Mr. Mahoney: Increased spending programs proposed by the NDP for social assistance, social capital and economic development would, of course, run into billions of dollars. Apart from the abolition of the sales tax, the NDP never suggested general tax reductions prior to the budget, although urging a host of spending programs on the government. Since the budget, though, the NDP have been outbidding the Conservatives in proposing tax cuts. Their deputy leader contended that personal income tax should be reduced by 10 per cent to 15 per cent—

Mr. Nystrom: Except yours.

Mr. Mahoney: —which would cost federal and provincial governments between $1.1 billion and $1.7 billion in lost revenue in addition to a proportionate reduction in equalization grants to the provinces. Again, the abolition of the sales tax on building materials, which was also recommended, would cost the treasury a further $360 million. If we take the figure of 15 per cent which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) suggested, the tax reduction would amount to more than $2 billion.

Mr. Nystrom: Hurrah!

Mr. Mahoney: For his part, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) proposed to increase the exemption for single people to $2,000 and the exemption for married people to $4,000. This would cost the federal treasury around $1,750 million and the provinces a further $500 million, based on 1969 tax receipts. He also suggested, though he was far from specific about it, that tax relief should be provided for those in the middle-income bracket. This concern for people in the middle-income bracket on the part of the hon. member for Waterloo is novel, especially to hon. members who had the pleasure of sitting with him on the finance committee during the past year while the white paper on tax reform was under consideration. As I say, the hon. member did not tell us what reduction or rate changes he had in mind for people in the middle-income group, so it is impossible to assess the cost which would be involved in his proposal.

It is difficult to know where one stands in connection with this general recommendation to alleviate the plight of people in the middle-income group. In addition, we lack a definition of "middle-income group", something which the hon. member was most assiduous in trying to dig out when various witnesses appeared before the finance committee last year. Perhaps he will take an opportunity to make his views on this matter clear at an early date. The hon. member also suggested that the budget was economic lunacy. This would have to be taken as something of an expert opinion and contrasted with the position advocated by the NDP, which would truly be the action of a government gone mad.

The government has proposed a series of measures since the last budget, the cumulative effect of which has been strongly expansionist. The government could have chosen to cut taxes instead of directing spending into areas of slow growth and high unemployment. The greatest advantage would then have gone to areas of the country already prosperous and with considerably lower unemployment. The benefit to slow-growth areas would have trickled down only partially and slowly. The approach of the government is in line with the course advocated by the OECD in its report last month to ministers on the Economic Policy Committee, namely:

> In cases where unemployment is rising toward unacceptable levels, attention should be directed to the possibility of selective action directed to areas of high unemployment, rather than indiscriminate increases in public expenditures or general tax cuts.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) made clear in the budget, there are real limits as to how far the government can go in adopting expansionary policies without creating an excessive risk of new inflation. One of the lessons learned from the sixties was that it is dangerous to expand the money supply in order to finance massive government deficits, setting the stage for a new round of inflation. Yet this is the advice the opposition gives us. This point, again, is underlined by the Economic Council in its recent report, "Performance and Potential".

> Monetary policy (together with fiscal policy with which it is closely interrelated) should evolve in a way that seeks to avoid large destabilizing swings in the growth of the money supply. There are long lags between changes in policy and their effects on the economy...For the creation of a stable environment for growth, we therefore consider it essential that the growth of the money supply over the longer term should be approximately in line with the underlying growth rate of potential output, with smaller swings around the rate of increase in potential output than have characterized past policy.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member for Edmonton West took specific issue with the proposal in the budget concerning investment incentive credit. He said it would have only a slow effect in spurring capital investment due to the length of time required to make expenditures. Indications of investment spending intentions show that there is a large carryover of capital programs already planned by the big-business sector and ready to roll once conditions are considered appropriate. These were deferred during 1970 because of market conditions and the expectation of a fall in interest rates. The effect of the increased capital cost allowance will be similar to that of a reduction in borrowing costs and it is expected it will produce a quick reaction.

We have been treated to a very similar response on the part of both the official opposition and the New Democratic Party. Their leaders are anxious to spend more money and to take in less by way of taxes, to provide greater incentives, increased social programs, increased expenditure on public works, extended and expanded assistance programs, all on the basis of decreased revenues and, evidently, without significant borrowing so as not to exert inflationary pressure on capital markets. This game of leapfrog, this game of bribing taxpayers with their own money, is far more typical of an era of minority government, of insecure government with the opposition tasting the prospect of office. Perhaps what we are looking at today is the phenomenon of minority opposition—an insecure official opposition and a New Democratic Party tasting office and hoping to convert ineffective opposition into official opposition.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, when I was preparing my notes for today's debate I made a special effort to avoid areas of sensitivity for the present government. I did this out of a sense of compassion. I really do not want to embarrass the government or any of the puppets of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Every day that passes must surely be embarrassment enough in itself when you consider that we end up with more problems and fewer solutions than we had the day before.

Canada is plagued by many corporate ills at the present time. Chief and most injurious of these to her progress are the following. First, a Liberal government and a Liberal syndrome of permissiveness, contempt of the law, corruption and waste in administration, and even contempt of Parliament. The latest example of this was the government's efforts to downgrade and make less effective the Auditor General's department. Second, there is a mounting national debt too great for the taxpayers to handle. Cost of servicing this debt alone amounts to $1,704 million a year. I obtained that figure this evening and I believe it is correct.

Third, we have an overstaffed and economically unproductive, and in some respects empirical civil service, in number and cost out of proportion to the needs of the country. Fourth, we have an extravagant and wasteful annual budget running currently at $14 billion, the source of which is inexorably being levied from fewer and fewer taxpayers in the middle-income class who at the same time are being deprived of family benefits and allowances.

However, there is nothing that one can say about the way this country is being run without causing great embarrassment to that army of experts on the front benches opposite. They must surely be experts, because this government and the Cabinet that is composed mainly of former civil servants can turn out more white papers on more subjects than any other government has since this country was founded. But apparently the brand of expertise available to the Prime Minister is not equal to the problems that beg solution. We on this side of the House, indeed millions of Canadians from coast to coast, would gladly trade all of this questionable expertise across the floor of this House for just a little bit of applied common sense.

The budget that the government tabled last week is a good case in point, Mr. Speaker. Our jovial finance minister has stated that there are solutions in the budget to a wide range of serious problems, though so far no one has been able to point them out. One day last week the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) suggested that the finance minister was the Charlie McCarthy of the chartered banks. I have to disagree with that analogy, though I can certainly go along with the sense of the hon. member's statement. Charlie McCarthy had real talent. McCarthy could fool all of the people all of the time and make them like it. Our finance minister cannot fool any of the people any of the time, especially from now on, and he certainly cannot make anybody like what he is doing. This budget is not recognized as such by many people. Indeed, one Liberal today called it simply a financial report.

Whatever the present government tackles, we end up with another little island of chaos. The fear is spreading across the country that these islands will all come together and we will have general chaos. However, Canada is resilient, and so are Canadians, and I firmly believe that the next general election will remove this treat to our economy and way of life.

There is one thing that can be said to the credit of the present government, and that is that it is consistent. This government can be counted upon to do some things as regularly as clockwork, and for this it deserves full marks. Here again I point to the budget that we are presently debating, in which the finance minister showed consistency. He tabled a budget when there was no demonstrable need for a budget at this time. That is why my Liberal friend called it a report. There was and is enabling legislation whereby, the minister could have accomplished any of the measures proposed in this budget that might be considered worth while. Yet apparently the minister was unaware that he had that authority, and so once again he was consistent. This is a nothing budget, and we have seen a succession of nothing budgets from the present government. I did not want to miss this opportunity to give credit where credit is due.

There is another area wherein this government is consistent and shows evidence of real finesse. The present administration has to be considered the all-time champion in the game of sloganeering. First we had the just society. This was laughed out of existence, and personally I was disappointed. I very much wanted the Prime Minister to create this just society because there were many adjustments to be made to our system. I wanted him to elevate all of us to a little higher plane of existence. I hated to see that one go by the board.

Then in the Speech from the Throne we were told that we were on the threshold of greatness. I really got caught up on this one. The idea that somehow we could achieve greatness in spite of the bungling and ineptitude displayed on the other side of the House was an intriguing one. However, my hopes were dashed again when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) exposed that particular slogan. Our leader reasoned that the Prime Minister was referring to the Conservative victory at the next general election, so I find I will have to wait a couple of years before I can achieve a share of this greatness.

However, Mr. Speaker, I really do not mind the wait, because every day that passes finds more and more Canadians wondering how this government, with one of the best mandates in the history of Canada and with the largest budget in our history, totalling $14 billion, manages to provide so little for Canadians. But this is the day of reckoning, the day that the government hoped would not come. The government has called the tune and has danced; it will now have to pay the fiddler. But that is not all. The slogans are still coming and they get better all the time. We now have the Prime Minister caricatured as Robin Hood riding through the country robbing the rich and giving to the poor. Robin Hood rides straight out of the finance minister's budget, and this is very fitting. If there were not so many people across this country in dire need at the present time, this would be the funniest slogan to come out of the government's slogan department in a long time. But it is not funny, Mr. Speaker.

There always seems to be a key phrase in every document that this government tables that points straight to the fallacies that are inherent in all of them, and this so-called budget is no exception. We are told that there are many rich people in Canada. In fact, everyone in this country who makes $10,000 or more must now consider himself to be rich. He must wait for Robin Hood to pay him a visit and then he must pay up—again, again and again. There appears to be no end to the price one must pay in this country for the "sin" of being self-supporting. There is no end to the penalties one must pay in this country for the "sin" of being enterprising and for displaying initiative.

A few days ago I asked a question in this House about the government's policy of permissiveness with regard to allowing Cuban embassy and consular officials to openly support extremist and revolutionary groups and activities in Canada. This question may be found at page 1716 of Hansard for December 3. I found out shortly afterwards that there is general concern throughout our country over this apparent disregard for threats against our social and political systems. However, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) answered in general terms about the present regulations being sufficient to screen persons coming to Canada to visit or to settle. He avoided the purport of my question and he had good reason to avoid it. The relations that exist between the revolutionary Cubans and other elements in our country made it possible for the government to get the kidnappers of James Cross out of the country in a matter of hours. It appears that all of them will be allowed to keep their Canadian citizenship. This attitude bears looking into.

There is evidence that this government is exhibiting a lack of leadership and concern with regard to safeguarding Canadian life, property and traditionally Canadian institutions. In addition to the unrestrained efforts of Cuban diplomatic officials to finance and train terrorists in Canada, the present government flatly refuses to use the powers inherent in the Immigration Act to prevent people like Abbie Hoffman, William Kunstler, the Black Panthers and others coming to Canada to spread their poison and treason throughout our country. In a recent issue of the Globe and Mail, MacKenzie Porter quoted from a speech by Dr. Roger Gaudry, rector of the University of Montreal. I think this quotation should be recorded in Hansard. It reads as follows:

> Ideological chapels have grown up in our universities so that a young professor who wished in certain cases to defend the position of a government that was not left wing, or to defend a position that is not left wing, would be quickly put down by his colleagues.

Dr. Gaudry in his speech was emphasizing the great danger we face today from the direction of our universities, the very institutions we should look to for intellectual defence of our system, particularly because of the influence of left wing faculty members. These people, these leftists, are getting a lot of direct and indirect support. The taxpayers' money is going to the Company of Young Canadians in spite of clear evidence before committee hearings that CYC personnel in Quebec have been giving support to the FLQ. When the committee hearings were in progress in the fall of 1969, the government said the FLQ was not a threat and that there was no reason to inhibit the CYC on those grounds. Scarcely one year later the Prime Minister implied that the FLQ was about to take over the province of Quebec and possibly the entire country, and it was necessary therefore to invoke the War Measures Act.

I pointed out earlier that the present government is often inconsistent, at least in certain areas. I should also point out that it can also be inconsistent in other areas, and it is the government's inconsistencies that pose the greatest danger. I could also mention the thousands of draft-dodgers, deserters and other weirdos the government encourages to come to Canada to swell the ranks of revolutionaries and also the ranks of the unemployed. But such warnings would only fall on deaf ears, ears that will not hear, eyes that will not see and minds that will not reason. What we are witnessing is a tragic comedy; the tragedy of dissipating God-given resources, both natural and human, and the plundering of willing minds.

But all is not lost. We have the blundering of the government to lighten our hours in the conviction that we have only a couple of years to go before the voters indicate that blundering has proven too costly to tolerate and that the Liberal syndrome and the fallacy and myth of "Trudeaucratic" charisma does nothing for Canada's ills.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes remaining before the vote, I should like to make a few remarks on the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) when he brought down the budget on December 3rd.

It will be remembered that last year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked the Canadians to tighten up their belts in the fight against inflation, and that in a subsequent speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) told them: Work more, increase productivity, to fight inflation. The Prime Minister said: Do without; while the Minister of Finance said: Work hard.

I remember that, at the time, we had said that the means suggested to overcome inflation would probably result in increased unemployment in Canada, mostly in underdevelopped areas. Our predictions unfortunately came true since, according to the December 1st edition of La Presse, more than 10,000 Quebecers lost their job in 1970.

For instance, the Canadian Marconi Company has fired 800 people since the beginning of the year and expects to fire 700 more before the end of the year.

At Les Industries Valcartier in the Quebec City area, a subsidiary of the General Investment Corporation, the layoff of 500 to 1,000 workers is anticipated before the end of the year.

The Northern Electric Company has dismissed 200 of its employees and expects further layoffs.

On the other hand, the United Aircraft Company which had a staff of more than 5,400 employees had only 4,500 as of December 1.

The same applies to the Wabasso Company in Drummondville which has apparently dismissed from 500 to 600 employees during 1970.

Going down the list, we would note that dismissals affect 500, 600 or 1,000 employees at the same time.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance stated that most economic indicators showed improving trends in the Canadian economy, an increase in employment, a decrease in unemployment and a recovery in the production of goods and services.

Mr. Speaker, if this inquiry had been made more seriously in sectors others than the manufacturing or industrial sector, we would have indeed found out that the number of unemployed has risen significantly, because a great number of farmers including those involved in the production of industrial milk have ceased producing because of the dairy policy of this government which does not allow the smaller farmers to operate their business and stay on the labour market.

Mr. Speaker, if we give the situation a closer look, we realize that a certain number of young people who are just out of school will soon be on the labour market. Although they have no particular experience, they no longer belong to the student population. Therefore they cannot claim any unemployment insurance benefits or obtain any other form of aid to the unemployed.

Thousands of these students are willing to work, but their names are not on the list of the 10,000 people who have lost their jobs in Quebec. They represent however a number of workers important enough to deserve consideration.

The policy outlined by the government in the budget speech will not be enough, in my opinion, to stop inflation and reduce unemployment, especially in eastern Quebec where conditions are alarmingly bad.

For instance, at Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière, a snowmobile factory employing a certain number of workers has laid off over 250 of them in the last two weeks. Those workers will be unemployed for an indefinite period of time, because the factory owners are unable to sell their snowmobiles fast enough. Warehouses are full and that was the reason for the employer's decision.

In order to get the economy moving again, the government should have proposed a tax reduction and primarily the removal of the tax on building materials. In the field of construction, the situation is none too good as this tax on building materials contributes to the increased cost of houses, and this coupled with the high rate of interest, prevents promoters from building houses and renting them at prices suitable to workers.

Mr. Speaker, I see you looking at the clock. I must resume my seat as it is 9.45 and the House has to vote on the sub-amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 6 of Standing Order 60, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the subamendment now before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said sub-amendment? All those in favour of the subamendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Saltsman) which was negatived on the following division:

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT BY MINISTER ON VISIT TO EUROPE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a round of important discussions in Europe. These included talks with government leaders in Britain, Belgium and The Netherlands, with senior officers of the European Economic Community and participation in the December NATO ministerial meeting. I took advantage of the NATO meeting to have a further talk with Mr. Schumann, the French Foreign Minister.

On this occasion I should like to report to the House particularly on western Europe, where events are moving so rapidly.

The six nations that today make up the Common Market are expected soon to be joined by another four. Varying forms of association will bind other European countries to the Community. Preferential arrangements have been and will be made for a number of Mediterranean countries and some developing countries in Africa.

The mood in Europe is one of buoyancy and confidence. The horizons of the Common Market are broadening at a time when the will to bring about a deepening of the relationships within it is increasing.

The government has been following these developments with the closest attention for some time. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has recently tabled in the House a paper outlining their implications for Canada in the light of his own findings in European capitals. I made it the main purpose of my bilateral talks with the governments I visited and with the Community to emphasize certain concerns that Canada has in the face of these developments. My first concern was with the disruption and shifts in Canada's trading patterns which would necessarily arise from Britain joining the Common Market. The second was to make the Community and individual members aware that Canada intends to take increasing advantage of the enlarged EEC as a major market not only for our raw and semi-processed materials but for the finished products of our secondary industries. My third purpose was to impress upon those I visited the political as well as economic dangers inherent in any tendency toward trade polarization between the United States and the European Community.

It will be recalled that the formation of the European Economic Community was accomplished by the negotiation of the Kennedy Round. At that time Europe and the world moved together in harmony in what was a most impressive advance toward freer trade. Today there is little evidence of this kind of harmonious relationship, indeed quite the contrary.

My discussions in Europe came as a logical consequence to the meetings we had in Ottawa two weeks ago with the senior members of the American administration, led by Secretary Rogers. The same points were made to the United States representatives here in Ottawa, to the British government in London and to those I met on the continent.

The timing of my visit to Europe was determined by the NATO December ministerial meeting. In the course of my statement there, I said that the developments in the last year suggest that we may have reached a turning point in east-west relationships in Europe. The sterile confrontation that has characterized these relationships since the end of the second world war is beginning to give way to a real effort to solve many of the intractable problems presented by the division of Europe. Interlocking negotiations with the Soviet Union are taking place on a broad front.

There can be no doubt that the conclusion of the treaties between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Soviet Union and Poland constitute progress. These are historic developments that could make a major contribution to a healthier situation in central Europe. The resumption of intra-German talks is another encouraging move even though these talks are beset with difficulties. The question remains, however, whether the Moscow and Warsaw treaties—as yet unratified—in themselves constitute sufficient progress to justify moving toward a general conference on European security in which Canada would be involved.

There was virtually unanimous agreement that the progress to date was insufficient, largely because no satisfactory arrangement for Berlin has yet been reached. Canada concurred in this view but in my intervention I suggested the Alliance should not be negative about the conference idea. I proposed that in our communiqué we note the useful negotiations currently under way, indicate our satisfaction that some progress had been achieved and express the hope for further progress in the near future.

You will note that in the communiqué, which I shall table at the end of my statement, Mr. Speaker, the member governments confirmed their readiness, as soon as talks on Berlin had reached a satisfactory conclusion and in so far as other ongoing talks were proceeding satisfactorily, to enter into multilateral talks to explore when it would be possible to convene a conference or series of conferences on security and co-operation in Europe.

The question of mutual and balanced force reductions is one NATO has been pursuing actively in recent years and is of particular concern to Canada. In Brussels the NATO ministers renewed their earlier invitation to interested states to hold exploratory talks on the possibility of negotiations on force reductions and indicated a readiness within this framework to examine different aspects of the question, including the idea of foreign force reductions which was publicly advanced by the Warsaw Pact countries last summer.

In the course of the foreign ministers' meeting, I expressed Canada's satisfaction with the results of the recent NATO sponsored colloquium on oil spills, which recommended that the governments should work through IMCO to eliminate by 1975, if possible, all intentional discharges of oil in the sea as well as to minimize accidental spills. This could be a breakthrough in one area of maritime pollution, particularly since the undertaking involves countries representing a high proportion of the world's oil carriers. It is an excellent example of NATO's ability to contribute in a practical way to the solution of problems of current concern to its members.

On the defence side, the decisions taken helped to place the respective roles of North America and Europe within the Alliance on a more equitable basis and to ensure that in the period of negotiation ahead the Alliance will be able to proceed with confidence.

Turning to my bilateral discussions with European leaders, I was struck by their determination to make progress toward integration. I have already spoken about enlargement. Discussions are taking place about an economic and monetary union and, perhaps more remotely, a common foreign policy. These internal preoccupations have overshadowed the problems enlargement presents to third countries and for multilateral trading arrangements.

I sensed, however, a growing recognition of the wider responsibilities that an enlarged Community must shoulder, resulting from its sheer size and wealth as the world's largest trading unit. I found as well an awareness of the dangerous deterioration in international trading relations which would arise from a confrontation between a protectionist United States and a Europe bent on consolidating its own economic progress.

In my discussions I expressed the positive Canadian view of the movement toward greater European unity, while stressing that EEC enlargement should not and need not be brought about at the expense of third countries like Canada. I impressed upon my European colleagues the need for a renewed dialogue between the Community and North America to avert the very real danger of trade confrontation apprehended by qualified observers on both sides of the Atlantic. In this connection, I am encouraged by the fact that Signor Malfatti, President of the European Economic Community, has accepted my invitation to come to Canada next spring.

At the NATO meeting I called attention to the impact of such a confrontation on the solidarity of the Alliance and suggested that NATO governments should be thinking of how best they could contribute to the continuing dialogue needed to avert the dangers foreseen.

While in Europe, as hon. members may recall, I had the unexpected pleasure and privilege of welcoming Mr. James Cross back to England in good health and spirits. I am sure that all members of this House would gladly have shared this privilege with me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): On a procedural point, Mr. Speaker, I am always surprised when ministerial statements arrive in opposition offices so late in the day. I am troubled because I cannot believe ministers are so ill organized that these statements are not ready, or that they would want to make it difficult for the opposition. Therefore I think this is a matter which must be turned over to Information Canada.

I should like to welcome the minister back; we are always glad to have him back. As I read his statement I thought that perhaps it was obvious that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) had been there ahead of him, and if there is to be a marriage of these departments I fear the minister will not be the senior partner.

I note, too, that he had an extra talk with the French Foreign Minister. I remember the days when this would indeed be news.

I quite agree that events in Europe are moving rapidly, as the minister states. This is still a dynamic and important area of the world which must not be, as I fear at times it has been, downgraded by this government. I favour, as the minister does, the enlargement and the rapidly accelerated moves toward integration of that very important part of the world. I think the European leaders and people are moving forward with imagination and vigour, and I think that Canadians can do nothing but salute them for their forwardness.

I note, too, that the minister found in Europe buoyancy and confidence. I wish he could have reported the same about Canada. I wish we did not have such problems as unemployment and a sluggish economy to dampen our own desire for the buoyancy which every forward-looking country should have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I note that the minister says Canada is and has been for some time following the developments in Europe with the closest of attention. I submit we have not been following them with sufficient closeness of attention, and that this is part of our problem. European developments have overtaken our concern, interest and awareness and it is only belatedly that the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, have rushed in to make a late assessment of what is going on. We have been far too late in showing sufficient attention to this tremendously important development on the world scene. I believe many in Europe in the chanceries of power and those whom they govern have been wondering in recent months if Canada's seeming playing down of its military and political interest in Europe was being accompanied by a downgrading of its concern for economic developments in Europe. Of course the minister is right in pointing out, as he says he did, the dangers of trade polarization, and it is high time that we became concerned and awakened to the dangers of this situation.

I read with interest the minister's statement on developments in respect of intra-German affairs and relations and developments between the Federal German Republic and Poland and the Soviet Union. I agree with him that for too long there has been in Europe a sterile confrontation on these very important matters. The world and certainly the German people have too long rested with a situation which surely was but an ad hoc arrangement after the end of a war.

While I welcome the events, the talks between Warsaw and Bonn and between Moscow and Bonn, I think we still have to look with clarity and concern at the situation in Berlin which I believe remains today, as it has stood for many years, one of the focal points of all the tension confrontations in the world in so far as diplomatic, political and military concerns may be appraised. We dare not forget Berlin. It is still an area of vital concern, still an area of potential danger, and the dangers are of explosive capacities. I notice that the minister, it seemed to me, gave a little lecture to some of the Europeans that they should not be too negative about the prospects of conciliation. I ask myself, does distance enhance our capacity for self-righteousness in these matters?

With the minister's reference to the colloquium on oil spills I find no fault. I go along with him completely and slide into agreement with him on that.

I notice there is no word in this document about Greece and nary a mention of Portugal. I wonder. Another problem which surely should concern NATO and Canada as a member of NATO is Cyprus, and there is not a word about that. For how many years do the United Nations and the world plan merely to retain the status quo in Cyprus? When are we to move toward mediation of that problem? Is it to be forever a military holding operation?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, because I respect the tradition that these statements be brief and because I did not have a copy of the minister's statement until a minute or two ago, I will close my remarks by echoing with sincerity and heartiness the minister's reference to Mr. James Cross whose courage, whose dignity and, indeed, whose charm under tremendous stress and strain have earned for him the eternal respect and affection of all the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) seemed to be unhappy about having received a copy of the minister's statement somewhat late. I can tell him he is lucky that it was not sent to him by mail.

I welcome the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) back to the House; we always miss him when he is away. His statement to the House deals mainly with two matters, the first of which concerns the problems that arise out of the enlargement of the European Economic Community. I must say that his statement does not give us very much information. This government has been completely ignoring for the last eight or nine years the fact that Great Britain and the other members of EFTA were moving steadily toward some relationship with the European Common Market, either as full-fledged members or as associate members. It is only in recent months that the government has become aware of what this could do to Canadian trade, particularly to Canadian agriculture.

When we recognize that side by side with the enlargement of the European Economic Community we now have a very strong protectionist element gaining control in the United States, we see the distinct possibility that Canada could become completely isolated or absorbed into the United States economy. At the present time the U.S. Congress is concerned with the trade act which would put very heavy tariffs against the import of certain commodities and which contains a trigger clause that would allow the President to apply additional tariffs at any time. The United States Congress is now discussing the setting up of a corporation which would rebate to companies exporting goods all the taxes they have paid, thus subsidizing the export of goods. This, of course, would make it quite possible for the Americans to enjoy a very advantageous competitive position in shipping into the Canadian market.

I hope we are going to have a definitive statement from the government fairly soon as to what position the government is going to take. It is all very well for the minister to come here and tell us, as he did today, that Canada intends to take increasing advantage of the enlarged EEC as a major market not only for our raw and semi-processed materials but also for the finished products of our secondary industries. But how?

Mr. Sharp: By selling.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What position will the government take with reference to the quotas and the tariffs that will be imposed not only by the present European Common Market but those which will be applied if and when Great Britain and the other members of EFTA are accepted into membership in the EEC?

The second matter which the minister has dealt with has to do with the NATO ministers' meeting in Brussels. Certainly no one will disagree with him when he talks about the sterile confrontation that has characterized east-west relationships, but I think there will be considerable disappointment when the minister tells us that the ministers' conference in Brussels threw cold water on the holding in the near future of a European security conference. The minister said:

> There was virtually unanimous agreement that the progress to date was insufficient, largely because no satisfactory arrangement for Berlin has yet been reached.

Certainly, there can be no doubt about the fact that the situation in Berlin is fundamental and that it is the key to some type of rapprochement in Europe. But surely this is part of a great many other tensions, and nothing could be lost by a European security conference at which Berlin and many other questions could be dealt with. Chancellor Willie Brandt of Germany is making valiant attempts to establish a détente with Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union. It seems to me that this is the opportune time for a European conference in an attempt to bring the east-west confrontation to an end, or at least to ameliorate it to a very considerable extent.

The minister makes reference to the discussions on mutual and balanced force reductions as proposed by the Warsaw Pact countries. Again there is no explicit commitment to holding a conference on this matter. It seems to me that there has been a good deal of foot dragging, and the longer this is delayed the longer the tremendous burden of military commitments will fall upon the nations of the world. A world that is spending $200 billion a year on military commitments is a world that is not able to devote its resources to the needs of people.

May I say finally, Mr. Speaker, that the minister made no mention of any discussions with respect to Portugal. If the newspapers are correct the minister, along with the representatives from Norway and Denmark, took some exception to holding the next NATO ministers conference in Lisbon. If that is correct I want to commend him for it, but I would have hoped that the minister would raise the much more fundamental question of whether or not Portugal, which a task force of the United Nations has found to be guilty of using its military forces to commit acts of aggression against a free and independent country, ought to continue to be a member of an alliance which is supposedly dedicated to stopping aggression and preserving the democratic way of life.

I think the minister would have also helped a great deal if he had told the House what position Canada took with respect to continuing Greece's membership in NATO, a country which has now abolished almost all the democratic institutions upon which a free country depends. An hon. member says that we may not have many members left in the alliance. Mr. Speaker, the alliance was formed of free nations dedicated to the preservation of freedom. You cannot preserve freedom by destroying it in your own backyard.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, as is often the case, we regret that the minister's statement was provided at the last minute and, moreover, exclusively in English.

The apologies we got today are part of a practice which has been going on for years of considering as secondary the contribution of the French-speaking population. It is too easy to always apologize. When will the necessary measures be taken to instate real linguistic equality in this government administration?

To come back to the minister's statement, Mr. Speaker, we consider that any effort by Canada to promote international trade obviously deserves our support. However, we must point out that our country never suggests any innovation or takes initiatives in international organizations. This is perhaps due to the fact that we do not really make the necessary efforts to be truly original in the fields of trade and economy and as the Créditistes have been saying for a long time if Canada took some steps to establish the special kind of economy which they advocate, it would be sufficient to impress international opinion. We could perhaps succeed in establishing real exchanges which would give rise to more prosperity not only in Canada, but also in other countries.

The difficulties experienced in that field—as far as the Common Market is concerned for instance—would be lessened, if we would carry out a policy meant to put the economy at the service of all citizens, as it should be. Thus we would in a much more realistic way promote brotherhood throughout the world.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order that might assist the Table in the disposition of this bill. It has been agreed that the government organization bill to which we have given first reading be dealt with at the committee stage in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION OF SEPARATE ACCOUNTS FOR TYPES OF WHEAT

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-208, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board Act authorizes separate accounts or pools for wheat, oats and barley. However, there are four distinct types of western Canadian wheat, namely, hard red spring wheat, hard red winter wheat, soft white spring wheat and Durum wheat.

These four types of wheat are as different from each other as are oats and barley. Therefore it is in the interests of equity that the producers of these various types of wheat be dealt with separately, which is the purpose this bill is intended to achieve.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HALIFAX, N.S.—FEDERAL BUILDING

Question No. 339—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Were tenders called for the work being carried out on the main doors to the Post Office in the Federal Building in Halifax and, if so, when and what were the amounts?
2. When did the work start?
3. What is the total cost of the work?
4. When will the job be completed?
5. What is the nature of the work?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes on February 26, 1970, for alterations to the main entrance of the Federal Building. The amounts of the tenders were: $16,750; $19,750; $21,760; $21,898; $22,485; $24,868.

2. April 20, 1970.

3. $17,500, which included some work additional to the original contract.

4. Before the end of the present calender year.

5. Answered by Part 1.

ADMINISTRATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES BRANCH

Question No. 399—Mr. Aiken:

1. With regard to the joint administration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Canadian Government Annuities Branch, do envelopes containing annuities, correspondence or annuities cheques bear the name of the Unemployment Insurance Commission on the outside and, if so, what is the reason for making it appear that those who have voluntarily provided for their retirement years by contributions are receiving or involved in the receipt of Unemployment Insurance?

2. When the present stock of stationery is depleted, does the government intend to use envelopes and correspondence paper bearing only the name of the Canadian Government Annuities Branch?

3. Are funds held to the credit of the Annuities Branch available for payment of Unemployment Insurance?

4. Have any funds been loaned, credited or otherwise transferred from the Annuities Branch to the Unemployment Insurance Fund since the two funds have been jointly administered?

5. Is there any fusion of the records of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Annuities Branch, with relation to identification numbers, recording of receipts and payments out or any similar joint administration?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): 1. Yes. Annuity cheques are sent out in envelopes bearing the following inscription in both official languages: "Unemployment Insurance Commission Annuities Branch". This is in accordance with the custom of indicating the departmental agency on government envelopes, although in this case the particular service, namely, Annuities Branch, is also included so that it will be clear that the payment or correspondence relates to government annuities.

3. No.

4. No.

5. No.

HILLSBOROUGH CONSTITUENCY—HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS

Question No. 400—Mr. Macquarrie:

4. Three, each in addition to other duties.

5. The first bilingual issue was that of January-February 1970, however, separate French versions had been published previously.

7. No.

CANADIAN INVENTORY OF HISTORIC BUILDINGS

Question No. 454—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many persons will be hired to undertake the survey of historic buildings recently announced by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

2. How many will be hired in each province?

3. Is it the intention to hire persons through Canada Manpower Centers?

4. Is it the intention to hire persons who are unemployed?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. A total of 43 university students were employed between June and August, 1970 on the Canadian Inventory of Historic Buildings. At present 40 students are employed for the period between October 1970 and March 1971. It is expected that some 114 students will be hired for the summer of 1971. The hiring of students for this phase of the Inventory will continue to the early fall of 1972, by which time the requirement for their services will diminish sharply?

2. (a) For the summer of 1970 figures were as follows: British Columbia, 6; Alberta, 4; Saskatchewan, 3; Manitoba, 2; Ontario, 7; Quebec, 8; New Brunswick, 5; Nova Scotia, 5; Prince Edward Island, 1; Newfoundland 2. Total: 43.

(b) Those now employed for the October 1970-March 1971 originate as follows: British Columbia, 6; Alberta, 4; Saskatchewan, 2; Manitoba, 3; Ontario, 7; Quebec, 7; New Brunswick, 5; Nova Scotia, 4; Newfoundland, 2. Total: 40.

(c) For the summer of 1971: British Columbia, 9; Alberta, 7; Saskatchewan, 5; Manitoba, 5; Ontario, 13; Quebec, 52; New Brunswick, 7; Nova Scotia, 10; Prince Edward Island, 3; Newfoundland, 3. Total: 114.

3. Yes, using the liaison which the Manpower Centers have with university placement offices.

4. Yes.

[Mr. Crossman.]

NATIONAL PARKS—WATER QUALITY CHECKS

Question No. 487—Mr. Aiken:

1. Does the National and Historic Parks Branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development maintain water quality checks on the waters within the national parks?

2. Do hotels in Banff National Park discharge raw sewage at any time of the year into Lake Louise and Moraine Lake and (a) if so, what action is being taken to eliminate the discharge of pollutants (b) if not, what was the source of pollutants found in these lakes during the summer of 1970?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. No. (a) Not applicable; (b) Fifty-nine streams and rivers were checked, 15 contained slight contamination and one heavy, this latter was posted. Wild animals are suspect as a contamination source. Louise Creek, outlet of Lake Louise suffered an oil spill from Chateau Lake Louise this past summer. A double trap system has been installed as a control measure. An old septic system and the Chateau Lake Louise Laundry are suspect as sewage and phosphate sources affecting Louise Creek. There is an algae which forms near the shoreline of Lake Louise during late summer. This algae turns brown and somewhat foul in time. An inadequate leaching pit of Moraine Lake Lodge caused pollution of Moraine Lake until September 1969. Two new leaching pits were installed in series. There was no observed pollution in 1970. There is a water bleeder pipe 1" in diameter near Moraine Lake boat dock. This has not been used for six years and will be removed this winter. The Moraine Lake campground septic disposal system was inoperative for several weeks this summer. It is possible that campers may have emptied chamber pots into Moraine Creek during this time. Also, a septic tank pumpout service vehicle was apprehended this summer for depositing sewage into a creek a mile from Moraine Lake.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DOMESTIC SATELLITE SYSTEM

Question No. 159—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What is the estimated launching date for the domestic satellite ANIK?

2. What is the estimated total cost of (a) construction of satellite (b) launching (c) construction of ground stations (d) other items essential to the provision of service as provided for in the legislation establishing Telesat Canada?

3. When is it intended to commence construction of ground receiving stations and, where are these to be located?

4. Will tenders be called and, if so, when and by whom?

5. What steps has the Government of Canada taken to obtain international agreement to obtaining a "parking space" for its domestic satellite?

6. What is the estimate of the Government of Canada as to time necessary to develop a system of direct broadcast satellites for the benefit of the people of Canada?

7. What is the projected cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for its role in domestic satellite system?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 20 is acceptable to the government.

EVALUATION REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF JOINT CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE, MANITOBA ROLLING MILLS

Motion No. 20—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by H. C. Pentland, Winnipeg, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding the "Evaluation report on the activities of the Joint Consultative Committee, Manitoba Rolling Mills, Selkirk, Manitoba".

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 31, 36, 38, 40, 50, 55, 56, 62, 64, 71, 72, 103, 104, 113 and 139.

ANALYSIS OF MANPOWER UTILIZATION OF THE MANITOBA GARMENT INDUSTRY

Motion No. 31—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by Summerour and Associates Inc., Atlanta, Georgia, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding the "Analysis of the Manpower Utilization of the Manitoba Garment Industry".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this motion calls for the production of a confidential report prepared by a firm of private consultants under contract to the department and a number of other sponsoring organizations, on the understanding that it would be available only to the sponsors. Because of this understanding, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDY BY REGINALD J. ROY REGARDING THE ANALYSIS OF OPERATIONAL REPORTS AND COURSES FOR THE OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING OF ADULTS PROGRAM

Motion No. 36—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by Reginald J. Roy, Montreal, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding the "Analysis of operational reports and courses for the Occupational Training of Adults Program".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Réginald Roy was employed on a contract basis by the Department to conduct an analysis of contractual arrangements between the provinces and the department under the Occupational Training of Adults Program. The progress reports prepared were for the internal use of officials of the department and as such are considered confidential and cannot be tabled. In the circumstances, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDY BY F. J. TOMLINSON REGARDING ANALYSIS OF COST ESTIMATES ON PROJECTS

Motion No. 38—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by F. J. Tomlinson, Ottawa, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding the "Analysis of cost estimates on projects".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Tomlinson was engaged as a consultant to provide specifications and programming services for computer work being carried out in the department. There was no written report produced which could be tabled as such. In the circumstances, the member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

STUDY BY DAVID WILLIAMSON FOR DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

Motion No. 40—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by David Williamson, Ottawa, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding the "Analysis to determine skill digit levels for all of the occupations listed in the Occupational Demand Guide".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Mr.

David Williamson was employed on a contract basis in the summer of 1969 to assist in assessing the skill ratings of occupations classified in the Occupational and Area Demand Report. His material formed part of the work of the department and as such is for their exclusive use. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

WHEAT CONTRACT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE USSR, JUNE 20, 1966

Motion No. 50—Mr. Gleave:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the wheat contract between the Government of Canada and the Government of the USSR signed on June 20, 1966, on the sale of 336 million bushels of Canadian wheat to the USSR.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is not the practice of the government or the Canadian Wheat Board to make public wheat sales contracts as such information might be prejudicial to the board's marketing operations. In view of this the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board would ask the hon. member if he would not reconsider and withdraw his motion.

Mr. Gleave: Question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT

Motion No. 55—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the plan of the special task force to study the question of summer jobs for students as stated by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in his address to the Canadian Vocational Association on May 23, 1969.

[Translation]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the documents called for in this motion are internal working papers used by departmental officials to formulate the student summer employment program for 1969. As such they are considered confidential.

In view of this, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDY OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE TRADE PROMOTION POLICIES

Motion No. 56—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study on the Department of Industry Trade and Commerce trade promotion policies showing a 12:1 cost-sales ratio as stated by Mr. P. Schutte, Chief of the Trade Fairs Abroad Division of the Department.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the particular promotion program referred to has been completed since the date of the member's last inquiry and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce feels he can now table a detailed statistical summary on the ratio requested without prejudicing commercial interests in the market. The summary will still not, of course, reveal names of individual company participants. If this is acceptable to the member, I shall be pleased to table the document.

Mr. Broadbent: That is a very unusual and acceptable statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. 56 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSULTANT REPORT ON PUBLIC OPINION SURVEY FOR DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR, 1968-69

Motion No. 62—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Canadian Facts Company Limited, on a public opinion survey undertaken for the Department of Labour in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the public opinion survey, made for the Department of Labour by Canadian Facts Company, Limited, was prepared for internal, confidential use. Under the circumstances we would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I think we should know what Canadian Facts Company, Limited really has to say about the public.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

FEASIBILITY STUDY ON MARGINAL DAIRY FARMING

Motion No. 64—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the feasibility study on marginal dairy farming undertaken for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the fiscal year 1967-68, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament excluding confidential references to individuals or individual firms.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the study requested was research undertaken for use by officials in programs planning and was intended solely for internal use. I would, therefore, request the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I call for the vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Some hon. Members: Chicken!

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CONSULTANT REPORT ON GUIDANCE AND ASSESSMENT OF THE CANADIAN TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Motion No. 71—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by the Economist Intelligent Unit on guidance and assessment of the Canadian textile industry, undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1966-67, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had indicated to the hon. member in previous responses this study is of a confidential nature, the release of which would be detrimental to the future relationship between the department, the consultant and the industry concerned. In view of this, the minister would ask the hon. member if he would not reconsider and withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is detrimental to the public of Canada not to know this and I call for the vote.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CONSULTANT REPORT ON THE CANADIAN TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Motion No. 72—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Gherzi Textile Organization on the Canadian textile industry undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1966-67, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this study is of a confidential nature, the release of which would be detrimental to the future relationship between the department, the consultant and the industry concerned. In view of this, the minister would ask the member to kindly reconsider and withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: The same explanation, Mr. Speaker. I call for the vote.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motions for Papers

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE REPORTS REGARDING ESTABLISHMENT OF INFORMATION CANADA

Motion No. 103—Mr. Lewis:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all memoranda, studies, reports, correspondence, etc., prepared by the officials in the Privy Council Office regarding the establishment of Information Canada and related matters thereto.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Barney Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the documents requested are part of the internal functions of the Privy Council office. In view of the long established principle of the House that such documents are privileged, perhaps the hon. member would agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the commitment of this government to participatory democracy and the giving of full information, I trust we can have a vote on this important question.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND WHITE PASS AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY REGARDING HIGHWAY FACILITIES

Motion No. 104—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the government or any agency or department thereof, and the White Pass and Yukon Railway Company since January 1, 1969 regarding highway facilities and transportation of oil or oil products.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, a search of departmental files has revealed that there exists no correspondence under the purview of this motion. The motion is therefore not acceptable to the government and it is hoped that the hon. member will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that but it seems passing strange that the Minister of Public Works at one time said there was.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—PROGRAM ON FAMILY PLANNING AND BIRTH-CONTROL CLINICS

Motion No. 113—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the federal government and the provincial governments regarding the Department of National Health and Welfare's program on family planning and birth-control clinics.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the provinces have not unanimously agreed to the publication of such correspondence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare cannot table the documents requested.

I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw her motion.

[English]

Mrs. MacInnis: If the Parliamentary Secretary can assure me that the provinces have refused to give their consent I will be glad to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion withdrawn?

Mrs. MacInnis: Did I understand correctly that they have refused to give their consent?

Mr. Isabelle: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

STUDY ON TEXTILES

Motion No. 139—Mr. Gilbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study on textiles as reported in the Annual Report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, April 1, 1967-March 31, 1968, on pages 51-52.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had indicated to the hon. member in previous responses, this study contains information provided in confidence to the department on the understanding that it not be disclosed. Such disclosure would prejudice the department's ability to obtain similar information in the future. In view of this, the minister would ask the member if he would not reconsider and kindly withdraw his motion.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the public would like the information and I would therefore ask for the vote.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLICY RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS TO KIDNAPPERS OF JAMES CROSS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what the policy of the government is with regard to the issuance of passports to the terrorists who kidnapped James Cross and who have left this country for Cuba?

[Mr. Isabelle.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the kidnappers did not leave Canada with passports.

Mr. Stanfield: I did not say that.

Mr. Sharp: They left with documents entitling them to travel. They have no passports.

Mr. Stanfield: I did not suggest they had. I asked the minister what the policy of the government would be with regard to the issuance of passports to these people?

Mr. Sharp: I imagine they would be turned down, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs can give no answer except to draw on his imagination?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to intervene at this moment. I would think that the further supplementary is hypothetical.

RELATIONS WITH CUBA AND ALGIERS IN LIGHT OF TRAINING OF TERRORISTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Yesterday I directed a question to the Prime Minister concerning Canada's relationship with Cuba and Algeria with regard to the FLQ. Inasmuch as the question involves several departments, specifically the Department of External Affairs and that of the Solicitor General, the Prime Minister indicated that if the question were directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs he would have an answer. I wonder if the minister has an answer.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If the hon. member will ask his question, Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer it.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of Canada's full diplomatic relations with the Republic of Cuba and the Republic of Algeria and the repeated allegations in the media that terrorists from Quebec are being trained in these countries and returning to Canada—in the latest instance they have returned to Cuba—and as many questions are being asked in this regard by the Canadian people, will the minister clearly state whether these allegations that terrorists are being trained in these countries are true? If not true—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this occasion to express the gratitude of the government of Canada to the government of Cuba for the way they have co-operated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I say this because there have been suggestions that the actions of the government of Cuba were somehow reprehensible. I want to make it clear that they acted on our request and on our request only. I have every reason to believe that this friendly country would not act in such a way as to be hostile to Canada.

Mr. Nesbitt: That does not answer the question at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously many members wish to ask supplementary questions. The hon. member for Oxford will be given the first opportunity.

Mr. Nesbitt: Have members of terrorist organizations in Quebec and other parts of Canada been trained in Algeria or Cuba? Surely the minister can answer that question.

Mr. Sharp: The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that they have not told us. I really do not know.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In view of the answer just given by the minister, I suggest that he communicate with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who had full information in this regard and told the Canadian people so several weeks ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADA—CUBA EXTRADITION ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A few days ago I directed a question to the Minister of Justice. He is in the House today. I asked him to advise the House whether there were any extradition arrangements between Cuba and Canada for crimes of this nature similar to the arrangements between Canada and the United States.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, a treaty was entered into by the United Kingdom and the government of Cuba on October 3, 1904, providing for extradition arrangements between Canada and Cuba. The government of Canada takes the position that this treaty between Canada and Cuba is still in force.

An hon. Member: Then bring them back.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know what deal was made, but has any thought been given to negotiations with Cuba for extradition of these three people in particular or any others?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, there are no such arrangements. If the government of Canada guaranteed safe passage of the men concerned to Cuba, I take it the government would have no intention of applying for extradition under that treaty.

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of Justice says he takes it that the government has no intention. I ask him if the government has any intention of making such an application?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I directed a question to the government. Because it is difficult to follow the ministers in their meanderings from portfolio to portfolio, I mentioned the Minister of Manpower and Immigration when I meant the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister not aware that there were broadcasts from Radio Havana—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PAYMENT FOR UPKEEP OF KIDNAPPERS WHO WENT TO CUBA

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I will be more specific in my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada made any arrangements to pay for the upkeep of the kidnappers who went to Cuba?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize one last supplementary on this subject.

AGREEMENT WITH CUBA RESPECTING LENGTH OF STAY OF KIDNAPPERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a supplementary question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he say whether there was an agreement between the Cuban and Canadian governments on the length of time the terrorists will have to spend in Cuba, and whether the Canadian government made quite sure that Cuban authorities would not be able to bring them back to Canada or to let them go to another place from which they would come back to this country?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If these kidnappers return to Canada, Mr. Speaker, they will be prosecuted for kidnapping, a very serious crime. It is our hope that they will never return.

Mr. McCleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps we might return to him after the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has asked his question.

Mr. McCleave: On a question of privilege, I think I have as much right to be recognized by the Chair as any other member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants will recognize that according to the rules the Chair has the discretion to decide when we should go on to another subject. We have had quite a few supplementaries. I suggest that an opportunity be given to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and a member of the Creditiste party to ask their questions. If it is the wish of a number of other members of the Official Opposition, we will return to this subject.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

POSSIBLE ENTRY OF BRITAIN AND OTHER COUNTRIES INTO EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—OPPORTUNITY FOR CANADIAN EXPORTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of his recent visit to Europe. Will the minister tell the House whether he has been able to secure any assurance from Britain and other members of EFTA with regard to Canada being able to gain entry into the markets of those countries, particularly for grain, lumber and various agricultural products?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In general, Mr. Speaker, the tariffs around the European Economic Community are among the lowest in the world. They are certainly a lot lower than the tariffs around Canada and the United States. In general, we have access to the market in Europe for industrial products and we have taken great advantage of it. Last year our exports to the Common Market were up by 40 per cent, an extremely good record. There are, however, difficulties with regard to agriculture. This is one of the principal reasons why the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and myself have been presenting the case for consideration of the position of third countries. This is very well understood. How much success we shall achieve, I do not know, because we do not even know yet whether Britain will succeed in getting into the Community.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I think what concerns those who are exporting primary products is not tariffs so much as quotas. Are Britain and the other nations which are seeking entry into the Common Market prepared to negotiate for a special status for Canada and the other Commonwealth countries, so that we may continue to enjoy a measure of preferred access to the British market?

Mr. Sharp: I think it goes without saying that Britain could not get into the Common Market and still maintain preferential arrangements with other countries; that would be contrary to the underlying principle of the Common Market. However, the British government has been urging the need for a longer period of transition; they have been urging that the quotas and tariffs of the Common Market should be changed to facilitate their entry, and this might result in some beneficial effects for us. We, of course, have been joining in these efforts.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Can the minister tell the House whether it is his impression that the countries of the European Common Market and those countries which propose to join are still disposed to take part in the round of negotiations proposed as a means of establishing a new international wheat agreement?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I raised this question when I was in Europe. We also raised it with the Americans when they were in Ottawa. We have been urging support for this course, and when I was in Europe I felt that the results were at least promising.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Stanfield: Could I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to explain very briefly just how the longer transitional period for which Britain is asking would help the export of Canadian agricultural products?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether you would wish me to enter into a technical discussion. The situation, simply, is that at the present time Britain operates a tariff system of its own, with preferences for us. If a long period of transition were provided, the tariff structure would change gradually from that which now exists to the new tariffs within the Common Market. So our preferential position could be retained for a somewhat longer time in diminishing degree.

POSSIBLE BRITISH ENTRY INTO EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—REVIEW OF CANADIAN ECONOMIC COMMITMENTS UNDER NATO

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the opinion expressed by the minister at the NATO ministerial meeting in Brussels, that there should be a constant dialogue between the United States and Europe to avoid a trade confrontation, does the minister or the government intend to press for a complete review of our NATO commitments and responsibilities, especially in connection with economic matters, in the hope of offsetting any economic losses which may occur to Canada if Britain joins the Common Market?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not specifically. My purpose in raising this question in the NATO context was related to Article II under which we are supposed to be co-operating in economic matters. When I was pursuing this point I was not speaking only for Canada; I was speaking for Europe, the United States and Canada. I believe it is very much in the interest of all members of the alliance that there should be co-operation. If we fail to co-operate we shall all suffer, not only Canada.

INFORMATION CANADA

ADVERTISEMENT FOR CHIEF OF ATTITUDINAL SURVEYS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister without Portfolio who answers for Information Canada. Yesterday I asked the Prime Minister about the appointment by Information Canada of a chief of attitudinal surveys at a salary of almost $23,000 a year. As the right hon. gentleman was not able to cope with the question, I ask the minister whether he will make a statement on motions shortly indicating the government's intentions, whether it is intended to set up an arm of the Public Service to take public opinion polls, bearing in mind the dangers which might arise from slanting, distorting or influencing these polls?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding of the hon. member's question is that he asked whether the minister would make a statement on motions. The question would be acceptable in those terms.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): In those terms, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no, because a statement has already been made by the Prime Minister explaining this matter. It has also been explained to the parliamentary committee in which the estimates of Information Canada were examined. Unfortunately, the members of the hon. gentleman's party have apparently not conveyed this information to him.

An hon. Member: There is an information gap.

PENITENTIARIES

PRINCE ALBERT—INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. About a week ago, my hon. friend from Regina East asked the President of the Privy Council whether he was prepared to introduce a motion in the House authorizing the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to conduct an inquiry into the riot and other disturbances at the Prince Albert penitentiary. The minister replied that he would confer with the chairman of the committee about this matter and give his answer later. Is he now in a position to make a statement about the intentions of the government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I am not able to reply directly today; I want to talk to the Solicitor General and consider this possible reference and any other reference which might be made to the standing committee dealing with such matters.

PRINCE ALBERT—RESULTS OF INQUIRY INTO ESCAPES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Justice, or whoever is in charge of the Solicitor General's department, care to make a statement to the House on the situation at the Prince Albert penitentiary regarding the escapes and, as I understand it, a hanging—a suicide—there and other troubles in penitentiaries in British Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to be asking for an extensive statement and I would think a general statement of this kind ought to be made on motions, unless the minister can answer very briefly.

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): I think I can answer the question very briefly, Mr. Speaker, as it applies to the Prince Albert penitentiary. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley put this question to me, as Acting Solicitor General, on Friday last, as did the hon. member for Skeena.

The proceedings of the board of inquiry convened to inquire into the escape of 11 inmates from the Saskatchewan penitentiary during the early evening hours of November 25 have now been completed. Following these proceedings, six staff members on duty at the time of the escape have been found negligent in the pursuit of their duties. The inquiry found also that their negligence contributed directly to the undetected escape of the 11 inmates. As a result of these findings, the six staff members have been suspended from duty and appropriate disciplinary measures are to be taken. All 11 of the escapees have been recaptured.

The proceedings of the board of inquiry into the fires at the penitentiary, which were referred to by the Solicitor General when he was in the House, are still in progress and consequently I am not yet in a position to make a statement or reply to questions as to the origin or cause of these fires.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, can the Acting Solicitor General tell us whether any further action has been taken as the result of a suicide in the form of hanging which took place, I understand, at the penitentiary on Monday last?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think I had better wait for the report before making any statement to the House.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the minister be prepared to table the report of the board of inquiry into the escapes and consider tabling the report of the board of inquiry into the riot itself when he receives it?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I should like to look at all aspects of that request, Mr. Speaker.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

SUGGESTED ELIMINATION BY TRANSFERRING DUTIES TO BUREAU OF STATISTICS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Since the facts which the Prices and Incomes Commission will be recording in the future as its main reason for continuing to exist are either being recorded at the present time by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics or can be added to its list at very little extra cost, is the hon. gentleman giving consideration to having this job done in the future by the Bureau of Statistics, thereby enabling the government to end the existence of this commission and save Canadian taxpayers several million dollars a year?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, knowing the hon. member's interest in facts, I am sure he will be glad to learn that in fact the Bureau of Statistics does not carry on any such inquiries as are envisaged by the Prices and Incomes Commission. Therefore, the premise upon which his question is based is quite incorrect.

Mr. Hees: Is it not a fact that the job that will be done is a fact-recording one and that the Bureau of Statistics already does this work in connection with the prices of all products? If the government is unwilling to take the action I have proposed, is it not evident that economy is for industry but not for the government? Why does the minister not admit his colossal failure and fold up this organization?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary question has evolved into a speech and I would not think that is in order.

Mr. Hees: It was a search for information, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that in fairness the Chair should recognize the hon. member for Joliette. I interrupted him on a supplementary a little while ago, on the understanding that I would return to him eventually. The hon. member for Joliette.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AGREEMENT WITH CUBA RESPECTING LENGTH OF STAY OF KIDNAPPERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

During negotiations between Cuba and Canada for the safe-conduct of Mr. Cross' kidnappers, have the governments come to any conclusion with regard to the length of time the Cuban government would be committed to protect these kidnappers on Cuban soil? Further, can we consider that this exile or this punishment prohibits the kidnappers from ever coming back to Canada?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question may I say there is no time limit. The Cuban government agreed to receive the kidnappers under safe conduct from us. With regard to the question about whether they can return, if they do return they will be prosecuted for the crime of kidnapping, and perhaps for other crimes. I do not know how I can say that they will never return, but if they do they will be prosecuted.

NATIONAL SECURITY

AVAILABILITY OF EVIDENCE FOR FUTURE PROSECUTION OF KIDNAPPERS NOW IN CUBA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Justice assure the House that if these alleged kidnappers or terrorists now in Cuba return to Canada in 10 or 15 years there will be evidence available upon which to base a successful prosecution?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the Leader of the Opposition that there is no statute of limitations applying to the offence of kidnapping. I cannot say whether evidence would still be available after a hypothetical period of time. However, I am discussing with the Attorney General of Quebec the possibility of laying charges so that they will remain in effect if and when these gentlemen should ever return to Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the Minister of Justice explain why the government is giving the assurance that if the terrorists do return to Canada they will be prosecuted when the minister is unable to give an assurance that evidence will be available?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MEASURES TO PREVENT MURDERERS OF PIERRE LAPORTE LEAVING CANADA—EXTENT OF WARRANTS FOR ARREST

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. Minister of Justice.

Since Canadian border guards have received specific instructions as well as photographs and detailed descriptions of the seven persons who obtained safe-conduct for Cuba, to cope with the possibility of Mr. James Richard Cross kidnappers returning, can the minister tell us whether he has also taken steps to prevent the murderers of Mr. Laporte from leaving Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is somewhat difficult to give a precise reply to the hon. member's question.

At any rate, replying to the question on the same situation previously put by the hon. member for Calgary North—

[English]

Warrants for the arrest of Paul Rose, Jacques Rose and François Simard have been issued by the proper authorities in the province of Quebec. Charges have been laid against Paul Rose for kidnapping, against Jacques Rose for conspiracy to kidnap and against François Simard for conspiracy to kidnap. The existence of these warrants has been made known to police forces across Canada, any of which is empowered to effect the arrest of these persons. All police forces in this country will do their best to apprehend these three men.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In light of this new information—and I am not making anything of that—and in light of the answer of the minister, was there something about not seeking to extradite in the deal that was made? If there was not, I do not see any reason why the minister would not say so and why extradition would not be used. If there was nothing to this effect in the deal, I would ask the minister to take a look at it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the question put to me by the hon. member for Compton related to the murder of Pierre Laporte. There was nothing in the negotiations involving safe passage of the people who are now in Cuba that related to the alleged murderers of Pierre Laporte, and nothing in that arrangement would protect anyone who was concerned with the murder of Pierre Laporte.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, could the minister say, in relation to those who were given safe passage to Cuba, whether any reward has been paid out in respect of their apprehension?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): To the best of my knowledge at the moment, Mr. Speaker, no reward has been paid out.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF BILL

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the statements made by the Canadian Mental Health Association that the proposed Young Offenders Act is, in fact, a Criminal Code for children which is distasteful in its terminology, legalistic in its approach and punitive in its effect, would the minister consider withdrawing the bill and bringing forth a bill that is more in keeping with the reformative and rehabilitative approaches that the government should take?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member's question is defective on two grounds. First, it is argumentative and, second, it anticipates an order of the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—NUMBER OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—PRESENCE OF PORTUGAL AND GREECE IN ORGANIZATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave a very comprehensive report on his trip to Europe, but there were one or two matters with which he did not deal. May I first ask him whether or not there was agreement on behalf of Canada that the policy that it had been intended to follow, namely, of reducing our armed forces personnel from 5,000 to 2,500, has now been departed from and that the 5,000 armed force members will be provided?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of the level of our armed forces did not arise in that connection. We did join with the United States in saying to our NATO partners that there would be no further reductions in our forces in Europe in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say whether or not it was decided that Canada would once more return to the 5,000 personnel who were previously in Europe? There is another question that arises, with which the minister might deal when he replies. Can he give the assurance that, at a time when unity is so necessary, Canada will not take or has not taken any part in moving to eject Greece and Portugal from NATO?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there is perhaps a little confusion in the right hon. gentleman's mind about the level of our forces in Europe.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, there is no confusion.

Mr. Sharp: All I want to say is that there was no discussion at these NATO meetings about the level of our forces in Europe, except for the statement made by my colleague the Minister of National Defence that there would be no change in our force structure in Europe in the foreseeable future. On the second point, no country in NATO made any move to eject Greece.

MILITARY INTERVENTION BY PORTUGAL IN GUINEA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Did the ministers' NATO conference in Brussels have at its disposal the information from the fact-finding committee of the United Nations which alleged there had been serious military intervention by Portugal. Was this matter taken up with Portugal by the ministers present, and did the Secretary of State for External Affairs, representing Canada, raise this question?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the House will be interested to know that a vote was taken last night for the first time in the United Nations Security Council approving by a vote of 11 to zero, with four countries abstaining, a resolution strongly condemning Portugal for its invasion of the Republic of Guinea. At the time of the NATO meeting we did not have any such report before us. I did raise, on behalf of Canada, the question of the site of the next meeting. This is a routine matter generally, but it seemed to me that in light of the developments at the United Nations it might be more appropriate to have the meeting elsewhere on this occasion. However, in the end there was an almost unanimous view that the best course would be to consider the question of the site of the NATO spring meeting as a procedural matter without political significance, and that is what happened.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the information the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just given to the House regarding the motion of condemnation passed by the Security Council of the United Nations, does Canada intend to take any steps with reference to the membership of Portugal in NATO?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the question of membership of Portugal in NATO is, as in the case of Greece, one to be decided on the basis of two considerations: would the departure from NATO of Portugal or Greece strengthen the alliance, and would it do anything to promote the kind of policies we favour? As hon. members know, I supported in this House the findings of the Council of Europe in respect of Greece. We have condemned the policies of Portugal in Africa, but I do not think this means that Portugal should be expelled from NATO.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DRUGS

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL PROTOCOL—EFFECT OF CANADIAN COMMITMENTS ON LE DAIN COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, I see that the minister and his Parliamentary Secretary are absent, so perhaps I should direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is scheduled to be in the House for only three more days before the Christmas recess, will the Prime Minister tell the House precisely when the minister intends to make a statement on motions about the commitments the government could enter into on the Geneva protocol on psychotropic drugs, and the effect of these commitments on the recommendations of the Le Dain commission report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House should perhaps know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is today attending a provincial health ministers' conference in Ottawa and that is the reason he is not in the House. The acting minister, the Minister of Labour, is present. I have no knowledge of this matter, but if the Minister of National Health and Welfare undertook to make such a statement to the House I am sure he will make it on one of the days he is here.

Mr. Rynard: I have a supplementary question. Is Parliament to be denied the right to make comments and give advice as to what the delegates to the Geneva conference should do, and how they should act? Are they going to Geneva as delegates to do just what the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Liberal party tells them to do?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, certainly the House should not be denied that right. As the hon. member knows, under the Standing Orders there are many occasions upon which opposition members can express their feelings and give leadership in these matters. There is, of course, the budget debate which has been going on—

An hon. Member: It is continuing after Christmas.

Mr. Trudeau: —and there are opposition days next week.

NATIONAL SECURITY

EXTENT OF WARRANTS FOR ARREST OF MURDERERS OF PIERRE LAPORTE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question.

As he answered questions asked by the hon. members for Compton and Calgary North, he said that specific charges would be laid against three persons. On what specific grounds does he feel that charges will be limited to three individuals and does he have definite indications that other charges will be brought against other persons and, if so, against how many?

[Mr. Sharp.]

[English]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the procedure which I follow consistently is never to say anything about investigations being carried out but only about charges brought against accused persons. Therefore, I am not in a position to answer the questions asked by the hon. member.

UNITED NATIONS

USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE—SUPPORT FOR CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS BY FRANCE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister was absent from the country, however, perhaps his parliamentary secretary will be in a better position to answer.

In view of protests issued by the Canadian ambassador to the United Nations with regard to the treatment given to the French language at the United Nations, could the minister or his parliamentary secretary tell us whether Canada has been given assurance that the situation will be corrected?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my Parliamentary Secretary has an advantage over me in that he has just returned from New York. He assures me that in response to a very eloquent appeal by our ambassador, which I supported very strongly, for greater use of the French language at the United Nations, he received a positive answer.

[Later:]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, this is a supplementary to the question put to the Minister of External Affairs by the member for Charlevoix.

Has the minister been informed by his parliamentary secretary whether France had supported Canada's representations for greater use of French at the United Nations?

SURVEY OF MACKENZIE RIVER FOR PURPOSE OF TRANSPORTATION IMPROVEMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. In light of factual reports that the Mackenzie River transportation route is the most effective for supplying the north slope of both Alaska and Canada, would he advise the House whether any preliminary plans have been made to survey the Mackenzie River in respect of improvements to navigation?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a number of suggestions have been made and a number of studies are under way. My colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has announced a change in a program under which considerable sums of money were to be spent on one highway which have now been allotted to the north. I think that adequate preparation is being made in respect of requirements for a route to coincide with the time the route will be needed. I have every confidence that developments will occur there, and I know my hon. friend shares this view. I think we are in a position to accommodate requirements for the movement of a very great deal of freight in that area.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—ESTABLISHMENT OF REGIONAL MARKETING BOARD IN MARITIME PROVINCES

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. Can he indicate whether the government intends to present a bill creating a regional marketing board for potatoes in the Maritimes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have no idea, Mr. Speaker.

CONSIDERATION OF ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND NEW ENGLAND STATES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It concerns a speech he made last evening in Saint John, New Brunswick, in which he referred to the important role the Atlantic provinces would have to play in continuing or increasing Canada-U.S. trade. Is the government prepared to give consideration to trade arrangements between the Atlantic provinces and the New England states?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

POSITION OF FORMER EMPLOYEES OF AUTOMOBILE PARTS SUPPLIERS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. As the motor vehicle manufacturers continue to limit the number of their suppliers in Canada, and in some cases are now manufacturing parts themselves, what is happening to the former employees of the plants that are closed down?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that is a good question but I do not know whether it is addressed to the right minister. They are either employed at other plants or they are unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: If the hon. member is talking about the broader problem of plant closings in Canada as a result of decisions made outside the country, I think this is one of the areas that the appropriate minister should study and in fact this question is being studied in great detail.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will realize I am trying to limit the number of supplementaries in the hope that we can accommodate as many members as possible before the question period ends. I apologize to hon. members who have not had a chance to ask their supplementaries.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE MARKETING OF SUBSTANDARD AUTOMOBILE TIRES

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises from a situation in the United States whereby automobile tires of substandard manufacture which are classified by the industry as rejects and are marketed for agricultural use only are finding their way into the automobile tire market. Is there any evidence that the same situation exists in Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will consult my colleague, the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for the administration of the automobile safety legislation.

PENITENTIARIES

TRANSFER OF FEMALE INMATES FROM MATSQUI TO KINGSTON

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who is replying for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the report on the status of women expresses concern regarding the need to decentralize women's correctional institutions, is the government reconsidering its decision to close the Matsqui institution in British Columbia and transfer the female inmates to Kingston?

Mr. Speaker: I think this question should be placed on the order paper or debated at the time of adjournment.

REPORTED GUERRILLA TRAINING CAMPS IN QUEBEC

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Acting Solicitor General. Has the government been able to locate any of the guerrilla training camps supposedly located in the Quebec interior and, if so, what action has been taken and were any arrests made in this connection?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Apparently the minister is not prepared to reply to the question. The question period expired a few minutes ago. Orders of the day.

Old Age Security

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OLD AGE SECURITY

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AMOUNT OF PENSION, MAXIMUM SUPPLEMENT AND ESCALATION THEREOF

The House resumed, from Friday, December 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-202, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Services.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, since the era of the Trudeau administration of a Liberal government we have been treated, with some interesting variations, to the old Liberal party technique of handing out crumbs from the rich man's table to the poor. In the days of the Pearson regime, or that of Mr. St. Laurent or Mackenzie King, the crumbs were simply tossed from the table without any great fanfare whenever it appeared that pressures were building up in the country to the point that it seemed necessary to do this in order to retain themselves in power. But under the present order we have had some interesting variations of that practice.

It may perhaps be that there is a mood in this country that will no longer tolerate simply the old hand-out, charity philosophy and therefore the crumbs have to be wrapped in new techniques. I suggest we have been treated to an exhibition of this in the tabling in the House of the white paper. Now, instead of simply tossing the crumbs on the floor they have been nicely gift-wrapped in pretty white paper with a blue cover in order to make them a little more palatable. They have had added to them an interesting new spice called "demogrant". That is the order of things in this debate. We have a fancy, gift-wrapped package called "Income security for Canadians". It of course contains some 60 pages of rather high-sounding phrases, statistical tables and the sort of thing we generally associate with white papers. I should like to make one or two brief references to the words of the white paper as I commence these remarks on second reading of Bill C-202. The white paper begins with these words:

> As Canadians strive for a better social and physical environment, one of their goals is to ensure that everyone has an adequate income on which to live.

Following through on that, the white paper suggests that the main thrust of the government's proposed policy for the coming years is the development of a guaranteed income technique as a major anti-poverty policy. Mr. Speaker, having read those high-sounding phrases in the white paper I was quite interested in the speech of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) the last time we discussed this measure. I think he took his lead from those opening words. As recorded at page 1772 of Hansard of December 4, the hon. member had this to say with reference to the general terms in which the old age security amendments are before us:

> It is my opinion that a guaranteed income in Canada in this technological age that we have entered, and in which we are destined to live for some time, is inevitable. Sooner or later we will have to have a total, integrated plan for a guaranteed income that is applied across the board.

[Mr. Speaker.]

That, I may say, is a good Liberal phrase.

A little later in his speech he said:

> I think if we are going to talk about this we have to recognize that our culture, as it is today, still has a kind of hangover or legacy from the day when it was accepted that it was good to work and bad to be unemployed or shiftless and not to work.

He then referred to the thrust of government policy toward a guaranteed annual income as a major technique in overcoming poverty and said:

> If we provide a guaranteed income across the board we must again ask how high we are prepared to go? If we put it too high, we are going to be in the position of literally changing our culture. I am not afraid of turning the culture around. It might well be that the time has come, again in a modern age, when we ought to turn the culture around and look at it from the other side.

Having introduced his remarks with this reference to the opening sections of the white paper, and having lauded the idea that we should consider changing our cultural attitudes toward the whole question of work as it relates to income, the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton turned completely about-face, just as I submit the government has done, and went right back to the old hand-out philosophy. I say this because the white paper, after referring to the main thrust of policy being the guaranteed income technique, goes on to say that from this development will follow a shift in policy of universal payments involving changes in the Old Age Security Act. That, of course, is the subject matter of the bill now before us.

When we look at this bill, we see that it does not come in any fancy gift-wrapping and is not spiced-up in any way. It is just a plain, ordinary bill printed in ordinary black and white type with none of the fancy trimmings of the blue-covered paper which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) tabled in this House and which the people of Canada have been awaiting with almost bated breath since the beginning of the Trudeau era. The feeling one has all too often in this Parliament is that when we are faced with the reality of having the Liberal party in power, we find ourselves suddenly coming down to earth with a thud and having to face the simple facts of the type of propositions the Liberal party places before us.

The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton said that the principle of this bill is good. Of course, I think one should immediately ask oneself, why does he think it is good? I would again refer to his remarks the other day in regard to the principle of the bill being a good one and would point to the fact that after talking about changes in our cultural attitudes toward work and it being a necessary part of living, he said that the principle of the bill is good because we in society have an obligation to help those who are poor and who cannot help themselves.

I suppose no member of the House would quarrel with the idea that we have a responsibility as individuals and as groups of citizens from time to time to do something to help those who cannot help themselves. We recognize this philosophy with regard to the very young and people who are infirm and suffer the accidents of life but, more to the point and related to the bill before us, the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton thinks the bill is good because we are going to recognize this principle in respect of the aged.

In expanding upon his support of the principle of the bill he referred to experiences he had had in a profession which he followed before entering this chamber. He talked at some length about his experience in northern Ontario where in his first parish, before having been in residence for two hours, 20 transients knocked on his door. He went on to talk about having to decide whether it is in the best interest of these people to help them so they may continue, as the hon. member said, to live the life of a bum, or whether he should deny that help in order to give them the necessary stamina and vigour to go back to work and do some hard living for themselves. So far as I have been able to follow the hon. member's argument, that is the basic reason for his thinking the principle of this bill is a good one.

I suggest that this is a rather classic example of the muddled thinking that is so characteristic of members opposite when they come to this old question of dealing with social security. Who was the hon. member talking about? He was not talking about the aged; he was talking about young men. What we have before us is a bill dealing with amendments to the Old Age Security Act. In discussing the question of an income guarantee and how it should be provided, we are discussing people who are no longer in the labour force of the country. We are considering the situation of people whom we are encouraging to retire from the labour force by various measures that have been adopted by this Parliament. They are the people for whom, under the Canada Pension Plan, we provided incentives to retire from the work force. I suggest that we are not talking about transient bums as we consider this bill, but about the older people of Canada whom we no longer want to see having to work for a living.

While it was argued in this chamber many times years ago before I was here—but I have followed some of these debates—that it would be demoralizing if through some form of public enactment older people were given means on which to live, nevertheless I thought we had reached the point where generally speaking we rejected that concept. The Old Age Security Act is, up to a point, a rejection of that principle. This is a principle to which I have never subscribed so far as I can recall. I am referring to the idea that there is something morally wrong or degrading in ensuring that elderly people may live in decency and in dignity.

What does this bill do? Among other things, it freezes at $80 the level of the old age pension. The bill is, in effect, a complete denial of what the government in its white paper says is to be the main thrust of its proposed policy, which is that of developing guaranteed income techniques. The proposal in the bill means that if one is talking in the context of a guaranteed annual income, so far as the Old Age Security Act is concerned the elderly citizens of this country will be denied for ever any right of access to the increased wealth produced as a result of the technology of our modern society.

The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton who discussed the question of the inevitability of the coming of a guaranteed annual income, presumably having in mind its general application, cannot logically say that those who are retired should have no part of it. I suggest that the bill flies in the face of the announced policy of the government. This is an aspect of the bill which is not part of an anti-poverty program but is, rather, part of a program for perpetuating poverty.

I suggest that this bill is a denial of the government's stated policy in respect of developing guaranteed income techniques in keeping with industrialization and trends toward automation in our society, because another aspect of the bill perpetuates the 2 per cent freeze on the cost of living index formula which gives no recognition, as does the present act, to the undenied fact that the cost of living has been rising by at least 4 per cent per annum ever since the 2 per cent was granted. I find it rather ironic, particularly since over this period of months we have been listening to pious exhortations about 6 per cent guidelines from people such as the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, guidelines which are directed at people in the work force and which apply to their increased income. We are told we should have a 6 per cent guideline for all those who are living out their active years, but a 2 per cent guideline for those who are retired—and no guideline for the banks and finance companies.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill had suggested a maximum cost of living index formula of 6 per cent, it would have been more in keeping with the general policies the government has been announcing and the things the Prices and Incomes Commission has been talking about. So, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the bill we come back to the inevitable fact that really all that is being done, all that is left from this fancy package which the government has introduced with such fanfare, is the old, unadorned policy of tossing the crumbs from the rich man's table to help the poor and the aged.

Indeed, I would suggest in this case it is not even a matter of tossing the crumbs from the rich man's table; it is a matter of tossing crumbs from the poor man's table to the people who are even poorer, because we are talking about money to be paid out of the old age security fund. So long as the upper ceiling on tax contributions into that fund remains fixed at $240 instead of following the normal income tax formula of escalating for higher incomes, the poor among the retired elements of our society will be supplementing the incomes of people who may be poorer.

I readily agree that the guaranteed income supplement increases will be welcomed by the people who are to receive them. Nobody can deny that. If you are poor at the level at which people have nothing to rely upon other than the old age security pension, then your pride will not be strong enough for you to turn away crumbs which might give you a full stomach. Therefore, undeniably, the changes in this aspect of the bill will be welcomed by quite a large number of people in Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that even those people should remember that in many cases the benefits they are to receive will come from the pockets of people even poorer than them. I am thinking of people who are retired on a small pension to which there is not attached even a 2 per cent increase in the cost of living index, retired teachers, retired industrial workers who are in receipt of a pension from a group pension plan to which they contributed and who also during their working years contributed to the old age security fund. Under this legislation they will not be entitled to a 2 per cent cost of living increase to their private pensions.

They will be denied an increase of 2 per cent on their old age security, which means that as far as this bill is concerned their income will be frozen for as long as they live. No matter what may happen to the cost of living, whether it goes up 2 per cent, 4 per cent, 6 per cent or 8 per cent per year, they will be frozen forever at that level of income. Mr. Speaker, I think in considering this question we should realize that if they have an income in addition to their old age security, if they are single of $110 a month or more, or an income of $190 a month or more from a pension or other source, they will not benefit by one penny from the guaranteed income supplement.

So when we talk about pensioners and freezing incomes that will not be adjusted in relation to the cost of living, we are talking about people getting $190 a month if they are single, or $350 if they are a married couple both on the old age security pension. No one can suggest, by any stretch of the imagination, that they are rich. That is what I mean when I say that even those who will get this increase in the guaranteed income supplement, welcome us undoubtedly it will be to them, should remember that by this legislation they are being put into a preferred position in relation to many of their fellow citizens who are living in retirement.

This, Mr. Speaker, is evidence so far as I am concerned that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was not in any way stretching things when he said at the outset of the debate that this was a bad bill. It is the kind of bill that makes me cringe because it has come as a poor substitute for all the high hopes held out since this Liberal administration began. This is the legislation introduced, despite all the high hopes that were built up by replies to questions to the Minister of National Health and Welfare about bringing forth his white paper, when it was going to come, and the hints dropped that we were moving into an era in which we would be thinking in terms of implementing guaranteed income security in the sense that we understand its possibility in our technologically advanced society. The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton said this was the sort of thing we should be thinking about; yet in his muddled-thinking way—I cannot help saying that—he apparently is quite happy with the kind of bill the government has brought forward. He is apparently quite happy that we should retain the philosophy of handing out crumbs to the poor.

It is increasingly difficult to accept those crumbs. The time has passed when one should be in any way grateful for those crumbs, because anyone who knows about the potential production of goods and services in Canada knows it is completely unnecessary that today anyone should be living at the kinds of levels that will be set under this bill in the combination of old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-202, to amend the Old Age Security Act, is now before the House.

This bill, tabled by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), is the result of the tabling of the white paper on income security in Canada which, after a fashion, stands as an admission of the liberal government's sins for having remained inactive in the field of income security.

For a long time now, the Ralliement créditiste has been asking that a guaranteed minimum income be made available to every Canadian citizen, regardless of his language, race, religion or social status.

Taking its inspiration in the white paper in which it hastily discards the minimum guaranteed income, the government now proposes to increase old age security to a certain level. On December 2, 1970, the minister said:

> In 1967, the combined benefits were $105 if single and $210 for couples. At the rate prices have been increasing since then, the corresponding values for these amounts in January 1971 would be $122 and $245. Our proposed rates of $135 and $255 more than restore what their pensions would have been had there been no limiting of escalation.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of income security is to give social protection to counterbalance the inability to earn a living. Therefore, the income must not only be guaranteed but stabilized. I think that in this connection the white paper is based on that principle and is consequently praiseworthy.

However, old people in Canada have always been considered as poor to whom a measly monthly allowance of $79 is granted. If they do not succeed in making ends meet with $79 and a few cents per month, a lot of investigators intervene to give them reluctantly what is called the guranteed income supplement.

This is perhaps what we dread most, the reluctant payment of a certain amount on the ground that the needs of the recipient have increased.

Mr. Speaker, we must not be prompted today by gratefulness to old people but it is our duty to recognize their rights. The elderly are really entitled to a decent living in Canada.

This is why we rejoice that, in his budget speech of December 2, the minister anticipates an increase in old age pensions. However, I should like to make some remarks as well as some proper representations.

The minister brings no change to the provision setting at age 65 the eligibility for this pension. As far as I am concerned, and through the force of circumstances, eligibility for old age pension has been reached well before 65, because very often, 50-, 55- or 60-year-old people cannot find employment anymore, nor can they undergo retraining. In fact, they are like derelicts in society and they cannot draw any social security payment.

The 55- or 60-year old who is ill or unemployed, even if he has managed to make the final payment on a little home and accumulate a few savings, is in a precarious position as he is not covered by any federal government program.

And if he applies for old age security pension, the answer will be: "Wait till you are 65." All that is left is to apply for welfare benefits. Then he will be told: "Begin by spending your savings and when they are exhausted you can come to us."

This is the type of reasoning used day in and day out by provincial civil servants in charge of welfare benefits. "When you are at the end of your rope, then we may perhaps help you." And my hon. colleagues are aware of the situation.

Should this 55- or 60-year-old person, who is not eligible either for the old age security pension or for social security benefits, apply to the Manpower Centre for a job or, being uneducated, should he ask to receive some training which would enable him to make a living, he will be told: Your chances of obtaining a job when you have completed the course are very dim. At any rate, should we allow you to hold a job, we would feel that we were giving you a bare minimum of social security and you would be taking the place of younger people. So, it is impossible for us to help you.

So, what is to be done with such a person? My colleagues of all parties will grant me that no government program takes into account the group of people whose ages range from 50 to 65.

When citizens reach the age of 65, the federal government begins to take care of them, but at 50, most of the time, the provincial government does not provide for them any longer because these persons have put a little money aside. Very often, they fall ill and have to be hospitalized. The medical expenses incurred then pile up and they find themselves in dire straits.

You will tell me that there is medicare but the fact is that I know scores of persons in my riding who have spent today whatever money they had put aside because there was no government program to help them.

Therefore, I want to tell the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the minimum age which he sets at 65 is too high and that it should be brought down to 60. Any person of 60 should receive the old age security pension, because at that age, 90 per cent of the people are jobless, or without any income to live on and discharge their family responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I feel this is an important point and I deeply regret that in this review in depth of the income security programs in Canada, the eligible age has not been reduced to 60.

I want to make this appeal to the minister and tell him that Canadians between 50 and 65 years of age, when they hold no job and do not get any income say to themselves: If I can only live long enough to get my old age pension. It is almost ridiculous:

I am in the office I maintain in my riding every week end, as many of my colleagues do, and out of 20 persons who come to see me, I would say quite frankly—and I could prove it—that 12 of them are in that situation.

These are unemployed pepople who cannot follow a refresher course, cannot receive welfare payments because they have small savings of $400 or $500 and who are waiting for their old age security pension.

It is sad to see that the white paper does not deal with the problems of people caught between two age groups: the age when one can work and the age when one receives the old age security pension.

I most sincerely hope the minister will consider this proposal and I am sure that if he calls for the support of all hon. members he will get it. In this respect, I hope the committee to which the bill will be referred will give the matter very serious consideration.

I would like to insist on another point. It is a matter of principle.

It seems to me that when the government grants an old age pension to one of the spouses it should be understood that the other spouse will automatically get the same pension. For instance when a senior citizen of 65 gets his old age security pension his wife should get it automatically too.

I think that we should not make distinctions in that matter. In his speech of December 2, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has clearly stated that the provisions of this bill are inadequate. His argumentation is very weak. When one examines it carefully, one sees that the government has simply brushed aside that proposal.

In my opinion, it seems logical for the government to consider most seriously my second proposal to the effect that in all cases, whenever one spouse gets its old age security pension, the other one should get it also, automatically, and without any investigation.

The third point which I would like to raise before this House—and this may be the most significant—is the following: from now on the government will hand out to our older citizens 42 cents more every month. What an increase!

Through the same provision the government is going to tax this old age security pension. Before this bill, the income of two aged people was not taxable but now, what the government gives them with one hand—the fantastic increase of 42 cents a month—it takes away with the other hand by collecting $3 or $4 in taxes. I figured it out for myself and came to the conclusion that by the end of the year the government will have collected more that it will have given.

Mr. Speaker, such is the ostrich policy that proves that the government cannot get anywhere with the present financial system. It empties the pockets of the taxpayers through taxes and surtaxes and gives back only bits of what it has managed to extract from them.

If the government is short of money, as it alleges, the reason is that administration eats up all revenues. It could be ascertained that old age security administration costs exceed the amount spent for pensions.

When needy single persons or married couples ask for the guaranteed income supplement, the government orders an investigation and the accompanying paper work confuses the older person, who often has no education. In fact, such red tape annoys and tires that person and even deprives him of sleep. He is so nervous that he makes mistakes while filling out the forms to be returned to the government. Officials claim that he has made false statements and that his application cannot be considered. The applicant experiences anguish, being isolated from the remainder of the society and unable to meet his needs.

This is what we call the government's "rub-a-dub plans", this socializing system which annoys everybody while failing to recognize individual rights, as Social Credit philosophy recommends, to guaranteed minimum income without government interference or tests.

Mr. Speaker, I insist on urging the government to abolish the guaranteed supplement income and ensure instead an equivalent income, the amount of which would be fixed by statute, to any 60 year old senior citizen. Such a suggestion would illustrate the legitimate and commendable wish of the government to assist people and give them the possibility of a better life. However, the government refuses to do so and says: we lack money. Of course the government lacks money, but it is simply because it takes money from taxpayers and gives it to somebody else.

For instance, on page 15 of the white paper on income security, this short extract which tells and reflects the spirit of the whole document:

> majority of people who enjoy greater security and affluence have been sharing their gains with the less affluent. They are undoubtedly prepared to do more in this direction provided they can be assured that their contributions are used humanely and efficiently.

Now, what does the government do? They publish a white paper, make noisy publicity and say to the people: We will increase old age security pensions because the government understands old people. They make this publicity in order to earn votes and to look like humanitarians so that people will swallow the pill. Once it is swallowed, the bill is passed. If we do not pay attention, we will be caught unaware because the government will tax the more affluent to give to the poor. This is called the concept of socialization, of egalitarianism.

We Creditistes oppose this system because we believe in individual freedom. If a person who is better-off has been clever enough or very often lucky enough to live more comfortably than his neighbor, so much the better for him and he must not be penalized for that.

As for the poor, they must not be penalized either because they are poor. There is no need to take from the rich to give to the poor since this is another injustice.

Here is what is advocated by Social Credit: Instead of taking money from the taxpayers to give it to other people, quite often by using complicated plans and formulas, after investigation a statutory amount of money should be granted to each Canadian from new credit coming from the Bank of Canada and based on the value of production, in proportion to the total buying power that is to say the consumption forces.

Thus the government would not be responsible for poverty and misery by taking the money it needs from the taxpayers but on the contrary it would give prosperity and freedom to our citizens while guaranteeing their economic security.

Mr. Speaker, so long as we keep fooling around with the current system, reform is far off. We are happy about this increase in pensions even though it is not sufficient. We are sorry to see that the government is letting down all the people aged from 50 to 60. I ask them once more that this age be lowered to 60 because I challenge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro)to tell me that even one program exists for this category of people who are too old for retraining and too young to get their old age pension.

In view of what I have just said, I ask the minister to revise his position and to lower the age limit to 60, so as to allow the spouse of an old age pensioner to receive the same benefits and, finally, to consider the proposals of the Créditistes so that our contribution to the relative ease and income security of old people will not be the direct cause of greater poverty in other areas.

Indeed, the government is well aware of this. In fact, when the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) commented the last budget speech over television, he recognized that although the government economic policies were designed to fight galloping inflation, to use the words of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), and to eliminate poverty in Quebec, and although he had approved them, they were effectively generating poverty in the province of Quebec.

Why? Because the whole thing merely amounts to a shift in taxes which increases the administrative costs which, in turn, absorb all these taxes.

Mr. Speaker, once again I demand an old age security pension with a fixed amount, payable without any investigation to every senior citizen in Canada. Indeed, every old people in Canada has equal rights, including the right to a guaranteed minimum income. And it is the duty of any government to guarantee this minimum income through the old age security pension, not by taxation which boosts poverty but rather by issuing credits according to the ratio between the productive potential of Canada and the constant state of equilibrium it should enjoy between consumption and production. That is the only way, according to us of the Ralliement créditiste, to straighten out the system and to really help the needy.

Mr. Speaker, what upsets me most as a member of Parliament, is the fact that the government, which is reputed to have good intentions, is in fact the real cause of poverty and hardship in Canada, because of its system of taxes and going into debt.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to suggest that the principle of the guaranteed income supplement be dropped, and that instead an amount equal to the sum of the pension and the guaranteed income supplement be paid all our old people. There would then be no need for investigations, forms to be filled out, red tape, all those things that annoy people and give no results.

Administration costs would thus be reduced by almost half and the surplus could be given to old people.

Basically, the government must review thoroughly its economic policy because that is where the problem lies.

Today, the provisions of the white paper seem the ideal solution to some members of Parliament but five years from now those members will ask to re-examine the problem because the amount of the proposed pensions will then prove to be insufficient, on account of the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, everything would have to be started over again. We must not delude ourselves and suggest that the white paper or Bill C-202 contains a marvelous solution. It is false! The problem will only be temporarily solved because the proposed solution is not based on the value of production and consumption in Canada, but rather on some superficial needs of old people. This solution is evidently not based also on an extensive economic reform.

This is why as long as the basic problem is not solved, that is the economic problem, such solutions as Bill C-202 will only be superficial answers which will only worsen the issue or delay the settlement. The more we wait, the more it will be difficult to solve the problem.

An example of this is that the debts accumulated by the federal, provincial and municipal governments, due to interest on bonds and loans for supporting programs of one sort or another, are increasing steadily.

Mr. Speaker, if Canada's senior citizens are under the impression of getting a little more money, in fact they will get less as this new measure will contribute to increase the national debt in view of our wrong taxation system.

Old Age Security

Mr. Speaker, we should rather resort to the issuing of new credits from the Bank of Canada, based on Canada's resources and on its productive value being at par with consumption, and not to promises as the ones that are being made at the present time.

[English]

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand-Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief remarks to make on Bill C-202, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act. The recent white paper on income security claims the government wants to fight poverty. Bearing in mind the inconsistencies I have seen recently in government white papers and legislation, I cannot help wondering whether this was really the objective of hon. members opposite. It appears to me they are more preoccupied with measures calculated by the computers to have greater voter appeal. At times there seems to be an almost callous disregard on their part for certain segments of our society which are in a minority.

A case in point is the government's suggestion that everyone who earns more than $10,000, even if it is only $10,001, is rich, and therefore not entitled to receive family allowances. This, we are told, is a valid conclusion. If a man has ten children and earns $10,000 a year, this beneficent government has decided that it will reduce his $75 or $80 family allowance to $50 per month and make that $50 taxable. If he has ten children and earns $10,001 per year, they intend to remove him from the family allowance rolls altogether. Earning the extra dollar puts him out of the picture entirely, and under the new scheme the family income would be reduced by $1,000 a year. Surely, everyone will agree with me that this is a ridiculous concept and one which will have to be adjusted.

Having said this, let me make it clear that I do not disagree with the principle that above a certain point people should not receive these social assistance payments. I do not agree in the particular case to which I have referred; the effect, as I have pointed out, is somewhat ridiculous and I mention it only to emphasize what I regard as a great inconsistency in this bill to amend the Old Age Security Act. The inconsistency lies in regarding a man who earns $10,000 a year as being rich and taking the benefit of family allowances away from him while continuing to pay $80 a month to paupers and millionaires alike. I know the government argues that the latter program is almost in the nature of a separate social contract between the state and the citizens; they say it has been financed since 1952 by a highly visible earmarked personal income tax. This may be true, but I do not accept the argument. Contributions to other social security programs may not be so clearly marked—I include the family allowance among them—but everybody knows that these things are paid for out of taxation.

The point I want to make is that there is inconsistency in the government's thinking. They will continue to pay $80 a month to all because they contend there is a contract and these people expect this payment. I maintain there are many people in this country making $10,000 a year, which is by no means a magic figure, who have been led to expect over the years that their family allowance payment would continue. When the minister speaks again, perhaps he will try to clear up this point without resorting to the old argument that there is a contract, because I do not buy that argument. People who have been receiving family allowance have just as much right to look forward to its continuation, and I am sure there are many more cases of need in that group than in the case of some people who will continue to receive $80 a month in old age security.

If the government adopts the position that there will be no cut-off point, then you cannot make chalk of one and cheese of the other. Obviously, many hundreds of thousands of people in this country do not need this $80, and if this is going to be the philosophy of the government, let it be so. I do not know whether if this payment is cut out, the minister is worried about getting the measure through the other chamber, because I imagine that the majority of its members have reached the age to qualify for this benefit. Nevertheless, there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who do not need this payment. We had an example of this yesterday from an hon. member who will not hear of any increase in pay for Members of Parliament. Obviously he does not need it, though he has reached the age where he receives it. I am also sure the former Prime Minister does not need it. However, I am not pinpointing these people; my point is that there are numerous people who do not need it.

Perhaps the minister would use his research facilities to tell me whether this payment of $80 would be made even if there were a reasonable break-off po nt. Perhaps having $50,000 or $70,000 in the bank would be a reasonable break-off point. I am not suggesting that ordinary people should be excluded, but I should like to know how much saving there would be if people who did not need it were not given this benefit.

There are many inconsistencies in this regard. For example, some mothers will receive under the new proposal almost three times the family allowance that they received hitherto; the payment is being increased from $6 to $16 a month. I know these youngsters have their whole voting life ahead of them but I do not think this should be a factor. On the other hand, we give our elderly people a big deal—an increase of from $111.41 to $135, whis is $24 or, about 20 per cent. On the other side of the coin, in some cases family allowance payments are increased by almost 300 per cent. As I say, there is no consistency.

I think ways and means should be devised to give our elderly citizens a real break, and again I emphasize that it should be given to those who really need it. Married pensioners may have to maintain a family. Many must maintain a home. They have all sorts of extra payments to meet that younger people do not have, such as special drug preparations for which they have to pay the same price as anybody else. We should forget that they will not be around to bother us much longer, and give them a real break now.

In its white paper, the government recognizes that a simple pensioner should not receive just half what a married pensioner receives; proportionately he is paid a little more. Although the government recognize that a single pensioner is single they made no recognition of the fact that a married pensioner is married, unless his spouse also is a pensioner. In other words, a married pensioner under this proposal will receive the same as a single pensioner if his wife is, say, only 62 or 63.

I am aware that under the old age assistance and social assistance schemes people in various provinces can apply for special assistance. As the minister has mentioned, the federal government wishes at the earliest opportunity to enter into discussions with the provincial government with a view to securing improvements in social assistance programs. I do not know whether this would be possible, but I should like the minister to give us some kind of assurance that in cases where pensioners have wives who are beyond the age where they can earn money, say 62 or 63, but below the qualifying age of 65, a provincial supplement will be paid that will bring the income of this married couple up to $255 a month. Otherwise, I think the minister and the government would be creating an unjust situation.

If the provincial governments agreed only to bring cases of this sort up to an income level of, say, $198 a month, I think this too would be unfair. There must be recognition of the fact that a married pensioner is married and is responsible for maintaining a wife and perhaps children or other dependants. There is no recognition of this in the white paper or in this bill. In the interest of such cases as these, I should like to have an assurance from the minister that a formula will be worked out along the line I have suggested.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments to comment briefly on Bill C-202 which is now before the House and to bring a few points to the attention of those who will be on the committee studying the bill after it receives second reading. I am at a loss to know why the government delayed so long before introducing this measure. There does not seem to have been any very just cause for this. I am also at a loss to know why the bill is not broader and more comprehensive in its outline. We were looking forward to something of much broader scope, a measure that would include not only welfare adjustments but perhaps an incentive to work program.

It is also difficult to understand why people aged 65 and over with a small income of just over $110 a month should have their old age security payments frozen at $80 a month. This brings to mind a very good cartoon that appeared in the Guelph Daily Mercury. It shows a senior citizen at a stamp wicket in a post office. In one hand he is holding a newspaper in which there is the headline "Old age pensions to be increased by forty-two cents". He is turning to the person in charge of the wicket and saying, "Easy come, easy go—gimme seven sixes". This cartoon brings out the point that the increase would be only 42 cents with the pension frozen at $80. This is a very serious matter. It is most unfair to these people. When we consider that inflation in the last few years has increased at about 4 per cent per year, it means that $80 six years from now, with this inflation factor built in, will only have a purchasing value of about $60.

There are many people in this class who even with the pension plus the allowable of $110 per month are living very close to the poverty line. This does not give them much more than an existence income. These people have paid into the fund at the rate of 4 per cent, if they have paid any income tax at all. These are the builders and the pioneers of this country who have played an important part in the development of Canada. It seems unfair that their pensions should be frozen.

I cannot help thinking of the debate on this act which took place in the House a few years ago. Along with other members of my party, I felt at that time it would have been more equitable to pay everybody a suitable and reasonable income across the board. There were great arguments both pro and con in this regard. I am broadminded enough to appreciate both sides of the argument. I still think it is discriminatory that those who have worked and saved during their lives to put something away for their retirement will not receive the supplementary benefit. This seems morally wrong. Many of these people have done without the things they wanted. This bill discourages a person from working and saving.

A person who is now eligible for the supplement is discouraged to go out and do light work because for every $2 he earns, $1 is deducted from the supplement. Many people like to help members of the elderly class by offering them odd jobs. Because of the provisions of this bill, elderly people will decide to sit at home on their verandas and read books, which is detrimental to their health. It is good for a person aged 65 to do light work and earn a little extra income.

Another feature of this measure to which I shall refer briefly is the cost of administration. We learned a few years ago, when we discussed this matter, that a very large part of the fund was used for administrative purposes. Perhaps we could cut the administrative staff and thereby save enough to allow an increase in pensions to $125 or $150 per month. The administrative costs are fantastically high. I must also add there are tremendous administrative difficulties. I find it necessary, and I am pleased to do so, to help many senior citizens in my area apply for supplementary benefits. In January I set aside a day or two to assist these people in filling out their application forms. Many people in the age group of 65 to 80 have difficulty with these forms. In many cases they do not have a member of their family to assist them. On occasions they make errors and understate their incomes, and on other occasions the department makes errors.

In some instances, as a result of errors made, a pensioner might find he has been overpaid. Often it is six or eight months before the overpayment is discovered. The pensioner then has to pay back a certain amount each month. This amount is deducted from his pension cheque, and because the money has been spent a real problem exists. In some cases the error was not made by the pensioner but by the department. I think it would be fair in such case that the pensioner should be liable for only half the overpayment, and the department which made the error should be liable for the other half.

These are some of the matters which have come to my attention since the supplementary payment has been in operation. When this bill is before the committee I hope the members of the committee will take a close look at some of its clauses. In clause 7 for example, the time for repayment should be specified; repayment of overpayment caused by administrative errors may bring about great hardship. This provision should be amended so that the cost of overpayment through administrative error is at least partially borne by the administration.

Clause 8 gives the governor in council power of regulation to determine the month in which an applicant or his spouse has ceased to hold office or employment, carry on business, or suffers loss or reduction of private pension income. These matters should not be made subject to regulation but should be determined by a third party—a board, administration or tribunal, but not by the governor in council. Briefly, those are clauses which I believe should be reconsidered by the members of the committee when they examine the bill.

The whole question of welfare would seem to be a hodge-podge. It has grown up like Topsy. I think it is time we had a much better system than that which exists today. I had hoped this would be the case when the minister tabled this bill, but it would appear that we are to continue in the same topsyturvy way of administering and distributing welfare. I cannot understand why the minister did not explain to the House and to the public the reason the people whose pension is to be frozen at $80 are not to have the 2 per cent increase each year, the same as those who receive the pension plus the supplement.

This government has instituted a plan whereby the 2 per cent inflationary factor is built into the Canada Pension Plan. It is also built into some civil service pensions and the RCMP pension. It would seem that this has been the policy all along. Here, however, they penalize the senior citizens of our country by not allowing them to have this built-in escalation which in my opinion they have the same right to receive as anyone else. As I mentioned earlier, the $80 will be worth only $60 in about six years from now because the yearly inflation factor is 4 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a few observations in respect of this very comprehensive and important bill dealing with our senior citizens, who are worthy of better treatment than they are receiving in the measure now before us.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in the debate on second reading of Bill C-202 may I say that I think the first thing all Canadians and all Members of Parliament should realize is that the greatness of this country naturally stems from our senior citizens. I believe that too often in the past some of our young people in society, including myself, have not really looked the way they should upon the senior citizen and particularly the message they are trying to get across to us in respect of their rights in society.

President Nyerere of Tanzania made very clear in some of his essays on Socialism the contribution the senior people in his country are making and will be making. I believe that we are not living up to the meaning contained in the words of President Nyerere in respect of the part our senior citizens have played. We seem to have a situation in which we deliberately try to divide and conquer this group in our society.

This bill provides a basic $80 a month with no consideration for escalation, and yet we see that the government is proposing an escalation clause in respect of the supplements. In our society it is not right that one group of people should be treated differently from others. If the payment of $80 is included in the bill, an escalation clause should be included to bring it into line with other portions of the bill. It is difficult to understand why the government considers that $80 a month should be the basic amount, when the Economic Council of Canada has stated that the minimum should be $150 a month.

If we expect to have an equitable distribution of wealth in this country, these people should have part of it. We do not seem to realize what is entailed in a planned economy, although we do realize that we should have such an economy. There is no reason to suggest that it is not necessary to take money from a particular segment of society in order to provide for our senior citizens.

In this bill a provision has been deliberately made whereby some people in society will receive only the $80 a month basic pension and will not be entitled to any type of increase. These people will look upon those who will receive the supplement as being in a different situation. I suggest it is not too late for the government to at least make the bill a little more palatable by including an escalation clause in respect of the small amount of $80 which has been suggested. I am certain that before the bill leaves the committee, consideration will be given to this suggestion. If the government indicates that it is prepared to do something about this matter right now, the length of time the bill will be considered by the Standing Committee will be greatly reduced.

There is a realization of the state of poverty which becomes more acute as time goes on. We should realize that these people who have set aside a small amount of money are entitled to recognition. We must realize that the people who will receive only the basic amount of $80 a month will be faced with property taxes which are increasing by 50 per cent in some areas. We know, for example, that some property taxes in Ottawa have risen by 25 per cent in the last year.

With the system of taxation we have at this time, we know that costs will not go down and that people who own property will be obligated, and rightfully so, to pay the property tax. I suggest that if we are to give any consideration to our senior citizens who wish to retain their homes, the property tax must be paid in some other way. I know of many cases throughout the country and in my constituency where people have had to give up their homes because they have been unable to pay the property taxes. I am certain that this 14-cent increase will not enhance their financial position in so far as their home is concerned.

It seems to me that we must accept some kind of equality. I do not think the bill before us can possibly be called the rule of law and equality for this nation. At the present time the law of this nation is dictated by the Liberal government and they will have to stand trial for subjecting these people to such a low basic old age pension. I am sure there is a method whereby the government and this House could redistribute the wealth in this country to bring equality to the citizens of Canada so they can be proud of being Canadian. I am sure we have all seen situations in the past where wage increases have been based on a certain percentage. This, again, accentuates the difference between the haves and the have-nots.

I think departments of government should consider the escalator clause, as they have with regard to other increases which were based on the cost of living. Surely the government can accept this principle and include in the basic amount an escalator provision which would make the assistance more consistent with the cost of living. Also, the 2 per cent provided by the government is far from sufficient. I am sure that the DBS figures reflect the situation as it exists so far as the equitable distribution of wealth is concerned.

We know that people living on old age assistance, and even those subsisting on the basic amount, continue to be confronted by the same situation as everyone else in the country; but they have no way of stretching their dollar to offset the high cost of medicines, for example. They have no means of taking in some of the entertainment to which they should be entitled, unless there is an escalation in the basic amount of pension which they receive. If the government is suggesting that there should not be a basic pension—in effect that is what they are saying in the bill before us—they should come out and say so, instead of saying they are going to divide our society into two groups and give some people a little increase while others will not be considered.

I hope that when this bill goes to committee, senior citizens and their organizations will be heard and the government will pay attention to their representations. I hope all Members of Parliament will realize that we must recognize these people as being members of the Canadian society. If the government does that, surely it will make amendments to the bill so that everyone in our society will be treated equally. Surely it is not asking too much at this time to consider the 510,000 people who would be affected if they were included under this bill. These people have been included in other types of settlement that have been made. There is no reason why these people cannot be included in this bill.

I am sure that more observations will be made on this subject, because there are millions of poor in Canada. People in other countries have a planned economy, while we have everything that is needed to bring about a planned economy but cannot achieve it. I am certain that if we had a planned economy the distribution of wealth and income of this country could be adjusted to take into consideration those people who have played a great part in the making of Canada.

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is my duty to take part in the debate on second reading of this bill because many of my constituents who are having a very difficult time know that this measure will affect them. The bill before the House is an odd phenomenon and reflects the ineptness of the white paper on income security for Canadians. The white paper on income security claims that the government wants to fight poverty. If this is so, this bill is a pretty poor weapon and the poverty line is secure.

Let us state now that a full adjustment for the rising cost of living should be given to all recipients whether or not they receive the guaranteed income supplement. This adjustment should be consistent with the annual cost of living index. Money is currently available for this purpose. The fund has had large and steady surpluses for several years, and the balance at the end of the 1969-70 fiscal year was about $725 million. For the majority of those who receive welfare payments there is no real incentive built into the current program which would encourage them to work and be independent.

I should like to comment on clause 7. The time for repayment should be specified in clause 7 (a). With regard to clause 7 (b), repayment of overpayment caused by administrative error may cause great hardship. This arrangement should be amended so that the cost of overpayment caused by administrative error is at least partially borne by the administration. The recipient should not have to pay for administration errors. Clause 8 gives the governor in council power of regulation to determine the month in which an applicant or his spouse ceased to hold office or employment or carry on business, or suffered loss or reduction of private pension income. These matters should not be made subject to regulation but should be determined at least by a third party—a board or administrative tribunal, but not by governor in council.

I should like to refer hon. members to the research office paper on statutory instruments. Criticism of the powers and use of regulation by the governor in council is relevant in this context. In October of 1970, 1,704,068 people received old age pensions. The present flat rate for old age pensions is $79.58 per month. The proposed flat rate increase amounts to 42 cents a month. The poverty line in 1968 for single persons was fixed at $1,800 and for married couples at $3,000. More than 50 per cent of Canadians 65 years of age and over live below the poverty line. The present guaranteed income supplement pays a total of $25.75 a week. Under the bill, guaranteed income supplement benefits are increased to $95 a month for married couples and to $55 for qualified single persons.

Changes in the old age pension would become effective on January 1, 1971. Changes in the guaranteed income supplement would be effective as of April 1, 1971. Transitional rates regarding guaranteed income supplements would be as follows: Between January 1 and March 31, 1971, the guaranteed income supplement would be $33.61 monthly for an individual and $67.22 per couple. These amounts would have been payable to guaranteed income supplement recipients in January through normal escalation under existing legislation. Income supplements could assist pensioners in the poverty group who are facing increased costs during the winter months.

On the economic front, the fight against inflation seems to be waged on a "victory at any cost" basis and the old age pensioners are the scapegoats. The old age pensioners are in a special category in our society and are undeniably suffering from the effects of inflation. With ever-increasing unemployment throughout Canada there is virtually no hope for an able pensioner to augment his meagre income. This situation is worsened during the winter months. Steps should be taken to assist the pensioner just existing at the poverty level to meet the higher running costs of the winter months. The increases to be implemented will just serve to allow the pensioners to catch up for the time they have been frozen at a 2 per cent annual increase. The cost of living has risen more than twice that amount.

Surely this country is not so hard-up, surely times are not so desperate that we must further penalize our old people in order to come to grips with inflation, and surely this should not be done by a government that professes to be taking us into an age of greatness. We have mass unemployment. Pensioners, both old age pensioners and war pensioners, are among the unemployed. With the present recommendations there is no incentive for them to get out and help themselves. I know of many elderly couples where one spouse is in receipt of a pension but the other cannot find work, and because of pride they do not want to plead their case. They are struggling along, trying to live on a single pension. I know of many cases where a couple is receiving a pension and is attempting to struggle along on a smallholding in districts where even well-equipped farms are meeting difficulty under present conditions. In many cases these people receive no supplementary allowance; all they receive is $79.58 per month.

These people have not drawn their plight to the attention of the authorities, but I know the hardship they are suffering. Surely greater attention should be paid to these senior citizens by the authorities. I have drawn a number of these cases to the attention of municipal authorities. We all know how much the cost of living has risen. I believe our senior citizens should be treated much better than they are, particularly when there is so much unemployment affecting our young, able-bodied people. I appreciate that the government has finally started to come to grips with this problem, but we have much catching up to do. Many of our senior citizens are in dire need.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to make some comments on this bill. I think it is a very important bill. It affects over one and a half million Canadians. It affects those Canadians to which all of us owe so much. I know that in my constituency many of the people who first settled the area are still there. Now they are senior citizens. These are the people who laid the foundations of my province and, of course, of our country. Many of these people who laid the basic foundation of our country are today faced with many injustices and inequities that are perpetuated because of government policies, or should I say lack of policies, where the government does not really care about them. Many of the elderly people who first settled the country now live in poverty, and as a result of this bill they will continue to live in poverty.

This is the main reason why I consider this bill is a bad bill. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is a typical Liberal bill. It is something that appeases a few people. It is something that would clear the conscience of a few middle-class Liberals. It may clear the conscience of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) but it does not do much for the people who are living out in the country, for the old people and for those who are living in houses that are unfit for people to live in, people who will still be living below the poverty line. It does not mean much to them.

I suggest that this bill is not really fundamental. It does not change anything. It does not redistribute the wealth of the country. What it does is redistribute poverty. For this reason I think the bill should be opposed vigorously by all of us who are concerned about this problem, and I do hope the minister will seriously re-evaluate his position and introduce two or three basic fundamental amendments to the bill.

I have said that this bill is really redistributing poverty among old people. It will not be much of a Christmas gift for our senior citizens. I suggest that the basic rate should be much higher. We in this party are suggesting a basic rate of $150 per month, along with an escalator clause. Under the bill we are to have a flat rate of $80 a month. This is 42 cents more than pensioners are receiving this month. We also find that the minimum income of pensioners will be going up slightly. Under the bill, the minimum income for a single pensioner is going up to $1,600 per year and for a married couple it is going up to $3,060 per year.

We all welcome these small increases because I think we all realize that, even psychologically, if someone is tramping on your foot and he gets off your foot a little, you feel better. So we are happy that there is a small increase. But if we tend to be satisfied with this increase we are only fooling ourselves. Those of us who are satisfied are just hiding in the smug complacency of Parliament; we do not know what our older people are facing.

All I have to do to prove my point is refer to the studies made by the Economic Council of Canada and by Senator Croll on the matter of poverty in Canada. In 1968 the poverty level for a single person in Canada was set at $1,800 a year. According to Senator Croll, who considered the increase in the cost of living, in 1970 this figure should be raised to $1,944. If this bill passes it will raise the minimum pension for a person with no other income to $1,600. But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. The person with a "tremendous" income of $1,600 will have to pay income tax because our government believes he is making two much money and does not need it all. For this reason I think we need some basic and fundamental changes in this bill. Let's not fool ourselves. I hear the minister saying that we need more money. It seems to me that in Canada we have a great deal of money for other things. We have money to subsidize certain sectors of private industry. We have all kinds of money to spend on things that really are not important when it comes down to people who are not as privileged as others. Yet all of a sudden we run out of money.

I suggest that we should make amendments to this bill in reference to the escalator clause. Under the new requirements the escalator clause will not apply to the flat rate of $80 a month, but it applies to the flat rate today. The 2 per cent applicable to the supplement is not adequate, and I think the minister is fooling himself if he thinks the cost of living is going to increase by only 2 per cent next year and the year after. Why does he set $80 a month as the basic flat rate for the old age pension? This figure is ridiculous. Many older people who are without other means will find this amount far from adequate in order to live in Canada at today's high cost of living.

Under this bill only 60 per cent of the people now receiving the old age security pension will be eligible for the guaranteed income supplement. That is, 60 per cent of 1,700,000 pensioners will receive the supplement and the remainder, 510,000, will not receive it. But many of these pensioners also need extra help. I have already said, Mr. Speaker, that those people receiving the old age pension today will not be exempt from income tax, and this seems rather ridiculous. When the basic exemption for income tax was set in this country, the cost of living was not as high as it is today. We could get around this problem by doubling the exemption for old people, making it $2,000 instead of $1,000 for single people and $4,000 for a married couple.

I should like to ask the minister why we must delay the implementation of these benefits, small as they may be, until April 1, 1971. Why not make these provisions applicable at the beginning of next year, or even sooner? We have known for a long time that there is need for an increase in old age pensions. The problem of the pensioner in Canada is similar to problems faced by many other groups in this country, many of them powerless or underprivileged. These are the working poor, the unemployed and those on fixed incomes of one sort or another. If we are to give all these people an equal opportunity, we must have changes. The pensioner should not have to worry about money; he should have an income that enables him to live in dignity and to have all the services that are necessary in today's society.

We do not give these things top priority in Canada; that rating seems to fall to money, profits and the interests of our corporate society. In this country we seem to follow the philosophy of survival of the fittest. This means that the weak person, the older person, the person who for some reason or other may not have a skill or education, is pushed aside and trampled upon. This bill reinforces that philosophy. This bill does not redistribute wealth; it redistributes poverty. It takes from some of the poor who are a little more affluent, to give to the really poor. This might clear the conscience of a few people in the Liberal party or a few of the privileged people in Canada, but it will not put much buying power into the pockets of the old people.

There are a number of reasons why we have to take this question more seriously. As I said before, our old people laid the foundations of this country. The country is only 103 years old and many of those receiving the old age pension today are first generation Canadians. They came from all around the world to look for greater opportunity, and indeed many of them found it. But now that they are old they find themselves faced with living in conditions of absolute and abject poverty, when they have a right to dignity and comfort. They are not asking for a pension that is extravagant or that will allow them to live in luxury; all they are asking is that they receive the basics to enable them to live in dignity.

It is the duty of members of this House to convince the government that it must do these things; and if we cannot, we must change the government. We know the resources of this country. We are one of the wealthiest nations in the world, and we have the technology and scientific know-how to make that wealth work for the people. We can transplant hearts and we can go to the moon, but still 20 per cent of our people live below the poverty line. The whole thing does not make much sense to me, Mr. Speaker, and it makes even less sense to the old person who has to live on hand-outs in a house that is cold and not fit for habitation. I again appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to reconsider this bill and to come down, on the side of the people, with sound legislation that will make us all proud of him.

Mr. Mark Smerchanski (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on Bill C-202. It has been said that the increase is 42 cents a month. Of course, that is not so, because with the pension supplement a single person will receive $135 a month and a married couple will receive $255 a month. Perhaps the pension supplement should be higher, but on the other hand I think the government should be congratulated on the proposals contained in this bill. Based on a 40-hour week, the government has increased the pension rate for a married person to $1.50 an hour. That is an excellent proposition and is, I think, a major step in the right direction.

Many times in this chamber we have heard members state that they would like to get industry into their areas. The workers in their areas would be happy to receive $1.50 per hour. The pension supplement, based on $255 per month, works out to $1.50 per hour. The only unfair part of this proposal is that the recipients will be taxed under the present income tax arrangement. When the proposals in the white paper on taxation are implemented next year, single persons receiving $135 a month, and married couples receiving $255 per month, will not be taxed. As with any program, everyone would like a little more money to spend. However, there must be a reasonable equivalent between the tax proceeds of the government and what it has to pay out. Some people in our society have a very heavy tax burden. It is not fair to require these people to pay additional taxes in order to hand out this money to others.

The program proposed in Bill C-202 will assist the senior citizens. We must bear in mind that there are also other programs for these people, such as medicare. The provinces have a well-integrated and well-planned system by which some senior citizens enjoy additional benfits. I repeat that if the pension supplement is worked out on an hourly basis, it averages $1.50 per hour. If all employed Canadians received $1.50 per hour, taxes could be reduced in this country. It is only one side of the coin to state that this increase works out to 42 cents per hour. It should be brought to the attention of our senior citizens that they are receiving fair and equitable treatment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Smerchanski: The pension supplement for single people will be increased to $135 per month, and $255 per month for married couples. We must also consider the places in which our retired senior citizens live. Those living in a rural area may have a garden, chickens and possibly cows which provide their milk and butter. If they receive $1.50 an hour, this is a good income. The opposition is being unfair when they say that the government is not providing enough. The assistance proposed in this bill is fair and equitable. I agree that more can be done. Possibly in another year or two we will have to reconsider this whole matter. In the meantime, the government should be complimented for having introduced this good program. The senior citizens of Canada will be in a much better position as a result of it.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): When we think of some of our elderly people on pension, Mr. Speaker, we are sometimes inclined to think of an old lady living in the suburbs of a city, a small town or on a farm in a genteel or decent form of poverty. Our senior citizens should have an adequate income with which to meet and cover their needs; their income should not only be adequate for their bread and butter. These people have worked hard to build our society and they did not receive very much income for so doing. We received the benefits. Our senior citizens are not given the proper credit for their basic pioneering in this country.

We often take these things for granted. We feel that because we live in a modern, affluent age we deserve all these things. We sometimes feel that because our older people did not earn very much in their working days, they do not deserve a good pension. I take issue with those who hold that view and do not want to provide an adequate pension for senior citizens. Those who built the basic framework for our society have a claim on us. That claim should not be equated to a dollar value on what they put into society. Anyone in business realizes that the basic capital invested in a community increases once the society is in gear. We must give recognition to these people in an economic sense. They should have adequate incomes to enable them to live with a feeling of decency and worth. We disagree with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). He does not recognize the basic fact that our citizens have contributed more than is recorded in dollars and cents.

I wish to spend a few moments speaking of some of the individuals in my constituency. I feel it is better to talk about individuals than to quote statistics. We must consider the problems of those people who have farmed for most of their lives, moved into a small village adjacent to their farm and turned over the operation of the farm to their son. They may have an adequate house in the village, and possibly a little money. In addition, they may have an old car. Their life is not too bad so long as they are able to drive that car. But times are changing in Canada. Perhaps the villages no longer have a store. Many do not have a doctor, druggist or hospital. People must go elsewhere for these services. As long as they are able to drive, the situation is not too bad. If they become incapacitated and are no longer able to drive, they are in trouble. They may decide that the village is not adequate and decide to move to a larger town.

When they try to purchase a home in the larger town, they find it is beyond their resources to do so. Because they are not able to sell their house in the small village at a good price, they do not have the capital with which to purchase a house in a larger village. Therefore, they decide to rent an apartment. They find that rents are out of all reason compared with the income on which they have been used to managing. Inflation has cut into their savings. Now they are faced with an extremely difficult problem. They need to be near medical services and they want to be close to older people like themselves. Yet when they try to move, their resources prove inadequate.

The increases which have been announced are not sufficient to take care of these needs. In some cases, it is true, there may be children capable of assisting their parents. This is all to the good; perhaps today we pass too many of our family responsibilities on to the state. But in other cases children will not accept this responsibility or, possibly, they do not have the necessary means. When these old people move into a community where rents are high, they find that when they have paid their rent they are left with insufficient money to take care of other necessities.

I recall talking with elderly people who are extremely conscious of transportation costs. They were used to getting 20 tickets for a dollar. Now, in Ottawa, it costs 25 cents or 30 cents to travel on a bus, and most elderly people travel by bus. Expenses such as these—minor expenses to most of us—are important to elderly people, especially if they wish to take part in such activities for older people as our society provides.

I think of some railroaders in the town of Biggar near my home who were hardworking, industrious people. They saved money and bought a house. They receive a pension. But the pension is nowhere near adequate to their needs today. They were saving money back in the thirties and forties when a dollar went quite a long way. That is not the case today. Their taxes have gone up; the cost of food has risen and the cost of new articles, when they have to buy them, bears no relation to the provision they were able to make for themselves. So they are caught in a squeeze. I am not talking about people who, like the grasshopper in the fable, preferred to be idle. I am talking about industrious people who saved and used their resources with care but who, because of the changing times, are not able to meet the problems which surround them today.

When I look at these people and see the arrangements they have tried to make, I cannot but feel we ought to consider them a little more as individuals and a little less as statistics. I am sure that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare were to go out and talk to these people, he would also relate to them in this way. He is no more heartless than the rest of us. Sometimes, here in Ottawa, dealing with millions of dollars and problems of statistics we forget that somewhere out there is a person. We must look at this question less impersonally.

I do not wish to belabour the subject. I feel we can do better than we have done. I liked the suggestion made by one hon. member who preceded me that we ought to consider this subject again in a year or two. I do not think we are dealing with it adequately now. If this is all we can do at the moment, we had better not wait too long before we take another look at this problem, because inflation is constantly with us and unless we do something about bringing rents into line with the ability of people to afford them, the problem will become more acute rather than less. It behoves us to look after elderly people in a better fashion than we have done so far.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I feel I must speak up in this debate in defence of the elderly people in my constituency of Regina East and in defence of elderly people wherever they may live in Canada. In my constituency there are many elderly people who are watching events very closely at the present time to see what is likely to happen. They know what their situation is. They know very well that they cannot make ends meet on present pensions and sources of income available to them. They see things happening around them which are completely beyond their control; nevertheless, they are affected by economic and social developments which have a definite impact upon their day-to-day living, upon their pocketbooks and upon the small amount of money available to them in their remaining years.

I should like to refer briefly to some of the past history of old age pensions. While I am a relatively new member of this House, I have had some contact with events of the past. I have watched from the galleries on many occasions as subjects such as this were debated. I have heard many spokesmen for the Liberal party in past years brag about their record in connection with welfare policies and declare how constantly they kept the interests of the small people of this country in mind and how well they were looking after their welfare. Really, it was a great day for Canada, as was pointed out earlier in this debate by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when the Liberal government of the day decided to do away with the means test in relation to old age pensions and move to the principle of a universal pension.

A great proponent of Liberal policy of that day, Hon. Paul Martin, now government leader in the Senate, was the leading apostle of the government's philosophy in this area. He, along with other Liberal spokesmen, took advantage of every opportunity to draw attention to the great thing they had done by doing away with the means test, by abolishing the differentiation which had existed amongst the old people and making a universal pension available with all its advantages.

It seems, now, that the government is ignoring some of the statements which were made by government spokesmen years ago in defence of the move made at that time toward a universal pension. A significant step was taken a number of years ago when the Canada Pension Plan was introduced, together with the guaranteed income supplement and the universal old age security pension. These measures were, of course, the subject of protracted debate in the House. People such as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre deserve great credit for the efforts they put forth then, as well as on many other occasions throughout the years, on behalf of the elderly people of this country in an effort to ensure them a fair deal.

It is quite clear, as already stated by some of my colleagues, that the effect of legislation such as that now before the House is to create two classes of citizens in this country—the haves and the have-nots. In this connection an injustice is being done to both groups. On the one hand, those who will have to resort to applying for the guaranteed income supplement will have to go through the humiliating procedures involved in filing their applications and taking what amounts to a means test in order to qualify.

I am sure all members of the House have had occasion to deal with some of the very difficult cases that arise. One is amazed at the complexities of administration and the myriad figures that are produced just in dealing with a single case. Multiplied many times over in terms of the number of people who are drawing the guaranteed income supplement, we see something of the monstrosity that has been created and which is created when we have to deal with methods of this sort and programs of this type that distinguish between one group of people and another.

On the other hand, we must also recognize that there is discrimination against those people who, under the present program or under the new program, will qualify only for the universal old age pension which is now $79.58 a month and which, if this measure is passed by Parliament, will be increased to $80. Their first grievance has to be with the reduction of their pension at the start of the new year. These people had every right and reason to expect that as of January 1 their pension would increase to $81.17 from the present figure of $79.58. But it has been decreed by certain circles across the way that this will not be the case.

I am sure the minister is aware that there are many people in this country who are just above the level of income that would otherwise qualify them for receiving the guaranteed income supplement and whose only source of supplementary income is the old age security pension. These people are being cheated out of some of the return that they had every reason and right to expect as a result of their labours in past years on behalf of the people of this country.

It seems to me that a situation such as this is contrary to trends in our pension plans. I feel we have to examine what has happened in many other areas of pensions legislation in this country. We have to consider the position of this group of people who through a little luck or by good management have accumulated a modest, small income other than that which they receive by way of pension. Possibly they have some savings on hand which earn them additional income. These people will receive $80 under the new proposal, it is true, but they will not receive their just reward compared to what other people receive under other aspects of these programs.

It seems to me that a question of elementary justice is involved here. There should be, under our program, provision for the payment of an adequate universal pension, as suggested by other speakers, of at the very minimum $100 a month. If the government continues to pay a guaranteed income supplement, then the total payment should be at least $150 a month, though we would prefer and we advocate a pension of $150 a month for all Canadians.

I suggest that if this measure is passed in its present form it will cause many Canadians to look at government and at Members of Parliament with a sceptical eye. This government, with its typical Liberal, Machiavellian approach, is perhaps saving up a further increase until just before the next election—who knows? On the basis of past experience, I am sure we can expect this to happen. Rather than give an increase now when it is needed and desired, the government will save up a further measure for granting an increase until just before the next election, timing it very propitiously. I suggest the elderly people of this country will not be fooled by a continuation of this type of tactic if, in fact, this is what the government does have in mind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It will probably be another $6.

Mr. Burton: It could be another $6, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It might be more than that, because the Liberal party was bitten when it made such an increase once before, though I am not sure they have learned any lessons from that. I suggest we must be concerned about the process of alienation that is manifesting itself in our society. We hear many reports of alienation today with respect to our young people, the unemployed, the low-income groups, and so on. I suggest our elderly people are also becoming alienated. If we pass this measure in the form proposed by the government it will, I suggest, contribute to the social phenomenon we have come to regard very seriously today, the alienation of people from our institutions and from the recognized processes of society.

I also suggest we must consider the whole area of poverty. I am sure the minister knows very well what happens to pensioners who have only very little more income than it is possible for them to have and still qualify for the guaranteed income supplement. Many of these people are reduced to finding ways and means of tackling the desperate income problem they are facing at the present time. As I have said, I am sure they look with a very sceptical eye when they see that we now have higher pensions for Members of Parliament—a measure passed in the current Parliament—higher pensions for retired civil servants, higher pensions for members of the armed forces and higher pensions for the RCMP, all of which we approve.

This basic pension has been in effect since 1966—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, would someone on the government side confirm for the record what we know from private conversation, namely, that Bill C-205 dealing with regional development will be debated tomorrow?

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there is to be a continuation of the debate on the bill now before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The understanding given to me was that it would be either bill C-202 or Bill C-205.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 10, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-8, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FINANCE

TAX CONCESSIONS TO "TIME" AND "READER'S DIGEST"—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in light of recent disclosures I ask leave, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That this House is of the opinion that the special tax concessions made available to Time magazine and Reader's Digest are not in the best interest of Canada and should forthwith be discontinued.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity, so the motion cannot be put at this time.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PETITION RESPECTING PENSION PLAN OR IMPROVED EARLY RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR FORMER COAL MINERS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to present to the House a petition, which is a privilege granted hon. members under Standing Order 67. I should like to file this petition to the House of Commons with the Clerk of the House.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 to discuss a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the joint release this morning by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Manpower and Immigration on employment and unemployment in the Canadian labour force showing that the reduction in the employment of 14 to 24 years olds between October and November was higher than the average for this period in the last five years, representing an increase of 64,000 young people compared with a year earlier. The release also showed a rise in the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in this group from 10½ per cent to 11 per cent between June of this year and last month, with an increase of 43 per cent over the last full year and with particular effect on the Atlantic provinces.

I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell), that the House adjourn to discuss this urgent matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has given the required notice of his intention to move the motion to which he has just alluded. As the House knows, similar motions have been proposed from time to time following the publication of DBS monthly reports. The rulings of the Chair have consistently indicated that Standing Order 26 is not applicable in such circumstances.

I should add that since the House still has before it consideration of the budget, including an amendment on the subject of unemployment, I must rule that it would not be in order to initiate a new discussion at this time under Standing Order 26.

• (2:10 p.m.)

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—REGIONAL DISTRIBUTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Labour in respect of the subject raised by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. The question relates to the reported alarming increase of some 40 per cent over last year in unemployment among those between the ages of 14 and 24. Can the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour give the House any information as to the distribution of this unemployment among youth across the country? To what extent is it concentrated in specific regions such as urban communities or in the countryside? I ask this question because I assume that since this has been a continuing development over a number of months this matter has been under investigation.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the appropriate minister to whom this question should be addressed is the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I have not conducted a personal, detailed study of this matter. The only thing I have noticed is that the seasonally adjusted unemployment figure has dropped for the third or fourth consecutive month.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister or anyone else in the government whether, in view of this very alarming trend over a number of months, any study of the distribution of unemployment in this age bracket has been ordered? Perhaps even more important, has the government ordered any study as to the reason, if any, for this alarming increase in unemployment among Canadian youth which must be a source of great concern to the government as well as to us?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a regional breakdown in respect of particular groups may not be available in part because the size of the survey in regard to a particular group may not in itself be sufficient to justify any particular conclusion. The information available, however, is that the explanation for the greater number of unemployed in the age group to which reference has been made is that in some measure it is due to the unusually small decline in the size of the group seeking employment rather than in the amount of employment available.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if the minister considers that an explanation, I think the Prime Minister had better redistribute the responsibilities of the government. May I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of this obvious lack of information on the part of his colleagues in respect of this important subject, he will direct that an inquiry be made into this matter? Will he also report at a very early date, before the Christmas recess, what measures the government proposes to take directly related to this alarming increase in unemployment among Canadian youth?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in very recent days the Minister of Finance has indicated what we are doing about employment, and debate has gone on in the House on that subject. I think opposition speakers realized, as indicated in their contributions to that debate, that it was difficult to stimulate the economy and say that such stimulation should only profit a certain age group.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MANPOWER DEPARTMENT FORECAST

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Mr. Douglas D. Peters, chief economist for the Toronto-Dominion Bank, speaking at the Toronto School of Business, estimated that the unemployment figure for 1971 will not be less than 6 per cent, the figure which has obtained in 1970. May I ask the minister whether he is prepared to table the forecast which his department has made as to the unemployment figures for the coming months and, if possible, for the entire 1971 period?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will be glad to look once again at the question of whether the available statistical analysis would be helpful. If it seems that it might be I will look at the question of making it available.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the figures just released this morning show that there were 476,000 unemployed in November, which is 57,000 greater than the previous month and 122,000 higher than November, 1969, can the minister tell us whether the forecast of his department indicates that this figure is likely to decline or increase over the coming months?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite aware of the seasonal factors which normally affect unemployment from time to time. Of course the figures he quotes are accurate but they tend to ignore the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate has in fact dropped in the past month from the previous month. The difficulty in being more precise about the analyses we may have available is that hon. members opposite are apt to proclaim them to the country as targets rather than anything else if they were made available. It is our objective, of course, through our many policies to bring the figure of unemployment down as far as possible.

REDUCTION OF PERIOD IN LABOUR FORCE TO QUALIFY FOR MANPOWER TRAINING AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the unemployment among youth, those under 25 years of age, is now some 212,000 or about 45 per cent of the unemployed, would the minister consider reducing the period of time during which an individual must be in the labour force in order to qualify for manpower training and allowances?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this question has in fact been under constant consideration with the provincial ministers and other interested persons. It is, of course, a question of priority in respect of the training moneys presently available, and the original philosophy was to direct these moneys to those in the labour force for a longer period of time as well as those who have been unemployed. I think there is a lot to be said for that basic philosophy. Certainly the question of adjusting priorities is under constant review.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in order to try to help the minister clarify his explanation of why unemployment has increased in Canada, is the essence of what he was laboriously trying to explain to the House simply that the reason unemployment has increased is that there are not so many people working in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—SPECIAL MANPOWER UPGRADING PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the alarmingly high rate of unemployment among younger people, is the minister now prepared to undertake a study of the unemployment in this age group to see if a special manpower upgrading program is warranted?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The question of the availability of training programs for this age group as well as for others is indeed under constant consideration. Many of the people in this age group, of course, are able to take advantage of these programs although, with the rule about having been in the labour force for a certain period of time, a certain portion of that group is not eligible under the present law.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister with regard to the 60,000 extra unemployed. In view of the fact that the Christmas season is under way, would the Prime Minister bring joy to the hearts of the Canadian people by removing the Minister of Finance from office and adopting some of our suggestions?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—the Minister of Labour could also take note of the question—whether he would consider making available to the House the significant information which I understand is accumulated in his department, and perhaps also in the Department of Labour, indicating how serious the unemployment predictions are, so that we could make suggestions and offer proposals in order to help alleviate the problem among young people especially?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I think that is the same question as was asked a moment ago and which I answered at that time.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is not responding to the questions. Also, he is certainly misleading the House with his use or misuse of statistics in that he continually compares the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate for one month with the previous month. The only statistic that should be used—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that is not really a point of order but a debate between the minister and the hon. member. If he has a supplementary question, I would be glad to recognize him.

Mr. Lundrigan: It is no good asking supplementary questions if this kind of misinformation is going to be given by the minister.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to direct this question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Labour. It concerns those who had student loans from universities and have not had a job in six months or have just become employed. Would the government be prepared to extend the time of repayment to one year or more so as to give the students a better opportunity to repay the loans? That is a practical suggestion.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question of student loans is administered by the Minister of Finance, and I am sure that if the suggestion is practical he will consider it.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you not think it is practical?

REDUCTION OF PERIOD IN LABOUR FORCE TO QUALIFY FOR MANPOWER TRAINING AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration arising out of an answer he gave to the question asked by my leader. He said that the problem of reducing the number of years required before one can obtain an allowance as well as the right to training is under constant consideration. I should like to ask the minister whether, before we adjourn for the Christmas recess, he will make a statement to the House as to the result of that constant review and whether he will take steps immediately to change that regulation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not optimistic about being able to make any statement prior to the adjournment of the House. However, when a decision has been taken which would indicate any change then of course an announcement would be made.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Does the minister know what percentage of these 14 to 24 year olds require retraining to have a reasonable expectation of being incorporated into the work force?

Mr. Lang: It is difficult to say who requires retraining. The usual question is whether they can take advantage of or benefit from retraining in order to have greater variety or a better type of position offered to them. This is the object of the retraining programs, and of course this is why it is essentially offered to those who have been in the labour force and not simply to those who are at school or who have regular or other schooling available to them.

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps I may address this supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that many of these young unemployed people are obviously not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits and are not entitled to allowances if they try to get some training under a program and therefore have to depend on welfare, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government would consider immediately either changing the requirement of three years before being able to obtain an allowance during training or discussing with the provincial ministers of welfare some kind of expansion of eligibility for social welfare to which the Canada Assistance Plan would apply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot say that those particular remedies would be the ones that we would consider but the problem is being considered and when we do make any policy changes we will announce them. They may include the suggestions of the hon. member, but they may not.

Mr. Speaker: There is obviously a number of further supplementary questions. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and then go on to the hon. member for Shefford who has been waiting patiently for an opportunity to ask the first question on behalf of his party.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—SPECIAL MILITIA TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would he now consider more seriously the proposals I placed before the Minister of National Defence to introduce special militia training programs for youth?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister of National Defence heard the hon. member's representations.

TRADE

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMON MARKET WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for noticing how patient I have been.

[Mr. Lang.]

Since the Prime Minister is supposed to have said in St. John, New Brunswick, on December 8, that the United States will be a net importer of commodities within 10 years, does he not believe that it would be beneficial for Canada to establish a common market with that country?

Mr. Lewis: I hope not.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this consequence can be implied from those premises. The problem of the establishment of a common or continental market has already been discussed in the House. Hon. members know that the government has concluded in certain fields, in the automobile sector for instance, agreements quite profitable for all parties concerned. If other similar cases occurred, we would gladly consider them, but I do not think that it would be advisable at this stage to speak about a complete common market between the two countries. It would not be beneficial for Canada.

It is perhaps a matter that could be considered in the distant future.

DEVELOPMENT OF U.S. MARKETS FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES' PRODUCTS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Is he in a position to outline any special action that will be undertaken by the government to assist in the development of new markets for Atlantic provinces' industries in the United States, as a result of the speech he made in Saint John this week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, the services of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce are always available to explore new markets and to help Canadian industry take greater advantage of them. No one is more aware of the situation than the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce consider setting up a special seminar-type conference between industry, businessmen and political leaders in the Atlantic provinces to see if there might be some special type of assistance the department could give to the development of new markets in the area that the Prime Minister pointed out might be advantageous to industry in the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a subject which is being looked at at the moment, but I might underline the fact that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has just opened an office in Fredericton, New Brunswick. I might also say that the Premier of Prince Edward Island was here last week with his Minister of Labour, Industry and Commerce, and there was an exchange of views with my department, on the external trade situation in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce if he would consider for the Atlantic provinces the type of undertaking that a former minister of trade and commerce undertook for all businessmen in order to develop new markets in foreign countries, especially in the United States?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I might look at it with suspicion now that I know the origin of that idea.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I resent that, but I would be glad to tell the minister how to do it. It may take a while but I will tell him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE SALE OF ELECTRICITY TO UNITED STATES THROUGH DEVELOPMENT OF FUNDY TIDAL POWER

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister following the question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North. Would the Prime Minister and the government now reconsider the decision they have made on the Bay of Fundy tidal power project in order to provide badly needed electrical energy to the eastern seaboard of the United States, which would be an excellent export from the Atlantic area to the United States?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENITENTIARIES

PRINCE ALBERT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON ESCAPES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Justice if he would be prepared to table the report of the board of inquiry into the escapes from the Saskatchewan penitentiary at Prince Albert. Is he now in a position to reply favourably to that request?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I have looked into that, Mr. Speaker. It has been brought to my attention that these reports have always been considered to be confidential and for purposes related to the internal management of penitentiaries, and so I decline to table the report.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Is the minister aware that the board of inquiry report into the riot at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary in the mid-1950s was made public and tabled in the House? May I ask the minister whether, if he is not prepared to table the report of the board of inquiry into the escapes, he will at least table the report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police inquiry under Inspector Mosher, which was highly critical of the warden of the penitentiary?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVOLVEMENT OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES IN RECENT TROUBLES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

With regard to the international implications of the terrorism that occurred in Quebec, is the minister in a position to state that foreign governments were not involved in the troubles of the last months?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have seen no evidence whatever that foreign governments are involved.

FLQ MEMBERS TRAINED IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question for the hon. Minister of Justice in his capacity as Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell the House how many members of the FLQ who have been apprehended and questioned were trained for their activities in foreign countries such as Jordan, Algeria or Cuba?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): No, I could not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister undertake to obtain this information from the RCMP and perhaps communicate it not only to the House but to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

TRADE

DEVELOPMENT OF U.S. MARKETS FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES' PRODUCTS—TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, also based on his forecast in his recent Saint John speech about unprecedented opportunities for Maritime provinces' products in the eastern United States. With a view to furthering this desirable goal, can the Prime Minister advise if he and his government will contribute toward the rapid and efficient transport of such goods by reconsidering the decision to abandon the P.E.I. causeway and by reappraising its contribution toward the cost of construction of the corridor road?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that this speech in New Brunswick was read so attentively by members of the opposition. If the hon. member would read further in the speech he would see that I talked about the problem of transportation in the Maritimes, though not that particular aspect.

Mr. Macquarrie: It was a most sensitive and sensible speech but I wonder if the Prime Minister would consult with the Premier of Prince Edward Island and reopen that most important subject? That would make a good second chapter.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION ON UNITED KINGDOM DELEGATION NEGOTIATING ENTRY INTO COMMON MARKET

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Has Canada a representative directly attached to the United Kingdom delegation which is negotiating the terms of Great Britain's entry into the European Common Market?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, but we have representatives accredited to the European Economic Community and to the United Kingdom. Between these two I think we do quite well.

Mr. Woolliams: If you do it like everything else it will be a failure.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE SALE OF SOGEFOR LIMITED TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the General Investment Corporation has announced the sale of one of its subsidiaries, namely Sogefor Limited, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to purchase it, or whether he will announce that steps will be taken to ensure that a typically Canadian company does not fall into foreign hands?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send me word, a few minutes ago, that he would put that question to me. Unfortunately, I have not yet had time to find the components of an answer. I shall merely say that this is the first time I have heard of this sale, but it would seem that if the General Investment Corporation wishes to sell its subsidiary, there is no reason at first glance why the Canadian government should buy it.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

BANNING OF SALE OF POTTERY PRODUCTS WITH LEAD GLAZING

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that one Montreal child died this year and another suffered serious lead poisoning by drinking from a handmade earthenware jug, and in view of the further fact that the United States has now banned some similar Canadian and Mexican products as being too dangerous, will the minister take action for the immediate removal of such products from store shelves in order to avoid possible Christmas tragedies?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been working on the development of a standard for the lead glazing of pottery in order to avoid a recurrence of the tragic event in Montreal a year ago and we expect to announce regulations in due course. If the hon. member has evidence of certain pottery items available now having a high lead content in the glaze, I hope she will bring it to my attention so that proper and speedy action may be taken if required.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if the fact that such Canadian products are banned in the United States is not sufficient evidence to take action?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary question is argumentative.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TO TREATY SIGNED BY POLAND AND WEST GERMANY

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government of Canada taken a position with respect to the treaty just signed between Poland and West Germany?

Mr. Woolliams: This will be a good answer—he has it written out.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we welcome this treaty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that hon. members opposite will agree that this is an important question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Questions in this House are supposed to be of urgent and pressing necessity before they are permitted. This question has no urgency whatsoever as the Canadian people know that this treaty was signed a few days ago. The fact that it has been brought up now does not qualify it as an urgent question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member and to all hon. members that it is for the Chair to determine what is a matter of urgency. After the question period the conclusion of the Chair from day to day is that many questions are asked and allowed that hardly qualify under the criterion suggested by the hon. member. In view of the circumstances I think the question asked by the hon. member is in order.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would point out for the benefit of hon. members opposite that this is the first time a question has been asked about Canada's attitude toward this treaty. It should have been asked by the opposition but apparently they are not alive to the importance of this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It would not have been allowed.

Mr. Sharp: Canada welcomes this treaty and its attendant documents, including the provisions dealing with Poland's western boundary. We admire the courage and the realism that the federal government of Germany has shown—

An hon. Member: Hallelujah!

An hon. Member: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister. It is obvious from his reply that what he wants to do is make a statement to the House, but the minister can only do this by way of a statement on motions. I would suggest to him that he should not give the information by way of a statement at this time.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, with all due deference, when a question is asked by a Member of Parliament on a matter that he considers urgent and that I agree is urgent, I think it is important that he should have an answer from me. I do not want to make any statement in the House—

An hon. Member: Make it on motions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the minister kindly resume his seat? The question was asked and the minister replied, albeit briefly. I doubt that the statement he was about to make should be made by way of a reply to a question. With respect, I suggest to him that this should be the position in connection with the procedural aspect of the matter.

Mr. Baldwin: Put it to music and sing it at the Christmas party.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SECURITY REVIEW BOARD

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In order to hasten immigration appeals and to reassure the public, has the minister decided to set up a security review board to screen and deal with immigration security cases, as recommended by the latest Sedgwick report and the Royal Commission on Security?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a question put that broadly goes beyond the scope of my department. Certainly we are considering the whole question of appeal procedures following upon the Sedgwick report and other considerations in this issue. These will include a consideration of the best method of handling security cases as well as the best ways of handling all the other problems involved in the matter generally.

Mr. Ryan: Is the minister recommending to cabinet that such a board should be set up?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is in the wrong place to be told that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: Shame! There you have the same old bunch.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MORTGAGE MONEY REQUIREMENTS AND ROLE OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of housing. In view of the recent discussions he has had with representatives of pension funds and in view of his statement that there will be an anticipated short-fall of mortgage moneys from conventional sources, would the minister make a statement on motions before the Christmas recess setting forth the financial requirements and the targets that we expect our financial institutions to meet?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is in order only to the extent that the hon. member is asking the minister whether a statement will be made or not.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I will not be in a position to make a statement as all-embracing as that being asked for by the hon. member before we rise for the Christmas recess. I will make the pertinent information known to all members as soon as that is reasonably possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLICY RESPECTING ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS TO KIDNAPPERS OF JAMES CROSS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has made a great to-do about people being awake today. Has he yet been briefed about the matter of the issuance of passports to the terrorists who went to Cuba, and is he now in a position to say what the policy of his department is in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Leader of the Opposition is asking me to make a statement. This seems to have been ruled out of order.

Mr. Hees: Just answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask Your Honour to rule whether the question is in order.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition is being very helpful. I thank him. I shall deliver solemn judgment. The first part of the question was in order, but not the second part.

Mr. Hees: Let us have an answer to the first part.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to answer the first part of the question.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Leader of the Opposition would rephrase his question so I can answer it accurately.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the minister whether he will tell the House what the position of his department is with regard to the issuance upon request of passports to the terrorists?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If we are going to be technical about this matter I suggest to the minister and to the Leader of the Opposition that the question would be in order if it dealt with the current situation. It is certainly not in order to invite the minister to make a statement which is normally made on motions. If the minister would like to reply to the first part of the question, as I suggested a moment ago, that would be quite in order.

Mr. MacInnis: Come on; let's have an answer.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I was quite serious in my answer to the Leader of the Opposition. It would take me some minutes to explain the position and therefore I suggest it would be better if the answer could be given as a statement.

Mr. Baldwin: Why not revert to motions?

[Mr. Andras.]

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON TREATY BETWEEN WEST GERMANY AND POLAND

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether my question is in order but I am also interested in knowing what the Canadian government's attitude is with regard to the treaty concluded by West Germany and Poland.

You have decided, Mr. Speaker, that we should revert to motions in order to allow the minister to make a statement. Could we not ask for unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions in order to allow the minister to deliver his statement? Otherwise, would the minister be prepared to make his statement on this important treaty tomorrow on motions?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I could answer this question very shortly and much more quickly than I could the question put by the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: The minister is wasting the time of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The question, as I understood it, is whether the minister would like to revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement or whether he will ask permission to make a statement tomorrow on motions.

Mr. Hees: What is the minister going to do?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TO TREATY SIGNED BY POLAND AND WEST GERMANY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we admire the courage and the realism that the Federal Republic of Germany has shown, as a part of its eastern policy, in negotiating this difficult treaty, which follows the one signed with the Soviet Union on August 12. We also commend Poland for its part in contributing, together with the Federal Republic of Germany, to a relaxation of tensions in Europe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his courageous and forward-looking statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for York South rising for the purpose of addressing himself to the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I want to say first that if the Secretary of State for External Affairs felt, as he should have felt, that the subject required a statement by him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have the floor for the purpose of entering into debate on what appears to be a point of order raised by a number of hon. members a moment ago. He should limit his comments to the substance of the statement made by the minister.

Mr. Lewis: With respect, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what I thought I was doing, in my own mind at least. I say that if the subject matter in the minister's mind deserved a statement to this House, it ought to have been made at a time when it would not evoke the kind of laughter and hilarity we have witnessed.

Mr. Trudeau: Why did hon. members give their unanimous consent, then?

Mr. Lewis: We are delighted that the Polish government and the Federal Republic of Germany have entered into this treaty. It is significant that Mr. Brant has pursued this kind of policy of trying to ease tensions between West Germany and the countries of eastern Europe ever since he took office.

Mr. Sharp: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I say that that should have led the minister representing this country as well as ministers representing other countries at the NATO discussions to take further steps which ought logically to follow this treaty between West Germany and Poland.

Mr. Sharp: We did.

Mr. Lewis: They ought to try to solve the problem of a general German treaty, the problem of Berlin, and the other problem which still threatens the peace in Europe. It is not enough for the minister to welcome a step that has already been taken. I say to him in all earnestness that this is merely one little step taken by the two governments concerned, and that there will not be a settlement of the problem in Europe until he and other representatives of other governments are prepared to agree to some kind of security conference or other conference leading to final settlement and a peace treaty between Germany and the other nations involved in the last war.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POLLUTION

PRECAUTIONS FOLLOWING DERAILMENT OF RAILWAY CARS CONTAINING SULPHURIC ACID

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a very urgent question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In his absence may I direct it to the acting minister. Following the derailment of sulphuric acid tank cars which were part of a CPR train near Sudbury and the spilling of sulphuric acid into the Pickerel River, can the minister advise the House if proper anti-pollution precautions have been taken or will be taken?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the latest information received is that nearly all of the 93 per cent H_2SO_4, sulphuric acid, estimated at 1,300 tons contained in the tank cars, has escaped. A large amount of the acid is reported as lying on the ground and has not yet reached the river. Seventy-five tons of lime have been transported from Sudbury, and is now being spread over the spilled acid. More lime is coming from Toronto and is expected on site this evening. The OWRC have an engineer on the site supervising the operations. The Department of Lands and Forests has an aircraft and a biological crew at the site looking for signs of fish mortality and other biological damage.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FISHING BOUNDARIES AROUND ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the controversy surrounding the fishing boundaries and limits around the French-owned islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, would the minister make an early statement in the House on what progress was made in connection with this matter during his talks while he was in Europe recently attending NATO ministerial meetings?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this subject did not arise in the conversations I had while in Europe.

Mr. Crouse: Bearing in mind the strong views expressed at the United Nations by Mr. J. A. Beasley, head of the legal division of the Department of External Affairs, concerning the desirability of a new law of the sea covering territorial limits, exploitation, pollution and conservation, would the minister indicate whether any progress has been made toward convening an international conference to deal with these matters and, if so, where and when will such a conference be held?

Mr. Sharp: I should like to take notice of that question. I think the general answer is that progress is being made, but I will ascertain the extent of that progress.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the importance of continuing discussions with France in connection with treaty rights off our east coast, especially in terms of implementing our pollution legislation, may I ask whether talks aimed at reaching a satisfactory settlement of this treaty which we inherited from Great Britain are still going on with the French government? If not, why not?

Mr. Sharp: The subject matter is still the subject of discussions between the two governments. There have not recently been any discussions on the subject, however.

Mr. Stanfield: It is still a matter of discussion but there are no discussions.

PROPOSED AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is related to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Victoria the other day. Having in mind the announced intention of the United States to proceed with a further massive nuclear test in the Aleutian area next fall and the increasing concern over this proposal in Alaska and British Columbia, will the minister check on this situation, particularly the reported danger of radioactive hydrogen leaking into the Pacific and contaminating its waters?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a representation to the minister and he has to assume it will be taken into consideration by him.

HOUSING

ESTABLISHMENT OF CENTRAL MORTGAGE BANK

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): My question is addressed to the minister responsible for housing and it is supplemental to that asked by the hon. member for Broadview. In view of the minister's willingness to participate in the setting up of some form of central mortgage bank, as recommended by the task force on housing and urban affairs, which would be a base for new mortgage institutions and would lead to further liquidity, is it the hon. gentleman's intention to lay before this House legislation leading to the creation of such a central mortgage bank?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): We held an exploratory discussion in September with the approved lenders and again, the other day, with the trusteed pension fund representatives, during which this suggestion was considered as a possible way to provide increased marketability for mortgages. It was not announced as government policy but it is an interesting proposition which we shall be exploring in more detail, and if the indications are that we should make this recommendation I will say so to my colleagues and, if accepted, naturally we would bring the matter before Parliament.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect and all possible deference, I hope that we on the backbenches do not escape your eye. We are very patiently expecting some recognition, and in view of the fact that I have only had an opportunity to ask a couple of questions this week I hope Your Honour will give me a chance to ask a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member might be interested to know that the question period had already expired when I recognized him and, later, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. I think this is showing some forbearance and co-operation.

Has the minister received an urgent request from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture asking that the new Canada Grain Act include a provision for a check-off on grain receipts to assist in financing research and development as part of a national effort in this field?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

BROADCASTING

EDITING OF NATIONAL NEWS ON BUDGET BASIS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I wish to address my question to the Secretary of State. In view of the CBC and CTV practice of editing the national news on a budget basis from such places as Vancouver and Halifax when such is not done in the case of news stories from Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa, will the minister use his office to discourage this practice of discrimination against some parts of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that he is making a representation to the government; he has to assume it will be taken into account. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OLD AGE SECURITY

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AMOUNT OF PENSION, MAXIMUM SUPPLEMENT AND ESCALATION THEREOF

The House resumed from Wednesday, December 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-202, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Services.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned yesterday afternoon, I was in the process of urging the government to reconsider the legislation now before us and to bring forward a better bill for the elderly people of this country. I was suggesting that the government ought to be concerned about the process of alienation, to which attention has been drawn on a number of occasions by many speakers both inside and outside this House, and saying that feelings of alienation arose, too, among the old people of this country, the retired people. Unless there is a change of heart on the part of the government, the measure now before us will be greeted by many of the retired people in Canada with scepticism and cynicism.

The bill we are now being asked to pass must, in my opinion, be related to the over-all economic situation in Canada. I do not intend to get into a general discussion of this subject, but I feel there are some relevant points which must be considered in the context of the legislation before us. In many respects it appears the government is acting on the basis of its policy to date, that is its unwillingness to tell the private sector, the corporate sector of the economy, that any action will be taken against it. For some time now, the government has been concerned about inflation and has geared its policies to an anti-inflation approach. Hon. members opposite say, now, that inflation has been slowed down; the government feels it has the situation under control. But they are worrying about a new wave of inflation which may arise in the future and, at the same time, they are bound to consider the high unemployment levels which exist in this country. We hear comments about what is likely to happen during the next round, the next cycle in our economic affairs. We are on a sort of merry-go-round; we are going through the same boom and bust cycle as before. Indications are that the variations in the performance of the economy are becoming greater with each cycle. Each of these variations is tied to the structure of the economy and to government policies in relation to the economy.

I do not wish to discuss this subject in detail, but I feel obliged to mention certain aspects of it; the fact is that the government, given the set of assumptions on which it has been working, has failed to control the course of economic affairs satisfactorily. I grant that hon. members opposite would like to be able to influence the course of economic affairs, to bring them under some control and make them subject to a degree of stability. But they have not found the means of doing so up to the present time, given the assumptions on which the government is working.

I was pleased to note that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey, speaking in another debate in this House this week, did indicate that it might be necessary for the government to move to implement some form of selective control when dealing with the next cycle in our economic affairs. But regardless of what happens, of how successful or unsuccessful we are in controlling some of the economic forces in Canada, we must protect those who have been economically hurt; and the number one group of people who must be protected and helped is those on fixed and low incomes. The first group of people in this bracket is the old age pensioners of Canada.

This was pointed out by members of this party in a minority report submitted last February to the House of Commons by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs dealing with interest rates and the whole problem of inflation. We disagreed with some of the basic premises of the majority report of the committee and suggested that, as a basic starting point, we had to develop long term policies to deal with the problems of income distribution. One of the recommendations of this minority report was that to achieve the objectives of an equitable distribution of income, and an equitable distribution of the economic burden of rising prices, a comprehensive incomes policy should be adopted. Then, we went on to explain in these words:

> It is essential that what we mean by an incomes policy be well understood. To be meaningful, it must be comprehensive, it must include all forms of income. In addition to wages and salaries (the salaries of members of parliament included) all forms of non-wage and non-salary income—including profits, rents, interest, professional fees and unincorporated business income must be subject to the policy.
> The Comprehensive Incomes Policy must include the provision of a guaranteed annual income, to avoid injustice and hardship. It must be flexible enough to take account of (1) the plight of low paid workers (2) disparities within industries and classes of employees (3) increases in the cost of living and (4) other factors causing disadvantage to groups or regions.

We put forward this proposal in terms of its being a long-term policy approach, recognizing that there are problems in implementing such a policy and that this would take time. Thus, we suggested there should also be short run measures to deal with some of the immediate problems that face the Canadian people. The number one item in the list presented in our report, submitted on behalf of the members of this party by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and myself, was that we should immediately compensate the victims of inflation by ensuring that welfare benefits rise at least as fast as the cost of living index. We suggested this should be done in this way:

> —by abolishing the ceiling of two per cent per annum which the Liberal government has imposed on the rise in old age pensions and benefits under the Canada Pension Plan.
> —by regular increases in the minimum wage and farm and other primary support prices.
> —by requiring private pension plans to be based on best years' earning with a cost of living escalator.
> This recommendation does not assume that existing levels of pensions are adequate. An essential first step is to bring them up to the level necessary to meet the cost of living today.

I suggest that if the government had given more consideration to these recommendations instead of the recommendations submitted by its back bench members, it would have been in a much better position today than it is.

In taking a look at old age pension legislation and the manner in which we treat the elderly people of this country, I think we must bear in mind the changes that are taking place in society. Basic changes have been made, and changes are continuing to be made, in the structure of the family, indeed in the entire structure of society. No longer is it the case that the grandfather and the grandmother live with some member of the family; very often they live on their own, and for many reasons. They try to maintain an independent existence.

This is one of the facts of society today. Since forces in present day society have brought about this changed approach to life, we must ensure that our institutions and policies are geared to taking account of the situation and the problems that inevitably arise. Basically we must keep faith with the elderly people of this country. As I have already indicated, we must become concerned with the process of alienation that affects so much of our society and is causing much of the malaise that exists today.

It has often been said that a society is judged on the basis of the way it treats its young, its sick and its aged. I suggest that as far as the latter group of people is concerned, the people of Canada will not judge the government well in terms of the policies it is introducing on their behalf.

I know that many government members contend that we cannot afford to pay more money. They ask where we are going to get the required amount of money from. This is what we have been hearing, of course, over the years when discussing every progressive welfare measure that has been proposed in Canada. I say that we cannot afford not to introduce a better measure for the aged people of Canada. I say that an obligation exists in this regard, and that we must ensure the future welfare of the old people of this country and of Canadian society. This is why the government should reconsider the measure before the House and should ensure that all of our elderly people are treated fairly and squarely.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-202 which is before the House provides certain amendments to the present Old Age Security Act.

Unfortunately, it also contains certain provisions which are not likely to clarify the matter of eligibility. In fact, there is bound to be mistakes in interpretation followed by much correspondence to clarify the situation in certain particular cases.

The adjustment to the supplement, although small, will be appreciated. However, I am of the opinion that the government should have taken into account various factors which at times cause inconveniences to older people.

In the paper La Presse of Saturday, May 9, 1970, there was an article claiming that the role and place of older people has yet to be determined, and I quote:

> For the state and for industry, one becomes old at 65. At that age, one no longer has the right to work, one is no longer considered productive. One is only entitled to a bare minimum, like widows and crippled children.

[Mr. Burton.]

> The heart specialist, Dr. Paul David, recently asked: Why live longer, if one cannot lead a useful life? On the other hand, a gerontologist with the Jewish General Hospital, who also works in two veterans' hospitals in the Montreal area, disagrees that productivity should be used as a criterium in judging man. An old man could be happy even without being useful, according to this doctor, if he is still loved and if he still has dealings with other people.
> Harvest Years, an American magazine for retired people, has this to say about the needs of the old: to be in good health and to have as much independence as possible; to have enough economic security to ensure food, shelter, clothing, medical care and leisure; to be assured of a role in life, of a place in society, to continue to share, helps, love, talk and make plans; to keep one's self-respect, knowing that one is useful, productive and active, within certain limits.
> Here are two opinions out of three which lean towards usefulness. Is it easier to find some usefulness for old people or to accept for them (and to have them accept it) a reference role?

A real pension plan should be devised so as to enable old people to use this maturity at an important stage of their life in order to put in practice a life philosophy that it is impossible to have at an earlier age.

If reduced physical strength or the departure of their friends have closed certain doors to them, their maturity opens others. Their share of disappointment in life has increased their cautiousness and this enables them to avoid trouble. Whatever privileges the pensioner has to give up, he still keeps the right to usefulness and dignity.

Everybody cannot find enjoyment from the same sources. Each must try and discover his own capabilities and seek enjoyment according to his own limits, being always very careful not to ask nor hope for what is impossible. Society does not do all its duty if it provides only for the physical well-being of pensioners without any regard for their emotional and psychological needs. It is a mistake to believe that we can, so to speak, put them out to pasture by providing them with food, clothing and shelter.

Canada must endeavour to make the most of the enormous supply of ideas, talents and skills which are represented by its one and a half million people over 65.

During all their active life, these persons have used knowledge inherited from their predecessors, and now, as they are about to retire, they are able to carry out their obligations and to pass it on to their successors.

When we examine a little more closely the fate of the retired people, we soon notice that much has still to be done in order to create that just society which has been promised and which the people want.

It is found that most needy pensioners continue to suffer severe hardship besides living in constant insecurity. It is sometimes ridiculous to hear people speak of guaranteed income. They would be better advised if they tried to palliate the disastrous effects of the present system, which I would call the "guaranteed tax system".

Insufficient consideration is given to fluctuations of monetary values, so that the continuous rise in the cost of living within the system now in force confronts pensioners with serious financial problems, in addition to difficulties arising from application of regulations covering portability and the army of inspectors whose primary mission seems to be the protection of "the fund".

By granting a 42 cent monthly increase, the government steers them in the right direction. They do not seem to mind some sort of bargaining concerning senior citizens.

Quebec City's Le Soleil reported on March 3, 1966 a statement by the Minister of National Health with a headline which illustrates well that the legislation is drafted to protect our unbalanced financial system. I quote:

An increase in old age pensions would result in a tax hike and serious anomalies.

This is the underlying concept of this legislation. They make promises during the election campaign, but after all they can do is tax.

Since the percentage of people 60 years of age is high, it is obvious that the eligibility age for pensions should be reduced to 60, while respecting the freedom of those who want to continue to work and ensuring at the same time that the unemployed or the disabled are eligible for a pension instead of having to beg for welfare allowances.

As always many will worry about the same question of where to get the money they need. I should point out incidentally that in answer to a question asked in 1964 concerning the interest on the public debt of Canada officials indicated that since 1867 Canada had paid more than $15 billion for servicing the public debt. Mind you, "for servicing the debt". Yet our administrators and their underlings wonder where the money will come from. It is known that the amount paid since then for interest only on the public debt exceeds one billion dollars each year.

This financial cancer is now spreading. Municipalities, school boards, provincial governments and even the federal government use up 40 to 70 per cent of their budget to pay off interest on their loans. People are overburdened with taxes and debts of all kind.

Money does not grow on trees. It is produced, controlled and made scarce by men. We should be able, through an adequately oriented show of will, to change this system, replace it and put everything back where it belongs.

Money is a tool designed to allow people to satisfy their needs, provided those who produce or control it take due account of the value of the human person and of everybody's right to life, a natural right acquired by birth which should enjoy precedence over regulations established by those who manipulate money and credit.

Instead of basing our economic system on logic and natural order, we remain attached to a system which severely restricts the means of distribution and the flow of abundant goods which are now available; as a consequence, thousands of Canadians have to live in slums despite the available quantity of materials which they could use to build decent homes.

I do not think one has to be a university graduate to realize that men were created with needs for food, clothing, housing, affection and mutual help. Neither businessmen nor politicians meant it that way.

Admittedly, the Lord in his wisdom has created all goods necessary for the needs of all people, and we have the good fortune, in Canada, to find that goods are plentiful. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has visited several countries in the world to offer them our production surpluses.

Our difficulties are not derived from our inability to produce or to build, but rather from our inability to pay. Financially, we are unable to act, although our production system works well, our financial system does not.

This is a topical question that deserves much more consideration than it has received until now, if we mean to develop a mechanism which would make financially possible what is physically and morally feasible.

If we really want to prepare for a better future, we must make efforts along this line.

[English]

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on Bill C-202 which deals with the Old Age Security Act. I know a great deal of discussion has taken place on this particular piece of legislation. Once it goes to the committee our group is hopeful that amendments will be offered which will be acceptable to the government so as to make the legislation more acceptable to those concerned. I feel I should place my views on the record concerning the legislation because I shall not have another opportunity to speak on it during the second reading stage.

Bill C-202 must be classed as one of the major disappointments of this 28th Parliament. Ever since this government assumed office, it has led the senior citizens of our country to expect that adequate and favourable action on the whole pension issue would follow the completion of the government's survey of the problem. Our senior citizens waited patiently and expectantly for the white paper on income security for Canadians to be drafted by the government. They had expected relief from the mounting pressure of living costs and were confident that an adequate increase in the basic pension would result.

The bill before us will set the basic old age security pension at $80 a month. This change is to become effective on January 1, 1971, which is only three weeks from today. The disappointing and unjust aspect of this new $80 basic old age security pension is the fact that it is only 42 cents more than the amount being received now by the pensioners. This is a government which talks about the just society, and yet it increases the basic pension by 42 cents a month or $5.04 per year. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a very large number of disappointed and heartbroken senior citizens in our nation as a result of this legislation.

The crowning insult to the senior citizen who only receives the basic old age security pension is the fact that the government will now take away from him the 2 per cent cost of living bonus which was designed to stop the erosion of the purchasing power of the pension. This is one of the most discriminatory and unfair changes in this amending bill. It is contrary to a number of recent pension plans in which clauses have been included covering the escalation of the pensions. Why has the government deliberately chosen to disregard this principle in respect of pensioners who receive only a basic old age security pension? Why have they been singled out for this type of discrimination?

Let us briefly examine several pension plans which recently have been approved by this House. A little less than a year ago, we accepted the principle that the pensions granted under a number of plans should be escalated so as to prevent the rising cost of living from eroding the purchasing power of the pension. This makes sense. Retired people should be protected against inflation and against a lowering of their standard of living by this method. As a result, after accepting the principle, we applied it to a number of pension plans which come under our jurisdiction. It now applies to the pensions of retired civil servants, retired RCMP personnel, retired armed forces personnel and retired Members of Parliament.

If these groups are entitled to pension escalation because of the rising cost of living, then this principle should be applied also to the basic old age security pension. The total income of the pensioners who receive the basic old age security pension plus part of the supplement is not nearly sufficient. The maximum amount a single individual can now obtain with the basic pension of $80 plus the full supplement of $55 is a total of $135 a month. No one can live adequately on this amount, especially in those areas where rents take such a large chunk of the pension cheque. It is high time we set an adequate minimum income level for Canadians and made certain that all Canadians receive it. This is a special need of those whom we class as our senior citizens because they have little chance to supplement their income once they reach retirement age.

We had hoped to see an old age security pension of $150 a month, with a supplement for those who have no additional income. The present legislation falls far short of this goal. We also hoped there would be a provision to fully cover any future increase in living costs. We find that this is not to be, insofar as the group of senior citizens who receive only the basic pension is concerned.

I shall not spend a great deal of time dealing with the other aspects of the bill. Other members in the various parties have spoken concerning the number of people affected by this legislation. Other deficiencies in the legislation have been pointed out. It is my hope that in the committee some amendments will be made to the legislation which will be acceptable to all parties in this House. If these amendments are not forthcoming through committee examination, then it is assumed that a number of amendments will be moved when the bill returns to the House of Commons. When the bill returns to the House we will have an opportunity to deal in more detail with those clauses which we feel require amendment.

In closing, I suggest that the lack of an adequate basic pension increase is a disgrace. Surely, Canada can do better than set the pension at the level of $80. Surely, Canada, which has one of the highest standards of living in the world, can devise a means to make certain that the total income of this nation is distributed a little more fairly than this piece of legislation does. Let me say this: You are not going to satisfy the old age pensioners and we do not intend to stop fighting for a pension which will come closer to meeting their needs than does the niggardly approach this government has taken.

Mr. Pepin: You have done this for 30 years now. All you do is continually ask for more.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Harding: It is alright, Mr. Speaker; we do not mind the minister complaining about the fact that this party fights for the underprivileged in this country. We will continue to do this. We will continue to fight until we reach the stage where the poverty line in this country disappears and we do not have to be needling this government year in and year out to do its job. Under a just society you have objectives and aims, and you should be moving in that direction; but you are not doing it. That is why we are calling for action today.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Béchard: That is what we are doing.

Mr. Harding: We see people who talk of progress, and are supposed to be progressive in their outlook, allowing standards such as this to be legislated in 1970 in Canada.

In closing, may I say that I think it is a disgrace that we are going to offer to our senior citizens a basic pension of $80. It is amazing that we can do so much for other groups of pensioners, but just because these people have not the power to use a lever on this government, members of the government sit back and go to sleep. I am very disappointed that the minister and the government, after months and months of considering income security for all Canadians, would come down with legislation such as this which makes the poor subsidize the poor. You have had reports on tax reform, so why do you not use some of them to give the senior citizens of our country the break which they should have had many years ago?

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will speak briefly. The essential points in this debate have been made but, as is the case with most debates in this place and in committees, the central points are made, the logic is acknowledged, the facts are accepted, and then no change is made in the legislation. Continuing with the age old tradition of trying, I will make a few observations.

What are the essential points in the new legislation? First of all, the basic pension will be increased phenomenally from $79.58 to $80. If there were no legislation, there would have been a phenomenal increase to $81.17. Second, the escalator clause has been removed from the basic pension, the magnanimous escalator clause that does not keep pace with the actual cost of living for pensioners who have to live in a society where the rate of inflation goes beyond 2 per cent each year. Third, there was the big increase in GIS so loudly and proudly proclaimed by the government. What is the amount of this increase? For a single person, the increase is $23 and for a married couple it is $32.

What does this fantastic increase mean for pensioners who qualify? Let us keep in mind that they do not qualify unless they earn less than $110 a month. It means they get this additional money, but under the new legislation this increase will put them into the category of those who have to pay income tax. When you put these two facts together, you will discover that the elderly people who have spent their working lives in this country will live in 1970 at the poverty level. There are thousands of them who, with this announced increase in pension, will barely eke out an existence, whether they live in big cities, small towns or in the country. Yet, government spokesmen have pointed to this action with great pride.

The financing of this parsimonious and cruel measure, as has already been pointed out, comes in the main from the poor themselves. I should correct that in part, the money will come—

Mr. Munro: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question? He mentioned the fact that old age pensioners who receive $110 a month would be disqualified. He means, disqualified from what? Does he mean disqualified from receiving the GIS? Does he realize that on top of the $110 they would receive the universal pension of $80, making $190?

Mr. Broadbent: I hope the minister realizes that even if pensioners receive $110 and then receive their pension in addition to that, they have to pay income tax so, actually they will still be living at the poverty level. That is the point I am trying to make, and I hope the minister will take note of it.

Mr. Munro: There is not much tax on that amount.

Mr. Gilbert: But the total pension is still below the poverty level. That is why there is the FRAP organization in Montreal.

Mr. Broadbent: The money comes not from increased taxes on all those in Canada who are affluent—and I would include all Members of Parliament in that category—nor, even from increased taxes on the average person. It will really come from the old age security fund itself. That is to say, the parsimonious increase that has been granted to our elderly citizens will be provided for by other elderly citizens who themselves have real need of that money. What is needed instead, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as well as many others have pointed out, is a substantial increase in the pension, at least up to a level that would take all our elderly citizens out of poverty.

The proposal that we made was to increase the pension up to $150 for all those over 65, and to add to that an escalator clause which would correspond in its effect to the real increase in the cost of living. This proposal should be financed by a redistribution of income in the country, that is by increases in taxes on all those of us who can afford to pay such increases and not by taking money from the old age pension fund which is already in existence.

I will conclude by saying simply that the minister comes from a town noted for the manufacture of steel. As all people know, steel is cold, hard and inflexible. I should like to suggest that the minister and his government are revealing an attitude toward the elderly people of Canada which corresponds very well to the best known product of his home town. It is cold, hard and inflexible.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Gilbert: May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker? I think it is the custom before the debate closes for the minister to answer any of the questions that have been asked in speeches by hon. members. Even though he is not bound by the rules to do so, this is a custom and a courtesy that ministers follow. I would expect this minister to comply with it.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member knows, there is no such rule. It may be a practice, although it is certainly not a universally accepted practice. There are instances where the minister does close the debate. The only rule is that if the minister chooses to take part in the debate and speaks a second time, this second contribution closes the debate. But that is left entirely to the discretion of the minister. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

PROVISION OF SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE, LOAN GUARANTEE, ETC.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved that Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the legislation before us is to increase employment by broadening and strengthening our industrial development incentives.

There are two main proposals. One is to introduce a system of loan guarantees to operate in conjunction with incentive grants. The other is to provide a special incentive on a short-term basis, designed to give a particular stimulus to get new industrial projects moving in the next year or two.

The loan guarantees will become a full and permanent part of the program, that is to say, they will be available as long as the legislation is in force and in all of the designated regions. I hope and expect that they will develop into a significant instrument of economic expansion policy.

Several small businesses complain because they are unable to borrow at reasonable terms, even when their plans are good, but we are ready to help them. We want to test a new kind of assistance. When the carrying out of a project requires more funds then can be borrowed at reasonable terms, we will be in a position to guarantee that part of the loan exceeding the amount a bank or any other lender would normally have granted.

In general, large businesses can quite easily borrow if need be. It is not so for small businesses, especially in depressed areas of the country. We are ready to take certain risks to help small Canadian businesses establish themselves where there is a more urgent need of employment.

The ceiling of the loan will be 80 per cent of the total of the fixed investments made by the company, following deduction of any development grant or any kind of assistance from any public power. As long as the loan does not exceed that limit, we will be ready to guarantee part of it.

Service industries as well as manufacturing and processing plants may take advantage of that guarantee. In areas where expnsion is slow, service industries may not have the same difficulties as manufacturing or processing industries, but they still have problems getting capital.

Of course we could not guarantee all loans incurred by a multiplicity of small businesses or motels in designated areas. We will now be required by the act to define the areas where the establishment or large commercial concerns can contribute considerably to the economic expansion of slow growth areas. For instance, this could mean administration buildings, stores, convention centres and hotels.

[English]

In short, the bill's provisions for loan guarantees will both increase the scope of our encouragement to development and make it more effective. In manufacturing, that will be especially true for small and new enterprises that have great difficulty in getting money for projects that big companies finance easily out of their own resources.

The loan guarantees may also be especially helpful to existing plants that need to modernize or go out of business. Often, the biggest part of the expense in such cases is not so much the new equipment as the cost of re-organizing the existing plant and operations. Borrowing money in such situations can be particularly difficult. There may be an especially large role for the guarantees in helping plants to re-organize and modernize and thereby preserving jobs that would otherwise be lost.

I would like to refer at this point to the criticisms made by some people, who usually come from the regions of comparatively fast economic growth, because we provide incentives to foreign controlled companies. These critics should be reminded that we do not provide incentives in order to be nice to any company, whoever owns it. We provide incentives for the sake of the people who will get employment or, in the case of a modernization, whose jobs will be made more secure.

Whether we should have any different policy towards foreign controlled corporations is an important national issue—but it is a national issue. If we want to make changes in policy we must make them in all parts of Canada. We can, if we like, have new rules that apply wherever a plant is located. But that would not alter the importance of encouraging industry in the regions where extra jobs are especially important. That encouragement should be given in the same way to all projects in the slow-growth regions; any rules or policies about ownership and control should be national in application. In other words, if some hon. members want to attack foreign corporations, that is an issue to discuss on its merits. But it should not be used as an excuse for attacking regional policy. However our industry is controlled, there is and will be just the same reason to give it special encouragement where people have the greatest need for it.

I turn now to the second main proposal of this bill, which is designed to give particular encouragement to industry to get ahead with investments in the next year or two. The plants will have to be built and be in production by the end of 1973. The special development incentive proposed in these cases will be a maximum of 10 per cent of capital costs in the case of expansions and modernizations of existing plants. For new plants or for expansions to produce new products, the maximum will be 10 per cent of capital costs plus $2,000 per job.

In the Atlantic provinces, the special incentive will be available in addition to the present incentive. The maximum will, therefore, become 30 per cent of capital costs for expansions and modernizations, and for new plants the maximum will be 35 per cent of capital costs plus $7,000 per job.

[Translation]

In the already designated areas of Quebec, Ontario and the four western provinces, the grants will remain unchanged.

Immediately after Parliament will have approved those measures, we intend to designate a new area covering all of the not yet designated territory of south-western Quebec including Montreal and Hull as well as Stormont, Glengarry and Prescott counties in south-eastern Ontario.

The present incentives will not apply in the sector which lies within the main Canadian industrial zone; if the situation is considered on a long-term basis, no grants will be required. However, by resorting to special incentives we want to speed up the implementation of new projects and in doing so, to cope with the alarming unemployment conditions. This is why this new area will be entitled to the new grants set at 10 per cent of capital costs and at $2,000 per job created.

Needless to say, this new guarantee system will apply in this area just as they do in the other designated areas.

[English]

Since the special incentive will be particularly helpful within the province of Quebec, it is important that I dispose of some inaccurate statements that have been made about the operations of the incentives program to date. There have been suggestions in some quarters that favouritism is already being shown to Quebec. I do not know whether the people who make these suggestions—these are probably the same people who say, "If you want to solve the problems in Quebec you should solve the economic problems there," and when we solve them then they say we have favoured Quebec—are incapable of doing arithmetic or whether they are trying to stir up antagonisms by deliberate misrepresentations. Certainly, one or other of those explanations must be correct, since the facts are quite contrary to the accusations.

Let me state the facts. From the beginning of the program to the end of November, we have committed $91 million in offers which have been accepted by the companies concerned. Of this $91 million, just over a third or $32 million, is committed to industries in Quebec. Slightly more, $34 million, is committed to industries in the four Atlantic provinces.

The purpose of the program is to increase employment. The latest figures, for October, show that there were then 34,000 unemployed people in the Atlantic provinces, and in Quebec the number of unemployed was 159,000. In other words, at present what we have committed in incentives in Quebec is almost exactly $200 per unemployed person, and in the Atlantic provinces it is almost $1,000 per unemployed person, five times as much. I may add that the same calculation for the prairies works out at $250 per unemployed person, a little more than the figure for Quebec.

Of course, there is nothing final about these comparisons. They will fluctuate considerably from time to time, as major projects materialize in one region or another. Indeed, we have just had an offer accepted that will greatly increase the figure for the Prairies. Certainly, we expect to do much more for Quebec over the next few months. The reason is that, in relation to the severity of the unemployment problem, the program has as yet made a relatively small impact in Quebec. Anyone who claims that it is already biased in favour of Quebec is not telling the truth. What we are trying to do is to meet the needs as well as we can, wherever they are greatest. For a program so new, operating in the circumstances of a general slowdown in the economy, we have already had a fair measure of success. We are going to achieve much more success.

The two main proposals for this purpose are the loan guarantees and the special incentive. The bill before the House also proposes some minor and consequential amendments to the program. For example, the introduction of the special incentive makes it important to lengthen, from 12 months to 18 months, the time that companies will have to get a plant into production after a region ceases to be designated. This will simplify administration if it should prove desirable to change the boundaries of the regions.

Also, we propose to remove the absolute limit of $12 million on the size of any development incentive. This only affects plants employing more than 400 people, because the limit of $30,000 per job directly created in the plant will continue to apply. That, I would emphasize, is the absolute limit for developments with the most intensive use of capital. The incentives we are actually paying generally cost a great deal less. The projects under way to date will provide 15,949 permanent jobs. The average, for the offers accepted so far, is $5,700 per job.

I emphasize that these 15,949 permanent jobs are simply the new jobs that will be created directly in the industries we are assisting. The figure does not include any credit for the existing jobs that will be preserved by modernization of plants. It is entirely new, direct employment. It does not include employment in constructing the new factories and equipment; it does not include the indirect employment that will arise as the plants come into production and buy materials and services, and it does not include all the extra jobs that there will be in the consumer industries when the workers in the new plants spend their wages.

The economists tell us that these indirect effects add up to about two additional jobs for each one created directly. In other words, the legislation that this House passed in the summer of last year has already set in motion the creation, in total, of about 48,000 jobs.

Mr. Danforth: Oh boy—that is in theory.

Mr. Marchand: I am the first to say that in the present state of our economy, that is far from enough.

Mr. Gilbert: Right.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I found that out before you did. It is a good start. But we have to continue. We have to continue on a bigger scale. That is the reason for this amending legislation. I hope and believe that it will have the support of all hon. members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, the launching of the new development incentives program in summer 1969 meant a considerable amount of work for department officials. The improvements proposed in the bill entail a lot of work and we shall have to increase the personnel. The decisions will get increasingly more complex and important. That is why I suggest the creation of a board comprising senior officials of my department, representatives of the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as well as specialists from the private sector. Thus we shall be able to see to it that this most important program give the best possible results.

When we initiated the present program less than 18 months ago, many people were skeptical, and rightly so, about the chances this unprecedented measure had to succeed.

We had to learn from experience and that explains why we made mistakes. Yet I believe the program indubitably meets the present needs and produces excellent results. The amendments I propose have no other purpose than make it more efficient.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister's introduction to what we consider to be a most important bill, but he did not tell us very much. We had already read the press release from the minister explaining the proposed amendments to the bill. For what little enlightenment we gained, he could have dispensed with the speech which he made today.

Mr. Bell: Hear, hear!

Mr. Béchard: They are never satisfied.

Mr. McGrath: We have considered this to be a most important bill for a number of reasons. First of all, it is the first time that this act has been opened by Parliament since originally passed. The act has now been in operation for a full year, so we will want to examine it from that viewpoint. Secondly, Mr. Speaker, we are naturally very interested in examining the full intent of the amendments proposed by the government. I might say that we on this side of the House do not agree with the government's concept of regional expansion embodied in this bill. We will enlarge on this during the course of the debate and during the clause by clause examination in committee.

The bill is a relatively simple one, but the principle is very important and complex and it is on this principle that we want to examine the government very closely and carefully. The mechanics of the amendments can be dispensed with very quickly. Mr. Speaker, we want to question the minister's estimate of the number of jobs that have been created. I am very anxious to get into that and anxious to analyze the figure of 48,000 jobs. I should like to know how the government arrived at that figure.

What I consider the most startling failure of the government's regional development policy is its inability to come to grips with the fundamental problems of regional disparity in this country. After all, this is what the bill is supposed to do, together with legislation setting up the minister's department. This fundamental problem of development, sir, involves the question of ways in which the federal government contributes to the fulfilment of a given region's potential, in order that the citizens of that region can enjoy a standard and quality of life which meets an acceptable level.

In my view, Sir, this goal can only be accomplished if the first premise of any development strategy for Canada is based on the fact that Canada is comprised of five different economic regions, five regions with different potentials and different economic aspirations. It is only by approaching regional development from the standpoint of this premise that we can hope to meet with any degree of success. A strong national economic policy dedicated to full employment can only be successful if the economic realities of Canada dictate the development policy followed by the government. This regional concept of our economy is an economic fact of life in Canada, and one which this government will sooner or later have to recognize.

A strong national economic policy means a prosperous economy for Ontario and it means prosperity for the other industrial regions of Canada. A strong and prosperous Ontario or a strong and prosperous Quebec mean that the federal government and the national economy are better equipped to assist the disadvantaged regions of the country. Increased assistance to the disadvantaged areas of Canada is only possible if full employment is a national policy for all Canada. It therefore follows, Sir, that a strong national economy and our ability to assist the disadvantaged areas within Canada amount, of course, to the same thing. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that the co-ordination of development with stability means prosperity for all the regions of Canada. We believe that this approach must, of necessity, dictate the government's attitude towards regional development.

There are many aspects of the bill before the House, which embodies the main thrust of the government's regional development policy or the government's program for dealing with regional disparities in this country, that we shall want to examine. We shall want to examine the bill carefully in committee and hear expert witnesses who will be able to enlighten us about the proper approach that we ought to take in this country in order to achieve a meaningful regional development policy. Above all, the government must set for itself guidelines in order to meet the demands of regional development and to end regional disparities in this country.

We feel that the first guideline must be the recognition that the provinces, municipalities and regional agencies involved in any regional development plan know what is best for them. We believe that the regions of the country are in the best position to tell the government exactly what form of development is best suited to that particular regional economy. I say that, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has built up a virtual army of experts, bureaucrats and technocrats in Ottawa and all across this country. These so-called experts, well meaning though they are, fail to take full advantage of the expertise in the provinces, municipalities and regional agencies of this country. We believe that it is appropriate, and indeed necessary, for each region to develop its own view of its own potential. This view would, of course, be based upon the economic capabilities of the region and the kind of life that the citizens of the region wish to live. We believe that present government policy fails to take these factors into account. What is good for Montreal or southeastern Ontario is not necessarily good for Cape Breton Island or Newfoundland.

Mr. McGrath: Second, the keynote of any development strategy should include, in our view, a uniform approach to the problems of education, health and housing facilities, which should be standard for all Canadians and should be a right of citizenship in this country. Each region has a responsibility to its citizens to ensure that they have adequate health and housing facilities. These facilities must be made available in all areas and in all regions.

Third, Mr. Speaker, we believe that regional economic development is based upon regional potential and not a region's imperfect ability to copy the economic potential of another region. We believe this area is one of the main weaknesses of the government's approach to regional development in this country. This government has embarked upon a national policy of development through industrialization. The government has attempted to assist industries to locate in designated areas or slow-growth centres and by doing that it has ignored three fundamental facts.

First, it has ignored the fact that the location of industries under the area industrial incentives Act, or under this program, is at the intiative of the industry and not of the government. Neither the federal government nor any other government exercises any of this initiative. The initiative is placed solely in the hands of industry. Industry may locate in any of the designated regions of the country. As a matter of fact, industry now has the whole country from which to choose. Consequently, the disadvantaged regions lying at the geographic extremes of the country—areas such as the Atlantic provinces, certain parts of the north and northern Ontario—do not stand a chance. They just cannot compete, and there is no way in which they can compete.

Second, all such industrialization is bilateral between the industry and the federal government. In other words, the province does not, of necessity, come into the picture. The federal government makes the move by providing the incentive, and it can only hope that the industry in question will establish itself in any particular designated area. As I have said, an industry has practically all Canada from which to choose. This state of affairs is a basic failure of the program. This fact becomes self evident when anyone gives close scrutiny to the program that is contemplated by this measure.

Third, Sir, the type of industry that may be encouraged by virtue of the grant may not be the type of industry that can be properly sustained in the area in which it locates. For example, there is no point in building an automobile plant in northern Newfoundland. It would be too far away from major markets. Transportation difficulties are inherent in such locations. Yet this factor has all too often been ignored because the government does not possess the initiative; the initiative is in the hands of industry to locate where it will. The program should take into account the recreation or resource development of the area. This should be a guiding factor in the government's program. Hence, we get an expansion of the regional approach to this question instead of a national blanket approach such as the government proceeds to follow by trial and error.

We believe that provincial and local governments must participate in the planning of development strategy. Thus far, they have been largely ignored. We firmly believe that one federal strategy for development is neither possible nor desirable, with five unique economic regions. a multiple strategy is necessary. Accordingly, we must examine the intent of this area incentives legislation and we must examine closely the record of the act to date.

Fourth, regional development strategy in our view should harmonize with national economic management. The government has embarked on a nationwide campaign to control inflation. We all know the consequences of this campaign. By the use of its fiscal and monetary levers, the government forced the have-not provinces to pay a price altogether out of proportion to the contribution they made to the inflationary spiral in the first place. Consequently, there is disproportionately high unemployment in the areas which contributed least to inflation. This is why there is an anticipated unemployment figure in the Atlantic provinces of 14 per cent this winter. God knows how high it will go. It will certainly exceed that amount. In my own province of Newfoundland, it will probably reach 18 per cent or even 20 per cent. It is the have-not provinces which pay the piper for the tune this government calls in trying to fight inflation. I am of the opinion that the government has failed to take this into account when determining its monetary and fiscal policy. It has failed to harmonize these efforts with its regional development program.

To sum up, we believe the designated area concepts have been too generally applied. The result is that the disadvantaged regions of Canada receive no help, or very little help, in attracting industry. No one will quarrel with the designation of southeastern Ontario; no one will quarrel with the designation of the City of Montreal and the City of Hull. God knows, these cities need help. We know how alarmingly high unemployment has become in the City of Montreal, and we know something has to be done about it. Perhaps the government should have given consideration to making these places special areas instead of designated areas so that there could have been a more concentrated and dramatic approach to the problem. I notice the minister nods his head. Unfortunately, that nod is not recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Bell: It is now.

Mr. McGrath: I hope the minister will enlarge upon this aspect, because we realize there are serious problems in Montreal. I have no doubt, though, that there is also a serious problem in Vancouver where there is a high rate of unemployment. How will Vancouver react? I am sure that if the figures were examined it would be found there was serious unemployment in Edmonton and in Toronto. The situation requires that a special development program be implemented. But I ask that the government should heed the consequences to the Atlantic provinces, to northern Ontario and to some of the prairie regions of this country by his designation of Montreal. Surely, in the first instance, the concept was to enable the regions I have mentioned to compete with large industrial areas such as Montreal. It must be logical, then, to suggest that what the minister has done has been to defeat the very purpose of the act. And this is unfortunate for the Atlantic provinces, especially.

Reaction has already come from the Atlantic provinces economic council and from the government of New Brunswick. I hope that when this bill goes before the committee witnesses from these areas will be able to tell the committee and, hopefully, the minister, exactly what this will mean in terms of the government's regional development policy.

Furthermore, we believe the act fails to give the government control of the development process. Under the program as now set up, the government is merely a passive agent. The legislation has been operated in such a way that provincial governments, municipal governments and local bodies have been largely ignored. Yet the minister tells us that we must continue on a basis of trial and error. I contend that there is no need to continue on such a basis. I suggest to the minister, and to his senior officials, that if they were more willing to consult with provincial agencies, planning boards and municipal councils a lot of these errors would be eliminated. A little humility on the part of the department would help greatly.

Finally, we believe this act has not been fully selective in its application and that it has failed to recognize the economic facts of life in this country. These facts dictate that there must be a regional approach to regional disparity and not one blanket national approach as this government insists.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to say a few words on this bill on behalf of members of the New Democratic Party. Bill C-205 provides for a number of important changes in the Regional Development Incentives Act and it would appear to be, as the minister indicated, a major component of the government's program to improve economic conditions in Quebec.

To the extent that it may accomplish something useful in this regard we welcome it, but because of factors I shall be discussing later I have serious doubt whether it will accomplish the desired end. Some of the provisions of this bill require close examination. But before we analyse the specific proposals and get into the nuts and bolts of the bill, it is necessary to take a good look at the government's regional development programs and their relationship to general economic policy.

Regional development programs were presented by the government as a major weapon in the so-called war on poverty. The government introduced its programs with widespread support throughout Canada, as well as from all parties in the House of Commons. Few ministers have been as fortunate as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) in the extent of the support that he received for his new program.

It will be generally recognized that instant solutions are not possible in dealing with the types of problems that are tackled in regional development programs. However, the new program, which has been developed on the experience of the old area incentive development program, has been in effect for a year and a half, and Canadians have the right to ask just how that program has been operating. A great deal of money has been made available to this department, contrary to the experiences of other departments and, I suspect, to the envy of some of them. But we must now ask whether we are receiving value for our expenditures, whether these funds are being used in the best possible way.

The minister's remarks in the debate on November 19 gave us part of the answer. He indicated that under all incentive programs to date there had been an investment of $1.1 billion, $205 million of which had been provided through grants. Some 36,000 new jobs were claimed, both directly and indirectly, consequential upon the incentive grants made available. However, as I understood it, direct jobs were only in the order of some 15,000. The fact is that many of these new plants are not yet in operation, and some may never be in operation. Furthermore, the minister admitted that some new plants were constructed independently of incentives. I suggest the record is a pretty sorry one. In terms of number of jobs created, the performance has been pretty dismal when related to the unemployment figures revealed today showing 476,000 people out of work in November, 1970.

It seems to me that one of the problems we are contending with in the government's program is the ad hoc approach that is being used in many instances. The government seems to have dashed in here and dashed in there in order to help put out economic fires of one sort or another. Very often they used a single program approach centred for the most part on industrial incentives, industrial incentives restricted mainly to secondary manufacturing industries.

We now have the special Quebec program that is designed to deal with problems with which we are all familiar and which have been discussed at great length in recent months. With regard to the remarks made by the minister, I want to make it quite clear that any questions that we ask about this bill are not complaints or criticisms of favouritism to Quebec. We have some very important questions with regard to whether or not this measure will accomplish the objectives the government has in mind, and whether it will deal with the economic problems that are one major component of the over-all problem facing this particular part of Canada. We are also wondering whether this program will in fact make a significant contribution, the contribution expected of it, to solving these problems. Secondly, there are some very important problems in other parts of Canada which we feel are deserving also of attention by the federal government.

Reference was made this afternoon, as it was in earlier debates during the current session, to the designation of regions across Canada. Wide areas of Canada are now being brought under the umbrella of the legislation and are being stamped either as designated areas or special areas. Therefore, it is important to take a minute or two to examine the government's record in this respect. We should see what it has done and relate it to some of the things that were said at the time the program was being introduced.

I was particularly interested in this matter, because, as a member from Saskatchewan I was very much aware of the particular problems facing Saskatchewan during the past two or three years. Consequently, I made representations to the minister, asking that there be an extension of designated areas in the province of Saskatchewan. In this regard I wrote the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion a letter on October 6, 1969, in which I pointed out:

> My particular concern is for the province of Saskatchewan which, as you will know, is experiencing acute economic difficulties at the present time. Income levels and economic activity in Saskatchewan are currently well below neighbouring provinces and indeed only the Atlantic provinces are now below Saskatchewan in income levels. Additions to grain inventory which do not represent cash in the pocket succeeded in keeping Saskatchewan's level above that of Yukon and Northwest Territories.

I received a very nice letter in reply from the minister, dated November 13, 1969, in which he said:

> I fully appreciate your concern with the difficult economic problems facing Saskatchewan today. I share the concern. Frankly, however, I cannot agree that the attitude expressed in the news release which you sent to me will be the most effective in solving the problems.

That refers to some comments I had made and which I had enclosed with my letter:

> The incentives program is only one of a number of measures that need to be used. Important as it is, I would not pretend for a moment that it alone can solve all of the problems that we are trying to attack across the country.

I agree wholeheartedly with that statement, as I shall indicate during the course of my remarks. Then, further on in his letter, the minister made this comment in turning down my request that there be an extension of the designated regions in Saskatchewan:

> It is the nature of industrial incentives that, the more widely they are spread, the less they will do for the areas where they are the most important of the possible programs.

> Accordingly, what we tried to do in our designations was to use our available funds most effectively to produce across the country the best possible balance of results for Canadians whose employment opportunities could not be improved without the incentives.

That is a very laudable approach. However, it seems that the minister uses one approach one time when it suits his purpose to do so, and another approach another time.

In looking at the general approach used by the government and examining the inconsistencies that have been apparent over the past year and a half, it is interesting to note what the minister said when the regional development incentive legislation was before the regional development committee. On April 15 he was asked some questions by, among others, myself as a member of the committee with regard to the designation of areas across Canada. One of the comments made by the minister is the following, to be found at page 3:62 of the committee report:

> You know this is a very touchy point and this is the really difficult part of this program because the more you extend it, the more you weaken it. Manitoba asked for the whole province to be designated. All those cities that are not designated, of course want to be designated. I think only Montreal and Toronto have not asked to be designated. You can make a very good case for a municipality which is outside any limit you make. There is no doubt about that. We have to get used to hearing from people who are not satisfied with the borderlines. I know every day I received complaints and there are good cases; there is no doubt about that, but if we start extending it indefinitely it would become meaningless. It is a difficult point and I am sure many can prove to us that we should include this city and this other one. We have no reason other than if we extend it too much, it will become meaningless. It is difficult and politically it is very difficult too, but anyhow this is the purpose of the program. We have to stick to our guns.

Again, on April 15, 1970, the minister made some other comments before the committee when he was discussing the legislation. They are reported at page 3:15 of the proceedings of the Regional Development Committee:

> There is no definite or very precise criteria and we cannot say that we were not wrong in some cases. We do not know. The future only will tell. Our decision was based on this general philosophy, except the designation of some small areas, mainly in Newfoundland, where we designated special areas for purposes of resettlement. We cannot say that those resettlements were growth centres in themselves. It was for a particular purpose. At least the government of Newfoundland agreed with us. So this is the way we have approached the problem and this is the principle on which we based our decisions.

Then, in answer to a question by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), in respect of Cornwall, Ontario, which is now to be included as a designated area, the minister replied as follows:

> Cornwall is located in a very prosperous region of Canada. Cornwall has some difficulties mainly because of the situation in the textile industry. I do not think that the solution for Cornwall is to make a special area out of Cornwall. It is to see how we can solve the textile problem in Canada. I do not believe that Cornwall is say in the same situation as certain areas which were designated special areas. This town has been affected by one industry. It is the textile industry. And if we do not find a solution to the whole industry in Canada, I do not think that even if we designate Cornwall as a special area, if we do not find a solution to the whole problem.

It is very interesting to read the comments made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in light of his subsequent announcement. I want to make it clear that I have every sympathy with the problems facing the city of Cornwall. I am not questioning the designation of that area, but it seems to me there have been some important inconsistencies in the approach of the government to this particular matter since the regional development legislation has come into effect.

I think we do have to examine the objectives of the program. It is intended to eliminate regional disparities across Canada and to develop the human and resources potential in all regions of this country. Reference has already been made to the regional nature and structure of the economy. In addition I would suggest, and it is important, that more stress be put on the objective of reducing inequalities in wealth. I recognize, of course, that this does not involve only programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, but that the programs of that department must be complemented by other government policies designed to reduce inequalities of wealth. I think it is very important to keep in mind when drafting regional development programs that we do not simply perpetuate or possibly even extend the inequalities which exist within some of the regions of Canada that we are trying to help through these programs.

I should like to examine for a few minutes the operation of the regional development programs of the government as I see them from my own point of view and from the information that has been made available to the members of the House of Commons. Certainly, I feel this is a matter that should receive a good deal of attention from the members as it is a very important area of policy. When we take a look at the policies developed by the government over the past few years, there are three different areas we need to question and examine.

The first basic area has to do with the assumptions on which the government has developed and formulated its programs. Second, we have to take a look at the basic framework of these programs which have been, and still are, in the course of development. Third, we must take a look at some of the problems involved in implementing these programs. These problems, involving the nuts and bolts of the function, are also important in themselves.

To return to the first problem, it seems to me that the very first assumption upon which this program is based needs to be examined, that is, the assumption upon which the government's over-all economic policy is based. I have in mind the government's anti-inflationary policy which allowed a high level of unemployment to develop in Canada. This is a matter which has been debated at great length in the House of Commons. I want to say that I have some sympathy for the minister because I feel it is impossible for the minister and his department to develop a sound regional development program when, in fact, it is cast within the framework of a total economic policy which is inadequate and which allows unemployment to develop and exist across Canada. It seems to me that in such a framework, and within such a situation, it is impossible to have a regional development program that will do the job. It seems to me this is the first basic fault we find when we look at some of the basic assumptions involved in developing such a program.

The second basic problem is the absence of any sort of planning framework. I have already dealt with this in part. In fact, we have had a good deal of ad hocery, if I may use that phrase, in developing regional development programs. In this particular program some other gimmicks have been developed to help deal with problems in various parts of Canada. Much of the program which has been developed has been developed in the absence of any sort of planning approach, or any comprehensive framework. I have no doubt that some work has been done in this area. I certainly expect that is the case, but I feel this has not come through as yet in any program we have before us at the present time.

The third major function which I find at fault in the program of the government is its blind faith in relying upon the private enterprise sector of the economy to deal with this particular problem. Of course, the government's reliance and faith is demonstrated by the fact that the greater part of this money is being spent in the form of grants to private industry. I am not saying all of these are necessarily bad and there is not need for such a program, but we do have some very fundamental problems when we give away huge amounts of money in the form of grants to private industry because we have no control over the development of these industries. Actually, we have only a very short-run type of control over development and over what happens in these industries.

It is very important to know that what we are dealing with is the well being and welfare of the people. We must examine this within a broad context as well as within its more narrow limits. The minister has indicated in answer to questions from time to time, as noted recently by my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) during another debate, that in some areas of the country the government would provide assistance to the level of 35 per cent of capital costs, plus whatever other assistance is made available in terms of the number of jobs created through new development.

I am not arguing against giving special help to particular areas of Canada, but I want to draw attention to the reliance being placed on private enterprise and the corporate sector of the economy to deal with problems of regional development. I suggest the government's program is doomed to failure as long as it persists in this approach. It is simply unworkable and will not provide an answer in the long run.

The fourth basic assumption is the government's willingness to allow conflicts in policies relating to existing development. One particular problem, of course, has to do with the approach to the ownership of firms which are provided with financial assistance. A good deal has been said already about the type of assistance which has been granted to foreign corporations through the regional development program. I think this, as well, is a very basic fault. If the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) is to place before the government, the House of Commons and the people of Canada, any sort of meaningful program to deal with the problems of foreign ownership and control in the Canadian economy, then I suggest this willingness on the part of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to allow grants and allow giveaways to foreign controlled corporations comes into direct conflict with any such program which might be developed in the future.

When we come to the framework of the government's program, I think there are a number of serious problems as well. I believe there are very serious problems in respect of the management of the whole program and the myriad systems in the program which are being developed, such as primary incentives, secondary incentives, special area programs and so on. I suggest that within the framework in which the government has been developing this program, the program has become an unmanageable monstrosity. I suggest further that within the framework of the program itself there has been an inadequate amount of analysis of the projects for which grants are being provided. In terms of the analysis, and in terms of taking a look at the operations, one might find there are a number of operations in respect of which the real purpose of obtaining a grant or extra assistance is to bail out other types of operations.

Is there any prohibition against a new company being established which may be very legitimate but which may consist of shareholders who also hold shares in some other companies which are experiencing difficulties? This could lead to serious difficulties through the new company taking over the shares of the other companies and operating them as a subsidiary of the new company. By this means, it could engage in a bail-out operation which would be of no benefit to the people of Canada or the new shareholders who may eventually become involved in the operation.

Also, I believe it is very important that the government take a look at the economics of the projects it intends to assist. All projects should be subject to an economic criteria and analysis in order to make sure that the project is economically sound, because I do not think it is wise to assist a project which is not viable in the first place. In some respects it might be a disservice to a group of people in the long run if assistance were provided for a project which has no hope of surviving.

I have already dealt with one other aspect involved within the framework of the operation of this program and which has to do with policy with regard to foreign ownership and control of various companies. I also have some questions in my mind concerning what requirements are being placed on firms which receive grants with respect to pollution control. I know there is provision within the legislation to make sure that companies which receive assistance under these programs do follow adequate pollution control measures, but is there any sort of follow-through to this? Is this, in fact, being done in the operation of the department?

Finally, within the framework of the program as it is being developed, we must be concerned about the fact that there is no real strategy in terms of developing the infrastructure for adequate communities. To some extent, this is being done now in certain areas and possibly is in mind in respect of some of the special areas which have been established. I realize that some steps are being taken in this direction. It would seem to me, however, that grants are being provided willy-nilly on the basis of applications from this or that firm in many parts of Canada when in fact inadequate attention is being paid to the over-all planning and development of communities.

Finally, I should like to deal with some of the problems involved in the implementation of this legislation. The first problem I might raise, and which I raise only tentatively, is the whole question of the political or partisan political aspect. I want to make quite clear that I believe the minister was sincere in the statements he has made from time to time that he wanted to keep partisan political considerations out of the operations of his department. I feel that he no doubt has made an attempt to carry that into effect. I hope he will continue to do so. Questions may arise in some people's minds from time to time, and I hope there is no cause to follow up on this particular point. I have no direct complaint at this time. Suggestions have been made to me, but I am not prepared to put them in the form of a direct complaint at the present time and I hope I shall not have cause to do so in the future.

With regard to the implementation of the government's program, there is one problem which it seems to me is being raised in the legislation before us. I refer to the fact that the government proposes to remove the ceiling on the extent of the grants which may be provided to various commercial operations or industrial operations. This is a very important change in the program. I realize there are still some limitations which are retained in the legislation, but nevertheless the ceiling is being removed. I think we require more explanation concerning the reasons for this particular step being taken by the government.

Since there has been a ceiling of $12 million, it would seem to me when that ceiling is being removed altogether in respect of one aspect of the total sum that can be made available, some explanation is needed from the minister concerning why this is being done and why it is necessary. I wonder, for instance, if there are proposed operations which may receive more than $12 million in assistance which would not come into existence if there were not this type of assistance available.

With regard to the implementation of the program, there is the problem I have already dealt with concerning the matter of new designations being made now in conflict with the statement of the minister that there would be no more designations until the three year period expired in 1971. There are also problems of lack of consistency in the government's program. As well, I think we must be concerned about the fact that the government from time to time has provided assistance to firms which have engaged in unfair labour practices and which have paid low wages. This is a matter which I feel deserves consideration as well.

Another important problem concerns the fact that there is very little involvement or participation by the people in the regionally depressed areas who will be affected by the government's regional development program. There is one notable exception which has to do with some of the Newstart programs in various parts of Canada. These programs I feel have made a very important contribution in terms of the participation and involvement of people, and in helping people develop the ability to solve their own problems by taking action on their own initiative. This is a very useful type of program. Possibly I have missed some announcements, but I have not seen any announcement by the government or by the minister concerning future plans for the Newstart programs and whether, in fact, there is a plan to continue these programs either in their present form or through some successor type of organization or structure.

But, I think, coming back to the main problem, there is a feeling in many parts of Canada that in fact there is no real participation by people in dealing with the problems that the department is attempting to tackle. The minister has many able people who are assisting him in the department. They are able, sincere and dedicated and are trying their best to do a good job. I want to make it clear that I am not in any way deprecating the staff he has built up around him in the department. But regardless of how good a staff the minister has, it is simply impossible for him and for his department to do the type of job that is expected unless they find ways and means of involving people in the communities concerned. This is the type of emphasis that I feel the minister must develop with respect to his programs in the future.

Finally, with respect to the implementation of the program, I feel that there has been too little use made of public agencies and of co-operative methods, in attempting to solve economic problems in many parts of Canada. Of course, we have agencies in some areas, such as the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which I think are very healthy types of institutions which can take some initiative in dealing with economic problems in a particular region or area. This type of thing needs to be developed more in the future. There is as well the fact, a point I have made already, that a higher percentage of assistance is given to firms in various parts of Canada under the proposals now before us. If there is to be 35 per cent or 50 per cent public financing in a significant number of projects, then certainly there is a very good case for ensuring that there is public involvement in the decision making and in the whole development of the projects that are involved.

Turning to the specific provisions of this bill, I recognize that some of them are designed to deal with some special problems which have come to the fore in Canada in recent months. I hope they are successful, but I am very dubious that they will in fact do the job expected of them. I am somewhat disappointed that we have had so little in the way of a thorough analysis of the legislation before us and little in the form of an analysis of the Regional Development Incentives Act now that it has been in operation for a year and a half. I have already made some comments with respect to the special development incentive which is provided for in the bill now before us. I have some very grave doubts as to whether that, in fact, will act as any real spur to economic development in areas such as Montreal, southwestern Quebec, and possibly some areas of Ontario as well. Of course, the minister is more familiar with these parts of Canada than I am, but frankly I have to express some reservations whether, within the framework of the government's program as it has been developed—critical as I am of it—this will act as any real spur to development and to the provision of more jobs, particularly for the people in the province of Quebec where some 168,000 people are now out of work.

I was very interested to note that there is an extension of the operations of this legislation in the provision for loan guarantees. I was interested to note that these loan guarantees are to be made available to some service industries. The government, in fact, has made an important departure from policy in that it is going to go beyond the area of secondary industry and is going to assist tertiary industry as well. I am sure the minister will recall that when this legislation was originally before Parliament a year and a half ago, a number of us urged that assistance be made through these incentives both to primary and to tertiary industry based on adequate criteria. I am happy to see that this is now being made available, that the government has learned a little in this respect. I think it is possible that these loan guarantees can fulfil a useful function and that in particular as the minister pointed out in his public announcement that accompanied the introduction of the bill, it will be especially useful to small business.

I hope that that is the way in which these loan guarantees will be used, namely to help small business. In fact, I have some question in my mind as to whether or not some limitation should be built into the bill as it is now before us which would ensure that it could be made available only to a category of business that we might term small business.

Finally, we have questions regarding the lifting of the ceiling on the total amount of grants that can be made. I look forward to hearing what the minister has to say on this matter, whether he feels that this ceiling should be lifted, what purpose will be served, and to what use this particular change will be put. Thus, it will be seen that we have many serious questions that need to be asked about regional development legislation and, the performance of the regional development program over the past year and a half. I look forward to further debate during the course of the second reading of this bill and also in the committee stage, because I feel that these programs are very critical to the future well-being of Canadians. I feel that the programs that have been developed by the government are inadequate and that the bill which is before us today is inadequate because it will not do the job, both within the terms of the bill and of the program as it has been developed as well as within the scope of the government's total economic policy which, as we all know, is totally inadequate.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions, public bills.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Northern Affairs—Reference of land use regulations to standing committee; the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Alleged infiltration of FLQ cells; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Post Office—Christmas mail delivery.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR COPY OF STUDY OF UNDERPRIVILEGED URBAN SECTIONS OF QUEBEC

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the study undertaken by Le Centre de Planification Familiale, Montréal, in the fiscal year 1969-70 funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare on "Projet de recherche auprès du milieu défavorisé urbain Québecois.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it was not in a frivolous way that I asked for the production of this study. For a long time I have been pressing for a much broader program of birth control and for the distribution of information regarding contraceptives, much broader than we have had up to the present time, and I may say much broader than we are likely to get for some little time yet. I am convinced that there is a need for a broad program of public education, a program that would make contraceptives freely available, and a program which would use clinics and mobile clinics travelling from house to house. Such a program is one of the great needs in this country at the present time.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, when I saw that a study had been carried out by the Department of National Health and Welfare concerning the underprivileged urban sections of Quebec I felt it would add a great deal of information with respect to the need for such a program. Unfortunately, when I am speaking today I shall have to draw my material from my own end of the country, simply because the department is following government policy by refusing to make available the information which we need.

We need information from all sections of the country in order to know exactly what we are dealing with, in order to know the different requirements of different areas. It is very tantalizing and frustrating to know that this information exists in government offices and bureaus, and that we cannot get it. It is particularly tantalizing and frustrating when we know it is not the property of the government, when we know that these reports and documents were paid for by the taxpayers of the country. Surely, the taxpayers have a right to have access to this information, particularly at a time when on every hand we find members of the government, commission reports and other documents, stating that we should have the fullest possible information made available to the public on all matters affecting government.

One point I would like to make at the outset about birth control is that as you go down the income scale the need for such a program increases. That is exactly why I wanted to get this report which deals with the least privileged sections of urban Quebec, because in my opinion conditions in urban Quebec should not greatly differ from urban Ontario and urban British Columbia, meaning especially Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that last spring a brief was presented to the Senate Committee on Poverty by the Family Planning Federation of Canada, which is the English speaking counterpart of Le Centre de Planification Familiale, in Quebec. It pointed out the close and tragic connection between poverty and large families. As an example, it cited a study of Vancouver multi-problem poor families, where one-third of them had one child or more over 15 years of age living apart from the family for reasons of adoption, placement, emotional treatment or delinquency. In other words, in those large multi-problem, poor families, the large family was also the one that incurred breakup and led to the community being saddled with extra expenses. Of course, the family itself was broken and scattered. The Planning Federation commented:

We know that the practice of family planning declines rapidly from the top to the bottom of Canada's socio-economic ladder. The poor are still having the babies, many of them unwanted babies.

In my opinion, while some people may consider abortion a crime, the real crime is the birth of unwanted children, children who from the very moment of their birth are unwanted and condemned to wander in the world alone, uncared for and completely derelict from the beginning. What we need is more democracy in such matters; that is, the right for people on low incomes to have the knowledge and the means to plan and limit their families in the same way as those on higher incomes. Ottawa must take its part in providing funds for the establishment and maintenance of family planning clinics where they are needed across Canada.

To get the information on which to base those clinics, on where to locate them, we must have access to studies that are being kept from this House under lock and key. If birth control is not made available to the people who need it, we shall see an increase in the already far too high incidence of abortion in Canada. For that growing incidence of abortion, the government will have been responsible because of its lack of leadership in making birth control and birth control knowledge available to people across Canada. Lack of birth control means illegal abortion with all the misery, mutilation and death that come with this failure to face the facts of 1970. All the shibboleths, theology and mythology that can be uttered will not get us away from that fact.

These are the reasons I want this report and other reports of a similar character. Let me bring it down to cases, Mr. Speaker. Just the other day I was dealing with this matter in the city of Vancouver. In that city there are a number of people who are in the same situation as that of one young woman who is on social assistance. She had several children from a former marriage which broke up. Then, she lived common-law for awhile, and contracted a second marriage once she was able to get a divorce. She already had one child from the second marriage, and she did not know how to avoid having any more children, so she lost a baby through ceasarean section.

It was only after going through all the misery of having children that she could not look after—much as she loved them she could not look after them in her circumstances—and only after she had been brought into hospital and underwent a Caesarean section operation which resulted in the loss of that baby, that the doctors finally decided to sterilize her, thus granting her wish of not being vulnerable to having more children. That is a shameful condition in this day and age.

When information about birth control is available, why can it not be circulated? Why can we not have the informed opinion that will make people demand birth control programs? Some of us here may not think the situation is bad. I cite the situation in my own province as described by the Family Planning Association of British Columbia:

> Every year more than 5,000 children are admitted to the care of the Superintendent of Child Welfare and the Children's Aid Societies in B.C., and more than half can be classified as unwanted—battered, disturbed, neglected, delinquent, abandoned, transient or awaiting adoption.
> Babies born out of wedlock in the 1960s in this province increased from 7 to more than 12 per cent of total annual births. The largest group was born to mothers aged 15-19.

There would have been no need for those illegitimate births had we acted earlier and got a family planning program underway in Canada. We knew about the need for it. The Family Planning Association of Canada has been urging the establishment of such a program, as have welfare organizations from coast to coast. Yet we are still being denied information like this.

At this point I wish to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) for making available a bulletin about oral contraceptives, a bulletin for which I asked in April of this year. That was when it was first published. It was sent to doctors about that time, and now we are getting it as a Christmas present. I cannot understand why that delay was necessary but thank goodness we have got it now. I sincerely want to congratulate the minister and the department for getting out this report and I hope it is only the forerunner of others. I don't see why he would not give us the report that I am asking for today, and the other ones that I shall be asking for every chance I get until the channels which need to be opened are opened.

There are some excellent things in this report and we should pay attention to them. A doctor at the Vancouver General Hospital, which is the largest in Canada and which is performing the greatest number of abortions, told me that he was quite certain that a spate of recent articles had terrorized women about the use of oral contraceptives. He felt that these articles were responsible for them declining to use the 100 per cent safe method, the oral contraceptive pill. Many of those women who did not use the pill became pregnant and then had abortions. I know that particular doctor will be thankful to see this report which points out that pills with 50 micrograms of estrogen are not considered dangerous enough to demand any special precautions, though of course some women will still need to beware of these and to have the advice of a doctor.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that to date the oral contraceptive pill is the only method that has been found almost completely successful in preventing unwanted pregnancies. In the report are the facts which, underlie the newspaper reports on the pill. The diaphragm method of contraception has a failure rate of 15 per cent; the rate of failure for the condom varies between 4 and 5 per cent; such spermicides as jellies and creams have a failure rate of between 10 and 25 per cent, while intrauterine contraceptive devices have a 2 to 3 per cent failure rate.

In practice, 25 out of every 100 women, one-quarter of every 100 women who use the rhythm method of birth control become pregnant. I am not saying whether or not they should use that method—let them square that with their conscience. But I am saying that they have every right to know the facts and to be told what risk they are running. They do not know that to date. I want to get the facts out to them so that they will know. Some years ago the American writer Robert Ingersoll said that ignorance is the only crime, and he said a great deal. I believe that the more ignorance we have the more crime we get. Ignorance is one luxury that we cannot afford in the matter of population control and population growth. The government has no business to sit on this and other reports which would throw light on this subject.

The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women brought out some additional facts. According to that report, in 1968 there were 4,378,100 women of childbearing age, that is 15 to 45 years of age, in Canada. Yet one of the family planning clinics in Toronto was able to process only 1,250 calls in one year. How many family planning clinics were there or are there in Canada? Again we do not have the facts. One of the functions of the Department of National Health and Welfare, should be to let us know how many clinics there are in Canada, where they are, how great the need is and estimate how many more clinics are needed.

But according to the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, only 23 of the 948 general hospitals in Canada have family planning clinics. I am glad to state that one of these is located in the Vancouver General hospital, and it is an experiment that is working exceedingly well. I understand it is the first non-medical facility to be permitted within the walls of the Vancouver General and it is working well. But, only 23 of the 948 general hospitals in Canada have family planning clinics. Birth control information should be made available to hospitals, teachers, doctors, public health nurses, social workers and the public in general.

In closing, I want to suggest, to appeal, to the Parliamentary Secretary to prevail upon the minister to open up the channels of communication not only by access to papers of this kind but also with a program that will let people all across the country know the facts about birth control. A program that will show the success and failure rate of different methods, and which will look into the matter of establishing clinics, is needed. In England it is known that a great many women will not attend a clinic and that some women simply cannot get to one, so mobile clinics have been established under the equivalent of our metropolitan boards of health.

I make no apology, Mr. Speaker, for using time in this way. I know there are subjects which are less important but which take up a great deal of time in this House. If the government would like to cut down on the number of papers that I shall be requesting in this House, the surest way to do it is to make those papers available right now and give them wide circulation. Some of us are determinded to pry open the filing cabinets of the government and get these reports out where they will be most useful in establishing the type of programs needed in this country.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) for the interest she has always shown for contraception in Canada as well as for another problem that she seems to be a little more familiar with, namely abortion.

I may say that if today we are obliged to ease the legislation on abortion, it is perhaps because we have not informed the population on family planning, and I agree with the hon. member on this point.

Furthermore, I accept, on behalf of the minister, the congratulations which she has expressed and which I will be pleased to convey to him.

Family Planning Centres

I am sure that when we dealt with family planning, particularly in connection with notice of motion No. 114, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) opposed the tabling of the requested documents for the reasons I outlined in the House on October 28.

I have also learned, if my sources are to be depended upon, that Le Centre de planification familiale, in Montreal, now carrying out studies to which the hon. member made reference, has once again applied to the department for subsidies to pay the costs incurred in 1969-70 for research on the best means of ensuring family planning in the poorer sections of the province of Quebec.

Of course, it would be very difficult to table a document that has not been made public. As a matter of fact, the department has not yet read it. We believe that the report of the association referred to will probably be made public in June 1971.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has also talked about a bulletin tabled in the House. It is the immediate result of what could not be done before. The minister, as reported in a press release dated September 18, 1970, has indeed said that he would do his utmost to promote research on family planning. He has also stated that it should be recognized that the great problem is the education of the people. This could not be done before amending the Criminal Code. This is why the government acted in good faith and started to carry out this task as soon as the key means were available to it, such as the omnibus bill or the amendment to the legislation dealing with the use of contraceptives.

The bulletin my colleague referred to a moment ago is the one published from time to time by the Food and Drug Directorate for medical doctors. This month, someone saw fit to include in it the report of the special committee appointed by the minister to advise the Food and Drug Directorate on all aspects of the safety and efficacy of oral contraceptives marketed in Canada.

This brings me to give some details on the question which is a current topic, that is family planning. A government has no right, in view of its public responsibilities, to improvise legislation without being in a position to explain its motivations. The government will engage in some discussions with people engaged in research in order to determine what steps should be taken for the greatest good of the people.

I do not intend to deal with the technical aspects of that question. New and more efficient contraception methods are now being tested in Canadian clinics, because—and we must admit it—research is only just beginning as far as family planning is concerned, especially for oral contraceptives.

Research is also in progress in other countries and some of them will perhaps ignore the objections concerning the present methods, their admissibility, their efficiency and the danger they may involve.

I shall not refer either to those aspects which are perhaps most important and which are based on individual aspirations and beliefs, for their personal nature requires the greatest respect.

Family Planning Centres

I wish to try and call the members' attention to some considerations which are public in character and point out the implications of some provisions made in the field of family planning. Hon. members and the general public have displayed remarkable interest in the recent initiative taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The program for research, information and professional training in the field of family planning which was announced by the the minister has two major objectives, both essential.

The first is to make available to Canadians who so desire information and services in the field of family planning; the second is a proposal that Canada should respond positively to requests of assistance from developing countries or international organisations.

The first result of such a policy will be the very generous contribution that the Canadian International Development Agency will make to the UN to help finance demographic studies.

Canada also helps some foreign family planning programs through its membership in international organizations active in this field, such as the World Health Organization, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Apart from the fundamental demographic studies carried out by the UN demographic services, a number of these organizations are conducting independent scientific surveys and holding meetings on all aspects of the demographic problem, including family planning in countries which are presently experiencing strong social pressure. We hope that in the long run we shall be able to improve our abilities from our domestic experience of family planning and thus be in a position to take a more active part in the activities of those organizations in international aid and research.

The other factors that led the government to support a family planning program are the still relatively high maternal and infant mortality rate. In 1968, Canada ranked seventh with regard to maternal mortality, outranked mostly by countries with a national family planning policy. Numerous health authorities think that measures to identify the most endangered mothers and effective means of family planning for this group would make the mortality rate fall and consequently, would save many mothers.

It is also thought that Canada could improve the situation about infant deaths. In 1968, we became the eleventh country providing family planning services to groups which apparently are unaware of them or to whom they are not available. There is convincing evidence that family planning is the most efficient means to reduce the infant mortality rate.

We know quite well that many families, especially among the poorest ones, have no family physician and that they are trying to solve their medical problems, according to their needs, that is always at the last minute in case of emergency.

If we really want to progress in that respect, we must find new methods to contact and help those families either through community health centres or hospital clinics.

Instead of relying entirely on medical or para-medical staff to give advice, it would be perhaps be advisable to train consultants in family planning who would more easily communicate with women. We have reason to believe that many cases of illegal abortions jeopardizing the health of the mother are mostly explained by the lack of information on contraception freely and unreservedly given to women of child-bearing age.

In spite of the amendments to the legislation on abortion that came into force in August 1969, the number of therapeutic abortions in this country has steadily increased. And further efforts must be made in order to find new and better contraceptive methods, capable of meeting the needs of both women and men and as effective as possible.

With those objectives in mind, the part to be played by the federal government in family planning consists above all in assisting the provinces through advisory technical services, research grants and documents to be used for training and teaching.

Needless to say that family planning was on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference of health ministers, which ended this afternoon.

We may expect to be called upon to work in co-operation with the Canadian International Development Agency, as to the training in Canada of foreign personnel and the provision of advisory technical services for developing countries.

Most of the provinces have already taken steps to implement family planning programs, the features of which are far from standard. Some of those programs are implemented by public health services and in some cases, in co-operation with voluntary family planning agencies, sixteen of which are members of the Family Planning Federation of Canada. That federation broke new ground in helping to establish family planning services in most of our larger centres and especially in giving information to the public. On account of the experience acquired by that federation, we shall try to implement in close co-operation with them some stages of the family planning program set out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Besides, some aspects of this program have been applied for several years. Few people know it but quite significant support is provided to research on the medical, biological and social aspects closely related to family planning under several internal and external research programs of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

In addition, research programs on family planning, in so far as they are related to biology and sociology, are included in grants programs for research in the field of public health and social welfare.

There is also some kind of a research program carried out in the very laboratories of the Food and Drug Directorate. For example, studies were made on the effect of certain contraceptives on fertility and other functions and to the possible relations between particular drugs. Most of the research work has been carried out on humans. Under the direction of our colleague, Dr. Hurteau, the University of Ottawa has undertaken under contract very promising research on a contraceptive that could be used over a long period of time.

It must be added that similar projects have been approved by the research grants program of the Medical Research Council. For instance, research has been carried out on the biochimy and metabolism of steroids and hormones which have an influence on reproduction, on genetics, on reproduction immunology and finally chromosomic research on human populations.

The department is also studying some of the problems of abortion which is the most undesirable type of birth control. Abortion is very costly and, as I said a while ago, can do irreparable harm. Since we shall have an opportunity, later on, to discuss this question in the House, we shall then provide necessary particulars.

As concerns the major part of this research on family planning under federal governments grants (excluding the Medical Research Council program), I would rather be modest and say that this is only a beginning, especially in the social science field. We wish to set priorities in research on family planning, stressing pilot-projets, evaluation of programs and assessment of efforts provided in the field of education. From an administrative point of view, our efforts could have more weight if we changed the method used for financing research and directed those necessarily limited funds toward specific fields whose priority has been recognized.

The department aims at training qualified staff which will be responsible for considering and applying the various proposals designed to increase family planning services through information, personnel training and research. Of course, such a proposal should first of all be studied in conjunction with the provincial governments concerned. We also hope that some time will be devoted to family planning matters at the next conference of health ministers. As I suggested a while ago, it would seem that all delegates at the conference of health ministers have received the bulletin on family planning which has been distributed to them.

I would also like to mention that, for reasons which are not totally clear, Canada has relatively few specialists and experts in family planning, which requires qualifications in many disciplines. Educational books and other kinds of public information documents will be prepared for those working in this field at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to add that the federal government, with the means at its disposal, does everything to indicate to the Canadian people that it is absolutely necessary to allow an individual to use his free choice in connection with such things. That is why the federal government will give the necessary directions as the results of research will be known and that it will inform the population on the best steps to take in connection with family planning.

Even if that matter falls under provincial jurisdiction, the federal government must nonetheless be able to grant subsidies for programs of that kind, which will contribute to the development of this country. I believe that the government is pionnering, as indeed it has always been, in the social field, and I am sure that it will provide assistance in order to better life in Canada, not only for certain groups of society but for all Canadians.

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is the talking-out team over there.

An hon. Member: They're doing well.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us this afternoon in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) reads as follows:

> That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the study undertaken by Le Centre de Planification Familiale, Montreal, in the fiscal year 1969-70 funded by the Department of National Health and Welfare on "Projet de recherche auprès du milieu défavorisé urbain Québecois".

This study, as I understand it, relates to family planning in the Montreal area—to families in the low-income bracket and the effect of low income, poor housing and limited education upon the size of families. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway drew attention very ably in the course of her speech to the social and welfare aspects involved. She told us that throughout the country there were only 23 family planning centres so far; it does not appear that a great deal of advantage has yet been taken of the change in the Criminal Code introduced rather more than a year ago which allowed information to be made public, at least by government bodies and non-profit public groups.

The hon. lady suggested mobile clinics might be provided, such as they have in Europe. This would extend, I presume, to "storefront" centres for family planning advice. One inquiry came to me from a social welfare group which wanted to set up a clinic of this type. This was very shortly after the change in the Criminal Code. The Department of National Health and Welfare was most helpful. They provided me with names and addresses of people who could help, suggestions for the structure of the organization, the kind of people who would be supervising, and so on. I believe the group for which I made inquiries went ahead, in co-operation with the provincial department of health, to establish a family planning centre.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Isabelle) indicated that this study was undertaken in Montreal and that the final report would possibly be published some time next June. It seems to me it would be very wise to have the report in final form before it is made public and available for general use. Surely, in this type of project a little knowledge could be a dangerous thing. I think the results of the study should be appraised and put into concise form which would be useful to groups throughout the country that want to establish family planning centres, because certainly it appears there are not enough of them.

I notice that in their statement this afternoon the ministers of health who have been attending the federal-provincial conference referred to this question. This is an indication that these ministers are continuing to be interested in this subject. I should like to read what they said:

> The ministers reviewed trends with regard to abortion, and expressed the need for greater attention to be paid to family planning. Support was given to the concept of a family planning approach which stresses the need for research, public information and training of health personnel involved with family planning.

It therefore appears that this group will have a responsibility to the people of Canada as well as the members of this House. They have continued to give the matter a great deal of their attention: this was pointed out in the communiqué issued at the conclusion of the conference this afternoon. When the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) issued a news release last September on this subject he said there were three important components of any family planning program, namely, research, information and training.

I want to say something about what the welfare branch is doing and is capable of doing in each of these areas; also about the support for services on a shared-cost basis with the provinces which is possible under the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan. With regard to the underlying philosophy of federal programs, since public welfare programs are, unfortunately, often associated with notions of pressure and coercion, it is important to emphasize the philosophy behind federal family planning policy. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated, its essential purpose is to help make family planning information and services available to all who want them so that all Canadians can exercise free individual choice in the practice of family planning. It is fully consistent with the goal suggested by the Family Planning Federation of Canada in its brief presented to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty on February 10, 1970.

This goal is to "democratize" family planning, as one way of reducing poverty in Canada, by offering the poor the resources already available to the non-poor from private sources. In its positive aspects it is designed to ensure that every child is a wanted child. As the federation's brief points out, family planning is now a resource crucial to the ability of a family to cope with its environment. If every child is a wanted child, children are better cared for both physically and emotionally. Mothers are subjected to lower health risks if births are spaced carefully. The assurance that another child will not come before it is wanted helps couples plan other material and non-material aspects of their lives with more confidence.

[Mr. Foster.]

Moreover, family planning, in its broadest sense and the sense in which it is used here can assist some of the childless to bear wanted babies. In summary, the knowledge and means to space and plan the coming of children in relation to family resources is essential to happy, healthy, responsible family life.

It is common knowledge that on the average the least educated have the largest number of children and the lowest incomes. More significant is the evidence of personal and family breakdowns where resources are not adequate to meet needs. A study of multiproblem poor families in Vancouver, cited by the family planning federation's brief, found that such families were larger than the Canadian average by 1.1 persons and that one-third of these families had one or more children over 15 years of age living apart from the family for reasons of adoption, placement, emotional treatment or delinquency.

The need for family planning programs cannot, therefore, be dismissed simply by pointing out that crude birth rate figures in Canada are declining. Moreover, the weight of evidence is against the view sometimes stated that the poor have more children simply because they want them. A study undertaken in the United States, also cited in the family planning federation's brief, found that 17 per cent of births to the non-poor were unwanted, compared with 26 per cent among the near poor and 42 per cent among the poor.

These findings are validated by the sometimes dramatic results, in terms of declining birth rates, when family planning programs are properly presented in terms acceptable to poor people. The attitude of the federal government to family planning is consistent with the following principle embodied in a "World Leaders' Declaration on Population" made public by the Secretary General of the United Nations on Human Rights Day, December 11, 1967:

> The great majority of parents desire to have the knowledge and means to plan their families; the opportunity to decide the number and spacing of children is a basic human right.

Although the provision of a family planning service is most often the responsibility of the health authorities, there is an important role for welfare services, both public and voluntary, in the over-all program. The prescription by a doctor of a specific means of family planning is often the last link in a long chain and even the beginning of a new one to help people to continue to plan. Welfare services often play a crucial role in getting people to the point of acceptance and continuance of family planning services. Effective partnership between health and welfare services is therefore imperative.

Experience has shown that poor women are especially receptive to family planning programs immediately after giving birth to a child. Where such women are known to welfare agencies, the latter can play an essential role in maintaining their interest in family planning and in returning for necessary medical service. Unmarried mothers constitute a high priority group which is the particular concern of public welfare agencies. Experiments in the United States have shown that information and advice on family planning, as part of a carefully constructed social rehabilitation program, can have dramatic results in reducing the proportion of subsequent out-of-wedlock pregnancies in such a group.

I come now to research and the capability of national welfare grants. I want to say something about the contribution to research in the field of family planning that national welfare grants can and do make. Welfare research grants are offered as part of the national welfare grants program designed to assist in the development and strengthening of welfare services in Canada. Such grants are available to provincial welfare departments, municipal welfare agencies, voluntary welfare services, welfare councils, welfare treatment institutions, schools of social work, universities and research organizations in Canada, but not to individuals. Grants are made for one fiscal year and may be renewed on the basis of satisfactory progress. Priority is given to projects holding promise of producing new knowledge of general interest to the welfare constituency and wide application to welfare services, and to projects which advance the methodology of social research applied to welfare problems or services.

Applications for welfare research grants are appraised by staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare and, when warranted, by other interested federal and provincial government departments. They are then referred to a research advisory committee which makes recommendations on the application to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The following guidelines are used in the relationship between the organizations applying for a welfare research grant and the direction of the program:

1. An application for a welfare research grant and the documentation attached to such application is confidential.

2. The applicant retains the authorship of copyright of a project application.

(a) The department is not at liberty to disclose the content of a research project application other than its purpose and objectives in general methodology once a project has been approved.

(b) The organization receiving a research grant retains the liberty of disclosing the content of an approved research project grant and is encouraged to do so when information is sought.

3. A welfare research grant is made on the following conditions: That on completion of the project, the Department of National Health and Welfare will be furnished with five copies of a final report; that one or more copies may be placed in the library of the department for unrestricted library use; that except as may be subsequently agreed, publication or general distribution of the report and condensation thereof is the responsibility of the grantee agency and/or principal investigator; that in any such publication acknowledgement will be made of the assistance rendered by the department under the national welfare grants program; that in any such publication the author or authors will state explicitly that the findings or opinion expressed are those of the author or authors.

In reference to research relative to family planning I might point to the "Project de recherche auprès du milieu défavorisé urbain Québecois" by Le Centre de Planification familiale du Québec Inc., Montreal. The object of this project is to determine the various family cultural variables peculiar to deprived milieux which have an influence on attitudes and behaviour with regard to fecundity in order to build a model of these cultural determinants and, from this knowledge, to determine the conditions necessary for family planning to succeed in this milieu.

This project was initially founded in 1969-70 and a new grant was awarded in 1970-71 to allow the continuation of the project. As I have already said, a research grant can only be awarded on a yearly basis, and a research project can receive another grant in a succeeding year if warranted by its progress during the previous year. An application is required for each fiscal year for the total duration of a research project. The project I have mentioned is not yet completed and the report is not expected before the summer of 1971.

Another project is titled "Causes et conséquences démographiques, economiques et sociales de la pratique de la méthode thermique de régulation des naissances" undertaken by the département de sociologie de l'Université Laval. The project is not yet completed; consequently, no report is yet available.

The purpose of this project was to explore to what extent the seeking of increased material well-being is combined with cultural and moral motivations of the couples interviewed in wanting to restrict the size of their families. The survey seeks to answer the implied question: What type of birth control is suitable to what level of education, and at what levels of education are people prepared to apply different types of of methods?

The national welfare grants programs can also provide funds for demonstration projects and professional training. Such projects might include a demonstration of the most effective means of spreading information about family planning to the public as an example. In these ways the national welfare grants have some capability in all three aspects of the program in family planning of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Now I should like to turn my attention to the capabilities of the Canada Assistance Plan in respect of family planning. The provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan are sufficiently broad and flexible that it can now contribute to the training, public information and research aspects of the federal program of family planning announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on September 18, 1970. These contributions are made possible by two provisions in the plan which constitute major innovations in federal-provincial shared-cost assistance programs.

For the first time it authorizes federal contributions to health care, administrative and welfare service costs of provincial welfare programs. Health care services, the costs of which may be shared when supplied to needy persons, are broadly defined to mean medical, surgical, obstetrical, optical, dental and nursing services and include drugs, dressings, prosthetic appliances and any other items commonly associated with such services. Under this provision the federal government is prepared to reimburse the provinces 50 per cent of the cost of contraceptive medication and devices prescribed for persons who have met a test of need.

The cost of the services of physicians and related medical personnel involved in the provision of family planning services as part of the health care program for needy people is shared on the same basis, to the extent that these are not supplied through other federal-provincial programs such as hospital insurance and medicare. All provinces are using this provision to some extent and it is expected that as a result of recent federal initiatives increasing use will be made of it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair to resume same at eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

PROVISION OF SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE, LOAN GUARANTEE, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchand (Langelier) that Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-205, I would first like to tell the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) that I recognize that the state is striving to promote industrial growth in Canada. When I see the big smile on his face, I am satisfied that his hopes are even greater than he said this afternoon during his rather brief statement.

I hope that the results of this measure will match the hopes expressed by the minister. Nevertheless I have grave doubts as to the expected results, because we are saddled with an economic system whose shortcomings prevent it from being attuned to present-day realities.

If the present economic system was truly ideal and efficient, we would not be continuously faced with problems of unemployment, malnutrition and poverty in the midst of affluence, except perhaps in periods of wars, when these problems are exceptional. When we have reached a situation where the state has to inject millions of dollars in industries, this is certainly not an indication that our economic system is healthy. This does not mean however that I am opposed to the bill now under discussion, but I would like to show that we must also use other means, take other measures and implement economic reforms if we are to get still more beneficial results for the people, and especially for the working class.

Major Douglas, a Scotch engineer, had found the major defect in our economic system more than 50 years ago, and summed up his philosophy in this quite simple sentence: Production does not finance consumption. In other words, there is not enough money put into circulation within a production cycle to enable consumers to purchase all the goods produced. It has been proven. He was right. Let us consider the facts.

During World War I, that is the 1914-1919 War, in order to finance the Canadian war effort, the government had put money, which is purchasing power, in the hands of the Canadian consumers since many workers were getting paid for manufacturing armaments such as machine-guns, tanks, etc. Consequently, the population's demand for consumer goods increased. Plants producing civilian goods were in full operation. In those days, Canada experienced an unprecedented industrial boom.

I was then living in the Eastern Townships and I remember that all the manpower available was being recruited for work related to the development of our natural resources. In fact, not only was there no unemployment but even school children had jobs.

After the 1919-1929 decade, mass purchasing power dropped dramatically and we faced an economic crisis. What happened during that recession?

A great many industries went bankrupt, since lack of solvent buyers for their production forced them to close down, and they were taxed with bad management.

The same thing happened to farmers, many of whom had made commitments during 1918-19 when agricultural products were at their highest. When the subsequent period placed them in an impossible position, they were taxed with incompetence.

During the period from 1929 to 1939, unemployment stood at a record figure. In turn, the unemployed were upbraided for their heartlessness and their laziness. We saw some of them working for 20 cents a day. They were called "the 20 centers". I lived through those times that we are about to live again. I refer to this situation in order that we may learn a lesson, not to be plunged into similar circumstances.

I remember that at that time, when a young man was courting a young lady, he could not make serious plans for the future. He would merely say: Miss, if you are thinking of your future, do not rely on me for the time being, I am one of the "20 centers".

Suddenly the situation changed. War broke out in 1939. Governments asked Canadians to make a global war effort. Money reappeared. The federal government never said that it did not have any money, that the war effort had to be stopped. On the contrary! Money was flowing in larger amounts than ever and the situation changed completely.

Inefficient and poor managers as farmers were during the economic recession, all of a sudden they became efficient and good managers despite all the wartime restrictions. Why? Because they found buyers for their products, consumers with a purchasing power in keeping with their needs. The same thing happened to industrialists who went bankrupt during the crisis. Most of them recovered because their industries operating with full output, they became good managers. The "lazy" unemployed of the crisis period, the "20 centers", became the best workers and the best soldiers in the world. Everywhere in the world, the value of Canadian people was praised.

Canadians became so productive that the government had to resort to rationing in order to curb their desires, because they had acquired then greater purchasing power. After the war, it was necessary to rebuild. The money supply in the hands of consumers was more considerable and we experienced an economic boom from 1945 to 1956.

Since that date, we have been moving towards a situation of hardship in the midst of affluence. The situation is even worse that it was in the period from 1929 to 1939, because of automation. And, without our present social security legislation, we would have a depression of such proportions that it would seriously threaten our social structures.

Manufacturers are looking for consumers for their products and, when they succeed, they feel very happy.

A press release issued by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, on December 1, 1970 had this to say about the matter:

> Sales totalling $3,160,000 were made on the spot because of Canada's participation in the Interstoff textile clothing Fair held in Frankfurt, Germany, from November 17 to November 20. That was the first time that Canada was represented at this Fair. The 12 Canadian textile firms who took part in this event expect additional sales worth $13 million.

So, in Canada as elsewhere we are looking for consumers with purchasing power. Unfortunately, this class of consumers is becoming more and more scarce, and this is why many industries are slowing down, which inevitably leads to unemployment.

I know that people will find employment in industries, but such employment will be stable only if the industries sell their products and if their operations are profitable.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has explained in a statement given out after the first reading of Bill C-205, entitled "An Act to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act", that this legislation stipulates and I quote:

> 1) that loans could be guaranteed for new plants in economically under-developed regions by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion;
> 2) that incentives will apply to businesses other than manufacturing and processing companies, and finally,
> 3) that special grants will be paid in certain cases.

I will refer to that later on.

Why are those new provisions enforced? Simply because the rate of unemployment is high and businesses wishing to expand are prevented from doing so due to lack of capital.

Someone should have wondered why the unemployment rate is so high, why available capital is so scarce or why people are afraid to invest capital. This is merely due to the fact that the present financing system does not give enough money to consumers to purchase the available production and at the same time finance the development of new industries.

This is what I want to explain. I would like to suggest new formulas to finance businesses, financing which would not derive from the profits of promoters or the savings of individuals.

I have consulted with someone more competent than I in this field, in order to give the House valid explanations and suggestions likely perhaps to help the government in solving one of the most serious problems now, the high rate of unemployment particularly in eastern Canada.

What causes the deficit in the money flow to consumers? This is a very important question and it is not easy to answer it. But once the answer is found, it is possible to suggest a solution likely to keep the balance between the amount of prices attached to goods and the total amount of the purchasing power available to consumers.

Industry's sole source of revenue is the money that comes out of the consumers' pockets, and the latter have none other than that of industry, commerce or finance.

This means that all costs ranging from primary production down to consumption, through processing industries, wholesalers and retailers, all these costs, as well as all profits which have been added to actual costs and which have accumulated to make the final price, must be recovered through the price charged to the consumer.

On the other hand, the consumer cannot pay for the products that he buys more money than he has received from producers and distributors. Therefore, if through wages, salaries, dividends or otherwise, industry gives back to the consumers in an aggregate form all the money it gets from them and if the consumers spend all that money to buy products from industry, the latter can operate indefinitely, through the sale of a given amount of goods at a given price level. So any overproduction or any sale at a loss of products or any underconsumption becomes impossible.

What I said before is fairly obvious. There is indeed a cycle in the flow of money, from producers to consumers and from consumers to producers. Moreover, everybody knows that that flow is not supplied through providential means. Nobody expects money to grow on trees. Nevertheless, profit-minded businessmen increase their production in the candid belief that through some miracle, industry will succeed in getting from consumers more money than it has given them in the course of production. And if, by chance, money should not come back, they say it is due to consumers' opposition, to a psychological reaction on the part of buyers or to any other reason without giving the real one, namely that the buyers are unable to pay for more products without getting more money.

Any businessman will probably say that the financing of production and distribution of produced goods automatically provides consumers with enough money to buy the produced goods. But such is not the case.

Does the manufacturer want to give in wages, salaries, rents, dividends and otherwise as much money as the consumers will pay for the products? To act this way, one would have to be a philanthropist. The good businessman, if he wants to succeed, will want to receive, through the sale of products, more money than he has spent for production. That is quite normal.

In other words, enough money is not put into the hands of consumers to allow them to buy all the products on the market. Does anyone know somebody who would act otherwise? Is it possible to imagine a single businessman who would have as his goal to spend as much money in a given period of production as he wants to get from consumers?

Among our acquaintances, there are persons engaged in all kinds of businesses. Each of them takes all possible precautions in order to maintain his costs lower than his selling prices. Each of them has to do that. None of them has any other choice.

All businessmen, as long as they succeed, do not give consumers enough money to allow them to buy all the products at marked prices. Thus no business can prosper unless it shows a profit, unless it receives from consumers more money than it distributes them.

In theory, the deficit could be filled if all savings were used to increase equipment and public works, because then they would come back to the consumers, without increasing the quantity of consumer goods already on the market. In that case, the savings would not prevent consumers from having enough money to buy a certain amount of production.

However, the additions to the present equipment are aimed at increasing production. Now, the sale of an increased production requires a larger amount of money in circulation. Everything boils down to that.

With a given amount of money earmarked for the purchase of consumer goods, even considering the speed of money circulation, it is impossible to transact more than a given volume of business. Otherwise, we would not be experiencing the present depression.

As financing through savings and banking results in a lack of purchasing power, since borrowers must include in their prices the amount of interest they have to repay, some means should first be found to make up for the lack of consumer purchasing power.

It is possible to make up for that lack by dropping prices to the level of the consumer purchasing power, or by increasing such purchasing power in proportion to the existing deficit. Such a purchasing power can be distributed, as was done in the past—though inadequately—through family allowances or increased old age pensions, or, as advocated by the Social Credit, through a dividend paid to each and everyone, so that the whole community may benefit from modern advance and, mechanization, the Canadian people's heritage.

However, you might say that this does not solve the problem of production financing. The answer to this is that if consumers have enough purchasing power to use up production, producers will have enough money available and will be able to reinvest a larger part of their profits.

However, it remains that this reinvestment, if it is financed out of the businesses' profits or through the consumers' savings, will result in a further lack of purchasing power. New capital sources must therefore be found and invested into the enterprises. In other words, new credits must be created. New credits must be granted for the new productions proposed. These new credits can take the form of bank credits at an interest which would reasonably repay the bankers and the financiers for their contribution to our economy.

Even if the interest on those new credits is low, it will of course have to be paid off with the credits. Now, as the interest is never distributed by the banker or the financier, although it is included in the prices, it results in a deficit for the consumers.

As I said before, that deficit can be made up, either by adjusting prices, or by a compensated discount, or through a subsidy to the consumer, or a dividend.

In fact, restoring the purchasing power, meeting the needs of those who are hungry and thirsty, and helping what industries are unable to finance themselves are so many problems the solution to which may be found in the postulates of Major Douglas. He was a competent man who made very logical suggestions in this regard, and I would invite the government to study them seriously, with a view to organizing in our midst an economic system which will truly satisfy the needs of the people and will allow most of our workers to produce the consumer goods which the popoulation needs.

Indeed, the new act is an improvement when compared with the previous one since it will be used to ensure some degree of organization in the services sector. In this regard, let me say to the minister that his decisions were wisely taken since decent hotel facilities are required in all parts of Canada to provide for conventions. It was also a wise move to think of the organization of recreation activities.

I wish to draw his attention to the following.

In the Montmagny area there has been talk for some years now of setting up a marina in order to promote recreation activities and to produce new jobs, which would contribute to the development of the region of Montmagny.

I hope that it will be possible to help the Montmagy area with regard to the setting up of a marina and that an agreement can be reached at all levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal—in order to provide the funds for the dredging of the channel leading to the wharf at Montmagny.

It has become necessary to build that harbour. It is urgently needed. I hope that under Bill C-205 regulations will enable the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to respond to the numerous requests made to that effect by the municipal authorities and all the organizations in my region which are really interested in those problems.

Despite the weaknesses and faults of the bill, I feel that a worth while effort has been made. I would have liked to see some flexibility in the framework of the legislation. On page 5 of the statement of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, one may read as follows:

In the areas of Quebec, Ontario and the four western provinces already designated, incentives will remain at their present level.

I understand that the government had to stop somewhere. However, I suggest to the minister to see to it that an industry settles in the Montmagny region and is given the benefit of certain incentives. Even if to do so it is necessary to amend the bill in some way, I am sure that the minister will take my request into consideration.

I am convinced that all those who are really concerned with the problems now confronting us will wish to make their contribution in order to find solutions as quickly as possible. When reading the newspapers, I see that it is possible to sell Canadian products on international markets. I am delighted with that situation, for this is an effective way of helping make of Canada a country which will develop further and enable our young people from 18 to 22 who have completed their studies and would expect to be rapidly hired, to earn a living while making an all-out effort to do more for their Canada. It will then be possible to achieve this goal and bring renewed hope to our youth, which is so very necessary.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, this is certainly a very important bill and it is sponsored by a very important minister. If we believe the savants of the press, he is one of the three most important members of the cabinet, sharing with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) that special essence of power which is not shared by others. Therefore, I enter this debate with a great deal of trepidation in that I am looking upward toward a very high pinnacle. I should like to say how very much I appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), a member whose sincerity and concern for the people of his province and for all of Canada I salute and applaud as I have done ever since he became a member of this House.

I naturally subscribe to the remarks made on behalf of our party by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), in his very powerful and thoughtful address this afternoon. He set out some very cogent considerations. Reflection upon these will benefit the minister, I would say, and benefit the country. My friend called for more discussion by the federal government with governments at the municipal and provincial level. With this I agree, though I cannot help but express a little caution on this matter since I come from the province which has had more sustained and concentrated discussions and negotiations on a bilateral basis than has any other. I have the awful feeling that after all these negotiations and after all these discussions, all the signing and the fanfare, my province did not come up with a particularly good bargain. When I look upon a great development program whereunder Prince Edward Island, the smallest and second poorest province in the Dominion, would foot two-thirds of the bill and the great and vast government of the Dominion of Canada would pay the rest, I wonder at the efficacy of this sustained and continuous bargaining.

With longing I recall the old days when cost-sharing between Ottawa and provincial capitals was on a 50-50 basis. In many special considerations it was 75-25 in favour of the provinces and in some cases, such as certain aspects of the Trans-Canada Highway, Ottawa picked up 90 per cent and the province 10. I am not suggesting that had they talked less they might have produced a better bargain, but I say to my friend from St. John's East that all the talk, all the planning between Charlottetown and Ottawa in my opinion did not produce a most favourable relationship so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned.

My friend from St. John's East made a statement to which I think all of us would subscribe when he said that we do not quarrel with the designation of Montreal. Of course, we do not; but I am afraid that I will have the utmost difficulty in explaining it. Certainly it will not be an easy exercise. It has been my conviction for a long long time that many of the economic problems which Quebec faces are similar to those which the Atlantic provinces have faced, and that over the years Quebec and the eastern provinces should have been more closely co-ordinated in their efforts. But I would be less than candid with the minister if I did not point out that there would be some difficulty in the Atlantic area.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from a recent emanation of APEC, an organization with which I am sure the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has the closest relations. This article reads in part.

Designation of centres in Quebec and Ontario under the regional incentives program deals a serious blow to the Maritimes' industry-attracting efforts, says the Atlantic provinces Economic Council—

In a prepared statement, Harry Flemming, council executive vice-president, warns that designation of these areas—

He speaks of Upper Canada.

—"has made the task of attracting industry to the Atlantic provinces, much more difficult."

He suggests that designating these areas neutralizes the incentives program since, "when everything is designated, nothing is designated."

We are almost at the stage, Mr. Speaker, where this great country, this land of riches untold, this land that Laurier said had the twentieth century in the palm of its hand, has become one massive designated area.

Mr. Stanfield: Give these fellows another year!

Mr. Macquarrie: I think we have to approach this important piece of legislation with a little more than technocracy. Where does the regional disparity concept fit into our study? It comes, surely, from the concept of the nation as a whole, that because of certain national structures and certain national policies, regional inequalities were built into our system and the national government had an obligation to adjust them. Down through the years we have tried to overcome disadvantages through subsidies and various grants. We know that even in times of national prosperity there were regions within the country which, largely because of national policies, remained disadvantaged. We were unable to share fully, or indeed proportionately, in the prosperity of the nation as a whole.

Recently the concept of regional disparity has taken on an extra degree of sophistication. It is obvious, in the historical sense, that through the initiative of the former Premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Smith, the question of regional disparities reached the agenda of constitutional discussions, as it properly and legitimately should. It was discussed when spokesmen for the various jurisdictions within this federal structure met together to consider problems common to all of them and to both jurisdictional levels.

I think we ought to begin this whole thrust toward legislation aimed at correcting regional disparities by looking at the problems of areas which have economic difficulties because certain national policies worked against them and in the long run worked against the good of the commonalty. It is regrettable, alas very regrettable—and this is part of our difficulty today, sir—that the whole country is in the doldrums. This great land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is suffering from a sluggish economy. We are today dealing with a piece of legislation which was designed to compensate for the disparities among regions, whereas I submit we ought to be engaged in an assault upon those problems which have been created, I fear, in the main because the national policies themselves were faulty and inadequate. This, I think, is the crux of the matter.

There is no one, I am sure, in this party or in this House who is not aware of, concerned about or without sympathy for the special and economic problems of the province of Quebec. Those of us from outside Quebec quite frankly are appalled that the economic difficulties of Quebec should have reached such an acute stage before the national government galvanized itself into action for dealing with them. I have read, and after checking the Parliamentary Guide I am convinced that what I have read is correct, that we have never before had in the cabinet of the national government such a powerhouse of Quebec ministers. We have never had so many. So I am disturbed, surprised and filled with wonderment that so acute a problem should develop in this important and historic province and that so little attention has been paid to it until now. Therefore, anything that I say is not a reflection of any lack of concern on my part for the province of Quebec. I think the minister would be ill-advised not to note that there are possibilities of serious misunderstandings.

I have before me clippings from a few newspapers. Some are articles and others are editorials. One headline reads, "Atlantic area fears special status lost"; another is, "Budget called pro-Quebec"; another clipping is headed, "Quebec needs bigger bite of hand-outs from Ottawa"; another says that APEC is critical of the pro-Quebec stand.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Is the hon. member anti-Quebec?

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the minister.

Mr. Stanfield: He was suggesting that the hon. member is anti-Quebec.

Mr. Macquarrie: That is the kind of thing I would expect from that hon. gentleman. Perhaps he thinks that 3,000 of us are in a certain category. He is very good at multiplication. I hope he does not go into a "FRAP" when I say this, but I have been in this House quite a deal longer than he has.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Too long.

Mr. Macquarrie: Too long—that is statesmanship for you! I have no regret for anything that I have ever said about Quebec. I regret nothing that I have ever said about the problems of his linguistic or provincial group. I think he does his party, the government and the country a disservice by trying to exacerbate and manufacture differences which do not exist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: If he is disinterested in the opinions of other people and newspapers beyond his own province, that is his responsibility and that is on his conscience.

An hon. Member: It is also stupid.

Mr. Macquarrie: I am interested in what the people in all ten provinces say and think. It is my job to try to measure my utterances and my concerns against the whole country, and not to be concerned about just one province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I should like to say, in further extenuation and support of what our party spokesman said tonight, that we have lost something in this whole program by a diminution of the regional input to all these programs. I think one of the greatest mistakes ever made was the dismantling and destruction of the Atlantic Development Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: There we had the combination of the very best people in the area, the people who knew most intimately the problems of the area and were dedicated to eradicating the unfortunate circumstances, economic and otherwise, which have stemmed from regional disparities. The outlook of that body was distinct. I think much of our trouble has stemmed from that diminution. I would rather see an Atlantic Development Board than 20 regional desks and I think the people of the Atlantic provinces will agree with that.

So often in these days of excessive bureaucracy we have followed, discovered anew, followed again and searched out various sophisticated formulae, calculations and computations relating to incentives. I believe that I must assuredly come from the most studied, the most examined, the most investigated and the most planned-for part of the North American continent. We have all sorts of studies about us. I have been reading studies upon studies. I have just finished reading a report on the Newstart program. The opinions of a man with a respectable background and his views on the Newstart program are far from complimentary. I am sure the people of the Atlantic provinces are asking, when will these studies end and when will we begin a concrete attack on the problems which have dragged down the whole region ever since the days of confederation?

Surely there are many things to be done which are far more valuable than the introduction of a new, computerized incentives program. One thing which could be done for the Atlantic provinces would be a renewal of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants. Of all programs which brought new courage and encouragement to our region, none surpassed the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants which were established in 1957-58 by the government which in this House I supported for six years. The time has come for a renewal of those grants so that the small provinces by the sea may meet the heavy demands for social services which their people in these days, quite naturally and properly, expect the provinces to provide. There are many obvious ways in which we may be assisted by the senior, national government to help ourselves. It does not require an elaborate bureaucracy to note that in the Atlantic provinces, because of our topography, we have transportation problems. We have been saying this for over a century. The federal government could assist magnificently by helping us to get to the markets of the world and especially of this continent, the products of our sea, our land and our toil. We have talked year in and year out about a corridor road. A substantial grant to the corridor road would do a great deal more good for the Atlantic region than the manipulation of the incentive formula.

We have been told in years past that Prince Edward Island would receive a causeway. In fact, in token of the Dominion government's commitment thereto, some $20 million was spent. We have in New Brunswick in the constituency of my hon. friend from Moncton (Mr. Thomas), or near it, the newest and least used railroad in the continent—five miles of track headed for open sea. Would it not be a brave gesture toward Maritime self-help to build this causeway?

We all read with rapt attention the speech the Prime Minister made in Saint John, New Brunswick. He spoke glowingly of the opportunities the Maritime people would have in trade with the populous area of the northeastern United States. But how can we get into these markets without good transportation facilities? I invite the Prime Minister and I invite the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), who obviously is Crassus to Caesar, or Mark Antony to Augustus Caesar—one of the triumvirate, in any case—to reflect upon the importance of good transportation arrangements.

An hon. Member: Which one is Octavius?

Mr. Macquarrie: I would not like to say who that is. Nothing today is simple or direct. Must everything be complicated? Must everything be planned, super-planned, organized and reorganized? Cannot an assault upon long-standing problems be made in a frontal way? Does it take a genius to know there is tremendous potential in the Fundy tides? Does it take a Ph.D. to get accross the truth that as long as the sun, the moon and the earth endure there will be tremendous power in that tidal force? What does it require to convince the federal government of the tremendous value of developing tidal power? Does another century have to pass into history before they will listen? How long, how long, how long?

Does it require elaborate repetition to get across the truth that in the Altantic area, as in other regions, it is good economics and good administration to develop those things in which, to use the classical economists' phrase, we have a comparative advantage? In the midst of the elaborate spending on the regional development program in Prince Edward Island no way has been found, to give a homely and meaningful example, to get a freezer built for the 1¼ million tons of blueberries produced in Hillsborough constituency alone. No way has been found to build a carrageen extracting plant. Thousands of men in the Atlantic provinces harvest thousands of tons of Irish moss. This moss is taken to Denmark or to the United States for final processing and then it is sold back to Canada. Would it not be a splendid thing to build an extraction plant right in the area?

We have in the Atlantic region capacities for improvement and economic advancement but not, it is likely, the capacity to become a great industrial region. We have already lost our industries to Montreal, and we did that before Montreal was made a designated area. But we have a tourist capacity which is magnificent—we do not have to say it; others have said it. What would the establishment of another national park do for Prince Edward Island? I say these things knowing that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is piloting the bill before us. But I have always thought that he should not be the sole repository of consideration in the realm of regional disparity. The government as a whole must be aware of the need to recognize the disparity which exists among the regions. There is no point in the minister working to overcome these disadvantages if other aspects of government take no note of these things.

There are so many practical ways in which we could improve our situation. What is needed in Atlantic Canada is a recognition that the sea is not a deterrent but an opportunity. There is wealth on the sea, in the sea and under the sea, and our maritime complexion is something we should cherish and develop. I am looking forward to the day when my province and the province of the hon. member for St. John's East will be one province.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I can see ways in which both provinces would be improved and in which Canada would be improved. Why not an accelerated program of shipbuilding subsidies so that we could get over to them with the greatest ease and efficiency to supply the outstanding products of our excellent soil—soil which, they say, as a result of a geological movement a very long time ago came originally from the extraction of their topsoil, since combined with our own.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: So we have a double complement of soil fertility.

Mr. McGrath: You have ours.

Mr. Macquarrie: I want to make a distinction there. As a matter of fact, they have a higher birthrate than we do. I must say I was impressed by the sensible and sensitive speech of the Prime Minister. As to the possibility of trade, how much would it cost to upgrade, to enlarge, to construct a fleet of ships which would ply between the Atlantic provinces and the Commonwealth Caribbean? Is this not just the kind of expenditure which would be practical and meaningful? If these things could be done for Atlantic Canada, backed by the energy of our people, an energy all the greater because of many years of neglect, then we shall not worry about Montreal being designated. We, too, like Montreal. Montreal is ours. The whole country is our land.

I call on the minister with all the fervour one can command at nine o'clock in the evening to adopt an imaginative program. The minister has made many mistakes, as he himself admitted in his testament or release a while ago. Although he has not always been wrong, I know that he will make more mistakes. However, I hope he will take a little more local advice, that he will not be cribbed, cabined and confined by his bureaucratic, technocratic advisers but will take that broad sweep for which he has been famous through the years, will look at the Atlantic provinces and say that something must be done for people in that region in order to help them move forward.

One of the minister's predecessors in the cabinet, Hon. Walter Gordon, was going to move the Maritimers, though they had been moving to Montreal and Toronto long since. I should like to see Maritimers moved forward, not moved out. I should like the federal government to take its share of responsibility. We entered confederation because we were wanted. Even little Prince Edward Island was wanted. Bargains were struck. We lost something by entering; we gained a lot by entering. If confederation means anything, it is a sharing not only of the advantages but of the disadvantages. The federal system works, in so far as it is efficacious, only to deal with and iron out some of the disadvantages that the federal structure imposes on regions.

Speaking for the one area which longer than any other has suffered from these disadvantages, I ask for something more than this measure. We will, of course, accept it with all our reservations. We are aware of the special problems that have arisen and we know that something must be done in other areas of Canada. We know that we in the Maritimes do not benefit from having unemployment all across the country. God knows, we want to fight unemployment all across the country. But I say to the minister, let him never reside in confidence upon this bill and feel that the job is even half done.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about Bill C-205 which proposes a number of changes to the Regional Development Incentives Act. I am sure that most members of the House welcome the changes that will be made, some of which I think are aimed specifically at problems in Quebec and have probably been spawned by events of recent weeks. To this extent we welcome them.

However, before I get to more specific parts of the new legislation I want to spend a few minutes taking a general look at the problems of regional inequalities and disparities in Canada. Regional inequities have been with us in this country for many years, but I think the tragedy is that since the 1920s, when statistics were first compiled in relation to regional problems in this country, the gap between the have and have-not regions has not been narrowed. This gap is evidenced in many ways, the most obvious of which is in the income of those who live in the have-not regions. For example, I note that from 1962 to 1964 the average per capita income of people living in Ontario was twice the average per capita income of people in the province of Newfoundland. Many other examples are to be found in other regions of Canada.

In the matter of unemployment, we have in Canada today a very high unemployment rate throughout the country. However, in some regions it is twice as high as it is in the more wealthy parts of Canada. This disparity has been evident over the long term as well. For example, from 1956 to 1960 there was an average unemployment rate in the Maritimes of 10 per cent, while in the province of Ontario the rate was 4 per cent. What is the result of this situation? It means, first of all, that the opportunities offered a person and his family depend upon the area in which he lives. It is the area of the country in which he lives, not necessarily his ability, that determines his standard of living and his family's opportunities. As a result of these disparities among the various regions of the country, people face problems that you cannot really calculate, that are immeasurable in terms of human sacrifice and struggle.

As we all know, regional disparity in Canada is losing this country millions of dollars every year by way of lost productivity, because we are not operating at capacity. If there were no regional problems, this problem would not arise. Because of this, those people who live in the more depressed areas are caught in a vicious cycle of poverty. As a result of low income, high unemployment and low productivity, the people in these areas suffer from lower educational standards than people who live in the more affluent parts of the country. They have more inadequate health and welfare services. When their children grow up and acquire a skill or some form of training, they see them move to different parts of the country in search of employment.

The regional difficulties that I have described pose a real challenge to national unity in Canada. We will not achieve national unity and we will not be sure that confederation is here to stay until we make certain that each and every area of Canada is an equal partner in that confederation. I think that social and economic disparity in Canada creates more problems for trying to maintain unity in this country than anything else. This fact seems ironic in view of what has happened in recent years. Just 2½ years ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took over the reins of government, he talked about a new look and a new approach in Canada. He stressed national unity and talked of solving the problems of regional disparity and regional poverty. In addition, he talked a lot about participatory democracy.

When we examine what has happened in those 2½ years we find there is probably more disunity in Canada today than ever before in the history of the country. Since the hon. member became Prime Minister of Canada we have seen in the province of Quebec the rise of a separatist party that captured 24 per cent of the vote in that province. In recent months and weeks we have seen terrorist activities unprecedented on the North American continent. In addition to this, in the last 2½ years we have heard a great deal about a new phenomenon—western alienation.

I suggest that these conditions have been caused by the disadvantaged position of people in the poorer regions, both socially and economically. This has resulted from the increase in unemployment in areas such as Quebec, the Maritimes and certain parts of western Canada, which in turn has meant increased poverty. Before you have discontent and violence you must have a breeding ground. I suggest that the Prime Minister and his government must bear much of the responsibility for the unrest that we have in Canada today. This Prime Minister, through his lack of policies, has probably contributed more to disunity than any other Prime Minister. Certainly there has been no regional policy to remove the inequities between one region and another. This is obvious when we consider some of the problems plaguing the country. Before you can do anything about regional disparity in Canada you have to do something about the general economic situation in the country as a whole.

Consider for a moment the present unemployment rate. Over the last few months Canada has experienced the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized nation. I do not think this is something of which we can be proud. This country is rich in natural resources and technical knowledge, yet we have the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized country in the world. When we look at the incidence of unemployment we find it is much worse in the Maritimes, eastern Quebec and the Prairies than it is in the more industrialized parts of this country. We also observe that unemployment is hitting the youth of this country pretty hard. Just today questions were raised in the House about the high level of unemployment among the young people of Canada. Nearly half our unemployed are under the age of 25. We cannot be proud of this. About 38 per cent of our unemployed live in the province of Quebec. I suggest to the government that this is one of the reasons many of the people in Quebec are taking separatism very seriously; they see it as one way of getting away from the lack of policies on the part of the federal government.

When we are dealing with unemployment figures and statistics we do not always reveal the actual number of people who are unemployed. I suggest that there is hidden unemployment in Canada. Many people have dropped out of the labour force and, for one reason or another, have failed to register this fact. In any small town in Saskatchewan we find servicemen, repairmen, carpenters and people of this type are working on a part-time basis because there is not sufficient full-time work. These people are not registered and are not counted among the unemployed. In the province of Saskatchewan many hundreds of young people are going back to their homes on the farm because they cannot find work in the cities to which they migrated. These people are not counted as part of our unemployed. We find the same situation among women. Many women have given up trying to find a job and have gone back to the home. They, also, are not tabulated and do not become part of the unemployment statistics.

What is the result of this situation? The result is immeasurable harm to and difficulty for individuals, as well as the loss of millions of dollars in productivity and output. All this is unnecessary in Canada, where we have the resources and the knowledge with which to eliminate unemployment. I have just returned from western Europe. Many of the people there, when they learn about the unemployment rate in some regions of Canada, can hardly believe it because in many European countries unemployment is seldom experienced at a rate as high as ours.

We must also consider that our growth-rate has pretty well stopped. It is at least one of the lowest of the industrialized nations of the world. The other day the chairman of the Economic Council said that because we are not growing as rapidly as we should, and because we have a high unemployment rate, we are probably losing about $4 billion a year in productivity. Government spokesmen have said that this figure may be as high as $5 billion.

When there are problems like these throughout the country, it is no wonder that we have problems in the less advantaged regions. Before we can solve the problems of the poor regions of this country we must solve the problems which face the whole country. There are many problems in Canada because our economy is mismanaged and it is an economy that by no means is achieving its potential. We have witnessed the fight against inflation, with the government tolerating an unemployment rate that is too high. We have found that the fight against inflation has failed because the government has only been able to reduce prices on a marginal basis, at a cost that has been extreme. The fight against inflation has been very much a farce.

I should like to outline some of the reasons for the special problems which exist in some regions of Canada. Two years ago we heard that the government was going to create a department responsible for regional economic expansion. Those in our party who had for many years asked for such a department had some hope. We had hope for two reasons. First, the government realized the need for such a department. This gave us hope. Second, this new department was to co-ordinate all the plans of the government into a master plan. I suggest that the regional economic policies put into effect have become a dismal failure. They have not narrowed the gap between the haves and the have-nots in Canada. As a matter of fact, this gap has probably been widened.

The program has failed dismally for two reasons. First, I do not think the government has the power to exercise real control over the Canadian economy. It does not control the economic levers which might be used. The main decisions are still made by multinational corporations, and the government is very timid when dealing with them. The second reason is that the government does not seem to have an over-all plan to cure economic disparities in Canada. It is approaching this situation on an ad hoc basis, in a diffused, confused and unplanned way. The government is spreading too little over too much of the country, and because of this the program has been very ineffective.

Most of us in this party thought when the minister introduced this legislation that he should have particularized a program for dealing with specific regions. We were told by one hon. member speaking on behalf of the government that too much of the country should not be designated because the plan would then be ineffective. Now, in 1970, we find that most of the country is designated. On the basis of the minister's views, this means that the plan is ineffective. I suggest that if the Regional Development Incentives Act is to be effective, the government must be selective in regard to regions. We do not have that selectivity.

I now wish to comment on the program of grants made to industries which locate in certain areas. When the plan was first introduced, a maximum of 25 per cent was paid by the government. The minister did not think this would work. Now we are to have grants amounting to 50 per cent. The Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is handing out carrots to free enterprise, hoping that industry will come in and solve the problem. This program is not working and I cannot understand how the minister can rationalize this approach. When the minister appeared before the committee, he said the grant would be 25 per cent of the total amount expended by an industry. One of the members of the committee asked him why it would be 25 per cent and not 30 or 35 per cent. The minister said that if the grant was any higher it would be ineffective and we would only be giving money to free enterprise and private concerns. The minister suggested that if this were done, we might as well run the plants ourselves. Now the minister has turned around and is doing this. I suggest he is either hypocritical in his approach or he lacks the courage to stand up and confront the corporate structure in Canada in the way he should on behalf of our people.

I suggest we need a Canada Development Corporation to set up Crown corporations. Such a corporation could establish industries in economically depressed areas. This is the only way we will solve problems of regional disparity. I do not think the minister's bag of carrots is helping. I do not think it will help if he hands out bigger carrots. We do not need this type of Santa Claus in Canada. If we are to solve our regional problems we must take different action.

I have also suggested that one reason the government has not had much success in its regional development program is that it has not the courage to take over control of the Canadian economy. We are left with a country that is dominated by multinational corporations. We find that in Canada many of the decisions are made in the boardrooms of huge corporations outside our boundaries. If we really are to confront the problems of regional disparity and regional poverty which face so many Canadians, we must regain economic control of our country and have the economic levers in our hands.

Instead of doing this, we are moving in the opposite direction. We find that many of the subsidies and grants under this program are given to private industries and corporations that are not Canadian. We continue with a policy of continentalism which puts the decision-making process more and more solidly into the hands of multinational corporations outside the control of our government. This means that not only do we lose control of the decision-making process, but that we are exporting jobs to the United States.

We are basically exporters of unfinished products and importers of manufactured goods. Because of this we are exporting many jobs each and every year to the United States and other countries. This is the result of our having a branch plant economy and the government not having the courage to stand up and reverse the trend of continentalism in Canada. But even worse, I believe we are the only country in the western world that sets very few rules in respect of foreign corporations which come into our country. We do not just let them come in; we plead and beg them to come in, and we subsidize them. Under the new department we are still doing this.

What makes it even more hypocritical is that much of the money foreign corporations invest is our money, Canadian money. This money could be invested in the name of Canadians but we are not doing this today. We must regain the Canadian economy we have lost so that we can properly plan it. We must put the needs of people first, instead of the needs of huge, multinational corporations and instead of saying that the needs of the corporations are the needs of society. Once we regain control of our economy we can start planning to really eliminate regional disparity. First we must regain control of the economy, then plan to eliminate regional poverty and regional disparity.

There are many other matters I could mention, but perhaps I should end by asking the minister a series of questions about why the government is doing some of the things it is doing, and what plan it has for the future. I ask the government why grants to corporations, many of them large corporations, are being made without a firm assurance from the corporations or industries as to their future plans. Why is there not more planning, and why are not more assurances being sought from these industries? Why is there so little emphasis on development in these areas, and why is there so little emphasis on the use of Crown corporations or co-operatives in developing the depressed areas of Canada?

We must find a more effective way to alleviate regional problems than by moving in private industry. Many people feel there is not a real regional plan that is co-ordinated, a plan that knows where it is going. Why do we have a plan which is so ad hoc in nature, so unmanageable and so big that it is rendering itself very ineffective? There is a task to perform. There are problems we will have to solve, and I believe these problems are very acute. If we are to keep Canada together and if Canada is to enjoy its 200th birthday, we must solve many of the regional problems which confront us, because if all regions of this country cannot be equal partners in confederation, perhaps the country will not stay together much longer. I suggest it is the responsibility of the federal government to make sure that all regions have an equal opportunity and receive equal benefits from confederation.

As the speaker who preceded me said, we must share the advantages of confederation as well as the disadvantages. If we do not do that, let us not sit here in smug complacency and ask why there is a separatist movement in Quebec which is rapidly becoming strong. This movement really started after the election of the Prime Minister and this government to office, a Prime Minister who should have experience and knowledge of the province of Quebec. However, the Prime Minister does not appear to have this knowledge and experience. I do not think we should be sitting here and asking why there is so much discontent, when 20 per cent of our people live in poverty and another 20 per cent live on subsistence wages in a country blessed with affluence, abundance and technological knowledge which could do so much for the average Canadian. The burden rests upon the government, and much could be done through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

It is time we started moving, instead of playing games and dangling carrots before the eyes of foreign firms which really are not interested in developing Canada for its people.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) realizes that what he is requesting of the government is quite similar to that which took place in Saskatchewan, according to a reading of the book of Douglas in Saskatchewan—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With respect, I think the hon. gentleman's question might be argumentative.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You had better read from the record instead of that Chamber of Commerce propaganda.

[Translation]

Hon. Theogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make lengthy remarks, but I cannot let the discussion on Bill C-205 come to an end without making a few comments.

The purpose of Bill C-205 is to control unemployment and at the same time to stimulate if possible the economy throughout the country.

I have been expecting this measure for quite a long time. In fact, I made a number of representations in the past in favour of the recognition of the Saint-Hyacinthe area as a designated area. So, I am glad to see that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has acted according to the announcement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in his budget statement.

It is somewhat paradoxical on the part of the Minister of Finance, who exerted himself in order to create unemployment, to rely now on his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to repair the blunders he made while fighting inflation.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Unemployment has spread all over Canada and more especially in the province of Quebec, on a seemingly permanent basis and it is high time that something be done to solve this problem.

The most recent statistics show that there were 476,000 unemployed workers in Canada in November, including 168,000 in Quebec.

Whoever has had anything to do with manpower or labour will easily admit that the misery resulting from such a situation is catastrophic and has a tremendous impact on the population.

It has become exceedingly urgent, since this action has come too late, to change this situation.

If my interpretation of the hon. minister's remarks is correct, one of the bill's provisions would cover grants to firms and another would provide a guarantee for loans.

The legislation seems to me to be a fair one, and can be extremely useful since it will allow many small industries to avail themselves of such loan opportunities.

Many firms could have benefited by such legislation in the past. In my region, we lost industries which could have continued to provide employment, had my representations been acted upon earlier. For instance, we lost a shoe factory. Many other industries have had to cut down on their staff.

The implications this can have on the economic situation of a medium-sized city like Saint-Hyacinthe can readily be imagined, particularly when the same situation prevails in other similar municipalities.

During his speech this afternoon, the minister said he expected that within a few months, this measure would create at least 15,000 new jobs and that nearly 50,000 more would follow later. We greatly need them, in order to create a sound economic climate in Canada and especially in the province of Quebec.

I would not think of blaming the minister for that. I merely want to express my satisfaction to see that, at last, he has taken the necessary steps to make of the area of Saint-Hyacinthe a designated area and thus, remove an injustice that was causing very great difficulties to all the people in my riding, and particularly in the city of Saint-Hyacinthe.

I reiterate my satisfaction to see that the minister has introduced this legislatcon and I expect very encouraging results.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on this important legislation.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Like my colleague the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) who took this opportunity to express his views, I think that it is also normal that the representatives of other ridings should take this opportunity to do the same.

Living in a province which has largely benefited from grants these last two years, I would be ill-advised to blame the government or the minister.

However, I respect what has been said by some of my colleagues who represent other parts of Canada and maybe they have not obtained as many subsidies as they wished. They should inform the responsible minister.

In all objectivity, I feel it is my duty to express my satisfaction with the bill, and my satisfaction, as a Quebecer, with the grants of which the province of Quebec may have benefitted in the last two years and also with the concern shown by that department for the past and present difficulties facing Quebec.

At any rate, I do not think that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion can offer a final solution to all our country's economic problems. I do believe, however, that it constitutes a means of improving the situation just as other departments must find quickly some other remedies.

I will not hesitate to speak objectively, because I have always wished for and demanded this objectivity. Needless to add that I am satisfied with the bill. For the past two years, I have been the elected representative of a riding that does not have the same advantages as some others.

I took care to ask for the consideration of the minister on behalf of the intermediate groups and the various municipalities of my constituency. I admit most humbly but with great satisfaction that last week's statement recognizing my constituency as a "designated area" was good news both for my electors and for myself. After informing the minister of the special reasons which led us to ask for such special designation, I cannot but thank him for his objectivity in dealing with briefs submitted to him.

It is obvious that with this special designation we will be better able to compete with other designated areas. These grants provide our municipalities with an efficient tool, but they have the responsibility of creating a climate that will encourage investments, of offering at least the necessary services to the industries interested in setting up plants in our ridings.

I would like to take this opportunity to ask for very special attention, since we always refer to "special areas". Of course the Sainte-Scholastique airport project not too far from my own riding will require the Quebec government to undertake certain works to accommodate this airport.

Negotiations are presently under way between Quebec and Ottawa and I trust that the minister will make every effort to expedite matters so that, as a result, we get this designation of "special area", which would, once again, allow the people of my riding to see its rate of unemployment decrease and that would contribute to assure the economic stability in my area.

I am pleased that this bill has been introduced, since it is so important for both new and existing industries for which I have already requested special assistance. Now, the bill under consideration will encourage them to expand and modernize and still attract new industries interested in establishing in our constituencies if they are given the necessary assistance.

Some people claim that commercial operations would benefit from the provisions of the bill. I am pleased about that. Special development incentives could be granted concerning specific projects to be carried out in the next two years and the maximum amount of the incentives will be 10 per cent. I do not have to repeat the figures since the bill has already been tabled.

Those important and profitable changes for any new industry will create a more favourable economic climate. The members who represent ridings involved will not hesitate to support this bill.

Again I emphasize this freedom to express personal opinions in the House. I would be the last one to criticize the general policy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as I consider that the province of Quebec has received its fair share. As a member for this province, I can but express my gratitude for the minister's good offices and for the interest he took in solving Quebec's problems.

I must not forget to invite the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) to think of all parts of Canada. I believe he does. I also know it is not easy to please everyone at the same time, but I trust that Canada's economic policy will be such that it will soon attract investments not only in some areas but throughout the country in order to create a better economic climate.

I trust my remarks will encourage the minister to act, and will have the approval of the House. Indeed, we all want to build a better Canada; we all want to see the government become more and more responsible and spend as much money as is humanly and financially possible, as a certain politician often says, for the greatest good of the Canadian people as a whole.

• (9:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, the minister looks very tired. I was talking to him a minute ago and I was going to be rather critical of his department, but because he is so tired and because I want to be kind, I shall make just a few suggestions.

Mr. Gilbert: Oh, sock it to him!

Mr. Otto: In my old age, Mr. Speaker, I am softening up.

Mr. Benjamin: In the head.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, the concept of regional expansion is a good one; it has worked in many cases. But I have reservations about two points. First, there is very little emphasis in the department on the recreation industry. All areas try to attract manufacturing concerns. They think there is something magical about manufacturing. Therefore, we spend about $2,000 or $3,000 per job to put a plant where it does not really belong, thinking this is the way to build up the economy of the country or the area. This is just not so.

Some time ago the United States government decided it would not support recreational facilities in northern New York State and northern Illinois. Indeed, that government said it would recognize the Madawaska Valley, the northern and central part of Ontario, as a recreation area for the whole of the northern United States and Canada. Therefore, the logical thing would seem to be for our Department of Regional Economic Expansion to help expand facilities in that area. This means getting people interested in building good accommodation, year-round accommodation, because if you are exporting climate, snow and water it is something that is very easy to do and also it is very lucrative. It produces over $1 billion a year and employs a lot of people. Yet when the IDB is approached for a loan for this purpose it replies, "We are really concerned about manufacturing. We will give you so much for a new plant and so much for the machinery." When someone approaches it about a recreation facility, it expresses great reservations.

There is a distinct lack of interest by the department in this field, one that would be extremely lucrative. Therefore, I urge the minister to advise his officials that there is nothing taboo about recreational facilities. If we are to promote any industry, we should recognize the tourist industry, the recreation industry, as a bona fide industry. Austria and Switzerland have done so. Austria, in particular, within the last eight years has made a fortune on it. What are the Austrians selling? They are selling snow in the Alps. They are selling after-ski festivities and the local wines. They are attracting American and Canadian tourists. We do not mind American tourists coming to Canada to spend their money, but Americans want good facilities and Canadians now want good facilities, and that does not mean having to live for a week in a two by four shack. Those days have gone. We must provide first-class tourist accommodation. We must encourage the establishment of schools to teach Canadians how to manage and run proper, year-round recreation facilities. That is where our future lies.

My second point of criticism is in connection with the ideas of departmental officials regarding the location of new industry. In particular, the department does not make use of a great amount of talent and know-how available in our Canadian executive cadre when deciding where industry should go. I am not saying this is the minister's responsibility but I point out that some time ago Clairtone was induced by the Nova Scotia government to move to the Maritimes. If the department—I am speaking of the provincial department—had talked to three or four people who knew the business, those people would immediately have said that it was a dreadful mistake because the manufacture of highly sophisticated sound and television equipment would not be undertaken profitably in Nova Scotia; it is too far from the market and it is too costly to transport the goods. It requires a pool of expert knowledge. In this type of industry you cannot isolate yourself in a small community and hope to make a profit.

What happened was that Clairtone pretended to get out of the jam, but instead they got in deeper and the provincial government is now looking into the situation. I think they own practically all the shares, but the company is going down and I do not think anything would save it. I have talked to several businessmen about the Maritimes, some of them very knowledgeable about things in the area around Sydney. It is their opinion that this is the ideal place to establish a steel industry—not just the general, over-all steel ingot industry but a sophisticated steel industry. The coal is right there and 600 miles away at Sept Isles there is the ore. Although I think the coal has a high sulphur content, it is good for the production of stainless steel. But no one has suggested getting advice from the people who know, in order to establish an industry that would be viable. The same thing would apply elsewhere.

I suggest to the minister that before his department goes out on tangents they should consult those who are knowledgeable. It only needs two or three people knowledgeable about business to say that they want an industry in a certain area; I guarantee that within a week they could say what the right industry for that area would be and could give facts and figures. No department of government is completely foolproof. I would suggest closer liaison between department officials and people knowledgeable in business. Canadians would be only too happy to co-operate. On occasions, before an industry was established I have known people to comment, "I guarantee it will not work" and they were right. But they have also said, "This is the logical place for this type of industry."

Another example is the Gananoque area. I have heard many people suggest that without doubt this area would be ideally suited for a recreational area, for pheasant hunting. So it is only a few birds, but do you know that in Alberta they take in about $13 million a year from Americans? Americans from New York State fly all the way there to shoot a few pheasants because we have not developed a closer area. The Gananoque area would be ideally suited. There are people within our department who have evidence that this would be a logical place, but it needs a little encouragement. I see the minister laughing, but $13 million going into the Gananoque area would not be bad. Alberta has lots of oil and gas, so they are not worried about a few pheasants.

It is this sophistication that I ask the minister to consider and discuss with people who know the business to the extent that they could advise the department. The department would, of course, emphasize recreation in the many areas of Canada where recreation would be a logical and lucrative development.

Mr. Gilbert: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. I listened with interest to his remarks. He mentioned the Clairtone firm which has a television and hi-fi business in the Maritimes. I understand the reason for that was not only to create new industry in the area but to create a market in the northeastern United States. I understand that one of the main reasons they failed was—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of asking a question. He should ask the question.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I am getting right to the question. The reason they failed was that other television companies would not provide services in the northeastern part of the United States. I wonder whether the hon. member has any advice to give Clairtone arising out of his experience, so that they could overcome this difficulty and make it a success in that area.

An hon. Member: Good question.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, the last thing I want to do is give Clairtone advice at this stage of the game, because I do not think any advice would be advantageous. What I meant to point out was that right from the beginning there was no possible way in which Clairtone, or the manufacturer of sophisticated equipment, could succeed in the Maritimes. I said that this type of industry requires a fluid and constant supply of sophisticated labour. That does not mean a stabilized supply. It requires, also, immediate proximity to the market, preferably away from the New York market which produces ten times as much and more cheaply. If the hon. member would review the history of Clairtone he would find that it should never have been located there. It would have succeeded in Toronto or Montreal, but certainly not in the Maritimes.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, one further, short question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member has a short question which will take one minute.

Mr. Gilbert: Does the hon. member realize that only nine companies produce television and hi-fi equipment in Canada, seven of which are American, the two Canadian companies being Calirtone and Electrohome? If Clairtone collapses, all we have left is one Canadian company to service Canada and develop an export trade. Does the hon. member realize that?

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I was not discussing Canadianism or nationalism. I was giving an example of an industry going into the wrong place because of lack of foresight. It really did not matter what happened, the same result would have been obtained. If they had stayed in Toronto, their chance of success would have been much better and then we might have had two or three companies.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—REFERENCE OF LAND USE REGULATIONS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on December 2 I addressed a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). I asked if he would confirm in the House a commitment he gave to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development during the previous session to refer to that committee the draft regulations on land use for the territories. The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, I cannot grant the request of the hon. member because the regulations involved have not yet been approved by the governor in council, but as soon as they will have been approved, I will try to determine whether that question can be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I was unhappy with that answer because it leaves two questions up in the air. First, the question of whether the minister will in fact refer these regulations to the committee at all and, second whether he will refer them to the committee for consideration in a manner which will make it possible for those wishing to discuss the content of the regulations to appear before the committee.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the House statements made by the minister to the Standing Committee on June 2, 1970. At that time we were considering the amendments to the Territorial Lands Act which made possible the drafting of land use regulations. If the minister were here he would probably recall that one of the Liberal members of the committee at the outset of the hearings, to use the vernacular, almost blew his stack. He said that we were being asked by the government for a blank cheque. However, by June 2 he had simmered down and did not oppose passage of the amending bill. As reported at page 58 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 23 of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the minister said several things. I wish to quote some of them. Near the bottom, left-hand part of the page we find these words:

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen said earlier that the word of the minister is the strongest power in the north, so—

An hon. member interjected, "You better believe it." The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development went on to say,:

I appreciate that, but I even offer to share this with you—

Meaning the power.

—because when these regulations are drafted I will refer them to the committee for study.

A little later he said:

As I said before, it is quite urgent to have some regulations because right now there are no regulations. In many aspects in the North we could face a dramatic situation if we do not move fast enough and that is why I am making this presentation to the committee.

I should remind the House that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) has been asking the minister questions relating to the exploration for oil and the regulations or controls with regard to the use of the land by those who were exploring. Following some other remarks by the minister, I said:

Could I ask a question for clarification, Mr. Chairman? The minister indicated he is prepared, when the regulations are complete, to refer them to the committee. By that does he mean he will refer them to the committee before or after their proclamation?

The minister replied:

It will depend on the timing. I think the committee could look into that, and I do not mind the delay, but it will be a matter of timing. I do not think I can avoid facing my responsabilities as a minister of the Crown and proclaim the regulations if it is urgent to proclaim them, because that is the responsability that is vested in me... But if I can send them to the committee and permit the committee to have a look at them before we proclaim these regulations, I will be happy to do so. As I say, if we decided tomorrow to ban certain kinds of trucks in the north I have absolutely no authority to say to a company, 'I do not want the kind of truck in the north that destroys the ecology', and so on. If they have their truck there they can go along with my wish, but they are not obliged to. The casing of an oil well, for example, is a very important item and I do not want to take any chances on it.

I then asked whether I understood correctly.

—that the minister is undertaking to refer this to the committee if not before the recess at least in the fall, when the committee could have those regulations before them in a form which the committee, if it so desired, could call expert witnesses to give evidence with respect to their views on whether or not the regulations were adequate or inadequate in any way.

The minister replied:

I would be delighted to have your advice on these regulations and to have you make recommendations on whether they are not strong enough or too strong, and if the recommendations that you make are good, I will be happy to take your advice and change the regulations before or after proclamation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the Territorial Lands Act, the land use regulations must be discussed with the territorial councils prior to implementation. The department is prepared to have these discussions and will do so as soon as the councils meet. There has been a delay, of course, because the Northwest Territories Council was dissolved several months ago in anticipation of the election which is to be held later this month, on December 21. As soon as the council meets, the department will discuss the regulations with them.

After the regulations have been discussed with the councils, and prior to approval by the Governor in Council, they must be advertised in the Canada Gazette. This will give all interested individuals and groups an opportunity to examine the regulations and comment on member on December 2, it will then be determined whether this matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As a member of that committee, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) can certainly make a recommendation to have them referred, if he so desires.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF FLQ CELLS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General, last Monday, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had infiltrated FLQ cells, I got another silent answer, as I do quite often.

I understand that that is a delicate matter. The acknowledged and necessary discretion of the police—and particularly of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—as well as state reasons can prevent the government from giving a satisfactory answer.

However, hon. members and the rest of the population have a right to adequate information in order to avoid misunderstandings and ambiguities which leave doubts about the efficiency of police action.

Everyone knows that infiltration is one method used by the R.C.M.P. Court cases have often proved it. Recently, the press reported an incident involving a rock group whose main performer was an R.C.M.P. agent. In most cases, such a method meets with success.

This is why it would be most curious if nobody had thought of infiltrating the FLQ. The Front de Libération du Québec has been in existence since 1963. Practically everything is known about its leaders. Last year, Mr. Saulnier appeared before a Parliamentary Committee in Ottawa and submitted a thick file in this regard. The case of the Maison du Pêcheur, at Gaspé, is another proof of this.

It would therefore be quite normal for R.C.M.P. headquarters to have instructed their agents to act as pro-FLQ.

That would explain why they seemed so little worried about the kidnapping of James Cross. They knew what was going on behind the scenes and what is more, according to press reports, policeman had even rented the apartment right above the one where Mr. Cross was held prisoner.

Why put newspapers in one of the doors of the car carrying the kidnappers and Mr. Cross from des Récollets Street to the Canadian Pavilion at Man and His World? To hide Mr. Cross? Goodness, everyone had seen his picture since October.

Was it to hide Carbonneau or Lanctôt? We had seen pictures of them in all the newspapers. Only one has not been seen; his identity is unknown to everybody and even the police and the Quebec Minister of Justice cannot say anything about him. He is the famous Pierre, known as Pierre Séguin.

I am asking a direct question, Mr. Speaker: Is the man known as Pierre Séguin an agent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

If so, we should be told, otherwise certain methods of our police forces will have to be revised and the principle according to which prevention is better than cure will have to be put into practice. We understand the need for evidence before a court but between that and risking a kidnapping when it can be prevented, there is a big difference.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the unexpected and sadistic way in which the Chénier cell acted prevents the government from boasting about the police action which, through infiltration of the FLQ, would have saved this country from the so-called apprehended insurrection.

• (10:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, all members of the House will share the concern of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) for the security of the state. In answering his question may I say that in accordance with long-established practice it is not in the public interest to reveal this type of information.

POST OFFICE—CHRISTMAS MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on November 26 I asked the Postmaster General to transmit to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office my question concerning the paucity of mail deliveries during the Christmas season, a situation whereunder the people of Canada have no mail on Friday, December 25, which is Christmas; December 26, which is Boxing Day and a Saturday, and none on December 27 because it is Sunday. All of these we understand. But none on December 28, a Monday, is surely of some importance. I was astounded, therefore, to hear from the Minister without Portfolio on December 8 that the Postmaster General had not transmitted this question to the minister now in charge of the Post Office. Surely this says something about the roster system. It also says something about the communicating capacity of the Postmaster General who is also Minister of Communications.

I do not enjoy criticizing the Minister without Portfolio who has inherited an appallingly difficult task. He has in the House always displayed courtesy and consideration and has the capacity to bring such qualities to the administration of a department which has been so trouble starred in the past two years. It is therefore with the best motives that I ask him to reconsider this lacuna of delivery service. A black-out from Thursday to the following Tuesday is too much even in the post Kieransian age. Mail still has value to many Canadians, although some of the disastrous so-called reforms of the minister's predecessor drove away many customers, diminishing thereby potential revenue.

It is not surprising that there has been protest against these four mailless days. Among newspapers deploring the diminution of service were the Globe and Mail and the Charlottetown Guardian. The latter editorialized as follows:

> More money for less service. That seems to be the motto of the federal government. And nowhere does it show more clearly than in the postal department.
> For example over the Christmas holidays there is to be no mail delivery Christmas Day, Boxing Day. and Sunday. (These) are not working days for most people, of course, but what excuse is there for no mail delivery on the Monday after Christmas? Tying up the mails for four days in a row. Unheard of. Incredible—

Despite what the still incumbent Postmaster General may say, disruption of mail service does not improve the transmission of mail. The cessation of delivery on Saturday for urban Canadians has proved to be, as some of us predicted, a fiasco. The Davey Committee on Mass Media after a thorough study of the matter recommended as follows:

> What we do urge to assist these (daily) newspapers and almost all weekly newspapers is the earliest possible resumption of Saturday mail deliveries. The Lost Weekend has hit some newspapers almost as hard as the rate increases.

On occasions in months past when I deplored the advent and continuation of the five-day delivery, attempts were made to imply an advocacy of the six-day week. Let us not confuse the issue. Postal workers are in the main, and have been for a long time, working a five-day week. We want that for them. We want good working conditions for our postal workers. I have always been very much aware of their problems and sympathetic to their needs. But the minister represents more than the employer side of the table. He must also represent the ultimate concern of both employees and employer—the public. It is time the public interest was consulted and considered.

Let the minister begin to repair the damage in the department and restore the confidence of the public by putting the interest of all the people of Canada first. I invite him to begin by redressing the imbalance revealed in this glaring example of insensitivity to the needs of the Canadian people and a disregard for their right to expect service from the Post Office Department.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office has asked me to give his answer to a question which the hon. member for Hillsborrough (Mr. Macquarrie) put to him on November 26 last, and restated on December 8.

As I know the hon. member for Hillsborough quite well, I am sure, since he has always shown much sympathy for the workers, especially the Post Office employees, that he would not push his argument to the point of taking them away from family gatherings during the holiday season, especially at Christmas time, when he himself will be snug and warm at home, spoiled by his family, in a magnificent corner of the beautiful province of Prince Edward Island. The Canadian people do not ask as much from their Post Office employees.

However, I am told by the minister that even if home delivery is not carried out on December 25, 26, 27 and 28, the Post Office Department will provide wicket service where need be, according to local requirements.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House met at 11 a.m.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PETITION RESPECTING PENSION PLAN OR IMPROVED EARLY RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR FORMER COAL MINERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the first report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition of Mr. Angus MacDougall and 12 other persons, signed at Glace Bay, on the Island of Cape Breton, in the province of Nova Scotia, and pertaining to the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, presented on December 10, 1970, and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to express my appreciation for the fact that this petition has been received and found to be in order. I would like some guidance from the Chair in order to enlighten the House as to the proper procedure, and I say that advisedly, Sir, because this is a new Crown corporation set up to deal exclusively with a local problem. The information I have received in reply to a letter I wrote would indicate that the situation is very much misunderstood. For this reason I ask the Chair and the House for guidance on whether it is proper under Standing Order 67 for me to ask that this matter be immediately debated in view of the urgency of the situation.

Mr. Speaker: I think the proper procedure at this stage is for the hon. member to seek leave of the House to have the petition read. To my knowledge there is no strict or clear provision in the Standing Orders for the reading of a petition, but Citation 343 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition indicates that an hon. member has the right to request that a petition be read by the Clerk of the House and in that way given that measure of publicity. This would require the consent of the House. I ask whether the hon. member, by leave of the House, may have the petition read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Clerk:

To The Honourable The Commons Of Canada
In Parliament Assembled

The Humble petition of the undersigned Canadians, resident in the Island of Cape Breton and Province of Nova Scotia, who are persons for whose benefit and the benefit of their dependants your Honourable House intended to provide pension arrangements.

Sheweth:

That Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and your Honourable House, did enact the statute entitled the "Cape Breton Development Corporation Act", chapter 6 of the Statutes of Canada 1967, which said statute came into force, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, on the 1st day of October 1967;

That section 18 of the said statute provides that the Cape Breton Development Corporation shall, by by-law approved by the Honourable the Treasury Board, establish, manage and administer pension arrangements for the benefit of persons, among whom are your Petitioners, employed or formerly employed in certain coal mining and related works and undertakings on the Island of Cape Breton, and for the benefit of the dependants of such persons;

That the said Corporation, purporting to comply with the said section 18, has put into force and effect a "Pre-Retirement Leave Plan", so-called;

That the Pre-Retirement Leave Plan is an income supplement scheme and is not a pension arrangement; and the benefits paid thereunder are designed and intended to supplement other forms of assistance received or to be received so as to raise the total assistance received to—but not above—certain dollar amounts fixed under the said Plan, with the result that the assistance paid by the Corporation decreases or ceases as other assistance is increased;

That the said Plan specifies that assistance received by way of unemployment insurance benefits is assistance within the meaning of the Plan; and the Plan requires that persons who are on pre-retirement leave under the Plan must use up their full benefit entitlement based upon their unemployment insurance contributions;

That the Government announced on the 3rd December 1970 that, effective the 3rd January 1971, unemployment insurance benefits will be increased by ten per cent;

That your Petitioners and their dependants will not benefit by the said increase in unemployment insurance benefits inasmuch as the Cape Breton Development Corporation will deduct, to its own use and benefit, the amount of such increase from the amount of the supplementary assistance paid by the Corporation within the income ceiling fixed by the Plan;

That this loss to your Petitioners and their dependants will commence on the 3rd January 1971;

That except by petition to your Honourable House no remedy is available to your Petitioners whereby they may obtain relief of this grievance before the 3rd January 1971 or at all;

Wherefore your Petitioners humbly pray that your Honourable House will find means of prevailing upon Her Majesty's Government and the Cape Breton Development Corporation:

1. To revoke the Pre-Retirement Leave Plan and to substitute therefor pension arrangements based upon pension principles; or alternatively, to provide for improved early retirement benefits for your Petitioners and their dependants based upon the principle already approved by Her Majesty's Government and referred to in the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General which is printed in the Notice Paper of your Honourable House at page 3, for the 9th December 1970, and which recommends legislation to improve early retirement benefits for certain categories of persons employed in the Public Service; and

2. To provide an immediate remedy for the present personal grievances of your Petitioners that, commencing the 3rd January 1971, they and their dependants will suffer financial losses not intended by your Honourable House when providing, under section 18 of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act that pension arrangements must be made by the Cape Breton Development Corporation, with the approval of the Treasury Board, for your Petitioners and their dependants; and

3. To provide such further and other relief in the premises as to your Honourable House seems just and meet.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, now prayeth and will ever pray,

And your Petitioners have, and each of them hath, signed at Glace Bay, on the Island of Cape Breton, in the Province of Nova Scotia, this 6th day of December, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Nine Hundred and Seventy.

The petition is signed by Angus MacDougall and others.

Mr. Speaker: This is perhaps where we reach the point the hon. member anticipated a moment ago concerning whether a motion pursuant to the petition filed can be entertained at this time. The hon. member has correctly referred to Standing Order 67(8) which reads in part as follows:

—or if it complain of some present personal grievance requiring an immediate remedy, the matter contained therein may be brought into immediate discussion.

As hon. members know, there are very few precedents in modern times of the House having adjourned its business for the purpose of considering a petition. The only precedent I could find, and which I looked at in view of the fact that the matter was brought to the attention of the House yesterday by the hon. member through the filing of the petition, is the Raymond Rodgers case reported in the Journals of the House of Commons for Friday, October 19, 1962. The Journals record that by unanimous consent the petition received the previous day and read to the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I think it is relevant and important that this had been done by unanimous consent of the House.

Should there be unanimity in the House that the petition referred to by the hon. member be referred to a committee of the House, perhaps the hon. member might be invited to indicate to what committee he wishes the petition to be referred. I would think that this is the way in which a petition of this nature should be dealt with rather than by a procedure which is akin or very closely related to either Standing Order 43 or Standing Order 26. Perhaps the hon. member might indicate for the guidance of the Chair and of all hon. members what motion he had in mind to submit to the House in relation to the petition.

Mr. MacInnis: May I say at the outset that I had no motion in mind and I was relying upon the good will of the House to give unanimous consent under Standing Order 67. I was hoping that, since there is an immediate remedy available, the House would take this opportunity to examine the matter. I have quite a number of copies available of section 18 of Bill C-135.

As I said before, the problem here is that I believe most members of the House are not familiar with this legislation, and I do not say this in a derogatory sense. Here we have a Crown company set up to deal with a local issue. I do not think hon. members have examined carefully what they passed in the House. Because I believe the matter has not been examined sufficiently I ask that the House give permission for a debate on this matter, and I ask that all members of the House consider whether there is any reason why any Canadian should not receive that which this House voted for in Parliament.

[The Clerk.]

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has made his point clearly and if he agrees with the position suggested then the matter might be considered at this time and debated by unanimous consent, but the House would have to decide whether there is such a desire or whether that the matter should be referred to a committee. I am not sure whether the Government House Leader has a suggestion to make in this regard.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the importance of the subject matter of the petition. I have not an opportunity to examine the petition but I listened to it as carefully as possible. I think it would be unwise to make a final decision this morning as to what process we should follow. Certainly I would be unwilling to suggest that we suspend the normal business to continue on another important measure. Nor would I be willing to agree to send the petition to a standing committee until I have had an opportunity to examine it and to consider it together with the minister responsible for the operation of the corporation. However, I will undertake to carry out that examination and to consider the matter at a later date.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, when I tabled this petition in the House yesterday I did so under Standing Order 67. The petition having been tabled in respect of a matter of vital importance to Cape Bretoners and it being an unusual procedure, I assume that the government and especially the Government House Leader would have interested themselves in the contents of that petition, especially a petition on a matter so close to the House Leader's heart. It is an unusual case and I hope for the good will and the support of the House in this matter. My whole argument rests entirely on the written legislation and on what was provided by the government in the House. I ask for nothing other than what was provided for in the legislation, and I only wish to get it in the most expedient way possible. I will go along with the House Leader's suggestion as to a committee, but I only hope that hon. members will acquaint themselves with what we have given to these people but have not delivered.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that perhaps the suggestion made by the House Leader and by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is a good one. Perhaps the matter might be taken under advisement for consultation later on.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TORONTO-WINNIPEG PASSENGER SERVICE REDUCTION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the House for unanimous consent to move a motion under Standing Order 43. The CNR has announced that one of its two daily trains between Toronto and Winnipeg may be withdrawn on January 31, 1971. Therefore I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the government to urge the CNR to halt its proposed stoppage of this vitally important passenger transportation service.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent is required. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent to put the motion at this time.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PAYMENT OF DUES BY NON-UNION EMPLOYEES, STATUS IN DECERTIFICATION APPLICATIONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-209, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the intent of the bill is to permit an employee working in a plant or operation which has a certified bargaining agent or union attached to it to refrain from joining or to cease to be a member of that particular union without risk thereby of losing his employment, provided he pays to the union under the Rand formula concept an amount equal to the regular dues in effect from time to time. It also provides that in any decertification process such employees who opt out pursuant to the provisions of the bill are not to be considered to be taken or taken into account as employees for the purposes of the decertification process.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING VALUE OF GOODS STOLEN IN RELATION TO PUNISHMENT FOR THEFT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North) moved the first reading of Bill S-8 (from the Senate), to amend the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—EASING OF QUALIFICATIONS FOR INSURANCE BENEFITS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question relating to unemployment. As it is now indicated by the unemployment figures that perhaps some 77,000 of the unemployed are not receiving unemployment insurance benefits, and in view of the general agreement that it is going to be quite a difficult winter in terms of unemployment, will the Prime Minister not undertake to re-examine the question as to the advisability of some amendment of the laws relating to unemployment insurance to provide, at least on an interim basis, some easing of the qualifications for unemployment insurance assistance this winter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of these figures, Mr. Speaker. I shall ask the Minister of Labour to look into the matter.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—INTRODUCTION OF NEW POLICIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has had a day to reflect upon the seriousness of the scale of unemployment among Canadian youth and to consider the adequacy of present policies with regard to employment of Canadian youth. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to offer to the unemployed youth of Canada some hope that new approaches will be adopted other than those indicated by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has had a day to reflect upon my answer. I suggested to him that in our general fiscal and monetary policies it is hard to suggest they should discriminate against the aged people in favour of youth. They apply, of course, to all citizens.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister is genuinely concerned about disaffection amongst Canadian youth and about preventing civil unrest. Will he instruct his ministers to examine this problem and the prospects for Canadian youth in the coming year or so with a view to taking adequate measures to reduce this inhumane and dangerous treatment of our youth?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that we are concerned about unemployment and unemployed people, not only the youth. I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we should discriminate against the unemployed who are older in favour of young people.

EXTENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT AMONGST PROFESSIONALS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that there are large numbers of unemployed among professional workers in Canada, an indication of the sad state of the Canadian economy, will the Prime Minister take immediate action to publish figures showing the extent of the waste of this most valuable asset?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have the Prime Minister answer my question and the one from the hon. member for Calgary North at the same time. It would save him getting up twice.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR DEPARTMENTAL FORECASTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is also in charge of the Wheat Board. Is the minister prepared now to make available to hon. members the information he has available in his office which supports the position he took yesterday on national television that there will be a substantial increase in unemployment in Canada over and above what was announced yesterday?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the hon. member is accurately reporting anything that was said. There was an exchange in the House yesterday about figures being available. I have nothing to add to that exchange at this time.

Mr. Stanfield: You have nothing to add, period.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Finance would be willing to make available to the House the information he has available, and the Minister of Labour as well? I understand there is considerable evidence in the cabinet and in the Department of Manpower and Immigration which indicates that the prognostication as far as unemployment is concerned—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked the question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no information to make available.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

[Later:]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is he prepared to table estimates made for unemployment for 1971, month by month, which have been prepared for the government?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, may I refer the hon. member to the exchange which took place in the House yesterday.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. It is the same question that I directed to the Prime Minister yesterday and he informed me that the Minister of Finance would be in the House today. The question concerns loans to students who are graduating and are unable to meet their liability within the six months. Are the Minister of Finance and the government prepared to extend the time for payment until those students who cannot find work are employed?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are provisions under the Canada student loans plan whereby the banks making the loans can extend the repayment period up to ten years and they can also delay the time of the initial payment if they so desire. The period can also be extended beyond ten years upon application to the Department of Finance in special circumstances.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might follow up that matter. The information I have from the students at Calgary University and other universities is that pressure is being brought to bear on them by the banks. Will the minister take to heart the welfare of the students and take them out of the hands of the banks?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the funds were borrowed from the banks. If my hon. friend will give me specific instances, I will be pleased to take them up with the banks.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION INDICATING INCREASE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in connection with some remarks he made on radio and television last night. Does he not admit that he told the Canadian people during the dialogue he had with the press that he expected that there would be an increment in unemployment in the next few months? Did he not say that, or did the media not record his statement correctly?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him, did he not say that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman will no doubt recognize that the question is asked in a form which is hardly acceptable. I hesitate to suggest that he ought to rephrase the question. Perhaps it might be better to allow the minister to reply.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will try to indicate to the right hon. member what I believe I said in answer—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want what the minister said, not what he believes he said.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I did not think that the minister would reply in those terms. We have tried to follow the general rule that no question should be asked directly of ministers about statements made outside the House. That is why I thought that the question should be asked directly and not in reference to what the minister might have said outside the House. Perhaps the minister could reply in those terms.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister will understand what I have in mind. According to the records that he has and the prognostications and prophesies that have been developed in his department, does he expect there to be a material increase in unemployment during the next two or three months?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the efforts which the government has taken on the fiscal and monetary side are expected to have an impact in favour of a better unemployment picture than would otherwise have been the case.

Some hon. Members: Better unemployment?

Mr. Lang: Of course, one normally expects slightly higher unemployment as the winter deepens. This is, therefore, a factor against which the effective policies of the government are working.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There will be increased unemployment; that is what the minister is saying.

Mr. Stanfield: We ought to export that minister to the Common Market.

COMMUNICATIONS

REPORT ON MASS MEDIA—CORPORATION PROFITS AND CONCENTRATION OF POWER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister which arises out of the report of the Special Senate Committee on the Mass Media. In view of the findings of the committee that the profits earned by media corporations, that is, by both broadcasters and publishers, are, in their words, extraordinary and astonishing, and in view of the evidence of the growing concentration of power in the hands of fewer and fewer of these media corporations, what action does the government propose to take? Is the government studying the matter? Is any particular minister or department of the government looking into this matter? Also, will the Prime Minister or one of his ministers fairly soon give the House some indication of what course the government intends to follow?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet considered the report in cabinet. When we have considered it, we will announce the government's course to the House.

FINANCE

LIMITATION OF AMOUNT OF ADVERTISING DEDUCTIBLE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the very large mass media advertising revenues, which have doubled since 1960 and are expected to increase by another 25 per cent by 1975, is the minister giving any consideration to the possibility of limiting the amount of advertising which can be used as a deductible item for income tax purposes?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at this point, Mr. Speaker.

TAX CONCESSIONS TO "TIME" AND "READER'S DIGEST"

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Since the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs, the Senate Committee on the Mass Media and the Liberal convention have all recommended the discontinuance of the special tax exemptions for Time and Reader's Digest, will the minister now act upon that advice and end these special exemptions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question is a repetition of one asked previously. I may be wrong. Perhaps the minister might reply to the question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if there are to be any changes in taxation, they will be announced in the House in the usual manner.

IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC LEGISLATION ON INTEGRATION INTO FRENCH-SPEAKING CULTURE—CONSULTATIONS WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the new legislation presented to the National Assembly of Quebec regarding the integration of immigrants into the French-speaking culture, can the minister say what consultations were held between the two levels of government on this matter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations between the officials in the respective departments of immigration in connection with co-operative action which might be taken to improve our immigration practices and procedures and to improve the way in which immigrants are received when they enter Canada.

Mr. Paproski: Can the minister say if this new policy of refusing immigrants admission into 19 medical and technical corporations unless they have a working knowledge of French applies to immigrants coming to Quebec under the auspices of the federal department of immigration?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the problem to which the hon. member refers, but I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a further supplementary question in just a moment. Will the hon. member kindly allow me to suggest to hon. members that I will again seek their co-operation at the beginning of the question period so that we will have no difficulty at the end.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, is the government aware of the comment of the Quebec Minister of Immigration that any interference from Ottawa could lead to confrontation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

LABOUR RELATIONS

GENERAL MOTORS STRIKE—ACTION TO EXPEDITE SETTLEMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Since this is not his duty day in the House and as this is an important question, I will direct it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Is it an important question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Good morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am waiting for quiet. In view of the breakdown of negotiations in the General Motors labour dispute which occurred yesterday, will the federal government immediately offer its mediation services and any other help which might be useful in order to bring this very long and costly strike, which has resulted in hardship for the families of the strikers and a setback for the economy, to a very rapid end?

[Mr. Paproski.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that the Minister of Labour likes more than being helpful in this kind of situation—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —but of course this is a strike under provincial jurisdiction. I do not know if the hon. member is suggesting that we should interfere in the business of the government of Ontario in this strike.

Mr. Hees: I am suggesting that the government should offer any help that might be useful, because this is a matter of national importance and it is of great national importance that this strike should be brought to a quick end.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand the suggestion but I imagine it is addressed to the government of Ontario. If it wants our support, we will of course gladly give it.

GENERAL MOTORS—IMPORTATION OF CARS FROM UNITED STATES WHILE CANADIAN EMPLOYEES STILL ON STRIKE

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): In view of the deadlock in the negotiations to settle the General Motors strike, would the government reassess its decision not to prohibit General Motors from importing automobiles from the United States for the duration of this strike?

GRAIN

BARLEY—PRICE SPREAD BETWEEN DELIVERIES TO COUNTRY ELEVATORS AND FEED MILLS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who is responsible for the Wheat Board. Since western farmers delivering barley to country elevators are receiving 30 cents per bushel less than they would receive for the same product delivered to feed mills, what action is the government taking to ensure that farmers are not financially penalized by placing barley in export position?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to welcome the hon. member to the House. Farmers, of course, may deliver their barley to feed mills to the extent that there is demand for that barley at the prices which are offered. As an alternative, in most cases they deliver their barley to the Wheat Board under the Wheat Board marketing system. I would be interested to know if the hon. member is suggesting that he is opposed to the Wheat Board marketing system.

ABILITY OF FARMERS TO DELIVER TO ELEVATORS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is also responsible for the wheat board. The other day the minister suggested that the wheat board system will take in 250 million bushels, thereby saving the cost of storage under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Since there is an approximate capacity of 550 million bushels in the country and terminal elevators, under the grain policy announced by the minister is it the case that farmers will not be able to deliver grain even though space is available in the elevators?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a number of times I have expressed the hope that the elevators be kept from that very full level which prevents them operating efficiently and effectively and that the amount of grain in the system should be the amount required for genuine marketing reasons. There will, of course, be less wheat in the system than there has been for a long time. At the same time, there will be much more need in the system for space for handling the very large quantities of barley and rapeseed moving forward to export markets.

Mr. Korchinski: As the elevator system will not accommodate 300 million bushels, and taking $1 per bushel as the average price for barley and other grains, what suggestion has the minister to offset this $300 million loss which will affect the total economy of the Prairies?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the kind of statement he seeks from the minister ought normally be made on motions.

Mr. Korchinski: Because of the fact there will be a loss of approximately $300 million to the western economy, is the government contemplating any other policy to cover this loss?

Mr. Lang: The hon. member's premise is completely wrong, Mr. Speaker. He insists on continuing to forget and ignore barley and rapeseed.

ABOLITION OF TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, December 4, as recorded at page 1755 of Hansard, I directed the following question to the minister in charge of the wheat board:

> Mr. Speaker, could the minister advise the House what the estimated savings to the government would be this year by abolishing the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act?

The minister replied.

> Not at this point in time but I probably could obtain some figures for the hon. member.

Does the minister now have these figures?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Not yet. Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT RESPECTING PENSIONS TO EXPEDITE HOUSE BUSINESS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I am asking this question on behalf of the Government House Leader who is anxious to have certain items of business dealt with before the Christmas recess. Is the government considering making a commitment concerning CNR pensions along the lines recommended unanimously by the House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): In view of the preamble to the hon. member's question, I presume I ought to discuss this with the House Leader. As the hon. member knows, such a commitment on the part of the government at this time would be inappropriate in view of the fact that the pension issue is among those being discussed by the unions and the railroad in the current bargaining sessions. I stated to the House previously, and I repeat, that I have formally advised Canadian National Railways of the unanimous concurrence of the House in the report. I feel that it would be appropriate to see what changes emerge from the bargaining session now under way.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government only advised the CNR of the unanimous decision of the House or is it talking to the CNR in plain language?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE REASONS FOR FORMATION OF FLQ

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since several intermediate bodies would like the federal government to set up a committee made up of members of all parties in the House, in order to determine exactly the causes of the FLQ movement and the troubles which occurred in Quebec, does the government intend to accede to that request?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, such a request has not been referred to me. If it were submitted I would consider it, but I do not see a priori why we should accede to it. The causes of the FLQ come under the police which makes the investigations in that field or under the political and social order. In my opinion, nobody can be better acquainted with the facts than those who have been elected by the people.

FINANCE

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION BASED ON WHITE PAPER ON TAX REFORM

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the great uncertainty on the part of business and commerce and their plans for future expansion as a result of the white paper on taxation, when does the minister expect to introduce legislation for tax changes based on that document?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): In the spring budget, Mr. Speaker. I might clarify my answer. The spring budget will include tax reform but not necessarily the entire contents of the white paper.

HOUSING

ACTION TO INCREASE CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC HOUSING —INCENTIVES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. While statistics indicate progress in housing starts in the low-cost sector, will the minister advise if anything is being done in co-operation with the provinces to step up production in the area of public housing where the needs remain acute in many parts of the country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): During 1969 and 1970 the federal commitment to public housing will have had the effect of doubling the whole stock of public housing in two years compared with the previous activities of some 25 years. That emphasis will continue into 1971 and beyond. In addition, we have offered to the provinces of participation the idea of acquiring from existing stock through long-term lease accommodation for which we will share in terms of public housing subsidies. In this way, they will be in the position of not having to wait for new building production or provide capital investment.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the high cost of construction in the province of Newfoundland, which is causing delays in providing this type of housing, will the minister consider incentives for the construction industry in the province in order to create an impetus to overcome the serious shortage?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we embarked on that in an exploratory way this year. We will certainly continue discussions with the provincial government of Newfoundland and any members of the industry who are willing to sit down with us to see what can be done in this field.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question. Does the minister think that spending 60 cents per capita on public housing is sufficient to meet public housing needs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

POST OFFICE

RESTORATION OF SATURDAY MAIL DELIVERY IN LIGHT OF MASS MEDIA REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the post office. It arises from the emphasis placed upon improved postal services by the Senate committee. Does the minister specifically propose having the post office return to Saturday deliveries in view of the importance attached to this by the Senate committee in connection with a vigorous press in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we found the Davey report very interesting. The department is now examining the part of the report that concerns it and, in fact, I think the question is a little premature. We shall be able to reach conclusions once we have studied the matter.

MONTREAL—DISCUSSIONS WITH FORMER EMPLOYEES OF G. LAPALME INCORPORATED

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Considering the answer the minister gave last week to the effect that the file on the employees of G. Lapalme Inc. had not been shelved, could he say whether there were negotiations in Ottawa this week and whether those former Lapalme employees can still hope to be hired by his department?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): This is a very delicate matter, Mr. Speaker. There have been no meetings with former employees of G. Lapalme Inc. for two weeks when they were offered something for the Christmas season. We hope to meet with them soon.

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN COST OF CONSTRUCTION OF SATELLITE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to address a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Has Treasury Board approved or does it have before it for approval any increase in the cost of construction of the satellite Anik from the bid submitted by Hughes Aircraft which the government accepted in the amount of $30 million?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman perhaps does not appreciate the fact that the construction of and arrangements for the launching of the satellite are carried out by a Crown corporation. Questions regarding changes in cost would have to be directed to, and information obtained from, that corporation.

Mr. Lewis: I do not appreciate that the President of the Treasury Board cannot give this kind of information. The matter may not come before Treasury Board, but is the President of the Treasury Board aware of any requested increase?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any increase. As I indicated, the role of the federal government in respect to this matter is to scrutinize and to approve an annual capital budget for the corporation. Control of that budget rests with the corporation. They are the ones who negotiate and agree to, or otherwise, price changes.

PAYMENT OF REWARD FOR INFORMATION LEADING TO DISCOVERY OF KIDNAPPERS—POLICE FORCES INVOLVED IN SEARCH

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not any consideration has been given to or allocation made of the reward which was undertaken to be provided by the federal and provincial governments to anyone giving information in connection with the Cross or Laporte cases. In view of the fact that Mr. Cross' whereabouts were found, is any reward being considered for those who gave the information that led to the discovery of the kidnappers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say frankly that I know of no such reward having been paid. May I go on to say that if I did I do not see how the House could expect me to take it into my confidence. Obviously if a reward is paid as a result of information given by some of the associates in the crime, it would be undesirable to have their colleagues in crime know that they had been informed upon, and I doubt whether it would be in the public interest for the government to reveal such information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say, Mr. Speaker, the argument advanced by the Prime Minister is very ingenious. I am not asking for the identity of the individuals who received the reward; I asked whether or not consideration has been given to making a payment. In view of the evasiveness of the right hon. gentleman's first answer, I am led to ask a second question. Were any other police officers or members of the secret service participants in the search for the whereabouts of Mr. Cross other than members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the provincial police of Quebec or the city police of Montreal?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know of no other police forces. The armed forces, of course, assisted greatly in various parts of this operation. I must take exception to the hon. member's allegations about my being evasive in answering his previous question. I assure him that I was not evasive. I told him quite frankly not only that I thought it would be against the public interest to say whether or not a reward had been paid but that I felt the names of the persons to whom a reward might be paid should not be disclosed either.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is being hidden now?

FISHERIES

DECIMATION OF STOCKS—ACTION TO PROTECT INSHORE FISHERMEN

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the minister's press release yesterday which indicated that it has been determined by the Fisheries Research Board that activity of foreign fleets through overfishing has seriously decimated our fishing stocks, what immediate action is the minister proposing to take to protect our inshore fishermen?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have outlined several times in the House the steps that we are taking. We are describing what we regard as sound conservation practice, and bilateral discussions are being had with certain countries. We are working through the North Atlantic Fisheries Commission, which is our main hope, and we are preparing a strong submission to the next Law of the Sea Conference sponsored by the United Nations which may be held in 1972.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON MARINE RESOURCES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister of external affairs and some members of our Canadian delegation at the United Nations feel that it might take five years for an international Law of the Sea Conference to be held, would the minister be prepared to approach other members of the cabinet in order to try to convene an international conference on marine resources, sponsored by Canada, perhaps within the next year, year and a half or two years?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am not as pessimistic as the hon. member; I believe there will be a Law of the Sea Conference in 1972.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the seriousness of the matter alluded to in the minister's statement, is he prepared to use his initiative to convene an extra special conference of ICNAF to discuss conservation solely?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the next meeting of ICNAF will be in the spring, and we will certainly be stressing the findings of our Fisheries Research Board at that time.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will allow a further supplementary, but I would bring it to the attention of hon. members that I see at least 30 members and there are only five minutes remaining in the question period.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister of fisheries. Is the minister giving any thought to implementing the scientific and technical arm of NATO in order to bring this serious problem of overfishing to the attention of member countries in the hope of alleviating this problem?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think it will have much effect on the Russians, the Poles and the East Germans who are not members of NATO.

INDUSTRY

BOOK PUBLISHING—ONTARIO ROYAL COMMISSION—PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—COMPLEMENTARY ACTION

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Did the government of Ontario consult the federal government before it appointed a royal commission to investigate the problems of the Canadian book publishing industry, and does the federal government intend to take any complementary action relative to this and other recent related developments?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Not me, Mr. Speaker, but the study done by my department on this industry was provided to the Ontario government. We are still looking at this industry and have set up an interdepartmental group to look at ideas that could be developed to help the printing industry. I might add that one of the things that could be done is for the United States to amend its copyright act which would be very helpful to the Canadian industry, and in this regard a number of representations have been made by the government of Canada to the government of the United States.

HOUSING

RENT SUBSIDIZATION PROGRAMS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing and urban affairs. When the minister speaks of giving the citizen the opportunity to choose, does he mean that his department is considering giving more importance to rent subsidization programs? If so, when are such programs to be announced?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): As I indicated a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, we have offered to all provinces federal participation in rent supplements, under which they could acquire existing accommodation under a bulk lease or purchase arrangement. This would obviate the necessity for producing new housing accommodation. Rent supplement has been a standing offer for at least the last two years, an offer which has not been taken up by any province to any extent. One of the problems is that adequate housing stock in that general area which would be available to people of a certain income does not exist. So we have to produce stock as well as make the offer of rent supplementation.

AIR CANADA

DISCUSSION OF SONIC BOOM POLICY WITH TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Did Air Canada discuss with the transport department the government's policy on sonic booms before it placed orders for a number of very costly supersonic transport planes?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the latter part of the hon. member's question is incorrect; orders have not been placed in that sense of the word. Air Canada has purchased what is known in the industry as a queue position. It has made no firm decision on the purchase of SST's, nor is it likely to do so for some time to come. Therefore the rest of the question is not relevant in that sense. But I will say to the hon. member that Air Canada has held discussions with us regarding the so-called sonic boom problem and, in fact, within approximately the last week has decided to make a contribution, together with the Ministry of Transport, to further research on an international basis on the matter of the sonic boom and related problems.

POLLUTION

PRECAUTIONS FOLLOWING DERAILMENT OF RAILWAY CARS CONTAINING SULPHURIC ACID

Mr. Gaétan J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry relating to a question which I asked yesterday concerning the derailment of sulphuric acid tank cars near Sudbury, and the resultant threat from the spilling of this acid into the Pickerel River. Can the minister advise whether the situation is now under control?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker, it is under control.

[Later:]

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to one directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry earlier. In view of the apparent conflict in the reports which have appeared as to the real danger of pollution as a result of the train derailment, can the minister tell the House how long the danger will exist?

Mr. Davis: The reports I have received from the area indicate that the sulphuric acid is being contained and neutralized. There is no evidence of fish kill. However a diversion of water from the French River is also being arranged to dilute the acid if further escapements should occur.

WHEAT—PAYMENTS UNDER ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Will he assure the House today that the cheques for the first and second payments in respect of the LIFT program will be mailed to recipients before Christmas, as this affects many farmers in the west?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not likely that all of the final Lift program payments will be in the mail before Christmas. The office is processing these as quickly as possible but it will certainly be well into the month of January, according to the latest report, before they will be mailed.

Mr. Cadieu: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has not allowed supplementary questions for the last few minutes. A number of members have been denied this opportunity. Perhaps the question might be pursued on Monday.

APPOINTMENT OF BLAKE A. CAMPBELL TO FISHERMEN'S DEVELOPMENT BOARD

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry arising from a statement from the Pacific region office of his department regarding the appointment of Blake A. Campbell to the Indian Fishermen's Development Board. In view of the fact it indicates that Mr. Campbell is secretary of a committee investigating wage and price disputes in the fishing industry, I should like to ask whether this body is just a paper tiger, and if not what has it done since November, 1964, when it issued a summary review of information—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question can be placed on the "tiger" order paper.

POLLUTION

USE OF CRIMINAL CODE TO ENFORCE LAWS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the Reuters report this morning that the Soviet parliament has just approved an anti-pollution measure which provides for criminal proceedings against anyone found guilty of causing pollution, can the minister say whether it will be the policy of the new department of the environment to use the powers of the Criminal Code to enforce new pollution laws?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether this question involves legal opinion. However, I understand that the Criminal Code underlies certain clauses in the Canada Water Act. If that is so, the answer is yes.

FISHERIES

MANITOBA—REMOVAL OF PROHIBITION OF MARKETING OF SPECIES CAUGHT IN CERTAIN WATERS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the assurances the House has received from the minister that certain industries which have been causing mercury pollution in Manitoba waters have now stopped dumping mercury, can he say whether the regulation which prohibited the marketing of certain species of commercial fresh-water fish from these waters will be lifted for this winter's fishing season? If not, when does the minister feel this order can be lifted?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, it will not be lifted.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

PROVISION OF SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE, LOAN GUARANTEE, ETC.

The House resumed from Thursday, December 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchand (Langelier) that Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to comment on Bill C-205 because it has a particular effect on my province and especially on my district. I probably should have said that it could have had a particular effect on my district because so far, other than the odd dribble of funds—some $11,000 to a firm to expand a vegetable packing plant, a grant to a hockey stick factory which was later not accepted, and a grant to establish a sawmill operation—there has not been too much economic or employment advantage which I have seen. It is obvious that the serious unemployment situation, which my colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan), brought forcefully to the attention of the House yesterday bears out the fact that the whole program is not having the effect that was so loudly proclaimed by the minister last year.

My main objection to the administration of the regional development incentives plan is the lack of consideration for those people who would benefit by such a plan but who cannot participate. Who knows better what is best for an area or a region than the local people who should benefit? Even though the minister has proclaimed loudly and clearly that the program would not be successful unless every level of government were involved, these people at the grass roots level are being completely ignored.

The over-all regional development plan is not succeeding because both top levels of government, federal and provincial, are dictating what will happen instead of co-ordinating and consulting with the local level of government which knows the particular area and what is best for its development. The regional development plan has discouraged local governments from participating rather than encouraging them to forward their ideas to develop the resources of their regions. The words "participation, involvement" and "dialogue" are empty because this government, and the supposed experts who are charged with formulating a plan, are committing communities, areas and regions on the basis of what comes from a book rather than on the basis of what concerns the human beings who are to be helped.

I have experienced many examples of local firms with the necessary initiative and experience in respect of local needs being turned down for incentive grants, primarily because of technical rules and regulations. It is difficult to imagine that those making the decisions are even human. Sometimes I think there are robots in the regional development incentives branch rather than qualified human beings. This is difficult to understand.

I find it difficult to understand this whole area of government loans and grants. We have the Small Businesses Loans Act. Just try to get a loan under this act in Newfoundland, unless you have enough security to indicate that you do not need a loan of that type. Initiative and experience do not mean anything in my province in the consideration which leads to its granting of loans to small secondary industries which could spring up across the province creating employment opportunities. Outside exploiters can come into the province with guarantees handed out by the provincial government. This only creates a decrease in the morale of small businessmen who could create the lifeline of our economy.

We have the Industrial Development Bank, another government agency which guarantees loans. Do not try to get a loan from this bank unless you are prepared to wait for years of investigation, and even then one has to provide not only his assets as security, but those of his family as well. One also has to accept certain restrictions which tend to destroy his initiative and morale. I feel there is some progress being made in this regard. In last night's paper I noticed an indication that Newfoundland was obtaining a few more loans, but more impetus must be developed in respect of grants and loans in order to develop the province of Newfoundland which is so badly in need of an incentive grants policy. I believe the industrial incentives grants policy has missed the whole concept of what should be the proper aims and objectives, of such a policy deprived areas. It should provide incentives for those with initiative and business ability. But this government has failed to realize what incentive means, and those to whom these incentives should be directed are not able to contribute to the buildup of the economy of their own area.

Let me give you some examples, Mr. Speaker, of the weaknesses in both the over-all development process and the incentive grants. One small firm in the city of Corner Brook employs each year between November and May some 200 people in the herring industry. This firm is gradually improving its facilities under great difficulty because of a lack of expansion capital. Last year it applied for an incentives grant and was turned down on the technicality that it had already committed itself to ordering equipment under section 9 (1). The proprietor of the firm wished to expand by installing new, modern equipment which had to be ordered from Germany six months in advance so that it would be available for the herring industry in the Fall. Yet he was refused the grant on the ground that he could have attained his objective without the help of the grant. It is admitted that the applicant was able to find the money elsewhere, but this method of financing restricted him to the point where he was unable to expand to the extent of employing many more people.

May I give another example of frustration? The owner of an electrical firm showed me thousands of dollars worth of orders he had to turn down because of the procrastination of the department in establishing a grant for the expansion of his small plant. I could cite many other examples of businessmen with initiative and business sense who were thwarted in their attempts to establish new industry in line with the province's natural resources because of a lack of flexibility in the act and the hardnosed decisions of the agency which fails to realize that one of the basic concepts necessary for the success of the plan is the encouragement of people to participate in the development of their area.

Let us look at the statistics in respect of Newfoundland for the first year. Out of almost $80 million in grants in Canada, Newfoundland received some $845,000, with a prospective employment figure of 360. This is a projected figure. So, after one year of operation, the plan has not been too effective where the need is greatest. Of the 11 grants to Newfoundland, eight were for the fishing industry, one was for electrical products and another was for the dairy products industry.

I am sure the government cannot brag about this effort. The mechanical application of this program instead of a human and commonsense application points up the failure of the government to comprehend the objectives of an incentives policy. I have said many times in this House and in my province that the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was the most important step taken by this government in many years. I had faith in this department because it appeared that the power it had to inject funds into provinces with areas of regional disparity was just what was needed to create job opportunities. More particularly, it was just what was needed to aid the over-all development of the Atlantic regions, specifically the Province of Newfoundland.

Last year, through the co-operation of the regional development committee on request of the Newfoundland members, the members of the committee were able to visit some areas of the province to see the needs at firsthand. Every member on the committee, including those from the other side of the House, agreed that the trip was worthwhile and indicated to the minister responsible their support for development assistance. In my district alone, some 15 briefs were presented because the people hoped the briefs would be considered, that there would be further consultation and that results would be forthcoming. Here, a year later, the many local development organizations and the town and community councils are still in the dark concerning whether or not their ideas and plans will be taken into consideration. I encouraged these organizations to become involved and to submit their ideas and plans for development. I told them to have faith in the department because I had faith in it. But I can tell you now, Mr. Speaker, I am disillusioned just as I know these citizens who want to help the government are disillusioned because the department does not care about the people it should be helping. The words flow easily from the experts, Mr. Speaker—"equality of opportunity"; we want you to become involved"; "we want you to participate"—but they are empty words, because after being in existence for two years the results from this department are negligible.

The only way in which I can see the past mistakes being overcome is by the provision of flexibility. More attention must be paid to the natural resources of the region and a co-operative plan must be thought out, with the participation of the people at the grass roots level, to develop these resources. Such action must be encouraged through grants. The advisory board concept might be the answer, because under the original plan the Atlantic Development Board was much closer to the basic needs of a particular region and produced good results by instilling impetus into the development. I also feel that development incentives should be broadened to include the service industry, small businesses in the retail and wholesale area, and tourism, especially in the Atlantic regions. More scope should be given to the marketing potential of our fishing, agricultural and forest products in the Province of Newfoundland. Each region should be looked at separately with a view to the development of its potential. More infrastructural support must be given to the areas which can be developed through an orderly and commonsense buildup so that they can attain the objectives of both creating employment opportunity for the people in the immediate area and, just as important, improving the living, educational and recreational aspects of their everyday life.

As my colleague the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) stated yesterday, the members of the regional development committee will closely scrutinize the proposed amendments in Bill C-205. Probably during that phase of the exercise we may be able to impress on the minister and the officials of his department the important factors connected with the granting of regional development incentives which heretofore have been overlooked as a result of the mechanical process adopted. I still have some faith in the regional development plan and hope we can overcome the shroud of secrecy which exists between those who are responsible for its implementation and those to whom it is directed. Probably with a meeting of intelligent minds we can come up with a plan which will be to the advantage of the too many unemployed of Canada.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, we are now amending the Regional Development Incentives Act which was passed in 1968-69. This really is a concept which has been with us for a considerable period of time, dating back to the old area development incentives legislation. This is one of the ways in which I think most Members of Parliament believe slow growth, underdeveloped, distressed and high-unemployment areas can be assisted. For this reason, there is considerable interest in this legislation. I think, however, that even the minister would agree that in relation to what has been done, what could be done or what was anticipated would be done, much is left to be desired. I have always been concerned about the fact that the government seems to believe that by holding out a carrot everything will be well. This has been done in many fields. We find that there are periods of high employment and periods of low employment, and when there is a period of low employment or high unemployment the government comes up with instant solutions which really do not turn out to be instant solutions and which in many cases are very costly.

At the time the original Act was before us, when a similar type of incentive was applied for a period of time, a number of concepts were discussed which I think will have to be reconsidered. For this reason, I do not believe this bill will do very much to improve some of the basic concepts.

It has been mentioned that one of the problems we are facing in Canada is that, in the main, we operate branch plants of U.S. companies. There has probably never been a country—whether it be a colony in various states of development or an independent nation—in which a foreign power has exercised so much economic control as is the case in Canada. In some of the industries foreign control is almost 100 per cent, and only in a few industries is the control of the Canadian government evident. I think that this, in itself, raises a major consideration because in many cases this incentive program is being used to further develop U.S. control of our industry and of our economy.

A short time ago, I spoke to a young fellow who had only recently entered the industrial field. He pointed out that the company for which he works is in serious trouble, and he expects it may have to be sold to a U.S. corporation. One of the reasons for this difficulty is that when they make a fairly reasonable profit in Canada and the money is deposited in a bank in Montreal, the parent company in the United States phones up and asks how much money they have in the bank. As soon as the parent company knows how much money there is, it issues a draft. Then, when the company in Canada needs to expand into several industrial fields for which they have the necessary capability, staff and knowledge, they are not able to do so simply because the money is not available. The young fellow asked his manager very naïvely "why do we not apply for an incentive grant and build a plant?" Right now this company operates a small plant in Ancaster employing 12 or 15 people. I understand the 12 or 15 people will have to be laid off because that operation is closing down as it is in need of modernization and improvement. If it closes down, obviously 15 or 20 people will be out of work. Obviously, this company does not need this type of grant to keep it operating in Ancaster because it has made a fairly sizeable profit over its period of operation. However, because it is controlled by a U.S. company which has decided that the commodity which this plant produces is no longer necessary in Canada, it is going to close down.

It seems to me that if the government is really interested in solving the problem, they should not bend to political direction, as the minister said, but should make a firm decision as to the direction which the Canadian economy should take. There should be an over-all scheme which would accomplish that purpose. I am well aware of the fact that if we enact a regulation that money should not be transferred to U.S. corporations, the result would be as the minister predicted in the committee. If a company wanted to locate in Newfoundland, where there is a great need for industry, and that type of incentive were not given, the company might decide to locate in Toronto. It is time this government made up its mind where they want industry to locate. Certainly, the country cannot afford to have new industry locating in Toronto just because it wants to be close to the market. We will have to make a decision on where industry goes. England has been making such decisions for a long time.

I have used the example of the Ford Company which wanted to build a new factory in Coventry, but the government would not allow them to do this. They were told that there were insufficient schools and municipal facilities in Coventry and a preferable location for the plant would be further north. The government told them "our economy has changed; the textile industry in the suggested area is no longer viable and all the necessary facilities are available, so that is where the industry should go". The government did not give Ford a permit to build in Coventry. In England they operate on a permit system and you do not pay taxes on undistributed profits but you cannot use this money for expansion without a permit. If you do not locate in the right place to meet the needs of the total economy, you are not granted a permit.

What we have done in this country is to go around holding out a carrot. I come from an area which is desperately in need of secondary industry because, as the years have gone by, our primary industry has changed. I am thinking right now of the small community of Cobalt, which eight or ten months ago had 12 or 14 mines operating. Now, there is only one in that area. There is a smelter in that area which is operating sufficiently competently for the United States to be sending to it boxcar loads of coins for reprocessing into silver ingots. It is one of the most efficient plants of its kind on the continent, and can compete with any other plant of its kind in existence. By-products come to that plant from other mining industries in that area, and some of its production goes to Norway for processing and some of it goes to a U.S. plant somewhere in Montana. The processing could take place here in Canada if the government had some control over industry. The government has always played a role in this particular operation because silver ingots from the plant come directly to the Mint in Ottawa.

This plant has been operating off and on, first in Deloro and now in Cobalt, and it has had its ups and downs. Some of the silver producers have found that they have had to ship to the United States because the product could not always be handled in Canada. Yet, with the co-operation of the provincial and federal governments, the plant could expand very extensively into a smelter operation to process many of the rarer minerals, that are now not reclaimed in any other area in Canada. This could be done fairly easily and would allow a margin for by-products from base metals which presently come from Sudbury, from International Nickel which at present cannot be processed in Canada. We could very easily develop secondary industry to use some of the reclaimable by-products from such a smelter. In fact there are a number of things the government could do, but it seems to me that the minister of regional disparity has done exactly what he said he would not do.

If one reads the committee reports of a year ago, one will find the minister was very much opposed to the idea of the regional development program being used to provide government control. In effect he said, "We are only going to assist certain plants in certain areas, because if we expand the program so it is national in scope and covers everything in the country, this will defeat its purpose." Now, I understand it is intended to include the city of Montreal within the ambit of the program and it, along with cities like Toronto, was one that the minister was very vehement in saying could not be designated because that would defeat the purpose of the program. No one is opposed to incentive grants as such. No one is opposed to the principle of each job that provides employment, particularly new employment having a cost factor. But I think we have been given a lot of malarky over the last five or six years about the development of our industrial incentive program.

Originally, we decided we would designate areas that obviously could benefit greatly from secondary industry. Then, we developed the idea of slow growth areas. Now, we are saying that anyone who wants to build a factory, and who can meet the criteria, even if he is establishing in one of our major cities, will be able to take advantage of the program.

There is another matter that has concerned me with respect to the department. No doubt there have been a lot of personality problems. Originally, we established the Department of Industry, which has become the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with some of its responsibilities being transferred to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and during that time we drew together a body of people fully suited for the job that should be done. Many of them, however, have become dissatisfied, and a number of them have quit. There has been much transferring of personnel in both departments. Some of the blame for this should fall on Parliament itself. If we were able to develop the expertise, but were not able to get full value from the program, the value which we anticipated, part of the responsibility must fall on Parliament. For that reason, this kind of amending bill is not satisfactory. Sure, you give $12 million more. So what? Big deal! If we apply the incentive program to Montreal, so what? Big deal! If we apply it to South Shore and Cornwall—big deal! There is no suggestion that they should not get the advantage of it. Maybe every city and town in Canada should get that advantage. Maybe it should apply right across the board. I am not opposed to that, but I think that as a Parliament we should decide what we want to accomplish.

I think there are two things that people want in regional development. The first is that they wish to decentralize industry. They want to provide something for communities that are in a period of flux, whether they be one-time farm communities, or mining communities where the mining industry is defunct, or industrial areas where because of technological change there is great unemployment. Certainly, the industrial development program should aid such communities but, Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no advantage in moving people from one area to another area in which they will also find themselves unemployed, and where they will be unable to cope with their changed environment. People who are moved leave behind them assets that they and their parents spent a lifetime developing. They may move into a new area where they cannot be assimilated, and where they will incur fantastic expense to develop an equality, in the social amenities comparable with those which they had in the community they left.

Anyone who suggests that our present system, under which young people in the mid-Canada corridor are trained only to go to the city of Toronto to become displaced persons, to become the unemployed and the disadvantaged, is good must be pretty stupid. Yet that is what we are doing.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, even the Liberal party, undemocratic as it is—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Even the Liberal party, as indicated by the resolutions at its recent convention, was of the opinion that we must do something about Canadian ownership and Canadian direction of our industry. I say that is undemocratic, Mr. Speaker, because the convention does not relate to the Liberal cabinet benches. It does not relate to the backbenchers of the party when they stand up and vote, because they will vote as one voice. A backbencher in the Liberal party is only here to vote—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: I say that, Mr. Speaker, knowing full well as I look across at the Liberal benches that those members are just as smart as anybody else in the House; they are just as capable as anybody else in this House. They participate in committees and express the views of their constituents in those committees. They make suggestions in private that express the views of their constituents, but when they stand up in this House they vote exactly the way the cabinet wants them to do. They disregard their own points of view. They disregard the constituents they represent. As a result, Mr. Speaker, we are getting pretty poor legislation. One year ago we passed the main incentives Act. Now, we are amending it in some specifics. Mr. Speaker, we are interested in developing Canadian industry. We are interested in having control of our Canadian economy. I am quite sure most of my colleagues in this party will agree that they do not have all the answers. I do not think anybody has all the answers, but we should put our heads together and decide on ways to regain control of our economy.

This is not something which is held as desirable by one particular party or group. The Canadian public are in favour of achieving this, and they are looking to Parliament in order to get control of Canadian industrial development. One of the ways we can create industry is through the incentives Act. We are providing a carrot to industries to expand, to create employment, and we will provide the carrot almost any place.

The minister used a couple of examples in committee. I would like to refer to one of them, McCain Industries Ltd. The minister pointed out that McCain's does not need money. I am not sure why it does not need money. It is true that its plants and factories are fairly well developed. From my limited knowledge of New Brunswick, I think most of the development there has been by McCain Industries Limited. They have been well treated by that province but they are competent people and have done an excellent job. The company was faced with a decision about whether to move into the Boston market for frozen potato chips and they decided to do it. The government was involved in determining whether the plant to produce the potato chips should be established in the United States close to the market or in Canada. In this case, I think the incentive program worked as well as it has in any project. It has been explained that there was no reason why we should have had to pay these people that money because they were capable of getting it themselves, but I am not objecting to that. The resource was already there, so we were helping a secondary industry.

How can this minister, who is a provincialist and I suppose a nationalist, justify the decision taken in the province of Ontario to provide the maximum grant in two cases to Texas Gulf, an American corporation?

An hon. Member: Shameful.

Mr. Peters: This corporation has more money than the government of Canada. If Texas Gulf wanted to buy the government they probably could—in fact, they have and we are paying them for it. The Ontario government, rather belatedly, decided that the smelter was going to be established in Canada, period. They did not go so far as to say it was going to be in Ontario but anyone using their head would not see much sense in moving it to Manitoba—unless Manitoba was going to give an immense grant as well. So, we were going to have that smelter somewhere in Canada because Ontario passed a law which, in effect, said: "If you do not put it in Canada, you are not going to put it any place. This is our mineral and we have the right to make that decision."

We could have used that money for other purposes, Mr. Speaker. This company does not need it. A smelter is not a mine of course, and it is not a resource, but it is certainly related. Here was a wonderful opportunity for the minister to say, "We will participate and build your smelter; never mind the grant. We will build it provided we control it and own it or we will build half of it and get an equity in the plant because we are going to decide what to do with the material."

In Canada, we have control of all the nickel for the world through Sudbury. We have a smelter in Sudbury, and we could control most of the stainless steel of the world if we wished. We could control most of the fabrication involving nickel, which is expensive, in hundreds and hundreds of by-products. We could control this, Mr. Speaker, if we were willing to make the decision.

We will play around with this bill and pass it because the government members will feel that since cabinet introduced it they have to vote for it. Is it not time that we took a look at the over-all problem and decided we are going to put a similar smelter in the town of Cobalt, that it should be sufficiently developed so it can handle platinum and all the raw earth metals. It should be the only one in Canada because the minerals come from that area, then we will no longer need to send part of our raw material to Norway and other countries? Is it not time to make that decision? It is not a big decision that would cost immense amounts of money. I have no objection to free enterprise operating that plant. I am not particularly interested in extending the civil service into the field of industry but I think it is time we decided where the plant should be, what it should be and, in fact, whether it is going to be.

Until we make these decisions, Mr. Speaker, we are going to chase the donkey all over the country with the carrot. We are going to go to some very odd places and get some odd results, but we are not really deciding we are going to have Canadian industry rather than foreign controlled industries.

In the committee hearings my colleague from Oshawa-Whitby mentioned Turkey and everybody laughed about it. I presume I laughed, too, because I do not know what they are doing in Turkey but he mentioned that country had decided it wanted 49 per cent control of its industry. We were concerned about using Turkey as an example because we are not too familiar with it, so let us take a better example.

In the field of resources, Japan is dealing extensively with this country yet it says that foreign countries going into Japan must be controlled by the Japanese. They must think we are idiots in Canada because we give them full control of any of our natural resources and allow those resources to be taken out of the country and processed in Japan. This creates so many jobs in that country that they require one million more workers. If Canada wanted to export the unemployed for the next year or so, they could go to Japan. I am quite sure they would work out some arrangement with us for such a program because they need the workers. And what would they be working at, Mr. Speaker? At the raw material bought from Canada for almost nothing because we, as Canadians, do not have the brains to decide to develop it in our own country.

Mr. Peters: We are going to sell all our material to another country and then that country will ask our people to go over there and work in their secondary industries so that they can make a profit.

An hon. Member: Shame!

An hon. Member: And sell the product back to us.

Mr. Peters: Yes, and we will buy back the product. I am driving a Japanese car, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Peters: They will sell the nuts and bolts and things that we should manufacture.

An hon. Member: Why don't you buy a Canadian car?

Mr. Peters: There is no Canadian car, Mr. Speaker. You are stupid enough, Mr. Speaker, to think I should go out and buy a Canadian car—there is no such animal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Order. The Chair feels that perhaps the hon. member should rephrase that statement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree. You are not that stupid, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to you and I am not referring to the hon. member. Maybe it was an unfortunate word, but we do not seem to have the intelligence, Mr. Speaker, to realize that there is no Canadian car. We assemble cars here. The Volvo Company has a plant in the Maritimes. During the last election Liberals and Conservatives alike were screaming at me for driving a foreign car. This government supplied a lot of money for an assembly plant in Dartmouth to produce the Volvo I was driving. There is no such thing as a Canadian car, Mr. Speaker.

We could develop a Canadian car, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about that. Some very small countries have developed cars. We could develop one with a battery three times the size of the one in our cars now, because we need that. We could have the engine closed in at the bottom because of the snow, instead of the car that seems to be designed for Florida where there is no snow. We developed a snowmobile in this country which has proved excellent for recreation purposes. It has been great for industrial development, producing a number of plants employing a large number of people. But we have not produced a car, and yet we are one of the largest countries in the world and have a greater need for transportation. Transportation rates about the same as food and shelter in this country, yet we have not developed a car.

I suggest another bill will be introduced shortly, and I should like to see some major changes made. I should like to see this department abolished and the entire incentives program abolished.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And the minister, too.

Mr. Peters: I wish the government would again set up a department of industry. It ought to be divided into a number of subdepartments. The department of industry ought to be responsible at all times for the over-all development of industry in Canada. The subdepartments ought to be concerned about matters such as incentives. There ought to be a minister responsible for the Canadian content of goods manufactured. In that way, we could eventually decide how to regain control of our own industry and economy. Of course, the incentive program would allow us to gain control of our industry. We could introduce programs under which existing companies would carry on certain kinds of development. These companies have large amounts of accumulated capital. By writing in certain provisions into our income tax structure, we could make sure that they spend that money for the development of industry in those areas where that is necessary.

The new department would also exercise some control over transportation, both by road and by rail. I keep hearing that nobody can go ten miles north of Toronto, because the transportation costs are too great. Driving within the city limits of Toronto is quite an experience for me. I do not see how it can be any more expensive when you get ten miles north of Toronto—but that is neither here nor there. Every conference I have attended in northern Ontario has alluded to the problem of transportation. The minister responsible for the new department also ought to have some say in the development of transportation. He ought to control the means of transportation that are available to certain areas and, if necessary, subsidize the operation of that transportation. He should, in so many words, "equalize" it. The T. Eaton Company did this 50 years ago, as did Simpsons. If you live in Moosonee, on James Bay, you can order any item out of the catalogue and pay exactly the same price you would pay in Toronto. Those companies have, in a manner of speaking, equalized their transportation costs. On entering an Eaton store in Toronto, I have often been surprised at not seeing the merchandise advertised in the catalogue. Nevertheless, that company is able to sell merchandise from the catalogue for the same price in different areas. If they can equalize their cost for goods sold from the catalogue, why can we not do something like that?

That sort of thing has not been done elsewhere because every little company has tried to make its own deal with the railroads and the trucking companies. If we had a department of industry such as I suggest, it could look after the interests of all industry in Canada, and perhaps it could work out a formula to equalize distances in this country. Of course, research will have to be done. The department will need to exercise control in this matter and say how this can be done, where it can be done and who is to do it. It will need to do its work through the issuance of licences and the introduction of incentives. It will need to make grants, and perhaps it will need to do it under the aegis of public ownership. In many instances, the department will need to utilize the services of Crown corporations.

I know that some hon. members here are like a bunch of sheep.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Peters: They look on Crown corporations as socialist tools. Let me tell them that there are quite a few Crown corporations in Canada, and we have never had a socialist federal government. Look at Polymer Corporation. When the Conservatives were in power, they tried to give Polymer Corporation away. Why did they do that, Mr. Speaker? Because it was successful and because it was making money. By developing synthetic rubber products in Canada, we were able to create in Canada the expertise that made secondary industries utilizing synthetic rubber possible. All that stemmed from Polymer Corporation. It has proved its worth. It has not been a costly venture; yet it was a venture that nobody, but nobody, wanted to take over. In my opinion, what it developed would not have been developed by anyone else in Canada. I will not go into the background of what it did for the war effort of Canada and the United Nations. I do not have time.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Peters: The public is aware that Canada is in serious difficulty in terms of the direction which it should follow. We all know that when one of our companies wanted to sell trucks to Cuba—and we are dealing with Cuba—it could not, because the Canadian automobile manufacturer concerned was told by the directors of the parent company in the United States that there were to be no such sales. And why were there to be no such sales, Mr. Speaker? The parent company in the United States was afraid that if its Canadian subsidiary sold trucks to Cuba, the company would contravene the United States selling to the enemy act. The people of Canada were not fooled by this. They knew that the United States could stop the Ford Motor Company on this side of the border selling cars or trucks to Cuba. It is, therefore, obvious that the United States controls automobile production in Canada. It is true that we assemble and produce some vehicles as a result of the Canada-United States Automobile Agreement. Nevertheless, the important decisions are made in corporate boardrooms on the other side of the border.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, has some merit. It adds some money to the economy and extends the areas to be helped. The minister himself indicated, I think, that in some ways it is detrimental. Nevertheless, unemployment has spread. No longer is it contained in slow growth areas; it has spread to the major cities and we are attempting to fight it. I hope that we shall have an opportunity to examine these major problems when the bill goes to committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I feel a degree of sympathy for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) who is piloting this bill through the House. For a department such as his to be effective, there must be a degree of ministerial discretion. When a department has this discretion, it is subject to a good deal of criticism. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is different from the Department of National Revenue where everything is cut and dried. The Department of National Revenue is subject to legislation and regulations. In the event of an error, this can be easily cleared up by the courts.

I wish to draw some matters to the attention of the minister and the government. Incentives are a necessary part of regional economic expansion. On page two of the minister's news release, he outlines some of the principles he will endeavour to follow. The minister stated that there will be loan guarantees for money to establish new plants, as well as to expand and modernize existing plants in slow growth regions. He further stated that this will include some commercial operations that have not been considered before, such as providing convention, hotel and office facilities. This is all very well. However, with the diverse nature of the problems in this country, possibly too much emphasis is being put on industrialization. I suggest industrialization when necessary, but not necessarily industrialization.

Possibly industrialization incentives in areas such as Montreal, Hull and southeastern Ontario will be of some value, but in many areas of the Atlantic provinces where there is other potential, industry may not necessarily fill the role. The problems of Montreal and the problems of Newfoundland cannot be compared. To attempt to solve the problems of both these areas by industrialization might not work. I remember the time penicillin was discovered. It was certainly a great boon to mankind. It also benefited animals greatly. Although penicillin is very useful and effective when treating pneumonia and other infections, many amateur veterinarians administer penicillin to animals suffering from colic for which it is of no value. By primarily applying industrial incentives in this bill, the minister is acting in a similar manner to those who administer penicillin to treat every kind of problem.

The Minister has stated that Montreal, Hull and southeastern Ontario will become designated areas after the passage of this bill. I agree that these areas do have problems and may require assistance. But it was only a few months ago that a group from my area in Alberta wanted to start a rapeseed crushing plant in their community. God knows, Mr. Speaker, they need the support of additional industry, since people are leaving the farms and the economy is in great difficulty. This group formed an organization to pursue this idea, and it is still being pursued.

I went to the minister's department to try to get some help for them, and I made what I thought was a legitimate request for assistance. However, I was told that this group could not get any funds because their area had not been designated and there would be no redesignation until 1972. I pointed out to the department that the need was there, and asked them why it was not possible to make a redesignation at this time. The minister's department replied that it was not possible to make a redesignation. As a result I was very disappointed to see that the minister's department has been prepared to redesignate other areas in Canada at will but has totally written off my area in this regard.

A great deal has been said about incentives and measures to improve the economy. I suppose this regional development bill can be related to last week's budget which contained measures designed to help certain areas of Canada. However, the government has been responsible for creating a great many deterrents to improving the economy. One of the strongest deterrents is the government's white paper proposals on tax reform published last year. Not much mention is made of it at the present time, and very little mention was made of it in the budget speech.

Public reaction to these proposals across the country is one of the chief reasons for the government now attempting to stimulate the economy through other measures. In a great many areas that have an uncertain business climate, many businesses have alleged that their tax position would be such that they would be unable to operate. If we could eliminate what I might call the threat of a tax disaster hanging over the heads of businessmen today, then many of these measures in regard to regional economic incentives would not be required. The continuing depression of the thirties was not so much the result of a lack of money in the business community as a depressive psychology on the part of the people. I think the same condition exists today, and until we eliminate this depressive psychology all the regional incentives in the world will be of very little value in improving the economy.

A word now about increased incentives and plant capacity. In last week's budget, the mini-budget or whatever it is called, mention was made of improved capital cost allowances. Plant capacity in Canada in many areas is now over-extended, so it is very hard to see how these additional incentives will improve the economy.

One cannot participate in a debate like this without mentioning economies of which the government itself should be more conscious. Many members of the House have suggested that taxation should be reduced. At the same time, they say we should improve our social security measures. The government says we simply cannot have both, and to a degree I think they are right. However, the question of economy in government itself receives insufficient attention. This is something that tends to be ignored, yet it is one of the greatest leaks of taxpayers' money that we have. I suggest that taxes are one of the largest disincentives to business. This may not be a very popular thing to say, but if you do want to stimulate business I suggest that tax cuts at the lower income level are not necessarily the answer. In order to get industry and business moving forward you must grant them tax concessions.

I think another disincentive to business is the current rate of the Canadian dollar. Today we are not in a very good export position, though I do not think we were in a very good position anyway. I feel that if the dollar rate were brought down again, this would do a great deal to stimulate business activity.

It was announced last week that the oil situation in the United States, as far as Canada is concerned, had improved. Much was made of this and of what a terrific bargaining job we had done. However, I think most people realized that it was simply the way the political situation in the Middle East, in North Africa and the Arab countries had developed that brought this about. On the other hand, I think it is almost inevitable that export markets for oil in the United States will improve; that the United States will be willing to take all the energy that we can supply them. Only yesterday I read in the newspaper that some manufacturing plants in the U.S. will have to shut down this winter because the available energy will be required to supply homes with heat and light. As I say, sales of energy to the United States are inevitable, and in this regard we are in a tremendous bargaining position.

If the United States is in trouble in regard to supply of energy, then it is up to us to negotiate with them about bringing manufacturing industries to Canada, and particularly to western Canada where there reside great resources of energy, such as natural gas and coal. It would be far more economical to establish industries in this kind of environment, in areas where they would not compete with homes for energy supplies. This is an area that to date we have not—I do not want to use the word exploited, because I am sure that is not the way most of us think of this—taken our bargaining position in relation to the supply of energy seriously.

One of the major problems in respect of industry in Canada is low productivity. It seems that labour negotiations will never become simple in this country. We are to be faced with continued labour strikes. Union management consider business management as their enemies, and they feel they must take advantage to the greatest extent possible. I suggest that labour should have a piece of the action because there is nothing more depressing to an individual than to work in a factory at a forge or a punch press for 10 or 20 years. Nothing will result but despair and a revolt against the system.

If we are going to make everyone feel a part of Canada and ready to go ahead, we must incorporate some kind of incentive. This may have to be initiated by the government. Factory workers must have a part of the action. They should have the opportunity to participate in ownership rather than just profit-sharing. Profit-sharing is a good idea, but in order to involve these people I believe they should become shareholders. This is one area of an incentive program the government should not overlook. Perhaps this suggestion does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, but if we intend to continue the free enterprise system we must see that the factory workers, who are inclined to become disenchanted over the years, get part of the action. Otherwise, this system we treasure so much will not last.

Like so many other members, I have been disappointed in the role the agricultural industry has had to play in the development of our economy. There is very little mention of this area of our economy in the white paper on taxation. Certainly, there are no concessions given to agriculture. The program outlined by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board indicates there will be some payments made to western farmers and farmers in general. This amounts to some $100 million. There has been some suggestion that part of this money would be made available as a result of the rescinding of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. The minister has said we are not going to be storing as much grain, and that this storage will be reduced to about 250 million bushels. During the question period this morning, it was indicated that this would be about 300 million bushels less than the western storage capability, which is 400 million bushels, plus 150 million bushels in the terminals.

When we calculate this reduction in terms of dollars, we find that the farmers will actually be storing some 300 million bushels that will not be in the elevator system. They will not be paid for the 300 million bushels of grain. This will result in farmers having to borrow from the banks and other financial institutions. There should be some compensation in this regard, otherwise the farmers who are now in almost a bankrupt state will not be able to exist for another year.

The minister has pointed out that this deficiency will be offset to some extent by the production of barley and rapeseed, but this will not begin to fill the gap. The Lift program was supposed to put $140 million into the western economy. The last figures I have indicate that only $27 million has actually been paid to the farmers. Indications are that this will not be increased to any meaningful extent and this will cause a great deal of dissension across the country. The figures published by newspapers throughout Canada have indicated that the agricultural industry in western Canada is receiving $140 million under the Lift program and $100 million as a grant because of the rescinding of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Most of the people in the country feel that western farmers are receiving a great deal of money, but the actual recipients know that the amount they are receiving is perhaps 25 per cent of the amount publicized in the newspapers. This is a very disappointing and destructive situation to those farmers in the west.

In southern Alberta, we have a designated area which includes Medicine Hat in the riding of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). Approximately a month ago, the city of Red Deer sent a brief to the minister's office. A supporting brief was received from the town of Stettler. A comparison study was made in relation to the designation of Medicine Hat and the situation existing in Red Deer. The conclusion was that, if anything, Medicine Hat was better off than the undesignated areas. It is painful for me to say this, but I cannot help, but feel there is favouritism in respect of designation.

I do not wish to go on at length, Mr. Speaker, but I must draw attention to the fact that under the Regional Development Incentives Act the program has, as of September 30, 1970, produced an estimated 13,700 jobs at a cost of approximately $80 million. This works out to about $21,000 per job. I do not believe all the jobs created under this program will prove to be permanent. That is a high price to pay for so few jobs. If you relate the 13,700 to the present number of unemployed people, now in the neighbourhood of 500,000 to the cost under this program so far, we would have to provide another $20 billion in order to have full employment. That huge amount of money would help only about two-thirds of our present unemployed. So, it would be impractical to say that we could really supply jobs and help everyone equitably through this department. I suggest we must look at these other areas which I named and bring about a special climate in which we would alleviate the burden imposed through taxation on the business communities. We should look at incentives from other areas rather than through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. We should assess the whole scene in this manner, and then I think we might see the economy go ahead.

• (2:30 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for South Western Nova.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Merci, monsieur l'Orateur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comeau: I have a couple of friends, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: There are more than two, Louis.

Mr. Comeau: I hope so. Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in this bill because this is really the first opportunity Parliament has had to assess what has taken place in respect of regional development, and the policies and activities of this department within the regions. It is also our first opportunity to analyse the affect the department is having in particular areas of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, some say the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has been given somewhat excessive powers. When the department was established, it was said that a little too much dictatorial power had been vested in him.

I completely disagree with that assertion. Considering the work he has accomplished since the department was set up two years ago, it can be seen that the minister does not have enough power, since he does not have sufficient authority to tell his colleagues in the Cabinet that some of their projects defeat the purposes of his department.

[English]

I think he should have a bit more power, because if he had a little more power he would be in a position to advise the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in respect of inflation policies. He would be in a position to tell the other departments to stop fiddling around with what he is trying to do. Then, he would really be able to do a job in carrying out the objectives of his department.

People ask me what I think of the minister's department. Quite frankly, I do not have too many criticisms, other than the one I have just made. However, I believe it is a valid criticism. I tell people that the department provides a good deal of money to the manufacturing industries, but that really I cannot see any real progress being made. This is the complaint I have. The department does provide a good deal of money and does help industries in the sense that it provides loans and so on, but it really has not done its job in respect of some particular regions of Canada. I can speak for the Atlantic region because it is my area. The department really does not do much to help this area. It is my understanding that one objective of the department is to help this particular area.

[Translation]

I take this opportunity to congratulate the minister. He has created jobs, he has helped industry. But the fact remains that his department is much more concerned with lending money to industry than with trying to solve the problems of the various areas of Canada.

[English]

I am very pleased to see the clause relating to small businesses, because one complaint has been that small businesses have not been able to borrow money in the amounts they require. While they might have a legitimate reason to borrow, they have not been in a position to obtain, for example, $2,000 or perhaps $5,000. Small businesses sometimes need to be able to obtain a few thousand dollars. Under the present industrial incentives Act, the minimum amount which an older business may borrow for remodelling purposes is $30,000. I do not know, but as I read the minister's statement it would appear that the new act will be of some assistance to the tourist industry. I cite the remarks of the minister as recorded at page 1926 of Hansard for December 10:

> We will now be required by the act to define the areas where the establishment or large commercial concerns can contribute considerably to the economic expansion of slow growth areas. For instance, this could mean administration buildings, stores, convention centres and hotels.

I take that to mean that the department is now willing to provide grants and loans to the tourist industry. I compliment the department and the minister upon that decision because the Atlantic provinces particularly—Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and New Brunswick—can really do something in the field of tourism. Therefore, it is important for the department to take into consideration the fact that this is an industry which requires assistance. Assistance in this form would provide employment and help the areas concerned. It is interesting to note that when the present act came into operation a year and a half ago, one of the things we suggested was that tourism was an industry and, therefore, should be helped in the same manner as the manufacturing industry is helped.

The complaint I have about the department is that it does not have a regional policy but appears to have a national development policy. As was pointed out by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and others in our party, it is my view that the department should really be concerned about assessing the needs of the various regions. Then, it would be in a position to provide loans and grants to particular regions. In this way, those regions would benefit and become viable.

Mr. McGrath: Give us back the Atlantic Development Board.

Mr. Comeau: I will talk about the Atlantic Development Board in a minute. It was a very good thing. The department, so far as I am concerned, is no longer the guardian of the designated areas or of the so-called have-not provinces. It has now become a department which is taking over the job of the finance department by trying to provide a reasonable standard of living in all parts of Canada. The Department of Regional Ecomonic Expansion, as I said in French a while ago, has no control over the spending of other departments. For example, it has no control over what the Department of Finance does. The Department of Finance has created, through its policies, the present economic climate in Canada. It is through the policies of the government that we have this high rate of unemployment at present. Therefore, if there is unemployment in certain areas of the country, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should bring this to the attention of the Department of Finance and suggest to the latter that certain policies be avoided in the areas which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is trying to help.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Again, I want to refer to the Atlantic provinces. I suggest that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should consider the fishing industry there, and should not merely rely on the Department of Fisheries and Forestry to establish the correct policy for that industry but should advise this department as well as the Department of Public Works on the proper programs to develop that industry. If, for example, the Department of Fisheries and Forestry and the Department of Public Works are not providing the necessary facilities or do not have the right type of policy to promote that industry then, to my mind, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, as guardians of regional development should tell them so. This is what I would like the department to do.

This department should also advise the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources about the Bay of Fundy tides project to which reference has been made previously. If the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) feels that this is a good project, and that it will help out the area, then I think it is his duty to advise the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) to provide the necessary funds for it. I do not think any department should be allowed to cut back on any projects that will help a region which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is trying to assist.

Not too long ago a motion was debated which dealt with the development of marine resources. I spoke on it as did others. The motion was presented by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). This idea has great potential for helping the development of the Atlantic provinces. There is no reason for us to admit that the only resource we can obtain from the seas around the Atlantic provinces is fish because now we are doing some drilling for oil and gas. Therefore, the department should promote research and exploration of these avenues to make these provinces viable. It is not sufficient for the department to simply say they want to lend some money to industry and thus provide employment. It has to look at what the other departments are doing, assess the situation, and advise other departments what they should do in the different regions in Canada.

There is a specific reason for naming this department the Department of Regional Econom c Expansion. It should assess the situation in the various regions and decide what should be done for them, as well as suggest to other departments of the government what projects should be undertaken in order to help these regions to develop. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is not just a lending agency to manufacturing industry. To my mind, it should have sufficient expertise to assess the situation in various regions and work out appropriate programs for them.

Let us consider, for example, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce wh ch is responsible for industry and for all commercial activities in Canada. What has it done for shipbuilding? Of course, the minister will say that he provided some subsidies for shipbuilding. Why is the Department of Regional Econom c Expansion not saying that in the Atlantic provinces and on the west coast we should build ships and establish an effective Canadian merchant marine to operate in our coastal waters? This would provide employment and is what I would like the department to do.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion should also advise the Department of Transport with regard to the provision of proper transportation facilities in certain areas which lack them, because transportation is probably the most important single factor in the development of our regions. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion should be able to tell the Department of Transport that proper transportation facilities at competitive rates are absolutely necessary if a region is to be helped.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comeau: I am sorry to be referring continuously to the Atlantic area but that is the area I know best. At one time we had the Atlantic Development Board. Although it did not do marvels, after this department was established it should have taken advantage of the expertise which the board had developed over a period of time. The Atlantic Development Board did not have the answers to all questions, but the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should have provided some policies to replace those of the board which was designed to help those provinces.

[Mr. Comeau.]

Some regions used to be able to obtain grants for such projects as highway construction, sewerage, and so on. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was supposed to carry out projects which the Atlantic Development Board, ARDA and other agencies had recommended. I honestly believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has given up completely on the Atlantic Provinces. I think he knows that there are 25 seats out of 32 which are held by Progressive Conservatives, and he does not see how he is going to change that. Therefore, he has given up completely on that region.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Perrault: That is not true. This is a non-partisan government.

Mr. Comeau: What else can I believe? The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was supposed to do the job. How did this department come to be established? During the 1968 election campaign, the Prime Minister made a promise to the Atlantic area that he had all the answers, and after a few months this department was established.

Still, Mr. Speaker, I am not against the department. As I have said, I have some reservations about certain things in connection with it, but really it is not doing anything for the Atlantic provinces which it is not doing for other regions. The minister is shaking his head. It is absolutely true, Mr. Speaker. A little time ago I complimen ed him, but he was reading something and did not hear me. I did say that his department, by providing money—

Mr. Perrault: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comeau: —was trying to create jobs, but that really I had expected something great from the department. A bank can lend money. Any financial institution can lend money. I thought that with the Kents, and all these other great gentlemen, they were going to come up with something special for particular areas.

Mr. Perrault: You just wait.

Mr. Comeau: The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) says wait.

Mr. McGrath: Why isn't Vancouver designated?

Mr. Comeau: It may not be too long before British Columbia is also designated. In effect, that is what the hon. member is saying. If you have a department that is supposed to look after regional disparities, and it does not provide the necessary incentives for a particular region, then there is no use in having that department. I am not against designating Montreal or Toronto, but if you provide the same incentives to Montreal as to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, then holy smoke, Mr. Speaker, where do you think industry is going to go? I admit that there is a difference in the level of incentives, and I think the minister is to be congratulated in that respect. The incentives in these two cases are not exactly the same.

but the question must be asked, is the difference in the incentives really large enough to attract industry to certain parts of the country as compared with, let us say, Montreal?

As I stated before, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is not looking at other departments and telling them exactly—

Mr. Perrault: The way it is.

Mr. Comeau: —the way it is. I thank the hon. member. It should tell them, "What you are doing is not right. You should look at things this way." It should do this with the Department of Transport, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Public Works.

With respect to the Department of Public Works, we have been trying to have a little wharf built in my area at a cost of $60,000, but that department tells me it is not economically feasible. For what more can the people living there ask? They don't need a cotton factory or a car factory; they need a wharf. If the Department of Regional Economic Expansion does not tell the Department of Public Works that a wharf is needed in the area, then we will not get it. I have written to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion several times requesting it to impress on other departments what they should do.

What about the relationship of this department with the Department of Manpower? That department says it is going to retrain people. What is the use of training people if you don't have jobs for them after they are trained?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Comeau: The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was supposed to be the minister with the greatest power in the country. It was said that he was really in charge of things. He is not really in charge of things because he has not been dealing with the other departments, at least to my satisfaction.

Mr. Perrault: You're hard to satisfy.

Mr. Comeau: This amending bill will not hinder anything, but the minister should look again at the title of his department. He ought to apply regional policies to particular regions of Canada.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to assure the minister that I am not going to ask for any wharves in Alberta. However, I do have some experience with the regional economic expansion program. In my riding we have a portion of the designated area in Alberta, and a portion of the special area in Alberta, as well as a large ARDA area. I have also had experience with the former AIDA program, because two of the areas designated under that program were in my riding. So, over the last two and a half years I have gained some knowledge of how the incentive programs have functioned and the effect which they have had.

I was not present to hear all of the speech of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey), but I would like to start mine by congratulating the minister on the very large grant announced yesterday for the province of Alberta, one of the largest to date in Canada, some $12 million for the construction of a pulp mill, Alberta's second pulp mill, near the city of Grand Prairie. This is a very clear indication of the fact that the department is cognizant of the needs of the various areas of the country.

I am not about to criticize the amendments to the act proposed in this bill. I recognize that basically they are designed to deal with the serious problem of unemployment, and that all regions are not going to benefit equally from them. I am heartened to see that the greatest benefits will go to the areas of highest unemployment, and that is exactly as it should be.

It would be unreasonable, unfair and downright foolish of us to expect that every area should benefit equally, and that those areas which have the least problem with unemployment should get as much as those that have bigger unemployment problems. I understand that under the amendments Alberta may not get as much as the Maritime provinces or Quebec, but the fact that a $12 million grant was announced for Alberta within the last few hours shows the department makes no differentiation between the areas getting grants.

I want to deal briefly with the way in which the incentives program has operated in Canada during the last few years. In concluding I should like to make three points regarding this system and the way it should operate in the future, suggesting a changed system which in my opinion would be more effective and much better in the long run. In the Crowsnest pass area of my riding certain industries were given grants as well as tax concessions and tax holidays. As a result of these considerations, industries established in areas which were depressed at that time, were there was a high rate of unemployment and were there may have been a very low, non-farm income.

When coal was "king" this was a very bustling area of Alberta, supplying the railways with fuel. However, with the demise of the coal industry the Crowsnest pass area suffered very serious unemployment and was designated. As a result, a number of industries received grants and tax concessions enabling them to establish manufacturing plants in the area. Because housing was scarce and the infrastructure required for industry was not adequate, these industries ran into difficulties. In the last few months one industry has terminated its operation and is moving its plant to Calgary.

The net result of this, Mr. Speaker, is that the expenditure of the taxpayers' money on this particular industry was unwise and unprofitable. It may have employed a few people but it did not provide any rejuvenation of the economy.

The only rejuvenation that did take place was through the revival of the coal industry and not because a few industries were enticed into the area under the incentives program. This is a good indication of why the program was changed about a year ago and why the tax concession provisions were removed and the outright grants provisions made more generous. Rather than getting a maximum of $5 million, today an industry can get as much as $12 million for establishing a plant in a designated or special area.

Under the new system it is possible for the government to provide for the creation of the infrastructure necessary to support industry. If this infrastructure is properly created, then naturally the industries established are more likely to survive and be of long-term benefit to the community. I believe that areas such as the Crowsnest pass which have received assistance only to find that industry could not survive because of lack of infrastructure should be looked at again and redesignated as special areas. In this way they could qualify for assistance in the development of the infrastructure—municipal services, road construction, housing and anything that is necessary to ensure that a labour force will be available.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Crowsnest pass area should be reconsidered and redesignated as a special area so that existing industries can function smoothly and new industry be encouraged. Since the area was again designated about a year and a half ago, not a single new industry has been established, and I do not know of any that have made inquiries. It is not grants or incentives alone which encourage an industry to establish in an area: I believe infrastructure is necessary to ensure that industry will establish itself in areas where it is required.

Another aspect of the regional development program is that it is a remedial measure. We have not taken steps to ensure adequate employment in all areas of Canada. We have not taken steps to ensure sufficient diversification of industry. It is sufficient in Toronto, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Montreal—but these are not problem areas. The problem areas are smaller communities, communities in the Maritime provinces. One thing that these communities have in common is their dependence upon a natural resource. They are usually dependent upon only one large plant or perhaps several plants which depend on the same natural resource.

If this resource is depleted or there is not sufficient demand for it, the area goes into a depression and unemployment results. The government then has to come along and patch up the wounded area, so it becomes a remedial action. Rather than allowing this cycle of prosperity and depression to repeat itself, I suggest that we should take preventive steps. If we could ensure diversification, if one area of the economy is depressed perhaps other areas could take up the slack.

One of the best examples, Mr. Speaker, is the area I represent. There are two great coal mining areas in Canada, one in Nova Scotia and the other in the riding of Rocky Mountain. Alberta has 50.7 per cent of the nation's coal reserves, and 25 to 30 per cent of these are in the Rocky Mountain region. For many years the Crowsnest pass area southwest of Edson provided a large portion of the coal in western Canada and many thriving communities were established. Miners from all over the world came to work in the mines, and we have communities where the population was drawn from 50 or 60 nations. The coal mining industry, as I have said, went into a depression. Then other industries were given incentives to establish in the area and improve employment opportunities. That was done with some degree of success.

[Mr. Sulatycky.]

The coal industry has now revived and it is apparent that we did not need to take some of the steps that were taken a few years ago. Instead of allowing areas such as this one 25 years ago to remain totally dependent upon the coal industry, it would have been better had we provided incentives for other industries to establish there. The same remarks apply equally to Cape Breton. If 20 or 25 years ago secondary industry had been established there, that area would not have suffered the difficulties it has suffered during intervening years.

I have looked with interest at a study concerning new Canadian towns on what is termed "Canada's resource frontier." These are communities which depend upon one resource for their livelihood. They are to be found in all provinces. As a matter of fact, 148 such communities are listed. They include places like Corner Brook, Glace Bay, New Waterford, Sydney Mines, Elliot Lake, Uranium City, Lynn Lake, Sherridon, Powell River, Ocean Falls and Port Alice, each of which relies upon a single industry. Some of these towns that were tied to a single industry are either dead or dying: the others will suffer the same fate unless we make our regional incentives program preventive rather than remedial in nature. If that is done, some of these communities may be saved. If it is not done, we shall go through the same process of giving industries incentives to establish in certain areas because those areas will be suffering from a depression brought on because resource industries in the area have gone out of business.

In my riding there are several new communities. The outstanding new community is the town of Grande Cache. It was established to serve the coal mines recently opened by McIntyre-Porcupine. That company is supplying millions of tons of coal each year to the Japanese steel industry. There are about 4,000 people in this area. Three years ago there was nothing there; it was wilderness. The town depends totally on the one coal mine. It is a very beautiful town, beautifully situated, and its people have invested a great deal of money in it. It contains many progressive businesses and has some fine public buildings. There are adequate recreational facilities.

All the same, it is certain that if this town is allowed to depend solely upon the coal mining industry, sooner or later we shall need to establish some sort of incentive program to bring new industry into the town, because the coal industry will by then be either dead or dying. I think this illustrates the sort of approach we should be taking to regional expansion in Canada. Such an approach will perhaps require a period of evolution. We have begun with a different approach, but I hope that eventually we shall look upon our regional economic expansion program as preventive rather than remedial.

I suggest that the best way of doing this is not by introducing a system of incentives but by introducing a system of disincentives. We should determine the areas in which we wish industry to locate and we should designate those areas in which we wish to discourage the location of industry. I suppose the best way of doing this would be through a form of punitive taxation; we should penalize industries which locate in areas where we believe there is an overconcentration of industry, areas such as those in and around the Great Lakes. We should impose punitive taxes to make sure that industries do not establish in areas where we do not want them. There should be a scale of punitive taxes which would encourage industries to locate in areas where taxes are lower. The result would be that industry would tend to locate in areas of lower taxation. The industry concerned would itself make the choice. For example, if there were a disincentive for industry to locate in and around the Great Lakes, industry might go to Montreal, Vancouver or somewhere else. The industry itself would make the choice; we should not tell it where to go. Thereby, the areas which are most suitable for development would be developed.

I sympathize deeply with my colleagues who insist that we are not doing enough in the Atlantic provinces, for example. But perhaps not much more could be done. If we had a program of disincentives and allowed industry to choose whether it should establish in Alberta or Nova Scotia, and if under such a program an industry chose Alberta, it would be evident that Alberta was the more logical location for the industry because it had made the choice itself and had not been forced to go there.

Tied in with such a program there would have to be a more sophisticated and generous program involving the mobility of labour. No doubt there are areas to which industries just will not go. The result is that the people in those areas will be unemployed; there will be no work for them. We shall therefore have to make sure that the people move. As a result, in those cases we must provide allowances which are much more generous than those now provided. Of course, after people have moved and become acclimatized to new areas, we will hear fewer demands of the sort now being made by many people who find themselves in economically depressed regions.

The immobility of labour is a very real problem and adds to our unemployment. Recently I was talking to a number of mine managers in my riding. I discussed with them the possibility of shipping coal from Alberta and eastern British Columbia to eastern Canada. At present most of the coal used in eastern Canada comes from the eastern United States. I was also talking about shipping coal to Europe, because Europe is facing a coal shortage. The steel mills of Europe want our coal and without doubt they will buy it in future.

I said to these people who manage a number of mines, "Are you doing anything about selling coal in Europe and eastern Canada?" They said, "We would like to, but we cannot. We cannot mine enough coal; we do not have enough miners." In that area there is a shortage of miners; the mines have had to obtain people from Korea, Japan, Czechoslovakia, Britain and other parts of the world. This has been necessary because we cannot get Canadian miners to work there, despite very good conditions and the highest wage rate paid in Canadian coal mines. This indicates that we must re-think our position with regard to mobility of labour and regional incentives. We must rationalize the whole structure to make sure that we do not create a continuous cycle of depressed and distressed areas which require federal and provincial assistance through programs such as we are studying today. I hope that eventually our regional economic expansion program will evolve to this point.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question? Will the hon. member tell the House whether in his opinion the information as to the need for additional workers in his area is well known in the rest of Canada—for instance, in eastern Ontario?

Mr. Sulatycky: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the need for workers is well known. There is a crying need for experienced underground miners. I presume that Canada Manpower centres are seeking people for areas in which there is underground mining activity. In eastern Ontario there is not that kind of activity and perhaps the need may not be known.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride), I think it would be wiser if the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) did not take anything for granted. He should contact the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) to make sure that he knows about this problem. In a country as large and as varied as Canada, the minister may not know all the problems. In this case I suggest that the member contact the minister directly. This morning the Minister of Manpower and Immigration dealt with the matter of unemployment. He referred to a "better unemployment picture." The only better picture would be that of no unemployment. Perhaps the minister has coined a new phrase. Most unemployment is of the worst kind and I suggest the minister should consider it in this sense.

The problem of unemployment in Saskatchewan is very bad. In this morning's Globe and Mail I read an article dealing with Christmas shopping. The article stated that most of Canada would be in the same position as last year with regard to Christmas shopping but that Saskatchewan retail sales would decrease by 5 per cent. I think this indicates the situation in that province with regard to unemployment and the tightness of cash. I suggest that Saskatchewan suffers the worst kind of unemployment.

I wish to point out to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) that if some of the problems of the basic industries in this country were solved, the problem of unemployment would automatically be solved. In this way there would not be such a strain upon the minister and his department. I suggest that he get together with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board in order to solve some of our basic problems. If some of these problems were solved, there would not be as much unemployment nor as great a need for regional development in the province of Saskatchewan.

I am not sure why the area I represent does not qualify for aid under the regional development program. Geography alone should not determine whether an area is in need. A town, community or industry within a geographic area may have a very definite need for assistance or incentive program. The constituency of Battleford-Kindersley does not qualify for assistance because it is not in the region of the minister; we have to deal with our problems on another basis. There was the possibility of a vegetable-oil plant being built by a co-operative in North Battleford. When discussing this matter with the director of the co-operative, he informed me that a regional development or incentive grant would be of importance and would have a bearing on where the plant was built. I do not think that Saskatoon has a greater employment need than North Battleford. Is it suggested that people in North Battleford who are seeking employment should move to Saskatoon because it has been designated under the regional incentives program? I do not think that makes good sense.

If an industry wishes to settle in a particular area because of its proximity to the market or something of that nature, it should be given consideration. It take issue with the section of the regional development plan which deals with this matter. The minister has already changed his mind with regard to some areas. Saskatoon and Regina are now designated areas. There has been no change with regard to the area that I represent. Perhaps politically we are not important enough, or the industry in that area is not important. Perhaps as a Member of Parliament I have not been making enough noise. If this is the case, my constituents have reason to complain.

I do not think the approach to solving these problems is adequate. I intend to deal with some aspects of the bill. It refers to the fact that those involved in the tourist industry may borrow money for that purpose. This does not apply to my area because it is not included in the regional incentives program. I do not think there is too much need for the government to erect buildings for tourists. If we had enough tourists in that area we could build the necessary hotels and motels. The primary reason for the slump in the tourist industry in the Prairies is the economy. This is an industry that should be considered for regional development. Frequently the areas that do not have industry are able to attract tourists.

I recall visiting the constituency of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) south of Quebec City. The hon. member stated that a park should be built in the hills and mountains. It appeared that part of his riding would not be good for anything else. All the cattle were getting was exercise because there was not enough grass on the land. As a person travelling in that constituency, I felt it was a fair tourist attraction. This is true of other areas that are not rich in industry.

The rural area of my constituency has some of the best farmland in Saskatchewan. In addition, there are two oil fields. Many city dwellers have not seen farming country and oil fields. This would be of interest to them. Promotion of the tourist industry in this area should be encouraged. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce should promote a program to see Canada first, or at least part of it. I have talked to many people in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal who hardly know that Western Canada exists, let alone having seen it. I suggest there is much to see in western Canada.

I further suggest that the federal government, and particularly the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, promote the tourist industry throughout Canada much more than they have hitherto, in the interest of national unity if for no other reason. In newspapers like the Globe and Mail and other rich metropolitan dailies you see ads saying, "Come to the Caribbean", "Come to Miami", "Come to Europe". These ads are placed by Air Canada and declare, "Come fly away with us'. A package price is quoted for a tour. I should like to know whether Air Canada realize, when they encourage people to see things in Europe, that in fact they are importing unemployment. If they were to encourage residents of Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa to fly to British Columbia or somewhere else in western Canada, not only would Air Canada receive the air fare but they would put a few dollars in the pockets of Canadian tourist operators.

In this House there are several B.C. members who are very definitely tourist promoters. I observe the two hon. members across the way who have reached the ultimate in tourist promotion because I have heard them talk of the glories of B.C. But what have the departments of tourism of the governments of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia done to advertise the virtues of their respective provinces and to attract well-to-do tourists in eastern Canada who now holiday in Europe or some other country? I am not "knocking" a trip to Europe; indeed I would not mind one myself. But I suggest that many people who now go to Europe would visit western Canada if it were drawn to their attention that there were worth-while things to see there. I would challenge the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault and the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) to—

Mr. Pringle: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question at this point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member might permit a question, but the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) would have to ask it while in his seat.

Mr. Thomson: I shall talk for a moment or two more to give the hon. member time to resume his seat, when I should be happy to receive his question.

Mr. Perrault: Would the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. Thomson: Yes.

Mr. Perrault: Has the hon. member been out to beautiful British Columbia?

Mr. Thomson: Yes, several times.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomson: Furthermore, I hope to go again. There is quite a bit of B.C. that I have not yet seen, but what I have seen as a tourist I would recommend to anyone in the city of Ottawa, in eastern Canada or wherever it may be. I would also recommend the virtues of the Prairie provinces which are distinctly different from those of this area. As I say, I think the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should do a little more to promote tourism in Canada. May I make just a few comments about the responsibility of the Prairie governments in this regard. Such bodies as boards of trade and the tourist operators in the four western provinces have not done as much to promote tourism as they could. After all, why should the federal government be solely responsible for tourist promotion when, hopefully, these people themselves stand to gain from such promotion?

I have also been astounded at the ease with which some of the people who work in the House of Commons make the decision to go to Europe on holiday, or fly to Spain. Secretaries who work in this House, and wives of members go; and, if they are not too busy, even members occasionally go. Clerks, nurses, civil servants and all kinds of people in Ottawa fly on holiday to Europe. I think a great many of them could afford to see Canada first.

I should just like to make one last point. I see that the minister in charge of northern affairs is in the House. I recommend to him that in the interest of the people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories he promote tourism in the north. I have travelled in some northern areas and have been quite fascinated by some of the things I have seen there. It may be that in some of these areas a more hardy type of tourist is called for; but those who have never seen the north will find it very interesting, with its icebergs, polar bears, seals on ice and some 10,000 lakes. I do not think most of us realize how much there is to see.

I suggest it is high time we explored this idea. By doing so, hopefully we might solve the problems of some of those who live in outlying areas who do not benefit from employment or industry yet need the means to make a living. They could at least make some sort of living out of a tourist industry.

Mr. Walker: May I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Thomson: Yes.

Mr. Walker: Does the hon. member feel it would be helpful, in order to achieve some of the objectives to which he has referred today, if a publicly-owned railway had special rates for Canadians who travelled at least to provinces beyond their own in order to see Canada?

Mr. Thomson: I would not like to say at this point. But whether it be a publicly-owned railroad, a privately-owned railroad, Air Canada, CP Air, or what-have-you, there should be more tourist promotion in Canada and the people of Canada should be told of the things to be seen and enjoyed in this country. There is much to be seen in Canada. I thank the hon. member for his suggestion.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to the debate on this bill dealing with regional development incentives. My area is vitally involved with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and already in my constituency two or three incentive grants have been made. Having listened to the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) I thought we were debating the estimates of the department of tourism until I realized there is no such department in the federal government. However, let me tell him that I hope he will not sell the province of Saskatchewan short, because it is a great province. I lived there for a few years. I think everyone should see the Prairies and the western provinces, especially at harvest time when that part of the country is unsurpassed for beauty; and the people there make it that much better.

The special incentives in this bill are a temporary measure and affect the southwestern part of the province of Quebec and the southeastern part of Ontario. The incentives in these areas are at a lower level than those in the rest of the country, which I think is in keeping with the need to bring industry into this area. Industry tends to establish itself in the Montreal area and along the St. Lawrence because the sales potential there is large. One important feature of this legislation is that the department is developing a certain flexibility. It is bringing in legislation as needed and the legislation the department does have on the books is becoming more flexible. The criticism we always hear in northern Ontario when grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act are compared with those under the Ontario Development Corporation is that incentives are available primarily to manufacturing industries and not to processing and other industries such as mining and tourism.

Of course, this bill does not provide for incentives or assistance to the mining industry but it does provide for a broadened system of loan guarantees which would be available to projects such as convention centres, hospitals, office buildings, company headquarters and shopping facilities. In northern Ontario we will consider this a benefit because we have some of the best tourist areas in the country and the development of facilities to accommodate tourists is sadly lacking but highly desirable.

Where there is a narrow economic base of industry concentrated around the products of mining and forestry, a broadened tourist industry is highly desirable. The bill before us this afternoon will provide guarantees for loans to this type of industry. Another important aspect is that loan guarantees will be available to manufacturing industries. This is very important. Even when a company is establishing in one of the designated areas and is able to raise the required 20 per cent equity, the federal government will able to make a grant of up to 15 per cent, 20 per cent or 25 per cent of the capital required but there is still a problem in obtaining the rest of the funds. This has to be done through the Industrial Development Bank or other lenders, including commercial banks. The bill before us will give the Department of Regional Economic Expansion the power to guarantee loans. I understand it will be able to guarantee half of the equity which now must be raised by commercial loans.

Another aspect of this program which is particularly interesting is that the ceiling will be removed in respect of grants made by the department. At the present time the ceiling is $12 million. Some people might ask why it is necessary to remove the ceiling when grants up to $12 million are now available. We are trying to encourage the pulp and paper industry to establish mills in various areas. A very large mill capable of producing 1,000 tons of pulp per day would employ 600 or 700 people. Under the existing legislation there is provision to make grants only in respect of industries employing up to 400 people. The maximum figure of $30,000 per job created means that an industry which otherwise might qualify for $15 million or $18 million, because of the magnitude of the expenditure, perhaps up to $100 million, would not receive a loan. The present ceiling prevents such a company receiving what it might be eligible to receive if it were a smaller company.

I understand this bill will extend to 18 months the time limit in which the companies have to bring the enterprise into production. I know of one case where a company took almost a year to line up the necessary capital and had difficulty getting within the 12-month limit which now exists. The extension of the time limit to 18 months will be of great benefit. I believe the department should extend the benefits and grants to pulp and paper companies. In many areas of the country where we are trying to encourage secondary industry we are not as successful as we might be. The pulp and paper industry provides good jobs with good wages, and in many cases it is possible to increase employment. If we extended grants for new plants and for expansion of existing plants in the pulp and paper industry, we would create hundreds of new jobs in many areas of northern Ontario. I hope the government will consider making these grants available in this way.

I understand that the existing legislation for the designation of special areas can accommodate this type of guarantee, but it is very difficult for large companies planning huge expenditures to guess whether the department is going to declare an area to be a special area. At a later stage there should be provision for the department to extend the program to cover the infra-structure of gas pipeline companies. In many areas we have difficulty attracting secondary industry because we do not have utilities such as natural gas. Certain types of industries such as the pulp and paper industry, plywood mills and mining companies, will not establish in areas where there is not natural gas.

Although this bill does not contain all the provisions I would like, it is a good measure. It has certain features which I believe will encourage the establishment of small Canadian companies with limited financial ability. As the title suggests, it broadens and strengthens the incentives to regional development in Canada.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) and other members of the government for taking part in this debate. I suppose members of the House will be looking forward to hearing from the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), who was here a few minutes ago, and other hon. members from the great province of British Columbia which is experiencing tremendous unemployment problems. Undoubtedly the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour will have recommendations to make in respect of the designation of Vancouver and other urban parts of British Columbia, perhaps the entire province, which are suffering the second highest unemployment rate in Canada—8.6 per cent, compared with November of 1969 when the figure was 5.6 per cent. This is an increase of 3 per cent in one year. British Columbia has an unemployment rate second only to the east coast province of Newfoundland. Surely after making that remark the hon. member will want to ask me a question.

Mr. Perrault: Does the hon. member suggest that the unemployed in British Columbia are all British Columbians? The hon. member should be aware that thousands of our unemployed came from other parts of Canada. That is why we have to fight unemployment on a national basis, as the minister is doing so very well.

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member is suggesting that we should export from British Columbia all the people who were not born in that province. In that case perhaps we should send the Premier back east where he came from. If that is the suggestion, I would be delighted to entertain it.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I am also looking forward to hearing from the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) who made a few remarks when the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) was speaking and wondered whether the mines of Rocky Mountain could support the unemployed in his region. I am sure he would be dedicated to the idea of exporting some of his people from the Ottawa Valley. I am sure many members will take part in the debate so that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion can re-think its whole philosophy about regional development. A little more than a year ago the Department of Regional Economic Expansion came into existence when the bill setting up the department gave the minister greater power than any other minister of the government. We were delighted when the minister was given this authority because, as the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) indicated, we hoped that departments of government such as the Department of Public Works, the Department of Fisheries, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and others would work together in a co-ordinated effort to attack regional disparity as a government operation and not simply as a departmental operation.

I can do no better than reinforce the remarks of the hon. member for South Western Nova who today forcibly brought to the attention of the House of Commons exactly the position I wish to take. In that respect I suppose some hon. members across the way would ask me why I do not put an exclamation mark against his remarks and then resume my seat. I should do that, because I sincerely endorse his observations about regional disparity as it exists in the Atlantic region and the way he would like to see the minister and the government respond to our needs, rather than simply through the theoretical formulations of a number of experts who with good intentions have designed some of the programs for various parts of Canada.

What have we done in the last year in respect of regional economic development in Canada? As I see it, we have done two things. We have instituted a system of incentives which basically, on principle, is a very good move. Certainly it is. No one criticizes that system, because we need incentives to industry. As a matter of fact, it should be the aim of every member and of the government to provide incentives to industrial regional development in Canada as a whole and to specific parts of Canada in particular. Secondly, we have had a number of development programs such as those in Prince Edward Island and in our province which are aimed at providing an infrastructure, which is now the "in" word in regard to economic development, to encourage economic expansion in particular regions of Canada. I understand several parts of my province have been designated as special areas for receiving grants and loans to help provide an infrastructure for basic services in order to encourage the establishment of industry.

On principle, these moves are indisputably good so far as the benefits are concerned. But what have we lost since the Department of Regional Economic Expansion came into existence? We gave up the Atlantic Development Board, which was never a really well co-ordinated effort but it did provide a kind of on-the-spot response to industrial requests from the Atlantic region. It provided an on-the-spot response in a spasmodic and spurious manner. Perhaps it was not well co-ordinated, but it did provide many studies which I believe form the basis of some of the response by the department to the Atlantic region.

We gave up the ARDA program. In March, 1970, our province came under the agreements in the ARDA program. This program was brought into being by the former Prime Minister to give stimulus to rural Canada. This program might have been designed originally to help solve the rural, agricultural problems of western Canada but it became a very fundamental program for our part of Canada. We had the coming into existence of a new department and the bringing to the fore of a couple of programs on the positive side. But on the negative side we lost the old programs which in some ways were not well co-ordinated but were on the spot.

Now we are asked to support Bill C-205, which asks us to establish a loans program which is already in existence under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Small Businesses Loans Act. Really, we are being asked to extend the jurisdiction of these loans to tertiary and service industries and the like in various parts of Canada. In my opinion, the minister has carefully avoided making reference to these loans. This bill could have been brought in as a fourth government loans act. I have checked with knowledgeable members, who indicate to me that this special loans program is really only an extension of previous loan programs which are not now functioning and which are a complete waste of time and energy. I will prove that before I finish speaking.

Second, we are asked to spread the industrial incentives program to Montreal, southeastern Ontario and other special areas. Basically, this is what we are asked to do. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who very responsibly outlined our position in the House of Commons, and the hon. member for South Western Nova who again today reinforced some aspects of our position, have shown that what we are asked to do is dilute regional disparity to such an extent that the government is asking this department to assume the role of offering a cure-all, a panacea for all the economic ills of the nation.

Some people might say I am criticizing our including southeastern Ontario and Montreal as designated areas. This is not the problem. I could suggest that we even go into British Columbia in respect of special programs for areas where there is a problem of high unemployment. When I continue the debate on Monday I will show that what we are now doing is giving up the fight against regional disparity. I shall also discuss what we are losing by supporting this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, public bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, in view of the excellent progress made today, I wonder whether someone on the government side would advise the House what our menu will be on Monday. Perhaps I might direct the question to the government whip.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that we will continue with the item which is presently before the House and that, hopefully, we will be able to conclude this debate and send the bill to the committee. Then we would proceed with the government reorganization measure.

National Trade Mark and True Labelling Act

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because of the modesty of the acting government whip, I wonder whether I might point out that I believe there is general agreement to let the first eight items stand and proceed with Order No. 9, a bill in the name of the acting government whip.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the first eight items stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered. Orders 1 to 8 inclusive stand.

NATIONAL TRADE MARK AND TRUE LABELLING ACT

OCTANE RATING OF GASOLINE TO BE CONSPICUOUSLY DISPLAYED AT RETAIL OUTLETS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West) moved that Bill C-26, to amend the National Trade Mark and True Labelling Act (octane rating of gasoline), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. Like many consumers, I buy gasoline. The car that I own is a 1969 Ford.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No commercials, please.

Mr. Francis: I have purchased gasoline in many parts of Canada and I have found a wide discrepancy in the quality of the product that goes into our gas tanks. I have on occasion purchased what is supposed to be a superior brand with a higher octane rating and the performance of my motor has been very different from when I have filled my tank with other gasolines. Last summer I made a holiday trip to the fine province of New Brunswick, so ably represented by members in the House, and when I purchased gasoline there I noticed that in every gas station the octane rating of gasoline was conspicuously displayed. Apparently there is a law in New Brunswick which compels the octane rating to be displayed. I submit through you, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members that the existence of such a law demonstrates the feasibility of complying with the recommendation in the bill which I have the honour to present this afternoon.

The purpose of the bill is very simple. It is that at every retail gasoline pump there shall be displayed, in accordance with standards prescribed by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), the octane rating of the product which the consumer is buying. In this way it should be possible to eliminate the deception that takes place when consumers buy gasoline. I have had the experience of buying what was supposed to be a higher grade gasoline in the city and I have known from the performance of my motor that it did not come up to the standard I expected.

Therefore, I move second reading of this bill which has as its very simple purpose the display, in technical terms to be prescribed by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, by vendors of the rating of gasoline on gasoline pumps. I urge hon. members to support the bill.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to oppose the excellent bill put forward by the acting government whip, which for the first time in my memory at one of these afternoon sessions seems likely to proceed to a vote, but simply to point out that while we are on the subject of what should be displayed and what the public should know about the gasoline that we buy, we should know that the octane rating is a relatively minor factor among all the others which at least should be known to the public.

There is, of course, no doubt that unscrupulous dealers—and certain discount dealers might be in that category: I am not suggesting that my hon. friends are always searching out the cheapest retailers of gasoline—might be substituting a low octane gasoline for a higher octane gasoline and thus defrauding the public. In that case, I think the bill is a good one in that it would permit testing to take place very quickly and easily. If someone is advertising gasoline with a high octane reading and it turns out to have a lower octane reading, then prosecution should be possible.

When gasoline is simply rated top-line, medium range and low octane, it might not be possible to start the same type of prosecution to prevent the type of activity mentioned by my hon. friend. However, I feel that a great deal more should be said on the subject of gasoline. Gasoline is not a simple product. If I may mention another product with which one or two hon. members at least are also familiar, gasoline is rather like whisky. Whiskies may have the same octane rating or potency, but there may be a great variation in their effects as well as, perhaps, in their after-effects about which we would wish to know before proceeding.

Fortunately, with gasoline the results are not immediately damaging to the individual, but I feel that such factors as the lead content of gasoline should be known. Also, there are many aromatics which are added to gasoline and which vary greatly in different types of gasoline and have serious pollution effects. I think this, also, is a matter that should be considered in much the same manner as the octane rating. I stress this because we tend to drive up to a gas station, thinking we will get much the same type of gasoline regardless of the gasoline company or where we are. This is not so. There are many additives which, we are told by scientists, are highly dangerous to our environment from the point of view of pollution. Most hon. members are concerned about pollution and about buying a product which would do the least damage, but nevertheless are unable to do so because we simply do not know the true facts about gasoline and what we are buying.

I do not wish to suggest that the detailed content of gasoline must be listed, because obviously a member of the public such as myself would be unable to judge it. But I think it is important that a great deal more research be done, perhaps by consumer associations, perhaps by groups concerned with pollution and environment or by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to evaluate the various products we use.

I said a moment ago that some gasolines have a much higher lead content than others. I have before me a publication which indicates that this is something of a fraud on the public and that advertisements stating that low lead gasolines reduce pollution may not be as honest as they should be and are perhaps inaccurate. A company in Canada embarked upon a major advertising campaign, saying that they could produce a low lead gasoline. Nevertheless, they are not doing so because it is a fraud on the public in that this gasoline does not reduce pollution; the aromatics which would have to be added to replace lead are worse pollutants.

This type of thing makes me cautious with regard to the hon. member's bill. I think we must have more testing by specialists who would inform us of the over-all effect of a product such as this. While it may be helpful for us to know the octane rating of gasoline, perhaps the performance of the car is affected more by aromatics and other additives than by octane. While bills such as this may be good in achieving their objective—and I support the bill—nevertheless they will not do enough.

I have no wish to talk out this bill. It is one that I think all members of the House will be happy to support. I merely wish to put on the record my reservations regarding a too simplistic type of information which might indeed lead members of the public into making mistakes because of lack of knowledge of the effects of gasoline.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, this is a good bill. I take part in the debate this afternoon only because I am interested in one aspect that other hon. members have mentioned on previous occasions, that is, the use of different types of fuel in aircraft. It is evidently the case that less inflammable and less dangerous fuel is used on VIP flights than is used on airplanes which have as their main purpose the transportation of the general public. This fact is just brought to my mind. I intended to ask a question about it in the House. I mention it in this debate, and if anybody in the chamber knows anything about the subject I would appreciate a reply. In the Ottawa Citizen of December 5, just a few days ago, K. O. Bardwell of Ottawa, whom I understand is knowledgeable on this subject and is a technical civil servant, had published a letter on the labelling of gas as follows:

In the early days of jet airliners, Lord Brabazon of Tara, air pioneer and safety advocate, warned that planes using JP-4 fuel could easily become flying torches. The airlines who are concerned with costs have ignored his warning but British and American VIP flights use safer fuels.

If this fuel is not safe enough in planes transporting royalty and VIP's abroad, it isn't safe enough for public carriers either.

I believe this matter has been raised in earlier questions. It is an important subject. I agree with the contention of this letter writer, that what is good for VIPs, whether they be in Canada or elsewhere, should be good for the general public. I hope that this measure sponsored by the acting, but yet not quite permanent, government whip—and we hope that his appointment is confirmed—will bring about a greater appreciation of the necessity for having the same type of fuel used in all planes, no matter what passengers they carry. This may not be quite pertinent in terms of the bill, but I would like information on whether VIPs who fly in Canada—some of them may even be in this House—are getting special treatment, because through the years I have advocated that what is good enough for frontbenchers is good enough for backbenchers. This principle applies to every conceivable type of benefit brought into this House, whether it be today, next week or next Christmas.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to intervene for just a moment in this debate because I think the hon. member has brought to the House a measure very well worth referring to the finance committee. I suspect that there may be some problems to be discussed with the law officers of the Crown in terms of the constitutional right of the federal government to do what he proposes, but this does not detract from the fact that the idea of the bill is excellent.

I think, also, that companies which market petroleum products will appreciate the opportunity to come before the committee and give their views on the bill. I see no earthly reason why they should object to complying with such a requirement, because the terminology you see on fuel pumps today, "regular" and "premium", does not mean very much, except that one costs more than the other to the average consumer. If there is indeed anything in octane ratings, the public has a right to have it explained.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, about a year ago there were a couple of price increases. The price of nickel was increased by about 24.3 per cent, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) characterized the increase as quite small, an idea related no doubt to the fact that 96 per cent of our nickel was marketed outside Canada and so the price increase did not have much domestic impact. At the same time there was a boost in gasoline prices at the pumps in Ontario—seven-tenths of one cent per gallon. There was a great hue and cry about that increase, although it only added about $3.50 a year to the motoring costs of the average Ontario automobile operator.

The price of mailing a first-class letter was jumped about 1 cent just about a year ago. That was an increase of 20 per cent. At that time I do not recall anybody demanding an investigation of the Post Office for the purpose of determining whether the cost increase was justified. The Post Office had simply found its operating costs had risen and that, if it was to operate in a prudent business fashion, it had to collect more money for its services. However, we should not be too surprised to learn that it cost the Post Office an extra cent to move a 2-ounce letter around Canada—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the Parliamentary Secretary resume his seat? The Chair realizes that it may be the wish of hon. members that the debate be wider than usual during discussion of this bill, and I am sure all hon. members were pleased that the Chair gave the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) considerable latitude in his remarks. The Chair would do the same for the Parliamentary Secretary if this were the general feeling of the House. But because of our practices and procedures, it seems to me that we should note the fact on the record if we agree that the debate should range somewhat far from the subject under discussion.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I think this bill is directed to ensuring that consumers have an opportunity of assessing whether they are getting their money's worth when they buy gasoline. The point I was making is that if a year ago the Post Office Department determined that it cost an extra penny to move a 2-ounce letter around Canada it should not be too surprising to learn that the oil companies found it cost an extra seven-tenths of one cent to move an extra 7 pounds of gasoline around, which was the price increase it then announced.

I think all of this really relates to the fact that the retail price of gasoline, excluding taxes, in Toronto, for example has risen 1.7 cents per gallon or 6 per cent during the past 15 years while the general price index in Canada had risen 40 per cent. This factor has generally been overlooked. Gasoline prices have in fact been kept down very well by the marketing practices of this great industry. I only wanted to make that point in endorsing this bill which will enable the public better to assure itself that it is getting its money's worth when it buys gasoline.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I join those who have paid tribute to my good friend from Ottawa for his foresight in introducing the measure that is before the House. Like one of the previous speakers, I reiterate that octane rating in gasoline is obviously not the whole story. It is a technical term that is used by the refiners, but with regard to the performance of the automobile the octane rating does not count very much.

However, I would say to my friend who moved this motion that I have driven a great number of miles and have never experienced any difficulty with gasoline purchased in any province of the Dominion of Canada. I have not had that experience anywhere else. I do not ever recall receiving bad gasoline in Canada. I assure hon. members that I kept my automobile in top shape and, of course, this may be the key. As an earlier speaker said, much of our gasoline contains lead.

An hon. Member: You cannot get the lead out.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Mr. McCutcheon: Yes. And some even have perfume added. I suggest that our gas expert from British Columbia should take into consideration the fact that people often get into difficulty through buying aged fuel. Sometimes the refineries overproduce and are left with large volumes of first-class fuel. When it becomes aged, they sell it to discount outlets. I would therefore recommend to my hon. friend that he stay away from discount gasoline bars and buy only from reputable gas stations.

An hon. Member: But he is a real cheapskate.

Mr. McCutcheon: I commend the suggestion of an analysis or a test to determine the purity of gasoline. At the moment the weights and measures branch inspects gasoline pumps, but all that that assures us is that when we buy four quarts we get four quarts: there is no real test of the quality of the product. While I am on my feet I would like to say that I take the greatest exception to advertising which uses the low lead content of gasoline as an excuse to raise the price. I do not think that my hon. friend included that matter in his motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCutcheon: I think that automobile manufacturers intend to go a long way toward correcting the problem to which my hon. friend referred. Most of the 1971 cars do not require premium fuel, as do the 1969 models. If you take a high-compression motor which requires premium fuel to a discount gas bar and get No. 2 gasoline, you are not likely to get good performance. With this brief interjection, Mr. Speaker, I hope this matter can immediately come to the vote. I do not want to hold it up because I think it is an extremely worth-while proposition.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a question. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) has spoken of ancient, or old, gas. Stemming from that would he agree with the old saying, "There is no fuel like an 'oil fuel' "?

An hon. Member: Correct your blues.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to unduly delay discussions on this bill and its referral to the appropriate committee.

I am always a trifle surprised to hear people talk about octane, octane rating, information to octane consumers and yet nobody could come up with a definition. It would have been extremely important that members enlighten us on the matter.

I have some smattering of chemistry which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) could perhaps complete since he is an authority on the subject.

Octane cannot be measured, Mr. Speaker, it is simply a saturated hydrocarbon whose formula is C_8 H_{18} that I do remember. Besides the octane rating is used only to measure anti-knock value. Instead of listening to our distinguished colleagues who seem to be omniscient, perhaps someone could have given more precise indications. In fact, the other day when I was watching television I heard the president of a major oil company give interesting facts on the subject of lead and octane in gasoline.

My colleague from Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) knows a great deal about that, but we have to admit that the business of the House is so well organized that we were taken by surprise with this matter. So we are discussing pointlessly, mainly to confess our ignorance.

It would be important, I suggest, to talk instead about something we know.

That is why I would not want to take up much more time of the House. I do not know very much about this subject.

I remember with pleasure what I have learned at university, but unfortunately my recollections are beginning to wear off. I would like an expert to inform us on this important question when the bill reaches the committee stage.

[English]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that perhaps this bill is more important than some members realize. I come from an area where there is an international airport, and I believe that the quality of gas and various types of fuel is very important. I am told that the octane rating is a fundamental factor in considering gasoline. I wonder whether the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) had in mind the discrepancy in price between various octane ratings. The consumer is not in a position to assess whether an extra five cents per gallon guarantees him an extra five cents or only an extra cent in value. This was probably in the mind of the capable Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) when he made his observations.

I support the bill, Mr. Speaker. I also recommend that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) add to his not so busy schedule—and Dr. Young, now paid but unemployed, with his staff of 120—an investigation of the discrepancy in the price charged for gasolines with various octane ratings.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

A short while ago, I thought I heard the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Isabelle) referring to the fact that the business of the House seemed to be more or less well planned at this hour of the day on Fridays. In my opinion, it is appropriate that this House and the hon. Parliamentary Secretary know that the government members were very well prepared to discuss items 1 and 2 on today's order paper, meaning the bills introduced by the House leader of the official opposition, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) which deal with amendments to the British North America Act and abolition of corporal punishment, respectively.

Had it not been for the absence of some of the official opposition members, we might have been able to proceed with consideration of the bills which were at the top of the list.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. J. E. Walker (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe that many of the comments which have been made go far beyond the purpose of this bill, which is framed in a very narrow context. I would have some difficulty in agreeing that the bill should go to committee on the basis of some of those speeches which have been made. If it went to the committee, on the basis of some of those speeches, one might think it was being sent there to enable the Standing Committee to conduct a full-scale investigation of the entire gasoline retailing industry. That is not the purpose of the bill. I shall read the explanatory note, which is very clear:

> The intent of this bill is to require that all gasoline which is sold to the public shall have conspicuously displayed at such place of sale the octane rating according to a recognized standard to be prescribed by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

This is a narrow subject, and if the bill goes to committee that is the subject that will be discussed. I think it is time to bring our consideration of this bill into perspective and to consider what the mover of the motion had in mind. When I drive to a gasoline pump and ask the attendant to fill the tank of my car, even if I see a sign showing the octane rating of the gas I do not know what it means. I do not know what an octane rating is. For all I know, it could be a three-legged spider.

I remind the House that the purpose of the bill is very narrow. It has to do with the display of a sign on gas pumps to advise the sophisticated few who know what an octane rating is of the octane rating of the gasoline they are buying. I see that the sponsor of the bill is nodding his head. Bearing that narrow context of the bill in mind, it might be a good measure to send to committee for investigation—but only in that very narrow context. I am not sure what the mover of the motion had in mind, nor what enlightenment he felt the bill would give the public. He must know what an octane rating is. I suggest that gasoline companies could give a great deal of information to the public about the meaning of an octane rating.

I wanted to bring to the attention of the House the fact that this bill is framed in a very narrow context. An octane rating may or may not mean anything to the public; however, the mover of the bill thinks it will mean something. I hope the committee to which this bill is referred will not go beyond the narrow context of the bill and that the discussion will not lead to a wide, public discussion or investigation into the gasoline retailing industry in this country.

Mr. Mahoney: Amen!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to join in the unanimous support for this bill. I thought all those who were going to speak had done so, but I see that there are two others. I hope they can be persuaded to make their speeches on some other bill and to let this one go through.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are some members, Mr. Speaker, who think there should be more in the bill; nobody has said that there should be less in it. Indeed, there could not be much less. It has one point, and we all agree with it. There is no rule in the book that says that whatever is before the House on a Friday afternoon has to be talked out. I am afraid that the Liberal members are so used to doing that with our bills that they have forgotten that this bill is sponsored by a Liberal.

An hon. Member: We can discern.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I introduce to the Liberal members of the House the acting chief government whip, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). It is his bill that we want to vote on. If we pass it now, we can adjourn 20 minutes early. So why do we not pass the bill? It will not be given third reading and sent to the Senate; we shall merely send it to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and I assure the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker) that the chairman of that committee will see to it that the bill is dealt with properly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I join the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker) in saying that the debate on this bill has been too wide-ranging. I am pleased to inform the House that neither my car nor the car of my colleague the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) has ever stalled as a result of bad gas. He and I both come from the chemical valley and we have nothing to fear from this bill.

Earlier, the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) talked about tourist promotion. I invite him and other hon. members to come to Sarnia and tour our refineries which are the finest in the world. If any hon. member with a 1969 car is having trouble, it is clear that he spent too much money on the car and too little on gas. Such difficulties could never be attributed to gas that comes from the chemical valley.

I do not think we need worry about octane ratings. Nevertheless, I support the principle of the bill. The high quality of the gasoline that is produced by our refineries, and the high quality of the workmanship that has gone into the building of those refineries, leads me to say that we have nothing to fear and that we would welcome this measure. It would have the effect of taking away business from those two-bit businesses which try to sell what people call gasoline of a low octane rating. When we buy that sort of gas we have reason to complain. I therefore say on my own behalf and, no doubt, on behalf of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent that we who come from the chemical valley welcome this measure. I think we are all united in our views in Sarnia and the Lambton area generally. We have nothing to fear from octane ratings being shown at gasoline stations or on gas pumps.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong this debate. I was surprised to hear the House Leader of the New Democratic Party suggest that government supporters do not have a keen interest in this subject.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is too keen; that's the trouble.

Mr. Perrault: I for one think that every right should be extended to government supporters to speak on this subject. In many ways this has been a pretty high-octane debate. I think we have pumped the subject dry and I think it is time to get the lead out and refer the bill to the appropriate committee.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask a question. Is the government planning to establish a ministry of gas, and is consideration being given to appointing the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) as its head?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that we on this side of the House are quite aware of the vast powers of the chief government whip, and therefore we would not exercise any rights we might have to talk out this bill.

I think the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Frances) is very worthwhile. It would be in the best interests of the public if we could see such octane ratings. I am not as familiar with the process involved as the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen). I do not know whether it is possible to list the octane rating of gasoline at a gas pump. If it were possible to do so, I think it ought to be done because it would increase the efficiency and effectiveness of retailing gasoline to the general public.

The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker) has suggested that because the parameters of the bill are very narrow it should not be a vehicle for launching a full-scale investigation into the gasoline industry. On the other hand, I believe there is need for a full-scale investigation into the price of gas; in one part of Ottawa you may pay 44 cents per gallon, whereas only a few blocks away you may pay between 50 and 55 cents per gallon for the same type of gas. We all know that these cut-rate outlets purchase their gasoline from the same bulk tanks. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) should look into this situation.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) spoke about the problem of pollution. Some hon. members may feel there is a problem of gas pollution in this chamber this afternoon. There is certainly a problem with regard to the amount of lead in gasoline; in fact, it is a potential health problem. Some research has been carried out on animals pastured close to heavily-travelled, public thoroughfares. When testing the serum they are able to determine which animals are pastured near heavily-travelled, public thoroughfares by reason of the amount of lead in the animals' blood.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the general public should be assured that higher prices are not being charged for gasoline which, although it is more expensive to produce, does not have more value. I do not want to talk out this bill or to do anything to prevent its passage.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau).

An hon. Member: Don't be a Liberal.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says, "Don't be a Liberal". In the two years that I have been here the only private members' bills that have been sent to committee have been those introduced by Liberal members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that at this stage he should discuss this bill and not bills which may have been considered in different ways in the past. I suggest that at this stage his contribution should be limited to the bill before the House.

Mr. Comeau: I agree with what Your Honour has just said. I made that remark because I feel it is important. The bill simply requires that gas stations post signs on their gas tanks to indicate whether they are selling low, regular or high-test gas and also the octane content. What will happen?

Mr. Borrie: Nothing.

Mr. Comeau: Exactly. I have had seven years of university training as a physicist. I have done some chemistry. The word "octane" does not mean very much to me. Holy smoke, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pepin: That is right. It means "holy smoke."

Mr. Comeau: —what good will it do to post the octane content on gasoline tanks? Will Joe Smith from Yarmouth understand how it affects him? He is really only concerned about the price of gasoline. If the government requires gas stations to post these signs, the gas companies will have to hire men to do this work and the price of the gas will be increased another cent per gallon. I am opposed to this bill. I do not think it will do anything good. The gas companies will say that they must increase the price because of the cost of installing these signs.

I think it is very important to have a high octane ratio in gasoline. I think this should be checked by the distributors who supply the gas stations. This matter could be handled by the gasoline inspectors in the provinces. If the gasoline inspectors are doing their job, they can assure consumers that they are receiving the proper grade of gasoline. If it is not up to standard, we should be so informed by the inspectors. I do not see how the consumers will benefit from information that the gasoline they purchase contains a certain amount of octane. If the situation needs correcting, the inspectors should investigate the gas being delivered by the distributors. I cannot see that this bill will help the consumer other than—

An hon. Member: Nine minutes to go.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is the message?

Mr. Comeau: It is a joke between the whip and I. This bill is not very elaborate; it contains only one paragraph. I am not going to speak at length on it because I believe that merely posting a sign will not benefit the consumer. The inspectors must provide the necessary checks to ensure that the gas has the proper octane content. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) and other hon. members may have purchased gasoline which does not give their automobiles the usual amount of pep. By posting a sign, the problem will not be remedied. We should make sure that the gas is properly inspected and brought up to the required standard. I think other hon. members want to speak in this debate, so I will resume my seat.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Bell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Comeau: Yes.

Mr. Bell: As one who I know has watched provincial rights quite jealously, coming as he does from Nova Scotia, would the hon. member agree with the contention put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary a few minutes ago that this bill is really an infringement on provincial matters and, therefore, we should not let it pass this afternoon before finding out a little more about the jurisdictional problem that might be created if the bill were passed?

Mr. Comeau: This point is probably valid, Mr. Speaker. The government often refers matters to the courts, and perhaps we should make a positive determination here. The government is very conscious of the fact that we should not infringe provincial rights, and therefore we should be very careful in this field too.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to support this bill. I have no doubt that this bill is of prime concern to the hon. member who introduced it, and I have no objection to a bill of this nature being introduced. But I feel that many of these bills deal with issues that are too narrow in scope. This is a prime example, because we are dealing with but one aspect of the sale of gasoline.

The hon. member who preceded me stated very emphatically that the bill should go through quickly because it was narrow in scope and dealt only with octane rating. He suggested we should let the committee make a decision on the bill. My objection is that this bill is not broad enough in scope, that we are dealing only with one small aspect of the entire problem, namely, the octane rating and the difference it makes to the price of gasoline. If we are going to ask the committee to spend not only valuable parliamentary time but the valuable time of its members considering this bill, it should consider the whole subject and not only one little segment of it.

I am concerned about the bill restricting itself to octane content. I find it strange indeed that a bill of this nature was not introduced years ago rather than today when the whole question of automobile propulsion is in a state of flux. Although the octane content of gasoline may be of prime quality today, a year or two from now it could be a very insignificant factor indeed. We are here seized with the proposition that we should pass a bill to make it mandatory for gasoline companies and those who distribute gasoline to acknowledge in a very concrete fashion the one provision of the bill.

There are indications from all across North America, the home of the automobile, that air pollution is a very considerable factor in automobile propulsion. Many companies and people are seized with the problem of fuel pollution, and no doubt octane reading in gasolines is part of their over-all consideration. But we do not want our parliamentary procedures to be tied to the contemplation of a bill which, even before it gets to committee, may have its provisions made obsolete. This is why I am concerned with this measure, though it is to the credit of a private member to bring in a bill of this nature. Indeed, he has every right to do so and I have no quarrel with him on that score. We know he has a valid and good reason for bringing in this measure. But as I say, I am concerned, as I know you are, Mr. Speaker, with the whole question of the introduction of private members' bills. We have so many of them to deal with and in such a limited time. A bill of this kind has to be dealt with in a period of one hour, and it embraces a subject of complexity and one of interest not only to consumers but to the oil industry at large.

We may think that in bringing in a regulation controlling the sale of fuel only we are not affecting many people. But this regulation would affect not only consumers of gasoline but the entire oil industry, an industry that should be given ample opportunity to examine the ramifications of the bill and to inform itself about it. It is said that this bill should be dealt with by the committee. I am not prepared to let the bill go to committee. Indeed, I am prepared to assume responsibility for talking it out. We have to take a stand somewhere in regard to the way we deal with public bills. I am very incensed because the government puts the emphasis on propelling their members' bills through to committee but—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hour assigned to the consideration of private members' business has now expired. The House stands adjourned until Monday at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INDUSTRY

TABLING OF REPORT OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION ON MANUFACTURED EDIBLE OIL PRODUCTS

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table in both official languages a report of the Prices and Incomes Commission concerning a review of manufactured edible oil products.

(a) Creative
Film Production Group
Film Technician Group

(b) Administrative Film Officer Group
Others

(c) English Production Branch

(d) French Production Branch

Please note that the Production Branch percentages for the years 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969 have been adjusted to represent the functions presently performed by the Production Branches. For example, Stills Photo personnel have been deleted from the Production Branch figures, and cameramen have been included although previously they were in the Technical Operations Branch.

2. (a) No. The NFB expects to receive $130,000 above the sum of $300,000 in 1970/71. (b) Since the suspension of the film rental charges, the NFB has taken steps to ensure that, with its available resources, service to the public would suffer as little as possible.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

CRTC—EVALUATION OF PROGRAMS IN DETERMINING CANADIAN CONTENT REQUIREMENTS

Question No. 62—Mr. Thompson:

On what basis or formula does the Canadian Radio-Television Commission evaluate programs in determining whether or not such programs are to be designated "Canadian" under the Canadian content requirements?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): The present Television Broadcasting Regulations enacted by the

Questions

CRTC set a limit on the proportion of broadcast time for non-Canadian programs on Canadian television stations. These Regulations assume that Canadian broadcasters are well able to identify a wholly Canadian program.

When a program contains non-Canadian elements, the Commission assesses the program on the basis of the predominance of Canadian creative and other resources in the various components of the production. The elements of production considered for this purpose include creative control, the performers involved, the production staff and the facilities.

Selective monitoring and study of a sample of programs are conducted to ensure compliance with Regulations.

With respect to AM Radio, the CRTC established the following conditions as requirements for a musical composition to be deemed "by a Canadian": (a) the instrumentation or lyrics were principally performed by a Canadian; (b) the music was composed by a Canadian; (c) the lyrics were written by a Canadian; (d) the live performance was wholly recorded in Canada.

This amendment will come into effect on January 18, 1971.

During the first year, one of the above four conditions must be fulfilled; afterwards, at least two of the conditions must be fulfilled.

AIR CRASH AT WABUSH, NFLD.

Question No. 121—Mr. Forrestall:

Has the government, as a result of the air crash at Wabush, Newfoundland on November 11, 1969, received any indication from any party with respect to further legal proceedings?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes. Five Petitions of Right have been filed and served on behalf of the families of five of the six passengers.

CANADA'S ANNUAL CONTRIBUTION TO UNRWA

Question No. 179—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Since the establishment of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), what has been Canada's annual contribution to its operating budget?

2. In each case, what percentage of the total budget did such contribution comprise?

3. What assistance has Canada provided towards relief and rehabilitation of the victims of the Jordanian civil war?

4. What requests have been received?

5. Is it intended to extend further assistance and, if so, in what form and amounts?

6. What Canadian officials have visited the Kingdom of Jordan since the termination of the conflict?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1 and 2. Attached is a table indicating Canada's annual contribution to UNRWA and relating this contribution to (1) UNRWA's annual expenditure and (2) annual government contributions received by UNRWA. In all years except UNRWA fiscal years 1950/51 and 1951/52 expenditure exceeded government contributions. This difference was met by income from investments, non-governmental contributions, miscellaneous income and drawdowns on working capital.

3. Canada has provided a total of $50,000 in two separate contributions of $25,000 to the Red Cross for relief operations in Jordan and a supplementary contribution of $150,000 to UNRWA for 1970 for use by the Agency in meeting the increased demands on its resources resulting from the hostilities in Jordan.

4. Two general appeals for assistance were received from the International Committee of the Red Cross.

5. No further assistance is contemplated at the present time.

6. None.

1. What is the area of land owned by the federal government in each province?

2. Is there a complete and perpetual inventory of federally owned properties?

3. What action has been taken since the release of the Glassco Report to improve the management of real property?

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. The area of land owned by the federal government as recorded in the Central Inventory of Federal Properties, by province, is:

Province	No. of Acres
Newfoundland	96,041
Prince Edward Island	1,353
Nova Scotia	22,514
New Brunswick	318,532
Quebec	280,485
Ontario	268,283
Manitoba	51,707
Saskatchewan	77,445
Alberta	101,751
British Columbia	164,158
*Yukon Territories	21,125
*Northwest Territories	90,193

*Includes only property that is being utilized by federal departments or agencies.

2. There is a perpetual inventory of federally owned land. The inventory is estimated to be 90% complete at the present time and is expected to be completed by the end of 1971.

3. Several of the recommendations made by the Glassco Report to improve real property management have been acted upon; more recently the Treasury Board-Department of Public Works Task Force has examined the entire ecect of real property management and proposals are now being studied for presentation to the government.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS—MAN-HOURS SAVED AS A RESULT OF USE OF COMPUTERS

Question No. 377—Mr. Robinson:

How many man-hours have been saved as a result of the utilization of computers by the Department of Communications during each year since computers have been used?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): The Department of Communications has utilized computers since 1969 in connection with its research and administrative programs. The man-hour savings in general are derived from estimates of the additional personnel that would have been required to cope with the increased workload over the past two years. In the Research area only moderate savings were estimated because it is realized that the majority of the present research projects would not be feasible without the use of computers.

Man-hours saved: 1969-70, 51,000 man-hours; 1970-71 (projected) 80,000 man-hours.

PERSONNEL OF DEPARTMENT OF COMMUNICATION AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 398—Mr. Macquarrie:

	Mr. G. Prud'homme, CR-3	5,632- 6,191

3. In accordance with Section 3 (2) of the Post Office Act, the Minister of Communications is the Postmaster General of Canada. By Order-in-Council P.C. 1970-1704, the Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté is authorized to act at all times for the Postmaster General in respect of the office of Postmaster General.

4. No. As mentioned by the Prime Minister in the House on November 9th, the Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté has been asked to study this question and is now pursuing the study.

MEADOW LAKE, SASK.—COST OF PUBLIC HOUSING

Question No. 401—Mr. Gleave:

1. How much money is being contributed by (a) the federal government (b) the provincial government (c) the Town of Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan, toward the 16 public housing units presently being constructed in the Town of Meadow Lake?

2. What amount was paid for the land?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): 1. The cost of the 16 public housing units in the Town of Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan is being shared among the three levels of government as follows: Federal Government, $172,200; Provincial Government, $45,920; Municipal Government, $11,480; Total: $229,600.

2. The estimated cost of the serviced land for these units is $11,000, and is included in the figures given above.

SASKATOON, SASK.—COST OF DWELLING UNITS FOR LOW-INCOME FAMILIES

Question No. 408—Mr. Gleave:

1. How much money is being contributed by each (a) the federal government (b) the provincial government (c) the City of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, toward the 50 dwelling units for low-income families in Saskatoon?

2. What amount was paid for the land involved?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): 1. The cost of the 50 dwelling units for low-income families in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan is being shared among the three levels of government as follows: Federal Government, $395,325; Provincial Government, $105,420; Municipal Government, $26,355; Total: $527,100.

2. The above funds are being used to acquire existing dwellings; it is not therefore possible at this time to determine the actual land cost.

LABELLING OF BABY FOODS

Question No. 409—Mrs. MacInnis:

Does the Canadian Food and Drug Directorate intend to adopt federal standards for infant feeding formulas and to require the labelling of all contents in baby foods similar to those recently set by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Food and Drug Directorate presently is developing regulations for infant feeding formulae which will specify the amounts of essential nutrients required to be present. A list of ingredients will be mandatory on the label of these products.

ICEBREAKING UPPER LAKES

Question No. 412—Mr. Noble:

Is it the intentoin of the government to winter the icebreaker Alexander Henry in Owen Sound or Collingwood to take advantage of the fact that navigation can be opened up in Georgian Bay and Lake Huron eight to ten days before Lake Superior?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No. The program this winter is for the Alexander Henry to winter in Thunder Bay and a second small icebreaker to winter in Georgian Bay.

Questions

LIVERPOOL, N.S.—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE AGENT

Question No. 452—Mr. Crouse:

1. What was the name of the Unemployment Insurance agent in Liverpool, Nova Scotia?

2. What was the amount of remuneration paid to him during 1970?

3. On what date did he resign?

4. On what date does the government plan to reappoint another agent in Liverpool?

[Translation]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): 1. Presently, there is no agent of unemployment insurance in Liverpool (N.S.). The last agent employed by the UIC in that locality was Mr. Lester L. Clements.

2. Nil.

3. Mr. Clements resigned on November 6, 1969.

4. At the present time, the Commission does not plan to reappoint another agent in Liverpool (N.S.). The Area Office of the Commission in Halifax provides services to the workers of that locality.

GENERAL MOTORS—WHEEL DEFECT 1960-65 TRUCKS

Question No. 457—Mr. Mather:

Did General Motors Corporation of Canada notify the government that the wheel structure of its three-quarter ton pickup truck manufactured between 1960 and 1965 is "subject to sudden and catastrophic failure" and (a) if so, what action has been taken (b) if not, is the government aware of the situation in the United States, where the U.S. Government is suing General Motors for refusing to notify purchasers of the above-mentioned defect?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): General Motors Corporation of Canada has not notified the Government of a wheel defect on pickup trucks manufactured during the period 1960 to 1965. The Ministry of Transport is aware of this situation in the United States. The dispute involves vehicles manufactured prior to enactment of the 1966 United States Motor Vehicle Safety Act and, as this litigation involves a complex principle of law, the case could remain in the Courts for some considerable period of time. The Canadian Motor Vehicle Safety Act has not as yet been proclaimed. The proposed date for enforcement is January 1, 1971. The Canadian Act is not retroactive with respect to either safety standards or defect notification.

*CBC—SUSPENSION OF EMPLOYEES IN QUEBEC

Question No. 469—Mr. McCleave:

How many employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (a) have been suspended (b) have been fired, from their jobs because of events arising from the state of apprehended insurrection in Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the CBC that two employees of the Corporation, one in the Ottawa-Hull area and one in Montreal, were apprehended under the provisions of the War Measures Act, detained in custody for 13 days and 10 days respectively, released without any charges having been laid against them and, on release, returned to their employment with the Corporation.

INVESTIGATION INTO PROBLEMS CREATED BY VISITORS AND NON-IMMIGRANTS SEEKING PERMANENT RESIDENCE IN CANADA

Question No. 504—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. Does the government intend to follow up on the report of an investigation made by Mr. Joseph Sedgwick Q.C. on the problems created by visitors and non-immigrants who ask for permanent residence in Canada?

2. When will the bills correcting this situation be introduced?

3. How many people worked on the investigation?

4. What was the amount paid in salaries for this investigation?

5. What were the other expenses incurred?

[Translation]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Yes.

2. As soon as possible. There will probably be a need to amend the legislation.

3. Mr. Sedgwick consulted with departmental officials and other interested parties in the course of his investigations, but the department is not aware of any persons who may have been employed by Mr. Sedgwick in connection with the preparation of his report.

4. Mr. Sedgwick's fee was $12,000.

5. Incidental expenses for hotel accommodation, transportation, meals, etc. amounted to $563.21.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS—STAFF MEMBERS

Question No. 56—Mr. Orlikow:

Who are the staff members of the Company of Young Canadians and, in each case, what is their annual salary?

Return tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise with regard to written questions, if I may.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Skeena rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): That is as convenient a way as any to get the floor, Mr. Speaker. I wish to inquire about starred question No. 40 standing in my name which simply asks about the results of the inquiry undertaken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare into the leakage with regard to the interim report of the Le Dain Commission. This question has been on the order paper since October 8, and I should like to know what progress is being made toward making a reply?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that I have noted his remarks and will try to get an answer very shortly.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

PRIME INTEREST RATE—ACTION TO BRING ABOUT REDUCTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement on Friday by the chartered banks that during the past 12 months their profits have increased by a further 12 per cent over and above the three previous record-breaking years, has the government given consideration in the intervening three days to advising the chartered banks that they can well afford to reduce the prime rate to 7 per cent and that it is in the national interest that they do so because this is by far the most effective means available to us for stimulating the economy and thereby counteracting rising unemployment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, to my memory the hon. member has asked this question at least six times in the past three months and each time he received the answer that the banks were effectively lowering their rates. There is nothing new to add today. I do not expect that he would imagine the government would act against the banks just because they were making profits.

Mr. Hees: The government has said that it is looking for ways to stimulate the economy. I have suggested a way in which that can be done very easily and I have asked the Prime Minister whether the government has considered this suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member has a supplementary question.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister has made it very clear that the government has no intention of following this suggestion, I would ask him if he would take the House into his confidence and tell us how it is that the chartered banks have the Minister of Finance and himself so completely in the palm of their hands—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that question is in order. I am sure it is not and I do not think the Chair should allow a reply to be made to it.

SINGLE UNEMPLOYED TRANSIENTS—EDUCATIONAL UPGRADING PROGRAM—PAYMENT OF WELFARE COST

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I want to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister regarding a group which is unfortunately growing in number. I refer to the single unemployed transients, many of whom at the present time have used up their unemployment insurance benefits and are not eligible for welfare assistance because they cannot establish domicile in any one place. The result is that many of them are being pushed from town to town and represent a very serious problem. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving any thought to some effective measures for assisting these single unemployed transients?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I had occasion to tell the House at least twice last week, the government is hoping to help all sections of the population who are unemployed. I understand that it is not within the power of the government to correct the problem in the particular case to which the hon. member referred. I know of many instances where companies in many parts of Canada have complained that the transients themselves depart very soon after their arrival, not because their jobs have been withdrawn but because they themselves decide to move on.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that many of them are young men who have not yet been able to establish themselves in the labour force, and in view of the fact that last summer the Secretary of State provided hostels for some of this group, is the government giving any consideration to establishing hostels where crash programs could be set up to help them upgrade their education or acquire some of the skills that are necessary to enable them to secure employment later?

Mr. Trudeau: It seems to me that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration dealt with this precise question last week, but let me repeat that I know of many cases where young, single transients do not wish to work very long in isolated communities and it is they who of their own free will give up the job when the company would very much welcome their continuance in employment.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since many of the municipalities and provincial governments—not all but certainly some of them—have been refusing to grant welfare to these people and insist on them moving on after giving them one night's lodging and a meal ticket, would the federal government consult with the provincial governments and undertake that if these people are supplied with welfare the federal government will assume the entire cost for looking after single unemployed persons whose care cannot be charged to a particular municipality?

Mr. Trudeau: As the House knows, Mr. Speaker, the government shares in 50 per cent of these costs now. If the government were ever to contemplate paying the total cost, of course the whole problem of provincial jurisdiction over welfare cases would have to be examined and the jurisdiction possibly shifted. I know of no province that is prepared to suggest that kind of change in the constitution.

NUMBER OF EMPLOYED AND UNEMPLOYED UNITED STATES DRAFT DODGERS AND DESERTERS IN CANADA

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has any study been made as to the number of draft dodgers and deserters from the American forces who are in Canada, how many are employed, and how many are unemployed at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I know of no such study, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe it is the policy of the government to keep track of people who enter this country legally and to see whether they are employed or otherwise.

Mr. McIntosh: Can the Prime Minister inform the House how many of these people are on welfare at the present time in Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I suppose this information is available at the municipal or provincial level. As the hon. member knows, these welfare schemes are administered by the provinces. I am told it is possible that we might have some figures and if there are figures available I will ask the minister to report to the House.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES OF SHARING OF COST OF ASSISTANCE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that reports in the last couple of weeks show that in every city in Canada the number of young people who cannot get jobs has risen to unprecedented heights, would the federal government discuss with the provinces the possibility, where these people do not qualify for assistance, of sharing the cost of assisting them so that they can be helped during the winter months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the thrust of the question. I believe it related to discussions with the provinces, but I did not quite seize the question.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase the question. In view of the fact that many young people do not qualify for assistance because they have not lived in a city or province for the required time, normally a year, would the federal government consider as an emergency measure discussing with the provinces the sharing of the cost of assistance for these young people during the winter months which will be extremely difficult for them?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that most provinces are in effect giving assistance to such people and that therefore this is the rule rather than the exception.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FEDERAL COMMITMENT RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF SUPERPORT AT LORNEVILLE, N.B.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has any federal commitment been given, either unqualified or conditional, to the superport known as Lorneville in New Brunswick, as reported by the president of the New Brunswick Development Corporation yesterday?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire about that and will be glad to report to the House.

Mr. Nowlan: When the minister inquires, in view of the statement of the president of the New Brunswick Development Corporation that such an announcement will be made in January will he make sure before any commitment is made that he and his officials have access to the most recent report on a superport for the Atlantic area, prepared by Jones, Bardelmieir, and Clements and I believe almost ready for release, which suggests that the superport for the Atlantic region should be in the Canso Strait area?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire first if any commitment was made.

NATURAL RESOURCES

NEGOTIATIONS WITH NOVA SCOTIA RESPECTING OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it government policy "to keep its cotton-picking hands off the Atlantic offshore mineral resources", as warned by the new Premier of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that his question cannot be asked in those terms. Perhaps he could find a more acceptable way procedurally in which to ask it.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made on Saturday by the Premier of Nova Scotia, has the Prime Minister been requested to renegotiate or are there direct negotiations going on at the present time with respect to offshore mineral resources?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has made very concrete proposals to all the provinces, including Nova Scotia, and in most cases we are still awaiting their responses to our proposals. I believe the Atlantic provinces have had consultation among themselves as to the type of response they want to give to the federal government. Perhaps the Premier of Nova Scotia, whom we are happy to see in that job, will be able to do a bit of homework and make sure it is not our intention to put our hands on anything that does not belong to us.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, based on the statement just made by the Prime Minister. Although he stated that the government did not want to put its hands on anything that did not belong to them, will he now take under consideration Bill C-135 on which I have presented a petition to the House? From that he should realize that the government has already disclaimed ownership of offshore mineral rights in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take notice of that question. I do not know if it refers to the heavy water plant and I do not know if the Premier of Nova Scotia wants us to keep our hands off that as well.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I can enlighten the Prime Minister since he was Minister of Justice when this bill was placed before the House. I am talking about mineral rights—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRANT TO PROCTOR AND GAMBLE FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PULP MILL IN ALBERTA—CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN COMPANY OR CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the minister's recent announcement that Procter and Gamble are to receive an incentive of some $11,790,000 to construct a pulp mill in Alberta, can the minister indicate whether this is a foreign-controlled corporation? If so, was consideration given to providing the incentive to a Canadian company or Crown corporation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we certainly considered the possibility of an incentive to a Canadian company, which unfortunately was not ready to start operations at this time.

PARTICIPATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN CONTROL OF PROPOSED ALBERTA PULP MILL

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. In view of the large investment by the federal government in the proposed pulp mill in Alberta, is it the intention of the government, either directly or through one of its Crown agencies, to hold any equity capital in this operation, or is there going to be any safeguard of the federal interest through having some members on the board of directors—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the hon. member's supplementary might be placed on the order paper.

DRUGS

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL PROTOCOL—EFFECT OF CANADIAN COMMITMENTS ON LE DAIN COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): My question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that the minister is back in the House after meeting his provincial colleagues, does he intend to make a statement concerning the commitments the government could enter into in regard to the Geneva protocol on psychotropic drugs and the effect of these commitments on the recommendations of the Le Dain Commission?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not think a long statement is necessary. I can assure the hon. member that I do not believe it is the intention of the government to make any commitments of a binding nature until it receives the final report of the Le Dain Commission.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Is the minister now in a position to advise the House on the nature of the answer relayed to the directors of the provincial anti-addiction programs who have urged the government not to proceed to enter into any international drug agreement prior to the completion of the Le Dain report.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would hope my previous answer would answer the hon. member also.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he can assure the House that no commitments will be made at Geneva until he comes back to the House and such agreements are fully ratified by Parliament?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that my previous answer would give the House and the hon. member that assurance.

PENITENTIARIES

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN INMATES FROM PRINCE ALBERT AND STONY MOUNTAIN TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice who I believe is Acting Solicitor General. I should like to know whether 20 or 25 or approximately that number of inmates of the Saskatchewan penitentiary have been moved to the penitentiary in British Columbia, plus a number of those who have been labelled as malcontents and the like from Stony Mountain penitentiary in Manitoba?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice.

[Mr. Speaker.]

PRINCE ALBERT—INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the President of the Privy Council. Has the minister taken under consideration the request made in the House last week that the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee arrange to visit Prince Albert penitentiary, and is the minister in a position to report now?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have had conversations with the Solicitor General with respect to a reference to the committee. I am not exactly certain what the effect of the reference will be, but it certainly will be in accordance with the general wish to continue the examination commenced last session.

Mr. Burton: Can the minister give any indication of the timing of any such visit to the Prince Albert penitentiary?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. I cannot anticipate what the terms of reference will be. When the terms are placed on the order paper, we shall be in a better position to say.

CLOSING OF RIVERS AIR BASE—MEETING OF MINISTER WITH LOCAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On October 20 the minister was to meet with the officials of Rivers Air Base and Brandon. However, the trip was postponed due to the Quebec crisis. Because of the uncertain economic situation in western Manitoba, can the minister advise the House when he will visit Manitoba and when these meetings will take place?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we intend to visit both bases as soon as the policy applicable to those who will be discharged has been fully developed.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Following the recent representations to the minister by a representative group from the province of Manitoba, led by the Premier of that province, with respect to widening the designated area, will the minister, when he visits the Rivers and Brandon communities, be making an announcement based on those representations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yukon.

ESTABLISHMENT OF REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I would refer him to the remarks which he made in the House on January 26, 1969, when he tabled the report of the Royal Commission on Security. Has the Security Review Board recommended by the commission, and discussed by the Prime Minister at pages 10637 and 10638 of Hansard yet been established? If it is functioning, how long has it been functioning?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. The policy of the government has been decided but the implementation is still suspended. I hope to acquaint the House with the action we are taking in the not too distant future.

Mr. Nielsen: Has any review procedure at all been established? If so, what is that procedure?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the review procedure which existed before is continuing to operate. As the hon. member knows, a new procedure was recommended in the royal commission report. It is this new procedure on which the government has taken a policy decision which has not yet been implemented.

Mr. Nielsen: On page 10638 of Hansard, the Prime Minister indicated that it was the intention of the government to bring about a parliamentary debate on the report of the commission. Can the Prime Minister indicate now when that debate will be held?

Mr. Trudeau: I am afraid I cannot, Mr. Speaker. I will take it up with the House Leader. Perhaps the occasion would be when the government announces its policy on the review board. Perhaps at that time the House may want to debate the matter. I thank the hon. member for reminding me of this commitment. I will discuss it with the House Leader.

TRAINING ABROAD OF MEMBERS OF TERRORIST ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Acting Solicitor General. Is the minister now in a position to tell the House if any members of the FLQ or related terrorist organizations have received training in terrorist activities abroad. If so, in what countries?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not.

Mr. Nesbitt: Could the minister undertake to give this information to the House before the end of the week? Perhaps he could discuss the matter with his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT TO COUNCIL OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THOSE ON LOW INCOMES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In making his new appointments to the Canadian Consumer Council, does the minister intend to appoint a representative or representatives from groups of consumers on low incomes?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are members on the council who purport to speak for these people now.

TRADE

SEMINAR ON DEVELOPMENT OF MARKETS IN NEW ENGLAND STATES FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES' PRODUCTS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister having officials of his department meet with officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding a possible seminar of businessmen and trade consultants on the increased development of markets for the industries of the Atlantic provinces in the New England states?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker. I shall inquire if meetings are being held and I shall inform the hon. member.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSITION OF FORMER EMPLOYEES OF AUTOMOBILE PARTS SUPPLIERS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and is further to the question directed to him late in the question period on Wednesday, December 9, last. What provisions, if any, are being made for the former employees of auto parts suppliers through the auto parts agreement or otherwise?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must apologize to the hon. member for not being as expansive as I ought to have been at the time. I misunderstood the question. If lay-offs in the auto industry are directly connected with the auto pact, those employees temporarily out of work during the transitional period are entitled to transitional assistance benefits to supplement unemployment insurance according to the specific formula which assures them of an income of approximately 65 per cent of their normal income.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Ryan: Is the government concerned in any direct way with these former employees, particularly in view of the fact that the closing of these supply plants seems likely to continue and as the government had something to do with the proliferation of these plants in the first place?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the particular provision to which I alluded will be in existence until December, 1972. A particular board is responsible for evaluating these lay-offs. If they consider that these lay-offs are a direct result of the auto pact, the transitional assistance benefits come into effect.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Will the minister consider discussing with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, the lay-offs in the automobile parts industries and attempt to persuade his colleague to peg the Canadian dollar which might prevent further closings?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is in the form of a submission.

LABOUR RELATIONS

GENERAL MOTORS STRIKE—ACTION TO EXPEDITE SETTLEMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Has the Minister of Labour been in touch with the Minister of Labour of Ontario to see whether the federal government can offer and make available services which might be of assistance in solving the General Motors strike?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member is repeating a question which was asked on Friday.

HUMAN RIGHTS

POLICE SURVEILLANCE OF UNIVERSITY CAMPUSES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman reaffirm the policy of the Pearson government so that in the interests of freedom of thought, expression and teaching there will be no police surveillance of university campuses?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm the policy of the government that there will be no more surveillance of campuses than of any other segment of Canadian society.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

OBJECTIVITY OF INTERVIEWS OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the Senate mass media report indicates that approximately 70 per cent of television viewers are willing to overlook distorted reporting, is it the government's intention to advise the president of the CBC that some people are very concerned about the fact that almost every time the Prime Minister is interviewed by CBC personnel a distortion caused by blatant, differential fawning occurs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that the question is not acceptable in those terms.

Mr. Rose: May I rephrase the question?

Mr. Trudeau: Try rephrasing your thinking.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might like to try a different question.

Mr. Rose: What is the Secretary of State prepared to do to increase more objective reporting on CBC television?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question contains an allegation and in that sense it is not in order.

INCLUSION OF HOTEL EMPLOYEES UNDER MINIMUM WAGE LEGISLATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister report to the House any progress in his efforts to have the employees of Canadian National hotels brought under the minimum wage legislation passed by this Parliament?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, henceforth that particular question would be best directed to the Minister of Justice as the Department of Labour has asked the Department of Justice to pursue the line I have already recommended on several occasions in the House.

Mr. McGrath: I redirect my question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister prepared to support the Minister of Labour in this very just and worthy cause in order to expedite a decision on this matter?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, Canadian National Railways has sought an order in the nature of certiorari before the Supreme Court of Alberta against the Canada Labour Relations Board and the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. These proceedings will raise constitutional questions respecting the application of federal labour legislation generally to the hotel operations of the railway company. Until this question having constitutional import is decided by the Supreme Court of Alberta, there is no justification for any further legal action against the company in that regard either by way of prosecution or otherwise.

Mr. McGrath: Can the Minister of Justice assure the House that the federal government will be represented at this hearing because of the special interest of Parliament with regard to this matter?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PENITENTIARIES

PRINCE ALBERT—INQUIRY AS TO TRANSFER OF WARDEN

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I have a question for the Acting Solicitor General. In view of the problems at the Prince Albert penitentiary, is the minister considering the transfer of the warden of that penitentiary?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): Not that I know of, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSFER OF FEMALE INMATES FROM MATSQUI TO KINGSTON

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Solicitor General with regard to the closing of the Matsqui correctional unit in British Columbia. Has the minister or the government had an opportunity to reconsider this proposal in view of the fact it will result in the loss of 65 correctional staff jobs in British Columbia?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

EXPLOSIVES AND ARMS SEIZED FROM FLQ

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister say whether there have been any further seizures of explosives and arms from FLQ arsenals? If so, will he indicate the extent of such seizures and the amount of the remaining explosives and arms available to the FLQ?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Even if that question could be answered with any precision, Mr. Speaker, I do not have with me further specific figures since the last time I addressed the House on the subject.

COMBINES

ALLEGED MONOPOLY IN ALBERTA BROILER INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On November 12 I asked the minister a question with regard to an alleged monopoly in the Alberta broiler industry by the Alberta Poultry Marketers Co-operative. Is the minister now in a position to indicate what progress has been made with respect to the investigation being conducted by his officials, particularly with regard to possible breaches of the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, the report was referred to the proper officials of the Combines Investigation Branch. Under the Act, progress of an investigation is not reported except in the annual report of the director or in the event charges are laid involving an infraction of the Combines Investigation Act.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Mazankowski: After the investigation is completed, will the minister be making a report to the House in view of the fact the matter was raised in the House?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, completed investigations are reported in the annual report of the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE OF FRANCE IN TEACHING OF FRENCH IN MANITOBA

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

A delegation from Manitoba went to France recently to assess the possibilities of getting some assistance for the teaching of French in that province. Could the Secretary of State tell us if these negotiations have been approved and conducted according to federal government requirements?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs can answer this question and not the Secretary of State.

Mr. Ricard: Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I shall repeat it in English.

[English]

A short time ago a delegation from the province of Manitoba visited France in order to study the possibility of obtaining assistance in the teaching of French in the province of Manitoba. Can the minister state whether the conducting of these negotiations has been approved by the federal government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think it is a question of approval, Mr. Speaker. As far as I know, any representations were made in accordance with the Canadian constitution and did not raise any constitutional issues.

WELFARE

DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES ON ASSISTANCE FOR SINGLE UNEMPLOYED PERSONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that reports continue to come in that single unemployed persons are being denied welfare in some provinces because the municipalities are naturally reluctant to assume responsibility for those who are not residents, will the minister undertake to conduct discussions with the provincial governments to see if some arrangement can be worked out so that such single unemployed persons who do not have domicile in a particular community can be taken care of rather than being pushed from pillar to post?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me this question was asked earlier, but possibly it was not answered and the minister might wish to reply.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have read some of the reports to which I believe the leader of the New Democratic Party has referred. After meeting many of the provincial welfare ministers a few weeks ago, I can say that this is not a prevalent practice throughout Canada, though it may be happening here and there. To the degree that it is, I shall be pleased to talk the matter over with the welfare ministers whom I shall be meeting shortly.

HEALTH

INCLUSION OF PARAMEDICAL SERVICES UNDER MEDICARE

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. May I ask whether at his conference last week the question of including certain paramedical services in the national medicare plan was discussed and, if so, whether any progress was made toward a consensus on this matter?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it was discussed, and it was decided we should examine this question of the extension of coverage together with the financial implications of the present sharing arrangements and of health insurance programs generally.

Mr. Rowland: Is the minister in a position to tell us when we might expect a more specific announcement?

Mr. Munro: Well, we agreed to look into this whole matter with the provinces over the course of the next few months, and until we are in a position to reach a more definite conclusion I would have nothing more helpful to advise the House.

IMMIGRATION

IMPROVEMENT OF APPEAL BOARD STRUCTURE TO DEAL WITH BACKLOG OF CASES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the government taking any steps to improve the Immigration Appeal Board structure and procedure having regard to the 14-month backlog of appeals waiting to be heard?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure this question was asked some days ago. It may be, however, that there have been developments since then which would make it more relevant today, so in these terms and to this extent the question would be in order.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will take this question as notice and I will refer it to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

NATIONAL LIBRARY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State inform the House when he will be appointing the national advisory council which was provided for under the terms of the National Library Act approved by Parliament over a year ago?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's question as notice and I will look into it to see where we stand.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ESCALATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Secretary of State.

Can the minister answer now my question of November 26 regarding the retired employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The CBC intends to give its retired employees the same benefits as those granted to Public Service employees but the implementation of this policy is subject to an agreement with the representatives of the employees and to considerations proper to the administration of a Crown Corporation pension fund.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I extend my thanks to the minister, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

PROVISION OF SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE, LOAN GUARANTEE, ETC.

The House resumed from Friday, December 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchand (Langelier) that Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: A brief point of order, Your Honour more for the sake of clarification than for obtaining some order from the House. Votes and Proceedings of Friday, December 11, includes an order of the day under the notices of committee meetings which indicates that this bill, Bill C-205, is to be considered by the Standing Committee at 3.30 this afternoon. While I understand there was some discussion on this question, and it was hoped the bill might have been dealt with, the committee is obviously not seized with jurisdiction so no such order can be made.

There is every hope, though, that with the spirit of goodwill which has finally made its way over to the other side of the House, we might get rid of this bill so that the committee would have jurisdiction. Perhaps either now, or before we leave the subject, the House will permit an order to be made enabling the committee to deal with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe the suggestion made by the Opposition House leader is a good one, and perhaps it could be agreed that when the order is passed the standing committee can consider the bill as soon as it can conveniently arrange its affairs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to continue the remarks I was making on Friday in this debate on Bill C-205 which seeks to offer assistance to industry and provide for further loans similar to those applying to fishermen, farmers and small businessmen, in addition to extending the designated areas so as to include Montreal and southeastern Ontario.

About a year and a half ago, when the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created, I recall having serious reservations on the subject of the powers accorded by the act to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), powers which I believe to be excessive. I felt that once a minister had been given such powers he was in a position to convert them into a type of dictatorial exercise; moreover, they might be used for the purpose of extensive political advantage. Nevertheless, I put these misgivings aside, feeling that since we have a cabinet made up of some 30 ministers and a Liberal caucus of some 130 members, any activity of this kind would be curtailed. Perhaps I was wrong. Perhaps I have been naïve.

I have always been aware that a cabinet is in itself a form of dictatorship, since there are 20 or 30 men who make all the important decisions. I have always felt that government is best when there is such a divergence of opinion that no one minister can take advantage of a situation. Looking at the present bill, I have to say that every member from the Atlantic provinces, every member from areas in western Canada where there is regional disparity, takes exception to the proposals contained in it. I am surprised that the ministers from Newfoundland, from Nova Scotia and from Prince Edward Island, together with the ministers from western provinces, have not prevented Bill C-205 from coming before the House. When members like the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), as well as the entire opposition, raise an issue in respect of the principle of Bill C-205, perhaps they are like voices in the wilderness because it is possibly a fait accompli.

I have an article by Gordon Aalborg, which appeared in the Edmonton Journal, in which he refers to a quotation from an official of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Michael Fitzgerald to the effect that incentives boundaries are extremely flexible. He indicates that it is at the discretion of the department to decide which areas should become designated and which areas should receive special incentives. He indicates also that this act gives little direction to the minister and that most of the decisions are made at his discretion, justified only by the unemployment situation. For example, when the minister designates the Montreal area or parts of southeastern Ontario, he can refer to the fact that at the present moment in Quebec unemployment stands at 7.2 per cent, up from 6.3 per cent in November of 1969. He can also cite, in respect of specific parts of southeastern Ontario, which has a very heavy unemployment rate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether hon. members would mind if I drew to their attention the fact that there are many conversations going on in all areas of the House, and that is unfair to the hon. member who has the floor. It is certainly difficult for the Chair to follow the hon. member. If these conversations have to be carried on in the House, perhaps they could be done sotto voce. I think it might be appropriate to carry on the conversations behind the curtains.

Mr. Lundrigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am mainly interested in the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion hearing my presentation and I think he is listening. Perhaps other hon. members have made up their minds or have not even read the bill and are not aware of its consequences. The minister is aware of the unemployment situation in Quebec. I wonder whether he is fully aware of the fact that at the present moment, regardless of the historic reason behind it, in the province which I represent there is an unemployment rate of 9.1 per cent, even higher than the critical unemployment rate of last November. This is the highest unemployment rate in any area of any province in Canada. During this winter, this rate will likely soar to about 20 per cent.

At this time the minister is using as a tool to fight the unemployment situation across Canada the special powers of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. In 1968, during the debate, and in 1969 when approval was given by the House, certain principles were agreed to in respect of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It was to be a tool to be used to fight specific problems in certain parts of Canada, a tool to fight regional disparity. It was never agreed that the department was to be used as an instrument to combat the economic ills across the nation.

If the minister follows the logic of designating highly industrialized parts of Canada, then he has no alternative but to designate the whole province of British Columbia which today has the second highest unemployment rate in Canada. This rate has increased to 8.6 per cent from 5.6 per cent in 1969. I do not think hon. members from the province of British Columbia would argue against the suggestion that we should designate British Columbia. They might argue that we should have special provisions brought in by the government to accommodate serious economic crises in various parts of Canada, including British Columbia, and I would agree with that. We need special measures to help particular parts of Ontario, and Montreal, which require incentives of various types in the form of economic aid and assistance during this crisis period of extensive unemployment. I do not think this Regional Development Incentives Act should be diluted by the patchwork designation of regions just because they face this kind of situation. Perhaps the minister is in agreement that there is a lot behind this move, and that before all this is over history will record what is now taking place in this cabinet and this government.

The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, in their Newsletter for November, 1970, makes some observations about the distribution of incentive grants in various parts of Canada. The letter reads in part:

> The incentives program seems to be having little or no effect in broadening the industrial base of the region, the bulk of the grants being made in the food and beverages and wood industries—the two industries which are the backbone of the existing manufacturing base. Nor are the grants proving useful in promoting the establishment of growth centres—

The same newsletter goes on to quote the distribution of grants from October 21, 1969 to September, 1970, one year. During that period there were 285 industrial incentive grants made in Canada; 11 were made to the province of Newfoundland; 9 to Prince Edward Island; 30 to Nova Scotia and 34 to New Brunswick. The province of Quebec received 104 grants, 22 went to Ontario, 65 to the Prairie provinces and 10 to the province of British Columbia. The total amount of grants represented $79 million offered as incentives to industry in Canada. The province of Newfoundland received less than $1 million or a percentage of 1.1 of the total incentives. In the province of Newfoundland, there is a much higher percentage of the total population than those figures would seem to suggest. Prince Edward Island received just over $500,000, less than 1 per cent. Nova Scotia received $20 million or 25 per cent. New Brunswick received $7.9 million or 10 per cent. Quebec received $30 million or 38 per cent. Ontario received $10 million, or 12 per cent. The Prairie received a total of $8.7 million or 11 per cent and British Columbia received less than $500,000, or less than 1 per cent of the total grants. Those are the particulars prepared by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council.

I understand the Council will have representatives appear before the committee when it meets to receive representations on Bill C-205. There is very serious concern on the part of this Council and the Atlantic provinces about the moves being made by the minister, the cabinet and the government, specifically in respect of regional disparity and development. We have, in the Atlantic provinces, a type of economic fibre unlike that of Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver. We have a multiplicity of small industries and small businesses. Many of these people know very little about the sophisticated international money markets or monetary and fiscal policies. We hoped that the incentives built into the regional economic expansion program would help a lot of the small industries indigenous to the regions to which I refer. I refer to the Atlantic provinces, the lower parts of the Prairies, the northern part of Ontario and rural parts of Quebec. These are the areas which require assistance in developing industries which are local and indigenous in nature to these areas.

Instead, we understand that 75 per cent of the total incentives have been outright gifts to multi-national corporations. I have in mind the announcement of a $12 million grant to a particular firm in Canada. I am not taking exception to this, but can hon. members of the House imagine where the bulk of the incentives are going to go in the industrialized parts of Canada, such as Montreal, which is designated as a special incentive area? Can hon. members imagine a small lumber dealer, a small fish plant operator or a small farmer in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, or even in my own province, trying to compete with these great multi-national organizations? This is the kind of thing which will ruin regional development in this nation and the whole Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

I am not against special emergency problems. I am not against special measures to help any part of Canada which has economic disparity or special economic crises. I could refer to certain cities which have had heavy unemployment this year caused by the government's mistaken attack on inflation, by the use of unemployment as a lever. I am not against that. I believe this is a necessary reaction to a situation the government has itself created. It is necessary to have special measures, but I do not think we should prostitute the industrial incentives Act in such a way that we dilute its effectiveness in parts of Canada where there are particular problems. I am against that and I do not agree with it.

We have been asking that special monetary and fiscal policy be adopted in special regions in Canada. I could not take the time to express even my own limited opinions concerning how monetary and fiscal policies should be adopted for special regions. This, however, is what the government must do if it is sincere in its fight against regional disparity. On Friday, the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) made a statement which sums up my views to a "T" about the need for the special regional development effort being oriented to the resources of particular areas. I say, for example, that in the last year and a half there has been a real contradiction in respect of the government's effort in the Atlantic region. The government has moved in to do two things. First, it has provided infrastructure in areas where this was inadequate. It has provided public services to attract industries where public services were lacking. Having provided these things, the government provided incentives for those industries which would move in and take advantage of the provision of the infrastructure.

Now, we have the government designating areas where there is already the incentive and the infrastructure. It is only a matter of an industry picking up an outright gift from the government to establish in an area in which it already has easy accessibility to the Canadian and world markets. We have asked the government to consider adapting their regional development policies so that they would be based on the industry in the area. I can speak with some conviction about my own province. Last year the government brought in an $82 million two-year program of special area grants and loans for the provision of the necessary infrastructure in the area, but not a single penny of that expenditure was directed to the resources of the area. There has never been a grant, for example, to assist in establishing facilities for the fishing industry which is the most important industry in my province. Not a single penny has been spent on this.

The minister and his officials sit in their offices. These officials are very capable men; you had better believe that. They have minds like computers and they have the assistance of computers. These officials have figured out what the economy of any area needs. They have paid no attention to the representations of the people or of the members from the area. They have designed a type of program that will elimintate the rural economy of Atlantic Canada. I am not against the relocation of people, but an approach has been designed which will mean the elimination of the rural economy. This includes the fishing industry, the traditional industry, the farming industry and the forest industry in the Atlantic region. This will be the result of the type of approach the government has designed, the elimination of the rural economy. If I had time, I believe I could prove that the government is hung-up tight on the question of urbanization across Canada, giving little consideration to the residents of the various areas.

I could point to transportation and regional development policies, as well as the lack of effort on the part of the Department of Public Works, the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, and perhaps the Department of Agriculture. I believe these policies have all been designed to hasten the already serious urbanization of the population across the entire nation without regard to the human consequences involved. In various parts of Canada, we have chronic unemployment problems which did not originate in 1970. They go away back in history. I do not think the federal government must assume the full responsibility for the heavy unemployment, for example, in my province any more than for the heavy unemployment in the province of Quebec. I think all hon. members from the province of Quebec, and other parts of Canada, could from their experience and from their reading concerning the history of Quebec find several reasons for the serious economic crisis in that province. If the government should proceed with Bill C-205 as it presently exists, I think this will mean it has given up the fight on regional disparity.

The Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) promise to the nation about regional disparity and regional development has become a farce. We cannot attract industry away from Montreal, and we should not attract industry away from Montreal or Toronto. However, I would hope we could have special types of incentives that would help us develop the economy in respect of our own indigenous natural resources. I could refer, for example, to the economy of Prince Edward Island, where there is a heavily based agricultural economy or my own province where there should be a heavily based fishing economy and also a forest and wood products economy. We receive very little incentive. I could point to all kinds of examples in my own area where men have endeavoured to obtain incentives for the forest and fishing industries. These incentives have been denied on technicalities because the members of the minister's department, either by instruction or on their own, have ignored the problems peculiar to these areas. They have interpreted the regulations exactly to suit themselves. The minister can go ahead now and announce a $12 million incentive for one of the largest companies in the world because he has the flexibility.

The headline on the article in the Edmonton Journal reads "Incentives area boundaries extremely flexible". Mr. Michael Fitzgerald explains how the minister has all the discretionary powers he wants. Yet, he sits back there in his cozy complacency and refuses to adopt any policies which would suit the indigenous industries of our area, particularly the fishing industry. Now, he intends to place all the provinces of Canada and pretty well all the regions of Canada on the same footing. Joe Batts Arm, Fogo Island, South Western Nova, the south shore, Dartmouth and all these other parts of Canada must compete for the same incentives with what is basically one of the largest and the most complex industrial economies in Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to touch on the minister's loans program. The minister announced that one of the big changes in legislation now will come about as a result of Bill C-205's provisions for lending to service industries. This week three types of loan programs administered by the federal government should have come before Parliament. One is the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, another is the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the third is the Small Businesses Loans Act. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, the Minister without Portfolio for Finance and the Minister of Finance will agree with me that these three loan programs are not worth two cents so far as the small growth parts of Canada are concerned, because once this chamber gives its approval the legislation will be administered by the banks and the banks scuttle loans in the slow-growth areas of our country. They are scuttling the loans because the government is asking the banks to lend money under a government guarantee with a pegged interest rate of 7 per cent to 8 per cent. I am saying that the banks are scuttling these loans. They refuse to lend the money because, with the tight money situation, they can lend money at the much higher interest rate of 12 per cent and do not have to worry about the government's program.

On December 1, I presented documented evidence in the House of Commons for the record, and for the information of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and his assistants, which indicated that small businessmen, fishermen and farmers have gone to banks but have been refused loans under government acts and that the banks have then made loans under demand loan banking procedure. In other words, they have deliberately scuttled the act. I say this legislation is window dressing and the minister knows it will not work in our area. The only people who will be able to take advantage of loans under Bill C-205 are the relatively large businesses in sophisticated parts of Canada. They can do so because they know the ropes. They can go to banks because they have done it for years and years, and they can take advantage of the situation. People in the slow growth areas where money is tightest cannot take advantage of the legislation. I have quoted statistics to show that under the act 800 loans were made in Canada but only two of them were made in my province, even though the act is supposed to be administered equally across the nation.

Hon. members have listened to the debate on Bill C-205 but I want to repeat my position. I am not against special measures for the city of Montreal, which undoubtedly is suffering serious economic problems at the moment. I am not against special measures being taken in southeastern Ontario, and I would like to see special programs brought in for British Columbia. I understand that the prognostications for the city of Vancouver are that it will have a 12 per cent unemployment rate this winter. The effect of this on young people, and on the population as a whole, will be tragic and frightening.

I think such special measures should be brought in, but I consider that the program under Bill C-205 is designed to even out the economic disparities in Canada in all regions, and our region on the east coast of Canada should have the same basic opportunities as the other regions in Canada. This is the aim of the bill and the end result will perhaps be achieved in a couple of generations. The present move indicates the government has given up the fight against regional disparity and is ignoring the underlying reasons for it. I am amazed at members of the cabinet from the Atlantic region, two of whom are in the House at present, and members of the cabinet from the Prairie region not taking a very strong exception to this bill. This act should never be used as a tool to try to solve economic crises across this nation.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): I should like to have a heart to heart talk with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) regarding Bill C-205. He and I have a great deal in common. We both came to the House in 1965. We have the same first name—he is Jean and I am John—and he has a French background while I have an Irish background, which indicates volatility and passion. He is a man of good instincts, like most Irish and French people. He is both concerned and compassionate. He comes from working class parents, as I do, and, like myself, he has at first struggled with a minimum of success. He has a labour background and most of his time has been spent in the trade union movement. I myself, have not been that close to the trade union movement but at one time I was an organizer and I think I am acquainted with some of the hopes and aspirations of trade union people. He has had a reasonable success in his position as a trade union leader. I think I will let you in on a secret, Mr. Speaker, and tell you that he attended the NDP founding convention in 1961, not as a delegate but as an observer. Later he did not see fit to join the party.

Mr. Baldwin: He made an even worse choice.

Mr. Gilbert: In 1965, he made the decision to join the Liberal party, I would assume on the basis that he wanted to do something for Quebec. He may have thought that the NDP were not in a position to wield power and bring about the changes that he had close to his heart to help the people of Quebec. That was a serious mistake. The result was that in due time he was appointed minister of immigration. I may say that he had a fair success in this portfolio because he appreciated some of the problems of immigrants. The record shows that he did a good and a fair job as minister of immigration. As Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, he has not been as successful. I have often thought that he should have been appointed minister of labour. It would have been more in keeping with his talents, his compassion and the fine instincts he possesses. But he has not had that opportunity to exercise some of his fine instincts. He has been almost totally dependent on his economic advisers, and this has cramped his style because he is not used to the jargon of the economists which is so difficult to understand at times.

Hon. members may recall that a year and a half ago he was responsible for passing the Regional Development Incentives Act. Today, we have before us Bill C-205, to amend that particular act. In his speech the other day he indicated that 15,945 permanent jobs had been created as a direct result, and also that for each of these jobs two additional jobs have been created, bringing a grand total of 48,000 jobs as a result of the act. I think that all of us should know that as of November 30 there were 476,000 unemployed people in Canada, and the minister said in his speech that in October the figures for Quebec showed a grand total of 159,000 people unemployed. The minister then said quite rightly that the legislation was far from enough with regard to meeting the unemployment situation in Canada. I happened to interject right then and the minister told me he had reached that figure far quicker than I had. It is really what is known as a plea of guilty to the charge that not only the act but the implementation of the act has been far from successful.

I am the last person to blame the likeable Minister of Regional Economic Expansion for the total unemployment picture in Canada, because the first reason for unemployment is the government's over-all economic policy regarding inflation which allowed a high level of unemployment to develop. This is the weapon that the government has used to meet inflation. The minister knows that most of our inflation has been imported from the United States, and one of the things that must strike him—certainly it strikes me very hard—is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has attempted to place the problem of inflation at the door of trade unions in Canada. I am sure the minister knows that, so far as trade unions are concerned, only 35 per cent of the working force in Canada is organized.

I am sure he knows that the inflation has been caused by high prices for goods and services, doctor's fees, lawyers' fees, and high interest rates over which the government has had no control. Yet the government speaks of unions, and demands that they conform to guidelines. I am positive that if the minister were a trade union leader today he would have refused to accept the 6 per cent guidelines imposed by the government, for the sole reason that trade union members should not be made to bear the brunt of inflation. Then, we had the Prime Minister telling the auto workers that they were screwing the people of Canada, which is both vulgar and wrong.

The second point to be made concerns not only the government's over-all policy with regard to inflation but its policy with regard to the provision of too much aid to foreign companies. To allow grants and give-aways to foreign corporations is a sell-out of the development of a strong and independent economic framework for Canada. If the minister supports the continentalism of most of his colleagues he will throw away the political, economic, cultural and linguistic freedoms of the people of Quebec, submerging the people of Quebec in anonymity. I ask the minister, do we have a quid pro quo with regard to aid to Canadian companies operating in the United States, with the U.S. providing assistance to them in the same way that he wants to help foreign companies operating in Canada? He knows as well as I do that the answer is absolutely no. He knows as well as I do that at present our American friends are attempting to set up barriers against the importation of goods into their country. To provide foreign companies with give-aways on the basis indicated in the minister's speech, that it is really for the purpose of creating jobs, is really a short-sighted view.

The minister has been in this House since the days of the Gordon theory of economic independence. He has been in this House since the receipt of the Watkins report. Now, he is anxiously awaiting the report from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) with regard to foreign control. But he knows full well that any report brought down by the Minister of National Revenue will be soft and lenient with regard to foreign control in Canada. I would have thought the minister would have taken some lead from countries like Japan and Sweden which exercise direct control with regard to foreign ownership.

A third reason that the minister has had a short fall of success in his department is that he has placed too much dependence upon private enterprise. It seems to me that the corporations have the government by the throat, simply by financing political campaigns. I always remember the minister saying that he had to determine where the moneys came from to support his party, and that when he did know he would take action. I do not know if he has decided where the moneys come from, but I can tell him they come from the corporations that directly control the party in power. Therefore the minister, like many of his colleagues, is just a marionette for the corporate manipulators. The minister is also a prisoner of his own officials, whose main aim is not to rock the economic boat. This is like asking the minister to swim across the St. Lawrence River with both arms tied behind his back.

The minister has some knowledge of what happened in my riding with regard to the Dunlop Corporation. He has seen how futile it is at times to depend on private enterprise, and in particular foreign controlled private enterprise, to solve unemployment problems in Canada. In the case of Dunlop, he knows that a very quick decision was made, not by the Canadian division of the company but by the English division, to close its plant in Toronto, thereby laying off 600 men, many of whom had long service with the company. He also knows that even though it stopped its operations in Toronto, Dunlop continues to operate in another country where labour and material costs are much cheaper than they are in Canada. Yet he continues to place an almost blind faith in the operations of private enterprise firms.

There are two main proposals in the minister's bill, one covering grants and the other covering other incentives on a short-term basis. But the lesson to be learned from all of this, Mr. Speaker, is that private enterprise has achieved a record of failure in creating and maintaining full employment in Canada. I would have thought the minister would have gone further with one of the basic socialist principles of over-all economic planning, and within such a framework could set guidelines to achieve the desired result.

The minister, Mr. Speaker, has a perfect right to ask me, "John, what is your answer to the problem"? In a very few minutes I shall attempt to set forth what I think should be the approach to unemployment in Canada. First, Mr. Speaker, I would not designate practically the whole of Canada as designated areas, but this is what the minister has done. I would prefer to concentrate on particular areas, where incentives would place industries in a strong competitive export position, and also enable them to charge reasonable domestic prices. The minister is quite sensitive about spreading out the moneys at his disposal across Canada. I think he is making a mistake. He is quite sensitive to the charge of showing favouritism to Quebec, but I think he has substantiated the fact that there is not any favouritism to Quebec. The minister should know that there are serious economic and social problems in Quebec. If he feels he should direct the moneys at his disposal to the solution of those problems he should not worry about the charge of showing favouritism. Quebec has a tremendously high unemployment rate, and it has tremendous social problems. I hope the minister has the boldness and courage to meet those problems head on.

On another point, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to see the minister allowing companies to establish themselves in small towns, pay low wages, and not encourage trade union development. One must be very careful that companies applying for loans do not have the intention of modernizing their plant in some small town, paying low wages to the local people, and going on to ignore trade union development. The minister should not be taken in by corporation directors on this point.

As reported at page 1,928 of Hansard, the minister said that as a result of the implementation of Bill C-205:

> The decisions will get increasingly more complex and important. That is why I suggest the creation of a board comprising senior officials of my department, representatives of the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as well as specialists from the private sector.

You, Mr. Speaker, coming from the town of Cornwall, knowing the importance of the textile industry to Cornwall and the importance of trade union development, would have hoped, I am sure, that the least the minister could have done would have been to include trade union officials on this board to help in the determination of the decisions. I am surprised and ashamed that the minister would not include trade union officials on the board. He is a prisoner of the officials of his department. Why would he not include trade union officials from the Canadian Congress of Labour and from the CNTU in Quebec, which he did so much to develop and maintain? I would ask him to give serious consideration to including trade union officials on the board who might help in arriving at some sensible decisions.

Third, Mr. Speaker, I would develop Crown corporations and encourage Canadian enterprise. The minister is very familiar with the Polymer Corporation, with Air Canada, with Sidbec Corporation in his own province and with DEVCO. These have been very successful companies. These Crown corporations were set up to meet a particular requirement.

I should like to address the minister for a few minutes with regard to Industrial Estates Limited in the province of Nova Scotia. That province attempted to meet a situation in the Maritimes by setting up the industrial estates to train men in particular industries. One industry that they helped develop was the electronics and television industry, as a result of which Clairtone had a special arrangement with the government. The purpose of this enterprise was to try and capture some of the northeastern market of the United States. It should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that there are nine television companies operating in Canada, seven of which are American owned and two of which are Canadian owned, those being Clairtone and Electrohome in Ontario. Clairtone's efforts to capture the market of the northeastern section of the United States have not been too successful. From what I have heard in the Finance Committee, this was because the American companies threw a block in its way. It was easy for them to do this; they just said that Canada could not meet the service requirements, thereby making it very, very difficult for Clairtone to operate with success. If Clairtone fails, Mr. Speaker, that will not only create unemployment in Nova Scotia but it will mean also that Canada will have only one company left to develop the television, radio and electronic business in this country.

Where is all the research and development done? For the American firms, it is done in the United States. Where is the advertising done? That is done in the United States as well. We may become captives of our American friends, not only with regard to television sets but also with regard to a series of other appliances such as refrigerators. I think the minister will have to give new initiative, new help and a new look to the development of Crown corporations in Canada if he wants to increase employment. These American companies set up branch plants in Canada to serve our domestic market and have little or no interest in the development of an export market. It is difficult to create employment with branch plants whose main purpose is to sell only to the domestic market.

I would have hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the minister would have developed a Crown building corporation, something like General Motors. We could have looked to CMHC for financing and could have specialized in building housing for senior citizens, public housing and co-operative housing across Canada. We could have applied pressure to the banks and trust companies for the direction of investment moneys. There is no reason why we should not do that. We could have used all the building techniques developed by the National Research Council, bulk buying and so forth, and perhaps we could have solved the problem that prevails across this country. When considering the housing record of the city of Montreal, we realize it is no wonder that organizations such as FRAP and movements such as the Separatists come into being. They see no future in the federal system for Canada.

I would hope that the minister would develop a Crown corporation to manufacture drugs, thereby bringing down prices and helping to create employment. Polymer Corporation and its chemical techniques could be used to provide some of the basic drugs. Thus far, the minister is depending on private enterprise. As a final challenge to the minister, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that he would develop a new Canadian car. It is shocking that small countries such as Sweden, Italy, France and England are sending cars to Canada and that the Renault Company is assembling cars here. Surely, we have the talent and resources at Sidbec Corporation in Quebec to provide the steel required. We have young engineers with talent. But the minister sits idly and allows American, European and Japanese concerns to capture the market.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the minister could use some of these ideas which I have advanced for the spending of moneys rather than just depending on private enterprise. If I were minister, Mr. Speaker, I would not give one penny to foreign corporations. The minister has given a large share of these moneys to foreign companies and this is hurting Canadian enterprise. Surely, the trend to foreign ownership should be curbed. When companies apply for grants, I suggest to the minister that he scrutinize any contracts made between those companies and the government to make sure that the companies pay fair wages and have some trade union representation. Should this not be the case, then the purpose for which the moneys were allocated is being ill served. All I am saying to the minister, Mr. Speaker, is, "Don't sell yourself to the fat cats. Return to your role as spokesman for labour." This is his rightful place in the cabinet; his place is not as spokesman and apologist for corporate fat cats. "Rise up, Jean Marchand; be done with lesser ideas and men and give your heart and strength—"

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to rise up and remind the hon. member that he should address the Chair.

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am just on my final piece of poetry and through you I would say, "Rise up, Jean Marchand; be done with lesser ideas and men. Give your heart and soul and mind and strength to serve your fellow men."

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton).

Mr. Burton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister is going to close the debate. A good many questions have been raised and if the minister could enlighten the House on some of them, I think we would save a great deal of time on subsequent proceedings.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I intend to answer, before the committee, the numerous questions which have been asked during this debate.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Marchand (Langelier), seconded by Mr. Munro, moved that Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thought that the motion needed a seconder.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member does not realize that the Chair is now referring to the motion which was moved when the bill was introduced on second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

TAX REVIEW BOARD BILL

ESTABLISHMENT, DUTIES, APPEALS, ORGANIZATIONS, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-174, to establish a tax review board and to make certain other amendments to other acts in relation thereto, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I move

That Bill C-174, an act to establish the Tax Review Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in relation thereto, be amended by striking out line 13 of subclause 22(3) at page 13 and substituting the following:

'controversy does not exceed $2,500 the'

On page iii at the back of the order paper, will be found a revised recommendation. This was inserted at my request. It was done after there had been certain consultations, to meet the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on second reading. I think there would be some disposition in the House to allow that recommendation to be changed by unanimous consent. Perhaps the amendment that has just been put might then be considered.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since the recommendation has now been so amended, may I say that this particular amendment was suggested in committee by the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan), I think. The committee agreed unanimously. Obviously, a minister's approval was necessary because this matter affects ways and means. I have agreed. This amendment reflects the unanimous decision of the committee. You will notice that the recommendation has to be amended accordingly.

Motion (Mr. Turner, Ottawa-Carleton) agreed to.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-174, to establish the tax review board and to make certain amendments to other acts in relation thereto, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Baldwin: By leave, now.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I once more thank the House for its courtesy. Also, may I correct my reference to the hon. member who suggested the amendment referred to previously. It was the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode).

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Canada Grain Bill

INVESTMENT COMPANIES BILL

FILING OF STATEMENTS AND INFORMATION, QUALIFICATIONS AND DUTIES OF AUDITORS, TRANSFER OF SHARES, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-3, respecting investment companies, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-3, respecting investment companies, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. Baldwin: By leave, now.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen (for Mr. Benson) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA GRAIN BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION, PROVISIONS RESPECTING GRADING LICENCES, ELEVATORS, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-175, respecting grain, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are some amendments to be moved, are there not?

Mr. Speaker: Since the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) is not in the House, perhaps hon. members will agree to consider motion No. 2, in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I move:

That Bill C-175, an act respecting grain, be amended by deleting Clause 41 and by renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly.

I only hope, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members will lend an ear to what is said on this important amendment. Clause 41 of the bill as now drawn would constitute an entirely new approach to legislation affecting grain in Canada. There is nothing like it in the old Canada Grain Act. Perhaps I ought to say, first of all, that the bill sets out the powers and objectives of the Board of Grain Commissioners. Clause 41 constitutes a new departure inasmuch as it includes a new provision under which the Board of Grain Commissioners may stop payment on stored grain if there is a labour stoppage on the part of certain employees. The idea here is that if grain is not in a position from which it can be delivered, the fault must therefore lie with the elevator companies and storage payments to them ought to be stopped. This clause will seriously affect the whole question of wage negotiations conducted through the process of bargaining. Clause 41 provides that storage charges will be paid for the first seven days, but if there is a dispute they will not be paid thereafter. From my reading of subclause 2 of clause 41, it is apparent that the payment of storage charges will cease after seven days under certain conditions.

At present, the government is greatly concerned about holding the line on costs in our society. It wishes to hold the line on cost inputs and, without doubt, labour costs are part of these inputs. In my opinion, clause 41 strengthens the hand of the unions and those negotiating on behalf of labour. It would strengthen their hand at the negotiating table. The clause provides categorically that, under certain conditions, storage payments will cease after seven days. In other words, the clause would encourage elevator companies to come to a settlement in any dispute before seven days, so that the storage payments would not be cut off.

The Manitoba pool elevator companies submitted a brief to the Standing Committee on May 26, 1970. On page 7 of the brief there is a reference to the question of wage negotiations. Also, United Grain Growers Limited, which has its head office in Winnipeg, wrote to the minister. A copy of the letter was sent to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. The letter contains this reference to clause 41 of the bill:

Section 41 of Bill C-175 could provide unions with undue advantage over terminal operators in any wage negotiations. We would suggest that while the holder of a warehouse receipt could be inconvenienced by an elevator labour stoppage, the elevator operators continue to incur the bulk of storage expenses throughout the period of a stoppage; and it would be prudent for the Act to limit specifically the Commission from reducing maximum storage charges to less than fifty per cent of the regular charge. We would further suggest that in the interests of producers, who in the final analysis pay the cost of elevator employee wages, maximum tariffs must be set at a level sufficient that undue bargaining leverage will not come into force.

The letter as written and signed by Mr. Runciman, the president of United Grain Growers Limited, and was sent to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I am sure the minister has a copy. The Manitoba pool and the United Grain Growers are owned by the producers. I quote what the North-West Line Elevators Association had to say:

Section 41 of the proposed Bill is an extraordinary piece of legislation. It is the opinion of this Association that this entire Section should be removed from the Bill rather than amended. Our reasoning for so recommending are fears of the harmful effects that this Section will have in promoting higher wage settlements to the detriment of producers. It should be noted that the bulk of the expenses incurred in storing grain in terminal elevators continue to be incurred whether the plant is operating or not.

The North-West Line Elevator Companies Association operates a series of elevators in the three Prairie provinces. They primarily operate under the title, the Pioneer Grain Company. I could read many, many submissions with regard to this particular clause. Most elevator companies have indicated their grave concern to the committee. There was nothing similar to this in the old grain act.

What has been the situation in the past? The last major work stoppage was at the Lakehead two years ago. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) was not very sympathetic to the producers and the elevator companies at that time. I will paraphrase a newspaper clipping concerning that situation. The minister said that if the grain trade had made a reasonable offer in the first place there would not have been a strike or the strike would have been shortlived. This is what he told the western farmers.

Two years ago the terminal grain handlers at the Lakehead were offered $1 an hour increase after much bargaining. Members of the office of the Minister of Labour intervened. A settlement was reached with $1.05 increase. The Minister of Agriculture cannot say that a reasonable offer was not made. Originally $1 was offered and the final settlement was for $1.05.

Mr. Olson: They did not.

Mr. Horner: The Minister may speak when I have concluded my remarks. A substantial increase was made two years ago. The contract is up for renewal this fall. Perhaps the end of this year will be the deadline. They are now asking for another 20 per cent increase in wages. Surely, the hand of the union does not have to be strengthened in today's economic set-up. I do not have anything against unions. They have played an important part in bringing about greater equity to those employed in the major industries in Canada and throughout the world. However, it is not the time for Canada to strengthen their hand at the bargaining table. Their hand does not need strengthening with regard to the handling of grain.

The hand of the union does not need strengthening in Vancouver or the Lakehead. Approximately 400 workers tied up the entire prairie economy. This was as the result of what happened in Vancouver a year ago. The entire prairie economy was affected when over 200 workers went on strike for a period of 26 weeks, half a year. Approximately 200,000 farmers were affected by slightly over 200 workers. Farmers repeatedly threatened to go to the coast to load the boats themselves, although they did not actually do this. After being on strike for 26 weeks in Vancouver, the workers finally settled for a 70 cent an hour wage increase with fringe benefits. The total cost to the companies was 87 cents an hour. This contract does not expire until the end of 1971.

Greater strength is being given to the unions at the bargaining table at a time when they are not acting like good Canadians. In his guidelines, Dr. Young proposed a 6 per cent wage increase and a 6 per cent price increase. We were told that the companies made a sincere effort to comply with this. However, they made no real efforts to comply with the suggestions and stated quite categorically that they would not comply. At times they deliberately went out of their way to prove that they were stronger and more forceful than the government. They convinced the government that wage increases in excess of 6 per cent were necessary.

A short time ago the grain trade settled for a huge increase. The grain trade can have serious effects on the whole matter of grain marketing. Hon. members know that the problems of grain and grain handling can create a massive financial problem for the producers of that commodity. A strike is only called when that industry is in a position to create economic chaos. For example, they do not strike when navigation on the St. Lawrence River is closed. It is to their advantage to strike when they can create the most pressure at the bargaining table.

The government has stated that labour must somehow control its wishes. A Prices and Incomes Commission was established to study price and wage increases. Huge sums of the taxpayers money were spent for this commission to travel across the country. On the other hand, government wage settlements indicate no attention was paid to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who stated the purposes of the commission. As I have said, the government puts forward a bill containing a clause which positively assists the unions at the bargaining table. This is what the United Grain Growers think; this is what the Manitoba pool thinks; this is what the North-West Line Elevator Company thinks; this is what the Federal Grain Elevator Company thinks—I could name a whole host. These are the people who will be negotiating on behalf of the producers for fair wage settlements. Hon. members can ask themselves: was there any provision of this kind in the old act? Remember, the old act was successful for 40 years; for 40 years it was conducive to peaceful wage negotiations and proved relatively satisfactory. I contend that this clause is an afterthought, included to meet the wishes of the board and in particular of the solicitor for the Wheat Board, Mr. Monk, I am told, who was tired of negotiating these arrangements and preferred a fixed pattern, going automatically into operation at the end of seven days. There was nothing in the old act along these lines and I urge the government to take the clause out of the bill before us, in line with my amendment. Such a provision has not been necessary for 40 years, it is not required now, and the amendment urges that it be removed.

I wish the minister would hide his prejudices. I know he favoured the unions at the negotiating table at the Lakehead two years ago when he suggested that the grain growers had not made a fair offer in the initial instance. Hon. members should bear in mind that we may be setting up a system here which will last another 40 years. A time may come within the next 10 years when some provision such as this will have to be written into the bill to give the unions greater bargaining power, but this is not the occasion on which to do so; this is not the time to say to the unions: You do not have sufficient economic strength in our society so we must ensure that a body of men numbering some 200 employed in the Vancouver terminal can tie up the produce of about 200,000 farmers trying to get their grain to export markets. Why should we go out of our way to write into this bill a completely new clause to strengthen the negotiating hands of 200 people who could, in some circumstances, tie up the incomes of 200,000 producers, as they did two years ago for a period of 26 weeks? In all fairness to the people I represent, I cannot allow this bill to be passed without putting the onus squarely on the government if they fail to remove this clause.

It is a clause whose effect will be to aid the unions at the bargaining table. This has been done deliberately. Just as sure as can be, there will be difficulty in the years ahead in settling grain handling problems at the Lakehead and at Vancouver; as sure as guns there will be difficulty, and this clause, if passed, will contribute to that difficulty, because no one can say he is serving the agriculture industry by strengthening the hands of the unions at the bargaining table. To my mind, this is a basic issue and I urge all members to take it very seriously before they vote on my amendment. For my part, I shall do my utmost to bring the matter fully to the attention of the farmers the next time we run into grain handling problems either at the Lakehead or at Vancouver. The farmers will want to know who assisted whom. All members should weigh this issue carefully before they vote on the amendment, because we can be sure that negotiating problems will develop in the years ahead.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to speak only briefly on the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) calling for the deletion of Clause 41. This particular amendment has been moved on two occasions in the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and has been defeated on both.

The argument which is advanced about strengthening or weakening one side or another as far as labour negotiations are concerned is not a valid one in my view.

Mr. Horner: The grain companies think so.

Mr. Olson: Yes, I know. If I owned a grain company I would like to collect the full storage charges from the farmers while elevators were shut down, but in my view it is not fair for farmers to have to pay full storage charges during periods when there is a major stoppage, because farmers have the right, by reason of the grain tickets they hold, to have access to that grain, and to have it delivered into a vessel or into any other means of transportation, when it is called upon.

So the reason for the inclusion of clause 41 in the Canada Grain Act is clear. It provides authority for the Board of Grain Commissioners to set a special maximum storage charge for grain held in an elevator when the licencee is unable to deliver the grain because of the condition of the elevator or because the employees are not working—in other words, when the elevator is not operating. This clause makes it plain that the regular storage charges can continue for seven days but that afterward a special storage charge shall apply, and that this lower charge may be set for specific periods of time after the first seven days.

In addition, subclause (3) of clause 41 specifies that to make this new charge operative, the regulations must prescribe it in advance. This is so that everyone, including the farmers who have grain stored in these elevators, is in a position to know in advance what the charges will be in the event of a work stoppage for any of a number of reasons.

I wish to be as conciliatory as I can, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me this is a perfectly logical clause. In my view the charge should not be applicable in full during a period when grain is not available for delivery on request, for example, from those people who act on behalf of the farmers holding warehouse receipts. I do not think holders of warehouse receipts should be called upon to pay full charges when their grain is not available to them. This is, essentially, the reason for the inclusion of clause 41. If an elevator is not operating, because of a labour stoppage, obviously the cost of running that elevator is significantly reduced. This is another argument in favour of my contention that it is not reasonable to continue charges at the full level. I might add that the commission is responsible for determining the approximate maxima.

As required by clause 80 of this bill, the commission is obliged to hold public hearings on such a tariff if it is requested by the licensee, and in this case the licensee would be the owners and operators of the terminal elevators. I hope the House will not accept this amendment on the basis of the arguments which I have just made because I do not believe it is fair to ask the farmers to pay full storage charges under such conditions as I have mentioned. That is what clause 41 is about and I want to completely reject, as kindly as I can, the interpretation the hon. member put on certain comments I made as long ago as a year and a half and again a few weeks ago.

I said that management, during the first four or five weeks of the strike at the lakehead in the fall of 1968, had not made a reasonable offer to the labour unions. That was not a $1 an hour increase. They offered 42 cents an hour during the first four weeks, which both labour and management knew was an unreasonable offer in relation to what they had already settled for at the Vancouver terminals. The hon. member is putting a completely distorted construction on what I said. While I do not want to argue with him this afternoon, I do not think his remarks ought to stay on the record unchallenged. We can argue this across the country, and no doubt we will, from time to time, in the next couple of years.

In conclusion, the application of clause 41 does not change the relative position of management vis-à-vis labour. What it does do is create an element of justice on behalf of farmers who have grain stored in these elevators in that they will not pay the full storage charges while some other parties are involved in a dispute.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a brief comment. As a farmer, I quite naturally cannot be in favour of any strike which would interfere with the delivery of grain from farms to terminal elevators in Canada. I feel that by removing clause 41 we would perhaps be placing an unjust burden on farmers who ultimately pay the storage charges. I must oppose the amendment on the basis that this clause does provide an element of justice to those who ultimately pay these charges. For this reason I will vote against the amendment.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent there are two sides to this question. This is what the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) had in mind when he introduced this amendment. A few years ago we were faced with a strike by grain handlers. Negotiations are still progressing at this time. If these negotiations break down, we will face the possibility of a strike which I am sure all farmers do not want. I am also sure that the government would not want such a strike at this particular time. One cannot predict what will happen because negotiations have not progressed to the point of breaking down.

Perhaps the minister had some changes in mind when the bill was first drafted. Perhaps he has had some afterthoughts, as a result of the suggestions regarding grain policy made by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. He left the impression throughout the country that he intends to make substantial changes.

This particular amendment relates to the payment of storage charges which, up until now, have been looked after by the government in so far as the amount in excess of 178 million bushels is concerned. This has had the result of giving higher returns to the producer. Last year the amount the federal government paid was in the neighbourhood of $70 million. It is now proposed that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act be eliminated. In that event, the farmers will be the ones who will pick up cost of this storage if sufficient money is not earned by the elevator companies, which in some cases are owned by farmers and farm organizations.

The only alternative to this proposal is an increase in handling charges. Such an increase will again have to be negotiated. I cannot envisage a commission defying the elevator companies which could quite obviously justify an increase because of insufficient revenues from storage charges. In any event, it would be the farmers who would pay.

The minister's suggestion is that under clause 41 the elevator companies would not get paid. It seems obvious to me, regardless of the protestations of the minister, the pressure will be on the elevator companies to settle disputes. In the last year or so, the Prices and Incomes Commission has suggested certain guidelines. The government, in its fight against inflation, has suggested a guideline of 6 per cent. I do not have to remind the House and the country that it was organized labour which did not subscribe to these guidelines. Through their spokesmen, organized labour suggested we could not control the demands of their membership.

As a result of this clause, organized labour will be placed in a better position when negotiations are in progress. The longer grain handlers are inactive, the greater the pressure will be on the elevator companies to settle because of the loss of revenue. I can readily see the kind of situation that could develop. At a time when we were possibly negotiating a grain sale to another country, following years of congestion and a lag in the movement of grain, grain handlers could put us in the position of having to renegotiate contracts. This could result in another strike if these grain handlers felt the time was ripe to again make these demands. It could well be said that this clause could definitely work against management. I think management might be able to look after itself.

However if, for example, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the United Grain Growers or any other elevator company should end up paying a higher rate than they consider to be reasonable, the net result would be that any earnings the farmers might expect to have from their participation in their farm owned elevator system would naturally be reduced. Last year we had a situation in respect of the wheat pools. They were in a very sound financial position. However, with the removal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act the elevator systems eventually will show reduced income and I fear what will happen is that the elevator systems will deteriorate and, in fact, to a large extent be eliminated. I have pointed this out in this House before. I am not convinced by the argument of the minister or any of those who subscribe to the policies the present government is pursuing, because it would seem to me that the only person who will stand to lose eventually is the farmer.

If some of the elevators should be removed, this would mean higher transportation costs for the individual producer because he would have to deliver his grain to more distant points. The total cost of his production will increase and, in that round about way, the effect will eventually be felt by the producer. Despite anything the minister may say at this time, I am convinced such a clause tips the balance against business negotiations, if you wish. I am sure the elevator companies are quite aware of the effect of this particular clause since they raised the matter in their submissions. Although the minister might wish to suggest one thing or another, I have already pointed out that in a round-about way I feel the bus stops right at the producer's door because eventually he will lose his elevators and his transportation costs will increase. I will support, and I urge others to support, this amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia) moved:

That Bill C-175, An Act respecting grain, be amended by

(a) renumbering Clause 12 at page 13 as subclause 12(1);

(b) by deleting the words, "other than a primary elevator," in line 18 of Clause 12 at page 13; and

(c) by adding the following subclause to Clause 12 immediately after line 36 at page 13:

"Limitation" "(2) The Commission shall not, in operating any elevator as a primary elevator pursuant to paragraph (d) of subsection (1), purchase grain."

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support this amendment because the words "other than a primary elevator" raise some serious problems concerning the definition of a primary elevator in another clause, I believe clause 2. I think the addition of a subclause to clause 12 does, in fact, meet all the arguments advanced in the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I believe it is fair to say the argument advanced were to prevent the Canada Grains Commission from operating a primary elevator for the purpose of making sure the commission does not become involved in the business of competing directly with the elevator companies. Therefore, the addition of subclause 2, as provided in this amendment makes clear that the commission will not be in the business of buying grain directly from the primary producer. The existing Board of Grain Commissioners at the present time does operate a number of elevators, particularly interior elevators, which could and indeed would come under the definition of primary elevator if there should be direct deliveries from some farmers to those elevators.

I am sure hon. members will have no objection to the kind of facility which would permit these elevators to receive, for example, truckloads of grain. The reason we would not like to include the words "other than a private elevator" is that this would prevent the Board of Grain Commissioners receiving this grain directly from the producers or indeed directly by motor transport or truck delivery. Therefore, the addition of the words suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) "the commission shall not, in operating any elevator as a primary elevator...purchase grain", I believe would meet the arguments that were advanced in the committee and at the same time allow the commission to do those things that may be needed and which may be reasonable in the operation of interior elevators. There is a situation now, with rapeseed coming into some of the interior elevators, where we would be willing to accept grain directly by truckloads lots at those elevators, even though it came directly from the producers, provided it is assigned to these interior elevators by a grain company.

We do not intend to get into the grain business, and indeed the additional clause specifically prevents that. The problem is that under the definition "primary elevator", the grain commission would also be prevented from accepting these truck lots of grain directly from the producers, notwithstanding that it had come through the account of some grain company or grain co-operative. For those reasons, I would hope the House would be willing to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I commend the minister for his explanation of the amendment, and I am inclined to support it. However, I think I would like to question the procedure here. Why did we not hear from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) who is purported to have moved the amendment? Why do we engage ourselves in this hide and seek? Undoubtedly, the minister handed this amendment to the hon. member for Assiniboia to move, but why did he not place the full load on the hon. member for Assiniboia and have him explain it to the House? I do not understand this business of trying to pass on a little favour to the hon. member for Assiniboia so that he can get credit for moving the amendment, when in reality it is the brainchild of the Department of Agriculture and of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). With those words, I tentatively wish to bring about corrective action by the Department of Agriculture. The minister need not be ashamed of moving this amendment. If it is his wish and his brainchild, he should put it forward.

If the hon. member for Assiniboia wants to boldly second the amendment or even take credit for this brainchild of the minister, he should rise and make a speech on the amendment, rather than expect the amendment to be passed without giving us his explanation of it and telling us why we should support it.

Now, I should like to speak to the amendment. This clause was debated at length in the committee on two previous occasions. Last June, the committee saw fit to vote the amendment down. The bill did not pass in the old session, so the amendment was put forward again. During the past summer recess, the committee saw fit to accept the amendment and voted in favour of it. As I remember it, the count was substantially in favour of the amendment.

What was the purpose of the amendment? The amendment is to clause 12, line 18, to delete from paragraph (d) the words, "other than a primary elevator,". It is no secret that, as the minister suggests, under the Board of Grain Commissioners the government is managing inland terminals at Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Lethbridge, Calgary, Edmonton and so on, regardless of whether they are called inland terminals or transfer elevators. In any case, they are other than primary elevators. As I see it, they could continue to be operated under paragraph (d) as it is now worded. However, the minister wishes to put forward this amendment. To my mind, the amendment clouds the issue a little. It states that the commission shall not, in operating any elevator as a primary elevator pursuant to paragraph (d) of subsection 1, purchase grain. In other words, if they operate as a primary elevator, they cannot purchase grain. That is my interpretation of the amendment. I do not believe this wording clarifies the clause.

However, if it makes the minister feel better to include these words, we would have no objection. I know the minister supported wholeheartedly the amendment to clause 12 when it was discussed in the committee, so we on this side of the House can support this amendment. I may say that the committee also put forward five amendments to the bill which substantially improved the bill. This act had not been amended for about 40 years and it needed careful examination, which it received in the committee. Although it was not passed in the last session, it has been substantially improved in this session. This being the last amendment before the House, we on this side are prepared to accept it. I think we should pay tribute to the minister for accepting so many amendments brought forward by the opposition in the committee, both in the last session and in the present one. I think the grain trade and the producers will be substantially better served as a result of the exhaustive study which the Committee on Agriculture gave to this bill, both in the last session and in this one.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, we support the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas). It seems logical in this day and age of specialty crops. Frequently, when not enough grain is grown to fill a boxcar, it is logical that it should be delivered to terminal elevators. I think that this amendment should be passed so that grain could be delivered to these elevators. It makes sense to me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the deferred division on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-175, respecting grain, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time.

Mr. Baldwin: By leave, at eight o'clock. May I call it five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the third reading motion will be put at eight o'clock this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment will be as follows: the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—Health—Inclusion of paramedical services under medicare; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Health—Inclusion of paramedical services under medicare; the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta)—Grain—Barley—Price spread between deliveries to country elevators and feed mills.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, Notices of Motions and Public Bills.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE LIVING STANDARDS IN CANADA AND THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

On the order: Private Members' Notices of Motions:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to the introduction of legislation to abolish poverty by redistributing income and planning productive resources so that the wealth created by modern technology may provide a much more equal standard of living for Canadians, regardless of who or where they may be, and may also be used to enable Canada to contribute a fair share of this country's wealth toward greater equality of living standards throughout the world.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is agreement to let this Notice of Motion in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) stand and retain its position.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

CUSTOMS ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO FACILITATE AIRPLANE TOURIST TRAFFIC AT AIRPORTS

On the order: Private Members' Notices of Motions:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of making regulations, pursuant to paragraph (r) of section 273 of the Customs Act, so as to facilitate airplane tourist traffic at Canadian airports of entry by providing for the deputizing of qualified personnel now employed as management or administrative officers to handle customs clearance to such tourist traffic.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, could this motion in my name stand today and maintain its position on the order paper?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Motion stands.

POLLUTION

NEED FOR GOVERNMENT AID IN RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT OF SOLID-WASTE DISPOSAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should initiate a national research and development program in respect of methods of proper and economic solid-waste disposal, including studies directed to the conservation of natural resources by reducing the amount of waste and unsalvageable materials and by recovery and utilization of potential resources in solid wastes; and provide technical and financial assistance to provincial and municipal governments and multi-governmental agencies in the planning, development, and conduct of solid-waste disposal programs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, an hon. member of my party who is to my left said to me, as you were reading the motion, that I could not lose with a motion of this kind. I told him that it is exactly the same kind of motion as I had moved previously, and my previous motion had not been accepted. May I say this now? The growth of our urban regions is being intensified and accelerated to such an extent that by 1980 about 80 per cent of our population will be urban oriented. I, therefore, believe it is necessary for me to continue to bring this matter before the House. I shall do that. I made a speech on this subject on February 2, 1970. May I refer hon. members to my remarks made between pages 3094 and 3103 inclusive. There I discussed the technical background of the problem involving the disposal of solid waste. This problem has grown much worse since that time. We shall continue producing waste in ever greater abundance. Citizens of urban areas are now producing one ton of solid waste per person per year. This fact must be considered. Because of the magnitude and importance of the matter, I submit that the House ought to be prepared to agree to a motion such as is before it now.

We now face a double problem, Mr. Speaker. We must adopt measures to take care of the accumulation of the neglect of past years and establish, as well, effective measures to clear up current problems. The seriousness of the problem is and was accepted on both sides of the House. I should like to emphasize and underline that statement. As I say, both sides of the House accept the seriousness of the problem. May I say that being against pollution is probably politically safer than being for motherhood these days. The question that is still asked is, what do we intend to do about pollution?

After my speech of February 2, I was pleased to see that the forty-fifth annual report of the United Church of Canada Board of Evangelism and Social Services, published in 1970 and entitled, "It's a big responsibility" upheld my views. I was glad to learn that that organization considered the problem I had placed before the House and the Canadian people as one which is important, which calls for an immediate answer and which calls for the involvement of the federal government.

My present proposal, Mr. Speaker, would, if accepted, encourage the government first to support research and training programs and, second, to make grants for demonstration projects in the area of the control of solid wastes, thus encouraging the implementation of existing technology to remedy current practices. I cannot understand how we can approach the problem of air pollution and water pollution to the exclusion of problems involving solid wastes. At page 3095 of Hansard for February 2, 1970 I am reported as saying:

> Although it seems possible, it really is not practical to separate problems involving solid-waste disposal from those involving water and air pollution. For example, air pollution can be aggravated by the burning of solid wastes. Household grinding of garbage eliminates solid waste but increases liquid waste. Solid-waste disposal by means of land fill can produce problems relating to ground water supplies.
> Therefore, any over-all policy involving the disposal of solid wastes must be developed in association with any policy relating to liquid waste and atmospheric conditions. Accordingly, it is necessary for the federal government to adopt some unified standard.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The research aspect of the proposal would emphasize recycling rather than dumping as the preferable method of disposal. Recycling includes all methods of disposal which have as a definite end the return of the materials to use. Where dumping is the only feasible alternative, the research would concentrate on those methods by which disposal is carried out without creating health hazards or further environmental pollution.

The financial aspect of my proposal is equally important to the research aspect. As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) pointed out in the debate last year, in many cases we already have the scientific knowledge to deal with certain aspects of this problem. All that remains is the need for funds to apply this knowledge.

There is a need for federal action. We all realize that the federal government cannot be expected to solve the problem by itself. Nor will it be solved by attacking a particular industry or level of government. As the comic strip character Pogo so aptly described the problem of pollution, "We have met the enemy and he is us". However, our experience has demonstrated the cities and provinces, unaided, will not be able to invest the funds urgently needed to meet the rising cost of solid-waste disposal and will lack the means to take advantage of improved methods now available and being perfected. Furthermore, there will be nothing gained in the long run if one city or province merely hurls the refuse into someone else's backyard.

I received a communiqué, probably from someone in the Ottawa office of the United States information services. It is dated March 24, 1970. It indicates that three departments of the United States government, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Interior and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare have announced a project to reconvert solid waste. I quote from the communique:

> The Departments of Agriculture, Interior and Health, Education, and Welfare today announced the establishment of a joint research and development pilot project aimed at helping the nation's cities reconvert solid wastes into useable materials.
> The project is being conducted at Madison, Wisconsin, to develop the technology needed to transform discarded cans, bottles, plastics, paper and other solid trash into materials that can be re-used in the economy.
> Later on, the Departments hope to build a full-scale demonstration facility capable of demonstrating to cities and towns across the country one way to handle their solid waste production. The design of this facility will begin this year.
> The disposal of solid wastes is one of the nation's most pressing environmental pollution problems. Last year, municipalities across the United States spent about $4.5 billion to collect and dispose of nearly 350 million tons of solid wastes, much of which went to open land dumps, creating new health and pollution problems. By the early 1980's solid discards are expected to exceed one half billion tons annually.

The United States is apprised of the situation to such an extent that it is prepared to have two departments face this problem and to accept what I have indicated in my motion, research and financial assistance. It is beyond my comprehension to understand why this government has not taken a similar stand.

A few of our municipalities have begun to take steps to upgrade their efforts in this regard. Various industries, including the Packaging Association of Canada have begun to demonstrate greater concern with the problem. However, as the current chairman of the program, "Keep Canada Beautiful", referred to as KCB, a program of the Tourist Association, has pointed out:

"KCB has been made aware through its efforts that a spot by spot antilitter program is not enough. There is little sense in cleaning up one area when the region or area directly connected to it is without any kind of campaign. A national attack on litter is needed—one that stretches from one end of the country to the other with the support of the provinces and the Federal Government."

I wish to point out that the research and financial aspects are very important. I am concerned because the government has not at least moved in the same direction as the United States. As far as I have been able to determine, the federal government has done nothing in this field.

In the debate on this motion on February 2, 1970, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) referred to an advisory committee on public health engineering which was supposedly preparing a report on solid-waste disposal problems in Canada. According to the hon. member, this report was supposed to be available by the spring of 1970. My enquiries reveal this report has not even been started, yet alone completed. The report, on an area of such magnitude and importance, has not been started.

In conclusion, it would be most detrimental for this country if hon. members opposite agreed in principle with my sentiment, then lessened their credibility by talking out this motion. If a special committee on environmental pollution does not do anything else of significance, I hope it will refer to the February debate and the debate of this afternoon and accept holus bolus my motion as one of its recommendations.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it may be some time before we get to the point of accepting holus bolus various recommendations of the hon. member. However, this is certainly one which we can look upon with sympathy and understanding. He has zeroed in on a problem that is well recognized. It is one of the major problems in our increasingly urbanized society.

One of the outstanding lessons in this century is that the capacity of our environment to decompose waste materials to harmless levels is not infinite. While the ability of the environment to assimilate our wastes is finite, the production of wastes is accelerating as we aspire to newer amenities and ways of life. We are rapidly overtaking the capacity of our environment to handle the waste that our way of life generates.

A diseased environment, such as results from the conditions described by the hon. member, means distress to all of us in a variety of ways. This extends beyond the physical well-being of man. It proliferates into the psycho-social and economic realms, not to mention the delayed, subtle impact on the ecology of our earth which sustains human life as we know it today. Granting that human activities must result in residues, and granting that all these residues will not be useful, or capable of being decomposed by nature, there is a real need, as the hon. member has suggested, to define both the nature and the momentum of the danger facing our society, to identify existing and potential hazards, and to develop a strategy to control them.

It seems that humanity reacts to environmental hazards only when a crisis has been reached; we usually perceive the dangers of environmental pollution only when the hazards have become obvious through human illness, economic changes, obvious damage, or insults to aesthetic values which cannot be ignored. It is time we realized that the detrimental effects of environmental pollution are the ultimate distress signals and that the type of research which is recommended is necessary and highly desirable in order that these symptoms may be identified and suitable action taken before the failsafe stage is reached.

Some preliminary work has been done in the Department of National Health and Welfare, as the hon. member has mentioned, in the division of public health engineering, to indentify the areas in which research might be properly undertaken. In view of the fact that the country is in transition from an agrarian to urban population, traditional approaches are becoming more obviously inadequate. The concentration of population in the urban communities and the upsurge in industrial development have accentuated the deterioration of our environment, for instance, by raising grave problems of waste disposal.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has recognized the urgent need to develop a system to protect the total environment. Such a system, it is proposed, should involve closely integrated studies of methods of preventing, controlling and abating the pollution of all the elements of the environment—air, water and soil. Attention is being paid to environmental contamination by solid wastes. The department has been provided with a lengthy series of recommendations concerning areas to which research might well be directed. I should like to record them at this time. Research needs are identified in terms of management and regulation of disposal practices, disposal methods and environmental effects. Under the first category, it is suggested there is need for:

1. Comparative evaluation of existing solid waste disposal regulations in Canada; the assessment of need for uniform regulations; and the development of standards and criteria.

2. Feasibility studies for the development of a mathematical model or systems approach to waste management with special reference to design and operation of disposal systems.

3. Development of a blueprint for comprehensive surveys of wastes.

4. Assessment of legislative and enforcement problems, and the development of solutions.

5. Assessment of factors of solid waste disposal with particular reference to town planning, land utilization and management aspects.

6. Feasibility studies and assessment of factors related to (a) levy of a disposal fee on the sale of non-degradable and non-combustible containers and packaging materials, (b) establishment of a solid waste monitoring system, and (c) establishment of a system for the reclamation or salvaging of wastes of economic value.

7. Development of national guidelines for solid waste management in Canada.

The second general heading is Disposal Methods. Here again, we are certainly in need of further information, including:

1. Feasibility studies on pipeline transport of solid wastes, including solid wastes from water and sewage treatment plants.

2. Studies on composing of degradable wastes with special reference to fertilizer value.

3. Studies on methods of incineration of combustible, pathological, and radioactive wastes with a view to achieving their neutralization without at the same time creating an even more serious risk for the future.

4. Methods of sampling and analysis of solid wastes, particularly from urban areas.

5. Methods for collection, treatment and disposal of animal wastes including feed lots and livestock farms. Recent publications have indicated the serious damage to water courses and to underground water reservoirs by effluence from modern feed lot operations.

6. Methods for composting agricultural, vegetative refuse.

7. Methods for the disposal of solid organic wastes and determination of bio-degradability, with particular reference to wastes containing biocides.

8. Studies on sanitary land fill under varied conditions of location, construction, operation and post-operative utilization of land.

9. Studies on reclamation of non-degradable wastes and associated problems.

10. Research for the development of new kinds of packaging materials and containers.

The heading "Environmental Effects" recommends a number of studies in areas where more information is desired. These include:

1. Studies on microbial hazards of disposal of pathological wastes from hospital and clinical laboratories.

2. Studies on micro-organisms active in refuse decomposition.

3. Studies on factors affecting oxidative conditions of buried wastes such as moisture, temperature, nitrogen, phosphorus, minerals, etc.

23568—57

4. Studies on gas production and composition of gases from buried wastes.

5. Studies on composition of wastewater drainage from land-fill areas, and its significance in relation to water pollution at the surface as well as underground.

6. Disease transmission, and nuisance aspects of garbage disposal practices.

7. Studies on volatile constituents of refuse.

8. Studies on beneficial and detrimental effects of organic decomposition with special reference to soil and water quality.

9. Fate of biocides in composted agricultural wastes.

10. Chemical cycles and ecology of solid waste composting.

11. The impact of solid waste disposal on the total environment of man—studies on interrelationships of individual effects.

I trust that this lengthy litany of detailed items will satisfy the hon. member that the department has a broad, comprehensive interest in the question he has raised.

The hon. member mentioned that research programs being carried out in the United States were ahead of anything we have in Canada. It is my view that one of Canada's shortcomings in terms of the economy and its resources has been a reluctance to utilize the results of research done elsewhere.

There is an insistence by many Canadians that we must do basic research here which is, in fact, a duplication of efforts being exerted elsewhere. I would be most reluctant to see the government launch a research program nearly as comprehensive as the one indicated as being necessary, without having full knowledge of what is being done in other countries and of the savings we could make for our own taxpayers by using the research of others rather than undertaking our own.

At the same time, we do have very extensive areas which it is desirable we should pursue. It is quite possible that some of these areas are not being satisfactorily or adequately pursued in other countries. Then, certainly, Canada would have something to offer not only itself but the world through pursuing these areas. I do not think for a moment we should attempt—

Mr. Alexander: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) rising to ask a question?

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering whether I am right in assuming that the hon. Parliamentary Secretary has indicated that we must wait until the United States completes its research and develops the necessary solutions before we move into the same type of programs initiated there?

Mr. Mahoney: If I understand the hon. member correctly in the context of his motion, that research development programs should be instituted, then he indeed may be interpreting me correctly. I would be most reluctant to duplicate programs being carried out in the United States, in terms of research, simply for the sake of having our own programs. If that is the sense in which the hon. member asked the question, then certainly he has interpreted me correctly. On the other hand, I would not for a moment advocate a deferral of immediate action on research programs of our own in areas that are not presently being handled elsewhere. If on investigation of what other countries are doing we find that research is not being conducted, or we will not have access to the results of that research, we should initiate our own programs. I appreciate the hon. member mentioning that point because it emphasizes the conclusion to my remarks.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to endorse the motion currently before the House. I do not think there is any doubt that there has been too little national research and development in respect of proper and economic solid-waste disposal. There is also an absolute necessity for conserving the natural resources we have in abundance in this country. The problem in respect of solid-waste disposal is only part of the whole problem. It seems to me that governments over the years have failed to realize that population, pollution and resources must be taken together as components of a single and indivisible system. It does not matter what you do as far as population, pollution and resources are concerned, they are tied intimately with each other.

In the mad rush in this and other countries of the world to gain material things, I believe mankind has generally overlooked the need for recycling a lot of solid-waste materials which now constitute major pollution hazards. I should like to speak very briefly on this aspect of the pollution problem. When the last Apollo space flight took place and the astronauts were circling the moon, people in Canada and all over the world received with bated breath the news that the oxygen supply of the space ship was running out. Everyone followed with close attention the astronauts' struggle to get back to the safety of the earth. I point out that the earth upon which we live is a spaceship large in size but needing similar resources whether they be in the form of oxygen, pure water or minerals. If we waste these resources or get into trouble because of their misuse, we will find that mankind will have to pay a price in years to come.

Statistics are readily available to all who search them out which indicate that if all the resources we have knowledge of in the world today were put into immediate use, those people living in underdeveloped countries could never enjoy the standards we have today in Canada. There are just not that many resources to go around. Projections indicate that over a period of time an increasing number of these resources will be used in this nation and the nation to our south. This leaves us with a problem. What have we done, or what are we going to do to recover a great deal of the material which has already been extracted, for example in the form of minerals? Much of this material has been discarded by Canada and other nations. I will not take the time of the House today to give the time cycles regarding how long these minerals will last, but they are extremely limited. This is why it is so necessary for us to consider the question of solid-waste disposal and a program of salvaging material that in the past has been thrown away.

A tremendous amount of pollution arises from the extraction of new minerals to take the place of those which we are currently throwing away. Statistics indicate, for example, that as far as the pulp industry is concerned there would be no need for new pulp mills for a number of years if we salvaged the paper and waste material which comes from pulp. The tragedy is that in the wasteful society which has grown up around us we are causing further pollution by getting rid of waste paper. We burn it and thereby pollute the air and environment with toxic fumes. I am not going into this matter in any great detail because I would not like to see the motion talked out. I am firmly convinced that not nearly enough research is being carried on, despite the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary. Not enough financial assistance is being pumped into these research programs. We must become more aware than ever that prevention is one of the keys to pollution control.

If we are to have abatement of pollution in this and other countries we must get down to the simple philosophy which ties pollution, population and resources together. If we do not integrate this program, I am afraid we will not be very successful in over-all pollution abatement programs so far as this or other nations are concerned. I urge the House to adopt this motion so that we may get at the basic cause of pollution in this country.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us this afternoon in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Alexander) reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should initiate a national research and development program in respect of methods of proper and economic solid-waste disposal, including studies directed to the conservation of natural resources by reducing the amount of waste and unsalvageable materials and by recovery and utilization of potential resources in solid wastes; and provide technical and financial assistance to provincial and municipal governments and multi-governmental agencies in the planning, development, and conduct of solid-waste disposal programs.

As I read this motion, it would seem the hon. member is recommending that we undertake more research in respect of the problem of solid-waste disposal. I think we all recognize the urgency of such research. I am sure that this week hon. members opposite will wish to co-operate with regard to the government's reorganization bill so that we can establish the new department on the environment and renewable resources, because certainly co-ordination is required. Much of the research which has been carried on under the federal government has been funded by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Perhaps the new department on the environment and renewable resources would wish to fund and co-ordinate the activity which is taking place. Therefore, I am sure hon. members opposite will want to see this new department established and will co-operate fully in passing the bill this week so that the department will be able to get under way early in the new year.

This motion also envisages the provision of technical and financial assistance in respect of the planning and development of solid-waste disposal programs at the municipal level. The hon. member for Hamilton West, who spoke most eloquently this afternoon, told us all about the need which exists in our great metropolitan areas. I agree with him wholeheartedly, because many of our great metropolitan areas such as the city of Montreal still pour nearly 100 per cent of their raw sewage into waterways such as the St. Lawrence River. So the need exists in our large metropolitan areas, because even cities such as Montreal with the great financial resources they should have find it too expensive to establish proper sewage or even primary sewage treatment plants.

The problem also exists in the smaller communities of the country. Ontario, which perhaps is the richest province, still is not providing an adequate program for the small communities and the 1,000, 2,000 or 5,000 people who live in each of them in respect of establishing adequate sewage treatment programs. Some communities have such programs but most communities are being badgered by the Ontario Water Resources Commission to establish these facilities, when the proper amount of money is not being made available to them with which to establish the necessary facilities.

In many districts in my constituency, if the communities were to establish proper sewage and water treatment facilities the tax load would be doubled and in some cases tripled. These communities are left in a limbo situation in which the OWRC, which is the regulatory body concerned, is demanding that such facilities be provided so that the watercourses will not be polluted, but the necessary financial assistance is not being provided.

Perhaps through increased research we would discover ways to handle waste. Perhaps self-contained units of a recycling system could be applied to each house. This would mean that the cost of sewage treatment would be reduced and the smaller communities, which after all are just as important on an individual basis as the large metropolitan areas, would not be involved in tremendous additional cost.

Recently I read of a program, I believe in Japan, in which solid waste was incorporated into building blocks for construction purposes. This would seem to be a very permanent way to dispose of solid sewage waste. I believe that in the province of Ontario a program has been developed under which it is demanded that all garbage dumps throughout the province be licensed and controlled by the department concerned with pollution. This is to make sure that the dumps are not immediately adjacent to small streams or waterways which run into areas where the water is used for drinking.

In the province of Ontario a sanitary land-fill program is being developed so that garbage and solid waste produced by small communities is not only disposed of but is covered up so that it does not create an eyesore in the area. In Belleville, for example, there has been a very imaginative program involving sanitary land fill: they have been able to fill in a large marsh area and create a park. In this way, not only do you eliminate marshy, swampy areas which are infested with mosquitoes in the summertime, but you also create a park area which is of long-term benefit to the community. This is another way of disposing of garbage and solid waste while at the same time creating parkland or new industrial land for the benefit of the community.

I think the point made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) is very important. He suggested that we should not duplicate the research being carried on in the United States or in other countries. I think it is fitting that he should be concerned about costs, because that is the kind of Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance we want. We do not want a man who is a free spender and who would throw away the government's money; we want a man who will think of the cost to the taxpayers of this research.

Since the Parliamentary Secretary is quite alive, I do not think I should develop this speech into a eulogy; but I think it is very fitting that we should consider the question of economy because the federal government has responsibility for research in this nation. In most cases the provincial governments carry out the regulatory aspects of pollution control but the responsibility for research has always traditionally fallen on the federal government. It is therefore very appropriate that this motion be put before Parliament this afternoon so that hon. members can debate it. Certainly it would be the responsibility of the federal government to carry out this research if the motion were carried.

I do not want to be responsible for talking out the hon. member's motion, so I will conclude with the hope that when the motion is passed a suitable program will be developed to ensure that proper research is carried out into the problem of solid-waste disposal.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex): Mr. Speaker, in talking on the hon. member's motion—

Mr. Alexander: Why?

An hon. Member: Let us have action.

Mr. Whelan: If the hon. member has to ask that question he has no business in this institution. I have had tremendous experience with the different departments in Ottawa that are concerned with this problem; that is why I feel I can talk on the subject and even go further than the thrifty Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) by telling hon. members that a lot of research is being done. As was mentioned by the hon. member who just spoke, we are creating a new department which will bring all research under one roof. What the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is asking for will be done. I am sure he is aware that some areas of Canada have carried out a great deal of research into the processing of solid waste.

In my own area, including the city of Windsor and the county of Essex, every municipality will have put in either sewage treatment plants or lagoons by the end of 1971. I would say that it is probably much further ahead than any other area in Canada, not only with regard to the control of solid waste that comes from sewage treatment plants but solid waste that goes up from smokestacks or that we try to bury in the ground. Solid wastes include many products other than sewage, as was mentioned by other hon. members, and therefore could be recycled. There are many ways in which this can be done and, as the previous speaker said, we know that other countries are doing it.

I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton West is aware that research is being carried out at the institute at Burlington of solid waste coming out of Lake Erie and Lake St. Clair. This waste is composed of the richest soil and the richest nutrients that one can imagine. It also may contain some pollutants which we would not want in our plants if we are to use the product of the plants for human consumption. This waste could be treated and used in many parts of Ontario and many areas south of Lake Erie, especially the areas where open-pit mining was carried out. It has been suggested to me by people from Ohio that it would only take a short pipeline, about 400 miles long, to reach this horrible-looking landscape which has been pockmarked by mining, and waste could be pumped there to fill in the holes and turn the area into a parkland which could be used by humans.

A program of reforestation could then take place. We know what young forests can do to produce oxygen. Research carried out at the Burlington Institute of waste out of Hamilton Bay shows that vegetables grow twice as fast as normal when fertilized with this waste. The mineral content of these plants when harvested has not yet been analyzed, but it will be and the results are anxiously awaited. I do not know whether the standard of living in the Hamilton area is much higher than that in the Lake Erie area, but according to tests the wastes are much richer in content than the waste from cities which have no sewage treatment plants.

We also know that algae grows wild as a result of the tremendous fertilization in the lake. It grows ten times faster than it would under normal conditions. The algae continually adds a high protein content to the waste. We are dealing with a substance which is unknown to us because insufficient research has been carried out to determine how valuable it is. The very thing we condemn may turn out to be one of the best things we could use in many parts of our nation. It could be pumped back to make productive lands that have been eroded to such an extent that they are completely unproductive at the present time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being six o'clock—

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You were probably going to notice that the clock was pointing to six o'clock, but I would like to draw to the attention of the House that one of the few democratic propositions remaining to the private member is private members' hour. This period is one hour long. Today private members' hour started at 5.08 p.m., and I deplore any effort, by accident or otherwise, to downgrade or shorten private members' hour. We on this side would not under any circumstances preclude any hon. member from speaking. I would therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, not to see the clock so that members opposite can have an opportunity to complete the discussion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): As the hon. member knows, the Chair must abide by the rules of the House. Only by unanimous consent could we continue this sitting for a few minutes longer. Are hon. members agreeable to pursuing the debate?

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope there is disposition on the part of hon. members to giving unanimous consent to carry on for seven or eight minutes longer, to make up for lost time. But I should add that this afternoon we voted on an amendment put forward by an opposition member, and that the voting went past five o'clock. There has been no effort on the part of anybody to downgrade private members' hour. I believe members on the government side will give unanimous consent to extending the debate for another seven or eight minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is there unanimous agreement to continue the sitting for seven minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When you rose, Mr. Speaker, you were under the impression that it was six o'clock. You were quite right. Perhaps you were going to indicate to the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan) that his time had expired, and if that is so perhaps you should do so now. That is the only point I have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan) still has the floor and has not completed the time alloted to him.

Mr. Whelan: If the hon. member for Hamilton West wishes to add a few more suggestions to his point of order, I am perfectly willing to allow him to do so if it will take up part of the time that I have been allotted. There are many more things I could say but I notice that two or three members wish to talk about the treatment of solid waste. Many hon. members may think that the waste in the House today is not so solid, that it is probably in the atmosphere. Anyone who suggests we are not undertaking research in our country has not delved into the work of different federal departments. I repeat that what the hon. member has asked for is being done by the federal government in creating a department of the environment. We are putting all these people under one roof so that we can tell what research is being done on behalf of the nation, for the benefit and use of municipalities and for anyone who wants to take advantage of it. I am not going to say any more at this time, Mr. Speaker, but once again I would state that we are doing this, and will be doing it to a greater extent than ever in the past with the new department and with the minister who is to be in charge of it.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, today we find the House at its best during private members' hour. It is in a constructive mood. Forward-looking, forward-reaching suggestions have been made on both sides of the House. I submit that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) hit the nail on the head when he suggested that we should not embark upon a great research program, that we should not build up a great research task force costing hundreds of thousands of dollars when south of the border there is expertise available to us where untold amounts of time and energy already have been spent. In other words, we should collate the facts already available, we should investigate the work that has been done and we should urge that Canada make its voice more effectively heard at the United Nations in developing a world environmental policy.

An environmental conference is to be held in Sweden within the next year or so. Is Canada to be represented at that conference? Mr. Speaker, I am told by one of my colleagues that it is. I am glad to know that. Mr. Maurice Strong of Canada is the convener of this conference. This is the sort of step we should be taking, working with other countries on a universal problem and getting the benefit of all expertise in those countries through the United Nations, through treaties, through joint enterprise and the exchanging of evidence. To launch an individual program would be chaotic. It would be like trying to develop the expertise of the Japanese in cooking their native foods. We have not the techniques and the ability to develop an oriental approach to the matter.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that in the Hamilton area we now have the Inland Waters Centre which the Liberal government finally established. I am proud to say it is one of the marvels of the world in examining clean-up problems connected with fresh water. Much has been done at the Inland Waters Centre. Experiments are going on; tests are being conducted; intelligent research of all kinds is being carried out at a practical level.

We should send a group of concerned people to the United States and to European countries simply to gather information already available there. Perhaps in the future this could be done by computers. I do not know if this is the type of information that can be gathered up simply and easily by engineers and experts, because here we are dealing with an area of scientific research as well as straight, factual research. In developing our techniques of gathering such information we must look first to the United States. What is being done in this regard in the United States appears to be accelerating. We have been critical of great cities like Detroit and Chicago for dumping their industrial spillage into the rivers and the Great Lakes. Apparently we are ahead of them in many respects.

But is not the problem in the United States more than a desire to do the job? Is not their weakness the fact that industry is too powerful for government to control? In other words, has not industry simply got the whip-hand over the individual? I think that in Canada there is a better balance. I think we are moving in the direction of pollution control in a planned, orderly way but without holding the big stick over industry. We are trying to get industry to co-operate. I think industry is gradually swinging into the spirit of anti-pollution techniques and even industries realize that if they do not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. The House agreed unanimously to extend the private members' hour, but the time appointed for the consideration of private members' business now having expired, I do leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock p.m.

At 6.10 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA GRAIN BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION, PROVISIONS RESPECTING GRADING, LICENCES, ELEVATORS, ETC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-175, respecting grain, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Don't be too hasty, gentlemen. Mr. Speaker, before we get into the substance of this bill I find it my painful duty to bring to the attention of the House, and particularly the government, a very fatal omission in the bill. I must lay the foundation for my point by reciting some parts of the bill. Clause 108 purports to amend and change, and to some extent repeal, section 11 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which provides as follows:

Where any licensee—

That is, a licensee established in the act.

—becomes liable to the penalty imposed by subsection (10)—

Subsection (10) provides for a penalty where a licencee fails to comply with certain provisions of the act.

—the commission shall, by order, require the licensee to pay the penalty to the commission—

I ask Your Honour to bear those words in mind.

—to the credit of the Receiver General.

Subsection (12) provides:

An order made under subsection (11) is enforceable and may be appealed—

Subsection (13) provides:

Notwithstanding subsections (11) and (12), the commission may waive all or any part of the penalty imposed by subsection (10) in any case where, in its opinion, the circumstances so warrant.

This particular clause also drives us to consider clauses 79, 80, 81, 82 and 83. I will not take the time of the House by repeating those, but they provide that the penalties fall into the hands of the Queen in right of Canada. What we see, because of those two clauses being taken together, is a provision for penalty. There is provision that such penalty becomes the property of the Queen in right of Canada, and there is provision that the Canadian Grains Commission which is purported to be created by this act can waive the penalty.

With that as background I should like to point out to Your Honour that it is a principle of parliamentary law that where a bill affects the Crown prerogative in any particular, the consent of the Crown must be given by a Privy Councillor prior to or at third reading and passage stage. In other words, it is quite competent for the government to debate this bill as they have and take it through first reading, second reading and report stage before the bill is given third reading and passed. But I propose to convince the Chair and, hopefully, members of the House that through the medium of a Privy Councillor there must be the consent of the Crown to this particular disposition of the prerogative which normally belongs exclusively to the Crown.

There are a number of authorities for this. I would first bring to Your Honour's attention some extracts from May's Parliamentary Practice. I refer to the decision of the Speaker on the protest of the leader of the Legislative Council of the province of Quebec. The extract I have is dated April, 1885, and deals with a decision given by Mr. Speaker in the following words:

Bill (No. 87) intituled: "An act to amend chapter 27, of the Act 46 Victoria... be now read a second time, and objection being taken by the Honourable Mr. Flynn that the consent of the Crown was necessary to continue to deliberate upon this bill:

Mr. Speaker ruled as follows:

An objection has been raised that the question for the second reading of this bill cannot be put, because the bill is one for which the consent of the Crown is required and because the same has not been signified.

The recommendation of the Crown is necessary for all resolutions or bills involving grants of money, while the consent—

As distinct from recommendation.

—of the Crown, is required for bills which concerns its rights, patronage, or prerogatives.

I think there is no question, Mr. Speaker, that the right to waive a penalty—the penalty is in the form of moneys payable to the Crown in right of Canada—cannot be assigned to an individual or a corporation to deal with unless and until the Crown has signified its consent in the usual manner, in this case in the House by consent of a Privy Councillor. I waited and hoped that this government, despite its disregard for the rules of parliamentary procedure and its detachment and contempt for the parliamentary process, would not have omitted the very substantial requirement necessary to make this a good bill.

The example I have just given is a provincial precedent, but I have gone far back and there are others. The U.K. Commons Journals, volume 166 (1911), 8th August, at page 390, reads:

A motion being made, That the Great Yarmouth Port and Haven bill be now read the third time;

The Deputy Chairman, by His Majesty's command, acquainted the House that His Majesty, having been informed of the purport of the bill, gives his consent, as far as His Majesty's interest is concerned, that the House may do therein as they shall think fit.

A later precedent in U.K. Commons Journals, volumes 202-204, 1946-49, 21st July, 1949, at page 323, reads:

A motion being made, That the Dover Harbour bill be now read the third time:

Mr. Secretary Ede, by His Majesty's command, acquainted the House, That His Majesty, having been informed of the purport of the bill, gives his consent, as far as His Majesty's interest is concerned, that the House may do therein as they shall think fit.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Not many years ago, on July 14, 1959, I had occasion to be in this House when Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough, who was then Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, moved the second reading of Bill S-6, which was to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves. That matter involved Indian reserves and lands in which the Crown had an interest and which had been disposed of by the federal government. For purposes involving the title of the people who had purchased the land, it was necessary to enter into an agreement between the two governments involved and to confirm what had been done by act of the Legislature of New Brunswick and of the Parliament of Canada. The matter is recorded in the following way on page 5960 of Hansard for July 14, 1959:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-6, to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves.

She said: Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the purpose of this bill, has given consent so far as Her Majesty's property rights are concerned, that the house may do therein as it shall think fit.

By virtue of section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, our Parliament has given to the Governor in Council the right to waive certain penalties under certain conditions. That right is given to the Crown's representatives. It is given by virtue of an act of Parliament with respect to which the consent of the Crown had to be given in the first place. Here we have a situation in which a money penalty may be assessed against individuals or corporations. Therefore, moneys which would normally belong to the Crown in right of Canada may be disposed of to the Canadian Grain Commission. I recognize that Parliament can do this; nevertheless, because these are moneys at the disposal of the Crown, the consent of the Crown must be given.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), or the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who I am sure is knowledgeable in this matter—I see him nodding and therefore I am almost certain that he will agree with what I have to say—may signify that consent. Either of them may say, "I have been in touch with His Excellency, who has been graciously pleased to say that the Crown gives its consent to disposing of assets in the form of money or, in some instances, to waiving the penalty." Until that is done, I submit that the government cannot proceed as it now seeks to proceed. I have a large number of precedents to fortify my argument. Until that is done, I submit that even if the government were to proceed with this bill and even if Parliament were to give it third reading, the bill would be null and void. It is not null and void at present because only at final passage does this consent becomes absolutely essential.

There are some good points to the bill. Like most government measures, it is not very effective, but it has some good features which we feel might be passed. As the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) said earlier, some aspects of the bill are bad. The government, of course, approaches many of its measures like an old man approaching a young bride, full of fascination and apprehension, yet sluggishly. Nevertheless, because there are some good aspects to the bill we are prepared to pass it. But we want to see it passed in the proper form.

Your Honour may want to consider this issue. I could cite a great many precedents. I will not take up the time of the House by so doing because I am sure the President of the Privy Council, supported by the Minister of Agriculture, will say that the government is prepared to proceed with third reading now and that it will obtain the approval of His Excellency, on behalf of Her Majesty, by tomorrow.

I should like to quote one or two brief authorities. May's Parliamentary Practice, Seventeenth Edition, at page 615 reads as follows:

> In the case of bills which affect the royal prerogatives—

The royal prerogatives include the right of waiving penalties, of granting commutations, and so on.

> —a more complicated formula is employed, varying slightly to suit the circumstances of each case, and including the statement that the Queen places her interests at the disposal of Parliament—

> The Queen's consent is signified by a Privy Councillor, but the communication of the fact that the Queen has placed her interests at the disposal of Parliament is made orally, generally by a minister of the Crown.

Beauchesne's Fourth Edition reads as follows at page 231; I am quoting from citation 283:

> The consent of the King or Queen, as the case may be ... is given by a Privy Councillor to bills ... affecting local and personal interests which concern the royal prerogative—

And so on. In this bill the government is attempting to dispose of moneys which normally are at the disposal of the Crown in right of Canada. That may only be done after there has been given in this House a statement by a Privy Councillor that the Governor General has given his consent to it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is well aware of the fact that when this bill was first introduced into the House during the present session, there was a recommendation from His Excellency.

Mr. Baldwin: Oh, yes.

Mr. Olson: I think only a few days ago His Honour ruled that the recommendation is an indication that His Excellency has seen the bill and recommends it to this House, and that any further action in this regard is unnecessary. I should also like to draw to Your Honour's attention, while raising this point of order, that the provisions the hon. member alluded to in clause 108 are to be found also in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Those provisions are the same with respect to penalties and the remission of penalties and are to be found in section 11 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Therefore, there is no change in those provisions. I think Your Honour will recognize that this is—I was about to say a phony argument but I will not say that.

Mr. Baldwin: I wouldn't, if I were the minister.

Mr. Olson: Well, it is a redundant argument which has no place in this situation.

Mr. MacEachen: It is a yuletide argument.

Mr. Baldwin: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thought I was presenting a valid, effective and useful argument and I was sorry my previous argument was dismissed by Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless, there is no comparison between that argument and the point I am now trying to make. It is true that a recommendation was brought in, but that recommendation is related to the spending of money. What I am now saying is that this bill contains clauses which interfere with the prerogatives of the Crown with respect to the waiving of penalties and fines. There is a distinction between the two points. I am sad indeed that the Minister of Agriculture has missed the point, because I thought I had submitted a fairly good argument.

Mr. Olson: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have been here for 11 or 12 years and never before have I heard the argument raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister can always learn.

Mr. MacEachen: It is a yuletide argument.

Mr. Olson: It must have been presented as a result of the Christmas spirit.

Mr. MacEachen: Does the hon. member agree that the bill shall be carried?

Mr. Baldwin: Come, come; my Christmas spirit does not take me quite that far.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have listened to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I must say that his is an ingenious argument. I think I have followed it. I should like time to consider the references and authorities which the hon. member cited. In regard to the rebuttal argument of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), I can see the distinction that he makes, that the point of order raised by the hon. member is covered by the recommendation of His Excellency. I admit to hon. members that this point may be clear to others more learned and with more experience than me. I would ask hon. members to give the Chair time to consider the point and rule on it later.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: That would be all right, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture might consider discretion the better part of valour. He might be able to approach His Excellency tomorrow in order to get the required consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the debate be adjourned by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: The debate might continue, and before the question is finally put on third reading Your Honour may have had an opportunity to consult the eminent and wise men with respect to this issue. If it is satisfactory to the government, the debate on third reading could continue. Hopefully, Your Honour will reach an affirmative conclusion in respect of my point of order before the question is finally put.

Mr. MacEachen: I think it would be better if we continued the debate. When the debate is ended we can postpone the question on third reading until this point of order has been resolved. When it is resolved we can put the question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the debate continue and that no final determination be made until the point of order has been dealt with?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this grains bill, C-175, has been thoroughly examined in committee. Many useful amendments have been made and I think the bill is better as a result. If the government had accepted the amendment of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) this afternoon, the bill would have been considerably better.

The immediate urgency of this bill is in the necessity to upgrade the act so that protein grading will be a factor in making our sales of wheat more acceptable to all countries. Although it seemed on the initial examination that this would be simple, the recent appearance of the Board of Grain Commissioners before the Standing Committee on Agriculture indicated that although grading of grain by protein analysis is relatively easy, with large quantities it becomes extremely difficult to transfer the payment of this to the individual producer. It appears that on pay-out to the producer, the Wheat Board may only be able to make payment on the delivery point basis. It is obvious from the testimony of the Board of Grain Commissioners that it will probably be a long time before individual producer payments for quality of protein will be perfected.

If under this new act protein grading is to be a major factor in our wheat sales, presumably a new set of variables will be introduced as far as payment to the individual grain producer is concerned. Insofar as the final status of the application of protein grading is concerned, it remains obscure and unsettled. The government, particularly the Department of Agriculture, will be charged with the grave responsibility of administering the act in the interest of the producers and with respect to the saleability of our wheat.

The new bill, in a general way, seems to give the government board the authority to control and direct the day-to-day operation of grain elevators. During the representation made by both the line elevator companies, those privately-owned and the farmer-owned companies, I sensed that this possibility was uppermost in their minds. Some restrictions have been placed on the wide general authority envisaged in the original bill. Many clauses of the amended bill will give the board authority beyond that which should be necessary. It is, of course, true that the wide powers specified in the bill will not be particularly restrictive if the regulations under which the act will be administered are reasonable and efficient. I believe it would be in the interest of the government and the grain trade if there were a certain amount of consultation with the farmer-owned elevator systems and the private systems with regard to the possible effect of the regulations.

In submissions presented by the Manitoba and Saskatchewan pools with regard to the white paper on tax reform, they indicated concern about possible changes in taxation proposals that would be of some significance in the future. There is no doubt that a massive amount of capital will have to be injected into the grain handling facilities of the elevator companies in the not-too-distant future.

To some extent the grain trade has been existing on capital and handling facilities expended many years ago. It is important that under the proposed tax reform laws enough capital be injected into a rebuilding program in order that the grain trade will remain viable. The low price for Canadian grain on the world market makes it imperitive that our handling and transportation costs be kept to a minimum. In conclusion, this bill seems reasonable. It is an improvement on the orignal bill presented to Parliament last spring.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on third reading of this grains bill. I wish to point out that we must assess the whole situation. The reason the bill is only being dealt with at this late date is summed up in the submission to the Standing Committee on Agriculture by the United Grain Growers. The submission was made on May 27, 1970, in connection with the original Bill C-196. I quote from the submission:

> The Canada Grain Act Relative to National Policy.
> If one of the main purposes of the Canada Grain Act is to foster increased grain trade, should not extension changes in the act be delayed until a national grains policy has been defined? We are thinking here of the report of the federal task force on agriculture. For the first time in our history we have an overall grain policy recommendation in writing; one which farmers and Members of Parliament will criticize and rewrite. Presumably this report will form the basis for a new national policy for agriculture. We cannot help but wonder if a major change in the Canada Grain Act, as proposed by Bill C-196, is not an attempt to do things right before it is decided what is the right thing to do.

I repeat the last sentence:

> We cannot help but wonder if a major change in the Canada Grain Act, as proposed by Bill C-196, is not an attempt to do things right before it is decided what is the right thing to do. We would, therefore, request delaying passage of the bill.

This submission was made to the Standing Committee on Agriculture by the United Grain Growers of Canada. The president of the United Grains Growers, Mr. Runciman, chairman of the Canada Grains Council, an eminent body established to advise the Canadian government with regard to a correct formula for grain handling. On page 5 of the submission they sum up the reasons this bill is taking so long to pass. They explain why the bill has had so many amendments in committee and why it has not yet passed the House of Commons.

The bill is really a measure which sets out clearly the powers of the Board of Grain Commissioners. It states, in effect, that the rights of producers shall be protected; that their wheat will be fairly graded and accurately docketed; that they will be credited with accurate shrinkage. In essence, the board is the policeman which supervises the marketing of the farmers' grain, and generally speaking over the years it has done a good job. I have no complaints and I do not think the committee had many complaints on this score.

In the last session of Parliament, Bill C-196, as it was then called, was subject to a number of amendments. I have attempted to count them; there were well over two dozen. The number depends, really, upon what is taken to be a full amendment: can each amendment to an individual clause be counted, or should several amendments be grouped together and counted as one? In any event, some two dozen clauses were amended during that session of Parliament.

In the present session, five major amendments were made, the first being to clause 11. This clearly restated the objects of the Board of Grain Commissioners. According to the old bill, the objects were to protect the rights of producers. In the new session of Parliament the committee saw fit to spell out in the objectives clause of the bill the provision that the directives issued by the Governor in Council or by the committee should at all times be in the interest of the grain producers. To my mind, this is a substantial amendment. From that point on—I am paraphrasing the words of clause 11 to be found on page 12 of the bill—no direction can be made by the commissioners, the Governor in Council or the minister other than in the interests of the producers. This is one of the substantial amendments made this session which I wholeheartedly applaud and which the committee wholeheartedly supported.

Another substantial amendment was made to clause 12. I am sure the former president of the Manitoba Wheat Pool, Bill Parker, will be pleased to see it. He presented a brief in opposition to clause 12 (d) which gave the Board of Grain Commissioners power to operate any elevator, primary or otherwise, in competition with the grain companies now in the business. The amendment accepted by the committee, and the rearrangement of the amendment accepted by the House, makes it clear that the government is not to be placed in the position of operating primary elevators. As I say, I am sure the former president of the Manitoba Wheat Pool, an eminent figure in the handling of grain, will be pleased to see the amendment accepted today in the bill before us. I am sure Bill Parker will be pleased to see that the House of Commons has declared that the government cannot get into the business of operating primary elevators.

The next amendment approved by the committee was moved by a government supporter and was to clause 15 of the bill. In essence, it states that grade changes can be made readily, but that basically no change which is made shall decrease the value of the grain unless some special reason exists for doing so; the value of the grain must be maintained or enhanced by the change in grade unless an extraordinary case arises.

As a result of a further amendment, clause 38 was changed to exempt a licensee from having to take out insurance protecting him in the event of an act of God or the Queen's enemies. This did not completely meet the wishes of the opposition but it went part way toward bringing the bill into relationship with the protection provided under the old grains legislation. In accepting this amendment the committee merely excused a licensee from having to obtain insurance against acts of God or acts of the Queen's enemies.

The other major amendment gave a producer or a given company which had bought grain the right to appeal the grading given to the grain, whether or not the grade given was in respect of what is called visual characteristics or non-visual characteristics. In the bill as it was ready to be passed last session, the producer or grain company could appeal only with regard to the statistics which pertained to the visual characteristics of the grain. The committee said this did not go far enough and that account must be taken of a non-visual criteria such as protein content. I was pleased to see the committee accept this amendment also.

This bill has had unique parliamentary experience, Mr. Speaker. It was first brought in as far back as last February or March. It went to the committee in early June, and politicians were whipped into supporting it by the prospect that were it not supported protein grading could not be implemented immediately and our grain sales would fall off tremendously. In fact, this did not happen. However, this was the prospect held out across the country to politicians and producers, in an attempt to secure passage of a rigid bill which at one time gave powers to the Board of Grain Commissioners to bring about a greater degree of rationalization in the grain handling system as an authoritative body. Protein grading was the carrot.

Politicians were whipped into action to support the bill because we had to have protein grading. Protein grading was needed because sales could not be made on the international market without it. The bill received slow passage, but in spite of that fact sales increased and we were told early in August that we were faced with a substantial movement of grain at the Lakehead and in Vancouver, and everything had to work at capacity or we would not meet our commitments. This only points up the fact that governments are not above attempting to use politics to put forward legislative concepts or ideas in proposed legislation.

One might well ask what was the real intent and purpose of this bill. It certainly was not strictly to implement protein grading or reinstate the Board of Grain Commissioners, because the old bill never expired. This bill was implemented in its initial form for the one reason, to help speed up or bring about an authoritative body to use government powers to expedite the evolution of our grain handling system on the Prairies, with a resulting saving to the railway companies. I say this only after an exhaustive study of the bill and a careful analysis of the evidence of witnesses and the briefs submitted.

Let me quote from a brief presented to the Standing Committee on Agriculture on May 28 by George H. Sellers of the Pacific Elevators Company and the North-West Line Elevators Association. The brief referred to Bill C-196 which was identical in form, except for the last two clauses, to Bill C-175. The brief has these words on the first page:

—Bill C-196 delegates to the Canadian Grain Commission complete authority to determine which community in western Canada will live and which community in western Canada will die.

He was speaking of rural communities and delivery points. The brief continues:

R. J. Shepp, special adviser to the grains group attached to the Honourable Otto Lang, minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, envisaged in a speech in Winnipeg just a few weeks ago that the country elevator system should consist of only 20 to 40 country elevators in place of 1,800 shipping points now in operation on the Prairies.

I cannot emphasize those words too strongly because they spell out the situation. When questioned by members of the committee on this point, a number of government authorities shugged it off and said that a reduction to 20 or 40 was too great and that it probably would be reduced to 100 points. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) quite gleefully said that some delivery points had to go because there were too many. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), who is not in the House tonight, said it stands to reason that a lot of delivery points would disappear. I feel that as a result of evolution, many delivery points will disappear.

As a representative of a rural region, I will not for one minute let 1,800 delivery points be reduced to somewhere between 20 and 40, or even 100. This is ridiculous on the part of bureaucracy. Surely no one representing a part of rural western Canada could buy that theory. This does not matter a hoot to any representative of rural eastern Canada. Many of them just laughed and added whatever contribution they could to the serious study of this bill by the committee.

There is no doubt that in the next few years, perhaps 10 or 20, evolution will reduce the number of delivery points from 1,800 to perhaps 1,000. Western farmers have not forgotten their democratic rights and how to express them. They will not allow any bureaucracy to reduce this number to such an extent. Such a thought is sheer nonsense on the part of the minister piloting this bill and the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. I cannot help remembering the words of the president of the United Grain Growers, who when referring to this bill asked whether it was not an attempt to do things right before it was decided what was the right thing to do. We should request a delay in the passage of this bill, because tonight we are in its final stages and we do not yet know what is right.

There have been a few studies of the grain handling system in western Canada. One was chaired by the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. Another commission was set up by the Canadian Wheat Board under the minister from Saskatoon. Another study was made by Menzies, who gathered together some of the world's experts on wheat handling as well as some importers from Europe and representatives of export agencies in Canada. These authorities are to advise the government what the Canadian Wheat Board should be doing, how it should be changed and how Canadian producers should be marketing and handling grain. I understand their proposals will be submitted to the minister early in the new year, yet we are tonight considering passage of this bill before having an opportunity to receive the views of these people who have made an exhaustive study of the grain handling situation. The Standing Committee on Agriculture has seriously studied this bill but has been denied the advice of these experts. Are we not really putting the cart before the horse? One can only assume that we are doing just that.

The committee heard from witnesses with great knowledge and ability in the handling and marketing of Canadian wheat in particular. That committee, under the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), the chairman and government henchmen, denied the repeated requests of members of the opposition to have representatives of the Wheat Board appear. I do not know what they were afraid of. Western newspapers have given the Minister of Agriculture, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a great deal of credit for appointing the former chairman of the Wheat Board to the other place. Mr. McNamara is knowledgeable in respect of grain handling. I would not in any way detract from the reputation which he has built. Western farm papers repeatedly referred to him as being a great contributor to our parliamentary system. He has been referred to as a man with a great grasp of the agricultural marketing system and one who could contribute his knowledge to the legislative processes of Parliament.

The committee proposed that Mr. McNamara be requested to appear. A vote was taken, and the chairman of the committee broke the tie. The government members thought it was nonsense. They indicated Mr. McNamara was appointed to the Senate to get rid of him and they did not want to take advantage of his knowledge of the situation. The chairman—and I acknowledge his wisdom and his spirit of co-operation—voted in favour of having Mr. McNamara appear, but lo and behold, when Mr. McNamara was consulted he declined to appear. The very next day he went to Regina and spoke about the danger of our losing barley sales unless the farmers were prepared to sell it to the elevator companies. He also spoke about the great danger facing the Wheat Board today. Yet he failed to appear before the agricultural committee. This is a man whom I have admired over the years. I have appreciated his wisdom and experience. He has done a disservice to Parliament by failing to appear before the committee. I know he could have contributed a great deal to this situation.

A grave situation faces western Canada. Two concepts very vividly stare the farmer in the eye in respect of the marketing of grain. There is the initial concept enunciated by the president of the Alberta Wheat Pool some time ago when he spoke at the annual convention; he said there is the concept of building up the inland terminals to which the primary elevators would deliver their grain by truck or rail. The full train or unit train system would be used to deliver grain from the inland terminals to outport terminals such as Vancouver and the Great Lakes. The unit train system would be established, farmers would deliver to the primary elevators and the railways would deliver from there to the inland terminal. This is the one concept that was outlined.

The other concept was that the primary elevators eventually would disappear completely and the farmer would deliver to the inland terminals. That would automatically increase the cost of transportation for the farmer. By means of the other system, the railways would absorb the cost through a great deal more mechanization. These two systems were clearly enunciated. These are the two systems which were incorporated in clauses 34 and 36 of the grain act. Wisely, the committee brought in amendments to those two clauses of the bill which would make it more difficult for the Board of Grain Commissioners to enunciate those ideas.

I believe we are debating a very important principle. Under clause 36, the provision in respect of the licence to an elevator was reconsidered. Under clause 44 the question of type and size of elevator was thoroughly discussed. Clause 34 was also thoroughly discussed. The Committee considered that these clauses would bring about greater rationalization of the grain handling system. The committee wisely recommended that the word "type" was all right when applied to elevators and equipment, but that the word "size" should not apply to elevators in particular but only to handling equipment in the elevators.

I can only hope that attention will be paid to the situation which is prevalent throughout western Canada. It would appear to be evident that the government is attempting to save money by a reduction in the amount of grain in storage. It is common knowledge that the elevators are now operating at less than 60 per cent of capacity. I shall give you, Mr. Speaker, the minister and the House figures to illustrate what I am saying. The Manitoba grain elevators today have 24.1 million bushels of grain in storage. In 1969 at this time of year they had in storage 45.1 million bushels. Their total capacity is 52 million bushels.

This is a deliberate attempt to reduce storage so that on July 31 or August 1 next year the amount to be paid out by the government in cash to western producers can be greatly reduced under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the money spent in other provinces. I need not mention in which other provinces. Let us look at the situation in Saskatchewan. The present holdings are a little better. There are 155 million bushels in Saskatchewan today. The amount in storage a year ago was 170 million bushels. The total capacity in Saskatchewan is 210 million bushels. In Alberta, basically the same situation holds true in respect of reduced storage as for Manitoba and Saskatchewan. In fact, it is the policy of this government to keep the storage at 60 per cent of what it was a year ago. If this policy is continued, there will be in the order of $200 million less in the pockets of the farmers next July 31 or August 1. This is not deliberate thievery but it is deliberate deception by the government to prohibit farmers delivering their grain.

I see the Minister of Agriculture with a smug look on his face. He is capable of this. The point is that if this is not deliberate policy, why is the quota not increased in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta? It is not increased because they want to have vacancies so that the elevators will operate at 60 per cent of capacity or less. Today in Manitoba the elevators are operating at less than 50 per cent of capacity. The present storage is 24 million bushels and the capacity is 52 million bushels. The point is explicitly spelled out. This government wishes to reduce the cost under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. The government is not worried about the farmers. Members of the government believe they can bring the farmer to his knees to the point where he will leave the small farm or the big farm, or reduce him to the point where he must accept the guaranteed income the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) proposed on October 29 to this House.

I do not believe there is any argument to substantiate the suggestion that elevators can operate more efficiently at 60 per cent of capacity. I know an elevator should keep one or two bins empty in order to facilitate the movement of grain within the elevator, but no elevator which operates efficiently needs to have 40 per cent of its space empty. No real argument can be made in that regard. There is no doubt in my mind that this government is going well out of its way to bring about a general weakening on the agricultural scene. Clauses 71 and 97 of the bill were very carefully examined by the committee. I attempted to introduce an amendment to clause 97 so that the farmer would have the right to deliver to the elevator of his choice or to load over the platform.

It is commonly agreed that with the concept of reducing the efficiency of an elevator to 60 per cent of its capacity, the government will automatically increase handling charges through the Board of Grain Commissioners. One of the first things they will do within the next three months is to increase the handling charges of elevator companies. Mark my words, Mr. Speaker—I notice the Minister of Agriculture is paying careful attention—one of the first things done by the Board of Grain Commissioners will be to increase the handling charges of elevator companies. They may not reduce storage charges, but by increasing handling charges they will encourage greater handling and less storage revenue for the elevator companies. I notice that the hon. member for Assiniboia is attempting to make a remark. It is too bad he could not make it this afternoon when his famous amendment was before the House.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I am sorry, gentlemen, but I have ten minutes left and you will just have to listen to me. The Minister of Agriculture did not have enough faith or did not trust sufficiently the hon. member for Assiniboia to allow him to explain the amendment that was in his name. It was an attempt by the minister to discredit the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The first thing this government will do is allow the handling charges to be increased. What effect will that have? Basically, it will encourage grain companies to increase their handling charges and reduce their storage. A number of things are taking place on the grain scene today. We have the announced policy of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, made on December 9 and followed by 200,000 pamphlets, at a cost of something like $50,000, encouraging producers to accept the new concept. The farmers have yet to buy the idea. The Canada Grain Act should spell out exactly what the grain policy is. It fails to do so, and in fact it attempts to hide the basic issues facing Canada.

There is no question in my mind that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act should remain in force. However, its effect should be reversed so that instead of farmers paying storage on the first 178 million bushels they should pay storage on the last 178 million bushels in commercial storage. The government should assume the responsibility of our being in a volume market. Producers and salesmen must have their product on the shelves and it must be for sale. If the average amount of grain in storage has been 400 million bushels in past years, we should be prepared to put 400 million bushels of the shelf and keep it there.

One of the things that has most hurt Canadian sales over past years has been the long and loud cry of the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board that our surpluses are hurting our markets. They are only hurting our markets when we are complaining about them—not when we joyfully carry them. Nobody complains about the amount of pork and beans on the shelves of warehouses across Canada. Wheat is a commodity for sale and we have to meet our commitments by making large volume sales. We must be prepared to carry it on our shelves to meet large sales.

Protein grading is a non-visual criterion to which we must pay attention. Our international markets dictate quite emphatically that we must be prepared to carry, if necessary, more rather than less grain on our shelves because there will be more varieties of grain; there will be No. 2 grain with three criteria for protein content, either less than 13 per cent, above 13 or 14 per cent. In other words, there will be more varieties of grain for sale and therefore we should have more products on the shelf. That is the essence of protein grading of wheat for our international sales. Therefore, the concept that the government should refrain from paying part of the storage is completely wrong. In fact, storage charges should be reduced.

The present legislation sets out that producers pay for the first 178 million bushels and the government pays anything thereafter. This should be reversed. I suggest that the government should pay storage on the first 400 million bushels in storage and the farmer should pay for the rest. This would bring about a degree of continuity and would discourage the weak-kneed, bleeding ministers who cry out. To paraphrase the words of the Prime Minister, this would discourage the weak-kneed, bleeding Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board from crying out and lamenting aloud about our surplus. The idea is that if the government paid the storage on the first 400 million bushels it would discourage the weak-kneed, bleeding-nosed ministers who cannot convince members in their own camp.

The second proposal that should be rejected by the House concerns our general grain policy. I refer to the proposal that the producer should pick up the losses of the annual pools of wheat, oats and barley. What kind of foolish criterion would this establish? If a farmer were to receive a high price today, his neighbour would grow barley tomorrow to pick up his friend's or neighbour's losses of yesterday. To me this is nonsense. It should be automatically and categorically rejected in devising a new policy for the handling of grain.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board announced on October 29 that losses due to sales made on long-term arrangements below the commercial rate of interest should be passed on to pool accounts. This, also, is sheer nonsense because it would encourage poor salesmanship; it would encourage salesmen to sell a product and pass on the losses to a third party. I have always believed that good salesmen can substantiate the case they are making. Losses being passed on to pool accounts would further encourage dissatisfaction among good customers who buy grain every year at the commercial rate when other customers buy at a lower rate. The loss is then passed on to the producer. The salesmen, in this case the government, would be doing a great disservice to the Canadian farmers. I believe that this policy should be rejected categorically.

Next we come to the stabilization plan. No government should put forward a concept according to which producers are guaranteed, on an individual basis, a formula worked out on a national basis. According to this policy—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Horner: May I conclude my last sentence, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Horner: I did not know that my remarks were so cutting that government members would not allow me to continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps hon. members would grant me their indulgence for a moment. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) at the beginning of this evening's session raised an interesting point of order with respect to the matter of royal consent and whether or not it was required in the bill now before the House. I asked hon. members if they would grant me the opportunity to look at some authorities. I now have had that opportunity and, if I may, I would like to rule on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Peace River and to thank him for a very novel and ingenious argument.

My concern, among other things, was in keeping straight in my mind the distinction between the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River with respect to the occasion when such consent is required, as he argued, and the occasion when a recommendation might have covered the particular point, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) argued in his presentation. It seemed to me that perhaps there was something I wanted to consider further to see if there is a distinction that I might bring out for the benefit of hon. members. The hon. member for Peace River argued that the consent of the Crown is required before the right can be given to waive the penalty which is referred to in clause 108 (10) and (11) of the bill. The question is whether without the consent of the Sovereign, given before the bill is passed, there can be such a waiver in the bill.

I will not take much more time of the House in making this decision. I thank the hon. member for Peace River and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) for their presentations, because it seemed to be a new point—certainly to me, with my very limited experience in the Chair—and there may have been a distinction I should have considered before rendering a decision as to whether the recommendation required for what we generally call money bills—this was the argument put forward—was required here or whether the recommendation of His Excellency did in fact cover the point with respect to consent.

With respect, it seems to me that we have to go somewhat further in considering the argument of the hon. member for Peace River, that in this case where the right to waive the penalty is given in the bill there would have to be the consent of the Sovereign. The matter has been dealt with by Mr. Speaker and I would refer just very briefly to his decision. Before doing so, I would say that generally speaking one might say that consent, as argued by the hon. member for Peace River, is required where the personal property of the Sovereign is affected, as distinguished from property that the Sovereign may hold for the Sovereign's subjects.

I would refer hon. members to the ruling of Mr. Speaker in the 1963 session, volume 3. The matter is dealt with at page 2980 during consideration of the Municipal Development and Loan Board bill and in circumstances which did not affect the personal property of the Sovereign. Mr. Speaker, then Mr. Deputy Speaker, made this distinction which I shall read briefly:

—I should like to turn to the citation which has been quoted by the hon. member, that is, citation 283. It is obvious that his whole argument, as has been suggested by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Mr. Favreau, is based on the premise that certain rights and privileges of the Crown are affected. It says:

Here Mr. Speaker quotes as follows:

The consent of the King or Queen, as the case may be (to be distinguished from the royal assent of bills) is given by a Privy Councillor to bills (and occasionally amendments) affecting local and personal interests which concern the royal prerogative, the hereditary revenue or personal property or interests of the Crown or Duchy of Cornwall.

I would mention, without reading them, the two other citations on which Mr. Speaker based his decision—Campion at page 329, and Beauchesne, citation 283.

Therefore, in view of the distinction that was drawn in the case where royal consent is required, it seems to me that while the argument of the hon. member was a learned one, it should not prevail in these circumstances.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong this debate on third reading but I do wish to make a few brief comments. This bill contains three main points pertaining to the selling of grain, as I see it. One is the protein factor, which has been mentioned. Another is the mixing at terminals, and the third has to do with boxcar allocation, control over the shipment and movement of grain. All these things should assist in the movement of grain to market.

I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) that there is more to marketing than just passing a new Canada Grain Act. For example, we should be looking for new markets, for new methods of preparing the products which we market, and at ways of providing financing for those who have difficulty buying the grain we have to sell.

In effect, what I say to the Minister of Agriculture is that we do not want any more excuses when we discover that we have a little too much grain on hand and we are not getting our share of the market. We do not want to wake up one morning and find that someone else is carrying out protein grading and we have to wait two years to pass a bill in order to do it. I suggest that we should be out, meeting the competition before it gets the edge on us. I would like to draw the attention of the minister to his point. We should be using imagination and initiative in preparing, selling and merchandising our grain. Now that the bill is being passed this evening, the minister will have a new instrument to aid him and the government in going out to find new markets, hopefully increased markets for all the grain produced by Canadian farmers.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my remarks this evening on third reading of Bill C-175 will be very brief. As hon. members know, I have had the privilege and pleasure of being a member of the Standing Committee on Agriculture which reviewed this legislation at some length. The original bill was C-196, introduced in the House early in the spring. I compliment the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), who are practising farmers, for devoting much time and research in preparing themselves for the committee study and the debate in the House on this very important piece of legislation.

The hon. member for Crowfoot, who resumed his seat a few minutes ago, outlined a number of our reservations and a number of the problems that we feel are still facing the agricultural industry, in western Canada in particular, in dealing with this Canada Grain Act. The minister and the government have accepted a number of opposition suggestions and amendments, and rightly so, Mr. Speaker, because to my utter amazement, as a layman not very familiar with the grain act in its original form, not having been actively engaged in farming for a number of years, Mr. Runciman, head of the Canada Grains Council, presented a brief to our committee prior to the recess in June suggesting no less than 83 amendments, 50 major and 33 minor. This, Mr. Speaker, was an indication that we as a committee had to dig in our heels and do some homework in order to come up with a better bill. If not, we would lose credibility in the eyes of the electorate no matter whether we came from the opposition or the government side.

In conclusion because of the briefs that have been referred to I think we have come up with a bill which, although it is not entirely acceptable as it stands, is much better than it was originally. On the basis of those facts, Mr. Speaker, I am content to see the bill given third reading. Hopefully, it will contribute to improving the grain market for Canadians generally and for western farmers in particular.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I spoke on the introduction of this bill and have had an opportunity to consider it at some length in committee, but there are still aspects of it which disturb me and I feel I must express my reservations. I do not believe the bill has been changed very much because it still has some very disturbing features. As has already been mentioned, the commission at one time had the power to authorize the licensing of elevators. When the bill was drafted, western Canada was growing agriculturally and there was a great demand for agricultural products, particularly grain. People were doing everything within their power to expand their operations and open up new land, building new communities in the process. It is a pity the House did not see fit to allow the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) to put a few more remarks on the record. He pointed out that the emphasis will be on the reduction of the number of grain elevators. The policy paper which arrived in my office this evening states: that any programs and policies which tend to encourage the breaking of new ground will be discouraged. I think that is a mistake. I agree that perphaps some new land is submarginal and should be taken out. There have been suggestions that the western Canada farmer should diversify and raise cattle, but to suggest that certain lands should not be opened up is taking too much into the hands of the government.

I have some land that is covered with bush, not under cultivation. No government can suggest to me that I have no right to open up that land after I have bought and paid for it and continue to pay taxes on it. No government can tell what my plans for that land may be. Eventually it may go back to grass, or it may be suited for rapeseed. There are many places where rapeseed cannot be grown. I may decide to put a crop in for a few years until the roots are rotted, before putting it into grass, so that it does not go back to bush. But a few bureaucrats sitting in Ottawa would not realize that this does happen.

With all the suggestions that have been made, I am afraid there will be a reduction in the elevator system. I am very concerned about this because it will add to the over-all cost of production. I can visualize a situation where farmers will have to deliver grain 30 or 40 miles and we will find that many farmers will be not geared up to do it because they do not possess trucks of high capacity. There was a situation a year ago where farmers had to deliver rapeseed 100 miles away. Even if a farmer has a quota he may run into difficulty in such a case. When a truck is loading up without a scale, he may find that it is overloaded. This is a situation which the farmer is bound to run into. Last year the net result was a prosecution. But are we to be faced with a similar situation because the rule says "no quota"?

The hon. member for Crowfoot pointed out that the elevator system is running at something like 60 per cent of its capacity; Is this the pattern we are to live with? There can be no conclusion other than that the policies of this government are such that eventually the elevator operators will find their business is not a paying proposition. The commission will then tell them they must reduce their elevator system, and they will probably then face prosecution. What will happen to the producer then? Clause 35 (2) provides:

> A licence issued pursuant to subsection (1) shall be
> (a) for a term not exceeding five years; and
> (b) subject to such conditions, in addition to any prescribed conditions, as the commission deems appropriate in the public interest for facilitating trade in grain.

It does not include the interest of the producer. It speaks of the public interest. What is the public interest, Mr. Speaker? The minister has told us we must reduce the effectiveness of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. That may be in the public interest but it is not in the producers' interest. If we were acting in the producers' interest we would maintain in full force the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I therefore say there ought to be a different approach to payments.

The other day I suggested in the House that the elevator system, which includes the terminal elevator system, has a total capacity of 550 million bushels. Since only about 250 million bushels are to be accepted, this will mean that the income of western farmers will be reduced by 300 million bushels. I do not see how the problem is to be overcome. If the elevator system is not to be filled, how will you get any extra money into the hands of the producer? The Minister of Agriculture of the province of Manitoba suggested that $300 million ought to be pumped into the farm economy immediately because Prairie farmers will receive $700 million less than they received in 1969.

What this government intends to do is quite obvious. Under this bill as now drafted, the commission will have the right to close down an elevator at any point as it sees fit, and it can claim it is acting in the public interest. It does not have to take into account the interest of the producer. It has been suggested that rapeseed and barley will go through the system. Senator McNamara suggested that both grain and barley should go into the system. Barley ought to go into the system, because if it does not we may lose our barley market. We may yet lose it because farmers will not grow barley at a loss. They will not grow barley merely for the sake of growing it.

We obtained a share of the market in the United States because of the corn blight in that country. The corn blight gave us a temporary market. The government's grain policy was geared with that fact in mind. The minister thought it might be a good idea to slip that policy under the rug, as it were. His idea is that once you get your foot in the door, you are all right. Well, he might sell the country on that idea this year; he may say that the government will put out some money at this time, but there is nothing to suggest that next year or the year after the same government policy will obtain.

The government's policy tells me that although we are asked to produce rye, flax, rapeseed, barley, oats and wheat there will be an eventual congestion not only of wheat but of all the other commodities I have mentioned. Apparently in the interest of stability the government is to hold back money earned from the sale of some commodities. They will not even trust me with my own money. They will hold back certain sums and dole the money out to me. I give my children quarters and dimes; I do not give them a dollar bill all at one time. That is exactly how the government is treating the farmers; it is that they do not know how to spend their money and therefore it will hold some of it back.

Also, if a farmer in one area does not make a very high income, the farmer in another area who has a higher income will pay out money for the benefit of the poorer farmer. In a sense, that is like insurance. I suppose everybody wants to enter into an insurance scheme of some kind. Certainly it will bring a certain measure of stability. But I do not want this if the government is to hold back my money, if it is going to say, "Look, we have held this money for you. Aren't we good boys?"

An hon. Member: Give them hell, Stan.

Mr. Korchinski: Those are some of the reservations about this measure that I felt I had to express at this time. In addition, under the provisions of clause 87, I believe, the elevator companies will not accept delivery of grain which may be out of condition or contaminated. The point I am making is this: the minister has not indicated in the House, although the matter was raised on several occasions, who is to be responsible if a loss results from grain that is contaminated with the rusty beetle, and so on. I am thinking of comments made by Mr. Hamilton of the Grain Commission who said that the farmer will have to carry this load. That statement contradicts statements made in the House to the effect that the farmer will not carry that load.

In the particular instance referred to, although the contamination was discovered on the ship after the grain had been subjected to a series of examinations, we were told that the farmer would have to bear the loss. But, Mr. Speaker, the farmer would not have delivered contaminated grain, because when grain is delivered at the elevator the elevator agent takes a scoop of it every so often: he looks at the grain; he checks it; he wants to know where it came from; he wants to know its weight and whether it is dry; he wants to know the dockage and shrinkage that is to be allowed. That grain is subjected to a number of inspections. It is inspected by representatives of the commission at the regional terminals. The commission itself supervises these inspections. Why, then, should we expect the farmer to carry the load when grain is allowed to become contaminated? Why is grain allowed to become contaminated, as a result of which farmers are told, "You cannot deliver your grain because it may be out of condition," and so on?

In this bill there are clauses similar to the one to which I have referred. They will cause us trouble. I wish the minister would make a statement about what really has happened in matters such as I have referred to, and at the same time indicate that the government is prepared, where the commission has been negligent, to carry the loss sustained.

Another provision of the bill relates to protein grading. We now know from the explanations given that protein grading will not go into effect for at least two years. This provision has been introduced notwithstanding all the protestations of the minister. Of course, we are accustomed to the type of propaganda in which this government has indulged. The minister singles out one item, explains it to us in a way we can understand and then he slips in other measures. That is typical of some of the legislation that has come from this government. You single out one or two items which are palatable, then throw in a lot of garbage and say, "Look at the beautiful job we are doing for you." The government wanted to rush this bill through without accepting amendments. We tried to point out some of the weaknesses in the grains legislation. After waiting for 40 years, they expect us to rush this bill through. In addition to all that, the minister told us we had an important market for barley.

Mr. Speaker, I have been amused because some people think that because China bought some of our wheat, all the farmers are rolling in dough. The government changed the entire quota system. We have the three-bushel quota this year but it is on the basis of summer-fallow whereas last year it was on the basis of total acreage. If you compare the figures you will see that this year we have a quota that is slightly more than a bushel greater than the quota we had last year.

In addition, the elevators are not being filled. The government does not think the farmers need any money now; they say they will receive it later. They think they can manage the affairs of the farmers better than the farmers themselves. I do not know what will happen if there is another cold snap such as we experienced a year or two ago. The problem was that diesels could not haul the grain to Vancouver. There is a great deal of snow in the west this year. It will be difficult for farmers to start their trucks. In spite of this, the government insists that they deliver their barley because it is required for the markets. The farmers will receive less for their production. It is ridiculous to ask them to rush out in the middle of the night to deliver grain.

The new protein grading system will create problems. There will be an even greater storage problem than at the present time. The new government policy will direct and condition the thinking of the farmers. Farmers have to accept the fact that they will have to deliver their grain to more distant points. Because there will be various protein levels of a certain grade, more storage will be required. The end result will be that as much, or more, elevator space will be required. Present government policy is directed toward the elimination of elevators.

After a study was conducted, a representative of Canadian Pacific Railway appeared before the committee. He informed the committee that the government had commissioned a study in order to work out a new system involving unit loading of trains. I admit that from the point of view of the railroads this might be a good idea. The railways like the idea of loading a complete train at one point. However, three elevator agents will be required if loading operations are carried out 24 hours a day. It would be convenient for the railways to deliver a series of boxcars to one point. However, there is no regard for the distance a farmer has to travel. When the representative of the CPR appeared before the committee, I asked him whether there were storage facilities for other commodities which they handle. He replied that there were warehouses at many points. If the end result of the new system is to be a saving for the railways, they should provide storage for the grain.

The government will require the farmer to pay for the storage of grain in the elevators. The government has no regard for the producers. Obviously this is the way they want the trend to develop. This is one more thing we have noticed in this government's pessimistic attitude toward grain. Last year the Lift program was introduced. The farmers were unable to grow wheat, not because of the program but because of wet weather. Instead, they grew barley. This was not because of any planning. The minister told the farmers that they should not grow too much barley because a glut might develop. This year there is a demand for barley. In their haste to dispose of some of the barley, the government without any regard to price grabbed the first sale and accepted a price of $1.30 a bushel. On delivery to the country elevators, the farmers receive 62 cents or 65 cents a bushel. Statements have been made to the effect that there will be no final payment. Even allowing for transportation and handling costs, there is still quite a disparity.

The government is now in a hurry to have stabilization legislation because they do not want it known that they have gained a market at the expense of the farmer. The farmer's cost of production will not be covered. The government felt it was a good opportunity to introduce this legislation. They do not have to live with the facts. At the same time they will be saving $60 million or $70 million which they would normally pay out under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

I had not intended to speak very long and there are still a few more points I would like to cover. I have taken longer than I thought. I want to register some of the doubts that I have. I hope the minister and the press will not state that protein grading is here from now on and that the farmers will be on easy street: this is what happened after the wheat sale to China. It will take two years to implement this system. There will be far more problems than we realize at present. Suggestions have been made from this side of the House. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) indicated that we would have been ready to pass the protein grading bill but that we had some reservations about certains aspects of it. Although I still have some reservations, I am prepared at this time to allow the matter to come to a final vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

STATISTICS ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF STATISTICS CANADA, PROVISIONS FOR ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill S-2, respecting statistics of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words concerning Bill S-2. We are proposing to make a number of changes in the existing legislation which governs the operations of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Not long ago I picked up a piece of advertising material which informed me that our old friend the Volkswagen was to have a "nose job" and that a number of changes were to be made under the hood. The advertisement went on to say that the important changes were those under the hood. We propose making a change in the appearance of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, a vehicle which has served us well over the years but the important changes are the ones which will go on, as it were, under the hood.

Before we begin consideration of the bill before us I think it might be interesting to recall a little history. The first census taken in Canada was as early as 1666 when Jean Talon, the intendant, went to work to determine how many people there were in the colony. But real business of gathering statistics in Canada began in earnest in 1918. At that time the government set up a commission to examine the methods used in gathering statistics. The commission reported, and a statistics act was passed in the same year endorsing the commission's proposal for a central statistical office to co-ordinate statistics. It then became the job of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to collect statistics, the responsibility for which had previously been scattered among various government departments. Later, in 1948, because of the numerous changes in the interval a new and revised Statistics Act was passed. It is this act we seek to amend today.

Since that time, Mr. Speaker, the nature of the demand has changed considerably. Both the provincial and federal governments have expanded their social and economic policies. New departments and agencies have been created. Task forces and royal commissions, coupled with expanding universities and independent research bodies, have led to an increased sophistication of business and market research. There has been an explosion in the demand for statistics by these organizations. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has responded wherever possible to this demand for accurate co-ordinated facts. It has become a service institution with a high reputation. But service institutions, like cars or television sets, have to be remodelled from time to time to keep them up-to-date. The new concepts contained in the bill before us will make it easier for Canadian business and social institutions to supply the facts the bureau needs, faster and more efficiently than in the past. That is what the new act is all about.

Canadians and their governments have mutual obligations in relation to statistical needs. The citizen, of course, has an obligation to provide statistical data to the nation, but the state has an obligation too—to make it as easy as possible for the citizen to do so, and it is in this regard that there is real room for improvement on the part of governments. Why, for example, should the citizen fill out one form for the federal government and another form to give similar information to a province? We ought to be able to do better than that, and we can do better.

In the past, informal practices have developed between federal and provincial statistical agencies toward that end. The new act formalizes existing ad hoc arrangements and adds a new area of co-operation between these two levels of government. Canadians will be able to fulfil many of their reporting obligations by filling in one form for both governments. The saving in paperwork will permit the modernization of statistical services and provide more and better service without increasing the cost.

Perhaps I can call it ten o'clock, and proceed later, Mr. Speaker?

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—INCLUSION OF PARAMEDICAL SERVICES UNDER MEDICARE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on November 18 I directed the following question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro):

How many provinces must agree to the inclusion of paramedical services under medicare before these services will be accepted by the federal government as a cost-shared item?

The minister replied that a consensus must develop before there would be any extension of coverage. He also said this question was "never seriously considered until every province had entered medicare and that was just about the case now." I also asked the minister if the federal government was considering cost-sharing of paramedical services with any province which would include these services in its medical care program. His answer was evasive and I welcome this opportunity to clarify the situation.

May I briefly sketch the problem which exists in British Columbia? When the B.C. medical plan was set up several years ago it covered all paramedical services up to a set amount each year. These services included those of chiropractors, podiatrists, optometrists, naturopaths, physiotherapists and osteopaths. In July of this year the B.C. government cut in half the set amount of paramedical services which an individual could obtain under its medical plan. This cut was entirely the responsibility of the provincial government because it never had any cost-sharing agreement with the federal government concerning these paramedical services. The provincial government knew this when it set up the plan. However, it also knew that the federal plan made provision for the inclusion of these services on a cost-shared basis, without the consent of all the provinces which is apparently now being demanded by the federal government.

We now see this ridiculous situation in respect of the various paramedical services. Each group must bargain individually with each province for inclusion in its medical care plan. I presume if agreement is reached with all provinces, then the federal government will consider the cost-sharing of the particular paramedical service with the province. This process is time-consuming and can delay for years the inclusion of all these necessary services in our provincial medical care plans. I might add that this is one bad result of getting away from a single national medicare plan to cover all Canadians.

I believe the federal government should share all these paramedical costs with the provinces. If any province wishes to include these services under its plan, then the cost should be shared. I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare how essential it is to include all paramedical services in every medicare plan. In respect of many individuals who have back trouble and require chiropractic treatment, we find this is perhaps the only type of health treatment required. Why should this treatment be denied, or paid for on a limited scale as is the case in British Columbia? Why should treatment by an optometrist be denied those who need it? Again, we find this is often the only health requirement of an individual. The same applies to physiotherapists and other paramedical services. To deny these as cost-shared services under medicare would often put them out of reach of those who need them most.

Since paramedical services were cut in half by the government of British Columbia last July I have received a large number of letters from throughout my riding urging that the federal government share these services and that they be made available to those requiring them. I fully endorse this position. I point out that many of those receiving these services are senior citizens and the curtailment of the services in British Columbia has been especially hard on them. I have received letters from every senior citizen group in my riding urging that immediate action be taken. These citizens do not have the money required for treatment beyond the treatment presently allowed. We should make certain that this type of health care is not denied the people of British Columbia or those of any other part of Canada.

I again urge the minister and the government to immediately review this important aspect of health care and bring it into the area of cost-sharing. There can be no valid excuse for delaying action on this issue. The health of our people should be one of our prime responsibilities and paramedical services plan a vital role. This is why we are requesting complete clarification of the issue.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, would it not be possible for the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) to make her remarks now, as they deal with the same subject to which the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) has just referred, so that I can reply to both at the same time?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary will understand that the Standing Orders of the House provide that a representative of the government must answer every question put to him, but if the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway agrees, I think we may allow the Parliamentary Secretary to give one answer to both questions.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, since I shall not deal with exactly the same subject as my colleague.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that the health insurance plan was not designed, at the time of its inception, to cover all personal health care expenses. Indeed, the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson specified, in 1965, as did the Minister of National Health and Welfare in 1966, that the basic plan was to cover, in the beginning, a minimum of services.

The plan contained provisions designed to extend its coverage when the provinces would agree to it and when the government would see fit to include other special services in the national scheme.

In spite of these provisions, the provincial health ministers feared that the government would act unilaterally and widen the range of insured services; in 1967 and in 1968, the then Ministers of National Health and Welfare had to reiterate their assurance that the federal government would not go ahead on its own.

Finally, in 1969 several provincial ministers asked the federal government to include some paramedical services in the national scheme. It is up to the government to take a decision in this matter and not to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

However, the minister had informed his colleagues from the provinces that he was prepared to discuss with the cabinet the inclusion of some services as soon as the provinces and territories would have set a date for joining the national plan, but this has not occurred yet.

After they have joined, the Minister of National Health and Welfare intends to draw the attention of the other cabinet members to this important matter in due course.

It should also be noted that this subject was back on the agenda at the last federal-provincial conference and it would seem that after all the provinces have joined in the national scheme, further discussions will take place.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, almost a month ago the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) and I questioned the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) in respect of the possibility of including paramedical services under medicare. His replies to our questions were extremely indefinite, not to say evasive. The same thing happened the next day when the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) tried to find out about the inclusion of optometric services.

For months now I have been receiving representations from members and organizations representing the paramedical services—optometrists, podiatrists, chiropractors, osteopaths and others. I have also received urgent appeals from people who require these services in order to carry on their work or maintain their health during their retirement, yet who cannot afford to pay for them on an individual basis.

All these people, those performing paramedical services and those who need them, have the same urgent request. They want to have these services included under medicare. They want the minister to make an agreement with their province to include such services under medicare. They are worried by his evasive attitude. They want to know why he cannot be definite and take action on the matter. There was a time when this matter was quite straightforward and not cloaked in mystery. The Federated Legislative Council of British Columbia, in its bulletin of September 4, 1970, quotes from the Canadian Chiropractic Association memorandum of August 28, 1970, as follows:

> On December 6th, 1966, the Medical Care Act was amended—"to permit inclusion of paramedical services." Details of the debate which followed can be found on page 10761-66 of the House of Commons Debates, December 6th, 1966. Two excerpts from that debate follow:
> "Mr. Douglas: ...I take it this means that the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the minister, can extend paramedical services in a plan in a particular province even though other provinces have not asked for a similar extension. In other words, the minister would be free under this amendment, to accede to the request of a particular province that wanted to add the services which are provided under this legislation, and it would not have to wait until a majority or a specified number of provinces, indicated their desire to have these paramedical services included."
> "I hope the minister's interpretation is the same as my own, namely, that any province would be able to go ahead with providing additional services, provided of course, that the minister and Governor in Council agree."
> "Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I think the construction the honourable member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has put on the proposed amendment is correct, namely, that it would be possible for one or any number of provinces to admit any health services. I want to assure the committee that the amendment proposed is not a pious wish."

• (10:10 p.m.)

In spite of what the Parliamentary Secretary has said, the then Minister of National Health and Welfare was quite definite on the point that the government, on the recommendation of the minister, can make an agreement with any one or more provinces to extend paramedical services there. But what happened between December 6, 1966, and the fall of 1970? Somehow, by a feat of mental prestidigitation, the minister has created the idea of consensus. Until all or most of the provinces agree to admit paramedical service he, alas, can do nothing; and the Parliamentary Secretary follows in the same vein.

In my opinion, this new policy of consensus is purely and simply a device to postpone action on this matter indefinitely. The word "consensus" does not appear in the legislation. The minister used "une entente" which does not appear in the legislation either, to the best of my knowledge. The word "consensus" does not appear in the legislation, nor is there any hint of such a policy. The minister should abide by both the spirit and the letter of the legislation and agree to provide financial assistance to those provinces wishing to include paramedical professions in their medicare programs. Only in this way can the full resources of modern medical treatment be made available to those who need care, and only in this way can the overloaded physicians share with others the very heavy burden of maintaining the health and the vitality of the population.

I should like to impress upon the Parliamentary Secretary the desirability of his approaching the minister to urge upon him the need of getting rid of this bogus business of consensus, because it is not in the legislation nor does it appear anywhere in the Medicare Act. As I say, we need to get back to the fundamental purposes of the act, which sets down clearly and distinctly that the minister might make agreements with one or more provinces, as the case may be, who wanted to include paramedical services within their medicare programs.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the eloquent speech by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. Unfortunately, I am compelled to tell her that the answer which I gave earlier also applies to the question which she discussed and that I have nothing else to add.

GRAIN—BARLEY—PRICE SPREAD BETWEEN DELIVERIES TO COUNTRY ELEVATORS AND FEED MILLS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to address the minister responsible to Parliament for the Canadian Wheat Board in the hope that I might clarify the question I directed to the minister in the oral question period on December 11. It was my impression at that time that perhaps the minister misunderstood the real sense of my question.

My question dealt with the disparity of 30 cents, more or less, between the price of barley delivered to Wheat Board elevators and the price paid for the same grain at the mills. This disparity represents in many cases the margin of profit that a farmer receives for his labour and his investment. In other words, if the average farmer in my riding delivered all his grain to the Wheat Board elevators at the present deflated price, he would end the season with a return roughly the same or less than the cost of producing the grain. He would be left with very little cash to meet current needs, and none at all with which to finance the new crop year.

This situation did not happen purely by chance, Mr. Speaker, nor was it in any way the fault of the farmer. In an attempt to make up for low volume of sales in the past, the government moved vast quantities of grain at low prices. This was done in order to be competitive and to be able to move grain out of the elevators. No one would quarrel with this as long as the farmer is not expected to accept the full burden of the lower prices. I will say more on that matter in a moment.

I would first like to point to another aspect of this situation, Mr. Speaker, where farmers find it more practical to deliver to mills rather than to elevators. Incidentally, the main reason for the price disparity is that there has been an increase in livestock herds, hogs and poultry, in Lisgar and so barley is at a premium, selling at 90 cents to $1 a bushel. The second aspect is that the elevators in my area are far below capacity with respect to stored grain, so low in fact as to present a problem in filling the needs of domestic and foreign markets. In Manitoba the elevators would normally accommodate 52 million bushels. At this time last year there were 45.1 million bushels in storage, and at the present time there are only 24.1 million bushels in storage. These figures are from the Board of Grain Commissioners report dated December 2, 1970. In spite of the fact that elevators in Manitoba are half empty, I do not believe there will be quotas available to farmers for some time to come, and certainly not before Christmas when extra cash payments will be sorely needed.

On Friday last the minister answered my question by asking if I was opposed to the present Wheat Board marketing system. The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. However, I know that the minister has the authority to act in order to meet extraordinary circumstances, and the matter to which I refer is an extraordinary circumstance. Therefore I respectfully ask the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, to consider two suggestions that I feel would go a long way toward alleviating this serious problem which besets the farmers in my area. First, I would ask the minister to consider allowing farmers in my riding, and ridings similarly affected, a further quota at the earliest possible opportunity. The grain is available and the elevators will accommodate such a quota. This would remove a problem of considerable proportions.

Second, I would ask the minister to consider an adjustment by way of a differential payment to farmers who have been penalized by delivering barley to elevators at the Wheat Board price of 67 cents per bushel. This would ensure a final payment in the spring, a move that I consider justified under the circumstances. I say this because I have good reason to believe from members of the grain trade that a final payment may not be forthcoming because of the low initial price at which the barley was sold. Such action on the part of the minister would prove to all that the present Wheat Board marketing system can be made to work in a variety of circumstances, instead of only within a very constricted area.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that I did understand his question. Of course, it is only a few short months ago that members were concerned about the differential between the price being paid for barley by feed mills and the price being paid when they delivered their grain to the Board. The feed mill prices were running at least as much as 30 cents below the board prices. We called it distressed pricing and indeed referred the question of distressed pricing to a committee of this House.

Since that time the market for barley has turned around, thanks in good part to the very vigorous efforts of the Wheat Board to move Canadian barley onto the market at competitive prices, which move the hon. member says he supports. He now points to a differential in price between non-board grain in his area and board grain, but I am afraid I do not quite understand his argument that there is a problem in the differential and at the same time there is a problem in lack of opportunities in the delivery system. The two are contradictory.

The fact is that an extra five-bushel barley quota, making a quota of 15 bushels, has been opened up in all blocks in the very recent past, and I can assure the hon. member that the Wheat Board will be opening that quota further just as soon as they think it desirable in their judgment, using the system to the best capacity. That is the plan to be followed in the future, rather than abusing the system and blocking it with grain that was not required for the market. The Wheat Board, operating under its obligation to move Canadian grain to market, in its judgment in the best possible way did in fact sell at prices below the levels in what may now be termed artificial markets.

The hon. member said he understands the reason for this. As a supporter of the Wheat Board, I am delighted to hear the hon. member say this. He should try to understand and give support to the Wheat Board in this manner of moving our grain. He should try to understand, too, that the board price and the pool price is made up of initial prices and whatever final payment there may be. He has speculated upon the final payment, though I would not choose to do so. The Wheat Board suggests it should not be done, for good commercial reasons, before the time when there is no longer any advantage to competitors in revealing those prices.

The idea of the pool is that those who market their grain to the board will share the price at whatever time of the year they market it. Those who choose to market to feed mills find that the mills are bargaining for barley at whatever price they can get. I am delighted that producers in the hon. member's area are able to get a higher price.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

TABLING OF AGREEMENT RESTRAINING CERTAIN JAPANESE EXPORTS TO CANADA

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table in both official languages the export restraint agreement covering certain Japanese exports to Canada during 1970, and texts of letters exchanged between Ambassador Kondo of Japan and myself dated December 7 and 11, 1970, confirming the arrangement.

FUNDY POWER AUTHORITY

PROVISIONS FOR ESTABLISHMENT, MEMBERSHIP, OBJECTS AND DUTIES, ETC.

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

December 11, 1970—Mr. Nowlan—Bill intituled: "An Act to establish the Fundy Power Authority".

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the motion I think I should mention to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley that the bill which is proposed for consideration by the House has caused me some misgivings. In many ways it is more akin to a private bill than to a public bill. I am sure the hon. member himself will have recognized that. At the same time, I am fully aware of the financial obligations entailed by the presentation of a private bill, and the nature of the propositions included in the proposed bill perhaps could not require that the hon. member should personally be saddled with these responsibilities.

In many ways this bill is perhaps a cross between a private bill and a public bill, or what has been called a hybrid bill. Unfortunately, our Standing Orders do not make provision for the presentation of a hybrid bill. There is no such—I was tempted to say "animal" but that would be highly unparliamentary. I would say that our Standing Orders do not provide for the presentation of such a bill. I would rather consider it a public bill and allow the hon. member, with a caveat, the right to present his bill.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-210, to establish the Fundy Power Authority.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate your caveat. I followed the precedent of the Newfoundland Tunnel Authority and a few other bills.

The purpose of this bill is to establish a hybrid body to be known as the Fundy Power Authority, involving the three Maritime governments, the federal government and associated agencies, to promote the multipurpose development of Fundy tidal power, potentially the greatest feasible single undeveloped power source on this continent.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

POSSIBLE TARIFF WAR—SUGGESTED GATT CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a question relating to trade. Arising out of the suggestion of members of the government that there ought to be a further round of GATT with a view to considering possible reductions of tariffs to avoid the possibility of a tariff war, particularly between the United States and the Common Market, can the minister tell the House whether this has just been a suggestion or whether he or some other member of the government has actually canvassed the members of GATT with a view to launching such a conference?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is more than a view on our part. To make things very clear, let me say that we have suggested two things. We have suggested that a number of elements which are presently being studied in GATT in Geneva should be extracted from the preparatory work and should be the object of international negotiation. These would be subjects that would not create major difficulty in the negotiations for enlargement going on at the same time.

Second, we have suggested that before the transitional period is over there should be a "mondialisation" of the results of EEC enlargement. These are the two things we have suggested, and efforts are being made now to convince others that this is the proper approach. Mr. Olivier Long, the Director General of GATT, is familiar with these ideas. I believe he shares some of them and is trying to work toward the same objective.

Mr. Stanfield: Do I gather that the impression that is abroad that the government has suggested another GATT round is not well based, is not correct?

Mr. Pepin: Well, Mr. Speaker, our views were clearly expressed in the report I made recently in the House on the EEC enlargement. So I presume they are well known in Europe now. These are not new ideas on the part of the Canadian government. I spoke that way to political leaders when I was in the U.K. and Europe, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has done the same. Whether these ideas will ever be elevated to Kennedy Round status I do not know, but we are working toward the objectives indicated.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the minister in a position to tell the House what the attitude is of the administrations of the two major trading units concerned, that of the United States and that of the Common Market, toward this suggestion? Has the minister received any response? Can he indicate very briefly what the response is?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, these views were obviously made known to the two parties the hon. member is talking about. Each one of them, I may say, has problems of its own. All of us know that at this moment the Europeans, dealing only with that group are so involved in the process of enlargement that they have only limited time they say to give to our suggestions with respect to a major negotiation in GATT. We have expressed the view that this would not be the proper approach and that it would be in their own long term interests, as well as ours, to devote some of their attention to the suggestions we have made.

Mr. Stanfield: Do I take it that the minister is not in a position to tell us that the initiative he has taken has received any positive response or endorsement or will receive any support in the immediate future from either the United States or the Common Market?

Mr. Pepin: No, Mr. Speaker, I could not use the word "endorsement" but we are still working very hard on it, and the ideas have supporters everywhere in the world.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED LAY-OFFS IN CANADA BY FOREIGN-CONTROLLED CORPORATIONS TO PROTECT JOBS IN UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of indications that the top economists in the government service have submitted a report claiming that one of the major causes of unemployment has been lay-offs by foreign-controlled corporations in this country and indicating that there is a strong suspicion that these lay-offs have been undertaken to protect jobs in the United States. Has the minister seen or received such a report from the top economists of the government?

Mr. Stanfield: Who are they?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, and I think the premise is a natural NDP premise.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any department of the government has received such a report or whether the Prime Minister himself has received such a report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of any such report being received by any department. I shall ask the ministers whether they have received such a report, but when I saw the news item I thought it looked like a bit of fantasy rather than reality.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether any study is being made of the indicated lay-off of over 5,000 persons by major United States concerns in this country? Is any inquiry being made into whether these lay-offs were necessary because of the situation in Canada, or because of the situation in the United States?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think this is all a dream of Stephen Lewis.

Mr. Lewis: His dream is your nightmare.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—ALLEGED ABOLITION OF PENALTY ON PRODUCTION IN EXCESS OF QUOTA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

According to an article which appeared in an Eastern Townships newspaper, Quebec milk producers, and probably all producers in Canada, will not be subject to the overproduction tax of $1.25 per cent starting December 1.

Can the minister say whether the government's dairy policy has been altered and whether he has issued a statement in this regard?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there will be a very important change in the holdback on the subsidy support program as soon as the provinces, particularly Ontario and Quebec, have a market-sharing program in place and functioning. We are hopeful that this will be very soon. As soon as it is there will be some important changes in the holdback.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the minister say whether the tax of $1.25 is to be repealed when these regulations come into force and, if so, whether this measure will apply retroactively from April 1, 1970.

[English]

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will. I shall announce to the House what the changes in the holdback on the subsidy support program are as soon as I have confirmation from the provinces and the milk marketing boards in those provinces that a market-sharing program is in effect.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Is it true that, since December 1, the penalty on surplus production has been reduced from $1.25 to 26 cents?

[English]

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not true in the way the hon. member put the matter. I think, as I said, that there will be a very important change, whether from $1.25 to 26 cents or to some other figure, as soon as the provinces have market-sharing quotas in effect.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STUDY OF NATO'S OUTLOOK—COMMENTS BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and welcome him back to the House after his trip to attend the NATO meetings and visit our forces in Europe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Smile, dear, smile. Could he advise the House of the reaction of the members of the NATO council to the gratuitous advice given to the council by the new boy regarding the future operations of NATO—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that the question cannot be asked in those terms. If he would like to ask the question in terms that are acceptable to the Chair, perhaps he could proceed.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister advise the House as to what was the reaction of the NATO council to the advice which the minister gave the other members regarding the future operations of NATO, particularly in view of the fact that the government he represents has just withdrawn half of its forces which had been committed to that body?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that the comments which we made at that time about the A.D. 70's study, which is the context in which the remarks were made, were agreed to be just under the circumstances and were well taken.

Mr. Hees: Could the minister advise the House if the reaction of the members of the NATO council to the minister's precocious pomposity was the same acute nausea which was experienced by this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

NATO—NUMBER OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Without using any expressions such as he has just heard—being devoid of expressions of that kind—may I ask him this question? What will the number of Canadian personnel in NATO be during the coming year? Will the number be 5,000, as it originally was, or 2,500, to which figure the force was reduced? I ask this question because, after reading what he said in Europe, there is considerable doubt as to what he meant.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I said in Europe that the force level would be 5,000. I say to the right hon. member that the force level will be 5,000, hence 5,000 means 5,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when was it that 5,000 became 5,000? When did the government of Canada change its attitude regarding the reduction of our forces to 2,500?

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was the conversion on the road to Damascus?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there was never any decision to reduce the forces to 2,500. There was a full force level proposed a little over a year ago, and after discussions with the NATO authorities it was equalized at a level of 5,000. That has been the position at least so long as I have been Minister of National Defence and for some time before that.

PROPOSED SALE OF ARMS BY BRITAIN TO SOUTH AFRICA —VISIT TO TANZANIA AND ZAMBIA BY PRIME MINISTER'S SPECIAL ASSISTANT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Did he send his special assistant, Dr. Ivan Head, to confer with President Nyerere of Tanzania and President Kaunda of Zambia? If so, was the question of the resumption of the sale of arms by Britain to South Africa one of the subjects that Dr. Head was required to discuss with the two African leaders?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The answer to both questions is yes.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Prime Minister whether Dr. Head's instructions were to inform the two African leaders that the Canadian government remains firm in its opposition to the resumption of the sale of arms by Britain to South Africa or whether he was to negotiate some kind of accommodation?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The position Dr. Head adopted was that which was expressed to the British government in a letter from myself to Prime Minister Heath several months ago. The purpose of the trip was to explain that position and to indicate that we hope that some accommodation can be reached within the framework of the Commonwealth which would permit each country to have, of course, jurisdiction over its own internal affairs but to make sure that its decisions were compatible, in so far as possible, with the maintenance and subsistence of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Lewis: Does the answer of the Prime Minister mean that, if some African members of the Commonwealth should so object to the British resumption of the sale of arms as to threaten to leave it, the Canadian government may change its position in the sale of arms to South Africa and find some compromise, or will we stand firm?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must point out to the hon. member that his question is hypothetical.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, Your Honour knows that the Prime Ministers' conference will take place in January and the Prime Minister of Canada will be out of the House at that time. What I am really seeking is information on the position which the Prime Minister and the government will take at the Prime Ministers' conference, and these are the final days on which the Prime Minister can be asked that kind of question.

Mr. Speaker: I realize that the matter is urgent and of national importance, but I was suggesting to the hon. member that his further supplementary appeared to be hypothetical. If I am wrong, perhaps the Prime Minister should be allowed to reply. I must point out to hon. members that the question period is moving along quickly, and if there are quite a few supplementaries at this time it will prevent hon. members on the back benches asking questions which they may want to ask later.

Mr. Lewis: May I rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. At the Prime Ministers' conference of Commonwealth leaders to be held in January, does the Canadian government intend to stand firm in its opposition to the sale of arms to South Africa, or will it seek some kind of compromise?

Mr. Trudeau: When I go into a meeting of any kind, Mr. Speaker, I generally know the kind of results I would like to issue from that meeting. But I would not go so far as to say that I would go into a meeting, even the Commonwealth meeting, with a closed mind and not prepared to listen to arguments from all sides.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If these arguments were to convince me that the position of the Canadian government was wrong, I hope I would have the courage to correct it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED SALE OF ARMS BY BRITAIN TO SOUTH AFRICA —CANADIAN POSITION AND VIEWS OF COMMONWEALTH SECRETARY GENERAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the position put forward by the Prime Minister's representative was taken after consultation with Mr. Arnold Smith, Secretary General of the Commonwealth, and whether the representations made by the Prime Minister's representative were fully consistent with the views of Mr. Smith?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has not made any attempt to make sure that Mr. Smith has any kind of veto over our position. If our position should be inconsistent with his, I am sure the House would not object to our having the right to express it. But if the Leader of the Opposition is asking whether we are in contact with Mr. Smith and aware of his efforts to assure the good health of the Commonwealth, the answer is yes. I have seen Mr. Smith and so had Mr. Head in the weeks preceding Mr. Head's visit to Africa.

PROPOSED SALE OF ARMS BY BRITAIN TO SOUTH AFRICA —REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO U.K. PRIME MINISTER Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a supplementary question in view of the rather unusual procedure regarding the letter written by the Prime Minister to the Right Hon. Edward Heath, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, in connection with the problem in South Africa and the sale of arms. As this letter was leaked in Ottawa almost before it was received by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, will the Prime Minister ascertain from Mr. Heath when he is in Ottawa whether he has any objection to the tabling of that letter so that hon. members will know the exact stand taken by the Prime Minister of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. member would like to correct the erroneous statement that he made. If he checks the facts he will see that the letter was not leaked in Ottawa, as he stated, almost as soon as it was given to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was it leaked?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Members of the opposition are applauding the right hon. gentleman because, when found at fault, he asks a question. I do not think there is anything particularly astute about this. I repeat that the facts as he stated them were wrong, and perhaps he would like to correct them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not withdraw at all. The Prime Minister did something which he had no right to do in the interests of the Commonwealth; he sent a confidential communication.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Trudeau: It is not personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, but I think the House is entitled to know the facts when I am accused of having done something which I had no right to do. I assure the House that we did not leak any letter. It was not leaked in Ottawa, and the right hon. member should not make an accusation of that kind without being able to substantiate it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I remind the Prime Minister that this is not the first time he has forgotten something—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize a further supplementary by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, but I must bring to the attention of hon. members that time is going by quickly.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): The Prime Minister stated he would go to the Commonwealth conference with a flexible position and listen to the arguments of Britain. Suppose countries such as Zambia, Tanzania and other Commonwealth nations put forward very strong arguments for taking an even tougher position against Britain; will Canada's position be flexible enough to tend to their side?

An hon. Member: Make him a Parliamentary Secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Both suggestions I have just heard are hypothetical, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am counting the large number of members who are rising now, and I must warn many of them that they will not be called during this question period.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REASSESSMENT OF FARMERS DOING OFF-FARM WORK

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. I have given him notice. Can the minister tell us the results of his meeting with the Minister of National Revenue on behalf of farmers who are being reassessed for tax purposes after engaging in off-farm labour to augment their incomes?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have had a discussion about this matter with the Minister of National Revenue, although these farmers have the right to communicate directly with the Minister of National Revenue if they wish. I am advised that the minister is looking further into this matter. We would like to be given names so that we can identify the files concerned, but I can also assure the hon. member that bona fide farmers are not being treated any differently now than they were in the past.

DISCUSSION OF LEVEL OF TAXATION WITH PROVINCIAL TREASURERS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. During the recent conference between himself and the provincial treasurers did any discussion take place concerning whether or not the increases in the combined rates of taxation, provincially and federally, have jointly passed the point of diminishing returns?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacLean: Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to suggest that discussion of this point should be on the agenda at the next such conference?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker, because I do not believe it to be the case.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is the kind of information which should be given to the House by way of a statement on motions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OF KOREAN TOBACCO

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell the House whether or not three million pounds of Korean tobacco were imported into Canada during the last two months for use by Rothman's Tobacco Company?

Mr. Speaker: This kind of question ought to be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency it may be discussed at ten o'clock.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, may I say that the tobacco auctions are in progress at the present time, and this is a matter of urgent importance to the industry in light of its marketing activities.

Mr. Speaker: If there is urgency which is still not apparent to the Chair, perhaps the minister might reply quickly.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Do I understand that the hon. member has in mind imports of flue-cured tobacco from Korea?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pepin: If that is the case, I have checked with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and I find there is no record of such imports in the first 11 months of the year. This is all the information that I have up to the present. Now that the hon. member provides me with further clues, I will be glad to try to procure any additional information I can.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will not allow the minister to reply to the question. The question should be placed on the order paper. In any event, it is not the kind of question which can be asked during the question period.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PETITION RESPECTING PENSION PLAN OR IMPROVED EARLY RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR FORMER COAL MINERS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. Inasmuch as he has now had an opportunity to review the petition placed before the House in connection with section 18 of Bill C-135, can the hon. gentleman indicate what his intentions are in this respect?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): The only aspect of the question I have been considering is the procedure by which the petition could be considered by the House or by a committee. There have been discussions with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and his Parliamentary Secretary, and with the chairman of the standing committee. It may be we can work out a method by which the petition can be considered by that committee. I believe there is a difficulty which hon. members can appreciate: if formal reference of the petition were made to the committee, similar petitions in future would have to be dealt with in the same way. This is a matter which has some consequence from the point of view of our over-all operations. Nevertheless, because of the special nature of the petition and especially its origin, I am particularly interested in having it considered in some place.

Mr. MacInnis: Am I to understand that the government is reluctant to allow a well-established precedent to operate here?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that this is argument. It would seem to me that perhaps what we should do is allow the hon. member and the President of the Privy Council to go into the matter together and try to find a solution, as suggested by the Chair originally.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I think my question of privilege is well established by the question of privilege with which the Prime Minister got away a few moments ago. When the petition was tabled I co-operated with the House and with the House Leader and gave him every opportunity to study the petition and the bill. With regard to sending it to the committee, it was my hope that the government would see fit to send it to the committee for study, and also that it would be sent to the justice and legal affairs committee, with the emphasis on the justice. We have before us—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a point of order or a question of privilege. The hon. member's personal privileges have not been offended, to my way of thinking. I suggest to the hon. member that our chances of finding a solution to the important point that he raised the other day are much better than he may think. He will remember that when the question was raised before the House by way of a petition I asked whether there was unanimous consent of the House, and I gathered that we were pretty close to achieving that. I am hopeful that we may still be able to achieve this, but in view of the briefness of the question period I do not think we are helping the situation at this point by pursuing the matter as a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: Then may I once again ask the Chair for guidance. Where does one seek justice? I have discussed this matter with the minister and the minister is reluctant to send it to the committee to be dealt with. I have no idea where I should turn in that this legislation has not been implemented. Where in this country do you get justice?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Greenwood.

HOUSING

MONTREAL—EFFECTS OF PROPOSED EXPRESSWAY—REPLACEMENT BY UNDERGROUND PROJECT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the acting minister in charge of housing, who I believe is the Minister of National Revenue. In light of the statement made by the Secretary of State that the project for an expressway in Montreal would butcher several residential areas and demolish 2,000 houses and therefore should be replaced by an underground expressway, will the minister undertake to look into this matter and explore what action might be taken to discourage the one project in favour of the other?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague I would be glad to take note of the question.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR ABOLITION OF THREE PER CENT SURTAX

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

With a view to meeting the request made yesterday by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to the government, to remove the 3 per cent surtax, which would result in lower unemployment, does the government intend to reconsider its last decision and soon announce lower taxes, in view of the fact that taxes paralyze production and give free play to the escalation in the cost of living?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, any changes in taxation policy will be announced in the House of Commons in the normal way.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—APPLICATIONS FILED AFTER JULY 15, 1970

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the numerous representations made in recent weeks by producers who, through no fault of their own, did not file their applications under the Lift program before the deadline of July 15, 1970, can the minister inform the House whether or not those representations have been considered and, if so, what has been the decision of the government?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have been giving serious consideration to the representations that have been made. Certainly we do not want to deprive any farmer of his payments under the Lift program through an honest mistake on his part. Therefore I have instructed the appeal tribunal in Regina to give a little more latitude in respect of the dates when applications were received but not to change the date on which the physical changes may have been made—that is, up to and including July 15 but not since that date.

POWER

INVESTIGATION OF USE OF BAY OF FUNDY TIDES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister in a position to report to the House the progress being made in his department on the harnessing of the power of the Bay of Fundy tides, and what future actions are planned in this regard? If he is not at the present time in that position, will he provide the House with an up to date report at the earliest possible opportunity?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add to the report I made at the time of tabling the study regarding the Bay of Fundy power project. I would be glad to look into the matter further to see whether the departmental study has come up with any further conclusions, and in this regard I will take the hon. member's question as notice.

IMMIGRATION

IMPROVEMENT OF APPEAL BOARD STRUCTURE TO DEAL WITH BACKLOG OF CASES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I asked a question of the acting minister yesterday concerning improvement in the structure and procedures of the Immigration Appeal Board in order to deal with the backlog of some 14 months in appeals awaiting hearing. Has the minister had this question referred to him and, if so, has he an answer?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this question has in effect, been answered several times in the House, at which time it was indicated that the specific recommendations of the Sedgwick report and its conclusions and our own decision on them were considered to be of urgent importance, and that we hoped to be able to come forward with some proposals for the House before very long.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REGULATION OF SALE OF TOY FIREARMS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I intended to put a question to the Minister of Justice but in his absence, I shall direct it to the Prime Minister.

Will the government consider the opportunity of bringing forward legislation to prohibit in Canada the import, manufacturing and distribution of false firearms sold as toys, in view of the proliferation of such toy guns and the dangers they represent for our youth and the police forces in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the matter of firearms has been raised in the past in the House and the Minister of Justice has said that he was examining it but, as I see it, if the question deals with toys, it should be put to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who, as we all know, has already taken steps to protect children against dangerous toys. I will make sure that the question is drawn to his attention.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, since he has agreed to answer my question.

Since during the Christmas season a considerable number of toy firearms appear on the market, could the government take immediate steps to prevent such proliferation at this time?

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG REGION—GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN SERVICING SMALL FACILITIES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the minister to phase out all federal government participation in servicing small airports by removing snow-clearing equipment and other DOT services in what is known as the Winnipeg region?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would have to have something a little more specific as to the region, but I can assure the hon. member that there is no such policy. There may be an airport or two where something is being done, but perhaps we can consult in this regard and the hon. member can give me more specific information.

WINNIPEG-REGINA—REGIONAL AIR POLICY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Now that TransAir has discontinued its service between Winnipeg and Regina, will the minister review the regional air policy for this area so that adequate regional air services may be provided and thereby maintain services at these airports?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is obviously not a supplementary question but the minister might be allowed to reply to it so we can save 30 seconds.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will take a look at this.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport when we can expect a full statement on regional air policy and the implications for regional airports so we can get a full measure of public reaction, hopefully in support of that policy?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, whether it be regional air policy or air policy generally, it tends to be an ongoing thing. I reaffirm the air policy stated about a year ago which added certain elements to it. There have been certain changes since that time. Perhaps the most appropriate place where we might be able to get full disclosure of the sort the hon. member wants is before one of the committees, and I would be happy to appear before such committee. However, I am not anticipating preparation or release of what might be described as a new regional air policy in total form in the foreseeable future.

TORONTO—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROPOSED SITES FOR NEW FACILITY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport. I understand that the minister is considering four sites only for the second international airport near Toronto. In view of the fact that the minister has been considering this matter for over a year, can the minister give the House an indication of the target date for advising the House and the nation regarding these sites, having provided safeguards to prevent speculation, so that the Canadian people can have what has been called participatory democracy?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): It is precisely because we are anxious to have a maximum amount of participatory democracy that this problem has arisen. If we wish to make an arbitrary choice of a site and just lay it on the table as having been completed and done with, that is one thing. What we are seeking to do is to secure the maximum amount of co-operation and participation with the provinces and the municipalities, including metropolitan Toronto. In order to do this we have to give people choices and in order to make choices available we have to show alternative sites. The difficulty, as I have told the House on previous occasions, is to find a means by which we can prevent land speculation during this period of public participation. I am happy to say that I have the full co-operation of the government of Ontario and that our officials are meeting jointly this week to see whether through the mechanisms that are available to both of us we can achieve that objective. The instant we have a means through which to ensure that there will be no land speculation the report will be released, and I hope that will be early in the new year.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister some other alternatives to offer rather than a Toronto auxiliary airport?

Mr. Jamieson: I might offer you a slow boat to China.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: I am afraid I do not understand the portent of the question and it might take too long to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this matter might be pursued tomorrow. If the hon. member would bear with me I would like to see the hon. member for Crowfoot and then the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Minister of Transport as long as a year ago advised the House that he would announce last September where the Toronto auxiliary airport would be. He has kept in suspense not only this House but all the people who are hanging on a limb as to where this airport will be. I asked the question not too long ago whether it would be north and west of Toronto and the minister said north, south, east and west of Toronto. I did not appreciate that answer but I said nothing at that time. Now we have asked the minister when he proposes to tell us the location of these sites and he offers me a slow boat to China. These people in this area want an answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member if I was flippant. I honestly did not mean it in any serious way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: If I were going to put him on a boat, Mr. Speaker, it would be to a much more attractive location than China.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: But seriously—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously we are going nowhere fast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister still speaking to the question of privilege? It was hardly a question of privilege. It was more a point of debate, but the House may wish to allow the minister to reply to the member's question.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to reiterate the point that this judgment we have made with regard to the phasing in terms of public disclosure has the full co-operation of the province of Ontario. If the hon. member or any others wish us to withdraw from our commitment to keep the people of the area informed on a proper basis, then we can go ahead and announce the site tomorrow, but until we have this assurance I think certainly the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee would not want me to be put in a position where perhaps the Auditor General might accuse me—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I owe it to hon. members to bring to their attention that the question period expired three or four minutes ago. I realize this is an important point that was raised originally by the hon. member for Hamilton West. The hon. member for Crowfoot, the hon. member for MacKenzie and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants have been trying to ask questions since the beginning of the question period. I will start with the hon. member for Crowfoot.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN HANDLING CHARGES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the Canada Grain Act has been passed, is it the government's intention to allow the Board of Grain Commissioners to increase the handling charges, which would be taken right out of the farmers' pockets if this should come about?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that question does not arise because the decisions that are made by the Board of Grain Commissioners respecting handling and storage charges are decisions made by that body.

TRANSPORT

EFFECT OF GREAT LAKES ICEBREAKING OPERATIONS ON SERVICES ELSEWHERE IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Did the start of icebreaking operations on the Great Lakes last week mean a cutting down of such services elsewhere in eastern Canada and, if so, where?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe the decision to carry out some experimental work in the Great Lakes will have any effect on icebreaking in other regions.

PRESENCE OF RUSTY BEETLE IN WHEAT SHIPMENTS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. On November 17 he indicated to the House he would order a study of the whole question of contamination of wheat by the rusty beetle. Is he now in possession of this report and could he indicate to the House briefly what the situation is?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did not say I would order a study. I said I would try to ascertain the facts. One of the facts that is important is that we have not had any claims in respect of contamination by the rusty beetle in grain shipments to our overseas customers.

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—PROVISION OF OFFICIALS TO ASSIST RELATIVES TO COME TO CANADA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, now that we have exchanged diplomats with the People's Republic of China, if he would make a statement on motions on what plans his department has for additional immigration officials on the mainland to provide opportunities for relatives of Canadian citizens to come to Canada from the mainland area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into the question of whether a statement on motions would be helpful some time in the near future.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Joliette raising a point of order?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Since I have received this morning a telegram of which the Minister of Transport should also have a copy in hand, would the House allow me to ask him a question concerning a most urgent problem?

Mr. Speaker: I have reminded hon. members that the question period has been over for six or seven minutes already. Should the House agree—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might perhaps ask his question tomorrow. I shall see to it that he is recognized at the very beginning of the question period.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY UNDER STANDING ORDER 58—NON CONFIDENCE MOTION—CONDEMNATION OF FALSE HOPES RAISED BY GOVERNMENT—INABILITY TO USE TALENTS OF YOUNG PEOPLE BETWEEN 16 AND 24 YEARS OF AGE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved:

That this House condemns the government for having inspired false hopes among young people between the ages of 16 and 24 by assuring them that education pays, at a time when young people coming out of schools and universities find no outlet for their energies and no means of placing the knowledge they have acquired at the service of the people, because the government has been unable to introduce such financial devices as the compensated discount and the national dividend so as to enable the masses to benefit from the communal resource constituted by young people who are educated and better equipped than any previous generation to produce more efficiently, more abundantly and more economically, so as to assure the greater welfare of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise very briefly on a point of order to renew the caveat which was filed by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) some time ago when a non-confidence motion was moved on behalf of a representative of the New Democratic Party. I do not intend to make a formal argument, and I shall not object to this motion proceeding now, because we feel that with some substantial improvement we might be able to support it. I simply wish to make plain that in allowing the motion to proceed, it is without prejudice to the view of our party that when we are in the process of dealing with the granting of supply to Her Majesty's government, it is the traditional right of Her Majesty's Official Opposition to move motions of non-confidence. I know that objection will be taken to this position by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is about to spring to his feet. I recognize that there is a very difficult problem here, and some day the hon. member, I, and other hon. members may have to place it before Your Honour.

• (3:00 p.m.)

May I conclude by saying that I hope this might be one of the matters at which the Procedure Committee might look. Quite properly, we should try to limit the number of non-confidence motions, but surely with 25 motions on opposition days it should be quite plain that in the past there have been too many dessicated and anaemic discussions, not because the subject matter was not a good one or because the calibre of the debate was not high, but because there was no vote to be taken at the end of the discussion. It would seem to me that some arrangement might be found by which motions which are dealt with on opposition days might be the subject of a vote, so that members on the government side who could not vote against the government because it was a non-confidence motion, might be free to take a position when suggestions are made urging the government to do something or take a less critical position than is involved in a non-confidence motion. I hope that this is one of the issues which the House and the committee might well discuss later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to join the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in entering, briefly, a caveat. As a matter of fact, it is because of the caveat that he has entered that I must do likewise.

The issue that is raised relates to the question of which hon. members have the right, under Standing Order 58, to file motions on non-confidence days. I might point out to Your Honour that in Standing Order 58(3) there is a reference to the fact that opposition motions may be moved only by members in opposition to the government, but there is no suggestion that those motions may be moved only by members of the official opposition. The hon. member for Peace River has just said that this is a traditional right. I am sure he would expect me to challenge that statement. As a matter of fact, over the years there have been many occasions when amendments to the motion to go into supply have been moved by members other than members of the official opposition. It is true that under this new rule we have never sorted things out, but I do not think we have had it long enough for it to have become a tradition.

In the last session, however, when we were unable to reach agreement on whether someone else should have one of these non-confidence motions, we have found a way to propose one of them. The fact is that there are six in the year under the rule as it stands. We do not think the official opposition has any prior right to have all six of these motions. We think that at the very least the other parties should have one each, and that if we cannot reach an agreement among ourselves, it will have to be resolved by making appropriate motions and bringing the issue before the Chair.

What happened today was that this was the final motion in the current semester, and during that time only one has been a non-confidence motion. Therefore, by default, our friends of the Ralliement Creditiste will have a vote on their motion tonight. I am glad the default has been in their favour, but I suggest that when the time comes to argue it out, it should be clear that the official opposition does not have a prior claim to all six of the non-confidence motions and that there should be a ruling accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that both hon. members have decided not to argue the case. In view of this, I will deliver a non-ruling. It may be that some day the rule will have to be clarified in some way, and I hope I will not be placed in the position of having to determine who has a non-confidence motion and who has not. I think that it would be preferable if this were done by the terms of the Standing Order but, as the hon. member for Peace River suggested, it may well be that the Procedure Committee could look at this difficulty in due course.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, in recent decades, the latest in particular, successive governments have based their economic policies on two broad principles. Even provincial governments have followed suit. Those principles are specialization and increased productivity.

Employment of Graduate Students

In their enthusiasm, because they thought they had found a magic solution, governments were hypnotized by the value of diplomas; they were forever speaking of "education" and "specialization". We now know the price of that enthusiasm.

When our fathers were young, instead of fidgeting at their desks in the classroom, they rushed to the woods in order to earn some money on which to live. They were jacks-of-all-trades and the only diploma of which they could boast was one in resourcefulness.

Our fathers experienced hard times. Indeed, their generation went through a succession of economic crises and wars, which left them no respite.

Today, governments are again driving those people to the wall, telling them they must have education, diplomas or some special skill.

Our governments have therefore invested billions of dollars in the construction of schools, in comprehensive schools, school renovation, recruitment and training of teachers. That was the period of Parent reports, Operation 55 and many other projects of both provincial and federal governments. There, Mr. Speaker, the federal government did not take a back seat.

However, the movement should not have stopped there. Once our governments had found the soltuion, which was education, they should have applied it thoroughly. It had indeed been sorely lacking.

That is why the federal government is in turn taking the lead and setting up adult education programs through its Manpower Training Centres.

Fathers and mothers as well who as children only got distant glimpses and dreams of school, are now being paid the equivalent of a salary by the government to make up for lost time. They are being offered an elementary course, then a secondary course and finally, to crown it all, vocational training. However, after that, there is no job.

• (3:10 p.m.)

This is tremendous for our puppet governments. In fact, those who otherwise would live in poverty are now living on hope. They are getting paid and, in any case, they would probably be getting welfare. Furthermore, these programs suit the government because it is normal to do everything so that these people may have the chance to get an education.

It is a political play to get votes.

Finally, while they are studying these people are not looked on as unemployed. So they are not adding to the already frightening unemployment figures which are further evidence of the government's inefficiency. This is what counts most for the latter.

The situation is quickly outlined, Mr. Speaker: everybody in school! The slogan is the following: Education will save you. It is the solution to our problems of poverty, economic injustice and wealth distribution, that is production distribution.

I think that there is no over-all solution to our economic and social problems. However, let us not put all our eggs in the same basket because when we drop it, we shall have quite an omelet. This is what is taking place today.

On Friday, December 11, 1970, on the front page of the newspaper Le Nouvelliste, of Trois-Rivières, there was the following heading: "476,000 unemployed in Canada and Quebec holds the record for unemployment in this country". Let me quote part of this article quite descriptive of our situation:

> The number of unemployed in Canada has increased by 57,000 and reached 476,000 in November last, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics disclosed Thursday in a joint statement.

This increase in the number of unemployed raised the gross unemployment rate to 5.7 per cent, from 5 per cent in October.

As for the labour situation, it is stated that it may vary from October to November. However, the number of employed workers stood at 7,924,000 in November, a drop of 69,000 from October.

And this is not happening only in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the same problem is just as acute in every province. This is—and I want to say it straight out—the total failure of this government's economic policy.

That is why I move, seconded by my colleagues of the Ralliement creditiste, the following motion:

> That this House condemns the government for having inspired false hopes among young people between the ages of 16 and 24 by assuring them that education pays, at a time when young people coming out of schools and universities find no outlet for their energies and no means of placing the knowledge they have acquired at the service of the people, because—

And this is where we find, Mr. Speaker, the incompetence of the old parties in economic matters.

> —because the government has been unable to introduce such financial devices as the compensated discount and the national dividend so as to enable the masses to benefit from the communal resource constituted by young people who are educated and better equipped than any previous generation to produce more efficiently, more abundantly and more economically, so as to assure the greater welfare of all Canadians.

Indeed the number of unemployed has increased by 44,000 in Ontario, by 28,000 in British Columbia, by 25,000 in Quebec and by 23,000 in the Prairie provinces. It is not merely a problem concerning Quebec; it is a national problem.

The rate of unemployment has increased in Quebec from 6.8 per cent to 1.2 per cent. It cannot be said that the government of Quebec ignores that problem. Indeed this shadow government has as a matter of fact won the election by promising 100,000 jobs. Up to now this plan has been a failure. Indeed in its last annual report the Economic Council of Canada estimated that only 3,000 jobs would be created this year in Quebec, which would not be much of a success.

But today 168,000 jobs would be needed to regain control of the situation. Through its anti-inflation policy the federal government has directly contributed to the increase of unemployment all across Canada. The economic policy followed by the government under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has led to complete failure.

To show the shortcomings of this economic policy of the Liberals, one merely has to point out that while graduates were being produced, a matching number of opportunities should have been created, and this the government has failed to do.

Mr. Speaker, the specialized magazine Supply and Demand indicates that the number of employment opportunities for university graduates has increased by a mere 3.4 per cent since 1969 whereas the number of graduates has gone up by 10 per cent during the same period, increasing at a rate twice as fast—if not more—as the number of job openings.

And for the province of Quebec, the Minister of Labour about a month ago predicted that next year 48,000 CEGEP graduates will not be able to find jobs corresponding to their educational levels.

This situation is serious, not to say upsetting, when one considers that its victims are the same young people who were promised a happy society where they would find freedom and security since their degrees, they were told, would secure a stable job for them. But today, what do these degrees secure for them? Idleness, disappointment and despair. Why? Because the present government simply does not have a monetary policy.

And our governments are directly responsible for this situation, which they literally created.

[English]

The greatest myth of the post-war years, Mr. Speaker, has been that of "more jobs, and better jobs through more education." We have already examined the results with respect to the young people who innocently believed this myth. More jobs, Mr. Speaker? Better jobs? They don't have any jobs at all! But even worse for the country is the fact that governments believed the myth, and so every government from Newfoundland to British Columbia poured money into education. And Ottawa was right out there in front, paying 50 per cent of the operating costs of Canadian universities, as well as financing the Canadian student loan program.

The Economic Council of Canada tells us that education is the biggest expense of governments in this country. Already public and private financing of education runs to over $5 billion. And what is the result? Young people coming out of universities with their degrees can't find jobs. It costs $40,000 to educate a man to the point where he receives a Ph.D. degree, and yet Dr. Frank Kelly, Science Adviser for the Science Council of Canada, last month said that half the Ph.D. candidates getting their degrees next year will not be able to find employment.

Somewhere, Mr. Speaker, somebody has made a horrible mistake. Billions of dollars are spent on education, and now students cannot find jobs. Mr. Speaker, the government has failed those students. And worse, far worse, it has failed the many unemployed people in this country because, in spending those millions and billions of dollars on education, it has deprived the poor and the uneducated of jobs and of a decent life that could have been created if the money had been spent on them.

[Translation]

We might understand why so much was spent on education if at least we had managed to give the poor, the underprivileged and rural citizens a chance to enhance their standard of living. But how can they benefit from it? How can the poor afford to attend university when tuition fees exceed $500?

There are 476,000 unemployed in Canada, including 212,000 under 25. Are those young people entitled to benefits under the current unemployment insurance program? Let us briefly examine the situation. They are not eligible because they are too young. This is preposterous indeed! To be eligible for unemployment benefits, a chap must have worked 30 weeks during the two previous years, including at least 24 weeks during the last year.

How many young people who just left school and cannot find employment fulfill this condition? Even if they could, they would receive approximately $40 a week. What happens if they take a federal government sponsored retraining course? They get an average of $65 a week. The government spends over $500 million to finance these courses, but can a young unemployed worker be eligible for one? It is very difficult, if not impossible. To do so, he should have completed his studies one year before or have been working for three years.

In fact, only 31 per cent of those who took these courses last year were unemployed workers. The others had provisionally left their position and intended to resume it as soon as the course was over. There is thus no hope for our young people.

What was the reaction of the right hon. Prime Minister in the face of that serious situation? He merely replied, woefully, as usual, and I quote:

> Through our fiscal and monetary policies, we can hardly propose to be discriminatory towards the old in order to favour the young.

That reply is shameful and unacceptable, especially coming from a Prime Minister who is a young "little old bachelor".

I urge that students be paid a salary so they will no longer be penalized for being students.

I urge that the government revise its investment policy, that it cease to use it as a marvelous tool for patronage and use it instead to stimulate the economy in particularly underdeveloped areas.

I urge that the liberal government quit wasting our natural resources through inaction and that it set up development programs for areas until now overlooked or neglected, such as Northern Canada for instance.

The young people of this country are ready and willing to work; they went to school in order to get the required training. Let the government give them now the opportunity to do something.

The young people are available. The task of building a country appeals to them. But the government should wake up and develop those vast natural resources, thus providing our youth opportunities for the future and allowing Canadians to take advantage of those natural resources.

I urge the government to give equal considerations to the student and the father, and to stop causing discrimination.

I urge the government to stop burying its head in the sand with its economic policy deliberately twisted to hide the real problems, and finally to acquire monetary and financial modern instruments in order to give each human being, whether he is educated or not, a graduate or not, without any regard to his age, sex, the thickness of his wallet or his social rank, economic security while respecting his freedom.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, what have this government and the previous one been doing? They have said to the people during the election campaigns: Go back to school to increase productivity. In fact, they have created a myth out of nothing, deluding the people, making fun of them, creating conditions which they wanted to be temporary while hoping that it would give a semblance of prosperity.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the awakening is brutal. The figures which I quoted earlier clearly show the direct result of the government's economic policy which has done nothing but create unemployment.

I remember that during the federal election campaign, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce appeared on television and radio in Victoriaville and Drummondville and repeated with his usual smile, that the Liberal government was the best tool to fight unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, the people believed that. The Liberal government said: "Give us a strong majority, in order that we may act." This government has no valid reason to remain idle. However, 42 per cent of the unemployed in Quebec are less than 25 years of age. There is the result.

Young people had been told: Go back to school, be brave; we shall build schools for you and provide you with teachers, in short, nothing will be missing. Go back to school so that we shall have peace while you are there. So, the young people went and studied, but once the course was over, they could not find a job. This problem is so serious, especially in Quebec, that a so-called competent manager succeeded in getting elected, thanks to a simple slogan: "100,000 jobs". Yet, the individual is not thinking of "100,000 jobs", he would be satisfied with only one.

All that the present government has been able to do is to get into trouble.

What do old party governments do? Instead of trying to get at the root of the evil, they take one particular aspect of the economic problem, inject all the money they can into one sector, make maximum investments, putting all their eggs in the same basket. Then they make an all out effort orchestrated by radio and television publicity emphasizing electoral programs of all kinds.

After people have been fooled for two, three or four years, it is realized that something went wrong, that the program was a flop.

As a matter of fact, in the last decade, the government has said: Education will be our salvation; we lack education and specialization. The government invested millions of dollars in education, but we have not made any progress.

Education in itself is not bad, Mr. Speaker, but it is not the cause of our problem. That is why no solution has yet been found. The problem is more serious today because people have a greater awareness of it than before.

At the same time, the government has said: To have prosperity, to do away with poverty, productivity must be increased. Let us produce! We do not know why, but let us produce!

The government has invested more millions and said: Let us produce! And so doing, the government has failed to remember that people were also consumers; it has ignored the problem of consumption in an economic system. "Consumption" is a word which does not exist for the government. It is concerned with foreign policy because such policy is paying. It is not interested in finding a solution to the problem judging from its administration. This is why the government is solely responsible for the situation.

Farmers and other citizens would be most happy to work. Manpower is not scarce neither are the schools. There is education. What is lacking then? A little common sense, a little logic, that is balance in our economic system.

As for myself, I would rather be a Créditiste than a government member. If Liberals find the Créditiste solution funny I see nothing funny about the present situation. That is why I think that we must tackle the basic problem.

We do not ask that Social Credit be implemented tomorrow morning, Mr. Speaker, but simply that it be considered. We ask our colleagues to do like us when the government compels us to adopt its policies with the help of its majority in Parliament while it does not even respect the views of its own members.

As for us, we study the government policies and the white papers and in the light of the situation, we form our own opinion quite sincerely and honestly. We advocate some solutions in order to act efficiently. Besides, my colleagues will make positive speeches in order to set out these solutions.

Mr. Speaker, we will then see the reaction of the hon. members opposite. They are already beginning to laugh. They find the Créditiste solutions funny.

I see the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) and that reminds me that I have received a letter from one of his constituents who would like his representative to stop laughing and start working. Mr. Speaker, I could show this letter to the hon. member for Lévis.

This is a typical example of those who find our suggestions funny. This member sends circular letters in my constituency to say to the farmers that the government will solve their problem of milk production. He tells the same thing to the young workers. Perhaps it is because he does not feel at home, I don't know. In any case, it would be better for him to mind his own affairs and take part in the business of the House.

• (3:30 p.m.)

What people want is to see their members at work, not just joking around.

The least we ask the government is to consider the economic policy advocated by the Creditistes. Probably there are good things in the NDP the Liberal and the Progressive Conservative parties, but there surely are in the Creditiste party and we would ask our hon. colleagues to adopt with respect to us an attitude similar to the one we adopt with respect to them.

Today, we blame the government for having caused unemployment. There is certainly a cause to this problem and the government cannot blame it on the lack of education and qualifications on the part of our workers.

It is true that there is unemployment. But even when we have succeeded in creating jobs, we will not succeed in solving the problem of poverty unless we ensure every citizen his share of our production.

In other words, the problem in government for the past 20-odd years has been that our policies have put too much emphasis on the productive aspect of our economy and of the individual, and not enough on the fact that as our industries become increasingly automated the individual feels more and more left out.

Mr. Speaker, we are clearly heading for a leisure society, where the workweek grows ever shorter and where jobs are increasingly scarce.

That is why I do not believe in full employment, because we are actually moving towards a leisure civilization. Labour unions try to shorten the working week. In fact, one can no longer require a worker to assume the same workload as a score ago.

Mr. Speaker, the economic system must be adapted to meet changing circumstances. We must once and for all recognize the consumption role of the individual and new policies must be developed to enable him to fulfill that role.

This is precisely where Creditistes step in to ensure respect of the human being, as well as his freedom and security.

Mr. Speaker, when one reckons social welfare recipients, senior citizens, unemployed workers, mothers and children, we see that a tremendous number of Canadians do not participate in production, while being consumers. That is the role we would like the government to acknowledge, not by granting measly monthly allowances, but by following a really efficient policy so that these people may indeed take part in the economic life of our country. These people—be they disabled or able-bodied, old or young, graduates or children—all want to take part in the economic life of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, they are not dead wood to be carried with difficulty, but they are an asset in society in so far as society is willing to give them a chance. And to that effect it is necessary to acknowledge the role of consumption.

Therefore we blame the government in our motion because, and I quote:

—has been unable to introduce such financial devices as the compensated discount and the national dividend so as to enable the masses to benefit from the communal resource constituted by young people who are educated and better equipped.

Mr. Speaker, in order that the masses may participate in economic life, policies must be adopted which permit the individual to purchase products, so that new ones may be produced.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of production is not producing for the sake of production, which would be as ridiculous as being elected to do nothing, like the hon. member for Lévis—

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is the hon. member for Lévis rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Even though the Creditistes think they have a solution to all problems, it is my opinion that the member for Lotbinière should take care of his riding. As for me, I am able to take care of mine. I have proved it until today Mr. Speaker and I think that his groundless charges—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is hard for the Chair to admit the reasons for this question of privilege. It is rather a matter of debate and arguments. In my opinion the best solution would be to allow the hon. member for Lotbinière to complete his remarks and let him know that he has about 30 seconds to do so.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, if the member for Lévis had been in the House when I started my remarks, I could repeat my statements since I cannot accept what he has just said. There is no overall solution to our economical and social problems. However, we should not put all our eggs into the same basket because if we ever drop it we will have a fine omelet.

When the people of Lévis will drop their member there will be a fine omelet!

Mr. Speaker, in closing my remarks, I urge my hon. colleagues to at least study and not shrug off our proposals on compensated discount and national dividend. The government may call this as they like but let them respect our request or at least let them study it so as to permit each Canadian to fully play his role not only as a producer but also as a consumer so that they may all enjoy the production now lying on store shelves.

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member for Montmorency rising to ask a question?

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask the hon. member for Lotbinière whether he would answer a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Since the time of the hon. member for Lotbinière has now expired, it would be necessary to secure the unanimous consent of the House in order to allow him to answer the question.

Does the House agree to allow the hon. member for Lotbinière to answer a question from the hon. member from Montmorency?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laflamme: Having listened to the speech of the hon. member for Lotbinière, I noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member talked about distribution of dividends. First of all I would like him to tell the House if this dividend is really the payment by the federal treasury of a sum of money to each individual?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and I commend him for it. He shows a positive approach and I am pleased with that.

The answer is both complex and simple. It would be new credits issued by the Bank of Canada, according to the economic situation. Indeed, if production were greater than the purchasing power, the first role of the Bank of Canada, according to the British North America Act, would be to control the issue of money and credit. We want that bank to fill perfectly that role and that it be used to achieve balance between production and consumption.

It would therefore be new credits which would not be burdened with debts and which could be given to each Canadian in order that each may play completely his role as a consumer.

This is certainly not a tax.

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker, I put this question to the hon. member because I am seeking to understand him, since he has asked us to try to do so. According to what he has just said, the new credits to be distributed would be provided by the Bank of Canada. Then, how could these new credits differ from a simple issue of money to be distributed among the Canadian people?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I shall answer this question by giving an example. When the Canadian government provides interest-free loans to foreign countries, it does so by means of new credits.

Mr. Speaker, we want the government to do the same thing in favour of the Canadian people. The question is not to resort to a "dollar machine" according to an old parody on Social Credit. At the time, it was done to win at the polls. I put the blame on no one. This was part of an election campaign. Nevertheless, the fact remains that there is no question of a "dollar machine" to be activated whether we have gas to feed it or not.

The National Monetary Commission, the creation of which we are calling for, is the driving agency that will enable the Bank of Canada, to set after consultation the necessary amount of currency. That does not necessarily means new credits. This is the compensated discount. As a matter of fact, this is not money we give to individuals. It is a discount the government grants to dealers so as to establish a balance between what a person has in his pockets and the price and value of the products in the store.

The object of that is to enable the sale of products. There is no question of minting money without rhyme or reason.

I believe the hon. member understands what I mean. A compensated discount means to give the dealer and the individual the means of establishing an economic balance, so that the consumer may play his consumer's part fully as regards production.

In short, the National Monetary Commission would be neither more nor less than a consulting agent to the Bank of Canada and the Bank would act as a driving agency to maintain a proper balance in the economic system so as to preserve us from inflation or deflation so that consumers may play their part fully.

Does the hon. member believe that answers his question?

[English]

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I commend the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) for bringing this important and urgent matter before the House this afternoon. The subject matter of the motion, which concerns the alarming increase in unemployment among our young, is one which ought to be considered most urgently. At a time when we are encouraging our young people to acquire more education, when we are encouraging them to invest in their future by acquiring new skills and abilities and when we are encouraging them to invest a greater equity in their education, we find this country caught in the web of the gravest man-made crisis that has ever been perpetrated deliberately on any country in modern times. I believe that the question of adequate job opportunities affects not only our young people but affects equally all Canadians as well.

The statistics reveal a most disturbing aspect of our unemployment picture. Apart from the magnitude of the number of the unemployed, it is clear that unemployment is greatest in that group which is 24 years of age and younger. The seasonally adjusted rate for this group is an alarming 11.2 per cent, almost double that of their senior counterparts. That this should happen in a country like Canada which has an increasingly youthful labour force is, in my opinion, an outright shame. One of the most important resources in our country is people. The young people of Canada are certainly a viable and important resource. Therefore, the development of these people, combined with the harnessing of their energies, abilities and talents is important. The current hardships, disappointments and the frustrations facing our young people in search of employment will have far reaching effects and long lasting implications on the social fabric of our society. These detrimental effects will be prolonged and adverse to the future progress of our country. I submit these effects can be very ill afforded at this time.

If Canada is to survive in the post industrial era, it must develop its skills and technologies. In order to develop these skills, it must provide the educational means. It must also provide adequate employment opportunities in order to utlilize those skills and achievements. If we compare the areas of science and industry in the United States with those of other countries, we find that the leadership in the technological and industrial sector of that country is largely the result of the pre-eminence of education and the employment opportunities in that country. The technological gap that is accruing between the United States and other industrial societies is largely because of the lack of education and job opportunities in other countries, particularly in the fields of research and development. Statistics bear out very clearly that the strength of the economy of any country is in direct proportion to the degree of enrolment in colleges and universities. If the opportunity to utilize skills is not available, in a matter of time people will be discouraged from attaining higher degrees of education. This situation is developing in many European countries today, particularly in Britain.

Of the total population in the United States between the ages of 20 and 24, 43 per cent are enrolled in post-secondary education courses. The enrollment in Russia is 24 per cent; France, 16 per cent; Germany, 7.5 per cent and Britain, 7 per cent. Canada has maintained a percentage of approximately 22 per cent, certainly above the average of European countries. However, this situation is now being threatened because of the uncertainty of adequate job opportunities. If this condition is allowed to continue, it will prompt the export of our talents at a very great loss to Canada, not only in terms of investment, but in skills and resourcefulness. The end result will be that Canada will become nothing more than a country of technological colonialism.

As pointed out by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), those with Ph.D's are having a problem. I understand almost half of the graduates will be unable to obtain suitable employment. At a reported cost of $150,000 per student, this becomes a very wasteful and inhuman exercise. Developing our human capabilities is our ultimate goal. Harnessing those capabilities through science, technology and managerial infrastructure will become increasingly important. Without these ingredients, progress will become substituted for imbalance, backwardness and economic retrogression.

Many parents have deliberately placed themselves under very severe hardship and strenuous obligation so that their sons and daughters may acquire an education. The need for educational facilities also creates hardships and sacrifice for the average taxpayer. Today a vast number of these young people are unable to secure employment of any kind. I remind Your Honour that, as in many areas, the government had ample warning and an abundance of time to react to the current situation. It has again shown its arrogance and contempt for people and has elected to deliberately perpetuate the crises. When the government finally gets around to dealing with this acute situation, a fractional improvement in the rate of employment will be heralded as a great achievement.

The government is now engaged in retraining programs which are supposed to be a cure-all, but it is overlooking one very fundamental aspect, job availability. Why are jobs not available? I suggest there are many reasons. The primary reason is the monetary and fiscal policies upon which the government has embarked. Second, I believe that the uncertainty created by the white paper proposals on tax reform has affected industries, primary industries as well as resource industries. I had the privilege of serving on the committee which studied the proposals. In almost every instance, the implications of the white paper had a detrimental effect on the development in fundamental sectors of our industrial community, particularly the mining industry.

Another factor is the detrimental effect of the unpegging of the Canadian dollar. This has affected the competitiveness of Canadian industry on international markets, particularly the primary industries, all of which has aroused an industrial slowdown and has further aggravated the unemployment situation.

The retraining programs which I mentioned are naturally welcome. However, they will not solve the problem of job acquisition at a time when jobs are not available. If a student cannot return to the classroom, he will be forced into idleness, eventually becoming a burden to the nation, surviving only on the sustenance of the welfare dole. Similarly, increases in unemployment benefits will be of little value because the majority of those with whom we are concerned are job seeking for the first time and hence will be unable to qualify.

The people of this nation with whom we are dealing are not self-styled radicals, revolutionaries or computer smashers. They are average red-blooded Canadian citizens who wish to fend for themselves, their families and communities and to hopefully take their rightful place in society. They do not want anything more than the opportunity of being steadily employed, with the prospect of advancement, promotion and improved rewards commensurate with their abilities and initiative.

Employment of Graduate Students

Our youth engaged diligently in studies and training because they were assured of growing opportunities and the ultimate achievement of their rightful share of Canadian benevolence. However, these opportunities do not exist today. They are today nothing but a distant ideal. Senator Fulbright said:

> One of life's injustices is that young men must fight the wars that older men begin. To a great extent, the lives and hopes of the present student generation turn on the wisdom and judgment of the men of an older generation to whom the people have entrusted political power.

I am sure many young people today will analyse this statement with a great degree of thoroughness. In particular, they will question the wisdom of entrusting their future to a government headed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whom they accepted as one who would be responsible for the future of their precious ideals.

We hear from many quarters that young people are simply lazy and do not care to acquire gainful employment. A survey was conducted by the University of Saskatchewan Students' Union recently in Saskatoon. The minister is present, and I am sure he would be interested in the results of that survey. The results showed that 84 per cent of all students were actively looking for work last Summer. Only 39.2 per cent of them found jobs. The largest number of these, 31.3 per cent, found work as labourers; 20.5 per cent claimed they found jobs in technical areas, and 12.2 per cent of those who found employment listed their employment as being in a service area.

It appears that "who you know" is still important when it comes to finding a job, since 48.7 per cent of the students who found employment did so through personal contacts. A further 32.5 per cent found jobs as a result of direct application, while only a meagre, and I repeat meagre, 8.1 per cent were placed through Canada Manpower centres.

One of the most appalling statistics uncovered by the survey was that 81.5 per cent of all students who failed to get jobs indicated that they needed jobs to finance their next year at university. If even a fraction of this group, it was said, could not return to university in the fall because of financial reasons, the university would face an enrolment crisis.

Lack of student employment opportunities gives rise to a number of other serious difficulties. Last week the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) questioned the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on the subject of student loan repayment. The Minister of Finance gave a frivolous answer, suggesting that special concessions could be made in cases where the hon. member would furnish details; he would be pleased to take up the matter with the banks, he added. No mention was made of who was to bear the cost of additional interest. The minister suggested the period of repayment could be extended up to ten years if a special application were made. This is all well and good. But who is responsible for the situation which has been created? I submit that it is the government, and that the government has a distinct responsibility to produce a policy to remove the pressure from students who are finding difficulties today in discharging their obligations.

The government continues to improvise last minute measures to deal with crisis situations which have deeply imbedded root causes, causes which are mostly of its own making, and unless the approach of hon. gentlemen opposite to the basic task of restoring faith in the Canadian economy changes, there is little hope for the future generation. Something must be done to end this serious situation and the resources of the government must be called upon, since the state of affairs I have described is a product of its own making. First of all, hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches opposite must take immediate and effective action to stimulate the economy, since unemployment among the young is only part of the larger problem of chronic unemployment which has existed throughout the tenure of the present administration. If we agree that tomorrow's leaders are today's students, we must give these students an opportunity to find ways of earning their education; we must provide productive means by which they can utilize their talents and abilities.

The government should also consider using tax incentives as a means of inducing companies to employ students, and, possibly, young people taking on their first job. These provisions could be administered in a number of ways but the most useful, in my view, would be one which provided for a program of permanently available work. It is my understanding that such a program is presently under consideration by a committee of ministers of education, and I believe the government would be wise to pursue such a course. Possibly a shorter working week might be considered. If those who are presently working are to be asked to support the chronically unemployed, it appears to be reasonable to consider the advantages of a shorter working week in certain areas.

We all know that the serious summer employment issue which existed among students earlier this year will continue to cause difficulties and hardship among students until a permanent system of utilizing student manpower is adopted. I think it is realistic to envisage a semi-permanent work force among this group, a work force which would contribute to society and to industry while at the same time imparting a sense of responsibility and challenge among our young people. I believe work is certainly necessary. It is an integral part of achieving a wholesome and invigorating life. Accordingly, the provision of work should be considered a priority. I am sure that today many of our young people are bewildered when they recall the pronouncements made by the Prime Minister some two and a half years ago. They responded to the call "Come, work with me"; they responded to his appeal to help build a just society. Today they are told that the just society is but a distant ideal, they are told we live in an age of clash and confrontation. To a vast number of young Canadians, the just society they were promised turns out to be a society which, for them, holds little future, little promise, little challenge and little opportunity. They stand on the threshold of a greatness which for them will probably never become a reality but merely remain a distant ideal.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

I, therefore, propose the following amendment, seconded by my hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

> By deleting all the words after the word "Government" on line eight and adding thereto the following:
> "has not adopted such fiscal and economic policies as would stimulate the economy and allow young people to better contribute to national growth."

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity provided by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) to debate the issue before us today.

The government's policy of deliberately creating unemployment, and of increasing unemployment as a method of fighting inflation, is in my view the most cold-hearted and callous policy that the administration has adopted during the past two and a half years of its existence. It has done immeasurable damage to individuals, to the Canadian economy and to society as a whole. Today, as a result of this policy, some 476,000 people are unemployed. This represents 6.5 per cent of our work force on a seasonally adjusted basis. It is the highest rate of unemployment in any industrialized nation of the world. This is not a very proud record for a government which was supposed to introduce us to the new politics in the 20th Century. Moreover, the result of this policy has been little improvement in terms of the fight against inflation. We find that it has had only a negligible effect and has but marginally decreased prices in Canada.

The policy of creating unemployment to fight inflation is essentially a farce. The cure is worse than the disease itself, though the disease is nowhere near the point of cure. This cold hearted approach on the part of the government may look good on paper to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) and a few other ministers, but it certainly does not look good to the half million or so Canadians who are unemployed in Canada today, and particularly to their families.

There are many by-products of a policy such as this, one of which is that it is the young people of Canada who essentially are taking the brunt of the government's policy to fight inflation. Evidence to this effect can be found in the unemployment statistics for November. According to these figures, approximately 45 per cent of the unemployed of Canada are under the age of 25. The number of young people who are unemployed has increased drastically this year over last year. In 1969, 148,000 young people under the age of 25 were unemployed, whereas last month this figure had risen to 212,000. These young people are to be found in every city in Canada, and as I say they are taking the brunt of the government's policy of creating unemployment to fight inflation. Indeed, over 10 per cent of our young people in Canada today are unemployed.

I suggest also that statistics on unemployment do not necessarily tell the whole story; there is a lot of hidden unemployment. I know of a number of people who have dropped out of school but have not registered for employment for one reason or another. Some of them have been looking for employment and have given up. The same can be said of many young women and housewives who either need work or want to work but have been unable to find employment. I am sure the minister is aware that in my own province of Saskatchewan many of the young people usually leave the farms to find employment in the cities, but this year they have been unable to find work and have been forced to remain on the farms. Many of these people are not included in the unemployment statistics. There are also many other partially employed people, such as servicemen and repairmen, who have some work but not enough to make an adequate income.

Who are the unemployed of Canada today? They range from the unskilled worker to the university graduate. Earlier today, the House was told how many people with doctorate degrees from our universities cannot find work. The other day I was reading a British Columbia university magazine which contained the statistic that 52 per cent of the graduates from Simon Fraser University last year were unable to find adequate employment in Canada this year.

Most of our unemployed, of course, are not university students or graduates, since only a small proportion of our young people are able to attend university in Canada. Most of the young people who are unemployed do not have a skill; or if they do have a skill they are unable to find a job where they can use the little training they do have.

What does the future hold for these young people who are unemployed? Economists, both within the government and without, predict that by February and March the unemployment rate in Canada may go as high as 750,000 or 800,000 people. In May and June over half a million students,—pretty well 700,000 of them—will be coming on to the labour market and trying to find work. Many do so because they have no other means to earn sufficient money to enable them to return to university.

I would ask the government what it is going to do for all these extra people who will be seeking work. What answers does the government give to our questions, Mr. Speaker, and what proposals does it make? Today a member of my party asked a question concerning reports that 5,000 people were unemployed because foreign companies had made the decision to lay off its Canadian subsidiary's employees. The government was asked whether or not it had received reports to this effect, but again the government, with its same lackadaisical approach, replied that this was just a dream on the part of Stephen Lewis. The government shrugged the matter off; it fails to take questions about the unemployed seriously. The government lives in its little ivory towar somewhere up in the clouds and does not come down to earth.

I think the Prime Minister sees the unemployed simply as statistics on a piece of paper. He says: "Perhaps it is unfortunate that these statistics are there, but they have to be there if we are going to fight inflation". I ask, fight inflation for whom, and with what results? I suggest that what is happening is completely unforgiveable and that the government has to take full responsibility for its arrogant and cold-hearted approach not only to our young people but to the elderly and people living on fixed incomes. The government's approach is off-hand and ad hoc.

Many times, Mr. Speaker, I sit in my seat and wonder how many of the people who make the decisions in government really know what is happening in Canada today. How many of these people have ever worked on assembly lines, in a warehouse or industrial plant? Even further, how many of them have tried to apply for unemployment insurance or have tried walking to the welfare office to collect welfare payments? I suggest that government policymakers are so far removed from reality that they do not understand the problem. They are completely insensitive to the needs of thousands of people in Canada today. If these people are not careful, pretty soon the accusations they are making about our party dreaming will turn into a nightmare for the government, and worst of all for this country. It is about time the government did something positive and constructive.

In Canada, as in most countries of the western world, young people are taught to grow up with high expectations for the future when they leave the educational system. This feeling is perpetuated not only in our educational system but through the whole socialization process our young people pass through. We tell them that if they are diligent and hard working, they will be rewarded by making lots of money and living a very secure life.

A lot of people today believe that this is no longer true. Young people step from schools and universities only to find that at the end of the path there is no secure job for them that is rewarding and fulfilling. Instead, they find a job that does not offer any challenge to them; or worse, they find there is no job at all. Naturally this leads to frustration and to alienation in Canadian society. I cannot understand why some people are unable to recognize what is happening. As we look around us, we see many more young people dropping out of school, giving up on Canadian society, simply because they discover that what they were told for so long is not reality. Yet, as they look around them they see affluence and abundance. They see people with all kinds of money. They see governments with money to spend on unnecessary items.

Before the last war we experienced similar economic policies. Suddenly, when war broke out the government had thousands of dollars to spend on each and every young person. The government put them in uniform, trained them and sent them overseas. Our young people are asking us most sincerely today why we do not do something constructive for them and give them the opportunity to work. These young people are not asking for a handout. I have met very few who want to accept welfare or are willing to live in that way. Because of this we are provoking despair and anger among these young people. We are encouraging young people all over our country to rebel. We have led them down the golden path. We have violence among the young people not only in the universities but outside as well.

Many middle-aged and older politicians stand up and denounce these restless students. They ask why these young people are so lazy. They call them bums, smear them with the big red brush and call them revolutionaries. They say they are trying to destroy the country and the society in which we live. It strikes me that they forget to ask some pretty fundamental questions. They never ask why there is so much despair at this time among the young people. They forget to ask what type of a system led to this despair, and motivated these young people to rebel and challenge the system.

As I stand here in this Parliament, I see our parliamentarians going further and further away from the people, becoming less and less relevant to many people in Canada. We stand around here every day and debate many problems that are important. Many politicians often speak in a patronizing way about these poor young people who cannot find work, but all of a sudden we close our books and forget about them. We do not do anything. It is this approach which is making this Parliament a much more irrelevant institution than it should be. At times we are a mere polite debating society in which we pat each other on the back; we are completely isolated from the world. I cannot tolerate that and I do not think the young people of Canada will tolerate it much longer.

In 1968 we had a new Prime Minister who spoke of a new approach to politics. He gave many young people a new grasp on hope. The young people went for him. The young people of Canada were behind this man; they worked for him and elected him Prime Minister. Now, two years later what do they have? They have a 19th century conservative who has only a little of the modern touch when it comes to style and dress. They have a man who has not changed anything that in a fundamental way would help the people of the country. I suggest that this man has broken faith with the tens of thousands of young people who supported him two years ago and who held high hopes for him and his government. Dozens of these people have come to me over the last few months. They ask why he does not help them. They say they thought he would be good and that he would change the system but that he did not do it. They ask why he does not listen to them and they ask why he has changed.

We can change the system, Mr. Speaker, we can make the system one in which people have work regardless of their age, their racial origin or where they live in Canada. I think a debate like this, if the government listens to it, can provide some positive alternatives. At this time I wish to move an amendment to the amendment that was submitted by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period to a comma and by adding the following words thereto:

"and, in particular, has failed

(1) to pursue policies of full employment, and

(2) to amend the regulations governing manpower training and allowances so as to enable young Canadians leaving school and those who have been on the labour market for less than three years to receive a training allowance and training necessary to fit them for useful occupations.

Mr. Speaker, I have about four or five minutes left in which I should like to outline a few of my reasons for moving this amendment to the amendment moved by the member of the Conservative party. First of all, if we are to solve the problems of unemployment in respect of our young people, we will have to tackle the unemployment problem in general in Canada. Recently, while I was in Europe, many Europeans asked me in complete surprise why we had so many unemployed in Canada. This astounded them. I suggest that it astounds most Canadians that we should have so much unemployment. There is unemployment because the government has created it. I suggest that if we are to reverse this trend we must begin immediately to introduce programs and projects to stimulate our economy and produce work for Canadians.

Second, I suggest that if in the long run we are to solve the problems of unemployment, regional disparity and poverty, we will have to do something about regaining control of the Canadian economy. Once again today during the question period this problem was raised. We have a branch plant economy. We have a country which is basically an exporter of raw materials and an importer of finished goods. Thus, we export our jobs to the United States and to other countries. If we are to tackle problems such as unemployment, we must reverse the trend of continentalism in Canada and initiate a positive type of nationalism in which we can control and direct our own economy. Then, all Canadians will have jobs and will be able to enjoy a decent life like all people in this House today.

The other point I want to make is that the government should seriously consider amending the manpower retraining program because, as it is now, we find that a young person must be out of school for one year and must have been in the work force for one year before he become eligible for retraining. He must have been in the work force for three years if he is to be eligible for a grant. If a young person is unemployed and is eligible because he has been in the work force for one year he probably requires a grant. Many young people who are unemployed do not qualify for retraining. Because they do not qualify for retraining under the Department of Manpower and Immigration, these young people have become the front line troops in the government's war on inflation. They are the shock troops. They suffer the worst effects of the war on inflation. No effort is made by this government to help these people by amending the program so they might receive some assistance. We seem content to sit back and let these people go on welfare.

This government places the responsibility on the local municipality. This is not good enough.

We cannot keep on shrugging off these problems in the hope that they will disappear because they will not. I suggest we should have an immediate crash program in an effort to retrain these young people now so that they will not be roaming around unemployed. This would not only help the individuals concerned but would help our economy in general. Economists have said that we lose billions of dollars each and every year because people in Canada are unemployed. Why do we not put some of the unemployed university students to work teaching other unemployed young people skills so that they can make a contribution to Canada, to themselves and to their families.

In conclusion, I suggest that the government begin a new program to create jobs in Canada. This should include a program to regain control of the Canadian economy. In addition, the manpower regulations should be amended so that people with less than three years on the labour market could qualify for retraining and assistance. Finally, I suggest the government should begin immediately to institute policies that would make university education and other post-secondary education more universally accessible to all, regardless of one's financial background. If we do these things we are on the road to some progress in this country. If we do not, let us ask why our young people in Canada rebel and challenge the system. They challenge the system because your system has failed. They know you have failed them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before the Chair puts the subamendment before the House, may I ask whether any hon. members have representations which they may wish to make to the Chair with respect to the procedural correctness of the subamendment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to do so. If I may speak simply on the procedural correctness of the subamendment, I certainly have no particular objection to any number of amendments of a different form and kind coming before the House in a debate such as this, but it does seem to me that it is worth pointing out that the thrust of the most recent amendment is, in part at least, directly inconsistent with the thrust of the original motion. As I read it, the original motion indicates the feeling of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) that we have too much education, that it is a bad thing that we have so much education, and the amendment would suggest in effect that there should be facilities for providing more of it to a wider group of people. That inconsistency should be pointed out to Your Honour.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) was once a law professor. I hope he taught his students a little more logically than he is trying to teach the members of this House. The original motion by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) does not state that there is too much education. It suggests that those who are getting education are being misled by hopes for full employment so that their services could be used. He does not say that there should not be any more education or that there is too much.

Second, the subamendment moved by my friend, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), does not deal with education. It deals with training under the minister. He does not refer to university education but rather to training and allowances under the minister's department. The minister may want to run away from his responsibility to deal with the question posed by the subamendment, but he cannot suggest that the subamendment is out of order. It clearly follows the amendment before the House, and I agree with what it says, that the government has not adopted fiscal and economic policies to stimulate the economy. The subamendment goes on to say in particular that the government does not follow policies of full employment and has not amended the regulations under the minister's jurisdiction. I cannot for the life of me see what basis the minister has for his objection to the procedural propriety of the subamendment.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one short comment. I think the minister is merely nit-picking. I believe that the amendment points out that there is a lack of co-ordination between the educationl process and the ability to receive jobs, and the subamendment suggests that measures should be instituted to prepare people for useful occupation. After all, that is the content and purport of the motion.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The contention of the minister that the original motion advances the theory there is too much education certainly does not indicate that the minister has read the motion.

An hon. Member: No, but he listened to the speech.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The motion indicates that young people coming out of schools and universities find no outlets for their energies and no means of placing the knowledge they have acquired at the service of the people. It then goes on to advance the particular monetary theories which the Ralliement Creditiste hold. The criticism in the motion is that young people coming out of educational institutions are unable to find employment. The latter part of the motion indicates why they are unable to find employment. If the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is out of order, then so is the amendment which indicates that the reason these young people are unable to find jobs is that the government has not adopted such fiscal and economic policies as would stimulate the economy and allow young people to better contribute to national growth. I agree with that amendment.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has simply gone on to cite another area in which the government has failed. We contend that both the amendment and the subamendment follow logically upon the main thrust of the motion moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière. The main motion says that young people coming out of educational institutions cannot find jobs. The amendment says that is because of the government's economic and fiscal policies. The subamendment which we have moved says it is also because they have failed to carry out full employment policies and to establish a proper manpower program. It seems to me that both of these amendments follow in logical sequence from the main motion.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, there is a point I wish to clear up first very briefly. The hon. minister is putting words in my mouth; I never said that I was opposed to a higher education and the hon. members for York South (Mr. Lewis) and for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) pointed out that I actually never said so; I urge the minister to follow the debate more attentively. I simply said that the government had not created a number of jobs proportionate to the number of university graduates.

Now, as to the point you are raising, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to indicate to him that the House is now considering, for the assistance of the Chair, the point of order raised by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang). I think the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Fortin) could assist the Chair in that respect, but I would ask him please to direct his remarks to the point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, we feel this is rather a difficult problem for the Chair to settle. Indeed, it is never advisable to kill initiatives coming from either side of the House. A ruling on the opportunity of moving a subamendment on an allotted day, with regard to supply, is even less so. Every party has the opportunity of moving a censure motion followed by a vote on a topic it feels is fundamental.

That question makes the day allotted to the study of a Créditiste motion absolutely meaningless. We would be happy if your ruling helped to encourage parliamentary initiatives during supply. However, we wish to point out that we would not like this day to be anything but a Créditiste day. We want to take advantage of it to offer a Créditiste solution to problems which concern the House of Commons, but if the day is gnawed at by each and every party, it will defeat its purpose.

That is why I say that we will readily accept your decision. We will submit to it respectfully and we ask you to consider both sides of the problem. If each opposition party seizes the opportunity to gnaw at those allotted days to make them into Conservative or NDP days, we might as well do away with them.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) has indicated his views, and I concede immediately that, in my opinion he has made a very good point. I can understand the concern of the hon. member and those in his party, that by the process of moving amendments and subamendments the points of argument that they wish to direct for the consideration of the House may be narrowed down.

I have listened to hon. members and I wish to thank them for their assistance to the Chair on the point of order raised by the minister. It seems to me, however, that the motion moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière, as the words that have been used in arguing the point of order indicate, has as its main thrust unemployment of young people and the steps the government might take in that regard.

That was followed by the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), which was accepted by the Chair. It followed, I think therefore, that it was consistent with the motion of the hon. member for Lotbinière.

I have some difficulty, I must say with great respect, in accepting the argument that the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is inconsistent in any respect that would give me any concern in relation to the motion and the amendment to that motion.

It seems to the Chair that hon. members in the House may have varying remedies, if I may use that word, and varying suggestions they may want to make to the government to correct a particular problem, and the thread of the problem is followed throughout, having been established in the main motion, and continued in the amendment and the subamendment.

So, having recognized the concern of the hon. member for Lotbinière, I would feel that speakers from his party would still have within the rather broad outlines that have been established, because the main thrust of the motion is of course the unemployment of youth and the various remedies that may be accepted, ample opportunity to deal with the subject of their motion.

Having said that, I do feel the amendment is in order, and if I may put it in a formal way now, it is moved by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period to a comma and by adding the following words thereto:

"and, in particular, has failed

(1) to pursue policies of full employment, and

(2) to amend the regulations governing manpower training and allowances so as to enable young Canadians leaving school and those who have been on the labour market for less than three years to receive a training allowance and training necessary to fit them for useful occupations."

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I said when I rose on the technical point, I am pleased to have any amendments before the House on a day like this but from the procedural point of view I thought the technical point should be brought to your attention.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) did not of course have the opportunity during the early part of the debate to hear all of the words of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) or he might have been a little embarrassed at joining in what was a genuine attack on the purpose and the value of education in this country.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was in the House when the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) started his speech. I was here throughout his entire speech, and have been in the House since the debate started.

Mr. Lang: Well, Mr. Speaker, of course in that case I will be very happy if the hon. member rereads the speech and pays some attention to it in the translated version, because he obviously missed the original text.

The point I am making is that really, in the reading of a motion as the government has to do when it is put before the House by the members opposite, the government has to try to find what the thrust of the motion may be. It certainly seemed to me in reading the motion that the thrust was in some specific suggestion which the hon. member was going to make about monetary and fiscal policy, about a new version of standard Social Credit theory which has now been retranslated as a non-issuing of credit. Some other form of cranking the wheels has been devised which is meant to accomplish the same thing, but without the hazards of having to bear the reputation of all the past theories and the discredit they received.

This gave the government some difficulty in knowing how best to answer such a motion because we could review once again our basic view, the central view of how one must balance fiscal and monetary policies on the one hand in order to encourage growth, and how one must have a very careful hand on this throttle in order to ensure that inflation does not destroy the very soundness and viability of the economy in the process. This, as I say, seemed to be the thrust, and some other of my colleagues might well—

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the minister stated that in my speech I introduced a new version of Social Credit theory. I wish to tell him in all fairness that those are the same proposals as before. If he wishes to run them down, he is free to do so—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member cannot rise on a point of order in an attempt to correct the minister's statement. The minister should be able to continue his speech without interruption.

[English]

Mr. Lang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, although I must say I am pleased to have the qualification, because I seem to have the same trouble with the translation as does the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and I will read the text with some care.

The point I was making was that another of my colleagues might indeed have attempted to deal with this motion in view of that being the main thrust. However, on the other hand, the motion in those terms really needs no further serious treatment, since there is some increased understanding in the country about the inability to simply crank out money. The balanced monetary and fiscal policies which the government is pursuing in the attempt to promote both a reasonable amount of growth and control inflation are indeed sound, and the exact technical issue which has to be put before hon. members interested in this is the extent to which that growth should be allowed to take place.

One approach could have been the difficult economic argument concerning at what point you have in fact created too large a money supply so that inflation may go forward again, at what point you have created enough money supply to begin to take up the slack in the economy, counting in the balance sheet that new upturn in the economy which can take place when growth factors themselves go to work and produce additional growth and revenue for the treasury. However, in view of the fact that there is much understanding about this, it did not seem to be a serious point to pick up at that stage and in that way.

On the other hand, within the motion the hon. member included some words which touched me very closely, not in my present capacities so much as in my recent ones. I think I may have been the Member of Parliament most recently engaged in a full-time way in the education of our young people, the people who are putting themselves in a better position to contribute to our society, to obtain better jobs. It seemed an opportunity for me to take up these rather odd words in the motion, that there was an inspiring of false hopes, if I may select words which I read as key words, "false hopes... that education pays." Of course, when you listened to the hon. member for Lotbinière there was no doubt this was a good part of the theme of his speech, that education itself is a doubtful thing. He was critical of our program to expand vocational training and felt that we had spent far too much money on this. The facts are, however, that when other governments launched these programs to build vocational and technical schools in this country, we were seriously short of people with skills in the vocational and technical fields so the training facilities were needed.

Employment of Graduate Students

• (4:40 p.m.)

Hon. members opposite did not always share the theme of his speech and at least one or two of them did not share it today. I say "at least one or two of them" because of course the hon. member for Vegreville did seem to join in this view. He criticized our training programs as a "cure all". This seems to me to be completely inconsistent with the approach taken by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) in his subsequent subamendment. I am indeed pleased for the hon. member for Vegreville that some of his colleagues from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, his Tory friends, were not in the House to listen to him criticize this program—

Mr. Lundrigan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, on a point of order.

Mr. Lundrigan: Is it within the rules for the minister to continue to perpetuate this kind of deliberate, unadulterated arrogance across the floor of this House? I wonder when the minister will get around to telling us what he is going to do about this problem. I have listened for ten minutes and I have never heard such arrogance in this House because—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): This is known as "ragging the puck".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if wasting any more of the time allotted by this House to the consideration of this important resolution will get us anywhere. I suggest that the minister proceed with his remarks.

[English]

I cannot suggest to the minister that he was not dealing with the motion; I assume that he was. If he was not he might want listen to the suggestions made for his guidance by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister once again. This time, it is the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) who is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the minister would certainly help keep the debate moving if he stopped putting in our mouths words that we never said.

I would ask him, once again, to consider what is being said in this House. So as to ensure the effectiveness of this debate, let him stop snaking around trying to turn the situation to his advantage, which is dishonest.

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure you that I have been dealing with the words and suggestions of hon. members opposite, and I will be content to have the record show the nature of this debate. I recognize from the response of hon. members opposite that they are sensitive to the references to their remarks, and to a demonstration of the inconsistencies in which they so often engage when dealing with this subject and many another.

I said that it is the basic position of the government on the main thrust of the motion, and indeed on the amendment itself, that there must be a balanced approach to expansion of the money supply and the use of monetary and fiscal policies. I also said that at the same time we must try to inspire growth in the economy. The policies which have been announced recently have been exactly in that direction of trying to move the economy forward. It seemed possible and consistent with our fight against inflation that we could expand the monetary supply and use fiscal policies in the direction of an expansionary economy.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville made light of our success in the fight against inflation, seeming to ignore the fact that we have been making very substantial progress in this area.

Mr. Orlikow: Tell us about unemployment.

Mr. Lang: As a result, we have found it possible to move in favour of additional fiscal and monetary measures to bring growth back to the economy.

Mr. Orlikow: Tell us about the 500,000 unemployed!

Mr. Lang: As long as we have forces calling for higher wages and higher returns for themselves—rigid forces like big labour and big business and the professions with the strength to demand more than they should be getting—we will have this delicate dilemma of balancing the growth in the economy and the control of inflation.

A consequence of attempting this balancing is of course that there are some pressures on the side of unemployment. This fact has been recognized by this government and frequently distorted by hon. members opposite both inside and outside this House. To use the words of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, it is distorted as a "deliberate creation of unemployment".

An hon. Member: Isn't it? Of course, it is.

Mr. Lang: That is a distortion of the situation.

An hon. Member: Ask the Prime Minister. He says we will have 6 per cent unemployment.

Mr. Lang: Coming from Saskatchewan as I do, where we know the NDP well, I am not surprised that one of the first lessons taught by them to their members is the art of distortion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: This is easily learned by those in the NDP ranks who come from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nystrom: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The minister said that I am distorting the facts; I suggest that I am not. The Prime Minister said that we had to tolerate 6 per cent unemployment and I suggest that the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate; this is not privilege. Hon. members should know the difference between privilege and debate. I suggest to the hon. member with respect, that if he wishes to continue the point I can allow him to continue in just a moment, but it is not in order to seek the floor on an alleged question of privilege when the only thing he wants to do is to try to correct what he considers statements of facts. Perhaps the hon. member might have an occasion later on that would be procedurally correct to deal with what he considers to be a misstatement.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of privilege, I suggest that the minister is imputing motives. I have taken part in the debate—

Mr. Speaker: It is not my understanding of imputing motives. I do not suggest that the hon. member does not have the right to be dissatisfied with what has been suggested by the minister. That is his right, but it is part of the debate. I would think that the hon. member might have an opportunity later, either by himself or through one of his colleagues, to try to rectify anything that he thinks was not stated correctly.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly understand the hon. member being unhappy with my remarks as I was unhappy with his. We will solve the whole problem if he corrects the practice of misstating the views and statements which have been made on this subject by the government.

An hon. Member: Tell us what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Lang: Economists everywhere understand that trying to achieve this balance is a very difficult issue. One of the reasons I wanted to enter this debate was the suggestion that education was misplaced in this country or that it was wrong to have further education for our youth as set out in the motion and the speech of the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is the minister not going to discuss unemployment at all?

Mr. Lang: It is extremely important to have the faith which I and so many other people in this country have that education, training and upgrading are important and valuable, and that they will lead to better jobs, better conditions and higher productivity. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville recognizes this in his subamendment. He recognizes the advantages of our training and upgrading programs. Many members have recognized these advantages in recent days by asking about the possibility of more programs. With the additions that have been made we will be spending $300 million for training and upgrading programs, a vast increase over last year. This is a program of great magnitude which is relatively young in this country and is using the very important facilities already in existence. This has come about as a result of a program of grants and assistance on the part of the federal government which has made the necessary technical training places available to our young people.

Considering the kinds of monetary and fiscal policies being followed in this country and the optimism we share for the future of this country, our proper role is one that will help to continue to train our young people and that will urge them to acquire an education so that they may undertake those jobs through which they will make a greater and better contribution to the life of this country. We shall continue these programs and we shall continue them because we are optimistic that the economy is essentially sound and that the unemployment figures, which now are a source of regret to all of us, will decline as the balance of our policies begin to work.

It has been said many times in this House, and repeated not too long ago, that the problem of inflation is serious. It has brought to bear pressures on prices, profits and wages in particular areas and on particular groups. May I say to hon. members, and I know that hon. members of the New Democratic Party will applaud, that I am not one to shrink from a policy of wage and price controls, if that should become necessary. I will say immediately that one ought to recognize the difficulties inherent in such a policy. One would ordinarily want to move to selective policies in this area rather than to general policies, because otherwise there would be difficulties. That course should be embarked on if it becomes necessary as a result of the failure of other measures which may be less restrictive and less confining, and which would not exert such a degree of dictatorial guidance on the economy as would be the case if outright controls were implemented. It is of course our unwillingness to accept readily that dictatorial guidance which leads us to hesitate longer than our friends opposite would hesitate in the introduction of such policies.

It is clearly the hope of this government that our policies of monetary and fiscal expansion will, together with a gradual realization on the part of those with power that certain restraints are necessary, lead to the growth in the country that is required. We hope that lower unemployment levels will result. In the booming economy which we shall again see, there will be a shortage as opposed to a surplus of those with education and with skills and training.

The hon. member for Vegreville, in a speech that was somewhat inconsistent with some of the other speeches which have been made, was worried about the outflow from this country of people with higher training. His remarks were somewhat inconsistent in that other hon. members have blamed the government for allowing into this country people with higher skills, people with Ph.D's and other, higher training. Indeed, he suggested that we were becoming some kind of colonial land from a technological point of view because of this export of our expertise. The truth is otherwise. We are receiving more people with higher training, higher skills and higher education than ever before. I, for one, say that not only do we need more of our people to be trained so that we may carry on our development in the future, but that we should use these trained people who have come to this land from other countries as well.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question. He mentioned $300 million which is being spent for manpower training in this country. Could he tell the House what numbers are now in training and what will be the maximum figure that the minister expects we shall reach during this fiscal year?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member the figures for the last few years. One hundred and eighty-four thousand trained in 1967-68; 301,000 trained in 1968-69 and 300,000 trained in 1969-70. The figure for those who trained in the current year may be in the same order of magnitude as that for last year. Of course, the exact number trained depends a great deal on the actual mix of training, having regard to the budget amount that is available.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister one more question. What are the numbers in training at present, and what slack is there in capacity? How many more could the minister's department take on if he were to amend the regulations as we have suggested and take on some of those who under the present regulations are excluded.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to obtain some information on that figure for the hon. member. Of course, it is also important to consider in this area budgetary limitations. That question raises the problem of the amount of monetary and fiscal expansion which is possible at present, as a result of the budget that is available. The problem with the subamendment of the hon. member is that it would adjust our priorities within the amount of money that is given to us, unless one were to abandon one's basic view as to the amount of fiscal and monetary expansion which is possible at the present time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We could find the money if we needed to.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, to judge the value of the motion moved by the Ralliement Créditiste, more specifically by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), one only has to witness the stirring in the House due to the amendments moved by the other two opposition parties as well as by the words of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang).

This proves that the proposed motion deals with a real problem, I would say the real problem, that of having failed to establish the necessary financial devices.

We understand that this may at times anger the government but, Mr. Speaker, we are doing our duty and the Créditistes are not to blame if everyone knows that this is the real issue today.

And as it is in line with our philosophy to deal with this very problem, we are that much freer to emphasize it in a debate on such a motion as the one now before the House.

This motion of non confidence in the government takes its full meaning in these difficult times when young Canadians are at grips with a great number of problems from indifference to active and even passionate dissent.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Let us read our proposal once again:

That this House condemns the Government for having inspired false hopes among young people between the ages of 16 and 24 by assuring them that education pays, at a time when young people coming out of schools and universities find no outlet for their energies and no means of placing the knowledge they have acquired at the service of the people, because the Government has been unable to introduce such financial devices as the compensated discount and the national dividend so as to enable the masses to benefit from the communal resource constituted by young people who are educated and better equipped than any previous generation to produce more efficiently, more abundantly and more economically, so as to assure the greater welfare of all Canadians.

If we look at this motion, sentence by sentence, we are compelled to admit, Mr. Speaker, that the government has "inspired false hopes". Is such a remark justified? Unfortunately yes and in every respect. What high standard have we tried to instil in our youth?

Let us talk about the example given by elders who, let us be frank, are sometimes more or less honest not to say really backward and even old-fashioned. The behaviour of older people has never been very exciting for the young. Between an out-of-date conservatism and a timid evolution, such paralyzing and depressing behaviour deceives and disillusions the younger generation willing to put its overflowing dynamism at the country's service.

So it is all the more vexatious for them when, having been lured with bright prospects, they always end up in front of nothing. This is false hope.

When a great many of our young people, especially in Quebec, were dropping out of school early, the reason given for unemployment was this factor of academic disqualification represented by these famous "uneducated" people as they have been described by a former liberal premier in Quebec. And from everywhere, we have heard bombastic and ambiguous slogans: "He who gets into debts gets richer". "Education is money". "Qualifications are needed". "Future belongs to youth". Our young people did believe for a while—until they got out of our schools and universities only to realize that they had been misled. Yesterday they were uneducated and unemployed, today they are educated but still unemployed. This is to prove, Mr. Speaker, that what was wrong, the real problem was perhaps less a question of education and ability than a matter of financial machinery that we failed to develop.

The necessity of studying and implementing new concepts and new formulas will never be emphasized enough. Those now applied are proof enough. The inextricable labyrinth to which they have lead us is there for all to see. From the highest director to the humblest taxpayer, the conclusion is the same: there is never enough capital and money, it is impossible to develop our resources for profit. Yet, Mr. Speaker, everything lies there: immense natural resources and abundant manpower that might even be insufficient if we applied, even a little, a creditiste economic policy.

Lastly, we also have the ability. All these young graduates from our institutions of learning are not asking anything else but to work as hard as they can to assure better production and better distribution and, finally, greater welfare for all Canadians. Educated and better equipped young people could make an open and honest contribution to the emancipation and fulfilment of the population as a whole. The difficult period we are going through holds a danger of irremediably engulfing generations of Canadians in the stormy, perturbing seas of violent dissent.

To be sure, most of our young people have an excellent mentality, but the longer we delay adoption of real solutions, the more the number of the violently dissenting increases. It is therefore high time that, putting aside all political partisanship or useless pride, we all get together, first to find out what is preventing our young people from reaching their full potential, then what are the adequate steps to be taken.

Now the matter of the adequate steps to be taken is what we are dealing with at present, and that is why our motion gets to the heart of the problem. That is why once again we emphasize the need to have money brought back to its proper role which is to serve people, and not the opposite where people are made to serve money.

Furthermore, if we wish our young people to go on living a dynamic, and active life and to really take part in the development of the entire country, then it is of the utmost importance that they be offered an alternative to the status quo which some people think is immovable, I mean the status quo within a system which is not to be changed for reasons we do not understand, then this is a proof that this system leads into blind alleys, that this system leads to nowhere and above all, as far as this particular motion is concerned, to conditions which dishearten our young people.

Hence, if we are to try and find solutions to all the problems now facing us, it is therefore more than important that we have money play its true role. The fact that certain principles are applied, such as the compensated discount and the national dividend, could not but add to the purchasing power which lies in the hands of each and every taxpayer and so, to better stimulate the entire economy. By doing this, we could further in a tremendous way the contribution which our youth can make to our country. We must give our young people a country to build.

Another political party in Quebec once used the slogan, "A country to build". Let us ask ourselves in this House whether we are really offering our young people a country to build.

Our immense resources, our immense wealth are there. Everybody sees them, everybody realizes this, and we are not providing our young people with an opportunity to set for themselves an ideal, to get really excited over the cause of their country, the cause of poverty, the cause, in fact, of everything that makes up our problems.

But before that can be done, it is absolutely necessary first to free what has become clogged. We understand that this may annoy the government, as we constantly come forward with the same solutions, and as we insist so much that we always seem to be told that miracles do not happen. But they are even more unlikely when the minister who answered a few moments ago simply says: "We are going to find solutions", while we say: "We have solutions". I think that after all we are more positive, more conscious, since it means that a solution will be found and one even dares to say: there is a certain improvement, but we must wait, we must not hurry! Mr. Speaker, since we have young people who are in such a hurry I am sure that we cannot ask them to be patient and therefore we must urgently find real solutions to the problems we are facing. The failure to do so would spell trouble eventually, or would mean idleness at the very least, and we know that when young people are idle, especially after spending years in school trying to acquire the necessary skills in order to be more effective, they become somewhat discouraged and will not tolerate the situation very long.

As I say, this is why we should together really seek solutions at the outset. Let us at least recognize the advantage of considering them and let us not reject them off-hand since we have evidence that whatever is done within our present system leads to nothing. Let us at least be decent about it and say that we will examine whether there is something in our proposal which could be implemented fortwith. When you see that, by increasing the purchasing power, all the problems are solved in part, then you can pass judgment. If it turns out to be a failure, we will be the first to say that the solution does not lie there.

Mr. Speaker, before passing judgment, let us at least have the decency of studying certain things seriously and trying them out to see what the results are.

Not so long ago, inflation was checked in some parts of the U.S.A. by increasing the purchasing power. This proved so effective that at one point the president of the United States even considered extending the practice throughout the States. But, unfortunately, some elements still seem to be stronger than the government; and they impose their financial laws; finally, the matter was dropped.

Let us therefore take the lead and provide our young people with the opportunity of pursuing a true ideal by giving them the necessary tools to develop Canada, so that we may take advantage of the vast resources of such a wealthy country and help the entire world to enjoy a better standard of living. Indeed, if we succeed in controlling poverty, we would thus have rendered a very great service to the entire world.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) would remain in the House for the entirety of this debate to hear the constructive statements of members of the opposition who, in the opinions of most Canadians, are still an integral part of the democratic process in this country.

The statement the minister has just made will come as a grave disappointment to tens of thousands of young people across this nation. We did not come to this chamber expecting the hon. gentleman to acknowledge that government economic policy was wrong, or that we were facing chronic unemployment among our young people. That would not be the place of a government spokesman. Neither would it be the place of the opposition to laud the government for achievement on all fronts. But at least we did expect the minister to present us with a positive statement and outline a policy which, while recognizing the difficulties confronting the government, was designed to get the economy out of its slump to the advantage of all the unemployed and, in particular, of the young people of this nation.

The minister spoke as a person who, to use a phrase suggested by one of my hon. friends, must have fallen in love with himself at a very early age. This, at least, was his attitude—the impression which hon. members gained. I was bitterly disappointed. I should like to see members of this House copy the minister's statement and have tens of thousands of copies printed and distributed so that the young people could be aware of the contemptuous attitude taken toward their problem, and the arrogance with which they were treated. I do not know where this arrogance came from, but I imagine a number of hon. members can guess. But this was the response to a serious discussion by the opposition of the critical unemployment issue. I shall get around to dealing in more detail with the minister's statement later. His pious pomposities will not go unchallenged by members of the opposition or, I hope, by some supporters of his own party. I did not expect him to remain in the House to listen to remarks from this side of the chamber, because I guess he does not want to hear the truth told in any unsophisticated way.

We have heard the motion proposed by an hon. member of the Creditiste party, the amendment put forward by the NDP, and the amendment offered by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). My hon. friend from Vegreville quoted a statistic which is indeed alarming, namely, that in November, 1970, the number of unemployed people under the age of 25 has increased by 43 per cent. A large proportion of these will be young family people, most of them, I imagine, between the ages of 20 and 25, who are raising families, eager to get homes and, in many cases, faced with financial liabilities as they seek to pay off debts and acquire at least a minimum of personal belongings. Some of them have perhaps not reached the stage of bearing matrimonial responsibilities; they are seeking to further their education or to make their way in the labour market. Some of them are well educated in the professional sense; others have only the basic requirements of an education. These are the Canadians we are talking about when we say there has been a 43 per cent increase among those unemployed in the age bracket below 25 during the month of November as compared with November, 1969. We are not talking about an adjusted rate; we are not thinking in terms of a sophisticated statistic concocted by the Bureau of Statistics for use by statisticians. I do not think these people are much concerned about whether they are part of an adjusted unemployment rate or not. The fact is, they are unemployed.

I do not believe we can overstate the seriousness of this problem. To hon. members who have taken part in the debate this afternoon, I want to say that we might not agree with the latter part of the motion put forward on behalf of the Creditistes. Our own contribution has been the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Vegreville—a substantial amendment which satisfies the party to which I belong. It is consistent with the position we have always taken, I am told. In this respect I believe the Minister of Manpower and Immigration must have a short memory, because apparently he does not recall the situation which arose in 1962, I believe, when the party to which he belongs, out of expediency, decided to support the policy advanced by the Creditistes in their motion. I feel sure he would wish to correct the record when he realizes that his party did move in that direction.

The implications of the present unemployment situation were clearly set out by my hon. friend. The first implication is that far too many young families today find themselves without money, and, for the most part, not provided for adequately by welfare and social assistance programs. Even when they are eligible, this short-term assistance is inadequate. The second consequence is that the total educational position of manpower in Canada this winter will take a beating. We cannot continue to expand our total human resource potential—I think that is the phrase educators use today; I do not know what the minister would call it—during a period when so many of our young people are unemployed; when they are, without choice and without alternatives, a drag on the economy. The total impact of this on Canadian society will be felt in years to come. Not only are these young people unable to support themselves, but in many cases they are a drag on their families. The adult parents of these young people have to dig down into their pockets to assist them to keep going during the winter. Again, in many of the families with which I am familiar, the patriarch of the family, the father, is unemployed as well. I have in mind those who, through no fault of their own, failed to acquire a satisfactory education. Fathers are caught up in exactly the same circumstances as their sons. They are forced to seek labouring work, and when the economy slows down the first jobs to be chopped are those in the labour field.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Another implication is that young people are not able to afford their own homes. They are being forced to live in rented basements, rented apartments in slum areas, areas that would normally be condemned if we had a healthy housing policy. The consequence is that few of our young people will ever be able to own a home and raise a family with some decency.

Another aspect that is more critical than dollars or education is the attitude of our young Canadians. How can they have confidence in a government, in a church, in a school system, in our economic policies, our whole way of life, our social institutions, our political setup when they have no opportunities? They have come up through school year after year having been told about the benefits of education. They have been told that education pays; that it is everyone's business to learn to live with change, to acquire an education, with dollar signs after the word "education". Then they leave school and go into a society where there is not a tinker's chance of their securing a job; as someone said, they have as much chance as a snowball in hell. There is nowhere they can look for a job. Welfare payments for them are either inadequate or inaccessible to them. What a tremendous amount of disillusionment must be felt by those young Canadians who are now facing one of the bleakest winters in the history of this nation.

Imagine the impact of this situation on the attitude of our young people. One case was brought to my personal attention involving an individual who, according to his own parents' admission, was actually forced to rob, to commit a crime, for which he received a serious sentence, mainly because he had not had a job for many months. This 18-year old was expected to occupy some kind of position with his peers, with his 18-year old friends, in a society that expects him at least to have the opportunity to have a dollar in his pocket, perhaps attend a movie and to have some status in the group. Hon. members are aware of the importance to an individual to be a member of the group, be he at any age in the teens.

For example, with the attitude of our young people toward free enterprise and toward personal initiative, how can we expect them to face society after a number of years' disillusionment with society, a society that has given them no opportunity to take a positive, buoyant outlook toward a young Canadian nation that has almost boundless resources? How can we expect them to have the same kind of outlook our forefathers must have had when they came to Canada to develop this great country?

To a certain extent, I am frightened by this business of attitude. The sort of social unrest existing across Canada today is in no small measure attributable to the economic dilemma being faced by young Canadians. As the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) said, we are not talking about draft dodgers or computer smashers or bomb throwers or people who are members of radical wings and extremist groups. We are talking about the masses of young Canadians in all provinces who are facing a bleak outlook, 43 per cent more of whom were unemployed in November 1970 than in November 1969.

What did this arrogant minister who has been exported from a western province have to say about this? I understand from some remarks made by Premier Thatcher, quoted in the Globe and Mail of last week, that he will not be exported after the next election, which would be a great advantage to young Canadians because they do not want this type of representation in the House. I do not know what our young Canadians would say today if they were present in the House to hear this bold, arrogant minister who sat in his place taking a very smug, snittish attitude. Political blimpery, pious pomposity—I cannot think of sufficient phrases to describe the blown-up, snobbish, complacent attitude which he exemplifies. A lot of young red bloods who I know would possibly give him a good kick where it hurts the most. Excuse my bluntness, Mr. Speaker.

What concerns me most, Mr. Speaker, is not only the minister's attitude but the fact that his attitude reflects the total attitude of the government. They have everything in their mitts. They are controlling the economy. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has referred to the government's mechanistic approach to the economy. They put the screws to it, tighten up all the bolts, and fight inflation by creating a severe unemployment situation. They will then move in with the big guns, unleash their economic power, solve the problem and become the political heroes of the nation. Perhaps that is the government's plan. Perhaps human misery, suffering and disillusionment have no relationship to the government's plan, no meaning in the scheme of things. Perhaps this is what is happening, I do not know. I am watching the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but I have never seen such smugness, a total attitude that displays such arrogance. They have no respect for the opposition. They do not think members of the opposition have any mentality; they feel they have a superior intellect, that they have all the answers. We cannot even get these people to face the fact that we have a critical unemployment problem, especially among our young people.

To be honest with you, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that at the moment we can solve the unemployment problem. I do not think we could bring in a program today that would solve the unemployment problem facing this nation, particularly as far as our young and elderly people are concerned. However, I would have thought that the government would realize over the past two years why we have been pointing out the danger of a policy that creates unemployment. The words the Prime Minister himself used were "creation of unemployment". We pointed to the pitfalls and thought that at least the government would hold in reserve some emergency programs that would enable a problem brought on by their own policies to be tackled. But we were wrong.

The other day I moved a motion in this House which basically was along the lines of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vegreville. I was trying to demonstrate the need for an immediate debate on this urgent problem. After the House rose, I was interviewed by a newsman and asked what could be done about the problem. I replied that very little could be done in the immediate future to solve the situation, but I did make one suggestion, and that was concerning manpower policies.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration left the House, went before a microphone and deliberately and calculatedly misrepresented every single word I said. He picked phrases out of the air, twisted words, added on "isms", modified all kinds of adjectives and sent out across the nation a terrible response to what was a fairly responsible statement. He has done the same thing today, and I am very disappointed in his attitude.

Many suggestions have been made with regard to measures that might be taken to help remedy the situation. We hoped that the minister would be in the House to act as a catcher to field these suggestions. I should like to place them on record in the vain hope that one of these days one of the members below the ministerial level will pick them up and react accordingly.

For example, as the Leader of the Opposition said, no solution would be as beneficial as a total revamping of our economic policies in order to buoy up the economy and have appreciable effect on the unemployment situation. This, of course, is a long-term proposition. One member in the House mentioned a few days ago relaxing government requirements regarding student loans that are outstanding and which are being assumed by a lot of our young people.

Another suggestion was made with regard to extending our manpower programs. Many young people are involved in manpower programs. As everybody knows, there is only a 52-week upgrading program. This means that after that period these people are forced out on the street. This situation adds to the 43 per cent increase which was referred to. Another suggestion was that we should relax the regulations in respect of manpower training which require that a person must have been in the labour force for one year. I believe there is a clearcut case here for relaxing the regulations. I do not know whether the suggestion made is a good one, but it seems plausible to me and I should like a responsible minister to explore it.

Another suggestion was made by my colleague the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) concerning militia training. What a time in Canadian history this would be to have many of our young people brought into a militia training program to bolster their moral fibre! I do not advocate military conscription but, rather, a militia training program which would help strengthen the disciplinary fibre of the young people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): If the hon. member seeks unanimous consent of the House to complete his remarks, I would ask whether hon. members agree to allow the hon. member to complete his point.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lundrigan: I appreciate the courtesy, Mr. Speaker. I just want to say that this is a prime time for us to investigate the possibility of mobilizing our teaching professionals in the Canadian nation. We should have a program in which total use is made of our educational facilities, not only manpower facilities, in an effort to work sensibly toward the upgrading of young Canadians, perhaps just academically. The alternative is welfare, total unemployment and deprivation. Neither alternative is a good one, welfare and deprivation on the one hand or just a crash program in manpower upgrading on the other. Although neither is a good alternative, I think the latter is preferable.

I think there is a good opportunity to bring many young people into upgrading programs. There is not much advantage in having young Canadians in educational programs if they have nothing to do afterward, but I do not think we should give up in this respect. I believe that in the long run we will reap great benefits. There is not an economist in North America who would deny that we would reap great benefits from having manpower programs for young people even if today the graduates become disillusioned because of the difficulty in obtaining employment.

The other day the minister indicated that our manpower institutions are already overcrowded. He asked what we would have him do. He asked whether we wished him to turn out all those people over age 25 and bring in people under 25. That is ridiculous: no one ever suggested that. The suggestion was based on the fact that the minister had average intelligence and could see the possibility of utilizing other facilities such as churches, auditoriums and classrooms in day schools so that these people could be provided with a shot in the arm in this respect. Perhaps the minister would like to see these people on the dole for the winter. I am sorry he is not here because I wanted to make some personal observations. The minister might think he is the greatest fellow ever, but many Canadians do not think so.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I too am disappointed that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) is not here. However, I am not too disappointed because the great eminence of the Liberal government is sitting right behind the curtain and I hope that somehow my ideas will filter over to him.

The motion states that the government has inspired false hopes among young people between the ages of 16 and 24 by assuring them that education pays. Of course education pays. If one had listened to the young people three or four years ago one would realize that the last thing they wanted was payment in material terms. They wanted payment in aesthetic terms. They have that now. But I think what every young person really wants is the ability and the opportunity to express himself in his career. The suggestion in the motion and the presumption made today is that this is an immediate problem, it just happened because of the government's restrictive programs and it will go away as soon as things get better. This is a fallacious presumption; it will not happen.

If hon. members would review history they would find that as any community has become more sophisticated, the first group to experience problems has been the group between 16 and 25 years of age. Why is that? It is because with sophistication in any type of culture or economic enterprise there is a vested interest in those who have power. Let me put it in very clear and unmistakable terms. We are now at the stage of economic enterprise when a young person does not automatically learn to take a car apart and put it together again. He may have a great interest in cars and he may be very adept at mechanics, but that is as far as he will get because he will have to be an apprentice, a journeyman, and eventually he will have to join a tight little union or organization established to protect those with vested rights. So he will in time obtain part-time work, and if he is very persistent he will obtain more work. Then after seven or eight years, at age 26, 27 or 28 he will become a fully-fledged member of that tight little organization. Every society has its tight little cliques.

A few years ago it was not difficult to become a lawyer. All that was necessary was for one to become a clerk in a law office and after a period of time he would be called to the bar. Today one must be A-plus in every course established by a law society even before he can receive any training. One cannot be a doctor by apprenticing to a barber's shop, and so on. All these structures we have built up in our society are limited to those with vested rights, and it takes a long time to get these vested rights. Automation comes in and eliminates opportunities for young people to immediately take a position. This is where the frustration begins. What are they to do? Of course there is training and further training. This is one way in which we have postponed dealing completely with this problem. Further training puts young people in a position of not killing time but of making use of time until the economy finds room for them. The presumption is that if we get out of the immediate, urgent problem vistas will open up for all the young people. It will not happen because each industrial innovation, each trade and each industry becomes more and more sophisticated, with an increasingly smaller requirement for labour.

Therefore, we will have a tough time keeping people employed, even those with vested interests. When I say vested interests, I do not use it as a capitalistic term but with regard to a position, a job or a calling. People are having the same problem because there is pressure upon them to retire much earlier although they are capable of working longer. There is pressure applied at both ends of their working lives. Between the ages of 16 and 25 the situation becomes more and more difficult. What, then, shall we do? Historically, the answer has always been to fill the vacuum or void with the most urgent problem. In other words, over a period of many centuries and even milleniums the main problem has been in respect of military defence, and into this these groups were fitted. First it was an agrarian economy which then became a commercial economy and eventually an industrial economy, all of which faced this problem; and the military was always the answer.

This is what we heard from the hon. member who preceded me. Historically, defence has been the most pressing problem. In other words, the most pressing problem has been the expenditure of money to maintain this group. The question then is whether this will be justified today. There might be a saving grace in this connection. A report recently issued by the department of economics of the United States indicates that over 63 per cent of Americans are employed in non-productive work, that is to say, in service-connected industry. By that they mean managerial, promotional or sales jobs as well as architectural and engineering work. From the balance, which is 37 per cent, you take away the unemployed, which is 7 per cent, and if you consider the agricultural element you have a still lower percentage of people engaged in manufacturing and industrial work. The reason they have reached this very satisfactory situation is that they have looked upon other countries as hewers of wood and drawers of water.

We Canadians are filling this void for the Americans. In other words, we no longer merely dig for raw materials; we go a step further and we do the processing: we even do the manufacturing. But we leave it to the more sophisticated sections of the U.S. economy to do the managerial work. At the moment we are all happy because with the automotive pact we are kept busy. However, that will not employ all our young people, nor will it solve the problem. I suggest to the grey eminence, to the government, that if we are to solve the problem we must take a long-range point of view and the historical example, but instead switch to the most pressing need today. Defence does not enter the picture so far as Canada is concerned. Under no circumstances can we say we will build a military establishment to defend this country realistically. We are by agreement or by force of circumstance already committed to a joint defence program under the umbrella of the U.S. This is a fact, and wishful thinking or nationalism will not change it.

However, we could change the military structure to suit the most current and pressing problem that faces us, namely, pollution. This is a problem which now replaces what was once the problem of military defence. If one were to ask the average Canadian citizen what is the most pressing problem before us, whether it is defence of the nation or pollution, I am sure you would find that most people would say it is pollution. Why not, then, change our whole military structure and adapt it to solve this problem? We now have many vacant military establishments and a decreasing cadre of military people. We are stressing the importance of a change in emphasis. We gave the Emergency Measures Organization a trial run, but in order to do an effective job we should incorporate into our military establishment such concepts as pollution control, CUSO, the CYC, and even forestry—programs which are now given second place.

I do not mean that we should continue these programs under strict military control but, rather, that we should do so by changing the Department of Defence, by reconstruction, absorption and by varying the duties of many of these organizations which now use up the energy and the interest of the young people. Thus, we could do this job eventually, whether it be in five, six or ten years. A great amount of money and energy will have to be spent if we are to get the most committed people. The hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) says I am stealing his speech. I hope I am not. I hope he will be able to follow me with many ideas which I know he has.

Let me get back to this vast problem, because I know there will be a problem. You cannot just go to a general and say, "You will change the traditional military role of the army and take over the work of the CYC, CUSO, control of pollution," and so on. To that, Colonel Blimp would say, "My goodness; you cannot do that, we are soldiers". However, we now have a brand new, young Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) who is not exactly enchanted with the whole idea of the thin red line, of cannons all over the place and of the charge of the Light Brigade.

I think the Prime Minister has indicated that his concept of defence is not as narrow as that of former prime ministers. Be that as it may, we have within the military establishment a cadre of disciplined people who will be needed to perform those tasks. If we introduce there the concept of pollution control, it does not mean we must wait a year before doing so, because if that concept is accepted everyone will realize that the quicker this is done, the better. In the meantime there is no reason why these people should not be gathered together and trained. This work cannot be done without trained people. We have ten vacant army camps in perfect condition. They can be filled, and money can be obtained. The whole structure of the present military establishment can be given this dual or triple role.

Such work will need much manual labour. No machines are made now to perform this type of work. Problems arise daily and work should be started almost immediately. If the government were to advance this idea, much of the uneasiness which exists in the economic community would be relieved. That in itself would be a great incentive to hire more people and it would be a solution to what is now considered an insoluble problem. CUSO, which is part of our external aid, should be incorporated in such a program. At the moment this organization is completely independent, but there is no reason why it should not be included. The same is true of the CYC. You do not have to say to all young people that they must undertake pollution control work, because they may not all be interested in that kind of work. But they may be interested in external aid, teaching, welfare work or other advanced programs, all of which can be offered within this program. There is no reason in the world why it cannot work. Having said that, the question is, do I think the government will take up the challenge? I am not sure that it will.

Some six years ago, on September 24, 1964, I made a speech in this House. We were discussing the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. I am not diverging from the subject matter of the debate, Mr. Speaker; I am just indicating why I have my doubts that the government will take this reform step. On that occasion I said:

> I have seen factory ships the like of which most members would never believe. These foreign vessels have on board office equipment that would compare favourably with that in an insurance company office. They have freezing plants, drying plants and canning plants. I even saw one ship that contained a factory to make the cans right on board. These factory ships sweep our seas like giant vacuum cleaners, taking everything there is. What do we do?

I put that to the then minister who is now a member of the other place. As I say, that was six years ago. His first reaction was that he had never heard of a factory ship, and then he was quite convinced they would never endanger Canadian fisheries. Now, in 1970, we are faced with the problem of factory ships and it is supposed to be a brand new problem. We had six years in which to do something. Mind you, now it is a different government.

An hon. Member: But the same old gang.

Mr. Otto: It is not the same old gang. From the speeches I heard today the consensus seems to be that we have an immediate problem, that we want an immediate solution and that somehow this problem of young people will disappear immediately. Mr. Speaker, it will not. Therefore I would urge the minister and the government to consider such an approach but not on the basis that the solution will be achieved overnight. I would ask the government to forget the concept that the problem of young people will disappear with economic activity. This is a growing problem. Next year it will be worse, and the year after that still worse again. If we are to put the military idea to work, I warn that you cannot expect the young people to parade on the parade square; there is no purpose to it. It will absorb some energy but it will not provide an acceptable, workable scheme.

It is up to the government to decide whether it will go from day to day, emergency to emergency, or will plan for the future realizing this is a problem that will grow. The problem is not the result of our nor the opposition's doing. It is the result of the sophistication of a civilized community.

I regret that the minister has not been here, Mr. Speaker, and I regret that the grey eminence to whom I have referred has not been listening. However, I hope they will read this speech in Hansard. I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will finally come to the conclusion that he was elected to institute reforms in giant steps. Canadians will not tolerate very slow, gradual, tortoise-like moves. This government has the absolute support of all Canadians to make these changes, right or wrong. If we are wrong, we will be forgiven; if we are right, we will be right. But if we do not make these moves we will have neither the support, the acclaim of the people nor the prestige that a government should have.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues are asking that I call it six o'clock. If you are agreeable, I shall begin my speech after the dinner-hour adjournment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

First report of Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs—Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—FALSE HOPES CREATED BY GOVERNMENT—INABILITY TO USE TALENTS OF YOUTHS AGED 16 TO 24

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fortin:

That this House condemns the government for having inspired false hopes among young people between the ages of 16 to 24 by assuring them that education pays, at a time when young people coming out of schools and universities find no outlet for their energies and no means of placing the knowledge they have acquired at the service of the people, because the government has been unable to introduce such financial devices as the compensated discount and the national dividend so as to enable the masses to benefit from the communal resource constituted by young people who are educated and better equipped than any previous generation to produce more efficiently, more abundantly and more economically, so as to assure the greater welfare of all Canadians.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. Mazankowski, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Nystrom.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I do not feel as encouraged as I thought I would a little earlier today. This is because of the ideas and attitude expressed by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) in his speech. We in the opposition feel it is our duty to offer proposals to the government as alternatives, but we expect the government also to put forward positive suggestions. I am sorry to say that the minister did not. His remarks were devoted to an attempt to smear the opposition and to impute motives to us. One of his own party, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), made a few positive suggestions but admitted that he did not think the government would pay any attention to them. That is the way we feel on this side of the House.

On speaking to the motion which we are debating, I have to admit that I agree with parts of it but there is one part with which I do not agree. For instance, the motion suggests that the government has inspired false hopes amongst young people. I am of the opinion that the government has never inspired anybody by their policies.

Mr. Ricard: Not even themselves.

Mr. Yewchuk: When one observes the effects of this government's policies it is easy to conclude that their policies are certainly uninspiring and uninspired. I think for the first time in Canada's history we are faced with a situation where even university graduates, including Ph.D.s, are unable to find employment when at the same time we are handing out many Ph.D. jobs to foreigners. This is a most shameful and unacceptable situation. It indicates the government is devoid of new ideas and is unable to cope with the problem of administering this country. The only thing that is keeping this government afloat at the present time is the ability of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to perform on television and the flashy image that he has on that medium. I do not think anybody here could say that this government's policies are keeping it in power. That is a great shame, because while the Prime Minister performs on television Canadians from coast to coast are in despair. While he wears all kinds of funny clothes—

Mr. Bell: And funny hats.

Mr. Yewchuk: —some Canadians cannot afford to buy clothes at all. When one analyses what has happened in this country in the past couple of years it becomes obvious that the economy is becoming more and more stagnant. Without question, the economy is even more below its potential now than it has been for two or three decades. The gross national product is not rising sufficiently to bring about a satisfactory output. Unemployment is reaching drastic proportions. But the government sits back in smugness and does virtually nothing, as was indicated in the recent budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

In the past five years or so, the youth of Canada have expressed ever-growing disenchantment with the establishment. Many of the adult population of this country sit back and wonder why. They wonder why in a country as affluent as ours, with what is considered to be one of the most democratic types of government in the world, the youth are turning against the system in large numbers and are becoming disenchanted with society.

When we look at the unemployment figures amongst the youth, the reason becomes very obvious. In the group aged 14 to 19 years unemployment is higher than in any other group. This is more evident in Quebec and the Maritimes. When we look at the unemployment rate for the next group, those aged 20 to 24, we find the second highest ratio of unemployment compared with the rest of the labour force. I suggest that the reason may be that our educational system and general economic planning have not been adequate to cope with changing conditions. In the past, tremendous stress has been placed on students going through university. This has been done to such an extent that anybody who has not gone to university has been virtually written off as a drop-out and regarded as a non-productive individual. That is very wrong, Mr. Speaker.

Great progress in the area of vocational training was initiated by the former Conservative government a decade ago. These institutions are now overcrowded and graduates from them are finding difficulty obtaining employment. In addition, a large segment of our youth still has not attended any institution of higher learning. Yet these young people also need to earn a living. Secondly, many adults have not had the advantage of university of vocational training and they are being discriminated against as a result of the increase in unemployment.

I should like to make a few comments about this situation and refer particularly to northern parts of the country. I think it is fair to say that in the north, particularly among the population of native ancestry, unemployment is higher than among any other group in Canada, including groups in Quebec or the Maritimes. There has been a complete and dismal failure on the part of the government to take any effective action in this particular area. From personal knowledge gained through living among and near native peoples, Indians and Metis, unemployment among them is probably higher than 50 per cent. As a matter of fact, at times it comes close to 90 per cent and even 100 per cent in some communities. These figures are not reflected in the statistics of the Department of Manpower; many of these people have reached the point where they do not bother applying to manpower offices because such applications have repeatedly led nowhere. On many occasions they certainly have not led to employment for native peoples.

There is another problem in the area of preparing these people for jobs which are created. A good example is northeastern Alberta, where unemployment among the native peoples is probably higher than 50 per cent. Within the past five years a huge oil refinery was established in the geographic centre of my riding and this created hundreds of jobs. While it was being established, many of the local residents, particularly the natives, literally jumped with joy at the prospect that finally jobs would be available to them.

The plant is now operating but unemployment among the native population remains at the same level. People were brought in from outside to fill the jobs which were created. The basis for this action was that local residents were not trained or equipped to handle most of the jobs that were considered to be technical. Even though there were some vocational training facilities in the area, the preparation of the local population was found to be inadequate. As a result, the local population was virtually bypassed by the job opportunities which had been created. These remarks are not meant in any way to express dissatisfaction with the people who came in and took the jobs. They are all extremely good, useful and productive citizens and we are all very happy to have them.

The development of the north is creating one of the greatest possibilities for employment. However, so long as the government fails to recognize the needs of the local people, and fails to institute a vocational training program for them when employment opportunities are developing, unemployment among them will continue forever. When massive unemployment among any group of the population exists, it is accompanied by all the horrors and tragedies associated with chronic, widespread poverty among adults and chronic despair and pessimism among the youth.

If I may change the subject for a moment, in recent years, as a result of this government's policies, we have witnessed another phenomenon, that of the abandonment of hundreds and hundreds of small farms, particularly throughout the Prairies. This situation has released thousands of people from a vocation to which they have been accustomed, onto a labour market which does not have sufficient jobs even for those who were not in farming and already are part of the labour force. There is no specific plan of action to assist people leaving the farm and attempting to seek another way of life in urban areas. This is probably one of the greatest errors the government is making.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: It coldly sits back and says, "This farm is not economical; let us wipe it out", forgetting completely the tragedies which will befall the farm family when it is forced off the farm as a result of poor economic policies. When it gets to the city, it will find that conditions are no better. These families will find a shortage of housing as well as a shortage of jobs.

What are the possible solutions to these problems? First, the direction of education must be reassessed. Our attitude toward education must be reassessed. Students must be made to feel that this country needs them whether or not they go to university. The best way we can do this is to make sure they can obtain jobs and are able to make a living. Young people must be made to feel that taking vocational training is also desirable and respectable. Those who do not take either university or vocational training must be made to feel they are useful human beings and that this country has a need for them. It is therefore necessary to aim education in the direction that will not only broaden one's horizons but will make sure that whatever education a person obtains will enable him to earn a living in any area of Canada. This, in particular, should apply to those who choose not to go to university.

In certain areas of the north where there is industrial development we have witnessed large turnovers in the white population. White people go north, work for a while and then go back south. Most of them do not stay for any period of time. Yet the local people continue to live off welfare or in abject poverty. We must design vocational training programs in conjunction, in co-operation and in consultation with potential industrial development. We must keep the local population in mind and make sure people are ready for jobs when they become available. We must ensure that the local population is not trained for jobs that never will be available in the area. That sort of thing has happened to quite a large extent.

Hon. members have spoken about possibilities that might be considered. For instance, one suggestion was that the youth who are now idle ought to be engaged in militia training where that is practicable. Another member suggested that we should let our young people participate in the fight against pollution. Those were good suggestions. I wish to make an additional suggestion. We must remember that Canada for a long time has been, and still is, primarily an exporter of primary products or raw materials. Because of poor government policies or lack of government policies, we have been robbing our people of thousands of jobs.

We are sending our raw materials to the United States, Japan and other countries. We are creating jobs for the people of those countries. They produce the finished product and sell it back to us at a very handsome profit. We ought to take a serious look at this process. If we had proper government planning and proper policies there would be no reason in the world why manufacturing processes involving industrial complexes should not be carried out in our own country. This would bring benefits from two points of view; first, in creating many jobs and, second, since we would be the ones manufacturing the finished product we would ultimately reap the greatest profit.

The considerations also apply to policies dealing with agriculture. It is fine, theoretically, to say that a small farm does not have the right to exist if it cannot pay its own way. Nevertheless, we must remember the human element involved. I am of the opinion that at least on a short-term basis it would be far better to subsidize some agricultural products in order to keep people on the small farm and allow them to make a living, rather than moving them to cities where they would subsist completely on welfare. On welfare they would be subsidized to the extent of 100 per cent. Secondly, while these people are being temporarily subsidized, long-term planning will have to be carried out from two points of view: first, to find ways and means by which they can improve their ability to make a living off their land without getting so deep into debt that they can never get out; second, in offering vocational training and creating job opportunities in the area before abandonment of the farm is encouraged. Then if they decide to leave the farm, they will do so with the knowledge that they will find a job and will have the vocational ability to ensure that they hold it. It may be that before this can be done, a change of government will be required. Obviously, the logical alternative is my party.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The same old gang!

Mr. Yewchuk: As a matter of fact, when this gang was in power, things were pretty good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: I said that the Prime Minister is a good television performer. I like to watch him over television. That is why I suggest he should do this on a full-time basis: I am sure the CBC could use him somewhere. As far as the administration of this country is concerned, I am afraid it is just too much for the Prime Minister and this government. This country needs a government with administrative ability, the ability to develop new ideas, new directives and special policies in keeping with the special needs of areas and individuals. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, Canadians deserve an opportunity to emancipate themselves from the economic strait-jacket in which the government has placed the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to take part in this debate on the motion proposed by the Ralliement créditiste to improve the present situation of young people in Canada. The problem facing us is twofold since we must take steps to make up for past carelessness and at the same time provide for the future.

During the last five years I met hundreds of students and their distress as regards their future is disturbing. Their attitude as to the necessary action reflects great confusion.

Nevertheless nobody is assuming the responsibilty of helping our youth to put all their talents at the service of the Canadian people. They are aware that the Canadian economy is more and more unable to absorb the mass of skilled people entering the labour market.

In the case of those young people, short term forecasts are most pessimistic and according to experts, job opportunities for new graduates will be almost non-existent next spring.

A recent edition of the specialized magazine Supply and Demand points out that the jobs intended for young university students have increased by only 3.4 per cent since 1969, while the number of graduates showed an increase of 10 per cent during the same period.

Thus the gap is widening and experts forecast no improvement in the near future.

In the arts field, the drop in available employment shows fluctuations ranging from 15 to 30 per cent.

Employment of Graduate Students

As far as the graduates with an M.A. are concerned, their share of the labour market shows a 20 per cent drop this year.

Finally, graduates with a Ph.D. who are entering the labour market have seen their chances decrease by 25 per cent during the last 12 months.

It seems that in spite of the billions of dollars invested in education during the last decades, the improvements we were expecting are not for the near future.

In this day and age, economic dictatorship of a few men protected by the government in power has imposed the prevalance of money over all values and man is nothing but a commodity subject to the law of supply and demand.

As for those who are hungry and those who are without work, society does not even offer them the surplus milk and wheat which it allows to be produced.

Since millions of people, too many Canadians live in poverty in our affluent society, young people are asking questions. They are skeptical of the words, the promises and the renewal programs which never materialize.

They mistrust politicians who do not govern for the people. They say that the government is not that of the people, and I know that they are right.

They do not fancy at all the role of slaves, which has been that of their parents in the present system, and they wonder what we have to offer them.

I believe that it is urgent to give an answer, because thousands of young people will not accept to join the ranks of people on welfare or of the unemployed.

In today's changing conditions, the government should take steps to make students and young unemployed party to the development of Canada. It is necessary to be able to discover the citizen and to give him social tasks the execution of which becomes a contribution to the common welfare.

The imagination and enthusiasm of young people can create and produce wothwhile initiatives. That responsibility which would be given to them would constitute an outstanding preparation for life.

If we wish to stop from growing the feeling of disgust that this generation has in view of the poor results of this administration, it is more than time in my opinion to take the necessary action in order to create the just society so often talked about.

One wonders whether the just society has been proposed simply for fun.

Frankly, we wonder whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) knew what he was saying when he promised the establishment of a just society. Did he really know what he was committing himself to or was it merely an election promise?

We are led to think so by the increase in unemployment. This situation is extremely costly because the losses in salaries are considerable.

[Mr. Godin.]

• (8:30 p.m.)

The goods which are not produced or the services which are not rendered make our society all the more poorer. The worker must then pay higher taxes to offset smaller tax returns and quite rapidly additional social allowances are required to compensate for the salary losses.

Keeping able-bodied people idle is demoralizing and downgrading for them. Keeping 500,000 people unemployed in Canada weakens community life, increases consumer prices and, for people still working, adds to the tax burden since it does cost something to provide the unemployed with even bare essentials.

The unemployed must make do with a bare minimum while the working man must tighten his belt because part of his pay is taken away to give a minimum to the unemployed.

Both are penalized since the working man who has just enough for himself is obliged to share his pay with his unemployed fellow citizen who has nothing at all.

But, most ridiculous of all, some people in their sixties, tired and spent, are still working and paying out to help provide for their neighbours 18 to 25 years of age who are in perfect health and awaiting their turn to be hired.

Not only is there nothing to be offered the young but they are in the way.

When those young people have less than Grade 10, their applications are simply thrown into the wastepaper basket. If they do have a diploma, their names are put on the lists of industry, business or those of the civil service, federal as well as provincial, at the Canada Manpower Centres.

Mr. Speaker, we won the war thanks to fellows who had only three or four years of schooling. To fight against the bad Germans, guys who could neither read nor write were even enlisted.

Today, in times of peace, those who wish to live normally have to wait. Even when he is registered as unemployed, he must prove he has experience, and as the youth is just coming out of school, it is pretty hard for him to prove that.

For instance, as the Public Service Commission wanted them to while the time away, they were asked to sit for examinations. I have here a letter which was written this summer to a voter in the Quebec area. A young man had applied for a radio operator job on April 17, 1970. To keep him busy, the Public Service Commission each month asked him to sit for an examination. At the end of the summer, on September 11 to be precise he was written the following letter:

Dear Sir:

This letter refers to your application for employment as a radio operator and to our acknowledgment of July 16, 1970.

In connection with this competition, we intended to invite you to sit for a written examination at the end of the month of August, but the examination had to be cancelled because of the postal strike. In the meantime, the Department of Transport has informed us that all places available for the next course are already filled.

Moreover, considering the number of successful candidates already on our lists, we have to inform you that the need for further examinations to be held is most unlikely.

Mr. Speaker, if war broke out tomorrow morning, everybody would be working. But, in peace time, the young people are being kept on lists of "successful candidates".

Again I quote the letter:

—considering the number of successful candidates already on our lists—

Fantastic, Mr. Speaker!

In business, accumulation of overdue accounts or too large an inventory often leads to bankruptcy. I wonder just how far we can go with our labour inventories, so well drawn up by our staffing officers in the Public Service Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I know of a young man who was an outstanding student and 95 per cent bilingual. Following a discreet inquiry which I dared conduct, I was simply told that this young man was not proficient enough in the English language.

Yet to fight against the bad Germans the government did enlist men who could neither read nor write. However, in peace time, they have to be 101 per cent bilingual.

At the present time, any reason is good enough to get rid of young people no matter in what department they apply for a job.

For those who are not eligible, there is not even a Kardex system; their names are simply removed from the list.

Then, our man is on the loose and ready to accept whatever occupation is offered to him.

If he is laid-off after three months with too small a contribution to be entitled to unemployment benefits, he can still go to the local Welfare office. There, he will be entitled to respect only if he has spent every cent of every pay cheque. If he has saved some money, he will be told: Spend it, man; come back when it is all gone. Then, he works for three months and remains unemployed for six. It is automatic; the guy is always broke and there is no way out.

In December 1964, the Economic Council of Canada stated in its first annual review, at page 38, and I quote:

In the light of careful studies, we have concluded that a 97 per cent rate of employment, or a 3 per cent rate of unemployment, of the labour force would constitute a realistic objective to be aimed at over the balance of the 1960's, and that economic policies should be actively directed towards the achievement of this target. We recognize that this target has important implications for other basic economic objectives—such as the maintenance of reasonable price stability and a viable balance of payments position—

Further, on the same page, we find the following:

—we are satisfied that, given favourable domestic and world economic conditions and appropriate economic policies, it is a practicable objective.

Employment of Graduate Students

Mr. Speaker, according to experts, the objective was practicable in 1964. However, the July 1970 monthly bulletin of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicated that the number of unemployed stood at 529,000, that is 6.1 p. 100.

Mr. Speaker, the government has also neglected several points. And if, in spite of thorough studies, it has utterly failed, it is because it has neglected the economic aspect. It has lagged once again and has continued to meet the requirements of those who create money and credit, that is the chartered banks to which it has yielded its powers.

The government has also failed, because it does no longer take into account the fact that in several sectors of national production, the machine is displacing man.

At page 13 of the first annual review of the Economic Council of Canada, the following can be read:

—from 1946 through 1963:

—total real output has approximately doubled;

—real output per capita has increased by about 30 per cent;

—real output per person employed has risen by close to 50 per cent;

—real production per man-hour has increased by almost 70 per cent.

From 1946 to 1963 Canadian production doubled but we know that it trebled from 1954 to 1970 since from $25 billion in 1954 it is expected to reach $80 billion in 1970.

Instead of paying 500,000 people for doing nothing, for not producing, why not use new credits to fight unemployment?

Why not design a plan for paying people to work?

In the various regions of Canada would it not be possible to carry out urgent and useful work which could be done immediately by people who are presently unemployed?

Is it impossible to imagine in various regions the unemployed being put to work creating industries commensurate with the areas, with the areas' resources and which would provide employment once the building stage is over?

In a certain city, could we not undertake collective projects that would create, at short range, a predictable industrial development?

In a region where slum tenements are plentiful, are we incapable of developing a cooperative housing projet, to the achievement of which the badly accomodated unemployed would be most eager to work?

In my opinion, if we voted new credits to put the unemployed to work, these serious problems which we are facing would quickly disappear. Thus we would get rid of this most serious social disease which afflicts Canada.

There is another step that I would suggest. Since there are few relations between education and industry, this government might consider and implement the integration of students into industry while they are still taking courses.

Employment of Graduate Students

Students could spend part of their time in college, and another part at work. This training could last for a year or two if necessary.

And as this is all about preparing the generation which will replace us, I can very well see a salary for students, whatever their studies and the profession they wish to practise. This would be a salary paid by the government out of new funds.

This salary for students is a remedy which can be applied at once. The present Prime Minister stated that in 1954 in Cité libre. If I may quote some extracts from this publication, he said for instance on page 34, and I quote:

> The problem remains to know whether there is no other limit to unemployment than dire poverty.

And there is something else on page 35:

> Fortunately there exists a remedy that can be applied at once—, it is to stimulate purchasing by delivering more money into consumers' hands. Benefits of all kinds must be widely and determinedly distributed by the state—

Hence, Mr. Speaker, the state should pay out all sorts of benefits. The Prime Minister has said so.

In my opinion, student-salary is the best investment the government can make. Now then, since the Prime Minister is holding the reins of power and is backed by a strong government, why does he not put into practice what he was advocating in 1954?

The challenge is tremendous and if there is no possibility of dialogue, many young people will see their talents go to waste. Our collective prosperity will be seriously jeopardized whereas it is of the utmost importance that our young people be associated with the development of our country.

They must discover for themselves the tasks which they can undertake. Self-help, daring, imagination and eagerness in our young people must work for Canada. If the Prime Minister is not a candle-snuffer, then let him prove it by giving our young people an opportunity to put their energy to work for the promotion of our population and the development of our country.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, to say the least, the speech the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) made this afternoon was interesting because he ignored almost completely the main point of the motion brought forward by the Social Credit Party, the amendment moved by the spokesman for the official opposition and the subamendment moved on behalf of our party by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

The minister chose deliberately to spend most of his time making jest of the economic theories of the Social Credit Party. I do not agree with those theories, but it seems to me the minister might well have taken the opportunity to deal with the important questions which concern the people of this country and which are being written about every day in the newspapers, including Liberal newspapers, of Canada. These questions include the fact that we have more unemployment in Canada than we have had for a dozen or more years, the fact that our young people make up almost half of the unemployed, and the fact that a number of people in the large cities, including Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, who have no work and no unemployment insurance protection are forced to try to obtain emergency welfare assistance because they do not qualify, on the basis of residence, for regular welfare.

All these are problems the minister ignored almost completely. He was proud of the fact that in 1970 we have had such a small increase in the cost of living. The minister did not draw from this fact the obvious conclusion that the government's policies of restraint and of not going ahead with necessary programs to a large extent have led to the unemployment we now face.

The minister attempted to chastise my colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, because he said the government had deliberately created unemployment. The fact is that on more than one occasion the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said publicly both inside and outside the House that he was prepared to be tough in dealing with inflation, and that even if Canada had a 6 per cent unemployment rate he would not be daunted in his program of restraint and restrictions in order to try to stop the increasing cost of living. The Prime Minister and the government have succeeded brilliantly! The fact is that Canada has a higher rate of unemployment than any other industrialized country in the western world.

Last year, according to OECD reports, average unemployment in the major countries of the western world was as follows. In Germany it was half of one per cent; in Sweden it was 1.9 per cent; in the United Kingdom it was 2.2 per cent; in Italy it was 3.1 per cent; in Belgium it was 3.3 per cent; and in the United States of America, our neighbour to the south, it was 4.1 per cent. In Canada it was 4.6 per cent. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration may be proud of the economic miracle they have created in their moves to slow down and stop inflation, but the unemployment we have, which is the largest of any country in the western world, is a direct result of their policies.

Canada's average unemployment figure of 4.6 per cent for last year is much lower than it will be this year. This year's average will be over 6 per cent. Last month in this country almost 500,000 people were unemployed. A very conservative estimate I have seen—which I am sure is not very different from the estimate prepared for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Prime Minister by government economists—indicates that for February and March of 1971 we will have close to 800,000 people unemployed. In fact, I have seen an estimate by a very responsible and respected economic research organization which indicates that the average for the whole of next year will be over 6 per cent.

What is particularly disturbing is that included in the figure of 476,000 unemployed for next year, 212,000 or 45 per cent are young people between the ages of 14 and 24. For the month of November, 1970, the unemployment figure in respect of young people between the ages of 14 and 24 was 10.2 per cent, an increase of 1.2 per cent over the 9 per cent for October.

If one considers Canada by regions, one sees how serious this situation is. Not only the poor, have-not provinces are in trouble, although as one might expect they are in the greatest trouble: it is estimated that this winter in the Atlantic provinces 14 per cent of the entire work force will be unemployed. I do not need to tell this to members of the House, because we have among us members from the Atlantic provinces and from Newfoundland who I am sure can tell hon. members better than I can that in some regions the unemployment figure will be 20 per cent or more. It is estimated that in Quebec 13 per cent of the labour force will be unemployed at some points during this winter. I do not know of a better way to recruit the people of Quebec into separatism than confronting them with an unemployment figure of 13 per cent. This is the result of the policies of a government with a Prime Minister who was elected to create a united Canada.

In prosperous Ontario the unemployment rate will be 7 per cent. In the Prairie provinces it will be 8 per cent. Eight per cent in fact is not an honest figure because excluded from it are farmers who are in serious economic difficulty and would like to work during the winter months. Also excluded from that 8 per cent figure are Indians and Métis who have been unable to obtain work in earlier years. With those exclusions, 8 per cent of the Prairies work force will be unemployed.

In prosperous British Columbia 12 per cent of the people will be unemployed. Is it any wonder the people of this country, and in particular the younger people, are having difficulty and are discontent? Questions have been asked of the Prime Minister concerning whether the government is prepared to adopt emergency programs so that over the next few difficult months the young people who are unemployed, who are not going to school, who are not in manpower training programs and who are not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits may be helped. I listened with dismay, and that is putting it mildly, to the flippant answers received from the Prime Minister and the non-answers received from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

I suggest to members of the House that they read any one of the newspapers published in the city of Toronto. The Toronto Star, which is Liberal, the Toronto Telegram, which is Conservative, and the Globe and Mail, which sometimes supports one party and at other times the other, have all in the last couple of weeks printed lengthy articles about the difficulties encountered by young people who have drifted into Toronto, as they have drifted into other cities, from small towns and communities outside Toronto, who have no work and who are besieging in the hundreds and thousands the manpower offices, the welfare departments and the private charitable organizations which are trying to help them. The stories are of a kind which I have not heard since the depression of the 1930s.

It is a disgrace that in this day and age young people meet the attitude of indifference which is portrayed so vividly in the articles to which I have referred in all three of the newspapers published in Toronto. I am sure that similar articles have appeared in newspapers throughout the country, because the situation is not peculiar to Toronto. It is worse in Montreal and certainly worse in cities in the Atlantic provinces.

What do the resolution and amendments proposed today call on the government to do? First of all, to adopt policies which would achieve full employment in this country. I do not think I have the time, and this is not the occasion, to list the things which can be done, the necessary social projects which are required and which could put to work every person in Canada who wants a job. We need homes, we need schools, we need hospitals, we need recreation centres, we need manpower training centres, and so on.

The government has turned its back on such proposals because of its false idea of holding the line on inflationary pressures, something with which they have not been successful and which, as I have said, has created increasing unemployment.

The second aspect of the requests which are being made to the government is that the manpower training programs which have been created and have done a great deal to upgrade the skills, the education and the working habits of the people of Canada, be geared to meet the new dimensions of the problems. What did the minister say today, and what was said all last week or so when he was asked about these points? He said, "Well, if we find places for the young people we will have to exclude some of the older people". He also said, "We have used up all the money which has been appropriated", and, "We are doing more than we have done in other years". It may be that we are doing more than we have done in other years, but compared with the needs of the winter of 1970-1971 what we are doing is completely inadequate. I say to the minister and to the government that the government should not refuse to act simply because it does not have the money to expand manpower training programs. I do not think any member of this House, of any party, would object to or vote against a proposal by the government to increase the appropriations for manpower training programs and for living allowances for those who are taking manpower training courses.

We have also been urging the government and this minister—not just in the last two weeks but in fact, ever since the manpower training program was begun—to take out of the legislation and the regulations some of the provisions which have prevented deserving, needy people of all ages who want to participate in a manpower training program to upgrade their skills so they can get the better jobs which will be available.

Some of the regulations and policies adopted by the government have prevented people from taking part in manpower training programs. Let me list some of them very briefly. There is the regulation which provides that a person must be out of school for a year before he can qualify for a course. There is the regulation that a person must be in the work force for three years before he can qualify for a living allowance, even if he is accepted in a manpower training course. What do these regulations do? They say to the young person: You simply cannot take the training even though you want to, even though there may be a need for the kind of skill which you wish to acquire, because you do not qualify.

We have said from the beginning that these rules are not only unjust but they are stupid. What is the point of saying to a young man of 18 or 19 who has finished high school and wants to take a course in a particular trade or profession for which there is a course available at one of our manpower training centres, a young man who in all likelihood is single and living at home, "You cannot take a course now because you have not qualified yet"? In all likelihood that young man has left high school and obtained an unskilled job. When he is 23, 24, 25 and sees that he cannot get a good, permanent and well paid job because he does not have the necessary skill, we say to him, "We will let you take a course and we will pay you a living allowance while you are taking the course". By that time the young man is probably married and living in his own home and it is costly to give him the manpower training course.

I am not objecting to encouraging married men with families to take the course, but I think it is obvious that we should not discourage a person from taking the course when he is young and single, when his living allowance would be much less. The government has been adamant in its refusal to consider this change although it has been recommended by people who work in the manpower training centres and have close contact with those who are taking courses and those who want to take courses. This suggestion has been made by such organizations as Frontier College, which has a brilliant record over many years of helping young people who do not have much formal education to upgrade their educational standard. Representatives of Frontier College appeared before the Senate Committee on Poverty and made such a proposal. The minister and the government know this is the kind of thing Frontier College has been proposing, yet time and again we get an absolute refusal from the minister to make this simple change.

The regulations provide that a person can receive a living allowance while taking a course of not more than 52 weeks, yet many courses offered in manpower training centres extend over two or three years. I wish to give one illustration with respect to one of my constituents who wanted to take a course in hotel management. People who travel across Canada, as do Members of Parliament on occasion, know how necessary it is that the training of people working in service industries such as hotels should be upgraded. So the manpower training centres offer a course in hotel management. We say to people, "You should take this course; it is a good course." Then we say to them, "But we are not going to give you the necessary allowance so you can spend two years on the course."

Surely it is time we stopped the policy under which the left hand does not care what the right hand is doing. Surely it is time we adopted a policy based on simple, ordinary common sense so that we can help people in this country, a large percentage of whom do not have the formal education required in the seventies to do the kind of jobs which, hopefully, will be open for them. Frontier College has estimated that 43 per cent of adult Canadians have less than a complete elementary education. Mr. Speaker, the 43 per cent do not even qualify for most of the manpower training programs offered by the government. We ought to be dealing with that problem, but we are not.

The government has to face up to the fact that in the winter of 1970 we have the largest unemployment probably since the end of World War II, and that a disturbingly high percentage of our unemployed are young people who have been led to believe that this is a country which can give a job to every person who wants to work, an expectation which the winter of 1970-71 is rapidly proving to be false.We have to face up to the fact that our manpower training programs, which have made tremendous strides since the former Conservative government introduced the technical vocational training grants—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: That was a very good beginning, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind giving credit where credit is due. These programs have been improved, although there are glaring errors and omissions in some of the programs devised by the Liberal government. However, there has been very rapid expansion in these programs. Canada has moved from the time in the 1950s when we had probably the poorest record in the western world, in terms of manpower training, to a time where we are probably in a middle position in that respect. But if one thing is obvious, it is that in this period of major unemployment our manpower training programs, which were devised for a time when we had much more full-time employment than we have today, are simply not doing the job. Therefore, I call on the government to give serious consideration to sharply increasing the programs which are adopted so that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired unless the House gives unanimous consent for him to continue. Does the House agree to allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that the government needs to recast all its manpower training programs, not in light of the problems of the 1950s and 1960s but in light of the problems of 1970-71, in light of an unemployment rate of 6 per cent for the year and a winter unemployment rate which in Quebec, the Maritime provinces and even in the wealthy province of British Columbia will be substantially more than 12 per cent, a figure which none of us ought to accept.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the previous speakers have extolled the merits of education for young people. In fact, those who have remained longer in schools or universities should enjoy much greater advantages than others.

This is indeed the tune played by the government and para-governmental agencies such as the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Canada Manpower Centre and the Economic Council of Canada.

The annual reports of the Economic Council of Canada have first praised the merits of education, as evidenced by the following statement recorded on page 71 of the Second Annual Report of this agency:

> It has been long recognized that education possesses intrinsic value as a factor enhancing the quality and enjoyment of life of individuals, as well as the quality and energy of a whole society.

But the report goes further in recognizing that education also has economic aspects, the nature and dimensions of which are just beginning to make their importance felt.

According to the Economic Council of Canada, the establishment and maintenance of a high rate of economic growth is one of the primary objectives of all industralized countries.

In its first report, the Economic Council of Canada states that, to have a high rate of economic growth, all productive resources, both physical and human, must be used and that the growth of the Canadian economy is dependent upon the quantity and the quality of the resources used, that is, first of all, labour, both quantatively and qualitatively, and, finally, a rational use of available capital.

• (9:10 p.m.)

In its second annual review, the Economic Council of Canada noted the progress made in the 1950-60 decade with regard to the productivity and growth of the Canadian economy. We may read on page 71 the following:

> Among the factors contributing substantially to the rate of growth of real income per capita over this period have been: Labour Input—There has been a substantial improvement in the quality of labour associated with a rising level of formal education.

Further, at page 68 of this review, progress realized in Canada in the field of education is compared with progress made in the United States and it is thought that this will be in favour of Canadians.

Here is how this reads:

> A rising level of educational attainment is, therefore, likely to be a much more important factor in economic growth in Canada over the next two decades than over the past two decades. Moreover, there may well be some narrowing of the gap in educational levels between Canada and the United States during the coming decade.

And further, the review points out that the real average income of Canadians in 1961, compared with 1911, was higher by a quarter from what it would have been had not the level of education increased.

In the review, a statement made by the late President Kennedy is quoted in support of the argument that education affects the income level of the people. The extract from President Kennedy's message to Congress on January 29, 1963, reads as follows:

> This nation is committed to greater investments in economic growth; and recent research has shown that one of the most beneficial of all such investments is education, accounting for some 40 per cent of the nation's growth in productivity . . . It is an investment which yields a substantial return in the higher wages and purchasing power of trained workers, in the new products and techniques which come from skilled minds, and in the constant expansion of this nation's storehouse of useful knowledge.

Those are words that every Canadian politician would have liked to have uttered if present experience did not demonstrate that the increase in the number of skilled workers and the level of education has had practically no effect on the vitality of Canada's economy which readily does without the qualifications and the will to work of new graduates since it does not hire them, and finally that the increase in the number of educated workers is not reflected by an improvement in the general standard of living of Canadians.

In this regard, Dr. Arthur J. Smith, President of the Economic Council of Canada, in the course of a lecture he delivered in Montreal to representatives of the North American Society for Corporate Planning, stated that the rate of growth must not only be continuous and quantitatively high, but also of a quality appropriate to the country's needs. According to Dr. Smith, some four billion dollars are being wasted in Canada, which are not reflected by new products. We are not progressing as we should because a large number of our young people are not now employed in production.

According to the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada there is a gap between the possibilities and the present growth rate of the economy.

The immediate result is an increase in unemployment. On the other hand there is a reduction in the growth rate of productivity, in the average working hours of employed people, a decrease in the rhythm of creation of jobs with respect to the increasing number of people who enter the labour market. There is a decrease in the production rhythm in various industries with respect to their capacity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those figures give us food for thought. Those are the hopes which were given to young people, to young Canadians who made sacrifices to get educated. But reality is quite different.

On December 10, 1970, figures were published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on the unemployment situation in Canada during the month of November, on the current number of unemployed workers and in particular on the number of younger workers of the 18-24 age group at present unemployed. According to those figures, the unemployment rate at the end of November had jumped to 5.7 per cent from its 5 per cent position at the end of October. The total number of unemployed in Canada had increased by 57,000 in November. This increase is especially noticeable in the 18-24 age group, taking into account the fact that by the end of November 1970, there were 66,000 more young workers unemployed in Canada as compared with November 1969.

I have in hand a more comprehensive study of the unemployment situation of our younger workers as published in the DBS monthly bulletin. Let me quote the statistics for the third quarter of 1970, compared with the corresponding quarter of 1969:

UNEMPLOYMENT BY AGE GROUPS

	1970	1969	Rate
14-19	131,000	93,000	5.3	3.8
20-24	99,000	61,000	12.5	9.2

So these are significant increases if we compare the two corresponding quarters of 1969 and 1970. And if we go further in this study, we see that unemployment is higher among young people from 14 to 24 years of age than for all other groups of workers.

Here are other statistics showing that this problem is not restricted to the third quarters of the years 1969 and 1970. Here are the figures for one particular week, that of June 22, for the years 1968, 1969 and 1970, among young people aged 14 to 19:

Number of Unemployed Ages 14 to 19		Rate of Unemployment
June 22, 1968	153,000	15.6%
June 22, 1969	144,000	14.6%
June 20, 1970	180,000	17.7%

Mr. Speaker, whether educated or not, our youth is doomed to unemployment. Such are the conclusions from the statistics I have just cited and which were mentioned in the specialized magazine Supply and Demand, and I quote:

Short-term forecasts are most pessimistic. Even though federal authorities refuse to make any comment on the situation, experts assert that the labour market for new graduates will be practically non-existent in the spring.

Here is another excerpt from a recent issue of the same magazine:

—that the number of openings for young graduates has increased by only 3.4 per cent since 1969 while the number of graduates has increased by 10 per cent during the same period. Thus the gap is widening and experts do not forecast any improvement in the foreseeable future.

In Quebec, the situation is hardly any better than in Canada as a whole. In this regard, the Economic Council of Canada thinks that la Belle Province will have created only 3,000 new jobs in 1970 while universities and junior colleges will inundate the labour market with over 16,000 graduates in 1971, up 22 per cent from last year—

According to the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, a short term solution would be to increase by 5 per cent the rate of economic growth in Canada.

It seems that it is in the field of pure sciences that the most serious problems exist. This year, the demand for scientists in every branch decreased by 22 per cent. Interest in scientific research must be encouraged without delay in the private sector if the situation is to improve.

In the field of arts, we also note a decline that varies between 15 and 30 per cent. The market for holders of master's degrees has also gone down by about 20 per cent. Finally, students entering the labour market with doctor's degrees have seen their job opportunities drop by 25 per cent in the last twelve months.

Some experts even say that the university students who are pursuing advanced studies in literature, social sciences and psychology made hopeless options, having regard to future needs.

Engineering students are those who are the least affected by the lack of skilled jobs, although there are also disparities in that area. Job opportunities in engineering have increased by 12 per cent in 1970 and the number of graduates by 15.4 per cent in the same period.

That is the way things are, Mr. Speaker. Those are the conditions experienced by the young people between 18 and 24 who are graduating from colleges and universities. That is the dead-end awaiting the young Canadians who made the necessary sacrifices to obtain a sound training and who cannot find any outlet for their energies, their talent and their knowledge, which would be so useful to the country to help all people enjoy a higher standard of living, to the extent of our material and human resources.

But such is not the case. Thousands of Canadian families are deprived of the bare minimum, while stores and warehouses are glutted with all kinds of goods that could satisfy the essential needs of all Canadian families.

Mills are closing down or are operating below capacity while Canadians, especially young people between 18 and 24, who are ready to devote their efforts and skills to the Canadian community, so that it may take advantage of their knowledge, are compelled to remain idle, unproductive and even in certain cases, to live at the expense of the State.

However, Mr. Speaker, there remains so much to be done in this country. I feel that we should do the utmost to enable those young people to put their talents to good use.

We need housing, schools and universities. Many ridings and small towns are not yet equipped with community centres or homes for retired people.

In certain areas, improved transportation would be required to move goods to larger centres. We also need community centres, libraries, and God knows what.

A great deal of energy is wasted every year because our young people from 18 to 24, who have had more schooling than earlier generations, are unemployed and do not produce. If the present production system was soundly and realistically financed, it would be possible to achieve all these objectives.

To further production and provide more well-being to all Canadians, the government should agree to the motion introduced by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), in order to support total demand through increased purchasing power, especially in the hands of the people who need it more in our society.

During this debate, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) praised the programs now in operation. He said that we must have faith in the future.

We do have faith in the future, but the programs in force up to now have failed to provide our young people with work which would allow them to earn a living and have the country benefit from their capabilities and their education, which we gave them at the cost of many sacrifices.

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this allotted day on the subject of youth unemployment. Subject to certain reservations, I congratulate the Créditiste party for bringing this subject before the House for the attention of all Canadians. Although everyone in this House realizes the seriousness of the situation with regard to youth unemployment, it is my intention to make a few remarks on the subject of youth development in this nation of ours which, if it showed serious concern, would overcome the unemployment disease with which we are faced.

This government of ours keeps repeating, with obvious pomposity, that the opposition has been weak in providing alternatives to some of the programs of the government. They have been asking us to provide some ideas to be used in their consideration of policy for the betterment of our nation. But unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, again the government uses meaningless words for political gain, instead of upholding their stand on utilizing Parliament in order to reach the objectives involving the common good of the 22 million citizens, both old and young, of our nation.

On two occasions in the past month I stood in this House and offered common sense ideas which would overcome the unemployment situation with regard to our youth. One one occasion I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) if he would consider the reintroduction of special militia training programs similar to the ones introduced in 1961 by the Progressive Conservative government of the day. At that time a series of militia training programs were initiated to overcome the unemployment situation in Canada and, at the same time, to afford a cross-section of our young citizens a training program to assist in the civil defence program which held a priority in the thinking of our military minds of the day.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the minister couldn't have cared less and discounted the suggestion which I had offered respectfully and earnestly. All I did was prove the attitude of this government toward the parliamentary system and toward recognizing worth-while ideas or suggestions that happened to come from the official opposition.

In my speech in reply to the Speech from the Throne I suggested the creation of a ministry of youth development which, to my mind and to the minds of many Canadians in this nation, should be treated as a priority. It is so obvious that over the years we have neglected the youth of our country to whom we look for our future leaders. This neglect has brought about our experiencing hostility and rebellion. Instead of that, we could have been achieving a participation and an involvement which in the end would have accomplished the goals of producing a better Canadian nation through the leadership of our youth.

The example of where our Canadian leaders have come from has escaped the attention of our supposed leaders. I refer to the remote areas of our country which continue to be neglected in favour of professorial thinking to the effect that the object of the exercise is to take all people from the remote areas of Canada and throw them into the Montreals, Torontos and Vancouvers. It is strange, to my way of thinking that at the drop of a hat this government can find the moneys that will allow a few of our better athletes to compete in order that a few medals may be won by a few, while the many thousands in the remote areas of Canada who require a few pennies to develop their bodies are left unrecognized. Why do we look for gold medals for a few, when for the same cost we can realize the development of the majority who can contribute to the betterment of our citizens of the future.

Sooner or later, Mr. Speaker, we must realize that the Canadian nation must recognize the value of all our youth. Instead of concentrating in our "one-rut mind" on the idea that those in the more affluent cities can produce the championships that we are looking for, we ought to recognize the value of over-all youth development. Instead of Information Canada, let us establish a "Youth Development Canada". I say, let us not waste the potential of our young people in the remote areas of Canada just because they do not happen to have the advantage of living in the more affluent provinces.

We have had examples of hostility and rebellion in the province of Quebec. We have seen the results of hostility and rebellion; the results were the murder of those who are dedicated to the preservation of our nation. Yet we fail to recognize what we who are Members of Parliament have strived for, the importance of the preservation of our society no matter whether we be French or English or from any other ethnic group of our society.

The majority of Canadians have supported this government in its decisions on the preservation of our federal society. The future of our nation is in our youth. Let us contribute some of the bulk of our affluence to the preservation of our youth, for the better future of our Canadian nation. Not too long ago I suggested to the Minister of National Defence that he, together with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) should give serious consideration to preserving our society by introducing a program to involve the youth of our country through special militia training programs. That would alleviate the unemployment situation which exists in our country. Such a program should provide, for the initiative of our youth, a contribution to training under leadership. Our society should be preserved through programs which assist in the support of civil law and order. It should provide a sense of participation. Our youth should be allowed to contribute to the security of our nation. Such a program would create an involvement of our youth to acquire leadership qualities and a sense of purpose in the future of our nation.

I followed up my sincere contribution to the government in a "late show" debate in this House. As is usual, I received a lip service answer about what the government is doing to provide for the youth of the country. The government is only providing for a few, Mr. Speaker. At the drop of a hat the government will provide hundreds of thousands of dollars to help a hockey team try to win a medal or championship in Europe. I have asked the government many times to provide funds for the thousands of our youth who cannot provide for themselves because of lack of community participation or government contributions. This would help them become better citizens. The answers are not too quick in coming forward.

I sincerely ask the government to provide a base for developing our nation through the youth of our country. At this time when new ministries and portfolios are being created, I plead with the government to make a most important contribution to our nation—the establishment of a department of youth development. If such a department were established, the experts in our defence department and other experts could ensure a proper, progressive development of the youth, our future leaders. We must be sincere when we say we want our youth to participate and become involved. We must provide in our budget for the educational, sociological and leadership qualities to ensure the preservation of our future. There must be a steady, progressive approach so that Canada will be as great a country as we want it to be.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, during the few minutes still at our disposal on this memorable opposition day, that was in fact organized by the Ralliement créditiste, I shall try to be as brief as possible, in order to allow the House to grasp properly the most important point of our motion, and to co-operate with the government to improve the situation of our young Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first time since I have been in the House that a non-confidence motion draws so much interest. I am proud and quite happy that the mover is a member of the Ralliement créditiste, a very young man whose name I need not give, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

The remarks made this afternoon by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), who said the hon. member for Lotbinière was against education, were inaccurate. It is normal that as a father of 12 children, I should take part in this interesting debate to say how I am in favour of even more education for our young people.

Our motion is not at all against a higher degree of education, but is against the fact that the government failed to take the necessary steps to provide employment to the thousands of students coming out of school every year.

It is true that we have put all our eggs in one basket. All governments did the same anyway. But while earmarking millions of dollars for education, the government should have used as great an amount to promote the development of our natural resources and industrial development, so as to create more jobs for graduates at all levels.

A while ago the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue) pointed out the number of graduates entering the labour market each year. That was no exaggeration on his part. I have here the November 24, 1970, edition of the newspaper La Presse from Montreal. It is not a Créditiste newspaper as far as I know. One can read the following:

> The number of university graduates is increasing twice as fast as the number of available jobs.

That means that there is something wrong in our economic system, something that really prevents production from serving its purpose, so as to enable our industries to keep on operating, to improve in order to provide employment for those entering the labour market, to work towards new discoveries, to attempt to have the people benefit from the riches they are entitled to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first proposal of the Ralliement créditiste, often stated by Major Douglas, is that the people's purchasing power should be equal to the collective price to be paid for the consumer goods on sale.

It is a matter of achieving a purchasing power perfectly balanced between prices that consumers must pay and the money they have in their hands. In other words, the proposition of Major Douglas providing for the compensated discount is no more and no less than a regulator like the one used formerly to regulate steam-powered engines. It was a kind of contraption operated by centrifugal force and whose role was to make the engine turn faster when the energy demand was greater, and slower when demand decreased.

It was the regulator which kept a constant balance between the energy required and the reserve kept under pressure in the boiler.

Same thing in economics. We need a regulator which will always take into account the productive possibilities and the needs of the whole nation in order to ensure a constant balance between that possibility of production and the needs of the consumers. The regulator in the Creditiste system is the compensated discount.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, we are sometimes asked to elaborate on what we mean by the issue of credit to increase the purchasing power in order that there would be continuity in production, and that this production may reach consumption. This is a dividend. What is a dividend? This is no Creditiste invention. Certain ministers receive dividends from companies where they are shareholders. Do they refuse these dividends? Absolutely not. What are their dividends? They are the profits distributed to the shareholders who have put capital into companies. And they are called capital dividends.

It is the same within a cooperative when several persons get associated for some kind of business and if there is a surplus at the end of the year it is distributed among members.

And since in our society we are getting associated to live better, to share our work, our intellectual and human resources, it is quite normal that at the end of the year we draft the balance sheet of our operations. If we have a surplus it should be distributed to the community.

This is why it is called a dividend. Its purpose is to have the whole of society benefit from surpluses accumulated for generations and from the work of those who permitted these surpluses to be useful to someone and to keep our economic system running for all to enjoy. Nothing scandalous about that.

Mr. Speaker, when I am asked: "But have you got any other proposals?" I reply by simply reading the conclusion of a conference given in Ottawa in 1936 by the Dean of the Economics and Political Science Faculty of Laval University, and I quote:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) continues to abuse the voting procedure in this House by walking in and out of the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the rules are quite clear on this. No member, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair is quite aware of the point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) but I must bring to his attention that in the opinion of the Chair nobody came into the chamber while the vote was being taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): This gives the Chair a good opportunity to bring to the attention of hon. members that the rule provides that no one should enter the chamber while a vote is being taken, but this rule does not prevent hon. members from coming in between votes.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

• (10:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Does the hon. member wish to express a further opinion?

An hon. Member: I hope so.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if the bums and idiots will be quiet now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair has another responsibility, which is to maintain and ensure decorum in this House. The Chair would appreciate it if the hon. member would make his point clearly.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the case: Your Honour has to look after the decorum of the House and when a member walks in, no matter whether he holds office in the cabinet or not, he is violating the rules of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I must remind the hon. member that the decision has been made on that point. If the hon. member does not mind, the House will carry on with the voting.

The question is on the amendment to the main motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I declare the motion lost.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) and (B), 1970-71

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B) of the sums required for the service of Canada for the year ending on the 31st March 1971, placed before the House on November 17th and December 4th, 1970, respectively, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-211, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1971, be read the first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-211, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

On clause 2—$465,312,758 granted for 1970-71.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

Schedule B agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Drury moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, so there may be no misunderstanding, I should like the leader of the House to indicate the business for tomorrow and the next day.

• (10:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall begin with the bill respecting statistics of Canada, followed by the bill respecting packaging and labelling, the bill respecting weights and measures, the omnibus loans bill, the bill respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company, the anti-dumping bill and the bill in respect of Deuterium of Canada Limited. If we succeed in passing those bills, we shall take the bill respecting the Old Age Security Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.33 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 16, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PRIME MINISTER EDWARD HEATH OF GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. Speaker: May I seek the indulgence of the House to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a most distinguished visitor, the Right Hon. Edward Heath, Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Canadian Parliament owes a great deal in its traditions and in its constitution to the British House of Commons; that is one of the many reasons why we extend so warm a welcome to the Prime Minister today. As he surveys our proceedings he will note at once the affinity between this House and the House of Commons at Westminster, of which he is such an illustrious member.

Mr. Heath has had a most distinguished parliamentary and public career, having occupied two of the great offices of Parliament, namely, those of the Leader of the Opposition and Prime Minister, leaving only that of the Speaker to be achieved.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (2.10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: He has had a notable record in wartime and has made a significant contribution to the public life of England and the Commonwealth. We welcome him as one of our own and wish him a pleasant, productive and happy stay, brief as it may be, in our country.

[Translation]

It is with great pleasure, Mr. Prime Minister, that we welcome you in this country. All the members of this House hope that you will soon be back in Canada for a longer stay.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

IMPORTS DURING INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES ACT

PROHIBITION OF IMPORTATION OF SIMILAR PRODUCTS BY COMPANIES INVOLVED IN STRIKES

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-212, respecting the importation of goods produced by corporations engaged in industrial disputes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Broadbent: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to prevent corporations in Canada which are involved in strikes from importing products essentially similar to those which they manufacture pending settlement of that strike. Although this principle has general relevance it is of particular concern to those industries involved in free trade pacts such as the auto pact. On that subject, Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to inform the House that a short while ago I was informed that a tentative agreement has been reached between the United Automobile Workers of Canada and General Motors.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ENCOURAGEMENT OF RETURN OF PROFESSIONALS TO CANADA

Question No. 9—Mr. Nowlan:

What active and concrete steps to encourage Canadian professionals in the social sciences, humanities and the arts, presently resident abroad to return to this country, have been taken by the Canada Council?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: Most Canada Council programs have this effect since they are meant to create better conditions and more opportunities in this country for Canadian professionals in the arts, humanities and social sciences. For example, the orchestras and the opera, theatre and dance companies which receive Council grants offer employment to Canadian artists, and the Council's research grants and leave fellowships to faculty members in the humanities and social sciences contribute to making Canadian universities more attractive places of employment for Canadian scholars. The Council is now conducting a study to determine where and in what numbers recent holders of its doctoral fellowships are employed. It has in addition recently published a directory of Council-assisted doctoral students who are near completion of their studies for distribution to universities and other potential employers in Canada.

GRAIN—RESPONSIBILITY FOR PAYMENT OF FREIGHT RATES

Question No. 17—Mr. Skoberg:

What written regulation or agreement is in effect, which spells out that the grain producer is responsible for the payment of freight rates to either Thunder Bay or Vancouver?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister Responsible for The Canadian Wheat Board): Under the terms of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, sections 25 and 35, and the Regulations made thereunder, the Canadian Wheat Board shall pay to producers selling and delivering wheat, oats or barley produced in the designated area to the Board, a sum certain per bushel basis in store Thunder Bay or Vancouver. Since the purchase of these grains is basis Thunder Bay or Vancouver the producer is responsible for transportation costs.

CONSUMER PURCHASING POWER OF 1949 DOLLAR

Question No. 33—Mr. Mather:

In terms of consumer purchasing power, what percentage of the 1949 dollar has been lost in the intervening years?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: The Consumer Price Index for Canada (1949=100) stood at 168.3 for October 1970. On the basis of this index movement, the purchasing power of the dollar spent on consumer goods and services in October 1970, in terms of the 1949 dollar, would be 59 cents. The decline in the purchasing power of the consumer dollar since 1949, therefore, would amount to 41 per cent.

DAWSON CITY HISTORIC SITE—DISAPPEARANCE OF ARTIFACTS

Question No. 151—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Are artifacts disappearing from the Dawson City Historic Site?

2. Has the government investigated this continuing loss of priceless historic treasures?

3. What action has the government taken to (a) stop the flow (b) deal with the offenders?

4. What remedies are available to the government in the matter?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Artifacts are not disappearing from National Historic Sites in Dawson City owned by the Department. There have, however, been instances where items have been removed from unoccupied Crown land and private property.

2. During the past summer, two cases where offenders had removed articles from Crown land have been investigated by the R.C.M.P. with the result that the articles removed were returned to the Territory.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

3. Action is taken whenever possible, but it is extremely difficult to protect artifacts or to prosecute the offenders when articles are taken from privately owned property and unoccupied Crown land.

4. In instances where the owner of the property can be identified and ownership can be established, it would be possible to initiate prosecution under the Criminal Code. The continued vigilance of the R.C.M.P. and the cooperation of local residents are the primary remedies available.

ALLOWANCES AND EXPENDITURES CLAIMED BY OIL, GAS AND MINING COMPANIES

Question No. 185—Mr. Harding:

1. What is the total amount of depletion allowances claimed by (a) oil and natural gas companies (b) all other mining companies in each year 1966 to 1969?

2. What is the total amount of exploration and development expenditures claimed for tax purposes by (a) oil and gas companies (b) all other mining companies for each of the same years?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: 1. The total amount of depletion allowances claimed is as follows:

	(a) Oil and Natural Gas Companies	(b) Other Mining Companies
	$ million
1966	68.4	110.2
1967	61.3	111.3
1968	68.2	109.1
1969	not available	not available

2. The total amount of exploration and development expenditures claimed for tax purposes is as follows:

	(a) Oil and Natural Gas Companies	(b) Other Mining Companies*
1966	521.6	181.5
1967	557.3	209.1
1968	626.5	209.9
1969	not available	not available

* Figures do not include exploration and development expenditures claimed for tax purposes by companies that had some mining activities, but whose principal business was in other fields. These expenditures were as follows: $ million, 1966, 19.4; 1967, 44.7; 1968, 63.4; 1969, not available.

TRADE—BEEF PROMOTION

Question No. 273—Mr. Southam:

1. What initiative is the government taking to penetrate the Japanese beef market in view of the rapid increase of consumption of beef in that country over the past several years?

2. Can the government indicate what special action is being taken to stimulate beef sales in other areas of the world?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Following an initial survey of the market by its Trade Commissioner Service, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce sponsored a show and exhibition of beef quality and grades in Japan in late 1968. This was followed by a Canadian Food Fair in early 1969 where meat products were exhibited. A mission to Canada of a group of Japanese meat industry representatives in October and November, 1969, was sponsored by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, during which Japanese officials were shown Canadian meat production from the ranch to the table. In the fall of 1970, in conjunction with a large departmental store in Tokyo, a promotion of Canadian products is being held which will feature Canadian meat products. In early 1971, a promotion directed to the hotel and restaurant trade, and featuring beef products specifically, is being planned. This promotion will take place in Tokyo and Osaka.

2. A meat trade study was conducted in Europe early in 1970 by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the results of which are presently being published and are scheduled to be released within a few weeks. This study covered the major meat importing countries of Europe. On the United States' and Caribbean markets, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has participated in a variety of food shows and has assisted Canadian exporters in establishing contacts with importers in these areas.

PERCENTAGE OF BUDGET FOR RESEARCH PURPOSES

Question No. 303—Mr. Robinson:

What percentage of the total budget is allocated for research purposes of one kind and another?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): General reply for the Public Service at large: Data pertaining to expenditures on scientific activities in the physical, engineering and life sciences are collected annually by DBS. This compilation includes expenditures identified functionally under Physical Sciences Research and those expenditures on scientific activities in support of other functions. In 1970-71, funds allocated to scientific activities account for approximately 5.8 percent of the budgetary Main Estimates. Complete data pertaining to expenditures on scientific activities in the social sciences are not available, but expenditures functionally identified under Social Science Research, account for approximately 0.4 percent of the 1970-71 budgetary Main Estimates.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES TRANSPORTATION STUDY

Question No. 314—Mr. Comeau:

Has the overall study of transportation requirements for the Atlantic Provinces been completed and, if not, when is it expected to be completed?

Mr. Gerard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Region Transportation submitted its initial report in May of this year. The report recommendations dealing primarily with disposition of the M.F.R.A. intra-select territory rail subsidy have been accepted in large measure and action to implement the recommended changes is in hand. It has been proposed that the Committee continue to function; as soon as representation on the Committee has been confirmed by the provinces involved, it is expected that further meetings will be scheduled. The work of the Committee, therefore, is ongoing.

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE STUDY

Question No. 327—Mr. Fortin:

1. What is the status of studies concerning the possibility of creating a Canadian merchant marine?

2. Is the feasibility study conducted by Hedlin, Menzies and Associates Ltd. completed and, if not, what is the anticipated completion date?

3. Will the studies be Tabled in the House of Commons and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Gerard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. A report prepared by Hedlin Menzies and Associates Ltd., in conjunction with George C. Sharp Inc., on the economic feasibility of developing a Canadian merchant marine will be submitted to the Canadian Transport Commission by the end of the year.

2. See Answer to Part 1.

3. Consideration will be given to tabling the report when it is submitted to the government.

NON-AGGRESSION PACT BETWEEN NORTH AND SOUTH KOREA

Question No. 349—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the advisability of urging the United Nations to explore fully North Korea's proposal of the non-aggression pact?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Government is cognizant of the proposals of the North Korean authorities in Pyongyang for a non-aggression pact between the governments of North and South Korea. Similar proposals in slightly varying form have been put forward on a number of occasions in recent years, most recently in June 1970.

Common to all of the North Korean proposals for a non-aggression pact is the pre-condition of prior withdrawal of all foreign troops, i.e. U.N. forces, from the Korean peninsula. Canada is a member of the "Participating Nations Advisory Group" to the United Nations Command in Korea and the Canadian Government is in agreement with the Government of the Republic of Korea that such a pre-condition to negotiation is unacceptable at this time—at least until North Korea demonstrates by its official statements and its actions that it is seriously interested in peaceful co-existence with its southern neighbour.

The Government believes that there is perhaps more merit in the proposals for Korean re-unification made by President Park Chung-hee of the Republic of Korea in his statement of August 15, 1970. Unfortunately the Pyongyang regime has dismissed these proposals out-of-hand.

Both sets of proposals were considered in some detail in the report of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea (UNCURK) which was submitted to the Secretary General of the United Nations on September 14, 1970 for consideration by the twenty-fifth session of the General Assembly.

On the question of unification, the report expressed the belief of the Commission that, while there has been no substantial change in the position of the Republic of Korea or the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (North Korea), the views of both have been further clarified and defined by recent statements. The Report noted that both sides continued to adhere to their fixed positions and that there would appear to be little possibility in the foreseeable future that these positions would be varied. Nevertheless, the Commission declared it would remain receptive to any proposal which would permit it to fulfil a more effective function in respect of unification. It also pointed out that, while the Government of the Republic of Korea has repeatedly affirmed its adherence to the objectives of the United Nations, North Korea continues to deny the competence of the United Nations to deal with the Korean question and continues to challenge the role of the Commission in carrying out its mandate. In the Assembly debate on the Korean question this autumn, Canada co-sponsored and voted in favour of a resolution extending the life and mandate of UNCURK. This resolution received the support of a majority of the members.

NATIONAL SECURITY—FACILITIES FOR HOUSING ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL DURING RECENT CRISIS

Question No. 364—Mr. Coates:

Were additional facilities leased by the federal government for the housing of Armed Forces and RCMP personnel as a result of the request for Armed Forces personnel by the Government of the Province of Quebec and the decision by the federal government to use additional RCMP in the Province of Quebec and, if so (a) from whom were such facilities leased (b) for what period of time (c) at what cost?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Solicitor General as follows: No additional facilities were leased for housing Canadian Armed Forces' personnel. Canadian Forces' Bases were used to support the influx of troops and a number of armouries were opened or temporarily taken over to house Regular Force personnel. In a few instances temporary duty was authorized for lodging and meals in areas where no service facilities were available. No additional facilities were leased for housing Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel.

UNITED STATES NAVIGATION REGULATIONS

Question No. 397—Mr. Rowland:

1. Do American navigation regulations, as applied to the American locks at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, prevent the vessels of any of Canada's trading partners from entering any of Canada's Great Lakes ports and, if so (a) which ports (b) the vessels of which nations are affected?

[Mr. Sharp.]

2. If the movement of the vessels of some of Canada's trading partners in the Great Lakes are restricted by American navigation regulations, has the Canadian Government made representations to the Government of the United States in this regard?

3. What was the nature of the representations?

4. What was the nature of the response of the Government of the United States to the representations?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In so far as the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority is concerned: 1. The U.S. Code of Federal Regulations (specifically Section 207.441 of Title 33) covering security regulations for the St. Marys Falls Canal and Locks prohibits passage of "vessels of the Sino-Soviet block countries" through the Soo Locks. This would appear to prevent passages of vessels from these countries via United States waters to all Canadian ports on Lake Superior.

2. No. The issue has not yet arisen inasmuch as no Soviet vessels have ever applied to proceed past Sarnia.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

DR. OLIVE ROBERTSON

Question No. 418—Mr. Robinson:

Has Dr. Olive Robertson been refused entry to Canada and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Department of Manpower and Immigration has been unable to locate any record of an application for entry to Canada having been submitted by a Dr. Olive Robertson.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION—EMPLOYMENT RESPONSIBILITIES

Question No. 424—Mr. McCleave:

1. Has the Public Service Commission delegated its employment responsibilities in the past three years to officers of various departments in (a) promotional fields (b) non-promotional fields?

2. In what areas are departments given the authority to make appointments from the open market?

3. If the answer to Part 1(a) or 1(b) is in the affirmative, what was the rationale for such a decision?

4. Has an estimate been made as to the added cost, if any, of such delegation in terms of advertising, travel of examining boards, travel of candidates, and time taken up of departmental people involved in such decisions?

5. What will be the impact of such delegation on the career prospects of public servants.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: (a) Yes. (b) Yes.

2. Subject to the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act and to a requirement to obtain referrals from Canada Manpower Centres, most of the major departments and agencies have been given authority to make appointments from the open market in: (a) all groups in the Administrative Support Category. (b) all groups in the Operational Category except the Correctional Group. A number of major departments have been given authority subject to certain limitations, to make appointments from the open market in the Administrative Services Group and the Program Administration Group of the Administrative and Foreign Service Category.

3. The Commission's decision regarding delegation of authority took into consideration: the maintenance of the merit principle in the making of appointments; consideration of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Government organization; consideration of the recommendations of the Preparatory Committee on Collective Bargaining in the Public Service of Canada; consideration of the deliberations of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service of Canada; consideration of special studies carried out by the Commission's staff on means of optimizing the effectiveness of the staffing function.

4. No.

5. None.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL AUTOMATION

Question No. 445—Mr. Forrestall:

1. At what stage are government plans with respect to automation in our air traffic control systems?

2. What planning is being done now with respect to post 1980 air traffic control systems?

3. Has the government evaluated as yet the studies resulting from the trial operations of Univac's ARTS 111 system and, if so, when might a decision be made to adopt this flexible automated system for Canadian use?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Planning is in progress to define air traffic control systems improvements incorporating a significant degree of automation for use both in terminal and enroute air traffic control.

2. The present planning for the introduction of automation into ATC is being conducted so that requirements for the latter half of the 1970's may be further extended into the 1980's in a manner which will permit the use of the latest techniques available that will meet the needs of the users at that time and provide the best ATC system available.

3. Representatives of the Ministry have been closely following the activities of the FAA in their developments of terminal automation systems (ARTS) I, II, and III and are currently conducting detailed studies of the ARTS III system. Present planning is to introduce a system similar to the ARTS III for the new Montreal International Airport and for the Toronto International Airport in 1973.

SMITHS FALLS—PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION OFFICE SPACE

Question No. 468—Mr. Francis:

1. Did the Public Service Commission engage space in Marina Hotel in Smiths Falls within the past three years and, if so, how much space was taken and what were the annual rentals?

2. Was the space redecorated for this purpose and, if so, were there any charges to the government and how much?

3. Are there any plans for continued use of this space by the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Yes. Forty-eight rooms. An annual rental was not paid by the Public Service Commission. Room rentals for forty rooms have been pro-rated to include meals and eight rooms for use as office, library, seminar rooms, lecture rooms, dining room and lounge at the rate of $20.00 per night, Monday to Friday and $11.75 per night for Saturdays and Sundays. Candidates from various departments, paid room charges in normal motel fashion, through individual departmental funds. The motel was used for thirty-six weeks each course year under direct arrangements with the Public Service Commission for the Management Course for the Career Assignment Program.

2. Redecorating was done by the owner. No funds were expended by the lessee for this purpose.

3. There are no plans for continued use of this space, in so far as the Public Service Commission is concerned.

CANADIAN MILITARY BASES TREATMENT PLANTS

Question No. 478—Mr. Godin:

Are Canadian military bases equipped with a treatment plant, and (a) if so, which ones (b) if not, are there projects of this kind and for which bases?

[Translation]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Except for the following, all Canadian military bases are either provided with a sewage treatment plant or, where feasible, connected to a municipal sewage system. The following installations do not have sewage treatment facilities: Massett, B.C., stuides are in hand to develop a regional system to meet municipal and federal needs; Esquimalt, B.C., work is to start in 1971 to incorporate with a new regional system; Shearwater, N.S., engineering studies are now in progress; Bedford, N.S., engineering studies are now in progress; Shannon Park, N.S., a study is in hand and consideration is being given to incorporating with the Dartmouth system.

Motion No. 83—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by W. R. Wright on departmental information programs undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that in response to his earlier motion this year the minister was unable to table this study since the document referred to in this motion was commissioned as an internal study for departmental working purposes only. This study is confidential and I would ask the hon. member to kindly reconsider and withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CONSULTANT STUDY ON CANADIAN COMMUNICATIONS SATELLITE SYSTEMS

Motion No. 88—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Northern Electric Company Limited on Canadian Communications satellite systems undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member requested this report on March 11 last; however, its disclosure was prohibited by the agreement under which the company supplied this report to the government. Since that time the contract for Telesat has been awarded and I am therefore pleased now to be in a position to table the report.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR REGARDING CLAIMS TO OFFSHORE WATERS

Motion No. 141—Mr. Harding:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all memoranda, letters, etc., exchanged in 1965 between the United States Department of the Interior and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding claims to offshore waters.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the correspondence which the hon. member has asked for does not exist by reason of the fact that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources did not come into being until October 1, 1966. I would ask, therefore, that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Harding: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

RESULTS OF QUESTIONNAIRE CIRCULATED AMONG YOUNG CIVILIANS AND MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Motion No. 160—Mr. Forrestall:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the results of the questionnaire circulated among young civilians and young members of the Canadian Armed Forces during recent months.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence advises that the survey referred to is still in progress and returns are not yet complete. Statistical analysis can only begin when all returns are in. It is anticipated that this will not be before April 1, 1971. In the circumstances I wonder if the hon. member would be good enough to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Forrestall: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining Notices of Motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour who was here. I will await his return to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF CRUDE OIL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises out of the announcement by two leading oil companies, Imperial Oil Company and the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company, that they are raising the price of crude oil by 25 cents a barrel. Since it has been anticipated for some weeks that such an increase was to be announced, may I ask the minister if his department or the Prices and Incomes Commission has been looking into this matter? Can he give the House any report? If this matter has not been investigated, will the minister undertake to have an investigation made?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. member considers that the Prices and Incomes Commission fulfils a useful role in the economy by conducting such inquiries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: The commission has been looking at a number of fuel price increases. I am not positive that they have looked at the precise announcement to which the hon. member refers. I will determine whether that is the case.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the taxpayers are paying for the Prices and Incomes Commission, I thought we ought to find some work for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since representatives of the two companies in question have both stated that the increase in price is due to the greater access which has been obtained for Canadian oil into the American market, will the minister undertake a specific investigation to see whether the increased price is due to any increase in costs or whether it is due to the fact that the Canadian price is being tied arbitrarily to the price in the United States?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to refer that to the Prices and Incomes Commission. Of course, the general energy policy is normally the responsibility of the National Energy Board which does not report to me.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURES TO ASSIST INELIGIBLE UNEMPLOYED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I caught the Minister of Labour out of position. A few days ago I asked the Prime Minister whether certain actions would be taken because of the indication that approximately 70,000 unemployed persons in Canada are not eligible for unemployment insurance. The Minister of Labour has no doubt had an opportunity to study this question fully. Has the minister conducted an investigation into the reasons for this gap? What measures does he propose to take to lessen the obvious hardship that will result in the difficult winter ahead which even that very sanguine optimist, the Minister of Finance, forecasts?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will try to deal with all the questions raised. First of all, I think the precise figure of 77,000 was probably arrived at by subtracting the number of people eligible for unemployment insurance from those who are declared unemployed. This was in the month of November. I think the figures will be substantially reduced following the coming into effect of the seasonal benefits on December 1. What is the reason for the gap? Under the present law too many Canadians are not covered because of the fact that the present plan is not universal in scope. Many of those unemployed are not eligible for various reasons. They may be unemployed school teachers or unemployed politicians. In any event, they are not eligible for unemployment insurance. The Leader of the Opposition asked what we intend to do about this situation. We will be introducing a very progressive bill that will remove these inequalities.

Mr. Stanfield: Has a study been conducted to ascertain approximately how many of the more than 70,000 persons are ineligible for unemployment insurance because they do not qualify under existing conditions or have not worked the required amount of time this year?

Mr. Mackasey: Under the present Unemployment Insurance Act, Mr. Speaker, eligibility is fairly stringent. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will be happy to know that under the proposed legislation unemployed persons will be eligible after a period of eight weeks. In addition to helping the bulk of the 77,000 this will also help young people entering the work force for the first time.

Mr. Stanfield: As it is evident that the minister does not intend to take substantial action this winter, does he intend to make any recommendations to close the gap that obviously exists between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration inasmuch as it is clear that no one in the government has the specific responsibility of looking after the interests of these people?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Labour a supplementary question.

[Mr. Basford.]

As many of the 77,000 unemployed young people are ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits because they have not yet been on the labour market, can the hon. minister tell us whether he intends shortly to take action to enable these young people to live decently, in spite of the opposition expressed by the Progressive Conservative party and the New Democratic party last night in this House?

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I think the only way to remedy the defect in the present Act, which makes it virtually impossible for young people entering the work force for the first time to receive benefits, is to give speedy passage to the new legislation which will—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are now resuming the debate which raged all day yesterday.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

PRESENTATION OF AMENDING BILL

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Does the hon. minister believe he will soon be able to introduce in this House a bill providing for a revision of the Bankruptcy Act as he has been promising repeatedly over several years?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I know the hon. member is very interested in this matter and I am pleased to advise him that I anticipate tabling the report at eleven o'clock on Friday morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the statement made by the Minister of Justice of Quebec to the effect that he wants to fight the Mafia efficiently, does the hon. minister feel he can give the House the assurance that the new legislation will make it possible to fight the Mafia through deeds and not through mere wishes, pious wishes, as has been the case in the past with previous acts?

[English]

Mr. Basford: Over the last two years, since I have been minister, a great many improvements have been made in the Bankruptcy Act—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Basford: —but I am looking to the report which I shall be tabling on Friday to recommend other ways of revising the Bankruptcy Act to make it more effective in dealing with manipulation of the bankruptcy laws and fraudulent bankruptcies. I hope the report will have very useful recommendations to make on this subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: May I ask another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Since available figures reveal that the activities of the Mafia have increased more than fourfold over the past five years, does the minister believe his new legislation will be able to do away with that scourge?

[English]

Mr. Basford: I would hope that a revised Bankruptcy Act would prove more effective in dealing with the underworld, in so far as they deal in bankruptcies.

PENITENTIARIES

INCARCERATION OF YOUTHS CONVICTED OF NON-CAPITAL MURDER IN PRINCE ALBERT INSTITUTION RATHER THAN COMMON JAIL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice as Acting Solicitor General. It has to do with 13 youths from Calgary who, after a mass trial some weeks ago before Mr. Justice Primrose for the murder of one person, were found guilty of non-capital murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. An appeal has been launched but cannot proceed for a couple of months, and in the meantime they are being incarcerated in Prince Albert penitentiary. This is an unusual course to follow; they should be in a common jail in Alberta. Would the minister have this situation looked into? The members of the families of these young men are deeply concerned that their respective relatives should be in a penitentiary, associating in a top security institution with hardened criminals.

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): I will look into that matter immediately, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATES ON POTATOES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to assure the House that the railway companies are not about to greatly increase freight rates on potatoes moved from the Maritime provinces to Montreal, Toronto and other major markets?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, I did not follow the question. There was a bit of hubbub going on.

Mr. MacLean: I asked the minister whether he could assure the House that the railway companies are not in the process of greatly increasing freight rates on potatoes moved from the Maritime provinces to Montreal, Toronto and other major markets?

Mr. Jamieson: As the hon. member knows, I cannot personally give such an assurance. I have been advised by the railways that there is, I believe, a 4 per cent increase proposed and that this has been discussed with the various companies concerned and with the provinces concerned. I have a lengthy reply in response to my request to the railways for information on this matter, and I shall be glad to make it available to the hon. member. It may serve to clarify the situation for him.

Mr. MacLean: What action is the government going to take to compensate for the grave damage that will be suffered by the export potato industry because of the extraordinary increase in freight rates on potatoes moving to export points?

Mr. Jamieson: Here again, Mr. Speaker, I can only pass on to the House what I have been told by Canadian National, which is to the effect that part, at least, of the increase is due to a change in charges for cars. This change was not in effect before because it was not in effect in the United States, and it is necessary to keep a balance.

Since that time there has, as I understand it, been a charge in the United States and the charge in Canada is comparable. I am advised by the railways that the relative position remains the same. However, I have asked, as I have said, for a more detailed explanation. I have one explanation here now which I will be glad to send to the hon. member, but I will look into the matter further in order to get a more thorough explanation.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—IMPLEMENTATION OF PREMIERS' RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the minister has referred to yet another increase in Atlantic freight rates—I think this is the fifth in the last few years—is the minister now prepared to say whether or not he is considering implementing the recommendations of the four Atlantic province premiers on Atlantic transportation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question on previous occasions. I think it is a fact that a great many of those recommendations have already been implemented and others are in the process of being implemented. The committee involving the four Atlantic provinces and the federal government, as well, incidentally, as the province of Quebec, is still meeting on these questions and as individual ones are being studied they are being put into effect, the most recent example being the announcement that will be made in a day or two regarding an increased subsidy in terms of freight movements by truck. That was one of the recommendations. The matter is an ongoing one, but quite a few of the recommendations have already been implemented.

APPLICATION BY UNITED STATES RAILROAD TO MOVE BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether he has received a telegram from the United Transportation Union in Edmonton asking him whether he has taken any steps to prevent United States railroads from transporting coal from southern Alberta and British Columbia to Roberts Bank port in Vancouver?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received the wire. At least, I am assuming it is in my office because I did see a copy of it which the hon. member was good enough to send to me. I presume reference is being made to the application now before the Canadian Transport Commission made by the Kootenay and Elk Railroad. This is a judicial proceeding now, of course, and until the findings of the CTC are made known no further action by the government is possible.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SEARCHES AND ARRESTS UNDER PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has any information as to the number of searches and arrests, if any, which have been made by the combined police forces in Quebec since the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act came into effect almost two weeks ago.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add to the figures that I have given the House, but I can give the most recent figures, though I cannot segregate them as between the original regulations under the War Measures Act and the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act which is now in force. As of 1.30 two days ago, December 14, the number arrested was 456; rearrested, 2; released, 408; detained, 46. There is a discrepancy in the figures which can be explained by the fact that there were a few released on bail.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister be good enough to undertake to obtain a segregration of these figures so that the House may know, when he gets a chance to inform us tomorrow or the next day, how many of these arrests have taken place since the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act came into force? Would the minister also find out whether any searchers have been made under the new legislation since it came into force?

AIR CANADA

CREW TRAINING PROGRAM FOR 747 PLANES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Transport inquire from Air Canada and advise the House whether Air Canada has decided to cancel its 747 crew training program in this country and, if so, whether the reason is the level of landing charges made by his department as well as the high level of tax on fuel in Canada, which means that the program will now be carried out in the United States?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will be glad to look into this matter, Mr. Speaker. I find the second part of the question a little incredible, but I will try to find out for the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is why I asked the question.

[Mr. Skoreyko.]

WATER RESOURCES

PEACE, SLAVE AND MACKENZIE RIVERS—ALLOCATION OF USE—APPLICATION UNDER NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT RESPECTING POWER DAMS ON PEACE RIVER

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Following the meetings at Yellowknife, and in light of the immediate requirement of coming to decisions regarding the use of the waters in the Peace, Slave and Mackenzie River systems, would the minister take it upon himself to convene a meeting with the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia to decide upon the allocation of use of those waters as between power production and transportation to the Arctic?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to bring the hon. member's reresentations to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the statement that the province of Alberta proposes to place two large power dams on the Peace River, has there been any application made to the minister under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act? If not, will the minister make certain that there is not a repetition of what took place in regard to the Bennett dam, when no application was made under that Act, in order to protect people living downriver?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with the hon. member's permission I will take that question as notice.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TASK FORCE STUDY OF PEACE-ATHABASCA DELTA

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister of fisheries. Could he inform the House when he expects the federal-provincial task force to study the Peace-Athabasca delta problem, and when does the minister expect a report on this study?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the task force will begin operation early in the new year and I hope we will have a preliminary report before the end of 1971.

Mr. Yewchuk: I wonder whether the minister could indicate if included in this study will be the question of power potential as well as pollution of Lake Athabasca?

Mr. Davis: The main concern is the environmental one, but power production will be another matter for consideration.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF STOL AIRCRAFT TO LINK REGIONAL AIRPORTS—NORDAIR OTTAWA-HAMILTON FLIGHT APPLICATION

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the Minister of Transport made any decision on the probable use of short take-off and landing aircraft, sometimes known as STOL aircraft, for linking up regional airports? Second, is it possible that we will soon hear whether the Nordair application in regard to flights between Ottawa and Mount Hope has been granted?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question of short take-off and landing aircraft, I can assure the hon. member that I am meeting with the industry, I believe within the next two days, because the industry has some proposals to make regarding STOL aircraft. On the matter of additional access to Ottawa from Hamilton, I am expecting a decision within a day or two and I have every reason to believe it will be favourable.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSULTATION BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC RESPECTING SECTION 80

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Prime Minister.

Following a decision made by the government of Quebec to introduce a bill to amend section 80 of the Canadian Constitution purporting to do away with the 17 "protected" constituencies without the agreement of the majority of members representing such electoral constituencies, I want to ask this question: has the government of Quebec consulted with the federal government on this issue? If so, has Ottawa agreed in principle that such an amendment be passed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the second part of the question, I can give a negative answer. There was no consultation and so there was no agreement from the central government.

The first part of the question deals with a constitutional and legal matter. Personally, I would think that this is an amendment to the internal constitution of the province of Quebec and that, in accordance with the first paragraph of section 92 of the Constitution, that province would be justified in making this amendment without the consent of the federal government or of the British government.

FARES BASED ON CANADIAN DOLLAR PEGGED AT 92 CENTS—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION FOR OVERCHARGING

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Now that the overcharging on Canadian fares for international travel has been removed by government involvement in the matter, will he follow up with the necessary action to ensure that compensation will be made available to Canadian consumers who were overcharged by some $4.5 million?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter in respect of which I will do what I did last time—refer it to my colleague, the Minister of Transport, who I am sure will be delighted to look into the problem.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATES ON POTATOES

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and I should like to revert to the question of potatoes. Has the minister been advised that the very existence of the potato industry may be threatened, especially in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, by the serious increase not only in transportation rates but also in handling charges, demurrage charges and other associated expenses in getting potatoes to the export market? Will he also examine the situation with a view to attempting to find some means to avert the serious consequences to this industry and our export trade in general which these increased charges may bring about?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has submitted his question in the form of a representation and he has to assume that it will be noted by the minister.

FREIGHT RATE LEVEL IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES—ACTION TO REMOVE DISCRIMINATION

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this appears to be a busy day for the Minister of Transport, and I too have a question for him. On November 4 I inquired of the minister what action the government was taking to rectify the problem of discriminatory high freight rates prevailing in western Canada. The minister replied that he had initiated talks with premiers and officials of the Prairie provinces with a view to obtaining their recommendations to improve this situation. Can the minister now advise the House on the progress, if any, that has been made toward solving this very serious problem?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that as a result of the type of consultation to which I referred in my earlier reply to the hon. member there have been some satisfactory changes or improvements in freight rates in regard, for example, to potash. On the broader question, as a result of representations made by the western provinces a group from my department is proceeding to western Canada as early as we can find an appropriate date convenient to representatives there, and I would assume discussions will continue at that level immediately following the beginning of the new year.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RETIRED EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS—ACTION TO IMPLEMENT COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION FOR INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport which is supplementary to a question and answer of last Friday. In view of the fact that Canadian National Railways has refused to consider any negotiations on pension matters with the result that the question is not now on the bargaining table, would he like to revise his answer of last Friday and assure the House that the government will urge the CNR to implement the recommendation agreed to unanimously by this House which called for increases in the pensions of retired CNR employees?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's intelligence service is a lot faster than mine. I have not been advised personally that this has occurred, but I shall be glad to look into it to see what the situation is now and advise my hon. friend later.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. In order to avoid labour strife in the railway movement I wonder whether the Minister of Labour might not lend a hand to the Minister of Transport in order to bring the CNR to its senses in regard—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Skoberg: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked his supplementary question. He cannot ask a further supplementary. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition but I believe the hon. member for Moose Jaw is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate being finally recognized after three weeks. At the same time I am wondering whether, in view of the fact Your Honour has allowed other hon. members on a number of occasions to rephrase their questions, I may be given the same consideration?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry whether he is now in a position to indicate to the House the position his government is taking with regard to the possible flooding of the Skagit Valley and, if not, will he assure the House that he will make a statement in the House before we recess for Christmas?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have made a certain recommendation to the government and action is being taken on it at the present time. I doubt, however, whether it will be possible to make a statement to the House before the recess.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister's Parliamentary Secretary and at least one member of the cabinet find it necessary to moonlight at the National Arts Centre's Nutcracker Suite ballet, will he give consideration to the early implementation of some of the recommendations of the Beaupré Commission report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as the government is concerned we hand this problem back to the Members of Parliament, and as far as I am concerned they can go and jump in the "Swan Lake".

NATIONAL SECURITY

IDENTITY OF QUEBEC TERRORISTS TRAINING IN PALESTINE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, if I can get government members out of Le Lac des Cygnes for a moment I should like to pose a question to the Acting Solicitor General. Can he tell the House whether the RCMP have established the identity of the two Quebec terrorists who have been training with the Feydayins in Palestine?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for the very civilized way in which he put his question. It has already been publicly reported that two self-proclaimed Quebec terrorists have been undergoing commando or guerrilla training by an underground military organization in the Middle East. To the best of my knowledge these people call themselves Selim—S-e-l-i-m—or Salim—S-a-l-i-m.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: Now that the minister has been able to obtain some information from the RCMP in this regard, can he tell the House whether he has any indication of any other countries, other than those in the Middle East, in which terrorists have been trained?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be in the public interest to speculate any further at this moment on this matter.

HEALTH

SAFETY DEVICES TO CONTROL EXHAUST EMISSIONS FROM PROPOSED NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Some weeks ago I asked the minister whether Canada had sought any assurance in respect of safety from the United States agencies which are planning to construct at least 20 or perhaps more nuclear generating plants along the shores of the Great Lakes during the 1970's.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: I wonder if the government and the minister would see fit, in view of the alarming studies that are coming to light now as a result of tests made on nuclear generating plants, to find some method of communicating to the United States authorities Canada's concern about the dangers of smoke and exhaust emissions from these nuclear generating plants?

Mr. Munro: I will be pleased to take that suggestion under advisement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SEIZURE OF CANADIAN FISHING VESSEL BY UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he in a position to indicate briefly now or perhaps by a statement on motions the circumstances regarding the seizure yesterday by United States authorities on Lake Erie of a Canadian fishing tug and crew, and whether representations will be made on their behalf?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian consulate in Cleveland has been following the situation closely. Immediately on learning yesterday of the arrest by Ohio state wildlife authorities of the Canadian tug The Liddle Brothers and its Canadian master and crew the consulate got in touch with Captain Liddle to ensure that he would have the services of legal counsel when the case came into court in Lorain, Ohio, today. Action was also taken to arrange for a consular officer to be present as an observer and to establish that while awaiting trial the Canadian fishermen are released on bail and allowed to stay aboard their vessel.

MINIMUM WAGES—SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE WITH CHATEAU LAURIER HOTEL EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether there are any developments he can report to the House concerning the case of the Chateau Laurier and other Canadian National hotels with regard to the payment of minimum wages?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I am pleased to announce that a settlement was reached about an hour ago between the Chateau Laurier and the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. I hope the settlement will include above-minimum wages. Because collective bargaining has achieved liveable wages does not change my opinion that this Crown corporation should abide by the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

TRANSFER OF AIRBRAKE REPAIRING FROM MONCTON TO MONTREAL

Mr. Guy Crossman (Westmorland-Kent): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister ask the CNR to reconsider its decision to transfer airbrake valve repair from Moncton to Montreal, which will mean 30 jobs less in the Moncton shops?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will be very glad to make that representation.

STUDY OF WEST GERMAN ECONOMIC POLICIES BY MINISTER ON TRIP TO EUROPE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that West Germany has a severe shortage of workers today while Canada has officially some 500,000 unemployed, did the Secretary of State for External Affairs have an opportunity to study the policies in effect at present in West Germany while he was in Europe recently in the hope that some of them may be implemented in Canada to ease our unemployment situation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): While I was in Germany I only had the opportunity to visit our base at Lahr. I did not have an opportunity to speak to any ministers about this particular problem.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SEMINAR ON DEVELOPMENT OF MARKETS IN UNITED STATES FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES PRODUCTS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester-Hants): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister now in a position to inform the House if his officials have met or are willing to meet officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the purpose of bringing about a business seminar in the Atlantic provinces to assist in the development of expanding markets for Atlantic provinces' businessmen in the United States?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will inquire about the situation. I know that contacts have been made but I did not receive any report on the matter.

FEDERAL COMMITMENT RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF SUPERPORT AT LORNEVILLE, N.B.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a supplementary question for the minister. Has he been able to check with his officials to find out if there has been a federal commitment to the Lorneville projected port in New Brunswick in view of the question I asked on Monday?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): There was no commitment, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the translation. Would the minister repeat his answer, please?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): My answer was no, there is no commitment at all.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I gave the minister notice before two o'clock of my question in the same connection. Will the minister be announcing before Christmas the Crown corporation in New Brunswick that will be in charge of this development and, if so, when will he announce it before Christmas?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not intend to make any announcement before Christmas, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED ATTEMPT BY POLICE TO PLANT DRUGS— REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): My question is for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Acting Solicitor General. In view of the indication on the CBC feature program "For Your Information" last night on channel 4 in Moose Jaw that city police officers approached a young person to plant drugs in a local residence, and in view of the fact that the RCMP were brought into this investigation and the over-all operation, would the minister say whether or not he would give a full report to the House on the planting of drugs and the entrapment of individuals?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): I am not prepared at the moment to accept either the preamble or the substance of the question but I will look into it to see whether it merits a report to the House.

[Mr. Coates.]

PENITENTIARIES

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN INMATES FROM PRINCE ALBERT AND STONY MOUNTAIN TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): While I have the floor, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I can reply briefly to two questions put to me, one by the hon. member for Skeena in which he asked me whether I knew in my capacity as Acting Solicitor General whether 20 or 25 inmates of the Saskatchewan penitentiary have been moved to the penitentiary in British Columbia. On December 10, 1970, 44 inmates from the Saskatchewan and Manitoba penitentiaries were transferred to institutions in British Columbia. These were normal transfers of selected inmates deemed suitable by classification boards for transfer to the following institutions: William Head institution, Mountain prison, Matsqui institution, and British Columbia penitentiary. They were selected for transfer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond wishes to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and would refer to the precedent established by your own ruling on November 19, 1970, involving the Secretary of State who attempted at that time to answer questions other than the one directly put to him. Mr. Speaker ruled that this was not proper at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw, may I say that the point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is well taken. I have always thought that it does complicate the question period when a minister replying to a question takes the opportunity of having the floor to reply to a question which has been asked previously. In this instance the hon. member for Moose Jaw has a supplementary question. The practice resorted to by the minister does make for a rather disorderly question period.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED ATTEMPT BY POLICE TO PLANT DRUGS— REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): In view of the fact that the CBC reporter had placed a tape recorder on the young man who was asked to plant the drugs, would the Minister of Justice say whether he would immediately obtain a copy of the tape from the television station for his perusal and then make a report to the House?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): I will look into all the circumstances of the case. Perhaps at a later date, Mr. Speaker, you can give me the floor to continue my reply to the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister wishes to pursue the statement he was making a moment ago, the Chair will recognize him at present.

PENITENTIARIES

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN INMATES FROM PRINCE ALBERT AND STONY MOUNTAIN TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): These inmates were selected for transfer because, in the opinion of their classification officers, the inmates concerned would benefit from the training programs available at these institutions.

Perhaps at a later date I may reply to another question asked me by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. At present I only wish to put on the record that I am ready to answer it now.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

NATURE OF RAIDS CARRIED OUT IN TORONTO

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is also for the Minister of Justice in the absence of the Solicitor General. Can the minister inform the House whether the raids carried out by the RCMP last weekend in Toronto were the result of regular investigations or, if not, were they special searches carried out in conjunction with the FBI?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Solicitor General): I had better take that under advisement, Mr. Speaker, to ascertain just what raids the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Justice is at it would he also find out if these raids are part of regular investigations against organized crime in Canada?

TRANSPORT

TORONTO—USE OF RAILWAY LINES BY METRO TORONTO FOR COMMUTER TRAFFIC

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct this question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister exert his influence with the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways to have them permit metro Toronto the use of railway lines for commuter passenger traffic?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is making a representation to the minister and he will have to assume the minister will follow it up.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED GASOLINE AND DIESEL FUEL RETAIL PRICES—INVESTIGATION OF POSSIBILITY OF COLLUSION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the increased prices for gasoline and diesel fuel at the retail level in western Canada in recent months, can the minister inform the House if his department or the Combines Investigation Branch is investigating whether there was collusion among the oil companies with regard to these recent price increases?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the department and the government are taking some satisfaction from the fact that the consumer price index published yesterday remained the same as for the previous month and is running at record low levels. However, with regard to the particular prices the hon. member mentions, the Prices and Incomes Commission is investigating certain price increases, as I indicated to his leader a little earlier in the question period, and I will discuss with the commission whether it is examining these particular price increases.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL PROTOCOL—AUTHORITY OF CANADIAN DELEGATES TO CONVENTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the 1961 United Nations Convention on Narcotic Drugs contains a warning to signatory countries against introducing qualifications to the protocol, since this would essentially nullify the original intent of the protocol, will the minister now specify how delegates to the January convention in Geneva can go to that meeting, without any intention of making commitments of a binding nature, unless it is agreed they are not to sign the protocol?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I would advise him that what is suggested here is an entirely new protocol on psychotropic substances which does not relate, in the sense that the hon. member is talking about, to the previous protocol.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATISTICS ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF STATISTICS CANADA, PROVISIONS FOR ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, December 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) that Bill S-2, respecting statistics of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I concluded my remarks on Monday evening concerning Bill S-2, I had dealt briefly with some of the history involved in gathering statistics in Canada. I had pointed out that there was now a need for new types of data gathering in Canada, and that new methods which have been developed will make the gathering of statistics much easier. I also pointed out that greater federal-provincial co-operation would ensue as a result of the bill that we have before us at the present time.

I want to go on now to say something about the provisions in the bill with respect to secrecy in the gathering of statistics in Canada. Perhaps the most serious responsibility of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics over the years has been the obligation of secrecy. Elaborate precautions have always been taken, and must continue to be taken to protect the privacy of the individual. However, after a most careful study of this provision with respect to secrecy, the Dominion Statistician has suggested that there are certain ways in which existing secrecy provisions are unnecessarily rigid, and their very rigidity places an unfair and unnecessary burden upon Canadians. Let me give you an example.

The existing act prohibits disclosure of any information from an individual return, even if it cannot be identified with a particular person or business. This rigidity really does not benefit anyone. The new act that we are proposing suggests that identifiability be made the basis for release or non-release of information. This would bring Canadian practice in line with procedures used around the world.

Another provision in the bill would require that information should not acquire a greater degree of secrecy than it had at its source simply because it is passed on to Statistics Canada, and so a specific provision has been made for the release by Statistics Canada of such information if the originating agencies are free under their legislation to release it, and further that they agree to the release by Statistics Canada of that information.

May I also point out that the bill provides that any return made to Statistics Canada, and any copies thereof in possession of the respondent, are not subject to discovery or production in any proceedings in law except proceedings that take place under the Statistics Act itself and relate specifically to the administration of the act. This provision will assist the bureau in obtaining complete and accurate information from respondents, and assure them that even their file copies of that information will be protected and remain secret.

Like all members of this House, Mr. Speaker, I share your concern with respect to this matter of secrecy, with respect to the privacy of Canadians as a fundamental right, and that government should never be in a position to make public personal details of an individual's life. I would like to underline that this principle of confidentiality of returns has been a bedrock principle of the Statistics Act since its passage in 1918, and it remains the bedrock principle of the bill before the House today. However, there are some changes in this regard that are worth noting.

The bill proposes giving the Chief Statistician access to income tax returns of unincorporated businesses, organizations and individuals. Under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act the Dominion Statistician now has access to corporate income tax returns for statistical purposes. The proposal before you today in this bill, if enacted, would give Statistics Canada access to the returns of individuals and small businesses that are sent in each year to the Department of National Revenue.

This would pave the way for developing new or improved statistics on consumers, such as income, finances and population movement, without increasing the reporting burden on the public. There is an urgent need for such information shared by government departments responsible for regional economic expansion, poverty programs, planning of all kinds, and consumer affairs.

Hon. members may wish to note that the DBS already has the power to secure this information. It can secure it directly from small businesses and individuals. It can obtain information concerning virtually all matters reported under the income tax law. However, under the existing Statistics Act, Statistics Canada would have to run a separate survey and secure that information itself. The new provision that we are suggesting would mean that these statistics could be compiled directly from National Revenue data by Statistics Canada. The object of this reform, as the object of other changes being made in the act, is simplicity. Every form that is eliminated is a saving of the taxpayer's patience, his money and his time.

For example, right away access to tax returns of unincorporated businesses would relieve 10,000 businesses of certain reports they now fill out. By the time the changes are fully implemented, 80,000 other firms will have the benefit of greatly reduced reporting burdens. I think this is an important and valuable reform.

I want to say something about the name, the "Dominion Bureau of Statistics". The name of a department or organization is an important indication of the function and even attitude of that group. In this light, we are proposing the name "Statistics Canada". En Français, "Statistique Canada", un nom simple et moderne, en Anglais ou Français, un nom presque bilingue. In just two words, what it does and where it does it. It is an efficient, definite title. I think it will make a great improvement in the name we call our statistics agency.

I would like now to refer to some of the other changes in the bill, some more routine. I think that in doing so and in reference to the bill as a whole, it is important to point out that most of the changes proposed are in relation to the techniques to be used for collecting information and do not empower "Statistics Canada" to collect information previously outside the jurisdiction of DBS.

In view of the rapid changes in our society, it is proposed that a national census of population be taken every five years, the first being in June, 1971. Subsequently, population figures broken down into electoral districts would be available. In addition, it is intended that there should be a population census every fifth year thereafter.

Another change of a minor nature but of some importance relates to information from public institutions. The present act exempts from secrecy all operational information about hospitals, universities and similar non-commercial institutions other than financial information. It is proposed to alter the act to permit disclosure of financial information in view of the widespread interest in these publicly supported institutions. I think this is a valuable change. These institutions are public and this information on finances will be of value to people who use this kind of statistic.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the bill before you aims at providing a better service both for the governments involved and the public. The public will fill out fewer forms and still be assured of their privacy. Although "Statistics Canada" will have access to income tax returns, secrecy standards will be maintained at a high level. Because of diminished duplication and increased co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, statistics will be provided more rapidly with greater accuracy and at lower cost. Some provisions in the act that have proved in the past to be too restrictive have been adjusted while others have been strengthened. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has been a useful vehicle. As with the family car that has served us well, we have a vague feeling of ingratitude when we have to trade it in but then we greet the new one with the expectation that it is better equipped to meet today's needs. It is in this spirit that we welcome "Statistics Canada".

I commend this legislation to the attention of hon. members and look forward to receiving the benefit of their views on this important act.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that I cannot share the minister's closing sentiment of welcoming this piece of legislation. There are four features upon which I wish to comment. The first is the penalty feature of the bill; the second is the burden that returns of statistics imposes on business generally; the third is the need to protect the privacy of the individual, the secrecy features on which the Parliamentary Secretary has placed some emphasis, and the fourth is the increased cost of maintaining the statistics branch.

Before dealing with these four matters, however, I should like to say something about what seems to be one of the chief reasons for bringing in this bill: that is, to abolish the titles, Dominion Bureau of Statistics and Dominion Statistician and to substitute the term "Statistics Canada". I can see no good reason for this. It seems to be only a continuation of an attack which has been going on for some years on what we might call traditional titles, particularly those that use the term "Dominion". This is an honourable term and one which in this case has attained a particular status in the eyes of the public. I think it should be maintained. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics is generally referred to as "DBS" and this term is understood by everyone in the country. "Statistics Canada" would be shortened to "SC" which would not mean anything to most people. Those of us who come from British Columbia and Alberta might think that it stood for Social Credit. The Parliamentary Secretary will understand this, as will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), I am sure, who is smiling.

People who are used to saying "Dominion Bureau of Statistics" or "DBS" will find the term "Statistics Canada" rather awkward. I submit it is better to retain the accustomed term and I hope this particular provision will be dropped when the matter is considered in committee. I know that even some government members have doubts about this matter because a four year transitional period is provided. But I, personally, hope that the title "Dominion Bureau of Statistics" will continue indefinitely.

Now, I wish to deal with these other matters, Mr. Speaker, the first being the penalty provision. Fines have been increased and the bill provides that refusal or neglect, just simple neglect to answer any questions or to fill in any returns, results in a fine or imprisonment or both. In view of the fact that the bill lays down that the leaving of the notice at the house of the individual concerned or delivering it by mail to his house or office is sufficient to impose an obligation on he individual or company concerned, I think this is a doubtful proposition. At the present time, as everyone in the House knows, you can never be sure whether the letter you mail will arrive at its destination. You do not know how soon it will get there. In view of the difficulties we have experienced with mail deliveries, I think the proposal to increase fines for neglecting to fill in some of these returns is a very doubtful one. When the bill comes before the committee, the penalty features of it will need be examined.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The next matter I wish to refer to is the constantly increasing multitude of forms and returns which businesses, and particularly small businesses, are required to file. I have received complaints about this matter for years. I have learned that some comparatively small businesses employ a man who does practically nothing except see that these numerous returns are filed. The Parliamentary Secretary made a good deal of the fact that he hopes to reduce the number of these returns. I hope that can be done. The tendency for years past has been in the opposite direction. I am afraid that unless the number of returns can be reduced, there will be a tendency for more and more information to be required for more and more purposes. In many cases those who fill out these returns are quite convinced that the information they are required to give is useless and serves no practical purpose. This aspect will also need to be considered. We shall need indications that are more definite than any we have had so far to show what means are to be instituted to prevent the continuing increase in the number of forms and returns which businesses, and especially small businesses, have to file.

The next matter I wish to raise is the necessity of protecting the privacy of returns. In other words, I am about to deal with the secrecy feature of the returns. One provision of this bill would allow access to individual income tax returns. That has not been possible before.

There is undoubtedly a considerable danger that the secrecy of those returns will be impaired by that access which is to be granted by the bill. Despite existing provisions for punishment of those who give out such information without authorization, a certain amount of leakage of such information is perhaps almost inevitable. Therefore, making an individual's income tax return available to Dominion Bureau of Statistics personnel will, I think, bring with it a very considerable danger. The danger is that there may be a breach of the secrecy to which an individual is entitled so far as his own private affairs and private business are concerned. It is said that this change is being made so that it will be unnecessary for the small businessman to fill in the many returns he has had to fill in in the past. I hope that proves to be the case. As I said before, this certainly must be looked into and corrected. I am very much afraid that any advantage which might be secured would be more than offset by the danger of the leakage of such information. This is a matter about which I think the committee will need to be reassured.

The bill also provides for the exchange of statistical information with the provinces, and this, again, is justified on the basis that it may reduce the number of returns, that it will prevent overlapping, and that it will lead to economies. I hope that will be the case. I say again that in such provision there is inherent the danger that there will be a leakage of information which is not justified. The provision presents a danger with regard to the secrecy of information and impinges on the privacy of individuals. It is a dangerous provision and is one more matter which I think needs be looked at very carefully.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is the matter of the cost of gathering statistics to be considered. This cost has been increasing constantly at a rapid rate. I am afraid this will continue. One provision of the bill calls for a census every five years, instead of every ten years, as is the case now. It is true that in the Prairie provinces of western Canada there has been a census every five years instead of the regular decennial census. If the bill passes, there is to be a nation-wide census every five years. There will be a very considerable increase in cost in this area alone. In addition, the constantly increasing demand for more statistical information on the part of all sorts of departments of government is likely to lead to greater and greater costs so far as the gathering of statistics is concerned. It seems to me that we need to sift pretty thoroughly all the information which it is said is being required at present, and all the numerous forms and returns which people are being asked to submit. We should eliminate a considerable number of them.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I express the hope that the matters I have mentioned will be dealt with fully when the bill is given committee study.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, although few will deny the importance of statistics—after all, we use them on both sides of the House for our own purposes—there is a growing doubt whether our present method of compiling statistics is really serving the needs and purposes of our present day society. May I point out some of the difficulties which I think exist in our system, how this bill proposes to deal with some of them and the extent to which it does not meet some of these purposes.

First of all, the whole system is much too secret. Second, it does not reflect any real human condition. Statistics often bear no relation to how people feel about certain things or to the advantages or benefits people derive from certain actions. Third, much of the information available is not related to the kind of information that is needed by those who are active in politics and by the public generally for the purpose of political decision making.

Let us look at the matter of secrecy. The bill proposes to touch on one of the sacred aspects of our system, the income tax return, and allow information compiled pursuant to the Income Tax Act to be made available to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Although it is said that such information will be confidential within that bureau, this really is not good enough. A provision such as that will not meet the kind of situation we face. For example, many researchers who need access to information are not able to obtain it as a result of the secrecy surrounding much of the information collected by DBS. More important than the researchers is the public.

There is a growing feeling that many of the things we once thought should be secret ought no longer to be secret. We make a great fetish about secrecy, yet we are becoming an open society. We know how well other members of the society are doing financially, or in other ways. That remark applies fairly obviously to Members of Parliament. Many of the affairs, especially the financial affairs, of Members of Parliament are well known and hotly debated by the public. That is the way it should be. No one will argue that members of Parliament should raise their salaries and give themselves other benefits in secret. The public should have this information. No one will seriously suggest that salary increases for people in the public service should be made in secret. Public servants, firemen, policemen and millions of wage earners in this country negotiate openly between labour and management. The results of the negotiations are published in the newspapers, and are followed closely by the public. Everyone knows about negotiations with hockey players.

The public is becoming increasingly aware of what is happening in our society with respect to all occupations. Where does the question of secrecy arise? It arises in the minority of cases, not the majority. The financial affairs of a very few people in our society are hidden from the public gaze. The public should have information about some areas in order to make political decisions based on that information.

I wish to explain my earlier remark that the collection of statistics does not reflect the human condition. Many people have the view that it is only necessary to collect statistics for specific purposes, such as making decisions with regards to the market. By that I mean cold facts regarding the amount of investment to be made or projections with regard to machinery and other items. Contrary to the belief that statistics serve only the purposes of government, statistics are increasingly benefiting the business community. The greatest pressure for increasing statistical information is from the business community. They require this information in order to make better and more farsighted decisions.

No indication is given as to the actual cost of goods. Figures are quoted for labour, overhead and equipment. Very little is said about the pollution caused by the production of goods, the cost to the public and the utility standard. I recognized the fact that it may be difficult to provide this information to the public, but that does not make it less desirable. It certainly would not be impossible. The gross national product is no longer a sure indicator of the progress being made by a society. What do we gain if the gross national product increases but in the process we create an unequal distribution of income, disparities between one part of the country and another and if the air and rivers of our environment are polluted? If this happens, is it necessary to increase the gross national product? These figures are no longer adequate for today's society. In addition to the gross national product, there must be other indicators.

I am not suggesting that the statistics presently being collected should be discontinued. They are useful. However, they must be read in conjunction with another statistical index which at the present time is not available. When the Statistics Act is being changed after 15 years, such a provision should have been included. The bill does not deal with this matter.

Statistics do not tell the whole story. One of the great shortcomings is that they do not consider the great contribution of women who choose to work at home instead of in the business world. For all practical purposes, these women just do not count from a statistical point of view. The contribution which they make to their families and the welfare of their children is not reflected in any index because they do not contribute to the gross national product. Although there may not be a practical need for this kind of statistical information, there is a great emotional and psychological need for this information in our society. It should not be argued that only those women engaged in a commercial undertaking are contributing to the family or to society. For many years women's organizations have spoken most eloquently of the need for including in a statistical index the contribution made by homemakers to the national economy.

Many statistics at our disposal are inadequate and unrelated to political decision making, both from the point of view of the politicians and the voters of this country. During the discussions on the white paper on taxation, many arguments were made regarding the comparison between taxes in the United States and Canada. To my knowledge, the only figures used in making this comparison were the tax rates and base tax at certain levels. This was very misleading. It did not take into account the improved social benefits in Canada which are provided through our tax system. Nor did it take into account the fact that Canadians have greater security and more safety. In order to provide these benefits, we have had to spend more money to improve our environment. We have shown a greater concern with regard to redistributing income in order to deal with the core problems of poverty and discontent.

However, as we have pointed out on many occasions, not enough is being done. At least Canada has made more of an attempt to do this than other countries. The result is a safer and happier environment than in other countries. This situation is not reflected in the statistics. All that is shown is a cold calculation of one rate of tax against another rate of tax. This is a totally inadequate comparison. Instead of stark taxation tables, Canadians are more interested in their quality of life, the amenities and securities which society provides. That is one area.

Again, when we deal with the question of unemployment, the unemployment figures, aside from whether they are measured directly or on a seasonally adjusted basis, are misleading because they understate the number of those at work, thus minimizing the seriousness of the problem. This is perhaps not a matter of so much concern to us when there is full employment, but it is certainly a matter of concern when a serious degree of unemployment is understated in the statistics. This situation comes about in many ways. It arises because some people leave the labour market. Others become marginal or part-time workers and their activities are not reflected in the statistics. Many work shorter time, and though this factor does appear in the DBS figures to some extent, the statistics are not co-ordinated so as to give an exact picture of the horror of the unemployment situation. The statistics should be sufficiently accurate to give clear guidance both to governments which are making decisions and to those who are influencing decisions in the House of Commons and elsewhere.

I should like to refer, also, to the situation which arose while the committee on consumer prices was holding its hearings in 1966, and the merry chase which was given to us by people in possession of statistics, officials of the Department of Agriculture and so on. I had a feeling they would have been able to save us six months' work had they been able to produce the figures we requested. On many occasions we asked representatives of a department: "What is happening to prices?", and they would tell us with a high degree of accuracy what the situation was. We would then ask how these compared with prices to the consumer, and they replied "We do not know." This was the responsibility of another department. It may be, indeed, that all they knew was the narrow picture they got in their own departments. But if they did not know, then, surely, someone else knew. It was not until we had spent many months of searching that we began to receive statistical tables showing the relationship between these things. I feel that if someone in the DBS had possessed the authority or the willingness to provide us with this information it would have been most valuable. The Bureau, in turn, might say that politicians did not have the wit to ask for it. It may be there were occasions on which we did not have the wit to ask, but there were others when we did ask for information and did not get it. The experience was a frustrating one.

Another subject of enormous importance to Canada is the whole question of foreign ownership. We possess a lot of information about foreign ownership now, information about investment, information about imports and exports, information as to how much of the funds of foreign companies is raised outside Canada. Most of this information exists inside the Bureau of Statistics in one form or another, yet no one in the Bureau, to my knowledge, has ever taken this information and put it together in a meaningful pattern so that we could look at it and understand all the implications. We had to wait for the Watkins Commission before we could get some of this information. It depended on researchers like Kari Levitt; we had to wait for people like Ed. Safarian to compile his study. In short, the country had to wait for years for private writers to put this information together. And not all the information they required was available to them. They had to send out questionnaires and carry on a large amount of private research. In other areas, they simply had to guess.

One would have thought that in connection with an issue as important as foreign ownership those responsible for setting guidelines affecting the DBS would have shown greater interest in making sure this information was available. One can only reach the conclusion that the minister or the policy makers responsible have never wanted the Bureau to be as comprehensive in its studies as I have suggested; they have been satisfied to see the Bureau do the least amount of work that would get by; they have never set out a program encouraging the DBS to look for information which would be helpful in the future. The tendency, I suggest, has always been to under-rate the work of the Bureau and to ask that it spend a little less money.

It seems we have something against the taking of statistics. The Bureau has always been an adopted child; it has never had full status in the overall picture of government and public functions. I have had some critical things to say about the DBS but I should make it clear that this criticism is not directed toward the personnel of the Bureau. I have met many of them on numerous occasions and I think they are a most competent group of people. They really do a good job. The problem does not lie with them. When I have asked them for certain information which they were not compiling, they have said: Well, we do whatever we can within the budget allotted to us. The real responsibility lies with the policy makers in the government for not having set before the Bureau the kind of tasks which, I am suggesting, are essential in a modern society.

My hon. friends and I will be supporting the bill because it does make some improvements and it does move in the direction we think should be taken. For example, it makes available taxation statistics which we believe to be important because there is a great deal we do not know and shall not know until we have access to taxation statistics. For example, we do not know how much it costs to go on with this commercialized society, so dependent upon product differentiation, in which companies incur enormous selling costs—and advertising is only one of these costs—which are not all reflected in the price of the product. I have asked what it all comes to—I am thinking of such things as depreciation allowances, and so on—but I have never received a satisfactory answer. These are important questions when we begin to talk about tax reform. I suspect that selling costs, depreciation allowances and the various fringe benefits available to business run into hundreds of millions of dollars each year and represent tax benefits which have never been visible to the general public but which should be visible to the general public. This part of the bill will be of some assistance and I hope it will be used for the purpose I have indicated.

I also hope that the minister responsible for DBS will show a little imagination, come into the modern world and see the need for the additional kind of information that I have suggested today. Perhaps eventually, though not waiting 15 years, he will bring in a bill which reflects the changing mood of society and the need to measure quality as well as quantity.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say about this very important bill. I admit I have not given the bill detailed study, but a very important principle is at stake here. This is why I do not think we should move too fast in sending it to committee. I refer to the matter of secrecy.

People have always felt that their personal income tax returns were private, that no one other than officials of the Department of National Revenue should have access to the file. In this bill, the government is asking that people employed by DBS be given access to all income tax files in the Department of National Revenue, not only the files of corporations and small businesses, but of individuals. This is one more encroachment on the privacy of the individual, another case of how far the camel has got his nose into the tent.

I want to express my opposition to this abrogation of a very fundamental principle. We are going to give people who work at DBS the right to take income tax files of individuals. These files will be in the area offices, will be transported to DBS offices where the personnel will take what they want from them, and then be transported to national revenue. We do not know what will happen to them during transportation. It is all very well for the government to say there is secrecy, but I do not think that the secrecy will be all that dependable.

I think there should be some alternative course proposed. I feel that the government would be pursuing a much better course by setting up within the Department of National Revenue a statistics branch, if I may call it that, which would provide the information that is required. Under the present arrangement I can see a conflict arising between departments and staffs. There will be no end to the problems that may arise. I suggest the files should be kept where they belong, namely in the Department of National Revenue. A principle is involved here, and I am very upset about almost anybody being given the right to look into matters as personal as income tax files. That is all I have to say about that particular provision.

I am also upset over the change in the name. We have had the name "Dominion Bureau of Statistics" ever since the act was passed. DBS are initials that are understood by people in all parts of the world. The government now wants to drop the "Dominion" and rename the bureau "Statistics Canada". I think this is the only reason this bill has been brought in, since very few other changes are proposed in it. I am concerned about relinquishing this old, reliable, well-understood nomenclature, one that will be missed, I am sure, by most Canadians.

I also hope that the changes provided here will mean better co-ordination and co-operation with the provinces so that small businesses and corporations will be asked to provide less material than is the case at the present. Like the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness), who has had many letters on this point, I too have received complaints from small businessmen about the great amount of work and effort they have to put into supplying DBS with figures.

One last point about reports made by DBS. Some of them are three or four years old when published, and in this computer age there is no excuse for this. I suggest that unless reports are reasonably current we might just as well forget about them.

I will not take any further time of the House. May I reiterate what I said at the beginning, that I am very concerned about inroads being made into people's privacy, particularly in the area of personal income tax returns.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary and the House that the Parliamentary Secretary has already spoken in this debate. The Standing Order provides that the mover of a substantive motion may speak a second time, thus closing the debate. The hon. member is not the mover of the motion, and while this may be a technicality; perhaps it would be better to obtain the consent of the House to allow the hon. member to close the debate. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate, I want to make a few comments on some of the excellent points that have been made by hon. members thus far. The points made pose the kind of problems that the government faces so often, where members of the opposition take an extreme view on the one side, and other members of the opposition take an extreme view the other way. Then, the government must somehow find a position between the two that is satisfactory to all Canadians.

I think the question of secrecy is an excellent example of this. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) suggested that we have far too much secrecy, whereas the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) and the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) declared that under the new arrangements we will not have enough secrecy. I want to say a few words about the particular subject of access to income tax returns. If I can describe the process that is envisioned, it might serve to reassure members of the Conservative party with regard to this point.

The proposal is that members of Statistics Canada who will be concerned with this particular aspect of the operation will go to the Department of National Revenue which will set up a special department under secrecy provisions more rigid than exist in that department at the present time. Data will be gathered on computer tapes and transferred in bulk to Statistics Canada for use at that centre as bulk information. The likelihood of an individual's return ever being made public is almost nonexistent. The conditions of secrecy under which personnel from Statistics Canada will operate will be, if anything, more rigid than the conditions under which personnel in the Department of National Revenue now operate.

In examining this bill for the first time, I was as equally concerned as are other hon. members over this point. I examined it very carefully before assuring myself that the provisions of secrecy which Canadians enjoy at the present time would be preserved. I feel I can assure hon. members that this important provision is being considered very carefully and that satisfactory action is being taken in that regard.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) made a point about the constantly increasing burden on businessmen in Canada to provide statistical information to the nation. I share his concern over this. I have talked to many businessmen who have experienced this burden and are concerned about the cost to themselves and their businesses of supplying this information, and I want to suggest to him that some of the most important provisions of this bill are designed to improve that situation. That is exactly what a good part of the bill is all about, to make it easier and cheaper for Canadian businessmen to fulfil the obligations they have to provide that information, which they use as well as governments, for the benefit of all Canadians. I think that is an important improvement accomplished by this bill.

The hon. member also suggested that there have been cost increases. I suppose there will be cost increases in the future as the nation grows, as business grows, as the gross national product grows and as the necessity to provide additional services grows. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics is doing everything it can to modernize and to use advanced methods such as computers wherever possible to simplify the gathering process in order that costs will be kept down and the greatest value for the dollar will be obtained. On the other hand, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) suggested that perhaps we do not have adequate statistics in Canada. He went on to say that the quality of statistics we have is not adequate.

The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) said he felt the reports were coming out too late. These are matters of a technical nature but they are being improved. I want to assure hon. members of the House that Statistics of Canada is constantly improving its ability to provide statistics of a more up-to-date nature and to provide them more quickly. It has an enviable record in this regard. If you consider these statistics provided on any subject by Statistics of Canada, you will find that reports are coming out more frequently and earlier after the completion of the gathering of that information than they have in the past.

Mr. Harkness: What is Statistics of Canada? We have no Statistics of Canada at the present time.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): The hon. member has referred to the change of the name of the organization from DBS to Statistics Canada. He has suggested it is going to be confusing for those of us in western Canada who are familiar with the initials "SC", meaning Social Credit. I know when he goes to the airport at Calgary and gets on Trans-Canada Air Lines, I mean an Air Canada aircraft to come here he must find it difficult to leave behind those confusing views we get from the Social Credit government in western Canada, but I am sure even he has become used to the name Air Canada.

An hon. Member: We won't juggle the books the way they have.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): An hon. member says, "We won't juggle the books the way they have". I am sure the hon. member has not yet found the wrong airline since they changed the name from Trans-Canada Air Lines to Air Canada, and I am sure he has found it quite useful and easy to be serviced by that excellent airline. I am sure he will get used to the idea of Statistics Canada. This will not be an earth-shaking change but an improvement and a streamlining.

In concluding, let me concur with the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo who said his experience with the people of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has been most satisfactory, that they are most competent in their work, are co-operative and have performed an excellent service to Canada. I want to endorse that view and say that these changes we are proposing today will make it possible for them to do their work even better.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the motion agreed to?

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan-Boundary).]

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING UNITS OF MEASUREMENT, INSPECTION, OFFENCES, ETC.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill S-5, respecting weights and measures, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I know there is a feeling in the House to deal with legislation rather quickly and get it to the committees before the Christmas recess. I will be very brief in what I have to say on this bill, leaving the details to be discussed by the committee.

The bill before the House this afternoon should be regarded as a companion piece of legislation to the consumer packaging and labelling bill, Bill C-180, which is part way through the second reading stage and which we hope to discuss in a very short time. The remarks made in respect of one of these bills would apply to the other.

Federal responsibility for weights and measures is clearly set out in section 91 of the British North America Act. Just let me give a short history. The first weights and measures act passed by this Parliament was passed in 1873, and the present act which is being revised or replaced by this legislation dates from 1951. Legislation of this kind is very basic to consumer protection and the purpose of this act is to ensure that the purchaser shall receive just measure, whether he is buying a commodity that is sold by weight, by volume, by length, by area or even, by time.

The units of measure used in Canada have been established by several different pieces of legislation, and many of these provisions and units established under them have been and are now in need of redefinition. It is considered more practical and efficient, while making these changes, to bring them all up-to-date, and to bring all of the units of measure used in Canada under one central piece of legislation, namely Bill S-5.

Accordingly, this bill sets out to repeal the Electrical and Photometric Units Act, the Length and Mass Units Act, and the Weights and Measures Act of 1951. All of these measurement acts will be incorporated under this one bill, as well as all the special features of these three acts. They will be incorporated, we hope, under the new weights and measures act of 1971.

The bill sets forth all the units of measurement which are legally in use in trade in Canada. It defines these units in scientific and legal terms in accordance with the latest internationally accepted system, the Systéme International. This system is a set of precise measurements adopted by the last general conference on weights and measures, and is now in use throughout the world. It represents a considerable improvement since the days of long ago when the yard, for example, was measured by the length of King Henry's arm, and the time of Confederation when the legal yard in Canada was a piece of metal manufactured in England and deposited with the Speaker of the Senate. I do not know whether he was thought to be a better custodian of the yard than the Speaker of this House, and I am not sure what reason—

Mr. Baldwin: Are you talking about King Henry VIII?

Mr. Basford: We have not got to him yet. The customary foot-pound units with which we are all familiar and the metric units will remain valid for use in Canada under this bill. I do want to assure hon. members, because there were some press reports which came out when the bill was before the Senate, that may leave the wrong impression, that the usual or official foot-pound and Canadian units we are used to cannot be curtailed without specific reference back to Parliament. There was a suggestion that this bill forced the introduction of the metric system. That is not so at all. It makes the use of the metric system legal in Canada, but it also retains the customary Canadian units which cannot be taken away without an act of Parliament.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The fundamental principle of the bill is that it makes it an offence to give short weight or measure. It provides that scales or any other type of measuring device to be used in trade must be of a type which has been tested and approved by the standards branch of my department. Certain devices now widely used in trade, such as parking meters and coin operated liquid dispensing machines, were not in general use when the last Weights and Measures Act was passed, but will be brought within the ambit of the act so as to permit us to ensure that these new devices give a fair and just measure.

In the past few years fraudulent practices connected with fuel oil deliveries and with odometers on automobiles have come to light, and this legislation, as it is being revised, will permit us to control those practices. The bill will also enable us to modernize our inspection program, using more sophisticated sampling techniques. Periods of equipment inspection will be set corresponding to the demonstrated need for testing based on a modernized statistical analysis of inspection data. The details of these features will, I am sure, be studied in great depth in detail in the Committee on Health and Welfare if this bill is referred to the committee.

This bill is closely related to, but quite distinct from, the packaging and labelling bill C-180 which I mentioned earlier. The latter bill is concerned primarily with prepackaged goods which are clearly identifiable as consumer goods. The packaging and labelling act is designed to establish the information about a consumer product that must be on a label or package, including a clear expression of the weight or volume of that consumer product. On the other hand, the weights and measures bill that is before the House covers the devices used in determining the weight or volume of all goods used in trade. It covers goods which are not prepackaged and are not covered by other legislation but are weighed or measured in stores, such as yard goods or fresh fish. It also covers goods which are sold at the non-retail level to wholesalers or to contractors or to others who buy in bulk supply. In other words, this bill is designed to protect the purchaser at every link in the chain from the producer of raw materials, to the retailer, and ultimately to the consumer, to ensure that they all receive full and just measure.

With that brief introduction, I move the motion that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs where, I am sure, the bill will be studied with great care by hon. members.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): We will not say too much at this stage, although we will make sure that when this bill gets into committee it will be thoroughly and closely examined. I was glad to see that, unlike the last bill, the minister did not suggest that this be known as weights and measures Canada. At least he is going to draw the line somewhere. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) here. The reason I mention that fact is I have heard his department and that of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) will be put together and will be henceforth known as Unemployment Canada. But we will wait for that.

The bill gives, of course, a great deal of power to the minister. It used to be said many years ago that the sun never set on the British Empire. I am not faulting the minister because ambition is a great thing to have, and I am glad to see young men with laudable ambition. But it will not be too long before we will be able to say that in Canada the sun never sets on the empire of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford).

Mr. Basford: And with my head, it sure shines.

Mr. Baldwin: From toys to consumers, he does not miss a thing in between. I remember him from the days when he was a struggling but very effective chairman of a committee which was inquiring into these matters. From that small start, this great monolithic empire has been built. We will continue to watch the minister with exceeding interest because of this fact.

As the minister said, this bill has to be read in conjunction with the packaging and labelling bill. There are a few aspects in the bill with which I will deal. First, there is the very wide power of regulation that allows the Governor in Council to regulate exemptions, conditionally or unconditionally, from the application of the bill. This is all set out in clause 10. I will not go into the clause except to point out that it is a clause of almost two and a half pages with about 22 or 23 different provisions. It points up an objection which I have been making in this House, supported by my party, that over and over again we have a government which enacts enabling legislation—and this is little more than enabling legislation—and asks the House to give it very substantial grants of authority to act by way of regulation.

I do not think there is any doubt that 90 per cent of the acts and actions of this government which affect the lives, fortunes and property of the ordinary people in Canada come about as a result of regulation, order in council, or ministerial decree. I have spent three or four years crusading on this, and last year we got through an excellent report of an all party committee recommending some very substantial and salutary precautions which can be taken, including a proposal in a bill and the establishment of a committee of this House. Right at the beginning of this session a bill was brought in, namely, the Statutory Instruments Act. It was defective in that it did not go anything like the distance which the committee recommended, but at least it was a modest start. The bill has been shelved, packaged and put away out of sight. Here we are having ministerial grants of authority brought forward in legislation of this kind and put in the hands of this government. I say it is a dangerous situation. We will not hold up the bill on that account, but let me tell the minister that I will seize every opportunity which comes up to point this out in the hope the media of this country will take into consideration the dangerous trend which is developing.

The tragedy is that it is only when we have lost these very important rights that we find out about them and start to complain. By then, it is way beyond the time for complaining; it is far too late. It may well be that before we are finished, we may take a stand. I say to the minister, and to his colleagues, that if the government persists in bringing forward enabling legislation which will operate mainly through the regulatory device, one of these days we in this party will take a stand and say, "you will not pass the bill until the House is given an opportunity to debate in an effective way the statutory regulations Act and to establish a parliamentary committee". We will not do it this time, however.

I am glad to see the Government House Leader is here. I hope he will listen to what I have to say and will take note that there will be an occasion, when a bill is brought forward by this government which, in our opinion, gives far too much power to the government to act by order in council, when we will say "no, you will not pass the bill". I want to make it quite plain that this warning is being given in good faith.

I also want to draw attention to the number of inspectors who are needed for the implementation of the bill. When he replies now, or if he replies in committee that will do just as well, I want the minister to answer one question. Perhaps a Parliamentary Secretary could reply for him, and we know that a Parliamentary Secretary can be most effective in giving replies. Are the inspectors who will operate under this legislation the same inspectors as those who will operate under the companion bill, the packaging and labelling bill?

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Basford: Yes.

Mr. Baldwin: Now, I wish to make some comment on the wide power of inspectors to freeze a business for 60 days or more, as stipulated in clause 39 of the bill. There is no question that an inspector has the right under that clause to put a business effectively out of operation for 60 days, and this is something at which we must take a good look. There will be an onus on the minister to justify that clause.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

I also point out that the bill purports to create a very substantial number of new offences. I quite agree that if you are going to have an effective piece of legislation you must have sanctions in it, but every time a bill purports to create ten, 12 or 15 new offences for which people may be summonsed, may be convicted, and may be put in jail, it is our duty in this House to examine it closely. I hope that when we get into the committee the minister will seize the opportunity to justify the need for all these provisions. The same remarks apply to the way in which the evidence is going to be introduced.

I will not take up any more of the time of the House, except to tell the minister that we are not going to object to the principle of the bill. We do not think the bill is going to be a great improvement. We think it does validate and bring up to date a number of ideas which probably are needed in legislation of this kind. We have no great objection to it, but we will examine the details with some care in committee. I hope that there the minister will have all the answers. He usually gives some answers in this House, but not the kind of answers with which we are happy. I hope he does better when we get into committee.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, we in this party are in complete agreement with the principle of the bill as outlined by the minister. He indicated that its main purpose is to make it an offence for a person to give short weights and measures. Putting it more positively, its purpose is to ensure that the consumer receives just measure for what he or she pays. I think this is an excellent objective.

As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has said, I do not think we need to say a great deal about the bill at this stage because obviously it is a very detailed and technical piece of legislation. It is essentially the kind of legislation that we must send to a committee where we can have an across-the-table discussion and get down to the details. However, there are just a few points I would like to raise in connection with it in a general way at this time.

I think the minister has said that this is really a companion piece of legislation, in the sense of being in the same context, to the packaging and labelling bill. In a way, its purpose is also to prepare for the introduction of the metric system in Canada. The minister pointed out the history of our weights and measures legislation, dating from a long time ago, all of which indicates that we are quite a long way behind many other countries in adopting the use of the metric system. I feel that Canada has been at a considerable disadvantage in many ways as a result of being so slow to adopt the metric system. Perhaps, as in so many other cases, our slowness has been because of the reluctance of the United States to adopt the metric system. As a result, we have been lazy in moving toward adoption of it.

This bill really includes three systems, both the metric system and the customary Canadian system of weights and measures, to say nothing of one part which includes land measurements from the old days of seigniorial tenure in the province of Quebec, with pied, arpent, perche, etc. It is novel to find all these included in a temporary developing situation, but I would like the minister to give some indication of the length of time that all these things will remain lumped together. I would like to hear from the minister his estimate of how long it will take to move from the use of the customary Canadian system to the use of the metric system.

At this point, I wish to recall something that may assist him. In our history books we have read that on January 1, 1922, the city of Vancouver and, I believe, the whole province of British Columbia, switched from driving on the left-hand side of the road to driving on the right-hand side. A great deal of preparation had to be made for that switch. But when the switch was made, it was made in a single day. People were well prepared for it, and as a result the confusion it caused was minimal. I hope that the period during which we will be struggling with both the metric and the customary systems in Canada will not be long drawn out and that, however we decide to move, we undertake the move as quickly as possible. I am glad that the minister is taking the first steps to move us into adoption of the metric system.

During the committee hearings, I shall ask how long the public will be undergoing preparation for the change to the metric system. I do not believe we should muddle along indefinitely using both systems. There is a need for consumer education in this respect. The committee on prices, which the minister so ably co-chaired several years ago, vigorously insisted on the need for consumer education. I hope he will now alert the public to become familiar with the terms of the weights and measures used in the metric system. This brings up another point.

Those who will be living with the metric system in Canada are today's school children. On this point I do not want the minister to hide behind the constitution and say that, unfortunately, education is a provincial matter about which he can do nothing. I point out that consumer education is the job of the minister and his department, and in my view his department should be considering ways and means of introducing consumer education at a lower level than that of adults who have become fossilized in the customary system of weights and measures that we are presently using. I think that the minister, agile and able as he is in so many ways, particularly with respect to details, should be able to discover a way by which consumer education can be directed at young, unformed minds so that in later years they will be able to use the metric system to the best advantage.

An hon. Member: What about the unformed minds in the Liberal party?

Mrs. MacInnis: I would prefer not to touch on that for the moment.

The hon. member for Peace River questioned whether there will be a need for all these inspectors. One way to keep down the number of inspectors is to increase the amount of public education. Well informed housewives will reduce the need for a large number of inspectors. I scarcely think the minister and the government believe it a good idea to keep the public uninformed so that a large number of inspectors may be appointed. The ordinary consumer, well educated and self-interested, would be much more vigilant than any civil servant wandering around and making less interested inspections. These are some of the points we should look at when discussing this bill.

As I say, the principle of this bill is a good one if the minister can assure us that we are not just going to add the metric system to our own weights and measures system, leaving it to some future minister to sort out the confusion. I would like to be sure that the present minister will see this through, and if he does I think we will have a good bill.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my remarks are more in the nature of a question to further underline the remarks already made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I should like to ask the minister, as we close this debate, if he could give some indication of what progress we have made toward the adoption of the metric system in Canada. The hon. member pointed out some of the factors that are holding us back, one being that the United States is loth to accept this standard. Our manufacturers are at a disadvantage when they undertake contracts for foreign companies and find that the specifications are in the metric system.

It seems to me that we should be moving a little faster in this field, Mr. Speaker. Many of our scientists have already spoken about this as it is the common scientific measurement throughout the world. The system is being taught in schools, but in a theoretical manner. I heartily concur with the suggestion that more steps should be taken to introduce this system of measurement in a practical way. I wonder if the minister could state if his department has taken any steps or conducted any research on how the system should be introduced.

At the present time the United Kingdom is moving to the decimal system of currency and both types of coinage are in circulation in order to facilitate the gradual introduction of the new system. This makes me wonder if we should not be moving in the same direction. Perhaps a good place to start would be to measure gasoline in litres instead of gallons, since everybody buys gas.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could indicate what progress is being made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to advise the House that if the hon. minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the remarks of hon. members and, in particular, those of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). However, I think his remarks can be dealt with more appropriately in the committee. The hon. member who just resumed his seat asked about the metric system. May I say that, of course, we can go into this in great detail in the committee. The bill before the House provides for the use of both systems, the customary foot-pound system and the metric system. The latter is already coming into vogue in some industries in this country.

The position of the government was clearly stated in a white paper that my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) tabled in this House last February. This is a very important statement relative to conversion from the foot-pound system to the metric system, and I think we are finally beginning to make progress on this. Let me make it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that there is no doubt in my mind that we should convert to the metric system, and the sooner the better. We should not be debating the question; the discussion should be on how we can convert with the least possible expense and inconvenience. Undoubtedly, there will be expense but we should endeavour to minimize it. It is obvious, however, that because we are a trading nation and a great deal of our market is in the United States—and I make this as a general statement—we are going to move to some extent hand in hand with the United States. I detect a growing sentiment for conversion to the metric system in many of the consumer groups in that country. I understand that the United States Congress has a committee which is examining the matter. When I was in Washington last fall and met with the Secretary of Commerce, The Honourable Maurice H. Stans, he was enthusiastic and thought that we should convert. My personal view is that we should convert as fast as we can and that we should be debating how we convert, not whether we should convert.

I think conversion to the metric system would greatly benefit Canadian industry and trade and, from the point of view of my own portfolio, it has great potential for benefiting the consumer, once it is understood in terms of comparison with competing products and the packaging and measurement of products. There are great advantages, Mr. Speaker, and I make that statement in answer to the questions that were asked. I know we will go into it in much more detail in the committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING PROHIBITIONS, LABELS STANDARDIZATION, INSPECTION, ETC.

[Translation]

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-180, respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of pre-packaged and certain other products, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on November 3, I began to move the second reading of Bill C-180, the consumer packaging and labelling bill. I got half way through my remarks so I should like to finish them now. I regard this bill as one of the most important pieces of consumer protective legislation which I have had the honour to present to this House. I think it represents a fundamental principle to the consumer movement, and it represents great advances in the whole field of consumer packaging and labelling.

When I was speaking on November 3, I drew to the attention of hon. members the great significance of obtaining full, accurate and relevant information about the product from its package and its label. At that time, I reminded the House of what had been said on the subject of packaging and labelling by consumer groups, and by the parliamentary committee mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), which Senator Croll and I had the honour of chairing and on which many members of this House served. I reminded the House of the recommendations of that committee and of the recommendations of the Royal Commission under Judge Mary Batten, appointed by the three prairie provinces.

All of these groups made recommendations about the need for change in the laws governing packaging and labelling. In so far as those recommendations can be dealt with by federal legislative or regulatory authority and action, and to the extent that they have not already been attended to in other consumer legislation which I have introduced, the present bill before us reflects the preoccupation and recommendations of those groups. The bill is also in line with proposed or existing legislation in most advanced countries of the world and indeed is ahead of some.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Having given this background, I should like to turn very quickly, because I appreciate what hon. members are endeavouring to do this afternoon, to the basic principles or basic thrust of the bill. I will leave unsaid a number of things I had wanted to say in order that we may be speedy. If I need to say them, I shall do so when I close the debate and have an opportunity of speaking again. I want to outline very quickly the five basic principles of the consumer packaging and labelling bill. First, this bill is designed to be a comprehensive, omnibus kind of bill. It is designed to provide, over a period of time, a reasonable degree of uniformity with respect to the method of labelling and packaging consumer goods and to overcome the confusing array of labelling requirements which now exist under a whole host of different packaging and labelling regulations and laws.

The second principle of the bill is the provision of full and factual information on labels. This is a fundamental requirement of the consumer movement. It is a fundamental axiom of consumerism that consumers ought to be able to exercise a rational choice. In order for consumers to buy conscientiously in the market place, it is necessary that they be provided with full and factual information. This is the second main principle of the bill. This principle is that the consumer shall have available to him full and factual information on labels so that he will have the basis on which to make well informed decisions and well informed and rational choices. This bill provides that all prepackaged products shall bear a quantity declaration, and such declaration shall be in terms of Canadian standard and metric units of weight, volume or length. Count will be permitted where this is the usual practice.

The net quantity declaration of weight, measure or count will appear on the main panel of the package. This declaration shall be easily legible and readily discernible under normal conditions of purchase and the minimum acceptable print size of the declaration will be established by regulation. The name and place of business of the manufacturer, packer or distributor will have to be shown on all packages so that the consumer may readily get in touch with him and make any inquiry or complaint. The commodity must also be identified in terms of its common or usual or generic name or in terms of its function.

The third principle, Mr. Speaker, underlying this bill is the prevention of fraud and deception in packaging and labelling, where these occur by way of non-functional slack fill, which is the technical term for the package which does not have as much in it as people may expect, or misleading depictions and vignettes, or deceptive descriptions of the product, by false advertising or in any other way. That is meant to curb actions which tend to deceive or manipulate the consumer. As hon. members can see, the bill will ban a variety of false and misleading representations on labels, including expressions or depictions which create a wrong impression as to content, origin, quality, performance or method of production. It will, for example, be illegal to declare an item handmade when it is in fact machine-made.

Containers of prepackaged products must not be manufactured, constructed, filled or displayed in such a way that a consumer could reasonably be misled as to quantity or quality of the product. In gauging the contents of a container, consumers should not have to put up with trying to detect whether there are hidden indentations, fillers or just unfilled space other than that which the peculiar qualities of the product require.

The fourth principle of the bill that I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, is this: the bill will tackle the question of the undue proliferation of package shapes and sizes which is the source of a great deal of consumer irritation. One of the most annoying things for consumers, and I frequently hear complaints about this, is the almost staggering variety of package shapes and sizes in some product lines. This matter was mentioned before the Parliamentary Committee and the Royal Commission. That makes prices comparison and product comparison almost impossible. I have reason to believe that certain manufacturers also consider that this marketing technique of package proliferation has, in some cases, reached ridiculous proportions and that they would welcome some rationalization of package shapes and sizes in some lines of consumer products. The bill provides that where the governor in council is of the opinion that there is undue proliferation in the sizes or shapes of the containers for prepackaged goods, the effect of which is to confuse or mislead the consumer, he may establish regulations to limit the sizes or shapes of such containers. The next provision is important, Mr. Speaker. For the purpose of establishing package requirements, the minister may seek the advice from time to time of the Standards Council of Canada, any organization in Canada engaged in Standards formulation, or any organization of consumers or dealers in the prepackaged product.

Some people, Mr. Speaker, have expressed the concern to me, and I notice that this matter has been referred to in the press, that the effect of this provision of the act will be that the government will interfere unduly with the free market process and will eliminate from the market package sizes which meet a real consumer requirement. I can assure the House that nothing could be further from the truth. I am fully aware that a variety of package sizes is necessary in order to meet the differing requirements of different kinds of households and products. I am also aware that there should be room for innovation in package shapes and sizes, just as there should be in other aspects of the marketing process. We wish to do nothing to prevent or hinder innovation.

I would remind the critics, Mr. Speaker, that a very large number of consumer food products are already packaged in standard sizes under a variety of acts and regulations which have been on the statute books for some time. These regulations have not worked an undue hardship on the manufacturers of those products which are required to meet certain standards under the regulations. For example, the more commonly used canned foods are sold in specified sizes, as is a product such as butter. The standards which have been introduced have not, it seems to me, worked any undue hardship on the free market system, on the producers, or on those who buy or sell butter. All that this section of the act intends to achieve, Mr. Speaker, is a similar degree of rationality in those areas where, quite frankly, the consumer is faced with an extremely confusing and even misleading array of package sizes for certain consumer products, which makes it almost impossible for him to reach any rational decision as to which may be the best buy having regard to his particular need.

In preparing these and all other regulations under the act, Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to consult not just with other government departments with interests in the field of packaging and labelling, but also with associations of consumers and manufacturers and other interested persons. May I point out that this is a very important principle to be considered in legislation of this kind. There is a specific provision in the bill which affords manufacturers, retailers and other people interested in the regulations a reasonable and statutory right to make representations with respect to the regulations. I think that is an important provision. We want to make sure that such persons will have a reasonable opportunity to make representations under the regulations. We also want to make sure that the regulations are as practicable as knowledgeable people can make them.

In a bill, Mr. Speaker, designed primarily to help the Canadian consumer make knowledgeable and rational decisions in the market place, there is another feature which is of very great importance and significance. I should like to announce this afternoon the government's position on bilingual labelling. Bilingual labelling should, in my view and in the government's view, Mr. Speaker, as a general practice be mandatory for consumer products, both domestic and imported, which are subject to federal labelling legislation. At the present time the various federal acts which set out packaging and labelling rules are not consistent concerning the use of English or French. Several acts make no reference at all to language; some require that either English or French be used, while a few of the more recent labelling regulations specify that either English or French or both English and French shall be used. The new labelling regulations dealing with hazardous household chemicals, recently issued under the Hazardous Products Act, represent the first general bilingual labelling regulations or legislation at the federal level. There have been for many years requirements under the Food and Drugs Act relating to the use of both languages. These will be broadened and made general.

Already, of course, a large proportion of food and drug products sold in Canada have bilingual labels. Manufacturers of many consumer products, especially of nationally advertised brands, have voluntarily applied bilingual labels to their products. This positive trend will facilitate the proposed program, making the task less formidable.

Over the next couple of years, drug products, foods, cosmetics, patent medicines, pesticides and all consumer products subject to federal labelling rules will progressively have to meet the bilingual labelling requirements. These new regulations will increase the number of products labelled in both languages, and we expect by the end of 1975 that bilingual labelling should, as a general practice, be mandatory at the point of manufacture for consumer products subject to federal labelling legislation.

There will be minor exceptions to the bilingual labelling requirements in certain circumstances where their mandatory application would obviously be impracticable or cause undue hardship. In general, however, most consumer products of both domestic and foreign origin will show the information on their labels in both English and in French by the end of 1975. It is recognized that imports may require special attention to ensure that foreign suppliers are aware of the bilingual requirements. Every effort will be made to encourage the earliest implementation of these new rules for imported products to the five-year target date. An interdepartmental committee will establish guidelines to ensure an orderly and efficient transition to this new policy.

[Mr. Basford.]

I wish to emphasize that what is provided in this bill has been demanded by consumers and consumers spokesmen for many years. This bill is designed to help achieve the demands and requests made to the government for many years. I urge consumers and consumer organizations to express their support for it. In fact, since the bill was made public, I have already had encouraging words of support from consumer organizations and I have told them that they can manifest their support by appearing before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs when, as I am confident will happen, this bill is referred to that Committee. I urge industry too, to get behind the bill, to give it their constructive support. I am confident that a careful reading of it will show that it is in the interests of that vast majority of honest and conscientious manufacturers who want to serve the consumers, just as it is in the interests of the consumers themselves. I am sure that this bill warrants the support of responsible businessmen. I urge them to continue this responsible support.

I trust that this bill will commend itself to all members of this House and that it will be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs at an early date where it will receive careful attention.

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the minister a question? I will not be responding to this motion. My question is in connection with the very important announcement made by the minister in respect of the bilingual aspect of labelling prepackaged products. This must not be misunderstood. Does the announcement which the minister has made on behalf of the government indicate the policy by which prepackaged products from abroad or manufactured in Canada will be required by a certain date, under the regulations which the Governor in Council will in due course establish, to have bilingual labels? If not, those who import goods into Canada, sell or advertise them will be subject to an offence and a penalty. One of the penalties is set out in the bill.

Mr. Basford: Subject to the exemption which I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that is the general thrust of the policy as announced.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, when the minister spoke on November 3, he used the Bible and the Magna Carta to substantiate his position with regard to the bill. Thank God he has not used them today as well as all his other platitudes and comments.

Mr. Basford: They are good authorities for legislation.

Mr. Howe: This bill is titled an act respecting the packaging, labelling, sale, importation and advertising of prepackaged and certain other products. This is an important bill. It affects the lives of all Canadians in that it relates to what they eat and what they buy on the market. It affects consumers, farmers and manufacturers. It enters into practically every type of business and organization in this country. This is one of the most complex and vital bills that has been introduced in this House for a long time.

I sometimes wonder whether items that are supposed to do so much good for the ills of the consumer actually work out that way. The modern market place is complex, reflecting, above all, the complexity of the needs and wants of consumers. Our marketing system has not developed willy-nilly, but rather includes a number of built-in safeguards, among them the basic intelligence and good sense of consumers, the role of retailers in tailoring available supply to customer demands, and existing laws providing consumer guarantees, standards and protection.

The minister stated that we have a great deal of legislation which deals with the protection of consumers. I wish to refer briefly to the legislation dealing with hazardous products. Great emphasis has been placed on the labelling of hazardous products. We seem to have overlooked the fact that hazardous products are detrimental to children. Many cases involving hazardous products concern children who are unable to read. Children are most often the victims of hazardous products such as bleaches, detergents, pills and other drugs. This packaging bill should place greater emphasis on safe packaging of pills, drugs, bleaches and other hazardous products that are easily accessible to children. Often their health is destroyed and in many cases they die.

The minister indicated that approximately 7,000 articles are available in today's supermarket. Within a few years this number will reach 20,000. This is a complex bill. Why were those who are involved with producing and selling packages not called upon for assistance in preparing this legislation? It is true the minister said they will be invited to appear before the committee, but I feel if the intention is to produce good legislation the people engaged in the business should be consulted at an early stage. After all, these packages and labels are all there for a reason. We have all seen what has happened in connection with other bills. Legislation is prepared and, in many cases, it falls short of what is required. Those who have had a tremendous amount of experience in the commercial and industrial world should be asked for assistance in situations of this kind. I am sure there are lots of manufacturers' organizations and consumers' groups who would be willing to assist in making sure that good legislation is put before the House.

The minister has told us that packaging is to be standardized. I cannot help wondering how soon it will be before there is a standardization of prices, before every package on every shelf in a store will carry the same price tag for comparable articles. For myself, I hope this time will never come, because if it did it would destroy the initiative of manufacturers, the desire of people to put a product on the market and work in the marketplace as they should.

We on this side of the House are a little disturbed about the legislation before us because, once again, we see that provision has been made for the governor in council to issue regulations. For example, he can exempt, conditionally or unconditionally, any pre-packaged product or class of pre-packaged products from any or all of the provisions of the act or regulations. This leaves the road open for a lot of possibilities. Even a little politics could enter, here. Someone who is a friend of the minister might be exempted from the effect of this legislation and he could place his product on the market without complying with the regulations laid down for others.

Then again, the minister indicated it might take five years for this measure to become effective. Well, in five years from now most of the produce presently on the shelves of merchants and retailers in Canada will have been replaced. The minister tells us that some packages are short-filled. I believe that in labelling, emphasis should be placed on the date of the package; a product may have been on the shelf for two years, and, naturally, there is shrinkage in this space of time. A number of products can, of course, be kept on shelves for long periods without deteriorating. Consideration should be given to this aspect. It occurs to me that another difficulty is likely to arise in connection with a wide range of imported products now available. Their number has increased year by year as many new Canadians come to this country and demand some of the products they have used at home.

We ought to consider carefully the effect this legislation is likely to have on the cost of living. It is true the proliferation of packages will probably be reduced, but the cost of altering the present system may well be substantial. I know, for example, that the cost of the box in which one company packs its woolen blankets is 50 cents. Under the legislation before us, this packaging might have to be changed. One can imagine the cost to the manufacturer if he is required to do so—and we must not forget that the cost of the packaging is added to the cost of the product itself.

I feel, sometimes, that some of these proposals intended to be for the good of the consumer do not, in the end, turn out to be much benefit when they are accompanied by government regimentation. In this case the cost of meeting new packaging requirements might add 2 per cent, 3 per cent, 5 per cent or even 10 per cent to the price in some cases. The expense might be enormous in some cases.

When we first look at this legislation it might appear to contain a good suggestion; we have all had our problems in the supermarkets in deciding between one package and another. But we should bear in mind that packages are arranged in the way they are, probably because consumers demanded packages of that type. It is not always the manufacturer who is to blame for the existence of all these types and varieties. Think of all the different soaps and detergents we can use nowadays, for example, the soaps made for use in dishwashers as distinct from washing machines. There is a tremendous complexity in this field.

When the bill gets to committee we must take a careful look at it. I was glad to hear the minister say that before the regulations were changed at any time consumer groups, manufacturers' groups and retailing interests would be allowed to consider them. I must say I do not see anything in the bill which says these groups will be consulted. I note that the regulations will be published in the Canada Gazette and a reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to consumers, dealers and other interested persons to make representations with respect thereto. But this appears to be putting the cart before the horse. If there are to be changes, they should be brought to the notice of the people most concerned before the regulations are drawn up. Then, when they are in the best possible form, they should be published. To my mind, this is the best way of proceeding, because once the regulations have been published in the Gazette it becomes more difficult to change them and this is bound to add to the complexity of the difficulties which the bill before us could create.

I sincerely hope the minister will afford an opportunity to all the groups he has signified to appear so that by the time the legislation is brought back to this House it will do for the consumers of Canada what the minister hopes it will do. I have my doubts in connection with the cost of this legislation and the length of time it will take before products already on the shelves have been bought or returned for repackaging or relabelling. As I said earlier, one of the main things we should be concerned with is the safety of containers in which hazardous products are offered for sale. This is as important as labelling, because children who sustain accidents through swallowing or coming into contact with injurious substances, cannot read.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to welcome this bill which I know will be well received by consumers across Canada. It has a great many good things in it. I want to discuss the bill under two headings: first, those things which are in the bill which I think are good and, second, one very important matter that is not dealt with in the bill and which I think it is essential that the minister take into consideration.

I was glad to hear the minister say that an opportunity will be provided people who are interested in the subject of labelling and packaging to make representations before any changes are made. I was even more glad to hear him suggest that consumers, manufacturers and other people interested would be welcome to appear before the committee when the bill is discussed in detail. I hope this means that witnesses will be called since the bill does make some new provisions. Most of the provisions were anticipated and were recommended by the report made by the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons of which the minister was co-chairman and which reported in the spring of 1967.

There is no doubt that the provisions in the bill have been requested over and over again by representative consumer groups, committees and commissions, as the minister has indicated. Some of the very good provisions are, firstly those that require a declaration on the label as to net quantity in terms of the weights and measures mentioned earlier. Secondly, there are provisions prohibiting false or misleading advertising and representation. I have drawn a lot of such cases to the attention of Box 99 and the minister, such as fruit drinks that are advertised in such a way as to make it appear they contain fruit juices, whereas in reality there is no fruit content in any way, shape or form but merely chemical compound. Thirdly, consumers have called for a long time for the number of servings to be indicated on the label. I do not mean by this a declaration that there are four, five or six servings, as the case may be; the quantity should be clearly stated in terms of appropriate weight or measure.

It is a good thing that the identity of the principal place of business of the manufacturer and other relevant information should be put on the label of a product. It is also a good thing that the product itself should be identified in terms of its generic or common composition or in terms of its function, namely what it does. It is a good thing that there is provision for information regarding the nature, quality and size of the product, and so on.

I also think that standardization of containers and the power to limit sizes or shapes of containers which are now in great profusion is a good thing. I have a distinct recollection of the prices committee visiting Fort William, or what was then Fort William and is now one half of the city of Thunder Bay, and being told by one consumer group that in one supermarket in town there were on the shelves 55 different kinds and sizes of packages of breakfast food.

I know that the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe) who has just taken his seat, expressed concern lest the minister use dictatorial power to cut down on the number of sizes and shapes of packages and thus unduly interfere; but I suggest that the consumers of this country are both bewildered and confused as well as annoyed by this proliferation of different sizes and shaped packages of prepackaged breakfast food, which is quite unnecessary and a nuisance to cope with.

It is also a good thing to make provison in the bill for banning the use of deceptive terms, such as "cents off", "special sale", "large", "jumbo", "king size", "giant size", "jumbo quart" and a whole host of misleading terms of that sort. All of these provisions are good, and there are others I could mention which the minister enumerated in general terms.

What I say now is, so far, so good. As far as the bill goes the consumers can hope that the legislation will work well, that it will deal effectively with a number of great nuisances and misleading and confusing practices. But I do not think that the bill goes far enough to protect consumers in the supermarket or in the market place. This bill is very like one passed in the United States in 1966 known, I think, as the Fair Packaging and Labelling Act. Consumers in the United States who hoped for protection found the legislation pretty frustrating and completely inadequate. Evidence of this is coming increasingly to hand. I am rather suprised that the minister, who must have been watching the situation there, has failed to see what I think is the central weakness in the United States legislation, the glaring omission that left consumers without the protection that they needed. What the United States bill left out was the real tool that shoppers must have if they are to determine the best value for their money. That tool is legislation that requires each package on the shelves to carry a label declaring the price per unit of the product inside the package. This provision is required in this bill and I hope there is sufficient representation before the committee for the minister to pause and to reconsider this legislation.

In case some hon. members are unfamiliar with the term "price per unit", may I briefly give this little summary taken from The Machinist, an American paper which puts the definition forward very succinctly. In the September 17 issue there appeared the following:

> Unit pricing is the practice of stating the price per unit (pound, quart or pint) as well as the price per can or other package.
> If you know the price per unit you can far more readily compare values and select the item offering the best value, regardless of its particular shape or size—which may be very deceptive.
>
> You can see the difference in cost among different brands, different sizes and different versions of the same food.
> The greatest differences revealed by unit pricing are often between the store's own brands and the national brands. But there are differences among the national brands too.

The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo expressed fears that this legislation would cause the minister to become dictatorial on the issue of the size and shape of packages. I notice these fears were also expressed in an editorial that appears in the Journal on November 5. The editorial questioned clause 11 of the bill and had this to say:

> —Section 11 of the bill . . . says the Minister may make regulations to avoid "an undue proliferation of sizes or shapes of containers". We see the intent: too many shapes and sizes make it hard for a customer to compare weights and prices. Yet—telling a manufacturer to label his goods honestly is one thing, but telling him he must use only such and such a package or container is moving into freedom of enterprise. It may not be a grave intrusion of free enterprise, but any such intrusion becomes a precedent and this one should be closely questioned by the opposition.

I imagine that in general this is the sort of fear expressed by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo. What a unit pricing system would do is remove this fear. With unit pricing, it would not matter what was the size or shape of the package. If the price per unit were stated on the package then consumers in general could tell exactly the value of what they are getting. I notice this question as to why there has been no unit pricing included in United States legislation has been asked in a number of places in the United States by consumer organizations. It must be remembered that consumer organizations in Canada as a rule have not caught on to this because they have not had familiarity with the Fair Packaging and Labelling Act of the United States. Consequently, they are unable to realize the shortcomings from their own experience. This is why I fail to see why the minister cannot take advantage of United States experience in order to avoid Canadian consumers having to go through a period of trial and error, having to learn the hard way.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Let me quote from the June issue of the 1969 edition of Consumer Reports:

> Why shouldn't all packages be labelled with the price per pound or pint or other relevant unit? In considering such a requirement, the drafters of the Fair Packaging and Labelling Act decided it might be too costly for the small independent grocer. Since manufacturers could not usually print prices on their packages without violating the laws against price-fixing, the price labelling job would fall, as it does now, to the retailer. But regional offices of supermarket chains could readily include unit prices on the master price lists sent to all store managers, and suppliers could equip small groceries with easy-to-use price tables. The extra cost, if any, would probably prove negligible.

I might add that the savings to the consumer would prove considerable, not only in money but in time and worry expended by women while they are fussing and wondering about which package offers the best value. Actually when this legislation was before Congress it had a provision for standardizing packaging which was at least a little more protective than our legislation. It required packages in sizes of pounds and half pounds which would allow the consumers to understand how much they were getting for their money. The Congress committee of the House of Representatives threw out this provision as a result of pressure by large commercial interests in the United States.

This is not an excuse for our minister to leave unit pricing out of his packaging and labelling bill. I hope the minister will reconsider and put it in. I might point out that in Canada there are many consumers who are concerned about this. I should like to quote from a brief I received not long ago from the Fédération des Magasins Co-op de Québec. Let me read this little quotation:

[Translation]

> Another aspect which has not been considered in that bill and which we are questioning at length deals with the application of the price per measure and unit. This measure enables consumers to choose any product by comparing the prices per unit of a specific measure and not only per packaging unit. It consists in generally indicating the price per ounce or per unit in the case of multiple packaging. It is thus easier to choose the most economic size.

[English]

I certainly hope when this matter comes before the committee representatives of the Fédération des Magasins Co-op will have an opportunity of coming here and discussing this matter with the minister and members of the committee. It seems to me that omitting unit pricing from the packaging and labelling bill will mean that consumers today will not discover very easily which product is cheaper. In fact they will not be able to discover this without a computing device of some type. Moreover it is all too easy for manufacturers to disguise the effects of inflation by putting just a little less of the product in the package and leaving the price unchanged.

I have taken many examples of this to Box 99. The minister of course, may agree with the Scott Paper Company which argued against the truth-in-packaging legislation in the United States as follows:

A woman in a store is a mechanism, a prowling computer—

Some women may be, but I have seen too many harrassed women pushing grocery carts in supermarkets, trying to hold on to a child with one hand and get packages off the shelves with the other, at the same time trying to watch a couple of other lively youngsters, in order to have any such comfortable illusions.

Trying under these circumstances to determine which is cheaper, the 12⅔ ounce package at 73 cents or the 1.8 ounce package at 81 cents is an exercise which can drive any "prowling computer" straight up the wall and turn her into a howling consumer in desperate need of tranquilizers.

I know the minister will tell the House he is going to get rid of all these fractions, and I am glad of that, but this is what the consumer is up against. While the minister might improve the situation, I do not think he will make it nearly 100 per cent as long as he does not embody this per unit pricing factor in the legislation. He may say that women can do just as well without this per unit pricing, but I should like to refer him to a couple of tests that were performed in the United States, one in 1962 and one in 1968.

Both these tests were conducted in the same supermarket in Sacramento, California. In each case there were five college educated housewives employed who shopped regularly for their family needs. I would not suggest that college training necessarily made better shoppers but these women were chosen because it was felt they would be able to discriminate. These groups of women in these periods of time, six years apart, were asked to disregard brand preference and quality. Each woman was instructed to purchase 14 specific average grocery items. They were told to buy the package which, in their opinion, offered the largest amount for the lowest unit cost.

It is interesting to note that the five women had a total of 70 items to buy on each occasion. In 1962, of the 70 selections the group made, 34 were wrong. That is almost one-half the total. In 1968, of the 70 selections made, 38 were wrong, and that is over one-half. In spite of the fact that these were sharp women consumers selecting articles they were buying all the time, the group in 1962 was wrong in just under half of their choices and the group in 1968 was wrong in just over one-half. I think these were pretty fair tests.

I maintain that if those women had the protection of price per unit legislation they would not have been able to go wrong in all those selections which they made. They would have known exactly what the price per unit was regardless of the look, shape or size of the package. This would seem to offer very conclusive evidence that without unit pricing, women on the prowl are not computers.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

The minister may still remain unconvinced of the fact that women without unit pricing are unprotected shoppers at the mercy of the market. I would like to see him do a little more investigation into this matter. It is all too easy for people who have been used to one way of doing it to say that we are smart enough to outwit deceptive packaging, particularly when the minister is proposing quite a few measures to do away with deceptive labelling and packaging, when he is trying to do away with slack fill, deceptive pictures, and other misleading practices.

• (5:30 p.m.)

I remember that a few years ago one of the ministers' assistants helped me to rectify a case of deceptive packaging. I refer to a package of cod fish fillets with a picture of five pieces of fish shown very clearly on the label. When the packages were opened, and we opened quite a few of them, there were exactly four pieces of fish inside. This may be mildly amusing to some members of the opposite sex in this chamber who do not have to get meals ready, but it is infuriating to women when they count on five pieces of fish, as shown on the package, and they find only four pieces inside.

The minister is doing a good job along these lines, but I wish he would go further. I wish he would put in what was omitted from U.S. legislation. I have given him evidence of it. I referred to the findings by U.S. consumers of the need for the price per unit being put on the package. I gave him the suggestion made by Consumer Reports—a publication with which he is familiar—that the cost would be negligible if the retailers were supplied with easy to use price tables. This would help women enormously. I know very well that the minister wants to help consumers become discriminating shoppers. He has said so himself. The most convincing thing he said was a few moments ago when he declared that he wanted them to come to the committee and make their voices heard. When he actually gets around to wanting to see them and hear what they have to say, I really believe he is in earnest. I will do my best to see that people with discrimination get to the committee in appreciable numbers.

I urge the minister to take to heart the findings of U.S. shoppers. If he really believes that the tests in the United States are not accurate, and that Canadian women may be able to outwit the packaging with the help of this legislation, I would like to offer him a challenge. I would like him to come with me some day to one of the supermarkets and to make a selection, a test, to see which of us could make the best choices. I really think we would both score fairly low on the totem pole. Perhaps the minister would come out ahead of me, I do not know. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has indicated that the minister has come a long way since he started. I know he would be very attentive to many details that might escape me, but I think both of us would do very badly in getting the best value and quantity in those packages. So, if he would like to do that some time after Christmas when his Christmas dinner has had a chance to settle and his new year celebration has become a pleasant memory, I shall be only too happy to have him accompany me to do that test.

Before this legislation goes through, I would like to see him convince himself that unit pricing is needed by consumers in this country to help them get the best value for their consumer dollar.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It is my duty at this time to remind hon. members that if the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) speaks now he will close he debate.

Mr. Basford: I have just had a most engaging invitation from the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) to go tiptoeing through the supermarkets with her. I am not sure, with women's liberation, and one thing and another, who would supply the money, or whether it would be proper for me to supply the money.

Mrs. MacInnis: It would be fifty-fifty; dutch treat.

Mr. Basford: I am not sure what my wife would think of it all. It is not every day that I get invited for a date with such an attractive member as is the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

I will touch very briefly on a number of points that were made, first, by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe). I appreciate what he had to say about hazardous products and their labelling and packaging. I know the hon. member has taken a great interest in the safe packaging of hazardous products, and I appreciated the comments he has made in the House over the years on this subject and the communications he has had with me. I think we have seen, in the last little while and we will see in the future, vast improvements in the area because we now have the Hazardous Products Act which deals with the sale, importation, packaging and advertising of products which are deemed hazardous or likely to be hazardous to the public. We are now taking steps by way of regulations and we will, as new designs and safer packages are developed, be able to regulate to ensure that products which are hazardous but still necessary are safely packaged so that the children of Canada are protected from them.

For example, just the other day we promulgated some regulations making it an offence to distribute a certain kind of very caustic cleanser from door to door by way of samples, because a particular firm distributing these samples had them slipped through the mail slot in the doors and children on the other side could pick them up and get seriously injured. We have now been able to pass regulations making that an offence. We have said that if people want to distribute this kind of product door to door they have to deliver the samples directly into the hands of the responsible householder. I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo on this subject, and I can assure him we are anxious to take whatever action is appropriate under the Hazardous Products Act to deal with the subject.

He also spoke about consultation. I should like to assure him that both I and my officials throughout the course of the preparation of this bill have consulted with various groups, the ones he mentioned as well as consumer groups and organizations such as the Grocery Products Manufacturers Association. Let me say that these consultations are not for the purpose of getting their agreement to the legislation but rather so that I, and officials of the department as well as people in the business, may have an understanding of each others position and attempt to write reasonable legislation which deals effectively with the problems. There has been such consultation in the past, and I am sure it will continue in the future. They of course are free to appear before the committee, and I know they will, to make whatever points they wish. To the extent that they can convince me and members of the committee that changes should be made, of course, the legislation will be improved.

I want to say one thing about people appearing before the committee. Of course it is a little presumptuous of me to say that because it is up to the committee to decide whether or not it wishes to hear people. However, I would urge the committee to do so because I know that there are people, other than government witnesses, who want to be heard. I know that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who will be a member of the committee, will urge that, and I hope the committee will decide to hear witnesses so that all points of view on this important piece of consumer protection legislation can be brought to the fore in the hearings of that committee.

May I say to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that I appreciate her complimentary remarks about the legislation, that it was dealing with a great many problems about which consumers have been complaining. I do not want at this point to get into an exhaustive discussion of the whole question of unit pricing, but let me say two things: from our point of view and the point of view of this legislation, there is a good deal more wrong with the U.S. truth-in-packaging legislation than simply the fact that it has left out unit pricing. The whole question of the proliferation, which is dealt with in Bill C-180, is far more effectively dealt with in Bill C-180 than it is in the U.S. bill. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I should not be commenting on the legislation of another country. But may I say, with respect to the hon. member, that it is an over simplification to suggest that all that is wrong with the United States legislation is that there is nothing in it with respect to unit pricing, and to suggest we have just copied the United States so our legislation has a big hole in it. The question is more complicated than that.

• (5:40 p.m.)

May I also say that we are not ignorant of this whole question of unit pricing. We have been following discussions on it extremely carefully. Officials of the department have gone to the city of New York, and I have visited with the Consumers Department in New York which is pioneering regulations in unit pricing. Officials of my office have made purchases in stores in Washington, D.C. which were being used experimentally to see how unit pricing worked. We have not written this into the legislation for reasons which we will have to discuss in the committee.

May I also say that the object of the consumer movement, as it is the object of the department, is to make it possible for consumers to make rational choices, informed choices, and to enhance the comparability of competing products. I think we can help accomplish this with Bill C-180, and I am sure we will discuss exhaustively in committee the reasons unit pricing is not contained within the provisions of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BORROWING POWER AND TERMINATION OF JURISDICTION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-179, respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-179, respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ANTI-DUMPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TRIBUNAL, INQUIRIES, REPORTS, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-6, to amend the Anti-Dumping Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-6, to amend the Anti-Dumping Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

LEPROSY ACT

PROVISION FOR REPEAL

Hon. Ron Basford (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-7, to repeal the Leprosy Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, perhaps one of the ministers could take this opportunity to give a brief explanation of the bill.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to repeal the Leprosy Act which has really fallen into dissuetude, and is no longer required on the statute books of Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to agree to the second reading of this bill at this time. We have done quite a good portion of work this Wednesday afternoon. Maybe we could get some other pieces of legislation through also.

Mr. Béchard: Old age pensions?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right. Maybe we could pass my amendment to retain the escalation clause with respect to the basic old age pension. However, I rose simply to say it is interesting to note that we have made sufficient progress in the field of health in Canada, so far as leprosy is concerned, that we do not need this legislation any more. It cannot be said that leprosy has been eradicated so far as the world scene is concerned, and I hope we will continue to make our contribution to the World Health Organization, and in other ways, towards needed improvement in health standards around the world. Meantime, it is good to note this forward step, and we are happy to agree to second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about taking up item No. 27?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have consulted with the representative of the Official Opposition and at the moment it is not certain whether there might not be a wish to have discussion on this order, No. 27, which is to refer the trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand to the External Affairs Committee. So, in accordance with that expression of opinion I thought I would not call that item today.

There are no other items that I would like to call today because of the arrangements that have been made up to the moment, but I wish to say that tomorrow probably we will continue with the Old Age Security Act, and that any regulations that might impede the submitting of amendments, or indeed the carrying of the bill to the third reading stage, might be waived so that, if we wish, we can complete the bill tomorrow.

As hon. members realize, there is a wish to dispose of the omnibus bill affecting various loans acts, and I would call this later in the week. Probably tomorrow we will begin with the Old Age Security Act, unless further consultation might lead to the conclusion that a very small amount of time would be spent in clearing that omnibus bill. In that event, I would call it first and then proceed with the Old Age Security Act, but that would not be done without further consultation.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I just thank the minister for not asking the House to proceed with the omnibus loans bill. One or two of our members who are interested in it are tied up in committee. After all, we have done pretty well today in dealing with six items of business. Perhaps with a good night's rest we might do a good day's work tomorrow.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, how can we have a good night's rest when we know it is the night for the annual Liberal party?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 5.53 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 17, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTES TO DR. MAURICE OLLIVIER, JOINT LAW CLERK AND PARLIAMENTARY COUNSEL, ON RETIREMENT—APPOINTMENT OF JOSEPH MAINGOT

Mr. Speaker: May I impart to the House the sad news that effective January 1 Dr. Maurice Ollivier will retire from the office of Joint Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the House of Commons.

On a brighter note, I am sure that hon. members will be pleased to know that Mr. Joseph Maingot will be promoted to succeed Dr. Ollivier. In the discharge of his previous responsibilities as Assistant Counsel, Mr. Maingot has earned the respect of all who have had occasion to seek his advice and guidance. We know that he will continue to serve members well in his new position.

At the same time, I am sure hon. members would want me to express their appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Maurice Ollivier who is leaving us after serving so many years in the high office of Parliamentary Counsel and Joint Law Clerk of the House of Commons. For close to half a century, Dr. Ollivier has dispensed knowledge and wisdom to generations of Members of Parliament, to political leaders, to successive Speakers.

[Translation]

His constantly alert intellect, his sound judgment and his dedication to duty made it possible for Dr. Ollivier to make his profound knowledge of parliamentary and constitutional law reliably and efficiently available to Parliament. His drive and his dedication both to hon. members and to the parliamentary institution itself were never found wanting.

In the course of his long career, Dr. Ollivier was able to adjust to all new situations. He possessed the ability to renew himself and to preserve his youth of spirit. Indeed, there has long been a suspicion that Dr. Ollivier has discovered the secret of perpetual youth and is jealously keeping it to himself.

Even after he leaves the House, he will therefore be able to pursue his professional and other activities with the same zeal and vigour that marked his work in the Parliament of Canada.

[English]

On behalf of the House, I reiterate to Dr. Ollivier the assurance of our gratitude for so many years of faithful service to the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted a few words on this occasion as one who first came to this Parliament in 1957 but before that had the experience of sitting in the Parliamentary Press Gallery as far back as 1949. I will not recall all the events that have happened since or even some of them, but I should like to pay tribute on behalf of my party to Dr. Ollivier who has been a most excellent parliamentary counsel. We wish his successor, Mr. Maingot, well.

• (2.10 p.m.)

Having known the great Dr. Ollivier over the years and having had the advantage of seeing some of his treasure house of documents concerning events that have happened in Parliament but which have not necessarily been reported, I hope that Your Honour and others will see fit to approach the Canada Council so that some of the documents that Dr. Ollivier has assembled dealing with the events of state over the past 50 years may be published in printed form. Having seen some of these documents which have never been publicized before, I am aware that among them are some of the most revealing and certainly some of the most interesting recollections pertaining to the development of Canada as a nation that one could ever hope to see.

I wish Dr. Ollivier well in his retirement and also his wife, Blanche. I wish the new parliamentary counsel well. I hope Your Honour will give some consideration to the thought I have directed to you today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, Your Honour has spoken so well on behalf of all of us that nothing needs be added, but on behalf of my party, I should like to re-echo most warmly everything you have said about Dr. Ollivier.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, from this corner of the House it is difficult for us to determine Dr. Ollivier's physical size, but nevertheless we have been able in the past to size him up from the standpoint of his efficiency, which, moreover, you have very well defined in your comments.

For the information of hon. members, Dr. Ollivier is a Quebecer, and members of the Ralliement Créditiste well recall that, in 1962, those among them who had no parliamentary experience were able to benefit from his wide knowledge and experience.

Should Dr. Ollivier have kept to himself the secret of eternal youth, we hope that his retirement will give him the opportunity to write his memoirs through which we will be able to learn of his vast and varied experience as Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the House of Commons.

By the way, I believe that no one is better able than Dr. Ollivier to record for the enlightenment and pleasure of future generations the events which took place in Canada in the last 25 years.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we are grateful to you for bringing to the attention of the House of Commons this important event and for giving us the opportunity to express our admiration to Dr. Ollivier for the many years of outstanding service that he has rendered to the House of Commons. That he has been able to withstand the vicissitudes and controversies of this place for 40 years and still retain a youthful image that might be the envy of men much younger is no mean record.

I join with you, Mr. Speaker, and with the representatives of the other parties in thanking Dr. Ollivier for his services and express the wish that he will continue his contacts with all of us in future. I also express our good wishes to the new incumbent of the office, Mr. Maingot, in the expectation that he will be here 40 years hence and that the rest of us will also be here to express appreciation to him.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS CONCLUDED BY CANADA

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have tabled in English and French a number of international agreements concluded by Canada over the course of the last 16 months.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

LACK OF SUPPORT FOR CONFERENCE ON REDUCTION OF TARIFFS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce following the questions I directed to him the other day with regard to Canada's trade position. In view of the lack of support by Prime Minister Heath yesterday for another general conference on the reduction of tariffs at the present time, is the government simply going to continue to push for this kind of consultation despite the lack of support from the United States, the European Common Market and Great Britain, or is a new approach being considered in view of these rejections?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Leader of the Opposition is not aware of the fact that in Europe and the United States the views that I expressed the other day in answer to some of his questions have also been expressed. They are not so extraordinary as to be the exclusive property of the Canadian government. These views are shared by a number of political leaders throughout the world. I have already indicated that among many others, the Director General of GATT supports some of these same concepts. I would not like to say who first expressed these views, but they are so much in the long term interests of the world that it was quite normal that they should be shared by a great number of people.

Mr. Stanfield: Are we to understand that the minister is not considering a different approach despite the rejection of the initiative on the part of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if one can dignify it in that way? When the minister spoke of bargaining power in connection with these matters, particularly with relation to the Common Market, what did he mean? What is this bargaining power and when does he propose to exercise it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the minister's reply will be brief. I would not think he should give an extended explanation of what he may have said or may have wanted to say. Perhaps the minister would co-operate with the Chair by making a brief reply to the rather general question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pepin: It is obvious that Canada is a major world trading power, with $17 billion in exports and more than $14 billion in imports. The import market represents a market to which Europe, the Common Market, the United Kingdom and other countries are certainly not indifferent. This means something in international conferences and negotiations.

Mr. Stanfield: Since it is apparent that the minister and his associates are simply making gestures which are not leading to any response, will the minister consider asking his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to go to Europe on a speaking tour to see what he can do?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

OIL

INVESTIGATION OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF CRUDE—REQUEST FOR TWO-PRICE SYSTEM—ACCESS TO UNITED STATES MARKET

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of the fact that three of the leading oil companies have now increased the price of crude oil by 25 cents a barrel following the example of the oil companies in the United States. Since representatives of these oil companies have indicated that the increase is not due to any increase in costs—as a matter of fact oil company profits increased in the first nine months of this year—but is due to the fact that the oil companies are following the example of oil companies in the United States, may I ask the minister whether his department intends to take any action with respect to this increase and, in particular, whether the National Energy Board has this question under study and has made any recommendation to him regarding it?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The hon. member may not be aware that in Canada it is the buyer who fixes the price for oil. The buyers are paying more for crude oil now and hence their profits will diminish, if anything, rather than increase. The change should, of course, increase the profits of the producers. As far as any review of this matter is concerned, there is no review under way. I might point out that with respect to crude prices there has been no increase since 1962, so I think this industry has been very responsible in showing price restraint. Any increases that have been made have been the result of taxation by provincial governments, not of increased product prices.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I do not think that is so. The minister seems to have forgotten the increase in the prince of gasoline that took place only a few months ago.

In view of the fact that the oil companies will now make an additional $350,000 a day as a result of this price increase, and since the government has already set a two-price system for gas and as the Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce has set a two-price system for copper—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would proceed to ask his question. We are reaching the point of argument now.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Will the minister give consideration to setting a two-price system for oil so that Canadian prices will not automatically be established in terms of United States prices as is apparently the case now?

Mr. Greene: No contemplation is being given to a two-price system for oil, but I would point out to the hon. member with respect to his political claims in this regard that we would sell no oil at all in the United States market if it were a completely open market. It is a highly protected market, a market protected at the expense of United States consumers, and access to that market is certainly a great opportunity for Canadian oil producers.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister, then, precisely what are the arrangements concerning access to the United States market? Are there still to be quotas with importers of Canadian oil allowed to use their overseas allotment to buy Canadian oil, or is there to be unimpeded access to the United States market during 1971?

Mr. Greene: As indicated subsequent to our meetings with our United States counterparts in this regard, we are moving toward an open market. We are still under restrictions, of course, but the market has improved at the rate of some 15 per cent a year. I believe the communiqué issued subsequent to our meetings indicated we would be moving to the full pipeline capacity available in Canada during 1971, and I think this is evidence of a continually improving market to the benefit of Canadian producers.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition on a supplementary question but I wonder whether we might not give some thought to trying to limit supplementaries on the first questions each day. It has been our experience in recent weeks, more so from day to day, that if there are many supplementaries on the first two or three questions most of the question period is spent on these lead-off questions. I would think it might be helpful to those hon. members not seated in the first or second rows if we were to limit supplementaries at the beginning of the question period.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to attack the minister nor to defend the provincial governments but to ask him whether he would check the statement he made that there have been no increases in the retail prices of oil products, as I understood him to say, since 1962 other than those to compensate for increases in provincial taxes?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to check that statement but it is my understanding that since 1962 there have been no increases. If that is not correct, I will inform the hon. member.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF UNITED STATES COMMUNIST PARTY INTO CANADA

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice.

Can he state whether his department is aware of and inquiring about present infiltration into Canada by the American Communist party which, with the help of outstanding Canadian personalities, publishes documents tending to undermine Canadian democracy and unity?

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Abitibi wish to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Laprise: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has any knowledge of evidence heard by the Senate sub-committee on internal security, as well as of reports and laws concerning security in the United States which were the subject of a study under the direction of Senator James O. Easland? Does he intend to get himself acquainted with these in order to find out what does take place in Canada regarding infiltration by the Communist Party?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I shall read this report, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUITABILITY OF CF-5 PLANES FOR CANADA'S ROLE IN NATO—NUMBER IN USE, IN STORAGE AND TO BE DELIVERED

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. The minister advised the House on October 5 that he was immediately sending some CF-5 planes to Europe for testing to see whether they would fit in with our NATO role and thus be available for use in that role. Has the minister found out as a result of his latest trip whether these planes are suitable for this role, and can he advise the House how many of them are going to be used?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the aircraft sent at that time were tried in the central European area and went through a number of tests. They are now at a holding base in Europe. We also plan to put them through similar tests in what is called the northern tier of the alliance, probably some time in the new year when arrangements can be made with the local authorities, and very likely when we will be having a battalion battle group exercise in the northern tier. So evaluation is taking place both with regard to their use on the central European front and in the northern tier, but this evaluation has not yet been completed.

Mr. Hees: Can the minister advise the House how many of the 115 original CF-5 planes were placed in storage as a result of the fact that the original order was not cancelled, even though our United Nations role was cancelled some two years ago? How many of these aircraft are still in storage in Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As of November 15, Mr. Speaker, there were 57 in various types of operational use, there were 22 in temporary storage, and there are 36 yet to be delivered in Canada.

AIR REFUELLING CAPABILITY OF CF-5 PLANES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. How many of these CF-5 aircraft have been converted to accept an air refuelling capability?

[Mr. Laprise.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that none of them at this moment have been. At the present time two of the C-137's, the 707's, are in the hands of the manufacturers for conversion to air refuelling capacity.

Mr. Forrestall: Could the minister indicate whether or not it is the policy of the department to convert these aircraft in light of the conversion program being carried out on the 707's?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, that would be the intention. I speak subject to correction, but I do not think that the CF-5 aircraft require too extensive a modification for this purpose.

METHOD OF PURCHASE OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Will the Minister of National Defence say whether tenders were called for the purchase of these CF-5 aircraft from Canadair?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as has been the case in respect of the vast majority of aircraft purchased by the Department of National Defence over a number of years the purchase contract was negotiated. This has been the procedure with aircraft contracts so they can be manufactured in Canada rather than purchased abroad.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

EFFECT ON OTTAWA OF CNR REDUCTIONS OF EMPLOYEES, FACILITIES AND OTTAWA-MONTREAL SERVICE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question, knowing that he is as interested as all his predecessors were in ensuring that the city of Ottawa is a capital city worthy of Canada. Will he look into the reduction of airline employees by some 33 per cent in Ottawa and the removal of certain of its facilities here? At the same time, will he give his attention to the announced intention of the CNR to downgrade the four Ottawa-Montreal runs and to discontinue the dining and parlour car services between Ottawa and Montreal effective February 1? Transportation is very material and necessary, and what is being done will result in making Ottawa a "tank town" as far as transportation facilities are concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to refer this matter to the Minister of Transport and discuss with him any suggestions he may have.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister take a stand on this matter in order to assure that the city of Ottawa shall not be sacrificed in respect of transportation facilities? That is what I asked but apparently he does not agree to do so.

HEALTH

REPORTED HAZARDS OF SHELL VAPONA INSECTICIDE STRIP

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can either minister indicate whether an inquiry or study is being made at this time into the reported health hazards of the household insecticide-killing strip produced by the Shell Oil Company, the Vapona strip?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, actually the question should have been referred to the Minister of Agriculture under whose jurisdiction the control of pesticides falls. Very extensive tests of this product are being conducted in consultation and co-operation with my department and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Mather: Can the minister indicate when the results of such tests might be available?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are sending out a press release today and I would be happy to send a copy to my hon. friend.

AIRPORTS

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—EXPROPRIATION OF LAND

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should have like to put a question to the Minister of Transport, but since he is away I shall direct it to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

We have learned that as a result of land expropriation for the construction of the airport in Ste. Scholastique, a great number of farmers, that is about 600, suffer serious prejudices as their rights are being encroached upon. I have also learned that they made some representations to the government in November, but that they have not yet obtained an answer. Could the minister tell us when and how the government intends to solve their problems?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will be pleased, Mr. Speaker, to pass on the question to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Asselin: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the urgency of the matter, could the hon. minister ask the Minister of Transport to make a clear and precise statement on motions about the government's position in that regard?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I shall also refer that question to the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

GRAIN

PRESENCE OF WEEVILS OR MITES IN WHEAT SHIPMENTS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the other day the Minister of Agriculture indicated to the House that he had received no complaints from foreign buyers in respect of rusty beetles in grain. Since he chose to be technical, has he had any complaints about weevils, mites or any other contamination in grain shipped to other countries? If he has, would he indicate which countries they are and how extensive the contamination was?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there have been some complaints and, indeed, even some claims based on these complaints. I should advise the House that this is not the first time this has happened, and indeed they have not been much greater this year than in previous years. I will be glad to give the hon. member the other details as to the countries and the number of cargoes as soon as I have them.

Mr. Korchinski: Since it appears that the inspection is at fault here, is the government prepared to accept the responsibility?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the inspection service is not at fault.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES ON TRIP TO JAPAN

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Will he soon report on motions about his trip to Japan?

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister did not understand my question. I simply asked for a statement on motions in respect of his recent trip. Would he make such a report?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I had not contemplated making such a statement, but as the hon. member has indicated interest I will consider his proposition.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABORTION—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT IN LIGHT OF REPORTED ILLEGAL OPERATIONS IN QUEBEC

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Justice received the report of le Centre de Planning Familial du Québec which estimates that during the past 12 months between 10,000 and 25,000 illegal abortions took place in the province of Quebec compared with 181 legal abortions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether it is sufficient merely to ask whether a minister has received a report. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase her question.

Mrs. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase it and ask a supplementary. In view of the report of le Centre de Planning Familial du Québec to the effect that during the past 12 months there have been an estimated 10,000 to 25,000 illegal abortions in that province compared with 181 legal abortions, when does he intend to change the law to permit women to obtain legal instead of illegal abortions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression this question has been asked on a number of occasions. If the minister feels he has anything to add to his earlier answers he might be allowed to reply now.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I have nothing to add, Mr. Speaker, except to say I cannot accept the preamble to the report, which I have not read, but because of the insistence of the hon. lady I will read the report.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Can he tell the House whether there have been official negotiations between his department and the Quebec Roads Department with regard to the construction of East-West Expressway in Montreal?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, there have been no official negotiations. So far, there have only been unofficial talks through third parties.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ASSISTANCE IN CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND UNIONS TO AVOID INTERRUPTION OF GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in view of the critical importance of uninterrupted shipments of grain at this time, what steps, if any, is the Minister of Labour taking to assist in the current negotiations between the railways and the unions?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at the request of both parties we have placed at their disposal the efforts of Mr. Kelly and Mr. Gibbons of our special mediation department. I am very encouraged that the request has come from both management and labour. This indicates that both sides are approaching collective bargaining in the right spirit.

POST OFFICE

RESTORATION OF SATURDAY MAIL DELIVERY IN LIGHT OF MASS MEDIA REPORT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General of Canada. In light of the searing but sensible strictures against the abolition of Saturday mail delivery made by the Davey Committee, can he advise whether steps are in progress or in contemplation to accept the findings of this careful study and to restore to Canadian people six-day mail delivery?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my colleague will undoubtedly answer that question tomorrow.

I am afraid we have not received the assurance we would like. May I therefore—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I will reword the question. Can the minister now state what our commitment at the conference will be, and can he assure the House that Canada will not sign the protocol?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated to the hon. member, the intention of the Canadian government is to listen and participate in the discussion and to do nothing that will prejudge its position prior to receiving the final report of the Le Dain Commission.

It is mighty cold outside.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED SALE OF ARMS BY BRITAIN TO SOUTH AFRICA—IMPORT OF DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN CANADIAN AND BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in his conversations with the Prime Minister of Great Britain yesterday he was able to persuade the British Prime Minister to change his government's position with regard to the sale of arms to South Africa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had these very interesting discussions with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. I did not demand of him an expression of what his final position would be. I just pleaded with him that it would be in the interests of all of us if we went to Singapore and had these meetings at which the representatives of all countries would be free to express their views and at which, hopefully, an accommodation could be found which would keep the Commonwealth alive and healthy.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that three leaders of African nations are reported to be considering whether they should attend the conference as a result of Mr. Heath's statement in Ottawa yesterday, was the question of representation at the conference discussed with Mr. Heath and has the Prime Minister found it desirable to take any steps to persuade the African leaders to come to Singapore despite Mr. Heath's statement?

Mr. Trudeau: The information we have in respect of any such statements by African leaders is purely that contained in news reports. We have no direct news that they in fact did say what they are alleged to have said. The House knows that I did have Professor Head visit them last week in order to advise them of the Canadian viewpoint. Indeed, after my meeting with Mr. Heath, last night I also communicated again with President Nyerere expressing the hope that the result would be that which I mentioned in answer to the first question.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of the question yesterday and I have inquired into the matter. I find that the report of the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board was made in October, 1969, and at that time the conclusions were that the tidal power did not come within economic range. The report has been under review since that date and is continually under review, but factors have not so changed, since October 1969 as to render the conclusions any different now.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I did inquire about this but I can change my answer to the hon. member only as far as this: for some time I have been telling him "in a few weeks from now". Today, I am telling him "in a few days from now".

GRAIN

RETENTION OF TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is responsible to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board. Now that it has become generally apparent that farmers and farm organizations insist that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act remain in effect, will the minister give the House the assurance that this in fact will be the case?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, once again the premise of the hon. member is wrong. I have had meetings with producers and producer organizations as recently as yesterday. We discussed the proposals we have put forward and their priorities in respect of the kind of things which should be done. We will be proceeding with the development of these proposals in the future.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

INSTITUTION OF STABILIZATION FUND PROPOSAL ON VOLUNTARY BASIS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the recommendation outlined in the task force report on agriculture, in which it is stated that the grain stabilization proposal should be instituted on a voluntary rather than on a compulsory basis, has the minister responsible for the Wheat Board considered proceeding with such a program on a voluntary basis?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Generally speaking, the representatives of the farmers and farm groups have not suggested a voluntary basis for the program, which would in fact make it more difficult to operate. Indeed, the representations in respect of the stabilization fund have tended to be to extend its operation so that it covers more grain for more farmers.

PRODUCTION AND RECEIPTS POLICY—ACCEPTANCE OF MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN WHEAT POOL PROPOSALS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the opinions expressed by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the Manitoba Wheat Pool and the specific changes they are requesting in the ministers' proposals, is the minister going to accept any of these proposals or make any modifications to the plan in light of these requests?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, representatives of those organizations were included in the meetings held yesterday and as a result of those meetings we are considering the development of the proposals as I indicated earlier. I am not sure I know what particular proposals the hon. member may be referring to since there a number of different sets in respect of the proposals as a whole.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have nothing to report to the House at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been recognized for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Gleave: At an early date will the minister make a statement on motions in regard to the futures market for rapeseed and in regard to the cereal grains program which he has under way?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly continue to try to keep the House as fully informed as possible, and make a statement when I have something to add to the information I have given.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. In light of the pamphlet put out by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board dealing with its new grain policy—

Mr. Korchinski: This is the official document—

Mr. Basford: Oh, I thought it was the Gallup poll.

Mr. Korchinski: May I rephrase the question?

Mr. Speaker: Obviously the question is not acceptable and it is not possible to ask a supplementary to a question which is not in order.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the $200 million innovative program of 1970 produced many benefits and we are in the process of evaluating them. Prime Minister. Will the government not compensate, by greater income tax exemptions per child, those people who are likely to be deprived of family allowances?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has made its views known on this in the white paper, and we are obviously open to representations from all parts of the country on this matter. Can he say whether the government intends to change the lay-out of the East-West highway in Montreal or to have it changed, following objections raised by the Secretary of State, the hon. member for Hochelaga?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the hon. member may phrase his question in this manner. If he wants merely to put it, without the corollary, I think that it would be more in order. Anyway, the minister may want to answer it.

[English]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not particularly anxious to answer. The program for the Trans-Canada Highway closes on December 31 this year, and any projection or announcements made by the province of Quebec would be on its own responsibility. I think any question with regard to any involvement on our part should more properly be addressed to my hon. friend, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, could I avail myself of the opportunity offered by the Minister of Public Works and ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion if the lay-out suggested by the province of Quebec will definitely be accepted by the federal government?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a point of order, but we have reached the end of the question period.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, about 20 minutes ago I asked the Prime Minister to indicate whether he would do something for these poor people outside the building so they could go back home to their families for Christmas, but the Prime Minister would not indicate one way

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the men were out there last summer when it was very much warmer at a time when the government had offered them all jobs in the public service. I hope the hon. member will remember this, and perhaps talk to them and remind them of it. INCARCERATION OF YOUTHS CONVICTED OF NON-CAPITAL MURDER IN PRINCE ALBERT INSTITUTION RATHER THAN COMMON JAIL Right Hon. J. G. The minister has been trying repeatedly to get your eye, and I understand the difficulty, but could there be an extension of the question period so he can answer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister did get the eye of the Speaker but I was trying to accommodate as many hon. members as possible. The Minister of Justice has had his opportunity on a few occasions today to show his wisdom and knowledge, but if the House agrees, he might be allowed to reply to the question asked by the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, because of the point of order on which you ruled in favour of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond yesterday, I have not been able to bootleg in some answers today. However, in answer to the right hon. gentleman, I did get a report from the penitentiary service about a question he put to me yesterday. I am not satisfied with that answer, and I intend to communicate with the right hon. gentleman when I get an answer that satisfies me and, I hope, satisfies him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister find out whether an arrangement was made between the government of Alberta and the government of Canada to allocate these prisoners to the Prince Albert penitentiary while they await the result of an appeal, which in my opinion is a totally callous and unjustifiable action?

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION ON MEASURES TO BE TAKEN

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of the orderly conduct of the business of the House, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question arising out of the debate on Tuesday last respecting the alarming increase in unemployment among our young people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust a question will not be asked as a point of order. The question period expired some minutes ago. If hon. members are allowed, to use the word of the Minister of Justice, to "bootleg" questions after the question period, I think we will get into difficulty. If the hon. member has a legitimate point of order I will hear it so he may indicate what the point of order is.

Mr. Mazankowski: My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if he intends to make a statement prior to the adjournment of the House respecting any positive measures to be taken by the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not, of course, a point of order. However, the member having asked the question, if the minister wishes to reply I shall then call orders of the day for the third time.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have no plans for a statement on motions.

Mr. Stanfield: You don't have any plans—period.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for Peace River is rising on what I gather will be a legitimate point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: My point of order is legitimate and not bootleg, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Government House Leader about the business for today and tomorrow, and if he can divulge his Christmas plans so that we may make ours accordingly?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we intend to call the Old Age Security Act as the first item of business today. If we make good progress on that, we will also call the omnibus loan bill today and maybe ask consent to clear the report stage of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I know this depends upon the good will of my hon. friend and others.

Tomorrow, we hope to begin consideration of the Regional Incentives Act. As my hon. friend is aware, that will require consent, in order to waive the notice provisions, which I shall be asking from the House at a later date. I propose to call the motion tomorrow providing that the House will adjourn when we return from the Royal Assent for the supply bill and any other measures. We will return on January 11. My expectation is that we can adjourn tomorrow as planned, and that we can clean up all the business that we had foreseen as possible earlier in the week.

In making that expectant comment I should like to express my appreciation of the co-operation received, and my expectation of further co-operation later in the day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a supplementary point of order? I suggest to hon. members that actually the point of order raised by the hon. member is really a question, and perhaps we should try to have it brought in as a question during the normal question period, rather than as a point of order six or seven minutes after the question period has expired. I would think that any supplementary question and supplementary answer might give rise to a debate which would not be very helpful at this time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AMOUNT OF PENSION, MAXIMUM SUPPLEMENT AND ESCALATION THEREOF

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-202, to amend the Old Age Security Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the first motion in the report stage of the bill now up for consideration, I should like to indicate that the Chair has reservations and misgivings about the procedural acceptability of motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) and motion No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard).

It seems that both motions propose to introduce financial provisions which go beyond the terms of the royal recommendation. I shall be pleased to hear argument in connection with these two motions, however, before a ruling is made on this procedural standpoint.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Lotbinière want to clarify for the Chair the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like, as briefly as possible, on behalf of my colleague for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) to refer to his motion to amend clause 1 by deleting all the words after the word "of" in lines 10 and 11 at page 1 and substituting therefor:

"one hundred and fifty dollars to every person who has attained sixty years of age."

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Speaker, we feel the amendment is acceptable, for the following reason.

At the time the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) tabled the White Paper on Income Security, he gave some explanations about the bill he was introducing, thus starting the discussion on two main points, namely the amount of the pension and the age of eligibility for this pension.

The Ralliement Creditiste agrees that the government has the right to impose certain financial limits to this bill, but just as the government may invoke the principle that the old age pension will be paid to everyone aged 65, we feel that this bill should apply to those aged 60 and over.

In this way, it may result in the passage of additional appropriations but the bill in itself provides only for the allowance of additional appropriations, which, in fact, changes the substance of the present act so that were we unable to amend this point in clause 1, I wonder what would be the meaning of the present debate since its aim is to determine who will be entitled to old age security under Bill C-202.

Therefore, we should like to discuss this motion briefly because we believe that we should extend the scope of the legislation. In this regard, we meet the request of the minister who asked us to look further into this bill.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: If these are the only submissions to be made for the guidance of the Chair, perhaps I might be allowed to make a ruling on both motions. I think hon. members will gather that I have to give effect to the misgivings I had about these two motions. I do not think, and I am speaking very honestly at this time, that any serious harm will be done because I gather that the motion moved by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) is very close to that moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The arguments which the hon. member for Simcoe North would have made on his motion could very well be made in support of the motion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Translation]

As regards the motion—

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. Were you about to deliver a ruling on both motions?

Mr. Speaker: I was about to deliver a ruling on both motions. I had invited comments on both because, in my opinion, they were faulty in the same way and for the same reasons. I felt that the arguments advanced in support of one motion would be arguments in favour of the other, and that arguments in opposition to one would be arguments in opposition to the other. As I indicated a short while ago, the difficulty relates to the limitations of the royal recommendation.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I recognize that, Your Honour. I only received a watching brief shortly after lunch and it may well be that I may have some rather unique and unusual arguments in addition to the first rate arguments advanced by my friend from Lotbinière. These arguments may persuade Your Honour to depart from the ruling which I feel you were going to deliver and which might not be in accordance with what would be acceptable, or at least, would not make us happy.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I think that there is a situation here which might well be considered by the Chair. Although I understand that it is not the duty of the Chair to be daringly innovative with regard to the rules, and I do not say that disparagingly, nevertheless there is a point of view that I want to put before Your Honour. It may be that you will think, on the basis of precedents and citations, it is not a valid proposition and that you cannot accept it. On the other hand, if I argue the matter, my argument may commend itself to the House for some future action.

Without question, it is increasingly difficult for hon. members these days, outside of matters that are referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, to adopt that changing and contemporary approach which to some extent is required with regard to matters such as I am about to raise. From time to time precedents are set which are not subject to an appeal in any way to the House. Consequently, when a new approach is introduced, an approach such as I suggest this is, it is no easy matter for Your Honour, no matter how well disposed you may be, to accept the new proposition. To put it shortly, the amendment which is proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) suggests a variation in the payment of the old age security allowance. I put it to Your Honour that we must look at the source from which this fund comes. Although I do not have the chapter before me, I believe a chapter in the Statutes of Canada, 1952, established the old age security fund. As a result of the terms of the pertinent legislation, as amended in 1967, that fund was established as a trust fund within the four corners of the consolidated revenue fund. That trust fund is charged with the payment of moneys to meet the old age security payments which are being varied by the legislation now before the House. To meet these, there has been 2 per cent added to the sales tax, 3 per cent to corporate income tax and a 4 per cent levy with regard to personal income tax which go into the trust fund.

My proposition is this, Mr. Speaker. When a fund of this kind is established, it is competent for a member of this House to propose variations of the scheme of payments made in legislation such as the House is now considering, provided that that proposal will not so draw upon that old age security fund as to make it essential for further taxes or levies to be imposed on the people of Canada.

It is difficult for us to know what was in the minds of those who enacted section 54 of the British North America Act. I am sure that they did not contemplate the kind of arrangements which have been worked out with regard to this particular fund, the unemployment insurance fund, the Canada Pension Fund, and so on. For that reason, I submit that judicial notice should be taken of the fact that there is now a surplus of $1 billion in the old age security fund. The very modest and reasonable increase proposed in the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe North is not in any way so alarming as to deplete this fund. The proposal would not in any way involve a tax or impost. It would neither change the government's revenues nor cause the Crown and the ministers involved to impose further taxation. I, therefore, submit that a trust fund of this nature, which is charged with these particular payments, may be varied in the sense that the hon. member for Simcoe North is attempting to vary it.

Before sitting down, may I add that Your Honour, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I had an interesting exchange on November 20, last year, when we were dealing with the water bill. At that time I took the position which I fear Your Honour is likely to take now. I argued that the imposition of such tolls and fines as were contemplated for certain purposes in that bill constituted such an imposition of taxation as required a variation in the royal recommendation. Your Honour held that so far as that aspect was concerned, it was not a tax which required a variation in the royal recommendation. I put that point to Your Honour in the hope that the most competent authority in the House today, Mr. Speaker, will support my proposition.

Mr. Speaker: May I first refer to motion No. 2, which stands in the name of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin).

[Translation]

Motion numbered 2 in the name of the hon. member for Portneuf, it seems to me, is clearly beyond the provisions of the royal recommendation. It is in this regard and strictly from the standpoint of procedure that I take the liberty of informing the hon. member for Portneuf and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) that the motion is out of order.

The arguments which the hon. member for Lotbinière has presented for the consideration of the hon. members and of the Chair are interesting and relevant, but they are of the kind that could be submitted during the debate in support of the motion made by the hon. member. I hope that in the course of the debate this afternoon or tonight—or perhaps tomorrow or even next week, which none of us would wish—the hon. member for Portneuf, the hon. member for Lotbinière as well as other hon. members will nevertheless have the opportunity to bring in the arguments of which the hon. member for Lotbinière has just advised us.

Just the same, as far as I am concerned, I must keep not to the gist of the hon. member's proposal but to his view on procedure. And in my opinion, the hon. member's proposal would establish a universal monthly payment to every person who has attained the age of sixty years. If my memory serves me right, such universal payment would amount to $150.

Citation 246(3) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, reads as follows:

(3) The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

In other words, it must be recognized that the royal recommendation establishes the terms and conditions of the financial liabilities which may be proposed to the House, and in this sense the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf is not in order.

[English]

I should like now to deal with the motion which stands in the name of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). Despite the very brilliant argument submitted by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), I find it difficult to ignore the long standing doctrine relating to the financial initiative of the Crown. The hon. member was arguing in the House just the other day that a certain bill would require the royal consent. I think if this House were at any time desirous of changing the doctrine of the financial initiative of the Crown, the royal consent might very well be necessary on that one point. If the hon. member presented the argument that I should have to consider very seriously whether this proposal would not effectively affect one of the prerogatives of the Crown, perhaps I might need to go into the matter more deeply. Yet perhaps that is not necessary.

There are a few more points of view which I was tempted to go into; I suggest to hon. members that that is not necessary. I have expressed the basis on which I have to make the suggestion to hon. members that the motion should not be put.

Before the first motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is put by the Chair, I should like to suggest that motions 1 and 3 might be considered and voted upon as one proposition. Perhaps I might hear from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in this regard.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy with Your Honour's suggestion that motions Nos. 1 and 3 be combined for one debate and one vote, unless, of course, there is unanimous approval of the proposal contained in these two motions. The reason there are two motions is that it seems necessary to make changes in clause 1 of the bill and to delete clause 2 in order to achieve the purpose I have in mind. I am quite happy with Your Honour's suggestion to combine the motions for one debate and one vote.

Earlier today I had a conversation with the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). He was hopeful but apprehensive as to whether his motion would be in order. He suggested that if his motion was not in order he would be happy to second my motion. I welcome his support, unless the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) or another government member would prefer to second it.

Mr. Speaker: I will put the motion.

[Translation]

I see that the hon. member for Lotbinière wants to have the floor. He wishes perhaps to raise a point of order. With his permission I will now read the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and then ask the hon. member for Lotbinière whether he still wants to raise a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That Bill C-202, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended by deleting from Clause 1 lines 4 to 11 at page 1.

Mr. Speaker: By order of the House, motion No. 3 is being combined with motion No. 1 on the understanding that the debate can range on both motions and they will be subject to one vote. I will put motion No. 3.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That Bill C-202 to amend the Old Age Security Act be amended by deleting Clause 2 therefrom.

Mr. Speaker: Before calling on the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I will call on the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

[Translation]

Does the hon. member for Lotbinière wish to raise a point of order?

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I did not dare interrupt you when you made your ruling, on motion No. 2, but when I made my comments to prove the validity of this amendment, I did not have the Standing Orders at hand. Now that I have them, I would like to quote Standing Order 63.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will allow the hon. member a few moments to make his point, but he will recognize that it is altogether out of order to have a debate on a point of order after a ruling has been made by the Chair. In any event, the hon. member will perhaps be able, with leave of the House, to briefly put forward the arguments he wanted to submit to the Chair a moment ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, what has prompted the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) to move this amendment is Standing Order 63 of the House of Commons which reads as follows:

All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, it is our duty as parliamentarians, not only to take part in this debate, but to make proposals and suggest limitations as I was saying at the beginning, according to this Standing Order, because we feel that as legislators it is our duty to take part in the drafting of a bill.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for having drawn the attention of the Chair to the provisions of Standing Order 63. The hon. member will agree that even though everything in this Standing Order is correct, there is no question of expressing doubt regarding one jot of it. All this remains subject to the initiative of the Crown to introduce in the House the aids referred to, the allotment of supplies and the expenditures. Thus, it is the gift of Parliament, that is the House, once the introduction has been made, with the consent of the Crown. The hon. member is right, but to a certain extent only. The fact remains that the philosophy of financial initiatives by the Crown must, to a certain extent, take precedence over the provisions of Standing Order 63.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in commencing this debate at the report stage of Bill C-202, my purpose, motive and approach is to make to this House as earnest a plea as I possibly can. My plea is that the escalating of the basic old age pension by at least 2 per cent per year be continued.

As Your Honour is aware and, indeed, as Your Honour has often drawn to our attention, the rules relating to the report stage of a debate require that we concentrate on particular issues and points that are underlined by any amendments that we move.

The two amendments to the bill that I am seeking by motions number one and number three, which Your Honour has allowed, combine to do one thing, namely to keep in effect the provision under which the basic old age pension, even if that is all a person receives, will be escalated every year by up to 2 per cent if there is an increase in the cost of living. This is the issue in this debate.

My interest in old age pensions is well known. It is hardly necessary to make the point that there are many aspects of the matter which concern me. Like the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) who sought to move a different type of motion, I would like to see the total amount of the pension increased to $150 a month. There are other things which I would also like to see done to improve the lot of our senior citizens.

However, in this debate and the vote that will follow, we shall be dealing with one issue only. I hope that the good will and concern of hon. members for our senior citizens will lead them to think very deeply about this matter and to support the proposition that the escalation of the basic old age pension must be continued. Just to make it clear why I keep referring to the basic old age pension, let me point out that in Bill C-202 as it stands the basic old age pension is to be frozen at $80 a month effective January 1, and in the case of all those persons who draw only the basic old age pension there is to be no further escalation of that pension in response to increases in the cost of living. It is true that the principle of escalating a portion of the old age pension is to continue with respect to the supplement and that any person who draws any portion of the supplement will, under the terms of Bill C-202, have his total pension, his basic $80 plus his supplement, escalated according to the formula set out in the Canada Pension Plan. In making this statement at this point, I am already drawing attention to the fact that our senior citizens are being divided into two groups, one of which will benefit from the escalation of the pension while another will be entitled to no escalation of the old age pension whatsoever.

This is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker, not just because the sum of $1.17 a month is involved, not just because a certain number of people are affected, but because it concerns our whole approach to the affairs of senior citizens, and, indeed, our whole approach to society. I believe that before we call it Christmas we should reconsider what has been done in the drafting of this bill and I plead as earnestly as I can with Liberal members of this House to support these two motions in order that we may continue the escalation of the basic old age pension.

It will be no surprise to hon. members if I say, as I have said on previous occasions, that my correspondence with pensioners in this country is very heavy. I believe I can say that the letters I receive are a good barometer of what the senior citizens are thinking. I can tell this House, and I tell the government, that there is among old age pensioners today great and very bitter disappointment over this decision to freeze the basic old age pension at $80 and permit no further increase in line with the rising cost of living. I shall not take the time to go into all the figures I recited on second reading. There was some discussion about them when the bill was before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. But even if the minister and I cannot agree on the number affected, even if he wants to think in terms of 200,000 and I prefer to think in terms of 510,000, a great number of our pensioners will be receiving only the basic pension and will not get a cost of living supplement such as they have been receiving for the past two or three years, and these people feel sad, they feel let down, they feel disappointed. They just do not believe the Parliament of Canada would do this to them. I said earlier that this is not just a matter of a $1.17. I know it is a cliché to say it is not the amount of money that matters, but the principle. But this is what is being said by people who are writing letters to me at this time. They say: If the government needs my $1.17, I am a loyal Canadian and I will help them out, but why should we be separated from other old age pensioners? That is the point. Why should senior citizens be divided into two distinct groups? These people are expressing their disappointment and they have every right to express it. Parliament is extremely ill-advised to create this sadness, this feeling of being let down, this sense of disappointment which our people are feeling, and it relates not only to the amount of money involved. Small per month as $1.17 may be, as far as they are concerned, even the total saving to the treasury is terribly small as far as the federal budget is concerned. I shall return to this point in a few minutes. The point I wish to emphasize at the start, and I do so because I have sufficient mail to tell me this is the way our senior citizens are feeling, is that there is great disappointment—not anger, perhaps; not political comment, but just heartbroken disappointment—that this is being done to them.

Some people not only write the letters directly to me; they send me copies of letters they have written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). I liked one which came to my notice the other day—maybe the minister recalls receiving it. The correspondent asks him: "How could you let anyone overrule your own heart and better judgment on this?" I have a pretty good idea who that someone was, but I cite this letter not to make that allusion but rather to emphasize the mood, the thinking, of our senior citizens.

You see, we must take into account not only the 510,000 who will not get a supplement but are in brackets where they need every extra cent they can get, but the whole group, the whole 1,700,000, as well as the younger people who are interested in their parents and grandparents. All are disappointed that this division into two groups is being made.

The second feeling I detect in the heavy correspondence I receive on this question is, perhaps, not far removed from disappointment, but I sense it as something different—it is disillusion. It is very real, and some of it is angry. They ask: How can parliament do this to us, a Parliament which entered into a social contract to provide that all future pensions would be escalated? I will provide quotations in support of this, in a moment or two. They ask: How can you break that contract?

There is another point which has been turning up in my letters, especially in the last two or three days. I shall not dwell on it, because I do not want to get off the track or annoy the very people to whom I am addressing my plea. But hon. members must know that people are saying: How can parliament ask old age pensioners to settle for one last increase of 42 cents a month and then receive a report which proposes some rather magnanimous increases as far as Members of Parliament themselves are concerned? This is in addition to what we did with respect to our own pensions only a few months ago, and remember that our pensions, like civil service pensions, will still escalate by 2 per cent a year. There is disillusionment about Parliament. Safe and secure as I believe this institution to be, Mr. Speaker, we must not press our luck too far; we must not gamble too much on the respect people have for this institution. If we do too many things which make people feel we are concerned primarily with ourselves and certain other interests, and not concerned about keeping our word to the old people of this country or with other groups which are not the subject of the debate this afternoon, this disillusionment could put Parliament in a bad way. My plea for the support of these motions is as strong and as earnest as I can make it, and I am making it now for the sake of Parliament itself. People write to me and say: You can't do this to us; the government cannot act this way; it is not like Parliament. Let us prove to them that we do not act that way.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I know the odds I am facing today. We had two or three votes in the standing committee on the very clauses that are before the House in these two motions, and we lost those votes on a division of something like 9 to 4 in both cases. All of the Liberals present voted to go along with discontinuing the escalation of the basic old age pension; my friends in the Conservative party and my colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and I, representing our party on the committee, voted of course, to continue the escalation. Unfortunately, my friends to my far left in this chamber were not present at the time, although I am sure they would have voted that way as well.

The point I want to make is this: I know this is a bill in the government's name, that the government is backing the bill. Its backbenchers backed the bill in committee. But this is still Parliament. It is still a place where speeches are made and listened to, arguments are considered and individual members make up their minds.

I say to every member of this House who is sending Christmas greetings back home wishing a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to his constituents, just don't bother if you are going to contribute to the disillusionment of people by telling them: "Oh yes, we told you a few years ago that all future pensions would be escalated, but the government has now changed its mind and so we backbench supporters of the government are going to go along with the government". As a lover of Parliament I plead that this not be done. I am sure there are just as many lovers of Parliament in the other parties as there are in mine. Let this be shown today when the vote comes on these two motions.

The third point I wish to make hinges on the word "equity". You cannot justify a scheme under which you divide our senior citizens into two groups, with one group getting the old age pension escalation when the cost of living increases, the other group not. It is no use the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) telling me that we are redirecting our money so that the poor get it. We went over this the other day. I still contend that all that we are doing is redistributing poverty. We are not imposing any new taxes on those of us still in our working years; this will all be paid for out of the old age security fund. What we are doing is taking $1.17 a month away from 510,000 people—there are more than that, but they are the ones in the middle bracket—and giving it to some other elderly people, starting in January.

There are a number of ways in which I might try to demonstrate the inequity of this. I have done some figuring, and at one point I thought of giving half a dozen examples. I have decided to give just one because I think it tells the story of inequity very clearly. I hope hon. members listen to this set of figures that I will now put on the record; they are not too involved and I am sure will be readily comprehended.

For the purpose of my illustration I give the case of a single person, because then we will not become too involved in different sets of figures. If a single person over 65 years of age has other income from any source—pension, investments or what have you—of $110 a month, that person cannot get any portion of the guaranteed income supplement. This $110 is calculated on the two-for-one basis and is regarded as $55, so he has had the full amount to which he is entitled and thus gets no guaranteed income supplement.

The minister will tell me that this person has a total income of $190 per month. That is right. He gets his old age pension of $80 a month, and he has this other private income of $110, for a total of $190. But consider the person whose other income amounts to $109 a month. A single person with an income of $109 a month will get a guaranteed income supplement of $1. He gets this because, according to the formula, for each full $2 you take $1 off: $109 is, for purposes of the formula, $108. In other words, the pensioner has $54, and he will get $1. He ends up with $80 basic old age pension and $1 supplement, and will receive a cheque for $81 from the old age pension people. He has his own income of $109, and his total income is precisely the same as the single person I talked about a moment ago, namely $190.

Now, the person whose $190 consists of $80 pension and $110 private income gets no escalation. But the person whose private income is $109 and who receives $81 basic pension and supplement has his $81 escalated. Hon. members can see that for the first year, 1971, these two persons will each have a total income of $190 a month. In 1972 the person who has a private income of $109, and hence a pension and supplement of $81, will have his $81 escalated by 2 per cent, and will receive an increase of about $162. As a result, in 1972 his total income would increase from $190 to $191.62. The other person's income stays put at $190.

Do you call that equity, Mr. Speaker? Not by any stretch of the imagination or any manipulation of the figures. I could take other cases but I shall not do so because more figures will just confuse the situation. What it all comes to is that if a pensioner has other income of a little less than $110, he gets a supplement. Initially he gets less than the person with the $110, but with a few years' escalation he will have more than the person who gets no supplementation at all. In this situation the people who have saved a little, who have picked up a little something else, are penalized, whereas those who did not quite make the grade get the benefit.

I have stood on my feet in this House and said a great many times during the last number of years that the finest piece of social legislation that this Parliament ever passed was the universal old age pension. It is the envy of social security officials in all western countries of the world. One of the reasons it is so good is that it created this feeling of togetherness or oneness among people who were retired. It did away with the stigma of having two groups of people. We are now bringing that stigma back. It was brought back by the guaranteed income supplement in 1966, and we are again bringing it back, and bringing it back with a vengeance, by making this distinction in regard to escalating the basic pension. I plead as strongly as I can that that escalation be allowed to continue for everyone who receives the pension, right across the board.

May I make one other point with regard to equity. I have cited the case of two people, one receiving $80 basic old age pension and who has enough not to receive the supplement, the other getting the supplement. In the course of ten years the cost of living will have gone up at a rate of 2 per cent a year, probably more. During that time the person with the supplement will receive more money as a result of the cost of living bonuses every year; on the other hand, the person who receives only the basic pension will find during the course of that same ten years that the value of his pension has gone down by at least 20 per cent. Twenty per cent of $80 is $16, which brings the value of his pension down to $64. I suggest that I am being conservative in that calculation, but there is no reason why I should not be "conservative" since I have a Conservative as the seconder of my amendment, but it is still spelled with a small "c".

Equity has been thrown out the window. I think it is a sorry day for Parliament when it is doing this kind of thing. The minister says that the cost is a factor, but he admits that it would cost only $15 million in 1971 to pay the supplement to all who receive only the basic pension. I think his figures are a bit high, but I will not argue that this is not what it would cost. In terms of the federal budget, this is really nothing by contrast with what we are doing to the disappointment and disillusionment of the people and the destroying of equity.

When we argue about this increase the minister says that ten years from now this $15 million would increase to $150 million because the cost of living will continue to increase in the next ten years and that the escalation in ten years will make it ten times as high. At times he tries to tell us that the cost of living is under control. If he tells us that it is going to cost $150 million ten years from now this means the cost of living is increasing, and in turn means that a person on the basic pension only will have a pension worth not more than $64.

Mr. MacInnis: Ten years from now they will not be here to worry.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten years from now they will not be here to worry; I quite agree with my hon. friend the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis), but in the meantime it is a worry, a heartache and a disappointment to many of our senior citizens.

The fourth point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that by doing away with this escalation we are breaking a contract and a commitment. I have used this phrase several times and I should like to indicate when it was uttered first in this House. It was uttered on November 9, 1964, as recorded in Hansard at page 9899 when the Hon.

Judy LaMarsh was introducing the Canada Pension Plan legislation and for the first time told us about the escalation on the basis of the cost of living. These were her words:

—all future old age security pensions will be pegged to the cost of living index and will increase automatically if living costs increase.

There was no suggestion that this was for four or five years. She said, "all future" pensions, and in later debates that promise was repeated. A couple of years later—

Mr. Francis: For all time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What does "all future" mean?

Mr. Francis: What does parliamentary government mean?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I can see there is one Liberal over there to whom there is no use appealing, because he is satisfied that the government is going to do something that is all right. Let me say to him that in the eyes of the Canadian people, and I think I am justified in saying so in view of the extensive mail which I am receiving every day, it is the view of old age pensioners that a contract is being broken. Not only was this a commitment made by Miss LaMarsh, Mr. Pearson and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who was then the Minister of National Revenue during part of this procedure, but we must consider the question of the taxes people have paid for these benefits. Some of these taxes were increased after the escalation was added. This was done because of the escalation clause and other things that increased the benefits, and it was done because the act itself gives no leeway and no opportunity to the Minister of Finance to cut back on the payments. The only thing he can do under the act, if there is a shortage of money, is propose to Parliament ways of making up that shortage.

In the eyes of the people of this country there was a social contract to pay these escalation benefits, and taking them away at this time is, in my view and in the view of Canadians generally, a breach of contract and a breach of faith. That is why I have emphasized so strongly the words "disappointment", "disillusionment", and "destroying equity". This represents the way the people across Canada feel.

When I look at this whole proposition, and if I can make any kind of division of these remarks this is my fifth point—there are only six with one "tiger"—I am trying my best to figure out why the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) did this. He is certainly not the young man I knew when he first came to this House. He was a backbench Liberal sitting over on this side with lots of ambition, and with lots of the crusader spirit. He is not the young man I knew as a parliamentary secretary—I was going to say to the late Judy LaMarsh, but she is not "the late", she is still around—as Ed Murphy would confirm. In those days I thought the minister was going to try to take my place as the crusader for old age pensioners.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

An hon. Member: They got to him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Somebody got to him, because now he comes along with this cut-off of the escalation. He has given us arguments for this in his white paper and he tried to give us some arguments in the statement he made to the committee a few days ago. When I asked him yesterday or the day before, whenever it was, if he would give us a statement some day as to the rationale or philosophy behind all of this he said he would. I hope I am not pushing him too far when I say he has really admitted that he has not done so yet.

I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare has gone to the cabinet and said: Look, I have to get some money for old age pensions. I have to do something because Parliament is breathing down my neck, the Liberal backbenchers are breathing down my neck, the people are breathing down my neck and my neck is getting pretty hot. I have to do something. No doubt he argued for the principle in which he believed when he was the young parliamentary secretary or backbencher. He is still young but—

Mr. Munro: I am aging.

Mr. Speaker: This might be a good time to draw to the attention of hon. members that the time allotted to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) appears to have expired, subject to the agreement that he might continue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 75(9) is it not provided that the mover of a motion at this stage has 40 minutes?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair must recognize the point of order raised by the hon. member and indicate that he has another ten minutes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipey North Centre): Thank you, Sir. I was pretty sure of it and I had consulted the rule just before I started.

Let me return to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who says he has aged. I hope he is feeling old and burdened, especially in his conscience, as a result of what he is doing. I suspect the best he could get from the cabinet was an agreement that it would let him push around so many millions of dollars, but he would have to find a way to do it and would have to do it within the framework of the old age security fund.

So the minister got out his pencils, sharpened them and did some figuring. One of the places he decided he could save a few dollars was in the area of this escalation factor of basic old age pensions for those who did not draw any supplement.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): "Chiselled" is the word.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That might be the word, but I would not be so unkind.

There is no principle, no philosophy and no rationale to this cut. It amounts simply to figuring out within the terms of so many dollars how it can be done. Whenever you abandon principles or try to resolve a social problem on the basis of expediency, you get into trouble, and if the minister feels he is aging I can quite readily understand. I urge that we get back to principles and admit that our senior citizens are entitled to equity. They are entitled to a recognition of the contract that was made with them. They are entitled to have their escalation in the basic pension continued in the terms expressed by Miss Judy LaMarsh in this House of Commons with regard to future pensions. There was no cut-off. The Liberals of those years were proud of what they had done.

Now, thanks to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, which gives me another few minutes, I should like to indicate one of the things which bothers me. This is my sixth remark about this. This course of action is a further attack on the principle of universality itself. In 1950, when the Old Age Security Committee reported to Parliament, I had the great honour of being a member of that committee and of having helped to draft the report. It was one of the finest committees on which I have ever served. The committee recommended that old age pensions be universal with no means test or needs test of any kind. I could quote from Mr. Pearson some years later, but I shall not take the time to do so, when he emphasized the fact that we had committed ourselves to a principle that old age pensions would be universal with no test at all attached to them. As a matter of fact, Mr. Pearson said that as late as 1965.

Is the minister objecting to what I am quoting?

Mr. Sharp: It was a private conversation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps I might quote what the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said, when he was Minister of Finance, in his budget of 1966. He pointed out that he had only one course when there was a shortage of money and that was to find ways to raise money, but that he had no permission to cut back on pensions. It took many years to get the Liberals to accept the principle of universality. Once they accepted it in 1950, and put it into effect in 1951 in respect of the Old Age Security Act, which came into effect on January 1, 1952, they were as proud as peacocks about it and for years they told everybody that it was the Liberals who had brought in this tremendous plan, the best in the world. When some of us reminded them that we had prodded them into doing it they said, "yes, there was prodding from the opposition side, but we did it".

Then along comes December 1966 when this universality was violated by the guaranteed income supplement. Now, it is being done again. Even with the guaranteed income supplement of 1966, we still remained the universal escalation according to the cost of living. Now, even that is being taken away today. This is a further attack on the principle of universality. It is a further downgrading of a principle which I assert was one of the finest ever implemented by the Parliament of Canada when it placed old age pensions on a universal basis. As I say, there was boasting about it by Liberals all over the country, especially at election time. There was boasting particularly about the cost of living supplement. There were even statements to the effect that the Old Age Security Act was now outside of politics. No one ever swallowed that, and I do not believe there is anything bad about having political issues here. Certainly, this one is political now and will be until we get it back on the rails. I suggest that the Liberals should not write off the position of Louis St. Laurent, Lester Pearson, Paul Martin and Judy LaMarsh. I have not often sung their praises, have I?

Mr. Francis: Very rarely.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend says "very rarely", and he is probably right. But even they became converted. Sometimes we hear about the generation gap and the fact that some of us do not understand these things and today's approach. I am happy to belong to a generation that believed that, especially when people reach retirement age, what is done for them should be done as a matter of right on a universal basis without any of these tests. Even if it takes us a while to get back, in the next generation they will believe that our generation was right and that this generation of Liberals is doing the wrong thing.

Those who came before us in this part of the House, Mr. Speaker, and those of us who followed them required 20 years to persuade the Liberals to take off the means test and bring in universality in respect of old age pensions. We finally won in 1950. This victory lasted for 15 or 16 years. We lost part of it in 1966 and we are losing more of it today. We are losing a part which will hit people very hard. We are denying some of our people the right to have their pension escalated when the cost of living goes up. Remember that the cost of living goes up for everybody, not just for some.

I hope the pleas which have been made, my pleas and the pleas which will come after me, will have some effect. If not, we may lose today's battle. But this is not the end of the war. This plea for an approach to equality, and for universality in respect of our older people in particular, is sound, just, humane and Canadian. I hope the vote today will bring back universality of escalation. But if we lose it today, even if it takes us another 20 years to get it back, we will keep up the battle for another 20 years or until we win, for right is on our side.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I believe we have listened to a very effective speech in respect of Bill C-202 to amend the Old Age Security Act. No matter how many times we have agreed or disagreed with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), no one can challenge his sincerity in this House in fighting for the underdog. I have been here for a good number of years and have heard him champion the causes of people who in many cases could not speak for themselves. He has been heard with a clear voice in the House of Commons. He has been heard again today and I am very happy to follow him in this debate.

This bill is a bad bill because it is discriminatory. It would seem that my hon. friend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), has been influenced by other people or perhaps was on pot or something else because I am sure this is not his own idea. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed so well what a charming figure he was when he came here, unsullied and untarnished, from Hamilton. Now, we see him sitting here today with a tarnished image.

This bill would discriminate and divide the older people into two classes, the haves and the have-nots. It is true this trend was started in 1966 when the Hon. Judy LaMarsh was Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now, another feature besides discrimination has been added. It is the erosion principle of a fixed asset, an arbitrary frozen asset of $80, neither founded on mathematical wizardry or justice. In 1966, the principle that inflation was eroding the pension was recognized and an escalation clause was added. If the cost of living rose by 2 per cent or over, then 2 per cent was added, regardless of whether the increase might have been 3 per cent, 4 per cent, 5 per cent or 6 per cent. This is the way the old age pensioner has been cheated over the years.

It is interesting to note one thing that the minister said, although maybe I am accusing him wrongly and maybe it was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) who said it. The minister has said so many things, written so many things, and issued so many statements that I cannot keep up with all of them. But he, or the Minister of Finance, said inflation would not be a major factor next year. However, John Meyer, writing in the Gazette of December 17, says:

> A resumption of significant price increases must be expected next year. The base for them has already been laid in the continuing high level of wage settlements—averaging in excess of 9 per cent for the first year. Advances in productivity can't overtake that sort of lead.

In effect, what the government is now doing is taxing the old age security pensioner by whatever amount the cost of living increases. If that is not a new principle introduced in this Parliament, I have never heard of a new principle. That is the fine hand of Scrooge, and here we are at Christmas time. It is interesting to note that during the first three years of the sixties, during the Tory administration under John Diefenbaker, inflation was held to around 1½ per cent per year. Thus, a very sound basis was laid for increasing expansion in later years.

[Mr. Rynard.]

During the following years, inflation took a higher toll, until in 1966 parliament decided that old age pensions must be increased. Old age pensioners were getting into difficulties. I will remember sitting in a rather good restaurant in a major Canadian city and noticing an old lady at the table next to mine. I saw her picking up some of the scraps, some of the bread that had been left by the people who had vacated the table next to hers. I asked the waitress about her, and she told me it was a usual occurrence for that poor old lady to do this, coming in to gather up the scraps. I asked where she lived, and was told that she lived in a third-storey apartment. Mr. Speaker, this was somebody's mother. This surely, was not good enough. I repeat that this incident took place in 1966.

It was for such reasons as this that the Hon. Judy LaMarsh raised the old age pension to $75 per month, effective January 1, 1967. But the government realized that this was not enough, and gave a supplementary pension of up to $30 per month to those who had little or no other income. Then, as I have stated, there was an escalation clause giving up to 2 per cent when the cost of living rose by 2 per cent or more. Have you ever heard of anything so ridiculous? This was cheating the defenceless people of this country. Mr. Speaker, in the last three years inflation has exceeded 15 per cent. To meet this situation, the old age security pension escalated to meet the cost of living increase should now be around $100 per month, and the old age supplement should be over $50 per month. That would be the case if our people over 65 years had been treated fairly, squarely and honestly by this Parliament.

Now, the government forsakes the very principle of universality, and yet the other day, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) announced plans to include over one million employees never before covered by unemployment insurance, he said that principle was very important. But in this case the cabinet forsakes universality and is bringing back the principle of selectivity.

Nevertheless in one area, and that is the area of hospital costs, there will be an extra tax of $37 million as a result of bringing hospital workers under the unemployment insurance scheme. Yet the other day in committee the minister told us that there should not be any more increases in taxation. Now, they are taxing the sick by taxing the hospital workers. This is one of the sensitive areas of galloping costs, and is of great concern to those in that field.

The Hon. Judy LaMarsh said that people must pay for pension increases. In 1967 she imposed a 1 per cent tax in addition to the 3 per cent tax already in force on all income tax payers, up to a maximum individual contribution of $240 per year. From this 4 per cent tax on income, over $1 billion was collected by the government last year. The people have paid into this fund. This is not a charity fund. Over and above that, there is a 3 per cent sales tax, to which all people contribute, to pay for their old age pension. Some day we will need that pension. The minister may need the Canada pension. Would he think it funny if some government came along and froze it?

Last year the government collected over $600 million from the 3 per cent sales tax, and also collected approximately $125 million from corporation tax to cover pension payments.

This was a fund into which trusting people paid expecting, if they lived, to get it back in the sunset years when they were unable to work any longer. Each person paying into this fund was taxed according to his income, up to a total of $240 per year. If a person earned more, he paid more. Those on low incomes paid only a little, and if people had no taxable income they did not pay anything, but all people were to receive the same amount. Now, the government has reversed the rules of the game, and those who have paid the most will find themselves with the least. Many people will find themselves with just a little more than they should have in order to qualify. They may own a home in a neighbourhood to which they have become accustomed and not wish to leave. But their expenses will have increased. These people will sit there, wondering if they should not have given away a little bit more in order to qualify.

Inflation has eroded their dollars. Inflation is abrasive to these citizens. There are around 600,000 of them. These people do not want charity. They paid into this fund, thinking they would get their money back from it. They only want what is their right. Now, they look at this fund which to date has piled up a surplus of $735 million, and they see this magnanimous government freezing their pensions at $80 per month. Can you blame them if they are angry when they look at the 42 cents that the government offers them? But the government says, "That is all there will be. There is no more for you." Some Santa Claus, Mr. Speaker! The amount of inflation will be deducted from the pension each year, and at the same rate as erosion has taken place over the past three years. Mr. Speaker, that is nothing but a tax on the aged, and I will prove to you that it is a tax.

If inflation continues at the pace set during the past three years, the resultant loss to a pensioner will be $4 in the first year, $3.80 in the second year and $3.68 in the third year, making a total of $11.68. Thus, inflation will have taken away from the old people of Canada over $10 of their old age pension. Those are the facts and this government must face up to them. Do the Canadian people want to see these senior citizens treated in this way? Nearly 600,000 of these people have paid into this fund and they have a right to receive benefits from it.

By next year there will be more than 1,700,000 people over the age of 65. Of these 1.1 million will have incomes of less than $1,500 for a single person or less than $3,000 for a married couple—pretty slim going. If there were no income security program, 72 per cent of single people over the age of 65, and there are 580,000 of them between 65 and 70, would have incomes of less than $1,500.

Let us look at this another way. Of those people aged 65 to 70 years, just over one-third pay income tax and some of those pay it because they receive the guaranteed income supplement. Some also pay OHSIP. Some own their own homes and receive the guaranteed income supplement; this year they receive a supplementary tax assistance of $50. This is a step in the right direction initiated by the Ontario provincial government. It is reasonable to assume that less than one in four have taxable incomes. Of the older married couples, 55 per cent or 300,000 of them have incomes of less than $3,000. Poverty is a fact of life among old age pensioners and this society must take the responsibility for inflation and make the necessary corrections.

Of single people 65 years of age and over, 70 per cent will have incomes of less than $1,320 and only 30 per cent will have incomes of more than $1,320. These people will pay income tax. Therefore, they will receive no supplement whatsoever but, in effect, they are also taxed by inflation each and every year.

One-third of married couples have incomes of under $1,800; half have incomes under $2,300 and two-thirds have incomes under $4,000. Half of those with incomes above $2,280 will not qualify for the supplement. The great bulk of the 600,000 find that the government is not only freezing their income from Old Age Security but is eroding it each year. I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of National health and Welfare that the government is really taxing these people, and surely this is not accepted Liberal policy. Many of the 600,000 will be caught cold on fixed pensions which they rightly felt would be sufficient to keep them. Some will be able to exhaust their savings and qualify. Others will put their assets into non-revenue producing investments and qualify. This is the type of chicanery the government is forcing upon senior citizens in order that they may live in this world of inflation. I challenge the minister to tell me that is not correct.

But the inequalities, Mr. Speaker! Some will own a modest little home and receive a tax subsidy from the provincial government while others will have to rent an apartment at $100 per month. Is that equity? Another gimmick is that if the house were sold and the money invested, the return would be $1,200 or $1,500 but they would have to pay this or more, for an apartment. Before the house was sold, the person qualified but afterwards did not. These are the pitfalls in the act. Many of these people would carry on in their homes longer, but illness increases with age and is tremendously expensive. I wonder if the minister has ever thought of that, and if he has drawn it to the attention of his cabinet colleagues. There is four or five times the amount of sickness after age 65 and this results in a need for drugs, and other expenses. It is estimated that sickness increases by five times from age 40 to 70. In many cases, chronic illness requires special drugs and it is not uncommon for drug care to cost $25 and more per person. The government brought in a national medicare scheme and are proud of it, but they do nothing about drug care. For the last year, I have been after the minister to do something for these people. I will say that he has never turned me down, he always promises. It is like that old song "Oh, Promise Me".

Senior citizens often have to save money on necessities, such as food, in order to buy drugs to keep going.

Remember, the aged person is at the end of the road. I would remind the minister that for him this may not be so many years away; the years pass pretty quickly as I can tell him from experience.

I should like to cite a specific case and there are thousands and thousands like it all across Canada. Mr. X has lived alone since his wife died two years ago. He receives a CPR pension of $998.76 and an old age security pension of $954.96. I should like the minister to figure this out, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is here and he is good at mathematics so he can help. I know he was on the council in Ottawa before he came to Parliament and I have always respected his skill with figures. I am not trying to be sarcastic in any way. This is only one letter, and I have received many, but it struck me as particularly interesting. There are many people in these circumstances.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I have to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rynard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate my fellow parliamentarians giving me this time and the minister has also been gracious about it.

The man paid out $35.20 to OMSIP; he has a knee injury and heart trouble so he pays $520 a year to a cleaning lady; fire insurance for his little home amounts to $30. Here is an interesting thing, Mr. Speaker, and I looked twice at it. He paid $50 to the church and I thought this was really something for a man who is just scraping along. Hair cuts cost $18, so I assume he got his hair cut once every six weeks; stamps, money orders, etc., $6; taxes on his home, $220; drugs, $162; taxi fares, because he could not keep a car going any more, $150—he had to go to hospital every three weeks for blood tests—$180 for fuel does not seem out of line, it is only $15 a month. Electricity cost $150 per year, and I thought was pretty cheap. The sum total is $1,557.

• (4:30 p.m.)

An hon. Member: What did he eat?

Mr. Rynard: Nothing is said about that. Another strange omission is the fact that he would have to pay taxes to the government. If my calculation is correct, his exemption would be roughly $1,200 if he were 65. If he were 70, the exemption would be $1,600. Therefore, he would be paying income tax on $353.72. I wanted to bring this forward, because it is a human story. It is one that is typical today. That is why I am asking the minister whether he drew to the attention of the cabinet the fact that these people are more prone to illness as they go down the road to the end. We call them the sunset years; but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is not always a smooth road for these people. The figures I gave do not include income tax. The minister could find out how much tax a man like that would pay. He would know exactly how much a man like that had to live on, or whether he was being helped by his friends.

I now want to say a few words regarding the recovery of overpayments. The filling out of papers, and particularly our income tax returns, is a difficult task. I expect that between a third and half of our parliamentarians do not fill out their own income tax forms. A survey on this subject might produce some interesting results. I see the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) scratching his head. I am sure he would not fill out his own form; he would not take the chance. Do hon. members remember what Walter Gordon said? He was a nice fellow, Mr. Speaker. He came from the city of Toronto and was minister of finance. He was here some time before you were, Mr. Speaker. Although he was a chartered accountant, he told us that he would not dare to fill out his own income tax form, because he might fill it out incorrectly.

This brings me to the point I have been trying to make. We are sending old people these complicated forms that we cannot ourselves fill out. We must remember that we are dealing with a generation of people with very little education. Many of them had to go right from grade school or public school to work. When people like that make a mistake, they are denied what should by right be theirs. The same type of difficulty arises when it is discovered that they have been asking for too much. When it is discovered that these old people have filled out their forms incorrectly and been paid too much, the overpayment is recouped by monthly payments which are assessed against the old people concerned. Therefore, these people who already live in the poverty area have to make do with a little less. I will not take up the time of the House by giving details, but I have received literally hundreds of letters complaining that people who have received an overpayment have been required to pay back the overpayment. As a result, they have too little to meet their obligations from month to month. Some people in this situation have had their telephone and electricity cut off, simply because some bureaucratic, faceless civil servant, faceless because he does not know the victim of the circumstances, has said, "You have got to pay".

Mr. Thompson: The authorities now take them to court.

Mr. Rynard: As the law now stands, the government can sue the estates of these old people. I know of an instance where the government recovered $6 from the estate of a poor lady.

In conclusion, I must say that there will be no incentive to save. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that you would not contribute to your pension if you did not think you would benefit in the end. Neither you nor I would contribute money under those conditions. Yet the old age pensioner, year after year, has contributed to the fund. All he asks is what is rightfully due to him.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to two single men, one of whom obtained $109, and the other $110. The man with the slightly larger income was worse off because he must pay his own OHSIP fees, whereas the fellow receiving $109 does not have to pay them. That illustrates the inequalities and discriminations inherent in this bill. There are no incentives for saving. In the near future, once you reach the age of 60 you will have to rely on a magnanimous government and the money it will give you will not lift you above the poverty level. If you meet certain requirements, you will be entitled to a supplement. Will people not try to meet those requirements. Since it will not pay to save, you will either give your money away or hide it in some way so that it will not produce any income. That will be the effect of what the government is doing. It is ensuring that all our senior citizens will live on or below the poverty line.

It is true that there is to be an adjustment for the rising cost of living for those receiving the guaranteed income supplement. May I point out that there is a surplus in the old age security fund of about $725 million. At present there is just no incentive for people to provide for their old age. The government's measure, therefore, would introduce an element of inequality and discrimination for our aged population. The government should opt either for the principle of selectivity or the principle of universality. For programs such as national medicare it has opted for universality; yet, when dealing with old age pensioners it is adopting the principle of selectivity.

An hon. Member: The poorest of the aged will obtain a supplement.

Mr. Rynard: The hon. member is right. The poorest ones will get the supplement. Those who are not quite so poor must starve a little. It is hoped that the government will accept at least the modifying influence of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre so that we may do away with a little bit of the disappointment, disillusionment and sadness, and the spirit of Scrooge that has been written into this bill.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to one aspect of Bill C-202 and, for a few moments, speak on it. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) recently reminded us that the cost of living escalation feature was introduced in 1965 into the old age security scheme and the Canada Pension Plan. This was extended to the guaranteed income supplement in 1966 so that all our older citizens from that time on would no longer need to absorb the full brunt of the inflationary pressures in our economy. He explained that the 2 per cent maximum figure for escalation had been set in his office after taking an average of the cost of living increases over the previous ten years. Because this average had worked out to 1.5 per cent, the figure of 2 per cent had been set to provide a small margin for error. Any provision for abnormal increases was left for the government of the day; the government was to bring this before Parliament, and parliament would deal with it.

Mr. Orlikow: And what happened?

Mr. Osler: If the hon. member will just wait, he will hear what I have to say. Later, inflation began to take place at a much greater rate than 2 per cent for a number of reasons, as we all know; yet nothing was done to increase the cost of living escalation feature in any of the plans that we are now reviewing and amending in this bill. Nothing was done because the minister said that he felt that inflation can and will be beaten, and that the cost of living increase in the future can be held below 2 per cent. That well may be so. The latest figures support this hope, and the government must be commended for these latest figures. We could say equally well that if inflation has been licked, all will be well from this day forward in. My question is this: why not transmit this hope into legislation?

Actually, we have come close to doing just this in so far as the guaranteed income supplement is concerned. The government has argued that this cannot be done for the old age security scheme itself, which is universal in application, if sufficient money is to be found to help those who need help most by means of the guaranteed income supplement.

This is no doubt an unanswerable argument. We must not forget that this government—any government—must put up or shut up and face the people with its tax proposals. And taxing is not popular.

I suggest that if this line of reasoning must be accepted, however, it must itself suggest that the government does not believe it will be able to contain cost of living increases on a long term basis to any significant degree. For if it did manage to contain them, only a relatively small predictable amount of extra money would be needed for escalation of the old age security payments. On the other hand, if the cost of living continues to escalate, so will the amount that the government receives in tax revenues, because the gross national product will also continue to rise.

If the government means what the Minister of National of Health and Welfare has said, that we will ensure the maintenance of a guaranteed income floor for our older people, all citizens of this country must be asked to continue the good fight against inflation. But they must also be prepared to guarantee that our senior citizens, including those with some savings, but to whom the basic old age security payment is still important, are not left to bear the full brunt of the results if and when this fight is not waged as successfully as it might be. The minister stated the other day that we can do no less for those who have done so much to make our society what it is today; and I agree with him.

The minister correctly stated that nothing should happen to those who are only receiving $80 a month with no escalation under the scheme we are now considering. If they should eat up a portion of their savings in their old age, or if they should have some misfortune, they will then be able to fall back on the guaranteed supplement and qualify for full escalation in line with any cost of living increases. Thank God this argument is factually correct, that it does provide a cushion. However, as an argument it is not good enough, because it misreads human nature in one crucial aspect.

Many thousands of our senior citizens are proud of the fact that they can still stand on their own feet, that they have salted away something for their old age and do not have to be a burden on anyone. The law of the land states that they are entitled to a basic old age pension which Parliament, in its wisdom, has now set at $80 a month. It is not good enough to simply state that, if we have miscalculated or if inflation catches up with us, these people can apply for the supplement. This is a degrading thought-process for them. It would be degrading in their view because it would mean that their plans had failed. If we let inflation get away from us again, it will be our fault. However, it will be the senior citizens who will feel they made a mess of things for they will be the ones who will have to apply for assistance in the management of their lives. They will have to come on their hands and knees, so to speak, to fill out forms; something they never thought they would have to do.

Although I think this is a good bill, there is one inconsistency embodied in it. We have one department or government approaching the problem of unemployment with a direct acknowledgment that the citizens of this country as a whole will have to pay for an unemployment scheme if unemployment reaches an average figure above a stated minimum. This implies that the citizens of this country have the responsibility to help the unemployed if the unemployment level reaches a certain limit. I agree with that concept. Also, we have a section of the Department of National Health and Welfare stating that if something goes wrong in the area of living costs, the citizens of this country as a whole will have to pay whatever additional amounts are required to keep those entitled to the guaranteed supplement from falling too far behind. I also agree with that principle. But, here, on the other hand, we have another section of the same department stating that the basic floor guaranteed to all old people in Canada can be left on its own to slide down to meaningless levels as a result of the same inflationary process.

Yet the complete package is good, even though there is an inconsistency which I find difficult to understand. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated that the bill is inconsistent in principle. I do not agree, I think the principle is consistent throughout, although there is this one inconsistency.

Mr. Orlikow: That is like being slightly pregnant.

Mr. Osler: Keep quiet and you will learn something. I cannot support any amending motion or arguments dealing with this bill at this time. The minister must have support, because the measures contained in it will significantly benefit millions of Canadians. The minister stated that Parliament can change the $80 basic pension any time it wants. I beseech him to speak to his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), before the next budget is brought down, to propose to him that funds be made available for the coming fiscal year, funds that will enable us to build an escalation into the basic pension, thereby allowing the people of this country to help all those old age pensioners who may be affected by inflation.

[Mr. Osler.]

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the House is now considering Bill C-202, an Act to amend the Old Age Security Act.

In introducing this bill, the government has shown once more its willingness to extend its public support of exploiters under the pretext of a fight against inflation.

This piece of legislation is more disturbing than it is impressive. Actually, it is just another repetition of the government's endless tactics to maintain its police action in order that the minimum assistance provided by law to old people is not exceeded. I am sure, however, that in our police state there are still people who have their fun.

I have in mind the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare who commissioned this Bill C-202. I am thinking also of the people who wrote this bill. In my opinion, the ones who were required to prepare the main part of it and whose fun is not over yet, are the C.A.'s, I mean the "congenial accountants".

Imagine that in the course of their work these very clever people succeeded in splitting the Canadian cent. In clause 3(1) we read:

> Subject to the provisions of this Act and the regulations, a monthly pension—may be paid to every person who—

In fact, this clause is proposing an increase of $5.04 a year, or 42 cents a month, or 1.4 cent a day. Everyone who knows that it takes 100 cents to make a dollar will agree, I presume, that this is a master stroke.

In the white paper on income security for Canadians, page 15, we read:

> The government considers that additional measures for the alleviation of poverty should be instituted as soon as possible as a first step in a well-defined and unified conceptual approach that will lead in time to the provision of a decent measure of security for all people.

Mr. Speaker, an increase of 1.4 cents a day as a first step is no great shakes. If this government considers the present bill as a first step, they just cannot miss. But obviously an increase of 1.4 cents in favour of elderly citizens represented the most effective measure to subject them to rationing and to insure all of them a decent security level.

It must be admitted that this bill does reflect the recommendations of the white paper on income security. No mistake can possibly be made. This is a long-term program which is far from satisfactory. By the way, we are considering a bill respecting senior citizens who contributed in developing this country, brought the land into cultivation, constructed railways, highways, plants and schools. They had to go through economic crises and wars which claimed sometimes the lives of some of their relatives, for all of which the government claims to be showing its gratitude by introducing Bill C-202, whereas all the legislation purports is an increase of 1.4 cents per day in their pension.

Mr. Speaker, speaking of the Liberal party convention which took place in November, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) expressed himself as follows:

I have said repeatedly that inflation is taxation's most regressive form since it strikes hardest at those who cannot defend themselves, either because they do not belong to the limited group of shareholders or great businessmen, or because they are not members of a powerful trade union.

Mr. Speaker, after that, the Prime Minister could have added: Our words are quite different from our deeds.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose that it is under the pretext of inflation that the government offers 1.4 cents per day to our senior citizens. As the Prime Minister said so well, and I quote: —because they cannot defend themselves, because they are not members of a trade union, because most of them are not either among the shareholders of big companies.

The group of people concerned by Bill C-202 deserves more than an increase of 1.4 cents a day. They have paid for their security a long time ago and they are not responsible for the increase in the cost of living. It is really ridiculous to make them share the increased cost of living, because labourers, housewives and retired people did not bring on inflation.

Inflation has been brought on by finance. It is by paying two or three times what we built once, what the government has prepared, which is the cause for inflation.

On page 88 of Hansard of September 16, 1968, concerning a question asked to the minister responsible for the National Harbours Board about the cost of Jacques-Cartier bridge, we can read a letter from Mr. Clément, superintendent engineer of bridges addressed to a certain Mr. Chénier of Montreal, which reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

Your letter of May 9, 1968, requesting some information on Jacques-Cartier bridge, has been brought to my attention. I am pleased to supply you with the following information:
Original cost of the Jacques-Cartier bridge—$18,571,308.71
Amount of the interests paid to date—$20,198,266.53
Balance to pay for the bridge—$14,065,605.39

This Jacques-Cartier bridge phenomenon is not unique. It takes place every time a development projet is carried out by federal, provincial, municipal and school authorities. However, in Quebec interests on school debts collected as a whole by school boards represent every day the value of a regional school, which means that each year, we give the equivalent in interest of 365 regional schools.

It is not surprising that with such gifts, the economy of Quebec, a supposedly poor province, should be somewhat perturbed. In the present system, the province of Quebec is not the only one to be perturbed. All Canadian provinces are presently facing difficulties.

To come back to pensions, the proposition provided in the bill for those who enjoy no other additional income is $135 for 1971. With the escalation rate of 2 per cent, this pension will reach $149 a month in 1975, that is $1,788 a year. Also, as the inquiry of the Senate Committee on Poverty discloses that those whose income is less than $1,944 a year in 1970 are living in dire poverty, it is evident that this government bill is already out-of-date.

In short, it is because this bill is recommending measures whose application will be spread over a six-year period, which is already considered insufficient to live on today, and is within the poverty limit, that on behalf of the Ralliement Creditiste, I tried to bring in the amendment appearing in the orders of the day and which reads as follows:

That Bill C-202, An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended by deleting in Clause 1 all the words after the word "of" in lines 10 and 11 at page 1 and substituting therefor:

"one hundred and fifty dollars to every person who has attained sixty years of age."

Mr. Speaker, we, of the Ralliement Creditiste, have presented this amendment because we feel that the Prime Minister, who is a bachelor and who has been a millionaire since his birth, has no idea of the financial problems and other difficulties of those who cannot work.

He gave us further proof of this in November, at the Liberal Congress, when he said, and I quote:

When the Old Age Security Act was amended, we provided an escalation of benefits of 2 per cent per year so that benefits would increase with the rise in the cost of living—

Unfortunately, for the past three or four years inflation has increased at a much higher rate than expected and consequently the intent of the legislation has been frustrated.

Mr. Speaker, those are the very words of the Prime Minister.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Invitation supposedly addressed to François Girod; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Air Transport—Fares based on Canadian dollar pegged at 92 cents—payment of compensation for overcharging; the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan)—Immigration—Reasons for decrease in number of Chinese admitted to Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand there might be some willingness to dispense with Private Members' Hour and continue with the business which has been under consideration this afternoon. If that is the case, I would certainly be willing to give our consent.

Mr. Baldwin: On our part, there is not only willingness but eagerness, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Same here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed that we will dispense with Private Members' Hour for today?

Mr. Baldwin: No vote until after eight o'clock, though.

Mr. MacEachen: Perhaps I might say it would be preferable if we were to postpone any vote until after eight o'clock and not take any vote during the time normally set aside as the Private Members' Hour. It has been suggested this would be a good arrangement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed that this be part of the arrangement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AMOUNT OF PENSION, MAXIMUM SUPPLEMENT AND ESCALATION THEREOF

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-202, to amend the Old Age Security Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I was quoting the words of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, if an incompetent mechanic ruins the engine of my car by taking out certain wires he will not be surprised at the result. But under the present government the economy always provides disagreeable surprises.

Even if the Prime Minister is surrounded by so-called competent economists and thinkers, the members of the Economic Council make each year some forecasts which are supposed to be workable, but unfortunately the results are always different from the ones anticipated.

So, Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid more surprises to the Prime Minister as regards the old age security, I would suggest that the present escalation rate of 2 per cent be abolished and replaced by 2 yearly rate pegged to the cost of living index.

Another point I would like to raise is the case of ordinary married couples. Under the present system, married people are severely penalized. Our legislation obliges the head of the family, or the wife if she is older and has reached the pension age, to support his or her spouse in sharing the $111 received once he or she is eligible for pension. Generally the husband is older and the wife must wait until she reaches the age of 65.

But the wife may be the older. It so happens that I have in mind the case of a 63-year-old man who had withdrawn a disability pension for two years and who saw his pension cancelled last April because his wife was eligible for old age security pension and for the guaranteed income supplement, which all in all amounted to $111. Therefore, the wife has an "obligation" toward her husband. This situation is nothing to be proud of for a so-called civilized country.

However a common law couple in the same age bracket is granted two pensions: one for the man and the other for the woman. For those who live together without any marriage contract and who have no "obligation" toward each other, this government is most generous.

Mr. Speaker, if it is possible to support couples who have no marriage contract, I feel that it would be normal to extend the same privileges to married couples.

There is no provision about it in the bill. I suggest that when the head of the family becomes eligible for the pension, his spouse who is disabled or unable to earn his living should become eligible too, whatever his age.

The hon. Minister of Health and Welfare pointed out that the new program as it is would cost $200 million more than it does now. However $200 million are nothing by comparison with the government budget of $13 billion and a national product of $80 billion in 1970.

In my opinion, no other group deserves security more than those who built our country as we know it. They have worked so much that the government is now burdened with surpluses in several sectors, such as food and clothing.

When the $40 pension was granted, the government made believe that it was impossible to pay more. The pension was increased to $111; however, I understand that the old-age security costs now amount to $720 million.

If all manufacturers, traders and businessmen were satisfied with a minimum, bankruptcy would be close at hand for them. For that matter, ambitious businessmen simply do not aim at a minimum. They aim at a maximum.

The Canadian economy has now become ill because, for too long, the government was satisfied with granting a minimum to students, widows and older citizens. Indeed, our economy is ill. There is a slow-down in all departments. Eventually, we will have to wake up. And if the government's treasury gets empty, despite the normal levy of taxes, only one thing remains to be done; the government should meet the needs of its citizens through new credits. I shall conclude by saying that the Bank of Canada was established to serve the country, and when the fund is exhausted, the government should resort to it to obtain the necessary credits for the implementation of a maximum old-age security program. Such a program is always possible if we make use of the surpluses of the Canadian production. The policy of destruction as applied in payments granted to farmers to promote reduced production, has already lasted too long.

In the end, those who have built this country have won only hardship; consequently, this government, strong in its majority, must act by other means than the 1.4 cent premium.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), it seems to me that freezing the old age pension at $80 for those who do not qualify for the guaranteed income supplement brings forward many contradictions in the government's own white paper. It really shows that the approach to welfare in the White Paper is a mish-mash that will create as many injustices as it is intended to correct.

First of all, the freezing of the old age pension at $80 is evidence of what the government has decided on in the matter of selectivity. It is true that the belief that the principle of selectivity for all welfare payments should be adhered to is gaining credence with some people. But certainly in this instance the problem of selectivity runs slam-bang up against the fact that old age security is aimed at those people in society who, by and large, cannot earn enough money in the market to keep themselves. Therefore, the state is required to provide them with a basic income, regardless of their station during their working years. This point was accentuated by one of the illustrious Prime Ministers of the party opposite. Mr. St. Laurent, as Prime Minister at the inception of the universal old age pension, emphasized that every Canadian was entitled as of right to old age security regardless of income.

In looking at old age security as a welfare program we have to remember that it is a program for a group of citizens who have finished their working careers. No matter how much they might wish to earn their living by working, they are usually prevented by infirmity from doing so. This is not true to the same degree of family allowance recipients. The parents who are recipients are usually in the earning age group. Grants to individuals for education are again given during the recipients working years.

In other words, selectivity in the case of the old age pensioner falls down because the recipients are at an age where they have not nearly the options open to them that are open to a people who are receiving assistance from the goverment in many other forms. Old age security has been contributed to, indeed paid for, by citizens throughout their working careers. As taxpayers, they have been paying 4 per cent on their income tax, assisting the corporations to pay 3 per cent on their taxes, and they have paid a 3 per cent sales tax on goods. The old age security fund is quite solvent, carrying a balance of over $700 million.

Approximately 52 per cent of the people whose old age security is being frozen do not receive the guaranteed income supplement. These are people who managed to set aside some money in their active years and are now finding they are being penalized for their effort. Some of them may have a double grievance: if they were pensioners in January 1966 they were automatically excluded from the Canada Pension Plan. They were, of course, entitled to old age security, as stated by Mr. St. Laurent at the inception of the universal old age pension plan.

But what has happened since 1966? They have suffered greatly from the effect of inflation, even taking the cost of living index, so dear to the hearts of the bureaucrats, as a reliable indicator. In view of the great wage-price increase over the last few years it seems a pension of at least $90 would bring them into line with what the 1966 pension rate would have brought them.

Up until now, they have been inadequately compensated by cost of living increments limited to 2 per cent. But what happens now that their pensions are being frozen at $80 and the government anticipates continuing inflation? They are to lose this slight concession of 2 per cent to which they were entitled. The minister stated that inflation was lower in the month of November but he will find, as reported in news items, that the cost of living was less because of a drastic decrease in meat prices, mainly pork. Anyone who is at all familiar with farming will realize that this is very temporary and no doubt an increase in farm prices must come about or farmers will be worse off in a short while than anyone else in the economy.

It would be a mistake to conclude from a reading of the consumer price index that the worst is finally over; it is not. A resumption of significant price increases must be expected next year. Wage level settlements are in excess of 9 per cent for the first year and increases in productivity could not make up for that.

The November price index indicated a 2.3 per cent increase for 1970 and the flattening of the increase in November can be directly related to the discount war on food prices; prices which are likely to rise again. Food is given a weighted index of 27 in preparing the index. Furthermore, the government's policy of restraint comes to an end at the end of this year. Organized labour is committed to obtaining as high an increase in wages as it can. Steel and aluminum price increases were announced a few weeks ago and they will finally reach the consumer.

The relief experienced by the rise of the consumer index cannot be counted on to be maintained in the coming year. Industry has to retain some assurance of profitability if the economy is to grow, and that in all likelihood will mean higher prices. Those whose incomes are low enough to receive guaranteed income supplement payments still continue to receive price related adjustments both for the flat rate payment and the supplement. By this means, which seems manifestly unfair, the government will make unassisted pensioners subsidize others by $15 million, increasing to $100 million in 1975-76.

Here again, the principle of selectivity in dealing with old age security runs completely contrary to the principle of universality, which the government intends to invoke in respect of the unemployment insurance fund. On the one hand, we have a defenceless group of citizens, old age pensioners, who cannot go into the market and increase their incomes, with rare exceptions. They are being singled out as the whipping boys for the government's idea of selectivity. The government intends to sweep in over a million people under unemployment insurance coverage, most of whom do not want insurance, have never yet been unemployed in any significant numbers in their various occupations, but who will have to pour money into the unemployment insurance fund so that large benefits can be paid. Workers who will be affected are surely those who have strong bargaining powers in the economy, such as teachers and civil servants who know their wage negotiations will effectively gain back most of the money taken from them to pay for unemployment insurance.

It seems to me that when dealing with old age security, it is important that the principle of universality be maintained. These people have paid for this in their taxes and are entitled to some modest compensation in relation to inflation. The 2 per cent factor has been deleted, and this at least did something and is an important principle to maintain. It did not adequately reflect inflation over the past two years, but it did do something to keep the principle alive.

In addition to my remarks about inflation, I should like to present a plea on behalf of this group of people over 65 who are entitled to a share of the increased wealth of this country. There has been a slow growth in the real wealth of our Canadian economy, although it has been stagnant this year. In any event, all Canadians are entitled to share in this increase. Workers in highly unionized industries are, through wage agreements, able to achieve this share. Entrepreneurs and even non-unionized individuals are able to increase their share of the real wealth of the country as a result of automatic adjustments in the economy. Unless a citizen over 65 is unusually skilled or still has a saleable ability he is precluded from this, except perhaps through some accruement of savings which he may have accumulated. Perhaps it is difficult to assess what the real increase is in order to bring him up to the equivalent level of 1966, but I think it might well be in the neighbourhood of $10 per month. If one added the inflation factor to the 1966 rate, this would make the old age security pension close to $100.

I feel this freezing of old age security points out the great weakness of selectivity. We are dealing with an age group which can only obtain a share of the economy through the action of government and not by their own efforts or the skills they may possess. I am very unhappy that this clause has been deleted. I think it would have been more just had the guaranteed income supplement been frozen, to be reviewed by the government and Parliament at appropriate intervals. We must assume that guaranteed income supplements are for those who have little or no means of supporting themselves other than by what the guaranteed income supplement brings them. Therefore, it is incumbent upon Parliament and the government to provide these people with whatever the economy can afford at a given time.

I wholeheartedly hope that the government will retain the 2 per cent factor and see fit to adopt this amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-L. Rochon (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) tabled in the House a white paper on income security in Canada.

Having studied the content of that white paper, one realizes that it proposes that all allocations directly paid by the federal government be redistributed in such a way that those who need them most will benefit more from them.

Further studying the content of that white paper, one realizes that its proposals can be considered in the context of a rationalization of income security programs, a rationalization which will go a long way toward preventing and lessening poverty in Canada by redistributing the money of the system in a more equitable manner.

It is believed that the living conditions of millions of low income people will thus be improved, thoudands of others will be prevented from becoming destitute and the basic revenue of most citizens will be given greater protection.

The more we examine that white paper, the more we see that it is a sort of challenge, consisting in a new income security policy that would enable us to help the people who need it most.

I listened very attentively to the hon. members who spoke or who, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), moved an amendment. I do not question their sincerity. I am convinced that like us, they have but one ambition, that of helping those who really need it.

The government is blamed for introducing Bill C-202, which would freeze at $80 the pension now granted to people 65 or over. We would certainly like to do more than we can at the present time. It is very well to say, in the midst of a great speech: We must give $150 or $200. If we had to give those $200, I wonder how we could administer this country's business.

We regret that we cannot do more than that. I had an opportunity to say so, in committee, when we discussed that bill. It takes courage to tell the people what we are telling them now and to make them understand that we cannot give more than $80 to older people.

We are paying only $80 because we want those who are really in need, who should get the income supplement, to get it. If we pay only $80 to those who need the income supplement, as the white paper points out, we will give the poorest a more substantial assistance. Instead of $111 this would mean a $135 pension which, within a few years, would reach almost $150. In introducing Bill C-202, the government has only one ambition which is to help those who actually need it. To those who tell us we are not doing enough we shall answer that to administer is to foresee and this should encourage us in avoiding all unjustified expenses.

We would like to keep on granting the 2 per cent increase in addition to the guaranteed supplement but this entails enormous expenditures which the government cannot afford.

To administer is to foresee. This bill aims at helping our elderly people. This is why as a government member I am proud to vote for it.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate I believe we have had about all the facts and figures that could possibly be given regarding this legislation. In speaking on second reading and when the bill was before the committee, many members outlined the reasons they believe this bill fails to meet the elementary needs of the old age pensioners in this country and the elementary standards of justice and fairness which have been built up for so long in the establishment of the principle of universality in old age pensions. This afternoon in particular my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) very thoroughly covered the ground again.

I was interested to note that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) is not at all convinced about this legislation. He appears to be very unhappy about this feature of removing the escalation clause for the people who will now be on the $80 fixed pension. He gave every evidence of this because he indicated that he trusts that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brings in his next budget, if there should be an increase in the cost of living, ways and means would be found to bring back the escalation provision. I suggest that part of the reason the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre sees this so clearly is his location vis-à-vis the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has succeeded in reaching the older people across this country in such a way that they are able to understand what has been happening. He has been able to open their eyes concerning what is happening in respect of this bill. If the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre can be shaken in his belief that this bill is what it should be, I believe it would be an excellent idea if we could find ways and means to bring some of the other members of the government into much closer proximity to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

This bill contains many faults. The amount is completely inadequate. The flight from universality to selectivity has been accelerated and continued. That flight began in 1966 with the provision of the so-called guaranteed income supplement. As I said at the time in my view it was a complete prostitution of the English language to speak of it as a guaranteed income supplement. It was no such thing. This bill also increases the divisiveness among our citizens. It separates the elderly citizens into two groups, with the poor having to finance the destitute. The freezing of the amount of $80 indefinitely is indeed a very bad thing. The one comfort we have is that the "indefinitely" may not be very long when the facts concerning this matter are known by a large enough group of people across this country. It will not only be the elderly people who will face the impact of this $80 freeze in respect of the old people of the country. In my correspondence I have a great many letters in which the point is made over and over again that the sons and daughters of elderly people, hard-up as they are through trying to bring up their own families in decency and with education in today's conditions, are hard hit when they find that in addition they must help finance their elderly parents.

This is the situation we started to get away from in 1927 with the provision of old age pensions in the amount of $20 a month at age 70 with a means test. A couple of labour Members of Parliament, with a few farm members thrown in, about 15 or 16 members in all, were able to take advantage of a balance of power situation to force this old age pension legislation on a government which did not wish to have anything to do with it. The Liberal government in those days did not wish to have anything to do with such legislation. The truth that Liberals and Conservatives have no sympathy whatsoever for this type of legislation lies in the fact that this pension legislation which was enacted in 1927 was the first social security legislation to appear on the federal statute books of this country in which the two old parties had been in power since 1867. Eventually, we secured universality in the old age pension. But now we find the government is using its position of power to begin to retreat again and attempt to get rid of this legislation bit by bit.

My next point concerns the removal of the 2 per cent escalation provision from those who are frozen at the $80 level. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) is no longer in the chamber, but I want to point out that when he spoke he was on both sides of the fence, draped half on one side and half on the other, which I might assure him was a rather ungraceful position for a person of his physical stature and looked very uncomfortable. He seemed to be undecided about which side he would flop on to before his speech was finished.

If it was a good thing, a desirable thing to remove the 2 per cent escalator provision with respect to people receiving $80 a month, why is the government not proposing legislation to eliminate that escalator feature from the Canada Pension Plan, the retired public servants legislation, the armed forces pensions, the pensions of Members of Parliament and other federal pension plans? Why does it not do this with these other pensions as well? There is only one reason, and that is that the government knows it can get away with it where old age pensions are concerned. The people receiving the Canada Pension Plan are too well organized to permit the withdrawal of that clause in their case. The retired public servants are too well organized to permit the government to withdraw that clause in their case. Likewise, the armed forces are too well organized. Members of Parliament would shriek to high heaven if anybody suggested taking the escalator clause from their pension plan.

This is a very mean thing that the government is doing to our elderly people. Our elderly people are helpless: they are not well organized; they are without friends in high places. That is why they are discriminated against. But, Mr. Speaker, the worst feature of this whole business is that we cannot turn down this legislation in spite of all the injustices and wrong things in it, simply because of the ingenious and diabolical way in which it is worked. Our old people are divided into two classes and the poor are made to finance the destitute. When a man or woman is drowning, you cannot tear away the pitiful little stick that is held out even though you know the holder of the stick has a life preserver locked up somewhere that he will not bring out. I cannot vote against this legislation—

An hon. Member: Because your party won't let you.

Mrs. MacInnis: No, it is not because my party won't let me. I do not belong to that kind of party. It is because these elderly people, the ones in the lower group, are so hard up that you dare not take away even the little bit that is offered.

An hon. Member: Then it is not diabolical; it is Machiavellian.

Mrs. MacInnis: It may be Machiavellian, but those of us who know anything about Machiavelli know he was first cousin to the devil. This is what makes us so bitter about this legislation. Many old age pensioners do not have the full import of it yet, but some have. Rather than go over again our feelings about it, I will let some of the old age pensioners speak for themselves. I make no apology for telling the House what some of them are saying. I will tell hon. members about a woman in my riding, the wife of a veteran. She appealed to me some time ago before this legislation came along. Her husband had served overseas and had a pitifully small pension. They received war veterans allowance for a little time but were unable to do very well even with it.

Last summer this woman appealed to me. She asked, "As my Member of Parliament, can you help me? I have been told that my whole system is being poisoned because I have abscesses on all my upper teeth. If the teeth remain, I shall be poisoned completely. My stomach is in terrible shape now with ulcers, but if they take my teeth out my health will suffer because I cannot afford dentures." This woman had no resources. She could not participate in medicare. She was practically crying when she talked to me. She said, "I have never taken charity in my life, but can you help me?" I said, "I don't know, but I will try." I scrounged around and found a voluntary fund in Vancouver that was able to help her. Thanks to that voluntary organization her health was saved. She wrote me just the other day as follows:

My new dentures have been a godsend—no more throbbing, infected gums and the teeth look very nice.

I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) whether he is proud of the situation in our country where this woman and others like her have their pensions frozen at $80 and are condemned to throbbing, infected gums and poisoned stomachs. Here is another letter from my riding:

I am writing this morning about my old age pension which isn't enough for me to live on when prices are going up all the time on everything we have to buy. So, I would like to see it raised another ten dollars. I might be able to get by on that. Hoping to hear from you soon.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

What am I going to tell her, Mr. Minister—that her pension is to be frozen at $80 and that the escalator clause providing 2 per cent according to the cost of living will be cut out? That is what she will learn for Christmas. Here is another letter which I received:

I think the old age pension is away below what a normal person needs. It is an injustice for Parliament to expect the older citizens to live with dignity on this low amount. Therefore, I am asking you as the member representing us in the House that on all questions regarding this you vote to improve their miserable existence.

Here is another:

As a taxpayer for over 40 years I feel it is time that our government spent a bit of money on us senior citizens. We are finding it very difficult to live on $79 per month, and since my husband receives a small pension of $65 we are not eligible for the supplement income. Therefore, we have to pay for all our medicine—over $300 per year—pay medical insurance, etc.

Our rent has been increased and the price of food is going up —in spite of Hon. Ron Basford and his teddy bears.

I guess she forgot about Hon. Ron Basford and his peanut butter. The peanut butter has come down, it seems.

There seems to be an abundance of money for all sorts of royal commissions, salaries, etc., and we are very concerned about the small amount which we are forced to exist on.

Can you do something to help us?

Mr. Minister, is this the best you can do for this woman and thousands like her in this country? Here is another letter:

• (5:40 p.m.)

As an old age pensioner, I would like to draw to the attention of the various levels of government of this country our desperate plight. I feel our dollar value is putting us in the "poverty bracket".

I would like to see some help such as: increase the tax exemptions for retirees over 65 to $3,000, and free health services such as free drugs and an increase in the old age pension itself to meet the ever-increasing cost of living. The dollar has eroded to the point where my small savings, which at one time seemed adequate, have long been going down to nil.

Would appreciate it if you would work for us all in your capacity as an MP toward this goal. We have a great country, and pioneers should be given some consideration.

If we can find money for commissions, boards, Members of Parliament, Senators and things like the Bonaventure, why can we not find money for these pensioners? I do not only hear from people in my own riding. Here is a letter from Montreal:

I am appealing to you on behalf of the old age pensioners. The government should give $150 a month to the pensioners. Last year the government gave them an increase of 2 per cent, when the cost of living has gone up 20 per cent to 25 per cent. No one can exist on $110 a month. My rent is $110 a month. Then I have phone and gas and electric, a charwoman once in a while. So you see how much I have left for food. In 1929, before the break in the market, I had a nice home, a country home, a car, a servant.

This writer is better off than the average.

My family used to go to Europe. I had a nice business. Three years later the bank took over and sold me out completely. I was left struggling, with my wife and three children but I managed. I lost my wife 22 years ago and my older daughter 12 years ago, and I am going to be 91 next month so what can I do? I worked till last year, selling textiles to coat and suit and dress manufacturers, but I cannot walk much. I used to walk ten miles a day.

I hope you can do something for us.

I make no apology for reading these letters, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) could read thousands. I am reading a few today because I want the minister to know how these people are faring. Here is another one, from Kingston, Ontario:

My husband and I are old age pensioners, 82 and 76 years old. We are constantly worried about the rising cost of living with the small pensions we have to live on. My husband worked for the Canadian National Railways for 42 years continuous service and his pension has never increased from $126 since he retired at 65. Due to this pension we each receive the reduced pension of $79.58. From this monthly income we have to pay $12.50 a month hospitalization, $5.90 a month for OHSIP, $75 a year income tax. Add to this drugs, rent and food. It is impossible to live in a manner which we as Canadian citizens—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. lady, but if she wishes to continue reading these letters she will have to get unanimous consent.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I have just a minute more?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give consent to the hon. lady to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. MacInnis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will take just two minutes. I shall omit the rest of that letter because I have one here that is particularly pertinent:

I am a widow, old age pensioner, with a small pension besides and a small $10 to $15 to draw on when things get very tight on $127.26 a month.

Because of the above, I rank with the "haves"; but I wish Mr. Munro, Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Benson would realize that we "haves" have to pay the same for our utilities, telephone, medical plan, not to count prescriptive medicines. Being an arthritic with very bad hips—using a cane—my monthly medicine bill runs around $12.50 to $15, so you see we have the same disbursements as the "have nots".

I do hope you will be able to bring these vital points home to officials because I am not the only one to whom the 42 cents is an insult, and the difference is very unfair.

Thank you again.

Here is another one:

I would like you to point out to Mr. Munro, the minister responsible for the paltry raise in the old age pension basic rate, that 42 cents amounts to less than two cents a day over 365 days. Personally, I am in favour of sending the 42 cents back to the government and saying that they must need it to pay the $35,000 yearly salary of the cabinet ministers.

I have not had time to read the letters from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and other places. I just want to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that in my view the very least we can do to salvage something for the people frozen at $80 is bring back the 2 per cent escalator clause. Are we saving that cost of living feature for the people retired from the civil service, the Canada Pension Plan people, Members of Parliament and a host of others? Why can we not give it to the people who need it so badly, the old age pensioners?

I urge all members to vote for this amendment, but I also urge the government to make the amendment unnecessary by stating that it will change the legislation and bring some small measure of justice to elderly people at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Kaplan: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question even though her time has expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Because the time of the hon. lady has expired, this could only be done by unanimous consent of the House. Does the House agree to allow the hon. member for Don Valley to ask a question of the hon. lady?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I can understand that the names of the authors of these letters should not be put on the record. However, I think it would be interesting to have the name of the voluntary organization referred to which provided dentures for the lady with the abscessed gums.

Mrs. MacInnis: Do you know why I do not want to supply that information, though I will give it to the hon. member afterwards? If I were to state the name publicly, there would be such a run on the fund that it would be dry by tomorrow morning.

Mr. MacInnis: Any more questions?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Any more abscesses, Don?

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, before commenting on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I think it only right and proper to say that while the ladies of Canada have only one representative in the House of Commons, when I hear her make pleas on behalf of worthy causes—and most of her causes are worthy—I feel that she makes up in large part for the lack of female representation. I wonder how many extra days we would be sitting if there were more like her in the House of Commons?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We would get more done.

Mr. Coates: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that we would get more done. That depends upon whether the government had the women or whether the opposition had them. If the government had the women, perhaps we would get more done. I believe that if the ladies in the opposition were as effective as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), there would not be enough days in the year to listen to all the complaints, many as justifiable as this one.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, on past occasions when legislation of this type was proposed I indicated that I was opposed to either a means test or a needs test. I reiterate my attitude in this regard. I believe that we ought to introduce an income ceiling or another type of system which would eliminate the investigative procedures under which people are subjected to a means or needs test by government officials, as is the case in the program with which we are now dealing. I think, Mr. Speaker, that our present system says to Canadians, "There is absolutely no value in your saving, because if you save you will merely jeopardize the kind of assistance that may be available to you from the federal government. If throughout your lifetime you contribute nothing, save nothing and become almost totally dependent upon the welfare state, you may do well. On the other hand if you work hard and contribute much, you will receive only a bare minimum from the federal government."

By giving the people of this country the great raise of 42 cents a month that is enshrined in this legislation, the government has told them, "This is your great reward." In 1957, one of the main issues in the election campaign was the two cups of coffee that the Liberal government promised if it were returned to office. At that time it did not propose increasing the old age security pension immediately from $40 a month to $46. The Liberal government of the day said, "We will do that after the election. If you elect us, we will give you $6 more per month." The people of Canada did not elect the Liberals; consequently, the people received $15 a month more. That was a fair increase.

The government is now saying to the people of Canada, "We have investigated in depth poverty in this country. We have brought down a white paper and this legislation, and on April 1 next we will act." The government says that it realizes there is difficulty now. That fact is accepted by everyone. In spite of this, it says to our people, "Even though at present there is at least $725 million in the fund, you will have to wait until next April for any action." The people of Canada have been told that the just society which this government talks about—it talked about it a great deal during the last election campaign—will not become effective for the old age pensioners of this nation until April 1, 1971.

The need for action is evident now; it is especially necessary for many of the 1,700,000 people who are recipients of the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement. The government says that the supplement is not sufficient, that the $25.75 now available as an income supplement ought to be increased to $95 a month for married couples and $55 a month for single persons. At the same time, it says that while there is an evident need for that increase today, our people will have to wait until April 1 before they receive any increase. This is a pretty callous and heartless approach. It is not one you would adopt if you had any true feeling for those in this country who are suffering from degradation, who are being deprived of the substance of life, who are being deprived of their dignity through having to subject themselves to a needs or means test and to investigations carried out by bureaucrats. Nevertheless, that is the situation.

The rules and regulations introduced by this government that has talked about the just society are such as to suggest to people: If you live until April 1, 1971, we will see if we can put a bone with a lot of gristle and not too much meat on your table. That is about the size of it. This is being done by a government that has endeavoured to leave with our people the impression that it is concerned about them. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not a true concern; it is a phony concern.

Mr. Bell: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: It is a concern that stopped on the day the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) led his party to victory in the election of 1968. The slogan "just society" never is found on the lips of Liberal supporters today. It is a forgotten slogan. They do not even mention it any more. What the just society means for the old age pensioners of this country is that there will be no action before April 1, 1971. The government says to them, "In the interim you may live the best way you know, or you may die, for that matter." If a pensioner owes as little as the $6.20 the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) mentioned, the government says, "We will sue you for the money. We will collect it from you; and if you die we will sue your estate." Apparently the government is very anxious to protect the taxpayers of this nation, even to the extent of suing the estates of pensioners for tiny amounts of money. There is not much justice and there is not much of the just society in Bill C-202, so far as I am concerned.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in too much repetition; that is not my worst vice.

Mr. Hogarth: What is your worst vice?

Mr. Stanfield: Tell us.

Mr. Gilbert: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has set forth the position of our party with regard to the amendment before us. The Liberal party is destroying the democratic process of this country. There have been two glaring examples of the cabinet arriving at a decision and imposing it on the members of this House. With regard to the War Measures Act and the temporary public order act, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), a man of fine instincts and high intellect, having been presented with this bill by the cabinet forced it upon the members of this House without accepting any reasonable amendments put forward by the opposition. Examples of the reasonable amendments put forward were those dealing with a review board and bail.

Once the cabinet decides on a particular bill, they impose it upon the members of this House because the government has the majority. This bill is another example of the government destroying the democratic process. The democratic process depends upon persuasion. If the members of the opposition can persuade the government with regard to an amendment, the government has a moral duty to at least consider it and possibly implement it. The amendment now before us would insert the escalation clause in connection with the old age security pension of $80 a month. The Government, through the cabinet, is telling the members of the Liberal party that no change will be made. I reviewed in Hansard the second reading debate on this bill. There are over 150 hon. members in the Liberal party. Only the minister and three other Liberals participated in the debate on one of the most important bills introduced this session.

I recall the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) introducing the guaranteed income supplement in 1966. He departed from the principle of universality which was implemented by the Liberal party in 1952. We had a very spirited debate in which the minister actively participated. I am rather surprised that he has not taken part in this debate. The fact that he has not strengthened my argument that once the cabinet decides upon the content of a particular bill, even though the opposition may plead and exhort it has no impact on the government. The result is destruction of the democratic process. A continuation of this attitude will make the members of the Liberal party puppets of the government. They will not be able to contribute to the debate on this bill.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has set forth our position in such an eloquent and persuasive way that I am sure hon. members opposite will be happy to adopt his amendment. Your Honour will recall that at the end of the debate on second reading when Your Honour asked whether it was the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion, it was adopted subject to a few members, including myself, shouting "On division". We shouted as hard as we could because we did not like the principle that the government was imposing with regard to the bill. It is a complete departure from the principle of universality which was established in 1952. We now have the selectivity principle.

In addition, the escalation clause attached to pensions of $80 is to be removed. The more I listen to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre expound the principle which the government is asking us to accept, the more certain I am I should join him in voting against it. I am asking that five members on this side of the House, or even on the other side, stand up on third reading and force a vote, because acceptance of this principle of departing from universality in favour of selectivity is likely to cause a good deal of damage and all Canadians should know what is being done.

The principle of selectivity was established away back in 1927 when the pension program was first introduced. A means test was thereafter applied. Between 1927 and 1952 members on all sides of the House pleaded with the government to adopt the principle of universality, and in 1952 it was adopted. When we enacted the Canada Pension Plan, Parliament added an escalator clause to provide for automatic increases in line with increases in the cost of living. This has now become a standard provision in many Canadian pension plans. When I think of the pension plans available to retired civil servants, RCMP officers, Members of Parliament and others, I have the joy of knowing there is an escalation clause in them to take care of increases in the cost of living.

In 1966, when the President of the Privy Council was responsible for this legislation we experienced the first departure from the principle of universality. Now we find this proposal for a further departure. When I consider the increase in the pension being offered, I am ashamed that as a Member of Parliament I have to take part in debate and try to persuade members on the other side that the increase is niggardly, mere flim-flam. The minister talks about the cost of the present escalation clause which I am trying to persuade hon. members opposite to retain. He says it will cost $15 million. We should all know that in the old age security fund at present there is more than $1 billion which has accumulated over the years. Surely, the retention of the escalation clause would cost nothing in comparison with that amount.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has recommended, first of all, a demogrant of $150 a month on a universal basis and inclusive of an escalation clause. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) says this would cost another billion dollars. We could find the billion dollars in the foreign exchange reserve amounting to $4 billion which is just sitting there. It would be an experiment accepted by all Canadians. In the old age security fund itself there is more than $1 billion, enough to take care of a demogrant of $150 a month.

The second proposal advanced by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is that we should make a universal grant of $100 and a $50 guaranteed income supplement to eligible Canadians in need. This would cost much less than the first recommendation. I am sure the newly-appointed whip, who probably appreciates the presence of a large number of pensioners in his riding, will agree wholeheartedly that this proposal ought to be tried and tested. After all, we have the necessary money.

It is worth repeating that a person living on old age security who receives not only the pension but the guaranteed income supplement, a total income of $1,620, is still left at least 25 per cent below the poverty level. In 1968 the committee on poverty said the amount necessary for a single person to live in Canada at the poverty level as $1,800. In 1970 they said it should be $1,922. We are giving these people the princely sum of $1,620. When we deduct the income tax payable on this amount, which is approximately $75, we find that a person in these circumstances is living at 25 per cent below the poverty level. I am sure that all members opposite who have a heart and a conscience will agree to bring about the necessary changes.

If we were to accept the $150 demogrant, the annual income would amount to $1,800 and it would be necessary to add an escalation clause to bring the recipient up to the poverty level. A married couple would receive $3,020 total income for the year. In 1969 the committee on poverty said it took $3,000 for a couple to live at the poverty level and in 1970 the figure is $3,200; so hon. members can see they would be $200 below the poverty level—and they are still subject to income tax.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre looked across at the Minister of National Health and Welfare this afternoon, recalling his arrival in the House, his progressive ideas and his compassion for people. Then my hon. friend pleaded with him to make the necessary changes in this legislation. I hope that the minister, who comes from a city where there is a measure of poverty and a large number of pensioners, will not be strangled by cabinet decisions to hold the line with regard to this bill. The least he can do is accept the proposal that the escalation clause be retained as it applies to old age security pensions.

As my hon. friend said so well in his speech to the committee, the government's proposal seriously affects single people who have an income of $2,280 and married couples with an income of $3,200. These are the people who are being hurt by not getting the guaranteed income supplement. Surely, a man of his stature and background, a man of his compassion and good instincts, will agree to make the necessary changes in the bill.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I agree with some of the reasons the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) put forward for the action taken by the minister. He said that the minister was probably told by the cabinet that he had to jiggle and juggle the sum of money he had been given, and this legislation resulted. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that if we pass this bill it is but the first step toward a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians? And it is a bad first step, because I am sure all of us are able to anticipate that the second bad step will be taken in the direction of family allowances.

Surely, we in this House should have the wisdom and the courage to stay clear of the selectivity principle and to adhere to the principle of universality. I suggest that the legislation before the House will create divisiveness. I want the opportunity on third reading to vote against the bill. I want five members of this House to rise when the motion is called and to force a vote so that hon. members are made to realize what they are voting for, namely, a redistribution of old age poverty. I think once hon. members realize this is what we are doing and that the implementation of this measure will not cost the government one penny, they will agree it is a bad bill.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre commenced his speech on second reading by saying that this was a bad bill. The hon. member said he had received letters from old age pensioners expressing disappointment and disillusionment, and I could not agree more with those pensioners. That is why I want members on both sides of the House to stand up and vote against this bill. We will have plenty of opportunity in the next few months to revamp the bill, put it in its proper perspective and take care of the senior citizens of Canada.

I notice the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is nodding his head. He participated in the second reading debate. He supported the government and spoke against our plea for a guaranteed annual income, asking where we were going to get the money. Let me tell the hon. member that there are $4 billion in the foreign exchange reserve. Surely that is a sufficient amount of money to implement the plan we have suggested.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre outlined this afternoon the breach of faith on the part of government, the breaking of a social contract that was entered into between the government and the people of Canada in regard to the escalation clause, the hon. member for Ottawa West contributed a gratuitous remark by asking, "Well, why can't we break a contract?" I ask whether he realizes what this means to all Canadians. Does the hon. member agree that we should break our agreement regarding a 2 per cent escalation for the Canada Pension Plan, or in regard to retired civil servants, the RCMP or military personnel? Surely the word of the government should be its bond. It was its bond in 1965 when the government introduced the escalation provision. It is now casting it aside. I do not think the members of the Liberal party would want it to be said that they should so callously discard the escalation clause in respect of this bill.

As I have said, the philosophy of a guaranteed income for our senior citizens is one of co-operation and consideration. When we think of the contribution that they have made over the years, not only to the productive life of this country but to the life of the family as well as to moral and spiritual life, surely the least we can do is ensure that they spend their twilight years in respect and in dignity. This bill will not produce that result. I think all hon. members of the House should realize this is the case and should vote against the bill.

The 42 cents increase in the basic pension is a disgrace, a cruel hoax perpetrated on many senior citizens at Christmas time. I hope that the President of the Privy Council, a man who comes from the Maritimes and who has seen poverty, as has his family, yet has overcome it, the man who introduced the guaranteed income supplement, will rise in his place and declare that he is opposed to the principle of selectivity and is in favour of universality. I perceive the Minister without Portfolio (Mr.

Andras) in the House. I think he would agree that not only must we have pensions but we must have homes in which our retired people can live in respect and dignity. I hope the members of this House will accept the amendment.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, as we approach the Christmas season we will be reminded on television and from our reading of what is regarded as the greatest Christmas play of all time, "The Christmas Carol". As I listened to the debate today it seemed to me that the Scrooge of "The Christmas Carol" is found in this House in Bill C-202, and in a way that we in this enlightened age ought to think twice about. Surely, the Christmas present that we are putting together for the old age pensioners of Canada can be described as nothing more than the device of a Scrooge who is as hard-hearted as the government.

Mr. Francis: Fifty-five dollars a month supplement.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) talks about the guaranteed income supplement. I shall have something to say about that. I would have thought his experience of bureaucracy in government would have told him that to devise a means test which for a single person might be applied in 55 different ways will do nothing but perpetuate bureaucracy and work hardship on those who really need our consideration and help. I say that kindly to the hon. member, because if this bill is implemented on the selectivity principle outlined therein, we shall be reverting to the means test system, one that will be more vicious than any we have had hitherto in our welfare legislation. It will be a retrograde form of means test that will be much more severe than the income tax reports used by some provinces to determine the premium that people in the low-income bracket should pay for health services insurance.

Much has been said in recent years about bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada. During the last election campaign the "deux nations" theory came in for a lot of discussion and heated debate. I believe that the real division in Canada has nothing to do with language, culture or politics in its most bitter form, but is the critical dividing line that cuts across all of these and separates Canada into two distinct groups. The first is the affluent Canada, the productive Canada where the majority enjoy a generally adequate standard of living, where cultural and educational facilities are readily accessible. This Canada is exemplified by the skyscrapers, high-rise apartment complexes, new subdivisions, luxurious schools and universities, a rising standard of living and new opportunities. In effect, it is the Canada where people are in the mainstream of our economic way of life. The population of this Canada is about 17 million.

• (8:30 p.m.)

On the other hand, there is a second Canada with which very few of us are familiar. It is the Canada where more than 4.5 million Canadians are trapped in poverty. Their level of income is below the $3,000 a year poverty line suggested by the Economic Council of Canada. These people are not to be found in one province; they are found in every province, in every major city as well as in the rural parts of Canada. This is the have-not Canada. With this legislation we are dealing with one of the larger groups in this have-not Canada, the old age pensioners, people who are past 65 years of age. There are, as well, the working poor and the unemployed. Probably there is no group in the have-not Canada to whom we as legislators in Parliament have a greater responsibility than those in the senior citizen group. On the eve of Christmas, as we are dealing with the welfare of these people and the amount of money that is available for them to live on, certainly it is only fitting that we should be doing so with a little more compassion than this bill indicates.

Perhaps the most comprehensive study of poverty undertaken in Canada is now being conducted by the Senate Committee on Poverty. The chairman of that committee, Senator Croll, in his report to the committee on its findings on November 11 and 12 made a number of significant statements. Time does not permit one to quote all of the important parts of his report, but there are one or two passages which should be brought to the attention of the House. He said:

> The low-income worker, the aged, the handicapped, the social welfare recipient, the single head of family, is becoming more and more alienated from society which each is desperately trying to rejoin. The poverty of our people, the unemployment, the 600,000 long-term welfare recipients in the province of Quebec clearly indicate, as they put it in the brief... that we are becoming a nation of beggars.

Those words were not spoken by anyone representing this party in the Senate. They were spoken by a distinguished Senator who belongs to the government party. He went on to say:

> I think what is required is a net to catch all those who, for any number of legitimate reasons, are unable to provide themselves with an adequate income. These people are our poor. Their numbers are a disgrace. They are the elderly, who helped to build this society, the handicapped who are unable to compete, through no fault of their own, and the working poor, who strive and aspire, like all of us, to a decent way of life, but regardless of how hard they try they are unable to catch up. They are forever losers under our present system. Up to now we have always said that the fault is with the individual. I think it is time that we looked around at the system and let it share some of the responsibility. For those who fall into this net we must provide, as a matter of right, a decent living and access to quality services which are easily obtainable.

The amendment to the legislation, which we will be voting on later this evening, seeks to deal with one segment of our society about whom Senator Croll was talking, our senior citizens. I think it is a downright disgrace and a travesty of justice that we should be making available, as the bill does, this pittance compared with what the Senate committee had in mind.

Senator Croll continued in the following words. I realize this is a general statement but it does relate to our legislation in a most acute way:

> Those appearing before us were unanimous in the view that the public welfare system has broken down, mired in bureaucracy and suffering from lack of leadership. It has failed in its ability to achieve humanitarian ends, and the public capacity to finance it in its present form is in question. The welfare system has failed for another reason; that is because it was considered a supplement to the economic system to provide for marginal people. It was never designed to supply basic needs for a large number of Canadians. I have been quoted as saying that the welfare system is a mess. That was some months ago, and now on reconsideration I think it is an impossible mess! It is too late for reform—it is beyond reform. It is too late to apply poultices or bandages or even to attempt to modify it. It is useless to try to make changes in the system because of citizen hostility and recipient anger. Its situation is now such that efforts to change it, even if such efforts should result in its betterment, are no longer possible and just would not be believed. It has infected generations of Canadians and plagues our society.

Bill C-202 does nothing more than perpetuate a system which is recognized to be wrong. And what is even worse, it takes a retrograde, backward step in eliminating the universality approach as far as our senior citizens are concerned and substitutes the selectivity approach which will further degrade people at the senior citizen level who should have our respect and to whom we certainly have responsibility. It has long been my political philosophy, as a student of political policy and science, that we have a special responsibility to our senior citizens and that each of us shares that responsibility individually and collectively because when we were young, they looked after us.

In the same way we have a very special responsibility to the youth of our nation, because when we reach the senior citizen stage they will be taking care of us. We are failing in our responsibility because the provisions of this bill are such that we are moving backward instead of forward. We are refusing to recognize what is the fact and reality before us. It is a tragedy that we do not take a more positive viewpoint. The National Council of Welfare feels strongly that the provisions of income support by way of needs-tested public assistance programs is inherently degrading, stigmatizing and destructive of self-respect, having a debilitating effect upon the recipient and upon the children of the recipient families, in this case upon our senior citizens. Can we not understand the logic and the truth of a statement such as this? Senator Croll went on to say:

I think we ought to be able to scrap the system completely. We could actually repeal every one of our social measures, with the exception of the Canada Assistance Act, the Canada Pension Plan and the unemployment insurance plan, and meet every requirement under the basic definition of "need" in the Canada Assistance Act, modifying it to some slight extent so it would all fit under an umbrella rather than as now under a tent with 200 or so measures.

Another paradox about this legislation is that we are dealing with it at a time when we have in our hands and have been studying with great interest the recent white paper on income security for Canadians. This legislation does implement some of the recommendations in the white paper so far as our senior citizens are concerned, but it completely rejects the basic concept of the white paper. It jumps the gun, so to speak, and brings in a type of legislation that negates or rejects the basic principle involved in the white paper on income security.

[Mr. Thompson.]

To return specifically to the amendments about which we are concerned tonight, we find that a single person is pegged, on the guaranteed income principle, over and above the old age assistance which is $80 a month, to an additional $55 a month which is available to those in need as supplementary income. Suppose such a person has no other income and is eligible as a single person for the $55 in addition to the $80: he would receive $135. Last week I met with a group of senior citizens in my home city. I asked them if it was possible for anyone to live on an income of $135 a month. Various persons at this meeting gave me statistics on their cost of living. With the inflationary costs we have today, it is impossible for a single person to maintain a respectable standard of living, especially if he must supply his own living accommodation.

As has already been said tonight, it is not necessary to take the word of the senior citizens. What does the Economic Council of Canada say? It states that a person needs at least $1,900 a year to barely exist. This was in 1969. The Economic Council went on to say that $3,000 a year was the poverty line. Here we are offering $1,620 to these people, knowing very well that it does not even come up to the existence level. On top of that, to add insult to injury we make that level of income subject to income tax. In other words, the senior citizen will not even receive $1,620; we will take some of it back.

We go still further and deny what has been a niggardly increase in respect of the cost of living. We deny these people the 2 per cent cost of living increase both in respect of the supplement and the basic pension. We know that the 2 per cent figure represents less than half the actual increase in the cost of living, but for some reason we are so poverty-stricken in our own attitude toward the needs of our senior citizens that we take away the 2 per cent and besides that make their income subject to income tax.

For these reasons this bill does not make sense. Not only is it bad legislation but it is completely unjustified and unwarranted in so far as our responsibility is concerned. By taking away this 2 per cent in respect of the cost of living we are placing an additional burden on old age pensioners, because when the cost of living escalates, as it will, through inflation—which the government has said, and which it is generally recognized increases year by year—the $80 will have less purchasing power each year because it is pegged in this legislation. It would seem that whoever thought this legislation through must have been completely ignorant of the facts. The government in nationalizing leaving the universality aspect and replacing it with the process of selectivity really has neither accepted nor rejected either principle. It seems to me the government should opt for one or the other and not short-circuit on both, because that will be the effect of the legislation.

An appeal procedure should be introduced as well. The ceiling on earned income should be raised to $3 or $4 for each dollar deduction of allocation. Surely the normal $1,100 tax deduction is completely unjustified in dealing with senior citizens who are receiving old age assistance or who are entitled to the supplementary payment. The selectivity principle will mean an increase in administrative processing. Has the government estimated the cost of administering this program? I wager that government administration and bureaucray which will be necessary under this program, if it follows the present pattern, will involve a cost greater than giving the 2 per cent escalation to senior citizens and including the universality principle at least in respect of the basic pension which is set at $80. This selectivity principle means that money is to be taken from some pensioners and given to others. Is this the type of war on poverty the government says it is carrying on? I urge someone over there to consider this question before the final vote is taken.

We might go back to "The Christmas Carol", when Tiny Tim reached the heart of Scrooge. We may not have a Tiny Tim here, but we hope that somehow the spirit that moved Scrooge will move the hearts of whoever devised this legislation, because it is not the type of legislation with which we should be concerned at this time. There are one or two points I should like to make in closing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has said he is closing his remarks. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: I thank the House. First, the cost of living increase should be attached to the actual cost of living, instead of being fixed at 2 per cent. However, at least that which has been the practice should continue both in respect of the supplement and the basic pension. Second, the deduction allowed in respect of income tax ought to be increased. At the very least it should be increased to the amount the Economic Council has said is the basic income one requires for existence. I believe the amount is $1,920 a year. It would be much better if it were increased, for the old age pensioner, to the poverty line of $3,000. No one could have very much objection to that.

It is wrong to penalize people over age 65 who would like to supplement their income a little, by taking it away in taxes. I will give an example from my home city. A man who is over 70 years of age, who a year ago did not pay any income tax because his income was not up to that level, overlooked the fact that his wife had reached pensionable age. He could not afford to have an accountant make out his income tax form. He did this himself, but forgot that his wife had received pension and so did not properly calculate the amount that he and his wife received as income. Therefore, he did not calculate any tax payment as he had not paid tax in previous years. He was later assessed for this in the amount of $157.17. When the first assessments notice arrived, he was amazed that he was being taxed. As he was not accustomed to paying tax, he neglected to do anything about it. He received another notice stating that if a payment was not made immediately, legal action would be taken to collect the amount owing.

This poor old man panicked. He did not read all the fine print on the form. He thought he might go to jail. He borrowed the money and paid the tax, because he knew that if his pension was reduced this year because of the unpaid tax he just would not be able to live on what he received. The tragedy of it all is that he does not have the money to pay back what he borrowed. I am sure this situation is duplicated tens of thousands of times across Canada. To tax our senior citizens at the present levels is a disgrace. Surely, the income tax deduction for people receiving old age assistance should be raised, so that if they have a little money of their own they may raise their standard of living at least to what the Economic Council has said is the poverty line.

At this last minute of the debate on this legislation I hope the spirit of Christmas may prevail in the hardened heart of the Scrooge responsible for the drafting of this legislation, so that the amendments put forward will be accepted and we may go home with the satisfaction of knowing that we have made this Christmas a little better for the most needy and worthy people in our country.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured at being given this opportunity of speaking on Bill C-202 which provides for an increase in old age pensions. It would be rather more appropriate to use the word "decrease" for this bill, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said, is a bad bill. Indeed, it does not take into account any of the present economic conditions which border on general chaos and for which nothing but ad hoc solutions are resorted to, the ineffectiveness of which is obvious. With this kind of action, the disease gets worse since, in any case, people are sinking deeper and deeper into misery.

How is it that we have reached a point where a host of aged people, and even young people, who are not even able any more to find what they need in our fair Canada? They are not even able any more to find a decent place to live in, not able to have their three meals a day guaranteed in a country swarming with resources.

So, there is certainly something the matter, and since our aged people are reduced to begging, as we can see now, our economic system must be reformed from its very bases. No one in this House, however, dares apply the remedies needed to rebalance our economy so as to enable every individual to benefit from progress and science.

Canadians are deprived of necessities. Many live in alarming conditions, and this is why we are trying to increase old age security pensions. The government is trying to find money where there is none, to take money from those who already have not enough in order to give it to others, in an effort to rebalance our economy a little. This unbalance is ever increasing and so is discontent throughout our fair Canada.

Here we are again discussing problems pertaining to elderly citizens, within an over-all national economy which is disrupted, confused, in short, unbalanced through and through. Let us keep on, if we enjoy it, wasting our time on trifles when the whole structure is falling apart.

A while ago, I listened with great interest to the speech delivered by the member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson). He made a sensible speech and put his finger on the cause of our current economic problems. Furthermore, he proposed certain solutions to get our economy moving again.

Other members also described the difficult economic circumstances which affect us one and all. Every day I receive letters which indicate that there is general discomfort and dissatisfaction. I will confine myself to deal with the indispensable economic reforms.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Our national economy is off balance because of the lamentable purchasing power of senior citizens. The Canadian government which exercises the supreme command and has a right of supervision and direction on the economic, monetary and political activities of citizens cannot correct the situation.

I must recall something fundamental that can help correct any economy which has been disrupted as a result of the attitude of the government and of the country's most important institutions.

The principle implied in the speeches of all government members, but which in no way corresponds to their economic concerns is their pretended unawareness of the daily realities of the Canadian economy which is necessarily personal and family-oriented, as well as social and corporate. It is needless to speak of administration, of economic policy whether national provincial, municipal or international, unless this principle is recognized from the start. Not only from the philosophical point of view, but from the practical point of view as well.

Mr. Speaker, having forgotten this first principle of any public administration, we now have an unbalanced economy. Nobody can live without money in any civilized country, be it capitalist, socialist or communist. To consume and produce goods and services, one must have money. Everywhere money is needed in any phase of the economic life, whether a child is being born, an adolescent growing up, an adult feeling he is in perfect fit, or an older citizen living his last days.

Any social life is entirely monetary, economic and political.

Because it is monetary, we need a purchasing power based on the basic needs of each human being.

Because it is economic, it is necessary that production should meet the daily consumption needs of each human being before being used for capitalizing for the future.

Because it is political, we have to control, through wise policies, all currency circulation according to the economic capabilities of the actual or possible production and according to the needs of all the human beings who compose the population of Canada, whether they are children, students or adult producers on unemployed. Whether they are pensioners, old citizens, sick or disabled persons, they have a right to live.

There is talk about giving something to old people once they have been unclothed, once they have been thrown out on the street. Action is needed to enable them to live. In order to keep them alive governments must intervene and to do it, they must rob well-off people and give their money to the others. Harm, even great harm, is done to some, to many, in order to ensure some happiness, some right to live to others in this country.

Instead of increasing the cost of living, of allowing interest rates to rise, or of enriching only the rich, society must be served. We should use our resources to serve our people. By this I mean that, instead of redistributing our riches, we are trying to redistribute what is in scarce supply.

According to statistics, our capitalization this year amounts to $34 billion. Surely, we could take one billion out of this to give a monthly pension of $150 to our older people without submitting them to any means test.

All Canada's senior citizens should receive $150 per month and I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is possible. It is easy to make such a distribution in our beautiful country. If we do not know where to get the money from, instead of robbing some to give to others—as I have said before in this House—we could use capitalization surpluses as well as excess profits. We could also grant a compensated discount and establish new credits to distribute production surpluses so as to procure a decent living to our senior citizens. Older people are not clothed or housed with bits of paper. What they need is a decent house to live in, a sufficient quantity of healthy food to meet their requirements.

This is what we have to accomplish through concrete, positive and social means.

It is through social consciousness and determination to achieve our objective that we will be able to satisfy these requirements.

Canada's production is plentiful, and here is the proof. Presently, 37 per cent of all Canadians are unemployed. Several citizens who do not enjoy the benefits of unemployment insurance, receive social welfare allowances. Thousands of people live at the expense of others who have not yet a sufficient income. Instead of distributing the tremendous wealth made of $34 billion in capital, to satisfy the needs of Canadians, people live in scarcity, and we find nothing more to say than: There is no money. To raise funds, we will have to take money from other people.

I wonder when the government members will take note of the facts which would enable us to distribute to all needy individuals the wealth which is plentiful in this country.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the entire economy, on account of our faulty financial system, no longer meets human needs. The pursuit of money has become the essential purpose of all.

Much could be said on this question and on the other consequences of a financial system that proves dictatorial when it should be a servant. The system has become a mechanical device and a robbing scheme when it should liberate men and distribute the benefits of progress. It engenders and promotes laxity among men instead of brotherhood and generosity that could shine in this world where physical hindrances have almost disappeared.

In such deprivation can always be found impoverished families, dispossessed small businessmen, important industries buried or swallowed by the monsters to which austerity gave the occasion to extend their tentacles and increase their power. Such monsters will enjoy the government's favour as large job providers. While they welcome workers from all quarters, cities and rural areas, on the other hand, they make them into robots, at the service of Mammon.

Mr. Speaker, I could give many more details on the basic question of old age pensions, and even if all the hon. members who spoke on this measure have explained the pension terms, the methods of payment and the amount to be paid, I still submit that we should get rid of the deceiving and anti-democratic system of the guaranteed income subject to a means test.

Gailbraith, an economist, had this to say on the matter:

> Today, we ensure an income to the have-nots, but through various means that are costly in their application and an outrage to human dignity.

Indeed, we insult our older citizens through inquiries to find out whether or not they are entitled to this or that.

Whenever someone has put something aside, there are some people who say: he is better off than I am, he is not entitled to that for I have nothing.

This is discrimination, Mr. Speaker, and in 1966, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States organized a forum on the best methods of providing a decent standard of living for everyone. Robert Théobald, James Tobin, Milton Friedman, all of them economic advisers, approved the principle of guaranteed income and negative tax, on which I should like to say a few words.

We should have enough sense, once the inquiries to find out whether older people need assistance are abolished, to determine a decent tax basis, so as to leave our older people with what they need to live decently.

The Ontario Labour Association, in a brief submitted on February 28, 1967, to the Special Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Consumer Credit, No. 39, shows that we have taken the wrong road. Inquiries on old age security should be done away with. We should be able to ensure old people of easy circumstances in a country bursting with wealth.

• (9:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a very few words in support of the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I take this opportunity to commend him on his appeal today on behalf of the aged citizens of this country. I also commend my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) who placed before the government a realistic assessment of the weaknesses in the bill before us.

The lack of human consideration by this government for the segment of society that falls in this category, as well as for other disadvantaged Canadians, becomes more and more obvious each day, Mr. Speaker. I refer to the blind, the disabled, the mentally retarded and others whom they help by lip service and to whom they throw a few pennies. In this case it is 42 pennies, to be exact. That is how much they have thrown these people out of the government's protective coffers. And, Mr. Speaker, it is ever more difficult for me to realize how they can continue, in conscience, to camouflage this attitude from most Canadians.

Again, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the overflow in government offices of experts who advise on the passing of what is supposed to be just legislation, there remain many weaknesses. This legislation exemplifies nothing but sheer, automatic consideration of disadvantaged Canadians as numbers, or holes in a punch-card, rather than as humans to whom we as a state owe at least some responsibility—the responsibility for their care; that they may continue to live in a reasonable state of existence in their remaining years.

One important segment of our senior citizens whom they have forgotten, Mr. Speaker, is the aged pensioner who suffers from exceptional incapacity. I am referring to that group of citizens who in their thousands are either left alone or suffer from a degree of disability which is such that they are unable to look after themselves. I can tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others in this House that I, too, have been getting many letters indicating disappointment, frustration, disillusionment, bewilderment and lack of faith in those who govern.

Let me quote an example of what I mean by those who are suffering from exceptional incapacities, Mr. Speaker. Just a couple of months ago I visited a lady 70 years of age who was blind, who had just had her second leg removed and who was suffering from diabetes and high blood pressure. Her husband, who was a war veteran, left her with a small widow's pension under the War Veterans Allowance Act. Because she was alone, she left her deteriorated home and, luckily, was able to move in next door with her son, who was also blind. He had eight children and was existing on social assistance. His wife has to try to take care of his mother. This lady's income, with old age security, totalled $111.41, plus her $40. The son borrowed $600 to repair the home. He rented it out, which meant that the rental income was eventually charged against the mother's income, which was reduced by a like amount. Luckily, I visited this lady and brought the case to the attention of the authorities. She is now getting a few more dollars because she happens to be blind.

The regulations do not make allowances for those suffering from exceptional incapacity such as in the case I have just quoted, Mr. Speaker. I submit that this, again, indicates a lack of human consideration. Another case I would like to mention is that of a citizen on old age assistance who made the mistake of trying to supplement his income. He earned some $240 by selling newspapers over a year and found that he had to repay part of this amount. While I realize, Mr. Speaker, that regulations as to limits have to be laid down, there should be some responsibility on the state to become cognizant of exceptional cases of extreme hardship. Money does not do everything. I submit that the government should consider very seriously staffing the various district offices with responsible people who are capable of looking into these cases, and the regulations should be broadened to allow for human consideration and discretion where the need is evident.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: It is difficult for me to understand, also, why couples are discriminated against. With the increase, the amount available for single old age pensioners will rise to $135 per month, whereas a couple will lose $15 a month if a man is living with his wife.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame.

Mr. Marshall: There is not much point in repeating many of the other failings in the bill, Mr. Speaker, because many of my colleagues have already pointed these out. I hope the minister will take note of the very important human consideration that should apply to those receiving old age pension who suffer from exceptional incapacity. I hope that something will be done to look after this serious problem. I can only say that I am disappointed that other disadvantaged citizens, particularly the blind and the disabled, will have to wait for discussions to take place between the minister and the provinces. This could have been an ongoing process over the past two years and the results could have been announced at this time. I hope, therefore, that the minister will do his utmost to speed up these discussions so that those who suffer from blindness or any other disability—this applies especially to those who are mentally incapacitated—will receive increases in benefits which are so urgently needed.

Another weakness, Mr. Speaker, is in the federal-provincial relationship concerning old age security and the Canada Assistance Plan. May I quote as an example a couple in the province of Newfoundland who are allowed, under social assistance, the grand amount of $130. The husband receiving old age assistance gets $111.41 and, under the maximum allowable, the province pays the wife $18.59. This means, Mr. Speaker, that with the increase in old age security, the husband will now receive $135 but that the $18.59 will now be denied to the wife, giving them in total an increase of only $5. This will go a long way in the fight to help our aged, Mr. Speaker! I am sure the government will agree that this will help that aged couple a great deal.

I also go along with some of my colleagues who stated today that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is not altogether to blame for the callousness of the cabinet. I remember well reading a few months ago in the local newspaper about the disagreement in the cabinet which turned down by 50 per cent the increases that the minister recommended. The article related that six members of the cabinet fought vigorously against the recommended increases: I am sure that the many aged and disadvantaged citizens of this country would like to know who the six ministers were. I do not think one has to be very smart to guess who they were. Fortunately, this is a time of good will and I would not want to spoil the festive season by venturing to guess who the nasty six were who turned down the increase that had been recommended by the minister.

There are many thousands of disappointed Canadians in Canada, Mr. Speaker. Many of them had faith and hope that their need would be relieved. They had this faith because of the loud and clear proclamations of our debt to that segment of society which needs our help. The proclamations came from many sources, from throne speeches, from white papers, from poverty committees, and very soon it is to come from the $7.5 million bookstore called Information Canada.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I hope the minister will try and impress upon his colleagues the shortcomings that exist in the bill, in order to provide some relief for our aged citizens. I hope the government will have a change of heart with regard to the 2 per cent escalation clause.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few comments to make at the time of the study of this very important bill which particularly concerns one class of our society, the old people who hope to live a few more years with a little security.

The amendment proposed by our colleague from Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Knowles) to change clause 1 by deleting lines 4 to 11 means that we do not approve restricting the pension to the amount established in Bill C-202.

I entirely agree with this motion because in 1970, the very people who propose the limit at the amount stipulated in clause 1 would not want to live with such a low pension.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that Canada would gain if it gave a pension higher than the amount established in the bill in order to increase the purchasing power of each group of people who are suffering from a lack of purchasing power to meet their essential needs.

As it must be the case for other hon. members, I receive each week from people 65 and over complaints to the effect that their income is too low to live decently at home.

Mr. Speaker, the old age security should be paid at 60. The proof is a Christmas card which I have received today from a married couple in my riding. They tell me that they hope that in 1971 people will qualify for the old age pension at 60 since at 48 or 50 they can no longer work. They are too old to get a job.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunately true! It quite often happens that people lose jobs that they have held for 20 or 30 years, get fired because of mechanization. They are not responsible for mechanization but since machines are more and more replacing men, automatically those people who had jobs find themselves without an income and are unable to support themselves. When they go looking for another job they are simply asked the question: "How old are you?" "I am 50, I am 52, I am 55." They then get the following reply: "You are too old to work here." Then they are too old to work for industry and too young to get the old age security pension and they find themselves in a very difficult situation.

A few years back, when we were advocating that the pensionable age be brought down from 70 to 65 years, we were considered people with too advanced ideas. It was not normal that the eligibility age for the pension be brought down, because it did not reflect the thinking of those who were responsible for the administration.

Now, in some provinces which I will not name, provincial governments moved to ensure a little more security to senior citizens, and they started to give them a form of pension which could supplement that given by the central government, and at a less advanced age, namely at 65.

After a few years, the central government came to the conclusion that it was normal to bring the eligibility age for the pension down to 65, and that has been accepted by the whole population and by all hon. members.

In my opinion, it would be desirable in 1970 to bring down to 60 the eligibility age for the old age pension, so that young people who come each year on the labour market could let society take advantage of their knowledge. Indeed, they are in a better position than older people to render services to society and society would benefit from it if those young people took the place of older people and if persons 60 and over were allowed to leave their jobs and at the same time be assured of their security for the remaining years of their life.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that mankind, and especially members, should remember: man does not change. It is easier for an elderly person to remain idle, without being subject to all kinds of whims and wishes, than for a younger person.

A youngblood is dynamic and if time is not spent on doing good things, energy will be consumed on not-so-good things.

As for senior citizens, they have matured and learned to be more deliberate. They can quietly and without fearing for their fate remain inactive and our society will not be the worse off.

Old Age Security Act

There remains one point to which I should like to draw the attention of the House. Even at 60 years of age, all the inhabitants of our towns or cities who are not completely worn out by work could keep busy beautifying properties.

In my riding, I have known people to whom I suggested that they leave their farm to their sons before the latter took off to go and live in town. I suggested that they buy a property and take care of it to brighten up the village and make it attractive for those who visited it or lived there.

I could give many instances of people who have taken our advice and who are now happy to live in an environment where they are not inactive but give to others the will to be of service in their milieu, to keep their home in order, with a small garden and flowers; they are an example for our youth; they show that everybody can lead a meaningful life, whatever his age.

It would be wise to alter this old age security legislation in some way so as to give our senior citizens an income which would not be partially taken away by taxes which actually prevent them from satisfying their needs.

I agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) to whom I listened attentively a few moments ago and who said that Canadians should not have to pay tax on an income of less than $3,000. In fact, if one considers the cost of maintaining a home and leading a decent life in 1970 this amount of $3,000 is far from excessive.

Secondly, people who must live in homes for the aged should be able to live without having to depend on welfare. Every week I visit old people. I have the opportunity to go and say hello, to talk to them since I think it is my duty to do so. The sole comfort that many have is to be visited by a member of Parliament who is really going to look into their problems so as to get better acquainted with their situation and make the necessary representations.

Tomorrow when people see in their newspapers the representations made by some hon. members, including myself, some will say: The M.P.'s worried only about the old age security while young people have also needs. They will wonder how it is that they are being ignored.

In October 1970, during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, we showed concern for young families when we proposed an amendment asking for an increase in family allowances in order to provide them with some additional income with which to fulfil their obligations.

Furthermore, in Canada, and particularly in Quebec, there are isolated people who may suffer because we neglect to speak on their behalf. I am referring to widows aged 60 or 65 who have family responsibilities and who need some income to carry out their obligations.

Those people write us from time to time, asking us to bear their plight in mind so that Canada may grant them a minimum income in keeping with the possibilities the country can afford.

As Bill C-202 applies to the situation of old people, I do not want to forget the others.

I deeply regret that Bill C-202 does not extend eligibility for old age security pensions to those who have reached the age of 60 and also grant them a tax exemption on incomes below a ceiling of $3,000. This does not mean that we are opposed to the principle of the bill or to the application of better legislation, but we want Canada to better realize the fact that people who were born before us deserve more, because we can inherit from them advantages from which they should benefit in 1970.

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to listen to various members of the opposition parties talk on this motion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The essence of it is that we should not remove the escalation feature from the $80 universal pension. In the course of the discussion about this particular issue the government has been characterized as Scrooges who are letting down a lot of the old age pensioners.

Some hon. Members: Correct.

Mr. Munro: I cannot help wondering whether any of those critics have analysed what we are doing of a positive nature for senior citizens. I ask the House to look at page 40 of the white paper to which many hon. members have referred. One passage which appears there is of some significance.

> There will be 1.7 million people over 65 in Canada in 1971. Of these almost 1.1 million, or 64 per cent, would have incomes of less than $1,500 (or $3,000 for a couple) were it not for the income security programs already in operation.
> Even with the existing income security measures, it is anticipated that 711,000 people, or 42 per cent of aged persons, will still have incomes below these levels in 1971. The proposals in this paper would raise the incomes of all aged persons above these levels; no single aged person would have less than $1,620, and no aged couple would have less than $3,060.

This is why the rates proposed, commencing April 1 next, are, for single persons receiving guaranteed income supplements, $135, and for couples, $255. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) talked about the poverty line, and I think I know his source. The type of pension we are now offering under the guaranteed income supplement would raise the income of the couple he was talking about to above the poverty line. I do not think he was aware of that, at least not from the way he was talking in his speech.

When the senior citizens of this country who are in desperate need of assistance receive $55 g.i.s. over and above the $80 o.a.s., for a total of $135, or $95 g.i.s. for a couple with each getting the $80 flate rate o.a.s., bringing the total up to $255 a month, I suggest this is a very significant increase indeed over what they are receiving today. A single person today receives $111.41. Therefore, I think it can be said that we are giving a very significant increase to a very significant majority of our senior citizens.

In essence, this is not very different from what every Canadian who files an income tax return does once a year. On this return Canadians indicate what their income is, and it is on this basis that their tax is calculated. If there ever was a system or a technique that removed the demeaning aspect of the old welfare systems we heard so much about today, certainly this is it. Canada was one of the first countries in the world to bring in a guaranteed income supplement for the aged. In fact, I think we were the only country with an income-tested program of this nature when we introduced it four years ago. It is a program that has worked well. Surely, it had its problems, but I do not think there is one member in this House who has not found that those who receive this needed benefit are happy about it and reasonably happy about the way it is administered. They see a real difference between this type of income-tested benefit and the old means-testing programs of years past.

When honourable members extol the virtues of a guaranteed annual income and condemn this program, they are contradicting themselves. What, in essence, a guaranteed annual income is all about is that it is some kind of income test. It does not matter whether the payment is a universal one and you tax back that payment at the rate of 100 per cent in the higher income brackets, or whether individuals make applications that are income-tested once a year, as is the case here. In essence, it is an income test and I think it is the kind of technique that would be used in any guaranteed annual income proposal.

I should like to deal with a couple of other matters. We have heard suggestions for making pensions universal. The honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated that he was very disappointed at the fact that we seem to be moving away from the concept of universality—and indeed we are moving away from it. There is no question that we must move away from this concept. If, as he suggested, we granted our senior citizens a universal pension of $150 a month it would cost, in addition to what we are already spending on pensions, $1,100 million. As indicated in the white paper honourable members have received, we could almost institute a guaranteed annual income for the whole population at a cost of between $2 billion and $2.6 billion.

If honourable members think that this is within the capacity of the present government or of any government in today's context, they are being totally unrealistic. In adopting the concept of universality, what honourable members are talking about is giving each of our senior citizens an increase of $10 a month. Instead of receiving $135, or $255 in the case of a couple, if we raise their pension from $80 to $90 it will cost over $200 million. This would not do the old age pensioners who really need an increase any good at all. If the pension were raised to $100 it would still be inadequate and would cost over $400 million.

When hon. members criticize programs in this way, I think at the same time there is an obligation upon them, if they are interested in getting money to those who need it under an administration as least offensive as possible, to put forward concrete suggestions about how the money required to meet the increase is to be raised. In all the debate I have listened to today, I do not think I heard one member of the opposition suggest how the money could be raised or in what manner he or the party he represented would raise it.

Mr. Stanfield: Get the economy moving again.

Mr. Munro: Do they propose to impose an additional tax on those middle-income groups that they indicated they were so concerned about? If not, where would the additional money be raised? All hon. members have indicated their concern for the senior citizens, but I do not think our senior citizens are easily fooled either. They know what these programs cost, and those who really need the money realize that this is probably the most effective and meaningful way of seeing that they get it. Indeed, we all agree they are in desperate need.

Hon. members have indicated they are concerned with poverty in this country. The hon. member for Red Deer mentioned the Croll committee. We have heard that four million Canadians are living below the poverty line, and this figure is probably accurate. Unless we start to make our programs more selective, as suggested by many committees, and try to redistribute the money we have in terms of supplemental income for low-income groups, we will never really be able to tackle the problem of poverty. Approximately 1.1 million senior citizens are living below the poverty line. We have produced a program that will realistically deal with their need and in this respect the government of Canada and hon. members on this side of the House have not anything to be apologetic about.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the minister resumes his seat I wonder whether he would entertain a question. Did he forget to speak about the motion that is before the House, which calls for the retention of the cost of living escalation on the basic pension, rather than freezing it at $80 per month?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to answer that question. I was thinking in terms of the general program involved here. The part mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is only one part. He did not restrict his comments and he did not talk about—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I beg to differ. I did.

Mr. Munro: I thought the hon. member was tying it into the whole proposal of selectivity. I am saying that when the hon. member talks about selectivity he is talking about removing the escalation feature for those people above the poverty line, and I thought I made that clear.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit another question? By taking the initiative away from those Canadian citizens who feel they should save a little money for their old age, jeopardizing them because of their inability to receive the supplement, does he not realize that in the very near future no one will save money? Where will he get the money then?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I just indicated that I did try to deal with this adequately before the committee, and I think that if the hon. member attended he would have heard the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Before the question is put to the House, the Chair feels it should remind hon. members of the suggestion made by Mr. Speaker to the effect that the two motions in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) are closely related, to the point, that the motion which appears as No. 3 on the Order Paper of today is consequential upon the provisions of motion No. 1. Accordingly, it might be understood that the vote on motion No. 1 will, in fact, resolve the question on the second motion which appears as No. 3 on the Order Paper.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as follows:

That Bill C-202, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended by deleting from clause 1 lines 4 to 11 at page 1.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, before ringing the bells I wonder if I might ask whether the House would agree to continue this evening until we give the bill third reading. I think it would be desirable if we had consent to dispose of third reading, and if we could agree on this matter before ringing the bells, it would be helpful.

An hon. Member: No; ring the bells.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We can hardly dispose of third reading before we take a vote on the report stage. If the minister would ask after the vote that we continue to deal with third reading, as far as my colleagues and I are concerned we would have no objection.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree that the hour of sitting shall be extended in order to complete third reading of this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, if we could agree that the House will not automatically rise immediately after this vote is taken, perhaps we could continue to sit for a period following the vote and then we could decide what to do.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is there unanimous consent that the House will continue this sitting for a short time after the vote is taken until there is agreement in respect of the conclusion of this debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on motion No. 1 (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Since there has been a vote in the negative on motion No. 1, it will not be necessary to vote on motion No. 3.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That Bill C-202, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Munro moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, just before ten o'clock I was somewhat frightened, as I believe the leader of the House was, that the minister was going to talk out his own bill. Then I heard a whisper between him and one of his colleagues.

The minister, in his remarks, drew attention to what the government was doing for one class of old age pension recipients. We are not denying this, Mr. Speaker. We favour increasing the income supplement. What we have been complaining about is that the basic pension would no longer carry provision for an automatic 2 per cent increase in line with increases in the cost of living. The minister said that those who are receiving the guaranteed income supplement will as of right receive the additional amount after reporting their income. This will hold true for a certain category of pensioners as of April 1 next, but it will not be true for pensioners in other categories. Those who are receiving the basic pension will not receive as of right the 2 per cent increment which other pension recipients will be receiving. This is the point the minister did not answer when my honourable friend from Huron (Mr. McKinley) posed his question. Members of this House have pleaded with the minister to give consideration to pensioners who will receive $80 as is proposed.

These pensioners are being discriminated against in another way. The fact is, as was pointed out by the minister in committee, that any shortfall due to an increase in the cost of living will be picked up by the recipients of the guaranteed income supplement. This is not so in the case of recipients of the basic pension. The minister, in his comments at the report stage, indicated that all kinds of money would be required.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair invites honourable members who wish to carry on conversations to do so outside the House, in order to permit interested members to follow the speech of the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Monteith).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (10:30 p.m.)

Mr. Monteith: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I found myself yelling pretty loudly in order to be heard above the turmoil in the House. However, I appreciate that the hour is late. I simply point out that apart from one small contribution from across the way in defence of the minister, which I do not think was too important, all the members who have spoken from the opposition benches today have pleaded with the minister that he reconsider our thoughts on the matter as well as the rights of the recipients of the basic pension. As a consequence, I propose to give the minister one more opportunity for a second thought about this very serious step that he is taking. This bill departs from the principle of universality that the old age pension has carried with it since its inception in 1950 or 1952, a principle that was the unanimous recommendation of an all-party committee. I suggest such departure is a very dangerous one.

I appreciate this principle was departed from when the guaranteed income supplement was originally brought in, but we are here taking a further discriminatory step by putting these people into a certain class which will not receive the cost of living increment. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted:

"Bill C-202, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, be not now read the third time as this House is opposed to a bill which fails to include any adequate cost of living provision in respect of the basic amount of the monthly pension".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Having read the amendment put by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot, the Chair feels it should consider it procedurally. The motion would postpone third reading of the bill and at the same time seems to impose a condition thereon. Consequently, the Chair might want to do some reading on the matter.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief in case the Chair intends to dream on this amendment tonight. We are simply declaring a principle adverse to the bill. The bill does not contain this aspect that we feel is essential. We are not attaching a condition to the bill; we are simply declaring that the bill is to this extent repugnant to us, not in its entirety but simply because it fails to contain this provision. I think this is the basis upon which the hon. member has moved his very sensible amendment, which the minister might be prepared to accept.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to waive any doubts that may exist as to the regularity of the motion, and have it put. From our point of view, we will accept the motion that the motion be put, waiving any doubts we may have about its regularity.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Under those circumstances, the Chair feels that the question can be put. The Chair will put the question if hon. members agree unanimously that it be put.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Monteith) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Is the House ready for the question on the main motion?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Some hon. members have called it ten o'clock, or eleven o'clock as the case may be. At this point the question is whether we should proceed to the adjournment debate. My interpretation of Standing Order 40 (7) is that we cannot have the adjournment proceedings unless there is consent of hon. members. Is there unanimous consent for this purpose?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is a little difficult for the Chair to decide whether there is unanimous agreement. Perhaps I should hear from the Government House Leader.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think if hon. members have questions that they wish to speak to, we ought to hear them tonight and allow the House to extend the sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Translation]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—ALLEGED INVITATION TO FRANÇOIS GIROD

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression for a moment that the House would adjourn this debate, but I am happy to discuss this matter while the minister is in the Chamber.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

On November 23 last, I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) if, as usual, the CBC was going to rush an invitation to the revolutionary François Girod, alias Giroux, who made some inflammatory statements in Algeria in connection with the FLQ and security in Quebec?

I also asked the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) whether Girod's visit to Canada would be watched closely and whether he would be declared a member of the FLQ on entering Canada, under the Public Order Act, 1970.

The statements of this revolutionary made me very anxious, and while it is normal that our borders should be closed to James Cross's kidnappers, because people of this sort are considered as undesirable, I think that it should the same for those who visit communist countries in order to learn how to destroy democracy and practice terrorism.

As it happened Giroux was in Algeria to obtain that this country recognize the Canadian FLQ and, in an interview published in Express, he declared among other things, and I quote:

> Having maintained disorder, kidnapped other people who will want to harm us, we shall launch such a powerful attack that Trudeau will have to call the Americans. The latter will rather give us our independance.
>
> Before that time, according to him, the FLQ will have a representative in Cuba—

Well, they already have seven.

I continue the quotation:

> —another one in old Ireland, and a third, underground this one, in France who after having been concerned with Palestinians could very well think of his far away cousins.
> Giroux mentions that he is going back to Canada but with great misgivings.

Canada has been flooded for ten years with revolutionaries like Giroux and we can now see the results. The CBC has always welcomed them and allowed them to inject their venom into the people, often paying them with funds coming from the taxes of all the citizens.

The programs "Téléjournal" and "Aujourd'hui" have often been parading gounds for a great number of Marxist revolutionaries preaching hatred. I have here a lengthy list of separatists who have poured their bitterness against the established order.

The leader of the Ralliement Creditiste (Mr. Caouette) has protested in the House against the attitude of the CBC about left-wing separatists of any stripe.

I shall quote part of a speech he gave in the House on June 13, 1969:

> I have often blamed the C.B.C. in connection with the separatist movement. The C.B.C. is responsible for the upsurge and the image the people have in Canada of the separatist movement in the province of Quebec. Every time there is a small demonstration of protest, C.B.C. cameramen are on the spot.
> But for the centennial celebration of confederation, the C.B.C. was absent. Why? Because there are avowed separatists among C.B.C. officials. I have no objection to their being separatists, but I object to the fact that they want the general public to believe that all the people are saparatists. That is bad. That they have a right to express their opinion, very well, but those with different political opinions should be able to express them.

I ask the Secretary of State and the Minister of Justice to be very careful about people whose only aim is to destroy for the benefit of international communism.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I am allowed to answer the hon. member's question, obviously I cannot separate the true from the false, or the doubtful, in the allegations he has just made.

I shall therefore limit myself to answering the question itself, and say that in the light of available information, Mr. Girod or Giroux is not known at the CBC, no one knows who he is, or has ever heard of him, and there has never been any question of his being invited to Canada.

AIR TRANSPORT—FARES BASED ON CANADIAN DOLLAR PEGGED AT 92 CENTS—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION FOR OVERCHARGING

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, since November 25 I have been pursuing the question of the discriminatory charging practices applied against Canadians paying international air fares in Canadian currency. I have been informed that the Canadian Transport Commission has taken action. The front page of today's Ottawa Citizen carries a report to this effect. It reads:

● (11:00 p.m.)

The Canadian Transport Commission announced today it will impose an exchange rate on the American dollar in terms of Canadian currency for use by all airlines in Canada, effective immediately.

This, of course, is the sort of response we wanted from the government and the CTC. It is unfortunate that the discriminatory practice was allowed to continue so long, because there is in the AITA manual on traffic conference resolutions the procedures for immediately removing this discrimination. The same procedures are set forth in the commercial air regulations. It would appear that the government's own carrier, Air Canada, has been the worst offender in this regard. Some of the publicity which it has issued indicates that the AITA has precluded the possibility of action on the matter before April, 1971. The news story, of course, refutes this. This does not settle the decision which has come almost eight months after the beginning of a discriminatory practice which began last June 1. That is when the Canadian dollar was unpegged. Since that time, Canadian passengers on international air services have been overcharged by an average of 5.63 per cent compared with passengers using American funds. If we calculate the total amount of international airline passenger revenues from May 31 to December 1, we arrive at a figure of $110 million. This represents a loss of approximately $4.5 million to Canadian consumers.

Yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). As he has done on several occasions when this matter has been brought to his attention, he passed the buck to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). The Minister of Transport has accepted his responsibility in this matter and obviously, through the order of the CTC, did what was necessary to remove the discriminatory practice. I suggest it is up to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who has been very long on talk and very short on action, to assume his responsibilities in these matters.

Canadian consumers have been bilked out of a substantial sum of money. In many cases they have been older citizens who have saved all their lives for a trip back to the old country. They paid $30 or $40 more than necessary had the legitimate rate of exchange been applied to their fare. This matter concerns Canadian consumers. I maintain they should be compensated for the amount they have been overcharged. This also involves misleading advertising, because the air carriers, particularly Air Canada, have indicated that there is no redress under the procedures that are available. It should be pointed out that airline tickets stipulate that prices are "subject to change prior to the commencement of travel".

By the same token, air travel consumers should have countervailing protection when international currencies fluctuate. If the fluctuation in the exchange rate had meant a loss of revenue to the air carriers, they would have been the first to change their regulations accordingly. Obviously there has been collusion. It is the responsibility of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to protect the interests of consumers in this regard. I trust that the minister and the government will assume their responsibility in these matters.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, let me first apologize to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) who could not be here tonight to answer the hon. member's question.

Obviously, this question is of considerable import and I trust the hon. member will recognize, as he has just said, that the minister's answers have been followed by substantial action.

Representations in this regard have been made to the Minister of Transport who asked that this matter be seriously investigated. This investigation is now under way and I can assure the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that as soon as it is concluded and that the minister has received detailed information, he will immediately refer this information to the House and point out what action has been taken on this matter.

IMMIGRATION—REASONS FOR DECREASE IN NUMBER OF CHINESE ADMITTED TO CANADA

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week I, and not my hon. friend from Parry-Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) as reported in the Canadian Press, asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) whether he would explain to the House the reason for the drastic decrease in Chinese immigration to Canada, as shown by the figures for this year and last year which are published quarterly by the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

The most recent quarterly immigration bulletin, that for the period ended September 30, shows Chinese immigration from Asia as down by 2,423 landed immigrant admissions. I ask hon. members to compare the picture for the first nine months of 1969 with that for the first nine months of 1970. The number admitted in the first nine months of 1969 was 6,655, whereas the number admitted in the first nine months of this year was 4,232. Having regard to the thousands of refugees in Hong Kong who are desirous of coming to Canada, the trickle admitted to this country during the whole of 1969—the figure is 8,272—is being cut to less than two-thirds in the present year. There was also a decline in 1968 as compared with 1969, but it was only by 110.

The minister may tell us that the points system is in part responsible for the dramatic decrease I have indicated, but I do not really think so since there are thousands of Chinese who could easily pass the points test if they were given a positive opportunity to apply, be interviewed and be screened. But the attitude of the department is one of negation and brush-off for the most part.

Virtually every Canadian is aware nowadays that one of the best possible types of immigrant to Canada is a refugee of Chinese origin from Hong Kong. He may bring little or much with him, but in either event he fits easily into the Canadian pattern. He is welcomed into the already established Chinese communities and is able to integrate his customs smoothly with Canadian ways and customs. Whether he is skilled or unskilled, it is seldom you will find him unemployed no matter what the economic difficulties of Canada may be at any given time. The current recession is thus no excuse for processing fewer applicants in Hong Kong. These immigrants, if anything, lend momentum toward overcoming a recession.

I know our immigration office in Hong Kong claims it has no Canadian method of screening applicants for security; that it has to rely on the Hong Kong police force, and that this force will only process so many applicants per month. I hope the minister or his Parliamentary Secretary are not going to claim that the quota to our Canadian office by the Hong Kong police force has been diminished by that authority. If so, the minister should be soundly condemned for not making the necessary contract with the Hong Kong police so that they could employ extra police officers for the sole purpose of checking out prospective immigrants to Canada and obtaining more of them. The minister's department could always have greatly increased the flow to Canada by the simple device of making such a contract.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

• (11:10 p.m.)

It is my understanding that the Hong Kong police force has always been ready, willing and able to help their surplus population emigrate to Canada but that they can only do so much for nothing, particularly for the Canadian immigration office. The Immigration Act and its regulations speak, in theory, of non-discrimination, but in reality there are many means of practising discrimination. The apparent chop-off of Chinese immigration is prima facie evidence of discrimination in practice. Let the minister explain the reason or reasons, if he can. The question demands an immediate answer.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has done some homework before rising to his feet in the House tonight, he would have discovered that the pattern of decline in immigration during the first nine months of the year is not a peculiarity of Chinese immigration but a characteristic in the immigration pattern of a number of countries, particularly European countries. Therefore, it has nothing to do with Chinese immigration per se; it is an established fact that is beyond the control of the department.

If the hon. member had proceeded further with his homework before raising the question of discrimination, as he did, he might have discovered that the Chinese communities of Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton, Sarnia, Burlington, Orillia and Peterborough, in a memorandum submitted to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) in June, 1969, had this to say:

> —we more than welcomed the coming into force of the new immigration regulations on October 1, 1967. The new regulations took away the last vestige of discrimination against Asians and Africans on the face of the law as the former special sponsoring privileges given to Europeans were revoked—This is a positive step towards an objective standard and a far cry from the days of head taxes and the Chinese Exclusion Act. The Liberal government should be commended for this achievement.

As every student of our immigration policy knows, the regulations of 1967 have broadened considerably the categories of persons eligible to be called forward by their relatives in Canada. The upsurge in applications for previously excluded relatives is now levelling off and this process is beginning to become evident. The fact is that there is no increase in the number of applications awaiting processing in Hong Kong.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have six waiting.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.16 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MORISON—ACCURACY OF TORONTO "STAR" REPORT RESPECTING DELAY OF CHRISTMAS RECESS BY OPPOSITION

Mr. J. B. Morison (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning on a question of privilege affecting members of the Standing Committee on Regional Development in general and more particularly myself. It was reported in the Toronto Star of December 17 that I had charged that the opposition was delaying the Christmas recess. The report goes on to state that the committee could not adjourn for holidays before dealing with the problems of unemployment as we were trying to do through Bill C-205.

There are some people in this world who have illusions of grandeur, but I should like to assure the House that I am not one of them. I know very well where the power in this House lies, and it certainly does not lie with chairmen of committees.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Morison: The incorrect attribution of such powers to chairmen of committees is incorrect reporting affecting the affairs of the House. It could also lead to some very dangerous impressions with regard to other committees. I also believe that such irresponsible reporting puts the members of a committee in a poor light so far as the people of Canada are concerned. I assure the House that the members of my committee were most co-operative inasmuch as they had a very serious bill to consider and a very short time in which to do it.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PETITION RESPECTING PENSION PLAN OR IMPROVED EARLY RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR FORMER COAL MINERS—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members will recall, on Friday last, December 11, a petition was presented to the House by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis). There was unanimous agreement at the time to receive the petition and have it considered in some way. The procedure was novel and I undertook at that time to the House to have discussions and to see whether the matter of the petition might be pursued. Since then I have had discussions with the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond and a few moments ago with a few other members of the House.

23568—67

It appears that there is a general disposition to agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond that the subject matter of the petition presented to the House by him should go to one of the committees of the House. There was a difficulty in determining which committee that would be, but I believe there is now an agreement that the subject matter of the petition should go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I doubt whether there is any point in discussing the matter further, but if there is agreement, there might be an order to proceed on this basis. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the House adjourn immediately after returning from attending Royal Assent to Bill C-211 (Supply Bill) and to any other measures; and

That it shall stand adjourned until 2.00 o'clock p.m., Monday, January 11, 1971, provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Her Majesty's Government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet—at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy

Chairman of Committees shall act in his stead for the purpose of this order.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there are one or two points I wish to make with regard to this motion. I hope that we will be able to have Royal Assent later today. In order to reach that objective, the House will have to agree to waive the normal rules with respect to Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act. My short comment on this motion may give the House an opportunity to decide unanimously to allow this bill to be discussed today and to move it through all its stages. It is my expectation that we will have Royal Assent, depending upon the other place, shortly after we have dealt with that bill.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I think the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has indicated the hope of hon. members that we will be able to proceed with this bill through all its stages today, allowing adequate opportunity for debate and discussion, so I have no objection to the proposition.

I must point out, however, that this is a bill of considerable magnitude and importance, parts of which have not been acceptable. It is hoped that when bills of this nature and character are brought forward by the government they will be tabled for first reading so that members of all parties who have a deep interest and concern will have an opportunity to examine them, make their case and make adequate preparation for second reading and committee hearings. This did not take place with this particular bill. I must file this caveat and make this request of the government. If the proceedings of this House are to be conducted properly, opposition members, private members, will need to have adequate time to examine the details of the legislation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to agree to the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) regarding the time of adjournment and the length of the recess. We are also prepared to give consent to the necessary waiving of the relevant Standing Orders so that we can deal with order number 47 and pass the bill through all its remaining stages today. I assume that this includes, of course, the right to deal today with the report stage amendment which is on the order paper, and that, in the spirit of co-operation which is being displayed, any other adjustments which are necessary will be agreed to.

Mr. Peters: Including other amendments.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I gather that in addition to the terms of the motion there was a suggestion by the President of the Privy Council, the details of which I shall not repeat. Is it agreed that we proceed with the consideration of the legislation in question as suggested by the President of the Privy Council?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: This requires the unanimous consent of the House. There does not appear to be unanimous agreement and in these circumstances the only thing we can do is to proceed with the motion as it has been put by the President of the Privy Council. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY

TABLING OF REPORT OF STUDY COMMITTEE—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table in the two official languages the report of the study committee on bankruptcy and insolvency legislation together with two statements being issued herewith.

The report contains proposals for changes and recommends that a new Bankruptcy Act be enacted to deal in a comprehensive way with both commercial and non-commercial bankruptcy. The government, for its part, has examined the report and is in general accord with the recommendations of the committee.

The revision of our bankruptcy and insolvency laws ranks high in the list of priorities. I should like to introduce a bill as soon as possible, and I should therefore appreciate it if interested associations and organizations and the public in general could give me the benefit of their views on the report and their suggestions before the end of January next so that those views can be taken into account in our drafting work.

In conclusion, I want to express the thanks and gratitude of the government to the members of the committee, Messrs. Tassé, Honsberger, Carignan and Landry, for the work they have done in preparing this report.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for providing us with a copy of the report and an indication of his remarks in sufficient time for us to be able to comment with a little more precision on the subject matter.

The report, as we see it, makes an extensive review of bankruptcy legislation as it is applied not only in Canada but elsewhere. It draws attention to the fact that the Parliament of Canada has exclusive legislative power in the field of bankruptcy and insolvency, and that these two subjects have been broadly interpreted by the courts. As the report further comments, in the operation of federal legislation in this area Parliament has come into conflict with the exclusive legislative competence of provincial legislatures, particularly in connection with the administration of justice, property and civil rights and other matters. Some provinces have taken steps to deal with such questions involving insolvency, such as the orderly payment of such debts, and la loi Lacombe in the Province of Quebec.

I wonder, however, whether the minister is right in asking for comments by the end of January since he intends to bring in legislation at an early date. I suggest to him that because of the vastly changed social and economic conditions it would be better to refer the report to the appropriate committee, say the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee, and that the public be invited to make representations and comments with regard to it. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no point in making representations to the minister himself, with the minister then introducing a bill which would have to be commented upon and likely severely attacked and modified in committee. I suggest that in the long run the better procedure would be to refer the report to the committee and have representations made publicly, not to the minister. It is not the minister and his officials who are going to decide the bankruptcy law of this country; the provinces have something to say, as does also the public.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity to look at this report and therefore I cannot make any lengthy or intelligent comment upon it. However, this party is extremely interested in the report, which affects not only commercial and general trade activity but also individuals, particularly small businessmen. As we know, for a long time there has been a need for revision of the bankruptcy and insolvency laws. All I need say at this time is that we promise the minister, the government and also the people that we will give this report careful study and will co-operate as much as we can in bringing forward in the House updated and satisfactory bankruptcy legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to express my appreciation to the minister for tabling in the House this report which has been expected for six years at least.

Having had an opportunity to study it this morning, I must agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

I suggest that this report should instead be referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, for it contains more than 110 very important recommendations. These recommendations, however, are not divided by chapters. They deal with the bankrupt, the registrar, the public trustee and also the procedure for obtaining release. These recommendations are very important in my opinion, but we should instead have an opportunity to study this report in the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee to help the minister, and as he has just stated, to be able to make interesting suggestions, for after a quick glance at this report, I still note further shortcomings in the present Bankruptcy Act.

For instance, as far as courts are concerned, it is recommended that the Superior Courts of the provinces be the ones empowered from now on to settle bankruptcy problems.

It is now common knowledge that in the bankruptcy field some dilatory disputes, instead of being brought before Bankruptcy Courts, are referred to Superior Courts, and these being over-burdened with cases, it takes at least three years to obtain a decision, which in turn delays decisions in Bankruptcy Courts, to the detriment of the bankrupt and the trustee.

Some regulations I consider to be valid but on the other hand, if we want to study the pros and cons, it is very important that the minister, before asking us to submit written recommendations to assist him in introducing a bill, should give us an opportunity to examine the whole file within the Justice and Legal Affairs committee, where we will be able to help him to prepare his bill and take into consideration amendments not provided in the recommendations, and also see that the recommendations submitted this morning are implemented.

FISHERIES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF FISHERIES CLOSING LINES

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, by amending the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act earlier this year Parliament laid the foundation for the establishment of exclusive Canadian fishing zones comprising certain areas of the sea adjacent to the coast of Canada. These provisions were enabling only. The creation of new zones requires executive action by way of an Order in Council.

I am pleased to inform the House today that the required action is now being taken to draw "fisheries closing lines" across the entrance to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Bay of Fundy, Queen Charlotte Sound and Dixon Entrance-Hecate Strait. A government notice to this effect will be published in the Canada Gazette on December 26, 1970.

The fisheries closing lines will become effective immediately upon the expiration of the mandatory 60 days waiting period imposed by the amended Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act.

The special areas to be enclosed by fisheries closing lines are important fishing zones for Canada. The Gulf of St. Lawrence has had annual landings of up to 550 million pounds of fish valued at $31 million, the Bay of Fundy's landings are about 300 million pounds yearly, worth about $12 million, and the Pacific Coast area has landings of 180 million pounds, worth $37 million.

Having established these new fishing zones, the Canadian government intends to conclude negotiations for the phasing out of the fishing activities of certain countries which have traditionally fished in the areas concerned, namely, the United Kingdom, Denmark, France, Italy, Norway, Portugal and Spain. Canada has recently entered into an agreement on reciprocal fishing privileges with the United States and the activities of United States fishermen in the areas concerned will not be affected by the promulgation of the fisheries closing lines.

Anti-pollution provisions of our Federal Fisheries Act and the Canada Shipping Act will apply within the limits of our new fishing zones, thus adding additional scope to Canada's efforts to preserve and improve the marine environment around our shores.

I would now like to table a four-page statement which was prepared in consultation with the Department of External Affairs. It provides additional information on the promulgation of the fisheries closing lines as defined by the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. May I ask the permission of the House, Mr. Speaker, to have this statement appended to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For statement referred to above, see Appendix.]

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the statement made by the Minister of Fisheries which indicates that action will finally be taken to conserve some of our fisheries resources. I know this announcement will be welcomed by all Canadians, and it will be especially welcomed by fishermen and processors on the east and west coasts.

While waiting for some action on this matter, many of our fishermen were beginning to realize the meaning of the word eternity, for history records that legislation respecting our territorial waters and fisheries laws was introduced by the Hon. Paul Martin, then Secretary of State for External Affairs, with much fanfare back on May 20, 1964. At that time the minister said that the bill respecting the territorial sea and the fishing zones of Canada was not enabling legislation. "On proclamation", he said, "the 12-mile fishing zone will be established—there can be no doubt about this point." A lot of fish have passed over the rails of foreign fishing vessels since that date. Today we see our fisheries resources seriously affected. In fact they have been depleted to the danger level as a result of the inaction and procrastination of this government.

I would point out that the announcement made by the minister today is long overdue, and in our view it is only a beginning. It is only the beginning on the long road back toward obtaining and retaining fishing resources which rightfully belong to our Canadian fishermen. However, I say it is only a beginning since the action taken today will leave many problems still unresolved.

The exclusive fishing zones, for example, as announced by the minister are not complete protection for the stocks of fish on our coasts. The only way to provide for proper conservation is to vest in the coastal states ownership and jurisdiction over the fishery resources on the continental shelf. This would be a logical extension of the United Nations convention on the continental shelf which already recognizes ownership of resources on and under the sea-bed of the shelf. Even this would not provide protection for anadromous species like salmon which roam far to sea during their early stages. Canada's Atlantic salmon are being intercepted on the high seas of the Atlantic, and the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fishery has expressed grave concern about the depletion of this valuable resource. In our opinion, nothing short of universal acceptance of the abstention principle will adequately protect Canadian salmon on both coasts.

Finally, this country must do everything within its power to work toward convening another United Nations Law of the Sea Conference at which we must strive for acceptance of at least two principles. One of these principles is the continental shelf concept for our fisheries resources. The other is the universal acceptance of the abstention principle for an anadromous species like salmon. In order to bring this about we need someone in the Department of External Affairs who recognizes the value to Canadians of our fishing industry, as it is obvious that the present minister does not share our concern. In fact, the present minister was only recently in Europe and he made no effort, according to his own statement to me in the House, to resolve the differences which exist between Canada and France over fishing rights surrounding the French-owned islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. In view of the importance of the fishing industry I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will consider strengthening the Department of External Affairs with someone knowledgeable on fisheries matters so that progress can be made at the international level toward solving some of our thorny fishing problems.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation to the minister for his kindness in sending us a copy of the statement he made earlier so that we could have a look at it. I think it might have been worth while if we could also have had a look at the four-page statement to be appended to Hansard. It would have made his statement more meaningful because the statement the minister made is sufficiently bare to leave a few gaps in our understanding of what has taken place. I believe it also indicates that we cannot have a great deal of faith in what the minister and the government say concerning fisheries matters because when the bill to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act was before the standing committee during the last session the minister said that in a matter of a few days he would have the fisheries closing lines established, but those few days have dragged on into seven months. That does not lead us to have much faith in the pronouncements of the minister about what he intends to do but indicates that we should pay more attention to what he does or does not do.

One point that has been dealt with extensively before the committee and in fishing circles, a matter with which we have concerned ourselves for some time, is the extension of our jurisdiction to the continental shelf and continental slope. The minister himself made a great play on that idea before the committee and elsewhere, saying that it was the intention of the government to extend jurisdiction to those areas so as to include groundfish as well to the extent we would have jurisdiction over it and to prosecute the fishery to the full extent on continental slope.

A few years ago the committee on fisheries which examined the estimates unanimously recommended to the government that the fisheries jurisdiction of Canada be extended to the continental shelf and slope. This has been completely ignored by the minister in his statement today and up to this time. There is no indication in the statement that any consideration is being given to that matter. In fact, its phraseology in terms of drawing fisheries closing lines across the entrances to certain waters indicates to me that this matter has in fact been completely ignored.

In dealing with fisheries we must concern ourselves with two fronts: first, the extent to which we can extend our jurisdiction to the edge of the continental slope and, second, the extent to which we can involve ourselves in international agreements with other nations to ensure that the fish of the high seas which originate in our land are preserved to the fishermen of this nation. We have a potential lever which was not used. If the government had taken the action of extending the fisheries closing lines out to the continental shelf and the edge of the continental slope, we might have been able to prevent the minister giving the right to the Soviet Union to fish inside our territorial sea, as he did earlier this year.

To return to the point I made about the degree of faith we should have in the minister, when he was asked in the House about the agreement with the Soviet Union he said he would gladly refer that matter to the standing committee. So far he has forgotten about that as well. I think we need a little more action and concern not only on the part of the Department of Fisheries but also on the part of the Department of External Affairs, and less froth and foam.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the minister for providing us with an advance copy of the French version of the statement he has just made.

We are very happy that the government has taken these measures, thanks to the excellent work of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

Fishermen on the East coast have been requesting a measure of this kind for a very long time, in order to keep for themselves the fish crops, and we are proud of it. Also, in order to control in the future pollution dangers in our territorial waters, such action was called for, I believe.

Therefore, we commend the good work of the minister and we hope he will continue to be interested in fishermen and all interested parties for the greatest good of all Canadians.

Post Office

POST OFFICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF IMPROVEMENT OF SATURDAY WICKET SERVICE

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that main post offices and most postal stations in urban centres will return to complete counter service on Saturdays.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): This is to replace the limited service offered since the start of five-day week letter carrier delivery in February 1969.

Extensive surveys were taken of the services provided on Saturdays, and these have shown a need to make services such as stamps and money orders available again at the majority of offices studied. However, the surveys also indicated that the need varies widely from city to city and even in different sections of some cities.

[English]

The hours of Saturday service at individual offices and the selection of locations to provide the increased service will, therefore, be determined by community needs. This will be left to the discretion of senior field managers who are familiar with local conditions and service demands. The improved service will begin on a regular basis from January 9, 1971. A Merry Christmas to all Post Office employees and to all customers of the Post Office.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by thanking the minister for his courtesy in providing, in good time and in both languages, copies of his statement. Indeed, I would say to him that his general considerateness and courtesy have detracted somewhat from the spice and enjoyment of the role I am trying to perform on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party.

I am impressed by the strangeness of the fact that it has become necessary to announce in the House of Commons a resumption of postal service to the Canadian people. I appreciate the fact that it is being done but it is surprising that it was necessary that such an announcement be made. I think, Sir, that this action marks another repudiation of the more preposterous and tortuous innovations of the minister's predecessor, and I commend this minister for his willingness to recognize that certain events, incidents and developments of some months ago were in fact very bad mistakes.

I note that it required "extensive surveys of the services provided on Saturday." This, I thought, would hardly have been necessary. No major inquiry should have been required because hosts of Canadians do have difficulty in transacting business with the Post Office on days other than Saturday, and many Canadians combine a visit to the Post Office with their Saturday shopping. I think it was not required to have a massive inquiry into that.

I am a little concerned also about the suggestion of flexibility. It seems to me that there is now too much variation in the postal service. Rural Canadians get six-day delivery, urban Canadians get five-day delivery, and there are many Canadians in suburban areas who are not quite sure where they stand or where the postman is going to come from and on what day.

As I said at the beginning, I commend the minister for taking this remedial action, but I say to him that it will not be sufficient. The five-day mail service has been a fiasco, and the sooner we get back to six-day mail service, which most countries in the world have, the better it will be for all, including those in the Post Office. Much of the delay in the mail delivery in Canada—and it has been appalling in the last few years—stems from this lost weekend, this blackout of mail delivery from Friday until Monday, which is followed by a backlog of mail that has to be worked through on Monday, and the delays sometimes last until Wednesday. This is part of the problem.

I commend to the minister's attention the recommendations of the Davey Committee on the mass media. I am not one of those who believe that the Senate is a useless body. I hope the Prime Minister in future days will remember my regard for it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macquarrie: I referred yesterday to a question based upon the report of the Davey Committee which said something that many of us have been saying for a long time, namely, that the new postal rates were most injurious to newspapers in the country. It also made a very strong statement on the five-day delivery. It said:

> What we do urge to assist these (daily) newspapers—and almost all weekly newspapers—is the earliest possible resumption of Saturday mail deliveries. The lost weekend has hit some newspapers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask, Sir, what I have done?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made an excellent statement but it appears to the Chair that he is ranging far and wide. The statement which the hon. member is allowed to make according to the Standing Orders should be closely related to the statement made by the minister. The minister dealt with only one aspect of the postal services, but it seems to me that the hon. member is going somewhat beyond the very limited scope of the statement made by the minister. That is why I thought I should invite the hon. member to return as soon as possible to the substance of the statement made by the minister in charge of the Post Office.

Mr. Macquarrie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your advice. I was merely commending the minister for what he has done and urging him to do a little more. I was quoting one sentence from the report of the Davey Committee on mass media. I do hope that the minister will rediscover still more of this lost weekend and that we will have even more service on Saturday than that which he has announced today.

I commend him for the return to normalcy, and I hope that this small step today will be followed by a giant step tomorrow. I also join him in wishing merry Christmas to the postal employees.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, the announcement of this partial restoration of the once proud Canadian postal service will no doubt be welcomed by the people in the areas to be affected. I think it is notable that the public of Canada has had very little to welcome from such announcements in the past two years. Under the present government there has been a notable decrease in service and a substantial increase in postal rates, as well as long drawn-out labour disputes. Part of the trouble involved in the Post Office may be related to the fact that in the last 11 years we have had seven and a half Postmaster Generals. They have not been in office long enough to learn the business, even by mail. Like the previous speaker for the Official Opposition, we hope that the announcement today of this small step restoring part of the service that we used to enjoy will be a mere forerunner of many other such steps in line with those suggested for a long time by the opposition. In wishing the minister a merry Christmas I can assure him that his Christmases will be merrier and merrier in line with his co-operation with the logical proposals of the opposition to improve the service.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues of the Ralliement Creditiste, I wish to offer my sincere congratulations to the Minister without Portfolio who is responsible for the Post Office (Mr. Côté) for having announced today the re-establishment on Saturdays of a service that is essential to the people.

Mr. Speaker, the former Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) stated in the House on September 27, 1968, as shown in Hansard of that date, and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a statement regarding changes in the operations of the Post Office.
> Our studies have indicated that several services are no longer required to the same extent as in the past. Business firms generally are operating on shorter hours and on a five day week. There is not, therefore, the same need to provide postal service on week ends when most businesses are closed.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I say that the former Postmaster General did not realize that the Post Office is a public service, while the new minister appreciates the fact that the Post Office may have deficits but remains a public service. This is why we congratulate him warmly and encourage him to change the orientation of his predecessor's policies so as to give the Post Office Department back to the population whereas before it belonged to one person only, the Postmaster General.

We want the Post Office Department to be the department of the Canadian people and not only that of a minister. We believe that the present minister is the man for the job and he is off to a good start. We hope that in the new year the minister will continue in this right direction.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTLEMENT OF CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAY SHOPCRAFT EMPLOYEES AND EMPLOYERS

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): This is not my normal day in the House, Mr. Speaker, but it may be the last occasion before the festive season or before the recess when I can make a statement on motions. I welcome this opportunity to report briefly regarding a matter of interest to all members of the House. It concerns the collective bargaining currently in process between the railways and certain unions representing some of the employees of the railways.

As members are aware, some time ago I announced the appointment of what I described as industry specialists to assist in the process of minimizing industrial unrest and, more particularly, to assist in obtaining collective agreements prior to the expiry date of existing contracts. Hon. members may recall that this approach resulted in an early settlement in the railway industry in 1968.

I am pleased, therefore, to announce that it can be safely stated that the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway will sign within the hour a memorandum of settlement with unions representing some 20,000 shopcraft employees. This constitutes, if ratified, a settlement ten days before the present contract expires.

• (11:50 a.m.)

In conclusion, I would like, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute not only to the representatives of the unions and the companies but also to our industry specialist, Mr. Arthur Gibbons, and my director of conciliation and arbitration, Mr. William Kelly, who have worked very closely with the parties for several weeks. In my opinion, both Mr. Kelly and Mr. Gibbons remind us of the fact that our public servants rank with the best in any country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word or two in response to the welcome announcement just made by the Minister of Labour. We are glad to learn that a settlement has been reached and that the signing of it is in prospect today between Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway on the one hand and representatives of the shopcraft unions on the other. I have no objection to the minister taking credit for his department for the good job that has been done. It is a good job for the industry and a good job for Canada.

There is just one point I should like to make, Mr. Speaker. If my information is correct, the issue of pensions was not on the table, at least toward the end of these negotiations, and that is probably one of the reasons why it has been possible to reach agreement. I suggest to the minister that as far as the other railway unions are concerned there is a good deal more anxiety over the pension issue and that settlement in those cases may not be possible within the forseeable future.

I therefore urge the minister to do everything that he can on the issue of pensions. In particular I urge that he make available these good offices that he has spoken of, and his own good offices, to his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to get Canadian National Railways to realize that if they would comply with the unanimous wish of this House of Commons concerning pension increases the whole issue would be settled a lot sooner and we would have peace in the railway industry.

This is a terribly important part of the whole railway issue, and it is not good enough for the government not to get involved in it. The Minister of Transport is a good man but he needs help, and I urge the Minister of Labour to give him that help so that this issue can be settled, preferably before Christmas.

AGREEMENT RESPECTING DISPOSITION OF BILL C-205

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): If I might have leave of the House I would ask whether we might establish the proper relationship between the motion on the order paper in the name of the President of the Privy Council and the disposition of Bill C-205. As I understand it, the House is of the opinion that we should proceed to deal with Bill C-205 both at the report stage and at subsequent stages despite the provisions of the Standing Orders. If that is the view of the President of the Privy Council and other hon. members, possibly the House might make its views plain at this time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this is the ambition of the government and if the words of the opposition House Leader could be put in the form of a House order that would be very helpful.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We gave our agreement earlier, Mr. Speaker, and we still stand by it.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): We agree, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING MINIMUM RESIDENCE REQUIREMENT

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-213, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act (Minimum residence requirement)".

Proposed Legislation

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, a considerable number of people in Canada would be disposed to participate fully in the life of the country but they are prevented from doing so by the fact that they have not yet been granted Canadian citizenship.

Therefore, this bill is designed to reduce from five to three years the minimum residence requirement for persons applying for Canadian citizenship.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CONSUMPTION DATE OF PACKAGED PERISHABLE FOOD ACT

PROVISION OF LABEL WITH DATE BEYOND WHICH PRODUCT NOT TO BE SOLD

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-214, respecting packaged perishable food.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require, to the extent that it may be done under federal authority, that all packaged perishable foods shall bear a label, readily seen and easily understood by the consumer, stating the date after which the food is not to be sold.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: I am advised that inadvertently the Government Notice of Motion concerning the referral of the third annual report of the Department of the Solicitor General to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs was dropped in the English version of the order paper. The French version carries the notice.

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

December 16, 1970—The President of the Privy Council:

That the annual report, for the year ended 31st December, 1968, made pursuant to section 30 of the Penitentiary Act, contained in the third annual report of the Department of the Solicitor General, tabled in the House of Commons on November 3, 1969, be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and

That during its study of the aforementioned report, the committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, the said Notice of Motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the House.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SCIENCE

SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION RESPECTING POLICY—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question about science policy. In view of the criticism of the science policy of the government by the committee of the Senate on science, following upon criticism by the OECD some time ago, does the government propose to act in the area of developing a coherent science policy or does it propose to await the further volume of the report of the Senate committee on science?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Both, Mr. Speaker. We have been acting and of course we will be able to act with even more enlightenment after we have received the final report. I understand it is expected about half-way through next year.

Mr. Stanfield: Since some of the blame for the lack of a coherent and effective science policy is attributed by the Senate committee to the overriding authority of the Treasury Board, does the government intend to act in this connection? Without any offence to the President of the Treasury Board, I should like to know whether the government intends to place this responsibility in another ministry in view of these criticisms?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this criticism has nothing very original about it. I remember telling the House about two years ago that the reason we had asked the President of the Treasury Board to also look after science, even though we recognized some apparent disadvantages, was that the minister was so able in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: He has spent too much time on the Auditor General; that is his trouble.

An hon. Member: Stop smiling, Bud.

Mr. Trudeau: The House will recall that in the Speech from the Throne we indicated our intention of establishing a minister who would be responsible for science. I understand that this is what the Senate science committee report has indicated. I also remind the House that we have in our government organization bill, which the opposition parties are now studying, provisions which will permit us to appoint a minister whose responsibility would be for science.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, since as Senator Lamontagne, the very able chairman of this committee and a former member of the cabinet, described the carrying out of science policy in this country in these words, "we are last where we should be first, and first where we should be last," will the Prime Minister begin now to take steps to try to rectify this confusion in which the government so often finds itself in following its policies?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that is a description which would apply very much to the Tory party also.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Now, Pierre, don't you tease.

Mr. Trudeau: I think, despite that, they may want to help by co-operating with the government in expediting the adoption of the government organization bill, so that we can proceed with this next step.

Mr. Hees: Since the previous Conservative government never encountered problems of this kind but had a cohesive science policy, we would be glad to step across the aisle and help the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CONTRACTING OUT OF RESEARCH PROJECTS TO INDUSTRY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board who now is the minister responsible for science. Inasmuch as last year industrial scientists complained that the government was not making full use of their services in the development of better manpower policies, will the government now consider the conclusions of the Senate science report, namely, that more research projects ought to be contracted out to industry in order to involve these scientists more fully in Canadian affairs.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. gentleman will examine the estimates, he will see that progressively more and more research projects have been contracted out to industry rather than being undertaken in government laboratories. That is part of a continuing policy.

URANIUM

POSSIBLE JAPANESE FINANCIAL PARTICIPATION IN CONSTRUCTION OF ENRICHMENT PLANT— CANADIAN CONTROL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Before doing so, I wish to raise a question of privilege affecting the rights of the members of the House. Yesterday, the hon. member for South Western Nova asked the minister if he would make a statement on his discussions in Japan. The minister said that he had not intended to do so but that he would give consideration to that suggestion. The minister then went out and, at a press conference, discussed the very thing that he had not discussed in the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I submit that Members of Parliament ought not to have to depend on fragmentary reports of a press conference appearing in the newspapers in order to know what government policies are.

Mr. Baldwin: They are reports concerning a fragmentary minister.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Nor ought we to have to depend on questions based on these press reports if we are to question the minister intelligently.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The minister, in the press conference, is quoted as saying that he believes it would be politically and economically wise to have an uranium enriching plant built in Canada with Japanese capital. I wonder if the minister could give us some information as to whether this is to be an enriching plant which will be wholly owned by a Japanese corporation, whether the corporation will be putting up all the equity capital or part of the equity capital, whether there will be any Canadian participation and whether the announcement that the former chairman of the Japanese Atomic Energy Board has given his support indicates—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to give the minister an opportunity to reply to the first questions. It seems to me that the question is becoming a little too long.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I will put it to the minister in the simplest possible terms. Will the minister tell us what he envisages to be the kind of program under which Japanese capital would be used to establish an uranium enriching plant in Canada?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, speaking first to the hon. member's question of privilege, I regret very much that I beat him to the television cameras yesterday. I guess it was my day to be swift. Answering his actual question, may I say that no decision has been reached so far. During the course of our Japanese visit, we found that the Japanese reactor and utilities people were very anxious to have a fourth enrichment plant outside the U.S.A. so that they could have another source of supply for enriched uranium. We argued the Canadian case. We said that we had uranium in Canada, that we had low cost hydroelectric power which would be the soundest base for such a plant, that the capital cost of such a plant could not very likely be borne by Canada alone inasmuch as it would cost in the neighbourhood of $1 billion or more, and that we would welcome Japanese capital in such a venture, if it became feasible. No finite arrangements were made. No definite plan was arrived at. We merely did some selling, if you like, with respect to the Canadian position and the attractive opportunities in Canada in this regard.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is the same question of privilege that was raised by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I had hoped that the minister, who I believed entertained a respect for Parliament, would give some reasonable explanation as to why this had happened. I realize that there is nothing any of us can do to prevent a minister from making a statement outside the House that ought to be made inside the House. But I did not think I would live to see the day in Parliament when a minister would dismiss such a thing in such a lighthearted way and indicate that he had rushed as quickly as possible to the television cameras in order to make a statement that he had been asked to make in the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: Although I recognize that there is nothing that I or any other member of the House can do about this, I hope that the members of the government will develop sufficient respect for this institution that they will not be contemptuous of the House in such an obvious and frivolous manner as the minister has just indicated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the hon. member's question of privilege and righteous indignation, may I say that I have sufficient respect for the House that I use its time circumspectly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Greene: I do not waste the time of the House. If hon. members opposite would follow this example at times, we could get the business of the House done much more speedily.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether we are progressing very much at this point. I wonder whether the minister might not agree, unless he has a further statement to make in reply to the question of privilege raised initially by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and later by the Leader of the Opposition, that we return to the question raised originally by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Bell: The minister's appeal is dismissed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Inasmuch as the government's policy has generally been understood to be that the control of uranium should stay very closely within the ambit of the government of Canada and the Atomic Energy Control Board, will the minister give the House the assurance that in any proposal for building an uranium enrichment plant in this country, the majority control will remain in the hands of either the Canadian government or the Canadian people and that any equity capital from Japan or elsewhere will be in the minority position or will be in the form of loan capital rather than equity capital?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Leader of the Opposition has rushed to the television cameras and could not stay to hear the answer to this very important question.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to advise Joe the Joker that the Leader of the Opposition has not gone to the television cameras.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: He has definitely not.

An hon. Member: He has.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Cheap, cheap!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Hees: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that we have already spent a good deal of time on the question raised by the hon. member which has developed into a question of privilege and deteriorated further in the process. I should like to go on now to the next question and return to this one in a short while. I think we are being unfair to the hon. member for Lotbinière who has been waiting for 15 minutes for the opportunity to ask a question. Immediately following his question, I will return to the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. Perhaps the atmosphere will clear a bit in the meantime.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—AVAILABILITY OF EMPLOYMENT FOR CEGEP GRADUATES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that over 44,000 CEGEP graduates will be without work when they finish their courses, according to Quebec Labour Department statistics, that unemployment is still increasing in that province, according to a joint news release of the federal Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and finally that 42 per cent of the unemployed in Quebec—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may not make a speech. He must put a question. If he refers to the Standing Orders, he will see that he is given the floor at this time to put a question and not to enumerate a long list of facts. I therefore invite him to put his question as soon as possible.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The more one waits, the more ideas come to his mind.

I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether, at this moment, the government is studying the particular problem of young unemployed graduates and whether it considers giving direct financial assistance to those young people until they find a job on the labour market?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will recognize, after consideration, that this question was asked yesterday or very few days ago, but in any event, it has been asked and since the time of the House has been monopolized to a certain extent, the House might allow the right hon. Prime Minister to answer.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the member knows that a few weeks ago, the government announced a series of new projects aimed at palliating the unemployment problem in the country. As I had the opportunity to mention it a few days ago, the government does not intend to discriminate between the young and the not so young who are unemployed. We intend to help them all. But since the hon. member particularly stated the case of graduating CEGEP students, it offers me perhaps an opportunity to remind them that the prosperity of the province will depend to a great extent on the possibility of attracting investments and that an atmosphere of violence which many among them advocate is not beneficial.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fortin: I should like to put a supplementary question.

Since the atmosphere of violence has partly been settled, thanks to the co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, and since the consequences of that crisis has been borne by both of them, have discussions been held to improve the climate and attract investments in Quebec in order to enable young people to find a place within the community and earn their living?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer must be given by the House which is considering a bill which, we hope, will be passed today with the co-operation of the opposition parties and this will specifically have an effect to attract investments in Quebec.

23568—68½

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I suggested a moment ago that we might return to the question raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I am not sure whether the minister actually replied or attempted to reply.

URANIUM

POSSIBILITY OF JAPANESE FINANCIAL PARTICIPATION IN CONSTRUCTION OF ENRICHMENT PLANT— CANADIAN CONTROL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I will repeat the question so that the minister will have an opportunity to answer. Having regard to the fact that the policy of the Canadian government has been understood to be that the control of the production and processing of uranium should stay strictly in Canadian hands, particularly under the control of the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada, can the minister assure us that any uranium enrichment plant will be under Canadian control and that any foreign control will either be in a minority equity position or in the form of loan capital?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the government has no intention of changing the current rules whereby the export of uranium is subject to the authority and permission of the Atomic Energy Control Board, with the further safeguard of ratification by the government.

In so far as financing is concerned, I think it would be premature and hypothetical to determine how the financing of such a project might be undertaken. In my conversations with the Japanese, I stated that, whatever may be the rules regarding foreign investment in Canada, we would continue to welcome foreign investment on the basis of their investment to date, namely, by minority holdings in Canadian companies and with a preponderance of debt financing by foreign sources rather than equity financing.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I saw the minister's statement to that effect and I welcome it. I am now asking whether the statement with reference to foreign ownership being confined to either a minority position or loan capital will apply with regard to any uranium enrichment plant in Canada in so far as Japanese or other foreign investment is concerned?

Mr. Greene: I do not think that the government has made any decision in this regard. The matter of whether there will be a plant is still hypothetical. I think it would be premature to determine how we should finance it. In my statements to the Japanese in this regard, I was not stating government policy. I stated that, whatever government policy was with regard to foreign investment, and this will be announced shortly, foreign investment was required in Canada on the basis of a minority holding in Canadian companies and largely by debt investment rather than a majority equity holding, and that this would continue to be favoured by the Canadian government.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): In view of the minister's statement that the whole position with respect to the enrichment plant process is still somewhat up in the air, will he assure the House that before a final decision is made on the merits of Canadian financial control, the problem of pollution, and so on, the whole issue will be weighed against the relative merits of developing Minas Basin tidal power?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that before any final decisions are made and when there is something specific to announce, it will be done in this House in a proper manner. To date, there is only a possibility and the matter of informing the Japanese that we welcome their suggestions in this regard. At this stage it would not be proper to present anything to the House because there is nothing specific to present. When there is, hon. members may be assured that I will report it to the House.

AIR CANADA

LAY-OFF OF OTTAWA RESERVATIONS PERSONNEL— TRANSFER OF FACILITIES TO MONTREAL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. If the minister has not already done so, will he investigate the lay-off of 50 reservations personnel in Ottawa by Air Canada to ensure that these people are offered alternative employment and are not simply part of a large-scale lay-off plan of Air Canada and Canadian National Railways across Canada? Also, will the minister ensure that the service to the public is not downgraded as a result, since it is most important that first-class service be available in Canada's capital?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do what the hon. member suggests. I have some preliminary information I can give to the House. I have been advised by Air Canada that this consolidation of reservation services and the like is part of a program policy in effect in other parts of Canada. A minimum of 25 of those who will be affected will be offered alternative employment immediately in, I believe, the Montreal centre where this will be carried out. Since the whole scheme will not take effect until October of next year, it is anticipated that by that time some of the employees will have left through the normal attrition process. Other employees will be offered employment in other parts of the country. Their usual travelling and moving expenses will be covered.

Mr. Hees: Did the Prime Minister notice the first-class manner in which the minister answered the question and will he take that as an example for the future?

[Mr. Greene.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I ask the well-answering minister whether he was consulted regarding this decision by Air Canada to transfer telephone reservation facilities from Ottawa to Montreal, whether those consultations were with regard to the whole plan of the airline, and whether the minister approves of that plan?

Mr. Jamieson: I think the hon. member knows as well as any hon. member in the House that in terms of this type of management I am not consulted. I have, of course, had conversations with the management of Air Canada with regard to their general management plans for the immediate future. It was in this context that the question of centralizing the reservation process was discussed. It is, in fact, becoming a common practice now not only in Canada but throughout the world.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister to be good enough to look into this decision by Air Canada, since not only jobs are involved but also service to the public in the capital of the country, and undertake to make a statement to the House on motions when we reconvene in the new year informing hon. members why this decision has been made by the airline?

Mr. Jamieson: I am not certain that the residents of the capital city, important as it is, are any more important than the residents in any other part of the country—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister would reply to the question as quickly as possible. Hon. members will notice that we have not been moving very rapidly this morning and there are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period. I hope there will not be too many supplementaries from now on.

Mr. Jamieson: I will answer briefly, Mr. Speaker. The whole objective is an improvement in efficiency; it is a matter of giving better service. But I shall be glad to consider the hon. member's suggestion and see what I can do.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Bearing in mind that booking services will be centralized many miles away from flight origins, will there be an improvement in meteorological forecasting such as this proposal would necessitate?

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF IVAN RITMAN TO BOARD

Mr. J. B. Morison (Halton-Wentworth): I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State. WATER RESOURCES

MACKENZIE RIVER SYSTEM—ALLOCATION OF USE—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Notice was taken by his Parliamentary Secretary of the question I asked last Wednesday, which involved several departments, but since the minister was in Yellowknife recently, and knows the facts, I am putting it to him. Will the minister assure the House that he will immediately convene a meeting with the governments of Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan to deal with the use of the waters of the entire Mackenzie River system, having in mind the imminent danger which threatens and the fact that by next spring the need to allocate the use of these waters will arise? Will the minister tell us whether he is now willing to have this question referred to a standing committee for discussion some time in the new year, as I have suggested to him?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and myself met last week with ministers from Alberta, and I know that my colleague has had talks with ministers from British Columbia. We are dealing actively with that problem but I wish to draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that if the former government had been a little more careful—

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I asked a legitimate, reasonable question and I would appreciate an answer.

An hon. Member: You got a pretty good answer, too.

Mr. Baldwin: Is the government prepared to refer this matter to a committee, or it is afraid to do so?

TRADE

SEMINAR ON DEVELOPMENT OF MARKETS IN UNITED STATES FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES' PRODUCTS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether he is in a position to answer the question I put to him last week regarding the establishment of a business seminar in the Atlantic provinces to assist industry to develop greater markets in the United States.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am writing the hon. member giving him a list of seminars, conferences and meetings of all kinds in the Maritimes in which my department has taken part in the last two years. This policy is a permanent one. I shall be studying, with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and with my department's regional officers the need for the type of seminar the hon. member suggests, and if it appears desirable to do so we shall be delighted to take part.

Mr. Coates: Would the minister be willing to participate himself in an effective way in such a seminar in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Pepin: I should be delighted to receive an invitation.

SHIPPING

STATIONING OF SEARCH AND RESCUE VESSEL IN SYDNEY AREA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister in a position to inform me of the latest developments in response to the urgent necessity for a search and rescue vessel being stationed in Sydney Harbour or its vicinity?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I am delighted to be able to tell the hon. member that the coastguard vessel Wood is now being renovated and crewed, and as soon as she has been fully equipped she will be placed in the search and rescue service in the general area of the gulf. The matter of where she will be stationed will be determined after we have decided where the vessel can best be employed, but she will be stationed wherever it is demonstrated it is best for her to be.

Mr. Muir: Is the minister aware that thousands of men who go to sea, as well as their families, have been waiting for this announcement for a long time? Is he also aware that his two predecessors ignored the pleas put forward by myself—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir: May I pose my question?

Mr. Speaker: I drew attention a few moments ago to the fact that we shall be running out of time in a short while. However, I will allow a supplementary to the hon. member.

Mr. Muir: May I ask the minister if I may, on behalf of all those concerned, thank and commend him and wish him and his family the happiest Christmas ever?

TORONTO—OPTIONS ON SITES FOR NEW FACILITY

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question, too, is directed to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the new site for the Toronto area airport. Have the minister's department and the provincial authorities yet arrived at a formula for obtaining options on the four sites which are particularly under consideration?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Meetings between representatives of the two governments and the officials took place yesterday or the day before. I am not sure how much progress was made; they have not reported to me as yet. But I am hopeful they will do so within the next day or two.

HOUSING

MONTREAL—EFFECTS OF PROPOSED EXPRESSWAY—REPLACEMENT BY UNDERGROUND PROJECT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Earlier in the week, Mr. Speaker, I addressed a question to the acting minister in charge of housing. I now direct it to the minister himself in the light of the statement made by the Secretary of State that the project for an expressway in Montreal, which would butcher residential districts and demolish some 2,000 houses, should be replaced by an alternative scheme to provide for an underground expressway. Will the minister undertake to look into this matter and explore what action might be taken by the federal government to encourage the one project and discourage the other?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Any decision with regard to an expressway would, of course, be the prerogative of the government of the Province of Quebec. However, we are extremely conscious of the need for housing in Montreal. In fact, we have invested, in greater Montreal through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, some $150 million during the past year to produce about 12,000 lower income housing units there. I shall be discussing this matter with my counterpart in the Province of Quebec, but I would not venture to make any further comment about the expressway at this time.

Mr. Brewin: Would the minister consider discussing with his government colleagues the possibility of providing some incentive for constructing an underground expressway which would not result in the demolition of housing, rather than the present plan?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DISCONTINUANCE OF SUPPLEMENTARY COMPANY PAYMENTS FOLLOWING INCREASE IN BENEFITS

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour, but in view of his absence I will direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. Is it the intention of the Department of Labour to permit companies providing supplementary unemployment insurance benefits to take advantage of increases in unemployment insurance benefits to reduce the company's contributions?

[Mr. Ryan.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked contains allegations, but perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary might give a quick answer to the question.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of the Minister of Labour it should not be the intention of any companies providing supplementary unemployment insurance benefits, including Devco, to take advantage of the increase in unemployment insurance benefits to reduce company contributions. Regulations will be introduced that will specify in general terms—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now making a statement.

HOUSING

PROVISION OF REASONABLE RENTAL ACCOMMODATION FOR ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence which is a follow-up to a question I asked his colleague the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Housing on December 4. May I ask whether the minister has had time to explore ways by which, hopefully, more economic housing might be provided members of the armed forces serving in posts where married quarters are not available?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my hon. friend for notice of his question. In response to his specific question of December 4, may I say we have had extensive discussions with CMHC in this regard, but because an essentially federal agency is involved none of the $40 million will be made available at the federal level; it will all be made available to the provincial governments.

Having said that, however, we are very concerned with the impact of high rents on members of the armed forces, particularly in some of the larger metropolitan centres. We have been having extensive discussions with housing authorities with regard to the possibility of trying to alleviate this problem. At the moment, I am afraid I have nothing very promising to indicate either to the hon. member or to the members of the armed forces.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PAYMENT OF MINIMUM WAGE TO HOTEL EMPLOYEES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, since this is probably, and hopefully, the last day before the Christmas recess, may I take advantage of this occasion to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour whether there is any change in the status of CN hotel employees in relation to the federal minimum wage law. My question is prompted by the fact that there are a number of unions in the process of negotiating a new contract for employees of CN hotels and the results of those negotiations will be dependent on the attitude of the government in regard to this matter.

Might I also be permitted to add a final part to my question? May I ask the Parliamentary Secretary whether there are any CN hotels in Canada at the moment that are honouring the minimum wage laws of this parliament?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in view of the settlement arrived at with the Chateau Laurier hotel in Ottawa the other day, there is hope that the general problem may be resolved in the near future.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

EXTENSION OF NAVIGATION SEASON—UNDISTURBED ICE AROUND POWER INSTALLATIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport concerning the importance of the seaway to the economic well-being of the country, and particularly the port of Hamilton. In light of the expressed need for an extension of the seaway season from 8½ to 10 months or more, is the minister taking into consideration the problem that exists with hydro officials who have indicated they require to have undisturbed ice around their turbines? Has the minister anything to report in this regard?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, nothing specific. We are aware of the problem. It is another example of the inherent difficulty of trying to keep the system open for the longest possible time. This does create problems for other interests. We are doing our best to resolve the problem, but beyond that there is nothing more that I can say.

Mr. Alexander: May I ask one short supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his answer, but can he give the House any indication when the Carr report will be made available, since this report may help to alleviate the situation by providing solutions?

Mr. Jamieson: I have not read the complete Carr report but I do not recall a chapter heading having to do with undisturbed ice. However, I think some of my Christmas reading will include finishing reading the report with a view to publicizing it, or those parts of it which are of public interest, as soon as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TORONTO-WINNIPEG AND OTTAWA-MONTREAL PASSENGER SERVICE REDUCTIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the protests that I am sure he, as well as other hon. members, have received about the CNR's proposal to discontinue their Panorama transcontinental train service from Toronto to Winnipeg, has the minister discussed this downgrading of passenger service with the CNR?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This, of course, is another of the notifications given by both railways with respect to passenger service. However, as the House and I am sure the hon. member know, this matter is now before the CTC. I am not sure whether this particular matter is the subject of an actual hearing at the moment, but certainly the whole question is. It is my judgment that the normal procedures should be allowed to prevail. In the event that the people do not like the judgment, there is machinery for appeal and it is at that point—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I bring to the attention of hon. members that the question period has expired at this point. The question is whether we should allow supplementaries to the question that is now before the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement of CNR that it intends to downgrade the service between Ottawa and Montreal, which is certainly well travelled, is the minister discussing with the CNR their whole policy on passenger service, which seems to be moving very quickly in the direction of the policy earlier adopted by the CPR?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, on the matter of specific routes, as the hon. member knows I am bound to a great extent by the National Transportation Act, which provides that in so far as individual services are concerned they must be adequate for the traffic offered. The CN's position, as I understand it, is that their proposed schedule is adequate for that purpose. There are grounds and means through which that kind of assertion can be appealed. However, on the broader question, may I say I have talked with officials of CN and I think it is quite important that there be adequate passenger service within a framework that is consistent with traffic offering. May I assure the hon. member that I shall be watching the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

ST. JOHN, N.B.—MEASURES TO ASSURE SURVIVAL OF POTATO EXPORT INDUSTRY

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In view of the many questions and representations from hon. members from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island could the minister tell the House whether the railway companies have accepted to be more concerned about the welfare and survival of the export potato industry as far as the harbour at St. John is concerned?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that the question is urgent, but I am sure it is not supplementary to the previous question. However, the question having been asked perhaps the minister might reply to it.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with the railway with regard to the whole question of the new rates for export shipments of potatoes. I have been told by Mr. MacDougall of the railway as of this morning that further talks are taking place. There appears to have been some misunderstanding—I am not altogether sure whether on the part of the shippers or on the part of the railway—particularly with regard to the charge for the retention of cars, which appears to be the most difficult part of the problem. The indication that I have had, and I do not want to be too hopeful, is that some amicable solution can be reached within a very short time.

PROVISION OF WEATHER DATA TO FISHING VESSELS—FREQUENCY OF BROADCASTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary or related question to the one asked the Minister of Transport a moment ago by the hon. member for The Sydneys. The question is urgent in that it is generally conceded that officials within the minister's department are—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I must give a bit of background. The officials are doing a first-rate job in assisting in gathering weather data. However, from complaints received from fishermen, especially at this time of year, it has become obvious that this weather data is not getting through to the fishermen. Would the minister undertake to make a study to ascertain whether the manner of projecting weather forecasts can be improved upon, and would the minister endeavour to increase the frequency of broadcasts of weather forecasts which are so beneficial to our fishermen?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that.

[Mr. Corbin.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ITEMS FOLLOWING CHRISTMAS RECESS

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council what business will come before the House after the recess and will he assure us that the second reading of veterans' pension legislation will be done of the first items?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will indicate to the hon. member now that the veterans' legislation will be one of the early items to be called. I could indicate a number of other items that will be called early, including crop insurance legislation, the trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand, the export development legislation and the Yukon Minerals and Northern Power Corporation.

Mr. Baldwin: What about the budget?

Mr. MacEachen: I will keep in mind the suggestion of my hon. friend and also the suggestion in respect of the budget. I am not certain which day it will be called but it will be called early.

Mr. McGrath: What about Beaupré?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

PROVISION OF SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE, LOAN GUARANTEE, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I move:

That Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be amended in Clause 3 by adding to subsection 4 of section 5 the following:

provided however that any incentive shall be granted only after the applicant has provided the Crown or its designated agency with such number of shares in the application firm that the Minister considers to be equivalent in value to the incentive except that where the amount of the incentive is less than one million dollars the Minister may grant an exemption to this provision.

When Bill C-205 was presented to the House for second reading, Mr. Speaker, members of this party agreed to second reading of the bill in order that its provisions and its implications could be studied further in the committee. We agreed also because we were anxious to help in any way in order that the regional development program could be extended or used usefully in dealing with some of the problems facing Canada. At that time we made it quite clear that we felt the provisions of the bill were inadequate in terms of fulfilling the objectives of it as stated by the minister and the government.

We also had serious misgivings about the bill because we felt it jeopardized the principles of a regional development program, and that in fact it might create some serious problems for the future of such programs. Now that we have gone through the committee stage and have had a chance to question the minister as well as hear witnesses who are experts in the field of regional development, we have to say that this is poor legislation. I suggest that the bill before us at the present time will emasculate the regional development program.

At the committee we heard from the minister and the deputy minister regarding this bill. They did not present an opening statement, they simply said they would answer any questions we had. That is a rather unusual procedure, one which I find is becoming too common on the part of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). The minister and the deputy minister simply took the attitude: We are alright, Jack; everything is fine. Just leave it to us and we will see that everything is fixed up.

This was not good enough, Mr. Speaker, and we heard from a number of witnesses. We heard from representatives of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and the Canadian Council of Rural Development. We heard from Professor Tom Brewis, probably the outstanding authority on regional development programs and policies in Canada. This witness made it quite clear that this bill would scuttle the regional development program. Every one of the witness presented serious criticisms of Bill C-205; and this is a very serious matter, all of them expressed a growing disillusionment with the government's regional development programs as they have been brought forward to the present time.

Then, we heard from the minister and the deputy minister again but they had the same approach. We had to pry information from them. They refused to prepare a considered reply to the representations that had been made by the various expert witnesses who came before the committee. At one point the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion tried to slough off some of the evidence that had been presented by indicating that these were just words of a professor, why should we worry about them? I think it is a very serious matter when the minister refuses to give serious consideration to the points of criticism presented not only by members of the House and members of the Regional Development Committee, but also by some of the expert witnesses who appeared before that committee.

As a matter of fact, the minister and the deputy did not even consider it important enough to have a person there to monitor the evidence presented by the witnesses. They were not in position to reply to some of the points raised earlier in the evidence. I should state that the Parliamentary Secretary to the minister was present. He was very attentive and took part in the proceedings. I was pleased with that part of the performance at least. The minister and the deputy were not in a position to adequately answer the points presented to members of the committee. They were not in a position to adequately answer the criticisms and questions put forward by members when they came before the committee the second time.

Consequently, we moved a number of amendments at the committee stage of the proceedings. Most of them were designed to make the best possible bill out of a poor piece of legislation. We at least tried to make it more workable by giving the legislation before us some focus and direction in order that it might be based on some sort of sound principles of regional development. All of these amendments were summarily rejected by the Liberal majority on the committee. I suggest one reason they rejected them all is that most of those members were absent for the testimony of the witnesses. They did not consider the evidence important enough to stay and hear it being presented by representatives of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, the Canadian Council of Rural Development and Professor Brewis. Most of them attended only when they thought their presence was needed to rubberstamp the government's legislation. When amendments were moved by opposition members they would say "no" before the amendments were even read.

Mr. McBride: That is not a fair comment.

Mr. Burton: That is true, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. McBride: It is not.

Mr. Burton: The hon. member was one of those who took part in the proceedings and he knows very well that is true. The only thing he could do was make noise, such as he is making right now. I suggest the performance of most of the Liberal members of this committee was disgraceful. They performed a poor service for their constituents and the people of Canada in the way they conducted themselves during the committee proceedings this week.

Today, we are moving one amendment which would make a major difference to this legislation. It would change the direction of the government's programs and the direction in which it is trying to take this legislation with Bill C-205. The amendment which has just been presented to the House provides for public equity in undertakings where there is substantial assistance provided by the people of Canada for new developments.

• (12:50 p.m.)

The amendment which has been moved contemplates a Canada Development Corporation. The government said it would introduce this legislation at this session. When it will come forward is difficult to say at the present time. The government has given no indication. Possibly it will be one of the never-never things for which this government has become rather well known. "Never-never" certainly can be applied to its policies in respect of a Canada Development Corporation. The amendment before us, together with other complementary developments such as the formation of the Canada Development Corporation, would assist in planning a comprehensive approach to regional development. It would also stop the give-aways to large corporations which I suggest is one serious feature in respect of the government's programs as we have them at the present time. It would assist in the process of helping to regain control over the Canadian economy. We must start now and not wait for some mañana which may never come. I think it is clear that the government's regional development program is getting into a worse morass every day. This legislation will be the final blow and that is the reason we believe it must be given very close scrutiny and study by the House. It will destroy the program as a regional development program.

As I indicated at second reading, we were prepared to give further consideration to the bill in committee. We were particularly sympathetic to the proposition, which was the government's contention, that this legislation was a key portion of the government's program for Quebec in dealing with problems with which all hon. members are familiar. In the committee we found that it will do nothing of the sort. Every witness pointed out that this program will not be of immediate help to Montreal and other areas of Quebec. We also pointed out that regional economic programs are no substitute for an effective national economic policy. Every witness before the committee pointed out that there is a considerable time lag in the program between its commencement and the implementation and impact of it. It must be considered as a long-run program. This is borne out by the evidence that up to this week only $3.4 million in incentives have been paid out. Let us contrast that with the total amount of offers which had been made under the Regional Development Incentives Act to the end of October, the latest month for which I have a compilation available. Up to October 31, offers had been made under the Regional Development Incentives Act of approximately $102 million. The figure to the end of November of course would be somewhat higher. But only $3.4 million has actually been paid out.

I acknowledge of course that as a result of some of the offers which have been made, but which have not yet been paid out, some work is under way. Certainly, that is an obvious fact. The basic point remains, however, that there is a significant and important time lag in these programs. They must be considered on a longer run basis and as long-run programs. The minister admitted that this legislation would do nothing for Montreal and Quebec this winter. He has admitted that we might as well write off this program in terms of it having any impact during the current winter. I suggest that the minister has performed a disservice to his own province by some of the statements he made before the committee. I think all of us will acknowledge the problems which exist in Quebec, as well as the various problems which exist in other parts of Canada. But the minister seems to have developed a habit of making very strong statements in order to back up his very weak arguments. I think we have had several examples of this over the past few months. It would seem that we have had a further example in some of the statements made by the minister before the committee in which he tried to paint a very drastic picture of the situation in Quebec and thereby once again exaggerate the problem.

I believe it has been properly said that the finance minister of Quebec could not let these comments pass, even though he is a colleague of the minister in political terms. I should like to quote from the Montreal Gazette of December 16. This is an article headed "Marchand exaggerated—Garneau". The article reads as follows:

> Finance Minister Raymond Garneau said yesterday he disagrees with a suggestion by Jean Marchand, federal minister of regional economic expansion, that Quebec's economy is likely to collapse if investment in Montreal does not improve drastically in the next three years.
> Mr. Garneau told a news conference he is happy with the federal government's decision to make the Montreal region eligible for economic incentives, but said Mr. Marchand exaggerated when he predicted the province's economy could collapse.
>
> The federal minister made his comments Monday during a meeting of the Commons regional expansion committee examining proposed amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act.
>
> The amendments would make the Montreal area eligible for a special incentives program until Dec. 31, 1973.
> "If nothing happens before 1973 I don't know what problem we would have left to solve," Mr. Marchand said.

The minister seems to get into a regular flap over various matters. First it was over FRAP—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair. The House will meet again at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Burton: When one o'clock was called I was making reference to the regular flaps that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) seems to get into, his most recent one being with respect to this bill. He seems to be in a panic to do something, to do anything, it would seem, to try to find something that would at least appear to be a solution to some of the problems that he and others have allowed to develop for some time. So, he insists on rushing this legislation through the House at the last minute, legislation which is admitted by all parties in the House to be very important.

I would like to draw to the attention of the minister some of his previous statements when the Regional Development Incentives Act was originally introduced in the House. He indicated at that time that this bill had to be rushed through, the government needed it right away. But then he agreed we must never do this sort of thing again. Now, we are on the same old merry-go-round again.

I should like to examine the amendment which I moved on behalf of the New Democratic Party in relation to the bill before us. I think it must be examined in the light of the operation of the program which is being carried out under the authority of the Regional Development Incentives Act. The first major objection to the bill is that it is being used to accomplish national economic objectives, something for which the program and the legislation were never designed. This was expressed very lucidly by Professor Brewis when he appeared before the committee. Professor Brewis pointed out to the Regional Development Committee at its meeting last Tuesday:

> The bill leaves me with a feeling of considerable uneasiness, and as I have listened to the discussion today, I must say that my uneasiness has increased. The bill introduces what seems to be a major reorientation of policy in the direction of measures to reduce cyclical unemployment rather than measures to improve the long run economic potential of the less favoured regions of the country.

Then, he went on to say that he wanted to remind the minister of what the latter said in a speech in Halifax in October of 1968. This is what the minister had to say on that occasion:

> I believe that in our business, the sensible effective action will be found in the middle area between short run expedience and vague long run plans.

The minister then suggested that 15 years was a reasonable time horizon on which to do the planning. He emphasized that his first principle was as follows:

> We will not offer short run expediency or long run vagueness. Measures must not be selected just because they catch up problems for the moment.

Then, Professor Brewis went on to comment:

> I think it is a great pity that the minister did not stick to his guns.

When Professor Brewis appeared before the committee he had some other relevant comments to make with regard to this particular point. He said that the nature of the incentives is not such as to ameliorate significantly the lot of the unemployed in the short run, and from past experience it seems more likely to benefit a large number of companies. Professor Brewis said that with regard to the short run, in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) speaking of important amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act, said:

> It is also very difficult to predict the volume of investment likely to be effective or the probable cost of the incentives. Judging from experience with the program to date, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion foresees a total increase in outlays because of the new program amounting to about $130 million over the period of the next few years.

• (2.10 p.m.)

That is the end of the quotation from the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. Professor Brewis went on to say:

> If we take Mr. Benson's figure of $130 million and assume in the light of past experience (according to DREE estimates) that $5,000 of incentives creates one job then these incentives may create 25,000-30,000 jobs. Since there are currently between 600,-000 and 700,000 unemployed, this will result in one man out of 20 getting a job. For this marginal result a massive change in the DREE legislation is envisaged.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wonder—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps a point of order or perhaps the hon. member would permit me to interrupt to ask when he expects to get into the substance of the amendment, about which we are very anxious to hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would take this to be in the nature of a point of order. I know that the preamble is a bit long and I think at this stage of the proceedings we should try to stay as close as we can to the issue. I know that the hon. member's remaining remarks will be germane to the rather narrow confines of the amendment.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the point of order that has been raised. I was trying to set out some of our reasons for moving this amendment; why we feel the government's purpose in implementing this legislation has been inadequate and, thus outline our reasons for introducing the amendment now before the House.

I could quote from other references made by Professor Brewis. One points out that the special incentives are of short duration and that this will not be of very much benefit in the long run. He went on to state:

> The job facing the department to effect the long-run economic structural changes which are necessary in the lagging regions is big enough and complicated enough without saddling the department with additional and largely unrelated responsibilities. There are other and more effective ways of reducing local unemployment than paying subsidies to industry.

When Professor Brewis appeared before the committee he gave a number of examples of what could be done more effectively in the short run to deal with the very serious economic problems facing some parts of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member. As I indicated on the point of order, and I say this very respectfully, I think the hon. member is making the type of speech that would be entirely in order on second reading or on clause 1 in the committee stage. I feel that at the report stage we should confine debate to the particular motion before the House, and I should like to ask the hon. member to come to the amendment as quickly as he can.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly keep your suggestion and request in mind as I deal with the amendment that is before the House. This amendment would make a very fundamental and important change in the direction of the regional development program. It is our view that it would save such programs from being destroyed, as we feel they are being destroyed at the present time.

This brings me to the next point. I feel the regional development programs are being destroyed because they will not help the new areas in Canada—

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): What about the amendment?

Mr. Burton: —to deal with their economic problems. It should be made clear, Mr. Speaker, that these areas could be designated without the legislation presently before us.

Witnesses appearing before the committee pointed out that simply adding 10 per cent of capital costs and $2,000 per job to the present incentive levels in the Atlantic provinces would not help those regions of Canada in their economic development. It was also pointed out that only about four grants have been provided up to the maximum levels at the present time. It seems to me, and this was noted in some of the evidence before the committee, that simply to add to the ante in terms of the incentive levels for the Atlantic provinces will create new problems which have not been encountered before.

It was quite clear during the consideration of this bill that the growth centre concept was in disarray—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I may ask the hon. member, and this is the third time I have asked, to deal with the amendment. It might be helpful to the hon. member and others if I were to read the motion and to indicate, as I have on two occasions already, that the amendment is on a rather narrow point.

The motion reads:

That Bill C-205, an act to amend—by adding—the following:

"provided however that any incentive shall be granted only after the applicant has provided the Crown or its designated agency with such number of shares in the application firm that the minister considers to be equivalent in value to the incentive except that where the amount—"

With very great respect I say to the hon. member that he should, and under our rules I think he must, direct his remarks to the point of the ministry or agency requiring that shares be given to it where a grant is given to a company. The Chair wants to be extremely fair, but the hon. member has used more than half of his allotted time without dealing with the amendment so the remainder of his speech should be confined to the amendment before the House.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure you that my remaining remarks will be pertinent to the amendment before the House. I wish to deal with the growth centre concept and to relate this to the amendment. We are calling for a degree of public participation in regional development incentives programs and feel that the public should be provided with a share of the companies being assisted through those programs. In this regard, it is very important to note that the government's original concept, which it developed in this program for growth centres, is in disarray. The adoption of this amendment would help to give the program some better direction and focus. The minister has stated that the special areas had provided some element of growth centres, but nevertheless he hedged and did not want to become too specific.

If we are to develop a growth centre concept and follow it through, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that rather than undertaking programs on an ad hoc basis where you simply consider applications from a widespread area which has been designated by regulation as authorized under the legislation, the government could help to give some better directions to its programs and some better focussing on this important matter.

This point was stressed by witnesses before the committee, particularly those from the Atlantic provinces Economic Council, who showed that there was considerable confusion in the government's programs. They did not know whether the growth centre concept was being followed and whether it was still one of the objectives of the department. They pointed out the number of problems developing within the Atlantic provinces as a result of the present pattern of dispersal of grants.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member and to ensure that I am not I invite him to indicate to the Chair the relevance between his remarks and the amendment the House is considering.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting it is quite relevant to follow the growth centre concept in the department's proposals, and to involve the public and the government in by requiring that the government receive a portion of the ownership of these companies. It is hoped that when companies receive these grants, they will help to carry through the objectives of the department, objectives which it has stated in the past. There is some confusion at present as to whether these companies are fulfilling these objectives.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I should like to pass on to the next point that I wanted to raise, which I feel is the most important one in connection with the amendment before the House. This point relates to the government's reliance on private enterprise and its large giveaways to corporations. This I feel is one of the most damning features of the government's implementation and administration of this act, and it is one of the major reasons why we have introduced this amendment. A large proportion of the funds which are being committed by this department are in the form of large giveaways to corporations. In the cases where this is simply a giveaway grant, in which there is for a limited period control over the firm receiving the grant, the grant becomes ineffective in terms of the public control of the investment after that time. This matter is too important to be simply left in the hands of private enterprise. The entire development of our regional development program is too important for that. We simply cannot leave it in the hands of private enterprise. Because of the very nature of the problem and the very nature of the solutions, we cannot leave it to private enterprise.

Our regional development problems and regional disparities in Canada stem from the fact that we have allowed so much of our development to take place in the past as a result of a form of giveaways. We have allowed private enterprise to do whatever it wanted, regardless of whether it met the needs of the people of Canada or whether its actions benefited the people of Canada. The size of this program is illustrated by the pattern of grants which have been made by the federal government or which at least have been committed by the federal government at the present time.

I have an analysis before me of grants which were committed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion under this act up to the end of September. The analysis shows that the ten largest grants totalled some $48,750,000, out of a total for all grants of $83,168,000. This means that 58.6 per cent of those grants totalled $1 million or over. That is the dividing line provided in the amendment I have moved, Mr. Speaker. It proposes that there be a public sharing in any grant of $1 million or over. These ten companies, as a result of these grants, will provide some 3,309 new jobs out of a total of 14,015 which it is stated will be created by the end of September. That is 23.6 per cent of the jobs which it is suggested will be so created. And that percentage of jobs will result from 58.6 per cent of the grants. These ten companies include Sydney Steel, which is a public corporation, Ecstall Mining IBM, Control Data, McCain Foods, Becancourt Glass, F.W. Pine, C.I.P. Homekakers, T.S. Simms & Company and Askland Chemicals. It will be noted, of course, that Sydney Steel is, as I have mentioned, a public corporation, and that therefore it should be and could be quite validly excluded from this particular pattern. I have done this as well.

If the figures concerning Sydney Steel are excluded, it will be shown that the nine remaining companies will receive about $32,866,000 in grants, or 48.8 per cent of the commitments for grants made to the end of September, the total being $67,284,000. Compare that with the 23.6 per cent of employment out of the total employment to be created through this program, and it will still be shown that there is quite a vast disparity.

These grants are being provided to large corporations; in some cases, they are foreign-owned corporations as well. We feel that the programs could be much better directed if a share in the ownership of these plants were vested in the Crown. I think it should be noted as well that this amendment contemplates the creation of the Canada Development Corporation.

It will be noted from the wording of my amendment that I suggest that the shares in any such enterprise should be vested either in the Crown or its designated agency. Without naming that agency in the amendment, we had it in our minds that the Canada Development Corporation could be and should be that agency.

It seems to me that one of the criticisms of this program is this: there has been an ad hoc pattern of development that has come about simply through the process of responding to applications from firms located in widely spread out designated areas and allowing those firms to decide, on the basis of their own narrow interest, as to whether a plant would be commenced.

A further aspect of this entire program has to do with the grants to foreign-owned and foreign-controlled corporations. It has already been noted that up to the end of 1969, under the various incentives programs, incentive grants were made by the government. They were made under various programs, including old programs now being terminated, and they were made to foreign controlled corporations. These, I suggest, could be controlled more adequately as a result of the amendment that I have moved. There is certainly no indication that there has been any change in the pattern of grants which have been offered under the Regional Development Incentives Act.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we must ask this question: where is the government going with respect to the question of foreign ownership? Certainly the government has indicated that it has directed a statement of policy to be prepared. Just when that will be available is difficult to tell. I am not too hopeful of the final result, especially when one considers the manner in which the department is currently contributing to the further giveaway and sellout of the Canadian economy as a result of grants being provided under this program. I think this is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker, because the minister must take the prime responsibility for the destruction of his program. You know, he entered the government as one of the three wise men. It seems to me that something happened on the road to Damascus; or, one might say, something funny happened on the way to the forum. This brought about tragic results—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I must tell the House that his time has expired.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make any extended remarks at this stage of our proceedings. I had some difficulty in relating the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat to the amendment. It is my understanding of the rules that the debate at this stage should be quite confined. We ought to confine our remarks to the amendment before the House. I intend to do precisely that, with this exception: we hope that the speech the hon. member has just made will not be repeated on third reading. That is the type of speech one might expect to hear during the third reading stage of the debate.

I should like to say a few words about the amendment and the position this party takes on it. This amendment was first moved in committee and was defeated in committee. We voted against it at that time because we then felt as we do now that this amendment would make the program ineffective to the point where it would be totally unattractive to any industry which wanted to take advantage of any grant available under the program. This is our main criticism of it.

The amendment calls for participation by the Crown. It proposes that the Crown shall be provided with a number of shares equivalent to the amount of the incentive grant. The hon. member excepts grants of less than $1 million. Unfortunately, we cannot support his amendment. We had hoped that the hon. member would bring before the House an amendment that we could support. We shall vote against the amendment because we feel it will make the program ineffective to the point where it would be totally unattractive.

We moved an amendment in committee. We had some difficulty getting our point across. However, I think we did make our point. We expressed our concern over the lack of consultation with the provinces and the agencies of the provinces, particularly the municipalities and regional development agencies. To underline this concern, we moved an amendment in committee making it mandatory for the minister to consult with the 10 provinces because they are all involved in this program, and also with the agencies of the provinces.

Our amendment made it mandatory for the minister to create an advisory board. We stipulated the composition of that advisory board. In the spirit of give and take and in an effort to expedite the business of the House, we arrived at a reasonable compromise which we feel strengthens the bill. In the previous amendment, this was discretionary, as are many things under this program. This was entirely within the discretion of the minister. We were reasonably happy that the spirit of our amendment survived the committee stage. The minister now has to establish an advisory board. I serve notice that it is our intention to very closely monitor the administration of this act. Presuming that the amendment passes, we will await with anticipation the creation of this board. We will be particularly watchful of the people who are appointed to the board.

We hope the minister fully understands the intent of the amendment. In addition to appointing senior civil servants from his department, the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the advisory board, the amendment calls for the appointment of other persons, hopefully those who represent some of the regions of the country directly affected by this program. More particularly, we will be very carefully watching the administration of this program, bearing in mind the reservations which we expressed in committee and which we will be expressing at the third reading stage of this bill.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the privilege of being a member of this committee. I would have liked to have heard the discussion. I have tried to read the proceedings in the committee reports, but I have not had too much success. I would have liked to have seen some amendments introduced at the report stage as a result of those discussions.

We have before us a specific resolution which goes a long way towards solving the problem which, according to the evidence, is the major criticism of Bill C-205. This criticism relates to the almost total coverage of Canada by incentive programs. If there are one or two more amendments, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be involved in every industrial development in Canada. If that is necessary, it is a sad commentary. It does not meet the hopes and aspirations we had for this legislation.

It is generally agreed that when a number of areas are designated, some consideration is given to incentives in slow growth areas. In fact, we must draw these areas to the attention of those wishing to establish industries. If the city of Montreal, with the largest population of any center of Canada, is designated, this will not help the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Hopkins) who last year made a very strong plea to have his area designated. I do not have much hope that my area in northern Ontario will be designated, something for which I have fought for two or three years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I know that the hon. member is very experienced and is familiar with the rules of this House. I wonder if he would now come to the amendment. There has been quite a bit of latitude. There will also be the third reading stage.

Mr. Peters: I thank Your Honour for inviting me to make a speech on third reading. I am from an area which has not received much consideration in the past. This proliferation of designations will not really help. Of the moneys that have been spent, 66 per cent has gone to foreign owned companies, most of them branch plants processing the raw materials of this country. If it had not been for the incentives that were offered, they probably would not have located in those areas.

This amendment provides that in areas when industry will not locate unless there is a very large incentive, we should attach a condition to the contribution we make that the government will receive equity shares. I am sure that many members of my party have already, or will shortly, reach that conclusion. I am sure other hon. members agree that we have to give consideration to the total ownership of specific industries in specific areas. We are going to have to direct our money into specific areas in order to provide employment in those areas at the lowest cost.

To give one example, we are providing a million dollars of federal money to one company. This program began on the basis of the number of unemployed in an area, the rate of growth of that area as compared with others, and so on. That million dollars meant the creation of 56 jobs, so these jobs were provided at a cost of $21,000 each. If we are thinking about employment, $21,000 related to 2,000 hours works out at approximately $10,000. This is the contribution we have made. Surely, we are interested in a longer term proposition?

It is almost universally the case that companies which locate in areas they would not normally enter do so because of the incentive carrot which is held out to them. They are not likely to be sure-fire enterprises; many are in serious difficulties before they start, and the grant made by the government strengthens their financial position. Many countries which have been using government direction and inducements to establish industry in particular patterns realize they will not necessarily be viable. When money is put into them they are obviously taking a chance. It is true the companies must meet certain criteria before they are considered worthy of support.

Bearing this in mind, I do not think it is at all unreasonable for us to ask for a share of the equity capital in these companies. Then, if they are successful, the people of Canada will make a profit. If they fail, at least we have sought to make a contribution to improving the economy of an area. Some of the companies interested in resource development are in a sound position. I should like to mention one industry in which we have an interest, Polymer Corporation. At one time, nobody wanted to put any money in that undertaking. None of the other companies was interested. But when we needed a substitute for rubber to help the war effort, we established the corporation on a sound basis. It was successful, and every year part of the money spent on it is returned to the Canadian treasury. This is as it should be. If that company had failed, it would have failed in an endeavour which was of great importance to Canada, and we would have been willing to accept the loss. This being so, I can see nothing wrong with our having some say in the development of companies which we are assisting.

Let us consider some of the propositions which were handled by the estates set-up in the Maritime provinces. The board established an interest in some of these companies, participated in financial decisions and exercised a limited degree of control. Obviously, when a company is induced to locate where it would not otherwise locate, it is acting artificially and in these circumstances it will often be difficult to make a success of the venture. In my view, those who have been involved in the regional development program, not only under the existing act but under the two or three measures which preceded it, are to be congratulated on producing as many winners as they have. In supporting this amendment, I suggest the Canadian public should have an opportunity to share in both the successes and the failures of this program. Together with share capital equal to the amount of the incentives grant, they would be able to exercise some degree of control over what is happening. I am concerned about some of the companies which, to my knowledge, have gone into the Maritimes with special support. One of them is a large, multi-national operation whose advantage it is to look at the overall picture. If there is insufficient profit coming from one region, the most paying course is to take the grant and get out. One company has done just that. If we had equity capital in these companies we would find ourselves in a much better position to advise or to cajole or even to ensure a greater degree of success by adding more money if necessary.

In the years ahead, depending on the kind of governments in power, the Canadian people will be bound to participate in industrial development projects to a greater or a lesser extent. Decisions will have to be made by government in the next 20 years whether or not to direct industry into specific areas. If the minister listens to the advice he gets from the provinces, he will find that in their view there is scarcely an area of any province which is not entitled to assistance. Nevertheless, the minister has an obligation under the act not to expand this program to the extent that it becomes unsuccessful. After he has specified the areas to be designated, money will have to flow into the new ventures which are established and in these circumstances it seems to me the government ought surely to be in a position to exercise a degree of control.

There are many ways in which control can be exercised. There is the kind of control Parliament exercises over the CNR which seems to me little more than picking up the tab, most of the time. We control various other government corporations in different ways. It seems to me that when it comes to companies, capitalization is really the basis of the control. We all read the financial papers and note the jockeying which is done for control of a company on the basis of, say, a 20 per cent control of the stock. In my opinion, we should consolidate our assistance in specific areas and obtain some degree of control. In the case of some companies which, to my knowledge, have asked for assistance of the kind the minister can offer, they are unable to borrow funds from the banks or raise them on the open market or extend their operations through the issuing of shares, so they would be very happy to take in the federal government as a partner.

The company would have to make some accounting to, for example, a deputy minister, and in this way the government would exercise some control and evaluation of the operation. In the case of a company like, say, Texas Gulf, it is my guess that such a company would not ask for an incentive grant if this meant they had to provide share capital. They would not want their operation diluted by the federal government sharing in the financial structure, and therefore would not apply for a grant. They would not need to apply because their ability to raise capital is better than that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). I am sure they would be more successful in floating stock than the federal government. However, if they did apply under the program, I can see no legitimate reason for them to do so, either from a socialist point of view or from the point of view of the most conservative free enterpriser. The previous speaker in the debate is, in my opinion, a pseudo free enterpriser, as I am sure he would agree, yet he is not in favour of this amendment. This shows that he does not really believe in free enterprise.

All we are suggesting in this amendment is that there be another partner in a free enterprise operation. We are not suggesting that the government exercise any undue control that they do not exercise over other companies. All we are suggesting is that they receive equity capital equivalent to the amount they put into the company in question, and that they be allowed to act in the same way as any other shareholder would act. I see no legitimate reason for not taking this first step.

The original incentive program has been a failure, as we are all aware. It is a failure in its total concept, not in individual instances. My colleague mentioned the McCain firm. In my opinion this is a case falling almost outside the incentive program, yet they received assistance. As a result of this assistance a new section was added to their large plant, thus allowing production to take place in Canada. In my opinion, that operation was worthwhile and was a success.

However, as far as ending unemployment is concerned, which was what the program was originally designed to do, it has not been of much help. A limited number of jobs have been created. The capitalization of these jobs has been very high in total, and to that extent has not been successful. I am sure that the minister will agree—indeed he has said this many times—that when you make a program too wide your chance of success becomes less and less with each expansion.

For the program to be successful now, we must rapidly increase over the next year the amount of money that is available. I am sure that the people of this country will be willing to assist through taxation, and to that extent will participate in the program. But surely the public can participate not only in the losses but in the profits in cases where profits are made on their investments. If companies under the program were fair with the government they would be willing to pay a dividend on investments for the lifetime of the investments. If they have been unable to get money elsewhere and turn to the federal government for assistance, surely they should regard equity capital from the government as no different from equity capital from other sources.

I am not an expert on financial matters, and I do not know how many of the companies we have already assisted would agree to the proposal now before the House. But in view of the number of companies that we have supported, it seems to me that this proposition is a very minimal requirement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must do so in order to tell him and the House that his time has expired. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Burton) which was negatived on the following division:

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved that Bill C-205, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Regional Development, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, we would expect the minister to make a brief statement at this stage of our proceedings. I wonder if he has anything to say on the bill. This is a very important measure and many hon. members in the House have very strong views on the bill and want to say something about it.

We believe that this government has proceeded with what we consider to be unjustified haste. We find it very difficult to understand why the government found it necessary to bring in this bill a few days prior to the scheduled Christmas recess of the House. In so doing, the government made it very difficult for members to study the bill in detail and its very broad implications. More particularly, it made it difficult, if not impossible, for people in this country who are greatly interested in this legislation to examine it and to prepare briefs which in the normal course of events they would present to Parliament during the clause by clause study of the bill in committee.

I think the record should indicate that this measure did not come before the House for debate until December 10, a little over a week ago. It was brought before us in the late hours of Thursday afternoon, December 10, and we spent Friday afternoon debating it. On Monday the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development. We had Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, morning, afternoon and night sittings in committee. We heard witnesses who were called on very short notice from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, from the Rural Development Council of Canada, from the Atlantic Advisory Board and from very qualified and eminent people in the field of economics, especially in regional development.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for interrupting him, but there are many conversations taking place in the chamber. It is unfair to the hon. member who has the floor, and it is difficult for the Chair to follow the hon. member.

Mr. Forrestall: Not to mention how difficult it is for the hon. member.

Mr. McGrath: It does not bother me particularly, Mr. Speaker, but it is certainly a reflection of the attitude of hon. members opposite to this very important bill, an attitude of callous indifference and, indeed, of arrogance toward the measure and the broad implications it has for the Atlantic provinces and the regionally disadvantaged areas of Canada. Mr. Speaker, it might be just as well if hon. members opposite did leave the House, because they have not been following this bill. They paid no attention when the bill came in for second reading; there was hardly a corporals' guard here then.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: Disgraceful.

Mr. McGrath: They paid little or no attention to the bill when it went to the Standing Committee on Regional Development. Indeed, until we were ready to vote on the clause by clause study of the amendments we did not even see the government members of the committee. They did not have the courtesy to attend and hear witnesses in the committee.

Mr. Hees: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: They showed the same indifference to the witnesses who came here, at great inconvenience, to give evidence on this bill as they are showing to the broad implications of this measure. That is reprehensible conduct on the part of the government, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: During the limited time at our disposal we intend to demonstrate exactly what the consequences of this legislation are to the Atlantic provinces, to the Gaspé region of Quebec, to new Quebec to the Labrador portion of Newfoundland, and what it means to northern Ontario.

Mr. Forrestall: The members have all gone.

Mr. McGrath: In so doing, Mr. Speaker, we shall be registering our grave concern about the course that the government has insisted on following. They have adopted this regional development program with its ramifications, a 15-year program designed to change the structure of areas such as the Atlantic provinces—and you cannot do that overnight—in an attempt to make up for the deficiencies of many years. They have taken this program and used it to meet a short-term, cyclical situation. In so doing they have diluted the bill to the point that it is practically useless to the peripheral areas of this country.

We are fully aware of the seriousness of the situation in Montreal. We are equally aware of the seriousness of the situation throughout the country which is the direct consequence of the government's monetary and fiscal policies in fighting inflation and the deliberate creation of high unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: We know that this is a very serious matter, but we are concerned about the way the government is attempting to cope with it. We are very concerned that they will take the Regional Development Incentives Act, the main thrust of the government's regional development policy, and use it to meet a situation which by its very nature must be short-term. The excessively high unemployment in Montreal and in most of the industrial areas of the country is short-term; it will pass. The problems in the Atlantic provinces are anything but short-term. The problems in northern Ontario, in eastern Quebec or in some parts of the Prairies are anything but short-term and will require a long-term approach.

The minister has gone full circle; he has gone completely against the assurance that he gave in Halifax in October, 1968. I think his assurance is worth repeating for the record. The minister said:

> I believe that in our business the sensible, effective action will be found in the middle area between short-run expedients and vague long-run plans. I propose to choose 15 years as the reasonable time horizon for which we should do our planning—

Nobody quarrelled with that statement at the time, because everybody realized the importance of time and that what the minister was trying to do could not be accomplished over-night. You could not do away with the injustices of a hundred years in a short time. The minister continued as follows:

> So let me emphasize my first principle. It is that we won't offer short-run expediency or long-run vagueness. We want to have constructive, practical, medium-length plans. We are going to plan for every possible effort for 15 years.

By the amendments to the bill now before the House the minister has changed the whole concept. Professor Brewis, considered to be one of the experts in Canada on regional development, believes that the minister has reoriented the whole policy by using this program to combat cyclical unemployment. Mr. Speaker, we feel that the broad ramifications of the minister's actions will be felt for a long time in the regionally disadvantaged areas of this country. That is why we are concerned, and that is why the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council is concerned. In a recent "Newsletter" the council stated:

> With so much of the industrial heartland of Canada now eligible for grants, the Atlantic region may well ask what chance it has to compete for new industry. When everything is designated, nothing is designated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: In our view, that is the main objection to the course the government is following. They have weakened this bill so far as areas like the Atlantic provinces are concerned to the point where it will be virtually impossible, notwithstanding the added incentives, to attract industry because industry will be unable to resist the pull of Montreal, the metropolis of Canada, located right in the major markets of the country. This act was designed in the first place to do just the opposite. It was originally designed to enable areas such as the Atlantic provinces to compete with industrial areas such as Montreal.

Representatives of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council gave evidence before the committee expressing the same reservations in much broader terms, as outlined in their "Newsletter" of December, 1970. They questioned the effectiveness of the program and the ability of the government to administer it now that the proposed amendments would broaden its scope to the extent where practically half the population of the country is involved in the Regional Development Incentives Act.

We should take a long look at this program, Mr. Speaker. We in this party intend to monitor its operation and the power the minister will have under this measure. We shall watch very carefully to ensure that there is consultation, for example, we will be very anxious to see what happens in Quebec and in Montreal, because we believe that this program will not be effective in meeting the immediate need of Montreal, which is jobs. These jobs are needed now, this winter. We question whether this program will meet that need.

During the course of the committee meetings on clause by clause study of this bill, and as a direct consequence of the evidence produced, we were concerned about the wide, discretionary powers enjoyed by the minister. We tried to put forward an amendment which would ensure that the minister used this wide discretionary power only after full consultation—

Mr. Muir: Dictatorial power.

Mr. McGrath:—with the provinces and the municipalities. We were shocked to learn during the committee stage of the bill that the Atlantic Provinces Advisory Council, which is charged by statute with advising the minister, had not been consulted by the minister since last January.

• (3:40 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: We thought that was a shocking revelation. We expected the minister to live up to the statutory obligation placed upon him by the act and consult the Atlantic Provinces Advisory Council about the formulation of the philosophy that brought about this amendment. I am sure that if he had consulted the advisory council they would have advised him against using this particular measure to combat unemployment in Montreal and southeastern Ontario. They would have advised him against this course because of the consequences it would have upon areas such as the Atlantic provinces.

We were equally disturbed after listening to the presentation of the members of the Rural Development Council, for which the minister also has statutory responsibility. They, too, indicated under questioning that the minister had not consulted them. The minister had not bothered to consult them, yet that body contains on its executive committee Professor Brewis, who, on the subject of regional development, is one of the most knowledgeable scholars in Canada.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The minister only talks to himself.

Mr. McGrath: Also, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, that quasi-official body operating in the Atlantic provinces under the patronage of the four Atlantic governments, had not been consulted by this minister. We find it difficult to understand where the minister obtains his advice. Where is he obtaining it? He has yet to tell us. When replying to our direct questions in this regard, he pooh-poohs all our suggestions. He says in so many words, "This is just so much economic theory. You and others have one view; I have my own view." Apparently everybody in Canada is out of step except the minister and his deputy. Unfortunately, in a situation such as this the consequences of that attitude can be serious.

Our amendment would have made it mandatory for the minister to set up an advisory council. We set out in our amendment the composition of that council. We suggested that the council should in part be composed of one nominee from each of the ten provinces, because all ten provinces are now concerned in this program. There are ample precedents for that position. We set out the precedent under the manpower act, a measure for which the minister had some responsibility. We set out the precedent under the Expo act and under the Devco act, for which the minister now has responsibility. There is ample precedent for the Lieutenant Governors in council to make appointments to federal advisory boards.

We stipulated that the board should be comprised of 15 members nominated by the government and a member nominated by each of the ten provinces. This board would have ensured consultation. It was to concern itself with the type of situation now developing in Canada with so much of the country designated. Now provincial governments such as the government of Saskatchewan and perhaps the government of Manitoba, are beginning to designate their own areas. They are doing so because areas in those provinces which have not been included as federally designated areas are at such a disadvantage that the provincial governments have been forced to move in and provide some incentives. Just about the whole country is designated, so what was formerly a regional development policy which gave us some hope has now been translated into a national economic program. The consequences of the government's action, in my view, could be most drastic for areas such as the Atlantic provinces.

The government agreed to accept a watered-down version of our amendment. Imbued with the spirit of Christmas and the spirit of compromise, they agreed that it was necessary to hold consultations. They agreed it was essential that the minister's powers should be at least mellowed by the process of consultation and that this consultation ought to become mandatory rather than discretionary, as the previous amendment set out. They accepted the amendment. There is a new clause in the bill which indicates that the minister shall appoint an advisory council. We shall be watching for the appointment and make-up of the members of the council.

Mr. Peters: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. McGrath: The minister heard the evidence given before the committee. He heard the concern expressed by the members of the committee. The minister knows full well that we are concerned because there has not been consultation in many of the complex regions pertaining to the administration of the act. There is provision in the bill making such consultation mandatory. The minister is under an obligation. I feel that inherent in the acceptance of that amendment is the minister's acceptance of the idea that there should be regional representation on the council. I am sure that was the wish of the committee. It was certainly my wish that the council should not be confined to civil servants in Ottawa and to perhaps a few of the minister's personal friends from Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I say that quite sincerely, Mr. Speaker. We want to make sure that somebody from the Atlantic provinces will serve on the council. We want to make sure that there will be on this council somebody who will look after the interests of northern Ontario and other regions.

Mr. Forrestall: The minister will not listen; he has left the chamber.

Mr. McGrath: As a consequence of our amendment being accepted, we feel the bill is now better than it was at the beginning. We ought to examine the record, to see what is the result, at first glance, of any analysis as to the way the program has operated thus far. Sometimes statistics are misleading, yet, on closer examination they usually tell the true story. Let us look at the over-all average of the number of jobs created in the period from, say, September 1 to the end of November, 1970. According to the national average, 42 jobs have been created per approved program.

That figure of 42 jobs per approved program does not stand up very well under analysis. If one examines the program closely, one will note that the Atlantic region, with the highest rate of unemployment in the country, had the lowest average number of jobs created per approved application. On the other hand, the province of Ontario, which has enjoyed a traditionally low rate of unemployment, has the highest average for the number of jobs created per approved application. A similar, high average applies to the province of Quebec. This in my view shows a serious weakness in the program. Even if one disregarded the amendment, one could entertain a doubt, to say the least, about whether this program was capable of performing the task that Parliament expected of it, that of creating new jobs.

Let us look at the statistics which apply to other parts of the country. As I said, on a national average 42 jobs have been created per approved application. Let us begin with Newfoundland, which has the highest rate of unemployment in the country and usually has had that unique distinction. For the period September until the end of November, 1970, the number of jobs created per approved application in Newfoundland was three: three jobs were created per approved application. The average figure becomes somewhat higher as one looks at the mainland of Canada. In Prince Edward Island the average number of jobs created per approved job application was 26; in Nova Scotia the average number was 20; in New Brunswick it was 19. Looking at Quebec, one sees that 60 jobs were created per application under this program. In Ontario it increases to 77. It declines as we go further west: in Manitoba it is 14; Saskatchewan, 53; Alberta, 42; British Columbia, 12. British Columbia has a very high rate of unemployment. It has the second highest rate of unemployment in the country.

The number of jobs created per application under this program is the lowest in areas of greatest need, and highest in areas of least need. That does not make sense. This program is not fulfilling its purpose. The purpose of the program was to create jobs in the regionally disadvantaged areas of the country where there is traditionally high unemployment. That is where the program is least effective. We were encouraged by the admission of the deputy minister that the Atlantic Advisory Council has undertaken a study to determine why the program has not been effective in the province of Newfoundland. The new facilities created, as the percentage of the total of applications indicates, show that the Atlantic provinces are well below the national average. Conversely, British Columbia, Quebec and Ontario are above the national average. This indicates that the program has not been effective in creating new jobs in disadvantaged regions. In its present form, the program has had limited effectiveness, especially in the Atlantic provinces.

The amendment before us will do little to correct this serious deficiency. It will provide an added incentive for the Atlantic provinces to offset the incentive provided to Montreal. The amount of the Montreal incentive will be added to that of the Atlantic provinces. The best evidence presented to the committee unequivocally indicated that this would not offset the designation of Montreal; representatives of APEC gave evidence to this effect. Professor Brewis, who was quoted earlier in this debate, gave clear and concise evidence to this effect. Professor Smith the chairman of the Atlantic Advisory Council, was less precise in his evidence before the committee. However, he indicated that before there can be an effective regional development program in this country there must be a strong national economy. If we do not have a strong national economy, the government must forget about regional development, which it is now doing; it must concentrate on uplifting the economy by providing employment in areas of high unemployment in the industrial heartland. This is precisely what the government has done. It now has no regional development policy.

The government has made the regional development program the instrument to combat the cyclical problem in the industrial heartland of Canada. By so doing it has diluted the bill to the point where it is practically useless to areas such as the Atlantic provinces, which is regrettable, Mr. Speaker, because the need is very great. It is anticipated that the rate of unemployment in the Atlantic region this year will exceed 15 per cent. It has already exceeded 10 per cent in Newfoundland, and God knows how high it will go before this winter is over. I point out the statistics to the minister because this is what concerns us about the legislation in its present form. We were not comforted by the evidence of Professor Brewis. This program is all we have and we must try to make the best of it.

We think the government has made a very serious error in judgment by using the regional incentives program as the main weapon to combat the seriously high rate of unemployment in Montreal. We must accept the decision of the government because of our concern about what has happened in Montreal. We have tried to point out the error of the course the government has chosen to follow. We have tried to improve the bill. We hope the bill will alleviate the very serious situation that exists in Montreal.

The minister did not satisfactorily answer the question put to him in committee. Why did he not take advantage of the government organization bill? He could have used the provisions of that bill to deal with the situation. I might add there is a very high rate of unemployment in Vancouver as well. Why not designate Vancouver? The minister could have introduced a "crash" housing program under the National Housing Act to combat unemployment in Montreal. This would have created housing in an area which has a disproportionately high level of substandard housing. It would have achieved two objectives, housing construction which is labour-intensive and it would have provided badly needed jobs and fulfilled a social need. However, the minister did not elect to do this.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the House consider sitting until six o'clock, if necessary, adjourning for one hour for dinner and continuing the debate at seven o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I assume that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is also suggesting that we suspend private members' hour.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, our party is agreeable to the proposition that the minister has just stated.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that an order be made in the terms stated?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: I fail to understand why the government did not use some of the existing programs at its disposal to combat the high unemployment in this country, especially in the cities of Montreal and Vancouver. I hope that when the minister speaks in this debate he will dispel our fears about the way this program has been used and the consequences of the government's action in designating the city of Montreal and part of eastern Ontario. This makes it virtually impossible for provinces such as Newfoundland to compete against Montreal in attracting new job-creating industries, which is the purpose of the program. This concerns us about the program. Members of the New Democratic Party referred to this matter in the debate on their amendment at the report stage of the bill.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Analysis of the program indicates that the highest grants produced the fewest jobs. This, surely, is an anomaly which requires explanation. There must be a reason why this should be so. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) referred to this matter and, indeed, the evidence presented to the committee showed that the highest grants did in fact produce the fewest jobs. I hope the minister will explain this situation and dispel our genuine fears on this point.

This is the only development program we have. Until the government brings in a new one we can only hope it will be effective in achieving its objectives. We certainly hope that the study undertaken by the advisory council in Newfoundland will produce a means whereby the program can be effective in that province, a province where this type of assistance is badly needed. Indeed, we hope the program will be effective throughout the Atlantic provinces and that the additional grants will make it possible for us to compete, notwithstanding the designation of Montreal.

We hope this program will work. We have tried to offer constructive criticism and the speeches which will be made by my hon. friends later in this debate will repeat some of our constructive criticism. I want it clearly understood that constructive criticism should not be misconstrued as opposition to the principle of the bill. We support what the minister is trying to do, but we question the way he is doing it. We sincerely hope that the program will be effective, that it will create jobs; but we hope a reasonable explanation can be given of the anomalous situation whereby the highest grants have produced the fewest jobs, and of the disproportion in the number of jobs created in areas of highest unemployment as compared with those in areas of lower unemployment. Having said this, I reiterate the view of the party to which I belong: We support the intent of the legislation but we question the way the government is going about it.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate because in my view and in the view of my hon. friends the bill we are discussing is wrong in its policy. It is, as one of the witnesses before the committee said, an administrative monstrosity and it is a negation of the whole idea of regional development properly understood and properly followed.

There is not a thinking person in Canada who does not realize that regional disparity is a problem with top priority in this country. There is not a person in Canada who is not anxious to get rid of the regional disparities. In income, standard of living, employment opportunities, welfare and every other area of our society, the disadvantaged portions of Canada have suffered for decades. We understood that the present government in particular had undertaken to deal with regional disparity in an effective and planned way. The sad and dangerous thing is that this is not the way in which it has been treated. In fact, from the relatively little information the minister has given Parliament, the program appears to be entirely in a shambles.

Every member of this House and every thinking Canadian is concerned about problems in the province of Quebec which were at least in part responsible for the crisis through which we have been passing in the last couple of months. As I said in another debate, I am one Canadian, one Member of Parliament, who is prepared to support any reasonable and effective contribution to raising the economy of Quebec so that unemployment there may be reduced, this winter if possible or in a year or two at least, and so that the basic unhappiness, resentment and frustration may be partly cured in that province. But I say to the minister that this bill and the regional development plan are entirely the wrong vehicle for dealing with the situation in Quebec. One cannot deal with a problem which, one hopes, is temporary, by means of a program which is supposed to have a long-range commitment and objective.

The reasons for the situation in Quebec and in Montreal in particular are quite different from those underlying the situation in the Atlantic provinces or in certain areas of Manitoba. For example, there is no question of transportation costs in Quebec or Montreal, no question that an infrastructure is lacking as there is in the Atlantic provinces. There is no problem about distance from markets, as there is in the Atlantic provinces.

None of the problems which underlie the lack of economic development in the disadvatanged areas is present in Montreal or Quebec. What is present in Montreal or Quebec is a consequence of an ill-advised and cruel policy by this government in its so-called fight against inflation. An associated problem in Quebec, as I am sure the minister will want to tell me, is that in recent years certain elements in that province, certain policies, certain groups, have by their nature and behaviour held back the normal amount of private capitalist investment going to Quebec. So there are entirely different grounds for the difficulties they have to face.

These proposals cannot deal with the lack of investment in Quebec as a result of a particular situation there. They cannot deal with the result of the government's dismal monetary, fiscal and investment policies as part of a regional development program intended to improve the disadvantaged areas of the country on a long-term basis. The minister cannot do it, and when he attempts to do it, as he does in this bill, he creates an administrative monstrosity and negates the very objectives which he himself set out when he introduced the original act to which this bill proposes amendments.

I understand that one witness before the committee gave evidence that the program now covers five different kinds of designated areas. There are the designated regions under the original scheme; there are the special areas created within these designated areas. Then we have the prescribed areas where certain other conditions apply. Then we get Montreal, Hull and the three eastern counties of Ontario as areas to which it is intended to apply the particular incentives of the bill before us. In addition there is the new situation in the Atlantic area where they will receive the incentives based on the old program of 25 per cent and $5,000 per job, plus the new program of the additional 10 per cent and an additional $2,000 per job. Mr. Speaker, if this is a sensible, logical program, I am the Emperor of Japan. The minister who is, I am sure, as anxious to deal with these matters as I am, ought to have known better than permit his deputy, who scuttled the anti-poverty program a few years ago, to lead him into the administrative jungle in which he now finds himself.

There are ways to deal with the special situation of Montreal and Quebec. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has suggested setting up a capital development fund of $150 million, the largest part of which is to go to the province of Quebec. We said at the time that $150 million in terms of the needs of the Canadian economy is both senseless and picayune; that what is required is $750 million or $1 billion if we are to give any real incentive to the improvement of the general economy, and particularly that of the province of Quebec. This would be the proper vehicle for dealing with the situation in Montreal and Quebec, in Cornwall and the three counties of eastern Ontario with which the bill is intended to deal. These areas do not have the problems of the Atlantic area; they must be dealt with in terms of an immediate, planned, large investment program that is not part of the regional development program because these areas are not part of it. You cannot artificially introduce something that does not belong to the regional development program.

In the Atlantic provinces there is the problem of infrastructure. There are problems of transportation and of private corporations that do not see a profit in the Atlantic economy. The policies that the minister and his department have followed show no element of planning, of direction, and constitute ad hoc planning of the worst possible kind. The minister jumps from one thing to another without reference to area. One of the witnesses from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, I think Mr. Flemming whose evidence I quickly read today, told the committee that what they have had in the Atlantic provinces is merely an increase in existing industry. He said that almost nothing new had been introduced. I will take his word for that since my observations during my visits there have shown me the same thing. From what I know about the grants that have been made to small businesses, there has not been any planning for industrial or economic development, as Mr. Flemming on behalf of APEC told the committee. It is simply a case of giving money to any business that looks O.K.

We also have a terrific time lag here. This should be kept in mind when we talk of Montreal, Quebec and Cornwall. According to the information the members of the House had toward the end of October, there were an estimated 18,362 jobs that it was intended to create with a commitment of $102,579,442. However, as of this week only $3.4 million had actually been paid out. I do not blame the department for this, though I suspect that part of the reason for it has been a great deal of bureaucratic movement in reverse, a sort of two steps backwards, one step forward process which frequently happens in this sort of case. But even if that is not the case, what this situation does underline is the immense time lag between the commitment of some expenditure on businesses that have come into the plan and the actual paying out of the money.

According to Mr. Flemming—I did not read in the evidence a denial on behalf of the minister or his deputy—it takes 16 weeks from the time of the making of an application to receiving an offer from the department. Then there is a further time lapse in order to build a plant if a new plant is required, to get machinery if new machinery is required, to import equipment if new equipment is required or to set up a new work force if a new work force is required. These things cannot be done overnight; they take months, sometimes years. As I have said, to attempt to deal with the situation in Montreal and Cornwall by the regional development route is to heap illogic upon illogic.

Having tried to study and understand the whole policy, my major objection to it is that there is no plan regarding regional development. I have seen no evidence that the department and its advisers have sat down and asked themselves what the Atlantic region needs over the next 15 years to raise its economy to a level that approximates the national average. I am not talking about merely expanding some little industry already in the Atlantic provinces; we may be required to introduce completely new industry and new concepts into the area. This is the way the problem is tackled in other countries and it is done in this way because there is not the same stupid, reactionary, doctrinaire commitment to deal only with private enterprise and private corporations.

It is true that there is no country in the world, at least no country I know of, that does not have a problem in regard to regional disparity. To take the Communist countries first, Russia has such a problem, as do China, Poland and Yugoslavia. The same is true in Italy and France, and to a lesser extent in West Germany and Britain. Even in the Scandinavian countries, where populations are small, there are disadvantaged areas vis-à-vis the national average in those countries. In other words, this is a world problem, not one that Canada alone faces.

I admit that this problem is not soluble overnight, in a year or even in five years. But we have to make a start on solving the problem. The way in which other countries have started to solve it is not by waving carrots in front of the noses of private enterprisers and echoing the stupidities which private enterprisers have echoed for decades. We must solve this problem by doing what has been done in Italy, France, West Germany, Britain and other democratic countries, namely, by having a plan for the location of industry, a plan that is related to the indigenous resources and skills of the area, a plan that takes account of the total economy and the regional economy and relates the one to the other. Such a plan has a life for a period of years, instead of jumping from one alleged crisis to another.

It is this utter lack of planning in the minister's department that has, in my opinion, made his department a shambles. This is why this legislation is bound to fail, though I know the minister will not agree and neither, perhaps, will the official opposition agree. On any proposal for planning and public investment, my party remains alone. I am not unhappy about that. I would rather stand alone with the conviction that I am right than merely follow the herd, and I do not apologize for that. As I say, the action the government is now taking is bound to fail.

Ever since 1963 we have been promised a Canada Development Corporation. Unless I am mistaken, every Throne Speech since a Liberal government has been in power, whether under right hon. Mr. Pearson or under its present leader, has promised a Canada Development Corporation. We still do not have it. The way to deal with the Montreal and Cornwall situations, and the way to deal with many aspects of the disadvantages the Atlantic region suffers, is to have a Canada Development Corporation simultaneously with a regional development plan, so you would have a pool of investment under the control of the government which could be used to raise the economies of all parts of Canada in a planned and sensible way. That is what we should have.

Because we do not have a Canada Development Corporation and because the minister does not have a pool of investment to which he can turn, except the funds the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) make available from time to time, he does this kind of senseless thing. I say to him that this bill is senseless. Hon. Members who spoke earlier today were right when they said this bill completely negates the regional development plan. The people of the Atlantic provinces are right to fear that as the result of this proposal they will get even less than they have received until now. The people of Quebec are right in feeling that their problems are being dealt with in a useless, flippant and almost silly way, and that they cannot look forward to a real solution to the problems they have faced and which Canada has had to face.

Of course I know that this bill will pass because the government has decided on it. However, I say, first, that it is a bad bill in itself and, second, that it destroys the concept of regional expansion. Third, it is another example of complete lack of economic and social planning. Finally, it will be of no use whatsoever in solving the unemployment situation in Montreal this winter, and probably of little use even a year or two years from now.

When we look at what the minister has accomplished a year or two from now, we will find that this minister, who has a big heart and a desire to do this job well, will be a failure because of the way he is proceeding and because the work is unplanned. He will be a failure because of the mixed-up monstrosity he has created with this bill.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that we are debating such a vitally important subject under the pressure of a Christmas recess deadline. There is nothing more important in the country at this time than the necessity of dealing with a problem which has been with Canada since confederation—the problem of regional economic disparity. This was one of the major topics discussed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the 1968 election campaign. It is one of the recurring issues which crop up at federal-provincial conferences on constitutional matters and also in respect of other areas of government. Because the government is taking this precipitous action to deal with a fundamental problem on a crisis basis, we find ourselves involved in a debate that can only aggravate the tensions which exist in Canada as a result of regional economic disparity.

Other members who have spoken during the debate have pointed out the government's failure to deal with this problem on a long-term basis. This has been the peculiar approach of the present government to economic matters. Just two or three weeks ago we had a budget brought down on the basis of a crisis precipitated by the troubles the province of Quebec has experienced in the past few weeks. That budget has since been described by various authorities on taxation matters as a non-budget.

To indicate that I am not prejudiced about this matter, I should like to quote a new Liberal voice from western Canada. I refer to the new Liberal provincial leader in Manitoba, Mr. Asper, who became well known for his understanding of tax problems as a result of his widely read book "The Benson Iceberg". His response to the non-budget was in the following terms, and I quote from the Brandon Sun of December 4, 1970:

"It's a budget designed to bolster the eastern economy while it should have created job opportunities on the Prairies so eastern unemployment could have drifted here", Mr. Asper said in an interview.

I should like to speak during the few minutes at my disposal this afternoon about the western approach to government initiative in the area of regional economic development and the whole program of diversification and dispersal of industry in order to bring about a more rational distribution of population, financial resources and political power. These problems have been discussed in Parliament since the end of World War II with increasing intensity. As a result, the government has moved gradually and cautiously into this area of responsibility.

I remember that one of the first private members' resolutions sponsored related to the necessity of government action to ensure diversification and dispersal of industry throughout the nation. There was considerable progress made in the latter part of the 1950s and the early part of the 1960s when special plans and programs were designed to deal with problems facing the Maritimes. We have heard several spokesmen from the Maritimes who have presented their case in typically eloquent terms. The program for northern development also came to the fore. There were also the special programs to deal with the peculiar problems of western Canada and the designated area program designed to deal with pockets of unemployment in urban centres. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was designed to offset the rural-urban drift which was reaching chronic proportions.

Unfortunately, during the latter part of the 1960s the government's policies both in respect of urban growth and the agricultural industry have tended to aggravate rather than solve this problem of population drift from rural communities to urban centres. This has resulted in a crisis atmosphere which is becoming all too obvious in our huge metropolis areas. Unfortunately, also, the legislation before us today is designed to deal with one of these crisis areas on an ad hoc basis. As has already been stated by spokesmen on this side of the House this approach will destroy the fundamental purpose of the DREE program.

If the process of continuing planning which has been gradually established over the past 15 years is interrupted by the use of legislation to deal with an immediate crisis situation, the program unfortunately will become so badly distorted that it will, as I have already indicated, aggravate regional disparity and create a growing tension and dissension in the whole area of national unity, rather than relieve the problem. I have already quoted one western Liberal authority in this regard. Perhaps the most apt description of what is taking place in respect of the government's initiative is that the program of regional disparity is being changed to one of political disparity which in the old days was known as pork-barrel politics.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Again, as an indication that this is not the prejudiced pronouncement of a member of the opposition, I should like to go back to the Liberal authority to whom I have already referred. I quote from the Brandon Sun of November 26 this year as follows:

The leader of the provincial Liberal Party told the Brandon Liberal Women's Association that Manitoba, in fact the entire Prairie region, is a victim of an "anarchistic and outdated" governmental structure—

Further on the article reads:

In a hard-hitting 70-minute address, Mr. Asper said he intends to travel throughout Canada "to tell how confederation has denied us equality of economic opportunity and reduced us to the status of second-class citizens."

Then he deals directly with the problem which we are discussing this afternoon.

About 33 per cent of Manitoba's one million people live below the poverty line.

"This 33 per cent figure speaks a great deal," Mr. Asper said. "It is higher than the 27 per cent figure for Quebec and everyone bleeds for Quebec. I also bleed for Quebec but I bleed more for Manitoba."

I agree wholeheartedly with the sentiment expressed by the leader of the Manitoba Liberal party. Coming closer to home, we have another Liberal spokesman from the west, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson), who comes back to the theme repeatedly. He has expressed continuing concern and I hope similar sentiments will be expressed during the course of this debate. A year before Mr. Asper expressed this concern, the minister is quoted in the Winnipeg Tribune of November 17, 1969, as follows:

In a strong speech to delegates attending the annual meeting of the Manitoba Liberal Party Sunday, Mr. Richardson warned that growth of eastern Canada at the expense of the western region must be brought to an end.

Further on we find these words:

He made it abundantly clear western Canada will not stand by idly while government controls are centralized further in Ottawa and economic powers are allowed to concentrate in Toronto and Montreal.

This is the old formula of dividing and conquering, because strong words like that from spokesmen of the Liberal Party in Western Canada of course receive the plaudits of the public. Words of that kind also have a very divisive effect upon the Canadian body politic. Parliament is the place those sentiments should be expressed. I trust that some western Liberal spokesmen who sit in this House of Commons and represent western constituencies will seize the opportunity provided by this debate to express those sentiments when they will have the most effect, while the minister is in the House listening to the voice of western Canada as expressed by Members of Parliament. Unfortunately, the minister cannot hear such expressions out on the hustings where their whole intent is to divide and conquer.

Worse than the failure to plan on a continuous basis to deal with the fundamental problem of regional disparity, we find that some of the recent program initiatives of the government have been working at cross-purposes. I should like to refer to one or two obvious examples of this. The problem of transportation in western Canada is always with us. We have the continuous downgrading of railway transportation in the west. What is more to the point, in this day and age when air transporation is becoming increasingly important we find the government is allowing its regional air policies to be downgraded by gradual erosion through decisions made by the Canadian Transport Commission.

Back in the middle fifties in the province of Manitoba we had adequate class A air service from Winnipeg right through to Calgary. Air Canada provided that service initially. Then Air Canada relinquished the responsibility to a regional air carrier, TransAir, along with a subsidy. In the past two years that subsidy has been removed. In a day when air transportation is of the utmost importance if we are to have any hope of encouraging industrial development, we find that the regional service at the western lateral between Winnipeg, Brandon, Yorkton, Regina and Calgary has been completely discontinued.

Last year, for example, the city of Brandon lost its class A service through to Winnipeg and Regina. This was done quite surreptitiously. In the last few weeks TransAir has even discontinued its daily service between Winnipeg and Regina. We are moving back to the horse-and-buggy days, instead of moving forward in the space age or air age when if we are to have any hope of benefiting from the government's regional development program we must ensure to prospective industry that there is adequate, first-class air service.

This is happening in face of the expenditure of millions of dollars for new airfields both in the Toronto and the Montreal regions. I can understand why Liberal spokesmen in the west are criticizing so vehemently the Liberal administration in Ottawa for their neglect in this respect. I only wish they would use the forum provided by Parliament, instead of shouting from the rooftops, on the hustings and then remaining deathly still and quiet here in the high court of public opinion.

I could also mention, of course, the confusion that was caused by the downgrading of the postal service within the past year when several communities disappeared completely in various parts of western Canada because of the arbitrary closure of rural post offices. Fortunately, we have a man in charge of that department now who understands the essence of regional development and the basis of rural problems and he has reversed that decision; but untold damage was done because of the government's failure to appreciate the real issues of regional development in western Canada.

As a result of this policy, or lack of policy, and of the planning, or lack of planning, on the part of the government we have this continued concentration in huge urban metropolises which creates problems of pollution beyond man's capacity to cope with, where the rate of crime soars, where urban guerrilla activities become a matter of serious concern and where, as is happening in some of the large centres in the United States, the problems of urban organization become almost unmanageable. This government's answer is to add insult to injury and to indroduce ad hoc programs that will only aggravate rather than resolve and assist in remedying some of these problems.

In conclusion I would like to give a specific example of the government's failure to give equal emphasis to economic problems and crises in various parts of Canada. I refer to its failure to deal with the phasing-out of military bases in western Canada in a manner designed to have the least possible economic impact on the communities concerned. In the province of Manitoba we have lost two military bases within the past several months. Two thousand seven hundred jobs were represented by those two air bases. This is more than twice the number of job opportunities created under the program of the department in the last year.

So we are going backward rather than forward. It does not have to be so, because there has been ample warning that in the government's reassessment of the military requirements for Canada there has been four or five years' warning. The base at Portage has been kept open even though there is a housing shortage that will require the expenditure of substantial sums of money in order to supply adequate housing for the increased personnel there. During the recent crisis in Quebec when military personnel had to be flown from Shilo to Montreal on an emergency basis, the Rivers airport, which is one of the best airports in Canada, had to be reopened temporarily because the Portage base was not adequate to meet this requirement. Millions of dollars have been spent at the Rivers air base in the last few years to repair the runways because it was felt that it would be one of the basic air force training units in Canada for a long time to come.

However, suddenly it is phased out of existence, and since the announcement was made in September there has been no concrete indication by the government that there are alternative programs to use the excellent facilities at this base. Representations have been made by the local communities involved who have come to Ottawa at their own expense on several occasions. Representatives of the provincial government of Manitoba have made pilgrimages to Ottawa. We have the promise that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) himself will be coming to Manitoba early in the new year when he will announce plans and policies to deal with the economic crisis that has been created by this situation.

I hope that in the interests of an adequate, fair and non-discriminatory approach to problems of regional disparity the minister will be as generous to western Canada as he is to the areas that are being specially designated under the legislation before us. If Ottawa does not operate on a fair basis, the protests that I have read briefly this afternoon by the Liberal minister from Manitoba, the speeches that he makes regularly on the hustings rather than in the House of Commons, will rise to an unhappy chorus that can only have a serious impact on national unity in Canada. Then there are the statements of the new Liberal leader, Mr. Asper, which I quoted earlier. People will begin to take him seriously if he goes on this crusade, as he says he will, across Canada, and again we will have increasing problems of national unity which are created by economic difficulties rather than cultural or symbolic matters.

As previous speakers have said, there is nothing much we the opposition can do about this legislation. The government is prepared to push it through regardless of any protests. It has been brought in during the dying hours of this part of the session of Parliament. The government has its disciplined majority. In the interests of a united Canada from sea to sea, I urge the government and the minister, as he contemplates the problems in western Canada, to act with the generosity and expedition that he is employing in the matter under discussion today.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the legislation before us for third reading, I assure the House that it is my intention to speak very briefly and to deal with only one or two points in connection with the over-all incentives program. Just over a year ago we passed the Regional Development Incentives Act. This act was to provide incentives for the development of productive employment opportunities in designated regions which require special measures to facilitate economic expansion and social adjustment. Bill C-205 which we are discussing seeks to amend that legislation. There are several areas where I feel other changes should be made and I welcome this opportunity to once again draw them to the attention of the minister and the House.

The specific objectives of the Regional Development Incentives Act were to foster industrial development in slow-growth areas. A number of these designated areas have been set up throughout Canada. My constituency of Kootenay West is located in one of them. To date, however, relatively few new jobs have been created as a result of this designation. There is an indication, however, that the several industrial committees which have been set up to promote and encourage the establishment of industries within their respective districts will obtain results. There is no doubt that it takes a long time to contact interested industrial groups and have them visit the area to assess the possibilities. While the process may be slow, once industry is established it helps to provide increased job opportunities which are so essential to the growth of an area.

The whole Kootenay West region has tremendous potential in the area of tourism. However, we find that incentives to develop the tourist industry were not included in the original legislation and are not proposed in this bill. I should like to make the point that once an area has been designated, adequate surveys for economic development should be made to ascertain how it can best be assisted. In the case of Kootenay West we find that the tourist industry is high on the list. Proper planning should indicate that tourism be encouraged through incentive grants.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

I point out to the minister that if an area is logically suited to a specific type of development, this development should receive further encouragement. It would be a tragedy to encourage the development of certain types of industry in a prime tourist area. Such development could only ruin the potential for tourism. That is why I would urge the minister to apply financial incentives to the development of the tourist industry. If this is done, there will be a tremendous increase in industrial activity in the area as a whole and in some parts of my constituency. Such encouragement would also prevent choice areas being affected by unwise economic development of a type which might seriously injure the potential of the tourist industry. I think the minister should again look at this side of the picture of industrial development.

It seems to me that jobs are jobs. I can understand the need for secondary industry and I endorse the establishment of it in many of the slow-growth areas. But if you have a designated area, a large portion of which can best use incentive grants to develop tourism, that is what the government should be encouraging. I believe this is spending wisely, Mr. Speaker. We desperately need jobs in my part of British Columbia and I think we would have a real boom there if incentive grants were directed toward the development of tourism. That is why I am requesting the government to add it to the over-all picture and make the program apply from the east to the west of Canada.

In speaking about the tourist industry I would point out to the government that this is something we can sell time and time again. It is not depleted as is mining or logging. Once developed, it is there for all time and can be sold to people who like to visit these areas. As long as we do not destroy our environment through foolish development, it will endure. If we want to stop unwise economic development in some areas we must clearly indicate now that tourism is the key industry to be covered. Then we can start long-range planning for any area suited to it.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not spend any more time on this bill because I know other speakers want to deal with points which have not been raised. In closing I would say I am alarmed at the hodgepodge that has taken place in our regional development planning. It is just patch upon patch. The government does not seem to have a clear idea of its direction. As several speakers have already pointed out, there are five different types of designated area in Canada. This cannot lead to adequate or proper planning. I agree it would have been better for the nation to have had a Canada development plan under an act, with adequate funds for development purposes. Then perhaps we could have proceeded along these lines in an orderly manner. I urge the minister to seriously consider the tremendous impact which the inclusion of tourism incentives in the Regional Development Incentives Act would have on all parts of Canada. I suggest that before the summer recess in June, the minister should bring in an amendment to make this part of the over-all plan.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, some nights ago I expressed my views on this measure. I wish that in the intervening period, brief as it has been, something had been said which would have caused me to look with more favour upon the legislation than I did at an earlier stage when we were seized with it. Having given the most careful attention to what went on in various areas of consideration in committee and in the House, I find that nothing has happened which fundamentally changes my point of view. I concur heartily with my colleagues who have expressed regret that a piece of legislation so fundamental in import and so broad in scope should be tagged on at the end of a session with such a brief period for deliberation and debate. I think this is regrettable.

Much has been said of the disturbing hodgepodge in the realms of bureaucracy and the lack of clarity of administrative goals. People have quoted the criticisms by spokesmen for the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. I believe that the term "administrative monstrosity" used by a spokesman of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has been used by a good many members. After careful reflection and after scrutinizing the measure, I believe that "administrative monstrosity" is not a hyperbolic expression.

This legislation indicates, of course, that the nation's economy is depressed. What is depressing is that we are coming to a stage at which, it must be admitted, programs designed to ameliorate or diminish the effects of regional disparity, or possibly eradicate them, have not been successful and in large part are being abandoned. Without question, the program has been diluted by the extension of the areas. Even without this dilution and diminution affecting the concentration of the regions concerned, we should have required a good deal of luck and a great, fortuitous knitting together of circumstances and events for the program to have proven efficacious. There has been clear and painful testimony about this in recent days from members of the House and from people in the regions most concerned, especially from the Atlantic region which probably, because of its history, knows more about the ills and iniquities of disparity than any other region.

We have already been told that Harry Flemming, executive director of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, testified the other day that the expansion program was in a state of chaos. He declared that the amended legislation would not work. He pointed out some of the sobering and chilling aspects of the whole program. Some have been mentioned by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and other hon. members. I will not repeat them. Mr. Flemming said:

> If the administration of the present program is in such a state of chaos, how is DREE going to administer a broader program including Montreal and southeastern Ontario?

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: Certainly.

Mr. Coates: I wonder if the hon. gentleman is aware that the gentleman he has just mentioned, who is the executive director of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council at the present time, was the Liberal candidate who opposed me in the last general election? What he said indicates that, from that point of view, both Liberals and Conservatives share the same attitudes in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Dinsdale: The same could be said about Manitoba, too.

Mr. Macquarrie: I am aware of what the hon. member has just said. I appreciate my colleague's reminding me that Mr. Flemming ran against him in the last election. Had he not been opposed by such a tough opponent as the present hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), he might have been in the House to say what he said so well before the committee the other day. I think there is very little disagreement in Atlantic Canada on the impact and import of this legislation. I think it is right that my colleague should have pointed this out by way of a carefully asked parliamentary question.

An hon. Member: They must have planned that one for hours.

Mr. Macquarrie: As an indication of what has happened to the program, let me say that now the name no longer means anything. If the whole country is involved, you can hardly call the program a regional matter. If we are told that conditions all across the country are bad, how can we talk about disparities? In my search for meanings, I consulted the two best dictionaries I possess. I wondered if the expression "DREE" had some meaning which would illustrate our difficulties. According to the Oxford Dictionary, page 658, dree means, among other things:

> To endure, undergo, suffer, bear (something burdensome, grievous, or painful).

I quote another definition. This one will readily be accepted by Maritimers:

> —to endure one's fate, suffer or submit to one's destiny.

It is this long range submission to our destiny that has disturbed the Atlantic provinces for lo these many years, for something like over a century.

Much has been said about what has been done for one region and what has been done for another. You know, Mr. Speaker, I have been thinking of a simple expression. Perhaps we are trying to rob Peter to pay Paul. We never succeed in paying Paul. I am, therefore, very doubtful about any benefits that would accrue to the new areas under this legislation. Perhaps we might adopt a more sanguine outlook if we could entertain the conviction that the new areas would benefit in terms of economic uplift and the provision of jobs, and if they were to be aided and assisted by the program. This conviction, I fear, I do not hold. As my friend, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) pointed out, many of this country's difficulties are becoming worse and troubling the regions of the west, the regions of Atlantic Canada, and so on. He was quite right in pointing out some of these.

I have always maintained that it was totally unrealistic for the government to give to only one department the obligation of fighting the disadvantages which have fallen upon certain regions as a result of national policies. In the past, one department has had the responsibility for such programs, whereas all departments of government should be totally and eternally aware of our difficulties. In their administration and performance, they ought to take stock of all such situations. In the Atlantic region and in other parts of the country, governments have gone through the process of laying off people and cutting down their operations as a result of the nationally imposed austerity freeze. The people have walked out of their jobs and hoped they might find jobs in another department of government, a department such as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Yet very few jobs have been found, except for those who are themselves planners and bureaucrats.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris has talked about postal matters. There has been a diminution in the economies of many communities and I agree with what he said about the changed approaches in those communities. One of the chronic difficulties of those areas at the extremities of the country has been in the field of transportation.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is quite right.

Mr. Macquarrie: Not a month, not a week goes by without someone crying out from a rural area, from the Atlantic area or from a western area, about some further cutbacks in transportation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has talked about selling Atlantic area goods to the northeastern United States. That is fine. We were doing that very well before confederation. We were prospering and so were they. Now, we want assistance to bring our goods to those potential markets; and concentration on improving our transportation facilities would be very much in order. Yet, instead of that, we find that the situation day after day becomes worse.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Our latest difficulty arises from the freight rate increase, and reference was made to that during the question period. There has been no other opportunity for members from Atlantic Canada to refer to it. I wish to quote from an article by Lyndon Watkins in today's Globe and Mail:

> Maritime potato producers are digging in for a determined battle with the railways over freight rate increases and sharply increased auxiliary charges which they say will add 70 per cent to transportation costs on export shipments through St. John and Halifax.

What is being done about this by the involved planning of the minister's department? An injustice is being inflicted upon the potato producers of two provinces of Atlantic Canada, the chief contributors toward agricultural income. It will be a serious blow to many people, not only those actively involved in agriculture, but those other citizens depending upon the success of those people. There should be a frontal attack by all departments of government on those aspects of national policy which make one region or another uniquely at a disadvantage because of these national policies. With all the powers that the minister has, even if he were as good as some people might think, he and his department could not cope with these problems. The whole government must be seized of them.

I do not enjoy being looked upon as a special pleader. We in the Maritimes grow a little weary about having to bring forward eternally for national consideration the problems with which we have to cope. However, for over a century we have had disadvantages against which we have had to struggle. Many of these have come as a result of uniting with the rest of the country. I think it can be said, without special pleading and without chauvinism, that we have never had our fair share of the fruits of federation. A very clear example can be seen by looking at the map of Canada in 1867. There was a union of four provinces at that time. They were not large provinces. A generation or so later two of the provinces had grown into vast structures. They extended northward and in one case westward. They became geographical giants and giants in other ways.

Other provinces were added. They were at first small and they grew. The province of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) was once the postage stamp province. The territories around these provinces were developed by united and confederated Canada. As the years went by, not one acre was added to the area of the two oldest provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. This also applies to Prince Edward Island. As new frontiers were opened, the three provinces by the sea were shut out of that particular kind of expansion. Therefore, we do not hesitate to say that we have rights.

We have reason to suggest to the federal government that the inequities which national policies have inflicted upon our region should be corrected by the only agency capable of doing this, the federal government. What we have before us is at best a palliative, at worst a weakening of the existing structure. Perhaps it is a well intentioned effort to improve the situation in the province of Quebec which, in economic terms, has apparently become far worse than many hon. members from that area expected. If they did expect it, they did not show the wisdom of their expectations. No one would hesitate to suggest that what injures Quebec also injures and affects all of us. I do not think the minister did his province, Parliament or himself a service by trying to create a division between Quebec and other parts of the country.

His suggestion that some of us, as we examined this legislation and spoke thereon, were anti-Quebec was most unworthy. It was a crude, ill-mannered interjection. There were times when the minister displayed some of the attributes of the once great minister in this House, Mr. C. D. Howe. While he may at times have his black disposition, I fear that he does not have his grey matter. It would not be well for him to emulate that man, because I do not think he can do it. Even with all the powers of the minister, I still have reservations about the efficacy of this bill. I hope it will be more helpful than I think it will be. I wish the government had shown more perception and imagination when faced with great problems in Montreal and done something better than tinkering with the regional expansion legislation which, in an untinkered state, had not been very successful.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I participate in this debate with mixed feelings. I realize that this part of the session is limping to a close. There is a sort of curfew on how long members can participate in the debate on Bill C-205. This is one of the more important pieces of legislation to be dealt with by this Parliament. I do not say that because I represent an Atlantic area constituency, but because I am a federal legislator in the House of Commons. I recognize the fact that there is a curtailment of time and that members opposite, especially in the ministry, deserve a break. I think all members deserve a break, not because of what we have produced in this House, but because of the stress and strain that members of the cabinet had to sustain and suffer this fall. Hopefully, with this Christmas recess, we will be able to regenerate and return to do constructive work and perhaps avoid the type of bill that we are debating today.

One of my misgivings about this bill is its title, "An Act to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act". Some of what I say will obviously be repetitive. Some members opposite may think it is all repetitive. However, I wish to add a couple of thoughts to the pot, not in the hope that there will be a great conversion of the minister on the road to Damascus or that there will be any change in the substance of the bill, but when the next session of this Parliament commences and the problems still exist throughout Canada on a regional basis perhaps we will appreciate the folly of our ways in approving Bill C-205.

I protest Bill C-205, not because of a parochial or provincial interest, but because the very title of the bill is a misnomer. While this is a bill to amend the The Regional Development Incentives Act, as a result of the regulations the minister is going to pronounce following the passage of this bill, it will no longer be a regional act. It will, in fact, be a national development incentives act. Every member of the House should be aware of what is taking place, what is going on. I must say I listened with a great deal of respect to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who led the Conservative group in the deliberations before the committee and who contributed in a most constructive way this afternoon. My hon. friend from Hillsborough talked more in a historical perspective.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I shall not belabour the obvious problems of the Atlantic area or the problems of the Gaspé area or the problems of certain parts of the Prairies. Before these amendments came before Your Honour, these were the regions of economic disparity which could look to a federal government for unique assistance in a most enlightened way. I shall not belabour the past in that way but I have been somewhat surprised by the vacuum of silence on the part of members from other parts of Canada who have made no contribution either plus or minus on Bill C-205. If I were a government member from Ontario, and there are a good many of them, I would be more concerned about the implications of this bill than I am as a member from the Atlantic area.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that except for some members on the opposite side who were on the committee dealing with regional economic expansion, not too many appreciate what is being done by this bill. Industry in, say, Ontario, will now be competing with industry across the boundary in Quebec. On one side of the boundary there will be a 25 per cent incentive, which was the amount under the old act, because of regional disparity, but as a result of this amendment there will be either a 25 per cent or a 10 per cent incentive depending on whether the industry is in Montreal or St. Jean or nearer the Ontario border. The effect of this three-tier incentive program which the minister has proposed to stimulate activity in some areas which have experienced unfortunate difficulties in the last few months and in the last few years, combined with the 25 per cent grant which presently exists under the old bill and the 10 per cent which the Atlantic area is to get making a 35 per cent set-up, will be to create potentially serious problems for any organized industrial expansion in any part of the country.

The only explanation which comes to my mind for the lack of contributions from members from all parts of the country, not just from an area of economic disparity be it the Atlantic area or not, is the restriction on time. For the purpose of the record, because this has been referred to in a general way, I want to outline the unconscionable haste with which this bill has moved from first reading on December 4, which as Your Honour knows is just a formality, see to the second reading debate on December 10. Then, for the first time, between 3.40 p.m. and 5 o'clock, it was debated for an hour and twenty minutes and between 8 p.m. and 10 p.m. for two hours. On Friday, December 11, this bill was debated for another hour and twenty minutes in the morning and another two hours in the afternoon. On Monday, December 14, it was finally referred to a committee after being debated for a grand total of one hour. In total, up to today, seven hours and forty minutes have been spent on a bill which I suggest to all members of this House affects all regions of this country.

While the catalyst, with the utmost sincerity of the minister and his advisers, was special problems and unique situations in Quebec and Montreal, the full ramifications of this bill affect this nation from coast to coast. I suggest what I have outlined is a sad commentary on the House of Commons. Many people outside this august chamber wonder how relevant we are, and how realistic our debates are, when a bill which is fundamental to the industrial and economic fabric of this land has been considered for only seven hours and forty minutes in this House. Of course, we all know it was discussed in committee, and it did receive three or four days of rather strenuous sessions of committee debate. But committee debate does not as yet, with the facilities that we have to propagate propaganda or policies, call it what you will, generate public interest. It might be just coincidence.

The minister states there is necessity for almost a brevity of debate because these proposals are supposed to be implemented on January 1. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, if the situation is as fundamental and serious as the minister told us in committee, then it is certainly a sad reflection on the planning of his department that this bill comes to this House in the dying days of this part of the session after receiving a grand total of seven hours and forty minutes of House debate. How does the country even appreciate it, as other members have said? How can people begin to study the implications? Certainly, until we got into committee I suggest that at least half the members of the Regional Economic Expansion committee did not really fully appreciate what was going on.

I want to deal, Mr. Speaker, with this bill in a relatively short period of time, but I shall not apoligize for taking my full time for the reasons I have just stated. I shall express my views on the basis of the principle of the bill as I see it, and the problems of the bill and I shall be covering many of the areas that have been very well documented by other members so I shall be brief. And I shall make a prophecy about this bill which, I suggest, whether it is right or wrong, should be at least stated so that we do not live in the unreal world in which we so often find ourselves in the House of Commons because we are afraid to say what we all talk about behind the curtains. We are not supposed to say these things on the floor of the House because they might offend sensibilities or be misinterpreted. As far as I am concerned, I am getting so fed up about the danger of being misinterpreted that I think arteriosclerosis is inhibiting the positive, frank point of view often expressed by all members of the House. And I am as much at fault in that respect as anybody.

But coming to the principle of the bill, there is no doubt, and I want to make this most clear, we all support the objective and hope it is achieved. The minister, perhaps in the emotion and excitement of second reading when he was a little impatient, made some most unfortunate suggestions about my hon. friend from Hillsborough who has contributed, as far as I am concerned, in a most positive way to a true one Canada regardless of how we all define it. This was most unfortunate. However, as I said in the beginning, I understand and sympathize with the minister, especially since he has been under abnormal stress and strain. Let us hope we get out of this place so that the minister, who is a pretty fine fellow although politically I am pretty apprehensive of him, will not, perhaps, say things that he will regret. But as far as the principle of this bill is concerned, if the principle is to help the needy and substitute some hope for hunger or to employ the unemployed or to give a lift to a lagging economy, obviously there is not a member of the House who is not all hosannahs for the bill.

If the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) wants to contribute anything to this debate besides the seat of his pants, then I would be only too happy to hear what he has to say. But I will not be interrupted by a man who usually speaks when his brain is in his seat.

Mr. Mahoney: Would the hon. member permit a question either now or at the conclusion of his remarks?

Mr. Nowlan: I will permit one now.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member made a great deal about the debate being short. Would he care to indicate whether he was in his seat when unanimous consent to this procedure was given?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not quite follow the hon. member's question.

Mr. Lundrigan: What do you mean by that nonsense?

Mr. Nowlan: I think the question is irrelevant, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lundrigan: It is also pretty small.

Mr. Nowlan: In any event, it has nothing to do with the merits of the bill. Since the hon. member for Calgary South wants to entertain some idiocies, let me transgress for a moment and get just a little bit political. Let me point out the paradox in which this chamber now finds itself. The government ran an election campaign on two mains planks, one of which was elimination of regional economic disparity. In this bill the government are eliminating regional economic disparity and substituting national economic development. National economic development may be fine and we are all for it, but they must remember that there are precise and chronic problems in regions that do not enjoy the full economic growth that some areas enjoy.

In the last election campaign, the government ran under the banner of one Canada and the elimination of regional economic disparity. The hon. member for Calgary South—and when he runs again in the next election campaign we will see whether he will still have his seat in this House—is supporting a government that no longer preaches the platitude of one Canada but is now dividing Canada, in effect, into have and have-not areas.

By expanding the designated areas, the bill is now including half of Canada within such areas, the other half remaining outside. This is a pretty ironic commentary on the political life of this country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) claimed during the last election campaign that he had the answer to the provincial and perennial question of the two solitudes. The two solitudes of the past have now become the economic solitudes of the present.

In addition to converting regional economic policy with long-term goals into cyclical unemployment policies of short-term duration, the bill is placing the future growth and industrial fabric of the land in the hands of one man, namely the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. No matter how wise, rational or benevolent is the minister, he has all the frailties and failings of a human being. I suggest this is the important difference between the original regional incentives bill and Bill C-205 that is now amending the act.

Under the government reorganization bill that created the minister's department, the minister was given discretion over which applications to allow and how much money to grant those applicants. However, under the regulations passed pursuant to the bill the authority and discretion of the minister was restricted to areas of economic disparity. I suggest that the timeless problems in these well demarcated areas of economic disparity helped to dilute and to define the unlimited discretion of the minister. As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and other members have said, these pockets of disparity can be pinpointed on the map. This bill is now extending the boundaries of the designated areas to include part of the industrial heartland of Canada. In effect, the minister is being given unlimited discretion effectively to direct the placement of new industry in more than half of Canada, and to define what is to be the expansion of existing industry.

I suggest that the effect of any decision that the minister might make will last for a longer time than any restriction that is imposed upon him in the bill. His signature to any application for assistance will survive any member of this House. As a parliamentarian this is the basic issue here, the arbitrary, unfettered and unrestricted discretion that is now being given to the minister, albeit for the most laudable objectives.

Reference was made earlier to Mr. Howe, who was also a noted economic expansionist and industrialist, a man who obviously did a lot to develop the economy of Canada. It was not too many years ago that he asked "What's a million?". I suggest that Mr. Howe was being prophetic, because "what's a million?" is pretty irrelevant in terms of the millions that this minister will have at his disposal and direction in order to help stimulate and expand industry in new areas of the country including, as I say, a large part of the industrial heartland of Canada. This issue here is whether any minister who has been elected to legislate should be able to dictate so effectively the future course of the economic development of this country. This is my objection to this bill.

Another issue which has been hit upon by hon. members who have spoken is the question whether a regional development program should be a policy for curing cyclical unemployment; whether long range plans should be merged into short run priorities, or whether the permanent solution of problems in areas of regional economic disparity should be diluted, perhaps even destroyed, by bypassing problems of admittedly critical importance but hopefully only of a temporary nature; whether in this bill the chronically ill parts of the country will not become even sicker, notwithstanding that there is a crisis in Canada in areas that have been geographically defined. I do not want to misquote the minister, but he said he wanted a 15-year program. He said he did not want measures of expediency, yet we have them in this bill. I suggest he will have to exercise the wisdom of Solomon in the administration of his proposed cure in order to prevent the spawning of increased stresses and strains to the fabric of this nation.

Basically, what is proposed is the concept of arbitrary discretion to deal with long-term regional development programs and long-term social and employment objectives. I do not want to repeat what has been said about the specific problems, and I am sure that will make many hon. members happy. I would like to believe that this bill is senseless, because if it is my fears would not be justified. I think there is something hidden in it.

Undoubtedly there will be administrative problems. When Professor Brewis testified before the committee he outlined the types of selective assistance available at different levels, 10 per cent, 25 per cent and 35 per cent, depending on the area. I suggest the problems we have in respect of regional development and national economic development will be compounded by this bill. If anything this bill takes on the aspect of a Trojan horse. It may be that many people in the country will look at this measure as the Trojan horse was looked upon. We all recall that the Trojan horse was inhabited by soldiers and when these people realize the enemies inherrent in this bill they will then know its potential for inhibiting production. In many aspects, this bill is just as deceptive as the Trojan horse.

Professor Brewis also suggested this measure would not create jobs, as the minister suggests. He refers to the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the $130 million to be used in this regard. He also mentioned the cost of $5,000 per job under the DREE program. This man is a professor who has written many books on regional economic disparity. He suggests that if you use the $130 million at an estimated rate of $5,000 per job, these incentives will create a potential of between 25,000 and 30,000 jobs. We all know that we have between 600,000 and 700,000 unemployed at the present time.

I should like to know where special incentives should be made available. If we believe the minister, this provision in the bill is supposed to stimulate growth. Where is this growth to be stimulated. Does it provide incentives to attract existing industry interested in locating in Canada. This is a factor which bothers me, having regard to the Atlantic provinces. It would also bother me if I lived in Ontario.

These incentives must be held out to attract industry to newly designated areas. The amount in relation to Montreal and other areas is 10 per cent. That might be sufficient to attract some industries to locate in those areas rather than in other parts of the country. We must keep in mind the differential involved, because 10 per cent in respect of a large industry likely to locate in the Montreal area is much different from 35 per cent in respect of a small industry locating in another designated area.

On December 8 the Prime Minister made a speech in Saint John, New Brunswick. On page 5 of his press release he refers to the potential markets in New England for manufactured goods from the Atlantic Provinces. Let me quote from this press release as follows:

> Industry is now coming to New Brunswick and to the Atlantic provinces. It is attracted in part by the availability of resources, of transportation, of a skilled labour force, and in part by the government incentives such as those offered by the federal department of Regional Economic Expansion.

It then reads:

> As it comes, those factors that I have mentioned should be taken into account to ensure a long-range, healthy type of development.

As I mentioned earlier, the special incentives set up in Bill C-205 may very well have a counter effect to that which the Prime Minister had in mind three or four days before this bill was placed before this House for second reading. It might be that in St. Jean, Quebec, you would have greater access to the New England market for manufactured goods than you would have in Saint John, New Brunswick, because this 10 per cent incentive for designated areas is very deceptive.

We heard evidence before the committee that during the existence of this measure some 400 applications had been made, but that only six applicants had received the maximum grant. I understand three of those were in New Brunswick, one in Prince Edward Island, one in Quebec and one in Saskatchewan. There was an indication in the press release that the Atlantic area was to receive the same 10 per cent incentive as the designated area around Montreal. In this regard, there will also be a ministerial discretion. When you consider these things, together with the fact that a maximum grant has only been given to six applicants during the history of this measure, it does not require a complicated computer to realize that the 10 per cent incentive in a heavily populated area will have a much greater effect than a 35 per cent grant to a small company in the Atlantic area.

When the minister appeared before the committee, he indicated he wanted to balance that which was being granted new areas with what had previously been offered in the Atlantic areas. I do not read in any ulterior motives, but the fact is that only six applicants have received the full grant. It is deceptive and highly illusionary to suggest that the 10 per cent to newly designated areas will be offset by the same 10 per cent in the Atlantic area.

It should be obvious that industry of greater magnitude will establish in Montreal and other heavily populated areas in the industrial heartland of this country. A maximum grant of 35 per cent for a smaller plant in a smaller populated area will not be equivalent to a 10 per cent grant to a bigger industry in these populated areas. A great deal will depend on how the minister exercises his discretion. If he is not careful, he could effectively stifle new industry in the Atlantic area and smother existing industry. In this way this measure would run completely counter to the direction the Prime Minister mentioned four days after this bill was given first reading and just before it was presented to the House for second reading. I wonder whether these two ministers ever got together in this regard. The Prime Minister may have been sincere in the speech he made in Saint John, but what he suggested was almost as deceptive as some parts of this bill.

There are other specific problems I could mention, but the government has decided in its wisdom to take this course in helping those areas which need special help. They will have to live with it.

Then, we have my prophecy in respect of this bill. This is my third, perhaps my shortest but more serious point. I still believe, no matter whether the minister be a Conservative, a Liberal, an NDP or of what political stripe, he should not have the unfettered discretion this bill would give him, although for the most laudable objective. Fortunately, the minister did acquiesce in the committee and agree that there shall be a council to sort of supervise the administration of the act. We will be most interested to see what form that council takes, because we know it will not have a legislative effect but only an effect after the fact. However, I would not wish to be in the minister's shoes with the discretion he will have. It is a fantastic commentary on the evolution of politics, at a time when governments delegate authority to delegate authority, that there has not been an expression on this question of the delegation of the appropriate power. I am sure the minister will try to exercise this power most sincerely. But if I were a political animal in any part of the country, which I am, I would be exposed to and involved in almost unnatural pressures to put my signature to an application in my area, or if I were from British Columbia to an application for that area, in respect of the particular problems which arise.

I am amazed that there has not been more of a complaint, because the new designated areas remove part of the restriction we had before. The minister, and any minister, obviously had to look at the facts of life before he granted or disapproved a loan. The history of the economy of a particular area would, in large measure, indicate whether or not a prospective industry would be a viable industry. But when a minister begins exercising discretionary power in half of this country, and particularly in the industrial heartland, it is an entirely different matter.

The other point of principle was the question of the mixture of long-term development or regional policies now being instituted, diluted and/or destroyed by short-term cyclical policies. But the principle of this bill again contains a sort of an irony. Again this should involve and interest all members of this House. A government which campaigned and won a strong mandate on the one-Canada theme not too long ago, and which at federal-provincial conferences has been completely against any form of special status anywhere, has by this bill, again for laudable objectives, sought to give special status to one-half of Canada. I suggest it is thereby making two Canadas.

Although it is passing strange—and perhaps if it were not so serious I could be more humorous about it—I suggest we will be faced with Bill C-205, amendments to Bill C-205 and amendments to other bills to help particular parts of this country. While it might be Quebec and Montreal today, it could be another part of the country tomorrow, unless this ministry starts to get tuned into the times and develops some viable constitutional policies which reflect the realities of this land. This is just a patch work job at best. How soon will it be before the Canadian people start to ask us if we are to provide particular funds to help particular parts of the country for various constitutional purposes. That is part of the gut issue in a bill that is anonymously called, an act to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act. We know we cannot continue in this unreal world much longer. We are not all the same. I am glad the minister is sponsoring this bill because if we can have the economic two Canadas which this bill would establish, then surely the minister would have some flexibility in respect of his dealings with his great friend and colleague the Prime Minister of this land.

Perhaps the minister could persuade the Prime Minister to adopt some flexibility in his constitutional stance, so that instead of having repeated constitutional discussions that accomplish nothing we could start to have the give and take of ideas that would reflect the realities of the land and our regional differences. I am not speaking about French or English and/or third force, but that is part of it. I say we are living in a dreamland if we believe this country is all the same. Quebec is different, and thank God it is different in so many ways. But let us not have this smokescreen that has polluted constitutional discussions, because unless we start to wake up and face reality we will have more bills such as Bill C-205. Surely, if the minister can set a precedent and, in effect, set up two Canadas economically, he can go to the Prime Minister and suggest that the Prime Minister be a little more flexible. I am not talking about a constitutional two Canadas, special status, associate status or deux nation. The good old Postmaster General can smile, Mr. Speaker. He may be smiling because he wished us all Christmas cheer and because there is to be a six-day delivery; thank God. But I suggest that so long as we legislators continue the sterile and puerile debate on semantic differences in respect of what we need in our constitution, we will be faced with the hard realities of provision such as we have in Bill C-205.

If there is any message which I would hope the minister would get from this debate, in view of all the apprehension I have about the principle of this bill, I would hope it would be to take the precedent which has been established by this bill to the constitutional discussions so that we could have some progress there.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, pursuant to special order adopted by the House earlier today, the House will now rise to resume its work at seven o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

23568—70

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are debating amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act. In other days when Canada was not plagued with such serious economic difficulties, the minister seemed to have a much more realistic concept of what he hoped to accomplish with this act. In Halifax in October of 1968 the minister said the following about the purpose of the Regional Development Incentives Act:

> So let me emphasize my first principle. It is that we will not offer short-run expediency or long-run vagueness. We want to have constructive, practical, medium-length plans. We are going to plan for every possible effort for 15 years.

At that time the minister was proposing a plan which would help the slow-growth areas of this country which are in need. It was obvious then, and it is even more obvious today, that in the ordinary run of events—I am thinking in terms of the market economy—the slow-growth areas would not and could not get the kind of industry and economic development which they require to use their raw materials and human resources.

Therefore, since one could not expect private industry to go into those slow-growth areas because it could do much better in the golden triangle of Toronto, Hamilton and Windsor and in the Montreal and Vancouver areas, the Maritimes, eastern Quebec, eastern Ontario and parts of Manitoba simply could not do without the kind of programs which were proposed under the Reginal Development Incentives Act. But now we have a different situation from that of October, 1968, when the minister made those remarks which I quoted. Today we are faced with major unemployment. There are almost 500,000 unemployed and by February, 1971, the figure will probably rise to 800,000. Almost 40 per cent of that figure, Mr. Speaker, is concentrated in the province of Quebec.

When the minister suggests that members of this House from any party who criticize this bill and the proposals he is making, do so because they are anti-Quebec, he is not only being unfair but is doing a disservice to that province. I think it is fair to say that there is no Member of Parliament who does not realize that the problems of Quebec are so serious, with the unemployment and poverty there, that they must be solved. Unless they are solved, this country will not survive.

Mr. Caccia: I wonder when—

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the backbenchers who are only here to vote when their fuehrer or leader tells them to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: —do not need to object as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is endeavouring to do. If he wants to speak, he can do so later. I do not think I have taken very much time and I do not need any lectures from him as to when I should speak, or for how long.

The problem of unemployment is of such importance that the country demands that major efforts be made. The expenditure of the $130 million which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) mentioned in his budget speech will not solve the problems of Canada or the unemployment problems of Quebec. The estimate of the department, which I think is too conservative, is that it costs $5,000 to provide one job under this program, so the total number of jobs we can expect to find is 26,000. Two months from now we will be faced with something like 200,000 people out of work. This unemployment is to a large extent due to the economic and fiscal programs adopted by the government on the advice of its top civil servants in the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance. The government decided that restraint was necessary so they put on the economic brakes and created unemployment. It is true that this year the increase in the cost of living has been lower than usual, but it has inevitably led to an increase in unemployment. The minister should have known that this would be a consequence in light of his background in the labour movement.

Having created unemployment on the one hand, on the other the government expects to meet some of the resultant problems with this program. But, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, this bill and its proposals are too little and too late. In the department, in the legislation and in the administration there are very serious defects. The minister is probably the only person who knows anything about this department but he does not realize the difficulties. Some of the best people in the department, those who had the senior positions, have left. That is not an accident, Mr. Speaker. They left because the department and its programs have changed from being people-oriented, being concerned with the needs of the people they supposedly aim to help, and have become almost entirely industry-oriented. I have talked to some of these people and I gather that they feel the department and the minister are now prepared to accept any type of growth, no matter whether it hurts the community concerned.

Let me illustrate briefly what I mean, Mr. Speaker. We have the ARDA and FRED programs, but what is their purpose? It is to rationalize the agricultural industry in the areas in which they are being instituted and to consolidate farms into economic units. These are worthwhile and laudable objectives. But as far as I can see, no plans have been made to encourage farmers to leave the farm. Instead of being the rural poor, they will become the city poor, living on welfare. So far that is the only progress I can see as a result of the ARDA and FRED programs.

The department is providing incentives to industry but it does not seem to be concerned about how these are used. It certainly does not seem to be concerned about what type of employment is created. Under one of the earlier programs the government of Canada participated with the former government of Manitoba in the establishment of a pulp and paper industry at Le Pas—Churchill Forest Industries. I am not going into detail about how much was contributed in grants and subsidies and how little the owners, the believers in free enterprise, contributed of their own capital. But it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that no provision was made by the department which put up the money, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to apply pressure on the owners to employ the people who live in that area. There are virtually no Indians employed with Churchill Forest Industries at Le Pas. This is another valid criticism which can and must be made of the program which this government has devised.

Mr. Speaker, I was not a member of the committee but I had an opportunity to speak to some of the members of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council a few days ago. I tell the minister that from them I got the impression that they could see no consistent, well thought-out program in the minister's statements or his answers to questions which would indicate that the government has any real plan on how to use the Regional Development Incentives Act.

As I said earlier, those who have criticized the present legislation support the idea that a special effort must be made to create more employment in the province of Quebec. But when the government and the minister bring in proposals which have the effect of making more than half the total land area of Canada eligible for assistance under a Regional Development Incentives Act, they destroy the whole point of an act designed to help slow-growth areas.

• (7:20 p.m.)

If the minister is not concerned about the kind of comments, criticisms and suggestions made by people who appeared before the committee, people such as Professor Brewis, I do not know what one can do. Professor Brewis' comments about the program are so important and so crucial to any kind of success that it seems to me the minister is under an obligation to explain to the House where Professor Brewis was wrong, if he was wrong. I wish to quote a couple of paragraphs from the material Professor Brewis supplied to members of the House who were interested in his comments. He said:

> The increase in the number of designated areas of one sort and another will almost certainly lead to action by provincial governments to include still other areas. The Saskatchewan government, for example, offers aid to firms outside the federally assisted areas. I suspect moreover that some provincial governments will become increasingly critical of federal policies of regional development.

Because we do not have a well thought-out federal plan which has been co-ordinated with the provinces, we are witnessing a kind of bargain basement sale. Every province, and certainly every have-not province, is busy with its own incentive plan. Each province bids against the others in the hope that industry will be encouraged to come to it and not to any other. I am thinking of the concessions made in Newfoundland. In particular, I am thinking of the oil refinery.

Mr. McGrath: That was a give-away.

Mr. Orlikow: That was a steal. The people of Newfoundland have been stolen blind. I am also thinking of the concessions made in Nova Scotia. I am thinking of the heavy water plant and of the Clairtone plant. I am also thinking of the Churchill Forest Industries project in Manitoba about which I spoke earlier.

I am not an ardent supporter of our so-called free enterprise system. I suggest to hon. members that no government, whether federal or provincial, should give away money without first taking the most elementary precautions. Just look at the article which appeared in the Financial Post. It shows how governments, federal and provincial, have given away tremendous amounts of money. Large concessions have been made in the province of Manitoba in respect of cutting wood, and so on, and the government has not received anything in return. The so-called owners have not put up any of their own money.

Professor Brewis says that if we accept the figures of the Minister of Finance who said that $130 million would be spent on this program, and if we assume that it takes $5,000 worth of incentives grants to create one job, which has been our past experience, we shall create between 25,000 and 30,000 jobs as a result of these incentive grants. I said earlier that we face the prospect of between 600,000 and 800,000 people being unemployed in the next three or four months. The results of the program will be pretty marginal. The massive changes will not come about as a result of this legislation about which we have been talking for the past couple of years.

Professor Brewis said:

> The job facing DREE to effect the long-run economic structural changes which are necessary in the lagging regions is big ... and complicated enough without saddling the department with additional and largely unrelated responsibilities.

That is precisely what will happen as a result of the changes which the minister is proposing in this legislation. There are other ways of reducing massive unemployment which do not involve what the government proposes under this legislation. A housing program, Mr. Speaker, particularly for people in the low-income bracket, would provide jobs more quickly than would be provided by this program.

We believe this bill has moved away from the concept the minister proposed several years ago. That concept had a great deal of merit and we supported it. It concentrated on growth points or centres. There is now no indication as to how the department will decide the merits of a proposal made to it. So far as we can tell, it will be done in an ad hoc, almost accidental manner. This will not achieve the results we have a right to expect. Such a course of action will inevitably or will seem to lead to political manipulation. After all, those who will not receive money—and the money will be limited—will say, whether they are justified in saying so or not, that they did not receive the money because there was someone closer to the minister whom he wanted to help.

Unless he lays down clear and specific guidelines and principles on how this program is to operate, the minister and the government will face endless trouble. This bill will be meaningless unless greater financial resources of the federal government are allocated for fighting the problem of regional development. When you talk about spending $100 million or $150 million on stimulating the economy when you should spend about $1 billion, you will not accomplish very much.

We object very strenuously to any government simply giving away money. If we are to operate under the free enterprise system, and if free enterprise is to continue those who enter such enterprises should be prepared to put up the money themselves. After all, they will make any profit which is to be made. They go into business because they expect to make a profit. They do not go into business—I am not being critical because, after all, this is an economic fact of life—if they do not expect to make a profit. We are not talking about small grants. We are not talking in terms of thousands or even tens of thousands of dollars. We are talking of individual grants running into millions of dollars. We are talking about grants, loans and subventions which will make up one-third or more of the total cost of a project.

How does this sort of program operate? I think the answer is perfectly obvious. I again refer to the CFI project in Manitoba. In that project the federal and provincial governments put up the bulk of the money. I do not think the industry concerned put up any money. Under that sort of system it is like saying, "Heads you win, tails we lose." If the grant is made available and the enterprise is successful, the loan will be paid back. Usually such money is lent at a subsidized rate of interest. The loan will be repaid and the owners will make the profit.

The Financial Post is skeptical about any prospect of success for the venture at Le Pas. I am skeptical about the success of many of the projects undertaken in other parts of the country. Let me put it this way. If the chances of success were good, private enterprise would have gone in without the government's support in the first place. If the enterprise is a failure, to a large extent the money lost will be at the expense of the people of Canada; it will consist of grants and loans which have come from government sources. One does not need to be a revolutionary to say that if the government of Canada is to become involved in projects—I think we should become involved in more of these, and not fewer—in slow-growth areas, it should do so to a very large extent through the provision of equity capital.

If a project is a failure, we will not lose any more than under the present system of loans and grants. On the other hand, if the project is a success, Canadians will benefit from the equity which they have in the concern to which they have made the loan. This is something which even this government, conservative as it is, ought to give serious consideration. In my opinion, the major defect in this bill is that it does not provide for any overall comprehensive development plan. It does not provide for the development of plans by co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. This has been one of the defects in the program of regional development since its inception. What happens is that competition develops between the provinces and the municipalities. This is bad for all concerned. Each is forced to offer more and more in the way of incentives, almost bribes, in the hope that they will attract industries which will provide jobs. In the process, they are faced with the tremendous financial responsibility of providing schools, roads, and sewer and water facilities which are necessary for industries in a modern society. It is also necessary to provide housing for the people concerned. This program is industry oriented. It fails to provide for the infrastructure which enables the provinces and municipalities to supply the services required by industry.

We would support this or any other government which made proposals to improve living conditions and produce jobs at adequate wages for the large number of Canadians who are either unemployed or underemployed. We would support this kind of a program. However, the minister and his department have made a hodge-podge of it. They have diluted and subverted it to such an extent that it is not possible for members on this side of the House to support this proposal.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax-East): Mr. Speaker, during the last few days the members of this House and the members of the Standing Committee on Regional Development have been dealing with a measure which has changed the direction of the basic thrust of government policy with respect to economic disparity in some regions of Canada. I wish to address a very few remarks on that point this evening. The arguments I wish to make are simple. They are based on the premise that there are regions in Canada that not only suffer from disparity when compared with the rest of the country but have particular disparities in their areas.

Some time ago the government embarked on what we understood to be a long range program aimed at the infrastructure. It was to overcome the disparity that existed and provide a greater share of the national prosperity for those regions. We recognized that there was disparity and devised a program to attack it. The program has failed. I can say that forcibly, simply, and with the contempt that the change of direction deserves. This would not change the basic fact that the programs designed to date have failed.

We placed a fair amount of hope in DREE, the regional attack on disparity. Many of us shelved what we in our wisdom thought to be a more appropriate approach, the constitutional approach, which would have given us the instruments to help ourselves. We were prepared to give the government a chance to see what it could do. We did so because we trusted the minister and the government. At the time we shared to some extent his enthusiasm. We have been let down because the program has not worked. For one reason or another, the minister has admitted that it will not work.

The amendment to the bill emphasizes the need for regional policies. We need policies for those regions in Canada affected by disparity, not policies to be in effect for 18 months or 2 years but for the long haul. In other words, we have to know where we stand from political whim to political whim. It was my position that the regional policy would be the instrument that we needed to overcome these difficulties. We have tried the mockery of ad hoc approaches to regional development, but we have failed.

It is time that the people from the Atlantic provinces faced up to one or two basic facts. Policies born in central Canada are born without a damn for the economic condition and the plight of the Atlantic provinces. This has been true for 200 years. A review of the financial history of Canada will reveal that central and western Canada found the capital they required and the surplus deposits built up between the mid 1700's and the early 1900's in the Atlantic provinces. Those of us in the Atlantic provinces recognize quite readily what happened to some of these surplus deposits.

In other words, for 100 years and perhaps for the better part of 200 years, there was no apology from the rest of Canada when our surplus deposits were drawn off for the development of the central regions. Now, in the middle of the 20th Century and particularly in the past 30 years, it has become apparent that the atlantic area is not able to keep abreast of the rapidly expanding central part of the country largely because of the central policies of successive governments. I shall not tar any particular government for this but, rather refer to governments generally. The effect has been recognized, I think, and I would hope by people who are seriously concerned about the plight of the Atlantic provinces. I repeat, I believe it is time we began to stop complaining bitterly about ad hoc measures and attempts to resolve the problems from time to time by governments which are oriented toward central Canada, and started making our own case for regional policies which would permit us to have our own banking institutions, which would allow us a far greater control over the fiscal and monetary policy of this country. This would be particularly useful with respect to national policies when, from time to time, the government deemed it necessary to implement measures to restrain or stimulate the economy.

It is in this area that we have felt our greatest wounds in recent years. We need changes in the tax incentive field. We need changes in the application of brakes on the economy that are bought from time to time by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). In other words, we need some control over our regional financial destiny. We need a return to some civilized human respect for the problems that we face. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, when anybody bothers to look at this bill, that what we are really talking about are the terms of our own protection. I grant the minister is concerned and I do not say that he is not concerned. I just think he is so preoccupied with other problems that the problems of the Atlantic provinces rate about 34th or 35th in the back of his mind. What I object to really is that perhaps because of this we keep being faced with subterfuge, if you will, by indulgence, and then when we catch them out, when we discover that they are a little bit off base, they are quite prepared to run around and do something. They are quite prepared to throw us the scraps off the table, anything is good enough.

We feel, Mr. Speaker, and there is nothing really complicated about it; we are falling behind the national economy. The minister knows this. The government knows it. But they just don't seem to give a damn. They do not seem to care. It doesn't seem to matter that our nation will not grow and remain unified as long as we have this disparity, as long as we have this casual attitude of saying, whenever pressure is brought to bear: Do something for them but don't go quite so far that we cannot change it in the event that something happens to begin to upset the delicate balance here in Ontario. At the risk of being accused of being anti-Quebec, I just cannot understand why the government does not stand up and say Quebec needs a few billion dollars. Does the minister, does the government, think that the people of Canada are not aware of some of the problems in Quebec or are scared to put the national economy to work with respect to solving these problems. Of course, the government does not pay too much attention to this. It is very obvious that they do not. All that I can effectively see, in this whole exercise, is that the government is recognizing the requirement of certain of the regions of the Province of Quebec and has sought to overcome them. This is commendable. I support this. The more openly they go about it, the more I support it.

But in the doing of this, Mr. Speaker, they have sought to find a political balance in the country, the political balance which they imagined was required. It was not a political balance, or the necessity for a political balance, which existed in the minds of Canadians from British Columbia to St John's, Newfoundland; it did not exist there, it existed in the minds of the government. So they embarked on this course. They thought: We will do what has to be done in Quebec and we will use the Maritimes to balance it out politically. But the massive amount of aid which has to go into Quebec could not be matched by any program the government could discern or develop in the Atlantic provinces. At least the caucus over there sounds very happy. Maybe they could come in and entertain us.

An hon. Member: That's television over there.

Mr. Forrestall: Television, is it? There was no need for the balance which the government imagined. The people were prepared to pay this price. But simply because the government could not accept it it seems to me they thought: Well, we have to move into the heartland of the country, into great industrial Ontario. Maybe there we can find the type of political balance we need to offset the fact we have to go into Montreal. I say it is sheer stupidity and means absolutely nothing. Our party, I hope, Mr. Speaker, does not believe that there is one federal strategy, that there is one national policy which will make this country healthy and strong. I hope our party does not believe there is one region or two regions in Canada, the Quebec region and the rest of Canada. I hope I belong to a party which understands that there are economic problems in this country, that I belong to a party which would not use the tools of subterfuge in an attempt to overcome them. I hope I belong to a party which will stick to a policy once enunciated and not roam all over the countryside trying to find political justification for their imagined needs in meeting cyclical difficulties and problems. The people of Canada are quite prepared to accept this, and anyone who denies this underestimates the desire of Canadians to remain as one country.

I do not believe there is one strategy or one program for development. Indeed, I believe very firmly, and I hope the party to which I belong believes very firmly, in the principle of multiple strategy. I hope my party believes in a multiplicity of programs in respect of the regional development of our country and the development of a strong national economy. The present government should follow its supporters out in the lobby, who are harmonizing their Christmas carols, and harmonize its attitudes in Canada. Let the government stop misleading those regions of Canada that need strength and help from the national economy.

• (7:50 p.m.)

Mr. Bell: They are always out of tune.

Mr. Forrestall: As they stumble in their harmony just outside the chamber, so they stumble in the development of programs to overcome regional disparity.

An hon. Member: But they will rise again.

Mr. Forrestall: I doubt it. The strategy adopted by the government to control inflation has had serious and grievous consequences for Canadians in all walks of life, not least of which are those who are fortunate enough to be unemployed in a large urban centre such as Montreal. Their plight is a serious one. But their problems are not resolved at the expense of other regions in Canada. You cannot create good out of evil no matter how hard you try. This program is going to cause privation because it is going to be watered down. The program is being made ad hoc in its approach to serious problems, if we are to be at all meaningful about national unity.

Evidence of regional unemployment can hardly be used as a yardstick in this regard. As I said a moment ago, the consequences of being unemployed in Montreal are far different from being unemployed in the Atlantic provinces, be it in the urban centres or the rural areas. The 10 per cent advantage now given to the Atlantic area means absolutely nothing when viewed in terms of a market that is 300 per cent larger. It is ludicrous to think that over the course of the next 18 months any firm that hopes to make a mark on the national economy would move to the Atlantic provinces when it can get exactly the same opportunities in the markets of Montreal.

As the deputy minister himself said, this bill and its whole approach is based on political expediency. The need for regional policies is clear, and it is the only path down which we can now travel. I hope that the premiers of the Atlantic provinces, two of them now, one not quite so new and the fourth almost a father of confederation, will direct their attention during the coming months of 1971 to this question. Without regional policies and other instruments under our control, it is eminently clear that we are not going to overcome the effects of regional economic disparity no matter how well intentioned our efforts.

This country is split badly on a number of very important and vital issues. Economic disparity will not help to heal any of these crucial problems. In particular, it will not help to resolve these problems to approach them in an atmosphere that seems to be one of subterfuge, guile, one that essentially is not honest or frank. It is time that this government addressed itself to the creation of a program that will overcome regional economic disparity. This failure to do so has been demonstrated not only to me, but to APEC and others who appeared before the committee, to editorial writers in the Atlantic provinces and to businessmen in the Atlantic provinces and in other regions designated under the old bill. The government has given an indication that they cannot be trusted with the economic destiny of Canada in the future.

Sometimes I wonder why the govenment is fearful of giving us these regional instruments that have been so often and for so long talked about. I wonder, too, about the long-range impact of such programs as, for example, the development of the Minas basin tidal power. What is going to be the reaction of businessmen if and when they are asked to make a decision with regard to the massive investment that will be required to implement the program, and they examine the records of the federal government in the matter of regional development only to find that it is, to say the least, inconsistent? During the last six or seven years we have not had a government that is prepared to address itself in a consistent manner to regional disparity. There is a problem here of fear of the unknown.

What is going to happen in 1972 when these areas have to be redesignated? What is going to happen to the Nova Scotia five year program? Where does it stand today? I have the suspicion—I do not know because no one has told me anything about this—that the program with respect to the development of metropolitan Halifax and Dartmouth has been shelved. There can only be one reaction on the part of industrialists and entrepreneurs to the lack of constancy in the attitudes, policies and programs of the federal government with particular relation to the Atlantic region.

The government thinks it has made things a little easier for us in the Maritimes. I say that is nonsense, balderdash. Unless they were a McCain, no firm would be interested in the 10 per cent differential offered in the bill. They would demand the full amount or alternatively go to the United States for funds. Who is going to come to the Atlantic provinces when a market the size of Montreal is available? Is the government prepared to change this situation if, by the end of June, 1971, there is a marked fall off of applications? It disturbed me that neither the minister nor the Parliamentary Secretary have bothered to speak on this matter, except to answer questions yesterday, in what I thought was almost an arrogant way. No one has bothered to tell companies to put in applications in order that they may be approved. No one has told the companies that their applications are in the process of being approved or that they should withdraw them and re-apply.

• (8:00 p.m.)

How generous is the government going to be if a company asks for a full grant under the terms of the amendment? The government has not bothered to answer these practical questions, let alone the more serious one I have just posed. How will we change direction if in six month's time we find we are receiving the proverbial you-know-what? What happens if we find we are being shafted? What will the government do if the worst possible thing happens in spite of the fact the minister says it will not happen?

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Forrestall: I suspect absolutely nothing will happen, as the hon. member suggests. I suspect that until the appetite of Quebec has been satisfied in this ample manner, which I find unforgiveable, we will sit in the Atlantic provinces as we have for the last seven or eight years with no assistance, help or direction. These are our fears. I think these fears are real.

If this matter comes to a vote tonight I must say to the minister that I cannot honestly indicate how I will vote because I am disturbed by the implications of the measure. I should like to believe what the minister has said, but I find this difficult in light of his comments in introducing the original bill.

Earlier today I was disturbed to the point that I intended to suggest tonight to hon. members that we should have a new minister who was not so bound up in the difficulties facing the government as this hon. minister is. It seems we should have a minister who is prepared to tell the country exactly what is wrong with the economy in all parts of our country, rather than a minister who says that all parts of the country must be assisted when they face problems. He should indicate how serious these problems are, and what the demands on our economy will be during the 1970's. We are prepared to do whatever can be done.

As long as I remain in this illustrious chamber I do not think I will ever understand the fear of the government about being honest with the people. Honesty of this type seems to be a magic elixir. I am sure the minister and the government would find the people of Canada quite prepared to pay whatever cost is necessary to assure every Canadian dignity and respect for his own worth and that of his neighbour. I am sure we would find them prepared to do whatever is necessary, without having to tear asunder well laid plans. The government must realize it does not have to overcome all the difficulties that various regions experience. There is ample authority under other statutes to overcome the difficulties which exist in the city of Montreal without having to dilute the one measure on which the Atlantic provinces have placed so much hope.

It is unfortunate that we will leave here tonight, having approved this bill, and still not knowing what will happen in six month's time if the worst of my fears come true. I hope to God they will not, but we still do not know what will happen if we find that no applications are being made to locate in the Atlantic provinces, except from industries that cannot make a go of it in Montreal or industries which do not want to market their product in that area. It may be that we will have applications from service industries which are similar to industries already located in the Atlantic region.

I do not think we have ever suggested that the Atlantic provinces should be turned into an industrialized area. Industrialization is good, but we do not necessarily want that sort of thing. What we do want is a program on which we can place a continuing trust and confidence. We want a program on the basis of which we can plan ahead for the next four or five years. We do not want to wake up one morning and find that something we did yesterday should have been postponed until tomorrow. This is not and never has been good enough. I suggest it will never be good enough.

The political impact of what is happening will not necessarily be felt anywhere in Canada this winter, let alone in Montreal. There is no way that new industry is going to get started between now and next spring. The minister should give some assurance that something will be done in the Atlantic provinces. He has said it only takes two or three weeks to process an application, in rare cases a little bit longer. Since he made that comment, I have received a number of letters and several phone calls. I will forward this correspondence to the minister if he wishes. It relates to specific cases in which it has taken five, six, seven and even eight weeks to process applications. In these cases, at least in the opinion of the applicants, all of the information was supplied in order that the applications could be finalized. Perhaps these people have been misled, but in terms of time the procedure has taken a lot longer than the minister suggested in the committee.

Even after five or six weeks, the implementation of this bill will have very little effect in the city of Montreal. It will have a long term effect on the industrial development of the Atlantic provinces. Within a period of two or three years from the implementation of this measure, I suggest that industry will not choose to locate in the Atlantic area but will opt in favour of the city of Montreal.

I had hoped that the minister would accept our amendment proposed yesterday rather than the token amendment he did accept. It is regrettable that he did not. I hope the minister will find some way of telling the people in the Atlantic provinces, and in other designated areas, just exactly what the government intends to do if this measure fails. This will have a very direct relationship to the cutback in the number of applications and the growth we can expect.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I get the impression that the attentive capacity of hon. members is lessening. Because of the very late hour, and the fact that some Liberal members want to speak, I will try to be as brief as possible.

• (8:10 p.m.)

I had an opportunity to speak on this bill when it was first introduced last week and when it was in committee. However, I should like to summarize a few of my feelings this evening before the measure passes. First of all, Bill C-205 has now passed the committee stage. When it was before the committee we had an opportunity to hear the minister, his deputy and the witnesses who were called to appear. Then we had an opportunity to study the bill clause by clause and to hear the minister and his deputy again. During the time this bill has been studied I have been bewildered at times because there has seemed to be a lack of enthusiasm for the bill by government members.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Nystrom: For example, to my knowledge, the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) did not participate in the debate. The only way he has participated in the debate so far has been to interject from his seat or to speak on a point of order. I find this amazing. I feel sorry for the minister. I know he must be very unhappy about some of his backbenchers. He must feel very sad that they have neither defended his bill nor offered opinions or constructive criticism. I would not wish to be in his position and I am sure most members on this side of the House would not want to be in his position. I assume that some hon. members opposite will offer comments tonight in respect of this bill. I know the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) and the deputy whip of that party are very happy. I hope some of these hon. gentlemen will participate in the debate. Where are the government members? Why are they not participating?

I believe we all realize that the problem we are discussing is serious. The purpose of this bill is to designate a few more areas in Canada and to raise the ceiling on loans and fees. I think we all recognize that in Canada the regional problems are very acute. We know the average income in places such as Newfoundland is much lower than it is in Ontario. We know that the increase in the per capita income in Newfoundland did not rise as rapidly as it did in Ontario, despite the fact that we have a regional policy and a department which should be looking after this matter.

We realize there are regional problems all over the world and that Canada's position is not unique. We also understand that one thing that has motivated this bill at this time is the special situation in the province of Quebec. I do not deny there are special problems in the province of Quebec which must be solved if we are to keep our country together and if we want to celebrate Canada's 200th birthday. I suggest, however, that this is a bad bill, for a number of reasons. First, the bill will create an administrative monstrosity: we will have five different types of designated areas in the country.

I think we should re-read some of the comments the minister made a year or two ago. At that time he spoke of trying to keep the regional development program and designated areas confined to certain sections of the country. He wanted to keep the program selective. He said that if it became too large, the program would negate itself. It seems to me that with the additional areas over 50 per cent of the country will be designated. This negates the government's earlier intentions and the philosophy it had when it introduced the idea of creating a new department to solve regional disparity in this country.

I am also concerned about the way in which grants are being handed out to private companies. The minister is handing out subsidies and grants to private companies as if they were going out of style. At times this is done without even considering the long-term effects and the commitments the companies may have in a particular region. From my knowledge of regional programs in other countries it would seem that when they have tried to solve problems of regional disparity the public has assumed greater responsibility, greater involvement and greater commitment. They have not tried to rely upon big companies and corporations to solve regional problems for them with public money.

Why do we have these problems of disparity and low incomes in some areas? I suggest much of the reason is that in the past we have relied entirely upon the corporate world and free enterprise to solve our problems, and as a result people in many regions of this country, not because of lack of training or skill but by reason of where they live have suffered from inequity and disparity. A company, naturally, will locate in an area where markets are close by, where transportation is convenient and cheap and where there are raw materials and resources. I suggest that if we are to properly plan our economy and eliminate much of the regional disparity and inequity which exists, the public sector must have a greater involvement than it has today; otherwise, as soon as the minister hands out grants and subsidies, many of these companies will wonder why they should remain in the area any longer.

Instead of continuing in this vicious circle, why do we not introduce to the House and the country a Canada Development Corporation? For five or six years the Liberal party has spoken of a Canada Development Corporation; it has been included in almost every Throne Speech since then. When he appeared before the committee, the minister suggested this might be one way to solve the problem of economic disparity in Canada. I believe the minister would be in favour of having a Canada Development Corporation. With his power and influence over the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which I assume must be great, I wonder why he does not try to motivate the Prime Minister toward instituting a Canada Development Corporation so that we could have a large amount of capital on hand which could be directed to areas which need it. In this way the long-term planning would be better than it is today.

It appeared to me and to witnesses who were called before the Standing Committee on Regional Development in the past few days that the government is using regional programs to fight what essentially is a cyclical problem. The government is trying to solve many of Canada's problems with regional programs instead of with general economic reform and responsibility. I believe that in order to be successful, a regional development program must be very selective. I do not see the sense in designating a city such as Montreal and having it placed in the same category as the Atlantic provinces except for the extra 10 per cent granted to the Atlantic provinces. I do not think this will help develop the Atlantic provinces or eastern Quebec. I am sure a company would settle in Montreal in preference to the Atlantic provinces, despite the extra 10 per cent. If we are to solve the problems of places such as Montreal we must endeavour to correct the general economic picture in Canada.

I am also disturbed about the statements the minister has made. Earlier today, my colleague the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) read to the House a statement made by the Minister of Finance of the province of Quebec who was concerned about some of the statements the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has made about the economic state of the province of Quebec. Matters such as these are of concern to me.

• (8:20 p.m.)

For such reasons as these, I would once again plead with the minister, without going on at great length, to re-analyse and re-think this whole policy for solving regional disparities in Canada, to be less sensitive to some political pressures that may be on him to include certain regions and exclude others. I suggest to the minister that he follow the philosophy which he outlined a year or so ago when he talked about designating only certain areas, trying to build up the infrastructure, to use the growth centre idea. I appeal to the minister not to get carried away by providing huge grants to certain companies to locate in certain areas. We find today that, as a result of these amendments, a company can now, by combining both a grant and a loan guarantee, get up to 80 per cent of the total cost of locating in some areas of this country. As one hon. member said, this is too much. As a matter of fact, about a year and a half ago the minister himself was saying that if we are going to give subsidies or grants of 40 per cent or higher, we might as well be running the industry ourselves. Why not? If the Canadian people are going to take risk to that extent and invest that much money, why can we not have share in the operation and then have the chance of reaping some of the long term benefits that a company like this would provide?

I will conclude by saying that I am very concerned about the regional development plan. There are five different types of designated areas. To me, this seems like a real monstrosity. It is growing in a very unplanned way.

You have the minister jumping back and forth, not sure of what he is doing, giving out grants to all types of companies. He has become nothing more than a great, big, friendly Santa Clause on a pogo stick that has gone berserk.

I suggest to the minister that he look at the whole program once again. If he wants to keep Canada together as a country, much more than bilingualism and biculturalism will have to be involved. We will have to make every region of this country an equal partner within confederation, socially and economically. Only when we do this, can we be sure that Canada will stay together as a nation. This is why I am so concerned about the future of this department. I think that if the minister pursues problems such as unemployment today, then he will fail, and six months from now he will come back to Parliament to ask us to designate a few more areas. I think we might as well start thinking about designating the whole country because we have almost done that now. There is not much of the country left to designate, anyway. So, I suggest to the minister that many of the problems he is trying to solve should be solved through the adoption by the government of an over-all financial or economic policy rather than by a policy administered only by his department.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, when the regional economic expansion program was first introduced, I think, if I recall correctly, most of us lauded it. It appeared to be the instrument through which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would fulfil one half of his total election program, namely, to work toward the elimination of regional disparity. We all remember the other half of the Prime Minister's election program which was to promote and encourage a just society. The Prime Minister has since dropped this particular program. He says that the just society was a slogan. He does not like slogans now, and he threw out the just society. That was 50 per cent of his election platform. Now, with Bill, C-205 as we say down in Newfoundland, he is heavin' out the other half. I think we would do well to remember this. I do not think we can over-emphasize it. The minister himself does not deny it.

The original intention of the incentives program was, in effect, to bring the disadvantaged areas at least somewhat closer economically to the central industrialized areas of Canada. This was a special program with a specific purpose and that purpose was spelled out very clearly. As I say, we landed it. We regarded it as a fulfilment of the Prime Minister's promise and as being a serious program that could possibly solve many of our problems in the Atlantic area which everybody agreed was disadvantaged. Is it any wonder now that some members on this side of the House are left with an uneasy feeling?

The effect of this bill will be to include in the incentives area the city of Montreal and a couple of other large areas in central Canada. I have been very concerned about this throughout the week as I sat on the committee. The minister thought it proper at that time, although I do not really think he meant to do it, to come out with the old slogan "you are anti-Quebec". What kind of nonsense is this? We are not anti-Quebec. My colleagues and I feel the same way when we go to the great city of Montreal.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is very important. I would like to know when I said that the hon. member was anti-Quebec?

Mr. Peddle: It is my understanding that this is on the record, that the minister actually accused my colleagues of being anti-Quebec.

An hon. Member: No, that is not so.

An hon. Member: That is pure mischief.

Mr. Peddle: I cannot substantiate that—

Mr. Perrault: Then take it back.

Mr. Peddle: There was one other time when the minister claimed something was not on the record when it was. I believe this statement is on the record. Anyway, I want to emphasize that the majority of people on this side of the House are not anti-anything. When we go into the great city of Montreal, we are proud that this is part of our country. When we go into Toronto, we feel the same way. When we come into this capital city, we are proud that the few of us who pay taxes in Newfoundland contribute to this. We feel that this is our country, and we resent any implication that any remarks we have to make are anti-this or anti-that. We do not like that.

In the short time that I have been in this chamber I have seen too much of the damned-if-you-do and damned-if-you-don't type of legislation which gives a great advantage to one area of the country and a few crumbs to another area. We are accused of perhaps being anti-Quebec if we vote against it, and at the same time our own constituents might blame us if we vote against the few crumbs that are in it for them. As I understand it, everybody knew there was a tremendous rate of growth in the central part of Canada and the idea of the Regional Development Incentives Act was to lure industry into the Atlantic provinces and the western parts of Canada, areas in which there had been no industrial expansion. This afternoon my colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and several other members, said that this program had been diluted. I am disappointed with the whole program, as I am sure many others are. I do not want anybody to say that we adopt this attitude because we are anti-Quebec. That is not the case. It is simply because the program was designed as an attempt to look after the problems of particular areas of this country which were not properly developed but now, with the inclusion of these other industrial areas, I have lost the faith that I had in it.

• (8:30 p.m.)

From September 1 to November 30 of this year, .23 per cent of the jobs created by this program all across the country went to Newfoundland, that is less than one-quarter of one per cent. Under the new program, we are told it will be possible to get 35 per cent of the capital costs of a project instead of the former 25 per cent. Looking at the figures for Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, I am moved to ask what the difference is between 25 per cent of nothing and 35 per cent of nothing—it could be 100 per cent and still mean nothing.

A few days ago in committee the minister told us that he and his department had asked the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council to investigate why the program is not succeeding in Newfoundland. Does he seriously want them to report on this while at the same time saying, "We are now including the great industrial area of Montreal." The reason is obvious, Mr. Speaker. Any program that has the same guidelines for the industralized areas of this country as it has for Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick is not based on a firm premise. It defeats itself and contradicts itself. This is a program to combat regional disparity but the program is the same for the whole country. It has the same rates of benefit, the same amount of money payable to a potential developer for jobs created in Montreal as in the outports of Newfoundland. In its very essence, Mr. Speaker, it is foolish.

What is the problem, Mr. Speaker? The minister is not here to listen but I believe I have the answer. I believe that the minister, as well as some other ministers, is too urbanized to be in charge of a program like this.

Mr. Lundrigan: That's right.

Mr. Peddle: We have had the champagne circuit, the pigs-in-the-blanket at cocktail time, and the rose in the teeth. Mr. Speaker, I think we have to convince the ministers that there are more smells in this country than that of a rose. There are the smells of the barnyard, the fish plant, the fishing boats and all the others that make up this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: They are too preoccupied with the carpeted office.

In committee the other day when I asked the minister why he persisted in excluding 75 per cent of the province of Newfoundland from this incentives program, he said that all of Newfoundland was included. It is not, Mr. Speaker. The province of Newfoundland includes some 110,000 square miles of that great expanse of Labrador.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: I asked the same question when the incentives program was first introduced and I got the same answer, "We don't think there is any possibility of development up there." At the time, I thought that was fairly reasonable because other places were excluded as well. Now, I find that the city of Montreal is included, so I have to go back to my riding and explain to the people why it is excluded from a program designed to help just such areas. I have to explain why Montreal and a number of other areas are included in the regional development incentives program to help disadvantaged areas. That is going to be a very difficult task. The minister's answer is not satisfactory. He just shrugs and says, "It is north". We cannot penalize people because they live in the north.

I tried to impress upon the minister some of the things I found when I travelled this area last summer. There are no big urban areas along the coast of Labrador; there are only communities of 500 or 600 people. I saw things that were frightening, Mr. Speaker, such as 10,000 pounds of fresh salmon being returned to the sea because there was no place to store it. There was no way to process it, so it went back to the sea and nobody seemed to give a you-know-what. There are several of these areas, but the minister says they cannot be designated because there is not much possibility of expansion. We don't want chemical plants and pulp mills along the coast of Labrador. We want a paltry few thousand dollars to help those people when they go out and catch fish, so that they will not have to throw it back into the sea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: I suggest that this minister, and some of the others, should get out of their plush offices and go into the country to ascertain the problems relating to the departments they operate. It might be a real education, Mr. Speaker. I know it has been an education for me. When was the last time the minister visited the coast of Labrador? When is the next time he is going to visit it? I invite him to come now. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that since the program with which the minister has been so delighted has been changed from a regional program to a national one, he will have to set up another separate scheme to look after regional problems. I plead with him to include Labrador when he does that.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I promised my colleague for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) that I would talk for only about four minutes. Perhaps I will take five minutes. The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) mentioned that about 10,000 pounds of salmon had to be thrown back into the ocean and that should make an impact on the thinking of this House, especially when we are trying to deal with legislation such as this. As the hon. member pointed out the other day in committee when we were considering the bill, the amount that the fishermen concerned lost may not mean very much to city slickers, but it was a very considerable sum for those who had expended a lot of sweat and energy in catching the fish. What he said should not be dismissed as rhetoric. As a matter of fact, I think I will speak for about four or five minutes. I really feel keenly about this matter. If we cannot cope with problems like that, we are indeed sinking.

I now come to the main burden of my speech, and I shall keep it brief. The makeup of the committee which studied the bill dealing with the regional economic development and expansion of this nation is different from the makeup of any other committee of the House of Commons. Most committees proceed in an orderly and quiet way. This committee, I think, is mainly noted for the fractiousness of its members. There is a reason for their fractiousness. Every member of that committee is concerned about overcoming this matter of regional disparities, and every one of them becomes terribly excited. That is because not one member of the committee can be certain whether the matter being considered will, in the end, achieve something amounting to justice for all Canadians. Perhaps that is why debates on regional economic disparities in this House and in Committees tend to be much more heated than debates on almost any other subject under the sun. I have thrown out, those remarks because they underline a philosophical thought.

I wish to make two or three points, and I will be brief. Professor Brewis appeared before the committee and told us things that I think ought to be considered by the minister and his advisers. He said:

The Bill leaves me with a feeling of considerable uneasiness. It introduces what seems to be a major reorientation of policy in the direction of measures to reduce cyclical unemployment rather than measures to improve the long-run economic potential of the less favoured regions of the country.

That is fair indictment, and all of us ought to consider it. The APEC Newsletter in my hand says that, "When everything is designated, nothing is designated." Professor Brewis puts it this way:

The proportion of the population falling within designated regions of one sort or another will be increased from ⅓ to ½. As a result the efficacy of the legislation to aid the formerly designated areas will be diluted.

For my third point, I wish to quote from the APEC Newsletter. I hope hon. members of the House realize I am trying to be brief. I am not trying to present an ordered argument. I am merely trying to put my case on record in the hope that it will deliver its punch whenever a program such as this is reviewed, as it must be, over a long period of time. The APEC Newsletter reads:

Another change in the DREE program may be more use to this region: that is extending guarantees of loans to manufacturing and larger commercial operations, including convention, hotel, office and shopping projects. This may relieve the provincial governments to some extent.

I hope that it will, Mr. Speaker. I continue to read:

On the other hand, this innovation also smacks of being hastily contrived to meet short-term needs only. Mr. Marchand should explain if assistance to commercial operations is to be a permanent feature of his program or if it, too, is to be dismantled when the immediate problems have passed.

I think the minister might try meeting that point when he speaks on third reading.

If the former, then a significant change in emphasis has taken place in DREE, the whole thrust of which has been to promote the development of secondary industry in designated areas. If secondary industry is now to be de-emphasized, relatively at least, a full and frank disclosure of DREE's reasoning should be given.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the minister will have the opportunity of meeting that point in a moment or two.

As long as uncertainty about DREE's basic philosophy of economic development remains, neither the private sector nor the provincial governments will be able to do any long-range planning.

I make these points because I think they are vital. They will have to be answered some time. Hopefully, they will be answered soon. We hope we will approve of the answers.

Finally, sir, I shall trespass on ground on which it is terribly dangerous for people to trespass. This legislation seeks to do what we have said over and over again must be done. It seeks, in part, to solve the economic problems that are bedeviling many young people in Quebec. I know this is tender ground to tread on, and I know that I am stepping over a quagmire that most people would not come near. I say that if we are spending millions or hundreds of millions of dollars in trying to solve the serious difficulties of that province, there ought to be no monkeying around with the language rights of Canadians in that province! I do not want to think that we, in this Parliament, are pouring out money that will be directed to certain people because they speak only one language or the other. We, in this Parliament, are committed to the full concept of federalism, and we are committed therefore to the concept that a person has the right to speak either one of the two official languages of Canada. Therefore, let no government say that the money can only be used to provide jobs for people who speak only one of the two official languages of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it requires 15 Senators to make up a quorum in the other place. I think, if we are really sincere in passing the best type of legislation, we should do our utmost to make sure that both Houses of Parliament consider this bill in depth. It affects the various areas of Canada. I, therefore, hope to hear right now that the members of the other place are willing to give this matter study in depth.

An hon. Member: What a hope.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The other place is asleep already.

Mr. Skoberg: I consider myself, first, to be a Canadian. My ancestors come from another country. My father, who came from Sweden, has experienced circumstances such as we are experiencing in Canada at this time. I believe that many people will be interested in reading a book that is now available in the library which deals with some economic aspects of Canada. I am referring to the book by Professor Gunnar Adler-Karlsson on the subject of reclaiming the Canadian economy. I think the minister ought to read this book, and then examine the legislation now before the House. He ought to determine whether the amount of money being spent by the Canadian people for economic development in certain areas will benefit all Canadians, or whether some of that money will go to other countries in the form of dividends.

I will be amazed if the minister states he is not aware or is not concerned about whether the dividends we are paying in Canadian tax dollars are staying in Canada or going outside our borders. The same applies to the type of control over the tax dollars being put into this type of program. We must be concerned about whether our tax dollars being used for economic expansion are benefiting Canadians or whether they are benefiting other people who are taking over industry in this country.

Not very long ago certain areas in Canada were referred to as growth centres. I welcomed the report of the minister when he named the growth centres in Canada. The area of Moose Jaw, which I represent, was designated as a growth centre. I thought that many things would happen. I thought the minister and the department would study the situation and attempt to do something for these growth centres. We now know these growth centres mean very little to the minister and his department. Although they are studying certain situations in this country, they are not looking at the original intent of the legislation passed in this House. Assistance was to be given to these growth centres to enable them to catch up with other parts of Canada. The legislation now before us does little to enhance the position of the original growth centre concept which we thought would benefit Canada.

We were very pleased when the government accepted the motion for production of papers No. 224, dated March 10, 1970. A copy of the study of ways to implement mobility undertaken by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the fiscal year 1967-68, as mentioned in the answer to question No. 1323 put last session, was made available. No doubt much time could be spent studying the consultants' report. The report indicated that people migrating from rural to urban areas tend to find employment lowest in status and lowest in income.

Agriculture and fishing should be treated as an industry in the concept of this bill. Too often hon. members, particularly those in the Liberal party, refer to the fact that our rural area represents only 10 per cent of the Canadian population. If the minister were really concerned, he would realize that the farming and fishing industries in Canada are still our most important industries and should be treated accordingly. Somewhere along the line the government has forgotten this fact. They have failed to realize that if we assisted the farming and fishing industries of Canada, many of today's problems would not exist. As indicated in the consultants' report, many people are forced to leave the fishing and farming industries and move to our large cities. We should be concerned about the situation in which they then find themselves. If the minister is sincere, he will try to bring about an equitable situation for all Canadians.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

Under the program of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, the only people able to receive assistance are those employed in the receiving centres or who have obtained employment through consultation with Manpower. Many people who move to the nearest area where work is available are not covered by the Manpower program, such as farmers, fishermen and others who are self-employed.

If the rights of everyone are to be recognized on an equitable basis, the minister and departments of government must be concerned. There must be a large mobility program. There is no cohesion among departments of government with regard to introducing a program that would be of benefit to this country. I strongly urge the minister to consult other departments of government in order to establish a comprehensive program which would be of assistance to Canada. There is no use saying that a particular area of Canada will receive special benefits if the minister is not sincere.

If we are not to have undue hardship, the Department of Labour, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and other government departments must work together to create employment. I am sure that enough has been said in this House to make the minister realize that a credible approach must be made to solve this problem. Nothing has been done which suggests that this government is credible in the eyes of the nation. The previous program of this government was not credible. With regard to what they are now proposing we must be suspicious about their attempt to have industry established in needy areas.

I urge the minister to bear in mind that farming and fishing are still the basic industries in Canada. If he does not accept that, he is dragging farmers away from their land and fishermen away from their nets. It will be a situation from which there will be no return.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Regional Development on several occasions has placed on record the position of my party. A number of hon. members have reviewed Bill C-205 in the last few hours, as well as on second reading and referral of the bill to committee on December 10. There has been a detailed explanation as to why we are unhappy with the bill. I think the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) understands my personal objections to the bill. There has been talk about the underlying principles of regional development. It has been stated that this bill applies to a short-term problem which is in direct contrast with the minister's philosophy. The minister contradicted his own position on a number of occasions by admitting that this bill will not have any effect on the problem in the area for which it was designed, even in the next six or seven months. As far as I am concerned he is admitting that this is a bad bill for Canada and at the same time it is no good for Montreal. That is the situation. It is a bad bill for Canada and it is no good for Montreal either. We have talked about the loans program, and we have placed before Parliament on numerous occasions and again in committee the feelings we have had about the program. We suggested major amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act which could have made an act which is not functioning in many parts of Canada more functional. We have suggested the use of special pieces of legislation now on the books which could help with the cyclical short-term problem in Montreal, Vancouver and other parts of Canada which are suffering from a temporary setback, perhaps as a result of the general economic situation.

We have talked about the need for more emphasis on resource incentive programs for resource development, which really means economic expansion. We have talked about the need for consultation with the provinces, with the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and with other agencies. We have talked about the absolute need for an expanding economy, and the implications of this sort of thing for the regions of Canada which suffer in terms of disparity.

I think we have presented a most reasonable approach to the basis of our objections. At least I can speak for myself, and I would not want to implicate anybody in my own thinking, but a very reasonable approach to the reasons why this bill is not functional has been put forward: it is diluting an existing program without the added advantage of assisting the area for which it was designed. I listened to the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) and to a few other members who mentioned the fact that every time we touch a piece of legislation here, no matter how logical the arguments or what the motivation, there is always a tendency, perhaps inspired, for members to try to accuse the person presenting his case of being against existing areas and regions which suffer. For this reason, I shall not make any remarks about the position which has been taken by our party, or the position which has been taken by members of the other parties in the House, because that position has been well stated for the record. It will be repeated on numerous occasions in the next six or seven months. It will be read with some interest by the premiers of the Atlantic provinces, the premier of British Columbia, the premiers of the Prairie provinces and the premiers who are concerned with regional disparity in the central Canadian provinces, that is areas outside the great urban parts of Canada. I think we will agree that the position we have taken on this bill is a logical and reasonable position.

I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, the only thing I want to say tonight is that I have been here for two and a half years since the election in 1968, yet I have never seen a situation which is so regrettable as the one existing on December 18, 1970 at 9.05 in this House of Commons. Every member who has spoken in the last several hours has apologized for taking part in the debate. They have apologized for taking part in this particular debate which affects every region in Canada. The hon. member who preceded me made a beautiful statement. It was very brief. It lasted ten or fifteen minutes, but he did not feel like continuing. My hon. friend from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, my hon. friends from Nova Scotia, some members of the Liberal party who hardly ever speak, all apologized for taking part in the debate here at 9.10 on December 18 just before Christmas. I have been placed in the position where my rights as a Canadian, and my rights as a representative of the people, have been jeopardized because I cannot stand here this evening with the goodwill of the members of the House of Commons and do an effective job of presenting again to the Canadian people the rational reasons for objecting to this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, back in the early years of the 18th Century, Alexander Pope in "The Rape of the Lock", if I recall my poetry correctly, wrote something like this:

> The hungry judges soon the sentence sign
> And wretches hang that jurymen may dine

I cannot think of a phrase which better sums up the government's procedural approach to this bill. I suppose I would be a little out of order if I said that the House of Commons, by the procedure adopted by the government, has been blackmailed. We came here on December 10, and started to debate on the referral the second reading of this important bill. It has been pushed through. I cannot understand the reason for the urgency. The minister admits the bill can have no effect. Dr. Brewis of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, as well as the advisers to the minister, all said the bill could have no effect in the immediate future. It is not the sort of thing which will shake the whole economy of an area in a few weeks. Regardless of whether we should designate some of the most industrialized parts of this nation, what is the reason for trying to squeeze this through before Christmas, before we can give the premiers of the various provinces, the people of Canada and those citizens who are interested in economic development, a chance to react?

The minister knows he can squeeze his bill through when the House resumes in the early part of January. Does it not make sense that we should have allowed the bill to stand, regardless of whether we agree with it or not, until the Christmas recess is over so that we would be in a position to receive constructive reaction with regard to it? Perhaps even those who agree with it would like to hear constructive reaction to it. I do not agree with the bill. I say it is bad for the country, bad for regional development and not good for Montreal. To me, this is very suspicious. I am probably offending the delicate ears of a lot of members across the way, but this is the way I feel about it. I think we should have let this stand for a couple of weeks to allow for reaction. I do not agree with amending the act to include Montreal. We should have made a special provision for Montreal and used other legislation to assist in carrying out a temporary program. I asked the minister, if he wanted to amend the act, why did he not amend it substantially so that areas which could not at present avail themselves of its provision could do so. He admitted they were conducting an investigation in one province because they did not think it was working out, and this is the sort of thing I was hoping would be done. I do not think it is consistent to designate an area that has had a temporary setback but not to designate, say, Vancouver.

This is all I really want to say. I feel that the members of the House of Commons who want to make constructive suggestions with regard to legislation passing through this House have been placed in an awful predicament this evening, to the extent that I am unable to continue to offer detailed proposals to reinforce our arguments without feeling that I am out of order in doing so. We have not been given the chance to debate this matter in detail, and it is an issue that is fundamental and at the very root of regional development.

A lot of people are unhappy about the fact that there is in this country an increasing tendency toward government by ministerial decree. We used to take great exception to legislation by order in council. We are now getting similar powers placed in the hands of the minister. I do not distrust this minister, but perhaps one of these years he may not be in the position he is in now. This is why I think we should be given the opportunity to examine this legislation in some detail. Once the bill is passed and the legislation is in the minister's department, tied all neatly and tidily, all businesses in Canada, except perhaps for the corner store, are going to be at the mercy of the minister when it comes to questions of finance. As one hon. member said, to all intents and purposes the minister is going to be czar of economic development in this country, and perhaps this is true.

The arguments that we have presented are legitimate ones. They have been based on research done by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, especially Dr. Brewis. Contributions have been made by many premiers of the provinces, as well as one of the newly appointed finance ministers in the Atlantic provinces. Yet, this bill is being squeezed through. Hon. members are now allowing the bill to pass because they do not feel like pushing on any further.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think in all fairness the House would expect the minister to make some statement before the House votes on third reading. There has been a very earnest and serious debate. We have had a very exhaustive study of the bill in committee. The minister has heard arguments tonight from opposition members. Under normal circumstances, we would expect the minister to make some reply to the views put forward by hon. members.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Before allowing the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to make comments, if he wishes to, there should still be unanimous consent—

[English]

According to the rules of the House, after the minister moves the motion for third reading he is entitled to passage of the bill.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House would be disposed to give unanimous consent to hearing the minister wish us a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, if nothing else.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think this would result in another debate which I think is not in the best interests of this House.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: We will take that as read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree that the question be taken as read?

Mr. Baldwin: I meant the minister's speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the bill we have just passed will be going to the other place.

Mr. Lewis: Are there enough of them still awake?

Mr. MacEachen: I gather there will be a wait of an hour or so before we can reassemble for royal assent, so I am wondering whether, in accordance with previous discussions, we might clear up two other items before rising until the bell summons us for royal assent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: I would call item No. 39.

FARM IMPROVEMENT, SMALL BUSINESSES AND FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACTS

AMENDMENT PROVIDING ADDITIONAL THREE-YEAR LOAN PERIOD

The House resumed, from Tuesday, December 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-191, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there is also the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. This bill has received study in committee and is now at the report stage. It would require consent to deal with it today, but I believe there have been consultations and that there is a desire to pass the bill tonight.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to confirm that there have been such discussions, and if the minister would like to proceed with the bill we would give our consent.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): We agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree to forgo the necessary notices and proceed with the study of the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT EXTENDING APPLICATION TO JUNE 30, 1973

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) seconded by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), moves that Bill C-4, an act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, as amended, be concurred in.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, should the motion not be moved by a minister who is physically present?

Mr. Baldwin: It does not make any difference really.

Hon. H. A. Olson (for Mr. Greene) moved that Bill C-4, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Olson (for Mr. Greene) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, as one representing an area which has a number of gold mines, I am pleased with the suggestions made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) about recent developments continuing emergency gold mining assistance for a 2½-year period. I am also pleased about the discussions which took place before the committee to the effect that one of the criteria for the expansion of this act beyond the 2½-year period relates to the ability of mining companies, unions and communities in mining areas to get together and arrive at an arrangement as to the extension of these payments.

Obviously, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) will be involved in this matter as well as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and ministers of a number of other departments, including Manpower and Immigration, the minister responsible for the retraining program. One of the justifications for these payments can be related to the fact that over half the miners working in this industry are past the age at which they can be successfully retrained. I understand 45 per cent of them are over the age of 50. If we are to be successful in this venture, a number of government departments must provide assistance and leadership to communities and industry. I hope the government in its wisdom will consider the suggestion that it should hold newly-minted gold in the Canadian treasury because of the rising price of that metal.

In talking to representatives of mining companies it is interesting to note they believe that within the next five years the industrial price of gold will be higher than the minted price. If this is true, the government should take advantage of the mark-up. In the past it has been possible to gain profits by holding gold at a price of $35 per ounce and selling it when the price went up to $41 per ounce. There is an indication from the stock market that we might find ourselves in an enviable position within a two and half year period in respect of gold. We may be able to recover much of our loss if the government has the foresight to hold newly minted gold at $35 per ounce and sell it to the United States market at the increased price.

This is probably the fifth time I have participated in a debate on the extension of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. We have never been able to remove the word "emergency" but it is interesting to note that we have been able to reduce the number of mines requiring assistance under this act from approximately 100 to about 18 or 19, or even fewer as projected for 1973.

We have not been successful in solving the problems facing our mining communities. We have been able to do something about the industry. Obviously, these community problems will be solved by the natural course of events. The government has conducted interdepartmental studies. Representatives of mining companies have participated in these studies. I understand they were very frank in making disclosures regarding reserves. The communities have been very frank in respect of capital expenditures and potential development. The government should give leadership to these communities.

It is unfortunate the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) is not here to speak for his riding. His riding and the riding of Timiskaming, which includes Timmins and Kirkland Lake, have developed with the support of the gold mining industry. Considerable capital investment is involved there and this capital investment could be of great value to other industries which might be established in these areas. These communities have been unable to offer industrial incentives required to attract new industry. I hope the government will accept the responsibility of finding ways to attract this industry so that after the 2½-year period we will be able to look back and say that these years were productive. I express the hope that we will not have to ask for an extension of the act after this period but will have a measure of much more permanent nature.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise to suggest now we move to the next stage of our proceedings. I should like, first of all, to thank my colleagues—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the minister speaking on this bill?

Mr. MacEachen: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I understood the bill had received third reading, but apparently I was wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Does the House agree to third reading of this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, before we move to the next stage of our proceedings I wish to take the opportunity—this may be my last opportunity before the recess—to thank opposition House leaders, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) for the co-operation they have extended during this part of the session. We are ending the session in an atmosphere free of confrontation. The progress we have made this week in our legislative program is the result of the co-operative and conslutative atmosphere which has prevailed in our relationships. I am very grateful for that. I should like, also, to extend to hon. members my best wishes for a Merry Christmas as they leave for what I hope will be a pleasant respite from their labours. They well deserve this period of rest until January 11.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, in the festive spirit I should like briefly to acknowledge the fact that a new chief government whip has been appointed. I am sure all members wish him every success in his endeavour to bring peace and good will to this House of Commons.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I suggest we might rise until the call of the bell.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it might be agreeable to hon. members, since we are to rise until called back by the bell, to join the Speaker and the officers of the House as well as some of our distinguished colleagues from the Press Gallery, in Room 16 to fraternize in the true spirit of Christmas.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 9.35 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 11.15 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

December 19, 1970

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today at 11.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau,
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by Major Guay Vandelac, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (11:40 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General has been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1971.

An Act to amend the Anti-dumping Act

An Act to establish the Tax Review Board to make certain amendments to other Acts in relation thereto

An Act respecting grain

An Act respecting cooperative associations

An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company

An Act to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act and to amend an Act to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act

An Act to amend the Old Age Secuirty Act

An Act to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members leave the House of Commons for a well deserved and richly earned holiday, may I, in the name of my wife and personally, wish you all a very Merry Christmas with your families and wish you a happy healthy and prosperous New Year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) seconded by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle), moves that this House do now adjourn. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

At 11.49 p.m. the House adjourned, pursuant to Special Order, until two o'clock on Monday, January 11, 1971.

APPENDIX

PROMULGATION OF FISHERIES CLOSING LINES

With the adoption of the amendments to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act earlier this year Parliament laid the foundation for the establishment of exclusive Canadian fishing zones comprising certain areas of the sea adjacent to the coast of Canada. As explained to the House on April 17, these provisions were enabling only and the creation of the new zones required executive action by way of an Order in Council. The required action is now being taken to draw "fisheries closing lines" across the entrances to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Bay of Fundy, Queen Charlotte Sound and Dixon Entrance-Hecate Strait. A Government Notice to this effect will be published in the Canada Gazette on December 26. The fisheries closing lines will then be brought into force immediately upon the expiration of the mandatory 60-day waiting period imposed by the amended Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act.

There are special geographic and legal factors pertaining to the areas affected by the Government's action, and Canada has historic and other claims to these areas. The establishment of exclusive fishing zones in the bodies of water under reference, as has been made clear on previous occasions, can in no way be construed as an abandonment of those claims by Canada. It is also well known that the new fishing zones we are creating are of vital importance to Canadian fishing interests. The Gulf of St. Lawrence alone has had landings of up to 550 million pounds valued at some $31 million, the Bay of Fundy's landings of 300 million pounds are worth $12 million, while the Pacific coast area contained within Dixon Entrance and Queen Charlotte Sound has landings of 180 million pounds, worth $37 million a year.

These are, of course, important considerations, but the Government objectives in introducing this imaginative concept of fisheries closing lines go beyond the securing of immediate economic benefits, as was outlined by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his statement to the House of April 17. On that occasion, he pointed out that:

"Now that the world is becoming aware that living resources are not infinitely renewable and that they can indeed be exhausted or depleted by overexploitation or wiped out by means of pollution of the sea, it is vitally necessary to apply to the exploitation of these resources some of the techniques which have been developed for offshore mineral resources. The action now being taken by Canada is a step in this direction, a step toward a more logical and systematic approach to the management of living marine resources.

Exclusive rights to harvest may be necessary, but they are not an end in themselves. The end we have in mind is conservation and rational management, and for this purpose we require jurisdiction. That jurisdiction, however, does not rule out the possibility of sharing fisheries exploitation with other countries; it does, however, allow us to set rules for that exploitation, to impose licensing requirements if necessary and thus to share the financial burden of conservation as well as the financial rewards of exploitation."

The fisheries closing lines being promulgated by the Government represent a very important step forward in the conservation and protection of Canada's coastal fisheries. It must be recognized, however, that there is also a need for international as well as national action if we are to preserve the marine environment and its living resources for future generations. For this reason the Government has been consulting with other interested countries for more than two years with respect to the convening of a Law of the Sea conference which would deal effectively with these problems.

The possibility of convening such a conference has been under discussion in the current session of the United Nations General Assembly and the Assembly has now resolved that a conference should be held in 1973. It is Canada's hope that there will emerge from that conference a rational system of fisheries conservation, management and exploitation in the common interest of all countries, including a clear recognition of the special rights and responsibilities of coastal states with respect to the living resources of the sea, and particularly the protection of the Atlantic and Pacific salmon stocks which are being maintained at considerable cost by the efforts of coastal states such as Canada and the USA.

In addition, it is Canada's view that the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment to be convened in Stockholm in June of 1972 will offer an important and indeed crucial opportunity for the international community to adopt a bold and constructive approach to the preservation of the marine environment. The living resources of the sea are the greatest wealth of the sea, and it is those resources, of course, which are most directly threatened by marine pollution. The Stockholm Conference, we hope, will include among its achievements the laying of a foundation for a global attack on marine pollution, including the work on this problem which we hope will be undertaken at the proposed conference on the Law of the Sea.

Having established the new fishing zones, the Government intends to conclude negotiations for the phasing out of the fishing activities of certain countries which have traditionally fished in the areas concerned, namely the United Kingdom, Denmark, France, Italy, Norway, Portugal and Spain. Canada has recently entered into an agreement on reciprocal fishing privileges with the U.S.A. and the activities of United States fishermen in the areas concerned will not be affected by the promulgation of our fisheries closing lines. There are as well other treaty arrangements with the United States and also France off Canada's east coast, and similarly the rights accruing under these treaties will be respected.

There may be differences of views as to whether or not a phasing-out period should be granted for countries which have carried on traditional fishing practices in areas over which a coastal state has established fisheries jurisdiction, as we are now doing in Canada's special bodies of water. There can, however, be no such differences of views with respect to areas which have become part of Canada's 12-mile territorial sea.

The extension of Canada's territorial sea to 12 miles and the establishment of exclusive Canadian fishing zones in the special bodies of water will permit us to conclude expeditiously the negotiations begun in 1964 following the passage of the Territorial Seas and Fishing Zones Act.

END OF VOLUME II
