INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

L'année 1948 a été marquée par le changement : changement de leadership et, jusqu'à un certain point, changement d'orientation pour le gouvernement du Canada et son ministère des Affaires extérieures. À la fin de janvier 1948, William Lyon Mackenzie King annonça sa décision de quitter ses fonctions de Premier ministre. Seize mois plus tôt, il avait abandonné le portefeuille des Affaires extérieures, mais ni ce geste ni sa décision de partir ne mirent fin à l'intérêt qu'il portait à l'élaboration et à la mise en oeuvre de la politique extérieure du Canada ou à sa participation au processus. Le rôle de King ne fait aucun doute à la lecture de la présente collection de documents; celle-ci comporte obligatoirement des extraits du journal du Premier ministre afin d'éclaircir certains détails clés d'un épisode d'une importance majeure que Robert Cuff et J.L. Granatstein ont qualifié de «croissance et déclin du projet de libre-échange canado-américain»<sup>1</sup>. De plus, à bien d'autres occasions, l'intervention de King se révéla déterminante ou bien son influence déclencha le réexamen de politiques. La déclaration officielle dans laquelle il annonça son départ avant la fin de l'année marqua néanmoins le début de la fin d'une époque.

En août 1948, Louis S. Saint-Laurent, qui avait succédé à King comme secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures deux ans plus tôt, remporta la course à la direction du Parti libéral. Il n'assuma toutefois la charge de Premier ministre que le 15 novembre, une fois Mackenzie King rentré de la réunion de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies à Paris et de celle des premiers ministres du Commonwealth à Londres (à laquelle il ne put assister pour des raisons de santé). À ce moment, Lester B. Pearson, qui avait été pendant deux ans sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, était entré en politique comme il l'avait donné à entendre à Norman Robertson au début de juin<sup>2</sup>. Devenu secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures le 10 septembre, il sera le plus souvent absent d'Ottawa jusqu'à la fin de l'année, d'abord pour faire campagne comme candidat lors des élections complémentaires dans la circonscription d'Algoma-Est puis pour représenter le Canada à des réunions à Paris et à Londres.

La direction politique des Affaires extérieures releva donc pour une longue période d'un ministre suppléant, le ministre de la Défense nationale, Brooke Claxton. Son principal conseiller au ministère, tout au cours de l'automne, fut Escott Reid qui était devenu sous-secrétaire d'État par intérim le lendemain de la nomination de Pearson à la tête du ministère. Entre-temps, la recherche d'un successeur permanent à Pearson se trouva entremêlée avec les efforts, entrepris plus tôt, en vue de trouver un haut fonctionnaire francophone capable de remplacer Laurent Beaudry, qui avait dû démissionner comme sous-secrétaire associé pour des raisons de santé. Les tentatives en vue de maintenir une présence francophone aux plus hauts échelons du ministère échouèrent lorsque, dans un premier temps, Pierre Dupuy déclina le poste de sous-secrétaire suppléant et que par la suite Jean Désy résista aux pressions de Pearson qui voulait en faire son successeur. Pearson avait alors déjà approché Arnold Heeney, greffier du Conseil privé. Cette intrigue secondaire ne connut son

INTRODUCTION

The year covered in this volume was one of change in leadership, and to some extent also in direction, for the Government of Canada and for its Department of External Affairs. In late January 1948, William Lyon Mackenzie King announced his decision to retire as Prime Minister. Sixteen months earlier, he had relinquished the portfolio of Secretary of State for External Affairs, but neither that change nor the announcement of his retirement ended his interest or involvement in the development and implementation of Canada's foreign policy. There is ample evidence of that impact in this collection of documents, which necessarily includes extracts from the Prime Minister's diary to fill important gaps in one major story, what Robert Cuff and J.L. Granatstein called 'The Rise and Fall of Canadian-American Free Trade.'<sup>1</sup> As well, there were many other instances when Mackenzie King's intervention proved decisive or when his influence prompted a reconsideration of policy. Even so, his formal declaration that he would leave the office of Prime Minister before the end of the year anticipated the end of an era.

In August 1948, Louis S. St. Laurent, who had succeeded King as Secretary of State for External Affairs two years earlier, won the leadership of the Liberal Party, though he did not immediately take over as Prime Minister. Not until after Mackenzie King returned from the meetings of the United Nations General Assembly in Paris and the Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth in London (which he was unable to attend for reasons of health) did St. Laurent finally assume the mantle of Prime Minister on 15 November 1948. By then, Lester B. Pearson, who had served for two years as Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, had made the transition to politics, about which he had hinted to Norman Robertson at the beginning of June.<sup>2</sup> On 10 September 1948, Pearson became Secretary of State for External Affairs. From then until the end of the year, Pearson was more often away from Ottawa, first to fight a by-election in Algoma East, then to represent Canada at meetings in Paris and London.

As a consequence, the political direction of the Department of External Affairs was for a considerable time in the hands of an acting minister, the Minister of National Defence, Brooke Claxton. The principal official advising him throughout the autumn was Escott Reid, who had assumed responsibility as Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs the day after Pearson's appointment as Minister. Meanwhile, the search for a permanent successor to Pearson became entangled with an earlier effort to find a senior francophone official to replace Laurent Beaudry, who had been forced to resign as Associate Under-Secretary for reasons of health. Efforts to maintain a francophone presence in the highest ranks of the Department failed when first Pierre Dupuy declined the position of Deputy Under-Secretary and later Jean Désy resisted Pearson's entreaties to succeed him as Under-Secretary. By then, Pearson had already approached the Clerk of the Privy Council, Arnold Heeney, about the latter position. That particular sub-plot was not dénouement que lorsque ce dernier devint sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures en mars 1949.

Le Ministère poursuivit son expansion en 1948, et à un rythme à peine moins spectaculaire que l'année précédente. Le service extérieur passa à 216 membres (une augmentation de 23 %) et le Ministère, à 1 213 employés (une augmentation de 47 %). Environ la moitié du personnel travaillait à l'étranger. Sept postes furent ouverts : une légation à Belgrade, deux représentations permanentes auprès des Nations Unies, l'une à New York et l'autre à Genève, un consulat général à San Francisco ainsi que des consulats à Détroit, à Boston et à Francfort. De plus, la légation à Rome fut élevée au rang d'ambassade. À la fin de l'année, le Canada comptait 44 missions à l'étranger : 14 ambassades, huit légations, sept hauts-commissariats, 11 bureaux consulaires et quatre missions spéciales<sup>3</sup>.

Si les femmes furent admises pour la première fois comme agents du service extérieur en 1947, leur nombre restait par ailleurs très limité. D'autre part, le lecteur remarquera sans aucun doute l'absence de documents en français dans le présent volume. En fait, un seul (le document 786) fut rédigé entièrement en français; d'autres ne renfermaient que de brefs passages dans cette langue. Même les communications en provenance de Paris (fut-ce de l'ambassade ou de la délégation à l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies) étaient rédigées en anglais. On peut en trouver une explication dans un extrait des délibérations d'un comité ministériel spécial sur les rapports préparés par les missions (document 7).

Mises à part quelques exceptions, on ne trouvera pas le type de dépêches ou d'analyses qui retenaient le plus l'attention de ce comité, à savoir les rapports sur la situation dans les pays hôtes. La première de ces exceptions a trait à l'une des crises fondamentales de 1948, à savoir le coup d'État communiste en Tchécoslovaquie et la deuxième, aux politiques nationales et aux relations internationales de deux des plus vieux et des plus grands alliés du Canada, la Grande-Bretagne et la France, qui présentèrent d'épineux problèmes aux occupants de l'Édifice de l'Est sur la Colline parlementaire. Les dépêches pertinentes ont été reproduites car elles aident à comprendre d'une part le contexte dans lequel le gouvernement du Canada et le ministère des Affaires extérieures cherchaient à définir les engagements du Canada à l'étranger et, d'autre part, certaines des réactions spécifiques à cette évolution de la situation internationale. Une autre préoccupation du Ministère à savoir l'attitude et les intentions de l'Union soviétique, est reflétée dans les documents qui complètent l'histoire amorcée dans le chapitre V du volume 13 des Documents sur les relations extérieures du Canada.

Cette préoccupation n'était que la manifestation la plus évidente d'une nouvelle donne dont on retrouve la trace partout dans le présent ouvrage : le début de ce qui commençait à être surnommé «la guerre froide». Même si cette expression n'est utilisée que dans deux documents (1079 et 1082), cherchant l'un et l'autre à résoudre l'énigme de la politique soviétique, l'impact de la bipolarisation du monde est évident dans presque tous les chapitres. Le niveau de la représentation du Canada à Prague et à Varsovie fut réévalué au lendemain du coup d'État en Tchécoslovaquie. Et, au moment d'arrêter sa position à l'égard des règlements de paix conclus avec l'Allemagne et le Japon, le Canada prit en compte leur impact sur les relations entre l'Est et l'Ouest. La plupart des grandes questions soumises au Conseil de sécurité resolved until Heeney became Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs in March 1949.

The Department of External Affairs continued to expand in 1948, with only a slight variation in the dramatic growth witnessed in 1947. The foreign service was enlarged by 23% to 216, while the staff increased by 47% to 1,213. Roughly half of the employees worked abroad. Seven new Canadian posts were opened in 1948: a Legation in Belgrade; permanent representation to the United Nations in New York and Geneva; a Consulate-General in San Francisco; Consulates in Detroit, Boston and Frankfurt. During the year, the Legation in Rome was raised to the status of an Embassy. By the end of the year, Canada had 44 posts abroad: 14 Embassies, 8 Legations, 7 High Commissioners' Offices; 11 consular offices and 4 special missions.<sup>3</sup>

Although the first women had been appointed as foreign service officers in 1947, their numbers were still meagre. Also conspicuous to a modern reader is the absence of French from the documents reproduced in this volume. Only one document (786) was written entirely in French, with brief extracts in others. Even communications from Paris (whether from the Embassy or from the Delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations) and Brussels were sent in English. An explanation of that tendency may be found in an extract from the deliberations of a special departmental committee on reporting from posts (Document 7).

With few exceptions, the documents selected for this volume do not include the kind of despatches or analyses which most preoccupied that committee, those which reported on the situation in the host country. The departures from this rule deal with one of the fundamental crises in 1948, the Communist coup in Czechoslovakia, as well as tendencies in the national policies and international relations of two of Canada's oldest and closest allies, Britain and France, which posed difficult problems for the occupants of the East Block on Parliament Hill. These despatches are included here as they help to explain the context in which the Government of Canada and the Department of External Affairs considered Canada's overseas commitments as well as some of the specific responses to these international changes. Another preoccupation of the Department, the attitudes and intentions of the Soviet Union, is reflected in the documents which complete the story begun in Chapter V of Volume 13 in Documents on Canadian External Relations.

That concern was simply the most obvious manifestation of a development whose influence pervades this volume, the onset of what was becoming known as the 'cold war'. Though that phrase is employed in only two documents (1079 and 1082), both of which are attempts to solve the conundrum of Soviet policy, the impact of the bi-polar world is evident in virtually every chapter of this book. The level of Canada's representation in Prague and Warsaw was reviewed in the light of the coup in Czechoslovakia. Canada's attitude toward the peace settlements with Germany and Japan was considered for its implications on relations between East and West. Most issues which came before the Security Council of the United Nations, on which Canada was now represented, were interpreted or debated along the des Nations Unies, auquel siégeait alors le Canada, furent d'ailleurs interprétées ou débattues avec la guerre froide comme toile de fond. Qu'il fut question de décider de l'admission de nouveaux membres à l'ONU ou de chercher à résoudre les conflits en Palestine, en Indonésie, en Corée ou au Cachemire, la délégation canadienne se retrouva souvent aux premières lignes dans la guerre de mots que se livraient deux idéologies opposées.

«Aujourd'hui, il n'est qu'un agresseur possible,» affirma Brooke Claxton à la Chambre des communes le 24 juin 1948. «Le seul conflit auquel le Canada prendrait part serait un conflit universel, une guerre totale<sup>4</sup>.» Les négociateurs canadiens jouèrent un rôle important dans l'élaboration du système de sécurité collective mis en place pour contrer la menace soviétique. La négociation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord se déroula en trois étapes : des réunions tripartites en mars auxquelles participèrent les États-Unis, la Grande-Bretagne et le Canada; des rencontres, à Washington, entre les ambassadeurs de ces pays et d'autres signataires du Traité de Bruxelles durant l'été; et de nouvelles rencontres entre les ambassadeurs, qui se poursuivaient toujours à la fin de l'année. Le département d'État prépara un compte rendu des rencontres des ambassadeurs, qui a été reproduit dans Foreign Relations of the United States (1948, volume III). Plutôt que de reprendre ce compte rendu, nous nous en sommes remis aux rapports canadiens sur les discussions et les négociations, ainsi qu'à certains comptes rendus des groupes de travail préparés par l'ambassade du Canada. Deux ouvrages, Time of Fear and Hope (Toronto, 1977) d'Escott Reid, et In Defence of Canada: Growing Up Allied (Toronto, 1980) de James Eayrs, ont puisé à ces sources. Sauf pour quelques nuances, la version des faits relatée ici est sensiblement la même. J'ai voulu couvrir ces négociations le plus complètement possible pour montrer à quel point ce sujet était important pour les décideurs à Ottawa et pour préserver l'équilibre dans ce survol des relations extérieures du Canada.

Même si ce chapitre débute par une tribulation plutôt familière pour Mackenzie King — la tendance des Britanniques à se livrer à des généralisations concernant les attitudes, les intérêts et les engagements du Commonwealth —, il importe de signaler que le Premier ministre ne fut pas aussi hésitant dans sa réponse (document 298) à la demande que lui avait faite le Premier ministre britannique Clement Attlee de participer aux discussions préliminaires sur la sécurité dans l'Atlantique Nord (document 296). En fait, King s'arrangea même pour lier la possibilité d'une coopération économique dans le cadre d'un éventuel Traité de l'Atlantique Nord et l'abandon du projet de libre-échange entre le Canada et les États-Unis (documents 323, 647 et 648). Fort conscient des réticences habituelles du Premier ministre au sujet d'engagements, réels ou appréhendés, Pearson souligna à plusieurs reprises que les discussions n'engageraient à rien. À l'automne, Reid tenta de convaincre ses collègues, son ministre et son ministre suppléant que le Cabinet devrait approuver l'ensemble de documents sur cette question. Une bonne indication des tensions suscitées par ces discussions et fournie par la démarche de Reid auprès de Pearson (document 425) et la conversation téléphonique entre Brooke Claxton et Hume Wrong (document 441) ainsi que par les commentaires sur la formulation de certains textes (particulièrement les observations incisives de Norman Robertson dans le document 414).

lines of the cold war. Whether the question was the admission of new members to the United Nations or an attempt to resolve conflicts in Palestine, Indonesia, Korea or Kashmir, the Canadian delegation often found itself in the front lines of a rhetorical contest between opposing ideologies.

"Today there is only one possible aggressor," Brooke Claxton told the House of Commons on 24 June 1948, "the only war in which Canada would take part would be a world war, a total war."<sup>4</sup> Canadian negotiators played an important part in the elaboration of that form of collective security, the North Atlantic Treaty, which was devised to counter the Soviet threat. Those negotiations took place in three phases: tripartite meetings in March involving the United States, Britain and Canada; meetings of the Ambassadors in Washington of these countries with other signatories of the Brussels Treaty during the summer; and further meetings of Ambassadors which had not concluded when the year ended. The State Department prepared minutes of the meetings of Ambassadors, which have been published in the Foreign Relations of the United States (1948, Volume III). Rather than duplicate that record, I have relied on Canadian reports of the discussions and negotiations, supplemented by some minutes of the working groups prepared by the Canadian Embassy. Two published accounts, Time of Fear and Hope (Toronto, 1977) by Escott Reid and In Defence of Canada: Growing Up Allied (Toronto, 1980) by James Eays, have made use of some of this material. What is printed here adds some shading and nuance to those versions of events, though not significant differences. To reflect the importance of this subject to policy-makers in Ottawa and to preserve balance within this overview of Canada's international relations, I decided to cover these negotiations as completely as possible.

Although this chapter begins with a familiar tribulation for Mackenzie King — the British tendency to generalize about the attitudes, interests and commitments of the Commonwealth — it is noteworthy that the Prime Minister was not so hesitant in his response (Document 298) to the appeal from the British Prime Minister, Clement Attlee, to participate in the preliminary discussions about North Atlantic security (Document 296). Indeed, King even contrived to link the possibility of economic cooperation under a North Atlantic Treaty to the abandonment of Canadian-American free trade (Documents 323, 647 and 648). Ever mindful of the Prime Minister's traditional wariness about commitments real or imagined, Pearson frequently emphasised the non-committal nature of the talks. In the autumn, Reid attempted to persuade his colleagues, his Minister and his acting Minister that the Cabinet should endorse a comprehensive package of documents on this subject. Some sense of the tensions evoked by this exercise can be found in Reid's appeal to Pearson (Document 425) and Claxton's telephone conversation with Hume Wrong (Document 441) as well as the comments on drafting (particularly Norman Robertson's cutting remarks in Document 414).

In the midst of this flurry of activity, Heeney wrote privately to Pearson that 'the combination of your acting Minister and acting Under-Secretary is pretty exhausting as you can imagine. The production of papers and the volume thereof has struck an all time high I should think and the North Atlantic crusade which you started is

Au milieu de toute cette activité, Heeney écrit en privé à Pearson : «[L]’action combinée de votre ministre suppléant et de votre sous-secrétaire par intérim a un effet plutôt exténuant, comme vous pouvez vous en douter. La production de documents et leur volume ont sans doute atteint un niveau record, et je crains que les notes de service n’aient raison de la croisade que vous avez amorcée au sujet du Traité de l’Atlantique Nord<sup>5</sup>.» Robertson, un ancien et futur sous-secrétaire, était aussi d’avis qu’en l’absence du ministre, son suppléant avait naturellement tendance à «saisir le Cabinet de questions qu’un ministre en titre sur place cherchera[it] à régler lui-même ou en consultation étroite avec ses collègues du Cabinet que ces questions intéressent tout particulièrement<sup>6</sup>». Pearson, toutefois, ne rentra qu’à la mi-décembre à Ottawa, où sa relation de travail étroite avec Louis Saint-Laurent, alors Premier ministre, facilita l’examen des grands dossiers de politique étrangère.

La position à adopter face au blocus soviétique de Berlin et au pont aérien mis subséquemment en place par les alliés fut l’un des points sur lesquels Mackenzie King s’opposa à Saint-Laurent et à Pearson. Malheureusement, ce furent les Britanniques qui, les premiers, demandèrent l’aide du Canada (documents 491 et 494) et la presse eut vent de la chose. King y vit un scénario semblable à celui de la crise de Chanak en 1922, épisode resté gravé dans sa mémoire comme une tentative d’un gouvernement britannique belliqueux de presser son gouvernement de soutenir aveuglément une intervention militaire à la marge des intérêts impériaux. Facile à caricaturer, la circonspection du Premier ministre était compréhensible et sa crainte d’un casus belli impliquant un avion ou un pilote canadien et susceptible de déclencher une Troisième Guerre mondiale était partagée par quelqu’un que ne hantait pas le spectre de Chanak, à savoir Brooke Claxton. King fut certainement soulagé quand ce dernier s’opposa, au Cabinet, à la participation du Canada au pont aérien (document 498). Deux lettres (documents 499 et 506) font ressortir les divergences d’opinion entre Claxton et Pearson.

Au fur et à mesure que d’autres dominions répondaient positivement à l’appel d’aide de la Grande-Bretagne, les pressions privées et publiques sur le gouvernement se firent plus insistantes. Il ressort clairement des archives de l’ambassade à Washington que le département d’État et les autorités militaires américaines souhaitaient elles aussi vivement la participation du Canada (documents 521, 522, 528, 532 et 533), mais il est aussi évident que Pearson y fut pour quelque chose (documents 519 et 520). Il ne fait pas de doute que l’approche initiale via Londres compliqua l’examen de la question à Ottawa, comme d’ailleurs l’impression du premier ministre sortant qu’une guerre était imminente. Ce sentiment était né durant une séance d’information donnée par le secrétaire aux Affaires étrangères de Grande-Bretagne, Ernest Bevin, quand King s’était rendu à Londres à l’occasion du mariage royal en novembre 1947, et il était toujours présent un an plus tard lorsque le premier ministre prit sa retraite. Comme on pouvait s’y attendre, deux semaines après le départ de King, Pearson pressa Saint-Laurent de reconsidérer la question (document 535). À la fin de l’année, toutefois, le Canada restait sur la touche.

La guerre froide eut aussi un impact sur les relations du Canada avec le reste du Commonwealth même si King ne jugeait pas que cela justifiait de devancer la date in danger of being checked by memoranda.<sup>5</sup> Robertson, a former and future Under-Secretary, shared the view that while the Minister was away there was a natural tendency for an acting Minister 'to take to Cabinet questions which a full-time Minister at his desk will try to dispose of either by himself or in direct consultation with those of his Cabinet colleagues most interested in a particular question.'<sup>6</sup> But it was not until mid-December that Pearson returned to Ottawa, where his close working relationship with Louis St. Laurent, by then Prime Minister, eased further consideration of the fundamental questions of foreign policy.

One issue on which St. Laurent and Pearson had found themselves opposed by Mackenzie King was the question of how Canada should respond to the Soviet blockade of Berlin and the resultant airlift by western allies. Unfortunately, the first approach for Canadian aid came from the British (Documents 491 and 494) and was leaked to the press. To King, this was reminiscent of the Chanak Crisis of 1922, seared in his memory as an attempt by a bellicose British government to stampede his government into blind support for British military intervention at the margins of imperial interests. This reaction is easy to caricature, but King's caution was understandable and his fear that an incident involving a Canadian aircraft or pilot would be a casus belli for a Third World War was shared by someone not haunted by the spectre of Chanak, Brooke Claxton. King was certainly relieved when Claxton opposed participation in the airlift in the Cabinet (Document 498). The differences between Claxton and Pearson are covered in two letters (Documents 499 and 506).

As other Dominions responded positively to the British appeal for help, the public and private pressure on the Canadian Government mounted. Records from the Embassy in Washington make it clear that the State Department and American military authorities were also anxious that Canada should participate (Documents 521, 522, 528, 532 and 533), though it is also evident that Pearson played a part in stimulating this expression of concern (Documents 519 and 520). There is no doubt that the initial approach through London complicated consideration of the question in Ottawa, as did the outgoing Prime Minister's sense that war was imminent. That sentiment had first been aroused at a briefing by the British Foreign Secretary, Ernest Bevin, when King was in London in November 1947 for the Royal Wedding, and it was still present a year later when he retired. Not surprisingly, two weeks after King's departure, Pearson appealed to St. Laurent to reconsider the question (Document 535). By year's end, however, Canada was still a bystander.

The cold war was also a factor in Canada's relations with the rest of the Commonwealth, though King did not regard it as a sufficient reason to advance the date for the meeting of Prime Ministers. As that gathering loomed, there were also objections in Ottawa to implications in the British approach to defence relations that the Commonwealth should be a focus for collective security. However, many of the items on the agenda were familiar: relations between sterling and dollar countries; regular consultation among members and the status or designation of de la réunion des premiers ministres. À l'approche de la réunion, certains à Ottawa s'opposèrent au fait que, dans leur approche des relations en matière de défense, les Britanniques semblaient voir le Commonwealth comme un instrument de la sécurité collective. Toutefois, bon nombre des points à l'ordre du jour étaient familiers : les relations entre les pays de la zone sterling et ceux de la zone dollar; les consultations régulières entre les membres; et le statut ou la désignation des chefs de mission. En revanche, la décision de l'Irlande d'abroger la Loi sur les relations extérieures, son dernier lien formel avec la monarchie, et celle de l'Inde de se doter d'une constitution républicaine présentaient des défis plus importants pour le Canada et le reste du Commonwealth. Dans le premier cas, il y avait un mouvement vers la séparation d'avec le Commonwealth (tout en prenant soin de protéger le traitement préférentiel relativement au commerce et à la citoyenneté), mais les relations avec l'Inde furent caractérisées par un désir sincère d'en arriver à un compromis. Le gouvernement canadien fut quelque peu pris au dépourvu lorsque le Premier ministre John Costello, dans une allocution prononcée au Canada, fit part de l'intention de l'Irlande de quitter le Commonwealth (document 922). Il ressortit toutefois d'un entretien privé entre Mackenzie King et Costello que les deux parties étaient tout aussi désireuses d'opérer ce changement le plus amicalement possible<sup>7</sup>. Si Mackenzie King tenta de trouver dans le cas de l'Inde une formulation de compromis, Pearson pour sa part participa très activement aux négociations avec Nehru et d'autres en vue de garder une Inde républicaine dans un Commonwealth jusque-là monarchique. Pour le Canada, il importait de garder l'Inde dans le Commonwealth, tant comme membre le plus influent d'Asie que comme rempart possible pour l'Ouest dans cette région. En fait, il s'agissait de redéfinir le Commonwealth.

Ce qui ressort tout spécialement du chapitre sur le Commonwealth (et des archives ministérielles à partir desquelles il a été élaboré), c'est l'insignifiance relative des relations bilatérales, exception faite des rapports financiers et commerciaux entre le Canada et la Grande-Bretagne. La dépêche de Norman Robertson reproduite dans le présent volume représente un brillant compte rendu de «la continentalisation croissante de la politique du Royaume Uni»; largement diffusée à Ottawa, elle ne souleva pas néanmoins de questions bilatérales exigeant une suite immédiate (document 927).

On ne négligea certes pas le fait, de leur consacrer un chapitre séparé se justifia par leur importance les relations économiques internationales. Mais aussi les différents volets de ce sujet — et notamment les relations financières et commerciales au sein du Triangle de l'Atlantique Nord formé par la Grande-Bretagne, les États-Unis et le Canada — étaient très interreliés. Cela ne fut jamais plus manifeste qu'au moment de l'examen du Plan Marshall et de ses répercussions. Au départ, les Canadiens voulaient éviter de créer à Washington l'impression d'une «coalition» des pays du Commonwealth contre les États-Unis et rejetaient donc catégoriquement une approche concertée (documents 585 et 586). L'Administration américaine exerça néanmoins des pressions dans le but d'amener le Canada à aider la Grande-Bretagne et, de la sorte, à influencer le Congrès (document 605). Et le caractère tripartite du problème sterling-dollar fut mis en évidence lorsque le chancelier de l'Échiquier, sir Stafford Cripps, effectua une visite à Ottawa (document 684) et se heads of post. More significant challenges for Canada and the rest of the Commonwealth were posed by Ireland's decision to repeal the External Relations Act, its last formal link with the monarchy, and India's move toward a republican constitution. In the former case, there was a drift toward separation from the Commonwealth (with care to protect trade and citizenship preferences), but relations with India were characterized by a strong desire to reach an accommodation. The Canadian Government was taken aback somewhat when Prime Minister John Costello declared Ireland's intention to leave the Commonwealth in a speech in Canada (Document 922), but Mackenzie King's private chat with Costello clearly indicated that there was a mutual desire to make the change as amicably as possible.<sup>7</sup> While even Mackenzie King tried his hand at drafting some way out of India's dilemma, Pearson was most actively involved in the negotiations with Nehru and others to keep a republican India in a heretofore monarchical Commonwealth. For Canada, it was important that India should stay in the Commonwealth, as its foremost Asian member and as a potential bulwark for the West in that region. In effect, the Commonwealth would be redefined.

What is most striking about the chapter on the Commonwealth (and about the departmental files upon which it is based) is how relatively insignificant were bilateral relations, other than Anglo-Canadian finance and trade. The despatch by Norman Robertson printed herein was a brilliant report on the 'increasing continentalization of the United Kingdom's policy' which received wide circulation in Ottawa, but it did not raise any immediate bilateral issues requiring action (Document 927).

However, there was certainly no lack of attention to international economic relations. The various strands within this topic were closely interwoven, especially the financial and commercial relations within the North Atlantic Triangle of Britain, the United States and Canada. That was nowhere more evident than in the consideration of the Marshall Plan and its implications. At first, the Canadians were wary of any impression in Washington of 'ganging up' by Commonwealth countries against the United States, so a combined approach was emphatically rejected (Documents 585 and 586). Still, the Canadians had to contend with pressure from Washington to assist Britain and thus impress Congress (Document 605). And the tripartite nature of the sterling-dollar problem was underlined when the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Stafford Cripps, came to Ottawa (Document 684) and then went on to Washington with the Minister of Finance, Douglas Abbott (Documents 632 to 635).

Curiously, the most emphatic statements of Canada's need to seek 'some pretty far-reaching trade arrangement with our neighbour to the south' came in the context of the bleak preparations for Cripps' visit (Document 675). For the story of the effort to reach a comprehensive agreement with the United States, the King Diary is an indispensable source. In its pages, one can find Abbott's progress report (Document 645), as well as further entries charting the course of negotiations until they were wrecked on the shoals of King's apprehensions (Document 647). That episode did nothing to ease the tensions between King and colleagues such as rendit ensuite à Washington en compagnie du ministre des Finances, Douglas Abbott (documents 632 et 635).

Curieusement, la nécessité de rechercher «un arrangement commercial plutôt global avec notre voisin du sud» fut soulignée avec le plus de conviction lors des mornes préparatifs de la visite de Cripps (document 675), quand on prit conscience des difficultés qui s'annonçaient. Le journal de King est une source indispensable pour qui veut reconstituer l'histoire des efforts déployés pour en venir à un accord global avec les États-Unis. King y fait état des progrès rapportés par Abbott (document 645) et retrace l'évolution des négociations jusqu'à ce qu'elles achoppent sur ses appréhensions personnelles (document 647). Cet épisode ne fit rien pour atténuer les tensions entre King et certains de ses collègues, comme Howe, comme aussi de hauts fonctionnaires, y compris Pearson (document 654). Il faut toutefois rappeler que King ne prenait pas seulement en compte les «conseils de l'au-delà» (que toute autre personne verrait comme des coïncidences paraissant confirmer sa décision) mais aussi la controverse qu'avait provoquée dans les journaux canadiens un éditorial du Life du 15 mars 1948, «Customs Union with Canada: Canada Needs Us and We Need Canada in a Violently Contracting World» (Union douanière avec le Canada : Le Canada a besoin de nous et nous de lui, dans un monde qui subit une contraction violente). Dans le cadre de ses préparatifs en vue de la réunion qui devait décider du sort du projet d'union douanière, King demanda à Pearson un résumé de la réaction des éditorialistes canadiens à ce ballon d'essai<sup>8</sup>. Et quelle qu'en soit la cause apparente, le recul de King sur cette question fut tout à fait conforme à la prudence politique qui le caractérisait.

D'autres aspects des relations du Canada avec les États-Unis soulevèrent des difficultés sans toutefois être aussi controversées. Ottawa réagit aux menaces que la coopération de défense dans l'Arctique présentait pour la souveraineté canadienne comme seul Ottawa sait le faire — en créant un comité interministériel, le Comité consultatif sur le développement du Nord. Les comptes rendus de ses délibérations (documents 931 à 933) donnent au lecteur une idée des raisons pour lesquelles les décideurs canadiens s'inquiétaient de l'intérêt que les Américains portaient à la défense dans l'Arctique. Pour ce qui est de la coopération canado-américaine dans le secteur de la production et des approvisionnements de défense, il est intéressant de confronter deux démarches de Heeney auprès de Claxton, l'une «officieuse» (document 978) et l'autre, officielle (document 979). Les attitudes et les actions provinciales vinrent parfois compliquer les rapports entre les deux pays, par exemple la réaction qu'on anticipait du Québec en ce qui concerne l'utilisation de soldats noirs par les États-Unis (document 989) et les échanges avec le gouvernement de l'Ontario et le président d'Hydro Ontario au sujet de la dérivation de la rivière Niagara et du Projet de canalisation et d'aménagement hydroélectrique du Saint-Laurent. Mais comme le gouvernement fédéral était lui aussi préoccupé par l'attitude des Américains à l'égard du Canada, on vit naître le «Projet canadien de coopération» avec l'industrie cinématographique américaine, les recettes que cette dernière tirait du Canada la rendant plus ouverte à la persuasion que la radio ou la presse écrite (documents 1040 à 1046).

Howe, as well as senior officials, including Pearson (Document 654). However, it is worth recalling that King was responding not only to 'guidance from Beyond' (which for anyone else would be seen as coincidences that seemed to confirm his decision) but also to controversy in Canadian newspapers provoked by an editorial in Life on 15 March 1948: 'Customs Union with Canada: Canada Needs Us and We Need Canada in a Violently Contracting World.' In preparation for the meeting which sealed the fate of the proposal for a customs union, King had asked Pearson for a summary of editorial reaction to that trial balloon in Canada.<sup>8</sup> Whatever the apparent cause, King's retreat on this issue was quite consistent with his cautious approach to politics.

Other aspects of Canada's relations with the United States posed problems but proved less controversial. Ottawa responded to threats to Canadian sovereignty from defence cooperation in the Arctic as only Ottawa can, by establishing an interdepartmental committee, the Advisory Committee on Northern Development. The records of its deliberations (Documents 931 to 933) do give the reader a sense of what bothered Canadian policy-makers about American interest in northern defence. On the subject of Canadian-American cooperation in defence production and supply, it is interesting to juxtapose two approaches by Heeney to Claxton, one 'informal' (Document 978) and one official (Document 979). Provincial attitudes and actions sometimes complicated the continental relationship, as with the anticipated reaction from Quebec to the employment of black troops by the United States (Document 989) and the dealings with the Ontario Government and the Chairman of Ontario Hydro over the Niagara Diversion and the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project. However, the Canadian government was also concerned about the disposition of Americans towards Canada, hence the 'Canadian Cooperation Project' with the American film industry, whose revenues from Canada made it more susceptible to persuasion than radio or print (Documents 1040 to 1046).

Other bilateral relationships were less important to Canada. Though Europe remained a focus for Canadian interest and developments there were followed closely by Canadians, the few diplomatic issues of note were irritants associated with the bi-polar world. In the Gray Lecture of January 1947, Louis St. Laurent had identified France as one of Canada's principal partners, but there was not much evidence of that priority in the files of the Department of External Affairs. We have reproduced here a long and revealing despatch written by Charles Ritchie about 'the state of French preparedness, both moral and material' (Document 1058). As Escott Reid commented, it conveyed a sense of a French 'apathy which endangers our national interests.'<sup>9</sup> That report received a wide distribution in Ottawa and it likely influenced later Canadian efforts to inspire a more resolute commitment to the North Atlantic Treaty from France and Belgium (Documents 372, 373, 379, 381, 383 and 390).

The peculiar dispute over the Polish art treasures bedevilled relations with Poland and with the Quebec provincial government. Meanwhile, the deepening rift of the cold war prompted a fundamental reconsideration of what information and de suivre de près l'évolution de la situation européenne. Toutefois, les quelques événements d'importance sur le plan diplomatique tournèrent autour des points de friction associés au bipolarisme mondial. Lors de la conférence Gray de janvier 1947, Louis Saint-Laurent avait nommé la France comme l'un des principaux partenaires du Canada. On ne retrouve cependant pas beaucoup de preuves de cette priorité dans les archives du ministère des Affaires extérieures. Nous avons reproduit une dépêche détaillée et révélatrice rédigée par Charles Ritchie au sujet de «l'état de préparation, tant morale que matérielle, de la France» (document 1058). Comme le fit remarquer Escott Reid, cette dépêche témoignait d'une «apathie [de la France] qui met en danger nos intérêts nationaux<sup>9</sup>». Largement distribué à Ottawa, ce rapport influença sans doute les efforts ultérieurs du Canada pour obtenir de la France et de la Belgique une adhésion plus ferme au Traité de l'Atlantique Nord (documents 372, 373, 379, 381, 383 et 390).

Le différend au sujet des trésors d'art polonais envenima les relations entre la Pologne et le gouvernement québécois. Parallèlement, l'intensification de la guerre froide entraîna une remise en cause fondamentale des informations et des privilèges que le Canada échangeait avec l'Union soviétique. À la fin de l'année, le ministère des Affaires extérieures s'orientait, avec certaines hésitations, vers la «guerre psychologique» avec les adversaires du Canada dans la guerre froide.

En ce qui a trait à d'autres régions, le bilan en fut un d'indifférence ou de réticence à s'impliquer. Ce fut manifestement le cas de nos relations avec l'Amérique latine. L'échange entre T.C. Davis et Pearson (dont la réponse reflète ses annotations en marge de la lettre de Davis) témoigne éloquemment de l'orientation occidentale de la politique du Canada. L'Asie n'avait pas plus de priorité, comme l'indique la décision du Cabinet sur la question de la représentation à Ceylan. Les tensions de la guerre froide accentuèrent les inquiétudes concernant la Chine et la Corée (avec en plus dans ce dernier cas la crise aiguë que provoqua, au sein du Cabinet, la participation canadienne à la Commission temporaire des Nations Unies pour la Corée), même si le Canada avait, à l'égard de la Chine, des intérêts qu'il fallait suivre de près. Évidemment, ce manque d'attention portée à l'Extrême-Orient eut, entre autres, pour conséquence que lorsque le Conseil de sécurité des Nations Unies se pencha sur le cas de l'Indonésie, le ministère des Affaires extérieures dut rechercher des sources d'information additionnelles à ses rapports de La Haye (documents 141, 147 et 152 à 154). Cette situation était tout simplement symptomatique d'un ministère des affaires étrangères dont les ressources et le personnel, en croissance, n'était pas encore à la hauteur de ses intérêts, responsabilités et engagements à l'étranger.

Pour ce survol des relations internationales du Canada telles que vues de l'Édifice de l'Est, je me suis fondé sur les archives du ministère des Affaires extérieures (maintenant le ministère des Affaires étrangères et du Commerce extérieur), du Bureau du Conseil privé et du ministère des Finances et, au besoin, sur celles d'autres ministères ainsi que sur des collections privées aux Archives nationales du Canada, y compris les documents de William Lyon Mackenzie, Louis S. Saint-Laurent, Lester B. Pearson, Hume Wrong, Escott Reid et d'autres. Les principes directeurs suivis pour sélectionner les documents présentés dans le présent volume sont exposés dans l'Introduction au volume 7. Les signes conventionnels sont les mêmes que privileges Canada exchanged with the Soviet Union. By the end of the year, the Department of External Affairs was also moving tentatively in the direction of 'psychological warfare' with Canada's adversaries in the cold war.

In other regions, there is a pattern of indifference or wariness about involvement, as was undoubtedly the case in our relations with Latin America. Certainly, the exchange between T.C. Davis and Pearson (whose response mirrors marginalia he had scrawled on the incoming letter) provides eloquent testimony to the occidental orientation of Canadian policy — a similar low priority to Asia was indicated by the Cabinet's decision on representation in Ceylon. Concern about China and Korea was elevated by cold war tensions (in the latter case complicated by the remarkable Cabinet crisis over Canadian participation in the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea), though there were Canadian interests in China which merited close attention. Of course, one consequence of this inattention to the Far East was that when the Security Council of the United Nations fixed its gaze on Indonesia, the Department of External Affairs had to seek out alternative sources of information to its reports from The Hague (Documents 141, 147 and 152 to 154). That was simply symptomatic of a foreign ministry whose burgeoning resources and personnel still had not kept pace with its overseas interests, responsibilities and commitments.

For this survey of Canada's international relations as seen from the East Block, I have relied on the files of the Department of External Affairs (now the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade), the Privy Council Office and the Department of Finance, supplemented by other departmental records where necessary and by private collections in the National Archives of Canada, including the papers of William Lyon Mackenzie King, Louis S. St. Laurent, Lester B. Pearson, Hume Wrong, Escott Reid and others. The guidelines for the selection of documents in this volume remain those quoted in the introduction to Volume 7 in this series. The editorial devices are described in the introduction to Volume 9. A dagger (†) indicates that a document has not been printed in this volume; an ellipsis (. . .) represents an editorial omission. I had full access to the records of the Department of External Affairs and the final selection was my responsibility.

In the preparation of this volume, however, many people assisted. The staff of the National Archives of Canada make a vital and sometimes unacknowledged contribution to scholarship. I would like to thank particularly Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden and David Smith of the Military and International Affairs Records Unit of the Government Archives Division whose professional dedication is matched only by their patient good humour. Several research assistants helped collect material for this book: Michel Beauregard, Neal Carter, Christopher Cook, Lisa Dillon, Brian Hearnden, Ted Kelly, Steven Lee, Leigh Sarty and Jacqueline Shaw all made my task easier. Fellow editors Greg Donaghy and Norman Hillmer were always available for consultation about those apparently inevitable problems or questions which arise almost daily in the preparation of such a volume. The general editor of this series, John Hilliker, is unrivalled for his attention to consistency and accuracy. Through reorganizations and reassignments, several managers have been responsible for sustaining this project: Peter Daniel, Fernand Tanguay, Alain Dudoit, Peter Lloyd, Janet Bax, Brian Long and Mary Jane Starr. Their commitment has ceux décrits dans l'Introduction au volume 9. Une croix (†) signifie que le document n'est pas reproduit dans le présent volume; des points de suspension [ . . . ] indiquent une coupure dans le texte. J'ai eu accès à tous les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et j'ai eu toute latitude quant au choix des documents.

J'ai toutefois été secondé par plusieurs personnes. Le personnel des Archives nationales du Canada apporte à la recherche une contribution indispensable mais qu'on a parfois tendance à passer sous silence. Je voudrais tout particulièrement remercier Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden et David Smith de la Sous-section des archives militaires et affaires internationales de la Division des archives gouvernementales, dont le dévouement professionnel n'a d'égal que leur patience et leur bonne humeur. Plusieurs assistants de recherche m'ont aidé à réunir la documentation; Michel Beauregard, Neal Carter, Christopher Cook, Lisa Dillon, Brian Hearnden, Ted Kelly, Steven Lee, Leigh Sarty et Jacqueline Shaw m'ont tous facilité la tâche. Mes collègues Greg Donaghy et Norman Hillmer ont toujours été disponibles lorsque j'ai eu à les consulter au sujet des problèmes et des questions apparemment inévitables qui surgissent presque tous les jours dans l'élaboration d'un tel ouvrage. L'éditeur en chef de la collection, John Hilliker, s'est distingué comme toujours par son souci de l'uniformité et du détail. Au fil des réorganisations et des réaffectations, différents gestionnaires ont été responsables de la poursuite du projet : Peter Daniel, Fernand Tanguay, Alain Dudoit, Peter Lloyd, Janet Bax, Brian Long and Mary Jane Starr. Leur appui a permis la publication du présent volume. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin a coordonné les travaux de l'équipe — qui comprenait Aline Gélinau, Islay Mawhinney, Catherine Devlin et James Hyndman — chargée de la production technique du volume. Isobel Cameron pour sa part a choisi les photographies et établi la liste des personnes et des abréviations et l'index. Ils furent secondés par Ted Kelly, Janet Ritchie et Calla Fireman à la Section des affaires historiques. J'ai aussi bénéficié de l'appui de Kathy Giles-Mackenzie, d'Anna Mackenzie et de Sarah Mackenzie. Je tiens en outre à exprimer ma profonde gratitude à Maria Horner et au regretté Imre Horner qui m'ont assisté dans certains travaux d'édition. Toutes les personnes susmentionnées m'ont aidé, mais je suis responsable de la sélection des documents dans le présent ouvrage.

made this book possible. The technical preparation of the manuscript for publication was undertaken by a team coordinated by Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin, which included Aline G lineau, Islay Mawhinney, Catherine Devlin and James Hyndman. Another member of this group, Isobel Cameron, chose the photographs and prepared the list of persons, the list of abbreviations and the index. Within the Historical Section, they were aided by Ted Kelly, Janet Ritchie and Calla Fireman. I have also derived support for this project from Kathy Giles-Mackenzie, Anna Mackenzie and Sarah Mackenzie. Some of the editorial preparation of this work was made possible by assistance from Maria Horner and the late Imre Horner, to whom I express my profound gratitude. All of those mentioned above have assisted me, but I am responsible for the selection of documents in this book.

[Ottawa], June 21, 1948

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 15th June, 1948, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, representing:

That Section 3 of The Royal Style and Titles Act (Canada) 1947, provides that the date on which the omission of the words "Emperor of India" becomes effective shall be published in the Canada Gazette;

That the Government of the United Kingdom has consulted the Government of Canada, which considered the matter on June 2, 1948, and agreed that the omission should be made effective as regards Canada by means of an Order in Council;

That the Minister has advised the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, London, of the Canadian Government's intentions and stated that it would be agreeable to any future date convenient to the United Kingdom and other Members of the Commonwealth provided suitable notice is given in advance; and

That the Members of the Commonwealth have agreed that the date on which the omission of the words "Emperor of India" becomes effective shall be the 22nd day of June, 1948.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, advise that Your Excellency in Council, in accordance with Section 3 of The Royal Style and Titles Act (Canada), 1947, cause the omission of the words "Indiae Imperator" and the words "Emperor of India" from the Royal Style and Titles to become effective as regards Canada on and from the 22nd day of June, 1948, by authorizing the publication of a notice in the attached form† in the Canada Gazette.<sup>1</sup>

I have the honour to advise you that changes have been made in the organization of the Department of External Affairs.

2. The Second Political Division has been split into two new divisions, the Commonwealth Division with Mr. R.A. MacKay as Chief, and the European Division with Mr. J.B.C. Watkins as Chief. The First Political Division has been renamed The United Nations Division and the Third Political Division has been renamed The American and Far Eastern Division.

3. Mr. Escott Reid has been appointed Assistant Under-Secretary and the American and Far Eastern Division, The Commonwealth Division and The European Division will report through him.

4. Mr. W.D. Matthews has been appointed Assistant Under-Secretary (Admin.) and the Administrative Division with Mr. S.D. Hemsley as Chief Administrative Officer, will report through him.

5. The other Divisions of the Department will continue to report to the Under-Secretary and Associate Under-Secretary as in the past.

POST OF ASSOCIATE UNDER-SECRETARY

With reference to our talk this morning on this matter, the suggestion which Mr. Robertson and I have been discussing is the abolition of the post of Associate Under-Secretary, the reclassification of the post of Deputy Under-Secretary at $12,000 (the salary now provided for the Associate), and the designation of its occupant as "Ambassador on Duty in the Department of External Affairs as Deputy Under-Secretary of State."

The Under-Secretary-Associate relationship worked very well with Mr. Wrong and Mr. Robertson, and with Mr. Beaudry<sup>2</sup> and myself. It would, however, be difficult to make this peculiar relationship work in all circumstances, as it does, in fact, mean that there are two officials in the Department of approximately equal rank, with the chain of responsibility between them not always clearly defined. For this reason, the relationship might be particularly difficult if the Associate was being brought back from abroad in an almost ostentatiously Deputy Minister capacity. On the other hand, to make the second man a Deputy Under-Secretary would fix him in the direct line of responsibility to the Minister and obviate some of the risks of disagreement and dissension under the alternative organization.

If the Deputy Under-Secretary were given the style of Ambassador on Duty in the Department, it would be easy and even natural to appoint him for a two or three year term, at the end of which he would again take up a position abroad.

Though the officer brought back would be a Deputy Under-Secretary in the Departmental set-up, he could retain the rank of Ambassador in the Diplomatic Service while he is on duty in the Department, to ensure that he had the rank and precedence of a Deputy Minister when on duty in the Department. All that would be required would be a ruling from Council or Treasury Board, as the case may be. A ruling of this sort was obtained when Mr. Wrong was made Associate Under-Secretary. An advantage of a ruling of this kind would be that, if the Ambassador brought back as Deputy Under-Secretary were French-speaking, there would be another person in Ottawa from Quebec in the Deputy Minister category.

Laurent Beaudry resigned for reasons of health.

You may wish to mention the above suggestion to the Prime Minister.<sup>3</sup> If it is agreeable, the post of Deputy Under-Secretary could then be offered to Mr. Dupuy.<sup>4</sup>

PRIORITY PREFIXES ON TELEGRAMS

15. Mr. Reid said that the Department was receiving too many telegrams marked "Most Immediate". In addition to depreciating the importance which should be attached to such telegrams, this practice means that members of the Cypher Section may be called back to the office in the middle of the night to decipher telegrams which could be dealt with equally well the following day. The following rules should be observed in the Department and abroad in giving priority markings to telegrams:

"Priority markings are an indication to the Cypher Section or Cypher Clerk and to the telegraph companies of the speed with which the message should be transmitted and, to the receiving office, of the degree of urgency attached to it. They are:

Most Immediate — Use of this prefix should be limited to cases of urgent necessity when action is required immediately upon receipt of the telegram, regardless of the hour of day or night at which it arrives. Telegrams with this marking must be deciphered at once and brought to the attention of the officer concerned. The drafter of a telegram has a special responsibility for preventing abuse of this prefix, not only because of the inconvenience it might cause but because its excessive use will lead to its being accorded less than the exacting attention it is intended to require.

I have discussed this with the P[ri]me M[in]ister and we both approve 5.3.48 [St. Laurent]

Pierre Dupuy declined on the grounds that his health would not permit his return to Ottawa. Pearson reconfirmed this when in Paris for meetings of the General Assembly and at that time offered the post of Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Jean Désy who was reluctant to return to Ottawa and put forward proposals for accommodation and a representation allowance which Pearson did not regard as reasonable. See: LBP/Vol. 4, Pearson to Dupuy, March 9; Dupuy to Pearson, March 31; PCO/Vol 89, Pearson to St. Laurent, November 25, 1948.

Immediate — This prefix is intended to be used when it is essential that action on the telegram be taken within a few hours of its arrival. Telegrams with this prefix must also be deciphered at once.

Important — Use of this prefix should be restricted to telegrams of moderate urgency dealing with matters of sufficient importance to warrant priority over routine telegrams in deciphering and circulation.

When urgent messages are being sent, consideration should be given to the difference in time between the sending and the receiving office.”

CIRCULAR NO. 9

Ottawa, November 3, 1948

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES; PROCEDURES FOR APPROVING DELEGATIONS

In accordance with a direction from the Prime Minister, which was approved by Cabinet on June 16th, 1948, all proposals involving Canadian participation in International Conferences and in meetings of International Organizations will be reviewed by the Department of External Affairs before submission to the government for approval.<sup>5</sup>

Departments and agencies are, therefore, requested to refer to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, for approval by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, all proposals for participation in and representation at International Conferences, together with a list of nominations for delegates.

This reference should be made well in advance of the Conference date so that, where appropriate, the Secretary of State for External Affairs can make recommendations to Cabinet, and the nomination list can be co-ordinated and approved.

A.D.P. HEENEY

This directive arose from a concern that departments and agencies were ignoring the Cabinet decision.

DEPARTMENTAL ORGANIZATION
ESTABLISHMENT OF DEFENCE LIAISON DIVISION

26. Mr. Reid said that the developments during the past year in Canadian foreign policy were bringing about a corresponding change in our defence policy generally. Since the beginning of this year public statements by members of the Government have emphasized that Canada is now willing to sign a regional defence treaty and is indeed anxious that such an agreement should be concluded. This development has meant that a great deal of time must be spent by members of the Department on questions of defence policy which impinge on foreign policy. The Department is already represented on such joint defence bodies as the Chiefs of Staff Committee, the Joint Intelligence Committee, the Joint Intelligence Staff, the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, the National Defence College, etc., and relations between the Departments of National Defence and External Affairs are extremely good. Within the Department, however, from an administrative point of view, difficulties frequently arise because no one Division has primary responsibility for all these matters. The Minister has therefore agreed that a functional division be established, effective November 15, to bring together all the defence liaison work which is now scattered throughout several sections of the Department. Mr. Crean will be Acting Head of the new division which will be called "Defence Liaison Division".

27. It will deal with work arising under the Permanent Joint Board on Defence, Commonwealth defence questions, and defence matters arising under the proposed North Atlantic Treaty. It will coordinate all defence questions dealt with in the Department, and will be the normal channel for liaison with the Department of National Defence on policy questions. It will also deal with security matters arising in the Department and at Missions abroad.

USE OF FRENCH IN DESPATCHES

16. The Committee<sup>6</sup> considered the use of French in a limited field of reporting. While this was desirable, it was realized that reporting in French might raise certain administrative difficulties which might be referred to the Administrative Committee. (Second meeting, November 9th)

17. Recommendation: Provided there are no insuperable administrative difficulties, a circular despatch should be sent to all missions indicating that, on an experimental basis, officers abroad may prepare despatches in French, provided (a) that such despatches are not concerned with subjects upon which specific action needs to be taken by someone who may not be familiar with the French language, and (b) that the Head of Mission is sufficiently familiar with French to sign these despatches — see Appendix VI.

5. The Chief of the General Staff stated that he had been advised by Mr. Pearson that the overall accommodation requirements in Moscow were being reviewed and that the availability of accommodation for two Service attachés was still uncertain. In view of this situation, he had at first decided that he would not now replace the present Army attaché when he was withdrawn. However, he had learned that the present Army attaché was producing reports of considerable value and he would like, therefore, to have this whole matter of Service representation in Moscow reviewed by the Joint Intelligence Committee and their recommendations made available before any final decision was reached. If, however, it should eventually be decided that accommodation could be made available only for one officer, he would agree that this be an Air Force officer.

6. The Chief of the Air Staff pointed out that as the sources of information were limited and a good deal was dependent upon personal observation, it was difficult for the Army attaché to provide information of value to the Air Force. It was most important that Air information be received. Further, it had been agreed previously that when the present Army attaché was withdrawn he would be replaced by an Air attaché. He did not feel, therefore, that reference to the Joint Intelligence Committee at this stage would be particularly useful.

7. The Chief of the Naval Staff observed that if the Service requirement were for two attachés, then strong representations should be made for the necessary accommodation.

8. The Committee agreed, after further discussion, that the Joint Intelligence Committee be asked to review the requirements for Service attaché representation in Moscow and make recommendations thereon.

SERVICE ATTACHÉS — U.S.S.R.

15. Mr. Pearson reported that the maintenance of the diplomatic mission in Moscow had proven increasingly difficult since the recent Russian currency revaluation. As a result, and since the Mission was restricted in the amount of Russian currency which it could obtain, it would be impossible, quite aside from considerations of accommodation, to increase the staff at present. This applied not only to Service Attachés but also to other officials which it had been intended to send. It was hoped that this situation would improve, but meanwhile it was suggested that only one Service Attaché be sent to replace the Army Attaché who was being withdrawn.

(Deferred from 410th meeting)

16. The Chief of the General Staff stated that, though he was impressed with the importance of having an Army Attaché in Moscow, in view of Mr. Pearson's remarks and of previous discussions in this connection, he would agree that the single Attaché to be sent be an Air Force officer.

17. The Chief of the Naval Staff pointed out that the Navy had previously agreed in the case of many Attaché appointments in Europe that, where only one Attaché could be sent, he be an Army or Air Force officer where there was a larger Army or Air Force than Navy in the country concerned. In Europe generally, however, if this principle continued to be followed, it would mean that Naval Attaché representation would be completely precluded. At the present time, two officers were available; one who could speak Russian, the other who could speak Turkish, eminently suitable respectively for appointment as Attachés to the U.S.S.R. and Turkey. This situation deserved serious consideration.

18. The Committee agreed, after further discussion:

- (a) that only one Service Attaché be appointed to the U.S.S.R. at present; and
- (b) that an Air Force Attaché be appointed to Moscow to replace the Army Attaché being withdrawn.

I attach a note of February 20 of a conversation which I had yesterday with Brigadier Allard.<sup>7</sup> Mr. Watkins and Mr. Wallis<sup>8</sup> were present at our talk. I explained to him that you were disappointed not to see him.

He struck me as being a very intelligent person.

This morning on my way in with General Foulkes he asked me about my talk with Allard. He had himself been talking to Allard and his conclusion from what Allard had told him was that accommodation in Moscow was sufficient for the Military Attaché as well as an Air Attaché. He added that Allard had said that some of our accommodation in Moscow was now being used by some clerks from the British Embassy.

General Foulkes appeared to be somewhat annoyed with you because of the arguments which you had used against the appointment of both a Military and an Air Attaché in Moscow. He thinks that you have not brought forward your real objections. I gather that he feels that your objections are based on reports from Holmes that a Military Attaché is not necessary.

He says that he will raise the matter with you on your return to Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Holmes:

I enclose for your information a copy of a memorandum to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs recording a conversation with Brigadier Allard on his return to Canada. I am not particularly impressed with his arguments concerning the relative values of a Military Attaché as opposed to an Air Attaché in Moscow, but I was interested in his statement concerning travel in the Soviet Union. Certainly, the reports, which I have received from National Defence, from Brigadier Allard do not bear out the fact that he had travelled very far afield from Moscow. I should therefore be interested in your comments on this point.

I should be interested in any other observations you may have to make on this memorandum.

Moscow, March 18, 1948

Dear Mr. Reid:

I should like to refer to your letter of February 26th with which you enclosed a memorandum regarding a conversation with Brigadier Allard. Like you, I am not impressed with the argument that it would be a mistake to appoint an Air Attaché in place of a Military Attaché. My frank opinion has been that there are grave doubts about the value of having a Service attaché of any kind in Moscow. There has been little enough for a Service Attaché to do in the past, without resorting to methods which could compromise his Government, and since the affair involving General Hilton last November the opportunities for legitimate investigation have been almost completely stopped. The decision, however, has been taken to send an Air Attaché, and I think that if he does not confine his interests too narrowly to military matters, he will be able to make a contribution to the work of the Embassy and have a satisfactory experience.

As for the opportunities to inspect and photograph Army or Air Force equipment, it seems to me, and I think it seemed also to my predecessors who have had somewhat longer experience, that the opportunities of seeing either are so insignificant that comparisons are not worth making. On the other hand, I know that the only report from any of the United Kingdom Service Attachés last year which was considered to be of some value in London, was a report by the Air Attaché. As for the view that an Air Attaché would merely complement the work of the Air Attachés of the United Kingdom, French and United States missions, and be able to get little information on his own, I doubt if this is a particularly impressive argument, as it would mean no change in the situation which has existed in the past.

As for the question of travelling throughout the Soviet Union, Brigadier Allard's experience in this country was, of course, considerably longer than mine. However, I think that his remarks, as reported in the memorandum, are misleading. It is difficult to point to any regulations preventing foreigners from travelling throughout the Soviet Union, but the fact of the matter is that there are in Moscow a considerable number of people suffering acutely from claustrophobia, anxious to travel anywhere, but unable to do so. I have heard of people getting as far as Kiev, and I know that last summer two members of the United States Embassy drove in their car as far as Kazan. It is, of course, quite easy to go to Leningrad. One can travel to Odessa or Libau in transit, and U.S. officials travel to Vladivostok when they are appointed to their consulate there. Otherwise, the limit seems to be Gorki, which is about 500 kilometres from Moscow, and there have been difficulties in getting even there. There is no particular difficulty about visiting towns within a hundred kilometres of Moscow. The problem is not that one needs a special permit to travel, but that one needs some kind of accommodation and facilities, not to mention a railway ticket or petrol, which are never provided. For a Service Attaché I should think travel very far from Moscow is completely out of the question. Certainly his heels would be dogged all the way, and every possible opportunity would be taken to embarrass or compromise him. It may be that the travel by car of foreign representatives, to which the Brigadier referred, took place during the earlier part of his stay in Moscow, or was confined to the vicinity of Moscow. Brigadier Allard himself, as far as I am aware, never travelled far from Moscow, but I do not know whether he made any effort to do so.

I agree strongly with Brigadier Allard's view that it would be valuable to have in Moscow an expert whose task it would be to collect all possible information about Soviet industrial, agricultural and technical developments in order to estimate the real strength of the country. This, in my opinion, would be the most useful work for a Service Attaché. Any attempts on his part to travel about the country "snooping" will serve no useful purpose, and will only involve the overworked staff of the Embassy in the complicated problem of getting him out of the hands of the M.V.D.<sup>9</sup> On the other hand, a great deal can be done, I think, by a careful study of published reports; by the patient collation of this material we would be in a much better position to estimate the real war potential of the Soviet Union. That is what I had in mind when I said I hoped that the new Attaché would not interpret too narrowly his functions. For his own peace of mind, furthermore, I think it essential that he occupy himself in this way, or he will quickly become discouraged, frustrated and unhappy.

Yours sincerely,
J.W. HOLMES

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Geneva, May 10, 1948

My dear Escott [Reid],

I have had referred to me copies of your letter to Mr. Holmes of February 26th, together with accompanying memorandum on your interview with Brigadier Allard, the two letters of March 18th addressed to you by Mr. Holmes on the subject of Service attachés at Moscow, and the letter addressed to you by Mr. Ford on March 24th† on the same subject.

I have no hesitation in endorsing all that Holmes and Ford write with regard to this subject. Not only is it useless to have Service attachés in Moscow because there is nothing for them to do, but it is positively dangerous and the chances are very grave that sooner or later we will be involved in some international incident. This is particularly the case because the Defence Department stubbornly refuse to believe our representatives, who really know Russia, and contend that if they send the right man he will find work to do in Moscow. This means that whoever they send will, like Brigadier Allard, feel that he should be able to "deliver the goods", unless the man is very much above the average. This means that there is a grave danger that he will do something which, sooner or later, will get us into trouble. Finally, and not unimportant, is the fact that it is very disturbing to the morale of our staff at Moscow to have Service attachés hanging around with nothing to do.

I do not expect that this letter will arrive in time to alter the decision which I believe has already been reached, but I thought it was my duty to warn you so that perhaps before the men leave for Moscow they will be cautioned not to do anything which will result in an international incident. This at least will serve to absolve our Department from failure to realize the risks we are running in sending to Moscow men who impress me as being "babes in the woods".

With kindest regards and all good wishes,

Yours sincerely,

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH AUSTRIA

You will recall that the post-war relations between Canada and Austria were reviewed in a memorandum which I had prepared for you on January 21st, 1948.† After pointing out that Canada had never been at war with the political entity of Austria, nor with any Austrian predecessor to the present Government, the memorandum reported that both the Canadian High Commissioner in London and the Canadian Ambassador in Washington had been approached by their Austrian colleagues with a view to exchanging diplomatic representation; and that the Austrian Minister in Washington had explained that his Government would like to open a Legation in Ottawa, or at least a Consulate-General, even if the Canadian Government were not able to reciprocate for the time being.

2. Your comment on the memorandum on February 12th was: "Council feels we should not be in any hurry about this. We are not able to expand at present." On February 14th you added: "In view of attitude of Council re our mission in Rome, I prefer not to bring up the matter of diplomatic relations with Austria at this time. Perhaps we might consider it a few weeks hence when again discussing Rome."

3. The elevation of our mission in Rome from Legation to Embassy has recently received your, and the Prime Minister's, approval. I feel that consideration might now be given to the Austrian Government's request for some sort of representation here.

4. The Austrian Government, since the date of my previous memorandum on the subject, has continued to press this matter, and not only through their Ministers in London and Washington. As you know, the Austrian Chancellor himself brought it up when he received Mr. Manion of our Rome Legation, during the latter's visit to Vienna in connection with Canadian relief shipments. In a despatch dated February 24th Mr. Manion reported: "The Austrian Government desires by all possible means to strengthen its position vis-à-vis the Western Powers."

5. I consider that recent developments in Europe make it advisable for us to do what we can to help Austria strengthen the ties with the West upon which it evidently sets such store. It is true that our shortage of staff makes it inadvisable to consider an exchange of diplomatic representatives for the time being. However, I can see no objection to the Austrian Government's alternative suggestion, that an Austrian Consulate-General be appointed to Ottawa, — a step, of course, which involves no obligation whatever on our part to reciprocate.

6. I would suggest, therefore, that we might instruct the Canadian High Commissioner in London to inform his Austrian colleague that the Canadian Government would now welcome the establishment of an Austrian Consulate-General in Ottawa. In doing so he should make clear that we cannot reciprocate now or in the foreseeable future.<sup>10</sup>

Attached is a fresh copy of a memorandum entitled "Diplomatic Relations with Austria", which I sent to you on May 14th. My conclusion was that while our shortage of staff made it inadvisable to consider an exchange of diplomatic representatives for the time being, we might well allow the Austrian Government to establish a Consulate General in Ottawa (as this would involve no obligation whatever on our part to reciprocate). You returned the memorandum with the following annotation: "I prefer to wait until I can suggest something more obvious in the way of advantages to a grouping of the Western Powers."

2. May I take the liberty of pointing out that our Ambassador in Washington and our High Commissioner in London both expressed regret that we did not accede to the Austrian Government's minimum request, viz. for a Consulate General.

Mr. Wrong wrote on May 28th:

"I find it difficult to know how to explain to the Austrian Minister that we are not prepared at present to receive an Austrian Consul General in Ottawa. I think that there would be some practical advantages to us in having an Austrian representative in Canada as there are a number of Austrian citizens in Canada who from time to time require consular services. Furthermore, in connection with the development of E.R.P. there might be some value in having an Austrian representative available through whom information about Canadian supplies could be conveyed to the Austrian Government. At present, if we have any business to do with the Austrian Government, we either have to send someone specially to Vienna or communicate through the British Minister, neither of which is a satisfactory way of doing business.

I am rather loath to undertake to explain to my Austrian colleague here the reasons for our reluctance when we have in Ottawa, let us say, a Haitian Consul General, a Lebanese Consul and a Finnish Minister."

Mr. Robertson said in a telegram dated June 4th:

"I am sorry that the recommendation in paragraph 6 of Mr. Pearson's memorandum of May 14th was not approved, since the Austrian Government's principal interest in having a representative in Canada is to have someone look after their nationals and to see what can be done to promote trade. They would, I think, be content for a while with Consular representation, although their neighbours in Prague and Belgrade have diplomatic representation with Canada. Our general policy in the past has been to put no obstacle in the way of friendly countries establishing Consulates in Canada, particularly if there was no implication of reciprocity in such an arrangement. I think it would be difficult to make an exception in this rule against Austria."

3. Mr. Robertson has now received a note from the Austrian Legation in which he is asked to ascertain the views of the Canadian Government on the suitability of one Mr. Paeumann of Montreal for the position of Honorary Representative of the Austrian Tourist Office in Canada. Mr. Robertson comments: "Inasmuch as our diplomatic and/or consular relations with Austria still have to be normalized, I doubt the wisdom of accepting a representative of the Austrian Tourist Office, which seems to be a Government agency, even in an honorary capacity."

4. You may wish, at this stage, to reconsider the possibility of authorizing the establishment of an Austrian Consulate General in Canada, as suggested in the last paragraph of my memorandum of May 14th. If you were to submit this proposal to Cabinet, I presume you would emphasize that a Consul General has no diplomatic status and that there would be absolutely no obligation on our part to open any sort of mission in Austria.

5. The Austrian Chargé d'Affaires in London has asked for an appointment with Mr. Robertson with a view to discussing this matter as soon as possible.

Dear Norman [Robertson],

The Cabinet reconsidered the other day the question of Austrian representation in Canada. It was one of those very bad Cabinet days, and to my great disappointment, the reconsideration resulted in a negative decision. The Minister did his best: but the Prime Minister would have nothing to do with the matter at this time. The decision as formally reported was as follows:

"The Cabinet after discussion, agreed that it would be inadvisable to accept a representative of the Austrian government in Canada at this time and that the High Commissioner in London and the Ambassador in Washington be instructed to inform Austrian authorities that it would not be possible to permit the establishment of an Austrian consulate general in Ottawa."<sup>11</sup>

I need hardly say how reluctant I am to pass on a decision of this kind. It is embarrassing, of course, to tell the Austrian government that we will not receive a consular representative. Perhaps you could put it that there are special circumstances which make reception of an Austrian Consul General difficult at the present time; but that we hope that it will not be long before the difficulties are removed. The "special circumstances" will probably be assumed by the Austrians to be related to the fact that there has been no peace treaty with Austria. This, I admit, is a rather flimsy excuse, considering the action which has been taken by other countries; but I suppose we should not discourage them from making this deduction.

What I am anxious to do is not to give the Austrians the impression that this decision is irrevocable and will not be reconsidered later in the year. Would it be possible to strike a friendly note by saying that, if their representative in Washington would care to come to Canada from time to time, he would be warmly welcomed and we would be glad to transact such official business with him as may be required?

I would think also that the Cabinet decision does not extend so far as to refuse to recognize a tourist representative. Possibly they could go ahead with such an appointment if they so desire.<sup>12</sup>

ACCREDITING OF MR. KEARNEY TO CEYLON

When Mr. Kearney was attending the celebration of independence of Ceylon in February last, the question arose in a discussion with the Ceylonese Prime Minister as to whether Mr. Kearney might not be accredited as well to Ceylon. The Prime Minister of Ceylon appeared to be anxious to have this arrangement made and to have in turn Ceylon's High Commissioner in London accredited to Canada.

2. Mr. Kearney is in favour of his being accredited to Ceylon since if evacuation of Europeans to Ceylon should become necessary it would be desirable to have some Canadian representation there. A further consideration is that living conditions in New Delhi in midsummer are very trying for Europeans and they normally leave the city for a cooler area, usually the northern hills. In view of the disturbed situation in the north this year it is understood that the diplomatic corps are generally moving to the coast for the summer months. The summer climate in Colombo, Ceylon, is quite satisfactory for Europeans and Mr. Kearney would be prepared to go there instead of to the coast.

3. Since the Ceylonese Prime Minister suggested accrediting the High Commissioner in the United Kingdom to Canada, it was thought desirable to ask the United Kingdom's views informally. Officials of the Commonwealth Relations Office have indicated that although the United Kingdom, like Canada, is opposed in principle to the practice of dual representation, it would waive objections in the case of Ceylon in view of the special circumstances.

4. It is recommended that the Ceylonese Government should be formally approached in the matter. It should, however, be made clear to the Ceylonese Government:

(a) that in principle the Canadian Government is opposed to the practice of dual representation but in view of the special circumstances in the case of Ceylon, it would be prepared to accredit Mr. Kearney and, if Ceylon wishes to accredit its High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada, the Canadian Government would have no objection;

(b) that in accrediting Mr. Kearney to Ceylon it should be understood that the Canadian Government could not prepare to open up a permanent office in Ceylon or could not undertake in any foreseeable future to appoint a separate High Commissioner to Ceylon, or to continue the proposed arrangement indefinitely. The proposed arrangement should rather be regarded as an experiment;

(c) that Mr. Kearney would ordinarily reside in New Delhi but would pay an occasional visit to Ceylon for official purposes.<sup>13</sup>

DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS IN PRAGUE AND WARSAW

On December 15th last, I sent you a memorandum on this subject, copy of which is, for convenience, attached.<sup>14</sup> Since this memorandum was written, we have had approaches from both the Polish and Czechoslovak Governments, expressing their disappointment that we have not appointed Ministers to their countries. The matter has been brought to a head in both capitals by the announcement that we have sent a fully accredited Minister to Yugoslavia.

The Czechoslovak Minister has told me, informally, that his Government would, he thought, be disappointed if the appointment of our Minister to Yugoslavia were not followed up very shortly by the appointment of a Canadian Minister to Czechoslovakia. We have had the same report from Mr. Macdonnell in Prague.

<sup>13</sup> Le Cabinet a rejeté cet avis le 6 mai. Saint-Laurent, qui avait soutenu la proposition, a expliqué cette décision comme suit dans une note à Pearson en date du 8 mai (DEA/5-C(S))† :

Cabinet rejected this advice on May 6. As St. Laurent, who had supported the proposal, explained in a minute to Pearson on May 8 (DEA/5-C(S))† :

Council felt no extension of our services in the East should be attempted at this time.

There is no question that the Prague post should be one of the most important in our diplomatic service in present circumstances. Czechoslovakia is almost the last bridge between the east and the west, and I am satisfied, myself, that we should do everything we can to emphasize the importance of that bridge. I would, myself, like to see our Czech Legation raised to an Embassy, and an outstanding Canadian made Ambassador. General Crerar might, even now, be persuaded to accept this post, and a man of his calibre could, I think, exercise a very important influence in this very strategic sphere. However, if this is not possible, I would strongly urge that we promote Macdonnell to Minister. As I have pointed out previously, this does not mean that he would be promoted in our hierarchy, as he would remain classified as a Foreign Service Officer, but it would be a recognition of the importance we attach to the Czech post, and would remove any feeling of disappointment that the Czech Government has.

As for Poland, substantially the same considerations apply. Mr. Kirkwood, in a letter which we have recently received from him dated January 15, says that the Polish Government has continuously shown some disappointment that we have not yet appointed a Minister to Warsaw. He goes on to say that the recent appointment of a new Polish Minister to Canada is a fresh indication of the Polish expectation that Canada will reciprocate. He fears that Poland would consider it a continued affront if we withhold the appointment of a Minister very much longer, especially since we have now appointed a Minister to Yugoslavia and to Turkey and contemplate sending one to Sweden.

Here, again, I would suggest that Mr. Kirkwood be given the rank of Minister, though, also, this would not mean any reclassification. There are particular reasons why he should be left in Warsaw. Living conditions there are very difficult indeed, and there would certainly be few candidates in Canada anxious for this post. Kirkwood lives in the Hotel Bristol, which was almost completely destroyed, but some parts of which have been rebuilt. It certainly would be no place for a new Minister with a wife and family. Kirkwood has the advantage, dubious in all other respects, of being a bachelor, and is doing a good job in Warsaw, under very difficult conditions.

I would be most grateful if you could have a word with the Prime Minister about this at an early date.

The attached documents† have to do with the appointment of Macdonnell as Minister to Czechoslovakia and Kirkwood as Minister to Poland. You will recall that the Cabinet on February 12 approved of these two appointments and that the King has given his approval. The Governments of Czechoslovakia and Poland have been asked for their agrément. The agréments have not yet been received, but they may be received any day.<sup>15</sup>

Our plans had been to make a simultaneous public announcement of both appointments as soon as the agréments had been received from the two Governments concerned.

An announcement of Macdonnell's appointment as Minister in Prague immediately after the Communist coup d'État there might be misinterpreted. The danger of misinterpretation might be lessened if we could postpone the announcement for a couple of weeks. The decision, however, is not entirely in our hands and it may be that the Government in Czechoslovakia might make the announcement as soon as they have given their agrément for Macdonnell's appointment. In that event, I assume that there is nothing which we can do except to confirm the appointment as soon as we hear officially that the agrément has been given.

It seems to me that it would be difficult now that matters have gone so far to reconsider the decision to make Macdonnell a Minister. Besides, we have already sent a minister to the out and out Communist government in Yugoslavia and we are appointing Kirkwood as Minister to a Government in Poland which is just as communist as that which now exists in Czechoslovakia.

Of course, if the United Kingdom should refuse recognition to the new government in Czechoslovakia, we would have to reconsider our position.

I should be grateful if you would let me know whether you would agree that for the present our objective should be to postpone the announcement of the appointments of Macdonnell and Kirkwood for about two weeks and to make the announcements of both appointments simultaneously.<sup>16</sup>

There are four documents attached for your signature and for Submission to Council.

[Ottawa], May 20, 1948

During the last few months the Department has been considering the advisability of establishing a Canadian office in Frankfurt. A memorandum was prepared suggesting that it would be advisable to open a consulate in the "capital" of Bizonia because of its increasing economic and political importance.†

2. This memorandum was sent to our Heads of missions in London, Washington, Paris and Berlin and they were asked for their comments. These have now been received and all are agreed that the suggested consulate would be valuable.<sup>17</sup> Mr. Robertson felt that we should have someone with sufficient authority in Frankfurt to supervise and control the operations of Canadian immigration teams in Bizonia. Mr. Wrong believed it to be most desirable to establish a Canadian office in Frankfurt as soon as possible on the grounds that, if the situation grew worse, the office might be needed in Frankfurt at shorter notice than we would be able to set it up. General Vanier emphasized the economic importance of Canadian interests in Western Germany which he felt could best be served by the opening of an office in Frankfurt.

3. Since our memorandum referred to was prepared the London Tripartite talks have made considerable progress. Steps will be taken for a Trizonal German constitutional assembly to meet by September 1st, 1948. Full Trizonal fusion is being aimed at and it is hoped that it will follow the establishment of a Western German government. Opportunities are being given to the Benelux States to comment on Bizonal developments through their consulates in Frankfurt.

4. On the basis of these responses and having in mind the recent and rapidly developing events resulting from the Tripartite talks in London, it seems to me that:

(a) It would be psychologically and politically unwise to withdraw our mission in Berlin at the present time.

(b) A consular office in Frankfurt would be useful in view of:

This is misleading as the Head of the Military Mission in Berlin expressed his opposition in two letters to Reid (March 19 and 22). In the second, more personal letter, Pope comments that: "like Calvin Coolidge's parson's view of sin, 'I'm agin it'."

(i) The unsatisfactory situation in Berlin which may conceivably result in the withdrawal of our mission from there.

(ii) The increasing political importance of Frankfurt as the capital of a large and important "state".

(iii) The import programme for Western Germany under the European Cooperation Act in which we may have some interest.

(iv) The removal of travel restrictions for businessmen and some restrictions on foreign banking activities which suggest that Western Germany will be open to world trade.

(v) The need for a representative to supervise and coordinate the operations of our immigration teams in Western Germany.

(vi) The difficulty of performing all these functions from Berlin which is, as you know, comparatively inaccessible.

(c) If a Frankfurt office were opened the volume of consular work in Berlin would not justify the retention at that post of the consular officer Grade III who is now stationed there. He could therefore be transferred to Frankfurt and only one additional officer would be required at Frankfurt.

(d) As is usual in countries where we have a diplomatic mission and a consular representative, the Frankfurt representative should be responsible to the Head of the mission in Berlin.

(e) All our enquiries indicate that there would be no objection on the part of the occupying powers to the opening of a Canadian consulate in Frankfurt with jurisdiction throughout the three zones of Western Germany.

4. I therefore recommend that preparations be made in the Department for the opening of a consular office in Frankfurt which would be subordinate to the Military mission in Berlin which, I feel, must be maintained.

5. The Frankfurt office would have the following functions:

(a) It should coordinate the operations of all Canadian Government agencies in the three Western Zones.

(b) It should perform consular functions in the three zones.

(c) It should provide political and economic representation in the three zones.

6. If you agree, I suggest that General Pope should be authorized to seek office space and quarters in Frankfurt<sup>18</sup> and that the three Occupying Powers should be formally asked to agree to the opening of a Canadian consulate in Frankfurt.<sup>19</sup>

PROPOSED ELEVATION OF CANADIAN LEGATION IN ROME AND ITALIAN
LEGATION IN OTTAWA

You will remember that, when it was decided to exchange formal diplomatic representation with Italy, the Italian authorities requested that the missions should be Legations for the time being rather than Embassies. In view of the events of the immediate past, the Italians wished to move slowly in their return to normal diplomatic relations. Although we should have preferred an exchange of Embassies, we understood the Italian reasons and readily agreed to exchange Legations.

2. In a recent, personal letter, Mr. Désy has advised me that the Italian authorities (including the President, Prime Minister and Foreign Minister) feel that the time is now ripe to elevate the rank of the diplomatic missions and are somewhat anxious that a request to this effect should be received from Canada.

3. Mr. Désy was told that the Italians expect the initiative to come from us because we are the victors of the war. I assume this means that the Italians do not wish to appear either presumptuous or suppliant.

4. Mr. Désy suspects that the Italian Government would welcome this change before it engages in the electoral campaign, as it would enhance governmental prestige and be considered to express Canadian appreciation of efforts aimed at the restoration of Italy.

5. In view of our general aim of reducing the distinction between Ministers and Ambassadors, I should think we could support the suggested change in status. The change would, I suppose, be some small indication of support for Italy's struggle to remain democratic. Incidentally it would remove the anomaly of maintaining in Rome a Minister "with the personal rank of Ambassador."

6. I see no real objection to our taking the initiative in this matter, as the Italians seem to attach some importance to it, and, if you agree, I shall see that the necessary steps are taken.<sup>20</sup>

Dear Jean [Désy]:

I told you on December 31 last that the question of the elevation of the Legation in Rome to an Embassy would be considered by the Government. For that purpose I had previously sent a memorandum on this subject to the Prime Minister and the Minister recommending this course.

The matter came before Cabinet on February 12.<sup>21</sup> The arguments of our memorandum were appreciated but it was felt that some misunderstanding might arise in Canada if we pressed for this change at the moment. The fact that Italy, an enemy power, would be in a preferred position over two or three of the ex-allied powers, where we were represented, was stressed. It was agreed that while change at the moment was undesirable, it should be made as soon as possible. For that purpose I will be bringing the matter forward again with the Minister's approval in two or three months.

I am sorry that we could not have this change made immediately, but the delay will not, I think, be long. Meanwhile, no matter what they may call the mission in Rome, we here only think of you as being one of our senior Ambassadors. In this case the words "Personal Rank of Ambassador" really mean something.

Yours sincerely,

PERSONAL

Rome, February 26, 1948

My dear Mike [Pearson];

I thank you for your letter of February 16th regarding the present non-elevation of the Legation in Rome to an Embassy.

Of course, I have no right to question the wisdom of the decision reached, but I should like to point out that Italy is an ex-enemy power which has become an ex-allied power.

I do sincerely hope that the change which, at the moment, is undesirable, will become before too long desirable, and I regret that, for the reasons given in the last paragraph of my letter of January 2nd, the suggested change has been adjourned. We could have helped effectively the Italian Government in the course of the coming elections at very little expense. And in view of the recent developments in Czechoslovakia, the elevation of our mission to Embassy would have been highly appreciated by the Italian Government as an opportune and well-timed manifestation of friendship.

If it is true that we want to check the progress of Communism in Europe, especially in Italy, it seems that we should use every possible means, as insignificant as they may look in the Canadian perspective, to increase the power of resistance of those parties combatting the threatening advance of the Soviet.

I suppose we have every good reason not to hurt the feelings of our ex-allies who are now behind the iron curtain, and I earnestly hope that Italy will remain on this side of the curtain. The proposal made would have helped somewhat in that direction.

I appreciate your kind remarks in the last paragraph of your letter. They are very soothing to my skittish vanity.

Yours sincerely,
JEAN [DÉSY]

ELEVATION OF CANADIAN LEGATION IN ROME AND ITALIAN LEGATION IN OTTAWA

Now that the Italian elections have returned the democratic Government of Mr. de Gasperi securely to power, I believe we should reconsider the question of raising our mission in Rome from a Legation to an Embassy, and asking the Italians to do the same in Ottawa.

2. You will remember that I recommended that this be done in a memorandum of January 9th, 1948, but that Cabinet decided on February 12th that no action should be taken at that time.

3. It seems to me that the result of the Italian elections has now greatly strengthened the case for raising the status of our Rome mission:

(a) Prior to the elections the Italian Government more than once asked us unofficially to propose this step, apparently desiring to enhance its prestige during a critical period, by securing what would have appeared to be a mark of approbation from Canada. Cabinet may have been reluctant to act on this sort of consideration as long as the issue of the elections was still in doubt. It is now certain, however, that the de Gasperi victory has delighted the great majority of Canadians, who would regard the elevation of our mission as a fitting expression of their approval of the way things have gone in Italy, and of their desire to encourage the Italians to persevere in the course which they have chosen.

(b) Another reason for Cabinet's hesitation last February may have been the thought that by the time the formalities had been completed, we might have found that we had appointed an Ambassador to an antipathetic government. The resounding success of the democratic parties in Italy has removed all cause for anxiety on this score.

(c) The elevation of our mission would not only accord with our general aim of reducing the distinction between Ministers and Ambassadors, but it would remove the anomaly of maintaining in Rome a Minister "with the personal rank of Ambassador."

(d) Apparently the Italians expect the initiative to come from us because we are the victors of the war. I assume this means that the Italians do not wish to appear either presumptuous or suppliant.

4. For these reasons I therefore recommend that we propose to the Italian Government that our mission in Rome, and its mission in Ottawa, be raised from Legation to Embassy.<sup>22</sup>

5. Even if this decision is taken, I think we should have to make it clear to Mr. Désy that he could not, on that account, expect to receive any additional staff for some time to come.

6. Mr. St. Laurent has agreed with this recommendation, and has asked me to bring it to your attention.<sup>23</sup>

In this capacity you will receive a salary of $8,000 per annum, and allowances of $10,000 per annum. The allowances will be paid to you with effect from the date of your arrival in San Francisco. Attached marked "B" is the Order-in-Council, P.C. [illegible]/666 of February 20th, 1948,† which authorizes these amounts. In consequence, your initial pay and allowances will be at the rate of $18,000 per annum. No other allowance for housing accommodations, entertainment, etc., will be permitted. Travelling expenses, however, may be claimed in accordance with the regulations.

The Consulate General in San Francisco is the third to be opened in the United States, and effects the division of that country into three parts for the supervision of our consular activities. There are already Consulates General in New York, with jurisdiction over the Atlantic States, and at Chicago supervising the Central and Mid-western States. The post at San Francisco will administer the Mountain and Coast States. The attached sheet marked "C"† shows the division of territory in detail.

As you are aware, it is the intention that a Consulate will be established at Los Angeles at the beginning of 1949. It is possible that at some future date, so far undetermined, it will become necessary to open a Consulate at Seattle. The Consulate at Los Angeles, when established, will be responsible, under your general supervision, for the southern portion of the State of California, and the State of Arizona.

It will be your duty to act as a representative of Canada in the whole territory allotted to your Consulate-General. In the course of your tour of duty you will doubtless find it desirable to visit parts of your territory other than that immediately contiguous to San Francisco. Such occasions may be used to advantage for reporting to the Ambassador on any particular matters of interest which you may encounter.

It will be your responsibility to encourage Canadian trade, and travel to Canada, to maintain registers of Canadians living under your jurisdiction who may wish to so register, to distribute information matter, to deal with applications for immigration and temporary entry to Canada, to prepare political and commercial reports, to issue travel documents and grant visas, to assist destitute Canadians, to prepare and endorse documents, to conduct correspondence, to maintain records and accounts, and to perform such other related duties as may be prescribed or required.

You will at all times bear in mind that the principal function of the Consulate General of which you are in charge is the promotion and cementing of the traditionally close and friendly relations which have for so long prevailed between the people of Canada and those of the United States. You will, however, have observed that there is much misconception among the people of the United States, concerning Canada and its government, culture and people. It will, therefore, be your constant concern so to act that, so far as is possible, this misconception may be dispelled.

This briefly describes your duties in general. The Chief of the Consular Division will supply you with a separate memorandum for your guidance, in more detail, in carrying out your commission.

Your appointment is the earnest of the confidence reposed in you by the Government of Canada and by this Department. I wish you all possible success in your undertaking.

Yours sincerely,

[Ottawa], January 30, 1948

PEACE TREATY WITH BULGARIA — CANADIAN RIGHTS

An interesting question has arisen in connection with the Peace Treaty with Bulgaria.

2. Canada did not declare war against Bulgaria and, consequently, was not a signatory to the Treaty. However, Canada may be able to derive certain benefits under Article 32 of the Treaty, which reads as follows:

“Articles 22, 23, 29 and Annex VI of the present Treaty shall apply to the Allied and Associated Powers and France and to those of the United Nations whose diplomatic relations with Bulgaria have been broken off during the war.”

3. If diplomatic relations have been broken off within the meaning of Article 32 of the Peace Treaty, the Bulgarian Government would be obliged to return all property belonging to Canadian citizens which might have been removed by force or duress from the territory of any of the United Nations and would also be required to restore all Canadian property as it now exists in that country to the Canadian owners. If restoration in complete good order is not possible, compensation in local currency is to be paid to the extent of two-thirds of the amount of the damage sustained. Bulgaria would, moreover, during a period of eighteen months commencing September 15, 1947, be obliged to grant to Canada most-favoured-nation treatment providing Canada reciprocates. Finally, Bulgaria, for a period of one year commencing September 15, 1947, would be obliged to enable Canadian citizens to submit for review any judgments given in Bulgarian courts during the war, in cases where the Canadian had been unable, adequately, to present his case, either as plaintiff or defendant.

4. The principal interest which Canada appears to have in the benefits outlined in paragraph 3 above is in respect of claims by Canadian citizens. So far, we are aware of only four claims, one in the amount of $4,000 representing damage to property and three in connection with Kingdom of Bulgaria bonds and the accumulated interest thereon, amounting to $192,000. It should be possible to arrange for a settlement of these relatively small claims through ordinary diplomatic negotiation as readily as by reliance on the Treaty. Moreover, arrangements might be made with the Bulgarian Government with a view to protecting Canadian claimants before releasing Bulgarian assets now vested in the Custodian, amounting to approximately $60,000.

5. In a despatch dated August 28, 1944, this Department advised the Dominions Office that "our formal position is that of a country which has broken diplomatic relations but not declared war." On the other hand, there does not seem to be any evidence on file to establish that Canada broke off diplomatic relations with Bulgaria. Bulgaria has never had diplomatic or even consular representation in Canada. Canada has at no time had diplomatic or consular representation in Bulgaria, the United Kingdom Minister representing our interests in that country from time to time as occasion required.

6. The question arises whether certain action taken on March 5, 1941, resulted in a breaking off of diplomatic relations between Canada and Bulgaria. On that day, acting on instructions from the Government of the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom Minister to Bulgaria broke off diplomatic relations with that country. On the same day, the Prime Minister of Canada stated in the House of Commons, in announcing the action of the United Kingdom Government:

"There is no Canadian diplomatic mission in Bulgaria and there are no Bulgarian diplomatic or consular representatives in this country. There was, therefore, no occasion for any action by the Canadian Government with regard to the severance of diplomatic relations."

7. The Legal Adviser of the Department has stated that, while the matter is not free from doubt, in his view the action taken on March 5, 1941, did not result in a breaking off of diplomatic relations between Canada and Bulgaria within the meaning of Article 32 of the Peace Treaty.

9. I am inclined to think that we should take the line suggested and rely for the protection of Canadian interests on the remedies, by way of diplomatic representation or otherwise, that are available apart from the Peace Treaty. We would probably not wish to create the impression abroad that Canada's diplomatic status was dependent on, or indeed necessarily related to, action taken by United Kingdom authorities.

10. Do you agree?<sup>1</sup>

TERMINATION OF THE WAR WITH ITALY, ROUMANIA, HUNGARY

The legal advisers of the Departments of Justice and External Affairs have expressed the view that, in so far as Parliament, during the last session, approved Treaties of Peace with Italy, Roumania, Hungary and Finland, it would be appropriate that the coming into force of these Treaties and consequent termination of the state of war should be announced by proclamation.

These Treaties were signed at Paris on February 10th, 1947, each to come into force on the date of deposit of the Instruments of Ratification of the parties concerned. In the case of Canada, the Italian Peace Treaty came into force on September 15th and Treaties for the other countries on September 19th, 1947.

Submissions to Council have been prepared accordingly for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, one to proclaim the Treaty of Peace with Italy and the other for the Treaties with Roumania, Hungary and Finland. This division is in conformity with that made when war was proclaimed against the above countries.<sup>2</sup>

[Ottawa], April 3, 1948

You will recall that the Council of Foreign Ministers' meeting in London at the end of 1947 failed to reach any solution to a variety of problems which grew out of the unsettled condition of Germany. The United Kingdom, United States and France then felt obliged to meet some of these urgent problems through a series of individual and concerted actions.

2. One of these actions was the holding by the United Kingdom, the United States and France of the London meeting on Western Germany. This took place from February 23rd to March 6th. The Benelux states were invited to this meeting. The agenda of the meeting was divided into two parts:

(a) Interim administrative problems which were reserved for the consideration of the United Kingdom, the United States and France alone:

- (i) The relationship of Western Germany to the European Recovery Programme.
- (ii) Reparations.
- (iii) Political and economic organization of Germany as related to trizonal fusion.

(b) Topics of wider implication in the discussion of which the Benelux states participated:

(i) The role of German economy in the European economy and the control of the Ruhr.

(ii) Security against Germany.

(iii) Evolution of the political and economic organization of Germany, excluding the discussion on trizonal fusion.

(iv) Provisional territorial arrangements, e.g., the Saar.

3. Although a cursory examination of this agenda leads to the conclusion that something approaching a peace settlement was being aimed at, we did not consider that we should regard the association of the Benelux states or the exclusion of other belligerents, including ourselves, as a denial of Canadian interests in the discussion. We felt that the association of the Benelux states was a necessary step toward the realization of the European Recovery Programme, which the Canadian Government had already welcomed.

4. The London meeting created a number of committees called Working Parties, some of which reported back before the conclusion of the London meeting on March 6th. One of these Working Parties was charged with examining the future political organization of Germany. Its work, however, was not complete and it was decided that the settlement of disagreed points should be referred to a new Working Party to meet in Berlin. The Canadian Government has been invited to express its views informally to this Working Party. It will be noted that this topic, while of great importance, is not of outstanding importance as compared with some of the other topics on which our views have not been solicited.

5. The London meeting is being resumed in the middle of April. At this meeting the representatives of the six Governments are expected to produce decisions over the whole field of subjects which were studied in the first meeting. These decisions will then be placed before the governments concerned for approval and implementation.

6. It seems evident that a peace settlement for Germany is being reached and that no satisfactory method has been found for associating the smaller powers with that settlement. This is not, of course, in line with the declared policy of the Government that Canada should take a part in any German settlement proportionate to the part this country took in the defeat of Germany.

7. However, the situation is extremely difficult for the United Kingdom, the United States and France who are anxious not to take any action which would leave them open to a Soviet charge that they were making a separate peace with Germany. This difficulty is further complicated by the fact that the problems involved are subject to extreme differences of opinion among the Western Powers themselves, and that the introduction of any more countries would mean the introduction of further differences and a slowing down of Western European consolidation which we are anxious to see achieved with all possible speed. Our information from London is that a conference of all belligerents would be inappropriate at present because:

(a) The Bogota Conference is at present in session and pressure would be brought to bear upon the United States to include non-active belligerents in any projected deliberations.

(b) The situation in Germany is extremely uncertain as regards the Soviet Union's next move and it would be well to see what develops before undertaking any fresh approach to the German settlement.

(c) The progress which is now being made, particularly toward the realization of the European Recovery Programme, might be adversely affected.

8. The United Kingdom has expressed the hope that we will take part in the Berlin Working Party and states that they would gladly receive any views the Canadian Government may wish to express directly to them.

9. In the circumstances I feel:

(a) That General Pope should be authorized to present comments to the Working Party on the future political organization of Germany; and

(b) That a note should be transmitted to the United Kingdom, the United States and French Governments pointing out that we believe something approaching a peace settlement is being reached; that there is no adequate part assigned to this country in that settlement; and that, with due consideration of the difficulties involved, Canada would welcome any suggestion those Governments may have to make on how this country could be associated in the settlement we believe is being reached.

10. I attach for your consideration draft telegrams to General Pope and to our missions in London, Washington and Paris as well as a copy of C.R.O. telegram Q.40 of March 9th† on which our telegram to General Pope is based.

[Berlin], April 9, 1948

Dear Mr. Steel,

With reference to our conversation of yesterday afternoon, I beg to advise you that I have now been instructed by my Government to present to the Berlin Working Party No. 5 the attached memorandum commenting on the Agreed Report of the (London) Working Party on the various problems in regard to the future German Government (Document TRI/4, dated at London, 4th March, 1948). As you have already informed me that Working Party No. 5 has completed its labours, I beg to communicate this attached memorandum to you in your capacity as Chairman, trusting that you will be good enough to take due note of its contents and to bring them to the attention of the Conference of Military Governors.

In this connection, may I invite your attention to the fact that in drawing up their memorandum, the Canadian Government had before them only a cabled summary of the Document TRI/4.

I attach further, for your information, a copy of a memorandum in regard to procedure in the matter of drafting the actual terms of the German peace settlement which the High Commissioner for Canada in London and the Canadian Ambassadors in Washington and Paris have been instructed to present to the Governments to which they are respectively accredited.

Yours sincerely,

[MAURICE POPE]

CANADIAN SUBMISSION ON THE AGREED REPORT OF THE (LONDON) WORKING PARTY ON THE VARIOUS PROBLEMS IN REGARD TO THE FUTURE GERMAN GOVERNMENT, HAVING REGARD TO POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS (DOCUMENT TRI/4, DATED 4TH MARCH, 1948)

1. General

The presentation of these comments to the Berlin Working Party No. 5 should not be construed as denoting any change in the view which the Canadian Government has repeatedly expressed that the measure of Canada's participation in the war against Germany warrants Canada being accorded a correspondingly effective part in the framing of the German peace settlement. The comments are therefore presented without prejudice to our right to present views later and to insist on an effective part in drafting the actual terms of the peace settlement.

It is assumed:

(a) that the German territory for which a political structure is proposed in the (London) Working Party's report will consist, in the immediate future, of the United Kingdom, United States and French Zones, but that it is intended that the political structure should be capable of application to the whole of Germany;

(b) that Western Germany will remain under military occupation indefinitely;

(c) that Western Germany must be a community capable of playing its part in the life of Western Europe;

(d) that Western Germany will participate in the Western European system known as Western Union.

3. We understand that it is the intention of the Western European nations to establish as rapidly as possible effective central organs of the Western European community and to endow these organs with a constantly increasing amount of power. The more power the Western European nations transfer to these central organs, or to other international organs such as an International Rhine Valley authority the easier it will be to include in a German constitution provisions, vesting powers in these organs rather than in the German federal government. This would help to solve the problem of how to create a viable community in Western Germany without at the same time creating too strong a federal German government.

4. Method of Election to the Lower House

One disadvantage of indirect election is that it would lead to an increase in the powers of the federal political parties; a representative in the Federal Lower House would tend to become not so much a representative of the people of the Laender as a delegate of a federal political party. Moreover it would result in Laender elections being fought on federal issues. The advantage of direct election to the Lower Houses of both federal and Laender legislatures is that it would increase the possibility of voters voting for one party in federal elections and for another party in Land elections. This provides a desirable check and balance.

5. Election of Chief of State and of Federal Minister President

There would seem to us to be an advantage in having both a Chief of State and a Federal Minister President since power could be divided between them and one might provide a check and balance over the other. Neither should be elected by direct popular vote since this would tend to magnify their power and influence. It would obviously be inappropriate for both to be elected in precisely the same way. We would suggest that the Chief of State might be elected by the Upper House and the Minister President by the Lower House. This would tend to make the Chief of State the protector of the rights of the Laender and as such he should have the power to refuse assent to legislation pending reference to the Courts on its constitutionality.

6. Federal Ministers

The view which we put forward in our submission of January 30, 1947, to the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers, was that the executive should be subject to the control of the legislature. We are still inclined to this opinion and consequently think that the Federal Ministers should be collectively responsible to the Lower House.

7. Division of Powers between Federal Houses

We are inclined to support the United Kingdom view that the Upper House should have the power to suspend but not to veto legislation. There would obviously be difficulty in reconciling with the principle of collective responsibility of the cabinet any special power of the Upper House over foreign affairs and certain appointments.

8. Division of Powers between Federal and Land Governments

(a) Subject to the observations set forth in paragraph 3 above, control over economic matters such as currency and coinage, banking and insurance, customs tariff, export and import trade, allocation of supplies for industry, and probably prices and marketing, would seem to be essential powers of an effective central authority;

(b) it would seem to us useful that the Land governments should have power to enter into international agreements on matters which are not delegated to the federal government or are not transferred by the constitution to central organs of the Western European community or to other international organs which may be set up;

(c) some limitation would probably have to be put on the right of individual Laender to join international organs where every state has one vote to avoid the danger that Western Germany could control nine votes.

9. Taxation

From our own experience with a federal state in Canada, we foresee difficulties in the adoption of the restriction that the federal German government should dispose of monies only for the purposes for which it is set up. This would preclude a federal government from extending grants in aid or general subsidies to the Laender to assist in overcoming the disparities among the Laender in their ability to provide essential public health and public welfare services. We also foresee difficulties in restricting to the Laender the power to collect taxes. To give the Laender power to collect taxes on behalf of the federal government would involve the danger that the governments in more prosperous areas would not be likely to be careful in collecting taxes which are not for their own direct benefit. The fiscal resources of Germany are severely limited and it will therefore be necessary to put them to the best possible use if Germany is to make an adequate contribution to European recovery. It would seem to us that the available fiscal resources are most likely to be put to the best use if the federal government has wide taxing powers and a good deal of authority in allocating fiscal resources. Otherwise it may be found that the incidence and the collection of taxes as well as the quality of public services in the different Laender may be very unequal. Such conditions would inevitably give rise to discontent and might promote social unrest.

10. Federal Judiciary

In order to give adequate protection to the civil rights of individuals, the appellate jurisdiction of the Federal Supreme Court should extend to the protection of the rights of individuals against the Land governments as well as against the Federal government.

11. Civil Rights

Civil rights should be guaranteed through constitutional limitations of the powers of the Land governments and legislatures as well as the federal government and legislatures.

12. Citizenship

The sentence on this in the summary we have received is obscure. It would seem to us that there should be a common citizenship and that the citizens of one Land, if they move to another Land, should automatically become citizens of that Land. Inasmuch as some of the civil rights may hinge upon citizenship, special precautions should be taken to ensure against discrimination in citizenship laws on the ground of race, sex, language or religion.

13. Reserved Subjects

We assume that the complete constitution might contain certain chapters, on defence for example, and on certain aspects of foreign policy, which would not come into effect immediately since these matters would be temporarily reserved by reason of the continued military occupation. One of these reserve chapters might be the one containing the provisions for the amendment of the constitution.

COPY OF MEMORANDUM BEING PRESENTED BY THE HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR CANADA IN THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE CANADIAN AMBASSADOR IN WASHINGTON AND THE CANADIAN AMBASSADOR IN PARIS TO THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE, RESPECTIVELY, IN REGARD TO PROCEDURE IN THE MATTER OF DRAFTING THE TERMS OF THE GERMAN PEACE SETTLEMENT<sup>3</sup>

The Canadian Government does not wish to hinder in any way the development of plans by the three Western Occupying powers for cooperation either in the administration of their Zones area of Occupation in Germany or in securing a measure of unity in Western Germany. On the contrary, the Canadian Government has full sympathy with these developments and welcomes the wide measure of agreement which has already been reached by the three Western Occupying powers.

The Canadian Government realizes, however, that what is, in effect, taking place is something close to a peace settlement for Western Germany which will govern the reintegration of Germany in Western Europe, which may eventually affect the position of Germany as a whole, and which cannot but prejudice some of the issues which would come before a peace conference.

The Government does not wish to allow Canada's claims to participate in the German peace settlement to go by default merely because of the special circumstances in which the London Meetings are taking place and of our desire not to complicate or hinder the negotiations at these meetings.

In the opinion of the Canadian Government, however, the measure of Canada's contribution to the war against Germany warrants Canada being afforded a correspondingly effective part in the framing of the German peace settlement. The Government does not consider that an opportunity to present views to Working Parties or to the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France is sufficient. What we ask for are opportunities to play an effective part in drafting the actual terms of the peace settlement.

The Canadian Government trusts, therefore, that the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France will bear in mind the necessity of making adequate provision in the near future, before the general lines of the peace settlement with Germany have become fixed, for the active participation in the process of peace making of those western countries, like Canada, which contributed effectively to the prosecution of the war.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Reference our telephone conversation of April 12th.

In view of the way the general international situation has been developing in recent months, I think it would be at least inopportune, and probably unwise, for Canada to raise now the question of the formal participation of other belligerents in the German settlement.

2. Since failure of the four-Power meeting in December, the division of Europe and the world has deepened, and the fissure now cuts right across both geographical Germany and the political problem of the German settlement. In this new context the classical pattern under which a victorious war was followed by a general conference of the victors, at which a treaty of peace was drawn up and imposed upon the defeated States, seems remote and unrealistic. For better or worse, the phase in which these procedures were politically possible is over, and I think it would be a mistake to try to carry forward into the current phase our very reasonable preoccupation with securing a status in the peace settlement more or less commensurate with our country's contribution to the general victory.

3. The major risks of war will not arise from the shortcomings of the German settlement. Though the difficulties in reaching the German settlement are evidence of the strain under which the world is labouring, they do not seem to me to be in any real sense a cause of that strain. There is I think, a growing recognition of the correctness of this analysis, perhaps best illustrated by the quick conclusion of the parties to the Brussels Conference that the pattern of the Treaty of Dunkirk was already obsolete, and that the recognition of Western European security could not in any realistic sense be based on a scheme for meeting a hypothetical German aggression.

4. Considerations of this kind have, I think, a close bearing on the whole problem of the German settlement, which has to be looked at more as a question of what contribution Western Germany can make to the creation of a viable Europe than as a study in retributive justice qualified by guarantees against recidivism. If there is anything at all in this way of looking at the general problem, we would not be helping matters by attempting at this time to revive an old issue of appropriate participation in the German peace settlement, and certainly not by airing the possibility of a conference of "western belligerents" which would include six extra-European countries of the British Commonwealth of Nations and exclude six of the 16 countries co-operating in the European Recovery Program. Ends.

London, April 15, 1948

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Reference my telegram No. 524, 14th April, German settlement.

Following specific considerations seem to me to support, with more or less force, the very general argument which I have tried to put forward against our raising the question of association of other belligerents with the German settlement at this time.

(1) The western occupying Powers need all the elbow room they can get to cope with the Russians who are still calling the tune in Germany and taking every opportunity to create mischief and difficulties. Pressures on London, Paris or Washington at the present time for closer association of other Powers in the general direction of German policy could only hamper them from acting together as quickly and flexibly as the changing situation demands.

(2) The United Kingdom and France, with the encouragement of the United States, are laying the foundation of a new organization of Europe through western union, which would completely cut across the old lines of 1939-45 belligerency and neutrality. Such plans for European recovery and reconstruction are directly and immensely dependent upon the future of Germany. To my mind it would be a major mistake to exclude Italy, for example, from participation in the German settlement so long as she is co-operating in the European Recovery Program and participating in plans for a western European customs union, etc., which imply the ultimate integration of German resources in the European economy. Europe has undergone profound changes since the defeat of Germany, and it is no longer possible to think of it in terms of "western belligerents" versus the rest. The division of Europe today — and there is no reason to believe that the Russians will permit its coming together in the foreseeable future — has created an entirely new alignment of forces, and any suggestion of a conference of "western belligerents" to determine the future of Germany, for example, would cut across this alignment.

(3) Were we to insist on the necessity of closer formal association in the German settlement, it would be difficult to distinguish effectively between our approach and Evatt's recent effort to revive plans for a general German Peace Conference which would settle all the issues on which the Council of Foreign Ministers were unable to agree. I do not think a general conference could accomplish anything of the sort, and I should not like to see our interest in helping to further a sound European settlement confused with his search for a new conference over which he could perhaps preside.

(4) An invitation either to "other western belligerents" or to "western European countries" to a conference to determine the future of Western Germany would formally and definitively mark the abandonment of any hope of ever getting a four-Power agreement in Europe. It is true that very little hope of such agreement remains, but it would still be a serious step formally to exclude its possibility. Relations with the Soviet Union during the next year or two seem certain to remain delicate and difficult, and I do not think we should urge the Western Great Powers to take a diplomatic initiative of this kind which might precipitate a possibly avoidable crisis in those relations.

(5) As events develop over the next months we must expect to see democratic German administrations gradually assuming increasing responsibility for the conduct of affairs in Western Germany. The Western Powers which need German resources to make the European Recovery Program work are bound, for economic and strategic reasons, to encourage such German administration to co-operate as closely as possible in plans for European reconstruction. This task would be made more difficult by premature pressure for a formal peace settlement which could only confirm the partition of Germany under Allied auspices. Ends.

GERMAN SETTLEMENT

On April 3 I sent you a memorandum on the German settlement recommending (a) that General Pope should present to a secret Working Party in Berlin of the three Western powers our comments on the future political organization of Germany, and (b) that a memorandum should be transmitted to the United Kingdom, the United States and French Governments pointing out that we believe something approaching a peace settlement is being reached; that there is no adequate part assigned to this country in that settlement; and that, with due consideration of the difficulties involved, Canada would welcome any suggestion those Governments may have to make on how this country could be associated in the settlement we believe is being reached. I attach copies of our comments and of our memorandum.

2. You approved of these recommendations.

3. I therefore authorized General Pope to present the comments in Berlin. I put off giving an authorization for the presentation of the memorandum until it was received in Paris. Before it had been received in Paris, I received two personal telegrams from Mr. Robertson in which he expressed doubts about the wisdom of our presenting the memorandum. I enclose copies of these telegrams No. 524 of April 14 and No. 530 of April 15.

4. Mr. Robertson's telegrams demonstrate that he had somewhat misinterpreted our memorandum, since he believed that our intention was to air the possibility of a formal conference of the Western belligerents. You will recall that we had given some consideration to this possibility but had rejected it. However, Mr. Robertson's telegrams did make clear that our memorandum might be misinterpreted by some of the powers to which it was addressed. I was therefore going to suggest to you that we might make some revisions in the memorandum.

5. However, before I was able to get these revisions in final form, we received a despatch from General Pope in which he informed us that he had presented to the representatives of the three Western powers in Berlin not only our comments on the future German political structure but also our memorandum reserving our position on the peace settlement. This he had done by misinterpretation of the instructions we had sent him.

6. It seems to me that, in the circumstances, the best thing for us to do would be to ask General Pope to explain to the representatives of the three Western powers in Berlin that the memorandum on procedure had been sent to them in error, and he should go on to say that, while the memorandum does represent our views, we had decided not to present it at the present time since we fully appreciate the difficulties which are confronting the three Western powers in their present efforts to work out plans for Western Germany and we did not wish to add to those difficulties.

7. If you approve of this, we can then instruct our representatives in London, Washington and Paris to inform the local Foreign Office that, if their representative in Berlin has forwarded our memorandum to them, they should read it in the light of this message to General Pope. This will perhaps enable us to make the best of both worlds. We will have made our views clear to the United Kingdom, the United States and France, and, at the same time, we will make it clear that we have no desire to hamper them in any way from acting together as quickly and as flexibly as the changing circumstances demand.<sup>4</sup>

8. I enclose an extra copy of this memorandum and of the enclosures in case you should wish to discuss them with the Prime Minister.

Ottawa, April 28, 1948

THE ROLE OF WESTERN GERMANY IN THE EUROPEAN AND WORLD ECONOMIES<sup>5</sup>

On January 30, 1947, the Canadian Government submitted to the Council of Foreign Ministers' Deputies in London a number of suggestions about the economic aspects of the German settlement. This submission referred to the three principal Canadian interests in the future German economy:

- (a) the economy should not be so strengthened as to permit aggressive war;
- (b) there should not be perpetuated in Germany conditions of depression and unrest;
- (c) German industrial capacity should be used for the benefit of all countries, particularly the European countries which normally trade with Germany.

It is not thought that these views require substantial modification in the light of present circumstances, although some changes of emphasis are needed.

2. The Canadian Government recognizes that general European recovery requires a healthy German economy:

- (a) to eliminate from Western Europe an area of depression and misery which could be exploited by Communist propaganda, and to give Germans confidence that in a free democratic society in a free democratic Western Europe they will eventually be able by their own efforts to reach a standard of living appropriate to a Western European country;
- (b) to reduce the dependence of Western Europe on outside assistance and to hasten Western Europe's return to a self-supporting economy;
- (c) to enable Germany and Western Europe as a whole to make the largest possible contribution to the building up of sound international trade on a multilateral basis.

3. As it is seen from Ottawa, there appears to be danger that the pendulum may now swing too far from the days of the Morgenthau plan. One of the reasons the Morgenthau plan was absurd was that it ignored the great measure of unity that existed in normal European economic life and that it failed to recognize the consequences for all of Europe of the virtual destruction of German industry. It would be equally unjustified and even dangerous to assume now that the uncontrolled expansion of the German economy would constitute no problem for European life. The dilemma might be avoided if the problem of Western Germany were to be treated

The memorandum was forwarded to the governments of the United Kingdom, United States, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg through the High Commission in London.

consistently as a part of the problem of Western Europe. For example the question should not be approached as one of building up Western Germany as a bastion against the Soviet Union. The objective to be sought is that Western Europe as a whole, including Western Germany, should make the largest possible contribution to the creation and maintenance of an overwhelming preponderance of force over the Soviet Union. Force in this context, as the Prime Minister and Mr. St. Laurent have stated in recent public declarations, means not only military and economic force but non-material forces such as the ability to rally allies and to enlist the wholehearted support of the citizens of all free countries.

4. If the non-material component in the preponderance of force is to be as strong as possible, it seems essential that the countries of Western Europe should support wholeheartedly a programme for Western European co-operation, which must include, as a part of that programme, measures for the reconstruction of the German economy. It is recognized that this support is unlikely to be forthcoming from our former allies if they do not receive assistance in their reconstruction more favourable than that accorded Western Germany and if, when special United States help ceases, their economic strength has not increased relatively more than that of Western Germany. This general consideration should be given full weight in making decisions on the level of industry in Western Germany or on the expansion, curtailment or elimination of any particular industry, even if it involves some loss in immediate increases in productivity in Western Europe.

5. On balance it is felt that it would not be wise at the present time to make any upward revision of the level of industry plan announced in August, 1947, by the United States and the United Kingdom. It seems to the Department that this level of industry plan represents the maximum which the Western neighbours of Germany would freely approve. This plan appears to be a reasonable compromise between the point of view that German industrial recovery is of first importance and that which lays greater emphasis on the necessity of providing for security against German aggression.

6. The Canadian Government is glad that the Western zones of Germany will become members of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. It is believed that the more power the Western European nations find it possible to transfer to this body or to the Consultative Council set up by the Brussels Treaty or to other international bodies which may be set up, such as an international Rhine valley authority, the easier it will be to solve the problem of how to create a viable community in Western Germany with the minimum danger that Germany will become a threat to the independence of the other states of Western Europe.

7. In the view of the Canadian Government, it would be in the interests of Western Europe and of the Western world as a whole that Germany should be a member of any scheme for closer European economic cooperation that may be worked out.

8. It is recognized that there are dangers in an unregulated development of trade between Western Germany and the Soviet zone of Germany and between Western Germany and Eastern Europe as a whole. The Department hopes, however, that a way will be found by which trade between Western Europe, including Western Germany, and Eastern Europe can be safely expanded. Perhaps the Organization for European Economic Cooperation could be used as the agency for regulating this trade.

9. It is obvious from the above that the Canadian Government believe that decisions on the role of the economy of Western Germany in the European and world economies involve a careful balancing of political, strategic and non-material considerations as well as purely economic considerations.

SIX POWER TALKS ON WESTERN GERMANY

On June 9 I sent you a memorandum on this subject.† It seemed to me that it might be useful if this memorandum might be brought up to date, in view of the possibility that a question might be asked in the House of Commons on our Estimates.

I therefore attach a brief statement on the 6 Power talks which contains no confidential information.

You will recall that we have informally expressed to the governments which participated in the London talks our views on the future German political organization and on the role of Germany in the European and world economies. Mr. Pearson informed the House of Commons Committee on External Affairs that our political comments had been submitted to officials of the United States, the United Kingdom and French Governments. Shortly after he had made this statement to the Committee, we submitted our views on the role of Germany in the European and world economies, and this and the previous comments on German political organization have been sent to all six governments. They have not, however, been made public.

We have also prepared comments on the control of the Ruhr. These comments were on an early confidential draft of proposed recommendations on the control of the Ruhr. That draft has now been revised and has been published.

These comments on the control of the Ruhr were sent to you on June 9 for your approval, so that you might authorize us to send them to Mr. Robertson for such use as he might see fit to make of them.

In general, the views expressed in the three documents which we have prepared elaborate the views set forth in our statement on the German peace settlement, the text of which was given to the House on January 30, 1947.

In case you might find it necessary in the House to say anything about the views we have expressed, I attach copies of the three documents, scoring in the margin those passages which might be alluded to. You will recall that, in the House of Commons this session on May 5, 1948, (House of Commons debates, page 3632-3), you made a statement that we have not insisted on participating in the London 6 Power discussions "because if we did, it would be a reason for bringing in a great many other countries which might hamper or retard the progress being made in trying to bring some semblance of order and re-organization" in Western Germany. You went on to say that the restoration of Western Germany "not to the extent of becoming again a menace to its neighbours but to the extent of taking its part in the integrated economies of western Europe, is important to the whole of western Europe; and because it is important to the whole of western Europe, it is of direct interest to us." We are, however, "still insisting" that when it comes to making the final peace with Germany, the powers who took a substantial part in the winning of the war shall be given a role proportionate to their importance in the conflict.

E[SCOTT] R[EID]

SIX POWER TALKS ON WESTERN GERMANY

1. Informal discussions on Germany were recently held in London between representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, France and the three Benelux countries. These discussions resulted in a report containing agreed recommendations on all the items discussed. The report was submitted to the six governments for their approval and that approval has now been given.
2. A summary of the report was issued as a communiqué on June 7. Attached to the summary was the text of the recommendations on the control of the Ruhr.
3. The views of the Canadian Government on some of the economic and political aspects of the problems which were discussed in London were made known informally to the governments which participated in these talks.
4. Many difficulties must have intervened before agreement was reached amongst the participants in the London discussions, and we welcome the spirit of concession which has made it possible to produce agreed recommendations on all the items that were discussed. These recommendations were submitted to the participating countries as a whole since, according to the communiqué, "their main provisions are mutually dependent and form an indivisible programme."
5. We are confident that these agreed recommendations mark a great advance towards the solution of the German problem.
6. The concluding paragraph of the communiqué contains the assurance that the recommendations agreed to in London "in no way preclude, and on the contrary should facilitate, eventual four-power agreement on the German problem" and that they are "designed to solve the urgent political and economic problems arising out of the present situation in Germany because of the previous failure to reach comprehensive four-power decisions on Germany."
7. This observation is an added reason for regarding the recommendations as an important step in the political and economic reconstruction of Europe.

You may recall that some time ago it was decided that we should offer informal comments on the various aspects of the German settlement which were discussed by the six power meeting in London. As you know, our comments on a number of the topics have already been passed on to the representatives of the participating countries in London.

2. We were informed some time ago that a secret working party on territorial claims by Western States against Germany would meet in Paris and report to their governments by August 15th. We accordingly prepared comments. However, it seems to me that it would be inadvisable for us to send in comments at the present time. The whole German situation is now obscure and it might be better to wait till it clarifies.

3. I should be glad to know if you agree that we should not, at the present time, offer any comments on territorial claims against Germany by the Western Powers.<sup>6</sup>

4. I assume that the Western Powers themselves are not likely, in present circumstances, to commit themselves on the subject of their territorial claims against Germany. On such a touchy question I should think they would not want to restrict their freedom of manoeuvre in four-power discussions on Germany should they take place.

CONTROL OF THE RUHR

During the London talks on Germany last spring we prepared a commentary on a draft agreement laying down the principals for the establishment of an International Ruhr Authority. This paper dated May 26th, 1948, a copy of which is attached,† was approved by Mr. St. Laurent and sent to London for communication to the representatives of the participating governments.

Yes. St. L[aurant]

2. However, before it could be presented an agreement was reached in the form of Annex (C) of the attached Report, received under cover of Commonwealth Relations Office despatch D. No. 33 of June 9th, 1948.† It was decided that no useful purpose would be served by presenting our comments based on an earlier paper.

3. We are now informed that the governments of the United Kingdom, United States, France and the Benelux countries are meeting in London, beginning November 11th, to draft a statute bringing an International Ruhr Authority into being on the lines established by the London Report. We have also received a United Kingdom draft statute by Commonwealth Relations Office telegram No. H.443 of November 4th, 1948 (copy also attached).†

4. In view of our existing policy that matters relating to the settlement of Germany are of interest to Canada and in view of the fact that we had previously offered comments on other aspects of the London talks, it seemed advisable to prepare some comments on the United Kingdom draft statute for the establishment of the International Ruhr Authority. Two draft telegrams are attached for your consideration and signature if you agree.†

5. In preparing these comments we have adhered as closely as possible to the commentary as approved by Mr. St. Laurent. However, a number of points covered in the original commentary were definitively settled by the London report. It therefore did not seem to us useful to revive such matters most of which were of a drafting nature and the majority of which were settled in the London report along the lines which we were recommending in our commentary.

6. The attached commentary retains all the references made in the original to the Canadian attitude as given in our submission to the Council of Foreign Ministers' Deputies on January 30, 1947.

7. The most noteworthy features of the United Kingdom draft statute are that it contains no direct reference to the disarmament functions of the Authority and that it has omitted provision for wider powers for the Authority on the conclusion of the occupation.

8. In our revised commentary we recommend direct reference to the disarmament functions of Authority. It does not, however, attempt to introduce into the United Kingdom draft provisions for wider powers on the conclusion of the occupation as this would mean the re-writing of such considerable portions of the United Kingdom draft as would make it almost unrecognizable. The point is, however, covered in the telegram instructing Mr. Robertson on the presentation of the commentary.†

9. As the United Kingdom draft now stands it would not seem likely to gain the support of the French Government particularly in view of the considerable difficulty encountered in obtaining French approval for the terms of the London Report. The United Kingdom draft would seem to be even weaker than it need be under the terms of the London Report. It might, as it stands, be subject to attack in France and elsewhere as having more to do with “Marshall Plan imperialism” than it has with security against future German aggression.

FORMER ITALIAN COLONIES

On May 13, 1948 the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers, who have been meeting in London to consider the disposition to be made of the former Italian colonies in Africa, invited the Canadian Government and certain other interested governments to present their views on the subject, orally or in writing as they might prefer, during the early part of June. Canada was asked to present by June 9th any statement it might care to make.

2. Under Article 23 of the Italian Peace Treaty the final disposal of the former Italian colonies, to which Italy renounced all right and title, is to be determined jointly by the Governments of the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and France. Their decision is to be reached within one year from the coming into force of the Peace Treaty, which took place on September 15, 1947. The Four Powers stated, in a declaration published as Annex XI of the treaty, that if they failed to agree on the disposal of any of the former Italian colonies within the allotted twelve-month period, the matter would be referred to the General Assembly of the United Nations for a recommendation. They undertook to accept the Assembly's recommendation and to take appropriate measures for giving effect to it.

3. The Four Powers also agreed that in trying to reach a decision themselves on the disposal of the former Italian colonies they would take into consideration the views of other interested governments. Several of these have been heard from already. The Council of Deputies hopes to know the views of all interested governments before it begins to discuss the reports of the Four Power Commission of Investigation, appointed on October 20, 1947, which has been studying conditions in Eritrea, Italian Somaliland and Libya.

4. The Council of Deputies has undertaken to send copies of the reports of the Commission, immediately after their completion, to the Canadian Government and to other interested governments. These governments will be accorded the right to present supplementary views to the Council of Deputies, either in writing or orally, after they have examined the reports of the Commission.

5. The text of the first Canadian statement, which has been transmitted to the Council of Deputies through the High Commissioner for Canada, in London is as follows:

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

CONFIDENTIAL

DISPOSAL OF FORMER ITALIAN COLONIES

The Canadian Government, having been invited by the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers, in a communication from the Secretary-General dated May 13, 1948, to present its views on the disposal of the former Italinal [sic] colonies, desires to submit in writing the following observations.

2. It is the understanding of the Canadian Government that until the African territories formerly administered as Italian colonies are placed under trusteeship or until they achieve independence or are incorporated in the territory of an independent state or states, they fall within the scope of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter. This means that, in considering the disposition to be made of Eritrea, Somalia and Libya, the interests of the inhabitants should be recognized as paramount, according to the principle enunciated in Article 73 of the Charter, and that arrangements to ensure the future political, economic, social and educational advancement of the peoples concerned should be based on the ascertained condition of each territory and the needs and the wishes of its inhabitants.

3. The Canadian Government has therefore been gratified to learn that it is the intention of the Deputies to send to interested Governments copies of the reports of the Four-Power Commission of Investigation as soon as these are available and that interested Governments will be accorded the right, after examining the reports, to present supplementary views to the Council of Deputies, either in writing or orally. Thus the contribution made by all interested Governments to the ultimate decision of the Council of Foreign Ministers may be based on a knowledge of the facts, without which it would be difficult to reach conclusions serving the best interests of the populations concerned.

4. Should the reports of the Commission of Investigation indicate that any of the territories formerly administered as Italian colonies are not ready for independence, or that the majority of the inhabitants do not desire incorporation in a neighbouring territory or a neighbouring independent state or states, the Canadian Government will support the application to these territories of the international trusteeship system under Chapter XII of the Charter. In the selection of administering authorities the Canadian Government will support the appointment of those best qualified to achieve the basic objectives of the trusteeship system as set forth in Article 76, i.e., (a) to further international peace and security; (b) to promote the political, eco-conomic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants and their progressive development towards self-government or independence; (c) to encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms; and (d) to ensure equal treatment for all Members of the United Nations and their nationals, and equal treatment for the latter in the administration of justice.

DISPOSAL OF FORMER ITALIAN COLONIES IN AFRICA

In accordance with the request contained in your memorandum of 16th June,† the Chiefs of Staff have reviewed the strategic aspects of the various alternative proposals for disposal of the former Italian Colonies in Africa and have agreed that, from a strategic point of view:

(a) it is essential that Tripolitania and Cyrenaica be placed under a trusteeship to be administered by the United Kingdom or the United States, either individually or jointly;

(b) it is essential that Eritrea and Fezzan be governed or controlled by powers friendly to the United Kingdom and the United States; and

(c) the disposition of Italian Somaliland is not of such major importance and this territory might, if considered desirable for political reasons, be placed under Italian trusteeship; it being noted, however, that it would be most undesirable to have this Colony under the trusteeship of an unfriendly power.<sup>7</sup>

[Ottawa], August 5, 1948

I attach for your consideration a draft statement† of Canada's supplementary views on the disposal of former Italian colonies. I regret that it has been impossible for us to prepare this sooner. The telegram from the Commonwealth Relations Office containing a statement of United Kingdom plans did not reach us until Tuesday afternoon. The attached draft is related directly to the preliminary statement of Canada's views submitted to the Council of Deputies on 7 June 1948 (copy attached).

2. Canada's supplementary statement is required to be in the hands of the Council of Deputies no later than August 7. It is our hope that the final text may be communicated to Canada House by Friday of this week at the latest.

3. There has been less difficulty in formulating Canada's proposals for Italian Somaliland and Cyrenaica than in deciding the position which should be taken in regard to Eritrea and Tripolitania. It seems likely that the Four Powers will agree to the establishment of an Italian trusteeship in Somaliland and that the United States and France will agree to a United Kingdom trusteeship in Cyrenaica. Italy itself has offered to disinterest itself in the eastern portion of Cyrenaica and recognizes the special interest of the United Kingdom in this area and particularly in the port of Tobruk as a result of the present plans for the evacuation of United Kingdom forces from Egypt. In the case of both Italian Somaliland and Cyrenaica, moreover, reports of the Four-Power Commission show that there is a considerable sentiment among the local inhabitants in favour of the settlement proposed in the attached draft.

4. Considerable difficulty arises in the case of Eritrea and Tripolitania.

5. Opinion in Eritrea seems to be fairly evenly divided between the plan for union with Ethiopia and the proposal for a trusteeship under the control of some power other than Ethiopia or Italy. No more than 10% of the population seems willing to accept Italy. The United Kingdom Government may propose the creation of an Ethiopian trusteeship for the whole of Eritrea, with two non-colonial Members of the United Nations and Italy serving as an Advisory Council to aid Ethiopia in the fulfilment of its task. If this proposal should be accepted by the Four Powers I presume Canada would not object, provided that the Powers appointed to the Advisory Council were friendly to the United States and United Kingdom. This is not, however, a proposal which the Canadian Government could make on its own initiative at this juncture. Until the proposal is put forward by a state more directly concerned, Canada seems bound to take cognizance of the strong local sentiment for and against union with Ethiopia which seems to take precedence over other considerations in the minds of the inhabitants.

6. Many interested governments are likely to propose that the secondary port of Assab and a corridor leading to it should be ceded to Ethiopia. Since the inhabitants of Assab and the corridor are opposed to union with Ethiopia, however, it is suggested in the Canadian draft statement that Ethiopia should be given two free ports in Eritrea with exemption from transit dues on goods moving across Eritrean territory. This arrangement would prevent the inhabitants of Assab and the Danakil coast from being subjected against their will to Ethiopian control, while Ethiopia would be assured the substance of its actual requirements.

7. The United Kingdom is not anxious to assume administrative control of Eritrea or Tripolitania, both because of the financial burden involved and because of the charges of territorial aggrandizement which would be levelled against it by Italy, the Soviet Union and other powers. In Eritrea, however, many of the Moslem inhabitants have expressed a wish for United Kingdom assistance which it would be difficult for Canada to disregard.

8. In Tripolitania, on the contrary, there seems to be no sentiment in favour of trusteeship. There has also been considerable criticism of the British Military Administration, which has been prevented under the terms of the Hague Convention from introducing long-term development measures and which has therefore adhered to a "care and maintenance" policy only. The Four-Power Commission is convinced that Tripolitania must accept outside aid for some time to come. It will be necessary, therefore, to force on the people a settlement they do not desire. It is a question of selecting for them the administering authority which will actually prepare them most rapidly for self-government.

9. The United Kingdom Government is more likely than any other to do this successfully. It would prefer to have the United States undertake the responsibility but the resentment which has been caused throughout the Arab world by United States policy in Palestine makes it unlikely that the inhabitants would accept the United States as administering authority. If they are forced to accept outside aid the inhabitants of Tripolitania are likely to regard the United Kingdom as the least objectionable choice.

10. The Deputies are not likely to reach agreement on the disposition of the former Italian colonies. If this should be the case, the question will then be referred to the General Assembly. If the supplementary statement of Canada's present views is put forward, as suggested in the last two sentences of paragraph 3, as an indication merely of tentative and provisional views, it will be possible for Canada in the Assembly to support other proposals which may by that time have secured a considerable following, provided these are in line with the Charter and provided they take cognizance of the needs of the inhabitants of the territories concerned.

11. I attach an extra copy of the draft statement in case you wish to discuss the matter with the Prime Minister.

High Commissioner in United Kingdom to Secretary-General, Conference of Deputies of the Foreign Ministers, Council of Foreign Ministers

[London], August 7, 1948

I have the honour to refer to your letter of the 17th July advising me on behalf of the Conference of Deputies of Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R., the United States and France, of the procedure to be followed in presenting supplementary views about the disposal of the former Italian colonies.

I have now been instructed by the Canadian Government to convey to the Deputies, through your good offices, the following statement concerning the disposal of the former Italian colonies:

1. The Canadian Government in its statement of 7th June, 1948, to the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers, indicated its belief that in considering the disposition to be made of Italian Somaliland, Eritrea and Libya the Governments concerned are bound by the terms of the United Nations Charter to recognise that the interests of the inhabitants are of paramount importance. This is the clear meaning of Article 73 of the Charter, which deals with the subject of dependent territories.

2. One of the first needs of the three territories appears to be the continuation of outside assistance. The Four-Power Commission of investigation did not consider that any of the territories it visited was ready yet for self-government, although three of its members pointed out that Cyrenaica's homogeneous political and social composition "provides a good foundation for building up self-government." The Canadian Government, in accordance with the statement it has already submitted to the Council of Foreign Ministers, will therefore support the application to Italian Somaliland, Eritrea and Libya of the United Nations Trusteeship System, except where the inhabitants desire incorporation in a neighbouring state or territory.

3. Members of the Commission disagreed on the significance of much that they saw and heard in the three territories. They have reported, moreover, that the inhabitants themselves are divided in their estimate of their own needs. Members of the Commission also expressed some doubt as to whether the statements made to the Commission by spokesmen of certain communities represented the actual opinions of those communities. In the circumstances the Canadian Government is not at present in possession of sufficiently precise information to reach final conclusions. On the basis of the information now before it, however, the Canadian Government has arrived at the following provisional views:

4. Italian Somaliland. The Canadian Government is disposed to support the choice of Italy as administering authority for the trust territory of Somaliland. The development of the territory is described by the Commission as being a long-term problem requiring among other things "co-operation between natives and non-natives" and the Italian Government appears to be willing to provide the necessary non-native agricultural settlers as well as the capital required for the fulfilment of a general development programme. Moreover the report of the Four-Power Commission records the existence of a considerable sentiment in the territory in favour of Italy as administering authority.

5. In view of the importance attached by certain politically conscious elements of the population to the development among all Somali peoples of a sense of their common interests, the Canadian Government assumes that the terms of any trusteeship agreement adopted for Italian Somaliland would not preclude the establishment in due course of the closest possible economic, social and cultural relations among the territories of East Africa which are inhabited principally by peoples of Somali race.

6. Eritrea. The Canadian Government is inclined to support the union with Ethiopia of that portion of the highlands of Eritrea in which the Four-Power Commission reports that the great majority of the people desire to be included in the Ethiopian Empire. The remainder of the territory would be placed under trusteeship. In the trusteeship arrangements for this area the Canadian Government would welcome the inclusion of clauses providing Ethiopia with free ports at Massawa and Assab and exemption from transit dues on goods moving to and from the free ports across Eritrean territory.

7. In view of the preference expressed by the majority of the spokesmen heard by the Commission in the area concerned, the Canadian Government is not at present prepared to go beyond expressing support for the designation of the United Kingdom as administering authority for that part of Eritrea which is not included in the Ethiopian Empire.

8. Libya. The Canadian Government is not at present prepared to express a firm opinion as to whether the former Italian colony of Libya should be established as a single trust territory or whether it should be divided into two separate trust territories.

9. If separatist sentiment in Cyrenaica is considered to be too strong to admit of the inclusion of that territory in a single trust territory of Libya, the Canadian Government would favour the creation of two separate trust territories of Tripolitania and Cyrenaica. Otherwise the Canadian Government would prefer a single trusteeship for the whole of Libya, having in mind the general desirability of establishing as large political units as possible. A single trusteeship agreement for the whole of Libya might contain, however, provisions for the development of autonomous provincial administrations in Tripolitania and Cyrenaica and for the group settlement of Italians in Tripolitania, where Italian economic enterprise has not only benefited the territory but where it also appears to have been appreciated by the inhabitants.

10. If two separate trust territories are to be established, Canada would support the choice of the United Kingdom as administering authority for Cyrenaica, in view of the preference for United Kingdom assistance expressed by spokesmen of Cyrenaican communities. Because of the close ties already existing between Cyrenaica and Tripolitania and the desirability of establishing even closer relations between the two territories, the Canadian Government would favour the appointment of the United Kingdom as administering authority in Tripolitania as well as in Cyrenaica.

11. For the same reasons, if a single trusteeship agreement for the whole of Libya is planned, the Canadian Government is disposed to support the choice of the United Kingdom as the administering authority for the territory.

12. Trusteeship Agreements. The Canadian Government assumes that in each case the administering authority chosen by the Four Powers would be invited to submit as soon as possible to the General Assembly of the United Nations a draft trusteeship agreement for the approval of that body. The Canadian Government also takes it for granted that no major change would occur in the administration of any of the territories pending approval by the General Assembly of the terms of the draft trusteeship agreement for the territory concerned.

13. In drafting the terms of the trusteeship agreements, administering authorities would be expected to bear in mind any references made by the Four-Power Commission to special conditions prevailing in the territory concerned. In particular they should bear in mind the need of various regions for agricultural development by non-indigenous agricultural settlers familiar with modern methods of intensive farming. There exists in Italy a considerable body of displaced agricultural and industrial workers already familiar with living conditions in North Africa and East Africa. The Canadian Government accordingly considers that in areas where foreign agricultural and industrial settlers are needed and where Italian settlers are welcomed by the native inhabitants, facilities should be provided at an early date for the settlement in the areas concerned of former residents of Africa now living in Italy.

I am, etc.

FORMER ITALIAN COLONIES

Procedure

The Italian Government hopes that the Assembly will decide to place Italian Somaliland under Italian trusteeship and defer action on Eritrea and Libya. If this proves to be impossible, it hopes that no action will be taken on the former colonies at all.

2. When the Political Committee first decided in favour of adjournment on December 11 or 12, the delegate of the U.S.S.R. moved that the former Italian colonies should be discussed immediately. The motion was overwhelmingly defeated. The United Kingdom tried in plenary session yesterday to prevent adjournment of the Assembly before important matters on the agenda had been attended to, hoping particularly to have the former Italian colonies considered. The Assembly, however, upheld the Committee's decision to adjourn the end of this week. There is still a possibility that if the discussion of the Korean question is concluded soon enough, the former Italian colonies may also be considered before adjournment.<sup>8</sup>

Italian Somaliland

3. There is general agreement that Italian Somaliland should be placed under Italian trusteeship. There is still some disagreement, however, as to its boundary with Ethiopia and the manner in which outstanding economic and financial questions should be settled.

Libya

4. Both France and the United States now support the proposal for a United Kingdom trusteeship for Cyrenaica. The U.S.S.R., when it last spoke on the subject, wished the United Nations itself to be the administering authority.

5. The United Kingdom and United States wish a decision on Tripolitania to be postponed for a year. France wishes Tripolitania to be placed under Italian trusteeship. The U.S.S.R. asks for a trusteeship under United Nations administration. The United Kingdom has repeatedly explained that it cannot allow its troops to be used to install Italy by force against the will of the inhabitants. It believes that next year it may be easier to settle the question without bloodshed.

6. France wishes to incorporate the Fezzan permanently in Southern Algeria, without benefit of trusteeship. Canada is committed to supporting trusteeships except where the inhabitants themselves ask for incorporation in neighbouring territory. The preference of the people of Fezzan is for a Moslem government, but if Tripolitania should be placed under Italian control a year hence, the people of Fezzan would presumably ask for incorporation in French territory. The United States and United Kingdom hope to defer the decision on the Fezzan for another year.

Eritrea

7. The United States and United Kingdom have reached a compromise agreement on Eritrea. The United States formerly suggested giving about 2/5 of the least valuable portion of Eritrea to Ethiopia, while the United Kingdom would have placed the whole territory under Ethiopian administration with United Nations assistance and supervision. The present agreement between the United States and United Kingdom is that a decision should be postponed on the disposal of the predominantly Moslem Western province, the remainder of the territory being incorporated in Ethiopia. This would provide for the free flow of Ethiopian trade through the towns of Asmara and Massawa which are dependent on the Ethiopian Empire for their prosperity. It would also meet the wishes of the great majority of the non-Moslem population for reunion with Ethiopia.

The Department of Finance have suggested that we, immediately, enter into negotiations with a view to obtaining premises for use as residences and Chanceries in partial settlement of the military relief credits owing to Canada by several European countries. In the case of Italy and Greece, these premises would be accepted in full settlement of the military relief obligations. While the credits are large in the case of these two countries, their financial position will make it impossible for them to make any substantial payment and the Canadian Government has already agreed to accept a nominal sum as full settlement. In the case of Denmark, the total debt is only $565,000 and, therefore, even though their financial position is better than that of Italy and Greece, a premises could be accepted as settlement in full. In the case of the other countries where the obligation is large, the financial position is such that we would expect to obtain a fairly large sum in discharge of their obligations and the transfer of premises would only be accepted in partial settlement. There is no doubt, however, that in all cases it would be easier for the countries concerned to effect partial settlement by the purchase of local properties which would involve an expenditure of only local currencies rather than effect full settlement in convertible currency. For this reason it is believed that a more satisfactory settlement from the point of view of Canada can be achieved if part of the payment is used for the purchase of premises.

Seen by St. Laurent. 19 February 1948

The Department of Finance believe that, if negotiations for the settlement of these credits is not undertaken immediately, there may be difficulty in obtaining any value whatsoever for these obligations. It is quite possible that, if the United States begins making payments to these countries under the Marshall plan, they would object to any repayment by those countries on account of relief credits.

While it appears that the acquisition of properties in this manner will not, in fact, cost the Canadian Government anything, it will probably be necessary to obtain Parliamentary approval. Under these circumstances, I would like your authority to send the necessary instructions to the Chiefs of our Missions in the countries concerned to commence negotiations and where any definite offer is obtained to refer these back to Ottawa for final approval.

The situation in the countries concerned is as follows:

France — Relief credits amount to approximately $12,400,000 and in addition there is a credit of $1,000,000 for relief distributed in the French zone in Germany.

We think it probable that the French Government would be ready to sell to the Canadian Government either the Hotel de Talleyrand or the Hotel de Castries. Either of these properties would be eminently satisfactory as a combined residence and Chancery. It would be necessary to obtain not only the property but to have the French Government agree to make the necessary expenditures to modernize the buildings since neither of them would be satisfactory unless completely new plumbing, wiring and heating were installed. There would also be fairly substantial alterations to adapt them to our purposes. Therefore, if we obtain the premises without an additional agreement that the French Government would pay for the modernization we might find ourselves faced with an expenditure of an amount that might reach one-half million dollars. It might also be possible to have the French Government agree to pay for the purchasing of furnishings in France.

The Netherlands — The relief credit amounts to approximately $14,000,000. If a property more suitable to our requirements than the present residence could be found, I would suggest that the Ambassador negotiate for some different premises. If, however, nothing else is available, the present residence but not all of the grounds would be satisfactory. Our present Chancery is not satisfactory either in design or structurally. Our Ambassador should, therefore, be asked to look for alternative Chancery premises or for vacant property and the credit would be used for the purpose of building a Chancery. An endeavour should also be made to permit the purchase of furnishings for the property purchased.

Belgium — The relief credit amounts to approximately $7,800,000. We would recommend the purchase of the present Chancery which is admirably suited to the needs of all Canadian Government offices in Brussels. The present residence is very satisfactory in its interior and its location but it would be preferable to obtain a different property if at all possible as it is semi-detached. I would, therefore, suggest that the Ambassador be instructed to look for an alternative residence which might be obtained, but if nothing is available, to negotiate for the purchase of the present residence. If possible, arrangements similar to those suggested for France for repairs and furnishings should be made.

Denmark — The relief credits amount to approximately $565,000. Our present building in Copenhagen is very satisfactory as a combined residence and Chancery. I would, therefore, suggest that our Minister negotiate to obtain this property and if possible also furnishings for the property to be purchased in full settlement of the relief credits.

Norway — The relief credits amount to approximately $1,700,000. Our Chancery is at present in an office building and the residence, while it appears to be the best available at the moment, would be more suitable for a diplomatic secretary than a Minister. I suggest, therefore, that our Minister be asked to look for a property that might be purchased for a residence and to commence negotiations for the transfer of that property to Canada together with an agreement to finance any necessary repairs. If no alternative property is available, he might negotiate for the present residence which, at a later date, could be used for a member of his staff.

Yugoslavia — The relief credits amount to approximately $226,242. As our Minister has not yet arrived in Belgrade, we have no specific properties that we can recommend. We do, however, know that the accommodation situation in Belgrade is desperate and, therefore, we would suggest that the Minister be instructed to look for a house and that we be ready to accept a property that, while not just what we desire, would serve our purpose until the housing situation improves.

Greece — The amount of the relief credits is $612,352 but Canada has already agreed to accept a nominal settlement. The present residence is entirely satisfactory and the Chancery, although well located, might be a little on the small side. It would, however, serve if nothing better presents itself. I, therefore, suggest that our Ambassador be instructed to negotiate for the purchase of the present residence, and to look for other Chancery premises but, if none are available, to negotiate for the present Chancery premises.

Italy — The relief credits amount to approximately $28,400,000, but Canada has already agreed to accept a nominal settlement. Neither our present residence or Chancery in Rome would be suitable for permanent use. I, therefore, suggest that we instruct our Minister to look for premises for both residence and Chancery purposes which could be purchased for the Canadian Government.

For your information, I am attaching a table showing the rentals at present being paid in the capitals referred to above.† In France, in addition to the rentals being paid by External Affairs, premises are also leased by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Immigration Branch of the Department of Mines and Resources.

*Le sous-ministre des Finances
au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Deputy Minister of Finance to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs*

Ottawa, February 4, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I have your letter of February 2 with the enclosures in regard to the acquisition of Embassy premises abroad and possible funds to improve them, in settlement of Military Relief obligations.

I agree that the general principle of policy involved here is a correct one, that is, that we should seek as soon as possible to acquire some real property abroad and improvements upon it, in partial settlement for these substantial claims, and that the acquisition of such partial settlement should not be delayed until full settlement can be arranged. I understand that Mr. Bryce has already cleared this general policy with the Treasury Board when the matter came up there some months ago at the time you were preparing your Estimates.

There will be a problem in deciding upon and obtaining the necessary Parliamentary authority to accept these properties or any other consideration in settlement for these claims. I understand Mr. Bryce is already discussing this matter with Mr. McIntyre and Mr. Mundell,<sup>10</sup> and we will be writing you further upon it. The most definitive authority would, of course, be to have a short Bill passed by Parliament authorizing the Government to settle these claims and to accept as consideration in settlement, among other things, real property and funds earmarked for the improvement and furnishings of such property. Such a Bill might also contain the necessary authority for expenditure of funds received for this special purpose. We are exploring, however, the possibility of avoiding the need for a special Bill by some items in the Estimates which could form special provisions in the Appropriation Act.

In carrying out the policy which I have described above, we must, I think, avoid extravagance in the properties that we request and avoid acquiring properties that will involve us in unreasonable commitments for maintenance and furnishings in future years. Merely because we are getting a property out of these Military Relief claims should not lead us to acquire a property of a magnitude or character that we would not normally acquire, although it may, of course, lead us to acquire property a little earlier than would otherwise be the case. These considerations may be relevant in connection with the acquisition of the Hotel de Talleyrand in Paris. I would think the acquisition of this large building and its alteration at a cost that might reach half a million dollars would only be justified if it were going to save us substantial amounts in rents for Government offices other than External Affairs. I would suggest that we might have a separate report on this particular proposal for consideration by this Department and Treasury Board, as well as your own Department.

In regard to the Netherlands, I would think that it was not necessary to acquire all the grounds of the present Embassy residence, and that a Chancery should be acquired only of a size and nature that we would regard as suitable if we were paying for it ourselves.

I think it should be understood in all cases except those of Greece and Italy that the acquisition of this real property and any improvements made on it, or funds provided for such improvements, shall only be taken as partial settlement for the claims in question at the current equivalent of the local currency costs involved in acquiring the property and improving it. Settlements for the remainder of the claim will, of course, have to be negotiated in due course. In some cases, I think we can reasonably expect to get practically full payment, for example, in the cases of Belgium and Norway. In other cases, for example, those of France and Holland, we may have to wait a good many years before getting payment, but when we do get it we may still have some chance of getting payment in full, without interest, of course.

We have not had much to do with Denmark or Norway on this matter; but we have had some preliminary conversations with French representatives, who have indicated their Government's willingness to consider deferred payment, and with representatives of the Netherlands, who have expressed a fervent hope that we could waive payment in dollars and accept payment in some other form, including things like Embassy property. We have not agreed to waive dollar payment, and the matter has been deliberately left in abeyance while the Netherlands negotiate with the British. I understand, incidentally, that these negotiations have been taking place recently and may have been concluded. I note in the memorandum you sent me it is suggested that an Embassy in Copenhagen might be accepted in full settlement for the claim on Denmark. I do not believe this is desirable, as a matter of principle. I think in all cases, except Greece and, possibly, Italy, property should be accepted only as settlement on account, and it should be clearly understood that we will be negotiating for further substantial settlement for the balance of the claim, which in most cases, of course, will be many times the value of the Embassy properties acquired.

A special problem arises in connection with Greece and Italy, where we have agreed to accept only nominal settlements. In the case of Greece, our claim is small enough that a modest Embassy property would, I think, constitute satisfactory nominal settlement. In the case of Italy, our claim amounts to many millions of dollars, and I think the acceptance of Embassy property might not exhaust what we could reasonably request as a nominal settlement. I would suggest that we might ask in addition for some sort of scholarships for Canadians to study in Italy. Perhaps your Department could give some thought to this matter. I would think that we might ask the Italian Government to provide funds for support of a specified number of students, either undergraduates or postgraduates, or even professors on exchange or sabbatical leave. It would be understood that the funds could only be used in Italy or on Italian vessels. They should be defined, I believe, in such terms that inflation in Italy would not destroy their value; for example, they might be defined in lire, but the amount of the lire would depend upon its exchange value in terms of the dollar. If we arrange something of this kind with Italy we might then use some portion of our claims on other countries to get similar arrangements there, provided our Government were prepared to agree to such proposals.

I note you speak of having funds for alterations, repairs and furnishings. I think in principle this is satisfactory, but we should consider carefully whether we wish to have the funds turned over to us for this purpose, or whether we wish to have the Government concerned carry out these works on our behalf and turn over to us the finished properties. It may be that we will not have the supervising staff to carry on these alterations, repairs, etc., on our own behalf. However, I think it would be well to have your men in the field consider this proposal as well as Mr. Monette<sup>11</sup> and your staff here. I think it is necessary to decide on this before reaching a decision in regard to our legislative authority, as it may be necessary to provide specific appropriations for the expenditure of funds which we receive as money and use for the improvement of these properties.

There may be some need for clarifying the nature of our claim on recipient countries under Military Relief. Mr. Bryce has spoken to Mr. Hopkins, of your Department, and I am writing you separately concerning this matter.

The Minister of Finance has seen this letter and is in agreement with it.

Yours very truly,

I have recently had discussions with the Department of Finance concerning the procedure to be adopted to endeavour to obtain premises, in certain European countries, for use as Embassy residences and Chanceries, in partial settlement of our Military Relief credits. For your information, I am attaching a draft memorandum, addressed to yourself, which I submitted to Mr. Clark for comment, together with

Antoine Monette, Departmental Architect.

Mr. Clark's reply, which he points out has been shown to the Minister of Finance and has been agreed to by him.

Mr. Clark agrees that it would be desirable to obtain premises on these terms on the definite understanding that, except in the case of Greece and Italy, the premises would only be accepted as payment on account of the total debt. In the case of Greece, premises could be accepted as payment in full and in the case of Italy, the premises plus a provision of funds for scholarships to be granted to Canadians studying in Italy would be accepted as payment in full.

It is important that preliminary negotiations be started on this matter with the Governments concerned and that recommendations concerning specific properties be made to the Department by the Chiefs of our Missions.

If you agree with this proposal, will you please sign the attached despatches† to our Missions in those countries where we have Military Relief credits.<sup>12</sup> As soon as any specific recommendations are received, we will arrange to have Mr. [Antoine] Monette visit the capitals concerned so that we can have his recommendations before any definite decisions are taken.

You will recall that you signed our previous despatches dealing with the acquisition of premises in partial settlement of military relief credits.

Now that the dollar items in the Estimates have been approved and we have received fairly definite figures of the amount of credits owing for military relief by the different countries, we have prepared these despatches dealing in more detail with the methods to be followed in approaching the various Governments in these property negotiations.†

The despatches are similar, with the exception that for Greece it has been decided that a nominal payment only should be accepted in full discharge of this obligation; and that for Italy it has been decided that, while it is not intended to ask for settlement in full of the amount owing by Italy to Canada on account of this obligation, we do not consider that the cost of Embassy property including alterations, renovations and furnishings would be an adequate amount to accept in full discharge of the debt. We have, therefore, suggested that an additional amount might be set aside which could be used to finance the expenses of Canadian students in Italy, and we ask for more information on this prospect.

CANADIAN CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE OR LOSS

The Inter-Departmental Committee on Reparations has studied the question of compensation for loss or damage suffered by Canadians as a direct result of operations of war and has decided to recommend that action be taken without undue delay to ascertain the claims of Canadian citizens therefor, particularly claims against the ex-enemy countries with which Canada has concluded Peace Treaties. Under the provisions of the Treaties with Italy, Roumania and Hungary, the Canadian Government has the right to retain the assets of those countries or their nationals vested in the Custodian, up to the amount of the claims of Canada and Canadian citizens against those countries and their nationals. Anything in excess of that amount requires to be returned. Under the Treaty with Finland, Canada is obliged to return property which was vested in the Custodian.

2. Under the Trading with the Enemy (Transitional Powers) Act, the Custodian is required only to keep a record of Canadian claims which are filed with him on a voluntary basis. At the present time, no department or agency of the Government has the authority to advertise for claims, investigate the validity of claims, make awards or otherwise dispose of claims. The Government has not yet publicly invited or required the filing of claims by Canadians. The claims presently registered with the Custodian amount to approximately $250,000,000.

3. The claims of some Canadians will be satisfied in whole or part from one or more of the following sources:

(a) Peace Treaties. Under the terms of the Peace Treaties with Italy, Roumania, Hungary and Finland, the Governments of these countries have undertaken to restore Canadian property to the rightful owners. They are also obliged to make restitution of looted property. Moreover, in the event that property cannot be restored, these Governments undertake to compensate the Canadian claimant in local currency to the extent of two-thirds of the damage suffered.

(b) Equal Treatment Agreements with Certain Countries. Canada has concluded Equal Treatment Agreements with the Netherlands and with France. It is expected that such an agreement will be concluded with Belgium in the near future. Under these agreements, the Governments of the countries mentioned will extend the same treatment to Canadians who have suffered property losses in those countries as they give to their own nationals. It is not expected that agreements will be negotiated with any other governments.

(c) United Kingdom War Damage Compensation Legislation. This legislation embraces all property within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom Government in respect of which compensation is claimed, regardless of the nationality or residence of the owner, and Canadians are therefore eligible for compensation without the necessity of any formal agreement with the United Kingdom.

4. Apart from the claims which will receive some compensation from the sources mentioned in (3) above, there remains the residue which will require the Government's attention. Unless Parliament is asked to appropriate money, it appears that the fund for meeting this residue of claims will be relatively small, in view of the fact that it will be derived from the following sources:

(a) The liquidation of any reparation in kind which Canada is to receive from Germany. Under the Paris Reparation Act, Canada's share is 1.5% of industrial plant and equipment and 3.5% of the total pool of German external assets.

(b) The liquidation of enemy assets presently vested in the Custodian, which amount to approximately $19 million. However, vested property may not be available as a source of payment without specific legislation of the Parliament of Canada to that end.

(c) The liquidation of whatever reparation Canada may receive under the Peace Treaties yet to be signed with Germany, Austria and Japan.

5. When all Canadian claims have been assembled, it will probably be necessary for the Government to appoint an independent government agency, preferably a Royal Commission similar to that established after World War I, to investigate and assess the validity of these claims, and also to recommend awards with respect to their settlement. It may also be desirable to establish a fund from which interim payments could be made to deserving claimants who would not otherwise benefit from compensation should the final settlement be delayed for any length of time.

6. It is therefore recommended that the Secretary of State be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to ascertain the claims of persons residing or carrying on business in Canada, or of Canadian citizens residing outside of Canada, for loss or damage arising directly from operations of war, including claims, the partial or full settlement of which is provided for under the Peace Treaties, Equal Treatment Agreements or the national legislation of certain countries. After ascertaining such claims, the Secretary of State should have them arranged in categories according to country, or in any other manner which he deems would be useful for Government purposes. It should be clearly indicated in any notice, press release or other form of advertisement that at the present time, such claims are required for purposes of information only, and that the action of the Secretary of State should in no way commit him or the Government of Canada to responsibility for the correctness of the claim, to taking action for the recovery of the claim or property in question, or with respect to settlement thereof or otherwise.<sup>13</sup>

7. This memorandum has been concurred in by the Secretary of State.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, March 31, 1948

Dear Alfred [Rive]:

Mr. Bryan S. Lendrum, Assistant Secretary of the Office of the High Commissioner for New Zealand here, came in to see me this morning to discuss a number of questions relating to the Far East that had been raised in a memorandum attached to a letter of February 27th which A.D. MacIntosh had sent to Andrew Sharp, Official Secretary here. I understand that Mr. MacKay has sent you a copy of MacIntosh's letter.† In this letter I shall confine myself to what I told Mr. Lendrum concerning our present views on the Japanese Peace Treaty.

I said that officially there had been no change in the Canadian views with regard to the substance and procedure for the Japanese Peace Conference from those expressed by Mr. Claxton at the Canberra Conference last August. Mr. St. Laurent had made a statement in the House of Commons on December 19th regarding the procedural question in which he had reiterated that it was our view that the original United States proposals of July 1947 should be adhered to, namely, that the eleven states members of the Far Eastern Commission should meet together in a preliminary conference to draft the Treaty, voting to be a two-thirds majority.

The question posed in the memorandum read, "Do the Canadians regard the conclusion of the Peace Treaty as urgent and have they any opinions on how to overcome the procedural impasse." I said that it seemed to me that it made very little difference whether we regarded the conclusion of the Peace Treaty as urgent or not. Actually, we were not seriously affected one way or another. The only obstacles we felt at the present time were those restrictions on trade with Japan which would be largely remedied by the fixing of a rational exchange rate. I thought it was more important to consider what the factual situation was and, more particularly, what the intentions of the United States are. I thought that the Americans now felt that it had been fortunate that a Peace Conference had not been convened last fall as it would probably have worked towards a settlement generally similar to that envisaged in the various papers now before the Far Eastern Commission. The United States was now more concerned about the Soviet Union as a menace to world peace than Japan and was probably going to revise its own proposals for the reconstruction of the Japanese economy. Mr. Kennan's recent visit to Japan and the present Mission there of Mr. Draper, Under-Secretary in the War Department, would seem to indicate that the United States was going to review its policy with respect to Japan. The expectation was that they would give sufficient financial support to enable the Japanese economy to be rehabilitated by 1953. Such an economic rehabilitation was a continuing one and the United States did not feel that it could slough off its responsibility by a Peace Treaty. Accordingly, they did not consider a Treaty an urgent matter now, I thought.

It seemed to me that if other interested countries wished to influence United States policy in respect to Japan they would have to do so in the Far Eastern Commission. This might involve a re-examination of all of the matters now before the Far Eastern Commission, particularly those relating to the levels of industry to be permitted Japan and reparations removals. I thought it would be useful if the various British Commonwealth Members on the Commission could get together and exchange views in order to anticipate United States tactics in the Far Eastern Commission. It seemed to me that the methods by which the United States proceeded to initiate and implement its new economic policies with respect to Japan would be important. I thought that the United States should be encouraged to bring its proposals to the Far Eastern Commission to have them examined and discussed there in the various committees. When these papers were considered at the Commission level and the Soviet Union decided to veto them, it might be understood that the United States could then go ahead and issue an interim directive to General MacArthur. If the United States was prepared to accept the views of two-thirds of the Members of the F.E.C. and did not issue interim directives contrary to the views of the majority, then I thought that we should be well satisfied with this procedure as it was the one we were pulling for in the Japanese Peace Conference itself. However, it was also important that the United States should not try to short-cut this procedure. Otherwise interested countries like Canada and New Zealand would not have an opportunity to shape and influence their policies.

As regards the substance of the settlement with Japan, our views had not changed substantially from those expressed at the Canberra Conference. Our primary concern was security. Canada, as a North Pacific power, was perhaps more apprehensive concerning Soviet aggressive intentions than it was concerning possibilities of the revival of Japanese militarism. Moreover, Canadian strategic views concerning the defence of the northern half of the Western Hemisphere are bound to be very strongly influenced by the United States. If the United States felt that it was desirable to build up the Japanese economy to a point where it would be better able to assist in resisting Soviet expansionism in Northeast Asia than we were hardly in a position to argue over this policy. In the final analysis it was the United States which held the preponderance of power in the North Pacific and on whom we would rely for protection whether the aggression came from the Soviet Union or a revived Japan.

As for our secondary interests in the substance of the Treaty I thought that they were probably connected with the revival of commerce in the Pacific. The Canadian businessmen who had gone to Japan encountered a great many difficulties and prospects of reviving Japanese trade to even its pre-war levels were not bright. Some improvement would result from the establishment of a rational exchange rate. However, even this would not act as an all-powerful catalytic agent. I thought that it would be some years before commerce flourished again in the Pacific basin. Revival of Japanese trade with all countries would benefit Canada indirectly and it was from a general increase in commerce in the Pacific that we would profit rather than from a specific exchange of goods with any one country.

I told Mr. Lendrum in conclusion that I thought it would be useful for us to continue to have an exchange of views in Ottawa, Wellington and Tokyo on matters relating to the Japanese settlement, but that I thought that probably the most fruitful contacts could be made between our Embassy in Washington and the New Zealand Legation there. I knew that Mr. Collins and Col. [B]owles were on intimate terms and I was sure that they would continue to exchange views on all matters arising in the Far Eastern Commission which, I thought, would continue to be the principal arena for discussion on the Japanese settlement for sometime yet.

I am sending copies of this letter to Ralph Collins<sup>14</sup> and Herbert Norman.

Yours sincerely,

A.R. MENZIES

JAPAN

General Political Considerations

In his message to you,<sup>15</sup> Mr. Attlee points out that present United States policy in Japan is directed towards denying Japan's industrial potential to the Soviet Union. This is an objective to which we may all subscribe. There are, however, grounds for differences of opinion as to the way in which this objective should be achieved. United States strategy is to postpone the Peace Treaty and to build up the Japanese economy as quickly as possible. Both of these matters require examination.

2. The United Kingdom suggests that one of the primary motives for the desire of the United States to postpone the Japanese Peace Treaty is pure expediency in that they wish to continue to station troops in Japan. From our conversations with Mr. George Kennan, Chief of the Division of Policy and Planning in the United States Department of State, we understand that there are a number of other considerations which have influenced the United States toward postponement of further efforts to convene a Japanese Peace Conference. The Soviet Union is not prepared to accept United States procedural proposals. If a Peace Treaty were concluded with Japan without the participation of the Soviet Union, the latter would be under no obligation to observe the provisions of the Treaty. Moreover, the Soviet Union would then be in a position to offer the Japanese better terms and thus create difficulties. Finally, Mr. Kennan indicated that the United States was very reluctant to urge the Chinese to attend a Peace Conference in which the Soviet Union was not participating if the Chinese did not so wish.

3. We have suggested to the United States at the official level that there are a number of other avenues which might be explored informally in attempts to convene a Peace Conference. However, we recognize that responsibility and initiative in respect to this matter rest with the United States. If the Japanese should become restive under a prolonged occupation, it will be a United States responsibility. Similarly, if the Chinese are to be persuaded to come into a conference on our terms, the United States will have to bargain with them. Furthermore, the United States will be primarily accountable for any misstep in Allied relations with the Soviet Union in the North Pacific. Therefore, it would appear from a Canadian point of view unwise to press the United States towards a course of action which they themselves consider imprudent.

Level of Economic Life in Japan

4. However, if a prolongation of the occupation requires the building up of Japanese industry to a point menacing the long term security of other Pacific countries, I think we have a right to express an opinion. I am inclined to agree with the United Kingdom that Japan can be given a viable economy without rebuilding its industries to a point where they would be a menace.

5. There is a question of tactics as to how the United States should be persuaded of the reasonableness of this view. The United Kingdom consider that this should be done by quickly submitting a revision of figures for the level of economic life in Japan. I think this would serve a useful purpose. However, I am not at all sure that Canadian interests would be served or our influence exercised to the best effect by associating ourselves with such a submission by the United Kingdom.

6. The background to the problem of the level of economic life in Japan is this. When the Far Eastern Commission initiated its study of the economic controls to be placed on Japan during the occupation period, it was seen that the questions of Japan's industrial war potential and reparations were closely linked. Hence the attempt was made to fix for the year 1950 a peaceful level of economic life for Japan based on the 1930-34 level with suitable increases for population growth, technical advances, adjustment of foreign trade, etc. What was above and beyond this peaceful level in the war supporting industries was to be made available as reparations.

7. The Far Eastern Commission has not yet reached a decision on a policy towards the levels of Japanese industry. The closest approach to an agreement is contained in policy paper FEC-242/32 which is based on original United States proposals. At present all members except the United States, the Soviet Union and China are under official instructions to support this paper.

8. This spring the United States Department of the Army sent two committees to Japan to survey the industrial requirements for Japanese recovery, and they have recommended a considerably higher level of economic activity. It would, however, be very difficult for the United States to win support from the Far Eastern Commission countries for any drastic upward revisions in economic levels for Japan. Countries such as China would not only be deprived of the greater portion of the reparations expected from Japan but might well feel their security threatened if such a programme were adopted.

9. However, if the United States is to continue to regard the Far Eastern Commission as the policy-formulating body for Japan some agreement should be reached in the matter. Although Canadian security requirements are sufficiently similar to those of the United States to permit our acceptance of general and substantial increases in the levels of Japanese industry, Canada can, I think, best make her influence felt on policy towards Japan through the medium of the Far Eastern Commission. We have an interest in the avoidance by the United States of action which might prejudice the right of the Far Eastern Commission powers to participate in the formation of policy.

10. We think that any submission to the Far Eastern Commission by the United Kingdom of a policy paper revising upwards the levels of industry previously put forward in the Commission might have more chance of winning acceptance if it were presented before the United States became deeply committed to a paper of their own. The suggestion might be forthcoming from the United Kingdom that a Commonwealth working party should be organized to examine the figures relevant to this paper. We feel that a working committee of this nature, if suggested, would cause delay. It would probably make for antagonism on the part of the United States such as that which developed from the holding of the Canberra Conference last year. It might result in commitments which would limit our freedom of manoeuvre in the difficult negotiations consequent to the expected introduction of the United States proposals in the Far Eastern Commission.

11. In summary we feel that a proper evaluation of the position of primary responsibility held by the United States in regard to Japan makes it inadvisable to press the United States unduly to convene a Peace Conference which they regard as imprudent at this time. Although the United Kingdom submission to the F.E.C. of higher figures relative to the Japanese level of economic life than those previously proposed in the Far Eastern Commission would be welcomed by us, we doubt that it would be to Canada's advantage if we were to be associated too closely with such a submission.

12. I am attaching, for your consideration, a personal message to Mr. Attlee embodying these conclusions in case you wish to transmit a reply through Sir Alexander Clutterbuck.<sup>16</sup> In view of the general nature of our opinion on the matter this personal message from you to Mr. Attlee should suffice to answer both Mr. Attlee and the Commonwealth Relations Office telegram No. 137. I am forwarding a copy of this memorandum and its attachments† to Mr. St. Laurent in case you might wish to discuss the subject with him.

13. Also attached, for your information are copies of Secret Commonwealth Relations telegram No. 137, dated July 20, 1948,† concerning level of economic life in Japan, Secret memorandum for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, dated June 15, 1948,† concerning United States policy in Japan, and Top Secret telegram, dated July 7, 1948, from the Canadian High Commissioner, London, † concerning probable United Kingdom-Australian discussions on the level of Japanese industry.

[Ottawa], February 4, 1948

APPLICATION BY PAKISTAN FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE FAR EASTERN COMMISSION

On January 9th, 1948, Pakistan, in a letter from the Counsellor of the Embassy of Pakistan at Washington to the Secretary-General of the Far Eastern Commission, made formal application for membership in the Commission. This letter has been circulated as document FEC-286.†

2. At its 86th meeting on January 15th the Commission discussed the method by which this application should be dealt with. Since this is the first time that any other country has sought to join the Commission, there is no precedent to guide the members in the current discussions.

3. Article V of the Terms of Reference of the Far Eastern Commission, which provides for the admission of new members, reads as follows:

“The membership of the Commission may be increased by agreement among the participating powers as conditions warrant by the addition of representatives of other United Nations in the Far East or having territories therein.”

4. It was generally agreed by all the members that this provision should be interpreted to mean that agreement should be reached among the Governments of the States members of the Far Eastern Commission, on the subject of Pakistan's admission, in a manner similar to that in which the Commission had been created. It thus followed that since the procedure was not clearly laid down, the necessary agreement could be reached either through normal diplomatic channels, whereby Pakistan would initiate diplomatic exchanges with each Member Government, or by having all Governments convey their instructions to their representatives in Washington or on the Far Eastern Commission. It was recognized that the Far Eastern Commission, as such, is not competent to admit new members. It was agreed that it would not be desirable for the Commission itself to discuss the admission of Pakistan in an open debate, as there would be no representative at the meeting to present Pakistan's case.

5. It was finally agreed that FEC-286 should be tabled and that each member would seek the views of his Government. When all such views are known, the Commission will again consider whether or not it should deal with the application.

6. On January 21, in Circular telegram D. 42,† the Commonwealth Relations Office expressed the following views on Pakistan's application of January 9. While the Far Eastern Commission is not competent to take action on the application, this could conveniently be taken in Washington by the exchange of views of the Governments concerned through their representatives there. The United Kingdom intends to support Pakistan's application, but has assumed that the "agreement" referred to in Article V of the Terms of Reference of the Commission must be unanimous. The British Embassy have addressed a letter to the Chairman of the Commission and a note to the State Department informing them of these views.

7. On January 27 the Australian Minister for External Affairs replied to the above Circular telegram D. 42, indicating that the Australian Government intends to support Pakistan's application for membership in the Far Eastern Commission, and that they concurred in the suggestion of the United Kingdom Government that the application be dealt with by an exchange of views through the diplomatic representatives in Washington of the eleven Governments concerned.

8. It will be recalled that the attitude of the Canadian Government to the participation of Pakistan in the Canberra Conference was expressed in telegram No. 148 dated August 11, 1947,† from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Ottawa, to the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, London. It was stated that the Canadian Government would have no objection to the participation of delegates from Burma and Pakistan, but it was emphasized that since the Canadian Government had already agreed to the United States proposal of July 11 that there should be a preliminary Peace Conference on Japan, to be attended by the eleven States members of the Far Eastern Commission, its concurrence in the participation of Pakistan and Burma in the Canberra Conference was not in any way to be interpreted to mean that we would support their application for participation in the initial Peace Conference.

9. However, on August 26 the new Dominion of Pakistan was admitted to the United Nations as a member and there therefore arose at the Canberra Conference, during the discussions on the procedure for the drafting of the Japanese Peace Treaty, the question of whether Pakistan should not be added to the list of eleven countries members of the Far Eastern Commission which would, under the United States proposal, draft the preliminary Peace Treaty.

10. It was the unanimous wish of the Conference that Pakistan should be allowed to participate in the future Peace Conference and, while it was recognized that the United States and the U.S.S.R. might object to its participation, the Commonwealth countries undertook to do whatever they could to support Pakistan's claim for admission. No serious developments in this field have taken place between the Canberra Conference and the recent application by Pakistan on January 9 for admission to the Far Eastern Commission.

11. This is quite obviously intended by the Government of Pakistan to be a major step towards ensuring that they will be represented at the preliminary Peace Conference. If they should be admitted to the Far Eastern Commission, it would not only make it very much easier for the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries to support their claim at the appropriate time, but it is difficult to see how their claim could reasonably be rejected after they have qualified for membership on the Commission.

12. With regard to its present application, we can see no reason why Pakistan should not be admitted to the membership of the Far Eastern Commission. Its claim is based on the same considerations, about which there has never been any question, as govern India's membership. Pakistan is a sovereign state, (The United Nations Assembly accepted it unanimously); it made a great contribution in manpower to the ultimate Allied victory and, geographically, Pakistan is as much a Power with Pacific interests as India.

13. It is therefore recommended that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington be instructed to support Pakistan's application for membership.<sup>17</sup> A teletype in this sense is attached for your approval.†

14. However, it must be noted that Pakistan's action has raised the question of other applications which might be submitted in future to the Far Eastern Commission. It is quite possible that the U.S.S.R. may wish to sponsor a claim from the Outer Mongolian People's Republic or even, at a later date, Korea. Burma may also wish to join and all such manoeuvres would probably be closely related to the Japanese Peace Conference. The Canadian Government would naturally have to consider any such future applications on their merits, but we have in the past and at Canberra held the view that any country, either applying for membership in the Far Eastern Commission or claiming a right to participate in the Japanese Peace Conference, would not only have to have a legitimate interest but would also have to have an independent foreign policy. That is, if Burma were to be admitted to the United Nations, we might be willing to support any application she may make for membership in the Far Eastern Commission, but we would probably wish to oppose any similar claim on behalf of the Outer Mongolian People's Republic on the grounds that the Security Council has rejected its application for membership in the United Nations.

PROPOSED ADMISSION OF BURMA TO THE FAR EASTERN COMMISSION

On April 30, the Burmese Ambassador in Washington sent a note to our Ambassador there requesting the assistance and cooperation of the Canadian Government in obtaining the admission of Burma to the Far Eastern Commission.

2. Article V of the Terms of Reference of the Far Eastern Commission (Moscow agreement of December 27, 1945), which provides for the admission of new members reads as follows:

"The membership of the Commission may be increased by agreement among the participating powers as conditions warrant, by the addition of representatives of other United Nations in the Far East or having territories therein."

3. Pakistan has been the only country to apply for membership under the terms of this article. Since it was generally recognised that the Commission, as such, was not competent to admit new members, it was agreed that the application of Pakistan should be dealt with by an exchange of views through the diplomatic representatives in Washington of the eleven governments participating in the Commission. The matter is still pending. Burma has an equally supportable claim to membership on the Far Eastern Commission.

4. Burma's interests in the settlement with Japan are these: With a population of fifteen million and considerable natural wealth, Burma will become an increasingly important far eastern state. The fact that her territory was fought over from end to end in the war with Japan gives her reason to request a voice in the formulation of the policies and principles by which the Japanese Government is to fulfil the terms of surrender. Burma's war damage and losses constitute a good portion of the United Kingdom claim for reparations from Japan. Without special agreement, the United Kingdom could not now continue to represent Burma's interests in the Far Eastern Commission. It would appear more appropriate for Burma to have her own representative.

5. The genuineness of Burma's independence, and its capacity to play a part in international affairs are generally recognised. Anglo-Burmese agreements do not in any way limit the independence of the country. Burma has been judged competent to assume the responsibilities of United Nations membership. On April 19 the General Assembly approved Burma's application by unanimous vote.

6. It would be in Canada's interest, I think, to support Burma's application for membership in the Far Eastern Commission. To oppose it would be regarded in Asia as a slight to a country whose right to secede from the British Commonwealth we have all recognized. Canada supported Burma's application for membership in the United Nations. We have already recognized her interest in the Japanese peace settlement by agreeing to her participation in the Canberra Conference last summer. We have advocated the view that all states which fought Japan and which have important interests in the Far East, have a right to take a direct part in the formulation of a peace settlement with Japan. Having agreed to support Pakistan's application for membership in the Far Eastern Commission, we should, I think, support Burma's.

7. I should like to have your approval for instructing the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to inform the Burmese Ambassador, in reply to his note of April 30, that Canada will support Burma's application for membership in the Far Eastern Commission.<sup>18</sup>

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN UNITED STATES AND SOVIET POLICY IN THE FAR EASTERN COMMISSION

Although the holding of a Japanese Peace Conference now appears to be somewhat remote, developments of the last few months indicate that the eleven member Far Eastern Commission may be entering upon a new phase in its work in which it is becoming increasingly difficult for it to function as it was originally intended to, namely, as the policy making body for Japan for the duration of the occupation. The two main developments along these lines have been (a) a stiffening of the Soviet Government's attitude together with the formal use of the veto by its representative, and (b) a shift in the United States Government's policy towards an increasing reliance upon the executive authority of the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers as a substitute for policy decisions by the Commission, as well as towards a greater willingness to issue interim directives to the Supreme Commander in order to counteract the Soviet delegation's policy of obstructionism.

2. In the past, the work of the Commission was generally carried on by the majority of the members in a spirit of good faith. This was reflected in their desire to cooperate constructively and was based to a large extent on their identity of interests regarding Japan. Frank and free exchanges of views took place in the working committees. This, however, often led members to refrain from pressing policy decisions to a vote which would have brought on the United States or Soviet veto. As a result of such inaction by the Commission in many important fields, such as those of reparations removals and levels of industry, the basic issues underlying them have largely been resolved by the course of events in Japan. No agreed Allied policy has yet been reached concerning these and other matters. Hopes that such agreements might be reached before the Peace Conference have been considerably diminished by the altered tactics of the United States and Soviet delegations in the last few months.

I agree. St. L[aurant]

The Soviet Attitude

3. During the past six months, the Soviet delegation has become increasingly reluctant to accept compromises, and has made every effort to gain the acceptance of Soviet amendments without alterations at all levels of the Commission. Jurisdictional disputes have become frequent and the Soviet delegation has attempted to prevent the discussion by the Commission of many controversial issues on the grounds that they lie beyond its jurisdiction. Moreover, in recent months the Soviet representative has frequently resorted to the Commission as a medium for criticizing the Supreme Commander's activities. Article II-A-2 of the Terms of Reference enables any member to review any action taken by the Supreme Commander involving policy decisions.

The Veto

4. The Terms of Reference governing the activities of the Commission were agreed upon at the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers at Moscow in December 1945. Under Article V,2, which lays down the voting procedure of the Commission, China, the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R., each possesses the veto power. Although the Commission has never been free from the constant threat on the part of the United States and the Soviet members to employ this power, it was not until March 4, 1948, after more than two years of the Commission's activity, that the veto was actually invoked for the first time in order to prevent the adoption of a policy which was unacceptable to the Soviet delegation in its final form.

5. One result of this action was that on March 17, the United States Government issued an interim directive to the Supreme Commander in accordance with its authority under Article III, 3 of the Terms of Reference. This directive, brought into force most of the provisions of the policy which the Soviet member had vetoed a fortnight previously, thus circumventing his veto.

The United States Attitude

6. At the same time as the developments noted in para.3 above were going on, concurrent developments were taking place in United States policy which may, in the long run, come to be of greater significance to the work of the Commission than the use of the Soviet veto. There have been indications lately that the United States Government may be coming to think in terms of revising its general policy towards Japan in the light of the probability that the occupation will now be prolonged for many years longer than was initially anticipated.<sup>19</sup> This is bound up with the deteriorating world situation in which the tension between the United States and the Soviet Union is increasing, and in which Japan is gradually coming to assume greater strategic importance to the United States as the forces of Communism consolidate their holds over Korea and Northern China. One of the implications of this re-orientation of the United States policy is the gradual growth of a conviction in certain high quarters in the United States that, since both the Allied Council in Tokyo and the Far Eastern Commission in Washington were set up to assist in the formulation of Allied policy during the first stage of the occupation of Japan, and since that initial stage of consolidation of control over, and demilitarization of, Japan is drawing to a close, both the Allied Council and the Commission have outlived their usefulness. The thinking of this group appears to be along the lines that the Commission should revert in practice, if not in theory, to its earlier advisory capacity.

7. In the event of serious disagreement arising between the members of the Commission and the United States Government over the latter's policy in Japan, the Commission might easily come to be regarded by the United States as an unwelcome embarrassment. The United States Government might then be tempted to bypass the Commission as a policy making body. Moreover, it is in a position to reduce the Commission to impotency because its representative can veto any new policy and, in the absence of a policy governing any subject, the Supreme Commander has virtually a free hand to implement whatever policy he desires. There have already been several instances of this development in United States policy of enlarging the Supreme Commander's powers at the expense of those of the Commission.

8. The Legal Adviser to the United Kingdom Foreign Office has indicated his agreement with the United States' view that a legal basis for the Supreme Commander's almost unlimited authority may be found in Article II-A-2 of the Terms of Reference. This article provides that one of the functions of the Commission shall be "to review . . . any action taken by the Supreme Commander involving policy decisions within the jurisdiction of the Commission." This is interpreted to mean that the Supreme Commander may not only make policy decisions but that he is, in fact, free at all times to take such decisions and to act independently in all those matters not covered by previous policy decisions of the Commission.

Attitude of Other Members

9. While the United States Government may not intend to pursue this line of thought to its logical conclusion, nevertheless other members of the Commission are concerned about the possibility thus opened up that there would be no legal limitation which might prevent the United States Government from relegating the Commission to a position of insignificance similar to that now occupied by the Allied Council for Japan. This situation, in which the United States appears to have a relatively free hand, and in which the Soviet delegation seems bent on obstructing the work of the Commission in order to maintain conditions of disorder in Japan, has meant that many of the other members have been forced to resort to the tactics of corridor diplomacy. Like-minded members are being driven to working out agreements on issues of common interest to them in advance of Commission meetings. This is an undesirable departure from their previous practice of coming to the meetings with open minds. A two-year period of constructiveness and good faith might almost be said to have come to an end.

10. However, in actual fact the United States Government is susceptible to moral and diplomatic pressure, and I am inclined to think that the United States Government would be prepared to go a long way to gain general support for its policies in Japan, both because of the importance to it of domestic as well as international support, and because of the desirability of maintaining in Japan a public opinion friendly towards the occupation.

11. The general feeling among the Commonwealth and other more moderate members is that, in the light of the realities of the present situation, the most sensible course for them to follow in their own interests would be to encourage the United States Government to issue interim directives to the Supreme Commander with the support of a substantial majority of the members, in the event that desirable Commission policies are either unduly delayed or blocked by vetoes. A spirit of intelligent cooperation coupled with one of constructive criticism on the part of most of the other members might encourage the United States Government to continue to work through and with the Commission for some time to come. Otherwise there is a risk that the existing Commission machinery might be scrapped as a result of persistent opposition to the United States. The course suggested above would have the merit that, if the United States Government were to assume responsibility for issuing interim directives to the Supreme Commander instead of allowing the latter to formulate policy by independent actions, the United States Government would probably try to get at least majority support for any action taken through such interim directives. In this way discussions of prospective policies in the Commission would continue to serve a useful purpose. In the absence of opportunities for such discussions, it would become increasingly difficult for the other members of the Commission, including ourselves, to exert any appreciable influence in the formulation of policy in Japan, having in view the fact that the United States alone is bearing almost the entire burden of the occupation.

The Canadian Attitude

12. Our position is influenced by the fact that Canada and the United States are the only two North American members of the Far Eastern Commission and Canada is therefore more inclined to share United States views on security questions than other members are. Our common commercial and other interests also tend to draw us closer together. Moreover, the Canadian Government was prepared a year ago to participate in a general Japanese Peace Conference, to be based on a two thirds majority voting procedure. A simple majority voting procedure might have left the United States too much freedom of manoeuvre.

13. It seems to me that our general attitude should be somewhat as follows. We should continue to pursue the long-range objectives which we had in mind at the Canberra Conference. Since the Canadian Government might well have been at peace with Japan now, had the proposed Peace Conference taken place last year, we should be willing to support the restoration in Japan of conditions as nearly as possible approximating those which would obtain if Japan had by now made her peace with the Allied Powers. Actually we enjoy far more control over Japanese affairs under the present circumstances of the occupation than we would were we to be at peace with that country now. That this is due almost entirely to the fact that the United States and not the Soviet is the principal occupying power also influences our willingness to cooperate with the United States delegation on the Far Eastern Commission. We should favour on the one hand a shift in the practice of the Commission towards the two thirds majority voting procedure, and, on the other hand a restoration of more normal and liberal conditions in Japan which would anyway have come about with the peace settlement.

14. To sum up, the position is that from now on interim directives from the United States Government may be increasingly required if effect is to be given to the view of the majority on the Commission, and this is a development to which we might well lend our support in order to thwart the use of the veto by the Soviet member. However, the disposition on the part of the United States Government to claim a greater area of freedom of manoeuvre should be given the most careful attention, since we would not wish to find ourselves in a position in which, by supporting the United States Government against the pressure of the Soviet veto, we had allowed all effective influence over Japanese problems to slip out of our hands.

15. I should be grateful if you would indicate whether you concur with the views set forth in paragraphs 13 and 14 above.<sup>20</sup>

RE FAR EASTERN WAR CRIMES — PROPOSED FURTHER CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

On October 29, the Department received a message from the Canadian Liaison Mission in Tokyo reporting that General MacArthur's Headquarters had requested that Canada provide a judge for forthcoming war crimes trials of ex-Lieutenant-General Hiroshi Tamura, ex-Admiral Toyoda Soemu, former Commander-in-Chief of the Japanese Navy and possibly others. It was not suggested that any Canadians had been victimized by the accused.

2. We are informed by the Commonwealth Relations Office that Tamura and Toyoda had been held as "class A" suspected war criminals for trial by a second International Military Tribunal similar to the one which, at long last, is winding up. The present suggestion is that they be tried for class "B" or "C" (minor) war crimes by Military Commissions of the American type, but that MacArthur's Headquarters would like to give the Commissions an international flavour.

3. The United Kingdom Government has instructed its Liaison Mission in Tokyo that it does not seek representation on the panel of judges at the Tamura and Toyoda trials.

4. Canada has already fully participated both in the trials of the major Japanese war criminals and in minor trials in the Far East where there was a Canadian interest. In view of the United Kingdom action, and of the fact that no Canadians appear to have been victimized, it is recommended that the Canadian Liaison Mission in Tokyo be advised simply that "Canada does not seek representation on the panel of judges at the Tamura and Toyoda trials." You may wish to raise this matter with the Cabinet.

5. I would be grateful to know, in any event, whether the foregoing recommendation has your approval.<sup>21</sup>

RE FAR-EASTERN WAR CRIMES — FURTHER REQUEST FROM MACARTHUR'S HEADQUARTERS

Attached is a telegram No. 314, dated November 13, from the Canadian Liaison Mission in Tokyo.† Also attached is telegram No. 313, of the same date,† which contains an analysis of the verdict and sentences in the trial of the major Far Eastern war criminals conducted by the International Military Tribunal in Tokyo.

2. Mr. Norman, the chief of the Canadian Mission in Tokyo, has received a request to go to the office of the Supreme Commander on November 22, "to advise and consult with reference to sentences of defendants in the International Military Tribunal Trials." In an earlier memorandum, I recommended to you that Canada should not seek to be represented on the panel of judges for the forthcoming trials of Toyoda and Tamura. (Those trials of course would not be by International Military Tribunal.)

3. Mr. Norman has advised that it is expected that the ten representatives of the Allied Powers will be present on November 22 to advise the Supreme Commander on the exercise of his right to review the sentences.

4. I suggest that if the other Liaison Missions in Tokyo are to be represented in these conversations, and particularly if the United Kingdom Mission is to be so represented, it would be appropriate for the Canadian Mission to accede to General MacArthur's request.

5. In the past, we have experienced certain difficulties because of our participation in the commutation of sentences, (e.g. Kurt Meyer). Moreover, similar difficulties were experienced because United Kingdom Military Officers commuted the sentences of Japanese war criminals who were guilty of atrocities against Canadians. Nevertheless, it is difficult to see how we could properly refuse this request, when a Canadian Judge was represented on the panel of judges which tried the principal Japanese war criminals.

6. I would be grateful to know whether you agree that it would be in order for Mr. Norman to accede to General MacArthur's request and that he should be authorized to exercise his best judgment in any questions which may arise in the review, which General MacArthur expects to undertake, of the sentences imposed on the accused.<sup>22</sup>

[Ottawa], December 14, 1948

APPEAL TO THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT FROM JUDGEMENTS BASED BY THE INTERNATIONAL MILITARY TRIBUNAL FOR THE FAR EAST UPON JAPANESE WAR CRIMINALS

On December, 6th the United States Supreme Court decided, by a vote of 5-4, to hear the appeal of two Japanese War Criminals sentenced to die by the International Military Tribunal for the Far East.

2. It appears that the Defence Lawyers base their case on the contention that the International Tribunal was in reality a creation of the United States.

3. The United States Department of Justice, on the other hand, intends to argue that the Tokyo War Crimes trials were handled by a genuinely international tribunal. It has, therefore, requested an opinion from the Far Eastern Commission as to the status of the International Tribunal. When the question was brought to the attention of Committee No. 5 of the Commission, on December 10th, the delegates acting in their personal capacities agreed to submit a draft reply for consideration of the Steering Committee of the Commission on Tuesday morning December 14th. Text of the draft may be found in teletype WA-3145 of December 11th from Washington (attached).†

4. Although information then available was inadequate, Mr. Menzies, of the American and Far Eastern Division, and Mr. Hopkins, the Legal Advisor, studied (1) the appropriateness of producing an opinion in this matter for the use of the United States Justice Department and (2) in the event such an opinion was to be presented, what form it should take.

5. Their conclusions were communicated by telephone to Mr. Collins, the Alternate Canadian Delegate on the FEC and repeated in a teletype to Washington, (attached).† The views expressed were that it might not be appropriate for the FEC to render the opinion requested by the United States Department of Justice. Such an opinion might be difficult to differentiate from a formal policy decision and failure to comply with it on the part of SCAP might endanger the whole position of the Commission.

Approved. B[rooke] C[laxton]

6. The United Kingdom's instructions to its representatives on the Commission were repeated to Ottawa in CRO telegram No. 170 of December 13th. The United Kingdom attitude was that it would be unwise for the Far Eastern Commission to adopt an ex-post facto policy decision stating that the International Military Tribunal was an international court properly established pursuant to the authority of the Far Eastern Commission, itself an international body. Such an act might only serve to throw doubts on the status of the International Tribunal which, the United Kingdom felt as we did, is a truly International Court. The position of the United Kingdom was that the only proper recipient of appeals against sentences of the International Tribunal would be SCAP.

7. Shortly after noon, on December 14th, Mr. Collins called Mr. Menzies from Washington and reported that at the meeting of the Steering Committee that morning there had been no discussion of this question. The subject is to be taken up Wednesday morning at a meeting of the full Commission.

8. Mr. Collins also reported on conversations with four delegations:

a) The New Zealand delegate acting without reference to Wellington for instructions said that he would support the draft reply to the United States Justice Department, with slight modifications;

b) The Australian member had received instructions to support the production of an opinion for the Justice Department;

c) The United Kingdom had received the instructions outlined in the United Kingdom telegram referred to above, but would probably not support the presentation of an opinion for the Justice Department without receiving further instructions;

d) The United States member had been told informally by Mr. Collins of our reservations.

9. At the Wednesday morning meeting a number of delegates will probably be without instructions and may be obliged to abstain. If so, the motion to produce an opinion for the Department of Justice may still be carried in view of the fact that, according to the voting procedure of the Commission, abstentions do not constitute vetoes.

10. If the Supreme Court is aware that there has been a qualified vote in the Far Eastern Commission on this question, it may reflect adversely on its opinion as to the attitude of the member countries of the Commission unless the reasons for the abstentions came clearly under two headings:

a) lack of instructions

b) attitude that the Far Eastern Commission should not give such an opinion for the use of the Justice Department

In view of the above situation, a teletype has been prepared for the Canadian Ambassador. In this teletype the Ambassador is told that, in our opinion, his representative on the Commission might make a statement to the effect that

(1) Doubts are entertained concerning the desirability of the Far Eastern Commission rendering an opinion to the United States Department of Justice to be used before a domestic court of the United States.

(2) Consequently, if the matter is pressed to a vote, he will have to abstain.<sup>23</sup>

The above instructions were approved by the Acting Under-Secretary and received the verbal approval of the Acting Minister.

Dear Dr. Clark:

I am enclosing two interesting telegrams, Nos. 109 of April 1† and 110 of April 2,† from Dr. E.H. Norman, Head of the Canadian Liaison Mission in Tokyo, reporting on his conversation with Major-General Draper, U.S. Under-Secretary of the Army who has recently been visiting Japan.

You will probably have seen reports in the press that the United States is considering a revision of its policy toward Japan, that it may be considering ways and means of giving economic assistance to Japan with a view to rehabilitating that country's economy by 1953. Such a change in policy would affect Far Eastern Commission papers fixing the peaceful levels of industries to be permitted Japan and the amount of industrial equipment that would be available for reparations removals from Japan. Our representative in the Far Eastern Commission has consistently supported high levels for Japan's industries and in accepting the views of the majority in committees on lower levels has often indicated that we would have preferred a higher level. Should the United States now propose a reconsideration of papers in the Far Eastern Commission, I think we would be in a position to give them support without showing any inconsistency of attitude.

Any Canadian Government loan to assist in the rehabilitation of the Japanese economy at this time would, of course, be out of the question. I do not know whether any private Canadian investors would be interested in such a venture.

The "resolution" of the Far Eastern Commission was approved unanimously on December 15, with Canada and India abstaining.

You will note in paragraph 4 that the suggestion has been advanced that the Canadian Textile Mission, at present in Great Britain, might be consulted with a view to ascertaining their critical opinion on the question of textiles and what products might be favourably received in Canada and what the dangers would be in the revival of the Japanese textile industry. I should be glad if you have any comments to offer on this matter that I could pass on to Dr. Norman.

You will notice also that in paragraph 6, inquiries were made concerning the availability of low-grade wheat and heavy timber. I assume that Mr. Kenderdine, the representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce in Japan, will be communicating direct with his Department about these inquiries.

I am sending copies of these telegrams to the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I refer to your letter of April 3rd enclosing two telegrams from Dr. Norman concerning the conversation which he had recently with General Draper who has been visiting Japan in connection with the revival of the Japanese economy.

The possibility of a Canadian Government loan to assist in the rehabilitation of the Japanese economy at this time is clearly out of the question. There is no likelihood that Canadian private investors would be willing to lend to Japan. Even if they were willing to extend credit assistance to Japanese industry, we would not permit them to do so for the simple reason that the Canadian economy is in no position to send unrequited exports to Japan.

With regard to the suggestions concerning textiles, I do not understand the reference to the Canadian Textile Mission in Britain. I have not heard that there is such a Canadian mission in Britain at the present time. However, I am informed by The Wartime Prices and Trade Board officials that Canada would be interested in obtaining from Japan reasonable amounts of grey cloth and cheaper cottons which are adapted to the Canadian market provided they could be had at reasonable prices. With respect to the longer run situation, I see no reason why the revival of the Japanese textile industry should be deliberately prevented.

With respect to the general question regarding the rehabilitation of Japanese industry, I agree with you that we should continue in the attitude which our representatives have taken in the past in supporting a policy of high levels for Japanese peaceful industries.

Yours very truly,

MOST FAVOURED NATION TREATMENT FOR JAPAN

At a meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy of August 19, the question of granting Most Favoured Nation treatment for Japan was considered, and I understand that the Cabinet Committee on External Trade Policy will discuss this subject at its next meeting.

The United States Government has expressed its intention of placing this question on the agenda for the second session of the Contracting Parties of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, being held this month in Geneva. This follows an unsuccessful attempt by the United States Government at the Havana Conference to obtain reciprocal exchange of Most Favoured Nation treatment with the Occupied areas of Germany and Japan. A further unsuccessful effort was made to include in the E.C.A. bilateral agreements an undertaking that the E.R.P. countries would grant such privileges to Japan. As a result of the strong objections raised by European countries, particularly the United Kingdom, this provision was removed from the final agreements.

The United Kingdom resisted on the specific grounds that there was no necessary connection between Japan and European recovery, and that in addition, prior consultation with other members of the Commonwealth was necessary. It is understood that the British remain opposed to the granting of M.F.N. treatment and intend to state at Geneva that they have not had time to consider the matter adequately, in consultation with their domestic industries, of which the textile manufacturers would be the hardest hit, or with other Commonwealth governments. They propose to seek a postponement of the issue.

The Interdepartmental Committee is in agreement with its Sub-Committee that, from an economic point of view, the granting of M.F.N. treatment to Japan would be desirable. It is in the interest of Canada that the Japanese economy operate on a viable basis. The world needs the textiles which Japan would be in a position to produce, and it might be difficult for Canada to justify opposition to steps that would develop healthy commercial and trade arrangements in the Pacific area. Japanese markets, if revived, could become of considerable importance to Canada.

The Committee, however, recognized that in the light of past Japanese practices, such treatment for Japan should only be granted on the basis of adequate guarantees from the responsible authorities in Japan.

It will be recognized then that in this instance Canada has an interest in M.F.N. treatment for Japan different from that of the U.K. Government, and more similar to that of the United States Government, although the latter is carrying the major portion of the present burden of Japanese deficits. Apart, however, from purely economic considerations, the granting of such treatment to Japan may cause difficulties within Canada, particularly with the Canadian textile industry. Neither the Committee nor the Sub-Committee have attempted to assess the domestic political aspects of this problem, and perhaps you will be able to examine this side of the matter at the meeting of the Cabinet Committee.

General McNaughton telephoned me at home to-day to let you know that he was at the disposal of the Government for the Security Council post. He told me that he would accept the appointment in principle but would like to discuss minor details with you at your convenience.

He said that he could keep the chairmanship of the International Joint Defence Committee and, of course, his post on the Atomic Energy Commission, but would have to resign from the chairmanship of the Atomic Energy Control Board in Ottawa.

The General telephoned me again in the afternoon and I told him that you were pleased to hear that he would accept the appointment and that you would also be pleased to see him as soon as possible.

I told the General that the Department is putting out to-day a press release to announce that Mike [L.B.] Pearson would be the Canadian representative at the next meeting of the Interim Committee of the General Assembly on the 5th and also at the next meeting of the Security Council on the 7th.

I told the General that Mike was in Washington and would stay in New York a few days on his way back to Ottawa and also that no permanent appointment to the Security Council could be made before the next meeting of Cabinet on Wednesday next, the 7th.

The General asked me to let him know when you could see him, Wednesday or Thursday next.

I informed Gerry [R.G.] Riddell of these telephone conversations.

UN ASSEMBLY; CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that it was considered appropriate that the Prime Minister head the Canadian delegation to the Assembly of the United Nations which would meet in Paris in September. It would probably be advisable that the delegation include, as well, another member of the Cabinet.

General McNaughton would be in Paris as Canadian representative on the Security Council and could be associated with the delegation. The Canadian Ambassador in Paris and the Canadian High Commissioner in London might also

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to his report at the meeting of August 17th,<sup>2</sup> stated that it was now proposed to announce that the Canadian delegation to the Assembly meeting in Paris would consist of:

Representatives:

- The Prime Minister, Chairman of the delegation,
- The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier),
- The Leader of the Government in the Senate (Senator Robertson),
- The Canadian Representative on the Security Council (General McNaughton),
- The Canadian Ambassador to France (General Vanier).

Alternates:

- The Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lapointe),
- The Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Maybank),
- The Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom (Mr. Robertson),
- The Canadian Minister to Switzerland (Mr. Wilgress),
- Mr. R.G. Riddell, Department of External Affairs.

The delegation would consist of 26 members, of whom most would come from European Missions; the staff all told would number some 61.

7. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved announcement of the Canadian delegation as indicated by the Minister.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, August 30, 1948

Dear Dr. Clark,

I am enclosing copies of confidential telegrams (No. 904 of August 20 and No. 910 of August 21†) from the Canadian Permanent Delegate to the United Nations regarding the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Budget.

You will note that according to one proposal Canada's assessment may be raised to 3.5%, an increase of .3% which would amount to approximately $100,000. on the proposed United Nations Budget of $33,419,587. for 1949. This increased ratio of payment would result in a per capita Canadian contribution slightly less than that of the United States but would fall considerably short of a revised assessment based on Canada's ability to pay, an assessment based presumably on national income.

Later designated as "Permanent Representative of Canada at the European office of the United Nations" to conform with United Nations terminology.

This proposed increase, which may be recommended by the Contributions Committee, should be considered together with an amendment which will be put forward by the United States (Agenda Item 47) to provide for the recognition of the principle of a percentage ceiling in the scale of United Nations assessments. As you are aware the United States accepted only with reservations its present ratio of 39.89% in recognition of temporary post-war dislocation. At the forthcoming session of the General Assembly the United States will attempt to secure:

(a) Acceptance at this time of the ceiling principle.

(b) A token reduction of the United States share.

(c) Agreement to fix the ceiling for the United States contribution at 33.33% for normal times.

(Note: Reduction of the United States contribution to 33.33% would increase Canadian contribution to 3.55%.)

It seems apparent that proposals may be made to increase the Canadian contribution. In this Department, we consider that the Delegation should resist firmly any effort of this nature, particularly if the contributions of certain great powers which enjoy a privileged position in the organization remain low. We should be grateful for your observations on this subject for use in preparing instructions for the Delegation.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Ottawa, September 25, 1948

Dear Sir:

In answer to your letter of August 30 concerning the Canadian contribution to the United Nations budget, I should say that this Department agrees with you that the Canadian delegation should resist firmly any effort at this time to reduce the contribution of the United States to the budget of the United Nations and to increase the Canadian contribution. Our understanding is that the assessment of costs strictly on the basis of ability to pay would lead to a higher contribution for the United States, and we believe that the present circumstances would not justify any further departure from this basic principle.

It may be exceedingly difficult to resist completely a strong effort by the United States to achieve at least a token reduction in their contribution. If such an effort is made by the United States, it would seem to us best to confine it at this time simply to a token reduction, and not to accept the principle of a ceiling and, in particular, not to accept the proposal that in normal times the United States' contribution should be no more than one-third the total budget.

If some token reduction must be made in the U.S. contribution, it would seem to us at this stage that this should be taken up by the necessary slight increase in those contributions which have been temporarily reduced because of post-war difficulties.

If the principle of a ceiling must be accepted, then provision should be made to ensure that no country such as Canada pays more per capita than any country subject to such ceiling, notwithstanding the ability to pay formula.

Mr. [S.D.] Pollock, who works on this subject for this Department, will be at the meeting of the Assembly, and we would suggest that he can assist there in working out the detailed arguments and proposals in connection with this matter.

Perhaps when the report of the Contributions Committee has been received and some study has been given to it by Mr. Pollock in Paris, you could arrange to have the important issues notified to us here by telegram, and we would then be in a better position to make more detailed comments to be used in the instructions to the delegation on this matter.

Yours very truly,

New York, April 8, 1948

SECRET

Your teletype No. 331, 6th April†, and previous correspondence, admission of new members to the United Nations.

In a letter dated 6th April to the Secretary General (Document S/712)† the Ukrainian representative has asked that the provisional agenda of the next meeting of the Security Council include "the question of the admission to the United Nations of Bulgaria, Hungary, Roumania, Finland and Italy, States with which the Peace Treaties were concluded, and also of Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic."

2. At a meeting of the permanent members yesterday the question of the admission of new members was considered. Gromyko repeated his view that the admission of Italy should be considered together with the applications of Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary and Roumania. He also tried to have the admission of Transjordan taken up together with that of Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic. The United States, United Kingdom and France refused again to consider a "deal" of this character and insisted that each application be voted on separately and on its merits. These three States, on United States initiative, submitted yesterday a formal request that, in addition to Italy and Transjordan and the States named by the Ukrainian representative in his letter of 6th April, the Security Council should reconsider the applications of Austria, Eire and Portugal. Thus all outstanding applications will be up for reconsideration when the Council meets again on this subject. The United States are pressing to have the President of the Council call a meeting on the admission of members for Friday, 9th April (tomorrow).

3. Despite the failure of the permanent members to agree on the other applications before them the application of Burma is unaffected and will come up for consideration by the Council, in accordance with the virtually unanimous report of the Council's Committee on the admission of new members (reference my teletype No. 361, 29th March).†

4. In regard to all these applications for membership, the United States will press to have the Council take them up in the order in which they were submitted for consideration. In this way Italy and Transjordan would be dealt with first, then the Soviet satellites and, finally, Austria, Eire and Portugal. The United Kingdom strongly support this procedure. Both the United Kingdom and the United States will strongly oppose reference of these applications to the Committee on membership again and will press for their consideration in the Council as expeditiously as possible. Neither the United Kingdom nor the United States plan to make any lengthy statements on any of these applications, although both delegations will probably make a short statement in support of Italy's application.

5. The United States position is now apparently to vote against (rather than to abstain on) the applications of Bulgaria, Hungary, Roumania, Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic. In regard to Finland, the United States have not apparently yet made any definite decision but will probably abstain or vote in favour. The United States draws a definite distinction between Finland and the other Soviet satellites. The United Kingdom have not yet received complete instructions but their delegation here hopes that they will also vote against rather than abstain on the Soviet satellites. (The United Kingdom previously abstained on Hungary and Roumania.) With regard to Finland, the United Kingdom also have not definitely decided but it is unlikely that they will vote against (the United Kingdom supported Finland's application previously). Concerning Austria, the United Kingdom have not received definite instructions but it is unlikely that they will vote against it. Previously they took the view (contrary to the United States) that Austria could not properly be considered an independent State, capable of carrying out its obligations under Article 4, in view of the presence of the Allied Control Commission. The United Kingdom may take the line that they will support Austria's application subject to the general Assembly approving a Resolution that Austria is, in effect, sufficiently independent to carry out its obligations under Article 4.

6. In view of the above, I would appreciate your instructions on how I should vote in regard to these applications. At present my instructions extend only to supporting the applications of Italy, Transjordan and Burma for membership. I would also appreciate knowing whether you wish me to make any statement in regard to these applications, particularly as regards Italy.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Your teletype No. 395 of April 8th. Admission of new members.

You should vote in favour of admission of Burma, Italy, Transjordan, Eire, Portugal. You may think it advisable to support your vote in favour of one or more of these states with a short statement.

2. You should vote in favour of admission of Finland unless, in consultation with your colleagues from the United Kingdom and the United States, you decide that there are good reasons for doing otherwise.

3. You should oppose admission of Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Albania and Mongolian People's Republic. If it is necessary for you to explain your vote, you should say that Canadian people have every sympathy with aspirations of peoples of these areas to play part in world affairs. Canadian Government is not yet satisfied, however, that Governments of these countries can in fact carry out obligations which Charter would place upon them.

4. Our view is that you should oppose application of Austria on grounds that country which is under occupation cannot possibly fulfil obligations under Charter. Canadian Government hopes that occupying powers will arrange for withdrawal of troops from Austria as soon as possible, at which time Canada will welcome Austria as member of United Nations. If, after consultation with your United Kingdom and United States colleagues you consider that there are compelling reasons for altering this position and voting in favour of admission of Austria, you may do so.

New York, August 3, 1948

Following from Ignatieff, Begins: Admission of new members.

The United States delegation has informally raised with us the question of what action, if any, the Council should take preliminary to the meeting of the General Assembly regarding this matter.

2. To recapitulate the situation:

(a) Reconsideration of the applications of Transjordan and Italy. In its resolutions dealing with these two applications, the Assembly requested the Council to reconsider, before the end of the second regular session of the Assembly, the applications of these two States. However, when the Council considered these applications on 22nd November, 1947, it was found that the members of the Council had not changed their positions with regard to the applications and, therefore, action on these applications was postponed to allow consultations among permanent members.

(b) Further consideration of all previously rejected applications by the Council on 10th April, 1948. France, the United Kingdom and United States requested reconsideration of the applications of Italy, Transjordan, Eire, Portugal and Austria. The Ukrainian representative countered with the request for reconsideration of the applications of Albania, Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary, Italy, Mongolian Republic and Rumania. Consideration of Italy's application was the main issue at the meeting of 10th April and representatives of France, United Kingdom, Argentina, Canada, Belgium, China and Syria supported this application.

However, the Soviet delegation charged that bringing up Italy's application was only a tactical manoeuvre connected with the Italian elections, and said that the Soviet Government would only agree to supporting Italy's application if Bulgaria, Hungary, Finland and Rumania were considered on the same footing, basing this argument on the Potsdam Declaration and the relevant peace treaties and claiming that France, United States and United Kingdom had obligated themselves under these treaties and the Declaration to support the admission of all these five States together. No decision was reached as a result of the Soviet position and discussion was adjourned indefinitely. The United States representative, however, indicated that consideration might be given at the next Assembly of devising means “Whereby certain States might be able to have a voice in the General Assembly of the United Nations. The General Assembly was the master of its own house. It could, therefore, choose the method which would partially do away with the present unjust disqualification of nations which possessed every moral right to become members of the United Nations.”

In this connection, the United States delegation have indicated that, after further consideration of the various possibilities, they are not disposed to initiate any proposal along these lines, as private soundings in Italy, for instance, have indicated that the Italian Government would prefer to continue pressing for full membership, rather than accept some expedient which would give it less than full membership which might be continued for some time and might, thereby, weaken its strong claim to full membership. The United States delegation would like to have our views informally on what the Canadian attitude might be on this point, particularly as it refers to Italy.

(c) Application of Burma.

On 10th April, the Council made a favourable recommendation for this application and the Assembly admitted Burma as a member on 19th April, 1948.

(d) Application of Ceylon.

On 11th June the Council referred the application to its Committee on admission of new members for examination and report. The Committee met on 29th June and 1st July to examine the application. Although nine members indicated their intention to support the application, the Soviet and Ukraine, after first reserving their positions, on 1st July indicated that they would oppose the application on the grounds that there was insufficient information available in support of Ceylon's application. The report of the Membership Committee will probably be considered before the Council adjourns in New York. It will then be known whether the Soviet delegation will go through with its indicated intention of barring this application.

3. The United States delegation are wondering whether it would be advisable to have all the above applications reconsidered in the light of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice in order to have an opportunity of invoking the majority opinion of the Court against the Soviet position, in the hope of having some preliminary clarification of the issue before the matter is debated in the General Assembly. An opportunity would present itself when the application of Ceylon is considered in any case. On the other hand, the conditions for such a debate would not be very favourable with the Soviet delegate as President of the Council, with Manuisky "running interference". Your comments would be appreciated, particularly for the purpose of further private discussion of this matter with the United States delegation. Ends.

Reference your teletype No. 837 of August 3, 1948, concerning admission of new members.

It is our view that the outstanding membership applications should not be reconsidered by the Council at this time unless there has been a change in attitude on the part of the USSR concerning them. It is unlikely that the invoking of the majority opinion of the International Court of Justice would influence greatly the USSR in this matter in view of the dissenting opinion of the Soviet representative on the Court. We are also doubtful of the propaganda effect of additional vetoes by the USSR of membership applications.

2. As regards the question of limited or qualified membership, your comments concerning the present US attitude and that of Italy have been noted. You might suggest, in the course of further private discussion with the US delegation, that this question be considered on a somewhat broader basis to include any State which has applied for membership and which has received majority approval in the Security Council but whose application has been vetoed. In this way, the objections of Italy might be overcome.

3. It does not appear that a decision needs to be taken in this matter at the present time. It might well be left in abeyance and held in mind for reconsideration during the General Assembly at which time delegations might be sounded out as to their views. If there is general support for it, it could then be brought forward.

4. The question of limited or qualified membership does raise the related problem of how far can the Assembly go within the terms of the Charter in giving privileges of association to non-member States. Although the Assembly is master of its own procedure, the question does arise whether it could invite such States to full participation in all its activities, excepting only the formal right to vote. This aspect of the problem has been referred to the Legal Adviser for his opinion and you will be advised in due course of his views.

BURMA'S APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The attached letter† of February 6 from Mr. Wrong states that the new Burmese Ambassador to the United States, U So Nyun, will be going to New York shortly to call on members of the Security Council with a view to enlisting their support for Burma's application for membership in the United Nations. Burma has, I think, a sufficient degree of independence to warrant our supporting its application for membership.

The special rights which the United Kingdom possesses in Burma under the Burma-United Kingdom Treaty of 1947, are not as extensive as those it possesses in Transjordan or in Iraq.

Therefore, if you agree, I shall inform General McNaughton that he can support Burma's application for membership.<sup>4</sup>

Reference your despatch No. 271 of 30th March, application of Ceylon for membership in the United Nations.

The Government of Ceylon has made formal application for membership in the United Nations in a letter dated 25th May from the Prime Minister to the Secretary-General. This letter has been circulated in Document S/820 of 3rd June.† The letter points out that Ceylon became an independent member of the British Commonwealth on 4th February, 1948, under the terms of the Ceylon Independence Act, 1947; that Ceylon accepts the obligations contained in the United Nations Charter and that she will "collaborate in effective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression."

2. We have discussed the question of Ceylon's application informally with the United Kingdom delegation. So far, the United Kingdom delegation here have not received specific instructions and they appear to have very little information in regard to the defence agreement between Ceylon and the United Kingdom. In any case, they do not believe that the question of Ceylon's application will come before the Security Council until the latter part of July, when it will probably be referred immediately to the Committee on the admission of new members.

3. I would appreciate your instructions on this matter and also any additional information on the attainment of Dominion status by Ceylon, received by you subsequent to your circular despatch No. A96 of 9th April.†

The United Kingdom delegation has advised us that a Ceylonese representative, Mr. Corea,<sup>5</sup> has now arrived in New York in order to press Ceylon's application for membership in the United Nations. The United Kingdom delegation have added that negotiations for the revised Defence Agreement between the United Kingdom and Ceylon have now broken down because of the reluctance of the Ceylonese Government to sign the new Agreement. This is unfortunate from our standpoint as a member of the Commonwealth, since it was hoped that the new Agreement would be signed prior to consideration in the Council of Ceylon's application for membership. The previous Defence Agreement concluded between Ceylon and the United Kingdom contained, as you know, certain features that raised question as to Ceylon's status as a truly independent State.

2. At the meeting of the Security Council on 11th June, 1948 the application of Ceylon for membership in the United Nations (Document S/820)† was referred to the Committee on the admission of new members without objection and without any comment from members of the Security Council (S/PV.318. page 6).† While there is no indication that this application will be taken up in the immediate future by the Committee on Membership, it is possible that it may be considered at any time and, for this reason, I would appreciate your early comments as to the position I should take on this matter.

Reference previous correspondence, application of Ceylon for membership in the United Nations.

The United Kingdom delegation have requested us to take up with you the question as to whether or not Canada would be willing to take the initiative in sponsoring Ceylon's application when it comes before the Committee on Membership and in the Security Council itself. While we have informed the United Kingdom delegation that we are still without instructions as to our attitude on Ceylon's application, we have agreed to transmit this request to you.

2. As I have previously informed you the United Kingdom delegation feels some hesitance in taking the leadership in sponsoring Ceylon's application in view of the fact that they feel it is possible that some criticisms may be made concerning the Defence Agreement concluded between the United Kingdom and Ceylon at the time of the Ceylon Independence Act. While they do not feel that the terms of this Agreement in any way inhibit them from whole-heartedly supporting Ceylon's candidature, they are not anxious to precipitate discussion of this Defence Agreement and therefore would be glad if we would take the initiative. It should be observed that, although there may be features in this Defence Agreement which critics might raise as being in some measure an infringement on Ceylon's status as a truly independent State, the United Kingdom have consistently shown their readiness to renegotiate the Defence Agreement in such a way that these features would be removed. Negotiations for the new Agreement have however, as I stated in paragraph 1 of my teletype No. 697, now been broken off due to the Ceylonese Government's reluctance to complete the new Agreement at the present time.

3. Meanwhile we have had one or two friendly discussions of an informal character with Dr. Corea, the new Ceylonese representative who is now High Commissioner in London and who has been designated as their future Minister to Washington. In these discussions we did not raise either the Defence Agreement or the United Kingdom suggestion to us that we take the initiative in sponsoring Ceylon's application. We did, however, suggest to Dr. Corea that it might be advisable to give members of the Committee on Membership ten days or a fortnight's time, before pressing for consideration of Ceylon's application, in order that the delegations concerned would have an opportunity of receiving instructions from their Governments. While Dr. Corea seemed sympathetic to this there is still a possibility that Ceylon's application may be taken up in the Committee on Membership in the latter part of next week.

4. I would accordingly appreciate your comments or instructions on the following two points:

(a) Should we support the application of Ceylon for membership?

(b) If so, should we assume sponsorship for Ceylon's application in accordance with the United Kingdom request?

On this general point it might be worth considering that it is perhaps not a desirable precedent to have the new independent members of the British Commonwealth from the Far East look automatically to their Asiatic neighbours for sponsorship in matters like this. On the other hand, you may wish to consider whether there might be any cause for embarrassment to us if a debate developed on the Defence Agreement between the United Kingdom and Ceylon. It is however possible, of course, that no reference will be made to this Agreement in the Council's discussion of Ceylon's application.

5. If you believe that we should undertake sponsorship of Ceylon's application I will take the matter up informally with Dr. Corea to find out whether this would fall in with Ceylon's wishes or whether they would desire to have their application sponsored by some other State. Ends.

The Committee on Membership of the Security Council met on 29th June to consider Ceylon's application for United Nations membership. In addition to the usual background information about Ceylon's application, a Declaration of Acceptance of obligations contained in the Charter signed by the Prime Minister of Ceylon and dated 16th June was circulated in accordance with Rule 58 of the Security Council's Rules of Procedure.

2. The first speaker in support of the application was the representative of China who referred to the traditionally good relations between his country and Ceylon dating back to the fifth century. Syria and the United Kingdom also spoke in support in that order. Ignatieff represented me at the meeting and as agreed in telephone conversation with Riddell, gave his support to the application, referring to Ceylon as a fellow member of the British Commonwealth of Nations and to Ceylon's qualifications for membership under Article 4 of the Charter. He expressed the hope that the Membership Committee would give Ceylon's application unanimous approval.

3. Belgium, the United States, France and Colombia also spoke in support; the United States recalling Ceylon's participation in the war (presumably having in mind the Soviet objection to neutrals in the last war). The Soviet Union and the Ukraine, however, abstained from participation in discussing the application in the Committee and reserved the right of their delegations to state their views in the Security Council. It was understood that the Soviet delegations had not received instructions. The report of the Committee on the consideration of Ceylon's application will be presented to the Council by the Syrian representative and, therefore, no special question of sponsorship of Ceylon in the Council will arise.

4. The High Commissioner of Ceylon in London, Mr. Corea, attended the meeting as observer.

New York, July 2, 1948

Reference my message No. 719. Ceylon's application for membership in the United Nations.

The Ukraine Delegation, in its first day in the office of President of the Security Council, suddenly called a meeting of the Membership Committee of the Council on July 1st on a few hours' notice.

2. The Ukraine Chairman, Galagan, asked whether there would be any objection to the Soviet representative making a statement on Ceylon's application. Although a report had already been circulated by the Committee on the consideration of Ceylon's application (S/859 of June 29th), recording the fact that the majority of the members of the Committee expressed their support for the application of Ceylon while the USSR and the Ukraine reserved their position, the Committee did not object to the Soviet representative making a statement, in the hope that it might give an opportunity to the Soviet Union and the Ukraine to associate themselves with the majority in support of Ceylon.

3. However, the Soviet representative, in his statement, alleged that there was insufficient information available to substantiate the claim to sovereignty and independence of Ceylon and also the democratic nature of its Government. He said that the Committee should seek further information from Ceylon in support of its application on these points.

4. Ignatieff, who represented me at the meeting, pointed to the difficult situation arising from the statement of the Soviet delegate, namely that if the Committee adopted the correct procedure of declining to re-open consideration of a report already adopted, Ceylon might fail to obtain a favourable recommendation in the Council as a result of the allegation of the Soviet Government that insufficient information had been made available to the Membership Committee. He maintained that sufficient information was in fact available, referring to the information paper circulated by the Secretariat (Working Paper 13 of June 24th)† and to other public information on the question of Ceylon's sovereignty and independence. In particular he referred in this connection, to the terms of the Ceylon Independence

Act, 1947, containing provision for the fully responsible status of Ceylon defined in Article 1 thereof. He also pressed the Soviet Delegate to be more specific in regard to what information he required to satisfy himself (as the nine other members of the Committee had been satisfied) regarding Ceylon's qualifications under Article 4.

5. The representative of Belgium submitted that the Committee would have to take a preliminary decision as to whether the report contained in S/859 of June 29th should be reopened. This led to a long procedural debate in which the Chairman, Galagan, maintained that the Committee, in failing to object to the initial Soviet statement, had automatically reopened consideration of the report.

6. The representatives of China and Colombia, as well as Belgium, questioned this ruling, but the Chairman and the Soviet representative continued to make statements on the application of Ceylon until the Chairman was finally pressed to put the question to a vote by Ignatieff under Rule 30 of the Council's rules of procedure. On the vote on the question as to whether or not the President's ruling, that the report should be reopened in consequence of the Soviet representative's request for further information should be upheld, the Canadian, as well as the United Kingdom representative, abstained, both explaining their abstention on the grounds that they did not oppose the idea of having further information on Ceylon's application available to the Soviet representative if this might result in a favourable recommendation of Ceylon's application by the Security Council.

7. Seven members of the Committee, however, voted to overrule the Chairman and the Chairman and the Soviet representative voted to uphold the Chairman's ruling.

8. After this vote, the Soviet and Ukraine representatives then made a statement to the effect that according to available information Ceylon was not an independent and sovereign State, and as the Committee had refused to accede to the Soviet Union's request for further information, their delegations would be compelled to object to the admission of Ceylon into the United Nations.

9. This statement which revealed that the Soviet Delegation intended to veto the application anyway, however, did not terminate the confused procedural debate as the Chairman then proposed to write a new report on the matter for submission to the Council. This was opposed however by the other members on the grounds that the decision taken on the Chairman's ruling established that the previous report stood, and would be submitted to the Council by the previous Chairman, the representative of Syria. It was also agreed that circulation of the summary record of the present meeting would suffice to inform members on the Security Council what had taken place.

10. It is expected that the question of Ceylon's membership will come up before the Council next week when almost certainly the Soviet and Ukraine delegates will maintain their position that insufficient information has been made available to support the claim to independence and sovereignty of Ceylon and your comments and guidance would be appreciated.

New York, August 19, 1948

Reference previous correspondence, Ceylon.

At the meeting of the Security Council, 10:30 a.m., 18th August, the application of Ceylon for membership was vetoed by the Soviet Union. After prolonged discussion, the Chinese representative moved that the Security Council make a favourable recommendation on Ceylon's application and the vote on this was 9 in favour and 2 against (the Soviet Union and the Ukraine).

2. I made two statements at this meeting. The first of these statements was on a point of order, suggesting that the agenda be changed so that Ceylon's application be considered before the Palestine question was taken up. This proposal was adopted with 9 in favour, 1 abstention (Soviet Union) and 1 against (the Ukraine). My second statement was in support of Ceylon's application. These two statements are contained in my immediately following teletype.†

3. The discussion on this subject in the Council meeting was marked by obstructive tactics by the Soviet and Ukrainian representatives who tried to justify their decision to vote against Ceylon by contending that there was insufficient information available to establish that Ceylon was a truly independent State within the meaning of Article 4. The Soviet representative introduced a Resolution to the effect that the Council should postpone consideration of Ceylon's application until "such time as full information on the status of the Government of Ceylon and on its Constitution as well as sufficient proof that Ceylon is a sovereign and independent State has been received from the Government of Ceylon." This Resolution is contained in Document S/974.† On a vote, it was defeated by two in favour (the Soviet Union and the Ukraine) and 9 abstentions.

4. In connection with their contentions that insufficient information had been received regarding Ceylon's independence, the Soviet and Ukrainian representatives both charged that the United Kingdom and Canadian representatives in the Committee on the administration of new members had tried to block the Committee's receiving further information on this subject. I answered this allegation by quoting from the summary record of this Committee's meeting on 1st July (Document S/C.2/SR.26).† In particular I quoted the last sentence on page 3 of this document, which summarized the position of the Canadian representative on this point and which is as follows: "If the representative of the USSR insisted on his position that there was insufficient information for a decision, the Committee should know specifically what he might desire." I also pointed out that Canada had not voted against the ruling of the Chairman (the Ukrainian representative) to the effect that the discussions should be reopened and new information should be sought, but that he had abstained from voting (Documents S/C.2/SR.26, page 8, and

S/C.2/SR.26/CORR.1).† I added that the additional information which had been sought had now been forwarded by the Government of Ceylon and was contained in Document S/951.†

5. After the Soviet veto had been employed against Ceylon's application, the representative of China made a statement in protest and said that this veto would be regarded as a severe setback to the former colonial peoples of Asia who were struggling for independence. Ends.

Repeat to London, No. 1514.

Ceylon High Commissioner in London has indicated that there is some dissatisfaction in the Ceylon Government with the way in which their application for membership in the United Nations was handled. There was also a feeling in Colombo that they might have to look for another form of association with the Commonwealth. They were contemplating sending a special envoy to see Stalin to try to convince him of Ceylon's independence. They are worried about left-wing opposition in their Parliament.

2. You will have seen Canada House telegram No. 1355 of August 13, 1948,† on the effect which a decision by Ceylon to withdraw from the Commonwealth might have.

3. We would like to indicate officially to the Ceylon authorities our continued support of their application for admission and our desire to assist in any way possible. Our attitude of full support was indicated in General McNaughton's statement in the Security Council on August 18. This was given in Canadian Delegate's telegram No. 894 of August 19† which was referred to you.

4. If Kearney is still in Madras, or some other convenient place in South India, if the Hyderabad situation and other developments, make it possible for him to go, and if in his judgment he thinks it is in order to leave India for two or three days, we would like him to fly to Colombo and express to the Ceylon Prime Minister our views as indicated in paragraph 3. If this is not possible, would you please formally approach the Ceylon High Commissioner in New Delhi and convey a message giving assurance of our support and sympathy.<sup>6</sup>

Following from Riddell, Begins: Application of Ceylon for membership was discussed in the Security Council yesterday morning as result of letter dated 9th December from President of the Assembly (S/1113).†

2. Malik immediately argued for postponement on the grounds that the General Assembly had formally moved that all twelve applications should be considered and that there was no reason for discrimination in favour of Ceylon, which was the twelfth applicant. He pressed for "immediate and simultaneous consideration" of all twelve applications. He did not, however, say that the Soviet Union would favour a lump admission of all twelve. After several other speakers had protested against his interpretation of the Assembly resolution and argued that each application should be given individual consideration, Malik said that the Council might consider all twelve in order of their application but that no one wanted them to be considered en masse.

3. Most of the other members made brief statements expressing their belief in Ceylon's qualifications for membership. Neither the Soviet nor the Ukrainian representative spoke at all on the subject of Ceylon's qualifications. After I had referred to the fact that information on Ceylon's constitutional position had been available since last June, Malik said that the Soviet Government was studying this material.

4. Malik warned that if the matter were pressed to a vote he would oppose the application. Although several members expressed their willingness to agree to a postponement, they said they could not agree on Malik's grounds. It seemed to me that there was no harm in pressing the matter to a vote despite the expected Russian

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the application of Israel for membership in the United Nations would be brought before the Security Council, probably the following day. The United States would support the application; the United Kingdom would oppose it.

It was proposed that the Canadian Representative adopt the attitude that as yet the government had not felt that circumstances warranted Canadian recognition of the provisional government; for the present, therefore, Canada could not support the application.

It was probable that the matter would be referred to the General Assembly.

4. Mr. St. Laurent added that an important consideration was that of the timing of recognition. The U.K. government would attempt to defer such action until the prospects of serious Arab reaction were the least. Before the United Kingdom recognized Israel we would be informed and we would be kept in touch with U.K. intentions.

UNITED NATIONS; APPLICATION OF ISRAEL

15. The Minister of National Defence, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, reported that Israel had now applied for membership in the United Nations and had requested Canadian support. The vote would likely take place in the Security Council the following day. It would, therefore, be necessary to send some message to Mr. Pearson immediately.

It would be recalled that, while in the Political Committee Mr. Pearson had expressed the view that the General Assembly should recognize the existence of a Jewish State, he had emphasized that what would render Israel eligible for membership was evidence that she had fully committed herself to the principles of peaceful settlement. He felt that it would be easier to deal with an application for membership if, beforehand, Israeli authorities had expressed their readiness to accept the terms of the Assembly's resolution respecting settlement and to co-operate in putting it into effect. However, the application was being submitted at once and, unless the Security Council postponed consideration until the General Assembly had acted, it would be necessary for the Canadian representative to state the government's view.

16. Mr. Claxton submitted and read a draft telegram to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concurring in the view that acceptance by Israel of the terms and procedures of settlement recommended by the Assembly and a pledge to implement them were desirable evidence that the government of Israel was eligible for membership.

The draft message went on to suggest that Mr. Pearson suggest postponement of decision by the Security Council upon the Israeli application and that, if the matter were pressed to a vote, he might abstain.

(External Affairs memoranda to the Acting Minister, Nov. 30 and Dec. 1, 1948, and attached telegrams).†

17. The Prime Minister suggested that it might be advisable to add to the message a paragraph indicating that the Cabinet understood that the Secretary of State for External Affairs might feel, as the situation developed, that he should take a somewhat different position. It would be well to leave final action to Mr. Pearson's discretion in the light of the known views of his colleagues.

18. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and approved the despatch to Mr. Pearson of the draft message submitted with the addition of a paragraph along the lines suggested by Mr. St. Laurent.

ADMISSION OF ISRAEL TO THE UNITED NATIONS

The vote on Israel's application in the Security Council has now been postponed until Friday, at the request of France.

2. In the meantime, two messages have been received this morning on the subject. One is from Mr. Pearson, repeating a message which he sent to Riddell stating that in the absence of a message from Ottawa, Riddell should take the line agreed to in a telephone conversation between Mr. Pearson and Riddell last night, namely, to vote for the admission of Israel.

3. A message has also been received from Riddell explaining the reason why, in the view of Mr. Pearson, the application of Israel should be supported in the Security Council. He states that Mr. Pearson found the attitude of the Israeli authorities, during the latter part of the Assembly debate, helpful and cooperative, and that following the adoption of the Assembly resolution last Saturday, December 11, Israeli authorities indicated their willingness to co-operate generally in securing a settlement. This attitude was more satisfactory than that of the Arab states, who insisted on many changes in the resolution of the Assembly in order to make it satisfactory to them, and then did not abstain in the vote, as the Canadian Delegation had been led to expect that they might. Therefore, Mr. Pearson believes that the Canadian Representative should now support the application of Israel in the Security Council.

4. As to the attitude of the French Delegation, Mr. Riddell reports that their intention is still not clear, and that they will leave their decision as to how they will vote on the application until the last minute.

5. I have prepared a telegram, copy of which is attached,† in the light of the information received today, and also in the light of the views expressed by the Prime Minister and yourself last night.

UNITED NATIONS; PALESTINE; RECOGNITION OF ISRAEL

12. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported at some length on the proceedings in the Political Committee and in the Assembly, leading to the adoption of the Resolution for setting up the Conciliation Commission for Palestine.

In these discussions it would be recalled that he had expressed the view that the United Nations should recognize the fact of the existence of a State of Israel.

13. Mr. Pearson then referred to the proceedings in the Security Council on Israel's application of membership in the United Nations. In the event Canada had abstained on the final vote and the application had not succeeded.

After leaving Paris, he had learned from the U.K. Foreign Secretary that the United Kingdom were apprehensive lest acceptance of Israel into the United Nations should prejudice current negotiations with King Abdullah concerning the outcome of which they were otherwise hopeful.

With this consideration in mind and upon the Soviet contention that approval of the Israel application would fix the boundaries of the Jewish State on the basis of the Assembly's Resolution, the Canadian Representative at the Council had been instructed to abstain.

14. Mr. Pearson went on to say that, while Israel had not qualified as a member of the United Nations, there was a strong case for immediate de facto recognition of its existence as a State. Such recognition by Canada might, in fact, help in the negotiations to be conducted through the United Nations Commission.

If the government were disposed to approve such de facto recognition, other Commonwealth governments would be notified by telegram; a few days later a note would be addressed to the Provisional Government of Israel, a press release issued simultaneously and all Canadian missions and consulates abroad notified to that effect. A draft note for this purpose to the Provisional Government of Israel was submitted and read.

15. Mr. Pearson added that de facto recognition of Israel would not now embarrass the U.K. government nor prejudice the United Kingdom negotiations with Trans-Jordan. In fact the U.K. government would probably take similar action before long.

No question of de jure recognition was involved, merely an acceptance of the well established fact that Israel had now satisfied the essential conditions of Statehood.

16. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the Minister's report and agreed that Canada accord de facto recognition to the State of Israel and its Provisional Government after notification to other Commonwealth governments and that, for this purpose, the course of action proposed by Mr. Pearson be approved.

My dear Mr. Under Secretary:

On my visit to you this morning I explained to you that the United States representatives in New York had been instructed very confidentially to discuss with the principal United Nations representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, France and the United Kingdom the question of Italian application for United Nations membership. For many reasons the forthcoming Italian elections on April 18 are of paramount importance and in the opinion of the Department of State it is essential that every effort be made to prevent the Communists from winning or substantially increasing their strength in these elections. Indeed, to European countries this matter may even be of more immediate importance than it is in this hemisphere. In any foreseeable future it would seem that the present time appears the most opportune to obtain a favorable recommendation on the Italian application, and should the application be approved of course the Italian people would recognize their indebtedness to the western nations. It is clear that under the immediate circumstances it would be embarrassing to the Soviets to veto the Italian application for yet another time, and indeed if they should so veto it could not but help to injure seriously the Communist chances in the forthcoming Italian elections. It is even possible that such a third veto might be a determining election factor.

I may add, as of significance in this particular matter, that the Soviets have only recently advocated continued Italian control for former Italian colonies and thereby increased the prestige of the Soviets within Italy itself.

The question may be raised as to why this matter of membership should be brought up at this time, particularly when it may be necessary that it should be preceded by Five Power discussions and consultations. However that may be, the fact remains that this is probably the most likely time to achieve approval of the Italian application, and the Department of State feels it essential that the democracies mentioned above should cooperate closely together. There is reason to believe these six countries cooperating could secure sufficient (or at least one) other favorable votes for favorable action.

Although in general its position remains unchanged, in view of the Czech developments the Department of State believes it more important than ever that such countries as Roumania and Hungary should not be admitted. The Department of State believes that with certain interim reservations as to Finland all pending applications should be re-examined.

In presenting the Italian applications before the United Nations, the Department of State feels that a reason could be advanced based on the special provision in the General Assembly's resolutions on Italian and Transjordan applications, which calls for immediate reconsideration by the Assembly in its next meeting. The argument could further be advanced that time did not permit detailed reconsideration and that pending consultation by the Big Five countries the matter had been delayed. Therefore, the Security Council had failed to give due weight to the urgent character of this special provision in the General Assembly's resolutions and this matter should be remedied without delay.

It would be most helpful in the Department of State's deliberations to know, with the least possible delay, whether the Government of Canada would be prepared to accept these arguments in favor of raising forthwith the Italian application to United Nations membership? Also, in determining future policy in a firm opposition to the satellite country applications other than Finland, what the position of the Canadian Government might be? In regards Finland in particular, what is the present thought of the Canadian Government?

The question of timing is essential since if any action by the democratic countries is to be effective in Italy it must be immediate and the Security Council itself should act not later than the last week in March.

I should be grateful for an opportunity to further discuss these views at an early moment.

Sincerely yours,
RAY ATHERTON

[Ottawa], March 17, 1948

Dear Ray [Atherton],

I enclose a reply to your letter of March 15 about the admission of Italy to the United Nations.

2. An idea has occurred to me about a possible follow-up to a Soviet veto of Italy's application for membership. Might it not be possible for one of the members of the Security Council which has supported Italy's admission to state in the Council, after a Soviet veto, that it intends to propose at the next session of the General Assembly that the Assembly give to Italy all the rights and privileges of membership in the Assembly except the right to vote?

3. I have not discussed this matter with Russ [E.R.] Hopkins but I think that such a proposal would be constitutional. The Assembly is, under the Charter, master of its own procedure. It has already extended to an unofficial body, the Jewish Agency, the right to participate in its discussions. This it did with the support of the Soviet Union. If the Assembly can permit an unofficial body to participate in its discussions, it would seem to be reasonable to conclude that it could permit a non-member state to participate in its discussions. A non-member state could not, of course, be called a member of the Assembly. It might, however, be called an associate member.

4. A decision by the Assembly to admit Italy as an associate member of the Assembly would, of course, require a two-thirds vote since it is an important question, but I should think that it might well be possible to secure such a vote.

5. The admission of Italy as an associate member would, of course, establish a precedent and it would be difficult for the Assembly to refuse to seat as associate members other states whose applications for membership had been supported by two-thirds of the Assembly but whose applications had been vetoed by the Security Council. I do not see, however, much danger in the creation of this precedent. It would, for example, enable the Assembly to admit Ireland as an associate member.

6. Consequently, I am passing this purely personal suggestion on to you for what it is worth so that your people in the State Department might give it consideration.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

My dear Mr. Ambassador,

On March 15 you wrote me about the Italian application for membership in the United Nations and about the attitude of Canada to the admission of a number of other countries.

I am glad to inform you that the Canadian Government agrees with the United States Government that it would be desirable to raise with the least possible delay in the Security Council the question of the admission of Italy to the United Nations. The Canadian representative will support the admission of Italy.<sup>7</sup>

So far as other outstanding applications are concerned, the Canadian Government would not support applications for membership at this time from any countries other than Italy or Transjordan, though we may be willing to give Finland's application favourable consideration in a few weeks' time, depending on how the current negotiation between Finland and the Soviet Union develops.

FOR THE GUIDANCE OF THE CANADIAN PERMANENT DELEGATE TO THE UNITED

Canada has now taken its place on the Security Council. Our election to this position of responsibility and importance has involved us in discussions and decisions in which we might not otherwise have had to take part. Our national and international responsibilities have in this sense been extended. At the same time, we have been given increased opportunities to influence the course of international developments without necessarily associating ourselves with the leadership or direction of these developments. In using such influence in support of policies which will contribute to the maintenance of peace and establishment of collective security, we shall certainly be acting in the positive interests of Canada. Two wars have demonstrated beyond doubt that we cannot escape the consequences of deteriorating relations and disputes between the Great Powers which lead to war. Isolation from such consequences is now even less possible than previously, since there is evidence of a developing cleavage between western democracy and Russian communist despotism. If this division were to deteriorate to the point of armed conflict between the U.S.S.R. on the one hand and the United Kingdom and the United States of America on the other, it is clear that it would be impossible for Canada to remain neutral and that positive participation by Canada on the side of the Great Democracies would be expected. It also seems clear that the political circumstances and the conflict of ideas provoking any such war would not lead any substantial part of the Canadian people to oppose active participation in it. Indeed participation would probably be taken for granted by the great majority of the population of Canada.

2. The Canadian representative on the Security Council, therefore, should do everything he can to halt the deterioration in relations between the Great Powers, or failing that, to ensure that any conflict will be waged collectively and with an overwhelming superiority of power on the side of the western democracies. In following this principle, he will be concerning himself directly with the interest which Canada has in peace and security.

3. Canada will be expected to play an effective, indeed an important, part in the proceedings of the Security Council and it will not be easy to avoid doing so even if there are occasions when it may seem desirable to remain silent. The Government may, at times, find itself in the position where the Canadian vote will be decisive in determining solutions to problems which may seem to be remote from Canada's interests. Although this remoteness is illusory and any situation which affects the peace of the world is of direct interest to Canada, this does not alter the fact that during the next two years Canada will have to declare its position openly and publicly on many matters which, previously, might not have come to the attention of the Government at all, or might have been dealt with confidentially through diplomatic channels.

4. Canada's membership on the Security Council is so important, therefore, that it seems essential to review our relationship to the United Nations, and more particularly our relationship to the United Kingdom and United States in respect of Security Council matters.

5. The position of a power of the middle rank on the Security Council is, under any circumstances, a difficult one. A small power is in a sense by its very smallness relieved from much of the responsibility which participation in decisions involves. Syria, for instance, is not likely to be asked to send forces or to spend its resources in implementing a Security Council decision. At the other extreme, the Great Powers can protect their positions with the veto. A country such as Canada, however, is in a difficult position. Its economic strength and political influence are of importance and the prestige of Canada in the United Nations is high. The material and moral contribution which Canada can make to collective action, as the late war has shown, is significant. The judgments which the Canadian representative makes on United Nations matters must therefore be made with care and a sense of responsibility, especially since Canada is a country the views of which are taken seriously because it has the reputation of conscientiously carrying out the commitments into which it has entered.

6. Canada's position on the Security Council, as a middle power, would be an important one in any circumstances. The special nature of our relationship to the United States and the United Kingdom complicates our responsibilities, though it also enlarges our opportunities for influencing developments. Canada will be expected, by some, to follow the lead of the United Kingdom; by others to follow the lead of the United States. The fact that these two states are now in general agreement on fundamental questions eases but does not remove our particular difficulties. Unfriendly observers will write us off as a satellite of both, hoping in this way to minimize the effect of our independent action. More objective observers will tend to assume that it will be hard for Canada to follow a policy of its own. The fact that Canadian interests will often naturally be identical with those of the United States and the United Kingdom without any suggestion or influence from these states, in a sense makes Canada's position more difficult. It will not be easy to secure credit for independence of argument and decision. The fact that if we do depart from the United States or United Kingdom policy on any Security Council matter, we may have to associate ourselves with the Soviet Union and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, will make a departure of this nature less easy and pressure from our friends more difficult to withstand.

7. Insistent demands that Canada associate itself completely with the policies of a major power will probably come more frequently from the United States than the United Kingdom. The United States delegation, may, unfortunately, take it for granted that Canada will range itself almost automatically on its side. The United States already tends to consider Canada its strong and invariable supporter. Canada is nearly always the first choice of the United States among foreign countries for election to United Nations posts to which importance is attached. This is, in part, a tribute to our record in the United Nations. It is due, however, also to the feeling which the United States delegations have that they can "count on Canada", that our reaction to events is usually the same as theirs, that they can talk frankly with us and thereby no doubt influence us, and that we are in effect one of themselves.

8. That the Canadian Delegation on the Security Council may count upon the confidence of the United States representatives, is in some respects a reason for satisfaction. However, while consultation and mutually cordial relations are desirable between the Canadian Representative on the Security Council and his U.S. colleague, the Canadian Representative should generally seek to establish and maintain a position of independence on the Council, and to avoid a situation where the Canadian Delegation would merely reflect the position of another state. It is all the more important to maintain a position of independence at the present time when a division between East and West will present itself in almost every issue which will come before the Council. The U.S. Government, through its Economic Recovery Programme and other measures, has embarked upon an effort to restrain Soviet expansionist tendencies. In many respects the political and security interests of the United States are shared by Canada, but it does not follow that the U.S. representative on the Council should expect support from Canada for every initiative which he may undertake. There have been occasions in the past when United States policy in the United Nations has shown a lack of certainty both in intent and application, and also an inclination to pursue rather narrow national interests. Unfortunately, the alternative to supporting United States proposals, the wisdom of which may not always be apparent, is to oppose them in a manner which may be interpreted as giving support to the Soviet Union. The only other course, however, is abstention, and that is scarcely a satisfactory solution to the dilemma.

9. The hard fact is that most of the difficult political questions which will come before the Security Council during our two years of membership will cause controversy between the United States and the Soviet Union. These questions will necessarily have to be judged not only on their merits but also with reference to the way in which the present distribution of power in the world will be affected by a decision one way or the other. It would seem clear that during the immediate future the maintenance of peace will depend on the ability of the Western world to create and preserve an overwhelming preponderance of force—military force, economic force, moral force, the force that comes from the willingness of states with common interests to take common action and the force that comes from a united and informed public opinion. It will then be necessary at all times for the power that comes from the existence of this force under any leadership to be used with great restraint and moderation.

10. It is therefore essential to keep constantly in mind the necessity of creating and preserving this overwhelming preponderance of force directed to the peaceful progress of the world. It is almost equally essential to remember that its creation and preservation cannot safely be based on wrong policies or provocative tactics. It will not be strengthened or demonstrated by toughness or rudeness, nor by the use of abusive or threatening language. Our dislike of the principles upon which the government of the Soviet Union is organized and the policies it follows should not lead us into a desire to defeat the Soviet delegation on every issue merely for the sake of defeating them; nor into treating Soviet diplomatic representatives at the United Nations differently from the way in which we treat the representatives of any other country.

11. There is also some danger that the United States may forget that in diplomacy no doors should ever be locked, no negative should ever be taken as final, no negotiations should ever be completely broken off. United States representatives at the United Nations are sometimes too anxious to clear the air, to get representatives to stand up and be counted, when it may be that the very thing to avoid is a premature hardening of position.

12. United States representatives at the United Nations meetings also occasionally succumb to the temptation to lose their patience, and to adopt attitudes which are more aggressive than the policies which their government will eventually adopt. We should, therefore, not give support to intemperate action proposed by the United States against the Soviet Union. We should particularly guard against supporting the United States on procedural questions when the United States is in the wrong and the Soviet Union is in the Right.

13. The prestige of the Security Council and of the United Nations generally, will suffer greatly if the action of the members of the Security Council serve to justify Soviet charges that the United States can always rally a mechanical majority in favour of its proposals regardless of the merits of the issues. It is in the long-run interests of the United Nations, as well as of Canada, and indeed of the United States itself, that our country should make clear its independence of the United States and of any other power on the Security Council. Our support or our opposition will mean little if we accept the position of a complaisant satellite.

14. The difficulties of our position in relation to the United States give added significance to our association with the other nations of the British Commonwealth. The practice of informal consultation, arising from mutual confidence and a recognition of common interest, provides Commonwealth Delegations in international organizations with an advantage which should be fully utilized. The Delegation should maintain and strengthen its contacts with other Commonwealth Delegations. Consultation should, however, be maintained on an informal basis, and it should not be allowed to appear that Commonwealth states regularly concert their policies in advance.

15. These considerations are important. They do not, however, destroy the validity of the general principle which should govern our policy on the Security Council, namely that on fundamental questions which may involve peace and war, we cannot afford to be on the opposite [side] from the United States and the United Kingdom when they are in agreement. All the more important is it, therefore, that these two Powers should not only be in the right on the big issues but should not put us in the position of having to oppose them on less important ones in which we believe them to be wrong. This means that the closest possible contact must be maintained with the United Kingdom and United States members of the Security Council with a view to reconciling divergent views before matters are debated openly at the Council table. It is often in these conversations that Canada may influence the trend of events for good.

16. The seriousness with which the Delegation must necessarily regard its duties on the Security Council should not, on the other hand, lead it to over-estimate the responsibilities which it is proper for the Security Council to accept. A tendency is already apparent for certain states to regard the United Nations as little more than an instrument for the attainment of narrow national objectives. These States raise in the Security Council problems in their relations with other States which they have not been able to solve to their own satisfaction, and hope that by doing so they will gain the sanction of international support for their particular objectives. The Delegation should avoid being used itself for such purposes and it should, as far as possible, prevent the Security Council from being so used.

17. It may be concluded from the Charter that before a subject is given consideration by the Security Council, the Council should satisfy itself that the question is one which does in fact endanger international peace, and that the parties concerned have themselves exhausted all peaceful means for the settlement of the dispute before placing it on the Agenda. The application of this principle will in many cases prevent the irresponsible use of the Security Council either for the purpose of making propaganda, or for the purpose of securing support for the national policies of one state or another. It will also prevent the Security Council from being led into the discussion of minor questions which properly should not appear on its Agenda at all.

18. The Delegation should also keep in mind the danger that the Security Council may be asked to accept commitments which it cannot fulfil. In the absence of military agreements under Article 43 of the Charter, or alternative arrangements for similar purposes, the Security Council is not in a position to enforce its decisions, or to give military support to commissions or other agencies which it may appoint. At the moment, its deliberations and judgments have only such weight as may be derived from their influence on world opinion or may result from the fact that its suggestions commend themselves on their merits to the parties to a dispute or situation. Responsibilities should not therefore, be accepted by the Council unless there is strong evidence that they can be met. Committees and Commissions should not be set up to arbitrate in disturbed areas or to accept this administrative responsibility, unless it is clear that agencies of this nature will be in a position to function effectively, and that their activities will be adequately supported by those States which at the moment exercise a preponderance of force in the world.

19. There is also a tendency for the Great Powers, especially the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, to expect the smaller powers on the Security Council to accept responsibilities which they themselves are anxious to avoid. The reason given for this is often that the Great Powers are themselves too directly concerned in the dispute under consideration, or that it is impossible to give responsibility to one of them without sharing it amongst all. This is a tendency which should be consistently opposed. If the Great Powers, because of differences between them, are unable or unwilling to perform their duties as members of the Security Council, they should not expect their less powerful associates on that body to take up functions which they find irksome or embarrassing or dangerous. In theory, every member of the Security Council should act in the interest of the whole United Nations. If, in practice, it is impossible for the members of the Security Council to detach themselves from their national interest sufficiently, even to attempt to fulfil their responsibilities with this objective and impartial attitude, it is doubtful if the Council can go far towards the solution of major problems. In any event, the smaller powers should not regularly be placed in the position of having to play a role which the permanent members are unwilling themselves to play.

20. One method by which the general acceptance of responsibility by members of the Council might be increased is through greater use of procedures for the private and informal discussion of questions on the agenda. In the past, the Security Council has all too often engaged in an angry and unproductive public debate which decreased rather than strengthened the chances of peaceful settlement of the dispute in question. If possible, the Security Council should avoid bringing judgment to bear on any of the parties to a situation or dispute. It should concentrate on devising means to remove the immediate threat to the peace, or to stop the conflict if it has already arisen. It should throw back on the parties themselves, as much as possible, the responsibility for settling their differences. It should avoid, if possible, undertaking judicial functions of a court. For these purposes a private discussion of the question under consideration in small groups, which shall, if possible, include the parties themselves, may often prove a useful procedure.

21. The urgency and complexity of the questions which are before the Security Council will require the constant attention of the Government. The Delegate to the Security Council should not hesitate to appeal for advice and instructions, and he should seek to draw the attention of the Government to the positions he may have to take as far in advance as possible. In a matter which so affects the interests of Canada and the relations of this country with the world at large, close and constant relations should be maintained between the delegation and the government.

22. When issues of importance arise which involve commitments on the part of the Government, it is essential that the Canadian representative should secure specific instructions from the Government before participating in a decision. If time does not permit obtaining such instructions before a vote is taken, the Canadian representative should in such circumstances abstain. He should explain that his reason for such abstention is that time has not permitted him to receive instructions from his Government on the matter.

23. The instructions in this memorandum will not meet and are not intended to meet all the circumstances and issues which might arise. Matters not covered by them can be dealt with by additional instructions as they develop.

THIRD SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS, PARIS, SEPTEMBER 21, 1948

(A copy of the provisional agenda for the Third Session of the General Assembly is attached to this Memorandum.† Where reference is made to an item on this agenda, the number of the agenda item has been indicated in brackets in the Memorandum.)

In present circumstances, the United Nations is unable to fulfil the principal purposes for which it was established in 1945. Even while the Charter was being drafted, evidence accumulated that the U.S.S.R. intended to follow an independent and aggressive policy in post-war international affairs. This development has now reached the point where progress is impossible in any political undertaking which depends for its success upon the co-operation of the government of the Soviet Union or of any state under the influence of that government. None of these states has shown itself prepared to enter upon the process of adjustment and compromise without which a system of collective security cannot be built.

2. This situation will necessarily limit the accomplishments of the Third Session of the General Assembly which meets in Paris on September 21, and the policy of the Canadian Delegation should be defined accordingly. In general the Delegation should give expression to the following points:

(a) The Canadian Government intends to fulfil its obligations under the Charter and is willing, in company with other members of the United Nations, to enter into agreements and commitments for the progressive establishment of a system of collective security. Responsibility for the existing stalemate must rest with those states which refuse to adjust their position in any degree to meet the wishes of the majority, or even to consider compromises or accommodations by which negotiation might be continued.

(b) In the absence of provisions for collective security within the United Nations, member States may be expected to seek arrangements elsewhere for their mutual defense. Considerations of this kind account for the interest which the Canadian Government has shown in proposals for a North Atlantic security agreement, and the support which it is prepared to give such an agreement. Arrangements of this character are not contrary to the Charter, nor do they prevent the achievement of security within a wider framework. The Canadian Government is ready to consider proposals for a wider agreement at any time.

(c) The Canadian Government continues to regard the United Nations as the best available instrument [at present] for the development of a system of international co-operation and, eventually, of collective security on a basis of universal participation. In certain fields, outside the area of direct conflict between the Eastern European and the western democratic groups within the United Nations, the organization has already shown itself capable of effective action to postpone the outbreak or limit the scope of hostilities. The Canadian Government will do nothing to weaken the United Nations, nor will it force any issue, unless a vital question of principle is involved, to the point where the unity of the organization is destroyed [impaired]. In other words, the Canadian Government considers that the United Nations should be supported now in the performance of as many of its functions as present circumstances will permit, that it should not be given tasks which are beyond its present resources, and that nothing should be done which will prevent it, under better auspices, from fulfilling the wider purposes for which it was designed.

Selection of Officers and Elections to Councils

3. In the selection of officers for the Assembly and its committees, the Delegation should use its influence, in preliminary consultations with other Delegations and in casting its vote, to secure the choice of competent and experienced persons. The less competent the officers are the longer will the session of the Assembly last and the less fruitful it will be. In particular, the selection of a President of the Assembly and of the chairmen of Committee I (Political Committee) and Committee V (Administrative and Budgetary Committee) should be made with particular care.

4. In the choice of members for Councils of the United Nations the Delegation should seek to secure as full an observation as possible of the functional principle that states should be chosen for membership on Councils on the basis of their ability to accept the responsibilities which are given to them and to contribute to the work of the United Nations. In elections to the Security Council, a Latin-American State will presumably be elected to replace Colombia, and the Delegation, in consultation with other Delegations, should support the selection of a responsible member of the Latin-American group. Mexico or Brazil would probably best fulfil the requirements which the Canadian Government regards as essential. The Delegation should use its influence to make certain that a Western European State replaces Belgium on the Security Council. An effort may be made to give the Belgian seat to an Asiatic State, thus leaving the smaller states of Western Europe without a representative on the Council. This should be avoided if possible, and the Delegation should be prepared to support any Western European State upon which agreement can be reached. India has indicated its desire to be elected to the Security Council, and may seek the seat which is being vacated by Syria. The Delegation should be prepared to support India but, if India withdraws or her candidature is not successful, the Delegation should then be prepared to support a state from the Eastern Mediterranean, possibly Turkey.

5. In the elections to the Economic and Social Council, the Delegation should seek to maintain the same principles which it has applied in elections to the Security Council. Canada will itself be retiring from the Economic and Social Council this year and the suggestion may be made that Canada stand for re-election. In view of its insistence that states which are capable of accepting responsibility be chosen as members of councils, the Canadian Government could not well refuse to accept re-election to the Economic and Social Council. The Delegation should not, however, seek re-election for Canada, nor encourage those who may propose Canada for a new term. If India fails to be elected to the Security Council, and seeks membership on the Economic and Social Council, the Delegation might then consider suggesting to any states which intended to vote for Canada for this Council, that they transfer their votes to India, indicating that the economic and social position of India warrants the election of that State, and that in the circumstances Canada would prefer to withdraw from the Council for the time being.

Atomic Energy, Disarmament and the Military Staff Committee

6. The most important and difficult discussions of the General Assembly will probably be those which relate to the international control of atomic energy, (item 20) disarmament, and the report of the Military Staff Committee. In the discussion of these questions, care should be taken to make clear that in overview the Reports of the Atomic Energy Commission embody a workable plan for the control and development of atomic energy. This plan, or some modification of it, might at once be put in practice except for the intransigence of a minority of members of the United Nations which insists on a basically different approach. In regard to disarmament, plans have not been developed in detail, but similar differences of approach have already become apparent, and little will be gained by continuing the discussions in present circumstances. The discussions of the Military Staff Committee, which have been concerned with arrangements for the provision of an international force, have also proved ineffective, and the Canadian Government is particularly concerned because this first step towards security through collective action has not been taken. In expressing its disappointment over the stalemate which has occurred in regard to these subjects, and in indicating where the responsibility lies, the Delegation should also make known the willingness of the Canadian Government to participate in renewed discussions wherever it seems possible that further progress may be made.

Constitutional Questions

7. It is not the policy of the Canadian Government to advocate at the present time the formal amendment of the Charter of the United Nations, in spite of the inadequacies which have become apparent in the constitution of that organization, unless all five Great Powers are prepared to ratify the amendment. The Delegation should not, therefore, support measures such as the Argentine proposal for a revisionary conference (item 17b), for an increase in the membership of the Security Council to 24 (item 48), or for the election by the Assembly of new members to the United Nations in spite of the failure of the Security Council to concur (item 14c). The Delegation should, however, make clear the opinion of the Canadian Government that the privileges given by the Charter to the permanent members of the Security Council are being used, notably by the U.S.S.R., in a manner which makes the proper functioning of the organization impossible. It should also support any proposals for the development of procedures or the acceptance of conventions by which these difficulties may be removed. The report of the Interim Committee on voting procedure in the Security Council contains many useful proposals and provides a new interpretation of the veto to supplement that given by the Four Powers at the San Francisco Conference. (item 17a). These proposals cannot now be embodied in a constitutional amendment, but the Delegation should give its support to any proposals or any suggestions for the adoption, either by agreement amongst the permanent members of the Security Council, or through the gradual establishment of precedents based on the report of the Interim Committee, of the reforms which have been proposed. In regard to an Indian resolution concerning the distribution of seats on the Security Council on a basis of equitable geographical distribution, (item 46), the Delegation should make certain that in any resolution affecting this subject, the provision of the Charter should be included which states that consideration shall be given "in the first instance to the contribution of members of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization." It should be kept in mind, however, that the Indian resolution on this subject reflects the opinion of governments of states in the South-west Pacific and South Asia that they are not adequately represented on the Security Council. The Delegation should be prepared, therefore, to consider any proposal which, by agreement amongst the permanent members of the Security Council, would lead to the adoption of an amendment to the Charter adding a seventh non-permanent member to the Security Council, and increasing the total membership to 12.

Political Questions

8. Greece, Korea, Palestine and Spain will all be subject to discussion in the General Assembly. In regard to Greece, (item 15), the Delegation should support any responsible proposal to continue the functions of the Balkan Commission, which has already proven its value, and to enlist the support of the states which in the past year have refused to co-operate in its work. The report of the Korean Commission (item 16a) should be supported, and encouragement should be given to the government which has now taken office in southern Korea. Nothing should be done, however, which implies that sovereignty in Korea has been transferred to this government by the United Nations, or that the United Nations has any special responsibility for its welfare, or for its political or territorial integrity. If recognition is sought for the Communist government of north Korea it should be pointed out that, since no one representing the United Nations was permitted to observe the election by which this regime was chosen, the United Nations is not in a position to know whether or not it represents the wishes of any of the people of Korea. Support should be given to any proposals by which the activities of the Korean Commission may be terminated or turned over to some other agency at an early date.

9. It is hoped that the discussion of both Palestine and Spain during the General Assembly will be brief. The settlement in Palestine is now on the agenda of the Security Council, and a process of mediation, begun by the Assembly at its last special session, is taking place. There should be no occasion, therefore, for a general discussion of the political settlement in Palestine, which could only create difficulties for the Mediator. Efforts will no doubt be made to provoke a general debate on Spain (Supplementary item 10). There would seem to be little advantage in present circumstances in trying to alter or re-affirm the Assembly resolution on Spain, and the subject should therefore be cleared from the agenda as quickly as possible.

Financial Questions

10. The Delegation should, as in previous years, encourage the efficient and economical administration of the United Nations (item 35). It should scrutinize the budget and seek to limit expenditure as much as possible. It should oppose the adoption of proposals which will needlessly increase the costs of operation.

11. In any general consideration of the scale of contributions to the budget of the United Nations, the Delegation should try to secure a reconsideration of the allocations of those states which, due to immediate post-war dislocation, were assessed relatively low contributions. It should insist that compensation for any reduction which takes place in the assessment of the United States should be made by increasing the allocation of those states to which special consideration was given when the scale of contributions was prepared. It should oppose any scale of assessments under which the per capita contribution of Canada would be higher than the per capita contribution of the United States, and it should oppose any increase in Canada's contribution.

Economic and Social Questions

12. The policy of the Canadian Delegation to the Economic and Social Council will, in most instances, indicate the policy which the delegation to the Assembly should follow. The Delegation should give general support to the draft declaration of Human Rights (supplementary item 13) and the draft conventions on Freedom of Information (item 26), but it should seek to avoid the adoption of proposals which have not been given adequate consideration, particularly from a legal point of view. On matters as difficult and important as these it might be wise for the Assembly to adopt the I.L.O. technique of a first reading at this session and a second reading at the 1949 session.

13. As the Assembly proceeds, questions will arise in regard both to subjects which have been mentioned in this Memorandum and to others which are on the agenda, concerning which the Delegation will require guidance. Frequent communication should be maintained with Ottawa, and, whenever possible, the Government should be acquainted with all important proposals which are placed before the Assembly and with the action which the Delegation proposes to take in regard to these proposals.

UN ASSEMBLY; INSTRUCTIONS FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION

27. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted and read a memorandum prepared for the guidance of the Canadian delegation at the Third Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, to begin in Paris on September 21st.

After stating the general attitude of Canada in support of the United Nations as an instrument for the development of a system of international co-operation, the memorandum went on to suggest the lines which the delegation should follow concerning the selection of officers, atomic energy, disarmament and the military staff committee and the constitutional, political, financial and economic and social questions, with which the Assembly would have to deal.

As the meetings went on questions other than those mentioned in the memorandum would arise. Upon such the delegation would require further guidance and frequent communication should be maintained with Ottawa so that the government would be acquainted with all important proposals and with the action which the delegation proposed to take thereon.

Copies of the memorandum were circulated, together with copies of the Provisional Assembly agenda.

28. The Prime Minister raised the question of the line which should be taken concerning the Soviet Union in his opening statement at the Assembly.

There were two possibilities — the first an unqualified attack upon Soviet policies and tactics, the second, a statement which would not exclude eventual change in the Soviet attitude.

29. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(1) approved the memorandum submitted as indicating the attitude to be adopted by the delegation subject to:

(a) amendment of paragraph 5 by the deletion of the third sentence therein, it being considered that Canada should not stand for re-election to the Economic and Social Council;

(b) amendment of paragraph 10 by the deletion of the last sentence therein; and,

(c) other minor amendments;

(2) agreed that the Prime Minister's opening statement to the Assembly should be so drafted as not to exclude the possibility of an improvement in the relations between the Soviet Union and the Western Powers.

Ottawa, March 13, 1948

The attached memorandum on the problem of voting in the Security Council is the one referred to in the draft Canadian statement to the Interim Committee which you approved on Friday, March 12. It contains a more detailed development of the proposals given in summary form in that statement. The memorandum is, with the exception of several deletions, the same as the one submitted to the First Committee of the General Assembly in November 1946.<sup>9</sup>

Such proposals in final form are supposed to be submitted on March 15 to the Interim Committee. They will then presumably be considered by a Sub-Committee set up for that purpose.

I am taking a copy with me to New York and, if you approve, I shall submit it as the Canadian proposal.<sup>10</sup> If we are members of the Sub-Committee then we shall be able, of course, to develop our ideas about other proposals at greater length.

THE PROBLEM OF VOTING IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL
 (SUBMITTED TO THE INTERIM COMMITTEE MARCH 15, 1948)

By Article 24 of the Charter, the Members of the United Nations have conferred on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and have agreed that, in carrying out this responsibility, the Security Council acts on their behalf. The Security Council is moreover required by Article 24 to act in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations. The Charter has thus imposed on each individual member of the Security Council, permanent and non-permanent, the obligation to exercise its rights and responsibilities as a member of the Council not in defence of its own special national interests but in defence of the interests of the United Nations as a whole. This applies to the votes which a member casts in the Security Council as well as to its other actions in the Council.

The Canadian delegation therefore submits for the consideration of the Interim Committee the following proposals for procedure in the Security Council:

(1) All the Members of the United Nations have under Article 33 of the Charter undertaken that, if they are parties to any dispute the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, they will first of all seek a solution by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice. The spirit of this undertaking applies to situations which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute. Therefore, the rules of procedure of the Security Council should provide that, when a state brings a dispute or a situation to the attention of the Security Council, it should submit in writing a preliminary statement setting forth the steps which have been taken by the states concerned to carry out their obligation under the Charter to seek a solution by peaceful means of their own choice before coming to the Security Council.

(2) The Security Council ought not to be asked to consider frivolous complaints or complaints which do not appear to be brought in the bona fide belief that they involve disputes or situations likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. Therefore, the rules of the Security Council should provide that a state which brings a dispute to the attention of the Security Council should submit in writing a preliminary statement showing in what manner the continuance of the dispute is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. Similarly, a state which brings a situation to the attention of the Security Council should submit in writing a preliminary statement showing in what manner the continuance of the situation might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute.

(3) Apart from the special jurisdiction which may be conferred on it under Article 38 by all the parties to any dispute, the Security Council's jurisdiction is restricted to international disputes and situations which are likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. The preliminary question to be settled therefore when a dispute or a situation is brought to the attention of the Security Council is whether the Council has jurisdiction to deal with the matter, that is to say whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. Therefore, the Security Council should work out agreed procedures to ensure that the early stages of the consideration of a dispute or situation by the Security Council are directed towards settling the preliminary question whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security. It may be necessary for the Council in these early stages to discuss the facts of the case and the claims and the counter-claims, but the purpose of this initial examination should be, not to arrive at a recommendation on the settlement or adjustment of the dispute or situation, but to decide the preliminary question of jurisdiction.

(4) The primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security was conferred on it by the Members of the United Nations to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations. The rules and practices of the Security Council should therefore be based on a recognition of the fact that the Security Council is under an obligation to deal with disputes and situations when it has decided that they come within its jurisdiction. Every member of the Security Council is under an obligation to see that prompt and effective action is taken by the Council. These obligations of the Council as a whole and of its members individually can be discharged only if the Council without delay pursues one or more of the three courses of action set forth in the relevant provisions of the Charter (paragraph 2 of Article 24, paragraph 2 of Article 33, paragraph 1 of Article 36 and paragraph 2 of Article 37). It may pursue these courses in any order it sees fit. The three courses of action are (a) to remind the parties to a dispute of their undertaking to settle it by peaceful means of their own choice; (b) to call upon the states parties to a dispute or directly involved in a situation to adopt such particular peaceful means or methods of adjustment as the Council considers most likely to succeed; (c) to recommend terms of settlement to the parties to a dispute.

(5) Under the proviso to paragraph 3 of Article 27 of the Charter, a party to a dispute is required to abstain from voting in decisions taken under Chapter VI. This proviso would be rendered of no effect if a permanent member of the Security Council could veto a decision that a dispute exists or that it is, itself, a party to a dispute. Therefore the Security Council should work out agreed procedures to ensure that no state is judge in its own cause.

The Interim Committee of the General Assembly will meet on Wednesday, July 7, to consider the reports of its sub-committees in the general field of international conciliation and to hear a final report on the consultations of the Temporary Korean Commission with the Interim Committee which took place earlier this year. Although the final reports of the sub-committees are not all completed, it is now fairly clear what recommendations will be brought forward. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the general attitude to be adopted by the Canadian representative at the meetings of the Interim Committee.

The following reports and recommendations will be brought forward:

(a) Report of Sub-Committee 2: this sub-committee has been studying general methods of peaceful settlement of disputes by negotiation, arbitration or judicial decision and specific means by which the General Assembly could facilitate peaceful settlement; the report will recommend that a revised form of the General Act for the Pacific Settlement of Disputes, which act had originally been administered through the League of Nations, be made available for signature and ratification to Members of the United Nations; it will also advocate the use by the President of the Security Council of an ad hoc committee of conciliation operating informally in an attempt to achieve a settlement before any dispute is fully debated in Council sessions; other proposals along the same lines are being considered and will be dealt with in the final report; it would appear that the work of the sub-committee merits Canadian support, since Canadian delegates have urged on previous occasions the necessity of exhausting every possible means of peaceful settlement before any matter is debated in the Security Council or in the General Assembly;

(b) Report of Sub-Committee 3: Canada has participated in the work of this sub-committee and, on the basis of general Canadian policy in this respect and of specific instructions previously issued, has supported the conclusions reached; the report recommends that almost all decisions of the Security Council, apart from those under Chapter VII, be exempt from the veto; it also suggests that the Permanent Members of the Council should consult among themselves and that they should use the veto only in vitally important matters; other means of implementation by interpretation of the Charter are suggested; these proposals are ones which Canada, along with most other Members of the United Nations, has consistently supported;

(c) Report of Sub-Committee 4: this report will recommend the continuance of the Interim Committee for another year; the report makes some suggestions for changes in procedure and defines more carefully the supplementary role of the Interim Committee in relation to the General Assembly; since the Interim Committee this year has provided the opportunity for careful and frank discussion of long-range problems in international conciliation without heated arguments over particular political issues, it would seem that Canada should support the continuance of a subsidiary organ which should be able to relieve the General Assembly of an increasing amount of preparatory and research work;

(d) Report on Consultations with the Temporary Commission on Korea: this will be merely a factual report on the consultations which took place earlier and the Canadian representative will have only to ensure that the position we took then on the constitutional aspects of these consultations is accurately represented.

Although the details of some of the final reports will have to be considered later, I would be glad to know whether or not you agree with the general policy<sup>11</sup> of support for the work of the Interim Committee suggested above.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

[Ottawa], January 10, 1948

MISSION TO WASHINGTON ON THE KOREAN COMMISSION
JANUARY 1-6, 1948

I left Ottawa on New Year's Day—thankful to escape the round of calls—with the Prime Minister's parting advice ringing in my ears, that I was to convince both the President and the Acting Secretary of State in Washington that this was an issue on which he would not yield and that, so far as he was concerned, no Canadian would serve on any Korean Commission. Mr. King felt that if this could be made clear, Mr. Truman and Mr. Lovett would, in some way, be able to help him out of his difficulties, though I never did see how this could be done, in view of the fact that the Commission was a United Nations and not a United States agency, and was already on the point of leaving for Korea. However, the main objective at the moment seemed to be to stall for time and to prolong the issue in the hope that feelings would calm down and the crisis could be averted. If Mr. King, as a result of this delay which could now be secured, did not change his mind, there was no doubt that there would be a major Cabinet shake-up, as Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Ilsley were as determined as the Prime Minister not to give way.<sup>12</sup>

My journey got off to a very inauspicious start, as I was 8½ hours reaching New York, owing to a freight wreck north of Peekskill. So I sat in a cold, foodless and drinkless train all day, instead of keeping my appointments at the State Department and the White House. I was to have seen Mr. Lovett at 3, at which hour I was still outside New York; Mr. Truman at 6, at which hour I was on the "Congressional Limited", which I had just managed to catch by dashing across New York.

I spent the evening at the Embassy, and went over the whole business with Hume Wrong, who was completely bewildered by all the excitement, and inclined to be somewhat amused at the idea of a Cabinet crisis over Korea. However, he was not amused at the seriousness of the picture as I unfolded it to him. He told me that I would be getting a pretty cold reception from Lovett, who was fed up with our attitude as stated to him by Ray Atherton, and somewhat alarmed at its isolationist implications.

The next morning, at 10, Hume and I went to the State Department. Fortunately, it was a Saturday morning, and there were no press men around. In any event, I had decided to throw them off the track as to the purpose of my trip to Washington, by telling them that I had come down to see the President of the United States about Korea. That would have been so fantastic that they would have assumed that I was joking, and that I was really talking about dollars or fuel oil. We found Lovett flanked by an impressive array of senior officials. He was inclined to be rather stiff and formal at first, but, when I asked him for a few minutes' delay while I sent for a Third Secretary from the Embassy so that the balance in strength on the two sides could be evened, he thawed out. Fortunately, also, I knew the other State Department officials there well, so that we could conduct our conversation on a very informal basis. I had a very difficult task to perform, because the point of view which they put forward and which is stated in the attached telegram,<sup>13</sup> was an entirely understandable and reasonable one, and because they knew that I felt that way. Having put the Prime Minister's case as strongly as I could, I then went off duty and talked over with them possible ways and means of getting out of the difficulty. Lovett was particularly alarmed because our withdrawal from the Commission would be exploited, not only by the Russians, but by the isolationists in Congress. Therefore, all he really wanted was no public withdrawal to take place. He said he didn't care whether we sent a messenger boy to Korea, or whether he slipped away after a few meetings of the Commission, but that it was of vital importance that we make a formal nomination to the body. He also expressed some anxiety about the position we would be adopting on the Security Council if we were as worried about commitments as we seemed to be about the Korean one. In this connection, he wasn't any more anxious than I was. He also thought it was unnecessary for me to see the President, as the press would ask me embarrassing questions and produce embarrassing speculations. However, I said I must see Mr. Truman, as I had been instructed to do so by the Prime Minister, and that, as for publicity, if they would merely issue a statement that I had been in Washington, having come from New York, where I was attending the Interim Committee of the Assembly and wished to take advantage of the occasion to pay my 1948 respects to Mr. Truman as a former Ambassador, that might satisfy everybody. He then telephoned the White House, and they agreed to do this. They went further — they smuggled me in by the back door, so that I avoided the press correspondents. Lovett came with me to see the President, and we had an amiable and somewhat aimless conversation. Mr. Truman was, of course, not familiar with all the details of the case, and he could hardly understand the Prime Minister's attitude, though I tried my best to explain it to him. He kept saying: "Surely Canada won't let us down"; "Surely we can count on Canada". When I pointed out to him that we did not like very much being pushed into a position at the head of the procession in a country so far away as Korea, where the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. could not themselves get along, he replied: "Don't worry, you won't get into any trouble over there, and if you do, we are behind you." If I had reported that conversation to Mr. King, which was, of course, merely a casual observation, our Prime Minister would have considered that his worst fears had been realized. Mr. Truman also didn't help his cause any by emphasizing that Canada was really the most respectable member of the Commission. That was exactly what worried Mr. King, who had kept repeating for days why should Canada be pushed on to a Commission with countries like El Salvador, the Philippines, etc.

I hinted to Mr. Truman that he might telephone to Mr. King and talk the whole matter over, but he seemed disinclined to do this. He did, however, agree to Mr. Lovett's suggestion, that Mr. Truman would send Mr. King a personal letter, explaining his views and urging that Canada should remain on the Commission.

I was only with the President 15 or 20 minutes, and we ended on a friendly note, far removed from Korea and more concerned with Margaret's [Truman] voice.

We then went back to the State Department, and Lovett's officials began to draft a letter to the Prime Minister from the President. I must confess that Hume and I gave them some hints as to how this could most effectively be done.

Lovett is a first-class person and handled our discussions with great ability.

Later in the afternoon, at the Embassy, Jack Hickerson arrived with the completed draft of the President's letter, which he went over with us. I took advantage of the opportunity to urge him, once again, to try through Lovett to persuade the President to telephone Mr. King, but he seemed to think that this would not be done. He practically admitted that, as Mr. Truman didn't know very much about this business, they were afraid that Mr. King might overwhelm him on the telephone.

I left that evening for New York and spent the next morning, Sunday, drafting and sending the attached telegrams to Ottawa. Mr. King got his message at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and, as soon as he had finished his afternoon siesta, he phoned me at the Biltmore. We talked for more than half an hour — or rather he talked and I listened. He didn't think much of the State Department arguments, and said that he was more determined than ever to follow the course he had laid down. He seemed disappointed that the President had not been able to help him more, and asked me if I had told Mr. Truman that the Cabinet might split up on this issue? I said that I had not; that I did not think it was proper for a Canadian official to emphasize our political difficulties to the President of the United States. I added that I might have been able to say more if I had been having an informal chat with the President, but that, with Mr. Lovett present at a formal appointment, I could not really go further than I had. Mr. King agreed. This was a depressing telephone conversation, and made me more worried than ever about the outcome of this whole business.

Sunday afternoon I also had a talk with Trygve Lie's Executive Assistant, Andrew Cordier, to enquire what the plans were for the Korean Commission. I found that they had already left for Korea. That simplified matters in one sense, because it made impossible a meeting of the Commission at Lake Success, at which they could discuss whether, in the face of Russian opposition, they should go to Korea at all. I indicated to Cordier, and also to Trygve Lie himself, the next day, that we were having certain difficulties regarding the Canadian appointment, but that we hoped in their press statements from Lake Success they would make no reference to these difficulties or indeed to the fact that a Canadian appointment to the Commission had not been made. They promised to co-operate in this matter. I told Mr. King that I had not given any indication to Trygve Lie that the difficulties in question were political ones and, after some discussion, he agreed that this was the best course.

On Monday I attended the Interim Committee of the Assembly, a dull business, and let Korea lie. I also was busy with preparation for our first meeting of the Security Council the following day, when Canada would take her seat. The fact that the subject on the agenda was the dispute between India and Pakistan, made it likely that it would be a hot seat. I had a word with the Prime Minister about this dispute, and he emphasized that we should take no part at all, if it could be avoided. Certainly we were not to act on any Security Council Commission investigating the matter. Sir Alexander Cadogan,<sup>14</sup> on the other hand, thought that Canada should play a leading part in this business, and he hoped that we would do so. I told him that that would be impossible, because, in the first place, we were just joining the Security Council and wished to keep modestly in the background for a time, and that, secondly, in a dispute between two Dominions, it would be inappropriate for a third Dominion to intervene.

On Tuesday, while I was attending our initiation into the Security Council, I was called away to talk to the Prime Minister again on the telephone. He had received the President's letter, which in fact had been delivered to me at the Biltmore Hotel on Monday evening and which I had put on the teletype at once. The only impression it made on him was a bad one. He thought that Mr. Truman's arguments were very unimpressive, and his position remained unchanged. The crisis, therefore, remained unresolved. Mr. King said that I was to hurry back to Ottawa, as he wished to talk to me about the whole business. This sounded ominous. I left New York on Tuesday evening, and I spent a good deal of the time that night trying to analyze this queer business. There are several possible explanations for the Prime Minister's attitude:

(1) He has been so thoroughly frightened in London about the approach of war<sup>15</sup> that his mind has fallen back into its accustomed pre-1939 pattern of isolation and suspicion of commitments. In this case, it is the United States, rather than the United Kingdom, which is the villain, and trying to lure Canada into foreign adventures;

(2) He has manufactured this crisis in order to establish his supremacy over the two strong members of his Cabinet, Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Ilsley, even at the risk of their resignation, which, in fact, he may be manoeuvring. This explanation becomes only intelligible if Mr. King has picked his own successor, and it is not to be Mr. St. Laurent; or has decided to continue in office himself;

During a visit to London in November, 1947, King had been briefed by Bevin about the deterioration in East-West relations. See Volume 13, Document 569.

(3) He may be merely attempting to re-establish a position in the Cabinet which has been slipping as the day comes for his retirement, though he does not intend to carry this attitude to a point where it really will break up the Government.

I arrived back in Ottawa on Wednesday, and had barely reached my office when Mr. King telephoned. He read me his proposed reply to President Truman. It was stiff and uncompromising. It was quite clear that, if it were sent, either he or Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Ilsley would resign. I suggested to him that he might wish to have this reply considered by the Cabinet before it went, but he felt that it was a personal reply to a personal letter, and did not require Cabinet consideration. I then mentioned to him that, if this reply laid down Government policy, it would require a telegram to the United Nations, stating that we would not take up our place on the Korean Commission; that this telegram would have to be made public, and the controversy within the Cabinet would be exposed. Mr. King said he was quite willing to take the responsibility for this, and that it was up to the Department of External Affairs to send the message. I then said that, if the Secretary of State for External Affairs were to send the message, presumably he should have a look at the draft reply to Mr. Truman. Mr. King agreed to this, and said that the reply in question should be held up until Mr. St. Laurent had seen it. The letter was sent to me by hand, and I immediately took it over to Mr. St. Laurent. Mr. St. Laurent was quite calm about it, but quite firm. He said he had no objection to the telegram in question going to Trygve Lie, but it would not go over his signature because he would not be Secretary of State for External Affairs. If Mr. King persisted in this course, there was nothing for him to do but resign. He had been head of the Delegation which accepted Canada's membership on the Korean Commission, and a refusal to confirm that was a repudiation of his action and that of Mr. Ilsley. They both, therefore, would of course resign, though he, Mr. St. Laurent, would do it as quietly and non-controversially as possible, so that it would not cause any trouble to anybody.

I asked Mr. St. Laurent, before he took any action, whether he wouldn't talk to the Prime Minister, as I was certain that the Prime Minister had not really realized the position that he had reached. He was a little loath at first to take the initiative in this matter, but soon agreed to telephone Mr. King. He did so, and arranged to have dinner with Mr. King. This, I knew, would be the critical occasion which would resolve or precipitate the crisis.

We had some talk about the duty of a civil servant in a break-up of this kind. Mr. St. Laurent thought that it did not really concern me as an official. I said that I felt I should either resign or ask for an appointment abroad; that I really could not carry on in the Department when policies with which I did not agree were being laid down by the Prime Minister, against the wishes of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. St. Laurent said that he would come round to the house to see me after his dinner with the Prime Minister.

At ten o'clock the door bell rang, and I let him in. He was looking very happy, and I knew everything must have been worked out all right. What had happened was this. The Prime Minister and the Minister, in the mellow mood that a good dinner and a bright fire sometimes induces, had talked over the whole question and had agreed on a compromise, by which a Canadian member could be appointed to the Commission, though he would withdraw from its work if it became apparent that Russian co-operation was not forthcoming. In other words, our member was to have nothing to do with elections for South Korea only. This is not an unreasonable stipulation and one that can be defended. There is no doubt that the compromise represents a very definite withdrawal by the Prime Minister from his earlier position, and in that respect is a victory for Mr. St. Laurent. He has certainly established his position vis-à-vis the Prime Minister and, having established it, is now anxious to meet Mr. King as far as possible on the general question of caution and conservatism in regard to our United Nations commitments.

Mr. King phoned me the next morning to say that he was very satisfied with the way things had worked out, and that he was revising his letter to the President accordingly. The letter, as sent, is attached.† As it happens, this letter may do some good, as it will show the Americans that we are not going to be pushed around by them on Security Council matters. The more depressing implication of the business is that the Prime Minister is going to watch with suspicious attention every detail of our activity on that council, with the result that we may find ourselves filling too often the role of inglorious abstainers. However, it is only for a few months, as Mr. King seems to have made it clear in his talk with Mr. St. Laurent that he will persist in his determination to retire this summer.

With the Prime Minister's permission, I sent a telegram at once to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, appointing [G.S.] Patterson to the Commission, and drafted a telegram of instructions for him which the Prime Minister approved, and which brought this whole strange business to an end.

The aftermath will become apparent in our work on the Security Council. I am glad that it is McNaughton and not I who is to be responsible for representing Canada on that body for the next six months.

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: At 10:00 o'clock yesterday morning, accompanied by Mr. Wrong, I saw Mr. Lovett, the Under-Secretary of State, (General Marshall was away on leave) and explained to him as frankly and fully as I could your position not merely in regard to the Korean Commission itself but on certain other problems concerning Canada, the United States and the United Nations which I mentioned to you on Wednesday afternoon last, and of which the Korean difficulty is one reflection. I emphasized not only your strong feelings about the Korean Commission but also your preoccupations about these other questions. I referred, for instance, to the tendency of the United States to recommend to the United Nations proposals which to certain other Governments did not always seem wise or timely; and to the difficulties that this made for smaller countries like Canada especially when they were asked to serve on United Nations Commissions dealing with these questions and on which the Great Powers were not represented. I said that we were particularly anxious about these matters at the moment because of our approaching membership on the Security Council, a membership which might well create certain special problems for Canada because of our very close relationship both to the United States and the United Kingdom, which made it all the more necessary in our view that we maintain on the Council a position of independence. As for the Korean Commission itself, I emphasized that you did not see how its work could have any effective result and might indeed cause trouble because of the suspicious and non-cooperative attitude of Russia. I stated that we hoped that the Commission could meet at once in New York and, if it confirmed that Russian cooperation was not in fact forthcoming, might decide that its further activities in Korea itself were unnecessary and unwise.

2. Mr. Lovett then gave me the views of the State Department on the points that I had raised. He and his colleagues felt that, whereas our participation in the work of the Commission could be merely formal in character if we so desired and, as such, need command little attention, our non-participation in that work after election by the Assembly would certainly be the cause of much press comment. It would, he thought, be impossible to conceal the fact of such non-participation or to prevent misleading and possibly mischievous press speculations in both countries about its implications. Furthermore, it was their intention that the work of the Commission — in so far as they had anything to do with it because of their special position in Korea — should not be permitted to inflame the situation there. Their hope was that, on the contrary, it might ease that situation and give the Koreans at least some hope for an independent democratic and national existence.

3. On the more general question of United Nations activities, they appreciated our anxieties and hoped that collaboration between both countries, especially on the Security Council might be not only close and friendly but useful in preventing rash and precipitate action. To them United Nations Commissions were a means, not of fomenting but of preventing trouble. The reason that there was a tendency to appoint Smaller Powers only to such Commissions was the impossibility of the USA and USSR working effectively together in present circumstances. They deplored this but did not think it was their fault. There was certainly no purpose in their mind, as I had hinted there might be, to ask Canada to do more than her share in these matters or to take on responsibilities which did not belong to her.

4. As I had spoken very frankly to Mr. Lovett about your views, he spoke equally frankly to me in emphasizing how distressed they would be if Canada were not to be able to take its place on the Commission. He did not think that a meeting of the Commission at Lake Success for the purpose of ascertaining the attitude of the USSR, and, if that attitude was negative, returning the Commission's mandate to the United Nations, was practicable or desirable. For one thing, some members of the Commission had already left for Korea. For another reason, they would greatly regret it if a United Nations Committee, once appointed, abdicated its responsibilities before beginning its work merely because the USSR refused to cooperate. Furthermore, though I had stated that the appointment of this Commission was injudicious and its results almost certain to be negative, Mr. Lovett thought that we were too pessimistic in this. At this point Mr. Jacobs, political adviser to the United States General commanding in Korea and a foreign service officer of long experience in the Far East, intervened to emphasize his view that the Commission might in fact serve a useful purpose in helping to establish a democratic Government in the United States zone of Korea, at least, which area comprised more than two-thirds of the total population of the country. Finally, Mr. Lovett expressed anxiety lest a decision by Canada not to take its place in the Commission would be misinterpreted and exploited by the Soviet, whose propaganda would claim that our attitude completely justified their earlier non-cooperative position at the United Nations Assembly. The USSR would use this episode to suggest a serious division between Canada and the USA, which in its turn would be misused by isolationist and anti-Marshall Plan elements in this country. This, I think, is the aspect of the problem of our abstentions from the Korean Commission which worried the United States authorities most.

5. At 11:15 Mr. Lovett took me to see the President, who began by sending to you, through me, his warm greetings and good wishes.

6. I went over the position with Mr. Truman emphasizing that you had returned from Europe deeply anxious about the international situation which had, at least in respect of relations between the USSR and the western democracies, seriously deteriorated since the appointment of the Korean Commission. It was in the light of this deterioration that you felt that Canada could not participate in the work of a Commission which might provoke trouble between the USA and the USSR in the Far East.

7. Mr. Truman, while friendly and sympathetic, expressed his very great regret at this especially as he felt that the Commission would not provoke any of the serious consequences which we feared, but might on the contrary do a useful piece of work. He was, naturally, not as familiar with the details of the subject as the State Department people were, but he was worried as they were about the effect on the public mind here and in the USSR of our decision not to take part in the work of the Commission. Like Mr. Lovett, he felt that that decision would be exploited and misinterpreted by elements unfriendly to the U.S. Administration at home and abroad. Mr. Truman told me that he would like to send you his frank views on the matter in a personal letter and asked me if I would be good enough to deliver such a letter to you.

8. I concluded our conversation by emphasizing the very great importance you attached to this matter, and that you had only reached conclusions concerning it after the most searching consideration of all aspects of the situation.

9. I feel certain that both the President and the Under-Secretary of State now regret that we were elected to this Commission, but that they are both extremely worried about the public consequences of our inability to take part in its work. Whatever Mr. Truman may have thought last summer about Korea as a danger spot, there is no doubt that he now does not attach so much importance to it, but is preoccupied with the greater and more immediate problems of European recovery and the struggle against Communism in that part of the world.

10. The President undoubtedly hopes that in view of the possible effect on these larger problems of the misinterpretation of our abstention from the Korean Commission, we may still be willing to participate though I gave him no reason to believe that you would change your views on this matter. Both he and Mr. Lovett wondered whether it would help our position if a Canadian delegate attended only a few meetings of the Committee in Korea and played an inconspicuous part. The question arose also whether he might not even act in his personal capacity only, as Justice Rand did on the Palestine Committee, and without receiving any instructions from the Government.

11. There were one or two other matters which I raised with Mr. Lovett, particularly about Arctic developments and U.S. economic pressures against Canada, on which Mr. Wrong is telegraphing separately. Ends.

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Mr. St. Laurent from Pearson, Begins: I have sent the Prime Minister a telegram, copy of which I assume has been sent to you, about my meetings in Washington yesterday.

2. In addition to Mr. Lovett the following officials were present at the State Department: J.D. Hickerson, Director, Office of European Affairs; S. Reber, Assistant Director of the above office; Jacobs, political adviser to the United States Officer Commanding in Korea; W.W. Butterworth, Director, Office of Far Eastern Affairs; Dean Rusk, Director, Office of Special Political Affairs.

3. Mr. Lovett and I saw the President alone.

4. I'm afraid I did not get much help for the solution of our Korean difficulties from either the President or Mr. Lovett. They both expressed a perplexed surprise at our stand and a very real anxiety lest the disclosure of that stand would promote an unexpected but none the less welcome propaganda gift for the Soviet and the isolationists on this continent. I think that my explanation of the Prime Minister's worries about general United Nations developments made some impression on them, but my efforts to explain Mr. King's views on the work of the Korean Commission had, I am afraid, little effect.

5. In the circumstances, I couldn't very well press my suggestion that the President should telephone the Prime Minister. As a matter of fact, Lovett thought that it was rather a waste of time for me to see the President at all, though he was quite agreeable when I said that nevertheless I wished to keep the appointment which he had been good enough to make. He was worried, in the result unnecessarily, that the White House correspondents might get hold of me and extract embarrassing information about the purpose of my visit.

6. However, after I telephoned you yesterday, and before leaving Washington for New York I decided to pursue further the matter of a telephone call from the White House. For that purpose I saw Hickerson again, with Mr. Wrong. He is an old and close friend of both of us and I told him very frankly that I felt that it might be of real help if Mr. Truman would give Mr. King a call, if only to tell him that he had seen me and was sending, as a result, a personal letter to the Prime Minister on the matter we had discussed.

7. Hickerson said he would see Lovett and take up again the question of a telephone call.

8. I doubt however whether this will in fact take place. Both the White House and the State Department are frankly bewildered by the information I gave them and not a little irritated over our Korean situation which they don't seem to appreciate. Lovett is indeed even more worried about the more far-reaching implications of that situation.

9. I will be seeing the United Nations people today in New York but I'm afraid I will get little assistance there, as some of the Commission have already left for Korea. However, I will emphasize the importance of playing down Canada's absence as much as possible, until the situation clears up, one way or the other. Ends.

Washington, January 5, 1948

My dear Mr. King:

I appreciate very much your courtesy in sending Mr. Pearson to Washington to discuss the Korean matter with me and Mr. Lovett and Mr. Pearson's full and frank presentation of your views.

It seems to me that the Korean matter itself is of considerably less importance than some of the fundamental considerations about which you have expressed anxiety. We do not minimize the seriousness of the questions which you have raised with respect to the general world situation and the efforts of the United Nations to resolve some of the present difficulties. We also are concerned and preoccupied about these same subjects. It is precisely because of these broader questions that we are so concerned over the question of Canada's association with the Korean Commission. Naturally, our two governments must give these larger questions careful study and will have many occasions during Canada's membership on the Security Council to consult about them and to give expression to the great objectives which we share and which we have seen written into the Charter. While our two governments will probably be in agreement on most of these issues, it will be a result of full and free exercise of independent judgment by each of them.

It occurs to me that we shall be better able to deal dispassionately and constructively with these problems if we can in some way avoid the public speculation and irritation which must inevitably follow from Canada's absence from the Korean Commission to which she was elected at the recent General Assembly session. Although your participation in this Commission might have occasioned the expression of your concern to us, I believe you would agree that the real issues you have raised go much deeper.

We do not expect the work of the Korean Commission to lead to or to contribute to a clash with or even an intensification of the present tension with the U.S.S.R. I can assure you that we, on our part, are going to do everything we can to prevent this. It seems likely that the Commission will be denied entry to Northern Korea and that its work will be confined to Southern Korea where 20,000,000 of the 29,000,000 Koreans live. It is our hope that the work of this Commission will contribute to the ultimate establishment of a democratic government in Korea.

Canada's part in the work of UN has been wholehearted, able and constructive. I am deeply concerned over the possibility that Canada's failure to appoint a representative on the Korean Commission would be misunderstood and distorted out of all proportion to the modest importance of this temporary agency. I am fearful that it might be seized upon by persons in this country and elsewhere who are anxious to find grounds for opposing cooperative efforts to resolve urgent political and economic problems which confront the world and which must be solved if western civilization is to endure. I need hardly add that the U.S.S.R. would exploit Canada's absence to the fullest in its propaganda.

While I understand and appreciate the difficulties which the Korean Commission presents for you, it is my earnest hope that you may find it possible to appoint a Canadian representative, even if his role may be a relatively nominal one, in order to remove this comparatively unimportant element from the larger picture.

With warm personal regards and every good wish, I am

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S TRUMAN

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: I have seen Trygve Lie and other officials of the United Nations about the Korean Commission. That Commission is now on its way to Korea, some members having left last Thursday, so a meeting prior to departure at Lake Success was not possible. In any event certain of the members are to meet the Commission in Korea as they are stationed in the Far East so an earlier meeting would, in any event, have been difficult to arrange. The feeling here is that the Commission may not be very effective but should not itself cause any further deterioration in the situation in that part of the world. If the Commission finds that it cannot carry out its mandate Lie expects that, as provided for in the Assembly Resolution setting it up, it will report to the Interim Committee of the Assembly, which body is now in session.

United Nations officials are naturally cautious about commenting on the wisdom or unwisdom of setting up this Commission in view of the fact this was done by an Assembly Resolution which they are bound, as officials, to implement to the best of their ability.

I have emphasized here the desirability of playing down the fact that the Commission left without a Canadian member. United Nations have co-operated effectively on this, their task being made easier by the fact that the Indian, Phillipine and, I think, one other member are to join the Commission in Japan. Ends.

My dear Mr. President:<sup>16</sup>

I have just received your communication of the 6th instant which has been brought to me from New York by Mr. Pearson to whom it was personally delivered by your messenger.

You know, I am sure, that, alike on personal and official grounds, there is no one — certainly no one in Canada — who could be more anxious than I, myself, am to join with you in furthering between the United States and Canada, the greatest measure of co-operation in international relations, and in seeking to avoid situations arising which might occasion possible embarrassment to either of our countries.

I wish I could regard the appointment of a representative of Canada on the United Nations Korean Commission as something that would serve either of these ends. Unfortunately, I do not. I believe that, in the long run, the result of such action, at this time, would be quite the reverse. I think the appointment of the Commission, in the first instance, was a mistake. I believe, if many more Commissions of the kind are appointed, the United Nations will not only speedily lose what measure of influence it possesses, but that it will be impossible for some of its member nations to avoid being drawn into positions of great future embarrassment to themselves.

Until a recommendation for the appointment of a Canadian representative on the United Nations Korean Commission came before our Cabinet, the Cabinet, as a whole, had had no opportunity to consider either the wisdom of the appointment of such a Commission, or the advisability of Canadian representation on the Commission when appointed.

Whatever may have been the circumstances which, at the time, may have seemed to justify the appointment of this particular Commission, those circumstances, it seems to me, have since so materially changed as to make it most inad-visible to have the Commission even attempt to carry out the functions it was appointed to perform.

With the failure of the Foreign Ministers Conference in London to make any progress in effecting agreement between the U.S.S.R. and the other great powers with respect to the Treaty of Peace and the future of Germany, and the relations between these powers being, as a consequence, what they have since become, it seems to me, it is but inviting further rebuffs, for the United Nations to seek, at this moment, to have a Commission bring about in Korea, a more friendly relationship between the Powers concerned than was possible in London over a matter of much greater importance to the peace of the world. Unless there were a prospect of some really effective action by any Commission, which I do not think there are grounds for anticipating in the case of the present Commission, I greatly fear that an attempted intervention on its part, to which the parties mainly concerned have not agreed, would only, all circumstances considered, aggravate the existing situation.

As no appointment of a representative of Canada on the Commission has yet been made, and holding so strongly the views I have expressed, I have not felt that I would be justified, at this time, in supporting any recommendation for appointment of a representative of Canada on the Commission. Were I to support such a recommendation, I am quite certain that I would be acting contrary to the wishes of our Parliament, and of what its members and the people of Canada expect of me as the Leader of the Government. I am sure that you, Mr. President, will fully understand my position, and will not expect me to say more by way of reply to your communication.

You know how warmly I reciprocate your personal regards and good wishes. With all kind remembrances,

Ottawa, January 8, 1948

Dear Mr. President:

I received yesterday your communication of the 6th instant which had been brought to me from New York by Mr. Pearson to whom it was personally delivered by your messenger.

You know, I am sure, that, alike on personal and official grounds, there is no one — certainly no one in Canada — who could be more anxious than I myself am to join with you in furthering between the United States and Canada, the greatest measure of co-operation in international relations, and in seeking to avoid situations arising which might occasion possible embarrassment to either of our countries.

I wish I could regard Canada's association with the Korean Commission as something that would serve either of these ends. I am convinced, however, that unless the greatest caution and restraint is exercised by the Commission in the attempted discharge of its responsibilities, the result will be quite the reverse. I think the appointment of the Commission, in the first instance, was a mistake, I believe, if many more Commissions of the kind are appointed, the United Nations will not only speedily lose what measure of influence it possesses, but that it will be impossible for some of its member nations to avoid being drawn into positions of great future embarrassment to themselves.

Whatever may have been the circumstances which, at the time, seemed to justify the appointment of this Commission, those circumstances, I believe, have since so materially changed as to make it impossible for the Commission to carry out the functions it was appointed to perform.

With the failure of the Foreign Ministers Conference in London to make any progress in effecting agreement between the U.S.S.R. and the other great powers with respect to the Treaty of Peace and the future of Germany, and the relations between these powers being, as a consequence, what they have since become, it seems to me it is but inviting further rebuffs for the United Nations to seek, at this moment, to have a Commission bring about in Korea a more friendly relationship between the Powers concerned that was possible in London over a matter of much greater importance to the peace of the world.

Unless from the very outset, there were a prospect of some really effective action by the Commission to carry out its mandate in the whole of Korea, I fear that any intervention on its part, however slight, to which the parties mainly concerned have not fully agreed, would only, all circumstances considered, seriously aggravate the existing situation.

Being impressed so strongly with this dangerous possibility, I had not felt, until your letter was received, that I would be justified in supporting any recommendation for the appointment of a representative of Canada on the Commission. In your letter, however, you raise the question of what might well become a larger issue through the possible misinterpretation and distortion of Canada's attitude and motives in not appointing a representative to the Commission, and the use that might be made of this for purposes of adverse propaganda.

Having discussed the matter fully with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, we have come to the conclusion that the possible difficulties and dangers which you foresee, as well as those which I foresee, might be met and overcome by our making very clear to our representative the understanding on which he is being named a member of the Commission and which is that we interpret the General Assembly resolution as meaning that the elections are to be held for the whole of Korea and the government to be established for the whole of Korea; that this would of course necessitate that the Commission should operate in North Korea as well as in South Korea and will require the co-operation of the U.S.S.R. authorities in the northern zone; and that the Commission will at once get into touch with the Soviet authorities with a view to securing, if possible, such co-operation. Should such co-operation not be forthcoming, and the Commission not return its mandate to the United Nations in view of the impossibility of carrying out that mandate in the whole of Korea, our representative will be told to withdraw from the Commission.

On this understanding, I have agreed to support the recommendation of the Secretary of State for the appointment of Mr. G.S. Patterson, at present Counsellor, Canadian Embassy in China, as Canada's representative on the Commission.

You know, Mr. President, how warmly I reciprocate your personal regards and good wishes. With all kind remembrances.

[Yours very sincerely
W.L. MACKENZIE KING]

TELEGRAM 3

Ottawa, January 8, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Patterson, Begins: Your telegram No. 2 of January 5th.† You have been named the Canadian member of the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea on the following understanding:

The General Assembly resolution setting up this committee gives the Commission the task to facilitate and expedite the holding of democratic elections in Korea and the establishment of a national government. We interpret this to mean that the elections are to be held for the whole of Korea and the government to be established for the whole of Korea. This necessitates, of course, that the Commission should operate in North Korea as well as South Korea and will require the co-operation of the U.S.S.R. authorities in the northern zone. It is assumed, therefore, that the Commission will at once get into touch with the Soviet authorities with a view to securing, if possible, such co-operation. Unless some other member does so, you should bring this question up at the first meeting of the Commission which you attend. If the Soviet authorities co-operate, then the Commission can proceed with its work. If the Soviet authorities refuse to co-operate, then you are instructed to support any move on the part of the Commission to return its mandate to the United Nations in view of the impossibility of carrying out that mandate in the whole of Korea. If the Commission refuses to accept this policy, please report to us at once by cable, as you will be instructed, in such circumstances, to withdraw from the Commission and resume your duties in Tokyo.

You will recall that the resolution expressly provides that the Commission should consult with the Interim Committee of the Assembly "with respect to the application of this resolution in the light of developments." The Canadian Government is very strongly of the opinion, by which you should be guided, that developments which make clear that the Soviet Union will not co-operate are among those which would require immediate consultation with the Interim Committee as visualized above and a termination of the activities of the Commission in Korea. You will have gathered from the above that the Canadian Government is determined to do what it can to ensure that the work of this Commission should not be the occasion of any clash in Korea between U.S.S.R. and U.S.A. interests. If every possible step is not taken by the Commission to avoid such a clash, you should withdraw from its activities. It is also our understanding that the only obligation imposed on the Commission is to facilitate the establishment of a national and independent Korean government, in which task it acts as the agent for the General Assembly which established it. No special obligation devolves upon the governments of particular countries represented on the Commission, except to nominate a member to that Commission. The Commission acts as a subordinate body responsible to the General Assembly and, in the event of difficulties arising, the responsibility rests on all members of the United Nations alike. In any event, as indicated above, we would expect you to take no further part in the work of the Commission if any special difficulty resulting from U.S.S.R. non-cooperation arises.<sup>17</sup>

Following for Patterson. We take the view that the responsibilities of the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea are limited to (a) advising the occupation authorities and Koreans on ways of fulfilling the programme set out in the General Assembly resolutions of November 14, as interpreted in our telegram No. 3 of January 8, (b) of observing the way in which the programme is implemented and (c) reporting to the General Assembly.

2. You should therefore resist any suggestion that the Commission has or should assume any executive powers. The Commission obviously has no power to enforce adoption of its advice. It can only record in its report (a) the advice given, (b) the circumstances under which the advice was given and (c) the action taken by the occupation authorities and Koreans. It should do nothing to suggest that it is or may become the agent of the occupying military authorities.

3. We think that the Commission should determine at the outset whether the Soviet authorities in North Korea are prepared to cooperate generally in the fulfilment of the programme set out in the General Assembly resolution. If they are not, we take the view that this is a development of such importance that the Commission should refer the whole matter to the Interim Committee of the General Assembly as provided for in paragraph 5 of the Second Resolution. You are instructed to insist on the Commission following this course. If it does not do so you are to telegraph us at once and not take further part in the work of the Committee until further notice.

*Le président des États-Unis au premier ministre
President of United States to Prime Minister*

Washington, January 24, 1948

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have received your letter of January eighth and am gratified to learn of your decision to name a representative to the Korean Commission.

With respect to the future work of the Commission, that will, of course, be a matter for the Commission itself to decide. We believe that the Commission should carefully consider the situation it finds in Korea and determine in the light of the facts how it might best give effect to the desire of the General Assembly to forward the cause of Korean independence. If obstacles arise to prevent the Commission from carrying out in full the task set for it by the General Assembly, we can imagine that the Commission might either decide on its own account to proceed with such part of its task as is possible under the circumstances or report to the Interim Committee for advice, as permitted under the terms of the Assembly's resolution.

We hope very much that it will be possible for the Korean Commission to carry out its task throughout the whole of Korea and we are by no means convinced that it is a certainty that the Commission will be denied entry into northern Korea. Should the latter eventually arise, however, we would still be eager to have the assistance of the United Nations in our efforts to bring to the people of south Korea, who constitute more than two-thirds of the total population of the country, the freely-elected government which they so eagerly await. Such a government, even if established at the outset for only a part of the country, would, in our view, prove of itself to be a strong force for the democratization and unification of the country as a whole, the goal toward which we are all working.

Please accept, Mr. Prime Minister, my warmest regards.

Very sincerely yours,

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], February 9, 1948

KOREAN COMMISSION

The United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, after meeting for a month in Seoul, Korea, has decided to send its Chairman, Mr. K.P.S. Menon (Indian Ambassador to China) and Assistant Secretary-General, Dr. Victor Hoo, to consult with the Interim Committee of the General Assembly regarding the negative attitude which the Soviet authorities in North Korea have taken toward cooperation in the work of the Commission. The resolution adopted by the Korean Commission on February 6 reads as follows:

“The United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, having considered that the negative attitude of the Soviet authorities with regard to the work of the Commission has made it clear that it will not be possible for the Commission to exercise for the time being the functions conferred upon it by the General Assembly, under the resolutions of 14 November, 1947, in the part of Korea occupied by the armed forces of the U.S.S.R.;

“That the General Assembly, in resolution 2 of November 14, 1947, paragraph 5, authorized the Commission to consult with the Interim Committee with respect to the application of this resolution in the light of developments;

“Having considered the preliminary results of the work of its sub-committees and in particular the consultations held up to date by subcommittee 2;

“Resolves:

“(1) that the Commission shall consult with the Interim Committee with respect to the application of the resolutions of 14 November in the light of developments;

“(2) that the Chairman, accompanied by the Assistant Secretary-General shall represent the Commission during the consideration of this question by the Interim Committee;

“(3) that in the accomplishment of this Mission the Chairman shall be guided by such directives as the Commission may formulate.”

2. In deciding to consult with the Interim Committee in this way the Korean Commission has, in fact, fallen in with the instructions which were sent to the Canadian representative, Dr. G.S. Patterson. It will now be for the Interim Committee of the General Assembly, which meets on February 24, to advise the Korean Commission concerning the desirability of proceeding with the implementation in South Korea only of the programme of elections and establishment of a National Government for Korea.

3. A telegram has been sent to the Canadian representative on the Korean Commission asking him to forward by air mail a full report concerning the work of the Commission to date and his advice concerning the feasibility and desirability of proceeding with the implementation of the programme in South Korea alone. It will be necessary for the Government to formulate instructions by February 23 for the Canadian representative attending the meetings of the Interim Committee of the General Assembly.

4. It is thought that you might wish to make a report to Cabinet on these recent developments in the work of the Korean Commission.

UNITED NATIONS; KOREAN COMMISSION

13. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of December 22nd, reported that the UN Temporary Commission on Korea had agreed to send its chairman to consult with the Interim Committee of the General Assembly regarding the refusal of the U.S.S.R. to permit the Commission to proceed with their programme in North Korea. The Canadian representative had been asked for a full report on the Commission's work to date.

(External Affairs memorandum, Feb. 9; telegram to Liaison Mission, Japan, Feb. 11, 1948).

14. Mr. St. Laurent added that it was now proposed that Dr. Patterson be instructed to propose that, in the circumstances, the Commission adjourn pending decision by the Interim Committee and, thereafter, to return to Tokyo regardless of the decision taken.

It was also proposed that the Canadian representative on the Interim Committee take the position that the Commission should not be instructed to go ahead with their programme in Southern Korea only; if a Southern Korea government was to be established, this task should be undertaken by the responsible occupying power.

It was to be noted that this attitude would mean that Canada would take in the Interim Committee a position which would probably be diametrically opposed to that of the United States.

(External Affairs memorandum, Feb. 10, 1948,† and attached draft telegram to Canadian Liaison Mission to Japan).

15. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the course proposed by the Minister and agreed that the Canadian representatives on the Korean Commission and in the UN Interim Committee be instructed accordingly.

Following for Patterson. When the Temporary Commission for Korea has completed preparation of directives for the guidance of the Chairman in his consultation with the Interim Committee, you should propose that the Commission adjourn pending a decision of the Interim Committee. Regardless of the decision of the Commission on question of adjournment, you should then return to Tokyo. You may inform your colleagues that the Canadian Government does not propose to take any further part in the work of the Commission pending a decision by the Interim Committee, especially since the Canadian Government does not intend to support any proposal for implementation of a partial programme in South Korea only. You may add that it is the view of the Canadian Government that if a South Korea Government is to be established, this task should be undertaken by the responsible occupying power.

2. In the discussion of the Korean question in the Interim Committee it is probable that the Canadian representative will take the line that since the General Assembly's resolutions of November 14, 1947, laying down a programme for the re-establishment of the national independence of Korea cannot be fulfilled because of the unwillingness of the Soviet occupation forces in the Northern Zone of Korea to co-operate, the Commission should not be advised by the Interim Committee to go ahead with a partial fulfilment of the programme in South Korea only. We should be grateful for a statement from you of the arguments as you see them that may be adduced for and against this line.

5. On 2 (c) he will outline proposals of Korean leaders for political Conference. It is not now believed that such a Conference can be held.

6. On 2 (b) he will state that the opinion of the Commission is divided. For your information China, India and the Philippines favour proposal — Canada, Australia and Syria are opposed. Position of El Salvador and France not too clear.

The paragraph stated:

"the Commission is loath to consider [withdrawal] so long as there is any hope that an improvement in situation may make progress possible."

7. In introducing question of consultation with the Interim Committee at eighth meeting, February 4th, Chairman outlined alternatives indicated in paragraph 5 of my telegram No. 4 of February 7th.<sup>19</sup> At ninth meeting I repeated views of Canadian Government as outlined in your telegram No. 3 of January 8th and your telegram No. 9 of January 10th which I had already presented at second session as reported in my telegram No. 1 of January 15th paragraph 3. Commission voted to refer the whole matter to the Interim Committee as reported in my telegram No. 4 of February 7th. I interpreted this to meet requirement of paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 9 of January 10th. Commission will meet Monday, February 16th, to clear up pending items, will probably instruct sub-Committees to continue work and will then suspend activities till the Chairman reports on consultation with the Interim Committee.

8. In view of circumstances outlined in paragraph 2 and paragraph 7 above do you agree that I remain and participate in sub-Committee meetings or do you wish me to withdraw from the Commission and return to Tokyo?<sup>20</sup> Ends.

UNITED NATIONS; KOREAN COMMISSION

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of February 12th, reported that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs would represent Canada at the Interim Committee meeting on Korea later this week.

It was possible that the United States would urge that the Commission operate in South Korea only. There were, however, sound legal reasons for the view that the Assembly resolution establishing the Commission did not confer authority for such

5. Brief to be given chairman by Commission will probably ask for opinion of Interim Committee on following four alternatives and will emphasize numbers three and four. (1) To withdraw. (2) To implement programme of Resolution II in South Korea alone. (3) To observe election of representatives for purposes of consultation as outlined in Resolution I provided there is assurance of free elections. (4) Further to explore possibilities of conference of Korean leaders from North and South on formation of National Government.

According to a later report, † when UNTCOK met on February 16, Patterson had not yet received telegram No. 42 from Ottawa. As it turned out, Patterson had already favoured adjournment of UNTCOK in meetings he attended on February 13 and 16.

action; nor did the Interim Committee have the right to change the basis of the Assembly resolution.

The Canadian representative had been instructed to hold to this view. He was to state that the Canadian government would not accept any proposal for the Commission's association with elections in South Korea even though the Interim Committee were to purport to authorize it to do so.

4. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the Minister's report.

Following from Patterson, Begins: No. 6. February 18th. Your telegram No. 42 of February 13th. Arguments for Commission participation in elections for South Korea are set forth in enclosure No. 5 of my despatch No. 3 of February 14th.† They may be considered under the following heads.

2. First: Is participation by the Commission justifiable?

(a) Argument for: It is legally justifiable on basis of Resolution 1 taken by (group corrupt). When Assembly passed the Resolution present impasse was foreseen. Participation was therefore expected. While, elections proposed are for consultative purposes only, such representatives might form party for Assembly, to be joined later by representatives from the North.

(b) Argument against: Resolutions 1 and 2 must be simultaneously linked together. Elections envisaged are for whole of Korea. To base participation on Resolution 1 would mean using it for purpose not originally intended. In any case it is possible for United States to conduct elections without United Nations observation.

3. Second: Effect on Korean people:

(a) Argument for: (Group corrupt) has been increasing and elections would be regarded as a step towards righting wrongs. (Groups corrupt—repetition requested) greatly heightened in Korea by United Nations observation and might lead to rapprochement between North and South Korea. If not held, uprisings and bloodshed are likely.

(b) Argument against: Elections proposed differ radically from those expected. Leftists are disloyal for obvious reasons and many rightists fear they would entrench the Soviet in the north, leading to final breach between north and south and provoke civil war.

4. Third: Effect on United Nations:

(a) Argument for: Prestige would be enhanced through supporting United States who are willing to cooperate and rebuke U.S.S.R. for non-cooperation. Korean question would be kept before the United Nations.

(b) Argument against: Hollow victory for United Nations if United States — U.S.S.R. tension were increased thereby. Little possibility of improving conditions for free elections and United Nations support would be given to entrenching reactionary Government. If it could not be thus elected (groups corrupt — repetition requested) they would cite United Nations support to bolster prestige in spite of all precautions to the contrary. Korean question, in any case, will be kept on General Assembly agenda.

5. Fourth: Effect on United States — U.S.S.R. relations:

(a) Argument for: Conceivably Soviet might recognize representatives if elected under United Nations observation and allow representatives from the north to join them in consultations with the General Assembly.

(b) Argument against: Soviet would construe participation as another evidence of American imperialism. Dangers to international peace would be increased.

6. Menon will probably point out that arguments ultimately adduced are fairly evenly balanced. In my opinion the arguments "against" are stronger than "for" under first heading, but if elections could be justified they would probably have favourable effects on Korean people and probably enhance United Nations prestige.

7. However, paramount consideration is whether favourable results to Koreans and to United Nations would outweigh possible unfavourable effects on United States — U.S.S.R. relations and on future influence of United Nations proposals. Ends.

Note: Delay due to message being received in very corrupt form. Repetitions being asked for and will be forwarded as soon as received.

IMMEDIATE

Following from Pearson, Begins: I protested strongly yesterday against the adjournment of the Korean discussion until Tuesday. Apparently this was arranged by the Americans on Wednesday afternoon when they realized how strong would be the opposition to their policy that the Korean Commission should now go ahead with elections in South Korea only. The United States delegation apparently felt that they could remove or soften some of this opposition during the week-end and thereby remove the embarrassment of its disclosure in a public session of the Interim Committee.

2. Jessup, the United States delegate, asked me to lunch yesterday to ascertain the Canadian position. I made that clear and, he did his best to convince me of its unwisdom. His main argument was the old one that a decision that the Korean Commission should now disband would be a diplomatic triumph for the U.S.S.R. and a tragedy for the Korean people whose hope of a democratic National Government would be set back. I told Jessup that we would do everything we could here to minimize our differences with the United States of America on this matter and that our stand would be taken on legal grounds, namely that the Commission has no competence under the Assembly resolution to operate in South Korea alone. Our dilemma is that if we do not do our best to carry this point and to impress other delegations of its validity, a United States of America resolution in the opposite sense might carry and then we would be faced with the necessity of withdrawing our member from the Commission, something that we could not do without provoking comment. I suggest, therefore, that, on the purely legal point of competence of the Commission under the Assembly Resolution, we do our best to make our view prevail. This should not cause any great embarrassment because we are not dealing with questions of substance and because other delegations will be taking the same line.

3. If it is decided that the Commission has not power to organize elections in South Korea alone or even for the purpose of choosing Koreans to consult with the Commission and not to set up a government (this is one of the proposals put forward by the Commission) then we will be faced with the following alternatives:

(1) The Commission should withdraw from Korea at once.

(2) The Commission should make a final effort to bring northern and southern Korean leaders together for consultation.

4. This second course will, I think, get a great deal of support even from delegations like the Australian, which support our position on all other grounds.

5. I should think that we could also support (2) above which is an effort towards conciliation, bringing the north and south together, but would be grateful for your instructions on this point. Ends.

2. I sent a memorandum to Mr. St. Laurent† putting to him the points raised in paragraphs 2 and 4 of your teletype under reference.

3. Mr. St. Laurent confirmed the instruction that you are to state clearly in the debate on the Korean question the Canadian objection on legal grounds to any United States proposal for holding elections in Southern Korea alone. He agreed that you should state these objections in advance of the vote, even though this may have a considerable effect in bringing about the defeat of the United States proposal if one is made.

4. In regard to paragraph 4 of your teletype under reference, Mr. St. Laurent agreed that there would be no objection to supporting a proposal to the effect that the temporary commission for Korea make a further effort to hold elections in Korea on a national basis, bringing Northern and Southern Korean leaders for the purpose.

5. I am not sure whether Mr. St. Laurent's comment as reported in para. 4 above covers point you raised on telephone about Commission remaining in Korea for consultation with Korean leaders, and would be grateful to know if you wish further clarification in this regard. I do not see how individuals for consultation could be chosen in South Korea without some form of election in that area, and I am not clear whether or not proposal assumes that Commission would return to Korea to observe elections for that purpose. If so, I should think support for this course is not included in present instructions. Ends.

SECRET AND URGENT

KOREA

The attached teletype No. 253 of February 24th concerning the discussion of the Korean question in the Interim Committee has just arrived from Mr. Pearson. We learned late yesterday afternoon that the request for instructions would reach us this morning, and I spoke to Mr. St. Laurent about it. He asked me to send it to you as soon as possible.

Mr. Pearson telephoned this morning and asked me to give you this additional information:

(1) If the vote is taken before he receives a reply to his telegram, Mr. Pearson will vote "no" on both the United States and Australian proposals, even if he is in a minority of one. If the Australian proposal is put as an amendment to the United States proposal, he will vote "yes" for the Australian amendment on the ground that it is less objectionable than the original United States proposal. He will then vote "no" on the motion as amended, if the amendment carries.

(2) Mr. Pearson said that the United States delegation had carried great weight with the argument that its proposal did not call for a vote in South Korea, but for elections in every part of Korea where it was possible to hold them. There was, he said, a strong feeling of impatience with the Russians for having failed to comply with the Assembly's wish that elections be held everywhere, together with an equally strong desire to do whatever was possible for the Korean people. It is assumed, he said, that if a government is not established in the south which can claim to be a national government for Korea, the Russians will claim that their government in the north is a national government.

(3) Mr. Pearson said that his argument to the effect that the Commission did not possess authority to carry out its mandate in South Korea had not carried much weight. The reply was that inability to carry out the full mandate should not prevent the Commission from carrying out the seventy-five per cent that was possible.

(4) In regard to the action he should take concerning Canada's position on the Temporary Commission, if the United States resolution carries, Mr. Pearson thought that it would not be necessary for him to give any immediate indication of Canada's unwillingness to continue to serve. He had already, in his statement, pointed out that at least three members of the Commission had expressed doubt as to the competence of the Commission to act in South Korea alone, and that the adoption of the United States resolution would embarrass all of them.

We have not yet received the full text of Mr. Pearson's statement but I am attaching a summary.†

You will notice that, in paragraph 5 of his message, Mr. Pearson asks for instructions on a number of specific points.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from Pearson, Begins: At this afternoon's meeting of the Interim Committee I delivered a short statement on Korea, the text of which you will have received on the U.N. teleprinter.

2. Of the other 10 speakers, 8 supported the United States proposal for elections in South Korea for the purpose of setting up a National Government there. You will have noticed from the United States statement that their proposal emphasizes that the elections are for the whole of Korea even though conditions make it impossible for members to be returned from certain areas at the present time. In other words, the elections will be held by stages as conditions permit, with the National Assembly in being as soon as the first stage is completed. It will, however, not be an Assembly for South Korea only, nor will any Government it sets up be a Government for South Korea only.

3. The only opposition to the United States Resolution, apart from our own, was advanced by the Australian delegate, who favoured consultative elections only in South Korea but did not support our position that the Commission should do nothing at all in the way of elections. Elections for consultative purposes, according to the Australian plan, would be held under Assembly Resolution I and would be for the purpose of choosing an Assembly of Korean representatives, freely elected, who would consult with the Commission in regard to future developments. The purpose of such consultative elections is outlined on page 15 of Mr. Menon's statement to the Interim Committee made last Thursday.

4. It is interesting to note that even El Salvador, whose position in the Korean Commission was far from clear, supported the United States proposal as did China, Brazil, Turkey, the Argentine, Greece, Ecuador, and Bolivia.

5. I understand that the United Kingdom will also support the United States proposal. It may be that a vote will be taken on this proposal tomorrow afternoon. I would, therefore, appreciate instructions on the following points:

(1) We will not, of course, vote for the United States proposal in any event but if we find ourselves in a minority of one or two, will we abstain or vote against it? I think, personally, we should vote against because,

(a) It would be consistent with the position we have taken, and,

(b) It would make our non-participation in the future work of the Commission more logical, if the United States Resolution carries.

(2) If the Australian proposal for consultative elections only acquires considerable support, and could be used as a means of defeating the more obnoxious United States proposal, should we vote for it for that reason, or should we continue to oppose it also?

(3) If we continue our opposition to both the United States and Australian proposals, then a tactical problem arises if the Australian proposal is put forward as an amendment to the United States proposal. If such an amendment could be used to defeat the United States proposal, we could vote for it explaining that, though we are voting for it as the lesser of two evils, nevertheless if the amendment is carried we will vote against the Resolution as amended.

(4) If the United States proposal seems certain to be carried, should we tell the Committee, before the vote is taken, that it will be impossible for our representative to continue to serve on the Commission in these circumstances?

Against such an announcement is the fact that it will underline our difference with the United States and the others; and will, therefore, focus attention on this controversy. In favour of such an announcement, is the fact that we will be in a stronger and more logical position later, if we withdraw our representative. We will have made clear to the United Nations our position in the matter and, therefore, Paterson's withdrawal later will occasion less surprise than would otherwise be the case. Ends.

2. Prime Minister is confined to Laurier House with a cold, but he telephoned immediately upon receipt of your message and gave me the following instructions to communicate to you:

3. In regard to paragraph 5, section 1, of your telegram under reference, the Prime Minister said that he agreed with you and that you should vote against the United States resolution.

4. In regard to paragraph 5, section 2, you should vote against the Australian proposal for consultative elections if it were put forward as a separate resolution.

5. In regard to paragraph 5, section 3, the Prime Minister said that he agreed that you should vote for the Australian resolution if it were put forward as an amendment to the United States resolution, and then oppose the United States resolution as amended, if the amendment were carried.

6. In regard to paragraph 5, section 4, the Prime Minister said that, if the United States proposal seemed certain to be carried, you should tell the Committee, before the vote is taken, that it will be impossible for the Canadian representative to continue to serve on the Commission in these circumstances. In this connection the Prime Minister said that this had been clearly understood when you left for New York and that this decision had been based on the broad consideration that where no forces are organized to enforce a decision of the United Nations, nothing should be attempted in the way of intervention except with the consent of both parties. He remarked that in industrial disputes conciliation is not attempted except with the consent of both parties and arbitration is not undertaken unless it can be put into effect. United Nations has not yet got to the position where it can enforce its will, and it should therefore not undertake commitments which it cannot fulfil. Ends.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following from Pearson, Begins: As the vote on the Korean question will probably take place tomorrow, I would like to explain as clearly as possible the present position, state my instructions as I understand them and make certain suggestions.

2. There will almost certainly be a vote on the United States proposal that the Commission should facilitate and observe national elections wherever it can in Korea. I am still attempting to avoid any vote suggesting instead a report which will convey the majority and minority views of the Commission. The United States however while agreeing to a report which will include our views will also ask for a vote on its resolution.

3. We may be the only country to vote against that resolution though Norway may join us and a few other members are likely to abstain.

4. It will be made clear however that this resolution and the report have no binding effect on the Commission. They are merely advice which the Korean Commission may accept or reject as it sees fit. I expect to say a few words tomorrow emphasizing this view to which no objection, will, I think be taken.

5. In this case, the important decision will be taken by the Korean Commission itself and I suggest that only then does the question of our withdrawal from the work of the Commission arise. If this is true, would it not be a mistake to state publicly tomorrow that a favourable decision on the United States proposal will mean our withdrawal from the work of the Commission. Would it not be better to state that if the majority advice of the Committee is followed by the Commission, then a new situation will arise which will have to be taken into consideration by the Governments represented on the Commission who feel that the advice is wrong and unconstitutional.

6. A statement here tomorrow that we will withdraw from the Commission if the Committee passes the United States resolution will cause surprise and controversy here. However, if I do not get any instructions to the contrary I propose to make such a statement as I understand, — after telephoning the Department today — that this is what I am expected to do. Ends.

3. "It seemed to Mr. Pearson therefore that he should not state today that the Canadian member of the Commission will be withdrawn, but should do no more than say that if the Korean Commission decides to accept the advice of the majority of the Interim Committee, it will create a serious situation for governments represented on the Commission which do not consider that an adequate legal basis exists for the proposed action, and they will have to reconsider the position of their representatives on the Commission. 3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of February 19th, reported that, while it had now been accepted generally that the Interim Committee lacked authority to enlarge the terms of the Assembly resolution establishing the Korea Commission, a U.S. resolution in favour of the holding of elections in South Korea had been approved by a substantial majority. Under instructions, the Canadian representative had opposed it.

The resolution would be communicated to the Commission as representing the views of the majority of the members of the Interim Committee. It would not be mandatory and the Commission would also be informed of the minority view.

In the circumstances, it had not been considered necessary or advisable for the Canadian representative to announce, at this stage, what action Canada would take with regard to continued participation in the Commission. If the Commission decided to accept the advice of the majority, Canada could then decide whether or not the Canadian representative should withdraw. Meantime he had made it clear that acceptance of the Committee's advice would require the government to reconsider their position.

United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea. Following for Patterson, Begins: Press reports from Seoul state that at a public rally on March 1, marking the 29th anniversary of the declaration of Korean independence, Y.W. Liu, Acting Chairman of the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, declared that in conformity with the views expressed by the Interim Committee the Commission will observe elections in such parts of Korea as are accessible to the Commission not later than May 10. It is further reported that General Hodge announced the same day that by agreement with the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea a general election will be held on May 9.

2. We are greatly surprised and concerned about these reports. Please verify them. We are particularly anxious to know whether Mr. Liu said he was speaking for the Commission and whether in fact he was authorized by the Commission to make this statement. We had assumed that the Commission would await the return to Seoul of Chairman Menon before taking up the discussion of the resolution passed by the Interim Committee. This resolution is only advisory and it is for the Commission to decide in accordance with its rules of procedure what its future course of action will be.

3. If it develops that Mr. Liu made an unauthorized statement appearing to commit the Commission to the supervision of elections in South Korea in advance of a decision on this important question being properly reached by the Commission in accordance with its rules of procedure, then you are instructed to lodge a vigorous protest on behalf of the Canadian Government against such irregular procedure.

4. If it develops that General Hodge issued a statement setting a date for elections in South Korea in which he mentioned agreement with the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea when in fact no such agreement was properly given, then you are instructed to raise in the Commission the question of the Commission issuing a statement clarifying its position. Regardless of whether we will agree or will not agree with future decisions adopted by the Korean Commission, we consider it most important that its decisions be reached by proper parliamentary procedures and that it avoid giving the appearance of acting in accordance with the wishes of the Commanding General of the United States Forces in South Korea.

5. If the Commission has already taken a decision to supervise elections in South Korea, then in accordance with instructions contained in our telegram No. 55 of March 1st, you are to cable us immediately for further instructions and not participate further in the work of the Commission until such instructions are received.

Following from Patterson, Begins: No. 9. March 5th. Your telegram No. 57 of March 3rd. The fear I expressed in paragraph 5 of my telegram No. 8,<sup>23</sup> regarding implications of Liu's speech, arose out of telephone conversation of February 29th in which Jackson, Australian representative, told me incidentally of Liu's intended speech on March 1st. Though conversation was necessarily guarded and though I did not know at that time the form of the Interim Committee communication to the Commission, I expressed to both Jackson and Schmidt, Principal Secretary, my strong feeling that no public statement should be made until the Commission had considered Interim Committee report.

2. Press reports of speech here were not alarming and contained no such statement as reported in paragraph 1 of your telegram under reference. Jackson and Schmidt, however, now confirm that Liu's statement was essentially as reported by you.

Patterson then referred to the speech made by the Chinese representative in Seoul on March 1 with "implication" that had cleared it by telephone with Menon in New York and Liu had secured individual agreement of seven Commission members in Seoul.

"the Commission would be proceeding forthwith with preparations for elections"

Liu Yu-wan, Representative of China; K.P.S. Menon, Representative of India; Jean-Paul Boncour, Representative of France.

4. The Commission agreed at its last meeting, February 16th, that no further meetings would be held until Interim Committee report had been received, and decided that if necessity for meeting should arise during the absence of the permanent Chairman, a meeting would be convened by the Secretariat after consultation with the members. According to Jackson, when members were called together by the Principal Secretary for consultation with Liu, no minutes were kept and this gathering was not regarded as an official meeting of the Commission.

5. It is clear, therefore, that no decision has been reached by the Commission on Interim Committee recommendation nor can it be maintained that Liu spoke with the authority of the Commission. Schmidt is including in the agenda for Monday's meeting consideration by Commission of its attitude to Liu's statement, presumably in expectation of having it confirmed. If, however, on return to Seoul I find the above mentioned facts are confirmed, I shall lodge a vigorous protest according to your instructions in paragraph 3 of your telegram under reference. Obviously, the Commission cannot confirm Liu's statement unless and until it formally adopts the recommendations of the Interim Committee.

6. According to Jackson and Schmidt, General Hodge announced May 9th as election date but made no reference to any agreement with the Commission. If reports of his statement are not clear on this point, I shall press for Commission to issue a clarifying statement with reference to Commission's relation to his remarks. Ends.

Your telegram No. 70 of March 4.† Following for Patterson, Begins: Your telegrams No. 8 of March 3rd, and 9 and 10 of March 5.

2. Canadian view that United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea supervision of elections in South Korea only would not be in accordance with General Assembly resolutions of November 14, 1947 was supported in Interim Committee by Australia only, although certain others which abstained in vote saw force of our argument. Other Commission members supported United States resolution which was carried 31 to 2 with 11 abstentions. Australians have since indicated that they will accept view of majority and have requested Canadian support in Commission to prevent further distortion of its mandate.

3. In accordance with instructions contained in our telegrams No. 55 of March 1 and 57 of March 3 you should raise at the earliest possible opportunity in the Commission on a question of privilege necessary for clarification of Commission's relationship to the announcement made by General Hodge, fixing date for elections as May 9. If Mr. Liu made a statement which gave the incorrect impression to the public that the Commission had already decided to supervise elections in South Korea, then Mr. Liu should be called upon to issue a statement of clarification. If General Hodge's announcement of date for South Korean elections incorrectly included statement that announcement was being made by agreement with the Commission, then the Commission should issue a statement clarifying its relationship to this announcement.

4. If the Commission refuses to support you on these two questions, providing that our suspicions are well founded, you should indicate that you take it that Commission has decided to cooperate in holding of elections in South Korea. This being the case you should state that you will not be able to participate further in the work of the Commission until you have received further instructions from your Government.

5. If the Commission supports you in regard to necessity for clarifying Commission's relationship to election announcement issued by General Hodge, question will then arise whether or not Commission is to assist in conducting elections in South Korea. Your instructions are that you are to oppose association of Commission with conduct of elections in South Korea only. If Commission decides not to support this view you are to state that you cannot participate further in its activities until you have received further instructions from your Government.

6. There is no objection to making our view clear in public session if this is necessary but we would be glad if any public controversy on this matter could be avoided.

UNITED NATIONS; KOREA COMMISSION

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that notice had just been received that a question would be asked in the House that afternoon concerning the press report that the Canadian Delegate to the UN Commission on Korea had "walked out" of a meeting and refused to return for a later session.

The situation was somewhat obscure, but it appeared that Mr. Patterson's hand had been forced by the action of the Chairman and Vice-Chairman in deciding that the advice of the Interim Committee should be accepted without a formal meeting of the Commission. Accordingly, when the matter came up for discussion, the Canadian Delegate had found, on returning from Tokyo, that the decision had been taken to proceed with the elections. Apparently on this ground he withdrew from the Commission.

It seemed that Mr. Patterson's action had been in accordance with the instructions given him, although it had been expected it would have been possible for him to withdraw unobtrusively. Circumstances had rendered this impossible, however.

It would now be necessary for the government to state the position and it was suggested that, since accurate information was far from complete, it be said that Mr. Patterson had been recalled to Ottawa for consultation but that no formal withdrawal from the Commission had taken place.

(Departmental memoranda to the Minister, Mar. 9† and 10,† 1948).

10. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the course proposed by the Minister and agreed that a statement to that effect be made in the House that afternoon.

Following for Norman from Pearson, Begins: Your telegram No. 80.† Considerable publicity is being given in the press here to what is called Dr. Patterson's "walk out" on the Korean Commission. Please ask Dr. Patterson to cable us as soon as possible, if he has not already done so, the circumstances surrounding his withdrawal from the Commission, which we hoped could have been done with a minimum of sensation. I assume that he did not walk out in the middle of a meeting, but merely refrained from participating in the afternoon meeting. I would like information on this point and any other relevant circumstances. As soon as Dr. Patterson's report is received, the Cabinet here will decide what the next step is to be. KOREAN COMMISSION

Dr. E.H. Norman, Head of the Canadian Liaison Mission in Tokyo, Japan, telephoned this morning to report on a conversation which he had had last night with Dr. G.S. Patterson, Canadian representative on the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea. Dr. Norman is sending through a telegram on his conversation with Dr. Patterson.

2. Dr. Patterson denied emphatically the press reports concerning his actions in the Commission. He stated that, as instructed, he had raised a question concerning the propriety of the members of the Commission present in Seoul deciding outside the Commission to authorize the Acting Chairman, Mr. Liu, to make a statement on March 1 to the effect that the Commission would supervise elections in South Korea as recommended by the Interim Committee. It was as a result of this statement that General Hodge announced the May 9th date for elections. There had been some discussion of his proposal in the Commission and at the conclusion of this discussion he had left the chamber and gone to his room. He had made no statement about leaving the Commission or anything of this nature. Later the Chairman had telephoned him and said that they were now discussing the nature of a statement to be issued by the Commission and wished the benefit of his views. Dr. Patterson had returned to the chamber at that time and had participated in the discussion of a statement which was later issued. This statement indicated that the question of the Commission's role in supervising the Korean elections announced by General Hodge was still under consideration. Dr. Patterson was participating in these discussions and there was no question of a walk-out as the press had irresponsibly reported. Dr. Patterson had made no statement to the press concerning the discussions in the Commission. He had simply stated that any statement concerning proceedings in a private session would have to be made by the Chairman.

3. I told Mr. Norman that I thought Dr. Patterson had behaved with admirable discretion and that it was most unfortunate that the incident was so unfairly and mistakenly played up in the United States press. One suspects that the United States military authorities in Korea may have encouraged this, and that the State Department would not be disappointed by this version of the situation.<sup>25</sup>

4. I also told Mr. Norman to tell Dr. Patterson to attend meetings of the Commission while he was awaiting instructions from Ottawa, but not to participate in the proceedings in any way. I had a word about this with the Prime Minister, who indicated that this course would be entirely satisfactory.

5. I am worried, somewhat, about Patterson's own position. It appears that feelings are running very high in Korea at the moment, and that Patterson is becoming the center of a violent controversy. The attacks on him by Koreans have, so far, been only verbal, but I do not think that his physical safety can be assured; especially if the Commission accepts the Canadian position. This is, however, I think, an unlikely contingency, and Patterson's personal unpopularity may be overlooked in the popular satisfaction over the prospect of elections.

6. I thought that you might wish to have this information that we received by telephone, in advance of the telegram which no doubt will come in shortly from Dr. Norman on this subject.

L.B. P[EARSON]

<sup>25</sup> Dans son rapport à Patterson sur cette conversation, Norman a attribué à Pearson le commentaire In his report of this conversation to Patterson, Norman attributed to Pearson the comment that Pearson

"was quite sure that the Americans were attempting to squeeze us by this tactic."

Selon Wrong, les rapports de Séoul au département d'État qualifiaient le geste de Patterson comme un «walkout» et soulignaient son effet «discouraging» sur le moral des Coréens. Ces rapports suggéraient également que les réunions de la fin février étaient «official and plenary», après quoi Menon et Patterson étaient censés être «consulted». C'est seulement après que cette controverse eut éclaté que ces réunions furent reclassifiées comme étant «informal», ce qui laissa le général Hodge dans une situation gênante. (DEA/204-A(S): WA-750, 12 mars).†

According to Wrong, the reports from Seoul to the State Department depicted Patterson's move as a "walk-out" and emphasized its "discouraging" effect on Korean morale. These reports also suggested that the meetings in late February were "official and plenary," after which Menon and Patterson were supposed to be "consulted." Only after the controversy erupted were these reclassified as "informal," with General Hodge left out on a limb. (DEA/204-A(S): WA-750, March 12).†

Note
Memorandum

[Ottawa], March 12, 1948

CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
AND DR. ROBERT T. OLIVER, ADVISER OF THE KOREAN COMMISSION
IN WASHINGTON, D.C., MARCH 11, 1948.

Dr. Oliver informed Mr. St. Laurent that he had flown up to Ottawa on cabled instructions of Dr. Syngman Rhee, head of the Society for the Rapid Realization of Korean Independence, which is the dominant political grouping in South Korea. Dr. Rhee had asked him to bring to the attention of the Canadian Government the consternation felt by the Korean people over the attitude taken by the Canadian Representative (Dr. Patterson) on the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, and the Canadian Representative (Mr. Pearson) on the Interim Committee of the General Assembly at its recent meeting at Lake Success. Dr. Rhee thought that the legal arguments advanced by the Canadian Representatives must cover some deeper difficulties seen by the Canadian Government of which he was not aware. News reports of Dr. Patterson's "walk out" on the Korean Commission were incomprehensible to Koreans who regarded Canada as a friendly democratic country.

Mr. St. Laurent said that, according to information we had received by telephone from Tokyo that morning, the news reports were erroneous and misleading. It was true that Dr. Patterson had expressed surprise at members of the Commission proceeding in an informal manner to decide they would go ahead with the observation of elections in South Korea. Dr. Patterson had pointed out that the Interim Committee resolution was only advisory and it was up to the Commission to decide, in accordance with its rules of procedure, whether or not it would accept this advice. Later Dr. Patterson had excused himself and gone to his room. He had returned for the afternoon session when a press release explaining the relation of the Commission to General Hodge's announcement of the date of Korean elections was discussed. There was no question of a "walk-out".

As for the legal arguments Mr. Pearson had advanced in the Interim Committee, Mr. St. Laurent said that these were not a cloak for some more deep seated reasons. The Canadian Government was concerned that the United Nations should act only within the terms of the Charter. The General Assembly resolutions of November 14, 1947 had laid down a programme for the realization of Korean national independence. Neither the Commission, nor the Interim Committee had the right to alter the terms of these General Assembly resolutions. That could only be done by the General Assembly. We did not want the Soviet Union to be able to criticize the work of the Commission in South Korea as illegal.

Mr. St. Laurent thought that if elections were to be held in South Korea only to establish an interim government dependent on the United States for support, then it was the responsibility of the United States as the occupying power to run these elections. Elections of this character had been run by the occupying powers in the various zones of Germany.

Dr. Oliver said that the aspirations of the Koreans for national independence had been thwarted so long now that a highly explosive atmosphere had been created in Korea. He wondered if Dr. Patterson had reported on Korean reactions to the work of the Commission. Mr. St. Laurent said that as Dr. Patterson had no staff to encypher his telegrams he had to confine his reports to essentials. Dr. Oliver hoped that, if for any reason Dr. Patterson was compelled to withdraw from the Commission, he would make it clear that it was not from want of Canadian sympathy with the aspirations of Koreans for national independence.

Mr. St. Laurent said no decision had been taken to withdraw the Canadian Representative from the Commission. He thought that Mr. Pearson had made it quite clear in the Interim Committee that Canada was in full sympathy with the objective of establishing Korean independence. However, he would be glad to assure Dr. Oliver that if the Government should decide to withdraw from the Korean Commission very careful consideration would be given to the wording of a statement that would make it quite clear to the Korean people that Canadians fully sympathized with their aspirations to national independence and hoped this independence would soon be achieved. If we decided we could not properly participate in the Commission's supervision of elections in South Korea we would gladly say more power to the other members who felt they could assist in this way in furthering the cause of Korean independence.

Tokyo, March 15, 1948

Following for Pearson from Patterson, Begins: Relayed by telephone to Tokyo.

Have just received summary of Norman's telephone conversation of March 11th with you. Covering letter† states that you might still desire telegram.

2. This will confirm my statement as quoted by Norman that in no sense did I withdraw from the Commission. Nor could my action be described as a "walk-out".

3. After debating throughout the two sessions on March 9th, the Commission voted 3 to 2 against issuing of press release designed to (meet your requirements?) for clarifying statement on Commission's relationship to public statements of March 1st. On the assent of the Chairman that I was correct in concluding that this meant that the Commission was unwilling to issue any clarifying statement, I said that I would have to act under Government instructions and abstain from further Commission activities until I received further instructions. The Chairman said that the Commission would regret the action I had to take but would quite understand that I had no other alternative.

4. I then quietly left the room, this being the natural and correct thing to do. The Chairman has assured me it seems so to him also and that under the same circumstances he would have acted in exactly the same way. The action could not be interpreted as what is generally known as "walk-out".

5. The Chairman telephoned me within a half-hour to confirm his understanding that I had not withdrawn from the Commission but must only abstain from activity until instructions were received. He said the Commission wished to reconsider its vote. The decision was then immediately reversed by vote of 4 to 0.

6. That night I explained to the Associated Press, New York Times and United Press reporters the position of Canada as I had stated it at the open meeting of the Commission on Monday but declined to answer any question about Tuesday's meeting and referred them to the Chairman.

7. Subsequently I learned that Rich, United Press reporter, had betrayed the confidence of Grand, United Nations Public Relations Officer, who had given background of Tuesday's meeting in off-the-record talk. In Tokyo Stars and Stripes Rich's communiqué states "Patterson walks out and said that he would not attend no more meetings." Rich says that his communiqué was twisted by Stars and Stripes and promised to give me his original text but has failed to do so. I have not seen United States or Canadian press reports and Rich says that he has not received "play back".

8. As a result of betrayal of confidence, Grand has told other reporters he will give no further off-the-record talks when Rich is present.

9. Grand told Associated Press reporter I had not left the room, justifying this statement because of misinterpretation Rich had given.

10. See my telegram No. 87† for Rich's tactics after meeting of March 12th.

11. I acted as I did in desire to confirm to your instructions repeated ten times in your telegram. Absenting myself from meetings of the Commission seemed to me only way open "to abstain from activities." It still seems to me less emphatic than return to Tokyo. When I followed the latter course on your instructions I understood that it was interpreted here as indicating a virtual withdrawal. Even if I had remained until adjournment on Tuesday the press could have given same wrong interpretation in view of the statements that I had had to make.

12. Nevertheless, in view of the opportunity that physical act of leaving the room affords the press to represent this action, I feel that it was a mistake to have done so. For the same reason I have decided to attend future meetings of the Commission unless you instruct me definitely that this would not be in conformity with your instructions.<sup>26</sup>

13. I have cleared this telegram with the Chairman and he is in complete agreement with facts and with my interpretation.<sup>27</sup> His comment on paragraph 4 was "absolutely".

14. I should be grateful for your comments on the above and your further advice regarding course I should now follow. Ends.

KOREAN COMMISSION

Further telegrams (Nos. 86-89)† were received over the weekend from the Canadian Liaison Mission in Tokyo reporting that on March 12 the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea passed the following resolution:

"To observe elections announced by the Commanding General of the American Forces to be held May 9th, 1948, provided that it has ascertained that the elections will be held in a free atmosphere wherein democratic rights of freedom of speech, press, and assembly will be recognized and respected."

The vote in favour was 4 to 2 with Canada and Australia against, and Syria and France abstaining. At the time of voting Dr. Patterson made the following statement: "I wish formally to announce to the Commission that I will have to abstain from the activities of the Commission until I receive further instructions from Ottawa." He did not withdraw from the conference room.

2. In voting on this resolution the Commission in effect recognized the validity of Dr. Patterson's objections to the irregularity of the earlier informal agreement to observe elections in South Korea reached by members of the Commission without consulting him and without the convening of a regular Commission meeting. This should serve as a lesson to members of the Commission and U.S. Military Government officers in South Korea that a United Nations Commission cannot be pressed into making irregular decisions. Undoubtedly Dr. Patterson's forceful representations were instrumental in getting the Commission back on the rails again.

3. In considering what instructions should now be sent to Dr. Patterson, two courses are open:

(a) to recall Dr. Patterson for consultation; thereby deferring a decision, or

In Despatch 7, 15 March, † Patterson indicated his distress and anger at the way his action had been reported. (DEA/50068-40).

(b) to authorize Dr. Patterson to continue to serve on the Commission within the limits of further explicit instructions.<sup>28</sup>

4. Dr. Patterson reports that before the vote on the resolution to observe elections, Mr. Menon, the Commission Chairman, made a statement to the effect that if the directive from the Interim Committee had been categorical he would not have been willing to participate. However, Mr. Menon attaches great importance to the authority of the Commission to withdraw at any time. The resolution adopted only commits the Commission to observe the elections in South Korea, "provided it has ascertained that elections will be held in a free atmosphere." Responsibility for conducting the elections rests with the U.S. Military Government. The Commission's responsibilities are limited to observing, consulting, and advising. It may be argued that in observing elections in South Korea the actual conduct of which is in the hands of the U.S. Army, the Commission would not by this act alone be exceeding the terms of reference contained in the General Assembly resolutions of November 14, 1947, provided it made no commitment regarding recognition of those elected as the National Government of Korea.

5. If the Government so desires, therefore, they could leave Dr. Patterson on the Commission to play a passive role. Such a decision, in view of the terms of the Temporary Commission's resolution, would not, I think, be inconsistent with your statement in the House of Commons. That statement said that if Dr. Patterson confirmed that the Commission "has, in fact, in this manner, decided to associate itself with elections in South Korea only, he will be instructed, by cable, to return at once to Ottawa for consultation."

6. If Dr. Patterson does return for consultation, he should, I think, be advised at once. This will postpone any decision as to whether the Government will or will not associate itself with the Commission in its future activities, but it will be only a postponement. Eventually, Dr. Patterson will have to be given instructions and, if those instructions are not to participate further in the Commission's work, that fact will, in due course, become known.

7. On the other hand, if the Government do not wish to recall Dr. Patterson to Ottawa, there would not now, I think, be any great danger of complications in following this course, owing to the form of the Commission's decision and to its timetable of operations outlined in the paragraph following.

This memorandum was circulated to Cabinet and St. Laurent presented these alternatives.

Cabinet authorized Patterson to stay on the Commission

"for observation of the elections to be conducted in South Korea by the US military government; it being understood that the Commission were not thereby exceeding the terms of reference contained in the General Assembly resolution of November 14, 1947, and that the Commission would withdraw if it were ascertained that elections were not held in free conditions."

***

(Cabinet Conclusions, 18 March).† This decision was communicated to Patterson (DEA/50068-40: Telegram 73, March 18).†

8. It may be forecast that with elections held on May 9th, a constituent assembly would not be convened before the middle or end of June. This assembly would address itself during the summer months to the formation of a government and discussion of a constitution. It is altogether probable that the Korean Commission could without difficulty defer for reference to the September session of the General Assembly the crucial question; whether it should be recommended to members of the United Nations that the South Korean Government should be recognized as the National Government of Korea because it represents two thirds of the population.

9. In view of the unwillingness of the Soviet Union to cooperate with the Korean Commission, it is altogether unlikely that members of the Commission would wish to assume responsibility for answering this key question. It is fortunate, therefore, that so far as can be foreseen it, and other important questions may be conveniently left over for consideration by the September session of the General Assembly. Under these circumstances the risks involved in authorizing Dr. Patterson to continue to serve on the Commission as it observes elections would not be great.

10. A decision to withdraw the Canadian representative from the Korean Commission would bring criticism from certain quarters. Spokesmen for Korean groups have visited Ottawa recently and also called on General McNaughton in New York to report the alleged dismay with which Koreans have listened to expositions of the Canadian view. The Chinese Foreign Minister called Mr. Davis in on Friday to urge continued Canadian participation in the work of the Commission. The Australians, who have supported our view, have accepted the majority decision and urged us to maintain our representation on the Commission in order to help keep it on the rails. An increasing amount of comment is appearing in the Canadian newspapers calling attention to our criticisms of the Soviet Union for boycotting activities of the United Nations with which it did not agree, and wondering whether Canada would withdraw from the Korean Commission.

Joseph E. Jacobs, Delegation of United States, General Assembly of United Nations.

Our assessment of the post-election political atmosphere in South Korea, as well as a study of the wording of the General Assembly Resolutions of 14 November 1947 incline us to the view that the Commission should leave, and make clear that it is leaving the initiative in formation of a government and or other steps to the acknowledged leaders of the elected representatives of the people of South Korea. They have sought responsible government and if the United States chooses to give it to them, then in the final analysis it is for these elected Korean leaders to weigh the various factors that should be taken into account in choosing a policy directed toward their ultimate objective of national independence.

2. Elected Korean representatives will have to consider whether conversations with South and North Korean political figures who did not participate in recent elections would serve any useful purpose at this time and if so whether such conversations should take place before or after the elected representatives have organized themselves into a governmental body and discussed with U.S. authorities questions relating to assumption of governmental responsibilities. We are not repeat not prepared to express a view on this problem now except to urge that full implications of steps taken be considered in advance and that Korean leaders making these decisions realize they must assume full responsibility for their actions.

3. The question of the need of South Korea for continuing economic and military aid will also require consideration. We understand that present bill before U.S. Congress providing 150 million dollars for reconstruction in Japan, Ryukyus and Korea would still be available after end of occupation. There is no assurance so far as we know that U.S. would be prepared to maintain indefinitely forces in South Korea even on request.

4. Title assumed by any government established may have a bearing on its recognition abroad. Recognition is the prerogative of individual governments and Commission can only recommend to United Nations Assembly that it recommend to members that they adopt a certain attitude.

5. From above you will observe that we favour the Commission being cautious about giving advice now and should certainly not give it in too authoritative a form. We favour the Koreans themselves assuming responsibility for their future course of action. Commission should consider where it can defer decisions on important matters relating to the international status of any government established for consideration by the General Assembly in September.

Dear Hume [Wrong],

We have been recently receiving information from various sources that the United States military people in Korea are suggesting, both directly and by implication, that the Canadian member on that Commission is a Communist or a fellow traveller. We are getting a little sick of this, and the mentality of military government authorities who consider that those who are not for them in all their policies, whether right or wrong, must be Communists. We get especially tired of it when they pass on their suspicions to United States news agencies.

So far as we are concerned, Patterson has done a good job on the Commission and the job he was instructed to do. Furthermore, the experiences and activities of the Commission have justified many of our doubts about its usefulness, and confirmed one or two of our worst fears. I hope, therefore, that the next time the opportunity presents itself, you will give some of the people in the State Department an indication of our impatience at the slurs that are being made in certain United States quarters in Korea on the work of our representative.

Yours sincerely,

UNITED NATIONS TEMPORARY COMMISSION ON KOREA

The Korean Commission returned to Seoul on June 7 from Shanghai where it has been drafting the first part of its report to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

2. On June 17, Mr. Butterworth and Mr. Hickerson of the United States Department of State discussed the Korean Commission with our Ambassador in Washington. These gentlemen were concerned about information which they had received from Shanghai that the report of the Commission would be rather critical in character.

3. They felt that their information on the election did not indicate that a report of such a nature would be justified. Since the Commission had supervised the election to some extent, they hoped that the Commission would give a boost to the election results and return to Seoul. Mr. Butterworth hoped that we might send instructions along these lines to Dr. Patterson.

4. On June 18, Mr. Collins of our Washington Embassy and Mr. Butterworth had a further conversation. Mr. Butterworth said that the Korean Assembly was going ahead with the drafting of a constitution and the formation of a government. He wished the Commission to continue with the task assigned to it by the United Nations resolutions on the basis of the elections which had been held and to give as much help as possible to the Korean Assembly in setting up their new government.

5. On June 18 Mr. Ross, Deputy United States representative to the United Nations, raised the matter of the Korean Commission with the Canadian Permanent Delegate in New York. Mr. Ross said that information received by the State Department indicated that some members, including the Canadian representative on the Commission, were disposed to take a discouraging view about the elections which might give rise to doubts as to the democratic qualities of the elections. Mr. Ross also expressed the hope that the Commission would remain in Korea until the middle of August at least and that the Canadian representative would not urge the Commission to terminate its activities on the completion of its report.

6. Report of the Commission. Dr. Patterson has informed us, in his despatch No. 20 of June 5,† a copy of which is attached, that the first five chapters of the Commission's report have been approved and forwarded to Lake Success from Shanghai. They are factual in character. The sixth chapter, containing the impressions, opinions and conclusions of the Commission, has been given preliminary consideration in Shanghai and is expected to be completed in Seoul by August 1st. The report as a whole will be single and unified.

7. It is hoped that the report will be distributed to member Governments of the United Nations by August 21. Although the report is not to be made public until it is presented to the General Assembly, Dr. Patterson has also written in the same despatch "that I have already reported to you the favourable opinion I formed on the administrative efficiency with which the elections were conducted, on the satisfactory adherence to electoral rules and regulations, on the reasonable degree of freedom maintained and on protection of the secrecy of the ballot. Although no formal statement has been made, it seems to be generally known that the opinions of all the members are similarly favourable."

8. In the light of this information we see no reason for the United States concern that the report itself will be unduly critical in nature.

9. Future Activities of the Commission. In our last secret telegram of instructions to Dr. Patterson, No. 122 of June 4th,† a copy of which is attached, the opinion was given that the Commission should clearly leave the initiative in the formation of a government and/or other steps to the acknowledged leaders of the elected representatives of the people of South Korea. I am attaching a copy of despatch No. 21 of June 6 from Dr. Patterson in which he has reported that there is full agreement among Commission members that the Commission should wait until asked by the Korean representatives for consultation.

10. Moreover, Dr. Patterson has informed us that while there would seem to be no objection on the part of the Commission to the establishment of a provisional Government for South Korea for administrative purposes, most of the members believe it would be unwise if the present assembly should attempt to assume the title or the rights of a Sovereign Government. Dr. Patterson has given it as his personal view that the only positive action which the Commission can take in the future, under its terms of reference, would be to consult with the elected Korean representatives, "regarding the prompt attainment of the freedom and independence of the Korean people," and if in the end this problem should be insoluble, to refer it to the General Assembly of the United Nations. This line of thought would appear to be consistent with our past policy.

11. However, until we are further informed of the direction in which the Korean Assembly is proceeding, we do not think it is necessary to expand on the instructions to Dr. Patterson, which are contained in the attached secret telegram No. 122 of June 4, † nor do we think that we are in a position to assure the United States that our representative will or will not counsel the Commission to terminate its activities in Korea on completion of the report on or about August 1st.

12. I attach for your approval, a proposed telegram to Dr. Patterson † informing him of these representations and reassuring him of our support.

Ottawa, July 13, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Pursuant to our conversation at lunch today concerning the question of the recognition of the Korean Government, I understand that the views of my Government are as follows:

(a) The right of the General Assembly to reach its own decisions, as established in the conclusions of the report of the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, is recognized by the Government of the United States with reference to whether or not and if so how far the new Korean Government fulfils the object of the General Assembly Resolutions of November 14, 1947, concerning the re-establishment of the country's national independence. The United States is desirous of avoiding any incident which could be considered detrimental to that right.

(b) The United States is, however, the occupying power and therefore must make its own estimation of the new government before undertaking any negotiations with it for the purpose of carrying out the further Resolutions of the General Assembly concerning the transfer of governmental functions, removal of the forces of occupation and other matters which these Resolutions require to be carried out upon the formation of the new government. It is thought that hesitation by the United States to commence the carrying out of these further provisions as soon as such a government has been established could be interpreted as want of trust in that regime, and to that extent its prestige would probably suffer both internally and externally. Since it is likely that two or three months will pass after the government has been constituted and before the General Assembly will consider the problem and since the enthusiasm of the Korean nationalists is very great, it is believed that refusal on our part to act before the deliberations of the General Assembly could also cause serious disturbances for which, as the occupying power, we would be responsible.

(c) It is felt very strongly that any act by the United States or by the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea or its member states which could possibly be considered as disavowal of the new government would seriously jeopardize the very considerable achievements of the UN thus far in re-establishing the Korean people's independence and freedom. Considering the peculiar position of the United States in the matter as the principal progenitor of the General Assembly Resolutions and as the actual occupying power from whom the new regime will acquire its sovereignty, the granting of even some limited form of recognition on its part could be thus construed. Moreover, any loss of authority or dignity by the new government in South Korea would most certainly assist the puppet government to the north, and as a result would make less possible the country's ultimate unity on any basis except as a Russian satellite.

(d) My Government also believes that the matter of whether or not the Korean Government should be viewed as a national regime must be determined by the people of the country through the medium of their newly elected delegates. I understand this view is consistent with the Resolutions of the General Assembly, especially as they have been interpreted by the Interim Committee.

(e) The United States is of the opinion that it would admit the total lack of power of the United Nations to effectuate the clear preference of most of its members in face of the resistance of a lone state acting against the majority if we were to accept the idea that a government established in the south could not be considered a truly national government because such recognition might lead to similar action in northern Korea by the Russians. It may also be true that if we should fail to consider the government in the south as a truly national regime it would invite the Russians to grant just that recognition to their regime in the north as a measure of consolidation. Thus it is believed that any consideration of the new regime in South Korea as pertaining to that area alone would probably strengthen the present partition of that nation and make it all the more difficult to incorporate the northern area.

(f) In view of the facts discussed above my Government is now considering the publication of a statement shortly after the establishment of the new Korean regime to the effect that the Government of the United States considers it the national government of the country as stipulated in the Resolutions of the General Assembly and that a special representative will be sent to treat with it, in consultation with the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, respecting the carrying out of the other provisions in these Resolutions. The Department of State would welcome your reaction to the views expressed in this letter.

Sincerely yours,

JULIAN F. HARRINGTON

Ottawa, July 19, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I have just received from Washington certain information concerning my Government's views on Korea which supplements that contained in my letter to you of July 13, 1948.

With regard to point (e) of that letter, it is our opinion that recognition of the recently established legislature as the "National Assembly" would most probably not have any effect on Soviet action in northern Korea. We are informed that they have been consistently promoting a project for a "National Government" in the north for a long time and, as shown by the last session of the Pyongyang, this plan is nearing accomplishment.

Prompt recognition of the national assembly in Seoul by the United Nations would be expected to result in many benefits. The objection that Russia would set up a government of her own is considered to be without foundation because this action is already under way in north Korea completely without regard for the efforts and resolutions of the United Nations Commission and the United Nations itself.

Sincerely yours,

JULIAN F. HARRINGTON

[Ottawa], August 10, 1948

I am enclosing herewith a copy of a memorandum on recognition of the Korean government which I have sent to the Minister. Mr. St. Laurent approves of it generally, but has asked me to send a copy to you for your consideration also.

We have been asked both by the United Kingdom Government and the United States Government for our views on the Korean situation following the election of a parliament for South Korea, the setting up of a government in that area and the desire of that government to be recognized as the government of Korea. Also, this matter will come up at the forthcoming United Nations Assembly and we will be expected to state our position in regard to it at that time.

In brief, the recommendations made in the memorandum are that, notwithstanding the desire of the United States Government, we should not recognize the newly established government in Seoul as the government of Korea at this time, because its writ does not run over the whole of Korea and, in any event, full governmental powers have not in fact been transferred to it by the United States occupying authorities.

In order, however, to avoid the impression that we are unfriendly to the aspirations of the Korean people for independence or that we have ignored the election of a Representative Assembly for those parts of Korea where an election was possible, it is suggested that the Canadian Government should send a friendly but non-committal message of congratulation to the Chairman of the above Assembly on the progress made to date in the achievement of the goal of Korean independence.

A copy of the draft message for this purpose is attached for your consideration.† You will note that in this message we emphasize that the recent elections were in South Korea only and that the government formed is for South Korea only. However, we do offer the good wishes of the Canadian people to the Korean people in the progress which they are making towards complete independence.

RECOGNITION OF THE KOREAN GOVERNMENT

Background

1. The Assembly of 200 representatives chosen in the elections held in South Korea on May 10 under the observation of the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea is expected to proclaim the establishment of the Government of the Republic of Korea about August 15. The Assembly has already approved a Constitution and elected Dr. Syngman Rhee as first President of the Republic. He is now choosing a Cabinet which has to be approved by the Assembly.

2. The United States Government is considering the publication of a statement shortly after the establishment of the new Korean regime along the following lines:

"The Government of the United States believes that the present Korean Government is the Government stipulated in the resolutions of the General Assembly. Pending action by the General Assembly, a special representative will be sent to treat with this Government, in consultation with the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea, respecting the carrying out of the other provisions in these resolutions."

The United States Embassy in Ottawa in letters of July 13 and 19 has informed us of the reasons why the United States considers it desirable to take the action mentioned above, and has asked for an expression of our views.

Recommendations

3. I recommend that:

(a) we inform the United States Government that

(i) we would not favour the extension of recognition to the newly established Government in Seoul until we are satisfied that full governmental powers have in fact been transferred to it;

(ii) we think it unwise for the new Government to claim to be the national government of the whole of Korea and we would not favour its recognition as such.

(iii) we consider that the elected Assembly should be permitted, if it so desires, to go ahead with the formation of a Government, and that it would be in order for the United States Government to hand over to it governmental powers as far as practicable.

(iv) we think that the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea should be available for consultation during the process mentioned in (iii) above. Final responsibility, however, rests with the elected Korean Assembly and the United States Government.

(v) to give the Koreans a pat on the back and clear up any misunderstanding concerning the attitude of the Canadian Government we propose to send a friendly message of congratulations to the Chairman of the Assembly in Seoul on the progress made to date toward the achievement of the goal of Korean independence.

(vi) we would be glad to have some indication of the views of the United States Government regarding the further disposition of the Korean question at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

(b) we inform the United Kingdom Government, which has asked for our views, of the nature of the reply being returned.

(c) we send instructions along these lines to Dr. Patterson.

Reasons

4. My reason for opposing the granting of recognition, de facto or de jure, to the new Government when it is proclaimed on August 15, is that it will at that time actually enjoy no governmental powers. Under international law and diplomatic practice recognition is only granted when it is clear to the recognizing state that a Government does in fact exercise full governmental powers within reasonably well-defined borders and that it has a reasonable chance of survival. The United States proposes to send a special representative to Korea to negotiate with the new Korean Government in consultation with the United Nations Temporary Commission regarding the transfer of power. Until more definite information on the timetable is forthcoming from the United States Government or actual efforts indicate that the necessary transfer of powers has taken place recognition of the new Korean Government, either de facto or de jure, would appear to be unwarranted.

5. My reason for thinking it unwise for the new Government to claim to be the national government of Korea is that such a claim would have no real basis in fact or law. Its authority derives from the election held in South Korea only and its writ cannot be extended north of the 38th parallel. As they have done in Dairen, the Russians may argue that they are in legitimate occupation of North Korea until they sign a peace treaty with Japan. Furthermore, the new Government in South Korea will only derive its governmental powers in that zone as they are turned over to it by the United States Military Government. The new Government could not acquire de jure or de facto power in the north merely by claiming to be the National Government of Korea and therefore the rightful Government of North Korea. Moreover, by making such a claim the new Government would probably make more difficult its relations with the Soviet occupation authorities in North Korea in any negotiations over North-South communications or commerce (e.g. hydro-electric supply) or in possible future moves toward unification of the country. By being a little more modest in its pretensions I do not see that the new Government would sacrifice any of the prestige it has gained from compliance with the United Nations resolutions.

Proposed Message

6. Attached for your consideration is a draft of a message suggested in 3 (a) (v) above.†

Ottawa, August 13, 1948

Dear Mr. Harrington:

I should like to refer to your letters of July 13 and 19 regarding the question of "recognition of the Korean Government" and to communicate to you the views of the Canadian Government on this subject.

2. The Canadian Government recognizes the strength of the desire of the people in South Korea, as represented by the recently elected Assembly, to proceed without delay with the formation of a government. It does not consider that the formation of such a government would be contrary to the intention of the United Nations General Assembly Resolutions of November 14, 1947, interpreted in the light of developments which have taken place since that date. It appreciates the reasons which have prompted the decision of the United States Government to enter into conversations with the leaders of the elected Korean representatives when requested by them to do so regarding the transfer of governmental functions to the new government being formed. While responsibility for determining the extent and timetable of this transfer of authority must rest with the United States Government and the Korean Government which will be assuming power at Seoul, it considers that the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea should be available for consultation during this process in accordance with the provisions of the General Assembly Resolutions.

3. As regards recognition of the new Government, the Canadian Government proposes to apply the general principles of international law. It cannot see its way clear to granting recognition until it is satisfied that the new Government is possessed of full governmental powers.

4. The Canadian Government believes that it would be unwise for the new Government to claim to be "the National Government of Korea." Such a claim, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, would have no real basis in fact. The Assembly now meeting in Seoul has received a mandate only from the people of South Korea, and North Korea is under Soviet control. The new Government will acquire governmental powers only in South Korea as these are handed over to it by the United States Military Government. By claiming to be the rightful Government of North Korea the new Government would probably make more difficult its relations with the Soviet occupation authorities in North Korea, or any provisional North Korean regime they may sponsor, in any negotiations over North-South communications and commerce (e.g. hydro-electric power supply) and possible future moves toward unification of the country. As they have done in Dairen, the Russians may argue that they are in legitimate occupation of North Korea until they sign a peace treaty with Japan. Without sacrificing the prestige it enjoys from United Nations approval, it would appear wiser for the Koreans to maintain a degree of flexibility in their claims regarding the representative character of the Government they are establishing. Their claims rest on moral rather than legal or factual grounds.

5. In making these observations concerning the situation in Korea, the Canadian Government does not wish to convey the impression that it is dissatisfied with the elections held in South Korea on May 10 or the steps now being taken toward the formation of a Government by the Assembly now sitting in Seoul. It considers it desirable that the Assembly and Government properly chosen in accordance with the terms of the Resolutions of the General Assembly of the United Nations, although presently limited to South Korea, should receive the approval of member governments of the United Nations which voted for the Resolutions of November 14, 1947. It is the hope of the Canadian Government that the steps so well taken in South Korea toward the formation of a representative government will in due course be taken similarly in North Korea so that eventually a united and independent Korean Government may be formed.<sup>30</sup>

6. The Canadian Government would be glad to have in advance some indication of the views of the United States Government regarding the further disposition of the Korean question at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Yours sincerely,

KOREAN QUESTIONS

Debate began in the Political Committee of the General Assembly this morning on the Korean question. The Delegation has sent us the text of a Draft Resolution, copy attached, which we understand is to be jointly sponsored by Australia, China and the United States. A number of delegations have indicated that they would be able to support the Resolution in its present form.

2. The Draft Resolution declares that there has been established a lawful government (the Government of the Republic of Korea), having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the Temporary Commission was able to observe and consult and in which the great majority of the people of Korea reside; that this government is based on elections which were a valid expression of the free will of the electorate of that part of Korea and which were observed by the Temporary Commission; and that this is the only such government in Korea. It recommends that the occupying powers withdraw their armed forces from Korea as early as practicable. It then goes on to establish a new Commission on Korea to replace the Temporary Commission. The new Commission would lend good offices to bring about the unification of Korea, seek to remove barriers to friendly intercourse between North and South, observe the withdrawal of occupying forces and be available for consultation with regard to the further development of representative government in Korea based on the freely expressed will of the people. It calls upon member states to refrain from any act derogatory to the results already achieved or to be achieved by the United Nations in bringing about the complete independence and unification of Korea. (This provision is primarily directed to the Soviet Union.)

3. This Draft Resolution is substantially in accordance with Canadian views as outlined in the section of the statement approved by Cabinet on September 8 for the guidance of the Canadian Delegation. The Canadian Delegation has reported that they have examined the Draft Resolution and consider that, in its present form, it would constitute satisfactory action by the General Assembly. Unless, therefore, we advise to the contrary they propose to indicate their willingness to support this Resolution or one in substantially similar terms.

4. Our principal concern will be with the composition of the new Commission to be established to replace the Temporary Commission on which Canada is represented by Dr. G.S. Patterson. An earlier draft of this Resolution proposed that the new Commission should have five or seven members. The present draft does not indicate what the size of the Commission should be. We have had no indication from the Delegation concerning the views of other delegations on the membership of the Commission. The Delegation will be aware that the Government would prefer that Canada should not be represented on the new Commission. I think however that this should be restated in the telegram of instructions.

5. I attach for your consideration a proposed telegram† to the Delegation authorizing them to support the Draft Resolution or one in substantially similar terms and reiterating the view of the Government that it would prefer not to be represented on the new Commission.

RESTRICTED

Following is the Adviser's report on agenda Item No. 16 (which is shown as Section II/12 in Canada at the United Nations 1948) on "Korea".

This covers the action taken up to the close of sessions of Committee One, December 8th, 1948.

When the Temporary Commission on Korea presented its report to the third session of the General Assembly the problem was referred by the Assembly to Committee One for consideration and report.

Before the item was reached on the agenda it was proposed by the representative of Czechoslovakia that the Committee, at that time, should consider his draft resolution proposing that a delegation of the Korean Peoples' Democratic Republic should be invited to participate in the discussion on the question. (The Korean Peoples' Democratic Republic was established in North Korea as a result of elections held in North Korea on August 25th, in which, it was alleged, the people of South Korea had also participated.) The Czechoslovak proposal was rejected by the Committee. Subsequently, when the Committee took up the Korean question, the Czechoslovak draft resolution itself was rejected by 34 votes to 6 with 8 abstentions. In opposing the Czechoslovak resolution, the Canadian representative said that representations had been made in the resolution regarding elections in North Korea and the establishment of a so-called People's Democratic Republic. In default of verification of these representations, by the United Nations Temporary Commission, the Canadian representative believed that Committee One should not give the elections any support, or the persons supposed to have been chosen by them, any endorsement such as would be secured by passing the Czechoslovak resolution. He stated, however, that, once the representatives of the Government elected in South Korea under United Nations supervision had been heard, certain persons from that part of Korea occupied by the USSR army, which had refused to admit the United Nations Commission, might, if they were present, be given an opportunity to state to the Committee their views on the problem of Korean unification, and then withdraw.

By 39 votes to 6 with 1 abstention, the Committee adopted a Chinese draft resolution inviting the delegation of the Government of the Republic of Korea, to participate in the debate, without the right to vote. It was also agreed, without objection, to invite the Rapporteur of the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea to present its report.

The general debate on the question was held at the 231st to 235th meetings of the Committee during which a draft resolution was proposed by Australia, China and the United States, and a second draft resolution by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The draft resolution proposed by Australia, China and the United States approved the conclusions of the reports of the Temporary Commission; declared that a lawful Government (the Government of the Republic of Korea) had been established, having effective control and jurisdiction over that part of Korea where the Temporary Commission was able to observe and consult, . . . and that this was the only such Government in Korea; recommended that the occupying Powers should withdraw their occupying forces from Korea as early as practicable; and, resolved that a Commission on Korea should be established to continue the work of the Temporary Commission and to carry out the provisions of the present resolution. The draft resolution of Australia, China and United States was adopted by 41 to 6 with 2 abstentions. (The text of the Australia-China-United States resolution is given in appendix.)†

The draft resolution proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics which resolved that the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea should be abolished, was rejected by 42 to 6 with 3 abstentions.

During the general debate the Canadian representative who was the last speaker on the original list, offered to forego the privileges of speaking and, in the interest of securing a vote on the question before the Committee adjourned its present sessions, proposed that the general debate should be closed. The proposal was adopted by 35 to 6 with 2 abstentions.<sup>31</sup>

By a vote of 41 to 0 with 1 abstention,<sup>32</sup> the Committee adopted a proposal by the representative of the United States of America that the Commission on Korea should consist of the same member States which composed the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea. The representatives of the Byelo-Russian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and Yugoslavia did not take part in the vote and the representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, in addition, stated that his Government would not take part in any activities of the Commission provided for in the draft resolution. The Canadian representative, while stating that Canada would not oppose, at this stage, the proposal regarding the composition of the Commission, suggested the desirability of smaller Commission and reserved the right to move an amendment in the Assembly. Ends.

Another report lists 3 abstentions.

The solitary abstention was Canada.

Following from Riddell, Begins: Korean Question. The General Assembly began discussion of Korea at midnight, December 11th, and adjourned at 2 a.m. December 12th to meet at 3 p.m. December 12th.

2. At the latter session Mr. Wilgress presented a statement which had been approved by Mr. Pearson before leaving for London. He said the Canadian Government shared the confidence expressed by Committee One in the United Nations Temporary Commission on Korea and in the validity of the process by which the Korean Government had been established. He stated Canada's preference for a smaller Commission. Recognition of Ukraine's refusal to participate in the Commission would reduce the number to eight which would not be a convenient number. He indicated that Canada was prepared to withdraw from the Commission, thus reducing the number to seven.

3. The Resolution adopted by Committee One proposed that members of the new Commission should be the same as the Temporary Commission. Wilgress presented an amendment that the Commission should consist of Australia, China, El Salvador, France, India, the Philippines, and Syria. The amendment was carried 42 to 0 with 3 abstentions (Afghanistan, Siam, and Sweden). The Soviet bloc did not participate in the voting.

4. The Resolution from Committee One with this amendment was passed 48 to 6 with Sweden abstaining.

5. Information contained in this telegram should be added to report on Korea forwarded in telegram No. 598 of December 10th. Ends.

2. As you know, our instructions were specific to get off the Commission if we could, and I think that this has been very successfully done with a minimum of attention being attracted. Off the record, we have told delegations in Paris that on grounds both of economy and efficiency a Commission of nine was too large and that a Commission of five would have been quite adequate. None of the other members of the Commission wished however to withdraw, and therefore to reduce its members without causing controversy all that could be done was to have the Ukraine dropped and Canada withdraw. No objection could be taken to the first because the Ukraine had refused to co-operate with or even to recognize the Commission. As to the second, our withdrawal should not give rise to any misinterpretation especially as it was accompanied by a very friendly statement regarding the work of the Commission and desirability of Korean independence and unity. Dear Pierre [Dupuy]:

By now you will probably have received our circular document A.7 of January 12th,† with which was enclosed a memorandum of December 29th,† on the Indonesian question which was prepared in this Department for the information of our representative on the Security Council. You will recognize in that memorandum much of the material you have been good enough to send us in your despatches, and you will notice that we have relied rather heavily on the information which you have provided.

This week we have been wrestling with the problem of drafting instructions for General McNaughton on the Indonesian question for submission to the Minister for his consideration. The recent announcements of the plan to form a federation of about ten autonomous states means that we will have to consider the whole question in its broad outlines rather than confine ourselves to the problem of securing the effective implementation of the cease-fire order.

In trying to work out a suitable approach to this whole difficult question, we have been finding your numerous and useful reports on the situation as viewed from the Hague to be most helpful. We appreciate that you have been devoting much time and energy to the preparation of your frequent despatches, and I would like you and your staff to know how valuable we have found them.

Your close association and friendship with the Prime Minister and other high ranking officials of the Netherlands Government have, by enabling you to keep well abreast of current developments, made you one of our most important sources of information on the whole Indonesian question. This is especially so, since we have no representation at the present time in Batavia.

I would be glad if you would convey to Feaver a word of appreciation for the despatches which he sent us during your recent visit to Canada. Those, and others which he has written, have also been found most helpful here in Ottawa.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

INDONESIAN QUESTION

The Committee of Good Offices,<sup>33</sup> which was established in accordance with the Security Council's Resolution of August 25, 1947, offering its good offices to the parties to the Indonesian dispute, will submit its report to the Security Council on Wednesday, February 11th. A full discussion will then take place on all the developments in the Indonesian situation since December 9th, when the matter was last on the Council's agenda.

2. On February 3 the Members of the Committee of Good Offices reported to General McNaughton, as Chairman of the Council. The interview was reported in telegram No. 113 of February 3rd (copy attached).† The Committee indicated that they expect the Security Council to identify itself, on behalf of the United Nations, with the Agreements recently reached between the Dutch and the Indonesians under the auspices of the Committee.

3. General McNaughton, as Chairman of the Council, feels that it might be appropriate to introduce a resolution wherein the Council would endorse the work done by the Committee. To this end, he has sent us (in telegram No. 139 of February 7th, attached)† a tentative draft resolution in the following terms:

“The Security Council,

“Having considered the report of the Committee of Good Offices, informing the Council of the steps taken by the Netherlands Government and the Republic of Indonesia to comply with the Council's Resolution of August 1st, 1947;

“Notes with satisfaction the signing of the Truce Agreement by both parties and the acceptance by both parties of certain principles as an agreed basis for the conclusion of a political settlement in Indonesia;

“Commends the members of the Committee of Good Offices for the assistance they have given the two parties in their endeavours to settle their dispute by peaceful means, and endorses their offer of continued good offices in the working out of a political settlement;

“Maintains its offer of good offices contained in the Resolution of August 25th, 1947, and, to this end,

“Requests both parties and the Committee of Good Offices to keep the Council informed about the progress of the political settlement in Indonesia.”<sup>34</sup>

4. Because no agreement has ever been reached concerning the constitutional basis, under the United Nations Charter, upon which the Council has remained seized of the Indonesian Question, it would seem undesirable to associate the Council with the precise wording of the Truce and Political Agreements signed on January 17, 1948. Differences of opinion are quite likely to arise over the interpretation of these Agreements.

5. It is generally agreed by the parties concerned, and it probably will be agreed by the majority of the Members of the Council, that the Committee of Good Offices should continue to make its services available in overseeing the implementation of the above Agreements. The grounds for the continued functioning of the Committee appear to be provided for under Article I of the Twelve Political Principles, and Articles IV and V of the Six Additional Principles, as well as by the continuance of the Security Council's offer of good offices of August 25, 1947. Actually the Committee, by continuing its good offices, could render a great service to both sides by maintaining the confidence of all concerned in the justice of the forthcoming political settlement in Indonesia.

6. You may wish to make some report to the Cabinet on this matter. While tentative and subject to amendment, General McNaughton's resolution is non-controversial in character and, if introduced by him as Chairman at the beginning of the Council's discussion of the Committee's report on Wednesday, it may well serve to guide the course of the discussion, and may head off any controversial resolutions which other Members might wish to submit.<sup>35</sup>

General McNaughton telephoned yesterday evening to say that the discussions on Indonesia had opened in the Security Council. You will recall that he had prepared a draft resolution giving approval to the report of the Committee of Good Offices, the text of which we sent to you in a memorandum on February 9th. He showed this text in advance to various members of the Council, and secured the concurrence of the United States, the United Kingdom and other delegations. He also showed it to the representatives of Indonesia and the Netherlands. The Indonesians at first objected because they regarded the resolution as providing too little support for their position, but finally accepted it. They asked, however, that the last sentence in the draft resolution be altered by adding the word directly as follows:

"Requests both parties and the Committee of Good Offices to keep the Council directly informed about the progress of the political settlement in Indonesia"

The Indonesians asked for this amendment in order to protect their right of access to the Security Council. Van Kleffens and Van Roijen, who were representing the Dutch, accepted the amendment; and the revised draft was circulated. Subsequently, however, the Netherlands delegation objected privately to the change on the grounds that it conceded too much in the direction of Indonesian sovereignty; and General McNaughton is fearful lest the Netherlands may ask him or the Canadian Government to change the text back to its original form, or that they may oppose it publicly. The General's view is that the Dutch would be well advised to accept the resolution as it stands without further comment because both the Chinese and Soviet Delegates are prepared to table resolutions which the Dutch will find most distasteful, and are being prevented from doing so only because both parties have accepted the text now before the Council.

The discussion will continue on Friday — General McNaughton expects that, in spite of a very disagreeable attack on the Dutch by Gromyko, the question will be settled then in terms of the resolution now before the Council, unless the Dutch withdraw their concurrence.

INDONESIA

We have heard from General McNaughton to the effect that a vote will probably be taken in the Security Council to-morrow on the subject of Indonesia.

There are three proposals before the Council. The first of these is a resolution drafted by General McNaughton as President, which accepts the report of the Committee of Good Offices as a basis for settlement, and requests the two parties concerned and the Committee of Good Offices to continue their efforts to solve the political problem in Indonesia.

General McNaughton has secured the agreement of both parties to this resolution and he regards it as the greatest measure of agreement on the action which might usefully be taken by the Security Council in relation to the continuation of the work of the Committee of Good Offices. The other two are amendments, one proposed by Australia and submitted by the U.S.S.R., and the other proposed by Colombia. Both these resolutions have the effect of widening the functions of the Security Council in a manner which the Netherlands Government is not prepared to accept.

General McNaughton proposes to vote against both of the amendments on the ground that it would be preferable to proceed on the basis of agreement that has been indicated in his own original resolution. He expects that both the amendments will be defeated, and he will then be able to support his own original resolution. If one or other of the amendments is carried, he will then have to use his judgment as to whether he should support his original motion as amended. His action in this connection would be affected by the attitude of the two interested parties toward the amended resolution.

General McNaughton telephoned from New York to say that he hoped it would be possible to secure your approval for this proposed course of action by to-morrow morning. In case you may wish to refer this question to the Prime Minister, I am attaching a note for your signature covering a copy of the memorandum.<sup>36</sup>

SECRET. PERSONAL.

Following for Pearson from McNaughton, Begins: Confirming our telephone conversation of Sunday night in reference to the approval given on Saturday, 28th February, by the Security Council to the Canadian Draft Resolution on Indonesia.

2. A critical consideration of the record of the discussions will show the growing anxiety felt by members of the Council as to the sincerity of the protestations made by the Netherlands representatives in regard to the establishment of real conditions of democracy in Indonesia and the termination of colonialism.

3. Most unfortunately the Netherlands spokesmen have left the impression that the Netherlands authorities, both in Indonesia and at home, will in fact endeavour to give a unilateral interpretation of the agreed political principles in order that they might operate to their advantage and to the disadvantage of the Indonesian Republic; and that while they may adhere to a strictly literal interpretation of the various clauses, they will nevertheless show little scruple in transgressing the spirit. For example, already the Netherlands Governor General of Indonesia, Van Mook, on 21st February, was reported by a despatch from Aneta, the Dutch news agency, to have recognized by decree as a political unit the new "State" of Madura formed by an autonomous anti-Republic movement in that area. Similarly on 25th February, again according to an Aneta despatch, the West Java Conference also asked for recognition of the new State of West Java from the Netherlands East Indies Government and apparently received the required recognition the same day. Both these new "States" are in areas in dispute between the Netherlands and the Indonesian Republic. The Netherlands contend that, in the second of the twelve principles forming an agreed basis for the political settlement, accepted by the two parties on 17th January, 1948, they did not have the right, let alone the duty, to "suppress or thwart" autonomous political movements in these areas. The second of the agreed political principles, mentioned above, says that "neither party has the right to prevent the free expression of popular movements looking toward political organizations which are in accord with the principles of the Linggadjati Agreement" (see Document S/649, page 111).

Approved, subject to no objection being expressed by the Prime Minister. L.S. St. L[aurent]

4. In opposition to this the Indonesian representative feels that this action is a part of a Dutch programme to progressively diminish the authority and influence of the Republic and to leave it as a weak, dependent unit in an eventual Federation under Dutch domination.

5. In conversation with Kirby after the meeting he again stated that our Resolution had given the Committee adequate authority to proceed usefully but he added the proviso that this would only be the case if the Dutch were reasonable.

6. The last paragraph of our Resolution permits direct reference to the Security Council either by the Committee or by either of the parties if they become dissatisfied with the progress of negotiations. From what Kirby and the Indonesian delegates have said to me I am convinced they will use this authority promptly should the Dutch unwisely provide an opportunity, and the matter will then be reopened in the Security Council.

7. I think that the Netherlands should appreciate that in these circumstances they are not likely to receive much sympathy and, in fact, with the hardening view against them which is evident, they will be laying themselves open to very drastic censure by the Security Council.

8. I think, therefore, that it is most important that the Netherlands should now take full advantage of the opportunity given them by our Resolution to show their purpose of implementing the spirit of the Truce Agreement and the agreed political principles; also to disarm suspicion and promote accord by showing an attitude of cordial, in place of grudging, acquiescence.

9. It seems to me that it would be an act of friendship if some counsel along these lines could be conveyed to The Hague. I think we have earned both the right and the duty to give this counsel because, while I am satisfied that our Resolution represented the proper action in the light of the evidence presented, yet I am certain that it would not have carried without our support in the face of the growing opposition brought about by the stubborn position evidenced by the Netherlands representatives. 2. In accordance with the suggestion made in paragraph 9 of your telegram, I propose to ask Mr. Van Roijen, the Netherlands Ambassador, to come in in the course of the next few days, and I will convey to him the sense of the observations in paragraphs 8 and 9 of your telegram. I agree with you in thinking that we now have some responsibility for trying to see that the Dutch should not go about their business in Indonesia in such a way as to prejudice the prospects for a peaceful settlement out there, and cause the whole question to be returned to the Council under conditions unfavourable to the Dutch.

3. As our Resolution prevented the adoption of other proposals which would have given the Committee of Good Offices greater powers, such as powers of arbitration, than it continues to have under our Resolution, we are in the position of having preserved for the Netherlands a considerable degree of flexibility in their forthcoming negotiations which they might not otherwise have been able to enjoy. I therefore feel that if they should overtax our good faith or abuse the confidence which we and other Council Members have reposed in the sincerity of their intentions, it would not only reflect upon the Canadian Resolution but would, moreover, make it difficult for us to be as sympathetic as we were the last time in the event that the dispute might be returned to the Security Council.

4. I will let you know if any new developments of interest should result from my interview with Mr. Van Roijen. I will also inform Mr. Dupuy at The Hague of the results of this matter.

Dear Mr. Greene,

INDONESIAN QUESTION

I should like to refer to my despatch No. 129 of March 1, 1948,† and to our previous exchanges of correspondence concerning Indonesia.

We have recently been giving some thought to the possibility that the Indonesian question might at any time be referred back to the Security Council, in the event of a break-down in the current discussions between the Dutch and the Republican delegations. If that were to happen, we might be called upon at short notice to formulate instructions for the guidance of our delegate to the Security Council, and we are concerned that we might encounter some difficulties in view of our limited information on the present developments.

Our principal sources of information at this time are (a) despatches from the Hague, which give us the Dutch point of view, (b) teletype press releases from the U.N. Press Bureau and (c) circular telegrams from the Commonwealth Relations Office, London. The latter are usually confined to the texts of communiqués and agreements which are generally made public anyway. We are thus in a position of not knowing much more than the general public does about the progress that is being made towards a political settlement in Indonesia.

Since we do not wish to have to rely quite so heavily for our background information on the Hague, although they are doing a good job there, we have been wondering whether it might not be possible to obtain some additional information from the Australian Department of External Affairs.<sup>37</sup> We do not know of course, but we presume that the Australian representative on the Good Offices Committee sends regular reports back to his government at Canberra, covering the latest developments. I would be glad to know your views on whether or not it might be possible for us to arrange with the Australian authorities to receive copies of such reports or other material, provided they are willing, in order to help us follow the trend of events in Indonesia from a point of view different to that of the Dutch. If you should think that such an approach would not be feasible, you might perhaps be able to suggest some alternative.

Yours sincerely,

INDONESIAN QUESTION

I refer to my memorandum on this subject dated June 16† to which was attached, for your consideration, a memorandum† outlining our views on the Indonesian question. On the former you indicated your concurrence with the view that the Security Council should continue to follow with interest the course of the current political negotiations between the Dutch and the Indonesian Republic, with a view to ensuring that a just and satisfactory outcome to the dispute should be reached.

2. On June 17, the Security Council met to discuss the Indonesian question. The Canadian Permanent Delegate reported on this discussion in his teletype No. 692 of June 19.† In his teletype No. 691 of June 18,† he also commented on the memorandum outlining our views to which you have agreed. It had been sent down to him as teletype No. 521 of June 17.† I now attach for your convenience, copies of the Permanent Delegate's two teletypes mentioned above for ease of reference.

3. At the Security Council meeting of June 17, General McNaughton expressed our view by taking the position that the most appropriate course for the Council to follow at this time would be to continue to supervise the developments in Indonesia without, however, taking any action which might prejudice the prospects that a satisfactory agreement might be reached as a result of the current negotiations being conducted under the auspices of the Council's Committee of Good Offices. General McNaughton also indicated that the Council would be meeting again to-day, June 23, to discuss this same question. It was considered desirable that two further teletypes should be sent down to the General in reply to his of June 18 and 19 by way of amplifying our previous instructions in the light of the Council's discussion of June 17 and also to indicate our agreement with the position he took at that meeting.

A similar letter was sent to Robertson on April 12. See also Document 154.

4. Accordingly, two such telegrams were prepared on the basis of your concurrence with my memorandum of June 16 and these were sent down last night as teletypes Nos. 535† and 536.†

5. You will note that in them we generally agree with General McNaughton's estimation of the Indonesian question. We took the position that while we are concerned that the Dutch should not do anything which might reflect unfavourably on their good faith and sincerity of intentions to abide by the spirit as well as the letter of the Renville Agreement,<sup>38</sup> we, nevertheless, are conscious of the questionable legal basis upon which the Council has been seized of the Indonesian question for the past year. Accordingly, under the circumstances, we think that the interests of all concerned would best be served if the Council should refrain from attempting to pass judgment on the merits of the present dispute as long as there remain any hopes that an agreement might be reached.

You will by now have seen the United Nations press summary of the Security Council meeting on Indonesia at 2:30 p.m., July 1st. At this meeting a general and somewhat confused discussion developed on the subject of the present stage of the negotiations in which the Committee of Good Offices is engaged. On this matter I made a short intervention to explain our position, to emphasize our concept of the proper role of the Committee of Good Offices and to state our view that the Committee should keep the Council informed if any developments occurred in Indonesia which would prejudice the continuation of the negotiations and the truce. The text of my remarks is contained in my immediately following teletype.†

2. Discussion in this meeting of the Council centered around the proposal of the Chinese representative that “the President of the Security Council ask the Committee of Good Offices to make available to us the working paper signed by the representatives of the United States and Australia in the Committee of Good Offices.” You will recall that the Chinese representative originally introduced this proposal on June 17th (see my teletype No. 692 of June 18th)† and that, at that time I supported the idea that the Council should have information concerning the suspension of negotiations. Your teletype No. 536,† paragraph 3, stated that my intervention of June 17th accurately expressed your point of view. You will also recall that, following the Council meeting of June 17th, the President of the Council (El Khouri of Syria) sent a telegram to the Committee of Good Offices asking them to “furnish the Council, at its discretion, with information pertaining to the suspension of negotiations, including its course and eventual duration” (see S/PV. 326, p. 6).†

3. In view of our previous position on the necessity for securing factual information I supported the Chinese proposal. I also felt that the document in question (i.e. Dubois-Critchley proposals) had now achieved considerable notoriety and that garbled and misleading versions of these proposals had appeared in the press. For this reason I believe that it would be desirable that the Council should be sent the authoritative version of these proposals as they were actually made. I also felt that the transmittal of this working paper to the Council for its information need not in any sense, affect the course of negotiations in Indonesia. By requesting information of this type the Council was not passing a judgment on the merits of this working paper or on the efforts of the Committee to continue the negotiations. It was merely a request for information naturally arising, in my view, from the Council’s concern over the publicity which this paper had received.

4. The representative of the United States took a somewhat different point of view and said that he felt the only question in this regard was “would it help the negotiations going on in Indonesia if we asked the Committee of Good Offices to send us this document.” He felt that the answer to this test was in the negative. He pointed out that the Committee had sent to the Council three communications in answer to the President’s telegram of June 18th. These were contained in Documents S/850,† S/850/Add.1,† and S/858.† They did not include the working paper in question and he felt that this omission of the working paper was evidence that the Committee was reluctant to send it to the Security Council, in view of the fact that it had not been sponsored by the Committee as a whole. The representative of Belgium expressed this point of view more strongly and said he was definitely opposed to having this working paper transmitted to the Council. On a vote the Chinese proposal was defeated by 6 votes in favour (Canada, China, Colombia, Syria, the Ukraine and the Soviet Union) and 5 abstentions (Argentina, Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the United States.)

5. It was quite evident that the representatives of Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States had the same objective in this matter as I had but there was difference of opinion between us as to what was the best course to follow. As stated above, I felt that it would be useful for the Council to have this working paper in its possession in view of the notoriety it had attained, and that it would be unwise to do anything which might be construed as trying to suppress the document. The other representatives named, however, were of the opinion that the production of this document in the Council would inevitably provoke a debate on its merits which would be prejudicial to the continuation of the negotiations in Indonesia. In supporting the proposal for transmitting this working paper I was not, of course, in any sense supporting the idea that the Council should have a debate on the substance of the working paper. If such a debate were to develop I would naturally follow the clear course of action outlined in your teletype No. 548.† However, I regarded the Chinese proposal yesterday as quite a separate matter — namely a request for useful and necessary information.

6. The Council's discussions during the present month will probably be somewhat confused due to the partisan and unpredictable Chairmanship of Mr. Manuilsky.<sup>39</sup> An example of this occurred yesterday when he tried to sum up the meeting and said that, in addition to the Chinese proposal, there was a Canadian proposal before the Council. You will see from the text of my remarks, which are contained in my immediately following teletype,† that I made no such proposal but merely tried to give our views on the present state of negotiations together with the Council's expectation of the way in which the Committee of Good Offices should proceed. In any case, I spoke to Manuilsky after the meeting and informed him that there was no Canadian proposal of any type on this subject now before the Council. The Council will meet again on this subject on July 6th, at 3:00 p.m. At that time an attempt may be made by the President to make capital out of the decision yesterday not to request the working paper of the Dubois-Critchley proposals. If such a manoeuvre develops I shall, of course, take the position that the Council's decision has been made and that this subject should not be re-opened. I would, however, be glad to have any comments on this subject that you may wish to send me for future guidance.

Reference your teletype No. 732 and 733† of July 2. Indonesian question. Following comments from Johnson, Begins: In paragraph 3 of your teletype No. 732, you outlined the reasons why you supported the Chinese proposal that the Committee of Good Offices should be requested to forward to the Council the text of the Dubois-Critchley proposals, and these are in conformity with our views. It seemed to us also that it would be desirable, from the point of view of world public opinion, that the text of the above proposals should be brought out into the light of day in order to set the records straight and to dispel the general uncertainty and confusion which has arisen since their leakage to the press. However, as you indicated in your statement, our desire that the Committee should keep the Council informed regarding everything that bears upon the truce does not necessarily mean that we expect the Council to pass judgment, or even discuss all such information. In this particular case, anyway, the Dubois-Critchley proposals could not properly have been discussed by the Council as if they had been put forward by the Committee as a whole.

2. We are inclined to think that the Council, by suppressing the above document, would not be likely to contribute to the settlement of the dispute any more than had it authorized the publication of the document, since the latter might have cleared the air.

3. Regardless of the above views, we agree that, since the Council has now taken a decision on this matter, it would be improper if Manuilsky were to attempt to reopen the question in the Council.

4. With reference to tomorrow's meeting, we foresee two possible dangers. The first, as you suggested, is that Manuilsky might take advantage of his opportunity to make anti-imperialistic propaganda in order to picture the Soviet Union and its allies as the sole champions of the Asiatic peoples everywhere, and not only of the Indonesians. He might take such a line regardless of whether or not they really desire to contribute to the solution of the dispute in Indonesia. In fact, Manuilsky might even go so far as to say all sorts of things which would do anything but facilitate the work of the Committee of Good Offices.

5. The second danger would then be that the other members might be manoeuvred into a position in which, by taking too narrow or legalistic a view, they would, either in fact or in appearance, be defending the Dutch position and thereby be playing into the hands of Dutch elements who are inclined to drive as hard a bargain as possible. The Dutch might be encouraged to suppose that, however much pious talking the other members of the Council have done on Indonesia, when it comes right down to a question of taking action, they might be counted on to hold the legal ring while the Dutch and the Indonesians fight it out by themselves.

6. We would, of course, prefer to see either or both of the above pitfalls avoided, if possible. We would not wish to see the present situation exploited to the advantage of either the Russians or the Dutch, without any substantial contribution being made to the settlement of the dispute. Our primary concern has been that a lasting settlement might be reached which would do equal justice to both parties.

7. One suggestion you might wish to consider and which might avoid strengthening the Dutch hand unnecessarily, would be to restate our attitude towards this whole question by laying special emphasis on the necessity for both parties to continue to seek, by peaceful means, to find a settlement of the dispute. In such a way, by going back to the Council's resolutions of August 1, August 25 and November 1, 1947, a certain amount of moral pressure might be brought to bear on both parties to avoid, at all costs, another breakdown of negotiations which might lead to a resumption of hostilities.

8. The Republicans might be reminded of the benefits to be enjoyed from conditions of peace and stability in which the fullest possible co-operation on all levels and in all fields can be had with the Dutch. The Dutch, on the other hand, might be reminded of their frequent promises to grant complete independence to the Indonesian people, and also of Article 12 of the now defunct Linggadjati Agreement which set January 1, 1949 as the target date for the establishment of the United States of Indonesia. Although Article 1 of the Renville Agreement states that the proposed political settlement should be based on the principles underlying the Linggadjati Agreement, we are aware that the Dutch are most reluctant at this time to consider setting a final date for the transfer of sovereignty to the Indonesians. Nevertheless, by reference to that part of the Renville Agreement mentioned above, moral pressure might be exerted to prevent them from completely disregarding such earlier commitments as Article 12 of the Linggadjati Agreement.

9. We are inclined to think that the Dutch should be made aware that it is generally considered that they have a moral responsibility at this time to take the initiative in resolving the present deadlock in the negotiations. Although, realistically speaking, no concession of importance can be expected from them prior to the forthcoming elections in Holland, we do, nevertheless, regard it as being up to the Dutch to be magnanimous and to somehow end the impasse. Nothing can be expected in this regard from the Committee of Good Offices which appears to have exhausted its powers of initiative at present, and particularly since van Mook on June 4 requested, in writing, that the Committee refrain from every form of initiative at this stage. We are inclined to the view that no settlement can be expected to last unless it satisfies the Indonesians. Although the Republican leaders have indicated their willingness to discuss the Dubois-Critchley proposals, it is not a matter of consequence to us whether the credit for ending the dispute should go to the Committee or to the Dutch (through van Mook) so long as the result is satisfactory.

10. You may, however, wish to consider some different approach other than that outlined above which would, nevertheless, have the same end in view, namely, the avoidance of the impression gaining currency that we were prepared to go a long way in backing the Dutch on the basis of the questionable legalistic aspects of this problem. Regardless of which articles of the charter have been quoted in connection with the Indonesian dispute, it is a fact that the majority of the members have felt that this was a problem involving over 70,000,000 people and one with which the Council had a moral, if not strictly legal, right to be concerned. Ends.

New York, July 7, 1948

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference previous correspondence, Indonesian situation.

At the council meeting at 2:30 p.m., 6th July, it was stated by the President that this meeting had been called by him at the request of the Indonesian representative because the latter wished to make an additional statement in the Council. The Indonesian representative then made a lengthy statement in which he gave details concerning the alleged economic blockade which, he said, was being imposed by the Dutch in Indonesia against imports into territory under Republican control. He quoted the report of the Committee of Good Offices in document S/848† to the effect that "the failure of the truce to bring about the resumption of normal trade and commerce" has caused severe shortages of important commodities, including medical supplies and even food in some cases. He also referred to Article 6 of the Truce Agreement which stipulated that normal trade conditions in Indonesia should be resumed as rapidly as possible. In conclusion, he asked that the Security Council "give its opinion of this blockade," and to this end that the Council should request a report from the Committee of Good Offices.

2. The Netherlands representative replied by saying that he had received information yesterday morning (6th July) to the effect that the Netherlands and Republican representatives were discussing the re-opening of negotiations on the question of goods traffic, which had been previously broken off. He also repeated the view of the Netherlands previously expressed that the Committee of Good Offices should be allowed to continue its efforts unimpeded by lengthy charges and counter-charges in the Security Council.

3. The Australian and Chinese representatives supported the principle of the Indonesian proposal. A confused discussion then developed as to what procedure should be followed by the President and what should be the text of the telegram he should send to the Committee of Good Offices. The Soviet representative, with the support of the President, suggested a text which would have, in effect, prejudged the issue by referring to the existence of "an economic blockade by the Dutch."

4. The President also wished to insert a clause to the effect that the Committee of Good Offices should make its report to the Council within five days if possible. The Chinese representative, who had been the first to support the Indonesian proposal in principle, then formulated a text which would not prejudice the case as it did not refer to the "economic blockade". Under this Chinese proposal the President was to request information from the Committee of Good Offices concerning existing restrictions on trade, both domestic and international, and any information concerning the delay in the implementation of Article 6 of the Truce Agreement. This proposal was generally satisfactory to those delegations who did not wish to prejudge the case and, on a vote, it was adopted by 9 votes in favour with two abstentions (the Soviet Union and the Ukraine).

5. I spoke in favour of the Chinese proposal as I felt that it was in the interest of the Council to have this information and that the formula suggested by the Chinese representative would not imply a judgment by the Council as to the existence or not of the alleged economic blockade.

6. The text of the Chinese proposal adopted by the Council is as follows:

“That the President of the Council cable to the Committee of Good Offices for an early report on the existing restrictions on the domestic and international trade of Indonesia, and the reasons for the delay in the implementation of Article 6 of the Truce Agreement.”

INDONESIAN QUESTION

I attach, for your information, copies of Top Secret Despatch No. 193 of June 15† and Secret Despatch No. 198 of June 16† from the Canadian Ambassador at The Hague which deal with this subject. Copies were originally referred to you on June 29.

2. In reporting on the Dutch viewpoint in the present phase of the Indonesian dispute, Mr. Dupuy, while giving us some very useful and valuable information has, at the same time, left the impression that he is sympathetically inclined towards the Dutch position. In paragraph 3 of Despatch No. 193, Mr. Dupuy says: “Personally I am of the opinion that force will have to be used again, sooner or later, if the extremists are not to be left free to sabotage any political or economic reconstruction of the country.” Again, in paragraph 3 in Despatch No. 198, he criticized the Australian and United States representatives of the Committee of Good Offices for having initiated a compromise proposal which encouraged Republican “resistance”. He further states that “until the white people present a common front, why should the Republicans give up?”

3. In replying to my Top Secret letter of June 28† with which were enclosed copies of the two above-mentioned despatches, General McNaughton stated in paragraph 3 of his letter of July 10† which I now attach: “I would be less than frank if I failed to give you my opinion that I find certain passages (those quoted in paragraph 2 above) somewhat disturbing.” The General goes on to say in his final paragraph: “For example, I can think of no action which would be more harmful to Netherlands prestige, at least in so far as the Security Council is concerned, than if they were to embark on a "police action" similar to that which occurred last year. For this reason, I believe it would be the part of friendship for our authorities to leave the Netherlands Government in no doubt as to the international repercussions which would almost certainly follow such an adventure. I also feel strongly that it would be most unfortunate if the authorities in the Netherlands felt that they would have, in any sense, the tacit support of the Canadian Government in embarking on such a policy. Perhaps you might consider it advisable to pass on some comment of this nature to Mr. Dupuy?"

4. You may recall that on March 3 last, the General, in reporting on the adoption of the Canadian resolution of February 28, made a similar suggestion to the effect that we ought to counsel the Dutch to take full advantage of the opportunity presented by our resolution to demonstrate their good intentions to implement the spirit of the Truce Agreement and to disarm suspicion by showing an attitude of cordial and not grudging acquiescence. Accordingly, later on in the month, I had a conversation with Dr. van Roijen during which I raised this subject. However, it would now appear that this might be an opportune time to act on the General's suggestion quoted in paragraph 3 above and again to let our views be known at The Hague.

5. While I am confident that Mr. Dupuy would at all times be careful to avoid giving the impression that his personal opinions on the Indonesian Question may be taken as accurate reflections of the Canadian Government's attitude, I consider that it would be helpful to Mr. Dupuy and also desirable from our point of view if he were to be informed, in general terms, of our thinking on this subject.

6. Accordingly, I attach for your approval and signature,<sup>40</sup> a letter to Mr. Dupuy along the above lines which would take care of General McNaughton's concern lest the authorities at The Hague might expect to have the tacit support of the Canadian delegate to the Security Council or of the Canadian Government if they were to embark on another "police" action. You will note that our general attitude is summed up in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the attached letter.<sup>41</sup>

Dear Mr. Dupuy:

I should like to refer to the Indonesian Question, and to thank you for your Top Secret Despatch No. 193 of June 15† and Secret Despatch No. 198 of June 16† on this subject. We are grateful to you for the valuable information contained in these despatches, and especially for the evaluation you give of the present Dutch attitude towards the Indonesian Question. It was particularly helpful to us to have information of this sort at the time when the Security Council was considering the reports of the Committee of Good Offices on the political developments in Indonesia. General McNaughton also finds it useful to have available background material of this nature in the light of which he can view the positions which Dr. van Kleffens takes whenever the Council discusses Indonesia. Only by getting the fullest possible information relating to both sides of this dispute are we in a position to formulate our own opinions on the reports of the Committee of Good Offices.

2. On reading over your interesting despatches, it occurred to me that it might be helpful to you in your position if I were to set out, for your guidance and information, a brief restatement of our general attitude here in Canada towards the Indonesian Question.

3. We have to take into account two important factors. On the one hand, there is our long-standing friendship for the peoples of the Netherlands, which you yourself have done so much to foster, with whom we share so many common traditions and aspirations and in the liberation of whose country our armed forces played such an important part. On the other hand, we are concerned over the welfare of the South-East Asian countries whose futures will have a direct bearing upon Canada as a Pacific power. We have realized how mutually beneficial the historical association of the Dutch and the Indonesians has been and how fruitful their cooperation throughout the years. We also appreciate how desirable it would be for such happy conditions, based on mutual confidence, to be again restored to the Indies. Accordingly, our interest in this dispute has all along been that a just, and therefore a lasting, settlement should be reached as early as possible. Only under such conditions do we think that we can look forward to the restoration of conditions of stability and prosperity in the Indies with a consequent expansion of Canadian trade with that area.

4. We also feel that the Security Council has a moral responsibility, arising out of the Committee of Good Offices, for supervising the course of the negotiations in Indonesia with a view to protecting the interests of both parties and of ensuring that they demonstrate their good intentions to continue to negotiate with one another, using the Renville Principles as an agreed basis for their political discussions. We have been growing concerned over the past few months that the Dutch, as well as the Indonesians, should not do anything which might reflect on their sincerity in this regard. We continue to hope that counsels of prudence and moderation will not cease to prevail amongst those officials responsible for the shaping of the Dutch Government's Indonesian policy.

5. We hope, more particularly, that the thinking of those authorities will not reach a point where they might feel that the only remaining solution to the dispute would be in terms of military force and a renewal of their "police action". For responsible Dutch quarters to even think along such lines, or to put in train preparations for such an eventuality might well put to an end any reasonable hopes which may persist that a peaceful settlement can be reached and would probably result in a crisis in the negotiations. Any undue haste on the part of the Dutch of such seriousness as to foreshadow widespread political repercussions would almost surely give rise to a feeling of hostility and criticism among the general public which would render it difficult for the Dutch to make their position understood and appreciated.

6. In such an unhappy event, the Canadian Government would be considerably embarrassed if we should be forced into a position of having to oppose, in the Council, the Indonesian policy of a Government whose European policy, on the other hand, we desire to support and encourage. I am sure you can appreciate the complexity of this problem and how important it is that the Netherlands Government should not be permitted to gain the impression that, should they renew their hostilities against the Republic of Indonesia, they might rely on the tacit support of the Canadian Government in the Security Council.

7. Moreover, apart from the more direct Canadian interest in this dispute, we have to consider the reputation of the United Nations Organization. We are anxious that its prestige and usefulness should be maintained. As a member of the Security Council, we feel that Canada is partially responsible for endeavouring to assist, whenever an obvious need exists, in the adjustment of differences between the East and the West, between colonial powers and their Asiatic dependencies. The Indonesian dispute may be regarded in the same light as the Indian-South African dispute; it is of considerable importance to world peace that these and similar disputes should be settled amicably. It is of direct interest to us that the United Nations should not fail in the eyes of the Asiatics, because of all the advantages which that would entail to the Russian propagandists.

8. There are two reasons for my thinking that you might usefully be informed at this time of our feelings on this question. The first is that we have been hearing an increasing number of rumours which suggest that those elements among the Dutch camp who favour the use of force are seriously considering a renewal of hostilities in Indonesia. You may recall that General McNaughton, as President of the Council last February, was largely instrumental in securing the adoption of our moderate resolution of February 28 in terms much more favourable to the Dutch than they might otherwise have expected. Our resolution helped to prevent the submission of other proposals which might have given the Committee of Good Offices powers of arbitration. It also headed off a good deal of hostile criticism and acrimonious debate over the details of the Dutch activities in Indonesia, which might have given

Dr. van Kleffens a very embarrassing and uncomfortable time. Our resolution thus preserved for the Dutch a considerable degree of flexibility in their negotiations with the Indonesians. We hope that in these negotiations the Netherlands Government will exercise all possible moderation and restraint in their Indonesian policy, because the most serious repercussions would almost certainly result if hostilities broke out again on a wide scale.

9. My second reason is that I sometimes gain the impression from a reading of some of your reports that there are opposing groups in the Dutch Government whose counsels are divided. There seem to be those who advocate patience and moderation, and those who feel that force will have to be used. The latter school of thought seems to be reflected in the following sentence of paragraph 3 of your despatch No. 193 of June 15th:

“Personally, I remain of the opinion that force will have to be used again sooner or later if the extremists are not to be left free to sabotage any political and economic reconstruction of the country.”

I know that you will not give the Netherlands Government the impression that this point of view is necessarily shaped in Canada without question, or that they can automatically count on our tacit support for any new Indonesian move which they might contemplate.

10. I should be glad to have any comments you may care to make on the foregoing observations as well as on the exchanges of teletypes on this subject which have taken place between the Canadian Permanent Delegate and ourselves.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

Ottawa, December 1, 1948

Dear Mr. Greene:

I have your Secret letter of November 15th† with which you enclosed a letter of November 12th† from Mr. L.R. McIntyre of the Australian Department of External Affairs covering a memorandum† setting out the Australian assessment of the present situation in Indonesia.

2. We very much appreciate having this information from the Australian Department of External Affairs. We have made a good many efforts to obtain information on the background of the Netherlands-Indonesian negotiations from the State Department. On some occasions we have actually obtained some useful material. On the whole however, State Department officials at the working level are so hamstrung by security regulations that they do not dare to pass on much material to us.

They have yet to learn the value, as I think the United Kingdom Government is fully aware, of keeping one's friends fully informed about what is going on. As you know we receive very full and helpful reports from our Ambassador in The Hague concerning Indonesia. His information is of course practically all from Dutch sources. No matter how objective he tries to be in his reports he cannot give us the point of view that the Australians do in their reports on developments in Indonesia as seen by their representative on the Good Offices Committee. We therefore value these Australian reports very highly and are certain that they are read with a good deal of interest and profit by our representative on the Security Council, General McNaughton.

3. In accordance with the suggestion made in paragraph 3 of your letter we have sent a telegram to Mr. Pearson asking him, if a suitable opportunity presents itself, to express to Dr. Evatt our appreciation for the trouble which Dr. Burton and Mr. McIntyre have taken in keeping you up to date on Indonesian developments as seen by the Australian Department of External Affairs. I have also sent a note to Mr. Escott Reid asking him if he would take an early opportunity to speak to Mr. Forde along the same lines.

Yours sincerely,

Paris, December 20, 1948

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference this morning's telegram No. 855.†

Following from Ritchie, Begins: Security Council met this morning at request of the United States delegation with which Australia associated itself to consider the Indonesian question in view of military operations in Indonesia. USSR and Ukraine were absent and Associate Secretary General read a telegram from Molotov to the effect that as the President of the Security Council had stated at the last meeting that three days notice would be given before meeting of Council was called, they requested a delay until Wednesday, December 22nd.

United States representative (Dr. Jessup) requested that in view of urgency of the situation, Soviet Government should be pressed to have representatives available for a meeting tomorrow and in this connection called attention to Article 28 (1) of the Charter providing that the Council should be so organized as to be able to function continuously. He was supported by China. The President replied that he would not be justified in sending such a telegram to Soviet Government as he had given assurance that 3 days notice would be given. He was supported by France. Jessup did not press his point but expressed hope the meeting might take place on Wednesday morning rather than on Wednesday afternoon as suggested by Soviet Government.

Syria proposed that Committee of Good Offices should be asked to send urgent report giving information regarding situation on the spot. United States and United Kingdom supported this proposal and the President announced that he would act on this suggestion.

Chinese suggestion that preliminary statements should be made by members of Security Council possessing special information regarding conditions in Indonesia was not accepted as members present felt that we could not proceed to debate in the absence of two members of the Council. This was not in fact a formal meeting of the Security Council and the agenda was not adopted.

I had a conversation with Jessup before the meeting who told me that the United States took the gravest view of developments in Indonesia, and were re-considering the whole policy at the highest level. He confirmed that they were contemplating action under Chapter VII of the Charter and said that he personally could see no justification whatever for the Netherlands action.

Van Roijen who saw Robertson and myself last night justified Netherlands action along the lines indicated in telegram No. 149 of December 17th from Canadian Ambassador to the Netherlands (repeated to me as your No. 388 of December 19th).† He emphasized solidarity of Netherlands Cabinet on this issue, including Socialist and Labour elements and stated that Netherlands trade unions were in full support of the Government's action. The Dutch were prepared to face the consequences of their decision even if this meant United Nations sanctions.

He gave me photostat copies of documents (unfortunately in Dutch and Malay) purporting to prove that Republican Government had given instructions for terrorist acts by guerillas against Netherlands nationals. He expressed confidence that after present military operations against the Republic, scattered guerillas would lack direction and could then be brought under control.

Van Roijen emphasized that any United Nations action condemning Netherlands would have the effect of making their task in maintaining law and order and going ahead with their plans for setting up federal Indonesia very much more difficult, as many Indonesians both in the Republic and in other Indonesian States who might consent to co-operate with the Dutch would thereby be encouraged not to associate themselves with development of federal regime. He emphasized that Dutch terms for inclusion of the Republic in federal regime still held good and would not be attenuated as result of present developments.

Van Roijen professed surprise that the United States and Australia should adopt their present attitude in view of the growing dangers of Communism in Asia. He expressed conviction that so called "Trotskyist" elements in Republican Government were playing the Communist game and that if the Dutch had not taken firm action there was every likelihood that Republican Government would have come increasingly under the Communist influence. Ends.

Paris, December 21, 1948

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from Ritchie, Begins: Indonesia. The Security Council will meet tomorrow at 10.30 a.m.

2. I saw Van Roijen this morning and told him that Robertson and I were concerned at the situation which would arise when the Council meets. The communications from the Committee of Good Offices would strongly condemn Netherlands action and there would be no expression from the Netherlands side of respect for the Security Council or for critical world opinion. I pointed out that on the contrary the Netherlands memorandum of December 19th (see my telegram No. 863)† stated that "no intervention from the part of international organizations or of friendly Powers can be of further assistance." This amounted to a warning to the United Nations to "keep off the grass." Such an attitude would make a most unfortunate impression on the Security Council.

3. I asked whether the Netherlands position was that they were determined to exclude United Nations from any further participation in the Indonesian settlement. If not how far would they be prepared to go to implement a Security Council resolution? Van Roijen said he must exclude from the start the possibility of the Netherlands troops retiring to the positions which they had occupied before Saturday last. Such a retreat would leave behind them a chaotic situation. Those Indonesians who had shown willingness to co-operate with the Dutch would be liquidated by the extremists. If on the other hand the Security Council resolution took the form of a cease fire order he did not think that this would be practicable in the midst of a military operation. It might be acceptable later (presumably after the military operation was virtually complete) but there would remain the problem of dealing with guerillas and the cease fire could not apply to action against them.

4. I then enquired about the Netherlands intention regarding the members of the Indonesian Government and asked whether they contemplated further dealings with them. Van Roijen replied that they were at present interned in their houses. The Netherlands Government would not reinstate them in office. They proposed to appoint an interim Government composed of Indonesians who would co-operate with them in the task of creating Federal Indonesia. After the interim period there would be free elections in the Republic. I asked whether he was confident of finding representative Indonesian political figures who would serve in the interim Government. He said that he did not doubt that this would be possible but that much depended on the action of the Security Council and its individual members. If the Security Council, or others by their actions, encouraged the Indonesians to resist, they would be less likely to co-operate with the Dutch.

5. In reply to my enquiry as to whether the Netherlands Government would be prepared to accept surveillance by United Nations representatives of their implementation of Netherlands' pledges with regard to the future of Indonesia and of the establishment of democratic Government in the Republic if they were asked to do so, Van Roijen did not exclude the possibility of the Netherlands accepting later United Nations observers but said that this would be a question for the Government to decide.

6. I then reverted to the question as to whether the Netherlands Government was prepared to give any evidence of willingness to meet the Security Council and world opinion on this issue. I said that speaking personally I wondered whether the Netherlands Government could not make some statement before the meeting of the Security Council tomorrow of a conciliatory character which might improve the atmosphere. Could they not for example publicly repeat their assurances regarding the terms of the inclusion of the Republic in Federal Indonesia and the maintenance of democratic and representative Government in the Republic, and that they would welcome United Nations observers to see for themselves that these pledges were being implemented. Van Roijen substituted the phrase "international observers of authorized status" instead of "United Nations observers" and said he thought this was a constructive suggestion. I repeated that it was a purely personal one. He replied that in welcoming it he too was speaking personally. He then at once telephoned to The Hague in my presence and put forward the suggestion on his own behalf to the Netherlands Foreign Office. He reported that it was favourably received at the official level but that it would have to go before the Government for decision this afternoon.

7. I had previously seen Bonbright at the United States Embassy to whom I had mentioned the desirability of some conciliatory statement by the Netherlands Government before the Security Council meets. He agreed that it would be helpful if such a statement were forthcoming. Bonbright also said that Jessup had drafted a strong resolution which had been cabled to the State Department for approval and which would require the Netherlands to withdraw their troops to previously occupied positions. The Security Council will thus probably be faced tomorrow with a United States resolution calling either for the retiring of troops or at least for a cease fire in Indonesia, I should appreciate receiving your instructions prior to the meeting.

8. My own view is:

(a) That any resolution calling upon the Netherlands to withdraw their troops would be fruitless and would only further damage the authority of the Security Council by demanding action which we know in advance will not be taken by the Netherlands and which the Security Council is powerless to compel;

(b) That a cease fire resolution might be accepted by the Netherlands as by the time it had been debated and voted, Netherlands military operations might in any case be complete;

(c) That such a cease fire resolution might be combined with a requirement that the Netherlands should accept United Nations surveillance in some form to watch over the implementation of their pledges with regard to the future of the Republic.

9. If I do not receive your instructions in time I shall be guided by these general considerations. Ends.

Paris, December 22, 1948

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following from Ritchie, Begins: Indonesia. United States intend to introduce today resolution jointly with Syria, Colombia and probably China in following terms, Begins:

"The Security Council, noting with concern the resumption of hostilities in Indonesia, and, having taken note of the reports of the Committee of Good Offices, considers such resumption of hostilities to be in conflict with the resolution adopted by the Security Council at its 171st meeting on 1st August 1947, calls upon the parties

(a) To cease hostilities forthwith; and

(b) Immediately to withdraw their armed forces to their respective sides of the demilitarized zones established under the Truce Agreement of 17th January, 1948;

Instructs the Committee of Good Offices to report to the Security Council fully and urgently by telegraph on the events which have transpired in Indonesia since 12th December, 1948, assessing the responsibility for the outbreak of hostilities." Ends.

2. I should therefore appreciate your earliest instructions as to Canadian vote. United States delegation have been canvassing me vigorously for Canadian support. My own view is that cease-fire as suggested in (a) of United States resolution is as far as Security Council can go with the hope of attaining practical results and I should think that troop retirement as called for in (b) of United States resolution might demonstrate ineffectiveness of Security Council and meet with obstinate resistance from the Dutch. On the other hand, the United States delegation argue strongly that their resolution would have a deterrent influence on the Dutch and is essential to uphold authority of Security Council. United Kingdom will support (a) cease fire portion of United States resolution but not (b) troop retirement.

3. You will appreciate that instructions contained in your No. 393 of December 21st† have already been rendered somewhat out of date by developments. Security Council has already heard Netherlands and Indonesian statements and received further report from Committee of Good Offices (see my following telegram)† so that we can no longer base our position on lack of information. In addition the United States delegation are pressing hard for a vote as soon as possible. I shall probably have to make a brief statement on my vote and would be grateful for guidance.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Ritchie. Your telegram no. 874 of December 22, Indonesia.

If United States resolution as given in your telegram under reference is brought to a vote immediately, you should vote for clause (a) of first operative paragraph (to cease hostilities forthwith) and abstain on clause (b) of the first operative paragraph (immediately to withdraw their armed forces to their respective sides of the demilitarized zones established under the truce agreement January 17, 1948). You may vote for final operative paragraph of the draft resolution (Instructs the Committee of Good Offices, etc.).

2. In place of the present clause (b) of first operative paragraph, it would be preferable to have a directive to the Committee of Good Offices, asking that Committee to indicate what steps are practicable to bring about a cessation of hostilities and to restore peaceful conditions in Indonesia. It would be preferable to have this alternative operative paragraph (b) proposed by some other Delegation, but you may, if necessary, propose it yourself, or in association with other Delegations.

3. If new operative clause (b) as suggested in paragraph 2 of this telegram is accepted, first operative paragraph will have either to be revised or incorporated in new clause (b).

4. In explaining your vote, you may wish to indicate that while deploring renewal of conflict in Indonesia, you do not consider that Security Council should commit itself to precise programme suggested in present clause (b) of first operative paragraph, in the absence of detailed information concerning the situation which exists in Indonesia.

UN SECURITY COUNCIL; INDONESIA

3. The Secretary of State for External Affairs raised, as a matter of urgency, the question of the attitude to be adopted by the Canadian representative on the Indonesian situation.

The Netherlands had instituted "police" action and their forces had moved suddenly into Republican territory. The Security Council were being urged by the United States and Australia to take drastic action.

A resolution sponsored by the U.S. representative had been presented to the Council calling for an immediate cease fire and simultaneous withdrawal of Dutch troops. Adoption of the resolution would involve sanctions in the event of refusal by Netherlands authorities. The Australian representative had gone so far as to suggest, in such event, expulsion of the Netherlands from the United Nations.

4. Mr. Pearson said that the action proposed by U.S. and Australian representatives was precipitate and likely to cause a chaotic situation if approved by the Council. There was no objection to the Security Council calling for a cease fire but a demand for immediate withdrawal of the Netherlands forces would clearly be impossible of acceptance.

In the face of the aggressive acts which other of the United Nations had taken without comparable action by the Council, the proposed resolution in this case was regarded as quite impractical. In most other respects the Netherlands had been a strong supporter of the United Nations.

5. Mr. Pearson said that, in view of the urgency it had been necessary to send interim instructions to the Canadian representative. For the reasons given these instructions had been to support that portion of the resolution calling for the cease fire but to abstain on that relating to immediate withdrawal of Netherlands forces.

The views of the Cabinet were now sought in order that these instructions could be confirmed or modified.

(Telegram, External Affairs to Canadian Embassy, Paris, Dec. 22, 1948).

6. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the Minister's report and confirmed the instructions sent to the Canadian representative on the Security Council as reported by Mr. Pearson.

TELEGRAM 885

Paris, December 24, 1948

SECRET

Following from Ritchie, Begins: Indonesia. At this morning's meeting of the Security Council voting took place on United States resolution with which were incorporated Australian amendments. Resolution was voted in parts:

Part A. To cease hostilities forthwith was voted 7 for and 4 abstentions (U.S.S.R., Ukraine, France and Belgium).

Part B. "Immediately to withdraw their armed forces to their respective sides of the demilitarized zones established under the truce agreement of the 17th January 1948" failed for adoption by 5 for with 6 abstentions (U.S.S.R., France, Canada, Ukraine and Argentina).

Final resolution as adopted by 7 to 4 abstentions, for which Canada voted in accordance with instructions contained in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 398,† was as follows, Begins:

The Security Council, noting with concern the resumption of hostilities in Indonesia, and; having taken note of the reports of the Committee of Good Offices; calls upon the parties:

(a) To cease hostilities, and

(b) Immediately to release the President and other political prisoners arrested since 18th December. Instructs the Committee of Good Offices to report to the Security Council fully and urgently by telegraph on the events which have transpired in Indonesia since 12th December, 1948; and to observe and report to the Security Council on the compliance with sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) above. Ends.

I had previously explained to United States representative that we would not be able to support that part of his resolution dealing with the withdrawal of troops, but suggested that we might propose an alternative along the lines of paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 396 of December 22nd. Jessup said that he would be willing to support our proposal if his own resolution failed, but asked me not to introduce it until after the United States resolution had been voted on. After the defeat of the United States resolution, I accordingly introduced draft Canadian resolution in following terms, Begins:

The Security Council instructs the Committee of Good Offices to submit a report at the earliest possible date, with a view to enabling the Security Council to decide what practicable steps the Security Council may take in view of the existing situation in Indonesia to bring about the speedy establishment of peaceful conditions there. Ends.

In doing so I made brief statement deploring collapse of negotiations stating Canadian support for immediate cease-fire as necessary preliminary to any peace settlement and explained our resolution on grounds that:

(a) The Council require further information regarding the existing military situation in the Netherlands before committing themselves to precise programme suggested in troop withdrawal provision;

(b) That Council were fortunate in having on the spot an instrumentality in the shape of the Committee of Good Offices which would provide such information and which;

(c) Should also be asked to suggest steps which the Security Council might take to bring about establishment of peaceful conditions. In reply to Australian and . . . Chinese enquiry, I explained that we visualized these functions of Committee of Good Offices as applying to the immediate situation in Indonesia and not to the long-term political settlement. I told Hodgson privately that in my view, relation of Committee of Good Offices to eventual political peace settlement in Indonesia was a matter to be considered at a later stage. He agreed. Netherlands representative reserved position of his Government regarding Canadian resolution which he thought went beyond Terms of Reference of Committee of Good Offices. Belgium supported him.

Canadian resolution failed acceptance by 6 votes for to 5 abstentions. Those voting for were Syria, Colombia, China, Canada, United States and United Kingdom. Those who abstained are USSR, Ukraine, Argentina, France and Belgium. Two amendments were proposed to Canadian resolution: One by Syria to insert the words "especially on the technical possibilities of withdrawing the armed forces to their former position prior to December 18th" which failed by 5 votes and 6 abstentions (Canada abstaining); the second was a Syrian amendment to add the words "requests the Consular Committee to continue to make the services of its military assistants available to the Committee of Good Offices." This amendment failed by 6 votes to 5 abstentions, Canada voting for as did the United Kingdom and United States. I felt it necessary to vote in favour of this amendment as without military observers on the spot at the disposal of the Committee of Good Offices our resolution could have had little practical effect.

United States representative has expressed his appreciation of our co-operative attitude. On the other hand Mr. Van Roijen has told me that he and his Government deeply appreciated Canadian abstention on the troop withdrawal provision which would, he said, have had the most grave and far-reaching consequences, if adopted. The Dutch can congratulate themselves upon coming off very lightly in the Security Council today. Ironically enough they are indebted to the Soviet Union for this result. The Soviet delegation had introduced a resolution of its own incorporating most of the points in the United States resolution but conceived in more violent terms and reverting to an earlier proposal of theirs to set up a Commission composed of representatives of all members of the Security Council to supervise the cessation of military operations and withdrawal of troops, and to assist in settling the conflict between the Netherlands and Indonesia. This resolution failed by 2 votes for against 9 abstentions (Canada abstaining). Soviet Union abstained on all parts of United States resolution.

The subject of Indonesia remains on the agenda of Security Council for Monday's meeting and it is quite likely that further attempt will be made at that meeting to gain acceptance for a variation of the Canadian resolution in order to strengthen existing position of Security Council in the Indonesian question. Subject to your instructions, however, I shall not take the initiative in producing any further variation of today's Canadian resolution. In my own view:

(1) It would be undesirable for Canada to be thrust into a pivotal position in the Indonesian question by resolution standing in our name becoming basis for further action by Committee of Good Offices:

(2) I am far from convinced that the Committee of Good Offices in its present divided state with the Australian and American representatives on one side and the Belgian representative on the other, will achieve a united report;

(3) The majority report, i.e. that of United States and Australian members might well be in favour of troop withdrawal as this has been the attitude of the United States and Australian delegations, in which case the Security Council would find itself back again in the same position from which it escaped today.

I am aware that these criticisms apply to the Canadian resolution which was advanced today, but in accordance with your instructions I considered it necessary to put forward that resolution which was also justified by the need for Canada to make some positive proposal after abstaining on the troop withdrawal. We have now made our proposal and it has been defeated. I feel we should be wise to leave well enough alone. I should, of course, have to vote in favour of any variation of the Canadian resolution which was produced by another member of the Council, unless it manifestly goes beyond the intention of our own resolution.

Subject to further instructions, I shall be guided by the above considerations at Monday's meeting of the Security Council. Ends.

Ottawa, December 26, 1948

Your telegrams Nos. 151† and 152†, December 23, Indonesia.

I am grateful for comments contained in your telegram under reference. You will have observed from vote in the Security Council on United States resolution concerning Indonesia, that we did in fact endeavour to take a middle course between positions expressed by United States and the Dutch, and that Canada was one of the members of the Council which abstained on that paragraph of the resolution calling for immediate withdrawal of Dutch troops. At this point we parted company with both the United States and the United Kingdom. We did so because we were opposed to precipitate action which failed to take into account the realities of the situation, and also because we were aware of the difficulties which the Dutch have encountered in Indonesia and the provocation to which they have been subjected.

2. We nevertheless regret that the Netherlands Government thought it advisable to take sudden military action, and we share the view that in all probability they are creating more problems than they are solving. These problems do not affect the Netherlands only, since their action will have grievous consequences in the relations between the Western world and Asiatic communities generally. A heavy responsibility now rests upon the Dutch to repair this damage to the fullest extent possible. They can do so only if they demonstrate immediately the good faith of their intentions in regard to the ultimate solution in Indonesia, and it seems to us that they should find means of doing so as quickly as possible. They themselves must decide on the means best suited to this purpose, but one action they might take would be to request the Security Council to observe the processes by which they put their Indonesian programme into effect.

3. I am repeating to you the text of telegram 868 of December 21 from Ritchie in Paris in which you will note that he advanced to Van Roijen the personal suggestion that the Netherlands representative should make a statement to the Security Council repeating assurances regarding the terms of the inclusion of the Republic in Federal Indonesia and the maintenance of democratic and representative Government in the Republic and that Dutch would welcome United Nations observers to see for themselves that these pledges are being implemented. Van Roijen thought well of this suggestion and reported it to his Government. In the statement which Van Roijen made before the Security Council on December 22 he said that the Netherlands Government was willing to report regularly to the Security Council regarding the terms of inclusion of the Republic in Federal Indonesia and the maintenance of democratic Government in the Republic. Van Roijen told Ritchie after the meeting that this was as far as he had been authorized to go in the statement which he and Ritchie had discussed the previous day. We have noted that the Netherlands Prime Minister in his report to Netherlands Parliament on December 20 made a conciliatory statement regarding the guarantee of freedom to the peoples of Indonesia but made it clear that this was solely a Dutch responsibility.

4. In view of the fact that we have stood by the Dutch on this occasion, it seems to me that it would be in order for us to communicate the views set forth in this telegram to the Netherlands Government. Unless, therefore, you consider that it would be inappropriate or inexpedient to do so, I should be grateful if you would discuss the Indonesian situation with the Netherlands Foreign Minister along these lines.

THE KASHMIR DISPUTE

1. Mr. Beaudry welcomed Mr. Kearney and asked him to comment on the Kashmir situation. Mr. Kearney said that compared with other crises that had arisen in India, the Kashmir dispute was undoubtedly the gravest and most serious threat to the peace which India and Pakistan had faced. He briefly reviewed some of the problems and difficulties bearing on the issue.

2. Kashmir, a princely state with a predominantly Moslem population (approximately 80 per cent), is governed by a Hindu Maharaja whose supporters are drawn largely from the Dogras, a section of the Hindu ruling class. Despite this predominantly Moslem population, the Maharaja had acceded to India on behalf of Kashmir. India had accepted accession provisionally pending a plebiscite. It is obvious that India is, however, interested in retaining Kashmir, among other reasons because of Pakistan's weakness. India feels it must protect Kashmir which touches on three foreign borders including that of the USSR.

3. The leader of the Kashmir National Congress is Sheikh Abdullah, a Moslem who, placed in this position through the influence of Nehru, is considered a puppet of the Indian Government and, in Pakistan opinion, is a traitor to the Moslem group.

4. Superimposed on the struggle for accession of Kashmir to India or Pakistan, is the fact that the northwestern frontier districts in the neighbourhood of the Khyber Pass are over-run by Pathan tribesmen — nomadic brigands who live by fighting and looting. For two hundred years the British, with well-organized forces, have been able to maintain fairly good order in this region, but this success can be attributed to bribery rather than to control by force. Long experience had convinced them that it was useless to oppose with force the hit-and-run tactics of the tribesmen who could hide out in inaccessible places and live virtually in any way on anything. In the belief that persuasion was the only way by which peace could be maintained in this area the British subsidized the tribes with an annual payment of approximately £3,500,000, ostensibly for the purpose of guarding the Khyber Pass.

5. In October 1947, the Pathan tribesmen invaded Kashmir allegedly to liberate the Moslems although it seems more likely that their chief motive was to obtain loot. On nearing Srinagar, the summer capital of Kashmir, they stopped at Baramulla and completely looted and destroyed the town. This threat to Srinagar caused the Maharaja to seek military aid from India as a result of which the Indian Government decided to strike quickly and sent troops in an attempt to prevent Kashmir from being over-run by the tribesmen. Military operations against the invaders have not been too successful. India alleges that Pakistan has at least permitted aid to go from its territory to the invaders.

6. The situation is now gravely dangerous. India has appealed to the Security Council for settlement of the issue, meantime threatening to invade Pakistan to cut off assistance to the invaders as a base for operations against Kashmir. If invasion occurs and Pakistan resists, the most terrible consequences will undoubtedly follow. Communal massacres may be anticipated not only in Kashmir but in India and Pakistan as well.

7. Mr. Kearney felt that opportunity for possible settlement did exist and he regretted that neither state seemed willing to take advantage of it. He believed it should be possible for both sides to get together and buy off the tribesmen. Without settling the tribal problem it would be extremely difficult to hold a plebiscite.

8. Both parties have signified agreement to the holding of a plebiscite to determine to which state Kashmir should accede but the way in which it should be conducted raises a problem. Jinnah contends that the pressure brought to bear by Abdullah makes a free vote impossible. India has suggested that an international commission be appointed to conduct the plebiscite. Weather conditions will prevent the holding of a plebiscite until the spring, but if it could then be conducted under the aegis of the Security Council the situation might be relieved. In the meantime, however, the Security Council is faced with the need of finding a settlement of the immediate problem. If it appoints a commission and issues a "stand-still" order, communal war might be avoided but it must be remembered that dealings with nomadic tribes cannot be conducted on the same basis as with an organized state.

9. Mr. Riddell asked what might be the result of a plebiscite held under free conditions. Mr. Kearney thought that with the Moslem majority the vote would favour accession of Kashmir to Pakistan.

10. Mr. MacKay asked if there were any British forces left in India. Mr. Kearney said that there were no British units but a few small details which were being rapidly repatriated. Pakistan, anxious to obtain all military, technical and financial aid, had offered more attractive contracts to encourage the enlistment of former British soldiers in the Pakistan Army. India, on the other hand, preferred to keep assistance from outside sources to a minimum and only accepted British soldiers on sufferance. (There appear to be about 500 British officers in the Pakistan Army and about 200 in the Indian Army.)

11. Mr. Riddell commented on the very favourable impression made at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly by Sir Mohammed Zafrullah Khan, Pakistan's new foreign minister, and asked how great his influence might be. Mr. Kearney thought there was evidence of lack of coordination with his own government but felt that it would be difficult to estimate his influence at the present time.

12. Mr. Hopkins asked why India had referred the Kashmir dispute to the Security Council while Pakistan had brought it to the attention of the Commonwealth governments. Mr. Kearney said that India had not agreed to discussions with the Commonwealth governments so Pakistan had threatened to refer the matter to the Security Council but delayed in doing so and the Indians, conscious of their precarious position, had therefore taken the initiative.

When the India-Pakistan question is discussed in the Security Council on Thursday next, the President will first call for initial statements from the Indian and Pakistan representatives, and there will then be a preliminary general discussion. The President then proposes to set up a small group of three members to consult with the Indian and Pakistan representatives for the purpose of drafting, if possible, a resolution to be submitted to Council proposing what initial action should be taken by the Council with regard to the Kashmir dispute. This committee would meet in private. He hopes that it might produce a resolution which would be acceptable to both parties and would reduce to a minimum the public discussion of the question.

2. Langelhove, the Chairman, wishes to know if the Canadian representative would be prepared to serve on this committee.<sup>42</sup> He thinks that the United States,

No, because it is a dispute between two Dominions, one of which wished it dealt with by Commonwealth representatives and the other preferred it put up to U.N. St. L[aurant] the United Kingdom and France should be excluded for particular reasons. The Syrian delegate also has a special interest and should probably be excluded. The President is also hopeful that the U.S.S.R. and the Ukraine could both be left off this committee. He is, therefore, very anxious to be able to name a Canadian to the committee in spite of our misgivings about a Commonwealth country being chosen.

3. Apart from the question of whether or not we should be willing to accept this responsibility as a member of the Security Council, there might be some purpose in giving the proposal favourable consideration since we might thereby more easily be able to keep off any subsequent committee which is established for the supervision of whatever programme is agreed upon in Kashmir.

4. I would be grateful to know whether we may inform the delegate in New York that he may, if necessary, accept membership on the drafting committee which the President of the Council is proposing to establish in regard to Kashmir.

General McNaughton has informed the Department that a resolution is now being considered by the Security Council with reference to the India-Pakistan dispute. This resolution provides for the establishment of a committee to be sent by the Security Council to Kashmir for the purpose of investigating the facts and giving assistance by means of mediation, where possible. This committee would be established by inviting the two parties, India and Pakistan, each to select a member of the Security Council, and then inviting the two so chosen to select a third.

In the meantime, the two parties are meeting in New York under the chairmanship of the President of the Assembly, and are endeavouring to reach agreement on a procedure for bringing the disturbances in Kashmir to an end and providing for an impartial plebiscite concerning the future of that state. General McNaughton considers that it would be reasonable to urge in the Security Council that the two states should in this manner reach the very largest measure of agreement possible in New York, and that the functions of any commission sent to Kashmir should thereby be reduced to supervising the adoption of proposals which had already been accepted by both parties.

Mr. St. Laurent asked me to point out to you that unless the Delegation takes steps to make known its unwillingness to serve, Canada may be requested by one of the parties to act on this commission, or, alternatively, may be selected by one of the states so chosen. If we refuse a direct appeal on the part of one of these states to assist in the manner suggested, we may give the impression that we are unwilling to help a friendly state which has specifically asked for our good offices. The Delegation is, however, prepared to intimate in advance to the representatives of India and Pakistan that Canada is not prepared to nominate a member for a commission such as the one proposed, and to give similar information to the states which are chosen by India and Pakistan, if the Government so wishes.<sup>44</sup>

Following for McNaughton from Pearson, Begins: Your telegram No. 32.† The Prime Minister phoned me last night to confirm that we should make clear that we are not available for membership on the Kashmir Commission. The reason that you gave in your telegram is a good one, that we should not be asked, at the very beginning of our membership on the Security Council, to take on commitments of this kind. The more important reason, however, is that this is a dispute between two Dominions, and a third Dominion would not be as suitable for a Commission of conciliation as a state outside the Commonwealth. I assume that you will be able to make our position clear to the Indian and Pakistan delegates, though I suppose we have no reason to believe that either of them would nominate Canada to the Commission. When we know what two states are, in fact, to be nominated, then we can approach them to indicate our unavailability in case they were thinking of co-opting Canada as a third member of the Commission. I attach copies of six recent telegrams from General McNaughton (Nos. 34,† 35,† 37,† 38,† 45† and 48†) concerning the India-Pakistan dispute. These telegrams give an account of formal proceedings in the Security Council and also of private conversations which the General has had with members of other Delegations.

The Security Council has now adopted the resolution establishing a commission on the Kashmir question to be chosen by the same method as in the case of the Indonesian commission. The General has made it quite clear to the Chairman of the Council that Canada will not be available for this commission, and the President seems fully to understand our position. It is the intention that the Indian and Pakistan delegates shall agree in New York to a general programme for the settlement of the Kashmir question, and the President of the Council is endeavouring to assist them to reach such an agreement. In his latest telegrams, however, (Nos. 45 and 48) the General says that he has been informed that very serious difficulties have arisen between the Indian and Pakistan Delegations.

KASHMIR DISPUTE

So far, the Security Council has concentrated upon urging the two Parties to seek agreement through direct negotiation. A sub-committee consisting of the representatives of the two Parties and the representative of Belgium (Chairman of the Council during January) as rapporteur has been established. The Council has been acting under Chapter 6 of the Charter which deals with peaceful settlement: no suggestion has been made that the United Nations should resort to measures of force.

2. Since a stalemate appears to be developing the representative of Belgium has proposed a resolution to be put before the Council. The text of this resolution is set forth in Telegram No. 106 of February 2nd,† which is attached. It will be observed that the resolution appears to run counter to the rather uncompromising stand taken by India in two respects:

(a) It seems to contemplate that Pakistan forces should be permitted to enter Kashmir to assist in restoring order, although both forces would be progressively withdrawn as soon as the re-establishment of law and order permits.

(b) It calls for an "impartial interim administration" (in order to secure) "a free and fair plebiscite."

3. The discussion of the resolution on February 3rd and 4th made clear that it was not very acceptable to India which has contended that it is responsible for the defence of Kashmir, since Kashmir acceded to India, and that the plebiscite should be conducted by the Government of Kashmir. India has introduced an amendment safeguarding its position in these respects.

4. In a private meeting suggested by the United States representative and attended by the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, Belgium, France and the Chairman, it was agreed to avoid a vote on either the resolution or the amendment, but to continue debate and the effort at reaching agreement by direct negotiation. It was agreed also to redraft the resolution with a view to further discussions if necessary. General McNaughton with the assistance of Mr. Riddell has attempted a redraft, the effect of which is (a) to place responsibility for solution more directly on India and Pakistan, and (b) to make the resolution more acceptable in tone. A copy of Telegram No. 125 giving the redraft is attached.†

5. Both the United Kingdom and the United States appear to feel that if the direct negotiations now going on fail, a motion along the lines of that proposed by the representative of Belgium will be necessary. It would seem that the Canadian representative could not avoid going along with the United Kingdom and the United States representatives in supporting this proposal.

6. In accordance with his instructions, the Canadian representative has avoided taking an active part in the negotiations between the Parties and has informally advised the Parties that, since the dispute was between two members of the Commonwealth, Canada could not appropriately be nominated as a member of any commission established to proceed to Kashmir. However, since the Canadian representative is this month Chairman of the Security Council, he can scarcely avoid taking some part in furthering negotiations in his official capacity as chairman.

7. It is thought that you might wish to make some report to Cabinet on these developments in the Security Council's consideration of the dispute.<sup>45</sup>

The position in the Security Council in regard to the dispute over Kashmir is now somewhat confused. The Indian Delegation has insisted that the primary responsibility of the Council is to assist in preventing invasions over the borders of Kashmir, which it now regards as under Indian protection following the accession by the Maharajah. The procedure by which this accession is to be confirmed by a plebiscite is, according to India, a long term question which, in any case, is within the domestic jurisdiction of the Maharajah. The Pakistan representative, on the other hand, claims that the situation in Kashmir is essentially a civil war, brought about by attacks on the Moslem population of that province which the Maharajah has encouraged, and by Moslem unwillingness to accept this accession to India and a subsequent plebiscite under Indian domination. He has also insisted that the Kashmir dispute is only one aspect of the broader problem of India-Pakistan relations, which must also be discussed.

From the discussion which has taken place to date, General McNaughton, as President of the Council, has prepared a draft resolution which includes the points that have been put forward. The most important of these is a statement of the principle that, in order to ensure an impartial plebiscite in Kashmir, the Government of that province should be entrusted during the period before the plebiscite to a neutral administration. It was hoped that both India and Pakistan would accept this resolution. The Indian Delegation now claims, however, that the Council is refusing to deal with the original point at issue, namely, the invasion of Kashmir from bases in Pakistan, and broadening the discussion to include other and irrelevant topics. The Indian representatives have therefore announced their intention to return to New Delhi for discussions, and have asked the Council to adjourn the discussion of the Kashmir question for a month at least.

At its meeting yesterday, the Council refused to adjourn the discussion which will continue this morning. It has been intimated to the Indian representative that he can go to New Delhi for discussion if he chooses, but that he should leave someone on hand to represent his government. The Council will now proceed to work out general principles for the settlement of the Kashmir dispute. The Indian Government, having failed to secure from the Council immediate support for its action in Kashmir, seems fearful lest the Council now will make recommendations which might eventually result in the province detaching itself from India and joining Pakistan.

KASHMIR

At the meeting of the Security Council yesterday, the Indian representative again asked for an indefinite adjournment of the Kashmir discussion, or at least an adjournment of one month. He expressed some indignation that the Council should not accede immediately to this request.

The only support given to the Indian request was by the Ukrainian member of the Council. The Colombian said that a serious precedent would be established if a state, which found a case going against it in the Security Council, could adjourn a debate, and he showed considerable impatience with the Indians. He was supported by the Argentinian. The Chinese proposed a postponement of two weeks, and it was also suggested that discussion should continue on the more general questions raised by Pakistan.

At to-day's meeting, General McNaughton will try to avoid a straight vote on the question of adjournment by trying to get agreement to the following proposals:

i) that the constitutional point raised by the Colombian can be met by maintaining that, even though the discussion is adjourned, it remains on the agenda and may be resumed by the Council at any moment the Council chooses.

ii) discussion should continue on the question placed on the agenda by Pakistan.

iii) adjournment of the discussion on Kashmir should be granted for two weeks to allow the Indian delegation to consult its Government.

RE KASHMIR

As you know, the consideration of the Kashmir question in the Security Council is now proceeding on the basis of a draft resolution which was submitted by the Chinese representative. The Indian delegation has accepted a number of amendments to this resolution, which now provides for an interim government in Kashmir representing both parties, and a plebiscite on the future of Kashmir under the close supervision of an international commission and under the direction of an electoral official appointed by the Security Council.

As matters now stand, the United Nations commission which will go to Kashmir for the purpose of observing the activities of the interim government prior to the completion of the plebiscite, will consist of three states, one nominated by India, one nominated by Pakistan and one selected by these two nominees. Before the change in government in Czechoslovakia, the Indians nominated Czechoslovakia for this panel. It was expected that the Czechoslovak government would appoint some independent person who would be acceptable to the Western states. It is now probable, however, that the choice of Czechoslovakia as a member of this commission will give the Soviet Union more direct access to the operations of the commission than anyone had originally desired. The Colombian delegate therefore is renewing a proposal he made previously that the size of the commission should be increased to five. By this means, he considers that the influence of the Czechoslovak member could be minimized.

The delegation in New York will therefore require instructions on the following two points:

(a) Should it support a proposal that the size of the United Nations commission be increased from three to five members?

(b) Should it continue to refuse membership on this commission if the number is increased from three to five, and especially if it concurs in that increase?

The present position is that the delegation has indicated that Canada will not accept membership on the Kashmir commission. The circumstances have now changed, however, because of events in Czechoslovakia, and also because of increasing evidence that the Russians are not uninterested in developments in India and South-East Asia. The delegation wishes to know, therefore, whether the instructions in connection with membership on the commission remain unaltered.<sup>46</sup>

The effort to arrive at a method of procedure which will be acceptable to both the Indian and Pakistan Governments now appears to have failed in New York. The members of the Council now intend therefore to draw up on the basis of existing proposals and counter-proposals, a recommendation for consideration by the Council. They will endeavour, in preparing this recommendation, to propose a course of action which as far as possible protects the legitimate interests of both India and Pakistan.

The essential elements of this recommendation would provide that the present relationship between India and Kashmir should continue, for the time being at least; that the Indian army should continue to defend the borders of Kashmir; that the present government of Kashmir should be adjusted to include a fair representation of the Moslem groups; that conditions should be provided for an impartial plebiscite through the presence of a Security Council commission in Kashmir and the appointment on the recommendation of the Security Council of an external chief electoral officer. There is some hope that, although neither party will accept this recommendation in advance, both will acquiesce in it as soon as it has been accepted by the Security Council.

This document is being worked on informally by the delegates who have been chairmen of the Council while the Kashmir question was under consideration, in consultation with the United Kingdom and United States delegates. The expectation is that, if these delegates can agree on a draft resolution, they will put it forward jointly. General McNaughton would like to know whether it is in order for him, as a past president of the Council, to proceed in the work of preparing this document, with the expectation that, if it proves acceptable to the other delegates with which he is associated, he will be permitted to sponsor it in the Security Council jointly with them. The Government will of course have an opportunity to see and approve the text of this document before it is finally submitted to the Security Council.

RE KASHMIR

About a fortnight ago it became apparent in New York that no further progress could be made toward securing agreement between India and Pakistan on the course of action which should be followed in regard to Kashmir. The President of the Council (the Colombian representative) therefore asked other representatives who had been president during the discussion of the Kashmir question, to assist him in preparing a draft Resolution in which the Council would recommend a procedure for settlement. This group (Belgium, Canada, China and Columbia), with the assistance of the United States and United Kingdom representatives, who were co-opted, took as a basis for their discussions a draft Resolution which the Chinese representative had introduced when he was President. They also gave consideration to comments made to this draft Resolution by the Delegates of India and Pakistan. In regard to the draft Resolution as revised, General McNaughton makes the following comment:

“All these various changes, in my judgment, considerably improves the text of this Resolution, and should make it more acceptable to the two parties as a basis for settlement. The provocative elements of the Resolution have now been deleted whenever possible and the present text is a straightforward recommendation of certain measures which the Council believe would be appropriate to bring an end to the fighting in Kashmir and to create proper conditions for the plebiscite.”

The draft Resolution before the Council (a brief summary of which is annexed hereto) seeks to avoid making any judgment as to the facts or the law but concentrates on procedure of settlement. It provides, among other things, for appointing a commission which shall proceed to the Indian sub-continent and offer its good offices and mediation to India and Pakistan with a view to restoration of order and the taking of a plebiscite. A special officer, the Plebiscite Administrator, shall be nominated by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and appointed by Kashmir, to administer the plebiscite.

It may be observed that the procedure by commission will be impracticable if it is not assented to by India. There would appear to be little hope of India or Pakistan assenting to the procedure unless the Resolution receives the widest possible support in the Council. Telephone conversation with officials in New York this morning indicates that there is general agreement among the delegations who participated in drafting the Resolution that the Resolution will be sponsored and supported by all or none. If the Canadian delegate does not support the Resolution, in company with his colleagues, the present approach will probably have to be abandoned.

Further information of importance this morning is that United Kingdom is now prepared to support the Resolution and to use its best endeavours to get the Indian Government to accept it.

It is recommended that General McNaughton be instructed to support the Resolution providing all other delegations which participated in the drafting also support it.<sup>47</sup>

BRIEF SUMMARY OF THE DRAFT RESOLUTION ON KASHMIR TO BE PRESENTED TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL

The Resolution provides inter alia:

(a) for a Commission of five (formerly three) which will proceed at once to the Indian sub-continent and "place its good offices and mediation" at the service of India and Pakistan with a view to assisting them in restoring peace and order and assisting Kashmir to take the plebiscite;

(b) responsibilities are imposed on both parties — Pakistan for example must use its best endeavours to secure withdrawal of the tribesmen and to keep them out, India, as the tribesmen withdraw, is to withdraw its forces progressively in consultation with the Commission, to reduce them to the minimum required for the maintenance of internal order, and to dispose of the troops remaining in such a way as not to interfere with the plebiscite;

(c) India undertakes (on behalf of Kashmir) to appoint a Plebiscite Administrator who is to be nominated by the Secretary General, the Administrator as an Officer of Kashmir to be given all necessary powers including the power to appoint electoral assistants and magistrates to deal with election offences, and the direction of local police;

Agreed St. L[aurant]

(d) representation of the major political groups in the pre-plebiscitary government of Kashmir is to be provided by nomination by these groups of their representatives;

(e) the Government of India also undertakes (largely on behalf of the Government of Kashmir) to prevent, and to give full support to the Administrator in preventing, intimidation, threats or coercion of voters, and to assure freedom of speech, press, assembly and lawful entry and exit to or from Kashmir;

(f) the Administrator shall at all times have direct access to the Commission or to either Government, and the Commission in turn shall at all times have direct access to either Government, and to the Security Council.

New York, April 22, 1948

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference previous correspondence, Kashmir.

At the meeting of the Security Council at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday, 21st April, the joint Resolution on Kashmir was adopted paragraph by paragraph with no changes except for the redrafting of paragraph 10(e), adopted on the suggestion of the Chinese representative. Paragraph 10(e) now reads as follows:

“The Administrator should have the right to communicate direct with the Government of the State and with the Commission of the Security Council and, through the Commission, with the Security Council, with the Governments of India and Pakistan and with their representatives with the Commission. It would be his duty to bring to the notice of any or all of the foregoing (as he in his discretion may decide) any circumstances arising which may tend, in his opinion, to interfere with the freedom of the Plebiscite.”

With the exception of this change, the adopted Resolution is identical with that contained in my teletype No. 423† together with the amendments contained in my teletype No. 437.†

2. In most cases the voting on individual paragraphs was 9 in favour, none against and 2 abstentions (the Soviet Union and the Ukraine). In addition to this, Syria abstained on those paragraphs to which Pakistan had expressed strong objections.

3. Prior to the meeting of the Council, it was agreed by the sponsoring delegations that each of the sponsors would explain the various clauses of the Resolution in answer to the principal criticisms made by India and Pakistan on 19th April.

Accordingly, I undertook to explain the intention of the sponsoring delegations in regard to the changing of the words "direction and control" to "direction and supervision" in paragraphs 3 and 8. The text of my remarks in this connection is contained in my immediately following teletype.†

4. After the vote had been taken on all paragraphs of the Resolution, the Council adjourned until 3:00 p.m. Friday, 23rd April. At that time the Council will take up the question of completing the membership of the Security Council's Commission on Kashmir. On the suggestion of the United States representative, it was agreed that this meeting of the Council will also consider the subject of the truce in Palestine. The President added that, if time permitted, the Council would also consider the Czechoslovak question again at this meeting.

5. Before the Meeting adjourned Zafrullah Khan reminded the Council that the adoption of the Resolution on Kashmir did not dispose of the India-Pakistan dispute. He pointed out that Pakistan's complaint in regard to Junagadh and the question of genocide still remained to be discussed. The disposal of these remaining items in the India-Pakistan dispute may also be considered at the 23rd April meeting.

6. In regard to the reception by India and Pakistan of the Council's Resolution on Kashmir, I would like to draw your attention to a report by A.M. Rosenthal in the New York Times, 22nd April (page 2, column 2). The last paragraph of this report reads as follows:

"Despite the fact that both Dominions objected to the Resolution on the ground that it was giving the other side much too much, Council delegates were optimistic that the New Delhi and Karachi Governments would feel bound to accept the verdict of the United Nations."

My belief is that the rather hopeful note contained in this paragraph is not without some foundation.

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference previous correspondence, Kashmir.

At the Security Council meeting, 2:30 p.m., 23rd April, consideration was given to naming two additional members to the five-member Commission for Kashmir approved by the Resolution of 21st April. (See paragraph 4 of my teletype No. 466.) The representative of France nominated Belgium and Colombia in view of the contributions made by the representatives of these countries in regard to the Kashmir Resolution. I seconded these nominations on the understanding given below. By a vote of 7 in favour, none against and 4 abstentions (Belgium, Colombia, the Ukraine and the Soviet Union) the Council decided to ask Belgium and Colombia to serve on the Commission. Immediately prior to the Council meeting, the United Kingdom delegation asked me to propose the nominations of Belgium and Colombia. Both Noel-Baker and Patrick of the United Kingdom gave me to understand that Colombia would welcome this nomination and that the Belgian Government had agreed to serve on the Commission. I did not agree to propose these nominations, but did agree to second them if France proposed them. As it turned out, however, the Belgian representative was without instructions on this point and reserved his Government's position in regard to serving on the Commission. The Colombian representative stated that he would transmit the Council's resolution to his Government and request them to "undertake this heavy responsibility."

2. In regard to the Junagadh question it was agreed, on Noel Baker's suggestion, to leave it to the President's discretion to call the two parties together when they are ready to discuss this matter. The President was also given discretion to call upon the six delegations who had participated in the Kashmir Resolution if he thought this would be useful in the Junagadh case. Meanwhile, if a long delay seems likely, Pakistan retains the right to ask that Junagadh be again placed on the Council's Agenda and to have it considered by the Council in the ordinary manner.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that consideration is now being given to the policy which the Canadian Delegate to the United Nations should follow in regard to the question of Palestine when this subject is discussed in the Security Council. In this regard it is of particular importance that we should have some idea concerning the attitude of the United States Government towards this question. I would be grateful, therefore, if you would approach the United States Government with a request for information concerning the United States policy in regard to Palestine.

2. It would be appropriate for you to point out to United States officials that the Canadian Delegate to the United Nations will be President of the Security Council during the month of February. It is altogether likely that the Palestine Commission will report to the Security Council during the period within which General

McNaughton is President, and he will therefore have responsibility of particular importance in relation to this question.

3. You may wish also to remind the United States Government that, during the discussions of the Palestine question in the second session of the General Assembly, the Canadian Delegation gave its support to the plan for partition with economic union only on the understanding that the permanent members of the Security Council would take whatever action might be required for putting that plan into effect. This subject was discussed privately on frequent occasions by members of the Delegation with members of the United States Delegation. It was the view of the Canadian Delegation that the responsibility of the Great Powers should be made explicit through a reference in the Resolution of the Assembly to the authority of the Security Council to deal with situations and disputes. The United States Delegation objected to the proposals of the Canadian Delegation in this regard on the ground that a specific reference to the Security Council would in effect constitute a threat against the Arab states. It would be a mistake in tactics, they said, to adopt a formula which made explicit the expectation that the Arab states would resist the settlement and that force would have to be applied to make them accept it. In both public and private, members of the United States Delegation stated that it should be taken for granted that the Arab states would accept a decision of the General Assembly, and confidentially they intimated that they were prepared themselves to take action directly with the Arab states to secure their acquiescence. Before the close of the debate, however, it became evident that many states shared the misgivings of the Canadian Delegation concerning the means by which effect would be given to the Palestine proposals. In consequence, the United States Delegation finally agreed to an amendment to the Palestine resolution by which responsibility was placed on the Security Council in the event of disturbances in Palestine which would make it impossible for the Palestine Commission to carry out its mandate. At the same time, the United States delegate, Mr. Herschel Johnson, said in a meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee on Palestine, that in the event of an appeal to the Security Council, the United States could be counted upon to fulfil its responsibilities as a member of that body.

4. It is now evident that the Arab states are determined to resist by force the plan for the partition of Palestine, and it is doubtful if the Jewish community in Palestine will be able to establish and maintain the Jewish state in Palestine unless it receives armed support from the Members of the U.N. during the year 1948. It may also be that some continuing armed support from the Members of the U.N. will be necessary for some years to come to prevent attacks on the Jewish state. In these circumstances, it is most important that the United States should indicate to other states which generally supported their position during the discussions on Palestine at the General Assembly what concrete policy they propose to adopt or what specific proposals they will suggest when the Palestine question comes before the Security Council.

5. In making those inquiries, it would be in order for you to ask for a clear indication of the policy of the United States Government in regard to methods by which the proposed settlement in Palestine should be imposed and maintained. If the United States should indicate that it is thinking in terms of an international force made up of national contingents solely from the secondary states, you can suggest that the Canadian Government would not regard this as satisfactory nor in accord with the declaration of the United States representative (cited at the end of paragraph 3 above) that in the event of an appeal to the Security Council the United States could be counted upon to fulfil its responsibilities as a member of that body.

6. It would also be in order for you to go further in your discussions with the United States authorities and indicate quite clearly that, in the absence of a clear indication of a constructive and consistent policy on the part of the United States Government in regard to the Palestine question, that Government should not expect the Canadian Delegation to the Security Council to take any initiative in the discussion of that question or to concur in proposals on the part of the United States Delegation which do not have the degree of firmness and practicability which the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly was led to expect from its discussions with the United States Delegation at that time.

I have etc.,

TELEGRAM WA-390

Washington, February 4, 1948

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Your despatch No. 283 of January 26th on the situation in Palestine.

I spent an hour with Mr. Lovett this afternoon and gave him a memorandum based on the contents of your despatch. He was accompanied by Messrs. Loy Henderson and Dean Rusk.

2. The policy to be adopted by the United States delegation when the Palestine issue comes before the Security Council has not been finally determined. Our discussion covered a great deal of ground and from it emerged fairly clearly the probable position which they will take.

3. Lovett raised two points about the memorandum I gave him. The first related to the statement in paragraph 3 of your despatch that members of the United States delegation at the Assembly had confidentially intimated that they were prepared themselves to take action directly with the Arab States to secure their acquiescence in partition. Lovett said that there had not been any intention at any time of the United States intervening directly with the individual Arab States but only that their influence and prestige would be employed to give backing to the recommendation of the General Assembly. The second point related to the phrase at the beginning of paragraph 4 of your despatch to the effect that "the Arab States" will resist partition by force. He pointed out that the current resistance came from Palestinian Arabs and not directly from the Arab States, although of course the Arab League was inciting resistance. The point is of considerable importance, since unless there are incursions by forces from the Arab States into Palestine (as has been the case in Greece) the problem is an internal one and no act of aggression within the scope of the Charter has been committed.

4. Lovett then discussed the legal basis of the recommendation of the Assembly, emphasizing that it was a recommendation and not a decision and that it could not be turned into a decision under the Charter by the Security Council. Rusk pointed out that the only way under the Charter in which the United Nations could become legally responsible for the enforcement of partition would be for the whole of Palestine to be placed under trusteeship and for a fresh decision to be taken to partition Palestine.

5. The present situation, they said, is that the General Assembly has made a recommendation, hoping that it would be accepted by both Arabs and Jews in Palestine. It has not, however, been accepted by the Arabs either in the Jewish or in the Arab areas under the partition scheme. The Security Council is not bound to support the recommendation, and events have shown that a majority, or at least a substantial proportion, of the inhabitants of Palestine are against it. If the Arab States are unwise enough to intervene with troops inside Palestine, the Security Council would then have to take action, as an act of aggression would have been committed, but the Council would still have no legal authority, even in those circumstances to take action to enforce partition. I remarked at this point that doubt about the constitutionality of the Palestine proposals had been frequently voiced by the Canadian delegation during the proceedings at the Assembly without enlisting much support, and Lovett said that our position then was well taken.

6. Lovett remarked that the Security Council could find the existing situation in Palestine a threat to the peace even without intervention by the Arab States, although he appeared to think that this was unlikely. He added that in that case the duty of the Security Council would be to try to find means of restoring order, but that this would not include authority to impose partition.

7. The conclusion from this is that the Assembly's recommendation is unworkable at any rate in present circumstances and that therefore an effort should be made to find some other solution. Lovett argued that the immediate objective should be to secure a cooling-off period until the whole situation could be re-examined. The best way to do this would be for the British to keep their forces in Palestine for a further period and request the General Assembly to take another look at the problem in the light of the failure of its first proposal. He thought that the question might come before another special session, to meet within a few weeks. They have not had any discussions with the British, and do not, I should judge, propose to initiate discussions. The only alternative that Lovett could see to a continuance of British occupation was the recruitment of a volunteer police force on the lines of the original United States proposal to the Assembly. This, however, presented very great difficulties especially since the volunteers in most countries would be likely to be almost all Jews, who would constitute in effect an addition to the forces of Hagana and the more extreme Jewish organizations.

8. I directed Lovett's attention to Herschel Johnson's statement that if the matter came before the Security Council the United States could be counted upon to fulfil its responsibilities as a member of that body. In reply he retraced his earlier argument as to what in fact the responsibilities of the Security Council were in the present situation. There had certainly been no promise, express or implied, that the United States would despatch troops, and he thought that the despatch of even a small force as part of an international contingent would result in a wave of anti-semitism in this country. Hence, if United States citizens were to become involved in maintaining order, they would have to be volunteers. He alluded to General Eisenhower's statement that partial mobilization would be necessary if the United States were to take over from the British their responsibility in Palestine. He also mentioned the danger that, if matters went on as they are, one side or the other in Palestine might invite and secure Russian military assistance.

9. I observed that I knew that the United Kingdom would be very unwilling to retain their forces after May 15th as there was a very strong popular demand for their withdrawal and that no more British blood should be shed in Palestine. This led him into a general criticism of the British tactics, which he said were losing them public support in the United States at an alarming rate even among people unsympathetic to Zionist aims. They were standing half-aloo from the problem of law enforcement and had departed from the hard-hitting tactics which had been successful in coping with the Arab revolt before the war. He thought that it was not asking too much of the United Kingdom that they should keep their forces there until an attempt had been made to find a more acceptable solution. There was enough truth in the charges that the British were arming the Arab States to make the position of the United States most uncomfortable in enforcing their embargo on arms to the Jews.

10. He thought the best course in the United Nations would be for the Palestine Commission itself to propose to the Security Council that there should be a further study of the position during which the United Kingdom should continue to operate the mandate. The State Department, however, was in no position to make such a suggestion to members of the Palestine Commission because, as he put it, there were Zionist spies everywhere. He wondered whether the Canadian delegation might not do this in New York, but I said at once that it would be very difficult for us to have any part in initiating a proposal for the continued British occupation of Palestine.

11. Lovett cordially agreed that there should be further consultation between us on the whole position and instructed Henderson to keep me informed of any developments. I should doubt whether the United States member will have any proposal to put forward if the matter reaches the Security Council next week, and he will be likely to play for time. You will, I expect, wish to repeat this message to General McNaughton.

[Ottawa], February 6, 1948

THE PALESTINE ISSUE IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. Wrong's account of his conversations at the State Department (WA-390 of February 4) makes it clear that we are faced with very delicate and difficult problems as a member of the Security Council. Our objective must be to do what we can to minimize the effects of the blow to the prestige of the Security Council and the United Nations generally. We must also try to avoid being embroiled on one side or the other in the struggle between the United Kingdom and the United States to unload on the other the responsibility for the failure of the Palestine settlement recommended by the Assembly.

2. Our objective should indeed be not merely to avoid being embroiled in such an unpleasant struggle between the United States and the United Kingdom; it must be to do what we can to keep that struggle from becoming too open and bitter. For the past three years or more the Russians have been doing their best to drive a wedge between the United States and the United Kingdom. During the past two years they have met with little success. During the next few months the situation in Western Europe is likely to continue to be so acute that a serious rift between the United States and the United Kingdom might greatly increase the danger of the Western world not being able to hold the line against Soviet expansion in Western Europe.

3. At the last session of the Assembly, the Canadian delegation was able to do a great deal to reconcile the views on Palestine of the United States and the Soviet Union. During the present crisis over Palestine, it would seem as if our role should be to try to reconcile the views of the United States and the United Kingdom.

4. It is possible that a reconciliation over at least a short period might be found in developing the United States' suggestion that what is now needed is "to secure a cooling-off period until the whole situation could be re-examined."

5. The United States may support a re-examination by another special session of the Assembly to meet in a few weeks' time "to take another look at the problem," which presumably means to make an effort to find a solution which both the Jews and the Arabs will support.

6. In any re-examination is to be made, it would seem to me much better if it were made by the Security Council and not by the General Assembly. It is important in this matter to save the face of the United Nations. For the Security Council to request the calling of a special session of the Assembly would mean a public confession by the Security Council that it was not only unable and unwilling to act under Chapter VII of the Charter (enforcement measures) but that it was also unable or unwilling to act under Chapter VI (peaceful settlement). It does not seem to me to be necessary for the Security Council to make such a public confession of weakness. The Security Council, when the Palestine dispute comes before it, could decide to discuss it first under Chapter VI before moving to Chapter VII. This would be in accord with the general spirit of the Charter which is that the Security Council should exhaust all methods of peaceful settlement before authorizing the use of force. The Security Council could argue that, since the Charter makes it the world's supreme agency for international conciliation, the Assembly in its resolution could not have contemplated that the Security Council should renounce its obligation under the Charter to attempt conciliation.

7. If, in any event, the Security Council is going to be forced by events to discuss the possibility of either it or the Assembly finding a basis for conciliation, the damage to the prestige of the Security Council would be greater if it had first had a discussion of enforcement measures under Chapter VII and this discussion had ended in a public demonstration of the powerlessness of the Security Council to enforce the Assembly's recommendation.

8. It can also be argued that, if the Council were to first deal with the Palestine situation under Chapter VI, there would be a better chance of it reaching agreement under Chapter VII. There is certainly some indication that influential circles in the United Kingdom believe that the possibilities of conciliation had not been adequately explored at the recent session of the Assembly. These people would be more willing to support the use of force if the Security Council made every effort to conciliate and the Arabs proved completely stubborn. To a limited extent, the same might be true in France and China.

9. The Security Council might not therefore be merely bluffing if it stated to the parties to the dispute that the fact that it was first of all discussing the dispute under Chapter VI did not mean that, in the event of its efforts at conciliation failing, it was not prepared to resort to Chapter VII.

10. If the Security Council were to attempt to act under Chapter VI, it need not allow itself to be embarrassed even temporarily by questions regarding the basis upon which an attempt to negotiate, conciliate or mediate should be expected to rest. The Council could demand firmly of the disputants that they find a basis for discussion themselves, making full use of the good offices of the Security Council, or of a mediator or conciliator chosen by themselves under the aegis of the Security Council. The Council would thus try to put upon the disputants full responsibility for arriving at a modus vivendi. The Security Council could offer to back up the decisions of the disputants if they will agree to conciliation as an alternative to a ruinous conflict in which both would be likely to lose much more than they could gain.

11. The Security Council would presumably act under Article 33 of the Charter which provides that the Security Council, when it deems necessary, may call upon the parties to a dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, to settle their dispute by peaceful means. The Jewish Agency, speaking for Jews both inside and outside Palestine who support the Zionist venture, and the Arab Higher Committee and independent Arab states, could properly be considered to be "parties" to the dispute in Palestine within the meaning of Article 33 of the Charter. The use of Article 33 would give Jewish Agency spokesmen an opportunity to demonstrate the genuineness of their assurances, given during the recent session of the General Assembly, that they intend to meet the Arabs half way. It would also give spokesmen for the Arabs a chance to develop the proposals for compromise which they produced unexpectedly at the close of the Assembly session, too late for consideration by that body. Moreover, Zionists are aware of their own need for United States military backing if attacks from neighbouring Arab States have to be resisted and understand that in the absence of that aid their position in Palestine would become perilous in the extreme; the Arab states, on the other hand, might well prefer negotiations under Security Council auspices rather than to condemn large numbers of their young men to death in a struggle likely to be long drawn out.

12. As a result of recent developments, it may be that the Members of the United Nations are faced with a choice between two disagreeable alternatives. The first alternative would be to accept the breakdown of the Assembly's plans for the future government of Palestine and allow the Jews and the Arabs to settle their differences by force of arms. The second would be for the Security Council or the General Assembly to try to find a basis for conciliating the Arab and Zionist claims through amendment of the Assembly's recommendations.

13. I suggest that our first step might be to try to find out from London and Washington whether they agree that these are now the alternatives which confront us. Should they agree that these are the alternatives (though they disagree on which of them is responsible for the mess) then we might suggest to them that a public controversy between them over who is responsible for the mess would benefit no one except the Soviet Union. Starting from that, it might be possible for them, in direct and private discussions, to work out some agreed policy before the matter is publicly debated in the Security Council. In order to get a cooling-off period, the British might take on the job of persuading the Arabs to keep quiet while the whole matter of the Palestine settlement is being reconsidered and the Americans might try a similar job of persuasion on the Jews.

PALESTINE

The Palestine question will appear on the agenda of the Security Council on or about February 24th in the form of a special report from the Palestine Commission. This report will probably state that the Palestine Commission cannot give effect to partition in Palestine without military protection and support and that a serious civil war is on the point of breaking out in Palestine.

2. The threat of widespread disorder in Palestine is the culmination of a trend to which attention has been drawn by a long series of Commissions of Inquiry which have visited Palestine since 1921. More than a decade ago it was seen to be inevitable that the mandate would become impossible to administer unless the promise of a "national home" for the Jews in Palestine could be implemented in a way acceptable to the Arabs. Wartime persecution of the Jews and post-war pressures on Palestine have accelerated the arrival of the crisis long foreseen. By the winter of 1946-47 it was apparent that the United Kingdom, acting alone, could not bring the Arabs and Zionists to agree. Nor could it continue, in its own weakened position and under the existing pressures, to carry sole responsibility for holding the balance even between Jewish and Arab interests under the terms of its mandate from the League of Nations.

3. In asking for recommendations from the United Nations concerning the future government of Palestine the United Kingdom may have hoped to receive a proposal which would have had the effect of drawing Jews and Arabs closer together. Obviously the United Kingdom is not in sympathy with the plan actually proposed by the Assembly, and its consequent refusal to take part in implementing the plan for partition with economic union has seriously aggravated the crisis with which we are now faced. Hatreds held in check as long as the British were in control have now broken out in violence on an unprecedented scale. The Zionists feel that anything less than the translation of the "Jewish National Home" of the Balfour Declaration into the Jewish national state foreshadowed in the Assembly resolution would be a betrayal. The Arabs assert that they will fight against any combination of powers to prevent the partition of Palestine and the establishment of Jewish sovereignty in any part of that country, all of which they regard as Arab territory. The problem of protecting Jewish settlements against attack is expected to reach an acute stage as soon as the British mandate is terminated on May 15th.

4. When the matter comes before the Security Council, four courses of action are open:

(1) To accept the condition that partition is inapplicable, and refuse to act on the Assembly resolution, which is, after all, only a recommendation. This course of action would have the following disadvantages. It would make clear that a decision of the Assembly, which was opposed by only thirteen relatively weak states, could be set aside simply because certain of those states, the Arab ones, resisted it with a show of force. Inaction, moreover, would not solve the problem, since the Jews will certainly resist Arab domination in Palestine. It would leave the way open for the USSR to intervene in Palestine alone as the only state willing to use force to support a United Nations recommendation.

(2) To make preparations for the establishment of an international force in Palestine to put the partition plan into effect. A large force may not be necessary, but it would have to be well equipped and well supported. A force for this purpose might be raised in one of a number of ways:

(a) A volunteer international force, recruited, trained and equipped under United Nations control. A force of this nature could not be raised and put in the field within six to twelve months, and would not therefore be available in time to meet the present emergency.

(b) An international force made up of contingents provided by the regular armies of member states. In order to avoid accepting Soviet participation in a force of this character, it may be proposed that small powers only should contribute. The small powers, however, are not likely to be prepared to take part in military action from which the permanent members of the Security Council stand aside.

(c) An international force in which the Great Powers participate. In the absence of military agreements under Article 43 of the Charter, the Security Council has no force of this nature at its disposition. There is no reason, however, why a special agreement should not be made to provide a force for the specific purpose of dealing with the situation in Palestine, though it would admittedly be difficult to secure this agreement. A special agreement for this purpose would, of course, be subject to acceptance and ratification in the legislatures of the states which were asked to participate in it. The principal objection to this proposal is that it would necessarily include a Soviet contingent. The presence of a small Soviet group in a genuinely international military force is not necessarily as alarming as is frequently represented, and the United States, the United Kingdom and France may agree to establish an international force in which contingents from all large powers may serve. In this case, other states, particularly the non-permanent members of the Security Council, may be expected also to contribute to this international force. The Canadian representative on the Security Council should be advised as to the attitude he should adopt if a proposal of this nature develops.

(3) To refer the Palestine question to the General Assembly for further consideration, and to recommend that a Special Assembly be called for the purpose. No further discussion of the problem in an international conference is likely to produce an agreed solution, particularly if the discussion takes place without leadership from some state which is prepared to advocate a settlement. Jews and Arabs have taken up irreconcilable positions, and public debate will not bring them together.

(4) To make a further effort at conciliation, which the Security Council might undertake under Article 33 of the Charter. This course might offer some hope of an agreed solution but only if the United States and United Kingdom together had agreed in advance as to the form of compromise they thought applicable, and were prepared to put pressure on Jews and Arabs alike to accept this compromise. An effort to reach a compromise merely by debate in public in the Security Council will be as fruitless and damaging as a similar debate in a Special Assembly.

5. The most dangerous element in the present situation is the breakdown in communications between the Governments of the United States and United Kingdom on the subject of Palestine. As far as we can tell, the two Governments have not discussed the matter with one another on any responsible level. An acrimonious public debate may break out between them at any minute. There is ample material for recriminations on both sides, and much ill feeling. No one will profit from this situation except the USSR, which would, of course, benefit greatly if the Palestine question results in a serious wedge being driven between the United States and the United Kingdom. There is a real possibility of this.

6. There is evidence that responsible groups amongst the Arabs and the Jews, and also in the United Kingdom and the United States, would welcome a modification of the plan. Before the Security Council can profitably undertake a re-examination of the plan, however, the United States and the United Kingdom must have agreed together on a course of action, including a firm decision to make the Arabs and the Jews accept what is agreed upon.

7. Canada will suffer from a bitter public controversy between the United Kingdom and United States Governments on this matter. We might therefore, informally and confidentially, ask, through the representatives of these Governments at Lake Success, if they agree that the four courses of action suggested in this memorandum are the only ones before us. Should they agree that these are the only alternatives (though they may disagree on which of them is responsible for the impasse) then we might suggest to them that inability to agree on which course should be adopted would provoke a controversy which would benefit no one except the Soviet Union. Starting from that, it might be possible for them, in direct and private discussions, to work out some agreed policy before the matter is publicly debated in the Security Council. In order to get a cooling-off period, the British might take on the job of persuading the Arabs to keep quiet while the whole matter of the Palestine settlement is being reconsidered and the Americans might try a similar job of persuasion on the Jews. There seems to be no other possible solution to this problem which, if it is not solved, may result in a serious threat to peace generally.<sup>48</sup>

Mr. Pearson gave me a brief account over the telephone this morning of his conversations with the Americans concerning Palestine. As far as I could tell from his guarded comment, the Americans have in mind the following course of action:

(i) They will propose a resolution to the effect that the Security Council should, within the powers conferred on it by the Charter, take action to give effect to the General Assembly resolution on partition with economic union. This resolution will lead to a debate as to whether or not, in the absence of external interference in the affairs of Palestine, the Security Council has authority to place force behind the General Assembly resolution. The United States delegation expects that this resolution will be defeated on the grounds that the Security Council has no such authority. When this resolution is defeated the United States will feel that it has done its best to secure the implementation of the plan for partition.

(ii) The United States will then propose a resolution to the effect that, if there is external interference in the affairs of Palestine, the Security Council should then take measures to deal with this situation in accordance with the powers conferred upon it under Article 37 of the Charter. The means by which action would be taken would of course have to be determined subsequently. The United States delegation considers that this resolution will be adopted, and that it will serve as a warning to the Arab states not to interfere in Palestine while further action is being taken.

(iii) A resolution will then be put forward establishing a committee consisting of the five permanent members of the Security Council for the purpose of bringing about some agreed settlement in Palestine.

I am not sure that this interpretation of Mr. Pearson's report is accurate, and I may be reading too much into what he has said. He is seeing the Americans again late this afternoon and he will 'phone me tonight to give me some further account of what he learns. In the meantime he expects that tomorrow's session in the Security Council will be taken up with procedural discussion about seating of representatives of Arab states and similar questions.

UN SECURITY COUNCIL; PALESTINE

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of February 23rd, reported that little progress had been made as yet in the Security Council.

Two resolutions were presently before the Council, one sponsored by Colombia would involve the summoning of a Special Assembly to discuss Palestine. This was not likely to be approved. The other had been moved by the U.S. representative. It proposed the constitution of a committee of the five Great Powers to consider the present situation. This would probably be voted on early in the coming week.

Meantime, the U.K. and U.S. representatives had made no progress toward an agreed course of action. The Canadian representative was continuing his efforts through informal consultation to bring them together.

I am enclosing a memorandum for the Prime Minister on the Palestine question which I sent to him this morning and which I discussed with him at some length.<sup>49</sup> Mr. King wishes to have this matter considered by Council to-morrow.

He does not agree with the point of view which I expressed in the memorandum. He feels that though the Canadian delegation was quite right in supporting partition at the Assembly last November, nevertheless events since that time have shown that Partition cannot be implemented except by force. He does not think that the Canadian people are willing to participate in any force set up for the above purpose; that therefore we have no right to support a resolution which would advise others, the Big Five, to provide the force. For these reasons, Mr. King himself feels that the Canadian delegation should abstain in the voting on Part I of the U.S. Resolution by which the Security Council accepts the request made to it in the General Assembly Resolution.

Mr. King, however, thinks that we should support the Belgian amendment by which a Commission of Five would be established to attempt to find an agreed solution for the Palestine problem. This Commission, however, would not be bound in any way by the Assembly Resolution of last November.

I would be grateful to talk with you about this matter before the Cabinet meeting, if you so desire.

Ottawa, [n.d.]

THE PALESTINE PROBLEM

The Palestine Problem is now before the Security Council. A United States Resolution concerning it, to which a Belgian amendment has been submitted, will be discussed today Tuesday and possibly voted on the same day. The Canadian Delegate will require instructions on the attitude he is to take.

The United States Resolution

This resolution proposes that the Council accept the Recommendations of the General Assembly, which request it,

- (a) To take the necessary measures as provided in the Assembly partition plan for its implementation;
- (b) To consider whether the situation in Palestine during the transitional period until the establishment of the two new states constitutes a threat to the Peace;
- (c) To determine as such threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression, in accordance with Art. 39 of the Charter, any attempt to alter by force the settlement envisaged by the Assembly Resolution, e.g. partition with economic union.

The United States Resolution accepts these three tasks for the Security Council subject to the authority of the Council under the Charter. This would, therefore, seem to imply that the Security Council is being asked to implement partition, by force if necessary. This, however, is not the United States intention, because Senator Austin has made it clear that the Security Council has, in his opinion, no such power. It can, indeed it must, preserve the peace and prevent aggression. If a threat to that peace arises in Palestine, the United States will join with other members in deciding how to remove it, if necessary, by force. Nevertheless, the Security Council has, according to Senator Austin, no power to enforce partition itself. It can assist in implementation measures, but in doing so will not use force unless there is a breach of the Peace.

The U.S. may have difficulty in maintaining this distinction between maintaining the peace and implementing partition because of the following points:

- (1) it would be difficult, in practice, to distinguish between the use of force for police purposes and for partition purposes.
- (2) The restoration and maintenance of peace without some policy for Palestine, once peace is restored, would be meaningless.
- (3) After the mandate ends on May 15th, the U.N. Palestine Commission takes over legal control. That Commission is charged to implement partition. Intervention by the Security Council, therefore, to keep the Peace is intervention to permit the U.N. Commission to implement partition.

The First Part of the U.S. Resolution, therefore, does, it seems, put the Security Council more squarely behind partition than the U.S. itself seems willing to admit in public at this time.

The Second Part of the same Resolution, however, suggests a reconsideration of "partition" as a solution to the problem. It sets up a Committee of the Five Permanent Members to inform the Council as to the situation in Palestine; to consider whether it constitutes a threat to international peace; to consult with the Palestine Commission and others concerned regarding the implementation of the Assembly Resolution and to make recommendations generally on the position. Presumably this Commission could, if it so decided, recommend some other solution than partition; it could also recommend changes to the Assembly partition scheme in an effort to make it acceptable to Jews and Arabs. It is intended to act as a conciliation Commission, but in doing so would have to accept as its starting point the Assembly Resolution, including that part which states that any effort to change the Partition Plan by force is a breach of the peace.

The U.S. Resolution, in short, puts the authority of the Security Council behind the Assembly Resolution on Partition, accepts the duty of maintaining the peace in Palestine, and sets up a Commission of Five to see if some agreed solution cannot, even at this late date, be found.

The Belgian Amendment

An amendment to the U.S. Resolution has been moved by Belgium. This amendment is really a move to delete para. (1) of the American Resolution, while accepting the rest with a small and non-controversial addition to para. (2). The Belgian amendment, however, would remove the endorsement by the Council of the General Assembly recommendation on partition.

Canadian Position

If the Belgian amendment is put forward separately as a replacement for the whole of the United States Resolution, it will have to be voted on first and if it carries there will be no opportunity to vote on the United States Resolution as a whole. A vote in favour of the Belgian amendment put in this way could be interpreted as an abandonment of the Assembly recommendation on partition. A vote against the Belgian amendment would also be misinterpreted unless it were made clear that it was not a vote against the Commission of Five, but merely a vote in favour of the appointment of that Commission as part of the United States Resolution which does other things as well.

A way out of our difficulty would be found in having the United States Resolution voted paragraph by paragraph, in which case the Belgian amendment would come up in connection with para. 2.

If the United States Resolution is voted paragraph by paragraph, a decision will have to be reached in respect of the three parts. Part 1 has been explained above. It seems very doubtful if this part will carry as the only members of the Council who seem certain to vote in favour of it (leaving Canada aside) are the U.S.A., U.S.S.R., and the Ukraine. Syria will vote against, and the others may abstain, though this is not certain.

A decision is required as to the Canadian position on this point.

When Part 1 is disposed of, Part 2 of the U.S. Resolution will be reached, with the Belgian Amendment (if this has not already been dealt with separately). The Canadian Delegate will presumably be instructed to vote for this Part, as amended. It represents a serious effort at conciliation which should be attempted, even if the chances for success are not great.

Part 3 of the U.S. resolution is non-controversial. It is merely an appeal to the Governments concerned, particularly in and around Palestine, to keep the peace.

There is, of course, a real danger that the Council will not be able to secure seven votes for either Part 1 or Part 2 of the U.S. proposal or for the Belgian amendment to it. In that case, the Assembly Recommendation on Palestine becomes powerless; the United Nations Commission on Palestine will presumably "fold up" and with it any hope for avoiding by U.N. action complete chaos in Palestine when the British withdraw. The consequences of this on the situation in Palestine itself and in the Middle East, on Anglo-American relations and on the future of the United Nations will be very serious. A political vacuum will be created in Palestine. Russia is the power best equipped to exploit a situation of that kind. The temptation for her to do so may prove to be irresistible.

On the other hand, faced with a chaotic situation of this kind, the Jews and the Arabs may be forced to settle their own differences on the spot. With feelings and fears as they are, however, it is difficult to be optimistic on this score.

Before the U.S. Resolution as a whole is voted on, or at some other suitable opportunity, the Canadian delegate will, no doubt, have to make an explanatory statement to the Council.

If he is instructed to abstain on the first part of the U.S. Resolution, he could say that he does so simply in order to ensure that the Conciliation Commission should not be limited in any way in its work, by anything that the Assembly has previously done. The Canadian vote is neither for or against partition or any other solution, but in favour of setting up a Commission of Five, with a completely free hand to make a last, serious effort to produce an agreed solution for the Palestine problem. Such a statement will, however, undoubtedly be interpreted in some quarters as a departure from the position the Canadian delegation previously took on partition at the Assembly.

If the Canadian Delegate is instructed to support all parts of the U.S. Resolution, any statement he makes might include the following:

(1) an explanation of the meaning of the U.S. Resolution as we understand it. This is necessary because of wrong interpretations already given to that Resolution.

(2) Emphasis on the wisdom of making, without delay and with a vigour not previously shown, further efforts to reach an agreed solution. It should be pointed out that this will require concessions by all concerned, including the U.S.A., the U.K. Without such concessions no agreed solution is possible.

(3) The necessity of accepting the Assembly Resolution as the starting point for an agreed solution. Some alterations may have to be made to that Resolution, but the central requirement of Jewish state in Palestine must be maintained.

(4) The abandonment of this basic solution which has been recommended by the Assembly, for any other solution not agreeable to Jews and Arabs, would be a severe blow to the prestige of the United Nations without ensuring peace and order in Palestine. It should be pointed out that it is not partition which is causing the trouble in Palestine but the abandonment of the Mandate by the U.K., the withdrawal of U.K.'s forces and the absence of any agreement between Jews and Arabs.

(5) The alternatives to partition (if no agreed solution is possible) are either a solution to be enforced against the desperate resistance of the Jews, e.g. a unitary or Federal Arab state or the Security Council dropping the whole Palestine Problem.

The first would be difficult to justify and would provoke even greater bloodshed. The second would be extremely dangerous as it would leave the Jews and Arabs to fight it out after May 15th, with whatever support they could get from any quarter. Anarchy would prevail; a tempting invitation to fish in troubled waters by any state desiring to do so!

Any Canadian statement might go on to show that if conciliation and agreement are impossible then it is the responsibility of the Commission of Five to provide the necessary forces to enable the United Nations Commission to carry out the task given it. The states on this Commission were given special rights and privileges on the Security Council. They must accept the responsibility that goes with them, and not shelve it by attempting to transfer the duty of keeping the peace to the smaller powers. Furthermore that duty is placed on them by Article 106 of the Charter until military arrangements are worked out under Article 43.

There is one further point on which the Canadian delegate will require instructions. It may be that the U.K. will carry its policy of non-co-operation to the extent of refusing to serve on the Commission of Five. China may also refuse. In that case, the United States will press us to accept membership. They will emphasize that we can play a most important mediatory and moderating role, especially as we have the confidence of the U.K. If all the Permanent Members cannot serve and we do not wish to replace one of them, I suggest that we should support a Conciliation Commission of Three, the U.S.A., U.S.S.R. and France, rather than one of Five.

In all of the above, the position of the U.S.S.R., has not been mentioned, because it has been impossible to secure any information as to what that position is likely to be. Mr. Gromyko may clear up this point on Tuesday, but in such a way as to make a new assessment of the whole situation necessary. He may well produce a simple, straightforward resolution for the formation of an international force immediately, to go to Palestine and keep the peace while the U.N. Commission establishes the Jewish and Arab States. Such a Resolution would put members of the Council, including ourselves, in a dilemma.

I have also not mentioned another unhappy development, a growing coolness between the U.S.A. and U.K. delegations on this issue. The Americans feel that the U.K. have been negative and unfriendly; have favoured the Arabs against the Jews and have obstructed the U.N. proposals by withdrawing from Palestine in a way designed to make the implementation of those proposals as difficult as possible. The U.K. on their part feel that the present difficulties in Palestine are to a large extent the result of American Jewish intervention, encouraged, or at least not discouraged, by Washington for domestic political purposes; that the American delegation was irresponsible and rash in the way it supported partition at the last Assembly, and are now blaming the British quite unfairly because their own chickens are now coming back to Lake Success to roost.

The fact that there is much force to both sides of this argument, doesn't make the situation that is developing any more pleasant.

Canada may be in a position to play a helpful part behind the scenes in bridging the gap between the U.S. and U.K. positions on this matter. It is assumed that the government would wish its representative to do his best in this connection.

UN SECURITY COUNCIL; PALESTINE

6. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Palestine problem was now before the Security Council. The Canadian Delegate would require immediate instructions as to the attitude which he should adopt, particularly with respect to a United States resolution and a Belgian amendment thereto which were now under consideration.

The Under-Secretary had been asked to attend to describe to the Cabinet the background to these proposals and copies of an explanatory memorandum were circulated to all Ministers.

7. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, at the Prime Minister's request, explained the present position.

The first part of the U.S. resolution proposed that the Council, subject to its authority under the Charter, accept the recommendations of the General Assembly requesting the Council to take the necessary measures for implementation of partition, to consider whether the transitional situation in Palestine constituted a threat to the peace, and to determine as such any attempt to alter the proposed settlement by force.

The United States were trying to maintain the distinction between the use of force to implement partition and for the purpose of preserving the peace and preventing aggression; only in the latter circumstances had the Security Council power to act. However, in practice, this distinction would be difficult to maintain and the effect of this part of the resolution seemed to put the United States squarely behind partition.

The second part of the United States resolution proposed the establishment of a committee of the five permanent members of the Council to consider whether the situation in Palestine constituted a threat to the peace, to consult with the Palestine Commission and others and to make recommendations. In effect, this proposed a conciliation commission which would make a further attempt to find an agreed solution.

The Belgian amendment would accept the second part of the U.S. resolution but would omit the first which involved endorsement by the Council of the General Assembly recommendations on partition.

8. Mr. Pearson said that it seemed probable that the required number of affirmative votes could not be obtained for the first part of the U.S. resolution. Nor was it unlikely that the Belgian amendment might fail to carry. If the Belgian amendment were taken up first and approved, it could be interpreted as an abandonment of the Assembly recommendation. On the other hand, the U.S. resolution might be taken up paragraph by paragraph and the Belgian amendment considered in relation to the second part only.

Even if the Council approved the establishment of a committee of the five permanent members, both the United Kingdom and China might well refuse to serve.

9. Mr. St. Laurent noted that the Canadian Delegate would require instructions with respect to both parts of the U.S. resolution and the Belgian amendment. At some early opportunity he would also have to make a statement explanatory of the Canadian attitude.

There was danger that the Council would not adopt either the U.S. proposal or the Belgian amendment or, indeed, agree upon any course with the required degree of unanimity. In this event the U.N. Palestine Commission would presumably "fold up" and the result would be a political vacuum in Palestine with all that that would entail.

If the Canadian Delegate were to abstain on the first part of the U.S. resolution, this would be interpreted in some quarters as a departure from the position which the Canadian Delegation had taken in the Assembly, even though it were explained that the Canadian vote was neither for nor against partition or any other solution.

On the other hand, if the Canadian Delegate were to support all parts of the U.S. resolution, there was undoubtedly the implication that force would be used, if necessary, to give effect to partition. Even though, under the Charter, the Great Powers (in the absence of military agreements under Article 43) had special responsibility to provide the forces required to preserve the peace, the assistance of other nations, including Canada, might be invoked.

10. The Minister of Justice pointed out that the Canadian delegation to the Assembly had supported strongly the resolution recommending partition, particularly in relation to the responsibilities which it sought to place upon the Security Council.

11. The Prime Minister observed that the Assembly resolution had been adopted in the hope that partition could be brought about by peaceful means. This hope had not been realized. The changed circumstances required careful reconsideration of the Canadian position, particularly in relation to responsibility for the provision of forces.

The Canadian effort should be primarily to reconcile the views of the United Kingdom and the United States.

12. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed that, prior to any final decision by the Council upon the Assembly's recommendation respecting partition, every effort should be made to reach an agreed solution of the problem of Palestine by means of conciliation and that, with this in view, the Canadian Delegate be instructed:

(a) to support the second part of the U.S. resolution (or the Belgian amendment) for the establishment of a commission of the five Great Powers;

(b) to endeavour to have the Belgian amendment voted upon before the U.S. resolution;

(c) to state that this course did not involve repudiation or abandonment of the Assembly's recommendation on partition, but rather a final attempt at conciliation; and

(d) to abstain from voting on the first part of the U.S. resolution if, in the event, it were voted upon before the establishment of a commission of conciliation on the ground that no decision should be taken on the Assembly's recommendation until the commission had been set up and its report submitted and considered.

[Ottawa], March 6, 1948

Confirming my telephone conversation of last evening, the Security Council voted yesterday on the various resolutions before it concerning the Palestine question. The Belgian resolution was voted first, paragraph by paragraph. Each paragraph received only five votes and therefore failed to carry. Countries which voted for the Belgian resolution were, in each case, Canada, France, Belgium, Syria and China.

The United States resolution was then voted on. The first operative paragraph of the United States resolution, in which the Security Council was asked to accept responsibility for the partition of Palestine as indicated under the General Assembly resolution, was defeated. It received only five votes, as follows: U.S.A., U.S.S.R., Ukraine, Belgium, France.

The second operative paragraph of the U.S. resolution had, earlier in the day, been amended as a result of discussions between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. As a result of these discussions, the United States abandoned the position that a formal Committee of Five should be set up, and accepted the Soviet idea that the Permanent Members of the Council should merely be asked to consult, without instructing them or limiting them in any way as to whom and how they should consult. A new phrase, however, was added to this part of the United States resolution, saying that consultations should be "with a view to implementing the resolution of the General Assembly."

The Belgian delegate objected to these additional words, but the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. supported them strongly. Without them, the U.S.S.R. would have voted against the paragraph, and this would have meant that no resolution of any kind concerning Palestine would have been passed by the Security Council.

In the event, this paragraph of the United States resolution was adopted in the following form:

"To call on the permanent members of the Council to consult and to inform the Security Council regarding the situation with respect to Palestine and to make as a result of such consultation recommendations to it regarding guidance and instructions which the Council might usefully give to the Palestine Commission with a view of implementing the resolution of the General Assembly."

Delegations voting in favour were: the U.S.S.R., the U.S.A., Ukraine, France, Belgium, China and Canada. The U.K., Argentine, China and Syria abstained.

General McNaughton was in a difficult position in regard to the vote on this paragraph. If he had abstained on the grounds that the words "with a view of implementing the resolution of the General Assembly" were added, the paragraph would not have carried, and there would have been no decision reached at all. He therefore voted for the paragraph. It should be noted, however, that consultation in regard to implementation is to be held among the Permanent Members only, and that the United States has interpreted implementation as including conciliation procedures.

I understand that, even though no formal Committee has been set up, the United Kingdom Delegation have announced that they are not willing to join the other four Permanent Members of the Security Council in consultation on this matter. I think that this is an unfortunate decision.

Additional sections of this paragraph calling on the Permanent Members to consider whether the situation in Palestine constitutes a threat to the peace and to consult with the Palestine Commission, the mandatory power and the representatives of the principal communities of Palestine, were defeated. We voted for them.

A new paragraph was adopted calling on the Permanent Members to report on the results of their consultations within ten days.

A final paragraph appealing to all governments and peoples to prevent or reduce disorders in Palestine was carried by eight votes, the United Kingdom, Syria and the Argentine abstaining.

The United Kingdom and the Argentine abstained on all sections of this resolution.

The United States resolution, as amended and minus the rejected paragraphs, was then voted on as a whole. It was approved by eight votes in favour, none against and three abstentions (Argentina, Syria and the United Kingdom).

The amended text, as finally approved, is as follows:

"The Security Council,

"Having received the resolution of the General Assembly of 29 November 1947, on Palestine, and having received from the United Nations Palestine Commission its first monthly report and its first special report on the problem of security in Palestine;

"Resolves:

"To call on the Permanent Members of the Council to consult and:

"To inform the Security Council regarding the situation with respect to Palestine and to make as the result of such consultations recommendations to it regarding the guidance and instructions which the Council might usefully give to the Palestine Commission with a view of implementing the resolution of the General Assembly. The Security Council requests the Permanent Members to report to it on the results of their consultations within 10 days.

"Appeals to all governments and peoples, particularly in and around Palestine, to take all possible action to prevent or reduce such disorders as are now occurring in Palestine."

UN SECURITY COUNCIL; PALESTINE

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported upon the present position.

Consultation between the Permanent Members of the Council had apparently made no progress toward conciliation; their report would be made to the Council the following day. At that time the Council would be asked to consider whether the situation constituted a threat to the peace.

The Canadian representative would be unable to attend because of illness and the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs would go to New York to take his place.

There was no doubt that a very serious local situation had developed in Palestine. The attitude of the Arabs had hardened; they were receiving outside assistance. The Soviet Union would support enforcement of partition and might indeed try to undertake the task alone.

16. Mr. St. Laurent added that there was a possibility that conciliation by the Security Council itself would be suggested.

17. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the Minister's report.

PALESTINE<sup>50</sup>

On Friday last the United States announced through its representative in the Security Council that it no longer regarded the Plan of Partition with Economic Union as a practicable procedure for replacing the authority of the mandatory power in Palestine following the termination of the mandate on May 15th.

2. The United States proposed instead that action should be taken to establish a temporary trusteeship for Palestine, and that a special session of the Assembly should be called for this purpose. The United States had hoped that a recommendation of the General Assembly, supported by a two-thirds majority, would be accepted, if reluctantly, by the Arabs. It has been rejected, however, by the Arab States and by the inhabitants of the proposed Arab State in Palestine. The explanation of the United States decision to abandon Partition was stated in a legal argument to the effect that since it was now clear that the whole of the Plan of Partition could not be put into effect on May 15th, no juridical authority existed for putting part of it into effect, and a legal vacuum would therefore exist on the termination of the mandate. The actual reasons, however, for the change in United States policy are probably that the United States believes that:

(1) The proposed Jewish State cannot be established without the assistance of considerable force from outside Palestine. The Arabs will not establish a state in the area allotted to them by the Assembly resolution. The plan for Economic Union cannot be made effective without Arab co-operation.

This is Cabinet Document No. 637, which was discussed at Cabinet on March 23.

(2) The United States Government does not consider that it can provide its share of the forces necessary to overcome Arab resistance.

(3) No other permanent member of the Security Council, with the exception of the U.S.S.R., is prepared to take action through the Security Council to enforce Partition.

(4) The present crisis in relations with the Soviet Union has made the United States administration seek an alternative solution to the Palestine question which will not involve the risk that the U.S.S.R. can gain control of that area.

3. It is by no means certain that the proposals for the establishment of a trusteeship will prevent disorder on a serious scale from breaking out in Palestine on May 15th, or lead to an eventual settlement. Trusteeship was considered by the United Nations Special Commission on Palestine, and was rejected because it would be resisted by both parties in Palestine rather than only one of them, and because it delayed still further the acceptance by the people of Palestine themselves of responsibility for the government of that country. It may still be resisted by both parties. Arab leaders have claimed that the mandate cannot be terminated in any way other than the establishment of an independent state. The Jews, who may now fall under the leadership of the extremist elements in Palestine, have said that they will proclaim a Jewish State and fight for its establishment. The United Kingdom may not be willing to alter its plan to surrender the mandate on May 15th and evacuate its troops before August 1st. It may be necessary, therefore, before May 15th, to mobilize forces, either through the United Nations or otherwise, to suppress both Jewish and Arab resistance to a trusteeship. In the meantime, the problem of an eventual settlement of the Palestine question remains to be settled after the trusteeship has been established.

4. The plan which the United States is now initiating is, moreover, difficult and complicated, and will require careful handling if it is to succeed. Several days' debate will be necessary in the Security Council, and a Special Assembly will then be necessary to adopt this new plan. The proposal to call a Special Assembly for this purpose may be vetoed in the Security Council, in which case the United States will have to ask for the Assembly to be called by a poll of the members. A two-thirds majority will be necessary in the Assembly to carry the plan, and a combination of Arab States and their sympathizers and the Soviet bloc could defeat it. Not until it is carried will it be possible to put in hand the administrative arrangements for the government of Palestine after May 15th.

5. The United States officials have said privately that they have foreseen all these difficulties. They plan to bring pressure on both Arabs and Jews to accept a temporary trusteeship as an alternative to the violence which will break out on May 15th if this plan fails. For this reason, they hope that the amount of force required to keep the peace in Palestine will be much smaller than if Partition were to be enforced. They will try to persuade the United Kingdom to slow down the evacuation of its troops, though not altering the dates on which it surrenders the mandate and completes evacuation. The United States proposes also to take the initiative in preparing a trusteeship agreement by which an international administration will be provided for Palestine, supported by three trustee powers, the United States, the United Kingdom and France. The assignment of the trusteeship to these three states will be justified on the basis that they alone survive of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers of 1919. The United States itself will provide forces for the maintenance of the trusteeship agreement. United States officials are hopeful, also, that once it has been demonstrated to both Jews and Arabs that they will gain their independence only when they have agreed on a settlement in Palestine, moderate elements on both sides will work out a solution.

6. Since the United States Government seems confident that it can carry to a successful conclusion the course of action it is now initiating, it is recommended that the Canadian Delegate to the Security Council be instructed to support the United States resolution, a copy of which is attached. In doing so, he will not be acting in a manner inconsistent with Canadian policy. The Plan of Partition with Economic Union was not put forward by the Canadian Government and the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly supported it only because it was the least unattractive of a number of disagreeable alternatives, and the only one with any chance of acceptance. Throughout the discussions at the Assembly, the Canadian Delegation maintained that the plan should not be adopted unless the permanent members of the Security Council were prepared to take the initiative in putting it into effect. By February, when the Palestine question appeared on the agenda of the Security Council, it was already clear that the permanent members of the Security Council could not agree on a course of action for that purpose, and the basic condition which the Canadian Delegation had made in supporting this plan had therefore not been fulfilled. In the circumstances, an attempt must be made to deal with the problem of alternative methods, and the Delegate to the Security Council should therefore give his support to the new course of action which the United States is now proposing. In doing so, however, he should avoid taking any initiative which might lead either the United States Delegate or any other member of the Security Council to believe that Canada would be prepared to take part in putting the trusteeship in Palestine into effect or in administering it after it has been established.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Palestine. United States proposals in regard to Palestine were discussed by Cabinet this morning. In the absence of additional information, particularly in regard to attitude of United Kingdom, Canadian Government is unwilling to state its position in regard to United States proposals. Information is being urgently sought from United Kingdom Government.

2. Until you have received further instructions, therefore, it would be preferable for you to avoid taking part in the discussions of the Palestine question in the Security Council. If it becomes necessary for you to speak, you could make a statement along the lines of the draft contained in my immediately following teletype.† In any statement you make you should indicate clearly that the Canadian Government is at the moment not prepared to do more than admit that Partition with economic union is in present circumstances unworkable and that alternative plans should be considered.

3. We assume that no vote on any substantive question can be taken at the meeting on March 24 since no resolutions have been circulated in advance. If, nevertheless, a vote is taken before you have received further instructions, you should abstain on any proposal to which the United Kingdom has not agreed. The only exception to this rule of abstention is a proposal to call a Special Session of the Assembly. You may vote for this provided that:

(a) your affirmative vote is necessary in order to carry the resolution; and provided further that the United Kingdom has not opposed the calling of the Special Session; and

(b) the United Kingdom has not said that in its opinion the calling of the Special Session would be unwise.

4. You may, if you think it necessary, communicate to the United States delegation confidentially in advance that it will be necessary for you to abstain on any vote which is taken in present circumstances, and that further information is being sought. You should not, however, indicate that a particular effort is being made to secure information from United Kingdom government.

5. Instructions contained in this telegram will not apply if you ascertain that the United Kingdom delegation and United States delegation are in agreement in regard to a policy for Palestine. If the United Kingdom and United States delegations agree in supporting a resolution or any part thereof in regard to Palestine, you may support this resolution or such part. Ends.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Palestine situation. The Palestine situation was discussed in Cabinet this morning and as a result I wish you to discuss the matter at the highest possible level in the Foreign Office and to let us have a report of your conversations as soon as possible. You may speak along the following lines:

2. We feel that in the present grave international emergency it is just not (repeat not) possible that the U.K. and the U.S. are going to continue to be divided on this important question especially with the present discussions going on in Washington. The U.K. must be very much concerned in keeping the Russians from securing influence or power in eastern Mediterranean. We therefore find it difficult to believe that the policy of the U.K. Government is in reality as negative as the public declarations and private conversations of its representatives would lead us to believe.

3. Canada has supported Partition with economic union, but events have changed so that this cannot now be carried into effect. It is of paramount importance that the U.K. and the U.S. should reach accord on new proposals. We hope indeed that the U.K., U.S. and France can reach agreement on a common policy.

4. It may be that the new U.S. proposals are the best in the circumstances but that for understandable reasons the U.K. would find it difficult to say so publicly. We feel, however, that since the U.K. has had a quarter century's experience in dealing with Palestine and is a country primarily concerned in what may happen in the eastern Mediterranean, we should be taken into their confidence and informed of what they feel is the best policy for countries like Canada to support in the Security Council at the present time.

5. If, for any reason, the United Kingdom Government is unwilling to answer this enquiry, or if, indeed, their policy is purely negative, we will find great difficulty in determining what useful contribution the Canadian delegation could make in the discussions on the Palestine question in the Security Council.

6. My immediately following telegram gives for your own information our instructions to our delegate in New York.<sup>51</sup>

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following from Robertson, Begins: Reference your telegram No. 418, March 23rd, Palestine situation.

I have just had a long, worrying conversation with Bevin, to whom I showed the instructions to our delegate on the Security Council and gave a memorandum based on your telegram under reference.

2. He showed me the instructions which had been sent to Cadogan after a further Cabinet meeting this morning. They were to abstain from voting on the American proposals whether put as a whole or severally. Bevin, (and I think that there is no doubt that now he speaks on this question for the whole Government and the great majority of the House of Commons), is absolutely resolved that there can be no tampering with the timetable for evacuation. In the second place, he is convinced that United Kingdom should not use its forces to enforce a solution upon which the two parties in Palestine were not agreed. Moreover, he and his colleagues are really obsessed with the special risks and responsibilities that concurrence in any new compromise scheme may thrust upon them simply by virtue of the fact that they are the Power with troops in Palestine, and from now to May 15th are legally responsible for its Government. From these premises it is inferred in Cadogan's instructions that United Kingdom cannot vote for a truce under the American Resolution, because in fact it would be the country required to impose that truce. Similarly, they will not now vote for trusteeship, because they feel that they would, in fact, be the people called upon to enforce trusteeship against the opposition of the Jews, and this they are unwilling to do as they were to attempt to enforce partition against the opposition of the Arabs. Although United Kingdom will not vote in the Security Council, they are prepared to accept with a fairly good grace the approval of the American proposals. Their expectation was that these proposals would get 7 affirmative votes and that United Kingdom's abstention would, therefore, not have the effect of vetoing their adoption. This calculation was, I believe, made on the assumption that Canada would be supporting the American resolution. I believe I would be right in saying that United Kingdom would be relieved if this assumption turned out to be correct. Certainly if our Government decided that the least unsatisfactory course open to it was to support the American proposals while United Kingdom abstained from voting on them, such a decision would not be misunderstood here.

3. I found the Foreign Secretary very worried but frank and friendly. He feels he is in a quagmire; is fully conscious of the strategic risks of the Middle Eastern situation and of the dangers that lie in any worsening of the Palestine situation. He knows the Arab friendships which he has striven to keep may prove unreliable; and he clearly sees Russia as the third party profiting by every difference between United Kingdom and United States, and exploiting the alienation of Jewish sympathies in both countries.

4. He was sorry he could not give me a more positive and forthcoming answer to the fair and friendly question our Government put to him. All he could do was to go back laboriously over the efforts he had made for a solution, the explanations he repeatedly has given to Parliament about his policy, and his belief that the course his Government was taking was the right course for the United Kingdom to take in all the circumstances. He ended by repeating that he would fully understand our position if we decided that in our judgment the least unsatisfactory course open to us was to support the American proposals.<sup>52</sup> Ends.

The Security Council meeting continued consideration of the Palestine question on Wednesday, 24th March.

2. I had received the instructions contained in your message No. 300 of 23rd March together with the draft statement in No. 301† and copy of your message to Robertson in No. 299.<sup>53</sup>

3. Before the meeting I consulted Cadogan and was informed that the position of the United Kingdom Government had not been changed as a result of the United States latest proposal. They intended to go ahead with their plans for laying down the mandate and the evacuation of troops and, at the present time, would have to abstain if the United States proposal were put to a vote.

4. From consultation with the United States delegation before the meeting, I learnt that they did not intend to lay down any formal Resolution at this meeting but intended to wait until members of the Council had expressed themselves on the proposals which they had made.

5. When the Council met the President called for speakers but there was no response. The Syrian representative finally spoke briefly on the subject of Easter and the christian interest in Palestine. As I had been informed that the United States delegation did not intend to take any further steps until opinions had been expressed in the Council, and in view of the obvious possibility of the Council adjourning over the Easter holiday without any clarification of the situation, it seemed to me to be imperative that steps should be taken to clarify and focus the situation, and, in particular, to express the need for those Great Powers, who had the initiative in respect of Palestine, to offer leadership in the situation.

6. I then spoke using the text given in your teletype No. 301 of 23rd March,<sup>54</sup> together with the following addition made in the light of the situation as I found it to exist. This statement, as you will observe, underlines the reservation of our position at this stage:

“Alternative plans should be considered, but there is an obvious danger, in the opinion of the Canadian delegation, that if the United Nations, and the Council in particular, is to turn from one course of action to another without some assurance that the greatest possible amount of agreement and co-operation will be forthcoming from the countries most directly concerned, we shall again encounter serious difficulties of implementation. Therefore, in the circumstances, the Canadian delegation is not, at the present stage, prepared to declare itself in favour of one course of action rather than another until we have seen some evidence that there is a meeting of minds on the part of the countries most directly concerned on what the best course of action should be."

That statement had analyzed the existing situation and reserved Canada's position until there was more information about the US proposal.

7. The French delegate followed with a statement very much along the lines on which I had spoken, in which he identified himself with the point of view I had taken and he emphasized particularly the necessity for conciliation and an agreed solution. The French delegate suggested the possibility of a private meeting of the Council at which the United States might elaborate their proposals, after which the Council would be in a better position to take a decision on the holding of a special session and on the proposal for an interim trusteeship.

8. The Belgian delegate, while he did not speak in the Council, told me that the views I had expressed entirely accorded with those of his Government. He said that he had privately informed the United States delegation that, if the United States proposals were put to a vote, he would support the summoning of a special session of the Assembly but would have to abstain on the proposal regarding an interim trusteeship.

9. The Colombian delegate, who privately stressed his concurrence with the position I had stated, made some brief remarks emphasizing the primary responsibility of the permanent members and suggested that they should hold further consultations. The President replied that the consultations which had taken place had already been reported to the Council and that no further useful purpose would be served by the renewal of such consultations. He suggested that it would be better to wait until the United States had formulated specific proposals. The Colombian representative then remarked that it had been useful to have the situation clarified for the Council, and that members would now know that they could not proceed on the assumption that consultation between the permanent members of the Council on the Palestine question would serve any useful purpose.

10. Before the Council adjourned, the representative of the Jewish Agency read the statement adopted by the Jewish Agency for Palestine and the National Council for Jews in Palestine dated 23rd March, text of which has been published in the press.

11. The Council adjourned the discussion of the Palestine question until Tuesday next, 30th March. Discussion among members left me with the impression that it is generally agreed that the next move in the Council lies with the United States.

I had a word with the Prime Minister about Palestine before his departure on Monday. He reiterated his view that the delegation in New York should continue to reserve its position in regard to Palestine until we knew more about the intentions of the United States and the attitude of the United Kingdom towards these plans. He agreed, however, that General McNaughton should be instructed to vote for a proposal to summon a special Assembly, provided that the proposal did not include any commitment in regard to the decision that would be taken when the special Assembly met.

We learned late on Monday from the delegation in New York that the United States delegation will today submit resolutions calling for a truce in Palestine and proposing also that a special session be held. I have informed General McNaughton that it would be in accordance with his instructions to vote for both of these resolutions. I attach copies of the relevant telegrams (No. 360 of March 29th from New York and No. 312 of March 29th to New York).†

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

The Security Council meeting, Thursday 1st April, on Palestine, adopted the two draft Resolutions submitted by the United States, Documents S/704 and S/705, 30th March, texts of which were transmitted in my teletype No. 360 of 29th March.†

2. The proposal calling for a truce was put to the vote first and was adopted unanimously after the words "with grave concern" following the word "notes" in the second paragraph was deleted at the suggestion of the Ukrainian representative.

3. The representative of the United Kingdom supported this proposal with the following remarks: "I would recall that my Government have always favoured the adoption of all possible measures to bring disorder to an end and to establish better relations between the two Communities in Palestine. Consistent with that policy, they support the idea of a truce, and I have been authorized to vote in favour of this draft Resolution. At the same time, I must make it quite clear that my Government adhere firmly to their announced dates for the termination of the mandate and for the final evacuation of British troops from Palestine. There can be no question of their retaining responsibility for civilian administration after 15th May 1948, even though it be for the purpose of ensuring the observance of a truce."

4. The draft Resolution requesting the Secretary General to convoke a special session of the General Assembly was adopted by 9 votes in favour, U.S.S.R. and Ukraine abstained. The United Kingdom voted for this Resolution with the following explanation: "My Government cannot depart from their neutral position, and they therefore still pass no judgment on the solution which the General Assembly originally worked out in November last. In view, however, of the intense disturbances which have taken place in Palestine and the failure, as we see it, of the General Assembly, when it came to its original decision, to realize that this situation may arise, and in view of the apparent desire on the part of the Security Council that the General Assembly should be given an opportunity to review its decision in the light of events, I have been authorized to cast my vote in favour of giving the General Assembly this opportunity, and I shall vote, also, in favour of that Resolution."

5. In accordance with my instructions I voted for both Resolutions.

6. Following the vote, the Secretary General said that the special session "to consider further the question of the future Government of Palestine" would be convoked 16th April.

7. After adoption of the Resolutions there was some discussion as to what further action the Council should take on the Palestine question pending the special session. In the course of this discussion I suggested that as regards the truce Resolution the President should meet with representatives of the Jewish Agency and the Arab Higher Committee and bring forward some specific proposals regarding the truce for the consideration of the Security Council. As regards the special session, I recalled that the Resolution had been sponsored by the representative of the United States and also referred to certain proposals regarding an interim trusteeship and suggested that the President should consult with the representative of the United States in order that the United States representative might be given sufficient time to develop specific proposals which could then be put before the Council.

8. Warren Austin endorsed these proposals and the President adjourned discussion on Palestine in the Council until further notice. In the meanwhile, all members of the Security Council were invited by Warren Austin to meet in the office of the United States delegation for an informal conversation for the purpose of "an informal conversation relating to proposals for a temporary trusteeship" at 2:30 p.m. Monday 5th April.

9. As regards the further work of the Palestine Commission, Gromyko expressed the view that the Palestine Commission should continue with the implementation of the Assembly Resolution until a new decision had been taken by the Assembly. Although the Council took no decision the President, expressing the consensus of opinion, said that the Palestine Commission "cannot fail to take due notice of the manner in which events are moving under the direction of the Security Council."

10. I should like to have your views and comments regarding the informal conversations which are to be initiated by the United States delegation regarding a temporary trusteeship next Monday. In this connection I should mention that Warren Austin, in the course of his remarks said: "We should like all representatives on the Security Council to participate with us in the drafting of the terms of the trusteeship . . . " Ends.

Ottawa, April 7, 1948

Dear Norman [Robertson]:

I am enclosing copies of four telegrams concerning Palestine as follows: No. 381† of April 5th from New York, No. 382† of April 5th from New York, No. 916† of April 6th to Washington and No. 918† of April 7th to Washington.

You will see from these telegrams that the United States seems still to be approaching the question of Palestine in an unrealistic manner, and we are very sceptical whether new proposals that have any substance to them can be produced by a process of negotiation in a special Assembly. More than ever, the situation seems to call for an agreement in advance between the United States and the United Kingdom to a course of action in Palestine which both can accept and which will strictly limit and define responsibility of the United Kingdom Government. There seems to be very little that we can do in the present circumstances in this connection. You will see from the enclosed telegrams what our views are in the Department at the moment.

In case you have not already seen it, I am enclosing also a copy of the statement which General McNaughton made in the Security Council when the United States delegation first indicated that it intended to change its policy.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

Ottawa, April 8, 1948

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

The gist of the telegram I discussed with you this morning is as follows:

On February 25th the American representative in the Security Council introduced a resolution providing for acceptance by the Security Council of the General Assembly recommendation of November 29 providing for Palestine partition. The Security Council, however, refused to accept these recommendations and decided to call upon the permanent members of the Security Council to consult as to means by which the General Assembly recommendations might be implemented.

On March 19th the American representative stated that consultations among the members of the Security Council had revealed that the partition plan could not be implemented by peaceful means, and that it was clear that the Security Council was not prepared to go ahead with efforts to implement plans in the existing situation. An immediate truce, special session of the General Assembly, and a temporary trusteeship for Palestine were suggested by the American representative at that time.

On April 1st the Security Council, by a unanimous vote, adopted the American resolution calling upon Arab and Jewish armed groups in Palestine to cease acts of violence immediately, and calling upon the Jewish Agency and Arab Higher Committee to make representatives available to the Security Council for the purpose of arranging a truce between the Arab and Jewish communities of Palestine; and emphasizing the heavy responsibility which would fall upon any party failing to observe such a truce. The Security Council also adopted by nine affirmative votes and two abstentions the American resolution requesting the United Nations to convoke a special session of the General Assembly to consider further the question of future government of Palestine.

Regarding the truce, Ambassador Austin remarked in the Security Council on March 30th that the statement made by the President on March 25 indicated urgent necessity for exerting every effort in the Security Council to arrange a truce between the Jews and Arabs of Palestine. Such a truce should be based on two fundamental considerations: First, it is urgently essential that violence and bloodshed in Palestine cease for humanitarian considerations. We must prevent anarchy and preserve international peace. Second, both Jews and Arabs of Palestine must be prepared to accept truce arrangements which would not prejudice the claims of either group. The truce should include cessation of political as well as military activities.

Regarding temporary trusteeship, the United States Government adheres to the views stated in the Security Council on March 19, reaffirmed by the Secretary on March 20 and again by the President on March 25, that temporary trusteeship should be established to maintain peace. The trusteeship would be without prejudice to the character of the final political settlement in Palestine. Trusteeship is essential to establish order inaugurated by truce and provide interim governmental machinery after May 15, without which peaceful solution of the Palestine problem cannot be found or put into effect.

On April 5, members of the Security Council with the exception of USSR, Ukraine, informally met in Ambassador Austin's office in New York to exchange views regarding trusteeship. At this time Ambassador Austin, on behalf of the United States Government, presented a working paper entitled "General Principles Which Might be Included in a Temporary United Nations Trusteeship Agreement for Palestine." It was made clear that these general principles do not commit the United States Government at this stage, and that suggestions of other members on similar tentative basis would be welcomed. General principles are as follows:

1. A temporary trusteeship agreement for Palestine would be without prejudice to the rights, claims or position of the parties concerned or to the character of the eventual political settlement.

2. The agreement should be designed to be of indefinite duration, but subject to prompt termination whenever the Arab and Jewish communities of Palestine agree upon the future government of that country.

3. The Agreement might designate the United Nations itself as administering authority. This responsibility could best be discharged by the trusteeship council. It would be undesirable for the trusteeship council to undertake day-to-day governmental functions. Administrative, legislative and judicial powers should be exercised in Palestine through a separate body called the Government of Palestine, acting in accordance with (1) the principles of trusteeship contained in the charter, and (2) such instructions as the trusteeship council might find it necessary to give in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

4. A temporary trusteeship agreement for Palestine could include many of the features developed by the trusteeship council for its draft statute for the proposed international territory of Jerusalem.

5. The Government of Palestine should be headed by a governor-general appointed by and responsible to the Trusteeship Council.

6. The Government of Palestine should include a cabinet and a democratically elected legislature, possibly in two chambers. In the event, however, that such a legislature could not be assembled or, if assembled, could not function effectively, the governor-general should have authority to legislate by order.

7. The trusteeship agreement should provide for the maintenance of law and order within Palestine. Insofar as possible, the Government of Palestine should be responsible for law and order through its locally recruited police and volunteer forces under Article 84 of the Charter. When the forces of the Government of Palestine are insufficient for this purpose, the governor-general should be authorized to call upon such states as would be specified in the agreement to assist in the maintenance of security in Palestine. A separate protocol to this trust agreement would contain an undertaking by those named to assume full responsibility on specified conditions.

8. The agreement should make it possible for the Government of Palestine to take over on a temporary basis existing arrangements in Palestine pending the establishment of the organs specified in the agreement.

9. The agreement should make specific provision for immigration and land purchase, on a basis to be negotiated in consultation with representatives of the Jewish and Arab communities of Palestine.

10. The standard of living and public services in Palestine under the temporary trusteeship should, in general, be those which can be supported by the resources of Palestine; large subsidies by the United Nations should not be anticipated. The costs of the Government of Palestine under the trusteeship regime should, in general, be met from funds available to the Government of Palestine from Palestine revenues. This principle accords with the information which has been made available concerning the fiscal situation of Palestine under the mandate, which is to the effect that Palestine, except extraordinary security expenditures, is budgetarily self-supporting.

11. Under a United Nation's trusteeship, expenditures arising in connection with the employment of forces of members of the United Nations to assist in the defense of Palestine or in the maintenance of law and order should be defrayed by those members.

12. The United Nations would presumably wish to pay the salaries and emoluments of certain principal officers of the government, such as the governor-general and the chief justice, as an evidence of the responsibility of those officers to the United Nations.

13. If the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Trusteeship Council, considers that funds which cannot be raised by the Government of Palestine are essential to accomplish the minimum purposes of the temporary trusteeship, those funds should be supplied, as subsidies or recoverable loans, by the United Nations as a whole on the regular scale of contributions to the budget of the United Nations. The Palestine budget should be handled by the United Nations as a separate budget, not as a part of the ordinary budget of the organization.

14. The agreement should contain adequate guarantees for the protection and preservation of the holy places in Palestine, for the settling of disputes pertaining to them and for assuring, subject to necessary safeguards of public order and security, freedom of entry into Palestine for all foreign pilgrims and persons who desire to visit the holy places.

15. The trusteeship regime for Palestine should terminate as soon as a majority of the members of each of the two principal communities in Palestine — Arab and Jewish — have agreed upon a plan of Government for Palestine. It should be a responsibility of the Governor-General to take all possible steps to bring about such an agreement.

I hope it will be possible to hear from you regarding this matter without delay.<sup>56</sup>

Sincerely yours,

RAY ATHERTON

RE PALESTINE

Mr. Atherton called on Mr. Pearson yesterday and left with him a letter outlining the general principles which the United States Government considers might be included in a temporary United Nations trusteeship agreement on Palestine. He asked for our comments and said that he would call back within the next day or two.

The document which he left with us had already been forwarded by the Canadian delegation in New York, and a number of comments had been made on it by General McNaughton and by ourselves privately. General McNaughton has been concerned because the Americans seem to expect him to take a more active part in the discussion of these proposals. We suggested to General McNaughton therefore that they say privately to the United States delegation that the kind of comments we could make at this stage might only embarrass the United States delegation if they were made in the presence of other delegations. We would be glad, however, to let the United States delegation know our views confidentially.

It occurred to Mr. Pearson that we might take the same line with Mr. Atherton, saying to him that we did not wish at this stage to ask leading questions in the presence of other delegations, but that we would be glad to let him know our views. We might then ask him a series of questions somewhat as follows:

(1) What plans has the United States Government for giving effect to trusteeship proposal if it is not accepted by either Jewish Agency or Arab Higher Committee?

(2) Does United States Government contemplate working out with the United Kingdom in advance of special Assembly a plan for Palestine which will define and limit precisely the role of the United Kingdom in that area?

(3) Does the United States contemplate working out with the United Kingdom and France a general plan for security of eastern Mediterranean which would include Palestine?

(4) Has United States Government yet worked out details of proposed protocol under which troops would be provided by specified powers for use by Governor-General of Palestine?

(5) Does United States Government itself contemplate making United States troops available at call of Governor-General of Palestine for use under his command?

(6) What "specific provision for immigration and land purchase" does the United States Government contemplate offering as a basis for negotiation between the representatives of Jewish and Arab communities in Palestine?

(7) How does United States Government intend to meet claim of Arab states to be "parties directly concerned" with the trusteeship agreement?

(8) What guarantees were contemplated in the United States plan for minorities under the unitary government which it was proposed to set up in Palestine?

(9) What procedure does the United States Government contemplate for the transfer of administrative responsibility in Palestine from the United Kingdom Government to the new administering authority?

(10) If truce agreement fails and fighting breaks out in Palestine on May 16th, has the United States Government any plan to meet this emergency?

Mr. Pearson would be glad to know if you would approve of his discussing the matter with Mr. Atherton in these terms.<sup>57</sup>

RE PALESTINE

The text of a truce Resolution, which has been prepared by the President of the Security Council in co-operation with United Kingdom, United States, French, Chinese and Canadian delegations, has been sent by General McNaughton in telegram No. 414 of April 13 attached.† The General said in the course of the discussions of this agreement that he would not be prepared to support any truce proposal which did not have the concurrence of the Mandatory Power. Members of the United Kingdom delegation participated in the preparation of this draft, and the attitude of the United Kingdom Government towards it is now being considered. The delegation in New York expects that the United Kingdom Government will support this Resolution.

You will notice that the Resolution includes the appointment of a Truce Commission to consist of the chief consular officers of those members of the Security Council which have consulates in Jerusalem. This Commission is to assist United Kingdom in supervising the truce. The delegation understands that United States, France, Belgium and Syria have consular representatives in Jerusalem.

General McNaughton approves of this draft Resolution and hopes that, subject to the concurrence of the United Kingdom in the proposal, he may be permitted to associate the Canadian delegation with other delegations which cooperated in pre-

We received an interesting telegram from Washington (WA-1108 of April 15 attached) which gives some account of the United States position in regard to Palestine. Questions to which reference is made in this message are ones which we gave to the United States authorities as a result of a formal enquiry from Mr. Atherton concerning the Canadian attitude to the trusteeship proposal. The United States authorities had been pressing us to give some public indication of our views in regard to their proposals. Mr. St. Laurent authorized me to indicate in reply that we would be grateful to receive further information concerning their proposals, but that it might only embarrass the United States Government if we were to press for this information in public. Both our own and other delegations would probably be interested in securing information along the lines of a series of questions which we had formulated. In giving the United States these questions, we were not making a formal request for a reply, but merely indicating topics, on which we thought clarification was needed.

I have attached a list of the questions to the teletype message, for reference.

TELEGRAM WA-1108

Washington, April 15, 1948

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Reference correspondence on Palestine and in particular your EX-972 of April 12th.†

I was unable to keep an appointment which I had with Rusk yesterday afternoon. Stone saw him instead and reports as follows.

I agree. St. L[aurant]

Rusk looked over the ten questions and proceeded to answer them one by one. He wished us to emphasize to you that his answers were personal and tentative. He wishes us also to say that any replies which might come forward officially through Atherton in Ottawa would probably be not as full as the ones which he was giving to us now but they would be along the same lines. I give you his answers below with the same numbering as the questions in your teletype under reference.

1. The Americans have always regarded the trusteeship proposal as an extension of a possible truce which alone could not do the job which must be done after May 15th. Rusk described it as an attempt to "institutionalize a truce" to keep public law and public services going on the termination of the mandate. The truce, he said, was fundamental — if the trusteeship had to be imposed on both parties troop requirements, on the military estimate of both London and Washington, would be quite impossible. There was, therefore, a question not only of policy involved, but also of capabilities. Should one group in Palestine accept the trusteeship and the other not, what happens would depend upon what the community itself intended to do. Rusk foresaw a possibility of degrees of acceptance in Palestine which would create sort of liquid situations which would have to be dealt with ad hoc. He emphasized several times in the course of his talk that the Americans were not sold on the trusteeship for its own sake — they regarded it merely as a piece of machinery.

2. Very confidentially the United Kingdom Government has been approached in some detail. No reply has, however, been received, but Rusk was hoping for something today. He said that one suggestion they made in approaching London was that London, Paris and Washington should together approach say twelve countries (like-minded countries) in an attempt to compose a group in which the Assembly could have confidence. This group could perhaps agree on some plan of joint action. At this point Rusk stated emphatically that the United States had no intention of underwriting Palestine unilaterally — that if the Jews and Arabs decided to fight it out, and if no plan of joint action could be evolved by some or all of the members of the United Nations (preferably a carefully selected group) then the United States would take what steps it could (guards for Consulates, evacuation of citizens, etc.) to protect its own interests in the area of conflict. In the event of conflict, Rusk envisaged Jerusalem as creating a problem of its own as distinct from the general problem of Palestine.

3. Rusk referred to the talks which have taken place here on the general problem of security in the Eastern Mediterranean (about which Stone wrote to you privately the other day). He said that the first essential to any general plan for security in this area was the settlement of the Palestinian problem which London, he added, must understand.

4. The United States has not yet worked out the details of a Protocol under which troops would be provided by specified Powers. They would contemplate this being done by the Powers willing to join the group mentioned in paragraph 2 above. They have, however, a working paper in the form of a draft Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations as the administering authority, a copy of which has been given to Ignatieff in New York.

5. Rusk said that the United States Government would not answer this question alone, but only along with other Powers. They certainly have no intention of taking over from the British and, he again emphasized, unilaterally underwriting Palestine.

6. There are Articles in the draft Trusteeship Agreement on immigration, Article 29, and land policy, Article 31. Insofar as immigration is concerned the Americans have in mind a figure of approximately 4,000 a month for a period of two years and then a sharp reduction. The temporary nature of the proposed trusteeship makes this question difficult to answer.

7. Legal interests and legal arguments could undoubtedly be brought up to justify the claim of the Arab States. The United States, however, does not consider that proximity or race or religion necessarily give rights in this connection. Rusk thought that the "Allied and Associated Powers" had the first claim after the mandatory. The United States could not agree, he said, to see the question complicated by the creation of "a great many more vetoes." Here again he emphasized that the parties directly concerned in Palestine itself must do their share, but if they insist on fighting it out the United States has no intention of making a three-cornered war out of the thing.

8. This question is answered in the draft Trusteeship Agreement, Article 9, "fundamental human rights and freedom."

9. The legal transfer of authority, Rusk feels, could be effected by May 15th but administrative transfers would have to be made ad hoc and less rapidly. I believe that this is one of the points which they have taken up with the United Kingdom.

10. The answer to 10 is included in the answers to 1 and 2 above.

With reference to paragraph 2, Rusk wanted us to know that we were mentioned to the United Kingdom as one of the countries to which an approach might be made. His telling us this now, however, was not to be taken as an approach.

I am sending you by bag this afternoon one copy of the draft Trusteeship Agreement which Rusk gave to us yesterday. Ends.

RE PALESTINE

I am attaching copies of two personal telegrams which I have recently received from Mr. Wrong (WA-1143 of April 16<sup>59</sup> and WA-1144 of April 17<sup>60</sup>), which contain some account of the relations between the State Department and the Foreign Office on the subject of Palestine. I am also attaching copies of two personal telegrams which I have sent to Mr. Robertson in London on the basis of the messages from Mr. Wrong (No. 558† and No. 561†).

You will notice in Mr. Wrong's telegram the suggestion that the State Department may attempt to put together the questions of Palestine and the Security Proposals for Western Europe. This would, of course, be a form of political blackmail, and may cause so much resentment in London that it is to be hoped the United States will not find it necessary to resort to this device.

In the final paragraph of his second telegram (paragraph 6 of WA-1144), Mr. Wrong suggests that it might be useful for Mr. Robertson to discuss the question again with Mr. Bevin. I understand that when the question was last considered in Cabinet it was decided that Mr. Robertson should not approach Mr. Bevin again, and I have not, therefore, felt free to suggest such a course of action to him. I am not sure whether you would now wish to consider the possibility of asking Mr. Robertson to make some new enquiries in the Foreign Office on the subject of Palestine.

Dear Norman [Robertson],

I am enclosing a copy of telegram No. 451 of April 19† from General McNaughton giving an account of a conversation which Hopkins, Ignatieff and Lewis<sup>61</sup> had with Harold Beeley<sup>62</sup> on the subject of Palestine. I am not sure to what extent Beeley's views fully represent those of the United Kingdom Government on the subject of Palestine. His remarks indicate, however, that it is the considered long-term policy of the United Kingdom Government to withdraw from Palestine without making provision for a successor Government and that this policy, which Beeley describes as "non-intervention", is being followed because of the strategic importance of the relations between the United Kingdom and the Arab world. This readiness to abandon the people of Palestine to their fate after permitting a situation to develop over the years which cannot do otherwise than end in bloodshed may be perfectly justifiable in the light of the realities of power politics in the contemporary world. It is difficult, however, to reconcile this policy with the professions of concern for the welfare of the United Nations which Beeley and his colleagues reiterate, for it becomes more and more clear that the United Kingdom threw Palestine into the arena of United Nations discussions, at the same time desiring that any effort which the United Nations made to maintain peace in that area should fail. To say that the United Nations should follow a policy of "mind your own business" in regard to Palestine and at the same time place the Assembly under the obligation of recommending a solution to the problem seems to me a pretty cynical method of behaviour. The least the United Kingdom might have done was to tell some of their friends that this is what they had in mind. I know that they were distressed in November at the lack of unity amongst Commonwealth countries on this subject, and the Delegation in New York now tells me that the United Kingdom Delegation to the Special Assembly is even more concerned about the state of disarray in which the Commonwealth finds itself on this subject. I am at a loss, however, to know how the Australians, New Zealanders, the South Africans and ourselves were to realize that the United Kingdom had placed Palestine on the Agenda of the General Assembly in order that the United Nations should conclude that it would do nothing whatever about Palestine, if they did not at least tell us so. You will note that Beeley is also reported to have stated that "strengthened Anglo-Arab relations are regarded by the United Kingdom as of basic strategic importance from a long-range standpoint." If this is true, then it is difficult to understand how these relations could be strengthened by submitting the Palestine question to the United Nations for a recommendation which was bound to confirm the British pledge for a national home for the Jews. Beeley also states that it is a major United Kingdom concern that the U.S.S.R. should not gain a foothold in the Middle East. I should imagine no better way could be found of defeating that objective than allowing chaos and disorder to run rampant in Palestine. This Beeley calls, euphemistically, a "mind your own business" policy. Beeley concedes that there is a risk in this policy of the Jews inviting help from the U.S.S.R., but then makes the naive assumption that this help would be in the form of Russian troops and that the Jews would not favour this, because it would mean a general war. It is, of course, quite obvious that Russian help would be in no such form, but would be through infiltration of pseudo-refugees and other Communists from Black Sea and Bulgarian ports. This would be an infinitely more difficult problem to deal with, even for the Jews, if they did not desire such help.

In the meantime, we are perplexed to know what line the Delegation should follow in New York. We have been insisting that no solution to the problem of Palestine could be effected except by an agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom. It becomes more and more clear, however, that this agreement will not be reached, for which, I think, the blame can be about equally divided. I would judge that people who think as Beeley does on this matter will not be displeased by this purely negative result from another Assembly meeting on Palestine.

I have been giving you my personal impressions of the situation and I should be grateful for your comment. The day is long since past when it is of any importance whether the policy of the Government in regard to partition was a sensible one or not, and we are now looking for some means by which we can give our Delegation in New York reasonable instructions in the light of the new situation.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

TELEGRAM 460

New York, April 21, 1948

Repeated to Washington.

Reference Palestine. The discussion to date at the special session of the General Assembly on Palestine has given rise to certain questions on which I should like guidance.

2. It is now evident that the majority desire that a general discussion of the situation, to develop the views of the various delegations, should precede the consideration of the United States proposal for trusteeship. It will, in consequence, be difficult for me to avoid making a preliminary statement of our attitude probably not later than tomorrow, or at the latest on Friday. I have, therefore, drafted a few suggestions regarding a possible line which I might develop at this stage, and which I submit here-under for your consideration, Begins:

3. The calling of a special session is an emergency measure recommended by the Security Council in recognition of the mounting violence in Palestine and the situation reported by the Palestine Commission to the Security Council and to the Assembly. The Council adopted the Resolution calling for this meeting of the General Assembly and the Resolution calling for a truce with Canadian support, and we adhere to the statements we have made in these connections.

4. The main issue before this meeting of the Assembly is not the ultimate political settlement in Palestine but the very grave situation which has developed in that country since the Assembly adopted its Resolution last November; the task of the Assembly is therefore to develop a basis for the further action required to meet this situation. The mandate ends on 15th May and the problem is both to determine this basis and to bring it into effect in the few weeks that remain before that date. The matter is consequently of great urgency because in the absence of a practical plan, the people of Palestine would be left to settle the matter as best they might; almost certainly this would involve extended violence and the massacre of many people including those innocent women and children. While a peaceful solution by agreement cannot and should not be ruled out, even under existing circumstances, the evidence shows that such a possibility is, for present at least, remote. Nevertheless, the Security Council has called for a truce and we should press the parties to accept and to implement it and to inform us and keep us informed as to the action which they take. To this end some machinery for mediation is required to be set up preferably immediately, but certainly by 15th May when the mandatory will have relinquished its authority.

5. With regard to the action which might now properly be taken by the General Assembly, it seems to the Canadian delegation abundantly clear that whatever plan is evolved and adopted, it must satisfy the following positive requirements,

- (a) It must be capable of being put into effect by 15th May.
- (b) It must carry conviction of its practicability.
- (c) It should be made without prejudice to the ultimate political settlement.
- (d) It must be established that the requisite degree of force will be available in its support.

6. If these requirements cannot be met, then it would be the course of wisdom for the United Nations to devote itself to such measures as would be within its capabilities. The United Nations might, for instance, endeavour to provide the mediation or conciliation machinery referred to above to be available to the contending parties should they see that their present conflict leads only to chaos and destruction. The United Nations might make special arrangements, as has been suggested by the Swedish delegate, for safeguarding the holy places in Jerusalem. The United Nations might also consider in what way the strife can be, at least, contained within the borders of Palestine.

7. The delegation of the United States has placed before the Assembly a suggestion to provide a United Nations authority to take over from the mandatory Power on 15th May on the basis of a temporary trusteeship. This proposal, in our view, merits detailed examination in the light of the facts and of the principles to which I have referred. The Canadian delegation, therefore, supports reference of this proposal to the Fourth Committee.

8. The fact that the United Nations at present lacks the machinery whereby collective military action may be taken by its members is one of the factors that has to be faced by the Assembly. The Canadian delegation has always advocated the early completion of agreements for the provision of military forces under Article 43 of the Charter and has made it clear that it will respect the obligations which it will assume in that regard. Unfortunately, no such agreements are as yet in effect and in the time available they cannot be improvised. In the circumstances, special arrangements will have to be made for enforcement. I do not know what the nature of such arrangements might be, but I should like to make it clear that, as far as the Canadian delegation is concerned, if we are to participate with others in working out proposals in the present emergency, we cannot be regarded as thereby committing the Government of Canada to the sending of forces to Palestine. The situation in Palestine is so grave that it is imperative that members should face facts and be completely realistic in their assessment of what can and what cannot be done to meet it. Ends.

9. Mr. Warren Austin, in his statement yesterday in Committee 1 proposed that the United States suggestions for an interim trusteeship should be referred to the Fourth Committee with a view to "perfecting" the terms of a Trusteeship Agreement. Presumably we may vote for such a reference, but the question may probably arise of the establishment of a drafting sub-Committee to "perfect" the terms of this Agreement. It would seem to me that it might be in order for us to participate, if nominated to such a sub-Committee, having made it clear in the previous general statement that we would not be committed to any enforcement measures under such a trusteeship plan.

10. As reported in another message, the Swedish delegation raised the question of the protection of holy places in Jerusalem and suggested that this might be made the subject of a special and urgent investigation by a small special sub-Committee of Committee I. I presume that I may support this proposal, again within the terms of the general understanding expressed above.

Following from Pearson, Begins: Your No. 460 of April 21. Palestine.

Immediately following teletype contains text of telegram approved by Mr. St. Laurent for despatch to you with reference to your teletype No. 460 of April 21. This telegram contains Mr. St. Laurent's views in regard to the points raised in the last paragraph of the draft statement contained in your telegram under reference. Subsequent events as indicated in your telegram No. 469 of April 22<sup>63</sup> have now made the statement of views contained in immediately following teletype somewhat out of date. The points discussed are, however, of general importance, and Mr. St. Laurent considered that we should send you the telegram for your guidance. He will, I am sure, be glad to receive any comment you may care to make on the applicability of his views to the situation as it develops in New York. Ends.

According to that telegram

[the] "deterioration of the situation in Palestine in the last twenty-four hours, and in particular events in Haifa, have brought about such an increase in tension in the discussions in Committee I, that it is, in my opinion, inappropriate at this stage to intervene with comments of a general [illegible] as had been previously contemplated . . . I therefore propose instead to confine my intervention to a briefest possible explanation of our attitude to the three draft resolutions before the Committee, in order to prevent any misunderstanding of the Canadian position which might follow if we were to vote without a previous statement."

TOP SECRET

Repeat to Washington as EX-1104

Following from Pearson. My immediately preceding teletype. Palestine.

Following is text of instruction approved by Mr. St. Laurent for despatch to you, with explanation given in my teletype under reference. Text begins:

1. Text of draft statement contained in your telegram No. 460 of April 21, has been considered here and you have already been informed by telephone that I would prefer you at this stage not to go beyond paragraph 7 of the draft statement. You will also have received suggestions for certain minor changes in first seven paragraphs.

2. Paragraph 8 of your draft statement raises following two important questions:

(i) Participation of Canadian Delegation in preparation of any new proposals which may emerge during course of Special Assembly.

(ii) Participation of Canadian Government in any measures which may be taken to implement new proposals which may be made by Special Assembly.

3. In regard to the first of these questions, it is my view that the Canadian Delegation should not at this stage give any indication that it is willing to participate in the drafting of new proposals because there is no clear indication that these efforts will produce a constructive result which can and will be put into effect. The Canadian Delegation to the Second Session of the General Assembly expressed the view that the proposals for Palestine then under consideration should not be adopted unless adequate provision were made for carrying them out. Though the Delegation was not fully satisfied that this requirement had been met, it voted for the Resolution on partition in the hope that the proposal could be put into effect without the use of extensive force and that the Security Council would be in a position to take action in the event of difficulties arising in regard to implementation. These hopes were not realized, and no useful purpose would now appear to be served by adopting in the Special Assembly another resolution on Palestine which could not be put into effect. Indications at present are that a trusteeship will be resisted even more vigorously than the partition. In the absence, therefore, of any clear indication on the part of States which have major interests in the Eastern Mediterranean and which are in a position to employ force in that area, that they are prepared to play a major part in implementing proposals which the Assembly may adopt, I do not feel that the discussions now taking place will reach any practicable conclusion. I would hope, therefore, that the Canadian Delegation could avoid taking part in the work of any sub-committees which may be set up to draft new proposals.

4. In regard to the second question, that is the participation of Canada in any measures taken to implement new proposals, I do not think that it would be possible to persuade the Canadian Parliament at present, even if we wished to do so, to approve the use of Canadian forces for the purpose of imposing a settlement in Palestine on either the Arabs or the Jews. I am not so certain what attitude the Government or Parliament would take towards proposals for joint action in respect of Jerusalem as a separate area, but I do not see what useful purpose would be served at this stage by stating that the Canadian Government would or would not give support to measures designed to maintain the peace in Palestine. I would think it sufficient, therefore, at the present time merely to indicate that the Canadian Government would have to consider what action it might take in regard to any measures which may be proposed for maintaining the peace in Palestine or any part thereof, basing its judgment on the practicability of these proposals and the degree of support given them by those in a position to implement them. Text ends.

New York, April 27, 1948

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference your messages Nos. 391 and 392, 23rd April, on Palestine and your suggestion that I might comment on the views expressed therein, I have thought it useful to summarize the present position as I see it, particularly in reference to the discussion into which we are now entering on the U.S. working paper on the draft Trusteeship Agreement for Palestine contained in document A/C.1/277, 20th April.†

2. It seems to me that our attitude at this stage should be governed by two primary considerations (a) our responsibilities as a member of the Security Council to cooperate in the development of all appropriate measures to bring about a cessation of violence in Palestine and to prevent the situation becoming a threat to world peace, and (b) the desirability of encouraging the co-operation of the U.S. and U.K., particularly when some signs of this are becoming evident.

3. Both these considerations point to the need for action with respect to bringing about a truce as a first requirement of the situation. Both the U.S. and the U.K. supported this project in the Security Council and in Committee 1. It was emphatically endorsed by Creech-Jones<sup>64</sup> in his statement in Committee 1 when he said, "to my Government, a truce is of the first importance and the United Nations should take every possible step to obtain it.”

Arthur Creech-Jones, Representative, Delegation of United States to Special Session, General Assembly of United Nations.

4. Despite continued violence in Palestine, hopes for obtaining a truce are by no means exhausted and talks of some promise are still continuing behind the scenes, both there and at Lake Success.

5. So long as any prospects exist for success in this endeavour, it seems to me that, in common with the U.S. and U.K., Canada ought to support all efforts by the United Nations to appeal to the moderate elements in both communities. This point was emphasized in Creech-Jones' statement in Committee 1 when he said, “we, the United Nations, have the right to ask both Jews and Arabs to contribute to stability and world security by recognizing what is valid in each others' point of view and by making the mutual concessions necessary to secure a modus vivendi.”

6. The truce has more than a transient significance as has been emphasized by both the U.S. and U.K. Not only would it facilitate the restoration of peace and order but it is very essential as a preliminary to the opening of discussions between the parties looking to a stabilization of the position. These efforts are likely to require a considerable period for their fruition and it is therefore our idea that the truce and the separate arrangements being evolved for Jerusalem and the holy places should be developed into a temporary trusteeship.

7. As I indicated in my brief intervention on Friday last in Committee 1, reported in my telegram No. 475 of 23rd April,† the proposal for this temporary trusteeship is a “related measure designed to meet the emergency”. Creech-Jones' understanding of this proposal is similar. He described it, in Committee 1, as a “proposal to provide a stabilizing authority which would tide Palestine over the period from the termination of the mandate until some suitable form of Government would be agreed upon between the parties concerned.”

8. The U.S. views on the essentials of such a temporary trusteeship are still very fluid but are generally directed to the ends which I have described. These ideas are necessarily flexible at this stage in view of the position of the U.K. which has not indicated any willingness to undertake obligations involving a continuance of its military commitments.

9. If (a) the temporary trusteeship is, in effect, to be simply a caretaker arrangement without prejudice to the rights, positions and claims of the parties, and (b) its principal function is to be the taking over of the essential services which can only be operated by a central authority in Palestine, and (c) its duration is to be limited to the period necessary for effective measures of mediation by the United Nations then the idea of temporary trusteeship begins to take a practical form.

10. I am coming to the view that the general line which I have indicated above constitutes the only practical alternative to paralysis of the United Nations while the Jewish and Arab groups take the law into their own hands in an attempt to settle their differences by force. It seems to me, therefore, that we should support the efforts being made, both in regard to the truce and in respect to the establishment of what Creech-Jones has referred to as a “stabilizing authority”, not only for Jerusalem, but, if possible, for Palestine as a whole.

11. I agree that, in the absence of specific instructions, the Canadian delegation should avoid all action that might be construed as sponsorship or which might be held to involve the Canadian Government in the implementation of any plan. Still less should we become involved in any arrangements which appear to be impracticable. For this reason I agree with you that this delegation should avoid if possible taking part in the work of drafting Sub-Committees, at least until some of the major queries have been resolved and until the practicability of any proposed solution has been established.

12. In my view, if the practicability of a temporary trusteeship plan is established and it is adopted without prejudice to the rights and position of either party, the effect would be that the Assembly Resolution of 29th November, 1947 would be suspended and the question of the ultimate political settlement in Palestine would thereby become the subject of continued negotiation between the parties subject to eventual endorsement by the General Assembly.

13. In this telegram I have endeavoured to give you my appreciation of the general position in respect to the U.S. proposal for temporary trusteeship. In a separate telegram and in the light of my appreciation above given, I shall mention some of the main questions which arise in relation to the U.S. proposal and on which I will need early guidance because I will be expected to make observations thereon of at least a general character during the continuing debate in Committee 1.

[Ottawa], April 30, 1948

In a series of telegrams and telephone conversations, General McNaughton has been indicating to us that he thought his silence in New York was becoming difficult to maintain. It seemed probable, he said, that a state of war would exist in Palestine on May 15, and that heavy condemnation would lie on the United Nations, and particularly on the members of the Security Council, for having failed to take steps to prevent violence. The truce proposals had now been adopted by the Security Council; if they were to be effective it was necessary that the government of Palestine continue after May 15 on some legal basis. In this emergency, the United Nations should be prepared to consider any reasonable proposal for the continuation of government beyond May 15.

In the circumstances, we considered that the best course was to remind General McNaughton that the Government was not yet prepared to indicate its attitude towards the trusteeship proposals. If, however, General McNaughton thought it necessary to make a statement linking the truce proposals with the necessity of maintaining some kind of government after May 15, and raising a number of questions concerning trusteeship in the light of this emergency, we saw no objection to his doing so.<sup>65</sup> I attach a series of four telegrams in this connection as follows:

Nos. 496† and 497† of April 29 from New York,

Nos. 418† and 419† of April 30 to New York.

I am not sure, however, that General McNaughton will, in fact, make this statement. He has learned from Mr. Creech-Jones that the United Kingdom may intervene to say that the discussion of the trusteeship is obviously getting nowhere, and that the Assembly should set up some authority to mediate between the Arabs and Jews.

As you probably know, General McNaughton intends to be in Ottawa on Friday, May 7 to attend a Cabinet meeting.

RE PALESTINE

Attached is a copy of telegram No. 560 of May 12† from New York giving the text of a Resolution concerning Palestine on which the United Kingdom and the United States have now agreed. This Resolution will be made public today, and may be voted on in Sub-committee in the course of the day.

This Resolution has been worked out in conversations between the United Kingdom and United States representatives, which were attended by members of the Canadian Delegation. As I understand it, our Delegation had considerable influence in initiating the conversations between the United Kingdom and United States and in keeping them going, but they have never participated in them in any formal sense and have not accepted any responsibility for the results.

The proposed Resolution will have the effect of discarding, temporarily at least, the proposal for a trusteeship. It does not relate to the final settlement in Palestine, and is designed as an emergency measure to meet the situation which will develop on May 15. It does, however, suspend the responsibilities of the Palestine Commission and by inference, therefore, abandons all further action to implement partition now.

According to the Resolution, a Committee of the five Big Powers, acting without the right of veto, will name a United Nations Commissioner for Palestine. His functions shall be confined to mediation between the two communities in Palestine for the purpose of arranging for the operation of common services, protecting Holy Places, and promoting agreement on the future government of Palestine. He shall report to the Security Council. He will be provided with a secretarial staff by the United Nations, but he will not have any force at his command. He will not assume any administrative functions, nor take over any responsibilities from the Mandatory Power.

Agreed. St. L[aurant]. May 3, 1948

It is General McNaughton's opinion that he should vote for this Resolution and support it in debate. I agree with these recommendations, but I am not sure that General McNaughton should express his support in terms which would suggest that the Canadian Delegation has participated in preparing this Resolution or that our support of it is particularly enthusiastic. If there is further cooperation between United States and United Kingdom Governments, the Resolution may lead to some constructive result; otherwise it may simply be another example of placing on the United Nations responsibilities which it cannot hope to fulfil successfully. I should be grateful to know what instructions we should give General McNaughton in this regard.<sup>66</sup>

Information received since the opening paragraphs of this note were typed indicates that the United States Government has not yet concurred in the advice of the United States Delegation that it support this Resolution. The United States Delegation expects to receive the necessary instructions in the course of the day, but the Resolution will not, of course, be put forward unless these instructions are forthcoming.

Following for Wrong from Pearson. Palestine.

Delegation in New York reports that most significant development during last week of Special Session was renewal of discussions between United Kingdom and United States delegations. These discussions led to agreement in regard to the Resolution which was finally carried for appointment of United Nations mediator in Palestine. Resolution represented some compromise on both sides, since United Kingdom gave up wish to have mediator given certain functions as recipient of authority which Mandatory was laying down, and United States gave up wish to have his functions embodied in Trusteeship Agreement.

2. Cooperation between United Kingdom and United States delegations has now apparently been discontinued completely as a result of United States action in recognizing Israel and introducing Resolution in Security Council initiating action under Chapter 7 of Charter. United Kingdom delegation was not consulted concerning either move.

3. In regard to recognition, United Kingdom High Commissioner called yesterday on Prime Minister and Mr. St. Laurent and left memorandum, text of which is contained in my immediately following teletype,† indicating that United Kingdom had no immediate intention of following United States example. Clutterbuck was given assurances by Prime Minister that Canada would not recognize Israel without prior consultation, and by Minister that matter was under serious consideration and we would require much more information before action could be contemplated.

4. In the conversation which Minister and I had with Clutterbuck, I referred to Commonwealth Relations Office telegram H.192 of May 15† and said that strictly legal analysis of position contained in telegram, and particularly in paragraph 9, did not seem to take full account of realities of situation. Clutterbuck said that he thought that this legal appreciation was one prepared before recent events, and did not imply that United Kingdom would attempt to base eventual attitude on any legal analysis.

5. In regard to United States Resolution defining situation in Palestine as a threat to the peace, United Kingdom delegation has firm instructions to give no support to this Resolution whatever, on grounds that there is no indication that United States has any firm intention to take action in support of Resolution if it is carried. Canadian delegation will endeavour to elicit from United States delegation further information as to course of action proposed if action under Chapter 7 of Charter is initiated as suggested in United States Resolution. Meanwhile, United States authorities should not count on us for any support in present circumstances in regard either to recognition or resolution in Security Council.

6. So far as I am concerned, my own impatience with the attitude and policy of both the United Kingdom and the United States toward Palestine has not been diminished by the developments of the last week. The legal argument of the United Kingdom that there is no difference between Arabs invading Palestine and Jews who may be attempting to set up a state within a United Nations resolution, does not impress me very favourably, though no doubt it is explained by the very frank observations on strategy and oil in the United Kingdom message referred to above. On the other hand, the United States revolving door policy, each push determined to a large extent by domestic political considerations and culminating in the sorry recognition episode of last Saturday, inspires no confidence and warrants little support. Ends.

SECRET AND PERSONAL

[New York], May 18, 1948

My dear Mike [Pearson],

I am writing this personal letter to you, not in my official capacity, but as from one friend to another.

I believe that we are at present faced with a critical stage in the life of the United Nations. I refer, of course, to the communication which I have received (as Secretary-General) from the Government of Egypt that they have resorted to "armed intervention" in an endeavour to settle a particular problem. From a politically realistic point of view, and discarding the innumerable legal quibbles which can be developed in connection with this problem, there can be no escape from the fact that a Member Nation has openly declared its intention of using armed force — and this must be held as direct contravention of the spirit of the Charter. As you know, there is only one case in which armed force can be used, and that is in self defence under the provisions of Article 51.

I am not so much concerned with the individual nation which has committed this act — my responsibility is in relation to the matter as one of principle. I am convinced (and this view is shared by the most responsible men to whom I have talked in the last two or three days) that if the United Nations and its Security Council fails to act effectively in this, the first incident of its kind in the history of the United Nations, then it may well become the "Manchurian incident" which can be held to have started a series of events which led to the collapse of the League of Nations.

For that reason I felt it essential that my position should be made clear to each of the five permanent Members of the Security Council and on Sunday, 16th May, I accordingly sent them a letter containing my official views. For your personal information I attach a copy of this letter†.

The purpose of this letter is to ensure that you appreciate my personal views in this matter and to ask that you should do anything possible, and which you may feel proper, to ensure that the Security Council does take effective action in dealing with this matter.

I realize the complexities and difficulties of this whole Middle East problem, but if we fail to deal with this particular aspect of it effectively then I think the whole authority and the prestige of the Security Council may be undermined — and undermined to such an extent that the Governments which are presently accepting its authority in relation to problems such as Kashmir, Indonesia, the Balkans, etc., may turn from it, disregard its present instructions, and adopt independent courses of action which may well lead to major disasters.

Indeed, there is the further danger that such a series of events could end the usefulness of the whole United Nations organization.

I should very much like to have personal contact with you, but if this cannot be achieved at an early date it might be desirable for Jackson (who has just joined me) to slip up and see you informally at some convenient time.

Yours very sincerely,

TRYGVE LIE

TELEGRAM WA-1516

Washington, May 20, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Your messages EX-1325, 1326† and 1338† on Palestine.

I saw Rusk and Hickerson late yesterday afternoon at their request. They suggested a discussion because I had mentioned the day before to Hickerson that we were seriously disturbed by the latest twists in United States policy on Palestine.

2. One cannot get a frank explanation of the reasons for the immediate de facto recognition of Israel. It is clear that domestic political considerations were dominant. No suggestion, however, has been made to me by anyone in the State Department that either Canada or the United Kingdom should follow their example or that failure to do so prejudices some solution in Palestine. I am not sure myself that their recognition makes a great deal of difference. They emphasize its provisional character and the avoidance of even provisional recognition of boundaries.

3. With regard to the United States resolution defining the situation in Palestine as a threat to the peace, Rusk told me that the United Kingdom delegation had knocked this resolution on the head during yesterday's discussion, and that it seemed most unlikely to secure seven votes even if the veto were not applied. It may be amended to invoke Chapter 6 of the Charter instead of Chapter 7, in which case the United States delegation will probably abstain on the amendments and vote for the resolution.

4. They argue that the situation is certainly a threat to the peace, and that the Egyptian invasion and bombing of Tel Aviv is in fact a breach of the peace. What they are most anxious to secure is a standstill order from the Security Council. The representatives of Israel here have told them that the Jews would immediately comply with such an order. If either or both parties failed to comply, as the next step they would advocate the most effective type of economic sanctions, which would vary as between Arab and Jew to secure the maximum result. They are not prepared to commit themselves unilaterally beyond this, because they say that they cannot lay down their policy in isolation and that action in Palestine must be multilateral. Rusk said, however, that the latest British position in the Security Council made this part of our discussion academic.

5. They have nothing more to suggest and no more resolutions up their sleeve. Unless the fighting ceases they will, however, certainly lift the embargo on the export of arms to the Jews. If no concerted action is taken, we shall then have the pretty picture of the United States supplying the Jews with arms and the British supplying the Arabs. Rusk says that the truce negotiations before May 15th were close to success when Creech-Jones told the Jews that, if they proclaimed their Provisional Government in the Jewish area, Abdullah would occupy Eastern Palestine and stop there. They seem to have heard this only from the Jewish Agency, but they regard this statement as largely responsible for preventing agreement on a truce before the end of the mandate.

6. They are bitter about the British stand. I note in telegram Q.96 of May 15th† from the Commonwealth Relations Office that it is said that if Arabs and Jews came into conflict a situation would be created of which the Security Council would be asked to take cognizance as a breach of the peace. That has now happened, but Cadogan has taken a different line in the Security Council. Hickerson is most concerned about the effect of British policy towards Palestine on other matters of great importance, including the development of E.R.P. and possible action looking to a security agreement under Article 51 of the Charter. Pointed questions were asked yesterday when Lovett met the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in closed session to discuss the Vandenberg resolution.

7. I told Rusk and Hickerson that I had nothing to suggest either to them or to my own Government. I do not know whether it would do any good if some further discussions could be held, perhaps here rather than in New York, between the State Department, representatives of the delegations in New York and officers of the Embassies concerned. Rusk says that discussions between the United States and United Kingdom delegations in New York have not wholly ceased, but I should judge that relations between the delegations are severely strained. A change of milieu to Washington and direct discussion with senior State Department people (in which we might possibly participate) could conceivably remove some misunderstanding. The difficulty is that I do not know what policy should be aimed at since London and Washington are so far apart.

8. As evidence of this, Rusk referred more than once to Herbert Matthews' despatch from London in yesterday's New York Times, which I had not read at the time of our talk. This contains a statement attributed to a Foreign Office spokesman that the United Kingdom will not withdraw from the Arab Legion its British officers or cease its subsidy and supply of arms except in consequence of a United Nations decision that the Arabs are acting illegally. The despatch goes on to give details of British military commitments to Transjordan. This statement, coming in the midst of the Security Council debate on the United States resolution and when the fighting in Palestine is reaching serious proportions, was a shock to the State Department, because it seems to remove the last possibility of quickly finding some common ground between Washington and London.

9. In general I would say that responsible officials here, like Rusk and Hickerson, are certainly not proud of the course of action of the United States and especially of the way in which recognition was extended to Israel. Their central purpose is to find some means of stopping bloodshed in Palestine. British policy appears to them to be openly encouraging the Arabs to continue warfare. The division between the United States and United Kingdom is more acute than ever before. I do not see what Canada can do about it, and so expressed myself yesterday. Ends.

THE UNITED NATIONS

2. Mr. Riddell said that a decision had been taken in the Security Council on May 22 concerning Palestine. The United States had introduced a resolution with the effect of determining the situation in Palestine to be a threat to the peace and initiating action under Chapter VII of the Charter. The United Kingdom, opposed to action under Chapter VII, had introduced an alternative resolution limiting action to Chapter VI. The Canadian delegation had supported the United Kingdom resolution for a variety of reasons. No satisfactory indication had been given that the United States' delegation intended to follow up the action which it was proposing to initiate under Chapter VII, if the orders of the Security Council to cease fire were not obeyed. Mediation procedures had been started under a resolution of the Special Assembly and previous resolutions of the Security Council, and these procedures might be prejudiced if one of the parties were declared an aggressor at this stage. For these reasons the delegation had considered it preferable for the present to continue action under Chapter VI of the Charter. The two parties have been asked to comply with the Security Council cease-fire resolution within thirty-six hours, and an extension was granted at a Security Council meeting on May 24, for another forty-eight hours. There was evidence that great pressure was being put on the Arab States to comply. Advice from Palestine indicates that Arab forces from Transjordan have not yet entered any territory allotted to the Jews under the General Assembly resolution of November 29. Reports have been received that conversations between the United Kingdom and the United States have been resumed at a very high level.

PALESTINE

Yesterday I talked with Mr. Wrong on the telephone and he confirmed the very dangerous situation that was developing in Washington in respect of relations between the U.S.A. and the U.K. on Palestine; a situation which unfortunately promises to extend to other fields of Anglo-American relations unless it is corrected. Mr. Stone had had dinner with Senator Vandenberg a day or so ago, and was very much impressed by the Senator's condemnation of the U.K. policy in Palestine and the feeling in the Senate that the negative and non-cooperative attitude, as it appears to them, of the U.K. should be answered by an equally negative attitude on the part of Congress towards U.K. assistance under E.R.P. Mr. Wrong thinks also that American official and Congressional feeling on this matter will poison the atmosphere sufficiently to interfere with any Atlantic Security talks that may be contemplated. All this of course is not new, but it is depressing to have such positive confirmation of our earlier fears.

After I had talked with Mr. Wrong I thought it would be wise to get Mr. Robertson in London on the telephone. I did this, and emphasized to him the dangers of this Anglo-American rift on Palestine. I said that of course there was no suggestion of any official intervention by him as Canadian High Commissioner, but that it might be useful if he could emphasize on an appropriate occasion the danger that I have outlined above. The U.K. must, I assume, be aware of this situation, but I could see no harm, and possibly some advantage in a Canadian voice pointing it out to them in an informal and unofficial way. Mr. Robertson got the point at once and said that, as he was seeing Mr. Hector McNeil, he would take the opportunity to discuss with him the Palestine situation.

I do not know whether we can do any more than this either in Washington or in London, especially as conversations now seem to have commenced on a high level, and it is to be hoped that as a result some steps will be taken to heal the breach. Certainly no one at the present time is benefitting from that breach but the Russians.

PERSONAL AND SECRET

Ottawa, May 27, 1948

Dear Trygve [Lie],

I was grateful indeed to receive your personal letter of May 18th with the attached communication which you addressed to the five permanent members of the Security Council on May 16th. I greatly appreciate the fact that you felt inclined to discuss this matter with me on such a friendly and personal basis.

I am as distressed as you are at recent developments in Palestine and agree that the situation there and the attitude and action, or lack of action taken in regard to it by the U.N. will have a lasting effect on the future of our world organization.

The fact that the situation in Palestine is such a confused one legally leaves the way open to all kinds of technical and constitutional arguments in favour of doing nothing or doing the wrong thing, but it does not alter the fundamental position that members of the United Nations are taking armed action there contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Charter, which will cause difficulties in the future in connection with the settlement of any political problem by the United Nations. If you clear away all the superficial talk and political manoeuvring the essence of the matter as it appears to me, is simply this. On the one hand there are the British who are determined not to prejudice their relations with the Arab States if that can be avoided while not formally opposing a Jewish State. On the other hand are the Americans who are determined not to prejudice their relations with Jewish voters, but are also interested in oil and strategy in Arab countries. The conflict between these two points of view is confused by the common suspicion that the U.S.S.R. has no policy but to fish in these troubled waters. In all this confusion and noise, the ideals that were meant to inspire international action through U.N. are taking a bad beating. My own feeling, and this is a purely personal one and not to be attributed to any Under-Secretary or Canadian representative to the U.N. is "a plague on all your houses!" It is time that someone started thinking of the edifice at Lake Success. If they do not, there will be nothing left of it but ruin. The fact is of course, as you have pointed out, that practically every political problem that now reaches U.N. is coloured by and interpreted in the light of the conflict between the East and the West. Insofar as Palestine is concerned that conflict is also confused by a subsidiary one between the U.K. and the U.S. The result is certainly deplorable enough.

I wish I could see you or Jackson and have a talk about these matters. However, I am not sure when I will be in New York. I am trying to take some holidays in June on the West coast combining them with two or three speeches in Los Angeles and San Francisco together with attendance at the annual Conference of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs in Vancouver. I may be able to return via New York or get to New York sometime later in June, when I of course, will get in touch with your office.

Meanwhile, thank you again for having written me.

Yours sincerely,

SECRET

Following for your information is the text of a memorandum dated June 2, 1948 for the Secretary of State for External Affairs bringing to his attention the Resolution carried in the Security Council on Saturday May 29, 1948. Text begins:

You may wish to give consideration to the effect on the policy of the Canadian Government of the Resolution which was carried in the Security Council on Saturday concerning Palestine. This Resolution provides for the cessation of hostilities for four weeks, calls on all parties concerned to cease the mobilization and training of men of military age brought into the territories during the cease-fire, and lays an embargo on the importation of war material or fighting personnel into Palestine or any Arab State. It also makes provision for further efforts of mediation and calls upon all Governments to assist in the implementation of the Resolution.

2. This Resolution has now been accepted by both parties, subject to agreement on interpretation, and the Security Council will, this afternoon, set a date for the cease-fire. If the truce is subsequently to come into effect, the Security Council will then be under obligation, according to the terms of the Resolution, to consider whether action should be taken under Chapter VII of the Charter.

3. The only immediate effect which the adoption of the Resolution might have upon Canadian policy is in regard to foreign enlistments and the sale of arms. It appears from reports which we have received from the R.C.M.P. that Canadian citizens in considerable numbers are, in fact, leaving Canada to join the Jewish forces. The Resolution does not appear to place a specific obligation on Canada to prevent Canadian citizens proceeding to Palestine, or to bring into effect legislation such as the Foreign Enlistment Act. However, the Resolution is consistent with a decision to apply the Foreign Enlistment Act by Order in Council. Of course, should the truce be observed, there might be an end to the "civil conflict" in Palestine, which would cast doubt upon the competence of the Governor in Council to apply the act to Palestine by order.

4. A request has been received through the Canadian Embassy in Washington from the Egyptian Government for permission to purchase military aircraft from Canada. The Egyptian Government is being informed that this type of aircraft is not now available for sale to Egypt. It is possible under existing regulations for the Department to refuse all requests for the sale of arms for use in the Eastern Mediterranean. Text ends.

5. The Security Council Resolution of May 29 was brought to the attention of Cabinet by the Minister at a meeting held June 2. In the discussion of this matter the Minister said that it did not appear advisable for Canada to take formal action immediately to apply the Foreign Enlistment Act. He expressed the hope that developments during the period of truce and further efforts by the United Nations might bring about a situation which would permit de facto recognition of the State of Israel; at the same time the Act might be made applicable. He indicated that, although numbers of Canadian citizens were reported to be leaving Canada to join the Jewish forces, the policy of holding up the issue of passports to applicants having this object in mind would be continued. The Cabinet noted with approval the Minister's report.<sup>67</sup>

6. The memorandum to the Secretary of State and the views of Cabinet were brought to the attention of General McNaughton on Saturday, June 5.

PALESTINE

The Security Council Mediator in Palestine, Count Bernadotte, has now completed arrangements for the truce in Palestine to go into effect at six p.m. on Friday, June 11. His report, which is given in the attached teletype No. 660 of June 8, † indicates that he showed great qualities of firmness and good sense in the negotiations, particularly in the difficult task of interpreting the term "fighting personnel and men of military age." We have been informed that his proposals have already been accepted by the Arabs and will probably be accepted by the Jews before noon today.

A question may now arise concerning the sending of military observers to Palestine to assist the Mediator in implementing the truce terms. The United States regards the resolution of May 29th as an extension of the resolution establishing the Truce Commission and considers that military observers should be placed at the Mediator's disposal by the countries represented on the Truce Commission: the United States, France, and Belgium. The United States has already assigned officers for this duty and it is reported that Belgium and France have indicated their willingness to supply observers. Press reports indicate that the Soviet Union has also offered to send its military personnel for the same purpose.<sup>68</sup>

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the U.K. and U.S. governments had agreed upon a resolution which would define the situation in Palestine as a threat to the peace and call upon Jews and Arabs to desist from further military action. Failure to bring about a cessation of hostilities would demonstrate a breach of the peace under Article 39 of the Charter requiring further action by the Council.

The text of the draft resolution was read.

10. Mr. St. Laurent said that some difficulty had arisen concerning sponsorship of the resolution. Neither the U.K. nor U.S. delegations were willing to take the initiative and the U.K. government had now requested that the Canadian Delegate do so.

The force of the resolution would be largely lost if it were not proposed by the United Kingdom. In the circumstances it was proposed to reply to the United Kingdom that the government would be unable to instruct General McNaughton to put the resolution forward either himself or in conjunction with another delegate. On the other hand, it was clearly desirable that the resolution be supported and General McNaughton would be instructed to act accordingly.

In this connection a number of telegrams were read.

(Telegrams Nos. 757† and 758,† Canadian Permanent Delegate to External Affairs, July 12, 1948; telegram No. 1091,† Canada House to External Affairs, July 13, and draft telegram, External Affairs to Canada House, July 13)†.

11. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the Minister's report and agreed that, in the circumstances, the U.K. government be informed that the Canadian representative could not be permitted to move the resolution; he would, however, be instructed to offer full support to such a resolution if and when it were presented.

The United Kingdom Government has now decided definitely that it will not propose the draft Resolution on Palestine, the text of which I sent to you this morning. The United States delegation has therefore made a number of revisions in this Resolution and is prepared itself to put it forward. The United Kingdom delegation has accepted all the revisions except one and has agreed to support the Resolution if the United States puts it forward. The United Kingdom delegation has objected only to the inclusion of a specific reference to the Provisional Government of Israel in the revised draft, and the United States delegation may remove this reference. If not, the United Kingdom delegation will formally move an amendment in the Resolution to take out this reference to the Provisional Government of Israel.

I have spoken to Mr. Pearson who agrees that the delegation should be permitted to support the Resolution as revised. The only substantial change is the substitution for the phrase "calls upon" of the word "orders". This change is in line with a very strong recommendation made this morning by the Mediator and has been accepted by the United Kingdom delegation.<sup>69</sup> The question whether a direct reference is made in the Resolution to the Provisional Government of Israel does not seem to be a matter of much consequence, since the Mediator has been corresponding with this Government as such for a month. Mr. Pearson and I thought, therefore, that the delegation might be instructed to abstain on any motion which the United Kingdom makes in this regard.

I attach a copy of the revised Resolution† with the changes underlined. I should be glad if we might instruct the delegation to support this Resolution.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Ritchie, Begins: Regarding news of assassination of Count Bernadotte and a member of his staff in Palestine. An official statement is being issued by the Canadian Government as contained in my immediately following telegram en clair.† A message of condolence† to Count Bernadotte's family from the Canadian Government and people is also being sent through the Canadian Minister in Stockholm.

2. It is assumed that the Council will meet in connection with Count Bernadotte's assassination. You may take this opportunity of associating the Canadian Delegation with appropriate expressions of sympathy, both in regard to Count Bernadotte and the member of his staff who was killed with him. You may also associate the Delegation with what will undoubtedly be other expressions, in emphatic terms, deploring these acts of outrage against respected representatives of the United Nations engaged upon a most important task in the interests of peace and security on behalf of the Organization.

3. It will, of course, be necessary to take immediate steps in an effort to assess the responsibility for these outrages. In this connection, it might be recalled that should it be found that these acts were committed by the regular or irregular forces of either side in Palestine, a clear violation of the Council's resolution of 19 August will have been demonstrated. In that resolution, the Council informed "Governments and authorities concerned" (among other things) "that:

(a) Each party is responsible for the actions of both regular and irregular forces operating under its authority or in territory under its control;

(b) Each party has the obligation to use all means at its disposal to prevent action violating the truce by individuals or groups who are subject to its authority or who are in territory under its control."

4. We assume that efforts will be made not only to assess responsibility but also to continue the work of mediation in Palestine. While realizing the difficulty of finding a substitute for Count Bernadotte without some delay we attach importance to having the Council take all possible measures to see that the process of conciliation is not terminated as a result of the assassination of the Mediator.

Following for McNaughton, Begins: In connection with the consideration of the Palestinian question in the Council arising out of the assassination of the Mediator, you should be guided by the following principles:

(a) The truce ordered by the Security Council in its resolution of July 15th should be maintained.

(b) The Council should make all efforts to continue the work of mediation with a view to arriving at a negotiated peaceful settlement in Palestine, and to this end should expedite the appointment of a new mediator.

(c) Continuing efforts should be made to encourage the closest possible co-operation between the United States and United Kingdom Governments in maintaining the truce and in bringing their influence to bear upon Arabs and Jews with a view to arriving at a peaceful settlement.

(d) Efforts should be made to assess responsibility for the assassination of the Mediator. (The Acting Mediator, Mr. Ralph Bunche, has already instructed the Chief of Staff of the Mediator, General Lundstrom, to make the fullest investigation of the assassination.)

(e) The Canadian representative should maintain the present attitude regarding the disposition of the Arab refugees in Jewish controlled areas in Palestine, and interim aid to them. In particular, he should seek to encourage their return as far as possible, and resist attempts to make their return conditional upon other political considerations connected with a general settlement. As regards interim aid, assistance should be sought from Specialized Agencies such as the International Red Cross, the Children's Emergency Fund and the World Health Organization. (The possibility of direct Canadian assistance is still under review by the Departments concerned.)

2. Count Bernadotte's report has not yet been received here but as soon as it is available further instructions will be sent to you, if this seems necessary. Ends.

Ottawa, October 16, 1948

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

The discussion of the Palestine question in Committee I will be concerned, I understand, principally with the Report of the late United Nations Mediator and his proposals for a peaceful adjustment of the situation in Palestine. A detailed commentary on these proposals has been sent to you by air bag.† The following are some general considerations which might be helpful in guiding you in these discussions:

1) The delegation may express general support for the conclusions of the late Mediator which take into account the changes which have occurred since November 29, 1947, and which suggest a practical basis for a lasting settlement.

2) We are still concerned here with the matter of implementation and with what would appear to be a certain amount of wishful thinking, particularly on the part of the United States and United Kingdom, that a settlement may be effected by diplomatic efforts and "moral force". Since, however, the United Kingdom and United States have indicated that they are prepared now to cooperate in exercising influence on both sides in the direction of a peaceful settlement on the basis of the late Mediator's proposals, the delegation, in our view, should be cooperative, but not too active, in efforts which may be made to have the Mediator's conclusions embodied in a further resolution of the General Assembly. I do not think, therefore, that it would be wise for us to introduce or sponsor any resolution, although consideration might be given to association with other states in sponsorship if this seems necessary. You will, no doubt, refer to us any text of a proposal for our consideration before giving it your support.

2. I feel sure the delegation will bear in mind the importance of encouraging in every way possible agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, enabling these two Governments to follow a coordinated policy in the Middle East as a whole, as well as in regard to the settlement in Palestine on the basis of the late Mediator's proposals.

3. It would seem desirable that the process of mediation be continued, preferably by a single individual having personal authority and having a right to claim impartiality towards both sides, such as the late Mediator. However, should the idea of a conciliation commission gain general support, it would seem desirable that members should consist of those countries capable of exercising a peaceful or conciliatory influence upon both sides in Palestine. For this reason we would prefer to have the commission consist of the governments represented on the present Truce Commission. Such a formula, moreover, might prevent the re-opening of Soviet claims to participation in truce supervision and mediation.

4. As regards the question of the application of Israel for membership in the United Nations and its recognition by Canada, you should at present maintain the position decided by Cabinet, namely that in the present circumstances Canada will not support the application of Israel.

5. It is difficult to anticipate at this time all points of importance which may arise in the discussion, and you will no doubt wish to refer such matters for the consideration of the Government.

Ottawa, October 29, 1948

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Mr. Pearson from Reid, Begins: You agreed before your departure that preliminary comments on the United Kingdom-United States draft resolution on Palestine should be prepared for your consideration. Accordingly, I submit for your consideration the following preliminary Departmental comments as set out below.

2. The area of agreement which has apparently been reached between the United States and United Kingdom delegations regarding the proposals of the Mediator for a settlement in Palestine is gratifying. Its further extension is still necessary if the full influence of the United Kingdom and the United States is to be used to the best advantage in bringing about a settlement in Palestine.

3. We note with interest the view of the United States reported in paragraph 1 (a) of Teletype No. 245† of October 21 from the Canadian Delegation that "the United Nations can only recommend a settlement in the Assembly and act in the Security Council to keep the peace." We are aware, from our discussions with Jebb here, that the United Kingdom maintains that the Council has certain legislative powers under Chapter VII. However, the paramount consideration is that United States and United Kingdom policies on Palestine should not diverge. It therefore would seem to us desirable that the United Kingdom, Canada and other countries accept, for the purposes of the Palestine discussion in the Assembly and in the Council, the interpretation of the Charter given by the United States, and, in particular, that this interpretation should be reflected as far as possible in the text of the draft resolution to be submitted to the Political Committee.

4. As regards the responsibilities of the Assembly, these should be clearly limited to recommendations on procedure, expressions of opinion, and instructions to subordinate bodies which should not extend beyond the powers and functions of the General Assembly itself as the parent body.

5. The language of paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5 might be reviewed in the light of these considerations:

(a) In paragraph 2 the words following "United Nations Mediator" might be changed to read as follows: "and considers that the conclusions contained in Part 1 of that report, which are attached hereto, provide a basis for further efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement of the Palestine question."

(b) In paragraph 3 the words "in accordance with the provisions of the specific conclusions" might be changed to read "on the basis of the conclusions."

(c) The declaration in paragraph 4 must presumably be regarded as an expression of collective opinion by the General Assembly. The wording in the first clause seems satisfactory, therefore, but the words "considered as" might be omitted. The second clause containing an instruction to the Conciliation Commission should, in our opinion, avoid even the appearance of exceeding the powers of the Assembly by such reference to the Security Council as follows: after the words "Conciliation Commission" adding "subject to the directions of the Security Council."

(d) The instruction to the Conciliation Commission in paragraph 5 should more clearly reflect the fact that the Conciliation Commission, as a subordinate organ of the Assembly, can act only as a negotiating body. The words "delimiting the frontiers in Palestine based on the specific conclusions" might be changed to read "assist in arriving at a negotiated delimitation of the frontiers of Palestine on the basis of the conclusions."

6. So far as the Security Council is concerned, we recognize that even though, as we believe, the Security Council was not granted legislative power under the Charter, i.e., the power to change existing legal rights, nevertheless it can be argued, as the United Kingdom has done, that Palestine being terra nullius, the Council can assume legislative power in this particular instance. We do not, however, think it wise or useful to press this point, for two reasons: the United States is unwilling to accept it; and little practical purpose would be served by pressing it since the Council can attain the same practical results by acting under Articles 39 and 40. It is clear that two stages are involved:

(a) during the transition stage fighting can be prevented while negotiations are proceeding and the Council, acting under Article 40, can fix provisional demarcation lines between the opposing sides in addition to providing for truce observance, and

(b) once the parties agree on frontiers, the Council can then determine under Article 39 that any violation of the frontiers is a breach of the peace requiring the imposition of sanctions under Articles 41 and 42.

7. As regards (a) it would appear from paragraph 4 of the draft that the Conciliation Commission is to be charged not only with the heavy responsibilities of negotiating a settlement, but also with arrangements for the transition to a formal peace or armistice. If the Conciliation Commission is to be a newly appointed body selected by the Permanent Members as proposed by the United Kingdom in paragraph 3 of the draft, it might be considered advisable to prolong the functions of the Truce Commission to assume responsibilities for the transition from the truce to peace. On the other hand, if the Truce Commission were, as we suggested in our telegram No. 178 of October 27,† to be given new responsibilities of conciliation but maintain its present membership, this consideration would not arise.

8. As regards (b), namely the maintenance of peace on the basis of frontiers established through negotiation, reference might be made in paragraph 11 to what appears to be the underlying assumption of the whole proposed resolution, namely that the frontiers will have been established by negotiation and accepted by agreement, or at least by acquiescence, and not imposed by force or through some legislated settlement. This might ease the position of the Security Council should it find it necessary, as envisaged in paragraph 11, to treat violations of frontiers as a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or an act of aggression under Article 39.

9. This underlying assumption of agreement, or at least of acquiescence, in a settlement by both sides would seem to depend upon United States and United Kingdom agreeing on a definite plan and exerting maximum pressure on both sides.

10. Subject to the above comments, the draft resolution seems to me to offer a satisfactory basis for implementing the Mediator's proposals for a settlement in Palestine, and as such should be given the support of the Canadian delegation. However, before the draft resolution is introduced in Committee, it would be desirable that the Canadian delegation should endeavour, through consultations with the United States and United Kingdom delegations, to try to reach a common understanding not only on the constitutional problems to which I have referred, but also on the ways and means of implementing the resolution if it were adopted. It seems clear at this stage that only if a clear unity of purpose on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom on the Palestine question is revealed to the General Assembly will sufficient support be forthcoming for the Mediator's proposals or any other proposals for the settlement of the Palestine problem. Ends.

Ottawa, October 30, 1948

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Following for Mr. Pearson from Reid, Begins: There are two aspects of the Palestine problem bearing on discussions in the Security Council to which reference was made in the brief talk we had just before you left on which I should like to make the following comments: These concern two principles which it seems to me the Security Council must maintain at this time if it is (a) not to run the risk of losing any claim to exercising control over the situation in Palestine, and (b) create dangerous precedents.

2. Having once assumed responsibility, under its Truce Resolution of July 15 (and subsequent resolutions) to stop the fighting in Palestine so as to enable negotiations for a settlement to proceed, the Security Council must be enabled by the continued support of its members to ensure that fighting is not resumed pending the outcome of the negotiations. In this connection, it is sometimes said that, because the Council failed to take action to prevent Arab forces from using force to prevent the partition of Palestine, the Council should not now undertake to consider the use of its powers under Chapter VII to stop truce violations by either side. It seems to me essential that a distinction be maintained between the situation which existed before the Council assumed jurisdiction to prevent breaches of the peace in Palestine under Chapter VII, and the situation which has been created since the Council undertook, by the exercise of its authority to stop the fighting, so as to enable the process of mediation ("to promote a peaceful adjustment of the future situation in Palestine" initiated by the May 14 Resolution of the General Assembly) to be implemented. Under the Resolution of July 15 the Council assumed the obligation to declare that the failure on the part of any government or authority to "desist from further military action . . . would demonstrate the existence of a breach of the peace within the meaning of Article 39 of the Charter requiring immediate consideration by the Security Council with the view to such further action under Chapter VII of the Charter as may be decided upon by the Council." Unless the Council is now able, by the exercise of its authority, to have both sides "desist from further military action" without prejudice to any claims either party may have in respect of the plan of partition, the success it has already achieved in localizing the conflict may be nullified.

3. This brings me to my second point, namely that inasmuch as the United Nations has chosen a Mediator and staff as its instrument, under the May 14 Resolution, for the promotion of a peaceful adjustment of the situation in Palestine, and inasmuch as the Council has set up a Truce Commission and placed its reliance upon the United Nations observers on the spot for the information it requires, it is now essential that the reports and recommendations of these United Nations representatives who are on the spot should be accepted as a basis for any discussion of truce violations in the Council, and that these representatives be given every support. Charges of bias have been made against the observers by both sides and will continue to be made. However, it would seem to me that unless the Security Council by a decision withdraws its confidence from the Acting Mediator and the truce observers on the basis of an investigation on the spot, failure to accept their word against the word of interested parties will bring the Security Council discussions into a state of confusion. One of the principal points on which there appears to be conflicting evidence is the relative positions occupied at various times by the opposing forces of the two sides. Each truce violation appears to change these relative positions, and observers are not always present to determine the precise positions which the respective forces should be occupying under the truce arrangements. It would seem essential, therefore, that lines of demarcation should be drawn between the opposing forces, pending a negotiated settlement, and that both sides, as from a fixed date, be called upon to disengage their forces and retire to determined positions to enable observer teams to occupy and patrol the demilitarized intervening areas.

4. These comments are intended to supplement my message No. 187 of October 29. Ends.

ANNEX B: PALESTINE<sup>70</sup>

The Security Council continues its efforts to prevent fighting from being resumed in Palestine to enable a negotiated settlement to be reached. It will be recalled that on November 4 the Council adopted a resolution calling for the withdrawal of troops to positions occupied on October 14 when the most recent serious fighting broke out, and that failure to comply would be considered by a committee of seven, including the five Permanent Members, under Chapter VII of the Charter. The Acting Mediator was authorized to establish provisional lines beyond which no troop movements might take place. He did so on November 13, with the approval of the committee of seven, and ordered both parties to observe the new arrangements.

2. At a closed meeting of the Security Council on November 9, the Acting Mediator made the suggestion that there should be progress from a truce to an armistice, in order to create the psychological conditions necessary for negotiations and for the forthcoming discussions of a settlement in the General Assembly. For this purpose he proposed that a resolution be adopted by the Council, calling for a settlement of all outstanding truce problems in Palestine through the good offices of the Acting Mediator, and that an armistice should come into effect based on separation of all forces by broad demilitarized or neutral zones, leading ultimately to the withdrawal and reduction to a peacetime footing of opposing forces.

3. Following up the Acting Mediator's suggestions, a resolution was worked out in a series of discussions among the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian Delegations. As the views contained in the resolution represented a compromise on the part of both the United Kingdom and the United States Governments, the Canadian Delegation was requested by the Delegation of the United States and the United Kingdom to sponsor the resolution on the understanding that they would support it in the Council, in association with Belgium and France.

A report based on this annex was made to Cabinet on November 17 by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

4. The resolution (the text of which is attached) was submitted by General McNaughton at the meeting of the Council on the afternoon of Monday, November 15, and was immediately supported by the United Kingdom and the United States, as well as by other Delegations, with the exception of the Syrian and Soviet Delegations. The resolution was adopted at a meeting of the Council on Tuesday morning, November 16.

CANADIAN ARMISTICE RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL
NOVEMBER 16, 1948

The Security Council, reaffirming its previous resolutions concerning the establishment and implementation of the truce in Palestine, and recalling particularly its resolution of July 15, 1948, which determined that the situation in Palestine constitutes a threat to peace within the meaning of Article 39 of the Charter;

Taking note that the General Assembly is continuing its consideration of the future government of Palestine in response to the request of the Security Council of April 1, 1948;

Without prejudice to the actions of the acting Mediator regarding implementation of the resolution of the Security Council of November 4, 1948;

Decides that, in order to eliminate the threat to peace in Palestine and to facilitate the transition from the present truce to permanent peace in Palestine, an armistice shall be established in all sectors of Palestine;

Calls Upon the parties directly involved in the conflict in Palestine, as a further provisional measure under Article 40 of the Charter, to seek agreement forthwith, by negotiations conducted either directly or through the acting Mediator on Palestine, with a view to immediate establishment of an armistice including;

1. Delineation of permanent armistice demarcation lines beyond which the armed forces of the respective parties shall not move;

2. Such withdrawal and reduction of their armed forces as will ensure the maintenance of the armistice during the transition to permanent peace in Palestine.

ANNEX A: THE DISCUSSION IN THE POLITICAL COMMITTEE AND IN PARTICULAR MR. PEARSON'S STATEMENT ON PALESTINE OF NOVEMBER 22<sup>71</sup>

The delegates of the United Kingdom, United States and Canada have spoken in the opening debate on Palestine in the Political Committee of the General Assembly.

A report based on this annex was made to Cabinet on November 24 by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

2. The United Kingdom introduced a draft resolution to implement the proposals of the late Mediator, which embody a plan of partition based on the recognition of a Jewish state in part of Palestine and the absorption of the remainder by neighbouring Arab states. The draft resolution calls for the appointment of a Conciliation Commission of three members to take the necessary measures to put the Mediator's plan into effect. It would take over the functions of the Acting Mediator and Truce Commission, appoint a Commissioner for the Jerusalem area, draw up a plan for a permanent international regime for Jerusalem, and facilitate the repatriation of Arab refugees. It would appoint a boundary commission to establish frontiers on the basis suggested by the Mediator, giving northern Palestine and the coast to the Jewish state and permitting the Arabs to retain the eastern part of central Palestine and the southern desert. Adjustments of this plan might be made to promote agreement if the general equilibrium of the Mediator's conclusions were not altered. The Security Council would be asked to consider as a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression any attempt to alter these frontiers by force.

3. The United States accepted this draft resolution for purposes of discussion but wished the boundaries to be based on the Assembly's partition plan of last November. No changes would be allowed in this plan unless they were fully acceptable to the Jewish State. Nevertheless, if the Jews wished to retain areas described as Arab in last year's Assembly resolution they must offer appropriate exchanges through negotiation. The emphasis placed by the United States on negotiation and agreement rather than on the delimitation of boundaries by a United Nations commission is related to the warning of the United States delegate that more thought would have to be given to the nature of United Nations guarantees of the frontier and of human rights.

4. Mr. Pearson's statement of November 22 also placed emphasis on negotiation and agreement rather than upon the imposition of a settlement by the United Nations. He urged that permanent arrangements should be effected by negotiation among those directly concerned, within the framework of the truce and mediation proceedings worked out by United Nations bodies during the past year. These negotiations, he said, should take into consideration both the resolution of the General Assembly of November 29, 1947 and the Mediator's Report, as well as the situation which now exists in Palestine under the truce. Thus the Conciliation Commission proposed by the United Kingdom would assume the character of a Commission of Good Offices.

5. The other points stressed by Mr. Pearson are as follows:

(a) Recognition of the existence of a Jewish State (one of the basic premises of the Mediator's Report) need not wait for action until the boundaries of the state are precisely and finally defined, but the United Nations has a right to expect that Israel should accept fully the principles of peaceful settlement embodied in the Charter and prove their acceptance by giving effect to the truce and armistice arrangements laid down by the Security Council. Such a recognition of Israel, upon the terms specified, would make Israel eligible for membership in the United Nations.

(b) The principle of the internationalization of Jerusalem should be re-affirmed and both parties should be called upon to cooperate in facilitating the establishment of international control in this area.

(c) The United Kingdom draft resolution provides a good basis of discussion in the Political Committee.

6. Mr. Pearson has sent a message, No. 448 of November 22, copy of which is attached,† giving the principal points of his statement. The full text is following by commercial airmail.

ANNEX 2: PEACEFUL ADJUSTMENT OF THE FUTURE SITUATION IN PALESTINE

On December 4, the Political Committee of the Assembly approved, by a narrow majority of 25 votes to 21 with nine abstentions, a resolution providing for a Conciliation Commission of three members to assist the Arabs and Jews to reach final settlement on all outstanding questions. Jerusalem and environs is to be placed under effective United Nations control, and the Security Council is asked to arrange for its demilitarization as soon as possible. No mention whatsoever is made in the instructions to the Conciliation Commission of the basis on which the remainder of Palestine will be divided between Arabs and Jews. The Conciliation Commission is instructed to facilitate the economic development of Palestine and the repatriation and rehabilitation of refugees.

2. A noteworthy aspect of the Resolution adopted by the Political Committee is the reference, which occurs for the first time in a United Nations document, to "the State of Israel". The actual phrase which appears in the terms of reference of the Conciliation Committee which is "to promote good relations between the State of Israel, the Arabs of Palestine and the neighbouring Arab States." If the resolution is adopted by the General Assembly (for which a two-thirds majority is required) the reference to the State of Israel would amount to a recognition by the United Nations of the existence of this State.<sup>72</sup>

Unless a two-thirds majority can be obtained for the resolution in the plenary session, the Assembly is likely to adjourn without reaching any decision on the Palestine question. This would mean that the Acting Mediator would continue his attempts to control the situation under the Security Council's resolution of Nov-

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference our message No. 321 of 13th March† regarding Chilean representative's submission to the Council on Czechoslovakia.

I have learned from United States and United Kingdom delegations that they intend giving their support to having the Chilean submission put on the agenda of the Council and discussed on Wednesday, 17th March.

2. Neither delegation has decided what course of action the Council should take in any subsequent debate so far, but feel that in view of the seriousness of the charges regarding events in Czechoslovakia and the effect on public opinion, they have no alternative but to have the Council discuss the matter. As regards the possible outcome, a member of the United States delegation indicated that an appropriate objective would be an investigation regarding the charges of Soviet intervention in the coup in Prague, which he admitted might be difficult to prove in view of obvious Czech complicity. In any case, he thought that the Council should endeavour to ascertain the facts by its own investigation. Investigation, if proposed to the Council, might be vetoed by Gromyko in which case the responsibility for preventing action on the part of the Council would squarely rest on the Soviet delegation. If on the other hand, Gromyko were to walk out of the Council when the Czech question is put on the agenda, the Council would then be presumably at liberty to adopt a Resolution establishing an investigation of the charges. This action would serve to focus public opinion on the tactics of "indirect aggression" employed by the Soviet Union.

3. I would appreciate your advice as soon as possible as to the position the Canadian delegation should take on the question of admission of the Czech question to the agenda of the Council. In the circumstances I think that we should vote in form of admission of the Chilean submission to the agenda of the Council.

Your telegram No. 323 dealing with Chilean representative's submission to Council on Czechoslovakia.

It is not easy to decide what should be done about this matter. Putting this subject on the agenda against the wishes of Russia and ultimately forcing a Russian veto may possibly result in a useful political warfare victory against the Soviets, but if the Russians did not oppose its inclusion it might constitute an awkward precedent. Might they not then put United States alleged interference in Greece, Italy, etc., on the Council agenda? Furthermore, are the Americans sure that a commission investigating the charges can establish their validity? I had thought that on the surface there seemed to be little interference by the U.S.S.R. in the Czech coup. In that case an investigation would probably back-fire. It is, in fact just possible, though I suppose not probable, that the U.S.S.R. might welcome this particular enquiry on the ground that they could make, superficially, such a good case for their non-intervention. There is also the domestic jurisdiction angle. On the whole I think the Council should be careful about getting involved in an issue of this kind which may be turned against it, and I would have preferred, myself, to have restricted Council intervention to the simple question of the procedural handling of Papanek's<sup>73</sup> submission. However, it would be difficult to oppose the Chilean submission if it were supported by the U.S. and the U.K., and we may have to go along with them. From the evidence submitted, however, I am not satisfied that either the U.S. or the U.K. have sufficiently considered the consequences of this action. I may be wrong — I hope I am — but I doubt if putting this matter on the Agenda will have any useful results. If it is put on, however, I would think that we might adopt, at the beginning at least, a passive attitude during its discussion until we see how things develop.

THE CZECHOSLOVAK QUESTION BEFORE THE UNITED NATIONS

I. The General Background

The Communist Party in Czechoslovakia emerged from the elections of May, 1946, as the strongest single party, with 38% of the votes. The resignation from the Cabinet of twelve non-Communist members, after the Communist Minister of the Interior had refused to satisfy their protest against the widespread dismissal of non-Communists from the police force, gave the Communist Party the opportunity to effect the coup d'état of February 1948. Under pressure of threat and bloodshed, President Benes was compelled to accept the resignations of the twelve non-Communist members of the Cabinet and to agree to the formation of a new Cabinet controlled by the Communists. The new Government, through its control of the police and the information services and with the help of "Action Committees", was then able to face the coming election of May, 1948, without fear of suffering heavy losses.

2. On March 10th, Dr. Jan Papanek, then the permanent Czechoslovak delegate to the United Nations, handed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations a statement charging the Soviet Union with having intervened in the Czechoslovak crisis. Two days later, the Chilean representative wrote to the Secretary-General, asking that the Security Council investigate the matter and permit Chile to take part in the discussion. Both Dr. Papanek and the Chilean representative invoked Article 34 of the Charter of the United Nations which gives the right to the Security Council to "investigate any dispute or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security." Chile also invoked Article 35 (paragraph one) which states that "any member of the United Nations may bring any dispute or any situation of the nature referred to in Article 34 to the attention of the Security Council." The charges brought before the Council were that freedom and independence of Czechoslovakia had been suppressed by the Communist Party, with the cooperation of the Soviet Union, and that this fact was endangering the maintenance of international peace and security. The Council gave preliminary consideration to these charges and proceeded to discuss the means by which an enquiry might be made.

II. Dr. Papanek's Allegations

3. In his statement, Dr. Papanek claimed that every move that the Communists had made since they began their so-called cooperation with President Benes and the non-Communist elements of the country, had been a step towards the eventual destruction of democracy internally, and towards the complete submission of Czechoslovakia to the Soviet Union in foreign affairs. He stated that the steps taken by the Communists before and after the coup d'état had followed the same pattern as had been applied by the Communist Parties in other states of Eastern Europe. The threat of military intervention by the U.S.S.R. (indicated by the presence of Soviet forces on the north-west boundaries of Czechoslovakia), the restrictions on freedom of speech and press, of travel and of emigration, the curbs on the ownership of private property, the prostitution of justice, the elimination of non-Communists from public service, the economic pressure (such as the cession of the radium mines), the prevention of Czechoslovakia's participation in the Marshall Plan, the forcible removal of leaders and members of the non-Communist political parties and the restrictions on the constitutional powers of the President: these were some of the methods employed.

III. Outline of Discussion

4. Though realizing that it might be difficult to establish direct evidence of the Soviet Union's complicity in the coup d'état, the United Kingdom and the United States saw no alternative but to have the Security Council examine the charges with a view to ascertaining their truth so far as that was possible. They supported the inclusion of the Chilean request on the agenda of the Security Council. All the members of the Security Council did the same, with the exception of the U.S.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R. The resolution was placed on the agenda by a vote of 9-2. Mr. Gromyko then charged that the Chilean attitude was dictated by the United States, which sought to cover up its activities in Czechoslovakia, Italy and Greece, and to accelerate the passage of ERP through Congress. By a similar vote of 9-2, Chile was given the right to participate in the discussion and Dr. Papanek invited to appear before the Council. The Government of Czechoslovakia was also invited to participate without vote in the discussion, but declined the invitation on the grounds that "the discussion of internal matters of Czechoslovakia in the Security Council was contrary to the basic principles of the Charter." The Czechoslovak delegate, like the Soviet Union delegate, did not answer any of the charges concerning the pressure brought to bear by Moscow on Mr. Benes and Mr. Masaryk to bring Czechoslovakia into the Soviet sphere of influence.

5. To facilitate elucidation of the facts by the Council, Chile proposed a resolution, sponsored by the Argentine, which provided for the appointment of a Sub-Committee of the Council, composed of three members, to receive evidence and statements and to report to the Security Council. The U.S.S.R. opposed this resolution on the grounds that it was substantive and not procedural. Mr. Gromyko suggested that the preliminary question whether the motion was substantive or procedural be decided in accordance with the statement of the four sponsoring powers at San Francisco on June 7th, 1945. In his opinion, this would require that the decision be taken by a majority of seven votes, including the concurring votes of the permanent members. By a vote of 8-2 (France abstaining), the motion was declared a matter of procedure; however, President Parodi (France) declared that the motion was nevertheless substantive, according to the San Francisco statement. The U.S.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R. were in favour of this decision, France, the United Kingdom and the United States abstained, and the six remaining powers, including Canada, voted against. The President's decision was upheld, as there were less than seven votes cast against it. When the Chilean resolution was brought to a vote, nine states voted for and two against. The resolution was not adopted since one of the opposing votes had been made by a permanent member. At the close of the discussion, the United States proposed that statements should be obtained from refugees for the Council, and Argentina submitted a new draft resolution calling upon the Council to entrust its Committee of Experts to obtain evidence. The Argentine motion was opposed by the U.S.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R. The matter did not come to a vote, and the Council then adjourned.

IV. The Canadian Attitude

6. The Canadian representative at the Security Council took a strong stand against the Communist position. He regarded the Chilean resolution as procedural and considered the four power statement at San Francisco to be irrelevant. He recalled that the sponsoring powers had pledged themselves not to use the veto wilfully to obstruct the operation of the Council. He also referred to Article 103 of the Charter which provides "that in any conflict between obligations of member states under the Charter and under any other international agreement, their obligations under the Charter shall prevail." To this Mr. Gromyko replied that the U.S.S.R. "was not prepared to take lessons from the Canadian delegation and that he did not intend to listen to the moralizing of the Canadian delegation as to whether the U.S.S.R. was abusing its rights or not." General McNaughton gave the background of the seizure of power by the Communists in Czechoslovakia and stated that it was "difficult to avoid the opinion that the Communist Party gained control of Czechoslovakia with the knowledge, approval and some help at least from the Soviet Union." He considered that it was the duty of the Council to arrange that witnesses be heard to ascertain the methods by which a "minority group linked with an outside power is able to overthrow its political opponents and deprive the majority of the people of their political liberties, for this is not only dangerous to democracy but also creates a threat to international peace and security."

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

With reference to Vishinsky's draft Resolution on disarmament, it is thought here that his proposal should be regarded as propaganda, and that the Soviet draft might be dealt with by amendment rather than rejected outright.

2. The obvious defect in Vishinsky's proposal is the highly ambiguous provision for international control over the implementation of measures of disarmament, and the absence of any provision for international inspection. Experience in previous discussions in the United Nations has shown that such an ambiguous reference to "within the framework of the Security Council" inevitably raises the whole question of the veto, and it is evident that the veto might be used in the Security Council to limit the effectiveness of inspection.

3. The question of adequate preliminary international inspection is a matter of first importance in our view. In connection with Vishinsky's proposal that armed forces be reduced by one third, the Soviet delegation should be directly pressed, if possible by a spokesman for a group of delegations, to declare unequivocally whether the Soviet Union is prepared to open its borders to international observer teams which might establish, both quantitatively and qualitatively, the armed forces and armaments, both existing and potential, at the disposal of the Soviet Union in its own territories, as well as territories under its control.

4. Such an inspection is clearly a necessary prerequisite, if a sound basis for progressive general disarmament is to be established. Following such an inspection, which would of course be only the first of periodic and of unannounced inspections, a formula of disarmament must be found which would be related to the needs of general international peace and security. This is an entirely different approach from the one suggested by Vishinsky, that disarmament could be effective without adequate preliminary knowledge merely by the application of an arbitrary arithmetical formula.

5. However, before any assurance is demanded of the Soviet Union that it accept international inspections of its armed forces and armaments, the other Great Powers concerned must naturally be prepared to say that they would accept similar international inspection. We assume, therefore, that you would consult the delegations of the Western Powers, and particularly United States and United Kingdom, on this matter.

6. It might be appropriate also to point out that Canada, like most of the Allies in the recent war, substantially reduced its own armaments and armed forces upon the conclusion of hostilities. We had so acted in the hope that we might be able to place reliance for our own security on the undertakings to which all members of the United Nations had pledged themselves under the Charter, and on the machinery for the maintenance of international peace provided for in the Charter. No country therefore would welcome more sincerely progress towards effective measures of general disarmament than would Canada.

7. You might consider repeating our consistent position that we fully support effective measures for general disarmament, but not at the cost of insecurity for ourselves, or for other nations bent upon maintaining international peace and security on the basis of the principles and purposes of the Charter. It might perhaps be pointed out that, if the factors contributing to the present state of tension and insecurity were objectively examined by the United Nations, it would be found that the principal aggravating causes are:

(a) the overwhelming superiority of armed forces maintained and deployed by the Soviet Union particularly in Europe,

(b) the failure of the Soviet Union to cooperate in the establishment of collective forces under the United Nations on the basis of Article 43 of the Charter.

(c) the failure of the Soviet Union to cooperate in the development of proposals to establish international control of atomic energy and, the failure of the Soviet Union to respond to the majority view expressed in the Commission on Conventional Armaments that measures must be taken to strengthen the sense of security of nations before national armaments may be regulated or reduced.

8. Vishinsky has reiterated the Soviet Union's position regarding the prohibition of atomic weapons. The oversimplification of the Soviet argument in this respect will no doubt be exposed by statements such as the one made by General McNaughton on the Reports on the Atomic Energy Commission.

9. You may also wish to emphasize the importance which Canadian Delegations have always attached to the implementation of Article 43 which would enable nations to rely on measures other than their own armament for their security and would provide one important criterion for the international regulation and reduction of armaments and armed forces.

10. We realize that United States concurrence in the proposal set forth in paragraph 5 above, especially in regard to atomic bombs and installations, will be dependent on a realization by the United States that the pledge to accept effective international inspection will cost them nothing, since it is inconceivable that the Soviet Union will agree to make the pledge, or, if they make it, will agree to an international convention to implement the pledge. The Soviet disarmament resolution is pure propaganda and I do not see how we can counter it effectively unless we are prepared to meet the Soviet Union on their own ground.

Disarmament. With the referring of atomic energy to a Sub-Committee, Committee One took up today the next item on its agenda, the Soviet resolution on disarmament. General debate opened with a long speech by Vishinsky which was chiefly remarkable for the fact that it said nothing about his resolution. The first part was a historical study of disarmament proposals in the twenties and thirties which was followed by attacks on Bevin and Spaak and the usual objections to United States military and atomic policy.

2. For the United Kingdom, McNeil made a forceful and largely impromptu reply stressing,

(a) Our lack of any information about what arms and forces the Soviet Union possesses;

(b) The advantage to the Soviet Union as a heavily armed power of mere quantitative reduction such as Vishinsky's one-third;

(c) The overwhelming importance of an adequate settlement of international inspection.

3. Belgium made a general statement in reply to Vishinsky's attack on Spaak and the debate adjourned until Saturday, October 9th.

4. We propose to speak in the debate along the general lines of your telegram No. 69 of October 1st. We think, however, that we should not speak before the Great Powers, or at least the United States and France (China is rather holding back), since the resolution is in the first instance directed at them.<sup>74</sup> Ends.

Disarmament. Your telegram No. 170 of October 23rd† and previous correspondence.

The Disarmament Sub-Committee, with unexpected display of energy, on Monday, October 25th voted down the Soviet proposal and by a majority vote, approved a revised Franco-Belgian Resolution, the text of which is given in my immediately following telegram.† As this will be referred to Committee One in a few days' time, your early comments would be appreciated.

2. You will note that the operative part of this revised Resolution contains the same general ideas as the previous Franco-Belgian draft together with an invitation to the Security Council to report to the assembly not later than its next session on the effect given to the present recommendation.

3. After the meeting, the United Kingdom representative advised us that he was quite satisfied with the revised Resolution approved by the majority.

4. Your suggested changes to the previous Franco-Belgian proposal, contained in your telegram under reference, were made known privately to members of the Sub-Committee on Monday. Present text has, however, been agreed upon over the week-end by parties principally concerned in the Sub-Committee. Possibility of securing adoption of drafting changes when Resolution is returned to full Committee will be kept in mind, although this may prove difficult at Committee stage.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Your telegrams No. 278 and No. 279† of October 27. Disarmament. Following from Reid. Like the previous draft the general lines of the revised Franco-Belgium resolution seemed to us satisfactory.

2. It is unfortunate, however, in our view, that the language of the draft as it stands fails to reflect the necessity for propaganda reasons of making a clear and unambiguous answer to the Soviet proposal for a cut in armaments and armed forces. We realize that now that the Sub-committee has approved the draft, it may be difficult, if not impossible, for you to offer amendments in Committee stage. However, every effort should be made at least by a statement to present to the public mind the contrast between the Soviet proposal and that of the Western powers. The Soviet proposal, obviously made in bad faith, is based upon an arbitrary mathematical ratio of one-third. The Western Powers, on the other hand, propose a universal and thorough-going system of regulating and reducing all armaments and armed forces based upon cooperation between all nations and starting with, not an arbitrary figure of one-third, but full information on existing armaments and armed forces checked and verified by effective international inspection.

3. This is the consideration which prompted my remarks contained in paragraph 10 of our message No. 69 of October 1.

4. I expect that the Minister will be in Paris before the resolution is discussed in the Political Committee and you will no doubt have an opportunity to discuss this with him.

5. The drafting of the resolution appears to have been based upon insufficient realization of the fact that the disarmament discussions in Paris have no significance except as an engagement in the present propaganda battle. Our impression from here is that the Western Powers have been beaten hereto in this engagement. It is, I suggest, of some considerable importance that in the last phase of the discussions on disarmament in Paris, some of the ground which has been lost should be recovered.<sup>75</sup>

UNITED NATIONS GUARD FORCE

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has the honour to report that the Third Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations will be giving consideration to a proposal by the Secretary-General that a United Nations Guard Force be created to perform protective, control and administrative functions on behalf of the Security Council and the General Assembly.

2. The assassination of Count Bernadotte and the killing of other United Nations officials in Palestine have given impetus to the Secretary-General's proposals. The Secretary-General has now recommended to the General Assembly an initial Guard Force of eight hundred men of whom three hundred would be permanently mobilized, with five hundred in reserve living in their own countries but ready for service on short notice from the Secretary-General. This force, according to the Secretary-General's proposals, would be armed with light personal weapons only, (revolvers, rifles, carbines or light automatic rifles). It would be recruited in accordance with the principles established in Chapter XV of the Charter for the appointment to the staff of the Secretariat.

3. It is not the intention that this Guard Force should be considered in any way a substitute for the Armed Forces which Member States of the United Nations are obliged to place at the disposal of the Security Council in accordance with Article 43 of the Charter. The duties of the proposed United Nations Guard Forces would be not combative, but protective and administrative. The essential duty of the Guard Force would be to provide protection to the personnel and property of missions of the United Nations established by the Security Council or by the General Assembly. In the case of elections or plebiscites, supervised by the United Nations, the Force may act to supervise polling places and to prevent fraudulent voting. A proportion of the Force would also include experts in transport and communication, who might be called upon to operate such technical services where these are not provided by national or local authorities.

4. The Chiefs of Staff Committee has estimated that the annual per capita cost on the basis of Canadian prices and Canadian rates of pay and allowances would be $5,000. The Secretary-General has provided an estimate of $4,000,000 to finance the initial force. If the above proposal for a Guard Force is approved in principle by the General Assembly, this estimate will be followed by the submission of detailed estimates to the General Assembly.

Recommendation

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs therefore has the honour to recommend:

1) That the Canadian Delegation be authorized to support the proposal of the Secretary-General to recruit and to maintain a United Nations Guard Force, not exceeding 1,000 men in the first year, to perform protective, control and administrative functions on behalf of the Security Council and the General Assembly on the understanding that,

(a) the Guard Force is recruited and maintained under Articles 97-101 of the Charter, as personnel of the Secretariat and not in any sense as a combatant force under Articles 42 and 43 of the Charter,

(b) the Secretary-General will be fully responsible for such recruitment which may be facilitated by Member Governments in whatever way they may see fit, provided that recruitment should take into account the need for equitable geographic distribution, as well as the need for the efficient operation of the service,

(c) the Secretary-General, should make proper provision to meet financial obligations in regard to the force, including pay, allowances and pensions both to the individuals and their families.

2) That the Canadian Delegation be authorized to support a proposal to provide that the necessary funds be placed at the disposal of the Secretary-General through the United Nations budget for the current year to finance such a force, not exceeding 1,000 men in the first year.<sup>76</sup>

ELECTION OF ONE-THIRD OF MEMBERS TO THE FUNCTIONAL COMMISSIONS OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

At the Seventh Session of the Economic and Social Council, elections will be held to fill vacancies on the following functional Commissions of the Council: Economic and Employment, Transport and Communications, Human Rights, Status of Women, Fiscal, Statistical, Social, and Population.

You will recall that at the Third Session of the Economic and Social Council in 1946, elections were first held for membership to the functional Commissions of the Economic and Social Council. The term of office for Members of all Commissions is three years. However, for the initial period, one-third of the Members were elected to serve for two years, one-third for three years and one-third for four years. The Commission on Narcotic Drugs is an exception, for its initial Members were all elected for three years. On that occasion, Canada was elected to serve for three years on the Statistical Commission, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs and the Population Commission, and for four years on the Social Commission. Consequently, the elections to be held at the Seventh Session of the Economic and Social Council will take place while Canada is still a member of those Commissions to which it was elected in 1946. For this reason, it might not be appropriate for us to seek election to any additional Commissions.<sup>77</sup>

It is likely, however, that the Canadian Delegation will be asked whether Canada is willing to accept membership on any of the Commissions for which elections will be held. In view of our continuing membership on four Commissions of the Council, I should be grateful for your advice as to whether the Delegation should at this time accept membership on any additional Commissions of the Council.<sup>78</sup>

A communication has been received from the Indian Representative to the United Nations requesting Canadian support for India's re-election to the Transport and Communications Commission and the Fiscal Commission, and its candidature for membership on the Social Commission. A similar request has been received from the High Commissioner for South Africa concerning the re-election of South Africa to the Social Commission. It is proposed, if you agree, to advise Mr. Wilgress of these communications and to instruct him to use his own judgment concerning them.<sup>79</sup>

I have had it in mind for some time to write to you with regard to a number of matters arising out of my experience as a member of several delegations of the Economic and Social Council. I am prompted to do this at the present time in the light of the decision which has now been reached, that Canada is not to be a member of the Council during 1949.

I would like to say, first of all, that I am thoroughly in accord with our decision not to stand for re-election at this time. I think it would have been particularly unfortunate if we had made a decision to stand for re-election at the same time that two Latin-American countries, Peru and Chile, were also seeking re-election. While we are fully justified in refusing to accept the principle that only the great powers are entitled to re-election to the various organs of the Council, I believe that in this particular instance our action in standing aside for at least one year in order to allow some rotation of membership on the Council will in the long run rebound to Canada's advantage.

Having said this, I should go on to say that I think we should definitely plan to resume our membership on the Council after one year's absence. In other words, we should make a decision as soon as possible with respect to our intentions to stand for reelection at the end of 1949 for the three-year period 1950-1952 inclusive. As a corollary of this, I think it follows that we should also make a point of demonstrating our continued interest in the work of the Council during the year 1949 when we are not actually members of the Council. I felt that Belgium created a good precedent in this connection in arranging for Mr. Rolland Lebeau of the Belgian Delegation to attend Council sessions in the capacity of an observer during the year when Belgium was not a member of the Council. I feel that it would be very much worthwhile for Canada to make a similar arrangement, and I am certain that if this were done, Canada's continued interest in the work of the Council would be noted and appreciated.

In order to carry out my suggestion, I do not think that it would be necessary for any special representatives to be sent down from Ottawa unless it were thought advisable that a representative of the External Affairs Department itself should attend the Council meetings for this purpose. I would think that under ordinary circumstances representation for the first Council session at Lake Success could be arranged through the permanent Canadian Delegation in New York, while with respect to the second session of the Council next year which takes place in Geneva, representation could no doubt be arranged through one of the overseas offices of External Affairs in Europe.

Finally, I believe that it would be of additional advantage to Canada during her absence from the Council if she were to demonstrate her interest in practical terms by placing one or two small, but useful items on the Council agenda for discussion at the two sessions in 1949. Personally I have always felt that one of the greatest weaknesses of the Canadian contribution during its three-year term on the Council has been the fact that it has not at any stage put forward on its own initiative constructive proposals for Council discussion. I think it is correct to state that we have not at any time placed an item on the Council agenda. Our contribution has consisted chiefly of constructive, objective contributions to the debates which arise on items placed on the agenda by other Council members. In other words, it has been largely a second-hand contribution.

I think there are a number of matters which Canada could properly take responsibility for placing on the Council agenda, even during the year when she is not actually a member of the Council. These items need not be controversial items: they should probably concern themselves with questions relating to better methods of Council organization and the establishment of sound principles of administration.

I have in mind two specific suggestions by way of illustration:

(1) When the Population Commission was originally set up in September, 1946, it was thought necessary to arrange for liaison representatives to be present at Population Commission meetings from the Social Commission, the Statistical Commission and the Economic and Employment Commission. I think experience has shown that these liaison officers have proven to be unnecessary. There are, of course, important inter-relationships between all Commissions of the Council, but there is no more justification for providing these special liaison arrangements for the Population Commission than for any of the other Commissions of the Council.

It so happens that Canada has acted on a number of occasions as the liaison representative from the Economic and Employment Commission to the Population Commission. I think, therefore, that subject to confirmation of my views from Canadian representatives on the Population Commission and on the Economic and Employment Commission, it would be worthwhile proposing to the Council at its next session that we revise the original Council resolution which established the Population Commission and dispense with these liaison arrangements that I have mentioned. I think that if we take the initiative on this point, it will demonstrate our concern with tidy administrative arrangements, and also our concern that no opportunity be lost to eliminate unnecessary expense.

(2) The second point that I have in mind relates to the relationships between the Regional Commissions and the United Nations.

At the VIIth Session, Mr. Sidney Pollock raised a very important question regarding the budgetary relationships between Regional Commissions and the United Nations. He actually presented a resolution on this subject, but it was lost in the shuffle and did not receive the attention that it merited.

The point is this: under the existing arrangements between the United Nations and the Regional Commissions, the practice is for the United Nations to bear the costs of the administrative budget of the Regional Commissions. It is not, however, committed to bear the cost of the operative budget of such Commissions. Unfortunately, there are no clear lines of demarkation between administrative and operating costs, and our experience with the Regional Commission for Asia and the Far East, during the debate on the establishment of a Bureau of Flood Control in the Far East, pointed out to members of the delegation the dangers inherent in the continuation of the present situation unless there is clarification of what constitutes administrative costs and what constitutes operating costs.

Mr. Pollock or I could elaborate further on this point if necessary, but I think I have said enough to indicate to you the nature of the suggestions which I am putting forth.

In conclusion, I would like to repeat that I feel certain that an indication of continued interest by Canada in the work of the Economic and Social Council during 1949 will do much, not only to ensure our re-election at the end of the year, but will also do much to maintain Canada's position in the minds of other Member States as being one of the nations which has contributed most to the development of the Council's work since its inception.

I refer to your telephone conversation of today's date with Mr. A.A. Though I feel that it is perhaps too early to take a final decision as to when Canada should stand for re-election to the Council, I agree that we should send an observer to its sessions and should, moreover, give careful consideration to introducing one or more useful items into the agenda. I understand from Mr. Day that you are in accord with Mr. Ignatieff's view that we should postpone action in this matter in order to give further thought to the development of an important item for the ninth session.

Enclosed is a copy of our note of today's date to the Canadian Permanent Delegate to the United Nations,† confirming the arrangement by which Mr. Grande of the Canadian delegation will be assigned to full time work as an observer at the eighth session.

[Ottawa], January 29, 1948

The question of appointing a suitable delegation to the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press is one that requires immediate attention as the Conference is scheduled to commence in Geneva on the 23rd of March, and a good deal of preparatory work needs to be done before that time.

Of UN Division.

In an informal discussion with members of the Department, Mr. G.V. Ferguson, Editor of The Montreal Star, who was Rapporteur of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press, although not an official representative of Canada, expressed the view that the delegation should consist of representatives of the working press, radio and film interests of Canada. The resolution of the Economic and Social Council concerning delegations stated that they should include in each instance persons "actually engaged or experienced in press, radio, motion pictures and other media for the dissemination of information." The resolution of the Economic and Social Council calls for a delegation of five delegates, five alternates and as many advisers as necessary.

Two main alternative types of delegation are possible:

- (1) A full sized delegation representative of the media of information in Canada;
- (2) A smaller delegation headed possibly by one of our diplomatic representatives, accompanied by one or two press representatives, and representatives of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and National Film Board.

The appointment of a delegation on the lines of the first alternative requires that careful attention should be paid to the inclusion of such groups in the newspaper field as the Canadian Press, the Parliamentary Press Gallery, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association, the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association, the Canadian Women's Press Club, the Periodical Press and possibly the British United Press as well. In the film field, I think that the National Film Board would be sufficient and possibly someone like Mr. J.J. Fitzgibbon of Famous Players. In radio, it would be necessary to have representatives from both the C.B.C., and the private radio organization of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. In the latter case, the inclusion of Mr. Clifford Sifton in the delegation might cover both press and private radio interests.

At the technical level, there should be someone from the government information side, a legal adviser, and a Secretary and an Assistant Secretary.

Attached is a list of names which have been suggested, based on the assumption that a delegation of this kind is approved by the Government.

The main advantages of a delegation of this kind are that it would place responsibility for freedom of information directly on the publishers, editors and correspondents of this country, and that it would go far to meet the legitimate interest of the media representatives in the subject under discussion. Reports from the Embassy in Washington are that the United States delegation is to be built up on these lines, with prominence being given to representatives of the media rather than to government participation.

The disadvantages of a delegation of this kind seem to be three-fold. In the first place, the task of selection is undoubtedly a difficult one and there will inevitably be complaints from groups and individuals wishing to be included. Secondly, it is unlikely that the results of the Conference will justify the expenditure of a great deal of time and money. Finally, a delegation, the majority of whose members will be wholly inexperienced in the temper of present-day international discussions, may come away from the proposed Conference with a feeling that all international discussions are a waste of time.

The alternative to a delegation consisting in the majority of acknowledged leaders in the press, radio and film field of Canada would be an inter-government representation confined to the C.B.C., the National Film Board and the advisory level, and is worthy of exploration. It would presumably take the form of a much smaller delegation headed possibly by our Minister in Switzerland, with two representatives from the press of Canada and representatives of the C.B.C. and the National Film Board.

When a decision is reached in principle as to the character of the delegation, the question of its composition can then be examined.<sup>81</sup>

CONFERENCE ON FREEDOM OF INFORMATION AND OF THE PRESS; CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

The Cabinet at the meeting of February 6th, 1948 agreed that the Canadian delegation to the Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press should be of a representative character, including members from outside the government service; a recommendation would be submitted accordingly by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.<sup>82</sup> The following names have now been submitted for consideration as members of the Canadian delegation:<sup>83</sup>

Montreal, June 21, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I have gone through the Final Act of the Geneva Conference on Freedom of Information.<sup>84</sup> It contains five Resolutions which remit matters to the existing Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information. The last one, No. 39 recommends to the Economic and Social Council that the Sub-Commission's life should be extended for three years and that it should be given funds with which to set up a full-time staff within the U.N. Secretariat. There are one or two considerations I would like to suggest to you.

Chief among these are the problems of Sub-Commission personnel and the expense of the proposal. I do not think it would be prudent for the Canadian delegation to the Economic and Social Council to accept these Geneva recommendations without a good deal of critical examination. What is being suggested is virtually a permanent, substantial addition to the U.N. budget, and it would be well to inquire what the cost would be, what the members' nations would get for their money, and whether the Sub-Commission as it is now set up is the best possible vehicle to entrust with the proposed expenditure of funds.

First as to personnel. The Sub-Commission was on the whole fortunate in its original membership in that it contained a good number of members actively engaged professionally in the field of communications, or who were serious students of the information agencies. It weakened itself, however, by its own policy of accepting alternates and giving them full voting powers. The Economic and Social Council might therefore usefully compare the original membership with the membership which actually did the work. If the Sub-Commission's life is to be extended, the Council might seriously question the existing practice of alternates. By way of example, it might be pointed out that the original delegate from the United Kingdom never showed up and, so far as I can tell, does not propose to. This is Mr. R.J. Cruikshank, a top-flight British journalist. His place was taken by Mr. Archie Mackenzie, who did an excellent job but never was, and never will be, a professional worker in the field which the Sub-Commission is supposed to be expert in. The Czech representative was Mr. Lev Sychrava, now in "retirement" following the Communist coup d'état last February. Who will take his place? The Panamanian delegate never appeared at the Sub-Commission's first session and an alternate turned up at the second. He was a decent chap, Senor Iluica by name, who was a lawyer with apparently some political columning to his credit. He contributed nothing and eventually disappeared before the meeting was ended. The Philippine delegate, Senor Lopez, performed useful work at the first session, was sent to Manila by his Government before the second was half over, and was replaced by a character who was by profession a judge and contributed nothing but confusion. The original Uruguayan delegate, though not outstanding, knew about radio (which nobody else did). He did not appear at the second session and was replaced by a good liberal-minded lawyer who voted right (from my point of view) but was handicapped by lack of knowledge.

There is nothing I know of to prevent the Sub-Commission's quality deteriorating still further. If it is to become more expensive and have quasi-permanent form, its composition can stand looking into rather closely.

Our delegate's attention might be called to Resolutions Nos. 3, 6, 24, 36 and 39 of the Conference Final Act, all of which load duties upon the Sub-Commission. I think it would be valuable if the Economic and Social Council studied these resolutions all together, and, if the decision is made to keep the Sub-Commission in being, to consolidate them into a much shorter working agenda.

Some of the resolutions contain quite useful suggestions. It might be possible for instance for the Sub-Commission to draw up an international code of honor and recommend the composition of an International Court of Honor. It might be possible to draw up a definition of what news personnel could qualify as a foreign correspondent and also define what facilities he might have and what conduct he should be expected to maintain himself. It might be possible also to study the creation of government and semi-government information agencies.

It is when Resolution No. 39 is studied that I take alarm. This opens the door wide to a prolonged free-for-all between East and West and I doubt very much if it will serve any other very useful purpose. The different sections of this Resolution are the headings of very wide subjects indeed, for instance 3 (a) 1, 2, 3 and 5; or 3 (d) 1 and 2. If these are to be retained, it seems to me that the Sub-Commission might be given some leeway to draw them together, modify their wording and discuss them in a very limited form. I don't suppose this is practical, since the Conference was an official one and the phrasing of the resolutions represent the agreement of sovereign bodies, not lightly to be disregarded. But you will observe in many of the clauses the fine hand of the Soviet propagandist, turning the handle of the door to open it his way. For instance 3 (d) 2 uses a phrase which recurs throughout the Conference recommendations:

"The promotion of the dissemination of true information to counteract Nazi, fascist or any other propaganda of aggression or of racial, national and religious discrimination."

If the Sub-Commission is to embark on discussions of Nazi or fascist propaganda, I would like to see a wording other than "any other propaganda of aggression" to enable it to discuss Communist propaganda. It is the essence of the western case that totalitarian propaganda is destructive to the cause of real freedom of information. It does not matter whether it is Nazi, fascist or Communist: a state monopoly of information is per se evil. Sooner or later this point will have to be brought out and formally endorsed.

The weakness of the West's case is the refusal to admit abuses in its own information media. This weakness was apparent in the American presentation at Geneva. The readiness of the Sub-Commission to discuss those abuses was its strength. But, in the course of its discussion, it never got down to real grips with the evils of the state monopoly though you will find a phrase or two about it in a Sub-Commission document on the general concept of free information which I made sure of getting in myself.

If I might venture a suggestion, it would be this: that the Economic and Social Council should maintain the Sub-Commission in life but only for the purpose of (a) studying the results in practice of the three draft conventions passed by the Conference and (b) dealing with the matters suggested in the Resolutions other than No. 39. If its activities were thus limited, no full-time staff and no additional funds would be needed.

If, on the other hand, the Council has to go further than this — that is to say, if it has to embark on Resolution No. 39 (and as this was sponsored by the United States, I fancy this is inevitable), the Canadian line might be that the Sub-Commission's terms of reference be sharply restricted and the scope of No. 39 cut down. To do a good job on these present, sweeping terms would require a vast staff. How, for instance, could the Sub-Commission study the adequacy of news available to the various peoples of the world, 3 (a) 2 and 3, without combing over the whole performance for a period of three or six months? The Chicago Commission, with a lot of money to spend, set out to study the coverage by the American Press of the San Francisco conference, — a relatively small job. This project, I hear, has bogged down. It was found to be too difficult.

Yet, if the staff were not vast and the funds illimitable, it would be grossly unfair for the Sub-Commission to pass interim judgments which might receive publicity.

In other respects Resolution No. 39 directs the Sub-Commission to studies which it has already made as competently as it ever will. A friend who was at Geneva has written to me, as a matter of fact, to say that Geneva produced no issue which had not been already discussed at length at Lake Success. The Sub-Commission has, I think, done its most useful job. It would spend much time beating over old straw. You will discover, in our second report which contains a statement on the general concept of freedom of information, that we offered it as an "interim" statement. But nothing will ever be done that will be much better. For that reason, it might be as well to pitch in on the line that a start in international co-operation has been achieved at Geneva and that what is important is to study the effect of the conventions drafted there.

There is incidentally no particular reason — unless they are constitutional — why Canada should not accept the three draft conventions, with the reservations wisely suggested by our own delegation to the Conference.

Yours sincerely,
G.V. FERGUSON

Memorandum from Information Division to Head, Information Division

Ottawa, June 24, 1948

Mr. Ferguson's letter to the Under-Secretary raises important points regarding the U.N. Sub-Commission on Information which should be most carefully considered by the Canadian delegation to the Economic and Social Council.

1. Sub-Commission Personnel. The wide field opened to the Sub-Commission under the Geneva Conference decisions and the highly technical nature of the problems make it essential that the Sub-Commission should be composed of members with professional experience in information. Alternates, if permitted, should also be of expert standing.

2. When the United States proposal to continue the Sub-Commission for three years came before the Fourth Committee, France proposed that five permanent experts should be added to the Sub-Commission and the Sub-Commission would then be known as the International Council of Information. The United States declined to accept the French proposal on the ground that it would introduce a new type of organism — namely the permanent expert — into the United Nations. The U.S.S.R. delegate also proposed that the life of the Sub-Commission should be extended to two rather than to three years. Both the French and the U.S.S.R. proposals were lost in Committee.

3. Task of Sub-Commission: Resolution No. 39 (to which Mr. Ferguson takes exception) was submitted by the United States delegation. In its report on the Geneva Conference, the United States delegation makes this reference to the resolution:

The United States delegation also sponsored a resolution, which was adopted by a large majority, recommending the continuation with expanded but carefully guarded terms of reference of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press in order that there would be continuing machinery at work in this complex field (Resolution 39 of the Final Act); a world focal point is needed if the impressive start made by the Geneva Conference is to be carried forward. At the same time, the Delegation insisted that no continuing governmental machinery, UN or otherwise, should have the authority to pass upon the accuracy of news reports or exercise control over news matters or expressions of opinion in the political field.

4. As indicating the possible attitude of the Soviet delegation in the Economic and Social Council, it may be worth noting that on April 8, 1948, in the Fourth Committee of the Geneva Conference, the Soviet delegate, Mr. Roschin, agreed in principle that the life of the Sub-Commission should be extended. Mr. Roschin held however that some of the functions of the Sub-Commission suggested by the United States proposal were outside the competence of the Economic and Social Council and of the United Nations itself. Thus, it was suggested in the United States proposal that the Sub-Commission should supervise the execution of provisions of international agreements but it did not belong to the United Nations to supervise the implementation of such agreements. In articles 62 to 65 of the Charter, Mr. Roschin argued, there was no mention of any supervisory function attributed to the Economic and Social Council.

5. Resolution No. 39, as Mr. Ferguson points out, does impose some rather extraordinary and ill-defined tasks on the Sub-Commission which, to carry out properly, would involve considerable expenditure. It would therefore be an act of prudence for the Canadian delegation to urge in the Economic and Social Council that in its work, Sub-Commission should give priority to the more concrete problems such as measures to facilitate the work of foreign news personnel. At the same time, in view of the attitude of the Canadian delegation at the second session of the General Assembly, in regard to incitement to new war, the question of Fascist "or other propaganda of aggression" can hardly be ignored. Indeed resolution 3 of the Geneva Conference, which was adopted unanimously, recommends that the Sub-Commission "should consider appropriate means by which means taken to give effect to the resolution may be implemented."

There may be introduced in Committee III a resolution providing for a further Conference on Freedom of Information to meet in New York at the end of March "for the sole purpose of reviewing the three draft Conventions contained in annex one of the Final Act of the first conference." The draft Conventions approved by this Conference would then be referred to participating Governments for ratification and a report would be submitted to the next session of the General Assembly for its information.

2. We are not happy at the prospect of this new conference as we feel that despite the United States idea that it should take place in one committee room and that delegations should be restricted to one delegate, one alternate and one adviser (all on a technical level) it would be difficult in practice to keep it so simple. We are now considering whether it would not be preferable to ask the Economic and Social Council to complete the examination of the draft Conventions and report back to the next General Assembly. This would involve a further delay of six months before the Convention could be submitted to Governments, but would avoid the summoning of a special conference. The United States feels that to refer the question to ECOSOC would give the Soviet further opportunity for propaganda speeches and would needlessly complicate and delay final action.

3. We should be glad of your views, especially on whether the press in Canada is likely to be critical of our non-support of another conference or of a stand in favour of referring the whole matter to ECOSOC.

4. We are repeating this telegram to London with a request for comment.

Reference your No. 467 of November 24. Conference on Freedom of Information. We share your misgivings at the prospect of a new Conference in March but have discussed this with George Ferguson in Montreal. Ferguson does not repeat not feel that there would be any strong reaction from the press in Canada on whatever action may be taken, whether for a new Conference or for reference again to ECOSOC.

2. It is Ferguson's view, however, that whatever opinion there may be in Canadian press circles on this matter would favour a new Conference on Freedom of Information which would be attended largely by working journalists. He feels that the earlier Conference, largely composed of journalists, enjoyed the confidence of the press both in Canada and in the United States, and that present United States support for a new Conference probably reflects United States press views.

3. Ferguson is, however, quite sure that this is a matter of no repeat no great interest to Canadian press circles, a view which is endorsed by Rae.

4. I am happy to leave the final decision to your judgement.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL — SEVENTH SESSION

The report of the Third Session of the Commission on Human Rights, held May 24th to June 18th, will be discussed at the Seventh Session of the Economic and Social Council. The work of the Commission at its Third Session was confined to a revision of the draft International Declaration of Human Rights. The draft International Covenant on Human Rights, which will be a binding document when accepted, had been considered in detail by a drafting committee of the Human Rights Commission, and the Commission did not have time to consider it further.

In Canada, the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms discussed the unrevised declaration and considered briefs presented by various Canadian organizations. In its report to Parliament on June 25th, the Committee made general recommendations and asked that the Government, in presenting its views to the United Nations, have in mind the views of members of the Committee as reported in the record of proceedings and evidence.

If you agree, the Canadian Delegation to the Economic and Social Council, in accordance with the report of the Parliamentary Committee, will state that the Declaration would be more effective if shorter and more direct, and will comment favourably on the draft declaration submitted by China as being of an appropriate length yet embodying all the essential principles. The delegation will support the deletion of redundant articles from the present draft. It will also support the elimination, as far as possible, of articles such as those on social security, which give a detailed definition of governmental responsibilities. The Committee feels that these articles have no place in a declaration of human rights. The Canadian Delegation will also attempt to give effect to the opinion of the Committee that the name of God should be embodied in the first article of the Declaration. It is probable that only the Declaration will be considered at the Seventh Session of the Council and the Canadian Delegation will support postponing discussions on the Covenant until it is further revised by the Commission on Human Rights.

The general instructions to the delegation will be supplemented by a detailed account of the Committee's views on each article.

Third Committee. In general debate on draft Declaration of Human Rights, Maybank<sup>85</sup> made short statement of our position today. He emphasized our endorsement of general objectives, said we would put forward detailed suggestions for revision later on, emphasized that "property and civil rights" were, in Canada, under provincial, not federal, jurisdiction, and finally deplored E.C.O.S.O.C.'s failure to examine the draft Declaration at its seventh session, adding that Committee Three will consequently have to consider the draft Declaration with more than usual care. Your telegrams Nos. 92, 98 paragraph 4,† and 109.† Declaration of Human Rights.

It is understood that the Western Powers and in particular the delegation of the United States may press for the adoption of a Declaration of Human Rights based on the draft referred by the Economic and Social Council to this session of the Assembly.

2. I have discussed this matter with the Acting Prime Minister. Although it would be difficult for us to oppose actively the adoption of a declaration strongly supported by the United States and the United Kingdom (or indeed to oppose the adoption in principle of such a declaration) we would not, repeat not, wish to be responsible in any way for its adoption in its present form at this session of the General Assembly. Some of our principal objections to the present draft have been indicated in the commentary which is available to the delegation. In general, we are inclined to agree with the Parliamentary Committee that a shorter declaration along the lines of the Chinese proposal (UN document E/C.N.4/A.C.1/18)† would be preferable to the present draft.

3. A Declaration of Human Rights must be regarded either as a genuine attempt to set down the common understanding of the expression "Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms" as it appears in the Charter, or alternatively, it must be designed as an instrument of propaganda, in the present cold war between the Soviet and western worlds. The present draft seems to us to be inadequate for either purpose.

4. It is our view that you should attempt first of all to secure a complete revision of the present draft along the lines of the original proposal submitted by China in the Human Rights Commission. Such a revision would have to exclude Soviet amendments if it were to be satisfactory to the western world from a propaganda point of view. This could only be done if five or six of the principal non-Soviet delegations were immediately to meet together informally and hammer out an agreed simple Declaration and then press it through the Assembly as a statement of the creed of the western world. All attempts by Soviet States to amend it would have to be voted down. Such a Declaration might be a useful weapon in the cold war.

5. If complete redrafting does not appear practicable, we think that the principle of having a declaration might be approved by the Assembly, but that the text should be referred to a body of competent international jurists, preferably the International Law Commission, for study and report to the next session of the Assembly. You will no doubt be aware of the resolution passed recently by the Canadian Bar Association strongly favouring such a reference before any final action is taken by the Assembly.

6. If, finally, it is not possible either to redraft the present Declaration or to have it referred for further study to an expert body, it is our view that in the absence of instructions to the contrary, you should abstain from voting for the adoption of the draft in its present form, explaining that the present Declaration is so ambiguous in some of its articles as to raise genuine doubts regarding the meaning and effect of its provisions. You might also indicate that under the constitutional arrangements in Canada, as a federal state, the field of human rights is one in which the provinces of Canada are directly concerned, and that accordingly, the Canadian delegation feels particularly anxious that, even though the Declaration will not have an absolutely juridical force, its terms should not be such as to invite disputes in their interpretation.

7. Before being forced into a position where you would have to abstain, I hope you will have time to consult us and to make recommendations to us on the line which you think you should take in the light of the circumstances as you see them.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following personal for Chevrier from St. Laurent, Begins: You will have had my telegram No. 110 of October 8 containing the views of Pearson and myself on the draft Declaration of Human Rights. I regret that we did not take an earlier opportunity of commenting on this matter. However, I feel sure that you will agree that the adoption of the Declaration in its present form at this session of the Assembly might prove to be a source of embarrassment to the Government, particularly if the Canadian delegation were to take an active part in its adoption. It might, indeed, merely serve to provoke contentious even if unfair criticism of the Government. I realize that the approach indicated in our telegram under reference might place the delegation in some difficulties, especially with the United States delegation. In particular, we would not wish to be on record as opposing in principle the adoption of a declaration of human rights. We do, however, have real apprehensions concerning the adoption of a declaration in terms that may be open to criticism on juridical and political grounds and which might serve to provoke contention in the domestic as well as in the international field. I am particularly concerned about the use which could be made of text of articles 17, 18, 19 and 22 as an undertaking not to discriminate against communists because of their political views and of article 27 as obliging a state to provide higher education to everyone at the cost of the state if he cannot pay for it.

2. I therefore request that you keep in close touch with us on this matter.

Your telegram No. 110, Declaration of Human Rights.

Complete redrafting as suggested in your paragraph 4 is clearly impracticable. All principal delegations are committed to trying to put through something along the lines of the present draft declaration. The Chinese delegation have stated pub-lily that they will not put forward their short version since there is such great support for the document before the Committee.

2. It is barely possible, however, that the Committee might become so bogged down in confused and tedious debate that at a later stage it might welcome a short and simple version like the Chinese. We will not overlook this possibility and will discuss it, when the time comes, with other delegations.

3. Reference to a body of international justices, such as the International Law Commission, suggested in your paragraph 5 is a possibility if the debate continues to be unproductive.

4. As regards the final alternative — abstention — I am hopeful that we will have an opportunity to consult you before a final decision has to be taken.

5. At the present time, the Committee has done nothing more than decide to omit consideration of the preamble for the time being and to discuss Article 1. At the next meeting, on Monday, October 11th, there will probably be a vote on an amendment to Article 1 introducing the name of the deity, which we will support. This gives an indication of the slowness that characterizes the Committee's activities.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, October 28, 1948

Dear Mr. [John T.] Hackett, K.C., M.P.,

I understand that, as immediate Past President of the Canadian Bar Association and as Chairman of the Association's Committee on Legal Problems of International Organization for the Maintenance of Peace, you will be meeting in the next few days with the corresponding officers of the American Bar Association. In the circumstances, it has occurred to me that you might find it useful to be informed of the attitude which the Canadian Delegation is under instructions to adopt in Paris in respect of the draft International Declaration on Human Rights. The following is background information which I am happy to give you for your confidential use.

You may wish to know in particular that the Canadian Delegation is under special instructions to have full regard to the terms of the resolution adopted by the Canadian Bar Association at its recent meeting. The Legal Adviser of the Department was present during the discussions in Montreal, and the Delegation was fully apprised of the views of the Canadian Bar Association before leaving for Paris. Moreover, supplementary advice, almost in the terms of the resolution in question, was subsequently sent to the Delegation.

An opportunity has not yet been afforded to the Delegation to make public its view that, before final action is taken by the United Nations, the draft Declaration ought to be thoroughly examined, not only on points of substance but in all its juridical aspects. To this end, we have in mind a reference of the problem, if possible, to the International Law Commission. This body is now being set up by the General Assembly and may be expected to consult with representative Bar Associations, including the Canadian Bar Association. We would not wish to oppose in principle the adoption of an International Declaration (as distinct from a Covenant) on Human Rights. However, the meaning and effect of any such Declaration should be as clear as possible, and the draft Declaration, in this respect at least, is unacceptable.

You may have learned that the Third Committee in Paris is finding heavy going in discussing the draft Declaration clause by clause. It is conceivable, therefore, that the present discussions will be inconclusive. In any event, an opportunity would, I should think, present itself, before the conclusion of the present deliberations in Committee, to make the Canadian position clear.

It is my impression that the United States Delegation may continue to press urgently for the adoption of a Declaration at this Session of the General Assembly. Indeed, as you may be aware, the United States Delegation, through Mrs. Roosevelt, has expressed disappointment that the Third Committee has undertaken a re-examination of the draft Declaration article by article. In these circumstances, it may be difficult for us to prevent a vote on the acceptance of a draft Declaration more or less in the present form. The Canadian Delegation is aware, however, that the Government does not wish to be responsible in any way for its adoption as presently drafted. Indeed, the present intention is to abstain from voting, should the matter be pressed to this point, and to explain that the present draft is so ambiguous in some of its articles as to raise genuine doubts as to their meaning and effect.

I hope that this confidential information may be of some assistance to you during the forthcoming discussions with your United States colleagues.

With best wishes,

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Following for St. Laurent and Claxton from Pearson, Begins: Reference previous correspondence regarding our general position on Human Rights Declaration, in particular your No. 217 of November 8th<sup>86</sup> and your No. 117 of October 8th.

2. It is now evident from the debate in Committee III, and from informal conversations held by Maybank, that a proposal to refer the Declaration of Human Rights to the International Law Commission or a similar body would be overwhelmingly defeated. The only probable support for such a procedure would be, rather embarrassingly, from South Africa. Nearly all other delegations — including the United Kingdom and the United States — are anxious to get the Declaration approved by this Assembly.

3. Accordingly, I feel that it would be unwise for us to submit a formal proposal for reference to the International Law Commission and get decisively defeated. On the other hand, it is equally evident that the Declaration which will finally emerge from Committee III will contain some of the features found objectionable in the original text by the Parliamentary Committee and by the Canadian Bar Association, and which are referred to in your No. 110 and No. 117. In particular, Articles 20 to 23 inclusive are certain to contain clauses which raise questions of provincial jurisdiction in Canada.

4. Accordingly we propose to adopt the following course of action: To make a general statement regarding Articles 20 to 23 (probably within the next two or three days) emphasizing our constitutional position regarding provincial jurisdiction and our consequent inability to vote in favour of these articles. At the end of the debate in Committee III, when the examination article by article has been completed, we propose to make a further statement. This would be to the effect that we originally planned to put forward a proposal that the Declaration be referred to the International Law Commission. We would then say that from the course of debate in the Committee, and from informal conversations, it was evident that such a proposal would not be approved. Accordingly we did not wish to take up the time of the Committee by advancing a proposal certain to be defeated. We were, however, still of the opinion that the Declaration in its present form contained clauses which needed further detailed examination and, accordingly, we would abstain from voting on the Declaration as it now stood. We might also refer back to Maybank's statement of 1st October deploring the Economic and Social Council's failure to examine the Declaration at its 7th Session. Finally we might again refer to our jurisdiction problem with specific reference to Articles 20 to 23.

5. When the Declaration came before the plenary session we could again explain our abstention, in similar terms, if this appeared necessary. In this way we would have made our case clear, at each stage of discussion, and our position on the Declaration as a whole would be fully on record.

6. In view of this proposed modification in our position — i.e., not to submit a motion that the Declaration be referred to the International Law Commission — I would appreciate your passing on the substance of the above to Hackett, for his confidential information, and with particular reference to my letter to him of October 28th. Ends.

Following for Pearson from Claxton, Begins: Reference your 365 of November 9. International Draft Declaration of Human Rights.

I regret that it has not been possible to reply sooner to your message which particularly related to the discussion in Committee III on Articles 20 to 23 inclusive. Mr. St. Laurent and I felt, on further reflection, that it was desirable to consult our Cabinet colleagues on this matter particularly as these and other articles in the Declaration raise for Canada important questions of jurisdiction.

2. I note that in your statement of Monday, November 5, relating to Articles 20 to 23, you emphasized the constitutional position in Canada. It is assumed that before the end of the debate you will make it abundantly clear that the jurisdictional difficulty is applicable not (repeat not) only to these articles. You will no doubt agree that similar problems arise in respect of other articles in the Draft Declaration; for example, Articles 14 to 18 inclusive.

3. I further note that you now propose not (repeat not) to introduce a formal resolution referring the draft Declaration to the International Law Commission, but to say in the course of your remarks that this would be desirable. I quite agree with this stand. It may be possible that such a suggestion, if made during the discussions in Committee III, might plant a seed which would bear fruit and lead to this idea being taken up by other delegations. I note that you propose to speak again at the end of the debate in Committee III when the examination of the draft, article by article, has been completed.

4. As to the draft Declaration as a whole, it is our feeling that, having made sufficiently clear our position in respect of the federal-provincial problem in the field of human rights, and having also taken the position recommended by the Canadian Bar Association about the advisability of referring the whole Declaration to the International Law Commission for further study, we should, in the final vote on the Draft Declaration in Plenary meeting, abstain (repeat abstain).

5. I have delayed writing to Mr. Hackett pending receipt of your reaction to the foregoing observations. Ends.

Reference your No. 267, 18th November, Draft Declaration of Human Rights.

Paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference deals with our final vote on the Draft Declaration as a whole. As you point out, there are strong arguments in favour of our abstaining, but I wonder if our position would not be equally clear if we voted in favour of the Declaration as a whole, while making the reservations referred to in your No. 267 and in paragraph 4 of my No. 365. Whether we abstained or voted for the Declaration our reservations would be on the record in either case. Yet by abstaining we might find ourselves in a rather undesirable minority — including principally the Soviet bloc and South Africa (for different reasons). It is clear from the discussion in Committee III up to date that the great majority of other delegations wish to see the Declaration approved at this session of the Assembly, and there is every indication at present that, although almost every delegation regards the Declaration as unsatisfactory in certain features, it will be approved by a large vote.

2. I realize that I suggested that we abstain on the final vote. It was not possible at that time, however, to foresee that in abstaining we would be associated only with the minority group I have mentioned above. You may, therefore, wish to consider whether or not it would be more desirable for us to vote in favour of the Declaration, at the same time explaining our reservations. You may wish to consult the Prime Minister in this connection and possibly also the Cabinet as a whole. In any case, it now appears that Committee III will complete its discussions of the Draft Declaration during the present week and for this reason I would appreciate your comments as early as possible.

Ottawa, November 25, 1948

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Pearson from Claxton, Begins: Reference your No. 461 Draft Declaration of Human Rights.

The Cabinet yesterday had a long discussion of the attitude which should be taken on this subject. As you know, Articles 20 to 23 inclusive deal with matters which, in large part, lie within the jurisdiction of the provinces and this is also true of a good deal of the rest of the declaration. The provinces are jealous of their rights. Alleged encroachments by the federal government on the jurisdiction of the provinces were matters of major issue in the provincial elections in Ontario and Quebec this year. In the field of human rights the provinces' attitude would be quite correct. We must, therefore, make it abundantly clear in every statement that any attitude taken will not (repeat not) constitute any interference whatever with the jurisdiction of the provinces. To prevent later misrepresentation, all the sentences in such statements should be made up so as to prevent part of a sentence being taken from its context in a manner which might give some basis for a distortion of the attitude taken.

2. Quite apart from the question of provincial jurisdiction, the Cabinet holds strongly to the view that the language is sometimes so lacking in precision as to make some articles incapable of application. For example, unless Article 28 is given a very broad interpretation and application, Article No. 19, conferring the right to public employment irrespective of political creed, must be read as requiring the employment of Communists in the government service, while Article 16 would permit the unrestricted activities of sects like Jehovah's Witnesses.

3. A third objection to the declaration is based on the feeling that the cause of human freedom and happiness is not (repeat not) advanced by the adoption of resolutions which many of those voting have no intention of carrying out. Many of us believe that no (repeat no) resolutions should be adopted by the United Nations unless the nations voting for them have the serious intention of carrying them out.

4. You will appreciate that this matter is important from the point of view of further proceedings in the House of Commons. If we vote for the declaration, some private member might introduce a resolution incorporating the text or expressing approval of the declaration which might put every Member of Parliament in the position of having to take a stand on every Article in the declaration. Many of us think that such resolutions are contrary to the whole spirit of British institutions.

5. For these reasons a large number of the Cabinet would have been disposed to have authorized you to abstain after stating our position again on the constitutional question and making a brief statement in favour of the general principles expressed in most of the articles of the Declaration. However, your cable as to the probable course of the voting led us to feel that, if it turns out as you expect, that is, if all but the Soviet bloc and South Africa vote for, and if also there is no further change in the situation which would justify a reversal in this position, you should vote for (repeat for) the declaration after making a statement along the following lines.

Statement begins:

(1) When the Declaration of Human Rights was being considered in committee, article by article, the Canadian Delegation made plain its general attitude, which was that it was in general agreement with the main principles expressed in the declaration, but that it would abstain from voting for certain articles, particularly articles 20 to 23 inclusive, because while these have aspects which can be dealt with by the federal Parliament, they also deal with matters which, under the constitution of Canada, lie within the jurisdiction of the provinces of Canada rather than of the Parliament of Canada. The Canadian Delegation now wishes to reiterate its position and make it abundantly clear that, while it is in general agreement with the principles set out in the declaration, it is not within the competence of the Parliament of Canada to take action to implement articles 20 to 23, insofar as the matters to be dealt with lie within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that its vote, which it is now going to give in favour of the declaration as a whole, must be taken as expressing agreement with the main purposes of the declaration as a statement in the most general terms of what might be desirable as long-term objectives rather than as a blueprint for an immediate legislative programme.

(2) This delegation takes the view that many of the articles contain statements of human aims and aspirations which cannot be dealt with effectively by legislation here or anywhere else, and that consequently, there is some question whether they should be the subject of declarations by deliberative or legislative bodies. Moreover, we believe that some of the articles are open to more than one interpretation. For example, Article 19 giving the right to public employment to people irrespective of political creed, is only admissible if Article 28 is interpreted and applied so as to make it clearly understood that Canada will not (repeat not) hold open all branches of its civil service to employment by individuals who belong to organizations which have as their principal object the destruction of all the free institutions which this declaration of rights is intended to preserve and extend.

(3) We believe that Canada is second to no country in the world in the freedoms enjoyed by her people — freedom of speech, freedom from want, freedom from fear and freedom of worship. We believe that, in the relations of her two main races and in her acceptance of the people of other races, Canada has a proud record. Canada's regard for human rights is not merely a matter of passing resolutions but of day-to-day practice of convictions which are held from one end of the country to the other.

(4) It has already been intimated in Committee that we had hoped that the draft declaration might have been referred for careful examination by a body of international legal experts, such as the International Law Commission, before final action by the General Assembly. We still think that this would have been a wise course.

(5) Despite these reservations, it is our belief that a vote against this declaration might be misunderstood and misrepresented. Accordingly, there being no other statement on human rights before us, we propose to vote in favour of the declaration as a whole as containing principles and aspirations which are generally desirable, but we cast this vote having made it again clear that it must not be taken as an indication that the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction over or will do anything in relation to those numerous aspects of this whole question which, under the Constitution of Canada, properly fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces of Canada. Statement ends.

6. As you will gather, we regard this as a matter of importance and difficulty and would be glad, if you have time, if you would send us a further detailed report on the general situation and the text of what you propose to say when the matter comes to a vote both in the committee and before the Assembly.

7. Further, we wonder whether it would not (repeat not) be desirable for you again to discuss privately with friendly nations the possibility of taking action to postpone consideration of this declaration by the Assembly at its present session. Apparently the declaration in its present form does not (repeat not) please anyone. We do not (repeat not) see that it would have any great political usefulness either internationally or internally in any country. Many of them must feel as we do that the language and scope of the declaration are thoroughly objectionable for numerous reasons and that the adoption of the declaration in anything like the present form may do more harm to the cause of the United Nations and of freedom than if no (repeat no) declaration were adopted at all.

8. In dealing with this you will of course feel free to use in your judgment the best means to ensure the result indicated here. However, if the resolution goes to a vote, whether you vote for it or abstain, a declaration along the lines of that stated above should be made both in committee and in the Assembly and made in a form which will prevent anyone from representing our action as an invasion of the provincial field.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Your telegram No. 294 of November 25th. Human Rights.

I have made further enquiries here and I am confident that, if we vote against the draft Declaration of Human Rights in its present form, we shall be amongst the minority, which I indicated in my telegram No. 461 of November 25th. I have also come to the conclusion that there is no possibility of persuading the Assembly to take action to postpone consideration of this declaration at its present session. We could not secure the support of either the United Kingdom or the United States for such a proposal, and without their acquiescence it would be difficult to persuade other states to agree. We have also encountered the argument that the International Law Commission, though it might appropriately consider drafting points in regard to the Declaration, could not properly decide upon the principles to which expression should be given, and even if our suggestion for referring the document to the Law Commission were accepted, the Assembly would first have to give at least provisional endorsement to the draft Declaration.

2. I have therefore prepared a redraft of the statement contained in your telegram under reference. In doing so, I have attempted to deal with our constitutional difficulties in Canada in relation to the provinces as one of a number of difficulties which have occurred to us. In dealing with the question of Federal-Provincial relations, I have tried to make the point that the Federal Government will not in any circumstances invade Provincial jurisdiction in the field but to avoid implying that in general there is nothing that the Federal Government can do, constitutionally or otherwise, about international obligations which happen to lie within the field of Provincial jurisdiction. I quite appreciate the danger of giving any impression that we are infringing or even ignoring Provincial jurisdiction in the field of Human Rights. At the same time, you will agree, I am sure, that it would be unwise to do anything to confirm the extreme view that the Federal Government can never accept any international obligation or sign any international agreement which may deal with matters which under our constitution require Provincial action for implementation.

3. My present intention is to have our representative in Committee Three abstain when the full draft Declaration of Human Rights is put to the vote and, subsequently, in plenary session, to vote for the Resolution, making a statement along the lines shown in my immediately following telegram.†

2. We agree generally with the line you propose to take. There are, however, one or two modifications we would like to suggest particularly for purposes of emphasis.

If this substitution is made the words "for example" should be inserted at the beginning of the fourth sentence of your paragraph 3.

4. Having regard to the strongly worded resolution of the Canadian Bar Association and to the text of the letter which you sent to Mr. Hackett, it might be desirable to insert after the words "preserve and extend", in your paragraph 3, the following "It had been our view that some of these difficulties might have been removed had this document been reviewed by a body of international jurists, such as the International Law Commission, before final action was taken by the General Assembly, although the general desire to expedite this important matter appears to have made such a reference impracticable."

5. In the last sentence of your paragraph 3 presumably the expression "in any country" was a typographical error and was intended to read "in our country".

6. We have thought it desirable to delete the third sentence of your paragraph 5, which refers to provincial legislation in the field of human rights. Saskatchewan has an enactment on this subject. Ends.

Following for Claxton from Pearson, Begins: Committee Three voted on the Human Rights Declaration this morning at 3:00 a.m. There were no votes against. South Africa was absent and there were seven abstentions — the Soviet bloc and Canada. There was considerable surprise at this association of Canada with the Slavs. It certainly is regrettable that it had to occur but in view of the messages from Ottawa, we felt that we had no alternative. I hope that no misunderstanding arises in Canada over the situation. We will, however, make an explanatory statement at the plenary session and as agreed, change our vote in favour of the resolution.<sup>87</sup> I don't like this procedure either, but again, there seems no alternative. PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Mr. Pearson from Mr. Claxton, Begins: Reference my message 337, December 4, Draft International Declaration of Human Rights.

2. I think that you should know that the Prime Minister received a message today from Hackett communicating the following message which he has received from Judge Ransom of the American Bar Association:

"There seems to be still a chance that the considerably changed Universal Declaration of Human Rights can be held over until April meeting of General Assembly here if any influential government urges that course to enable its lawyers and the people to see and study the document before it is promulgated. I am sure that American Lawyers will feel much more favourably disposed towards the Declaration if they feel it has not been rushed through with too much haste. The American Bar Association is making further effort for the deferring of action. Amended Declaration will evidently come to the Assembly Wednesday and a decision will be made almost immediately whether to hold it over or press for adoption by Friday night."

3. Hackett added that he would appreciate it if the Prime Minister could see fit to suggest to you to do all you can to defer adoption of the Draft Declaration until the next meeting of the General Assembly. He added also that he felt that Canadian lawyers generally would be very much disturbed if the Declaration were adopted right away, and this was the view also held by the United States legal profession.

4. I note from your 560 of December 7 that Committee III voted on the Declaration on December 7. I realize how you must have felt about Canada abstaining in company with the Soviet Bloc. I do feel, however, that this further message from Hackett underlines the importance of adopting a cautious attitude to this Declaration, and also the wisdom of including in your statement the reference to the International Law Commission, contained in paragraph 4 of my message 337. I realize at this late hour, particularly in view of the alignment revealed in Committee III, it would be impossible for you to take any other position than the one you propose to take in plenary meeting, i.e., to vote for, repeat for, the Declaration.

5. It seems to us that the only hope of preventing a vote on the Declaration this week would be for the United States delegation to propose that the Declaration be referred to the International Law Commission for polishing and that the Commission be instructed to report to the Assembly before April 1, 1949, so that the Assembly could adopt it early in April.

CONTRIBUTION OF $200,000 TO THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE UNITED NATIONS APPEAL FOR CHILDREN IN CANADA FOR THE PURCHASE IN CANADA
OF SUPPLIES REQUIRED BY THE INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND FOR THE RELIEF NEEDS OF CHILDREN IN WAR-DEVASTATED AREAS

On 11th December, 1946 the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted a Resolution on the subject of relief needs after the termination of UNRRA [United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration]. Part of this Resolution directed the Secretary-General to consider ways and means of collecting and utilizing voluntary contributions from persons and organizations throughout the world to help meet these needs. This Resolution of the General Assembly was considered by the Economic and Social Council and has resulted in the establishment by the Council of the "United Nations Appeal for Children," a world-wide campaign to secure funds to supplement government contributions to the International Children's Emergency Fund. A special office of the United Nations Secretariat has been set up to deal with the United Nations Appeal for Children and an International Advisory Committee has been established to assist in this work. A Special Committee of the Economic and Social Council has also been formed to ensure that the intentions of the Council with regard to the Appeal are carried out. Canada is represented on this Committee.

2. National Committees for the Children's Appeal have now been established in thirteen States and are about to be formed in twelve other countries. In Canada, a voluntary National Council for the Appeal has been established and a joint campaign is planned, for the month of February, with the Canadian Council for Reconstruction through UNESCO. The campaign is to be entitled "Canadian Appeal for Children." Sixty per cent of the proceeds of the campaign are to be allocated to the Canadian Council of the United Nations Appeal for Children and the remainder to the Canadian Council for Reconstruction through UNESCO.

3. A request has been received from the Chairman of the Executive Committee for U.N.A.C. in Canada, on which are represented the Canadian Congress of Labour, Trades and Labour Congress, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and the Co-operative Union of Canada, as well as a number of other important organizations, for a government contribution of $200,000 to the United Nations Appeal. Since the funds collected during the campaign by the Committee for U.N.A.C. are to be placed at the disposal of I.C.E.F. for the purchase in Canada of essential supplies to meet the needs of children in war-devastated areas, the requested grant would appear to be an extension of the policy already approved in allocating $5,000,000 to the I.C.E.F. Such a grant would seem also to correspond with the purpose for which the fund for post-UNRRA relief was established. As a government endorsement of the campaign, a grant of $200,000 to the children's campaign would undoubtedly be of considerable assistance and would serve as an encouragement to the labour, agricultural and co-operative groups which have taken primary responsibility for the Appeal in Canada.

Recommendation:

It is therefore recommended that the sum of $200,000 be granted to the Canadian National Council of the United Nations Appeal for Children on the understanding that this sum will be made available to the United Nations Children's Emergency Fund for the purchase in Canada of necessary supplies for the relief of children in war-devastated areas.

It is further recommended that an Order-in-Council be passed granting this $200,000 from funds available for post-UNRRA relief in Vote 908 of Appropriation Act. No. 5, 1947.<sup>89</sup>

CANADIAN APPEAL FOR CHILDREN — ESTABLISHMENT OF A NATIONAL SUPERVISORY COMMITTEE

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has the honour to report that the Executives of the Canadian Council for Reconstruction through UNESCO and of the United Nations Appeal for Children have requested that a National Supervisory Committee for the Canadian Appeal for Children be established, the Chairman to be nominated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

2. The Committee will be composed of representatives of Labour Organizations, of Agriculture, of Cooperatives, of Industry and of Education, and it is the wish of the two Executive Committees that these representatives be approved by the Canadian Government.

3. It will be the function of the National Supervisory Committee to ensure that all proceeds collected by the Canadian Appeal for Children are expended in accordance with the announced purpose of the Appeal, and to ensure further that all campaign expenses are warrantable and properly accounted for.

4. It is the already established intention to put sixty per cent of the total funds collected at the disposal of the International Children's Emergency Fund for the purchase in Canada of relief supplies for children in areas devastated by war. The National Supervisory Committee is to ensure that the remaining forty per cent of the funds is devoted to the purchase in Canada of educational supplies, scientific equipment, food and clothing for the reestablishment of educational facilities in war-devastated areas.

Recommendation:

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs therefore recommends that a National Supervisory Committee be established under the chairmanship of a nominee of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, composed of representatives of Labour, Agriculture, Cooperatives, Industry, and Education, to exercise general supervisory control over the campaign expenditures and the ultimate disposal of the funds collected in the present Canadian Appeal for children.<sup>90</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Following is text of letter to the Right Honourable J.G. Gardiner, from the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, Begins:

"My dear Colleague, on October 29th, 1948, Cabinet approved the representation of Canada at the fourth session of the Food and Agriculture Organization to be held in Washington, D.C., commencing November 15, 1948. As there are some aspects of the agenda which have an international political character, I venture to make the following comments.

Saudi Arabia has applied for membership in F.A.O. For general reasons it is the view of this department that this application should be supported in conformity with our general view that specialized agencies should be as representative as possible.

The Government of Israel has applied for membership, but Canada has not yet recognized the "State of Israel". It would, therefore, seem advisable that, pending further developments in the discussion of Palestine in the General Assembly, support should not repeat not be given at the Food and Agriculture Conference to the application of Israel.

The Holy See has applied for recognition as a permanent observer. There would be no objection to a request for the Holy See to have an observer. The presence of an observer does not commit the Government which he represents. It is possible, however, that there may be some objection raised to the inclusion of the word "permanent" in the designation, as it would seem to indicate that the Holy See had no intention of becoming a member at any time in the future.

It seems unlikely that a definite decision will be made at this year's session concerning a permanent site. However, we should, I think, avoid indicating any preference until further opportunity has been provided to consider the relative merits of the various proposed sites. For all practical purposes, the possible sites appear now to be limited to Washington, Rome and Copenhagen.

I understand that consideration is to be given to revising the scale of contributions in order to bring the effective levy up to the budget estimate of $5,000,000. At the present time we contribute 4.13% or $190,000 toward a total assessment of $4,600,000. This is higher than the percentage contribution which we make to other international bodies of which we are members. Our share of the budget of the United Nations is 3.2%. As the United States Congress has indicated that its present contribution of $1,250,000 is a maximum there may be an effort to increase our share to about $212,700 or 4.25%. A number of countries seem to have contributed little but token payments and it seems to me that the shares of these countries might well be increased, and pressure brought upon delinquents to pay up at once.

A satisfactory basis for contributions might be that inter se they should bear the same relationship as the contributions of the same countries to the United Nations. As all members of the United Nations are not members of F.A.O. the total of the percentages of their contributions to the United Nations might be something like 80%. In order to bring this figure up to 100% it would (on this assumption) be necessary to increase each share by 25% e.g., Canada's 3.2% share of the United Nations budget would become 4% of the F.A.O. budget.

In any revision of the scale of contributions it will, of course, be desirable to keep our share of the cost as low as is reasonably possible. In general, we have sought to relate our contributions to those of the United States. If contributions were based on national income our share would be comparatively small, as Canada's national income is only one-eighteenth of that of the United States. I am, therefore, suggesting the above as considerations which you may wish to keep in mind when such discussions are taking place. Yours sincerely. Brooke Claxton." Text ends. Message ends.

Ottawa, September 10, 1948

The United Nations Maritime Conference, held in Geneva from February 19th to March 6th, 1948 at which duly authorized representatives of the Canadian Government were in attendance, drafted a Convention of the United Nations Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization. This Convention provides for the establishment of an Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative and Advisory Organization whose principal purpose is to provide machinery for cooperation among the governments on shipping matters, encourage the removal of discriminatory and restrictive practices, and facilitate the exchange of information and consideration of merchant shipping problems. The Interdepartmental Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy has considered the terms of this Convention and has recommended that the Canadian Government accept the Convention of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization and approve its ratification.

At the Geneva Conference a Preparatory Committee consisting of representatives of twelve states was established to act as an Interim Committee until the Convention comes into effect, to arrange that the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization is brought in relation with the United Nations and to make all necessary preparations for the first meeting of the Assembly. The Preparatory Committee held its first meeting at Geneva on March 6th, 1948. Canada has been elected to the Chair for the second meeting which is to be held at Lake Success probably early in November. The Interdepartmental Committee on Merchant Shipping Policy on July 22nd, 1948, recommended that the Canadian Government formally accept the Chairmanship of the Second meeting of the Preparatory Committee and that the Canadian Delegation to this meeting should be selected from the Departments of Transport and External Affairs and the Canadian Maritime Commission.

It is therefore recommended that the Canadian Government -

(a) execute and deposit with the Secretary-General of the United Nations an instrument of acceptance of the Convention of the United Nations Maritime Consultative Organization;

(b) formally accept the Chairmanship of the second meeting of the Preparatory Committee;

(c) name Canadian delegates to the Preparatory Committee, such delegates to be selected from the Departments of Transport and External Affairs and the Canadian Maritime Commission.<sup>91</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 24, 1948

Dear Mr. Clyne,

In the place of more formal instructions to you as head of the Canadian delegation to the second meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization opening in Lake Success on November 30th, I am writing you this personal letter for your guidance.

<sup>91</sup> Approuvée par le Cabinet le 16 septembre./Approved by Cabinet, September 16.

As the Preparatory Committee is largely the delegate of the Organization itself and as its functions appear to be fairly well circumscribed, it is difficult to formulate any very detailed information, but the position of the Canadian government on some matters likely to be discussed may be stated.

The government have no additions to suggest for the conference agenda nor have they any name to submit for the post of Executive Secretary.

In drafting the agreement between the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization and the United Nations and in drafting an annex to the United Nations convention on privileges and immunities, you should be governed by the general principles which have already been followed in dealing with the other specialized agencies of the United Nations. In this connection Canada has ratified the United Nations Convention on Privileges and Immunities with the reservation that Canadian citizens employed in Canada by the United Nations would not be given tax exemption. The same reservation is made in the Privileges and Immunities Act (11 George VI, Chapter 69). This Act can be made applicable to any specialized agency of the United Nations by the passage of an order-in-council. You should therefore assume that the government would not be willing to ratify the Annex on Privileges and Immunities of a specialized agency which goes farther in its provisions than the Privileges and Immunities Act.

As regards the scale of financial contributions to the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization, you should be guided by the memorandum of the Department of Finance on the subject, copy of which is attached.†

I am informed unofficially that the Netherlands may be putting forward a candidate for the post of Executive-Secretary. The Canadian Government have no special instructions on this point and I would suggest that you use your discretion in supporting the candidate who seems most fit to hold the post. If by any chance a candidate should be put forward whose nationality makes you in any way dubious about the support that should be given him, you would be well advised to communicate with Ottawa before giving such support.

You should keep the government informed of the committee proceedings if for some reason they extend beyond the expected period of a few days, and you should seek direction from the government on any important question of policy which is raised unexpectedly. For this purpose, communications should be addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and may be transmitted over the facilities of the Consul General in New York.

This letter has been discussed with the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs who concurs in the views it contains.

Yours sincerely,

[LIONEL CHEVRIER]

Ottawa, December 15, 1948

Dear Mr. Chevrier,

I have the honour to refer to your confidential letter dated November 24th containing informal instructions to me as Head of the Canadian Delegation to the second meeting of the Preparatory Committee of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization at Lake Success on November 30th and December 1st, 1948.

I propose to describe briefly and chronologically the work of the Preparatory Committee and later to refer in some detail to the specific instructions to the Canadian delegation.

The Preparatory Committee of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization held its second session at Lake Success, New York, on November 30th and December 1st, 1948. The Preparatory Committee had been appointed by the United Nations Maritime Conference which had met in Geneva in February, 1948. All members of the Preparatory Committee were represented at Lake Success. The member nations were:

Argentina	Belgium	France	India	Norway	United Kingdom
Australia	Canada	Greece	Netherlands	Sweden	United States

There was a total of 36 delegates and technical advisers present at the meeting. Also present were two representatives of the United Nations Secretariat. The Canadian Delegation consisted of myself, as head of the delegation, Mr. L.C. Audette, Commissioner, Canadian Maritime Commission, delegate and alternate head of the delegation, Mr. Norman Wilson, Department of Transport, delegate and Mr. S.P. Wheelock, Department of External Affairs, secretary of the delegation.

Before the formal meeting of the second session was convened, the Canadian Delegation held informal meetings with Mr. B. Lukac, who had been acting as Executive Secretary to the Preparatory Committee, and also with the Assistant Secretary General of the United Nations, who was responsible for providing the facilities of the United Nations at Lake Success for the use of the Committee. In addition, the Canadian Delegation held informal preparatory discussions with the Delegations of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, the Netherlands and Norway.

The meeting itself was characterized by informality, co-operation and the will on all sides to proceed with efficiency and despatch. The Preparatory Committee was able, in the short space of a day and a half, to discharge all the obligations which had been laid upon it by the Geneva meeting and to deal with every item on its proposed agenda and one or two additional matters as well.

Canada had been appointed to the Chairmanship of the Preparatory Committee and therefore, as senior Canadian delegate, I took the Chair at the beginning of the session and presided throughout. The Committee was greatly assisted in its work by Mr. B. Lukac, who had acted as its Executive Secretary in the interval since the Geneva meeting.

The Preparatory Committee, as its name implies, was mainly concerned with making arrangements for the first meeting of the Assembly of IMCO, and with suggesting agenda, rules of procedure, a budget and a scale of contributions thereto, and the preparation of agreements relating IMCO to the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies, so that the first Assembly would have concrete suggestions to which to turn its attention. The Preparatory Committee also was charged with the duty of making arrangements to carry out its own activities in the period which must elapse between now and the date when the first meeting of the Assembly can be called.

In general, the preparation of draft documents for the use of the Assembly followed lines already made familiar by the preparatory work of other Specialized Agencies of the United Nations. It is at present envisaged that IMCO will not be a large organization in terms of secretariat and staff, and every effort was made to ensure that the proposed arrangements would be as simple, as informal and as inexpensive as possible.

A draft agenda was adopted for the use of the first meeting of the IMCO Assembly (Appendix I). There was considerable discussion with regard to the draft agenda. It includes twenty-one items which were discussed one by one. Furthermore, it was understood that if any nation wished to add to the proposed draft agenda it should communicate additional items to the Executive Secretary. The Chairman was empowered to call another meeting of the Preparatory Committee if in his opinion such suggestions required consideration by the Committee as a whole.

Draft rules of procedure (Appendix II) were prepared overnight by a sub-committee composed of Mr. Fruen of the Netherlands, Mr. Peachey of Australia, a member of the French delegation and Mr. Davis of the U.N. Secretariat, and were approved. A draft agreement between IMCO and the United Nations (Appendix III) was approved for consideration by the first meeting of the IMCO Assembly. A draft agreement with the International Labour Organization (Appendix IV) was placed before the Committee and it was decided that such agreements were beyond the terms of reference of the Preparatory Committee and should be held over until the permanent organization was established. It was agreed that the Committee's secretariat should draft financial and staff regulations, following the standard pattern about to be established by the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies, and submit these draft regulations in writing to members of the Preparatory Committee.

The Preparatory Committee adopted a budget (Appendix V) for submission to the organization. The Draft Budget suggested that the annual cost should not exceed £20,000. This sum makes provision for a Secretary-General and a Secretary of the Maritime Safety Committee, each to have a deputy and adequate clerical and secretarial assistance. Provision was also made for rental of premises and expenses incidental to the running of an office, together with travelling expenses and those of translation. A reserve was included for contingencies.

The Preparatory Committee agreed to the adoption of the proposal made by the Netherlands Delegation (Appendix VI) suggesting to the first Assembly that contributions by members should be on an equal basis. This decision was reached in view of the small total of the budget and the extreme difficulty of establishing criteria of interest and ability to pay in relation to maritime matters. The scale of contributions was one of the few items on the agenda which could not be agreed to unanimously. It was adopted by 8 votes for, with 2 (India and Australia) against, and 2 abstentions (Canada and Argentina). The Committee agreed further that, if, in the opinion of the Assembly, certain nations should not, on the basis of equity, be required to make an equal contribution, such nations should be allowed to contribute one-half of what would otherwise have been an equal contribution, the deficiency to be made up by other contributing members.

The Preparatory Committee adopted a draft resolution submitted by the Netherlands delegation (Appendix VII) requesting the Executive Secretary to invite the Governments whose delegates had signed the Convention of IMCO, and other interested Governments, to take such steps as might be necessary to become parties to the Convention as soon as possible. Norway and Sweden abstained from voting on this resolution. Norway expressed the opinion that such an invitation would not come with good grace from a Committee of twelve members, only one of whom had, as yet, taken the necessary action.

At this point in the proceedings, the delegates reviewed the status of the IMCO Convention vis-à-vis their respective Governments. Canada was the only signatory to the Convention which so far has accepted it. Other countries which indicated that early acceptance might be expected were France, Greece, Netherlands, United Kingdom and United States. Other members of the Preparatory Committee were not prepared to commit their Governments at this time, although subsequently the Norwegian and Swedish representatives advised me in confidence that their governments would be likely to accept the Convention.

The Committee made arrangements for secretarial assistance, for its own budget and also to obtain from the United Nations, a loan to finance its expenses on a reimbursable basis (Appendix VIII). It agreed that this loan should not exceed in total $50,000. Mr. Lukac was requested to continue as Executive Secretary of the Preparatory Committee until the first meeting of the Assembly.

The Committee considered the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies of the United Nations and the annex to the special Convention dealing with this subject. United Nations Secretariat was good enough to circulate a copy of the annex to the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies of the United Nations relating to the World Health Organization and to the International Civil Aviation Organization. (Appendix IX). The United Kingdom delegation submitted a draft annex to the special Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies of the United Nations which was adopted by the Committee. (Appendix X).

The Chairman was authorized to convene the first session of the Assembly of IMCO within three months from the date on which the Convention of the organization comes into force. It was not envisaged that any meeting of the Preparatory Committee would be necessary until immediately prior to the first meeting of the Assembly. If, however, matters of sufficient importance should arise, it would be in the Chairman's discretion to call another meeting of the Preparatory Committee earlier than that date.

Dealing now with the instructions given to the Canadian Delegation, I might make the following observations:

During the discussion of the Annex to the United Nations Convention on Privileges and Immunities (Appendix X), the Canadian Delegate made it quite clear that Canada's acceptance of the Annex and of the Convention on Privileges and Immunities would be subject to the reservation that exemption from taxation imposed by any law in Canada on salaries and emoluments should not extend to a Canadian citizen residing or ordinarily resident in Canada.

The discussions of a scale of contributions by members to the budget of the organization placed the Canadian Delegation in a somewhat difficult position. The Netherlands Delegation first proposed that the budget should be shared equally by all members. This was strongly supported by the British and the French. Australia and India voiced some objections to this suggestion and after discussion, the Netherlands proposal was modified by the addition of a provision that if, in the opinion of the Assembly, certain nations should not in equity be required to make an equal contribution, they might be allowed to contribute one-half of what would otherwise have been an equal contribution, any deficiency being made up by the other contributing members.

Considering that the budget is only in the neighbourhood of £20,000 and considering that the number of members must be at least 21 and may well be 40 or more, Canada's share might vary between a maximum of five per cent and a minimum of two and one-half per cent. In actual figures, the Canadian contribution may vary between $2,000 and $4,000. The amount of money involved led the delegation to believe that it would be unwise to stress its objection; furthermore, if the number of nations participating in the organization exceeded 25 or 30, the Canadian position would probably be improved by the equal division of costs. It was, moreover, understood that this was a mere proposal for the budget, and referred to the first two years of the organization's existence only. The whole budgetary position would have to be debated on the floor of the Assembly at its first meeting. Even if this budget were accepted for the first two years the organization would review the situation at the end of that time and after all the facts were known. In view of all the above considerations, the Canadian Delegation did not vote against this proposal, but did abstain in view of the instructions it had received.

The position of the Netherlands, strongly supported by the United Kingdom and France, was that the difficulties of working out a scale of contributions based on criteria of interest and ability to pay were so formidable and the contributions relatively so small that common sense dictated this course of action. The Indian member believed that matters of principle were involved and said that he could not agree to abrogate these principles in the face of an argument based on practicality. The United States representatives were prepared to go along, although they had obviously come prepared to accept criteria which would have involved the United States in a much higher proportional share of the expense. Australia voted against the Netherlands proposal on the grounds that it imposed a disproportionate share of the expenses on the smaller nations. The Argentine delegation abstained from voting without comment.

At the conclusion of the meeting of the Preparatory Committee the delegates of all nations present expressed satisfaction with the work which the Committee had been able to accomplish.

SIXTH PART OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE PREPARATORY COMMISSION, INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION MEETING IN GENEVA BEGINNING MAY 4TH

At the request of the Deputy Minister of Mines and Resources, who wished this Department to provide the delegate to the next session of PCIRO, we have asked Mr. Wilgress in Berne whether he would be able to undertake this duty. Mr. Wilgress has now replied that he would be glad to represent Canada at the forthcoming session. The Department of Mines and Resources is providing an adviser for Mr. Wilgress from its Immigration staff in Germany.

It is therefore recommended to your consideration that the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming session consist of Mr. D. Wilgress with Mr. J.D. McFarlane<sup>92</sup> as adviser.

District Superintendent (Eastern District), Immigration Branch, Department of Mines and Resources.

This is perhaps an opportune occasion to consider whether Canadian delegations to routine and recurring conferences of this nature need to be referred invariably to Cabinet for approval. I am attaching a copy of a memorandum which I sent to the Secretary to the Cabinet last April in which he concurred. It was our understanding that Canadian delegations to important international conferences should be approved by Cabinet. Since between now and the end of this year Canada is to be represented at some forty or forty-five international conferences, it is suggested that for the relatively unimportant meetings the recommendation of the Minister of the Department concerned together with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs would provide adequate authority. I shall, of course, refer all recommendations concerning Canadian participation in international conferences to you for approval and if it is your wish I shall also indicate whether it seems appropriate to refer the particular delegation for Cabinet approval.

I recommend therefore that for the forthcoming session of PCIRO beginning in Geneva on May 4th you concur in the recommendation of the Department of Mines and Resources and that this matter be not referred but be simply reported to Cabinet.<sup>93</sup>

INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION — POLICY DECISIONS AT FORTHCOMING SESSION

General Pope has informed us (despatch No. 507, attached)† that at the forthcoming IRO session, the United Kingdom representative will urge:

a) support for a policy aimed at removing from care and maintenance into work in Germany as many Displaced Persons as possible, since resettlement in Germany is the most practicable solution in the near future for the majority of these Displaced Persons;

b) closing down on acceptance of further admission of D. P.'s into camps;

c) that able-bodied D. P.'s who refuse reasonable offers of work in Germany be removed from care and maintenance in camps.

This proposal will probably be strongly resisted by France, Belgium and the Netherlands who will not favour a more or less compulsory addition (of roughly

Agreed. St. L.[aurent]

270,000 workers) to the temporary or permanent German working population. It will probably be supported by the United States, Australia and New Zealand who are likely to agree that repatriation and overseas settlement will prove an inadequate solution to the problem within a reasonable time.

The Department of Mines and Resources has been consulted. The Director of Immigration supports the British proposal provided that this policy is supported by the United States representative who may feel that such a policy may have an adverse effect on the willingness of the United States Congress to accept a fair share of the D. P.'s.

General Pope has further informed us (telegram No. 120 attached)† that the United States will urge PCIRO to put under its protection the recent and continuing flow of Czech refugees of whom 8,000 have already arrived in the United States Zone, and 200 more are arriving daily. The United Kingdom will probably oppose this reversal of the policy adopted at the last session to accept no more refugees into the camps after February 1st. The United States representative will likely argue that the Western Powers are morally and politically bound to afford Czech refugees all possible assistance and that the freeze order and date-line of February 1st makes provision for "hardship cases".

Recommendation

The attached draft telegram† to Mr. Wilgress who will represent Canada instructs him to support the British proposal that PCIRO effect establishment of all possible D. P.'s in Germany; and to support the American proposal that PCIRO care and maintenance be extended to Czech refugees.<sup>94</sup>

The Director of Immigration concurs in this draft and subject to the approval of his Minister this telegram will be despatched if you approve.

I agree with your comments on a memorandum which I sent you concerning our possible election to the Executive Committee of the International Refugee Organization that we should not take on any more than our share of these duties. I think, however, that there are special reasons which make it desirable for us not to refuse membership on this particular Executive Committee if we are elected. We are one of the largest contributors to I.R.O. and we will be one of the most important countries on the receiving end of refugees. From both points of view, therefore, it is desirable, I think, that we should share in the control over the Organization. Otherwise we might be asked to do things which would create embarrassment for the Government here. The fact that we now have an office in Geneva and that Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Renaud are both at Berne should make it not too difficult to undertake these duties if they come our way.<sup>96</sup>

My dear Colleague:

A meeting of the International Telegraph Consultative Committee (C.C.I.T.) is scheduled to convene at Brussels, Belgium, on Tuesday, the 11th of May next.

It has not been our policy to send representatives to meetings of this Committee, but it is considered necessary that Canada should be represented at the forthcoming meeting for the following reasons:

(a) Many matters pertaining to International Telecommunications of vital importance to Canadian Carriers will be discussed, and the conclusions arrived at will form the basis for discussion with respect to such matters at the next International Telegraph Conference which is scheduled to convene in Paris on May 2nd, 1949.

(b) The American delegates to the Telecommunications Conference in Atlantic City last summer officially expressed the hope that the United States of America would sign the next Telegraph Regulations, in which case it would be expedient for Canada to do likewise.

(c) The United States is sending a strong official delegation to the C.C.I.T. meeting, and they will be supported by representatives of the American Telecommunication Companies, who are experts in their respective fields of telecommunication.

(d) The Canadian Telecommunication Companies are unanimous in their demands that Canada should be officially represented at the C.C.I.T. meeting, and that they should be permitted to attend in the capacity of advisors.

I propose, therefore, to notify the International Bureau at Berne, and at their request, the Department of Posts and Telegraphs, Belgium, that my Deputy Minister, Mr. C.P. Edwards, head the Canadian Delegation. He will be accompanied by Mr. W.E. Connelly, Superintendent of Radio, and a traffic expert of each of the Canadian Telecommunication Companies; Canadian Marconi Company, Canadian Pacific Telegraphs, and Canadian National Telegraphs.<sup>97</sup>

Ottawa, October 7, 1948

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE HIGH FREQUENCY BROADCASTING CONFERENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS UNION

At the Plenipotentiary Telecommunications Conference held in Atlantic City in 1947, plans were made to convene a High Frequency Broadcasting Conference in Mexico City on October 22nd, 1948. This Conference will prepare a high frequency assignment plan which will allot to all the Member States of ITU the short-wave frequencies over which they may broadcast.

The Atlantic City High Frequency Broadcasting Conference appointed a Planning Committee of five countries, namely, India, Mexico, the United Kingdom, the U.S.A. and USSR, to meet in Geneva from March 22nd to May 22nd, 1948, and later in Mexico City on October 1st with the following terms of reference: "to prepare a draft high frequency assignment plan and to suggest the most effective means of implementing it." The Planning Committee of the High Frequency Broadcasting Conference has issued a report containing the results of this Geneva session, but while it has produced a sample plan and certain alternative proposals by members of the committee, the committee, as a whole, has made it quite clear that neither the assignment plan nor the alternative proposals are recommended by the committee.

Two main problems exist for the Conference to solve: one, to reduce the actual requirements submitted by Member States since these requirements considerably surpass the existing facilities, i.e., frequencies, and the other, to establish a plan for allotment. This plan for allotment will have to be based upon some system of priorities, and it is there that the most controversial point of the conference will arise. At the meeting of the Planning Committee in Geneva, the USSR suggested that a plan should be adopted which would allot assignments in the following proportions: internal broadcasting, 80%-85% and international broadcasting, 15%-20%. Another proposal came from India, that a frequency assignment plan should be established on the basis of such factors as the area and population of a country and its colonies, the number of languages, both official, state or main, and the geographical position of the country.

St. Laurent concurred in a letter to Howe dated April 27†. (DEA/9083-40).

As you know, short-wave broadcasting has become one of the most effective means for the distribution of information and propaganda. Our own international service on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation presently carries out extensive broadcasting to all parts of the world, and in particular, to Western Europe. Although there will be a brisk struggle between all nations concerned for their share of frequencies, it is felt that the USSR (who can count the International Telecommunications Union amongst the very few specialized agencies to which it belongs) will endeavour to have adopted a plan which would give to the Soviet Union a preponderance of frequencies to operate into Central and Western Europe.

The decisions of the High Frequency Broadcasting Conference, as you can see, carry widespread political implications. I would accordingly recommend that Mr. T.A. Stone, Canadian Minister to Washington, serve as Chairman of the Canadian Delegation. I have consulted with Mr. Wrong on this, and he was agreed to release Mr. Stone for the duration of the Conference. I would also recommend that Mr. Cole, Chargé d'Affaires in Mexico, be added as a Delegate, Mr. Sicotte of his staff be nominated to serve as Secretary of the Delegation, and Mr. Blanchette of his staff be nominated as an Adviser. The remainder of the Delegation, as recommended by the Minister of Transport, would consist of Mr. Acton of the Department of Transport as a Delegate and Mr. Mather of the Department of Transport as an Adviser, Dr. Frigon, General Manager, C.B.C., Mr. Manson, Assistant General Manager, C.B.C., Mr. Richardson and Mr. Johnson, Radio Engineers, C.B.C., as Advisers.

If you agree with this composition of the Delegation, I would be grateful if you would sign the attached letter of credentials.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION ON THE PROVISIONAL FREQUENCY BOARD

In connection with your proposed talk with Mr. Dawson of the Department of Transport, who is to replace Mr. Coffey as Canada's representative on the Provisional Frequency Board, you asked me to outline some of the political considerations which might arise during the Conference and on which this Department might advise Mr. Dawson.

It is difficult to ascertain in advance the exact nature of any problems which may have strong political implications. You will recall Mr. Coffey ran into trouble on two points: one concerning the question of co-operation between ITU<sup>98</sup> and ICAO, on which it appeared that the latter organization were somewhat distressed at Mr. Coffey's seemingly personal animosity; the other concerning the question of the continuation of the work of the Provisional Frequency Board. You will recall Mr. Coffey tended to agree with that group (which included the USSR) who wished to disband the Board because it was not making sufficient progress. I do not believe there is likely to be any future points similar to the ITU-ICAO proposition. However, I believe we can expect, from time to time, that the Russians will make concerted attempts to disband the Board.

The PFB works within the framework, and on a general set of principles, established at the 1947 ITU Conference in Atlantic City. The specific job of the PFB is to allot individual frequencies to member states, bearing in mind these general principles. The USSR has never approved of these principles as established at Atlantic City, but rather they have favoured a system of allocation which would be made on priority of possession in 1939. In reality, this amounts to a "first come first served" theory. The world telecommunication picture has altered considerably since 1939, and any such system would certainly be to the disadvantage of those countries, such as Canada, which have expanded their facilities in the intervening years. As a result, the USSR delegates have consistently hampered and obstructed the working progress of the Board. Their disagreement with the general principles established at Atlantic City has provided a nice buffer for their actions, but I believe the real cause goes deeper, to the desire of the USSR to eventually destroy and break down all specialized agencies and committed bodies of the United Nations. Practical necessity, for the time at least, forces the USSR to remain in the ITU, so it would not be likely that they would withdraw from the organization, despite the heat of their protests.

It might be wise to remind Mr. Dawson that the Conference in Mexico City is endeavouring to make a similar attempt to allocate high frequency or shortwave broadcast bands. It would be useful for us to be able to prepare, from time to time, reports concerning general methods being adopted by the USSR delegations at both these meetings. It might be that Mr. Dawson, in addition to his technical reports to the Department of Transport, might find time occasionally to prepare a brief statement for our own Department concerning the general activities of the USSR delegation, subsequent reactions of other delegations, and the general atmosphere which was currently pervading the PFB. This would be the sort of thing that he would best discover through informal and non-committal chats with other delegations. In this way, we might be forewarned and forearmed of certain situations that are likely to arise at the Board.

Generally speaking, our political approach to the ITU has been very close to that followed by the United Kingdom and the United States, although we have of course, of necessity, always protected our own interest, from the economic point of view.

I have tentatively advised Mr. Dawson that you will see him on Wednesday, December 1st. If you would care to set a definite hour, I will see that he is available.

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THIRD SESSION OF UNESCO GENERAL CONFERENCE

At its extraordinary session on September 15th the General Conference of UNESCO decided that its Third Session would be held in Beirut commencing November 23rd. It is anticipated that the Conference will last for three and half weeks. The composition of the Canadian Delegation is now, therefore, a matter of urgency.

You may recall that on May 28th a memorandum was submitted to Mr. St. Laurent outlining the respective advantages of (a) a delegation composed entirely of government officials and (b) a composite delegation of government officials and representatives of the various co-operating bodies in Canada. Mr. St. Laurent indicated at that time that he would favour a delegation of officials, kept as small as possible, even at the cost of not being fully represented on all the sub-commissions of the Conference.

In a letter of September 16 copy of which is attached,† Claude Lewis of the Canadian Arts Council has enquired whether it is intended to select the delegation to the Third Session in consultation with the co-operating bodies. Mr. Lewis has drawn attention in his letter to Article IV, paragraph 1, which stipulates that delegates "shall be selected after consultation with the National Commission, if established, or with educational, scientific and cultural bodies." It is judged that letters similar to that from Mr. Lewis will be received from other co-operating groups in the near future.

The advantages of a delegation composed entirely of Government officials are:

(a) We would avoid the necessity of selecting representatives from among private bodies.

(b) Administrative problems would be eased.

(c) There would be no argument within the delegation on the question of a National Commission.

The selection of such a delegation would, however, cause renewed protests from the co-operating bodies in Canada.

The advantages of a composite delegation of Government officials and representatives of a co-operating body are:

(a) It would be more representative of educational, scientific and cultural life of the country.

(b) There would be less chance of protest from the co-operating bodies.

(c) Its selection would be an appropriate way of rewarding the co-operating organisations for the assistance which they have given the Department in UNESCO matters.

I should be grateful to learn whether you consider that the basis for the selection of the delegation to the Third Session should be re-examined, or whether we should proceed to select a delegation on the basis of the principles approved by Mr. St. Laurent.<sup>99</sup>

Dear Mr. Doré,

I am very grateful to learn that you have found it possible to accept my invitation to lead the Canadian Delegation to the Third Session of the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization commencing at Beirut on November 17th. Your knowledge of UNESCO activities and your experience in international conferences will be of great value to us at this conference.

The delegation to the conference is composed of officials of the Public Service and of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The principal reason which has led the Government to adopt this basis of selection is that the agenda of the conference is related to the conclusion or the continuance of existing projects. I have felt therefore that, as far as possible, those attending the conference should be familiar with the current work of UNESCO.

Three members of the delegation have had previous experience at UNESCO conferences. Dr. John E. Robbins, who as you know is Director of the Education Branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, was a member of the delegations to the Paris and Mexico City conferences. Dr. Robbins' interests are in the field of education and social sciences. Mr. A.W. Crawford, Director of Counselling and Training, Department of Veterans' Affairs, represented Canada in the Educational Sub-Commission at Mexico City. Mr. Charles Jennings, General Supervisor of Programmes of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, is a member of the UNESCO Programme Committee which is now meeting at Paris. Mr. Felix Desrochers, General Librarian of Parliament, whom I understand you know already, has not previously attended UNESCO conferences. However, his experience in the field of library work and in cultural matters generally will I am sure be very helpful to the Canadian Delegation. The Secretary of the delegation is Mr. J.C.G. Brown of the Department, who has handled UNESCO matters for more than a year.

A commentary,† containing detailed examination of the various matters which will be considered at the conference, is at present being prepared in the Department and will be ready to go with the members of the delegation proceeding to the Conference from Ottawa. I enclose a copy of a memorandum of general instructions for the guidance of the delegation.

You will note that this statement is on the whole rather critical of UNESCO, and that it indicates certain misgivings which the Canadian Government feels concerning the manner in which this organization has conducted its affairs in the past few years. I have thought that a frank indication of the general way we regard UNESCO would be helpful to you at this time.

The Government, as you know, has so far given UNESCO rather reserved support. I may say to you frankly that this reserved attitude is to be attributed mainly to the failure of UNESCO to inspire confidence in its administrative competence, and to its lack of a sense of reality in assigning priorities to its main projects.

This confidence may be won only if UNESCO were to guard against assuming responsibility for projects which more properly belong to other Agencies, and if administrative practices of the Organization were rendered more efficient. You will find that these observations of a general character will be dealt with in fuller detail in the commentary which follows.

I am sure that the Canadian Delegation, despite its small numbers, will make an effective contribution, under your leadership, to the development of the future activities of UNESCO on practical and efficient lines.

I wish you and the members of the delegation every success.

Yours sincerely,

[L.B. PEARSON]

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS

Members of the Canadian Delegation will be aware that UNESCO, since the last General Conference in Mexico City, has frequently been the object of severe and on occasion satirical criticism from a number of sources varying in their degrees of objectivity, goodwill and precise information. But even although much of the criticism directed against UNESCO has been based on prejudice and incomplete knowledge, it is undoubtedly the case that of all the Specialized Agencies UNESCO suffers from the worst press, and has succeeded least in capturing public imagination and in convincing world opinion of the validity of its objectives and effectiveness of its procedures.

2. The principal accusations against UNESCO, in which it must be confessed there is apparently some justice, are probably as follows:

a) The administration is inefficient and excessively large in proportion to the demonstrable or the projected achievements of the Organization. An examination of the budget statement for 1949 reveals an unusually high ratio of expenditure for administration and for exceptionally generous salaries and allowances.

b) The energies and resources of the organization have been dissipated in an excessive number of projects to the detriment of the educational and social reconstruction of war-devastated areas.

c) The Organization has a very ill-defined field of operations and is prone to undertake projects more appropriate to other Specialized Agencies or to existing international bodies (e.g. Copyright, Child Welfare, Implementation of U.N. Resolutions, Rylean Amazon).

d) The Organization has made excessive demands, usually through elaborate questionnaires, on the governments of its Member States for information exceedingly difficult to assemble and equally obscure in intention. Some of the information required is readily available, in a different form, in governmental publications which should be known to an alert Secretariat.

e) The Organization has so far failed to convince world opinion that its indisputably desirable objectives of international cooperation and community in the arts, the sciences, and the humanities can be achieved by its present and projected activities. A contributing factor may be that, in its public relations, the Organization has tended to ignore the history of intellectual cooperation throughout the last four centuries which could give a valid basis for the Organization's philosophic thesis. Too many both of UNESCO's advocates and critics can now see only an elaborate organization attempting to effect this cooperation by the promotion of multi-farious and unconnected projects. Public opinion has yet to be convinced that UNESCO is or could become an effective contributor to international amity.

3. If there is any substance in these and similar criticisms no doubt corrective measures can and must be taken: if such criticisms are baseless, the public relations section of UNESCO requires a thorough overhauling, since undeniably this estimate of UNESCO is widely and resolutely held.

4. The Canadian Delegation, with its restricted numbers, obviously cannot take part in the work of all the Committees and Sub-Commissions of the Third General Conference. The Head of the Delegation will therefore no doubt find it advisable to apportion responsibilities to his associates for those commissions and sub-commissions where matters of major policy and administration are under discussion, in accordance with the specialized knowledge and interests of each Canadian Delegate.

5. In general the Canadian Delegation should direct its energies and influence toward ensuring that the various projects already undertaken are being effectively carried out, without extravagance of expenditure or of administrative assistance. The Delegation should satisfy itself also that funds approved for specific projects are being wisely expended in accordance with the original intention, and that the finances of UNESCO in general are adequately safe-guarded and properly administered.

6. It is not expected that plans will be proposed at the forthcoming session for any major new ventures, and it is to be hoped that this Third Conference will devote its attention to evaluating the success of projects already in hand. The Canadian Delegation should oppose strongly any new enterprises for the coming year which are likely to make serious demands on the financial resources or to require increases in the administrative staff of the Organization. The Delegation will be aware of the widely-held misgivings that the budget of UNESCO is already considerably larger than that of the International Labour Organization, an Agency which has been able for thirty years to do extremely effective work with relatively modest financial resources.

7. The Canadian delegation may find it expedient and proper to suggest that to design new projects, desirable enough in themselves, requires no great skill or imagination: but to plan an effective programme of intellectual and social reconstruction within the limits of a modest budget and of a severely restricted administration calls for qualities of imagination, of good judgment, and of administrative expertness which UNESCO has not yet demonstrated that it fully possesses. The existing practice of creating a new and more or less elaborate section of the Secretariat for each project undertaken or contemplated suggests grave administrative inexperience and serious indifference to reasonable economy.

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE FIRST WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY
GENEVA, JUNE 24

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has the honour to report that the First World Health Assembly, to which Canada has been invited to send a delegation, will be held in Geneva beginning on June 24th next. Hitherto the World Health Organization has met in session as an Interim Commission, but since February of this year (by which time twenty-six states had become parties to the WHO Constitution), this Organization has acquired legal status as a fully constituted specialized agency of the United Nations.

2. During the course of this First World Health Assembly eighteen states will be elected to designate a representative to serve on the Executive Board. In the event that Canada is elected, the Chief Canadian delegate should be empowered to nominate the Canadian representative on the Executive Board.

3. Canada has strongly supported the World Health Organization since its inception. This Organization is one of the most effective and at the same time one of the least controversial of United Nations bodies. Since this Assembly of the World Health Organization is now to meet for the first time it has been judged proper to refer the question of Canada's participation to Cabinet for decision.

Recommendation

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs with the concurrence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare has the honour to recommend:

a) that Canada be represented at the First World Health Assembly which will open in Geneva on June 24th and that the Canadian delegation be composed as follows:

Chief delegate

Dr. G.D.W. Cameron,

Deputy Minister of Health, Department of National Health and Welfare

Delegates

Dr. G.F. Amyot,

Deputy Minister of Health, Province of British Columbia

Dr. T.C. Routley,

General Secretary, Canadian Medical Association

b) that these delegates have full powers to carry out their functions in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the World Health Organization, including authority to participate in the election of the eighteen states to serve on the Executive Board and to serve on the Executive Board should Canada be elected.<sup>100</sup>

Cross Conference. It now appears, however, that the Diplomatic Conference will not be convened until some months after the Stockholm Conference. The revision of the Geneva Conventions will be an important item on the agenda of the Stockholm Conference, and the draft Conventions which will be presented to the Diplomatic Conference may be altered materially at Stockholm.

4. It is, therefore, recommended that the decision to be represented at Stockholm by an observer only be reconsidered.

5. The attached memorandum† sets forth the various factors involved in a decision to be represented by delegates rather than by observers, and contains the following recommendations:

(a) That it be approved to send to the Stockholm Conference a three man delegation consisting of officers of this Department and of the Department of National Defence;

(b) That the delegation be instructed not to become involved in Red Cross "politics" or in any other contentious issues not directly concerned with the Geneva Conventions;

(c) That it be approved to inform the Swedish Red Cross of the composition of the delegation. (The Swedish Red Cross has asked to be informed at the earliest possible date in order to arrange hotel accommodation.)

6. If you agree with these proposals,<sup>101</sup> a memorandum for Cabinet will be prepared immediately. More detailed recommendations on the policies to be followed by the delegation could be submitted at a later date.

THE SEVENTEENTH INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS

At the invitation of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Government experts met in Geneva in April, 1947, to study the Conventions for the protection of war victims. Canadian experts participated in this Conference and draft revisions of the following Conventions were prepared:

(a) "The Convention for the Amelioration of Sick and Wounded in the Field" concluded at Geneva, 27 July, 1929.

I agree. St. L{aurent}

(b) Convention relative to Treatment of Prisoners-of-War, concluded at Geneva, 27 July, 1929.

(c) Convention (X) for the Adaptation to Maritime Warfare of the Principles of the Geneva Convention signed at the Hague, October 18, 1907.

(d) In addition, the Government experts prepared a draft text of a 4th Convention, entitled: "Convention for the Protection of Civilians in Time of War."

2. Following this conference the International Committee of the Red Cross consolidated and altered the texts prepared by the experts. It decided to bring these texts before the Seventeenth International Conference of the International Red Cross, to be held in Stockholm 20 August to 30 August, 1948. This Conference will consider these Conventions, in addition to conducting other Red Cross business.

3. The Canadian Government was invited to send a delegation of government representatives to this Conference, in order to take part in the discussion. It appeared that the texts of the Conventions, prepared by the Conference of Government experts, might be considerably altered as a result of the Stockholm conference and that the texts emanating from the Stockholm conference would probably be submitted for signature at a forthcoming diplomatic conference. It therefore seemed desirable to have Government representation at the Stockholm conference in order to prevent radical changes in the text, which would be unacceptable in the Canadian point of view. Canada accepted the invitation to send a delegation of Government representatives.

4. The delegation will consist of:

Mr. M.H. Wershof, Counsellor,

Canadian High Commissioner's Office (London); (Head of delegation)

Lt. Col. J.N.B. Crawford, RCAMC,

Department of National Defence;

Captain W.B. Armstrong,

Department of National Defence.

5. In addition, the Canadian Red Cross Society will send a delegation under the leadership of Dr. F.W. Routley.

6. No Conventions or amendments to existing Conventions will be signed at the Conference.

7. An Inter-Departmental Committee has devoted much study to the texts produced by the conference of Government experts, and to the consolidated texts produced by the International Committee of the Red Cross. As a result of this study the following observations are made:

(a) The humanitarian purpose of these conventions and the need for such conventions, both for the protection of members of the armed forces and for civilians in the time of war is well recognized. However, the conventions do not have full regard to the inhumane necessities and consequences of total war and a practical viewpoint must to some extent temper the idealism of the conventions.

(b) The conventions should contain reasonable and practical provisions in keeping with modern warfare. These provisions should be universally applicable and generally acceptable. They should set out only the minimum standard of treatment to be accorded to war victims and allow for any degree of improvement in the interests of humanity.

(c) The texts under consideration frequently employ terms which nowhere in the body of the convention are defined. For the sake of clarity, it would seem advisable to include an interpretive article which would provide adequate definition.

(d) The proposed texts frequently adopt a procedure of reference by number to various articles of the same or different conventions. Apart from being confusing, this practice is dangerous when reference is made to other conventions which may not be available to the person needing protection. This practice is therefore undesirable. The principles of each article should be clearly and simply stated and, as far as possible, each article should be self-contained.

(e) In its latest revision, the International Committee of the Red Cross has apparently acted on the assumption that an infringement of the provisions of these conventions will constitute a war crime and, moreover, that an offence against any of the provisions of the convention may be the subject of a trial during the period of hostilities. In the Committee's view, all reference to war crimes should be excluded from the humanitarian conventions and should be relegated to a separate convention on the subject of war crimes.

(f) It has been suggested that the four humanitarian conventions, mentioned in paragraph 1, might well be combined into one general humanitarian convention. In theory, this proposal seems desirable but it is possible that some nations, while willing to sign one of the conventions, would be unwilling to sign another. Canada should take the position that it would not object to the proposal for amalgamation provided that the amalgamation would not prevent those nations from signing a general convention which otherwise would sign an individual convention if they remained separate.

(g) The Geneva Convention of 1929 granted to medical personnel and chaplains attached to armies, immunity against attack and the right of repatriation if captured. The desirability of the former is clear. At the conference of Government experts it was proposed that such personnel, if captured, might be retained in such numbers as were necessary to care for fellow prisoners-of-war. This proposal seemed humane and reasonable and was supported by Canada. Since the Conference of experts, a number of criticisms of this proposal have been made, chiefly by France and Belgium, and it is very probable that this proposal will be hotly debated at Stockholm. In the Committee's view, the proposal remains humane and reasonable. Nevertheless, if the concept of protection as envisaged by the 1929 Convention is desired by a majority of the Conference, then Canadian support should be given to the incorporation of such a concept in the revised convention.

Recommendation:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs therefore recommends that the Canadian Delegation of Government Representatives to The Seventeenth International Conference of the International Red Cross be authorized to express views in accordance with the suggestions outlined in paragraph 7 if, in the opinion of the head of the delegation, it seems desirable to do so in the light of developments at the Conference. The delegation should also be instructed to confine its remarks to questions affecting the four Humanitarian Conventions described in paragraph 1.<sup>102</sup>

COMPULSORY JURISDICTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

Article 36 of the Statute of the Court provides for the acceptance by States, on a voluntary basis, of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court and that declarations made under the old Statute of the Permanent Court, which were still valid, apply to the new Court. In 1929, Canada made a declaration with five reservations. These reservations exclude disputes arising before the declaration was ratified, those which may be settled by another mode of peaceful settlement, Commonwealth disputes, disputes within the domestic jurisdiction of Canada and disputes before the Council of the League. A further reservation was added in 1939 excluding disputes arising out of World War II.

2. While there is no necessity so to do, there may be reasons of policy why Canada should make a new declaration accepting without reservation, for a period of five years and thereafter until notice of termination, the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.

3. Such a new declaration would strengthen the authority of the United Nations and would be in line with Canada's support of means of peaceful settlement of international disputes. The possible disadvantages of the elimination of all reservations are that Canada might be forced to bring before the Court a dispute which arose prior to July 28, 1930 or out of World War II or which lies within Canada's domestic jurisdiction. The disadvantages seem more apparent than real: there are no known disputes involving Canada during those periods, and paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter seems to preclude the United Nations from intervening in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state.

These recommendations were approved by Cabinet, August 11.

4. Consultation with the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the United Kingdom in 1946 and 1947 shows that they do not see that any positive advantage would be gained by making a fresh declaration.

5. Of 27 acceptances of the Compulsory Jurisdiction of the Court (16 being new acceptances) 5 only among the latter category (those of China, Denmark, Norway, the Philippines and Sweden) are without reservations.

6. Attached is a memorandum explaining this matter in detail.†

Recommendations

7. The undersigned recommends that Cabinet express its view as to the desirability of Canada making a new declaration accepting without reservation, for five years and thereafter after notice of termination, the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.

8. Should Cabinet think it undesirable to make such a declaration, Canada can rely on the declaration of 1929, with its reservations, and on its further reservation of 1939.

9. Should Cabinet think it desirable to make a new declaration, the following steps would be taken:

(a) All members of the Commonwealth (including India and Pakistan and Ireland) would be informed of Cabinet's decision;

(b) A resolution would be introduced (as was the case in 1929) in both Houses of Parliament seeking approval of a new declaration without reservation;

(c) Upon approval by the Houses of Parliament, the new declaration would be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

COMPULSORY JURISDICTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

I am disappointed to learn that Cabinet has not agreed to our making a new declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the Court without reservation.<sup>103</sup> I would suggest that we should not regard this issue as closed but should raise it again with Cabinet at an appropriate moment. Perhaps the best time would be about a month before the opening of the session of the General Assembly in Paris. The excuse would be that it would be useful for us in Paris to be in a position to urge the desirability of the United Nations making progress in the field of arbitration, conciliation and judicial settlement, even though it has not been able to make much progress in the field of political security.<sup>104</sup> Indeed, it can be argued that the realistic way of looking at the U.N. today demands that this kind of thing be done. The U.N. is without armed force to enforce its decisions. It is therefore all the more necessary for it to concentrate upon the task of trying to settle, by peaceful means, disputes between nations.

One way of strengthening this side of the work of the U.N. would be the acceptance by all Members of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court without reservation. Canada, as a demonstration of its desire to see this done, is informing the General Assembly that, at the next session of the Canadian Parliament, the Canadian Government will ask the approval of Parliament for the issuance by Canada of a new declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the Court without reservation.

I have a feeling that unless we do this soon the Australians will do it first and get the credit for it.

CIRCULAR DOCUMENT NO. A 152

Ottawa, July 27, 1948

RESTRICTED

Sir:

I refer to the nominations of candidates to the International Court of Justice made by the National Group of Canada in a letter addressed to the Secretary General of the United Nations on June 26, 1948.

2. As you will recall, the Cabinet asked Chief Justices T. Rinfret (Canada), J.C. McRuer (Ontario), T.A. Campbell (Prince Edward Island), and W.M. Martin (Saskatchewan) to constitute the National Group of Canada under Article 4 of the Statute of the Court to select candidates for the Court. Mr. John T. Hackett, K.C., M.P., President of the Canadian Bar Association, was asked to act as adviser of the Group. As a result of its deliberations on May 22 and of subsequent enquiries, the National Group nominated the following candidates:

- a) Judge John E. Read (Canada)
- b) Judge Hsu Mo (China)
- c) Judge Abdel Hamid Badawi Pasha (Egypt)

We might look at it then. L.B. P[earson]

d) Sir Benegal N. Rau (India)

Biographies of these gentlemen are attached.†

3. I shall be obliged if you will use your good offices, as occasion may arise, to promote the candidature of Judge J.E. Read. It has not been the custom of the Canadian Government either to pledge its vote in advance in elections to international office, or to seek firm commitments from other states on behalf of a Canadian candidate. You may, however, ask that sympathetic consideration be given to Judge Read's candidature, and draw attention to the special qualifications which Judge Read has for the office, and also to his distinguished record.

4. It appears to me that, on the present Court, the "main forms of civilization" and "the principal legal systems of the world" (as envisaged by Article 9 of the Statute) are not entirely represented. Indeed, from the following table it appears that Asia and Oceania are under-represented, while Europe and America are over-represented. There is also an over-representation of the civil law systems, eight judges representing the civil law, four various systems and three the common law.

	Population (in millions)	Representatives
Asia	1,105	1
America
North (2)
South (4)	253	6
Europe
North West (4)
Eastern (3)	403	7
Africa	158	1
Oceania	65	—

5. It seems to me that the contesting claims of "forms of civilization" and "legal systems" could be met in a degree if the following were elected: two common law representatives (Judge J.E. Read (Canada) and Sir Benegal N. Rau (India)), and representatives of China (Judge Hsu Mo), Africa (Judge Badawi Pasha) and of Oceania (Philippines). This would give the following results:

Asia	2
America	6
Europe	5
Africa	1
Oceania	1

There would be seven civil law representatives, four representatives of the common law, and four representatives of various other systems.

6. The Canadian government has not yet made up its mind as to which candidate it will support. It is possible that no suitable candidate from the Philippines is available. It may not be useful, either, to eliminate the two excellent judges from Eastern Europe now sitting on the Court (Judges Zorocic (Yugoslavia) and Winiarski (Poland)). It is possible that one at least of these judges should be re-elected. Again, it is possible because of the good service rendered by all the judges who will retire this year, that all should be re-elected, particularly in view of the fact that, by chance, they have been members of the court for a term of only three years. In this event, however, the possibility of coming closer to the desiderata of Article 9 of the Statute would correspondingly decrease.

7. To complete the picture you should also know that the National Group of Canada considered, on May 22, what recommendations it should make to the government (at its request) in connection with the International Law Commission. Not more than two candidates being nationals of Canada and two non-nationals could be nominated. The government decided not to nominate a Canadian to the Commission. It did nominate Professor K.H. Bailey (Solicitor-general of Australia) and Sir Mahmood Zafrullah Khan (Pakistan Foreign Minister). It has now been learned that Professor Bailey may not be available. The nomination of Sir Mahmood Zafrullah Khan ought to be well-regarded by the Muslim world.

8. I shall be obliged if you will let me know (or the delegation in Paris — the advance party of which will arrive there on September 13), what is the possibility of support by the country of your Mission.<sup>105</sup>

Cabinet have considered the situation confronting us in Europe as a result of the deadlock over Germany in the Council of Foreign Ministers last month. We shall be sending you separately an account of our conclusions as to line which we should pursue in Germany. In a wider field we feel that the time has come on the one hand to give a moral lead to the friendly countries of Western Europe and, on the other hand, to take a more active line against Communism.

Soviet Government have formed a solid block behind a line from the Baltic along the Oder, through Trieste to the Black Sea. Countries behind that line are dominated by Communists and there is no prospect in immediate future of our re-establishing normal relations with them. In Germany, France, Trieste, Italy and Greece, Soviet policy is exerting a constantly increasing pressure. Soviet policy is based on expectation of economic chaos in Western Europe and will be checked if Marshall Plan succeeds, but economic progress alone will not suffice. Indeed if we are to stem further encroachment of Soviet tide we should organise ethical and spiritual forces of Western Europe backed by the power and resources of the Commonwealth and of the Americas, thus creating a solid foundation for the defence of Western civilization in the widest sense. The countries of Western Europe already sense Communist peril and are seeking some assurance of salvation. They are likely to welcome a lead from Britain. We believe, therefore, that we should seek to form a Western democratic system comprising at any rate France, the Low Countries and Scandinavia, Portugal, Italy and Greece. When circumstances permit it could be extended to Spain and Germany. There need not be any formal alliance, although we already have an alliance with France and there might be alliances with other European countries. But there would be close consultation beginning with economic questions. Essence of the system would be an understanding backed by resources and resolution of participants bound together by common ideals.

We realise that Soviet Government would react fiercely to what they would describe as an offensive alliance directed against Soviet Union. Nevertheless we are convinced that, if we are to preserve peace and our own safety, we must mobilize moral and material force which will create confidence and energy in our friends and inspire respect and caution in others. Alternative would be to acquiesce in continued Russian infiltration and undermining of one Western country after another.

Foregoing policy would require strong political and moral leadership from Britain and assistance in building up counter attraction to tenets of Communism. This we think we could give. Material help to devastated countries will also be needed, and at present this must necessarily come from the countries of America as well as from the Commonwealth.

If this conception is to succeed we shall of course need the support of other British Commonwealth countries and of the United States. I am therefore taking the earliest possible opportunity of letting you know what is in our minds. If you have any comments my colleagues and I would welcome them. Foreign Secretary will probably ventilate the idea of a Western system in public in foreign affairs debate in Parliament later this month, and we should thereafter pursue it as occasion demands with Governments concerned.

I am attaching herewith a copy of the personal message to Mr. King from Mr. Attlee and a draft reply to it. This reply is an attempt to put into words some ideas of Mr. King conveyed to me over the telephone.

He was particularly worried about the sentence "If we are to stem further encroachment of Soviet ties, we should organize the ethical and spiritual forces of Western Europe backed by the power and resources of the Commonwealth and the Americas, thus creating a solid foundation for the advance of western civilization in the widest sense." He thought the use of the word "Commonwealth" in this connection to mean the centralizing of those powers and resources under a common direction and for a common use, a doctrine which, as you know, is anathema to him. I agree that these words are somewhat unfortunate and might lead to misunderstanding, but any danger from them is, I think, sensibly diminished by joining the Commonwealth with the Americas. If there is no greater centralization suggested for the Commonwealth than for the Americas in this context, then I suppose there is little to worry about.

I have attempted to underline this idea in the draft reply. I have also attempted to underline the idea that this western European democratic system must be backed primarily by its participants. For this purpose, I have joined one sentence from Mr. Attlee's telegram to another in the following way: "In your message you state that the United Kingdom feels that it should attempt to organize the ethical and spiritual forces of western Europe into a western European democratic system which . . . would be backed by the resources and resolution of its participants."

I would be grateful for any comments which you may care to make on the draft reply.<sup>1</sup>

I am attaching herewith a draft reply<sup>2</sup> to Mr. Attlee's message of January 14th.

A sentence of this message which, I think, might cause some misunderstanding, as you pointed out to me on the telephone, is as follows:

"If we are to stem further encroachment of Soviet ties, we should organize the ethical and spiritual forces of Western Europe backed by the power and resources of the Commonwealth and the Americas, thus creating a solid foundation for the defence of western civilization in the widest sense."

The use of the word "Commonwealth" in the above connection might be interpreted to mean the centralizing of the powers and resources referred to under a common direction and for a common use. I think, however, that the possibility of this misunderstanding is lessened somewhat by the association of the "Commonwealth" with the "Americas" in the same sentence. There could be no suggestion of centralization for the Americas and, by analogy, none should be understood for the Commonwealth. I have attempted to underline this idea in the draft reply.

I have also attempted, in this draft, to emphasize the idea that any western European democratic system must be backed by those participating in it. Mr. Attlee himself, in his message, makes that point when he refers to a backing "by the resources and resolution of its participants." In the draft reply, I have, in the third paragraph, associated that thought with the organization of the ethical and spiritual forces of western Europe which the United Kingdom proposes.

*Projet de réponse du premier ministre

Draft Reply from Prime Minister to Prime Minister of United Kingdom

[Ottawa], January 17, 1948

Your High Commissioner was good enough to leave with me, on January 14th, your very important message of that date.

I need hardly say that any lead which the United Kingdom decides to give to the friendly and free countries of western Europe in the defence of democratic and Christian civilization against totalitarian and revolutionary Communism must command the respect and the moral support of all countries which are on the right side in this vital issue. I agree, also, wholeheartedly, with your view that the approach to this problem should be positive rather than negative, by building up counter-attractions to the degrading tenets of Communism.

In your message you state that the United Kingdom feels that for this purpose it should attempt to organize the ethical and spiritual forces of western Europe into a western European democratic system which, though no formal alliance would be required, would be backed by the resources and resolution of its participants. I fully appreciate the importance and value of such a development.

The suggestion is made that these ethical and spiritual forces should also be backed by the power and resources of the Commonwealth and of the Americas. In this regard, the Commonwealth has, as you know, no more centralized control over the power and resources of its separate members than the "Americas" has over those of the countries of North and South America. The countries of the Americas, including Canada which is, as well, a nation of the Commonwealth, have, of course, their own responsibility for organizing the ethical, spiritual and possibly material forces of their people against Communist doctrines and disturbances, and would no doubt co-operate with each other and with others towards this end.

It occurs to me that a point where these activities can usefully meet is in the United Nations, where all the democratic and freedom loving states can co-ordinate their energies and policies against any subversive and destructive doctrines preached by the U.S.S.R. and its satellites. In this connection, however, I am prompted to observe that, if the United Nations is to be effectively used for this purpose, more care will have to be exercised than has been recently the case to avoid the dissipation of its strength and prestige by setting up Committees and Commissions to deal with problems which are not ripe for such treatment or which indeed should not have been submitted to the United Nations at all. With this reservation, however, I feel that the mobilization of the forces which are required to defend democratic and Christian civilization might usefully take place in the United Nations. This, of course, does not mean that I do not appreciate to the fullest extent the plans which are outlined in your message for the development, under the leadership of the United Kingdom, of a western European democratic system, backed by the resources and resolution of its European participants and bound together by common ideals which are shared, and would no doubt be upheld by many other countries outside Europe.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Ottawa, January 29, 1948

Dear Hume [Wrong],

The attached letter† is also marked top secret and personal, but this is really personal. I should tell you that, when Alec Clutterbuck left the message in question<sup>3</sup> with the Prime Minister, it did not get a very enthusiastic reception. That part of it to which the Prime Minister of course took some exception was the reference to the Western European system being "backed by the power and resources of the Commonwealth." Mr. King talked to me for some time about the matter and gave voice to many of his old suspicions. I drafted a reply for him, as he said he wished to send something to Mr. Attlee in writing. A copy of that draft is attached. I did not get very much satisfaction out of it, but you will appreciate the necessity for its somewhat tortuous reasoning and its language. However, Mr. King apparently has changed his mind, and decided to send nothing in writing, because I haven't heard anything from him about the matter. He undoubtedly has had more pressing things on his mind! In general, I should say that his anxiety about Commonwealth commitments has been overshadowed by his anxiety over United Nations and United States commitments. In fact, the latter anxiety has become so strong, and with some reason, that he is beginning to counsel close contact with the United Kingdom, notably at Lake Success, to make sure that we are not pushed too far by the United States. This, I have always been sure, was an inevitable development, but it has not proceeded to a point where the old fears do not occasionally emerge, even against the background of the newer and greater ones.

As an illustration of the above, I should mention that Clutterbuck also took up with the Prime Minister, some days ago, on the earnest instructions of Noel-Baker, the question of Canada's participation in any conciliatory machinery that might be set up to deal with the Pakistan-India dispute before the Security Council. Noel-Baker also tried to insist that I should go to Lake Success to do what I could to help in this matter. Both these suggestions met with a very chilly reception, as was bound to be the case. Mr. King's view is that, apart from his general feeling that we have been doing more than our share of United Nations work, it would be quite inappropriate for us to serve, as a Dominion, on a Committee which is investigating the affairs of two other Dominions. The fact that we have heard from Morley

Scott to the effect that the Indian Cabinet is anxious to have Canada as its representative on the Commission of Three has not altered Mr. King's view on this matter. We are to play as minor a role as possible in this affair, and, in fact, in all Security Council questions. That will be difficult, especially during February, when Andy McNaughton is in the chair.

On the general question of our role in the Security Council, we have sent a memorandum to the Cabinet,<sup>4</sup> a copy of which you will be receiving as soon as I know what their reaction is to it.

Yours sincerely,

[Ottawa], February 3, 1948

My dear Prime Minister,

CONSOLIDATION OF WESTERN EUROPE

With reference to my letters of the 14th, 22nd† and 27th January, †I have now received a telegram from Mr. Attlee saying that he and his colleagues in the Government have been very glad to know that you agree in general with our proposed policy and appreciate the reasons impelling us to this course.

In regard to the words which you questioned in Mr. Attlee's message of the 14th January ("backed by the power and resources of the Commonwealth and of the Americas"), Mr. Attlee asks me to reassure you on the point of interpretation and to confirm that these words were not intended to imply any military commitment for the countries of the Commonwealth or the Americas. He hopes he made this quite clear in his speech in the House of Commons on the 22nd January, which was intended to prove that the U.K. Government had been more than patient in their behaviour towards the Soviet Union and that it was high time that measures were taken by the U.K. to protect themselves and all those who share our spiritual values.

At the same time, Mr. Attlee points out, it is a fact that no Western European system can be solidly established and defended without U.S. military backing in the last resort, as the two last wars have demonstrated. The U.S. went some way towards recognising this when they put forward their proposals for the Four Power

Byrnes Treaty.<sup>5</sup> This project now seems unlikely to be realised, but the pressure of events may yet impel the U.S. Government to involve themselves in Western security in some other way.

Meanwhile, Mr. Attlee continues, we shall seek to bring Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg into close treaty relations with ourselves and France, and we shall press on with the task of economic rehabilitation in Europe. Our object is primarily to try to consolidate the ethical and spiritual forces inherent in Western civilisation, thereby building up for the countries of Western Europe a counter-attraction to the baleful tenets of Communism within their borders and re-creating a healthy society wherever it has been shaken or shattered by the war. If we are to succeed in this task, we shall need the sympathy and support of Canada, and especially of you yourself, and Mr. Attlee is very glad to think that he can count on this.

As you know, Mr. Marshall has given a warm welcome to our proposals. Mr. Attlee says that in a recent letter he has stated that he shares our views regarding the serious situation confronting the free countries of Western Europe and the urgency of measures to enable them to concert with one another. He believes that a closer material and spiritual link between the Western European nations will reinforce the efforts that have been made by the U.K. and the U.S. to secure a firm peace, and he wishes to see the U.S. do everything it properly can to assist European nations to bring such a project to fruition. This letter he followed up by the oral message referred to in my letter of the 27th January, to the effect that he was turning over in his mind the question of U.S. participation.

Mr. Attlee adds that the U.K. Government felt that the time had come to state frankly that the U.K. could not carry the enormous moral and material responsibility of standing alone as the guarantor of peace in Europe. Soviet reactions to the European Recovery Programme and their attitude towards every forward step on our part have shown that they preferred to risk a Western bloc rather than see U.S. generosity coming to the aid of Europe.

In conclusion Mr. Attlee says that he has been greatly encouraged by Mr. Marshall's response, and by the welcome the proposals have received both in the countries of the Commonwealth and in Western Europe itself. If the present drift is to be arrested, and the tide turned, the wholehearted backing of the Americans and of the nations of the Commonwealth will be needed, and he is most grateful to you for your assurances of Canadian sympathy and support.

Yours sincerely,

ALEC CLUTTERBUCK

Dear Mr. Pearson:

You have recently forwarded to me several papers concerning Mr. Bevin's proposal for a closer union of the Western European countries. I have now had an opportunity to discuss with Mr. Hickerson the proposals made by Mr. Bevin.

In the State Department they certainly regard the project of a closer union with warm favour. They are inclined to think, however, that a better start would have been made if Mr. Bevin had proposed something broader and more imaginative as the first step than the conclusion with the Benelux countries of treaties on the model of the Anglo-French Treaty of Dunkirk. Some in the State Department have visions of a much more extensive union, based not only on a defensive alliance, but also on a customs union, perhaps with common citizenship. Hickerson, for example, referred to Churchill's offer to France in June, 1940, as something that might be revived now in a broader setting. They do not close their minds to the possibility that the United States and Canada might be included in such a union. Hickerson even outlined a personal project or dream of his own, which included the use of the gold stocks in the United States as a grand stabilization fund of $20 billions which could be employed so as to lead to the creation of a common currency.

I am not suggesting that the President or Secretary of State would now endorse a scheme of this sort, but I gather that General Marshall would welcome even stronger proposals than those of Mr. Bevin and considers that the fears and dissensions of the Western European countries are unlikely to be overcome without a greater appeal to the imagination and hopes of the people. They are in particular critical of the suggestion that the first steps should be Dunkirk Treaties with Belgium, The Netherlands, and Luxembourg. Hickerson points out that the Treaty of Dunkirk is an alliance against the possibility of German revival as a military menace. This barely touches the central problems of Europe today. He says that what is needed is something more on the lines of the Inter-American Mutual Assistance Treaty of last year, but made tighter and stronger than that treaty. The eventual inclusion of Western Germany at least should be contemplated.

I note that in Mr. Attlee's message to Mr. King of January 27th,† General Marshall is quoted as saying that "at first glance he thought that our tactics seemed to be the easiest, i.e., a beginning by ourselves and the French with the Benelux group." This should not be interpreted as an endorsement of the plan for Dunkirk Treaties. It means that they think here that the United Kingdom, France, and the Benelux countries are the best group to start with for the creation of a Western Union. Hickerson told me that General Marshall's message to Mr. Bevin had been supplemented by a memorandum left at the Foreign Office in which some of the points that I have mentioned were included. He went on to refer to French policy as antiquated in that it was based on fear of Germany and not on fear of Russia. I did not get from him any indication of how the United States Government might participate in the plan of Western Union in the near future.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], February 10, 1948

PROPOSED CONSOLIDATION OF WESTERN EUROPE

In his address to the House at Westminster on January 22nd, Mr. Bevin announced certain United Kingdom proposals for "Western Union", the spiritual and economic consolidation, in the widest sense, of Western Europe.

2. The delay in proposing such a programme had been occasioned by the hope that four-Power agreement could be reached on the principles for the reconstruction and harmonious organization of Europe. However, Soviet reactions to the European Recovery Programme, the Cominform,<sup>6</sup> communist inspired strikes in Western Europe, etc., showed that the U.S.S.R. preferred the risk of a Western bloc to the successful execution of a recovery programme inspired and backed by the United States. As cooperation with all European countries was manifestly impossible, it was decided to go ahead with discussions with those States which were willing to cooperate.

3. The first step, as Mr. Bevin announced, was to advise the Belgian, Dutch and Luxembourg Governments of the United Kingdom's desire to discuss with them the development, with each of them, of relations on the model of the Anglo-French Treaty of Dunkirk. Italy and other European countries might later be included within this framework.

4. The French Foreign Minister had been consulted in advance and gave his enthusiastic support to this initiative and the French Government made similar approaches to the Benelux countries.

5. It is not without significance that Mr. Bevin, in the same speech, outlined United Kingdom plans for the efficient management of the Western German economy and for the organization of Bizonia. The intention is clearly to bring Germany, Western Germany at least, back into the comity of European nations when it has "worked its passage".

6. A Top Secret and Personal message from Mr. Attlee to Mr. Mackenzie King gives a clear resume of United Kingdom thinking on the problem of the consolidation of Western Europe. . . .

7. The relationship of Germany to the rest of Western Europe is obviously of cardinal importance. We have recently been given an indication of United Kingdom intentions in this regard and have been asked to take special care to safeguard the secrecy of this information. Briefly, the British aim to:

(1) Prevent a situation which would permit the control of Germany by Communists.

(2) Proceed as quickly as possible to reconstitute a stable, peaceful and democratic Germany, with Soviet cooperation if possible.

(3) Failing Soviet cooperation, to reconstruct Western Germany by extending bizonal economic administration and planning for elections and the formation by the end of 1948 of German bodies exercising most of the functions of Parliament and Government. Discussions with the United States, later France, would be carried on to this end.

(4) Institute financial reform.

(5) Raise the level of German production.

(6) Increase Western German trade with Eastern Germany and the Eastern European countries.

(7) Maintain reparations deliveries from Western Germany to the Soviet Union. (This aim is not satisfactorily explained and is the one point to which Secretary Marshall took exception when he was informed of this planning.)

(8) Maintain existing four-Power Agreements when this is practically possible.

(9) Make it clear that the dismemberment of Germany is not contemplated but at the same time to avoid dangerous political centralization.

(10) Attempt to coordinate policy as fully as possible with United States and France. A three-Power discussion is to begin on February 19th in London. The United Kingdom hopes to associate the Benelux countries with these discussions at a later stage.

8. The start on "Western Union" was made by approaches to the Benelux countries, suggesting alliances with the United Kingdom and France along the lines of the Treaty of Dunkirk. A copy of the Treaty of Dunkirk is appended.† The United Kingdom feels that the text of this Treaty would be satisfactory, subject to the following changes:

(a) In the preamble, the passage reading "while considering most desirable the conclusion of a Treaty between all the Powers having responsibility for action in relation to Germany with the object of preventing Germany from becoming again a menace to peace" would be left out as the Benelux countries do not have direct responsibility in Germany.

(b) The reference to the Anglo-Soviet Treaty would be amended; the reference to the Franco-Soviet Treaty would be omitted; a reference to the Treaty of Dunkirk would be added.

(c) In Article I, the phrases "all the Powers" and "the other Powers" would be replaced by "the Powers".

(d) In Article III, the word "other" would be omitted before "Powers" as in Article I.

9. M. Spaak, the Belgian Prime Minister, has outlined to the British and French Ambassadors the attitude which the three Benelux Foreign Ministers have decided to adopt:

(a) The Benelux countries welcome Mr. Bevin's proposals.

(b) Negotiations must be with the three Benelux Governments jointly. The Luxembourg Foreign Minister would be prepared to disregard the restrictions imposed by his country's traditional policy of neutrality if Luxembourg is associated with the other two Benelux Powers in any arrangement which may be made.

(c) The three countries consider that the Treaty of Dunkirk is no longer applicable. Its concentration on possible danger from Germany is inappropriate, particularly if Western Germany is to be included in the Western European system. The deletion of references in the Treaty of Dunkirk to Anglo-Soviet and Franco-Soviet relations would be required but it is recognized that the deletions would be too clearly invidious. M. Spaak held the view that a regional pact in accordance with Article 52 of the U.N. Charter would be the most satisfactory arrangement.

(d) A military agreement must be provided for in any eventual treaties. No territorial guarantee would be sought but there must be regular, serious joint planning.

(e) Prominent position must be given the economic side of the proposals. Talk of a customs union was perhaps premature but frequent consultation at a high level on economic problems would be desirable.

(f) If the Benelux countries were to be integrated into a Western European system, it would only be right to consult them from the outset on any developments of policy in regard to Western Germany.

10. The detailed views of the French Government on the form of agreement with the Benelux countries have not yet been received.

PROPOSED CONSOLIDATION OF WESTERN EUROPE

Since our memorandum of February 10th, 1948, was prepared there have been three main developments bearing upon Western Union:

(a) The opening, on an official level, of discussions in Brussels directly on the subject of Western Union.

(b) The London Conference on Western Germany which has recently been concluded.

(c) The Communist coup d'état in Czechoslovakia.

2. It is in connection with the Brussels talks that the proposals in the attached telegrams Q.32† and Q.33† of March 5th have been made. You will have noted that paragraphs 8 and 9 (c) of our previous memorandum indicated that there were divergent views between France and the Benelux States as to the nature of the treaty to be discussed. The French support of a Dunkirk model treaty was made necessary, it now appears, because:

(a) they had refused to negotiate with Poland and Czechoslovakia on the basis of the possibility of attack from any power other than Germany; and

(b) domestic instability made a direct affront to the communists impolitic.

3. You will note that the United Kingdom draft treaty attached† invokes section 51 of the United Nations Charter, which provides for self-defence against attack, instead of section 52, providing for regional security arrangements, as advocated by the Benelux States.

4. Our previous memorandum (paragraph 7) drew your attention to the important relationship between Western Union and a German settlement. Full official reports have not yet been received but there is every indication that a wide measure of agreement on German problems has been achieved in the London Conference, particularly in regard to the vexatious question of the control of the Ruhr. There is now some reason to believe that German problems may eventually be eliminated as obstacles to Western Union.

5. The Communist coup d'état in Czechoslovakia has had measurable effect on at least one party to the present Western Union negotiations. The French Government has expressed itself as no longer restricted by considerations of Polish and Czech sensibilities (paragraph 2(a) above). At the same time there is reason to believe that the French Government could now take a stronger line from the domestic political point of view.

6. You will see, therefore, that since our last memorandum some considerable progress has been made and a number of difficult obstacles to a Western Union agreement are in the process of being resolved.

7. The United Kingdom Treaty Text (telegram Q.33 attached)† is, of course, a working paper only and it has not yet been accepted as the basis of discussion at the Brussels Conference, nor have we any indication of the attitude of the Benelux countries to this proposed text.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; WESTERN EUROPEAN UNION;
U.S. POLICY; CANADIAN ATTITUDE

1. The Prime Minister referred to the announcement earlier in the day of the treaty of collective military aid and economic and social co-operation, signed at Brussels by the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg, also to the significant statement made at noon to the U.S. Congress by the President; in this Mr. Truman pledged U.S. support of the five power Western Union.

The President's message to the Congress had included recommendations for the early adoption of the European Recovery Programme, for the passing of universal military training legislation and for the temporary re-enactment of selective service in order to bring U.S. Armed Forces up to strength. It would be recalled that the idea of a Western Union had originated in a statement by the U.K. Foreign Secretary on January 22nd.

Canada was vitally interested in these developments and consideration should be given to the nature of a reference to be made to the Canadian attitude thereto at the opening of proceedings in the House of Commons.

2. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that a statement be made by the Prime Minister in the House, that afternoon, expressing the government's satisfaction upon signature of the Western European Union agreement, welcoming the statement of President Truman in support of the Brussels agreement and expressing the intention of Canada to participate fully in these efforts toward effective collective security by the development of regional pacts under the U.N. Charter.<sup>7</sup>

WASHINGTON EXPLORATORY TALKS ON SECURITY; MILITARY DISCUSSIONS WITH BRUSSELS POWERS

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of July 13th, reported that, as a result of the security talks in Washington, it had been decided that it would be appropriate for the Brussels Powers to invite observers from the United States and Canada to review the military position of the Western European nations, particularly in relation to equipment and rationalization of defence arrangements.

A formal invitation for Canadian military observers to attend such a meeting of the Military Committee of the Five Powers had now been received from the Brussels Treaty Permanent Commission. It was felt that, in the circumstances, Canada should be represented at these discussions.

Unfortunately, there had been a leak in London and a report of these conversations had got out. The release of an official statement on the subject in Washington was now under consideration. Meantime, it was felt that no public statement could be made in Ottawa.

(Telegram No. 1119, Canada House to External Affairs, July 15, 1948).†

8. Mr. St. Laurent added that, after discussion with the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, it had been felt that Brigadier Graham,<sup>8</sup> presently in London as Senior Liaison Officer, Canada House, and Vice-Chief of the General Staff designate, would be an appropriate Canadian representative. Brigadier Graham would be assisted as required by suitable Naval and Air Force officers.

A draft reply was read to the invitation to be represented at the forthcoming discussions.

9. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the Minister's report and agreed to Canadian representation at the London meetings of the Military Committee of the Five Powers as proposed by Mr. St. Laurent; a message to that effect to be communicated forthwith to the Brussels Treaty Commission.

ATLANTIC SECURITY AND WESTERN UNION—MILITARY CONVERSATIONS

The Chief of the General Staff reported that in July the United States and Canadian Chiefs of Staff had been invited to send representatives to attend discussions in London of the Military Staff Committee of Western Union. With the approval of the Prime Minister, Brigadier Graham, as Vice-Chief of the General Staff designate, had been nominated for this purpose and was working in close collaboration with the Canadian High Commissioner. The instructions to Brigadier Graham directed him to act as an observer, to take part in no discussions on major policy and to avoid making any commitment on behalf of Canada.

It was understood that the United States representative had been given broader terms of reference, which inferred that the United States would be prepared to consider assisting Western Union countries in their logistical problems under certain conditions.

In conjunction with the discussions in the United Kingdom, consideration was being given to the formation of a Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee as the directing military group. Brigadier Graham had learned that the U.K. Chiefs of Staff were proposing that the United States accredit a representative to this new organization but that the United Kingdom would provide the link with the "Machinery for Commonwealth Defence". This matter had been taken up by Brigadier Graham and Mr. Robertson with the Chairman of the U.K. Chiefs of Staff Committee in order to ensure that Canada's position was made clear. As a result of these representations, an undertaking had been given that the U.K. Chiefs of Staff proposals would be amended to provide for separate Canadian participation on the same basis as the United States.

It was felt that the present and developing military organization for Western Union was important inasmuch as it might well provide the pattern from which the broader organization under a North Atlantic Regional Security arrangement would develop. It was therefore particularly important that Canada's position continue to be safeguarded; for this purpose, it would be desirable for a Canadian observer to continue in attendance. It was important also to keep in touch with Western Union equipment policies, as these might affect Canadian policy. If, however, a Chiefs of Staff Committee organization were set up, it might be necessary to reconsider the character of Canadian participation. For the immediate future, it was planned to have Brigadier Clark<sup>9</sup> replace Brigadier Graham as the latter was needed here.

It was understood that the United States, in view of its possible logistical support for Western Union, was anxious to keep Canada in the discussions on a working basis. One of the reasons was that Canada still held large stocks of U.K.-type military equipment which might be released for use by Western Union countries and replaced by U.S.-type in the interests of Canada-U.S. standardization.

Brigadier-General S.F. Clark.

2. The Canadian High Commissioner to the United Kingdom pointed out that the U.S. and Canadian participation in the London military discussions had developed from the recent political talks in Washington regarding North Atlantic Security. The military talks were a counterpart of the political discussions and the pattern of Canadian participation should not be inconsistent. It was important, therefore, that Canada's representation in these military discussions should be on the same basis as that of the United States. The inference to be drawn from the instructions given to the U.S. representative was that at some stage, and under certain specified conditions, Western Union might expect assistance from the United States. Undoubtedly, also, at some time or other, the question would be asked as to the contribution which Canada would be prepared to make.

3. The Acting Prime Minister stated that his impression was that the Military Committee meeting in London was dealing with Western Union matters only and that the U.S. and Canadian officers were acting as observers. At the same time as the Western Union military discussions were taking place, consideration was being given to the broader Atlantic Regional Pact. Undoubtedly whatever military organization developed under the broader arrangement would differ in some respects from that of Western Union. Any question of a Canadian contribution should develop only by virtue of the broader defence arrangement not yet concluded.

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs observed that the original concept of the London talks had been somewhat altered. In addition to discussing long range plans for the military organization required in Western Europe, consideration was being given to military plans in the event of an immediate emergency. Canada was prepared to take a full share in any defence arrangements under an Atlantic Pact, but the situation would be somewhat different in relation to an emergency plan.

5. Mr. Robertson stated that the responsibility for emergency plans in the event of war arising from the present tense Berlin situation rested with the Military Commanders of the occupation zones in Germany. This problem had not been discussed by the Military Staff Committee, which was concerned at present with setting up the machinery for military co-operation and agreeing upon an estimate of the risks of war and of the resources available to meet it. Though this discussion concerned Western Union only at the moment, it could be anticipated that it would lead eventually to similar discussions in respect of an Atlantic Pact.

6. Mr. St. Laurent pointed out that, since operational and emergency plans were the responsibility of the occupying powers, and since Canada had no responsibility or participation in relation to occupation, it was difficult to see how Canada could participate or contribute.

7. Lieutenant-General Foulkes observed that Canadian commitments in case of an emergency were covered already in tri-partite military plans which had been prepared.

8. The Minister of National Defence pointed out that the emergency military plan had not been approved by the governments concerned; therefore it could not constitute a formal and final Canadian commitment. Undoubtedly, however, sooner or later a question would be raised as to what Canada would be prepared to contribute, both in an emergency and in eventual support of North Atlantic security arrangements.

9. Mr. Pearson observed that the situation in respect of the Berlin air-lift was critical. The question of Canada assisting had not yet been the subject of any joint request by the powers concerned. However, assistance might soon be required from all countries who were able to make a contribution. Even though Canada had no responsibilities in relation to occupation under the Potsdam Agreement and the Articles of Surrender, there could be no objection by Russia to Canada assisting other occupying powers. The Netherland countries had already done this.

10. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) noted the reports by the Chief of the General Staff and the Canadian High Commissioner to the United Kingdom concerning the London military discussions; and

(b) agreed that a Canadian military observer continue to attend; it being understood that, if a Western Union Chiefs of Staff organization were set up, the character of Canadian participation would be reconsidered.

5. The Acting Prime Minister reported that an invitation had been received from the Brussels powers for Canada to send representatives, as non-members, to the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee.

This was identical to the invitation to the United States. It was pretty certain that the U.S. government would accept both for military and political reasons. The phraseology of their reply would likely follow that of their reply to the earlier invitation to sit with the Military Committee, i.e., they would agree to "participate on a non-membership basis".

It was suggested that, if the government agreed to Canadian participation, it should be on a similar basis to that of the United States; also that, for the present, Brigadier Clark act for Canada with this Committee as well as with the Military Committee.

Presumably the Canadian reply to the invitation would be withheld until a final decision had been taken in Washington.

(External Affairs memorandum to the Acting Prime Minister, and attached papers, Oct. 26, 1948).†

6. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that, provided a favourable decision were taken by the U.S. government, a reply be made to the invitation, agreeing to Canadian participation on a non-membership basis in the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee.

Following for Reid from Robertson, Begins: I have today received a letter from the French Ambassador in London, in his capacity as Chairman of the Brussels Treaty Permanent Commission, inviting the Government of Canada to participate in the work of the Western Union Military Supply Board on the same footing as it has been invited to participate in the work of the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee. This invitation is intended to cover any Permanent Executive Committee which the Board may decide to create. M. Massigli's letter ends by stating that the same invitation is being extended to the Government of the United States.

2. You will note that although the original resolution of the Western Union Military Supply Board (Metric Document F.S.B. VII. WESTERN UNION: CANADIAN PARTICIPATION ON CHIEFS OF STAFF
COMMITTEE AND MILITARY SUPPLY BOARD

19. The Minister of National Defence, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, referred to the Cabinet decision of October 27th that Canada should formally accept the invitation from the Brussels Treaty Permanent Commission to participate in the work of the Western Union Chiefs of Staff Committee, provided a favourable decision was taken by the U.S. government.

A similar invitation had been received to participate in the work of the Western Union Military Supply Board and it had been decided in consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that Mr. A.E. Ritchie, First Secretary at Canada House, should act in a non-member capacity for the time being.

The Canadian Ambassador to the United States had recently reported that the United States had made no decision yet with respect to their representation on the committees, but that there was no doubt that they would accept. This raised the question of whether Canada should formally reply without waiting until the United States had acted. On balance, it appeared better to wait, and it was accordingly proposed to proceed on the basis of the earlier decision.

(External Affairs memorandum December 13th, 1948).†

20. The Committee, after discussion, noted with approval the arrangements reported by the Minister for Canadian participation in the work of the Military Supply Board and his proposed procedure regarding the formal acceptance of the invitations from the Brussels Treaty Permanent Commission.

TOP SECRET. PERSONAL. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Please see Canadian Prime Minister urgently and give him following message from Prime Minister, Begins: You will have seen in Mr. Noel-Baker's message of 9th March the international background against which we here are framing our policy.† Events are moving even quicker than we at first apprehended and there are grave indications from many sources that the next Russian move will be to make demands on Norway. From our latest report from our Ambassador in Oslo which Sir Alexander Clutterbuck will show you, there is reason to fear that Russia may move soon. Norwegian Government have consulted United States and ourselves as to the help that they could expect if attacked. As a first step we think that United States and United Kingdom representatives in Oslo should be instructed to infuse some courage into Norwegian Government pointing out that Turkey and Persia have successfully resisted Soviet demands and that Norway would be ill-advised to put her foot on the slippery slope by sacrificing her right to conclude pacts with whomsoever she chooses and that if she eventually requires outside support she is more likely to get it by showing resolution than by temporising. We cannot be sure however that encouragement of this kind will alone induce Norwegian Government to hold out. On the other hand we cannot at this moment afford to risk Norwegian defection which would not only involve the collapse of the whole Scandinavian system but would also prejudice our chances of calling a halt to expansion of Soviet influence over Western Europe and would in fact mean the appearance of Russia on the Atlantic.

2. In this situation only a bold move can avert the danger and the pace already set by Russia tells us that there is no time to lose.

3. The conclusion which we have reached is that the most effective course is to take very early steps to conclude under Article 51 of the Charter a regional Atlantic pact of mutual assistance in which all the countries threatened by a Russian move on the Atlantic could participate. These countries might be, besides the United States and the United Kingdom, Canada, Eire, Iceland, Norway, Denmark, France, Portugal and Spain when it again has a democratic regime.

4. As we see it if the threat is to be effectively met we must look to the creation of three systems which would bring in the many countries concerned. Firstly the United Kingdom-France-Benelux system with United States backing, secondly, a system of Atlantic security with which the United States would be even more closely concerned, and thirdly, a Mediterranean security system which would particularly affect Italy. We are pressing ahead with the first but in view of the threat to Norway the Atlantic security system is now even more important and urgent. Failure to act now may mean a repetition of our experience with Hitler and we should again have to witness the slow deterioration of our position until we were forced to resort to war in much less favourable circumstances.

5. In this grave situation I think it right to put our ideas at once before you and the United States Secretary of State. I am convinced that we should study without delay the establishment of such an Atlantic security system so that we inspire necessary confidence to consolidate the west against Soviet infiltration and at same time inspire Soviet Government with sufficient respect for the west to remove temptation from them and so ensure a long period of peace. Our idea would be that if the Canadian and United States Governments agree, officials of the three Governments should meet in Washington and very secretly explore the proposal for an Atlantic system. I hope that this will commend itself to you.

6. I am informing the Prime Ministers of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa in general terms of the situation and our views on it. Ends.

SITUATION IN EUROPE

Following is background to consideration by the Cabinet of the present situation in Europe. The expansion of Soviet influence as manifested lately by events in Czechoslovakia, pressure on Finland and Greece and internally in Italy represents an increasing threat to the countries of Western Europe and the traditions of freedom and democracy for which they stand. It has become necessary accordingly to re-examine our European policy.

We for our part have been proceeding on the basis which we have previously made clear to the Soviet Government that, just as they had built up in Eastern Europe what they called security, we intended to develop a good neighbourly policy in Western Europe not aimed against the Soviet Union, but inspired by the necessities of economic revival and of security. This was made clear in the Foreign Secretary's speech of 22nd January.

Since the European Recovery Programme was devised, the Soviet Government have been conducting a war of nerves and appear to intend to expand their influence over the whole of Europe. In other words, despite every effort on our part in the past three years to get a real and friendly settlement in Europe on a four-power basis, not only are the Soviet Government not prepared to co-operate in any real sense with any non-Communist Government, but they appear to be actually preparing to extend their influence over the whole of continental Europe and subsequently over the Middle East and no doubt the rest of the Asian land-mass. Unless positive and vigorous steps are taken shortly by other States in a position to do so, it may well be that the Soviet Union will gain political and strategic advantages which will set the great Communist machine in action culminating either in the establishment of a world dictatorship or more probably in the collapse of organised society in great stretches of the globe. We cannot be sure where the next move will be made, but all our information goes to show that further moves are to be expected in the immediate future with the object of frustrating the European Recovery Programme by one means or another and developing a situation in which Communism will succeed in many countries through economic decay.

If, however, opponents of dictatorship can present a truly united front and if the necessary economic means are made available by those who have them, the danger of war which would be liable to result from the Soviet Government overstepping the mark is not imminent. Indeed, if these two conditions are fulfilled, there is reason to hope that Communism will be forced on to the defensive and that a period of relative calm may ensue. The second condition is beyond our control and we can only do our best to assist the United States Administration with the passage of E.R.P. by warning them of dangers of delay. As regards the first condition the following are our conclusions:

(1) We should pursue on as broad a basis as possible in co-operation with France the conclusion of an economic, cultural and defensive pact between the United Kingdom, France and the Benelux countries which would be left open for accession by other democracies.

(2) Simultaneously the whole problem of co-ordination of efforts for the cultural, social, economic and financial revival and development of Western Europe should be taken urgently in hand in consultation with like minded countries in the British Commonwealth, in Western Europe and America, and eventually every country outside the Soviet group.

(3) The issue is that of Parliamentary Government and liberty or the establishment of dictatorship, and consultations should explore what organisation is necessary to prevent Soviet tactics succeeding on an even wider basis than hitherto and to halt any further expansion of Soviet dictatorship.

Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins: Your High Commissioner has shown me the very important message contained in your telegram No. 220 of March 10th regarding possible Soviet demands on Norway, and proposing, as a constructive measure against this and other such aggressive moves, the early conclusion, under Article 52 of the Charter, of a regional Atlantic pact of mutual assistance. I am deeply impressed with the gravity of these developments. Certainly everything possible should be done, and that speedily, to avoid a possible repetition of the disastrous experiences of pre-war years when peaceful states allowed themselves to become victims of aggression, one by one. Collective measures seem to me to be essential to establish some sense of security and to preserve the peace. Such collective measures will, of course, require the active leadership of the United Kingdom and of the United States. To permit of the earliest possible consideration by the Canadian Government of the proposal for an Atlantic system, I shall arrange to send one of our officials to Washington just as soon as he is required, to join officials of the United Kingdom and the United States Governments in the exploratory talks suggested.

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

Jack Hickerson and I had today one of our periodic lunches at which our talk covered a wide range. I thought part of it of sufficient interest to put into a note, and I enclose a copy of this. It deals with a number of different subjects and so will set a problem in filing. Perhaps when you have read it it would be simplest to destroy it! I hope to get some further information on the prospects here of a bold move in order to give a greater sense of security to the Western European countries. I should judge from the way Jack spoke that they have not yet decided what form this should take if the President becomes satisfied that something should be done.

I feel fairly sure that the Secretary of State, with his soldier's judgment, will support a course of boldness. He captured the initiative for this country with the Marshall Plan proposals, but events in Czechoslovakia and Finland show that the initiative has been lost, or nearly lost, in face of the Soviet counter attack, and since last June there has been a great further deterioration in the situation in China. If you have developed any ideas on what should be done and where Canada comes in, I should be very glad to have them.

Yours ever,

Mr. Hickerson and I discussed at some length today the situation in Czechoslovakia and its international consequences. He has no doubt that Masaryk committed suicide and that the cause was that he had allowed himself to get into an impossible moral position. Hickerson had the highest respect for Masaryk's intelligence but a low opinion of his courage.<sup>10</sup>

Masaryk's choice may have required the highest and harder form of courage — I don't think U.S. criticism on this score is warranted. L.B. P[earson]

He asked me what I thought about the rejection of Papanek's<sup>11</sup> appeal to the Security Council. I told him that I was dubious whether a discussion in the Security Council would do any good. He said that Lie had not followed the rules of procedure, which required him when a communication is received from a representative of a member government (which Papanek was as he had not been recalled) to circulate it to members of the Council and to consult with the President on whether it should be placed on the agenda. Lie had failed to circulate the communication, although he had consulted with the Chinese President. It was open to any member of the Council to bring the matter up and it was possible that Mr. Austin would request a discussion of the petition. He thought it might be a good idea if the Russians had to veto a resolution for the despatch of a commission to investigate events in Czechoslovakia.

He asked me whether I thought that Canada would join the United States in some sort of underwriting of security in Western Europe. I said that I could not answer that question. He asked whether I had seen any report of the discussions which they had been having with the British, and I said that I had seen nothing very recent on the subject. There have apparently been talks going on in Washington during the last two or three weeks. He then told me that when the British and French had suggested to the Benelux countries a pact on the model of the Treaty of Dunkirk Spaak had, as we know, replied that this model was outdated, and had gone further in suggesting that a Western union of this sort was not worth much unless some sort of guarantee by the United States was included. Hickerson thinks that in the next few days when the governments examine the draft which has almost been completed in Brussels this question will arise and the United States Government will be approached.

He commented that he thought that the public was ahead of Congress, and that Congress was ahead of the Administration in readiness to take some dramatic action. If nothing much were done, there would, in his view, be a convulsion of opinion within six months which might turn to a form of extreme isolation unless the opportunity were seized. Never before had opinion in the United States in peacetime been so fluid on the possibility of "foreign entanglements". He did not indicate what should be done, but said that the subject was under anxious consideration in the State Department.

Later I asked him if he wished me to sound out the views of the Prime Minister and Mr. St. Laurent, saying that, if this was the case, it would be better if perhaps Mr. Armour or he were to invite me to come to the State Department for a discussion, give me a full account of their thinking and request me to pass it on for con-

Mr. Pearson,

U.S. guarantee is necessary in W. Europe and Mediterranean as well as in Scandinavia. U.K. realizes this and it may be they hope that 3 power consultations on Atlantic Pact will evolve into consultation on the wider pact.

2. In order to assist this development and for other [reasons] mentioned below, the Atlantic Pact should not be based on Article 52 which provides for regional pacts but on Article 51. It could then be extended to other states invited to come in.

3. The other objection to Article 52 is that, read along with Article 53, it forbids enforcement until Security Council authorizes it. Collective defence could be undertaken by the regional groups under Article 51 but this must not be played up as a violation of the spirit of the Charter and it is not necessary to run this risk of aiding Soviet propaganda that we are deserting the U.N.

4. It would be dishonest for us to enter an Atlantic Pact unless we are prepared to increase considerably our defence appropriations in order to have a striking force immediately available.

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: Reference your telegram No. 342, March 12th.<sup>12</sup> Washington is ready to explore the possibilities of regional Atlantic pact of mutual assistance with the United Kingdom, and would welcome Canadian participation in the preliminary discussions. They suggested talks begin early next week in Washington. United Kingdom will be represented by Hollis and either Kirkpatrick or Jebb from Foreign Office. They hope to leave by plane on Wednesday.

2. United Kingdom regard Washington talks as essentially preliminary and exploratory. They are not wedded to the idea of three inter-locking regional pacts, but see merit in this approach and believe firm agreements could be reached sooner by this method than by attempting to get agreement on an inclusive European regional pact. They anticipate that Washington talks would cover scope of proposed agreement and definition of reciprocal obligations under it and its relationship to the United Nations. They would also hope to reach agreement on the questions of procedure, e.g., who is to approach the States invited to participate, and when.

Washington, March 13, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Under-Secretary only, Begins: Your messages EX-665 and EX-666† of March 12th. I saw Inverchapel late yesterday. He showed me a short note from General Marshall received yesterday afternoon agreeing to discuss an Atlantic pact of mutual assistance and suggesting that the United Kingdom officials should get here "early next week".

2. It will indicate the initial reception here of the British proposal if I pass on to you what Inverchapel told me of his approach. He received instructions late Thursday afternoon in terms parallel with Mr. Attlee's telegram to Mr. King No. 220 of March 10th. He put the gist of them into a memorandum which he sent to Lovett at his house, asking Lovett to arrange for him to see Marshall yesterday morning. Lovett telephoned him at 9:30 p.m. to say he would take the matter up at once with Marshall. He apparently did so that night or early Friday morning, since Marshall telephoned Inverchapel at 9:15 a.m. Friday to say that he was tied up but Lovett could later pass on his views.

3. In fact Marshall was at a Cabinet meeting, after which he spoke to the President and was able to write the note to Inverchapel mentioned above. He left Washington for the weekend early yesterday afternoon.

4. Inverchapel had a further talk with Lovett in which the latter expressed the personal view that they would cordially welcome Canadian participation in the talks, but this point was not covered in Marshall's note. Lovett left suddenly last night for Florida, possibly in connection with this proposal since the Secretary of Defence is meeting with the Chiefs of Staff and Directors of Plans of the three Services at Key West. You will note the alacrity with which the British initiative has been followed up and their interest particularly in an Atlantic pact. I mentioned to you earlier this week that I believed something was brewing looking to an underwriting by the United States of security in Western Europe, and it looks as though their minds here were moving on lines parallel to the British. I asked Inverchapel whether he had discussed earlier the possibility of the United States in some way supporting the western union project. He said that he had taken this up with Lovett soon after Bevin's speech in January, and that Lovett had then taken the line that it was absurd to expect the United States to undertake such a responsibility and that it would interfere with the European recovery programme which should of itself create a climate for peace.<sup>13</sup>

5. I am seeing Armour, who is in charge of the State Department over the weekend, late this morning and shall send you a further message.

6. Did you see yesterday's A.P. Report from London about rumours circulating there that Russia would soon ask Norway for a Treaty of Friendship? Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-766

Washington, March 13, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Under-Secretary only, Begins: My WA-761 of March 13th. I have just seen Armour and Hickerson. Neither had had an opportunity of discussing the British proposals with Marshall before he left Washington early yesterday afternoon, but had been present yesterday morning during the first consideration given them by Lovett. The question of Canadian participation in the proposed talks here had not been mentioned at this meeting, and was therefore new to them. Apparently Inverchapel had not included it in the memorandum sent to Lovett on Thursday evening, but had spoken of it verbally to Lovett later as reported in paragraph 4 of WA-761. Both feel sure, as did Lovett, that Canadian participation would be cordially welcomed, and Armour will clear this with Marshall on Monday morning.

2. They have no independent confirmation of the rumours of early Soviet demands on Norway, which, as they said, might either be the result of Norwegian jitters or might easily be well founded. They are puzzled about the British suggestion of three separate security pacts, and particularly about the omission of the Netherlands and Belgium from the proposed Atlantic Pact.<sup>14</sup> They are specially concerned that something more should be done to reassure Italian opinion before the elections, and they may not be in full agreement with the order of priority suggested from London. They are, however, eager to follow the matter up with minimum delay, and hope that the British participants will be able to arrive early next week. Their general thinking is about a pact promising full military and economic aid if any of the contracting parties becomes the object of attack. Hickerson considers it would be desirable for Italy, Greece, Turkey and Iran to be brought somehow or other into a security system, or security systems, of this nature at the outset.

This point supported by some U.K. evidence we secured some time ago. [L.B. Pearson]

3. There seems to be a mistake in typing or transmission in the reference in Mr. Attlee's message to the Prime Minister to the conclusion of a regional pact under Article 52. At any rate, the proposal as transmitted by Inverchapel referred to Article 51 and not to Article 52. Perhaps you should check back with London on this point.

4. It looks as though you may be required here possibly on Tuesday or Wednesday. As soon as I hear from Inverchapel when his people are arriving I shall let you know. You will have to devise a good cover story, which ought not to be too difficult. Everyone agrees that the completest secrecy must be observed. Ends.

I am enclosing herewith a short memorandum on the "Proposed Pact of Mutual Assistance for Atlantic States".

2. It looks as if it will be necessary for me to leave Ottawa on Wednesday or Thursday for the Washington discussions on this matter which are likely to open on Thursday or Friday. I realize that these talks are purely exploratory and on the official level only. I shall, of course, also keep very closely in touch with Mr. St. Laurent and yourself on points which may arise. It would be useful, however, if, before I left, I could have some general guidance from you on one or two of the principal issues which are likely to emerge.

3. At the moment, the United Kingdom apparently does not contemplate that the Washington discussions should result in an actual text of a draft, but rather that the discussions would cover such things as the scope of the pact, the definition of reciprocal obligations under it, its relationship to the United Nations, and questions of procedure such as who is to approach the States invited to participate and when.

4. However, things are moving so fast in Europe that this time-table may well be speeded up. If the Communists are to be held in check in Italy, it may be essential to have a pact concluded and published a week or more before the Italian elections which are to take place on April 18.

5. It may be, therefore, that officials will begin the framing of a draft text sooner than would otherwise be required. Presumably such a text would be similar to the original Dumbarton Oaks proposals in that the provisions in the draft would not bind governments but would be put forward by them as a working paper, for consideration, first, by the three governments and later at a conference of those states invited to become original signatories of the pact. I should think that this procedure would be satisfactory.

PROPOSED PACT OF MUTUAL ASSISTANCE

The purpose of the Marshall Plan embodied in the European Reconstruction Programme and the Bevin Plan for Western Union is to build up first in Western Europe and then in the whole non-Soviet world collective defence against Soviet aggression.

2. During the past few months the Soviet Union has consolidated its position in Eastern Europe and has secured complete control of Czechoslovakia. It looks as if it is about to secure complete control of Finland. Even before securing control of Finland there are grave indications that it may soon make demands on Norway. A subjugation of Norway would probably be followed by the subjugation of Sweden and perhaps Denmark; it would make the Baltic a Russian lake and give Russia a basis for offensive air and submarine operations on the Atlantic.

3. Russian pressure in the north has been accompanied by threats to the Mediterranean. The pressure in the north may be a feint to disguise a more immediate threat in the Mediterranean. The pressure on Greece continues but the more immediate and dangerous threat appears to be Italy. The Italian elections take place in five weeks' time (April 18). There is a possibility that the Communists and the left-wing socialists, who form together a cohesive left-wing alliance, may return the largest group and hence win the election. They may poll 30 to 40 per cent of the vote or even more. If the communists should win the election, the Soviet Union will secure control of Italy by constitutional means unless the present government refuses to resign. Such a refusal would probably precipitate civil war. If the communists do not win the election, they may attempt a coup d'état.

4. The United Kingdom has come to the conclusion that the Soviet Union is preparing to extend its influence over the whole of continental Europe and subsequently over the Middle East and no doubt the rest of the Asiatic land-mass and that unless positive and vigorous steps are taken shortly by other states in a position to do so, the Soviet Union may gain political and strategic advantages which will set the great Communist machine in action, culminating either in the establishment of a world dictatorship or more probably the collapse of organized society in great stretches of the globe.

5. The United Kingdom believes that if the opponents of dictatorship can present a truly united front and if the necessary economic means are made available by those who have them, the danger of war which would be liable to result from the Soviet Government overstepping the mark is not imminent; indeed, if these two conditions are fulfilled, there is reason to hope that Communism will be forced on the defensive and that a period of relative calm may ensue.

6. The first step by the United Kingdom to create a "truly united front" was taken at Brussels, where officials of the United Kingdom, France and Benelux reached agreement on a treaty for defence and economic cooperation. The U.K. has proposed that this be supplemented by two other pacts. The first would be a regional Atlantic pact of mutual assistance among the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, Portugal, Ireland and Canada. Spain would be added when it once again has a democratic regime. The second would be a Mediterranean security system which would particularly affect Italy. According to the U.K. proposals, the U.S. would give its "backing" to the U.K.-France-Benelux pact and it would be a member of the Atlantic pact. The meaning of "backing" has not been made clear. Nor has the U.K. made clear its ideas on the association of the U.S. with the Mediterranean pact. The U.K. considers that the Soviet threat to Norway makes the conclusion of the Atlantic pact more important and urgent than the conclusion of the other two pacts. The U.K. has therefore proposed to us on March 10 and to the U.S. on March 11, preliminary and exploratory talks in Washington with the U.S. and Canada on the possibilities of a regional Atlantic pact of mutual assistance. Canada agreed on March 11 and the U.S. on March 12 after Mr. Marshall had consulted the President.

7. The U.K. is not wedded to the idea of three interlocking regional pacts but sees merit in this approach and believes that firm agreements could be reached sooner by this method than by attempting to get agreement on an inclusive European pact. The U.K. anticipates that the Washington talks would cover the scope of the proposed Atlantic agreement and the definition of reciprocal obligations under it and its relationship to the United Nations. The U.K. also hopes to reach agreement on questions of procedure, such as who is to approach the states invited to participate and when.

8. Mr. Armour and Mr. Hickerson of the State Department are puzzled by the U.K. suggestion of three separate security pacts and particularly by the omission of the Netherlands and Belgium from the proposed Atlantic pact. They are specially concerned that something more should be done to reassure Italian opinion before the Italian elections on April 18 and they may not be in full agreement with the order of priority suggested from London. They are, however, eager to follow the matter up with minimum delay. What they have in mind is a pact promising full military and economic aid if any of the contracting parties becomes the object of attack. Mr. Hickerson considers that it would be desirable for Italy, Greece, Turkey and Iran to be brought somehow or other into a security system or security systems of this nature at the outset.

9. The two principal issues in the Washington discussions are therefore likely to be:

- (a) What countries should be invited to become original signatories of the pact?
- (b) What ground should the pact cover in addition to mutual guarantees of all-out aid against direct or indirect Soviet aggression?

10. It is suggested that on the first we should, for the present, keep an open mind. There is much to be said for the addition of Benelux to the Atlantic pact; this would probably mean that the separate U.K.-French-Benelux treaty of Brussels would be replaced by the more inclusive Atlantic Pact. There is also much to be said for inviting Sweden to become a member; otherwise it would be left dangerously exposed; and the Russians might deflect their pressure from Norway to Sweden.

11. The more important issue is whether Italy, and perhaps Greece, should be included. An attempt at a complete Russian conquest of Italy by constitutional or extra-constitutional means may take place during the next month. If the U.S.A. and the U.K. consider that exclusion of Italy from the Communist bloc is as important as the exclusion of Norway, then it would seem that a guarantee to Italy is at least as urgent as a guarantee to Norway.

12. The second point is what ground should the pact cover in addition to mutual guarantees of all-out aid against direct or indirect Soviet aggression.

13. Here it is essential to remember that the purpose of the pact is to rally the spiritual as well as the military and economic resources of Western Christendom against Soviet totalitarianism. To do this it should not be a merely negative anti-Soviet military alliance but should be the basis for a positive liberal and democratic counter-offensive. The pact may succeed in giving us a long period of peace if it results in creating an overwhelming preponderance of force against the Soviet Union. This force, however, to be overwhelming should not be only military and economic force; it should also include the force that comes from ability to rally to our side all non-Communists in all countries, including our own, who are now apathetic, fearful or doubtful.

14. The proposed pact should make as clear as possible the methods which the peoples and governments of the Free World intend to follow to make good their faith in human rights and fundamental freedoms, in the worth and dignity of man and in the principles of parliamentary democracy, personal freedom and political liberty. If it can do this it will underline that this Pact is something far removed from alliances and arrangements of the old kind.

15. The U.K. in the Washington talks may propose that the draft Brussels Treaty be taken as the basis of discussion. A copy of this draft treaty of March 12 is attached.†

Mr. Marshall has now sent us a message that United States Government are prepared to proceed at once with joint discussions on the establishment of an Atlantic security system and has suggested that our representatives should go to Washington this week. We are accordingly sending Mr. Jebb of the Foreign Office and General Hollis of the Ministry of Defence. We are of course taking every precaution to ensure secrecy.

I would suggest that the Canadian representative should get in touch with ours as soon as practicable. Our High Commissioner has details as to their movements.

Meanwhile the United States and United Kingdom representatives in Oslo have been instructed to inform Norwegian Government that if a Soviet demand is made it is imperative that Norwegian Government should resist resolutely.

FOR PRIME MINISTER ONLY

ATLANTIC SECURITY SYSTEM; U.K.—U.S.—CANADA CONVERSATIONS

The Prime Minister said that he had recently received a communication from the U.K. Prime Minister containing certain very secret information concerning probable developments in Soviet policy with respect to Scandinavia. In view of this information and recent events in Central Europe, particularly in Czechoslovakia, the U.K. government had suggested that tripartite conversations take place at once, in Washington, between officials of the U.K., U.S., and Canadian governments with a view to the conclusion of Atlantic security arrangements which would complement the agreement reached in Brussels by the Western European Nations.

The U.S. government had agreed, and conversations were to begin in the next few days for the purpose of exploring the possibility of an arrangement along the lines suggested by the United Kingdom. In the circumstances, it had been arranged that a Canadian official would participate. No commitment was involved in such participation and such specific proposals as might result would come before the Cabinet for decision. It was, nevertheless, desirable that, before the talks began a general expression of the Cabinet's views should be given for the guidance of the Canadian representative.

Mr. King emphasized the great importance of maintaining complete secrecy on these subjects.

The Cabinet noted the report of the Prime Minister and, after considerable discussion, agreed that Canada be suitably represented, on the official level, at the forthcoming discussions in Washington, it being the general view that Canada should adhere to an Atlantic regional pact, provided that the conditions of agreement proved acceptable to the government.

DISCUSSIONS IN WASHINGTON ON SECURITY PACT

1. Nature of preliminary three-power discussions in Washington

In view of the necessity for speed, I suggest that you should try to get sufficient agreement in two or three days to enable invitations to be sent to the list of governments decided upon. These invitations would be for them to participate in the framing of a mutual security pact. The invitations would outline the general character of the pact contemplated by the three inviting powers. Presumably these invitations would be delivered jointly by the representatives of the three powers in the capitals concerned.

2. Further work in Washington

Again, in view of the paramount necessity of speed, it is essential that the larger conference which would come out of the Washington discussions should reach agreement as rapidly as possible on the precise text of a pact. The possibility of their reaching agreement would be greatly increased if, before their representatives leave for the conference, they could be given a draft of the treaty. This draft might be described as a "working paper prepared by the officials of the three (or four if France is added) governments as a basis of discussion at the forthcoming conference." It could further be pointed out that the working paper should be considered as a tentative and provisional draft and should not be taken as committing the governments whose officials had drafted the paper.

3. Preliminary decisions in principle to be reached in the first few days of the Washington talksStates to be invited

The tentative United Kingdom proposal is that the pact be between the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, Ireland, Canada

There is a copy of this memorandum in the Escott Reid Papers (Volume 6, file 12) along with an undated note from A.D.P. Heeney:

Escott, I marvel at the speed & facility with which you have produced these documents [presumably including the draft working paper and treaty to which Reid refers at the end of the memorandum]. My criticism w[oul]d be of little value perhaps but I recoil from the idea of such an omnibus scheme as you envisage at this stage — too many and too soon I w[oul]d think. Surely the USSR & friends w[oul]d be more impressed by a quick business-like arrangement between UK-US-Canada cum France and the Western Union (I incline to think the first four sh[oul]d federate with the Brussels lot) than by an amorphous conglom[eration] which included Finland, Italy, Portugal and Pakistan.

and Portugal. This list is in part based on the U.K. assumption that the immediate danger comes from the Soviet threat to Norway. There is much to be said for an alternative assumption that the more immediate danger comes from a Soviet threat to Italy and that that threat might well be increased by the conclusion of a treaty which did not include Italy, since it might be taken by the Russians as an indication that the Western world was not prepared to fight in defence of Italy.

My own feeling, therefore, is that we should strongly urge that Italy be asked to be an original signatory.

It will be necessary constantly to keep in mind the necessity of the pact being a basis for what one can call the spiritual mobilization of the liberal democracies as well as being a basis for economic and military cooperation against Soviet threats. This involves a nice problem of balancing tangible and intangible considerations. It can be assumed that the new pact would appeal, as does the Brussels Treaty, to the "principles of democracy, personal freedom and political liberty, the rule of law and constitutional traditions, all of which are the common heritage" of the signatories. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to say that the present regime in Portugal embodies these principles. My feeling, therefore, is that on balance it would be wise not to include Portugal among the original signatories.

An even more difficult decision is whether Finland should be included in the list of original signatories. Here again there is the danger which would be implicit in leaving Italy out: the Russians might assume that we had given Finland up. My guess is that the present regime in Finland is a liberal free state which does believe in the principles cited in the Brussels Treaty and that on balance it is in our interests to invite Finland to become an original signatory. This would be carrying war into the enemy's camp with a vengeance but the Russians have surely taught us the advantages of going on the offensive.

The next question about membership is whether Australia, New Zealand and South Africa should be invited. My feeling is that they should be. This would help to preserve the unity of the Commonwealth and would remove the possibility of criticism of the pact by the Commonwealth-minded people in Canada.

It might, however, be invidious to invite Australia, New Zealand and South Africa to be original signatories and not to invite India, Pakistan and Ceylon which are also members of the Commonwealth. I just don't know what the answer to this should be. Their inclusion in the pact would most certainly extend greatly the commitments of all the other signatories since India and Pakistan are exposed and weak states, but their very exposure and weakness is a source of weakness to the United States, the United Kingdom and ourselves. On balance I feel that they, too, should be invited.

I would think that the list of invited states should stop here. To bring countries in which do not inherit so directly as these states the traditions of Western Europe would be to complicate matters at this stage when the paramount necessity is speed. We should not look upon the new pact as final in any way though I assume it would state that it was in force for fifty years. It could be supplanted at any time by a more inclusive pact. Such a more inclusive pact could be worked out at the next regular session of the General Assembly or indeed at a special session this summer if it were considered necessary. The General Assembly could take as its basis of discussion the pact which had been agreed to in April and it might be found to be possible to make those necessary amendments in the pact which would enable it to be signed by all the states of the world now outside the Soviet sphere. Such a pact would be "adopted" by the General Assembly, which would urge all Members of the United Nations to ratify it. Once it came into force, it could supplant the other pact.

Definition of reciprocal defence obligations

The important thing here is to get rid of the absurd weakness in Article IV of the Brussels Treaty under which the obligation of the signatories to come to each other's assistance is restricted to their being subjected to "armed attack". The whole game of the Russians is obviously to conquer without armed attack. So far they have been successful in playing that game and it is to be assumed that they will continue to play it. The new treaty will look pretty futile if it is a treaty to guarantee us against the kind of attacks on our independence which might have been made thirty years ago but not the kind of attacks which may be made during the next weeks and months. The treaty must therefore be a treaty of defence against not only armed attacks but also against "attempts by any state to undermine the political or economic independence of another state by intimidation or by subversive processes of political or economic penetration." It may be argued that the inclusion of such a clause in the treaty would be a violation of the Charter, since Article 51 on which the treaty will have to be based refers merely to "the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations." However, as Mr. Byrnes has constantly argued, and as we ourselves argued in the memorandum which we circulated to the Atomic Energy Commission on December 19, 1946 (our report on the United Nations 1946, pages 197-8), this difficulty can easily be overcome. The most important provision of the Charter is paragraph 4 of Article 2, under which all Members have pledged themselves to refrain in their international relations from the threat of force against the political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations. If a Member of the United Nations attempts to undermine the independence of another state by intimidation or by other subversive methods, it has violated this solemn undertaking of the Charter and its violation of the Charter would release the other Members of the United Nations from their obligation under the Charter not to threaten or use force against that delinquent state.

The reciprocal obligation for mutual defence in the Brussels Treaty is that each signatory state comes to the assistance of any other signatory state with all the military and other aid and assistance in its power. This provision should certainly appear in the new treaty. But to meet the immediate threats, it should, I think, be accompanied by a more specific obligation by each signatory state to maintain in a state of constant readiness certain types of armed forces and facilities and by a specific obligation to put other stated facilities at the disposal of other members immediately or whenever it is necessary. Perhaps these specific obligations should state what forces are immediately available on the date of signature of the treaty, and what forces the signatory states promise to have available in, say, a year's time.

Scope of the pact

The pact should certainly be as extensive in its terms as the Brussels Treaty. There is great danger that in the present atmosphere of crises Foreign Offices may be tempted to have recourse to something which would be not much more than an old-fashioned military alliance and that clauses in the pact other than those providing for mutual guarantees would be merely window-dressing. Such a pact would not, I am convinced, meet the necessities of the day. We have to establish rapidly an overwhelming preponderance of force and we have to remember that it is not merely military and economic force with which we are concerned but also with what can be described as spiritual force. Or to put it another way, mere force is not enough. There has to be the determination to use the force if necessary and a determination accompanied by a fervent belief in the society which one is trying not only to defend but to make the basis of an eventually united world. The new treaty must therefore be a living document and create a new living international institution.

The main enemies in Western Europe must now be despair, apathy, doubt and fear. A pact of mutual guarantee will not by itself overcome those enemies, for if the pact should not preserve peace, the peoples of Western Europe may have to go through for many years the trials of Soviet occupation.

All this, it seems to me, underlines the importance of what Mr. Attlee has called a bold move to raise in the hearts and minds and spirits of all those in the world who love freedom that confidence and faith which will restore their vigour.

It seems to me that a new treaty would give evidence of boldness and vigour if we carried a great deal farther some of the provisions of the Brussels Treaty. We should, for example, most certainly get rid of the absurd reservation to the acceptance of the optional clause which makes nonsense of the declared belief of the signatories in the rule of law. We should set forth much more precisely the goals of economic cooperation. We should in some way make it clear in the treaty that the treaty is based on the principle that there should be equality of sacrifice between the free nations in the struggle for a Free World. This means an acceptance of proposals for pooling our economic resources.

It also means that we should go farther than the Brussels Treaty in setting up revolutionary new political instruments of the alliance. That is why I feel that we should have not only a Board for Collective Self-Defence, but a parliament, a president (Spaak?), a chancellor (yourself?) and a chief of staff (Eisenhower?).<sup>16</sup> This would give the impression that we mean business when we talk about forming a new society of the free nations.

General of the Army Dwight D. Eisenhower, Chief of Staff, United States Army (-Feb.); President, Columbia University.

Relation of the pact to the United Nations

I do not for the moment see that this raises many problems. I would think that the clauses in the Brussels Treaty on this would be sufficient. The only addition I can think of is that there might be some mention of the necessity of the free nations working for those changes in the constitutions of the specialized agencies which are necessary in order that they become more effective instruments for the cooperation of the free nations in economic and social matters.

A Canadian working paper setting forth a tentative and provisional draft of a new treaty

I shall try to send to you by tomorrow's bag a new draft of such a working paper. You might perhaps find it useful in a private talk with Jebb to give him a copy of this paper at an early stage in the proceedings in Washington. It might be that you would also find it useful to pass the draft in a similar way to someone like Jack Hickerson.

Mr. Pearson telephoned to me about 11:30 this morning mainly to say that he was leaving for New York today in order to take McNaughton's place in the Security Council tomorrow and perhaps on Saturday, since McNaughton is ill in bed with a cold. The Palestine issue may come to a head before the end of the week. He has told the press that he has had to go to New York because of McNaughton's illness, and this cover will be applied to his later appearance in Washington. He expects to come on here on Saturday or Sunday and will be staying at the Biltmore in New York.

Taber<sup>17</sup> called on me just before Pearson telephoned to tell me that General Foulkes was arriving here on Sunday and that he had been told to speak to me about it. He would be in civilian clothes and it was hoped that his visit would attract no attention. I gave Taber a brief explanation of the purpose and asked Pearson about the arrangements. He said that Claxton thought it a good idea to have Foulkes in Washington at this time for two or three days and that he could be used at the meetings, if necessary. The ostensible purpose of his visit will be to call on the new Chief of Staff here and to take a look at the work of the Army Staff.

Yesterday Pearson was summoned to a Cabinet meeting at 2 p.m. because the Prime Minister had decided that he should consult his colleagues before going further with the idea of an Atlantic pact. The reception by Ministers was favourable. Pearson at 2:40 p.m. was asked to produce a statement on the Brussels Treaty for the P.M. to deliver in the House at 3 p.m. This he did, and he is sending us the text.

He regards it as a really important indication of policy, although the press this morning has largely ignored it.

I told Pearson that we thought it desirable to take a junior officer into the picture at this stage. We both agreed that Wright<sup>18</sup> should be informed so that he will be available for some of the secretarial work.

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary only, Begins: With reference to Pearson's message to me EX-724 of March 18th.† The first meeting is now set to take place in the Pentagon at 3 p.m. on Monday, March 22nd. The United States team will be Douglas (acting as temporary substitute for Lovett, who is away), Hickerson (who heads the Working Group), Achilles, and Butler<sup>19</sup> (who is Acting Head of the planning staff in Kennan's absence) from the State Department, with probably General Gruenther,<sup>20</sup> Director of the Combined Staff. There are only four or five people in the State Department who know about the talks.

2. Stone and I discussed the program with Hickerson yesterday. Hickerson read us messages delivered to the State Department that day from Bevin and Bidault with which the Benelux Foreign Ministers associated themselves. These messages arose from the independent French approach mentioned in paragraph 3 of my WA-778 of March 15th† and were in reply to Marshall's answer to Bidault despatched on March 12th.† They suggested that official representatives of Bevin and Bidault should meet with State Department officials and that Benelux should also be represented. After exploratory official conversations, the Foreign Ministers would themselves be glad to meet with Marshall. The central purpose would be discussion of the relationship of the United States to the Brussels Treaty.

3. In view of this separate approach to the same problem, Hickerson thinks that the first item to be discussed on Monday will be the relationship of the French to the U.S., U.K., and Canadian talks. The French, of course, know nothing yet about this project, and we must be careful to give them no cause for offence. While we can go ahead without them for a few days, they must, in his view, be brought in soon.

4. Hickerson says they will not have any specific proposal to bring forward on Monday and considers that the conversations should discuss several alternatives and try to reach informal agreement on what looks best. He is not enthusiastic about a separate Atlantic Pact and thinks that the Brussels Treaty could be the starting point with which the United States and Canada might associate themselves in some way not yet clear to him. He would particularly like to see Norway and Denmark accede to the Brussels Pact and, if possible, also Sweden, Portugal, Switzerland, and eventually Spain, together with Iceland and Ireland. The case of Italy would have to be specially examined. He thought that Greece and Turkey should not be included as being not in the general Atlantic region.

5. I have told him that our team would consist of Pearson, myself, Stone, and probably Foulkes initially, although Pearson and Foulkes could not remain for long. He has no idea of the possible length of the talks. We may add Wright as a junior officer to assist in making a record.

6. I shall inform Pearson by telephone of the timetable. I doubt that you should repeat this message to him in New York. Ends.

Secret of success present talks is to keep in mind the one immediate, simple objective — military security and to remember urgency. All of our information at the moment indicates that several possible members of the association of like minded countries, which we hope eventually to cement, (in or out of the U.N.) are immediately threatened — not next year but perhaps next week — some by direct action — Norway, some by encircling action — Sweden, some by revolutionary or quasi-legal action — Italy. It is self-evident and historically clear that the success of any action against any one of these countries not only weakens the effective military strength of the group but even worse diminishes to a disproportionate degree the effective appeal of joint action to the remaining possible associates. It seems to be pretty generally agreed that we cannot afford to lose more ground, that the Russians must be stopped where they are and that any further successful aggressions, of whatever nature, might destroy our chances of ever stopping them.

One of the major advantages which the Russians have over us arises from the fact that they are able, to a degree impossible for democracies, to take simple and direct and urgent action. They can entirely disregard the means and keep their eye only on the end which they desire to achieve. I recall that in the field of psychological warfare while we spent uncountable hours preparing directives which catered, and necessarily, to the sensibilities of this group and the prejudices of that (both at home and abroad), to the point where the final result was all too often a directive which neither directed nor in fact had any meaning or sense, the Russians day after day produced and issued the same order to their broadcasters and pamphlet writers, "The purpose for today is to defeat the Nazis."

The hour is now, it would seem, so very late, that we must take a leaf out of their book in this regard — devote ourselves to achieving what is obviously our common purpose by the simplest possible direct approach and to put what democratic trimmings on it as may be required later. There is, I think, no real reason to doubt that this is definitely the mood of the United States now, and it is only because it is also the mood of free countries in Western Europe that a pact was concluded in Brussels in so short a time.

There would seem to be no serious incompatibility in the co-existence of this Brussels pact with another and wider union with which North America could more appropriately associate itself — and with which Italy could also be associated — which would concern itself only with security — military guarantees of mutual assistance. There would seem to be no doubt that this would accomplish our immediate purpose and would, with firm U.S. backing, be generally acceptable. If there are in fact, minor or even serious incompatibilities between the co-existence of the two pacts, let's take a leaf out of the Russian book (we already have in the case of Trieste) disregard them for the moment in order to achieve the immediately desirable purpose and return to iron them out at a later date. Certainly the two arrangements could and would have to be tied together.

New York, March 22, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Prime Minister and Mr. St. Laurent from Pearson, Begins: I had a lengthy discussion Saturday morning with Jebb about the conversations on an Atlantic Pact which are to begin in Washington on Monday, 22nd March. He said that his instructions from Mr. Bevin were general in character and that he had considerable leeway to proceed in the light of developments. They were particularly anxious to secure at once United States views on important questions of principle involved as there had been no real exchange yet between the two Governments. So far as the United Kingdom Government is concerned, they had an open mind on the procedure which should be followed. There might be a separate Atlantic Pact or accession of the Atlantic Powers to the security clauses of the Brussels Pact or the Brussels Pact countries might join a wider and new Atlantic Security Pact. Possibly the first step should be the formulation of a Three-Power Pact to which the other Atlantic Powers could accede; this to be kept for the time being separate from the Brussels Pact. They realized, however, that if this were to be done, it would also be important to secure United States backing at once to the Brussels Pact, probably by means of accession to it. Jebb asked me whether if this course were followed, we would be inclined to join the United States in such accession. I said that I would pass this idea on. As to an initial Three-Power Pact I felt, personally, that it would be more desirable from our point of view if a general Atlantic Pact signed by all ten countries could be worked out. A Three-Power Pact might be considered by the others as a purely Anglo-Saxon initiative, and it might be more difficult for those others to accede later than to participate from the beginning. I put forward the tentative view that if the Three-Powers could agree on certain principles then these might be submitted to the other seven Powers, and as many of those Powers as accepted those principles would then work out in detail and sign a Pact.

2. I asked Jebb whether they had given thought to the relationship of Italy to these developments, as I felt, myself, that it was most important that no new security arrangements should be made public now which would give the impression that Italy was being excluded or ignored. He appreciated this point and agreed that the Italian situation should not be prejudiced in any way by anything that was done in Washington. For that purpose they hoped that Italy would accede shortly to the Brussels Pact, a procedure which, at the moment, they preferred to negotiations for a Mediterranean Pact. Bevin and Sforza had a long talk in Paris at the beginning of this week during which Bevin expected that the Italian Foreign Minister would bring up the question of Italian accession to the Brussels Pact. He had not done so probably because he wished for an invitation to accede, in which case the invitation might be used by the Italian Government for bargaining purposes on such things as Colonies.

3. Jebb also brought up the question of French participation. Bidault had recently approached the Americans and the British with a view to United States accession to the Brussels Pact. Therefore, until this question was decided, they were not sure whether the French should participate in the Washington discussions from the beginning. It might be difficult to ask the French to participate and leave out Benelux, and yet the latter might not be too anxious at this moment to extend the obligations which they had undertaken under the Brussels Pact. However, this matter of French participation would be discussed at the first meeting in Washington and, as a result, a French representative might be asked to join the discussions. I told Jebb that we would welcome France's participation in these arrangements from the beginning if that could be arranged satisfactorily to the United Kingdom and United States of America.

4. I pointed out to Jebb that if a Pact were to be worked out which included declarations of belief in democracy, free institutions, etc., such as were included in the Brussels Pact, it would be a little anomalous to have Portugal as an original signatory. He appreciated this but felt it would be even more difficult to exclude Portugal. The Azores were important.

5. I asked him if any of the other Dominions had expressed interest in the Washington talks or a desire to participate in any arrangements reached there. He said that, so far as he knew, no such interest or desire had been expressed. Ends.

Reference today's discussion. The immediate steps proposed to deal with the threat of Soviet aggression in Scandinavia and in the Mediterranean seem well designed to meet the situation. But it is perhaps arguable that the ideas which emerged on the method for dealing with the long term situation are not so well fitted to generally accepted ideas on Soviet behaviour.

In the first place, it is agreed that Soviet expansionism will take place wherever it is not stopped. Another usually accepted axiom is that the possibility of isolating aggression anywhere in the world is remote. By this time most people seem to subscribe to the theory that the best place to deal with aggression is where it breaks out. If these two principles are accepted, some simple conclusions seem to flow from them.

First, scattered regional arrangements with gaps in between them might invite the expansion of Soviet power into the holes. This seems to be a danger in the regional approach. To meet the threat of Soviet world wide ambitions, perhaps the Western powers should not run the risk of excluding by implication vulnerable areas. But what is the alternative? Perhaps the West should have the known intention of dealing with Soviet aggression anywhere if it constitutes a threat to the peace. Thus instead of drawing rings around certain areas which are definitely verboten, a looser and more flexible arrangement might be better designed to meet the long term threat. The Rio pact may be a fairly good guide here. Under such an arrangement, the U.S. would not be bound to go to war over Afghanistan. On the other hand, the Soviet would not be encouraged to move into such areas on the grounds that they lie outside a regional grouping.

Alternatively, if tight regional groupings are established the dangers inherent in them might be obviated by a concurrent announcement that a threat to the peace in the form of Soviet aggression would not be tolerated anywhere in the world.<sup>21</sup>

One of the disadvantages in the inclusive Western pact idea seems to be that it is ideologically messy i.e. Spain and Portugal. It seems a pity to sacrifice, if it can be avoided, ideological forces at our disposal. A looser arrangement might be less vulnerable to charges of hypocrisy.

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Reid from Pearson, Begins: Will you please convey following message to the Prime Minister, Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Claxton, Message begins: "General Foulkes, Stone, Wright and I attended this afternoon the first meeting to discuss the proposal for an Atlantic Pact and related subjects.<sup>22</sup> The British representatives included Lord Inverchapel, Gladwyn Jebb of the Foreign Office, General Hollis and two members of the staff of the British Embassy.<sup>23</sup> The chief representatives of the United States were Mr. Lewis Douglas, Mr. Hickerson, General Gruenther, Director of the Combined Staff, and two other officials of the State Department.

2. The discussion was very general. All participants emphasized the exploratory and non-committal character of the talks and pointed out that they had no clear ideas on specific proposals as yet.

3. The United States representatives were reluctant to include the French in talks during the opening stages, mainly for fear of premature disclosures. They emphasized the necessity of absolute secrecy at this stage. It was, therefore, agreed that the French would not sit in on the present discussions, which would also be held without reference to the expected meeting between Messrs. Bevin, Marshall and Bidault. I expressed the hope, however, that the French could be brought in at the earliest possible date and there was general agreement on this.

4. Jebb then explained the Brussels Treaty. He said that there had been no mention at Brussels of United States backing for the Pact, but that the participants felt strongly that United States support was essential to the success of the Brussels arrangements, and even possibly to their maintenance. This opinion led to an inconclusive discussion of the form that United States support might take. The United States representatives emphasized that United States policy in this respect must be wholly non-partisan. Douglas said that a unilateral declaration of support on the part of the President without sanction of the Senate was obviously less effective than support based on Congressional action which would provide the necessary continuity.

5. At this stage I put forward the suggestion that United States action could take one of three forms:

(a) A Presidential statement, perhaps a firmer reiteration with specific reference to the Brussels Pact of the phrase in his speech before Congress that "I am confident that the United States will by appropriate means extend to the free nations the support which the situation requires. I am sure that the determination of the free countries of Europe to protect themselves will be matched by an equal determination on our part to help them to do so."

(b) The accession of the United States to the Brussels Pact.

(c) An Atlantic Pact on a broad political basis or on narrower military lines. If the latter, it would absorb the security provisions of the Brussels Pact. In this latter event the Brussels Pact might remain as a sub-agency within the wider arrangements, and its signatories would be free to pursue independently their economic and cultural objectives.

6. The rest of the discussion centered around these alternatives. Hickerson, for the United States, seemed at first somewhat hesitant about the broader Atlantic Pact concept for the reason that it might shake the confidence of some European countries, notably Italy, with regard to the aid which they might expect to receive in the event of aggression. At this stage he seemed rather to favour the extension of the Brussels Pact to include the Scandinavian countries, Italy, Western Germany, and the three Western Provinces of Austria. In this connection, it was suggested that Article 9 of the Pact might serve as a basis for the extension of the Brussels Treaty. Jebb remarked again that some sort of United States support would be essential to the implementation of this idea. Otherwise, the Brussels Pact countries, particularly Benelux, might be reluctant to take on additional obligations. Mr. Douglas then said that for the purposes of the present discussions it could be assumed that United States support would be forthcoming although it was impossible to say in what form.

7. It was generally agreed that the immediate threat might well be Italy as much as Norway and that care would have to be taken to make sure that the working out of any Atlantic arrangement would not give the impression that the United States and United Kingdom were ignoring the danger of aggression in the Mediterranean. This was particularly important in view of the forthcoming Italian elections. Jebb said that the Italians had not yet been approached by the British with a view to acceding to the Brussels Treaty, mainly because it was feared that they would be tempted to ask an impossibly high price for their participation in the Pact. In this connection it was learned, however, that de Gasperi had told the United States Ambassador in Rome a day or so ago that such an invitation might be a political handicap to him in the elections.

8. The meeting closed yesterday afternoon with the decision that a Sub-Committee should be set up to examine which would be the better approach:

(a) The extension of the Brussels Treaty,

(b) An Atlantic Pact, or

(c) A combination of both (a) and (b).

The Sub-Committee will also consider the impact of these proposals upon the Middle East and the Mediterranean, and lastly think about the possibility of inclusive general security arrangements under Article 51 of the Charter.

9. I indicated a personal preference for (b) above and stated that I had no instructions about (a); that while great importance and value would naturally be attached to United States accession to the Brussels Pact, this would not be the case with regard to Canadian accession, for which, in fact, there is neither more nor less reason than for accession by, say, Brazil or Australia. I doubt myself whether we should take any action of this kind merely because the United States of America does. I do not think that this contingency will arise, but, in case it does, would be glad to have your instructions.

10. The discussions here will, I think, continue into next week. I plan, however, to return to Ottawa Thursday to report, if you agree. By that time it should be pretty clear how things will develop. Ends." Message ends.

Following for Mr. Pearson only. Following for Mr. Pearson from Reid, Begins: I gave the Minister your telephone message about your discussions and asked him what his own plans were. He said he would be arriving back in Ottawa on Thursday morning and leaving Ottawa for Quebec City on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock. He will be staying in Quebec City over the week-end and arriving back in Ottawa on Tuesday morning, March 30th.

He emphasized that, before you agreed to anything, it would be necessary for you to seek instructions. I said that I knew you fully realized this and that you had emphasized in your talk with me that the discussions, so far, had been entirely non-committal and exploratory.

I do hope that you will be able to get back here on Thursday in order to be able to see the Minister before he leaves for Quebec City. Otherwise, if things in Washington move a little faster than we now expect, we may find ourselves in a bit of a jam. Ends.

TELEGRAM (NOT SENT)<sup>24</sup>

Ottawa, March 23, 1948

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Pearson only from Reid, Begins: The Prime Minister and Mr. St. Laurent have considered the question raised in paragraph 9 of your WA-843 of March 23.

2. They feel that the essential thing is for the U.K. and U.S. to underwrite the security of the signatories of the Brussels Treaty and the Scandinavian countries. They would therefore accept anything which the U.K. and the U.S. jointly agree is required to defend our common interests. They would be prepared to recommend to Parliament, if need be, accession by Canada to a Pact of which the U.K., the U.S. and France were members even if no other Atlantic nations were signatories. They would, however, prefer an Atlantic Pact which would include other Atlantic nations as well as the signatories of the Brussels Treaty.

3. They do not at the moment wish to preclude from consideration the admission of Italy and perhaps some other states to the Pact now in contemplation so that you should for the present keep this open, in view especially of the critical Italian situation. Perhaps if it were felt that Italy should not now be invited to be an original signatory of the Pact, the Pact could include a provision that the signatories could extend the guarantees of the Pact to Italy.

4. You mention in paragraph 8 that your Sub-Committee will think about the possibility of inclusive general security arrangements under Article 51 of the Charter. We are not certain exactly what you mean by "inclusive general security arrangements", but if this means that all the members of the U.N. should now be invited to a conference to draw up such a pact, we think that this suggestion is premature. The paramount necessity at the present time is speed and it is likely that the Russians would be more impressed by an agreement quickly reached between the Atlantic Powers and the signatories of the Brussels Treaty than by a larger organization of the members of the U.N. other than the Soviet group. If we can get the Atlantic Pact, it might become the basis on which discussions for a wider union could be based.

Projet de déclaration des États-Unis
United States Draft Statement

Washington, March 23, 1948

Implementation of the President's March 17th declaration of support for the free nations of Europe will obviously require close consultation with political leaders of both parties in order that whatever policy is formulated is a truly bipartisan American policy. Implementation might take the form of a further Presidential declaration, of a treaty commitment, other forms, or a combination of two or more forms. The form can be decided upon only after such consultations. It is nevertheless assumed that adequate implementation will be provided, and the purpose of this paper is to recommend a course of action to be discussed with them.

1. We should not be a party to the Brussels Treaty but should give assurance of armed support for its parties as a group.

2. Assuming that such assurance (as recommended in paragraph 3 below) will be forthcoming in the very near future, the parties to the Brussels Treaty and Norway, Denmark, Sweden and Iceland should be consulted to ascertain whether, in the light of such assurance, the four Scandinavian nations should immediately become parties to it. The very early inclusion of Italy should also be explored. Portugal might well be included in the near future, with Eire, Switzerland, Germany, Spain and Austria being envisaged as eventual members of a natural and progressively closer association of western European nations.

3. The President should declare that, in the light of the commitment undertaken by the parties to the Brussels Treaty to extend all military and other aid in their power to any party to the agreement who may be the object of attacking Europe, the United States would, temporarily and pending conclusion of a mutual defense agreement as recommended in paragraph 4 below, consider armed attack against them to constitute armed attack against the United States, to be dealt with by the United States in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. This assurance might include a declaration of willingness to consider whether a given case of indirect aggression should be deemed armed attack.

4. The President's declaration should express the willingness to enter into negotiations for a mutual defense agreement under the Charter of the United Nations to include every signatory and adherent to the Brussels Treaty and such of the following nations as might wish to join: Canada, Iceland, Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Portugal, Italy, Switzerland and eventually Spain. That defense agreement would be along the following lines:

(1) Provide that at the request of any one of the parties, the contracting parties shall consult as to whether armed attack is threatened and as to the best measures to be taken to meet the threat.

(2) Provide that an armed attack against any one of the parties shall be considered as an attack against all of them and that each of the contracting parties agrees to take armed action against the aggressor in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the United Nations Charter.

(3) Provide that, in case of an indirect aggression against any one of them, the contracting parties will consult as to the necessary assistance to be given to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the threatened party and that, if any one of them be attacked in the course of extending such assistance, the several parties will regard such an attack as an attack against all of them. Indirect aggression should be defined as an internal coup d'état or political change favorable to an aggressor, or the use of force within the territory of a State against its Government by any persons under direction or instigation of another Government or external agency other than the United Nations.

(4) Provide that each contracting party shall determine for itself whether there has occurred an armed attack within the meaning of this agreement.

(5) Provide that upon determination that an armed attack within the meaning of the agreement has occurred the parties shall consult immediately for the co-ordination of the measures to be taken.

(6) Remain in effect for ten years and be automatically renewed unless denounced.

5. Concurrently the President and the British Prime Minister should give parallel public assurance to the free nations of the Middle East (or specifically Greece, Turkey, and Iran) that, in the event they become the object of armed attack, temporarily and pending the conclusion of an eventual Middle East mutual assistance agreement, the United States and the United Kingdom would consider armed attack against them to constitute armed attack against the United States and the United Kingdom, provided they defend themselves with every resource at their command.

6. Political and military conversations would be initiated with the parties to the Brussels Treaty and other selected non-Communist Governments with a view to co-ordinating our military and other anti-Communist efforts and strengthening our collective security.

7. If it should be decided that American support for the free countries of Europe and the Middle East should be limited to the President's declaration and exclude a treaty commitment, the foregoing would have to be modified accordingly.

Canadian Draft Statement<sup>25</sup>

[Ottawa], March 23, 1948

There are two problems, which are closely related.

(1) An assurance to the Scandinavian States, more particularly Norway, of help against Soviet aggression. This problem is immediate and urgent.

Damaged copy with incomplete text corrected by reference to other copies in Wrong Papers, Volume 4.

(2) The negotiation of a Western Pact for collective self-defence under Article 51 of the U.N. Charter. This problem is not so urgent, unless it provides the only answer to the first, which is not the case.

The solution of these two problems is complicated and to some extent determined by the following factors:

(1) The existence of the Brussels Pact, and the desirability at the moment of extending rather than re-placing that Pact, particularly in view of its emphasis on European co-operation.

(2) The necessity of doing nothing to minimize the importance and dangers of the Italian position.

(3) The desirability of emphasizing that Greece and Turkey and Iran are also danger points of Soviet aggression.

(4) The advisability of negotiating, subsequently, a Middle Eastern Security Pact and, ultimately, of a general Collective Security Pact under Article 51 open to all free peoples.

Without prejudice to the above, the two problems mentioned first might be dealt with in the following way:

(1) Approaches will be made by the U.S.A. to [signatories of the Brussels Pact] to get their support to the extension of the Brussels Pact in the way outlined below.

(2) Diplomatic approaches to the Scandinavian governments by the governments of the U.S.A. and U.K. informing them that

(a) the President proposes to give the signatories of the Brussels Pact an assurance of armed support if they are attacked and resist;

(b) if the Scandinavian States accede to the Pact, they will be covered by this guarantee;

(c) steps are to be taken at once to work out a Western Defence Pact under Article 51, which it is hoped, will include the following States . . . The Scandinavian States are urged to participate in this Pact.

(d) this Western Defence Pact will then replace the unilateral U.S.A. guarantee, which, in any event, could be only a temporary emergency measure.

Diplomatic approaches will also be made by the U.S.A. to Italy, to ascertain whether that government wishes to accede to the Brussels Pact before the elections or await the formation of the Western Pact.

Approaches will then be made by the U.S.A. and U.K. to the other governments to be included in the Western Pact, inviting their participation in and support for this development. A working paper on a "Western Pact" will for this purpose be submitted to all the governments concerned. This "working paper" would have been agreed on by the U.S.A., U.K., Canada and, possibly, France. However, because of the necessity for speed, it could only be a short paper in broadest outline. This would mean that before the U.S.A. announced its backing of the Brussels Pact, the following countries would have been invited to join in a "Western Pact":

France, Belgium, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, Italy(?), Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Eire, Iceland, Switzerland, and Portugal.

The way would now be opened for the U.S.A. statement.

This would include:

- (1) Specific backing for the Brussels Pact—to include those who are now signatories and those who might sign later (subject in this case to U.S.A. approval).
- (2) A reference to Italy, if that country does not accede to the Brussels Pact.
- (3) An assurance (in which the U.K. would join) of continued support for Greece and Turkey and Iran against aggression.
- (4) The announcement that certain states (which would be named) have agreed to meet to draw up a Western Defence Pact against aggression. That eventually the signatories of the Brussels Pact might wish to merge that Pact into the Western Pact.
- (5) An indication that a Mediterranean and Middle East Pact of a similar character might be a subsequent desirable development.
- (6) A final suggestion that the ultimate objective is a general Security Pact under Article 51 to include all free States who are willing to accept the obligations of collective self-defence.

While this procedure is being followed, the three governments, and, it is hoped, France, can continue to work out the nature, scope, and content of the Western Pact, along the following lines:

- (1) It might be called “Security Pact for the North Atlantic” area.
- (2) It should last for five years and be renewable.
- (3) It should be under Article 51 of the Charter.
- (4) Its guarantee of mutual defence might be based on Article 3 of the Rio Inter-American Treaty.
- (5) An effort should be made to cover indirect aggression.
- (6) There might be economic and cultural co-operation clauses to emphasize that this Pact is something wider and deeper than an old-fashioned military alliance.
- (7) There should be a preamble along the impressive lines of the Brussels Pact.
- (8) Provision should be made in the Pact for a Board for Collective Self-Defence. Among other things, this Board would decide the facts of aggression and would discuss and concert measures to counteract threats of aggression which are brought to its notice.
- (9) There should be an accession clause under which, among others, Western Germany and Western Austria might join.

TELEGRAM WA-852

Washington, March 23, 1948

Following for Reid from Pearson, Begins: Please deliver the following message to the Prime Minister and Mr. St. Laurent, Begins: Reference my WA-843 of March 23rd concerning the first meeting of the United States, the United Kingdom and ourselves to consider an Atlantic Pact.

1. The Sub-Committee met today.<sup>26</sup> Mr. Lewis Douglas and Lord Inverchapel did not attend and General Gruenther, Director of the United States Combined Staff, was absent for nearly all the discussion. Hickerson led the discussion for the United States and Jebb was the chief British representative.

2. At the outset of today's meeting the idea of broad action for collective security under Article 51 of the Charter was dismissed as being an impractical method meeting the present emergency. It was agreed, however, that the ultimate development of this approach should be kept in mind, and that no steps should be taken which might later prejudice its fulfilment.

3. By the end of today's discussion the outline of a plan had emerged which seemed to attract general support.

4. It was felt that the immediate threat to Scandinavia could be dealt with by extending the Brussels Treaty to include at least Norway, Sweden and Denmark on the firm understanding that United States military support for the signatories would be forthcoming in the event of aggression. If this move were found to be acceptable to the Brussels Pact and Scandinavian countries, the President of the United States might make a public declaration guaranteeing United States backing. In his declaration reference would be made also to Italy, Greece, Turkey and Iran in order to hold the line against the possibility of alternative Soviet aggression in those countries. If, however, Italy was willing to join the Brussels group, and this were agreeable to the other members of that group, an invitation might be extended to her as well as the Scandinavian countries in the first instance. By these steps it is hoped that the immediate situation could be controlled.

5. To counter the long-term threat of Soviet aggression a wider pact might be entered into by the nations of the Western World. These nations would eventually include the free countries of Europe west of the Stettin-Trieste line. Thus it is hoped that Italy would be a party to this arrangement, even if she had not joined the Brussels group. This wider grouping would be in the nature of a Western Defence Pact under Article 51 of the Charter and to which Canada and the United States would be parties if their Governments agreed to this course. Signatories to the Brussels Pact (the United States, of course, is not included in this group) would operate within it, though eventually the Brussels Pact might be merged into the wider arrangement.

6. Membership in the Western grouping would probably not be open to Greece, Turkey, and Iran. To cover the long-term threat in that area the President might in his declaration look forward to the eventual conclusion of a regional arrangement there backed by the United States of America.

7. Tomorrow the Sub-Committee will try to develop the plan outlined above.<sup>27</sup> Confirming my telephone conversation, I want to emphasize again that all of these conversations and suggestions emerging from them are on a purely exploratory and non-committal basis. Ends.

SECURITY PACT FOR THE NORTH ATLANTIC AREA

The attached paper<sup>29</sup> makes certain recommendations on the above subject. These recommendations were agreed on by officials during the Washington Discussions, the first stage of which was concluded on Thursday. They have not received approval of any of the three Governments concerned. They remain non-committal and official only. This was clearly understood in Washington throughout the course of the discussions.

So far as the United States Government is concerned, we have been informed that the paper will be submitted to the President, the Acting Secretary of State and other Cabinet Ministers over the week-end. If they agree generally with its conclusions, it will then be discussed very confidentially with certain Republican Congressional leaders, notably Senator Vandenberg. The United States Government are determined that any policy formulated on this vitally important subject will be a purely bi-partisan policy.

The paper is in the form of a United States proposal. One reason for this is that, if it should leak out, it will not appear to other governments as having already been discussed with two other Governments. It was felt that this was important in order to meet the sensitiveness of the French and possibly others. This, I think, is very satisfactory from our point of view. It emphasizes the non-committal character of the recommendations so far as the Canadian Government is concerned. If and when the North Atlantic Area Conference is called by the United States, Canada will be on exactly the same formal basis as the other governments invited. We will, however, have had an opportunity to influence the character of the recommenda-

The "attached paper" was dated March 24, with an explanatory note on it by Escott Reid:

Paper agreed to in Washington talks (UK, US, Canada) March 22-23 1948. Given to me by Mr. Pearson, March 26/48.

Le texte du document est composé des «recommandations» mentionnées dans la présente note qui sont précédés de la phrase suivante :

The text of the paper consists of the "recommendations" as quoted below in this memorandum, preceded by the following sentence:

The purpose of this paper is to recommend a course of action adequate to give effect to the declaration of March 7 by the President of the United States of support for the free nations of Europe.

tions made before the government will have to decide on them. In this respect we are in a privileged position.

Great stress was laid in Washington on the top secret nature of the discussions there and on the resulting recommendations. At the present time only seven or eight people in Washington and an equal number in London know anything about these developments. It is hoped that this secrecy can be maintained until the President makes his statement. This may seem to be an almost impossible hope, but every effort is to be made to realize it.

The telegrams that I have already sent from Washington will have given the background of the recommendations and some indication of the course of the discussions. Those discussions were extremely frank, and could not have been more friendly. They ranged far and wide, and covered a good many subjects that are not dealt with specifically in the recommendations. They disclosed that there was a very great unity of viewpoint among the officials of the three Governments who participated in the discussions.

Before explaining the recommendations in detail, reference should be made to certain suggestions which were put forward and discarded.

At the beginning, the United States officials thought that possibly the best course would be merely the extension of the Brussels pact to include all the free countries of Western Europe, plus the United States and Canada. This extension could be brought about by the accession to the Pact of the countries in question. The accession of the United States and Canada would be the occasion for important pronouncements by the President and the Prime Minister explaining why the two North American countries were joining the Brussels system as a means of stopping the U.S.S.R. and combatting Communism. It was eventually felt, however, that this procedure would be less satisfactory than restricting the Brussels Pact to European countries and working out a separate and more broadly based North Atlantic Security Pact. On this point, I stated my personal position that, if Canada were to accede to the Brussels Pact, other countries, like Australia and Brazil, etc., should also accede, and might indeed desire to do so. The accession of the United States would be an understandable action and would have a very important political effect; the accession of Canada could not, however, be considered in the same light. In the event, any difficulties that might have developed for us in this proposal were removed by the fact that it was dropped on the second day of the discussions.

Another proposal by the United States, representing, I believe, the Services' point of view, was that no general security pact of any kind was required, and that the objective could be achieved by a simple unilateral declaration on the part of the United States (and Canada, if she were agreeable), to the effect that an attack on any of the free Western European countries would be considered by the United States as an attack on herself. One advantage of this course would be that it could be taken speedily and effectively, and would not require any prior agreement or the negotiation of any political arrangement with the European powers. Its disadvantages, however, and these were considered to be over-riding, were that it was a purely unilateral act, without any quality of reciprocity, and that, as such, it might be open to attack both in North America and among the European states as too one-sided. It is possible, however, that if the idea of the Atlantic Pact is not carried out, the United States may consider making some such unilateral declaration of support without taking any further steps.

The question also arose whether the proposed Atlantic Pact should not absorb the Brussels Agreement. Both the United States and United Kingdom representatives were opposed to this. It was felt that the Brussels Pact, though it should be extended, should not be replaced by the Atlantic Pact because it represented an important step toward European unity, economic and otherwise; that there was room within it for closer cooperation in economic and social fields than was probably desirable in a pact which would also include overseas countries.

The recommendations are considered below, paragraph by paragraph.

Diplomatic approaches to be made by the Government of the United States to the signatories of the Brussels Pact in order to secure their approval to its extension in the manner outlined below and to inform them of plans for the conclusion of a Security Pact for the North Atlantic Area, details of which are given below.

There was some discussion whether the United Kingdom should not join the United States in recommending the extension of the Brussels Pact to its signatories. However, it was decided not to do this, so that, when such a recommendation was made, the French and the Benelux countries would feel that they were on exactly the same basis as the United Kingdom.

The United Kingdom itself has some doubts as to the advisability of extending the Brussels Pact at all at this time. They also feel that these doubts may be shared by the French and the Benelux countries. However, the United States guarantee, which is to be given to the Brussels Pact countries pending the setting up of the North Atlantic system, will be of such vital importance that the Brussels countries will, I think, agree to its extension if the United States presses for it.

Immediate inquiries then to be made of Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Iceland through diplomatic channels by the United Kingdom and France, with the consent of Benelux, as to whether they would be prepared to accede to the Brussels Treaty provided the President of the United States made a declaration along the lines of that recommended in paragraph 4 below.

This recommendation is made on the assumption that recommendation 1 above will be agreed to. If it is not, then a new procedure will have to be worked out, based on a North Atlantic Pact without any immediate extension of the Brussels Pact. The consensus of view was that the Scandinavian States might require a good deal of persuasion before joining the Brussels system at this time, but that, here again, the value of the United States guarantee, if conditional on such joining, would be so great as to remove their hesitations, except possibly in the case of Sweden, which might well, in any event, prefer to stand aloof.

Recommendation 3

A simultaneous approach to be made to Signor De Gasperi in order to discover whether his Government would welcome, in the light of paragraphs 1 and 2 above, an immediate invitation to join the Brussels system.

The United States attach great importance to the inclusion of Italy, both in the Brussels system and in the North Atlantic Pact. The United Kingdom, however, are doubtful whether this is wise, and have indicated that they would like to give further consideration to this recommendation. In any event, there is some evidence that the Italian Government would prefer not to be invited to join the Brussels Pact, at least until after the Italian elections. If this is the case, then Recommendation 3 will be dropped and Italy would probably be given a general Anglo-American promise of support, similar to that which is referred to in Recommendation 5 below.

Recommendation 4

The President of the United States should then make a declaration of American intention, in the light of the obligations assumed by the signatories of the Brussels Pact and pending the conclusion of the Security Pact referred to in paragraph 6 below, to consider an armed attack against a signatory of the Brussels Pact as an armed attack against the United States to be dealt with by the United States in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. This declaration of support might include an expression of willingness to consider whether any specific case of indirect aggression should be deemed to be an armed attack. The President's declaration would state that similar support would be extended to any of the free democracies of Western Europe whose accession to the Brussels Pact was also approved by the United States. It should not exclude the possibility of the United States similarly supporting any other Western European democracy which was the victim of an armed attack and defended itself resolutely.

This is a very important recommendation, on which the others will stand or fall. It certainly represents a far reaching declaration of policy by the United States Administration and, even though such a declaration does not bind Congress, its political effect would be very great, especially as it has to be read in the light of the statement that invitations are to be given to the North Atlantic countries to attend a conference to work out a general security pact which would, of course, be referred to the Senate for ratification.

The President's statement gives an assurance of support against aggression to all the present signatories of the Brussels Pact and any future signatories, providing the United States approves of extending the guarantee in any particular case. This support might even cover defence against indirect aggression. It was felt that a Presidential statement, while meant to encourage accession to the Brussels Pact, should be careful not to give the impression that any country which did not accede could be attacked with impunity. Hence the last sentence of this recommendation, which envisaged the possibility of United States support to any Western European democracy which was attacked and which defended itself, whether it belonged to the Brussels system or not.

Simultaneously with this declaration an Anglo-American declaration to be made to the effect that the two countries are not prepared to countenance any attack on the political independence or territorial integrity of Greece, Turkey or Iran, and that in the event of such an attack and pending the possible negotiation of some general Middle Eastern security system, they would feel bound, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, to afford the States named all the assistance in their power.

This confirms the existing guarantee of support to Greece, Turkey or Iran. The United Kingdom, however, have expressed some doubt as to whether they will be able to state this guarantee in such specific terms, and they wish to give further consideration to this recommendation. The recommendation also suggests the negotiation of a possible Middle Eastern security pact along the lines of the North Atlantic security pact. It was recognized, however, that this would be a complicated and difficult arrangement, and that too much encouragement should not be given to it at this time. It would bring up the whole question of the Arab States and Palestine.

Invitations to be issued by the United States to the United Kingdom, France, Canada, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland, The Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Eire, Switzerland, Italy and Portugal to take part in a conference with a view to the conclusion of a Security Pact for the North Atlantic Area based on Article 51 of the United Nations Charter and containing the provisions set forth in (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) below.

This covers the invitation to the North Atlantic Conference for the purpose of agreeing on a security pact, and gives an indication, in very general terms, of certain ideas that might be embodied in the pact in question.

As for the countries to be invited, the United Kingdom doubts the wisdom of including Switzerland, as this is merely asking for a rebuff. I also mentioned the disadvantage of the inclusion of Portugal from the ideological point of view, but it was felt that this disadvantage was more than neutralized by the strategic advantage of Portugal's membership in the Pact.

The question arose as to what should be done if the invitation were rejected by all but the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. Both the Americans and the British felt that the three Governments concerned, however, should go ahead, even on this restricted basis. It would be more embarrassing if, say, Eire and Portugal were the only European countries to accept the invitation. This is very unlikely, however, because the Americans will make it quite clear that if there is no North Atlantic Pact, it will be difficult for the U.S.A. to maintain, indefinitely, a guarantee of the Brussels Pact.

There was a good deal of discussion as to what the proposed pact should be called. I suggested, for instance "Security Pact of the Free Western Nations". The difficulty about such a general title as this is that it might seem to include the Latin American states, and even countries such as New Zealand and Australia. It was felt also that the regional idea should be emphasized, and, therefore, that the words "North Atlantic" should be used. However, to make possible the inclusion of Italy and Switzerland, the word "Area" was added after "North Atlantic", as it was thought that this would widen the geographical concept.

6 (a) A Preamble combining some of the features of the preamble to the Treaty of Brussels and making it clear that the main object of the instrument would be to preserve western civilization in the geographical area covered by the Pact. The Preamble should also refer to the desirability of the conclusion of further security pacts under Article 51 to the end that all free nations should eventually be covered by such pacts.

This caused considerable discussion. It was felt that the Brussels Preamble, with certain consequential changes because of the wider character of the pact, was a useful model.

It was also felt that the Preamble should make it clear that the North Atlantic Pact was only one regional security arrangement, which might be followed by others. Indeed, there was one other already in existence, the Rio Pact. The Americans were anxious not to give the impression that this particular North Atlantic Pact was to be the nucleus for a general security arrangement, but rather that there would be a number of such pacts, which would interlock and which might eventually coalesce into a general security pact, which would be open to all free nations. Such a development would, of course, only be necessary or desirable if the United Nations continued to be inadequate as a guarantor of national security.

6 (b) A provision that an armed attack by any state against any party to the Pact is an attack against all the parties; that in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter each party undertakes to give immediately to any other party which is attacked by any State, all the military, economic, and other aid and assistance in its power.

This is a vitally important provision. It is a combination, recommended by us, of the Rio and Brussels mutual assistance paragraphs. In discussion of this provision at our last meeting in Washington, Mr. Douglas raised the following points:

(1) Should there not be a precise definition of a guaranteed geographical area and of what constitutes armed attack, as in the Rio Pact? The argument against this is that, when you begin to define, you play into the hands of the aggressor by telling him what to avoid. On the other hand, a vague and general statement of this kind might, according to Douglas, worry Congress because of the all-embracing nature of the obligation. In reply to this, it was pointed out that each signatory of the Pact would itself determine whether an armed attack had taken place.

(2) Douglas also brought up the question of whether this guarantee meant that military forces of all the signatories would have to be moved at once to the actual point of attack. It was, however, made quite clear to him that no such intention was meant, and that each state would judge how it would implement its obligation for the provision of military, economic and other aid. If, for instance, there were an attack on Belgium, Canada's assistance to Belgium might conceivably take the form of moving troops to Fort Churchill in the first instance, and, in the long run, might take the form of concentrating on industrial production. The whole matter remained open.

(3) Douglas also brought up the very important point whether a forthright military guarantee of this kind might not be considered by the U.S.S.R. as so provocative as to bring about, immediately, the aggression they were seeking to prevent. It was felt, however, and he agreed eventually with this view, that the deterrent effect of this provision was greater than its provocative possibilities; that, in fact, a strong collective guarantee of this kind was our best hope for the prevention of war. If, in spite of or because of such a guarantee, the U.S.S.R. commenced an aggression, this might even, in the long run, be an advantage. It would at least ensure that the aggressor was fighting against the United democracies and was not able to attack them separately, one by one.

6 (c) Arrangements for consultation between all the parties in the event of any party considering that its political independence or territorial integrity is threatened.

Whereas 6 (b) deals with an armed attack where action on the part of the signatories is obligatory, 6 (c) deals with consultation in case of a threat of attack, armed or otherwise. It was felt that the provision for consultation should cover not merely the threat of armed attack but also that of indirect aggression. There was considerable discussion, in fact, whether there should not be a more specific provision in the Pact covering indirect aggression as the method of attack which would be most likely used in the future by an aggressor.

The United States were willing to go quite far in the inclusion of a provision which would have attempted to define indirect aggression and specify measures for its prevention. For that purpose, they submitted a definition which, as it happened, had been put forward by Molotov himself in the course of the Anglo-Soviet Mutual Assistance Discussions of 1939. The British, however, felt that indirect aggression could not and should not be defined, as this might suggest that the — signatory powers were attempting to interfere in the internal affairs of other states. As such it would be attacked by the communists and some non-communists as the beginning of a new Holy Alliance. Jebb pointed out that the subject had come up at the Brussels discussions and that the French had been adamant there in rejecting any guarantee against indirect aggression or any attempt to define it. As a result, it was decided to refer to it in the somewhat general terms of 6 (c).

6 (d) Authority to establish such agencies as may be necessary for effective implementation of the treaty including the working out of plans for prompt and effective action under (b) above.

This provides for the establishment of a Consultative Agency. We suggested that such an agency might be called the Board for Collective Defence, which would have as one of its sub-divisions a Military Cooperation Committee. It was felt that this matter might be given further detailed consideration, but that all that needed to be done at this stage was to agree on the principle.

6 (e) Duration of ten years, with automatic renewal for five year periods unless denounced.

This also caused some discussion. It was felt that the fifty year period of the Brussels Pact was too long and that a shorter period would be better to emphasize the emergency character of the arrangements. Ten years was agreed on.

In the discussions as to what else might be included in the Security Pact, I stated more than once that the document should not be exclusively military in character and that there were economic and even spiritual defences against communist attack which should not be overlooked. I felt that the Brussels arrangements had taken these important factors into consideration and it was even more important that the North Atlantic Pact should do so. Otherwise, it would be considered as merely another old fashioned military alliance. The ideas that I had in mind were embodied in the following paragraphs (one to be included in the preamble and one in the body of the Pact):

Preamble

To co-operate in creating a firm economic and social basis for defence against aggression, both direct and indirect.

A Provision in the Pact to the effect that the signatories will make every effort, individually and cooperatively, to promote the economic well being of their peoples, and to achieve social justice, thereby creating an overwhelming superiority of moral, material, and military force on the side of peace and progress.

There was general agreement with the above paragraphs and it was felt that when further consideration was given next week to the detailed provisions of the Pact they, or something like them, might be included.

It was emphasized that the provisions which had been recommended were in broad outline only and the details remained to be filled in. It was also emphasized that additional provisions would no doubt occur to the Governments concerned and that when the official discussions were resumed next Tuesday, such additional proposals might be brought forward.

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from Pearson for Ambassador only, Begins: I had a long talk with the Prime Minister on my return about our discussions and left with him a copy of the recommendations, also a supplementary memorandum, copy of which I am sending to you. Mr. King expressed himself as greatly pleased with the course that the discussions had taken and the resulting recommendations. He thought that from our point of view they could not be better. He is, however, anxious to include in them a sentence on economic cooperation in the preamble and an article on the same subject in the Pact itself along the lines of the draft which we submitted at the last meeting and which I showed to him.

I do not propose myself to return to Washington for any talks this week unless you think that it is desirable. Foulkes, however, will be going down for a couple of days. I assume that when the discussions are resumed to-morrow or Wednesday, both the U.K. and U.S. will be in a position to give general governmental approval or otherwise of the draft recommendations. If they are approved, then I suppose the work of drafting a more complete text will begin. On this, of course, we may have something to say, especially in the clause which would deal with the implementing agency. Ends.<sup>30</sup>

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Pearson only from Wrong, Begins: Reference your EX-823 of March 29th and previous messages concerning the discussions in Washington on a Security Pact for the north Atlantic area.

At a meeting today<sup>31</sup> the United States produced a somewhat revised version of last week's draft. The changes resulted mainly from indirect Congressional soundings. Douglas, who has left for London, likes the revised draft, as does Lovett. Gruenther reported that Forrestal was enthusiastic when he was shown it this morning.

2. General Foulkes is taking a copy of the new draft to Ottawa today, which he will pass on to you. The chief changes are (1) the expansion of the former paragraph 6(b) in the new paragraphs 5(b), (c) and (d), and (2) the omission of former paragraph 3, and the addition of Italy in the new paragraph 3.

3. The alterations make the draft conform more closely to the Rio model. The Political considerations which influenced this development are, of course, (A) the Congress is familiar with, and approves of, the Rio arrangement, (B) the United States would not appear to be so tightly committed.

Note I spoke to J.D. H[ickerson] about next meeting. He hopes for March 30 — would prefer 31st from his own p[oint] of view but realizes need for haste. He could give me no definite word until tomorrow — 30th. I informed L.B. P[earson] by telephone 5 p.m. L.B. P[earson] would like us to telephone him as soon as we have news. T.A. S[tone]

<sup>31</sup> Pour le procès-verbal des États-Unis, voir :

For the minutes prepared by the United States, see:

FRUS, 1948, III, pp. 70-1.

4. Hickerson appears to consider that self-help aspects should be emphasized as a return for United States backing, as they are in the E.R.P. For this reason he believes that the United States should exert some, although not heavy, pressure to encourage the Scandinavian countries to join the Brussels group. The United States, he said, should not sell any European nation down the river, but elementary logic and justice entitled those who were willing to help themselves to the first claim on United States assistance.

5. The British did not altogether agree. Mr. Bevin, according to Jebb, thought that pressure on the Scandinavians to join the Brussels Pact might produce the opposite result. They seemed to think that Norway, Sweden and Denmark might be more willing to join the wider Atlantic group than the Brussels Pact. In this case, to protect the Scandinavians while the wider arrangements were being concluded, the British suggested that the Scandinavian countries might be included in the President's declaration. In any event, the British wished to find a way of avoiding the risk of inviting Soviet aggression in Scandinavia, which might arise if proposals were made which those countries would not accept and they were thereby excluded, in appearance at least, from Western security agreements.

6. In the new draft the Italian situation is treated somewhat differently. The idea that Italy might be invited at once to adhere to the Brussels Pact is dropped, partly because not enough time is left before the elections. Instead in the proposed President's declaration "an armed attack against a signatory of the Brussels Pact, or against Italy," would be considered as an armed attack against the United States.

7. A major point discussed at some length was the area in which the provisions of the Pact apply. Jebb pointed out that the smaller participating countries would probably object if the Pact were to become operative in the event of attacks delivered, for example, in the Near and Far East. I mentioned that the Rio Treaty applied only in a defined area, which excluded the Hawaiian Islands, and added that the greater the area covered the looser would be the provisions of the Pact. I took the line that Alaska, Greenland and Newfoundland must be included, but that there must be some territorial limitation. I suggested that similar Pacts under Article 51 might cover the Far East and Middle East, and that the connection between these pacts would be provided by overlapping participation of the larger Powers; this would not close the door to the eventual development of a world-wide arrangement. There seemed to be general agreement to this point of view, and the question will be considered again tomorrow.

8. A rough draft of a North Atlantic Pact has been prepared in the State Department. This was not circulated, but Hickerson read a part of it incorporating your suggestions on economic co-operation. The language of your proposal was included almost verbatim in the preamble, and the following article appears in the pact itself: "The high contracting parties will make every effort, individually and collectively, to promote the economic well-being of their peoples and to achieve social justice, in order to create overwhelming moral and material superiority, as well as military security, in the cause of peace and progress."

9. Among less important points discussed, it was agreed that the reference in paragraph 5(d) of the latest draft to Article 54 of the Charter was dangerous and that the language of Article 51 should be used instead as in the Brussels Pact. In my view, it is desirable that the new pact should be kept distinct from regional arrangements under chapter 8 of the Charter, which are designed to deal with matters arising inside a region. Furthermore, Article 54 would impose a strict obligation to keep the Security Council informed of "activities in contemplation" under regional arrangements and might well be regarded as covering staff talks.

10. It was decided to omit Switzerland from the list of countries to be invited to the conference envisaged in paragraph 5, in favour of a diplomatic approach to the Swiss to say that their participation in the pact would be welcome if they so desired.

11. Mr. Bevin, for some reason, prefers to call the Pact a Defence Pact instead of a Security Pact. This does not seem to matter.

12. Foulkes can inform you of the opinions expressed about the probable reception of the proposals by the United States Chiefs of Staff. There was some discussion of the competition which may well develop between the economic needs of Western Europe under E.R.P. and the military needs both of the United States itself and of the other parties for military equipment and supplies which are already in much too short supply to go round. The conclusion is that, if the proposals are acted upon, there will be a series of very important decisions to be taken on priorities and allocations, which must be settled on high political grounds and not on purely military grounds.

13. It was mentioned at the meeting that both the French and the Dutch Foreign Offices have some inkling that these talks are going on, but they apparently do not know that Canada is included in them and believe that they are confined to the United States and United Kingdom. This emphasizes the need for speed. Hickerson told me that he hopes that we might get more into the open in a fortnight. Another meeting, perhaps the final one of this group, will be held tomorrow afternoon, when the draft will be revised in the light of today's discussion. The United States Chiefs of Staff are considering the paper today, and we expect to receive their initial observations on it.

14. Hickerson asked me again whether Canada would wish to be associated in the initial discussions with the signatories of the Brussels Pact. I said that, in my judgment, that was a matter between the United States Government and the signatories. I added that we would like to take part in the drafting of the proposals for the North Atlantic Pact. Ends.

The purpose of this paper is to recommend a course of action adequate to give effect to the declaration of March 17 by the President of the United States of support for the free nations of Europe.<sup>33</sup> So far as the United States Government is concerned, the recommendations made will require close consultation with political leaders of both parties in order that whatever policy is formulated may be a truly bipartisan American policy.

Recommendations

1. Diplomatic approaches to be made by the Government of the United States to the signatories of the Brussels Pact in order to secure their approval to its extension in the manner outlined below and to inform them of plans for the conclusion of a Security Pact for the North Atlantic Area, details of which are given below.

2. Immediate inquiries then to be made of Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Iceland through diplomatic channels by the United Kingdom and France, with the consent of Benelux, as to whether they would be prepared to accede to the Brussels Treaty provided the President of the United States made a declaration along the lines of that recommended in paragraph 3 below.

3. The President of the United States should make a declaration of American intention, in the light of the obligations assumed by the signatories of the Brussels Pact and pending the conclusion of the Security Pact referred to in paragraph 5 below, to consider an armed attack against a signatory of the Brussels Pact or against Italy as an armed attack against the United States to be dealt with by the United States in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. This declaration of support might include an expression of willingness to consider whether any specific case of indirect aggression should be deemed to be an armed attack. The President's declaration would state that similar support would be extended to other free democracies of Western Europe whose accession to the Brussels Pact was also approved by the United States. It should not exclude the possibility of the United States similarly supporting any other Western European democracy which was the victim of an armed attack and defended itself resolutely.

4. Simultaneously with this declaration an Anglo-American declaration to be made to the effect that the two countries are not prepared to countenance any attack on the political independence or territorial integrity of Greece, Turkey, or Iran, and that in the event of such an attack and pending the possible negotiation of some general Middle Eastern security system, they would feel bound, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, to afford the States named all the assistance in their power.

5. Invitations to be issued by the United States to the United Kingdom, France, Canada, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland, The Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Eire, Italy and Portugal to take part in a conference with a view to the conclusion of a Security Pact for the North Atlantic Area designed to give maximum effect, as between the parties, to the provisions of the United Nations Charter, and containing the following main provisions:

(a) A Preamble combining some of the features of the preamble to the Treaty of Brussels and making it clear that the main object of the instrument would be to preserve western civilization in the geographical area covered by the Pact. The Preamble should also refer to the desirability of the conclusion of further security pacts under the Charter of the United Nations to the end that all free nations should eventually be covered by such pacts.

(b) A provision that armed attack by any State against any party to the Pact shall be considered as an attack against all the parties and that each party accordingly undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.

(c) A provision to the effect that each Contracting Party shall determine for itself whether there has occurred an armed attack within the meaning of the agreement, and a provision following the lines of Article III, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty to the effect that, in the request of the State or States directly attacked, and until coordinated measures have been agreed upon, each one of the Contracting Parties shall determine the immediate measures which it may individually take in fulfilment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity.

(d) Provision to the effect that action taken or definitely agreed upon under the Treaty shall, as provided in Article 54 of the Charter, be promptly reported to the Security Council and cease when the Security Council shall have taken the necessary steps to maintain or restore peace and security.<sup>34</sup>

(e) Arrangements for consultation between all the parties in the event of any party considering that its territorial integrity or political independence is threatened by armed attack or indirect aggression.

(f) Authority to establish such agencies as may be necessary for effective implementation of the treaty including the working out of plans for prompt and effective action under (b) and (c) above.

(g) Duration of ten years, with automatic renewal for five year periods unless denounced.

6. When circumstances permit, Germany (or the three Western Zones), Austria (or the three Western Zones) and Spain should be invited to adhere to the Brussels Treaty and to the Security Pact for the North Atlantic Area. This objective, which should not be publicly disclosed, could be provided for by a suitable accession clause in the Security Pact.

7. Political and military conversations to be initiated forthwith with the parties to the Brussels Treaty and in due course with the parties to the Security Pact with a view to coordinating their military and other efforts and strengthening their collective security.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

I am enclosing herewith a telegram from Mr. Wrong regarding yesterday's meeting on the above subject, which he attended, along with General Foulkes. I am also attaching a telegram which I sent him this morning. This telegram suggests the inadvisability of one of the changes proposed yesterday by the United States members to the original draft. There were certain other changes, also proposed by the Americans, but I do not need to go into them in this memorandum, as I will be sending you a revised memorandum with those changes. I think it particularly unfortunate, however, that the Americans should have suggested a provision in the pact to the effect "that each contracting party shall determine for itself whether there has occurred an armed attack within the meaning of the Agreement." The telegram which I sent to Mr. Wrong will explain my point of view on the matter, with which I hope you will agree. I discussed the matter with Mr. Wrong on the telephone, and he feels as I do about this particular change. He said that the British have the same doubts and will produce, at the meeting this afternoon, a redraft of this paragraph. My own preference would be to omit these lines entirely, but if that is impossible, to modify them along the lines of my telegram. Mr. Wrong seems to think that this can be done and that the Americans will accept it.

You will note that Hickerson asked Wrong whether Canada would wish to be associated in the initial discussions with the signatories of the Brussels Pact, with a view to the widening of that Agreement. Wrong stated his view that we would not wish to be so included, and I think that he is right. I would, however, be glad to have your opinion on this matter.<sup>35</sup>

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Ambassador only from Pearson, Begins: I have read the text of the new draft of the security agreement which Foulkes gave me yesterday afternoon. Some of the changes are, I think, improvements, and others do not matter much one way or the other, but I think the new 6(c) is definitely a change for the worse. I realise, of course, that the type of guarantee to be given is largely a matter for the United States to decide itself, but my own view is that the spelling out that "Each contracting party shall determine for itself whether there has occurred an armed attack within the meaning of the Agreement" will have a very discouraging effect on those who might wish to sign the agreement and an equally encouraging effect on those who are expected to be deterred from aggression by it. It will be interpreted as reducing to almost nothing the obligatory character of the obligation. I realize that the determination of whether an armed attack has in fact taken place is the right of the individual signatories, but surely that can be left implicit rather than made explicit. If the United States feel, however, that, in its original form, the Article was too indefinite for Congress to take, then could it not be changed somewhat as follows: "A provision to the effect that on determination that an armed attack within the meaning of the Agreement has taken place and until coordinated measures have been agreed upon, each one of the contracting parties at the request of the state or states directly attacked shall determine, etc."

The fact that 6(b) has also been weakened in the new draft would seem to make all the more desirable that the first three lines of 6(c) should be omitted or altered as suggested above. Ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

The following are the changes suggested at yesterday's meetings by the Americans to the Recommendations, which were sent to you with my memorandum of March 27th:

1. Paragraph 3 regarding Italy joining the Brussels Pact is omitted.
2. Paragraph 4 — This omission is counterbalanced somewhat by the addition of the words "or against Italy" after the words "signatory to the Brussels Pact".
3. In Paragraph 6, Switzerland is omitted as one of the countries that might be invited to the North Atlantic Conference. The original invitation would have referred to a "Conference for the conclusion of a Security Pact for the North Atlantic Area, based on Article 51 of the United Nations Charter." The new draft reads: "A Conference with a view to the conclusion of a Security Pact for the North Atlantic Area, designed to give the maximum effect as between the parties to the provisions of the United Nations Charter."
4. Paragraph 6(b) specified in the original draft that the undertaking was "to give immediately to any other party which is attacked, by any state, all the military economic and other aid and assistance in its power." The new United States draft weakens this undertaking somewhat by re-wording it as follows: "Each party accordingly undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by Article 51 of the Charter."
5. The United States, after the old 6(b), has introduced a new paragraph, with which I have dealt in a separate Memorandum: "A provision to the effect that each Contracting Party shall determine for itself whether there has occurred an armed attack within the meaning of the agreement, and a provision following the lines of Article III, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty to the effect that, in the request of the State or States directly attacked, and until coordinated measures have been agreed upon, each one of the Contracting Parties shall determine the immediate measures which it may individually take in fulfilment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity."
6. Another new paragraph is introduced to emphasize the role of the Security Council as follows: "6(d) Provision to the effect that action taken or definitely agreed upon under the Treaty shall, as provided in Article 54 of the Charter, be promptly reported to the Security Council and cease when the Security Council shall have taken the necessary steps to maintain or restore peace and security." This seems to me to be a useful change.

7. In the original 6(c), after the words "is threatened", are added "by armed attack or indirect aggression". This, I think, is also a useful change.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Washington, April 1, 1948

Dear Jack [Hickerson]:

Since our meeting yesterday afternoon I have been pondering especially one provision in the latest draft — the first three lines of paragraph 5(c). I have also been able to secure Mike Pearson's views, since Foulkes went back by air to Ottawa yesterday afternoon, and gave Mike a copy of the draft. His views and mine coincide. We both think that this part of paragraph 5(c) as now drafted would have a very discouraging effect on those who might wish to sign the agreement, and an equally encouraging effect on those who are expected to be deterred from aggression by it. We fear that it will be interpreted as very seriously qualifying the obligatory character of the agreement. We all agree that determination of the question whether an armed attack has in fact taken place is a prerogative inherent in the sovereignty of each of the signatories. Surely, however, we should be able to find some way of saying this without making it look like an open escape hatch.

Jebb is, I know, trying his hand at a new draft of paragraph 5(b). I enclose three alternative suggestions, arranged in order of preference, for altering paragraph 5(c). Any one of these would meet my chief cause of anxiety.

There are many variants which could be developed to the third suggestion. What I have in mind is that the document should be so phrased as not to allow anyone to think that the obligation of the agreement could be escaped in the event of open aggression of the type of Hitler's attack on Poland in 1939, and to limit in words the qualification to doubtful cases, of which an extreme example might be the occupation of Spitzbergen without any fighting by a party of Soviet "scientists".

I am sending a copy of this letter to Jebb.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

Suggestion 1:

Omit first three lines of Paragraph 5(c).

Suggestion 2:

If Paragraph 5(b) of the latest draft remains unchanged, Paragraph 5(c) might be altered on the following lines:

“A provision to the effect that on determination that an armed attack within the meaning of the Agreement has taken place, and until co-ordinated measures have been agreed upon, each one of the Contracting Parties, at the request of the State or States directly attacked, etc.”

Suggestion 3:

Again on the assumption that Paragraph 5(b) remains unchanged, Paragraph 5(c) might be broken up on the following lines:

“A provision to the effect that should a Contracting Party request assistance on ground that it has been the object of an armed attack, and should there be doubt whether an armed attack has occurred within the meaning of the Agreement, each Contracting Party shall determine for itself whether such an armed attack has taken place.”

The latter part of paragraph 5(c) beginning “Until co-ordinated measures have been agreed upon” would then constitute a separate sub-paragraph, with some minor changes.

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Pearson only from Wrong, Begins: Reference our telephone conversation. In the version considered this afternoon,<sup>36</sup> paragraph 5(b) of the draft given you by Foulkes yesterday has been changed to read as follows:

“Provision that each party shall regard any action in the area covered by the Agreement, which it considers an armed attack against any other party, as an armed attack against itself and that each party accordingly undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.”

In addition, the first three lines of paragraph 5(c) have been deleted.

2. This is a distinct improvement, but if you can think of something still better which will meet the United States situation, I might possibly persuade Hickerson to adopt it tomorrow morning.

3. I shall send tomorrow a full report on the final meeting of the group this afternoon. Ends.

In looking over my rather copious notes about yesterday's discussion it strikes me that one deliberate statement and several half inadvertent remarks struck the keynote. I am sure that you noticed them, and the purpose of this note is only to write down these rather interesting sidelights.

It seemed that Donald Maclean carried the discussion for Jebb because the latter wanted to put across a major point in winding up the discussions. In extricating himself from the rather detailed and technical points which had arisen, Jebb appeared to want to leave the paramount impression with Hickerson that the United States must, preferably by agreement but essentially in any other way, underwrite the security of Western Europe to avert war.

In this he may have been attempting to avert the obvious, but unsaid uncommittal attitude on Hickerson's part which was revealed in his half joking remark in reply to your sally that the United States would be prepared to give armed support in the event of aggression only to Canada, the United Kingdom and France.

Another indication supporting this interpretation was the version of paragraph (b) agreed upon by both the United States and the United Kingdom last night when they added a proviso that all parties should assist in meeting attack with all the means in their power. When Jebb brought up that phrase yesterday it was quickly disowned by the United States as having been tossed out some time ago.

The remaining point which seems significant was General Gruenther's statement about the present "frame of mind of the United States Chiefs of Staff".

A record of the discussion is being typed now.

Reference yesterday's discussion.

Achilles opened the meeting by saying that the first paragraph was redrafted to make the whole paper a purely U.S. draft. It was then agreed, on your suggestion, that it should be named an "agreement" rather than a "pact" or a "treaty", and that the word "collective" should be added to its title.

Paragraph 2 spelled out that the approach to the Scandinavian countries and Iceland should be made by the U.S. as well as the United Kingdom and France, and also indicated that the countries approached should know about the wider arrangements initially. Respecting the same paragraph Hickerson mentioned that the U.K. and France should support any intent on the part of the United States to meet an armed attack in the immediate future. In this connection, Hickerson reiterated his thought yesterday that countries which helped themselves should have a priority on U.S. assistance. He suggested that a time limit should be put on the period during which the Scandinavian countries may decide to accede to the Atlantic Pact. Jebb indicated at this point that the main objective was to bring the Scandinavian countries into a wide security arrangement. In the discussion about the details and phrasing of this paragraph, Hickerson said that no very useful purpose would be served by niceties of drafting agreed on at the meeting since the whole thing was preliminary and, of course, subject to change.

With reference to paragraph 4, Achilles said that the phrase "all assistance in their power" should not be added because it was more than could be reasonably required of the smaller powers.

Respecting paragraph 5(b), I think you remarked that the phrase "which it considers" left a rather undesirable loophole. It was agreed that the phrasing in (b) and (c) is apt since it allows concerted action by one or two powers without the necessity of a 2/3 vote or anything of that kind. You remarked that the drafting was important in these paragraphs because it may influence the version which will be acceptable to the congressional leaders.

Again with respect to paragraph (b), you enquired whether the phrase "an armed attack" would entail a declaration of a state of war by the other parties. It was agreed that this would be the case but for constitutional reasons, it was inadvisable to spell it out from the U.S. point of view. In paragraph (c), on your suggestion, it was decided that "will" should be substituted for the word "may" in the sixth line.

Hickerson brought up the point that the wording "assist in meeting the attack" in paragraph (b) would not oblige the United States to go to war, for instance, in the case of aggression on Norway.

The delineation of the area covered by the agreement spelled out in paragraph (e) was then discussed. Jebb was somewhat dubious about the wisdom of this paragraph since it excluded armed attack in such places as Greece. After some discussion it was decided that the paragraph should be changed in the following way to include:

(a) The area should cover the continental territory in Europe or in North America of any party.

(b) Territory in Europe occupied by the forces of any party.

(c) Phraseology designed to include the North Atlantic islands. A rather interesting point arose out of this discussion. It could not be decided how to protect sovereign islands in the North Atlantic area without including the Azores in this definition, which would relieve Portugal of the responsibility of adhering to the pact on its own initiative. The debateable point was whether it was desirable to name any country that was a party to the pact specifically.

In paragraph 7 the wording was changed to increase the chances for immediate security in the case of those who were willing to help themselves.

At the end of the discussion Hickerson said that the next move would be for Lovett to take preliminary soundings with Vandenberg and possibly Connally.<sup>37</sup> You emphasized that it would be necessary to adhere to a very tight schedule and it was thought that the discussions between the U.S., U.K. and Benelux might start sometime next week, but more probably the week after. At best the conference could be called early in May, but if the arrangements did not work out neatly it was considered likely that it would be held in June.

TELEGRAM WA-939

Washington, April 2, 1948

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for Pearson, only, from Wrong, Begins: Reference our telephone conversation this morning and my WA-929 of April 1st.†

I have put your suggestion about paragraph 5(b) to Hickerson, who likes it at first glance and undertakes to go into it carefully.

2. The Paper is now out of our hands, and has become ostensibly a purely United States proposal for clearance with the top people in the Administration and a few Congressional leaders. I shall, therefore, not send by teletype the full text of the last revision, but shall forward it by bag tomorrow with a commentary dealing mainly with the discussions at this week's meetings. Your summary of last week's discussions covers the ground so well that I have nothing to add.

3. As to the timetable, Hickerson hopes that the Paper will be cleared with Lovett, Forrestal and the President by the beginning of the week. The first two are already familiar with its contents. If all agree, direct political soundings would be taken early next week with Vandenberg and one or two others in Congress. The Paper might then also go through the National Security Council, which already has before it a Paper similar to or identical with the draft tabled by the United States representatives on March 24th, the text of which was repeated to you in our WA-876 of March 29th.† Alternatively, it might be cleared with the Secretaries of the three Service Departments and the Chiefs of Staff without formal consideration by the National Security Council.

4. If all goes well, the discussions with the parties to the Brussels Treaty envisaged in paragraph 1 of the Paper might take place at the earliest late next week, but more probably around April 12th. They hope that Bonnet would be instructed to represent the French and Van Kleffens the Benelux partners. Spaak will be in Washington next week and he might then be consulted. This approach, if successful, could be followed at once by diplomatic approaches to the Scandinavian countries and Italy, probably giving them a week or two to make up their minds.

5. At best the President's statement could not be made until late in April, and the Conference for the conclusion of the North Atlantic Agreement could not meet at earliest before early May. Late May is a more likely date. If the Congressional leaders favour putting the pact to Congress before adjournment in mid June, every effort will have to be made to speed up the timetable. They may think it better for the pact to be negotiated but to postpone Senate consideration until after the elections, in which case the timetable would be slowed down.

6. Hickerson emphasizes that the Paper is "a pick and shovel draft" and that it is certain to be changed in a good many respects during the processes of clearance here as well as later on. He thinks it possible that the idea of concluding the pact in the near future may encounter such strong opposition that they will have to concentrate on the President's declaration and leave the pact over for the time being. He says that the President's declaration would require just as elaborate a process of clearance domestically as the pact itself. He thinks that at some early stage they may want to clear the proposals with the leading Republican candidates.

7. Every effort will be made to preserve complete secrecy, at any rate until after the talks with the parties to the Brussels pact. Some public announcement may be made at that time, as otherwise there would be sure to be leaks. Ends.

Washington, April 2, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I am enclosing several copies of the paper looking toward the conclusion of a North Atlantic Pact in the form in which it was left at the end of the final discussion yesterday. The purpose of this letter is to comment on the changes in the text from that taken back to Ottawa on March 31st by General Foulkes. At the close of the meeting Mr. Hickerson said that we could doubtless hold several more meetings and make further drafting changes which would improve the paper. Since, however, the object of the paper was to outline a possible course of action and since it was likely to be modified, during the process of clearing here and because the several steps would not probably have exactly the planned results, we ought, in his view, to discontinue our informal talks, especially because of the tightness of the timetable and the need for quick results.

Almost every paragraph of the paper has been changed in some respect from the previous draft. I shall only indicate in this letter the changes of substance and the reasons for which they were made.

In the first recommendation, the proposed Pact is described as "a collective defence agreement for the North Atlantic area" instead of "a security pact for the North Atlantic area". Mr. Bevin for some reason prefers in this connection the word "defence" to the word "security". The substitution of "agreement" for "pact" was made, since it is a more general term. It was thought that probably in the end the agreement would be called a treaty.

In the second paragraph, the first significant change is to include Italy as well as the Scandinavian countries at the second stage of the discussions, provided that this stage is reached after the Italian elections. It is also provided that the approach is to be made by the United States as well as by France and the United Kingdom, and the countries concerned are to be told about the plan for a North Atlantic defence agreement as well as to be asked whether they would accede to the Brussels Treaty in the near future if the President made the proposed declaration.

The third paragraph has been rearranged to put in the forefront the project of a North Atlantic agreement. Because of the suggestion that Italy should be invited to accede to the Brussels Treaty at the same time as the Scandinavian countries, the President's declaration of support would be limited to the signatories of the Brussels Treaty (of course including any of these States which acceded to it) during the interim period before the North Atlantic agreement could come into effect. The last two sentences have been somewhat rephrased with the object of encouraging accession to the Brussels Treaty by the five named countries and other Western European democracies. We had some discussion about how long the Scandinavian countries and Italy should be given to make up their mind about the Brussels Treaty so that they would qualify for full U.S. support in the interim period. Jebb thought that the main purpose should be to bring them into the North Atlantic agreement rather than into the Brussels Agreement. Hickerson suggested that the United Kingdom as well as the United States should join in any assurance of support for eligible countries which did not elect to accede to the Brussels Treaty, and Jebb did not take issue with this view.

The only change in paragraph 4 is to bring in a reference at the end to support under Article 51 of the Charter instead of the more exact promise that the U.K. and U.S. would afford "all the assistance in their power" to Greece, Turkey, or Iran if they were attacked. This was done partly because a pledge of "all the assistance in their power" might be interpreted by the country attacked as involving the immediate despatch of forces to assist in its defence, whereas the implied promise would be to free the country attacked by defeating the attacker in whatever way high strategy might require.

I forgot to mention in connection with the first sentence of this paragraph that Switzerland has been omitted from the list of countries to be invited to the conference on the understanding that a secret approach would be made to the Swiss Government saying that their participation would be welcome if they desired to join. You will also notice in the same sentence that the President's invitations to the conference would also be preceded by secret enquiries in the case of the thirteen countries named in the paragraph.

The outline of the preamble to the proposed agreement is unchanged except verbally by the addition of a specific reference to Article 51 instead of a general reference to the Charter.

Paragraph 5(b) has already been the subject of an exchange of messages between us. I pointed out that the exact language of the paper was more important in paragraph 5 as a whole than in the earlier paragraphs, especially since if it was accepted by the congressional leaders they might not be prepared to agree to any change of substance later on on the crucial points. I have already informed you that your suggestion that the phrase toward the beginning of the paragraph "which it considers" should be changed to "which is considered" has been passed to Hickerson this morning and that he thought well of it at first glance. When we were discussing this paragraph, I asked whether it was clear that each party would be bound to regard an admitted armed attack on another party as involving a declaration of war against the attacker. The Americans, of course, said that Congress alone had the right to declare war but that in fact they had no doubt that this would be the effect of the obligation.

Paragraph 5(c) contains a change of substance as the first three lines of the previous draft have been omitted because of the alteration in the language of 5(b). The use of the phrase "which it will individually take" in place of the phrase "which it may individually take" in this paragraph was made at my suggestion.

Paragraph 5(d) is only changed by the substitution of a reference to Article 51 in place of Article 54 of the Charter.

Paragraph 5(e) is new, resulting from a lengthy discussion at the meeting on Wednesday, and the first draft was considerably amended at yesterday's meeting. It was recognized all round that the language of this paragraph as it stands is not suitable for inclusion in a treaty. It was also recognized that if a war involving the Great Powers were to start anywhere in the world (e.g., by a Soviet attack on the U.S. forces in Korea), the North Atlantic agreement would be certain to come into operation, as attacks in the North Atlantic area would inevitably take place. It was thought, however, that most of the smaller countries would be hesitant about signing an agreement which would automatically involve them in war if there were trouble between the Great Powers in Asia and that therefore some territorial limitation had to be devised. In the present language there are several anomalies, of which an important one relates to the position of the North Atlantic islands. If Iceland does not become a party (and Hickerson now thinks it will not do so) or if the Azores were attacked after Portugal had refused to become a party, the view was expressed that nevertheless the agreement should come into operation. In the end it may turn out best, provided that all or nearly all the States invited to the conference ratify the agreement, to do what was done in the Inter-American Treaty and describe a defence zone within which the agreement applies.

Paragraph 5(f) is the same as the former 5(e) except for a verbal alteration, and the same applies to paragraphs 5(g) and 5(h), which are the old 5(f) and 5(g).

Paragraph 6 is unchanged, but there has been a change in paragraph 7, since this now provides only for political and military conversations with the parties to the Brussels Treaty. This change was made to bait the hook a little for the countries which are to be asked to accede to that treaty. I was assured that the limitation in language would not in any way interfere with political and military conversations between the United States and Canada.

I shall attempt to put into another letter to you in time for tomorrow's bag some broader reflections<sup>38</sup> inspired by the discussions in which I have participated.

Yours sincerely,

H.H. WRONG

[Washington], April 1, 1948

The purpose of this paper is to recommend a course of action adequate to give effect to the declaration of March 17 by the President of support for the free nations of Europe. The recommendations made will require close consultation with political leaders of both parties in order that whatever policy is formulated may be a truly bipartisan American policy.

Recommendations

1. Diplomatic approaches to be made by the Government of the United States to the signatories of the Five-Power Treaty signed at Brussels on March 17, 1948 in order to secure their approval to its extension in the manner outlined below and to inform them of plans for the conclusion of a collective defense agreement for the North Atlantic Area, details of which are given below.

2. An immediate approach then to be made to Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Iceland, and (if the Italian elections are over) also to Italy, through diplomatic channels, by the United States, United Kingdom and France, with the consent of Benelux, with the object of explaining to them the scheme for a declaration by the President on the lines of that recommended in paragraph 3 below, and of ascertaining whether they would be prepared in such circumstances to accede to the Five-Power Treaty in the near future and to enter into negotiations for the North Atlantic Defense Agreement.

3. The President to announce that invitations had been issued to the United Kingdom, France, Canada, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland, The Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Eire, Italy, and Portugal (provided that secret inquiries had established the fact that these countries would be prepared to accept the invitations) to take part in a conference with a view to the conclusion of a collective Defense Agreement for the North Atlantic Area designed to give maximum effect, as between the parties, to the provisions of the United Nations Charter. In his statement the President would include a declaration of American intention, in the light of the obligations assumed by the signatories of the Five-Power Treaty and pending the conclusion of the Defense Agreement, to consider an armed attack in the North Atlantic Area against a signatory of the Five-Power Treaty as an armed attack against the United States to be dealt with by the United States in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. The declaration would state that the United States would be disposed to extend similar support to any other free democracy in Western Europe which acceded to the Five-Power Treaty. If, as a result of the inquiries referred to in Paragraph 2 above, it appears that Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland, and Italy, or any of them, do not wish to accede to the Five-Power Treaty at this stage, consideration would need to be given, in the light of the views of each of the above states, to the extension to them of some assurance of immediate support in case of an armed attack against them which they resisted resolutely. In any event, the declaration would be so phrased as to avoid inviting aggression against any other free country in Europe.

4. Simultaneously with this declaration an Anglo-American declaration to be made to the effect that the two countries are not prepared to countenance any attack on the political independence or territorial integrity of Greece, Turkey, or Iran, and that in the event of such an attack and pending the possible negotiation of some general Middle Eastern security system, they would feel bound fully to support these states under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

5. It is contemplated that the Defense Agreement referred to in paragraph 3 above would contain the following main provisions:

(a) Preamble combining some of the features of the preamble to the Five-Power Treaty and making it clear that the main object of the instrument would be to preserve western civilization in the geographical area covered by the agreement. The Preamble should also refer to the desirability of the conclusion of further defense agreements under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations to the end that all free nations should eventually be covered by such agreements.

(b) Provision that each Party shall regard any action in the area covered by the agreement, which it considers an armed attack against any other Party, as an armed attack against itself and that each Party accordingly undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.

(c) Provision following the lines of Article III, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty to the effect that, at the request of the State or States directly attacked, and until coordinated measures have been agreed upon, each one of the Parties shall determine the immediate measures which it will individually take in fulfilment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity.

(d) Provision to the effect that action taken under the agreement shall, as provided in Article 51 of the Charter, be promptly reported to the Security Council and cease when the Security Council shall have taken the necessary steps to maintain or restore peace and security.

(e) Delineation of the area covered by the agreement to include (a) the continental territory in Europe or North America of any Party, (b) any territory in Europe occupied by the forces of any Party, (c) the islands in the North Atlantic whether sovereign or belonging to any Party, and (d) the waters of the North Atlantic and the air over them. (This would include Spitzbergen and other Norwegian Islands, Iceland, Greenland, Newfoundland and Alaska).

(f) Provision for consultation between all the parties in the event of any party considering that its territorial integrity or political independence is threatened by armed attack or indirect aggression in any part of the world.

(g) Provision for the establishment of such agencies as may be necessary for effective implementation of the agreement including the working out of plans for prompt and effective action under (b) and (c) above.

(h) Duration of ten years, with automatic renewal for five-year periods unless denounced.

6. When circumstances permit, Germany (or the three Western Zones), Austria (or the three Western Zones) and Spain should be invited to adhere to the Five-Power Treaty and to the Defense Agreement for the North Atlantic Area. This objective, which should not be publicly disclosed, could be provided for by a suitable accession clause in the Defense Agreement.

7. Political and military conversations to be initiated forthwith with the parties to the Five-Power Treaty with a view to coordinating their military and other efforts and strengthening their collective security.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

I am attaching, herewith, three memoranda<sup>39</sup> which I have sent to the Minister in the last day or two, together with the documents referred to in those memoranda.

The discussions on the official level were concluded on Thursday last, and further developments are now in the hands of the United States Government. The position seems to be as follows:

1. The timetable has slowed up somewhat, as the consideration being given in Washington to the questions that have been raised has taken somewhat longer than expected. My own feeling is that the Presidential statement will not now be issued before the end of April, or the North Atlantic Conference called before the beginning of June.

2. The Scandinavian States may not be persuaded to accede to the Brussels Pact, but may prefer to wait for the North Atlantic Conference and for the Security Pact

Documents 326 and 327 as well as another document (not printed).

which results from that Conference. There is a possibility that Sweden may not wish to sign any Pact.

3. It has been agreed that Italy should not be asked to accede to the Brussels Pact, but that, pending the conclusion of the North Atlantic Pact, she should be given the same guarantee in the Presidential statement as is given to the Brussels signatories.

4. There has been considerable discussion in Washington as to whether the North Atlantic Pact should include a provision stating specifically that each signatory will itself determine whether an armed attack has taken place against any other signatory. It would be a considerable political weakening of the Pact if this were spelt out rather than left implicit, and it was finally agreed that it would be desirable to avoid this weakening, if possible. The final form of the draft provision is satisfactory for this purpose, but the actual wording may further be changed by the United States authorities. Those authorities will, once questions of policy have been cleared with the Government, begin to work on the details of a draft for submission to the North Atlantic Conference when it meets. In this regard it is interesting to note that the provisions suggested by us for economic co-operation will be incorporated in the draft.

5. There was considerable discussion whether the North Atlantic Pact should cover a defined area only, as is done in the Rio Pact. It was agreed that this was desirable and that, for instance, an attack by the U.S.S.R. against United States troops in Korea would not automatically involve other signatories to the North Atlantic Pact. In the discussions in Washington we have supported a territorial limitation, and there seems to be general agreement with this point of view.

Washington, April 7, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Here are some general reflections on the discussions here last week and the week before about the conclusion of a North Atlantic Defence Agreement.

Some of the preoccupations of the U.S. Chiefs of Staff were revealed fairly clearly at last week's meetings. While I judge that they would agree that the conclusion of a North Atlantic Agreement would be more likely to be deterrent in its effect on the Soviet Union rather than provocative, it is their duty to take into account the possibility that the Soviet Union might conclude that time would henceforth work strongly against them. Therefore, if they do believe that war with the West is inevitable, they might conceivably decide to precipitate war before the bare bones of the Western alliance had developed muscle and sinew. In consequence, the strictly military view which Chiefs of Staff are bound to take may lead them to approve the proposal on a contingent basis, by attaching some such impossible condition as that the Agreement should be accompanied by full war mobilization in the United States. They themselves, except perhaps for Admiral Leahy, would recognize that such a condition could not be met, but they would leave it to their masters to take the political decision and overrule their military advice. We know pretty definitely that General Marshall and Mr. Forrestal (whom General Gruenther said was enthusiastic about the project) would advise the President to go ahead, and I feel fairly sure that the President would accept this advice.

The Chiefs of Staff may also take a difficult line over giving military assistance in terms of munitions of war to other parties to the North Atlantic Agreement. They may well advise that the military responsibilities of the United States under the Agreement would considerably exceed its strength, and that therefore for some years the total production of new weapons should be allocated to the United States forces. This, too, would be an impossible contingency, and if it were fulfilled the faith of other parties in the value of the Agreement would be shaken. In consequence, provision would have to be made, also by a political decision, for the allocation of scarce equipment and supplies to other countries.

In the same connection, the conclusion of the Agreement will intensify the competition for scarce supplies between military needs and the needs for economic development abroad as well as at home. Unless this is firmly and skilfully handled the effectiveness of the European Recovery Program could be gravely impaired. Steel is the obvious case in point. It was mentioned that supplies necessary for the re-establishment of the industries of the Ruhr, for instance, would be directly competitive with the needs of U.S. industry for military purposes. The Chiefs of Staff might argue that the Agreement, by incurring a risk of war at an early date, should be accompanied by more stringent export control over steel and other supplies needed for rearmament at home.

It was pointed out, and not only by some of the civilians present, that if a strictly military view of the consequences of the Agreement on the lines suggested above were to be adopted — the purpose, of course, being as rapid an increase as possible in the armed strength of the United States — the effect would certainly be that the United States would equip itself to fight a war on the model of the last war; the progress of research in the military field, however, indicated that in ten year's time military forces so equipped would be hopelessly out of date, so that too great a concentration on early rearmament might actually weaken the effective fighting power of the country in ten years or so, and might end in the Soviet Union having a more modern military establishment than the United States.

Another military concern, and one with which the civilian authorities should have every sympathy, came up at various times throughout the meetings. This was that no form of words should be employed in drafting the Agreement which could lead any party to expect that, if it was attacked, the other parties would immediately send forces to its direct assistance. If, for example, Sweden became a party and was invaded by Russia, the Agreement must not state or imply a commitment to send forces to Sweden. The commitment would be to defeat Russia according to the best strategic concept that could be devised. The offensive against Russia, however, should be undertaken anywhere and in any way that seemed best to the High Command.

The important thing from the European point of view is to secure a definite commitment from the United States extending over a sufficient period of years. Mr. Hickerson indicated cautiously several times that they might find that they were unable to go beyond a Presidential declaration made with the full approval of the leaders of both political parties. He said that this would be as difficult to "clear" with the politicians as a treaty commitment. The British and ourselves took every suitable opportunity of emphasizing that such a declaration would leave a great deal to be desired in the minds particularly of the European countries, and that what was required was a commitment binding on succeeding Congresses and a new Administration. This will, however, undoubtedly be one of the difficult hurdles for them to get over. We shall probably hear about how the Munroe Doctrine — a Presidential declaration — has stood the test of time for over a century, and how other countries should trust the word of a President of the United States without its being backed by a formal alliance, the conclusion of which in peacetime would be a tremendous reversal of the traditional national policy. No-one can say yet how many Senators, for instance, would take this line.

I think, however, that the Chiefs of Staff as well as the President's civil advisers on international and military affairs will exert strong pressure for the Agreement. The Chiefs of Staff want to know where they can operate. They hope to be able if war comes to undertake an effective and quick offensive, and to do this they must be sure in advance of the territory which they can employ. We had, for instance, some talk about the great value of Irish territory for submarine uses and the essentiality of airfields in Iceland, these two countries having been picked out for mention because of doubts whether they could be persuaded to become parties to the Agreement.

If an Agreement on the lines that were discussed becomes a reality, even though the parties might only be the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada and perhaps France and the Low Countries, it should considerably ease our problems in handling defence relations with the United States. For one thing, the military planning which would follow would tend to modify the concentration of the U.S.-Canadian planners on the defence of North America from outside attack. I have for a long time been worried lest our current defence arrangements with the United States should result in too great a concentration of effort and resources on the static defence of the continent, particularly in the case of Canada but also in some measure in the case of the United States. If the North Atlantic is bridged by a new defensive alliance, the problems of North American defence would become a small part of a larger plan, the purpose of which would be the means of defeating the potential enemy. In such a plan, the offensive aspect would be the primary consideration.

Furthermore, our own political difficulties about permitting U.S. forces to conduct certain operations or maintain certain facilities within Canadian territory ought to be substantially diminished if such activities could be seen as a fraction of a larger scheme.

I doubt that this letter contains much of value, and I have hesitated about sending it.

Yours sincerely,

H.H. WRONG

P.S. I enclose a copy of the Alsop Brothers' column which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune and other papers today.† You will see from it that information apparently based on the paper prepared at our meetings has reached the hands of the energetic Mr. Joseph Alsop. This has probably occurred in the course of the clearance of the policy with Congressional leaders. The leak, if leak it be, does not reveal that United States-United Kingdom-Canadian talks have already taken place, nor does it suggest that Canada would be invited to be a party to a defence agreement between the United States and the Western European nations. The article is written in a most understanding way, and I doubt that it will do any harm to the project.

Following for Pearson only from Wrong, Begins: I asked Hickerson yesterday about the progress made in clearing the security proposals. He said that the paper produced at our meetings had not yet been taken up with the Congressional leaders, although Lovett had twice talked to the President about it. Lovett himself is not completely convinced of the necessity of a pact in addition to a Presidential Declaration, although Hickerson thought it probable that he would come round to giving it his full support. The delay in making progress has mainly arisen from the tremendous pressure on Lovett's time in the last week.

2. I asked whether the project had been discussed with Spaak, who is here for all this week. He said that there had been a general discussion with Spaak of the United States relationship to the Brussels Treaty and to the defence of Western Europe, but no mention had been made of our discussions or of the possibility of early discussions between the United States and the parties to the Brussels Treaty. Spaak at one time had said that he was not particularly concerned about formal engagements, provided that the United States promise of support was publicly stated by the President. This opinion increased Lovett's hesitation over the project for a North Atlantic Agreement.

3. When Spaak accompanies the Prince Regent to Ottawa next week it is worth consideration whether something might be said to him about the importance of a formal commitment by the United States to supplement a Presidential Declaration, so as to bind a future Administration and future Congresses. It might be intimated to him that only in this way would it be possible for Canada to join the United States in underwriting Western European security. Hickerson has been using this argument with Lovett, although he has not given up hope that if they decide on only a Presidential Declaration the Canadian Government would say something to parallel it. I have told him again that this would be most unlikely.

4. He thinks it possible that they might be able to hold the talks with the parties to the Brussels Treaty late next week, but regards it as most unlikely that any North Atlantic Pact could now be negotiated in time for ratification at this session of Congress. He hopes that at least the Conference would be announced and the invitations issued before Congress rises. He may suggest that I should see Lovett to urge on him the importance of the North Atlantic Pact. Ends.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Washington, April 9, 1948

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

I have just sent you a message about a talk with Hickerson concerning the proposed North Atlantic Agreement. He told me yesterday that your suggestion for a minor emendation of the paper produced at our meetings had not been adopted as Lovett thought the original version was a little better from the point of view of clearance with congressional leaders. He made it clear, however, that if it came to drafting a pact, they would be quite ready to consider some other form of words.

In a postscript to my letter of April 7th I referred to the Alsop column which appeared that day. Hickerson doubts that there was any leak from those who knew about our discussions. He thinks that Alsop's reference to a presidential declaration followed by a security pact was intelligent conjecture.

He told me that Vandenberg planned to make a speech in the Senate next Wednesday on security problems in which he would refer to the Brussels Treaty and talk about the desirability of other regional agreements under the Charter. This prospect is likely to hasten the clearance with Vandenberg of the paper that we produced, since they obviously must prevent Vandenberg from taking a line which would be contrary to the proposals in that paper.

Hollis has been engaged in a series of talks at the Pentagon. I have not seen him since the last meeting and doubt I shall have an opportunity of doing so before he leaves for Ottawa on Sunday. When Foulkes was last here, he mentioned that agreement had been reached to conduct Staff talks on the general basis of the proposals in the paper and that these would be held even if no North Atlantic Pact was negotiated. He has designated Brigadier Smith to represent Canada in these talks. I daresay he has explained more fully to you what has been agreed upon, and you may get further enlightenment from Hollis when he visits Ottawa. If so, I should be glad if you would pass on to me what information you receive on this point.

Yours sincerely,

NORTH ATLANTIC COLLECTIVE DEFENCE AGREEMENT

I sent you Saturday the recent communications from Washington on the "North Atlantic Collective Defence Agreement" (Mr. Bevin seems to have succeeded in securing acceptance for this name).

The situation is now apparently as follows. The official talks have finished and a document agreed on, as a basis for discussion by United States Congressional and political leaders. This document should, I think, be satisfactory to us as it embodies most of the ideas which we favoured. It has been altered somewhat over the earlier draft, but most of the alterations seem to be improvements. The area of the agreement is now territorially limited; it is more closely connected with the Charter; it has been made clear that the obligation of mutual assistance does not necessarily mean sending forces to the point of aggression but in helping to defeat the aggressor by the best means available. This last point is an important one, both for the United States and ourselves.

The timetable has been set back over the earlier optimistic predictions. The "clearance" with Congressional leaders is not yet completed, and on its result will depend future procedure and policy in Washington. In any event, discussions with the Brussels powers will not likely be finished before the end of this week. This makes impossible any "guarantee" statement by the President before the Italian election, which is unfortunate. Discussions with other North Atlantic countries cannot begin until the "Brussels" talks finish. It seems unlikely therefore that there can be a Presidential statement before May, or a North Atlantic Conference before the end of that month. No resulting Treaty, therefore, could secure Senate approval during the present session of Congress. This is somewhat discouraging. However, the most important step is the Presidential statement of intention and if that can be made in early May, too much time will not have been lost. In the recent communications from Washington, two important points have been stressed, one, the attitude of the United States Services, two, the possibility that the United States Government might decide that no pact of any kind is necessary and that the situation can be met by a unilateral guarantee of assistance by the President after approval by Congressional leaders.

As to the first, United States Service chiefs have expressed some fear that the policy proposed, either by a Pact or a Presidential statement might provoke the U.S.S.R. to armed action. It can be argued convincingly that this is not likely, that the deterrent effect of this "collective security" policy will be far more decisive than its provocative effect. However, the military might use this risk to impose impossible conditions for their approval, e.g., partial mobilisation, an assurance that no arms and essential supplies will be exported until their own needs are filled. Such an attitude, if accepted, might have a most injurious effect on E.R.P. However, the Services may be putting their demands high for tactical purposes with the expectation of being over-ruled by a political decision. It is to be hoped that the necessary political decisions will be taken. However, all this is a matter for the United States Government.

Of more direct concern to us, and other countries, is the possibility that no pact at all will be negotiated by the United States. The argument here is that a unilateral guarantee of assistance to a selected group of states, if attacked, given after Congressional approval, will be adequate to provide the security required. It may be thought that some such statement will acquire the validity and authority in its field that the Monroe Doctrine, based also solely on a Presidential statement, has acquired in its field. It is also hoped that, if such a declaration were made, it could be supplemented by one from Canada, though why we, any more than Brazil, Argentina or Australia, should give such a unilateral guarantee is not clear.

I should think that, from almost every point of view, a multilateral security agreement is preferable to a unilateral guarantee.

(1) It would commit the United States to the policy in question much more firmly than a statement, because it would have been ratified by the Senate;

(2) It would embody the element of mutual assistance. Why should the United States and Canada come to the assistance of European countries if those countries are not willing to accept similar obligations to us?

(3) A unilateral guarantee gives unnecessary prominence to the dependence of the European states and seems to underline the satellite character of their relationship to the U.S.A. As such, it might unnecessarily offend their pride.

(4) Moreover, a multilateral security agreement reflects the realities of the situation much more faithfully than a unilateral guarantee by the United States. The United States and Canada need the assistance of the Western European democracies just as they need ours. A Russian conquest of Western Europe would mean for us war, and war on most unfavourable terms. A unilateral guarantee smells of charity (in the worse sense of the word); the Western European democracies are not beggars asking for our charity, but they are potential allies whose assistance we need in order to be able to defend ourselves. This is a point which will have to be made clear to the people of the United States and Canada. The difficulties of doing this in any case would be great but they will be increased if the United States gives a unilateral guarantee instead of entering into a multilateral security agreement.

(5) One of the real advantages of a Pact is that it would be an important demonstration that security arrangements could be worked out under the UN Charter, in this case, under Article 51. Eventually, other arrangements could be negotiated for other areas until all free countries might be brought in. Such a development would be given a serious setback if the United States at this time abandons a Security Treaty for a unilateral guarantee.

(6) Most important of all, a unilateral guarantee would be nothing more than a pledge of military assistance. If the peoples of Western Europe are to throw their full weight in the scales against Russia they need a good deal more than this from North America, especially since, if there is a war within the next year or so, the Western European countries run an almost certain danger of being occupied for many years by Soviet armies. Russia's allies in Western Europe are not so much now the Communists as the forces of despair, apathy, doubt and fear. It therefore seems to me very important that the peoples of Western democracies should make what Mr. Attlee has called a bold move to raise in the hearts and minds and spirits of all those in the world who love freedom that confidence and faith which will restore their vigour. What is needed is a treaty which is not merely a treaty of military guarantee but something along the lines of the Brussels Treaty, which contains provisions for closer political, economic and cultural cooperation, which sets up new international institutions, and which sets forth the principles of Western society which we are trying not only to defend but to make the basis of an eventually united world.

It is recognised that the decision on this matter is one for the United States Government to make. I would hope, however, that in any discussions with the Americans on the subject we could emphasise the above considerations. It might also be useful to have a talk along these lines with M. Spaak when he visits Ottawa later in the week.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Ottawa, April 13, 1948

Dear Hume [Wrong]:

Thank you for your letter of April 9 regarding the proposed North Atlantic Agreement. I am attaching herewith a further memorandum which I sent to the Prime Minister on this subject yesterday. I am somewhat worried that the Americans seem to be drifting away from a Pact to a Declaration. The latter would, I feel certain, be much less satisfactory from every point of view.

Hollis arrived yesterday and I have just returned from a meeting which we had with him in Brooke Claxton's office. He did not add very much to the information you have sent, but did indicate that the Service representatives from the three countries had begun their talks in Washington. Apparently the United Kingdom had hoped that these talks would have been devoted to a master strategic plan, but the Americans have insisted that this particular project should be for the moment postponed in favour of the working out of an emergency plan to meet a possible attack within the next few months. Foulkes was given the nature of this emergency plan when he was in Washington and presumably Smith will also know about it. Nothing of course is being said about it up here.

Hollis said this morning that they were also considering the type of Service organization which would be set up to work out military arrangements under any North Atlantic Agreement. They visualize a sort of combined Chiefs of Staff meeting presumably in Washington (though the British would prefer it to be in London) with United Kingdom, United States, Canadian and possibly French membership. Other associated countries would have ad hoc access to this body, something along the lines of that which we had to the Combined Chiefs during the war. Hollis did not see how any body with larger membership could operate efficiently. In fact, he would have preferred an agency representing the two governments only, but thought that this would be politically impossible. I think that it will also be politically necessary to associate Benelux and the Scandinavian countries (if they come in) more closely with any combined agency than is visualized in Hollis' idea. It would be hard to justify a Canadian connection with such an agency that would be closer than that, say, of Sweden or Benelux. It may be, however, that Hollis' reference to Canada's closer connection was a polite recognition of the fact that he was talking in Ottawa.

Hollis added that the British were beginning to build up their side of the Combined Chiefs of Staff organization which, of course, has never been formally dissolved. It had run down to very modest proportions, but the process is now to be reversed.

I am a little worried about Canada's relationship to these developments; whether we should ask for full membership or whether it might not be better to let the United States and United Kingdom carry the main burden with our relationship more or less similar to that which existed during the war. Possibly, the best course might be to have a sort of over-all military cooperation committee of the Atlantic Powers with an executive agency consisting of the United Kingdom, the United States and possibly France. However, all this is in the future. From our point of view, the main problem is the working out of the political arrangements, which, I am sure, should be based on a formal security agreement and not on any European Monroe doctrine.

Yours sincerely,
MIKE [PEARSON]

Dear Mr. Pearson:

You will have gathered from messages sent today and a couple of days ago that Senator Vandenberg's reaction to the proposed security arrangements has not been discouraging. We have now received from the British Embassy a copy of a telegram† to Lord Inverchapel dated April 9th which contains Mr. Bevin's views on the paper which we produced at our meetings here. I am enclosing three copies of this message and also of Lord Inverchapel's reply,† since I think that you may want to send them to the Prime Minister and to Mr. St. Laurent.

You will note from the Foreign Office telegram that Mr. Bevin has consulted Mr. Attlee and a few of his other colleagues and that they have adopted a very favourable attitude toward the proposals. I was somewhat concerned lest we should get back from London some rather niggling criticisms, and I am glad to learn that they have adopted what strikes me as a very broad and statesmanlike position, especially in their insistence that any U.S. pledge to support the Western European democracies should be embodied in a treaty if it is to have the hoped-for effects.

With regard to Lord Inverchapel's answer after he had passed on the contents of the first telegram to Mr. Lovett, I think that Mr. Lovett would now be rather more forthcoming, since his talk with Lord Inverchapel preceded his discussion of the proposals with Senator Vandenberg last Sunday and, of course, Senator Vandenberg's later, more detailed examination with Mr. Dean Rusk, which is the subject of a message that I am sending you today.† Messrs. Hickerson and Rusk are, I think, both thoroughly convinced that the United States ought to enter into a formal international obligation and that a presidential declaration will not do the trick. So, incidentally, is Mr. Reston,<sup>40</sup> whose views on this point are important because he is a confidant of Senator Vandenberg.

In spite of these encouraging developments, the timetable will still lag considerably behind the optimum timetable that we discussed at our meetings, and therefore the relationship between the possible announcement of a North Atlantic Security

Dear Mr. Pearson:

The British Embassy have been good enough to show us two minutes prepared by Balfour on private talks which he had on May 1st with Bohlen, and on May 5th with Kennan. While I was asked not to send copies of these minutes to Ottawa I was told that it would be perfectly all right for me to give you personally the views expressed by these two State Department officials. This I shall do below and at the same time report on a conversation which I had with Hickerson on May 5th.

Both Bohlen and Kennan emphasized to Balfour that their views were personal. They were, however, in agreement in that the suggestions which have come out of our meetings in Washington for an Atlantic pact do not commend themselves to them.

Bohlen said that while the plan elaborated was viewed with some favour by a number of highly placed persons in the Administration, it was, to his mind, open to objection in that it was at once too extensive in character and yet not extensive enough. It was too extensive because it envisaged inter alia a treaty in which the United States would be associated with the Scandinavian countries who, he thought, would be unwilling to participate.<sup>41</sup> It was not extensive enough because it did not envisage a United States treaty association with Greece, Turkey and Iran, countries as much threatened by the Soviet Union as those of Western Europe. The idea of concluding an Atlantic pact, therefore, to which the United States would be a party, appeared to him to be mistaken; at any rate as an initial approach to the problem of buttressing the security of the Western European countries which, he admitted, was of vital interest to the United States. He thought that insofar as the

This and the following 4 footnotes are marginal notes by E. Reid.

This can be discovered.

Benelux countries and France were concerned,<sup>42</sup> the mere presence of United States troops in Germany, pledged to remain there indefinitely, already ensured that the United States would automatically become involved as a belligerent if the Soviets were to make an aggressive thrust towards the west.<sup>43</sup> He considered, moreover, that in the present political setting an Atlantic pact would cause undue provocation to the Soviets.<sup>44</sup> As far as Congress is concerned, he thought that they would be unwilling to undertake so far-reaching a commitment in an electoral year.

As an alternative to a treaty commitment, Bohlen, for his part, favoured an approach to the problem which would concentrate in the first instance at any rate upon the technical questions involved. He thought that in order to enable Western Europe to resist aggression and to provide a deterrent to the Soviet Union, the United States Government should call together a meeting of Western European governments (he specifically mentioned Britain, France, and the Benelux countries), at which their military requirements would be discussed and a plan drawn up for supplying them with U.S. material and equipment to supplement their own armaments. He foresaw that the actual implementation of this plan would have to await the approval of the new Congress. Pending action by the new Congress, he thought that there would be no difficulty in securing from the present Congress a Senate resolution which would formally endorse the assurance to the Brussels powers contained in the President's speech of last March.

Balfour began his conversation with Kennan by expressing regret that Bohlen did not favour the plan for the early conclusion of an Atlantic security pact which, he said, would surely prove a most effective deterrent to the Soviets, besides giving much needed encouragement to the governments and peoples of Western Europe. Kennan immediately said that he and Bohlen saw eye to eye on this matter, which they had discussed at length together. He repeated Bohlen's opinion that the Scandinavian countries would be unlikely to participate in an Atlantic pact, with special reference to Sweden, saying that all available information from that country made it plain that the Swedish Government was obstinately convinced that it could maintain a neutral attitude if another war were to break out. Kennan said that Matthews, the present United States Minister to Sweden, was doing his best to shake the Swedes out of their complacent mood, but the task was an up-hill one.

Kennan then repeated Bohlen's argument that a formal pact was unnecessary inasmuch as United States forces would continue indefinitely in occupation of western Germany and that it was, in any event, unthinkable that America would stand idly by if the Soviets were to make an aggressive move against any country of Europe.

Kennan expressed the conviction that the Russians were fully aware of this state of affairs and he therefore maintained that the best deterrent to action on their part was to make it plain that the United States was prepared to give practical military support to Western Europe and to supply their deficiencies in war material.<sup>45</sup> He thought that such action on the part of the United States, which might be accompanied by a resolution of the Senate, would offer a more practical means of dealing with the problem than an Atlantic pact, the conclusion of which, in an election year, presented considerable difficulties from the point of view of overcoming an age long American tradition against entry into formal alliances.

When I was talking to Hickerson on May 5th I let it be known to him, without revealing my source, that I was aware of a difference of opinion within the State Department on the question of both the desirability and the possibility of an Atlantic pact. Hickerson made light of any differences inside the Department, saying that they could deal with them and that they should not be regarded seriously. He commented that both Kennan and Bohlen thought that the signature of a formal pact would have very little effect on the Kremlin on the ground that they were always signing mutual assistance pacts themselves to which they paid little attention. (This is not quite what Bohlen told Balfour, which was, as you will have noted above, that an Atlantic pact would cause undue provocation to the Soviets.) Hickerson went on to say that both Kennan and Bohlen believe that the adoption of Selective Service here, and the beginning of staff talks with European countries would be much more of a deterrent.

On the domestic political side of the picture Hickerson said that they have encountered difficulties in working out a programme for rapid action with congressional leaders. In his judgment it was now unlikely that they would be prepared to enter into an Atlantic pact until after the presidential election. In the interim, Senator Vandenberg is expected shortly to introduce a resolution in the Senate which would, in effect, promise aid by the United States to those countries in Europe which resisted further aggression by the Soviet Union and would include references to Article 51 of the Charter. The President would issue a statement endorsing this resolution. In the meantime, discussions with some of the Western European countries could take place, but no invitation to a conference was to be expected, nor was it likely that there would be an early meeting between Bevin, Bidault and Marshall.

I gather that the slower timetable is caused by political jockeying in an election year, rather than by any firm objection to the conclusion of a treaty to which the United States would be party. Hickerson is still strong for the Atlantic pact and naturally regrets the delay. He thinks, however, that the price of preventing it becoming a partisan issue is to delay action. You will recall that I reported in WA-1062 of April 13th that Achilles had told us that one of the serious political complications which had not been clearly foreseen by the State Department was the obvious rivalry for credit for the first move as between the White House and the Senate. It would seem from my talk with Hickerson that the popularity of the idea of an Atlantic pact is itself, in this election year, an obstacle to its being put into effect, since each party might wish to claim the sole credit and not share it with the other party.

Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: I have read with much interest and considerable uneasiness your top secret and personal letter of May 8th on Security Pact developments. I think that Bohlen and those who feel like him are on the wrong track and that the idea that all that is required is to back Western Europe by some form of unilateral guarantee and by supplying arms is wrong and possibly dangerous. It is especially discouraging to hear talk at this stage about an Atlantic Pact provoking the Soviets. I have the unhappy feeling that the big moment has passed when a genuine regional security arrangement could be negotiated on a reciprocal basis under Article 51 and that the United States is now relapsing into policies which are both short sighted and insufficient. That feeling is confirmed by the inadequacy in so many respects of Senator Vandenberg's statement and the indifferent reception that this statement has been given. I feel certain that the Western European states will be discouraged by these developments. On this point, van Roijen<sup>46</sup> saw us the other day, expressed disappointment with Vandenberg's statement, and added that the feeling of his people was that the Congressional approval for a 70-group air force was a sign of a new sort of isolationism in the United States and abandonment of more progressive and imaginative collective security ideas. He fears that the Scandinavian countries will now congratulate themselves for having been so reserved about possible adherence to the Brussels Treaty.

I will be writing you more fully about these matters, but I wanted to get this short message off at once so that if you share our anxieties you could pass them on informally to the State Department. Certainly the hopes that were inspired by the meetings that we attended some weeks ago seem now to have been largely dissipated and there is, I think, real danger of a reliance on old fashioned alliance policies, dictated by purely military considerations. It would be disastrous, I think, if the Article 51 approach so hopefully begun should now be abandoned. Ends.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Washington, May 8, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

In continuation of my letter of May 8th, and with reference to your EX-1324 of May 18th, I am writing to report on conversations which I had yesterday with Hickerson and today at lunch with Kennan, and one which Stone had this afternoon with Achilles.

I talked briefly with Hickerson yesterday about the Vandenberg Resolution and the security pact. Our conversation was somewhat hurried as he was tied up in connection with the Stalin-Wallace letters.<sup>47</sup>

Hickerson said that Lovett had been before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the Vandenberg resolution, and that it is expected that the Committee will report the resolution today. He thinks it is a good resolution, the adoption of which and its endorsement by the President should help to keep the issue out of party politics.

I commented that I was concerned over the slow rate of progress, and referred to the military discussions in London between the Defence Ministers of the parties to the Brussels Treaty reported in Vanier's telegram 295 of May 15th.† He agreed that progress abroad was satisfactory and appeared to approve of the results of these talks.

I then said that I was more convinced than ever that a formal commitment by the United States was necessary if the object was to be achieved. I was glad that he cordially agreed with this. He said that this was still the aim of the Department of State. It was, however, essential that the pact should be kept out of domestic politics, and this involved considerable delay before any conference could be called or public announcement made. Probably it would have to wait until after the election, although he thought that there was some possibility that when the conventions were over and the candidates chosen the candidates might agree to go ahead before the elections. They intend in the State Department to try to bring the candidates together soon after the nominations in the hope that during the campaign there will not be a serious divergence on questions of foreign policy. I remarked that if Vandenberg was the candidate it should not be impossible for Truman and him to agree on the convocation of a conference of the Atlantic powers this summer.

<sup>47</sup> Henry A. Wallace, antérieurement secrétaire au Commerce des États-Unis, a écrit une «lettre ouverte» à Staline publiée dans le New York Times le 12 mai; Staline répondit le 17 mai. Voir : Henry A. Wallace, former United States' Secretary of Commerce, wrote an "open letter" to Stalin published in the New York Times on 12 May; Stalin replied on 17 May. See:

In any event, he said that the preliminary talks envisaged in the Pentagon proposals could go on after the adoption of the Senate resolution and its endorsement by the President. I have some doubts about this myself, since these talks must envisage the negotiation of a treaty and a leak would bring the danger that the issue would be injected into inter-party politics.

I began my talk with Kennan at lunch today by saying that I was firmly convinced in my own mind that a formal commitment was necessary fully to achieve the purpose in mind. He said that they were still debating this in the State Department, and left me with the impression that he was opposed to a formal commitment. He argued that the United States would inevitably be involved from the first in war against the Soviet Union if there was Soviet aggression anywhere in Western Europe. The only exception he would admit was the possibility that they might not be involved from the beginning in the defence of Italy against an attack by Yugoslavia, provided that the Yugoslavs left the Trieste territory alone. He thought, therefore, that the same results would be achieved whether or not there was a pact.

I opposed this view on two main grounds. I said that many people in the European countries and also in Canada would not be content with a unilateral assurance of U.S. policy, which might be changed if there was a change in the Administration. They wished something to build on which would span a presidential term at least. Even if it were true that they were as much assured of U.S. support now as they would be under an alliance, plenty of people would not think that this was the case, and would therefore refrain from running risks which it was in our interest that they should run. This was a political rather than a military argument, but I was sure it had political validity.

My second point related to the position of Canada. I said that it would be far more difficult for Canada to collaborate in planning defence against Soviet aggression on the basis of a unilateral U.S. assurance than it would be if both countries were parties to an Atlantic agreement. Furthermore, under such an agreement the joint planning of the defence of North America fell into place as part of a larger whole and would diminish difficulties arising from fears of invasion of Canadian sovereignty by the U.S. It would become easier to advocate a policy of Canadian aloofness if the present state of affairs was maintained. An Atlantic pact would go a long way towards curing our split personality in defence matters by bringing the U.S., the U.K. and Canada into regular partnership.

Kennan said that he was much impressed by this latter argument, which had not occurred to him before, and that he would think it over carefully. He admitted that there was some force in my first argument, but seemed to think that this might be met by measures short of a treaty commitment. He was rather more optimistic than Hickerson about the prospects of getting on with discussions with the Brussels powers, and thought that there was a real possibility that, if the pact idea was maintained, progress might be made after the nominations, by agreement between the candidates.

Achilles told Stone this afternoon that he thought that the passage of the Vandenberg resolution, especially if it were, as they hoped, turned into a concurrent resolution, would open the way for the talks with the Brussels powers on the political side here, and on the military side, probably in London. Stone did not have long with Achilles as he was on his way to the Capitol to assist in writing the report to accompany the Vandenberg resolution which, as I told you this afternoon by teletype,† was unanimously approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. No reference was made in this brief talk to the opposing views in the State Department, but Achilles is very definitely in line with Hickerson in believing that a treaty commitment by the United States is a highly desirable solution to the regional security problem in the North Atlantic.

Achilles did ask Stone two interesting questions.

The first one, which he said was just "off the cuff" and his own idea, was what would we think about our taking part in the political talks here with the Brussels countries, which he thought would be in the first instance very preliminary and exploratory. Stone said that, of course, during the discussions here it had been clearly the view of everyone, including ourselves, that these talks would be exclusively between the United States and the Brussels countries. He said that he was not aware of any change of view in Ottawa but that he would certainly enquire informally for Achilles' own information. He did know, he said, that we were strongly in favour of the pact idea and he thought that anything that we could do appropriately to advance it we would be prepared to do.

The second question, Achilles said, represented some body of opinion in the State Department that we should take part in any military talks in London, if that is where they were to be held, and what would we think of this. Stone said that he could not, of course, give any authoritative answer, but for his own part he thought that in view of the fact that we would eventually come into military talks if we became party to a pact, it might be well if we were in from the beginning. I think it would be useful if you would let us have your preliminary views on this when you can, as from the way Achilles spoke there has apparently been some discussion of it in the State Department.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Ottawa, May 25, 1948

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I have read with very great interest your top secret and personal letter of May 19th regarding conversations which you had with Hickerson and Kennan and Achilles on Atlantic Security arrangements and the one which Stone had with Achilles on the same subject. I hope to be writing you at greater length on this subject shortly. Meanwhile, my own personal view is that the answer to the two questions which Achilles asked Stone should be both "yes". However, if this matter ever arose it would have to be decided, naturally, by the Government, and I am not certain that their answer would be as unequivocal as mine. However, I think that the odds would be in favour of a governmental affirmative reply.

Last Friday Clutterbuck left with the Prime Minister the attached memorandum from Mr. Attlee. It is a personal and secret communication, and I would be grateful, therefore, if you would consider it as such. However, I think you should see it as it has a very important bearing on the subject of this letter. I am glad that the United Kingdom Government are taking such a forward stand in this matter, and I only wish that the atmosphere in Washington were more favourable to the friendly reception of the United Kingdom suggestions. I suppose that even a British initiative in respect of such a matter as an Atlantic Pact will be affected somewhat by the sour situation regarding Palestine.

Yours sincerely,

TOP SECRET

[London], May 22, 1948

ATLANTIC PACT

The following summary of United Kingdom views as to the next steps has been sent to the United Kingdom Ambassador in Washington for his guidance in future discussions with the United States Administration.

(1) We remain convinced that the only satisfactory way of dealing with the present world position and ensuring a considerable and perhaps a long period of peace is the adoption by the United States Government of something like the programme sketched out in previous correspondence. The mere fact that the United States Government were prepared to enter into some kind of regional defence system would by itself encourage democratic forces all over the world and be far the best deterrent to any Soviet miscalculation.

(2) Even if it proved undesirable to propose at the outset that a defensive pact for the North Atlantic area should include all democracies of Western Europe, that would not be a reason for abandoning it. Even if it only included at the outset the United States, Canada and the five Brussels Treaty States it would be greatly preferable to some Presidential declaration or Senatorial resolution. There should, however, be reason to hope that Norway, Denmark and Portugal would come in and eventually also Italy.

(3) What is needed in order to defeat Communist manoeuvres is some definite acceptance of obligations by the United States. London discussions on Germany have shown that the presence of United States forces in Germany is not alone sufficient to remove French uneasiness about their own security. A treaty based on Article 51 of Charter to which the United States would be a party would be the best answer to those who are urging revision of Charter. Ultimate conclusion of some world-wide system based on Article 51 would be rendered practicable if the way were prepared by defence arrangement in North Atlantic area. It is surely along this road that we should try to give a lead and thus to canalise discontent with United Nations in right direction while preserving the centralising and pacifying functions of a central international authority.

(4) What is of the highest importance is for the United States Government to grasp golden opportunity for rallying the democratic nations of the world and calling a halt to aggressive attitude on part of others which we have all had to face.

Mr. Wrong has recently received on a personal basis from the British Embassy in Washington the three attached telegrams -

Mr. Bevin to Lord Inverchapel (No. 5318 of May 14)†

Lord Inverchapel to Mr. Bevin (No. 2305 of May 15)†

Sir John Balfour (U.K. Minister in Washington) to Mr. Bevin (No. 2383 of May 20).†

These have to do with the project for a North Atlantic Pact.

2. Mr. Bevin's telegram sets forth a clear, forceful and well-reasoned argument which should make an impression on any doubters in the State Department about the value of a formal treaty arrangement by the United States, as contrasted with a mere unilateral guarantee.

3. I am surprised that Balfour reports in his telegram that Mr. Bohlen and Mr. Kennan of the State Department have raised as a difficulty the possible isolation of Sweden since the United States Minister in Sweden, who was recently in Washington, told our Embassy there that the United States mission in Stockholm was convinced that the best way to bring Sweden to a more realistic and cooperative frame of mind was by detaching Norway and Denmark from the Scandinavian neutral bloc which the Swedes have been trying to create.

4. Mr. Hickerson has left Mr. Wrong with the impression that the case for the North Atlantic Pact has been more definitely accepted in Washington than Balfour's telegram would imply.

5. Mr. Wrong thinks that from our point of view the aim should be to do what little we can to support the U.K. and U.S. view favouring the negotiation of a treaty shortly after the party conventions have been held in the United States, on the understanding that it will be impossible for the treaty to be ratified by the United States until early next year. Apparently they intend in the State Department to try to bring the two candidates together soon after they are nominated, in the hope that during the electoral campaign there will not be a serious divergence between them on questions of foreign policy.

6. We cannot now be certain about what the timetable is likely to be. However, from the information available to us, there does seem to be a possibility that discussions will take place this summer between the United States and the Brussels powers on the possibility of the conclusion of a North Atlantic Pact.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

Before Mr. Pearson left Ottawa, he sent to the Prime Minister, Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Claxton and Mr. Heeney the attached memorandum of June 1 on the subject of the proposed collective defence agreement for the North Atlantic area. This memorandum brings the story up to date and includes a list of what seem to be the main reasons why, from the Canadian point of view, a multilateral treaty is preferable to a unilateral declaration by either the President or by Congress.

You will find many of these reasons are familiar to you, since they are based on various letters from you to Mr. Pearson.

In sending this to you, Mr. Pearson asked me to say that he would be very interested in your comments on the enclosed memorandum, as well as your comments on and suggestions for revision of the draft of a security pact which I prepared last March. You have a copy of this, dated March 20.†

The occasion for the preparation of the enclosed memorandum was the visit of Mr. Kennan to Ottawa. The United States Ambassador had a dinner for Mr. Kennan at the Embassy, at which there were present Messrs. Atherton, Harrington and Kennan, Claxton, Walter Harris,<sup>48</sup> Pearson, Pickersgill, Riddell and myself. At dinner the talk ranged over various subjects but, after dinner, virtually the sole topic of conversation was the proposed North Atlantic Pact. During the course of the conversation, we put forward, in one form or another, many of the arguments in favour of the Pact which are set forth in the enclosed memorandum, particularly those which were based upon the peculiar Canadian position.

<sup>48</sup> Secrétaire parlementaire du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures.
Parliamentary Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Looking over the memorandum I find that we put forward the following of the arguments listed in paragraph 7: (i) (ii) (vii) (ix) (x) (xi) (xii) (xiii) (xvi) and (xviii).

Mr. Pickersgill laid particular emphasis on the tenth argument, which was one which he had himself suggested should be incorporated in the memorandum. Mr. Pickersgill and Mr. Claxton pressed the argument set forth in the first sentence of sub-paragraph 13 — that is, that Canada would find it politically easier to grant defence facilities under a North Atlantic Pact than under an agreement with the United States. They referred to the debate in the House of Commons at the last session on the facilities granted to the United States in Canada.

As you had told us, we found Mr. Kennan particularly receptive to these arguments based on the peculiar Canadian position. Indeed, it seemed to me that your use of these arguments in talking to him had resulted in his conversion.

Mr. Kennan was obviously somewhat nettled at the United States having been pressed so hard by the United Kingdom and Western European countries to make a formal treaty commitment to them. He still feels that it is unrealistic for them to ask for it when they already have a guarantee because of the presence of United States troops in Western Germany. However, he will now go so far as to admit that the state of public opinion in those countries explains why they insist on a military guarantee. At one point, however, his impatience got the better of him and he acknowledged that he was impatient with their arguments and that the European states did not seem to realize that, if the United States gave this guarantee, it would be doing something which would be in the interests of Western Europe but not necessarily in the interests of the United States, since the United States could, at any time, make a deal with the Soviet Union. We naturally took him up on this and he withdrew from this exposed position. However, it did give me a feeling that if you scratch almost any American long enough, you will find an isolationist. They suffer, and you can hardly blame them, from a home-sickness for isolation.

I am sending to Mr. Robertson a copy of this letter and the enclosed memorandum.

Yours sincerely,
ESCOTT REID

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], June 1, 1938

COLLECTIVE DEFENCE AGREEMENT FOR THE NORTH ATLANTIC AREA

The secret discussions held in Washington in March, 1948, between officials of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canadian Governments resulted in the attached memorandum of April 1, 1948.<sup>49</sup> This is in the form of a United States paper recommending a course of action adequate to give effect to the President's declaration of March 17 of support for the free nations of Europe.

2. At the time this paper was drawn up it was contemplated that discussions with the signatories of the Brussels Treaty would take place about April 12; diplomatic approaches would then be made to the Scandinavian countries and to Iceland, Ireland and Portugal; the President would make a statement late in April announcing the calling of a Conference to conclude a collective defence agreement for the North Atlantic area; the Conference would be held in May.

3. This timetable has been slowed down and the programme set forth in the memorandum of April 1 will have to be modified in the light of the Vandenberg resolution (a copy of which is attached).† It is now possible that, after the Vandenberg resolution has been passed, either in its present form as a resolution of the Senate or as a concurrent resolution of both Houses of Congress, talks will take place between the United States and the Brussels signatories and possibly Canada. The North Atlantic Conference might then meet shortly after the party conventions in the United States and the resulting treaty would be submitted to the Senate for ratification in January, 1949.

4. There are two main stumbling blocks to the carrying out of this programme. The first is that the sense of urgency which was present in March has now diminished. The second is that not everyone in the State Department and in other agencies of the United States Government is convinced that a formal treaty is necessary; some of them still are inclined to the view that a unilateral declaration by the President or by Congress, followed by staff talks and perhaps military lend-lease, will be sufficient.

5. The general conviction in March that the conclusion of a North Atlantic treaty was urgent was occasioned in large part by the Russian seizure of control in Czechoslovakia and by rumours of Russian demands on Norway, as well as by the danger of a Popular Front victory in the Italian elections. Since then the Soviet Union has gone in for what appears to be an appeasement offensive.

6. It would seem to be the course of wisdom to regard this appeasement offensive with great suspicion. It may mean that the Soviet Union is not prepared to press forward in Western Europe for another year or so. On the other hand, it is just as likely that it means that the Soviet Union is trying to lull its opponents into a false sense of security and that the Soviet Union may resume its offensive in a few months. So long as Western Europe is as relatively defenceless as it is today, the Soviet Union is subject to a very strong temptation to seize Western Europe while it can do so in a few months and at a relatively low cost.

7. The following appear to be the main reasons why a multilateral treaty is preferable to a unilateral declaration by either the President or by Congress.

(i) Many people in the United Kingdom and Western Europe would not be content with a unilateral assurance of United States policy. They want a commitment which is binding on succeeding Congresses and on a new administration. Even if it is true that a unilateral declaration, plus the presence of United States troops in Western Germany, gives the Western Europeans, in fact, as much assurance of United States support as they would secure under an alliance, plenty of Western Europeans would not think that this was the case and would therefore refrain from running risks which it is in our interests that they should run. The difficulty from the point of view of the United States is that a formal alliance would be a tremendous reversal of the traditional national policy of the United States. This very difficulty, however, is the reason why the alliance would be of great value to Western Europe: it would be the outward and visible sign of a revolutionary change in United States foreign policy.

(ii) The presence of United States troops in Germany and Austria affords only indirect assurance to Italy and the Scandinavian countries. The talks on Germany which have been taking place in London have demonstrated that the presence of these troops is not sufficient to remove the perpetual uneasiness of the French over their security. Until that uneasiness is removed by the United States entering into a military alliance, it would seem doubtful if a satisfactory agreement can be reached on the settlement of Western Germany.

(iii) So long as Western Europe is not given the restored confidence and vigour which would result from the conclusion of a North Atlantic treaty, the possibility of the success of E.C.A. will be lessened. There must be a greater measure of political security in Western Europe before the governments and peoples of Western Europe can tackle successfully the problems of European economic reconstruction.

(iv) One advantage of a treaty to the United States and Canada is that it would embody the element of mutual assistance. Without such a guarantee of mutual assistance, persons in the United States and Canada who are opposed to our giving a guarantee to Western Europe could ask why the United States and Canada should pledge themselves to come to the assistance of Western European countries if those countries are not willing to accept similar obligations to us.

(v) The conclusion of a treaty would be an effective answer to those in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada who are demanding drastic revision of the Charter of the United Nations. Without such a positive and spectacular move by the United States, the demand for revision may constitute a real difficulty in the future.

(vi) The conclusion of a North Atlantic treaty would be an important demonstration that effective security arrangements can be worked out under the Charter. It would thus make it easier to conclude other similar arrangements in other areas until all free countries would be brought into one or more defence groups. This would pave the way to the creation of a union of all the free states of the world in a collective defence agreement under Article 51 of the Charter. Such a development would be given a serious setback if the United States at this time abandons a security treaty for a unilateral guarantee.

(vii) It is, of course, possible that all the states of the North Atlantic will not immediately agree to become members of a North Atlantic Defence Treaty. However, the conclusion of a treaty between the Brussels signatories, the United States and Canada would mean the creation of the hard core of a North Atlantic alliance and this alliance would have a magnetic attractive power for other states in the area. Moreover, it is by no means certain that Norway and Denmark would refuse to come into a North Atlantic treaty and if they come in they might eventually pull Sweden along with them. On the other hand, there is danger that if Norway and Denmark are not invited to become members of a North Atlantic alliance they may be persuaded by Sweden to become members of a neutral Scandinavian bloc.

(viii) It has been suggested that as an alternative to a North Atlantic treaty there might be joint staff discussions between the Brussels powers and the United States and that these discussions might be followed by the re-introduction by the United States of military lend-lease. This proposal, however, is not an alternative to a treaty since one of the main objects of the treaty would be to provide a constitutional basis for staff discussions and joint planning and as a result of these discussions and plans the United States and Canada might agree that, as part of their contribution to the common defence, they would re-introduce lend-lease and mutual aid in order to help their Western European allies to re-arm as quickly as possible.

(ix) One argument which is particularly strong from the Canadian point of view is that it would be far more difficult for Canada to collaborate in planning defence against Soviet aggression on the basis of a unilateral United States assurance than it would be if both countries were parties to an Atlantic treaty. Furthermore, under such a treaty the joint planning of the defence of North America would fall into place as part of a larger whole and the difficulties arising in Canada from the fear of invasion of Canadian sovereignty by the United States would be diminished. If the present state of affairs is maintained or even if there is merely a Presidential or Congressional declaration, the advocates in Canada of a policy of aloofness would be able to strengthen their position. An Atlantic treaty would go a long way towards lessening the political difficulties of defence planning in Canada by bringing the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada into partnership.

(x) A further advantage to Canada of an Atlantic treaty is that it would help to ensure that Canada was not pushed out ahead of the United States in the event of war. In the last two wars Canada has gone to war more than two years before the United States. A treaty commitment by the United States instead of a congressional resolution would lessen the danger that this might happen again.

(xi) Another disadvantage to Canada of a mere congressional resolution is that, unless it were followed quickly by the calling of a conference to frame an Atlantic treaty, the Canadian Government might be placed in a somewhat difficult position. There might be demands in Canada that the Government take some action similar to that taken by the United States Congress or even going beyond it, but it might be difficult to decide what action the Canadian Government could wisely and usefully take to supplement the public statements already made by the Prime Minister and by Mr. St. Laurent.

(xii) The military planning which would follow the conclusion of a treaty would tend to modify the present rather unrealistic concentration of United States and Canadian planners on the passive defence of North America from outside attack. If the North Atlantic is bridged by a defence alliance, the problems of North American defence would be seen as a small part of a larger plan, the purpose of which would be to defeat the enemy by offensive operations.

(xiii) There are a number of North Atlantic countries which, like Canada, would find it politically easier to grant defence facilities to a North Atlantic Union than to the United States. Thus it would be easier for Denmark to accord defence facilities in Greenland as part of its contribution under a North Atlantic treaty than it would be under a bilateral Danish-United States agreement. The same would be true of Ireland and Iceland. It is not, of course, certain that Iceland and Ireland would be willing to sign a North Atlantic treaty but there is at least a possibility that they might do so and unless they do so there would seem to be virtually no chance of their being willing to collaborate in planning defence against Soviet aggression.

(xiv) A mere promise of support from the United States without corresponding mutual guarantees from Western Europe would not provide as satisfactory a basis for war planning as would be provided by a treaty. If United States support is to be effective in Western Europe, the United States chiefs of staff must know where they can operate in the event of war or in an emergency. They must know the bases from which they can undertake a quick and effective offensive. They must be sure in advance of the territories which they can employ. They must, if necessary, establish bases immediately. All this will be much easier to do under a treaty.

(xv) It has been suggested that the conclusion of a treaty might provoke the Soviet Union into taking offensive action in Western Europe. The danger of the Soviet Union taking offensive action in the near future in Western Europe arises in the main out of the relative ease with which the Soviet Union could at present occupy Western Europe. In the short run, the way to minimize that temptation is to persuade the Soviet leaders that, if they did occupy Western Europe, the United States and its allies would wage unlimited war against them until Western Europe was liberated. The conclusion of a treaty would therefore be a deterrent. The other way in which a treaty would help to minimize the danger of an immediate Soviet aggression would be if it were followed by a very considerable increase in the military strength of our Western European allies who will have to bear the primary responsibility for manning the first line of defence of the North Atlantic community, at the Elbe.

(xvi) Until the line of defence at the Elbe can be strengthened to such an extent as to give Western Europe a reasonable guarantee against occupation by the Soviet Union, the Western European peoples know that if war breaks out they will be subjected to the horrors of Soviet occupation from which they will be released only at the end of a long war. The ever-present consciousness of this fact will of necessity make it more difficult for the governments and peoples of Western Europe to run the risks involved in a policy of restraining the Soviet Union, risks which it is in our interests that they should run. The governments and peoples of Western Europe will be the more reluctant to run those risks if they believe that once they are occupied they will have little or no say in the making of the larger political and strategic decisions by their Western allies. The conclusion of a North Atlantic treaty would make it possible to set up formal international bodies not only for making plans for preventing war but also for making plans for the waging of war. The existence of these bodies would help to ensure that, in the event of war, the occupied Western European countries had a say in the making of the larger political and strategic decisions by the supreme war council and the combined chiefs of staff. It is in the general interest that these countries should have a say, because of their political experience, maturity and moderation.

(xvii) A unilateral guarantee gives unnecessary prominence to the dependence of the Western European states and seems to underline the satellite character of their relationship to the U.S.A. As such, it might unnecessarily offend their pride.

(xviii) Moreover, a multilateral security agreement reflects the realities of the situation much more faithfully than a unilateral guarantee by the United States. The United States and Canada need the assistance of the Western European democracies just as they need ours. A Russian conquest of Western Europe would mean for us war, and war on most unfavourable terms. A unilateral guarantee smells of charity (in the worst sense of the word); the Western European democracies are not beggars asking for charity, but they are potential allies whose assistance we need in order to be able to defend ourselves. They are Canada's first line of defence. This is a point which will have to be made clear to the people of the United States and Canada. The difficulties of doing this would be great in any case but they will be increased if the United States gives a unilateral guarantee instead of entering into a multilateral security agreement.

(xix) Most important of all, a unilateral guarantee would be nothing more than a pledge of military assistance. If the peoples of Western Europe are to throw their full weight in the scales against Russia they need a good deal more than this from North America, especially since, if there is a war within the next year or so, the Western European countries run an almost certain danger of being occupied for many years by Soviet armies. Russia's allies in Western Europe are not so much now the Communists as the forces of despair, apathy, doubt and fear. It is therefore very important that the peoples of the Western democracies should make a bold move to raise in the hearts and minds and spirits of all those in the world who love freedom that confidence and faith which will restore their vigour. Just as the last war was a "struggle for the control of men's minds and men's souls" so is the present cold war. What is now needed is a treaty which is not merely a treaty of military guarantee but something along the lines of the Brussels Treaty; it should contain provisions for closer political, economic and cultural cooperation; it should set up new international institutions; it should set forth the principles of Western society which we are trying not only to defend but to make the basis of an eventually united world. By concluding such a treaty, the Atlantic Community could become "a model of what we hope the whole world will some day become."

Washington, June 16, 1948

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary only, Begins: I asked Hickerson today what their plans were for proceeding with the proposed Defence Agreement with the Western European countries now that the Vandenberg resolution has passed the Senate.<sup>50</sup> He said that they were anxiously considering the best means of progress and that a decision would not be reached before the latter part of next week. For one thing, they do not wish to make any move while there is a slight prospect that Congressman Eaton's<sup>51</sup> Bill may be adopted before adjournment on Saturday. (This Bill includes the substance of the Vandenberg resolution and also authorizes approval of the United Nations convention on privileges and immunities and of the Loan Agreement for the construction of United States headquarters. See my WA-1747 of June 15th. †)

2. He was sure, however, that there would be diplomatic conversations in Washington with the parties to the Brussels Treaty in the near future, and that the United States would be represented at the military talks in London which are going on under that Treaty. Beyond that at present he was not prepared to go, but he will give me further information as soon as they have cleared their programme.

3. I asked him whether it was likely that the President would take the occasion of the adoption of the Vandenberg resolution to make a public statement advancing the plan in the direction projected at the Pentagon talks in March. He said that this was still under discussion. In view of the bitter references to this Congress made by the President on his western trip and the Congressional reaction to them, he thought that it might be preferable for a full statement to be made by the Secretary of State, which would be briefly endorsed by the President. If questioned this week at a press conference, Mr. Marshall will confine himself to welcoming the adoption of the Vandenberg resolution as an outstanding example of bi-partisan foreign policy.

4. It is likely, but not yet certain, that we shall be asked whether we wish to participate in the diplomatic talks here with the Brussels partners and also in the military conversations in London. It is unnecessary as yet to seek a Ministerial decision on this, but I may have occasion to ask within a few days for a fairly rapid reply. My own opinion is that the advantages of participation considerably outweigh the disadvantages, especially in view of Mr. St. Laurent's public statements on the need for organizing the forces of the democratic countries. The talks in London would be secret, but an announcement would, I think, have to be made about the diplomatic talks here.

5. I think that before long I should receive instructions to see Mr. Marshall and discuss with him the Canadian attitude towards a North Atlantic Defence Agreement. The occasion might be our reply to an invitation to participate in the talks already referred to, if such an invitation is received. I shall probably shortly submit a request for instructions; this will depend on the timetable and programme now under consideration in the State Department.

6. The State Department is greatly cheered by the passage of the Vandenberg resolution by the overwhelming vote of 64 to 4. The debate is good reading. We are preparing an analysis of it which we will soon forward together with the relevant part of the Congressional record.† Whether this vote records in fact a momentous change in United States foreign policy will depend on how the policies approved by the resolution are developed, but its adoption does help to clear the way for new moves of the utmost importance. I have doubts whether the discussion of the resolution in the Senate and the press has been explicit enough to make people realize that it blesses the participation of the United States in entangling alliances in Europe. As usual, the pathway from the general to the particular is likely to be steep and devious.

7. I shall send you later this week some comments on your letter of June 3rd and the memorandum enclosed with it. Ends.

TOP SECRET

Washington, June 17, 1948

Dear Mr. Reid,

In your letter of June 3rd you gave me a welcome account of the discussion of a North Atlantic defence agreement with Mr. Kennan during his recent visit to Ottawa and asked me to comment on the memorandum which had been prepared summing up the arguments in favour of a formal agreement.

I have no criticism to make of the general line of argument in the memorandum and I do not propose to enter into detailed points of verbal criticism. I therefore confine myself to discussing a few points where I think the language of the memorandum might leave misconceptions. I arrange these in the order of the paragraphs of the memorandum and not in the order of their relative importance.

1. In the last sentence of paragraph 5 it is suggested that the Soviet Union has gone in for an appeasement offensive. If that is so, it is the most offensive appeasement offensive in my memory. It is true that Soviet pressures at a number of points have slackened since the successful coup in Czechoslovakia, but there is no evidence of any general desire or intention on the part of the Soviet Government to remove or reduce particular causes of friction by changing their policy so as to meet the Western Powers half-way or quarter-way. I see neither appeasement nor an offensive in the present comparative lull. If they were really aiming at some settlement or abatement of differences, they would not have followed the course they did in the Molotov-Bedell Smith<sup>52</sup> exchange and the Wallace-Stalin open letters.

2. In paragraph 6 it is said that the Soviet Union might now seize Western Europe at a relatively low cost. This seems to me only to be true in the sense that they could probably now occupy a great stretch of Western European territory with a lower expenditure of men and munitions than is likely to be the case a few years hence. The cost now, however, includes the cost of war against the United States, at a time when the Russians have no atomic weapons and have barely restored their economy to the state of production that prevailed when they were attacked by the Germans in 1941.

3. Argument (i) in paragraph 7 might well be pushed further. The events of the last fortnight in Congress have revealed very clearly the wide difference between the right wing Republicans, who control the leadership of the House of Representatives (but fortunately do not comprise more than about half the party in the Senate) and the Republican supporters of the bi-partisan foreign policy, on questions of foreign policy. I shall be writing more fully on this later on. It lends emphasis to the importance of a multi-lateral agreement binding the United States for not less than ten years because such an agreement would commit the whole Republican Party and considerably reduce the range in which the compass needle of U.S. policy could swing.

4. In sub-paragraph (ii) of paragraph 7, I think it goes too far to suggest that a military alliance with the United States would remove French uneasiness over their security. The French know perfectly well that in the event of war they are in grave danger of Soviet occupation, no matter who their allies may be, and they are scared stiff at the prospect. At most, such an alliance would abate their uneasiness.

5. I am not sure myself of the validity of the argument in sub-paragraph (v) of paragraph 7, nor am I certain that it is in our interest that the proposals for the drastic revision of the Charter could or should be silenced by a military alliance involving the United States.

6. In sub-paragraph (vi) of paragraph 7 I make the minor point that it seems to me rather unrealistic to refer to military alliances concluded in the light of the reservation contained in Article 51 of the Charter as being made "under the Charter". They are made outside the Charter, not under it, although they do not conflict with the terms of the Charter. I think, indeed, that if at San Francisco the construction now being put on Article 51 had been put forward, it would have been rejected and the Article would have been differently drafted.

Walter Bedell Smith, Ambassador of United States in Soviet Union.

7. In the same sub-paragraph, I am far from sure that I would like to see a collective defence agreement in which "all the free States of the world" would be partners. My own conception of possibilities is more modest and, I believe, more practical. It envisages perhaps four or five agreements covering different areas, with the connecting link between them the participation of the United States in them all and the participation of the United Kingdom in all except the inter-American treaty. If the fear of war were to diminish greatly, a general super-structure might be erected. In the present state of affairs I would prefer to limit the participating countries in each case, because the larger the alliance the more unmanageable and ineffective it tends to become. Coalitions are hard enough to control in wartime, but they are a great deal more difficult to manage in time of peace.

8. In sub-paragraphs (x) and (xi) reference is made to a congressional resolution in contrast to a treaty. This I imagine is a slip, because what has been proposed is a presidential declaration, endorsed by congressional leaders and coming within the general terms of the Vandenberg Resolution.

9. I think that there is some confusion of thought in references in sub-paragraphs (xvi), (xviii), and (xix) to the possibility of a Soviet occupation of a large area in Western Europe. Sub-paragraph (xvi) seems to envisage the strengthening of the line of the Elbe so that it would be difficult for Russian forces to pass beyond it. Sub-paragraph (xix) emphasizes the danger of a Soviet occupation of Western Europe within the next year or two. I doubt that the line of the Elbe could ever be made a formidable Maginot Line, and that certainly could not be done unless Western Germany was re-armed and admitted as a military ally. It is a mistake, I think, to lay so much emphasis on a North Atlantic agreement as a military guarantee against Soviet invasion, for the prospect is that no matter how much might be done to strengthen Western Europe, Soviet invasion of at least part of the territory will remain feasible for a long time to come. A North Atlantic agreement would have its greatest effect in making clear to the Russians against what countries they would have to fight if they passed the line of the Elbe and in encouraging the peoples of Western Europe to bestir themselves in strengthening their defences by giving them an assurance over a long term of instant support in case they were attacked.

10. Sub-paragraph (xix) of paragraph 7 is open to the criticism that it sets the sights too high. If we do get a North Atlantic defence agreement, it is going to be simpler than the sort of treaty proposed in this paragraph. I see no prospect that the United States would in the next year or so sign a treaty that goes as far as the Brussels Treaty. If that is the expectation in Ottawa, I think that steps should be taken to disabuse those who hold it. Certainly it is essential that we should be ready to approach the establishment of a real North Atlantic community by stages and not expect to get there at a rush. I believe that the central thing to concentrate on now is to secure a military undertaking on the lines of paragraph 5 of the document produced in the Pentagon talks last March with some simple general article which would cover economic collaboration and set up some sort of consultative organ or organs. If the other parties to the negotiation insist on something more they may wreck the whole project.

You also suggest in your letter that I should propose revisions of your draft of last March of a security pact. What I have just written gives the reason why I think it superfluous to undertake such a task at this time. The most that we should aim at is a modest elaboration of the Pentagon suggestions embodied in a treaty of not more than ten articles at the outside.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

TELEGRAM EX-1579

Ottawa, June 18, 1948

TOP SECRET

Following for Mr. Wrong only from Reid, Begins: Your WA-1761 of June 16 on the proposed North Atlantic Security Agreement.

2. I discussed this with the Minister yesterday and he has forwarded your teletype to the Prime Minister with a covering note.† The note summarizes your teletype and then says:

"Mr. Pearson discussed with me before he left Ottawa the possibility of our receiving invitations to participate in diplomatic talks in Washington and military conversations in London.

He recalled that during the discussions in Washington in March it had been the general view, with which we had concurred, that the preliminary diplomatic conversations between the United States and the Brussels partners would be exclusively between the United States and those countries. Mr. Pearson's own personal view was, however, that it would be in our interest to accept an invitation to participate in the Washington diplomatic talks if it was felt by the United States that our participation would help to advance the project.

Mr. Pearson also thought that if, as a result of the diplomatic talks, there were to be exploratory talks in London on military matters it might be advisable for us to be represented so that our position might be made clear from the outset."

3. For your own personal information, I might add that the Minister himself feels that if we are asked to take part in the diplomatic conversations in Washington and military talks in London, we should accept. He feels that it would be difficult to explain a refusal to accept an invitation if one is forthcoming in view of the statements which the Canadian Government has made in support of a defence agreement between the North Atlantic and the Western European countries.

4. I note that, in the last sentence of paragraph 4 of your teletype, you say that you think an announcement would have to be made about the diplomatic talks in Washington. My own personal feeling is that we might be put in a somewhat embarrassing position if a public announcement were made of these talks and we were not included in them. No doubt we could find some formula which might be satisfactory, but my guess is that quite a number of people in Canada would expect, as a result of the statements recently made by the Minister, that Canada would be invited to these preparatory talks in Washington.

5. In paragraph 5 of your teletype you speak about the probability that you will shortly be submitting a request for instructions to see Mr. Marshall and discuss with him the Canadian attitude towards a North Atlantic defence agreement. I know how pressed you are, but I know that you can also sympathize with the position I am in and I would, therefore, hope that you might accompany your request for instructions with a teletype to me setting forth the kind of instructions which you think would be wise and useful to have sent to you.

6. It may be that the Government's policy will be further clarified by the statement which the Minister of National Defence will make on his Defence Estimates early next week. Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-1832<sup>53</sup>

Washington, June 23, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary only from Wrong, Begins: Security Talks. Mr. Hickerson this afternoon verbally gave me an invitation for the Government of Canada to participate in diplomatic talks in Washington with representatives of the United States and the parties to the Brussels Treaty, to whom a similar verbal invitation is being extended today. The suggested date for the opening of the talks is Tuesday morning, June 29th. I undertook to transmit this invitation immediately and to request an early reply.

I gave copies this evening to the P[rime] M[inister] and the SSEA [Secretary of State for External Affairs] who agreed that Canada should accept the invitation and that Mr. Pearson should attend. *I have repeated this telegram to N.A. Robertson.

*I have told Mr. Wrong & Mr. Pearson of this decision. E. R[eid] June 23/48 10<sup>00</sup> p.m.

2. The procedure contemplated is that the European countries should be represented by persons now in Washington. Mr. Lovett will probably preside at the opening session at which a smaller working party might be appointed. It is not proposed to have any military representation, at any rate during the first phase of the talks. The suggestion is that the Ambassadors of the countries concerned should act as the senior representatives and that the total representation of each country should be not more than three. Luxembourg will probably not be directly represented. The date is probable but not firm. The United States participants will vary according to the subject matter, but will be drawn wholly or mainly from Messrs. Hickerson, Bohlen, Kennan, Reber and Achilles.

3. As to publicity, Hickerson proposed that the substance of the talks should be regarded throughout as top secret, and that no announcement about them should be made until the question had been discussed at the initial meetings. He thinks that a brief public announcement ought then to be made which would play up the United States initiative as the taking of steps to carry out the Vandenberg Resolution (the gist of which is now included in the Republican Party platform).

4. He said that the desire was to keep the procedure as informal as possible, along the lines that were observed at the Pentagon talks in March. (Incidentally, the occurrence of the Pentagon talks would have to be kept secret throughout from France and the Benelux countries). There would be no minutes and no formal agenda, and a frank expression of views without committing Governments would be encouraged.

5. As to topics of discussion they proposed on their part the four following items. The comments in brackets after each item are my own expansion based on my discussion with him.

(1) The situation in Europe as it affects security, including estimates of Soviet intentions. (This would be a general exchange of views, not an effort to arrive at an agreed appreciation).

(2) Security measures taken and to be taken in Europe by the Five. (This would cover the steps taken and contemplated to execute the Brussels Treaty).

(3) Security relations with other Western European countries. (This would cover discussion of the possible expansion of the Brussels Treaty, and problems such as the effect of United States participation in a treaty to which some of the free countries of Europe, such as Sweden or Switzerland, might not become parties).

(4) Nature of United States association under Vandenberg Resolution with European security arrangements. (This would cover the arguments for and against the negotiation of a treaty committing the United States to assist European countries in danger of attack or actually attacked, as well as related questions. The discussion might lead to the development of an outline proposal).

6. Hickerson said that they would be ready to add any topics which the countries invited might wish to bring up.

7. He thought that the talks might go on intermittently for most of the summer, but hoped that the first phase could be concluded within a fortnight or so. He said that the invitation to Canada to take part in the diplomatic talks also covered participation in any military staff talks that might be agreed on.

8. On the assumption that the proposal for a North Atlantic defence treaty would emerge, he said that they would have to go very carefully before anything was signed, to the point of assuring themselves that the result would be acceptable to a two-third's majority of the Senate. As he remarked, it would be fatal for the United States to sign a treaty which was rejected by the Senate. The debate on the Vandenberg Resolution and the terms of the Republican platform encourage them to believe that they can secure approval for a commitment on the lines of the Pentagon recommendations.

9. I shall communicate further tomorrow on the subject of our representation and other questions which will arise if the Government accepts the invitation. Ends.

[Ottawa], June 23, 1948

Mr. Wrong telephoned me about 6.30 this afternoon to say that he was sending me a teletype about an invitation which he had just received from the State Department for Canada to participate in talks in Washington beginning Tuesday morning, 29th June.

Copies of the teletype were available shortly after 8 p.m. and I was able almost immediately to see the Minister who arranged for us to call on the Prime Minister in his office in the House.

The Prime Minister was relieved to learn that the long expected talks were about to take place and authorized our acceptance of the invitation. He also authorized me to ask Mr. Pearson to return from his trip in order to participate in the talks as a direct link between the Canadian Government and the Washington discussions.

I got in touch with Mr. Pearson and Mr. Wrong by telephone and informed them of these decisions.

I also told Sir Alexander Clutterbuck.

TELEGRAM WA-1849

Washington, June 25, 1948

Following for the Under-Secretary only from Wrong, Begins: Security talks. Here are some random reflections and suggestions on the talks which will probably begin on June 29th.

1. In view of the public statements made in Canada on the desirability of a North Atlantic Pact, I doubt that we need any detailed instructions for the talks provided that the Pentagon proposals of last March can be accepted as a general guide. We should not, in my judgment, aim at present at a more elaborate treaty than that outlined in the Pentagon document.

2. It is still uncertain whether the State Department is fully convinced that a treaty commitment is desirable. I have talked the matter over with Franks today. He tells me that he brought up the subject with Marshall last week and that Marshall then took the line that they should get further with military discussions before taking the issue up diplomatically. Marshall seems to have changed his mind at a meeting in the State Department on Monday when it was decided to hold the diplomatic talks. I think that Lovett is inclined to be sympathetic but not fully satisfied on the treaty proposal. Bohlen still tends to oppose it, while Kennan appears to be converted. Hickerson is the staunchest advocate. Probably our main concern next week should be to play up all the arguments for a treaty commitment, from our more detached point of view as a North American country and as a smaller Power.

3. I should think that most of the discussion on the first three topics suggested by the State Department (see paragraph 5 of my WA-1832 of June 23rd) can be left to the other participants, and particularly the Brussels partners. We could have a good deal to say on the 4th topic. I had thought of suggesting the addition of a 5th topic dealing specially with the relationship of Canada to European security arrangements, but in view of the informality of the proceedings I doubt that this is necessary.

4. Hickerson remarked yesterday that if the talks began on Tuesday we should expect some word of them to reach the press by Wednesday. I should not be surprised if word leaked out in Paris at any time. We should therefore be ready to discuss on the first day what announcement ought to be made. I doubt that an announcement will cause much surprise or arouse great interest except on one point — the participation of Canada in the talks. The adoption of the Vandenberg Resolution, the endorsement of it in the Republican platform, and conjectural despatches from Washington and European capitals, have prepared the way for talks of this nature. On June 23rd Lovett informed the press that, as recommended by the Vandenberg Resolution, the United States would soon start talks with the countries of "The Western European Union" to explore the possibility of United States military support. He said that the talks would initially be diplomatic, but that they were likely to be followed by military discussions. This statement attracted little notice in the press; it had in fact been prepared before the decision had been taken to begin the talks at once.

5. The participation of Canada will be a surprise to a good many, but I have no doubt that it will be cordially welcomed here and in the European countries. It may inspire a good deal of comment on the place of Canada in the western world. It will help to serve the purpose of indicating that the talks look towards a North Atlantic Agreement and not merely a military underwriting by the United States of the Brussels Treaty.

6. You might consider whether some advance notification should be sent not only to Canada House but also to our Ambassadors in France, Belgium and the Netherlands. They are likely to receive many enquiries about Canadian participation, and it may be well to let them know what sort of comment they can make. I think that the Ambassadors in France, Belgium, and the Netherlands should not be given any information about our participation in the Pentagon talks in view of the importance of keeping secret from the French that they were left out of the first discussions. Ends.

[Ottawa], June 26, 1948

I attach a highly selective file of recent material on the North Atlantic pact. I think you will find that this will give you what you need.

I haven't included anything before 1st June since the memorandum of 1st June, which you signed before you left, gives the background. There is attached to the memorandum of 1st June the text of the Vandenberg Resolution and the memorandum of 1st April agreed on in the Pentagon talks.

The latest document which has come in is Wrong's teletype WA-1849 of 25th June. It has just come in this moment and I haven't yet been able to give any consideration to what should be done with it. I am inclined at the moment to hold it until I have had a chance to talk to you since I would myself disagree with Wrong's view, expressed at the end of paragraph 1, that we should not at present aim at a more elaborate treaty than that outlined in the Pentagon document, and I would not wish to pass Wrong's message to the P.M. and the Minister without considering whether we should not at the same time pass on an alternative recommendation.

I shall therefore withhold taking any action on Wrong's teletype until we have had a chance to talk about it tomorrow morning.

Arnold Heeny is also anxious to talk to you about the relationship of the military planning which has been going on with the forthcoming defence talks.

I attach a top secret document, prepared for yesterday's meeting of the Chiefs of Staff Committee, on short range plans.<sup>54</sup> It is the relationship of the kind of material covered in this document with what is going to go on in Washington that Heeney wants to talk about.

My own views on the kind of instructions, if any, which should be provided for our participants in the Washington discussions are set forth in my memorandum of today's date, which you will find at the top of your file.

Attached to this memorandum is a revision, also of today's date, of the draft which I prepared in April of a pact.<sup>55</sup> I have made a considerable number of changes in the draft in an effort to make it more politically acceptable. I still suggest a weighted voting system, but do not suggest any formula for arriving at the weighted votes. The more I think of it, the more it seems to me clear that in a political matter like this all one can do is put down on paper what seems to be a reasonable number of votes for each country.

I have not given my two memoranda of today's date any circulation.

You will find on the file a letter of 17th June from Wrong, commenting on our memorandum of 1st June. I have not yet had a chance to do a reply to this letter of Wrong's.

You will note that in the paragraph numbered 10 on page 4 he develops somewhat his argument that we should not set the sights too high in the discussions with the United States and he goes on to say that, if the other parties to the negotiation insist on something more than a simple document, "they may wreck the whole project."

It seems to me that Wrong has made too big a jump in this paragraph. There is a profound difference between setting one's sights high and taking the line that if you can't get what you want you won't take half a loaf. I shouldn't think that any one of the participants in the Washington talks would break the negotiations because the United States would not go as far as they want them to go. That doesn't mean that we should not press the United States to go as far as we think they ought, in their interest as well as ours, to go.

If Mr. Dulles is to be Secretary of State, I would think that he might be attracted by the kind of large and imaginative proposals which Bevin and we have been thinking of.

[Ottawa], June 26, 1948

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS A NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE AGREEMENT

1. The Canadian Government welcomes the proposal of the United States Government that diplomatic talks on security matters take place between the United States and Canada and the signatories of the Brussels Treaty. The Canadian Government hopes that as a result of these talks agreement will be reached on the principles of a North Atlantic defence treaty.

2. The Canadian Government is not only willing to recommend to the Canadian Parliament and people that Canada enter into an agreement, but is anxious that the agreement come into force as quickly as possible.

3. Our willingness and our anxiety arise out of our belief that it must be made clear to the Soviet Government that, if it attempts by direct or indirect aggression to subdue any more free nations, it will not succeed unless it can overcome us all.

4. In the opinion of the Canadian Government, the best guarantee of peace today is the creation and preservation by the nations of the Free World, under the leadership of the United Kingdom, the United States and France, of an overwhelming preponderance of force over any adversary or possible combination of adversaries. We also believe that the Soviet menace to the Free World makes it necessary that the Free World create and maintain a sufficient degree of political, military economic and moral unity to ensure that this preponderance of force is so used that the free nations cannot be destroyed and defeated one by one.

5. In order to provide as soon as possible the nucleus of a larger union of the Free World, we believe that a North Atlantic defence agreement should be completed. It should consist, at least, of the signatories of the Brussels Treaty and the United States and Canada. It is to be hoped that it would also include other democratic and freedom loving states of Western Europe.

6. The overwhelming preponderance of force which must be created must not only be military; it must be economic; it must be moral. In order to create that preponderance it will therefore be necessary to balance tangible against intangible considerations.

7. Just as in the last war, so also today we are engaged in a "struggle for the control of men's minds and men's souls". It is therefore necessary constantly to keep in mind the necessity of the defence agreement being a basis for what might be called a spiritual mobilization of the liberal democracies, as well as being a basis for political, economic and military cooperation against Soviet threats. It is essential that the states which are members of the defence agreement should be bound together not merely by their common opposition to totalitarian communist aggression, but by a common belief in the values and virtues of western civilization, by a common concept of democracy and a positive love of it and of their fellow men, and by a determination to make their kind of democracy work for the promotion of mutual welfare and the preservation of peace for others as well as for themselves.

8. It is to be assumed that a North Atlantic defence agreement would appeal, as does the Brussels Treaty, to the "principles of democracy, personal freedom and political liberty, the rule of law and constitutional tradition, all of which are the common heritage" of the peoples of the signatory states. The Scandinavian countries, Iceland, Ireland and Italy could properly subscribe to these principles. It would, however, be difficult, if not impossible, to claim that the present regime in Portugal, much less that in Spain, embodies these principles. The Canadian Government is therefore of the opinion that on balance it would be unwise to invite Portugal (or of course Franco Spain) to join the North Atlantic agreement.

9. The agreement could, however, provide that the executive board set up under the agreement could extend the guarantees of the agreement to any state whose defence is vital to the defence of the Atlantic community.

10. The Brussels Treaty provides, in our opinion, a pattern for the proposed North Atlantic defence treaty. Its purpose, like that of the North Atlantic treaty, is not merely negative; it is to create a dynamic counter-attraction to Communism — the dynamic counter-attraction of a free, prosperous and democratic society as opposed to the totalitarian and reactionary society of the Communist world.

11. We believe therefore that the North Atlantic treaty should be much more than a mere military alliance. We believe it should, like the Brussels Treaty, set forth in its preamble the principles of western society which we are trying not only to defend but to make the basis of an eventually united world. We believe that the Atlantic treaty should make provision for closer economic, social and cultural collaboration between the signatories. We believe it should provide for the peaceful settlement of all disputes between the signatory states. We hope, for example, that the signatory states will find it possible to agree that all legal disputes between them will be referred to the International Court of Justice. (It is difficult to reconcile the reservations in Article VIII of the Brussels Treaty with the declared belief of the signatory states in the rule of law between nations.)

12. We believe that Article IV of the Brussels Treaty provides a satisfactory formula for dealing with armed attack since it makes clear that each signatory undertakes to give to each of the other signatories, in the event of armed attack, "all the military and other aid and assistance in their power."

13. We think, however, that the Brussels Treaty does not deal satisfactorily with the problem of indirect aggression. It is clear that the Soviet Union hopes and expects to extend its domination without resorting to armed attack. Since the end of hostilities, the Soviet Union has successfully avoided making armed attacks upon the countries which it has subdued. It is to be assumed that the Soviet Union will continue to try to follow the strategy of indirect aggression. The North Atlantic treaty will not appear to be very impressive or effective if it is a treaty to guarantee us against the kind of attacks on our independence which might have been made thirty years ago, but not the kind of attacks which may be made during the next decade.

14. It would seem to us, therefore, that the Atlantic treaty must be a treaty of defence against not only armed attacks, but also against "attempts by any state to undermine the political or economic independence of any signatory state, by intimidation or by subversive processes of political or economic infiltration."

15. It may be contended that the inclusion in the Atlantic treaty of a clause along these lines would be a violation of the Charter of the United Nations since Article 51 on which the treaty will have to be based refers merely to "the inherent right of individual or collective self defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations." However, the most important provision of the Charter is paragraph 4 of Article 2, under which all the Members of the United Nations have pledged themselves to refrain in their international relations from the threat of force against the political independence of any state or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations. If a Member of the United Nations attempts to undermine the independence of another state by intimidation or by other subversive methods, it has violated this solemn undertaking of the Charter and its violation of the Charter would release the other Members of the United Nations from their obligation under the Charter not to threaten or use force against that delinquent state.

16. Three years ago we had hoped that under the Charter of the United Nations special agreements would be reached between the member nations and the Security Council under which the member nations would "undertake to make available to the Security Council on its call . . . armed forces, assistance and facilities, including rights of passage." These agreements would "govern the numbers and types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided." These provisions in the Charter have, for the time being, become a dead letter. We believe that they could properly now be inserted in the North Atlantic defence agreement. In order to avoid delay resulting from the necessity of concluding special agreements, we believe that an annex to the North Atlantic treaty might set forth the interim agreement of each signatory to keep certain forces and facilities available. More precise agreements could be concluded later after the treaty has come into effect.

17. Very great care should be taken in the drafting of the agreement to make clear that the parties to the agreement are partners in peace and in war, and that the relationship between them is not that between exposed states which are asking for assistance and less exposed states which are being asked for assistance. The United States and Canada need the assistance of the Western European democracies just as they need ours.

18. The Canadian Government believes that the chief obstacles to the creation by the Free Nations of an overwhelming preponderance of force over the Soviet states is the despair, the apathy, and the doubt which is so widespread in the Western World. The existence of this despair, apathy and doubt makes it essential that the North Atlantic democracies make a bold and imaginative move sufficient to raise in the hearts and minds and spirits of all those in the world who love freedom that confidence and faith which will restore their vigour.

19. In our opinion this means not only that the Atlantic Treaty must be more than a mere military alliance but that it must create new imaginative types of international institutions which will be outward and visible signs of a new unity and purpose in the Western World. These new institutions should have within them the possibility of growth and adaptation to changing circumstances. They should be given titles symbolic of the ultimate goal of the world order which we have in mind and of which we are building an essential foundation.

20. For this reason we suggest the use of such terms as these in the treaty:

- (1) "Atlantic Community" for the international organization established by the treaty;
- (2) "Atlantic Nations" instead of "signatory states" or "contracting parties";
- (3) "Board for Collective Self-Defence" instead of "consultative council";
- (4) "Military Cooperation Committee" instead of provision for meetings of defence ministers or of defence experts;
- (5) "Atlantic Parliament" instead of "assembly of the organization".

21. We also suggest that an effort be made to make a clean break with the old issues of "veto" and "unanimity" by setting up a system of weighted voting. We have in mind a system under which the largest state, the United States, would have, say, forty votes, the smallest state, Luxembourg, one vote and others in rough proportion. Under such a system of weighted voting it might be possible for all the signatory states to agree to accept decisions made by a two-thirds majority. The United States would in fact have a veto since it would cast more than one-third of the total possible vote, but it would be a logical and defensible veto.

22. Because the treaty should be a human and compelling document, calculated to strike the imagination of the peoples of the Free World, it is important that every effort be made to write it in simple, every-day language without the use of ancient forms and terms. We would hope, for example, that the preamble could be written in the name of the people of the Atlantic Community and not in the names of the heads of the contracting states; and that the preamble would not be couched in the "whereas" or "considering" form but be a simple direct recital in a series of short sentences setting forth the creed of our North Atlantic Community. We would hope, as already mentioned, that such terms as "high contracting parties" or "signatory states" can be avoided. We would hope that it may be possible to use simple, direct and crisp language.

PROPOSED NORTH ATLANTIC DEFENCE TREATY

Mr. Wrong's comments on the memorandum of June 1 summing up the arguments in favour of a formal agreement. (Mr. Wrong's letter of June 17 to Mr. Reid, in reply to Mr. Reid's letter of June 3 enclosing the memorandum of June 1).

In the light of Mr. Wrong's most useful comments, I suggest that the following changes should be made in the memorandum of June 1:

Paragraph 5

Change the last sentence to read: "Since then, Soviet pressure at a number of points has slackened."

Paragraph 6

Change the first sentence to read: "It would seem to be the course of wisdom to regard this slackening of pressure with great suspicion."

Change the last sentence to read: "So long as Western Europe is as relatively defenceless as it is today, the Soviet Union is subject to a very strong temptation to seize Western Europe while it can do so in a few months, with a lower expenditure of men and munitions, than is likely to be the case a few years hence."

Paragraph 7

Sub-paragraph (i). Add after the second sentence the following: "The events in Congress during the first half of June reveal very clearly the wide differences on foreign policy between the right-wing Republicans who control the House of Representatives and the Republican supporters of a bi-partisan foreign policy. This emphasizes the importance of a multilateral agreement binding the United States for not less than ten years, because such an agreement would commit the whole Republican Party and considerably reduce the range within which the compass needle of United States policy could swing."

Begin the next sentence with the word "moreover".

Sub-paragraph (ii). Substitute "abated" for "removed" in the last sentence.

Sub-paragraph (vi). Change the first sentence to read: "The conclusion of a North Atlantic Treaty would be an important demonstration that effective collective security arrangements can be worked out which do not conflict with the Charter."

Sub-paragraphs (x) and (xi). Substitute "presidential declaration" for "congressional resolution".

2. This covers the suggestions made in the following numbered paragraphs of Mr. Wrong's letter of June 17: 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 and 8.

3. In his fifth numbered point, Mr. Wrong comments on sub-paragraph (v) of paragraph 7. He is not certain that it is in our interest that the proposals for the drastic revision of the Charter should be silenced by a military alliance. This raises a very large question of Government policy, but my impression is that Mr. St. Laurent has on a number of occasions during the past year taken this position pretty firmly. Moreover, regardless of the merits of the argument, it is an argument which appears to appeal both to the State Department and to the Foreign Office.

4. In numbered paragraph 7 of his letter, Mr. Wrong comments on sub-paragraph (vi) of paragraph 7. He is far from sure that he would like to see a collective defence agreement in which "all the free States of the world would be partners". Here, too, this is a matter on which Mr. St. Laurent has taken a clear and consistent position. Moreover, Mr. Wrong's arguments are not inconsistent with the position taken by Mr. St. Laurent since Mr. St. Laurent would agree that the immediately desirable objective is the North Atlantic Defence Treaty, and the union of all the free States of the world is a more remote objective.

5. The points made by Mr. Wrong in his numbered paragraph 9 are important, but I do not think that they require any rewording of sub-paragraphs (xvi), (xviii) and (xix) to which he refers. It was not intended that these paragraphs should give the impression that a North Atlantic agreement would be a guarantee against a Soviet occupation of Western Europe. The point of sub-paragraph (xvi) was that, since this Soviet occupation will remain feasible for a long time to come, we should at least give the Western Europeans the guarantee that if they are occupied they will still have a reasonable say in the making of the larger political and strategic decisions of the allies. The point of sub-paragraph (xviii) was to make it clear that our interests would be served by a strengthening of the line of defence of the Atlantic community at the Elbe.

6. In his numbered paragraph 10, Mr. Wrong comments that sub-paragraph (xix) is open to the criticism that it sets the sights too high and that, if the other parties to the Washington discussions insist on something more than a military undertaking with some simple, general article which would cover economic collaboration and set up some sort of consultative organs, "they may wreck the whole project". The definite purpose of sub-paragraph (xix) was to set the sights high, but it was not intended to give the impression that, if we could not get the whole loaf, we would refuse half a loaf. We should not, I think, assume too easily that the United States administration and Senate cannot be persuaded to accept something more than the minimum set forth by Mr. Wrong. I think that Mr. St. Laurent is convinced that something more than that minimum is required by the existing international situation and that his view on this is shared in the United Kingdom, France and Benelux. If this is what we believe, it seems to me that we owe it to the United States to make our beliefs clear to them. Moreover, it is not only in Western Europe that something more imaginative than the Brussels pact might create greater enthusiasm and public support. Sometimes it is politically easier to put through a big imaginative scheme than to get agreement on a half-way measure, particularly if the half-way measure is written, as was Dumbarton Oaks, in the language used by tired civil servants. I am not convinced that something along the lines of the provisional and tentative draft of June 26 would not appeal to someone like Mr. Dulles.

Following for High Commissioner, Begins: Security Talks. The following is for your own personal information. Within the Department here the information has been given to only three of the officers. You should not, repeat not, initiate a discussion with the Government to which you are accredited, but if they raise the matter with you, you may indicate that you have received the following information for your personal guidance.

2. The United States State Department has proposed that diplomatic talks on security matters take place between representatives of the United States, the five Brussels Treaty Powers, and Canada, and should begin in Washington on July 6th. These talks would cover the whole question of the security of Western Europe and the nature of the United States association under the Vandenberg Resolution with European security arrangements. The United States proposal is that the first phase of the talks should be non-military and that the European countries should be represented by persons now in Washington. The talks might go on intermittently for most of the summer but the State Department hopes that the first phase could be concluded in a fortnight or so. The State Department proposes that the substance of the talks should be regarded throughout as top secret and that no announcement about them should be made until this question has been discussed at the initial meetings. The talks, at least in the first phase, will be informal and will not commit Governments.

3. In making the proposal, the State Department said that, while the passage of the Vandenberg Resolution had opened the door for a discussion of a North Atlantic Defence Treaty, the United States Administration would have to go very carefully before anything was signed in order to be certain that the resulting Treaty would be acceptable to a two-thirds majority of the Senate. However, the debate on the Vandenberg Resolution and the terms of the Republican platform encourage them to believe that the Senate will approve of a North Atlantic Defence Treaty.

4. The Canadian Government has agreed to participate in the discussions and will be represented in the initial discussions by Pearson, Wrong and Stone. The United Kingdom Government has also accepted the invitation and we assume that France and the Benelux countries will be ready to take part.

5. The attitude of the Canadian Government to the proposal for a North Atlantic Defence Treaty has been made clear in the following public statements of which you now have or will soon have copies:

- (a) The Prime Minister's statement of March 17th in the House of Commons;
- (b) My statements of April 29th and June 19th in the House of Commons;
- (c) Statement in the House of Commons on external policy and defence by the Minister of National Defence on June 24th;
- (d) The concluding section of my speech in Toronto on June 11th.

I would draw your particular attention to my statement of June 19th (House of Commons Debates, pages 5551-2) in which I said that Canada has been crusading for the completion of a Western Union or North Atlantic Pact under which the Western European democracies, the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada would guarantee each other's security and would pool and coordinate their potentials for defence purposes so that any possible aggressor would know that he would have to be prepared to overcome us all if he attempted any aggression. We do not, repeat not, think that a Defence Pact that does not include the United Kingdom and the United States would be sufficiently impressive to require Canada to be a party to it.

6. In my speech of June 11th I had said that the best guarantee of peace today is the creation and preservation by the nations of the free world, under the leadership of Great Britain, the United States and France, of an overwhelming preponderance of military, economic and moral force over any possible adversary. The Canadian Government believes that Canada should play its full part in creating and maintaining that overwhelming preponderance of force and the necessary unity for its effective use. The Canadian Government does not, repeat not, however, believe that a Defence Pact which did not include both the United Kingdom and the United States would create the kind of overwhelming balance which we consider is required and which would justify Canadian participation.

7. The United Kingdom Government has instructed its High Commissioners in Canberra, Wellington and Pretoria to inform the Australian, New Zealand and South African Prime Ministers, respectively, of the forthcoming diplomatic discussions in Washington. Notwithstanding the instruction in paragraph 1 above, our High Commissioners in those three countries may discuss the matter orally with these Prime Ministers.

8. This telegram is being sent to our Ambassadors in Paris, Brussels and The Hague, and to all our High Commissioners other than the Acting High Commissioner in Newfoundland.

9. I need not emphasise the great secrecy which should surround this whole matter, at least at the present state. Message ends.

SECURITY DISCUSSIONS

I am sending, for your consideration, a draft statement on Canada's association with the proposed security discussions, which might be issued, if you agree, on Monday morning, to coincide with Mr. Bevin's statement in London. As you know, we had hoped that Mr. Bevin's suggested statement could be altered to include a reference to Canada and to add the words "and North Atlantic" after "Western European".

The State Department, however, are anxious to avoid using the words "North Atlantic" in security discussions at this stage, though they agree that this reference may be required later, if treaty arrangements are worked out. I think they are making a mistake here, but, as agreed with you on the telephone a few minutes ago, we are not pushing further for this amendment at this time.

The draft statement for release in Ottawa (which I read to you over the telephone) is as follows:

"The following question was asked in the House of Commons in London today: 'What arrangements have been made for discussions between the Powers adhering to the Brussels Treaty and representatives of the United States Government regarding American armed aid to Western Europe?'

The Foreign Secretary's reply to this question included the following:

'There will undoubtedly be a constant exchange of views in Washington between the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the other parties to the Brussels Treaty and Canada concerning Western European security arrangements, and United States and Canadian association with them.'

The Canadian position in regard to such security arrangements and Canada's association with them, was made clear by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on March 17th, when he said: 'The Canadian Government has been closely following recent developments in the international sphere. The peoples of all free countries may be assured that Canada will play her full part in every movement to give substance to the conception of an effective system of collective security by the development of regional pacts under the Charter of the United Nations.'

The proposed Washington discussions, at this stage at least, will be purely exploratory and on the diplomatic, not the governmental level.

The Canadian Government has been glad to accept the invitation to participate in them, and the Canadian Ambassador in Washington has been asked to make himself available for that purpose. In these diplomatic discussions he will be assisted by officials of the Department of External Affairs as required from time to time."

Following for Reid from Pearson, Begins: Confirming my telephone conversation, would you please tell the Prime Minister and the Minister that the talks here are going well along lines which should be very satisfactory to us. The Americans have apparently decided that the basis for any security arrangements should be broad and have emphasized that neither a military alliance of the old sort, nor a unilateral guarantee is sufficient to achieve the purpose desired. Mr. Lovett keeps referring to a "North Atlantic system" and to the fact that arrangements agreed on should be positive and not merely negative; that co-operation should be wider than merely military co-operation and should be closely related to the principles and purposes of the United Nations.

At first the French Ambassador showed an inclination to direct the discussions to the military aspects of security, but he agreed this morning that the talks here should concentrate on the wider political approach.

The general discussion should finish Friday, when it is hoped that working parties will be set up to go into the separate matters under discussion in greater detail.

I expect to be back in Ottawa Sunday and will be in a position to report then on what has happened here. Ends.

WASHINGTON EXPLORATORY TALKS ON SECURITY

I enclose copy No. 22 of the record of the first two meetings held in Washington on 6th July,<sup>56</sup> to which the informal title has been given "Washington Exploratory Talks on Security". Extraordinary security precautions have been taken to preserve the complete secrecy of these talks. The precautions are explained in the attached teletype No. WA-1979 of 8th July from Washington. You will note that it has been agreed that there should be no telephonic communication on the subject and that telegraphic communication should be limited to the indispensable minimum. This is partly because of the subject matter of the talks themselves and partly because premature leakage might seriously embarrass the State Department in its relations with the Congressional leaders.

2. I also enclose teletype WA-1997 of 9th July† from Washington, from which you will note that we should have by Monday the records of the third and fourth meetings<sup>57</sup> and that Mr. Pearson, who will reach here tomorrow, will be able to make a full report on all five meetings.

3. The first phase of the Washington exploratory talks has now been concluded and it has been agreed that the talks on the present level should not be resumed until after the governments concerned have had an opportunity of commenting on this week's conversations. This will mean a gap of not less than a week or ten days, and perhaps longer. In the meantime, a working party will go ahead with drawing up a program for more detailed studies based on the records of this week's meetings.

4. You will recall that in the memorandum which I sent you on 17th June before we received the invitation to participate in the Washington talks I reported to you on the probability of our receiving invitations not only to diplomatic talks but also to exploratory talks on military matters with the signatories of the Brussels Treaty and the United States. You will also have seen the message from Washington, WA-1908 of 1st July, which confirmed that we would probably be receiving an invitation to participate in the exploratory military talks and which went on to say that the terms of reference which would be given to the United States officers would probably be in some such terms as to proceed to London to participate in talks with the military representatives of the Brussels Treaty countries on a non-member basis with a view to coordinating the defence of Western Europe with that of the United States and Canada.

5. At the very first meeting of the talks in Washington Mr. Lovett, the Under-Secretary of State, mentioned that the United States had already received an informal invitation to send qualified officers to exploratory military talks and that he assumed that both Canada and the United States would shortly be receiving formal invitations.

6. A formal invitation has not yet come in, but I expect we may be receiving it in a few days through Sir Alexander Clutterbuck. It looks as though the military talks may begin towards the end of next week.

7. The State Department has also promised to let us have within a few days the terms of reference of the military observers whom they are sending to London. They are sending Major General Lemnitz, the Deputy Commandant of the National War College, and they are also hoping to send Major General Gruenther, the Director of the Combined Staff, along with a number of other officers.

8. The military talks will, of course, be purely exploratory. Participation on our part should be useful in helping us to relate plans for Canada-United States joint defence with the larger Anglo-United States arrangements.

9. Our present understanding is that the main topics which will be discussed in the exploratory military talks will be

(a) a review of the present organization and state of training and equipment of the military forces of the Brussels Treaty powers;

(b) steps which might be taken to sort out the types of equipment now in use by the Brussels Treaty powers in an effort to ensure that only one type of equipment will be used in future in each country (apparently at the present time the French, for example, are using both United Kingdom and United States surplus military equipment);

(c) future equipment requirements — those available from local manufacture and those available from outside.

By Monday, 12th July, the picture should be somewhat clearer and I shall look forward to discussing the matter with you then.

WASHINGTON EXPLORATORY DISCUSSIONS ON SECURITY

7. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported progress since the meeting of July 7th.

The discussions had been adjourned for a short interval. It appeared possible that a proposal would emerge for the conclusion of a treaty along the lines of the Rio pact. U.S. representatives had emphasized the necessity of an effective joint organization among Western European nations. The possibility of rationalizing the supply of equipment among the Brussels powers was under examination and a "stock taking" was in process.

Care was being taken by U.S. participants to have due regard to the "bi-partisan" approach. There would, of course, be no final commitment possible until after the Presidential election in November.

WASHINGTON SECURITY TALKS

There is little that I can add to the written reports on these talks which have been sent to you. They went off very well, indeed, and were conducted in a very friendly, frank and informal atmosphere. Their exploratory and non-committal character was kept constantly in mind.

Mr. Lovett proved to be an exceedingly good chairman, while Sir Oliver Franks and Mr. Van Kleffens played very useful parts. They are both first rate men, of course, and did much to ensure that the discussions were conducted on a high level. I do not know of any more impressive person at international talks of this kind than Sir Oliver Franks. He should be a most successful Ambassador in Washington.

Since the general discussions ended last Friday, and while the governments themselves are considering the reports that have already been submitted to them, a working group has commenced to examine some of the detailed questions which arose. The working group is presided over by Mr. Bohlen of the State Department; Mr. Wrong and Mr. Stone are representing us.

The working group has decided to go carefully through the records of all the meetings previously held and to prepare a list of topics for further consideration, probably starting with a brief appreciation of the risks to the security of Western Europe and North America. The group may also make a preliminary estimate of the provocative as opposed to the deterrent effects of a North Atlantic collective security agreement and may also go into the very important problem of indirect aggression and how to meet it. The attached telegrams Nos. 2023 and 2024, from Mr. Wrong give the text of an annotated agenda which is to serve as a guide in the discussions of the working party.

Related to these political talks, though not arising directly out of them, are meetings of the Military Committee of the Brussels pact countries to be held in London shortly to discuss, on the technical military level, coordination of plans, standardization of equipment, etc., of the forces concerned. The United States feel it is desirable that their services should be represented at such meetings. The question of supplies for and standardization of equipment of the Brussels forces cannot, of course, be effectively decided, or even discussed, without the United States being consulted, as much of the equipment and supplies will come from that country. They are therefore anxious to have their military experts participate in these discussions. It has also been suggested by the Brussels powers and the United States that Canada should participate. I understand that Mr. St. Laurent has mentioned this matter to you; that it has been discussed by the Minister of National Defence and the Chief of the General Staff; and that it has been agreed that such participation is important for us. Decisions made in Europe in regard to supply and equipment matters will have a very direct bearing on plans for our own forces. It may be decided, for instance, that certain Brussels pact countries are to be supplied by British type military equipment. As our own forces are tending, for obvious reasons, to become standardized on a United States equipment basis, such a decision might facilitate this process by providing a market for some of our surplus British type equipment. For this and other reasons, it has been felt that if the United States officers participate in these London talks, ours should do so as well.

The invitation to attend was received yesterday by the attached telegram from Robertson.†

Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Claxton, after consultation with the Chief of the General Staff, agree that the Canadian Services Representative at these meetings might be Brigadier Graham who is stationed at Canada House and who is to take up his position in Ottawa shortly as Vice Chief of the General Staff.

Washington, July 23, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

The only progress that I have to report in the security talks is the completion by the working party of the draft paper on Item 1† — the situation in Europe as it affects security. I enclose three copies of this paper for your information (numbered 5, 6 and 7).

I am not too happy about this paper but I think that it will have to be revised in the light of the papers produced on the other items. I think, therefore, that it might be accepted provisionally as a working paper.

Much as I like and advocate brief papers, I think that this particular one represents an effort to be too brief. I would, for example, have preferred an extension of the discussion of the provocative and deterrent considerations as well, perhaps, as some analysis of indirect aggression. The paper, as you will see, limits itself to two brief references to indirect aggression.

The working party has been working slowly indeed. The reason for this is that the representatives of the U.K., France and the Benelux countries believed that they were not in a position to contribute to a discussion of Items 3 and 4 until they had some information, both on the views of their individual governments and the joint views of their governments as these may have come out of the meetings at The Hague. It was, we know, the intention of the Foreign Ministers to discuss at The Hague progress which has so far been made in the talks in Washington, and presumably to indicate whether, from their point of view, these talks were going in the right direction. It is feared now, however, that the Berlin crisis and the fall of the French Government may have meant that very little time was devoted to this matter. In any event, until yesterday afternoon at 3.00 o'clock none of the Ambassadors here had had any reaction whatsoever from their people at home.

I must confess that I myself, and I think the same can be said of the State Department people, am not able to see why the working party could not have gone ahead with the exploratory talks. I cannot help but fear that delay might be interpreted as deliberate procrastination and remove from the State Department the first full blush of its enthusiasm. Certainly, delay in present circumstances, which is caused by the European countries, would, it seems to me, be difficult to explain to Senator Vandenberg. At yesterday's meeting of the working party, however, Reber suggested in no uncertain terms, and it was generally agreed, that beginning Monday the party should get on with its job, whether or not fresh instructions have been received by the European representatives from home. He pointed out that the discussions in the working party were, after all, merely to blaze some trees to help the Ambassadors' meeting, which itself, by common consent, was nothing but exploratory and involved no commitments whatsoever on anybody's part.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, July 27, 1948

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I have received your letter of 23rd July with the Working Party draft paper on Item 1 "The Situation in Europe as It Affects Security". I agree with you that this is a somewhat inadequate analysis of the subject, though it is clear enough as far as it goes and the views expressed seem to me to be sound.

I think that it is most unfortunate that the Benelux countries and the United Kingdom and France are not pushing ahead with the Working Party. I suppose the delay has been due to two factors: one, the meeting of the Foreign Ministers in The Hague, which may have caused hesitation in Washington until instructions could be received from that meeting, and two, the general feeling that there is no need to hurry this work because the immediate problem is one of getting arms to the European countries rather than tying up the United States to any Atlantic security arrangements. I suppose the European countries feel, in fact, that such a tie-up has already taken place because of the presence of United States troops in Europe and the fact that the United States would be involved from the beginning in any Soviet attack on Europe. This point of view is, I think, profoundly wrong and shortsighted. I feel myself that it would be folly for the European states concerned not to push ahead with the North Atlantic security pact because of their worry about immediate military assistance. Their main hope, it seems to me, lies in the development of a genuine regional mutual assistance system in which the United States will play a leading part. Circumstances favour such a development in the United States now, but it may be different two or three years from now.

In this connection, I am enclosing herewith a letter from Dupuy† which conveys, to me at least, a depressing impression of lack of imagination in certain European quarters. I hope shortly to reply to this letter at some length and will send you a copy.<sup>58</sup>

Yours sincerely,

[Washington], July 27, 1948

THE SEVEN POWER MEETING, JULY 26, 1948: CONSIDERATION OF COUNTRIES FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE PACT RESULTING FROM THESE DISCUSSIONS

At an early stage in the discussion it was decided that whatever pact might result from these Seven Power discussions should be designed to include the countries of the North Atlantic and Western Europe. The meeting then turned to the consideration of each of the possible member countries in turn, but in no definite order. It was decided that the Seven Powers taking part in these discussions should all be members.

The countries of the Western Hemisphere which were considered in addition to Canada and the United States were Newfoundland, Brazil and one or two other Latin American countries. While it was considered that Brazil would be useful as a staging point for United States forces proceeding to Europe via the southern route, it was the consensus that the United States could probably secure such facilities under the pact concluded at Rio de Janeiro, and that the inclusion of Brazil in this pact would merely lead to further complications. The only complication which was mentioned was the possibility of jealousy on the part of Argentina and Chile. It was decided not to discuss the possible membership of any Latin American country other than Brazil. It was unanimously agreed that Newfoundland would have to be a participant, either as a tenth province of Canada, as a colony of the United Kingdom, or as an independent Dominion.

In considering the countries of Western Europe which might subscribe to the pact, notice was taken of three main factors:

- (1) what each country could contribute to an alliance;
- (2) whether the security of each country was menaced at the present time; and
- (3) a mélange of subsidiary matters, such as the presumed willingness of each country to participate and the possibility that omitting any given country from the alliance would by that fact itself invite Soviet aggression against that particular country.

Below is a list of countries together with the factors which were considered in each case.

Ireland would be an asset to any alliance of North Atlantic and Western European countries because of the bases it could provide. However, Irish security is not menaced by its present lack of outside support, nor is it probable that the Soviet Union would embark upon a direct attack upon Ireland if it were left out of such a pact.

Iceland would be a most important asset as a base for planes flying from the United States to Europe. It was noted that the Icelandic Constitution outlaws war and makes no provision for armed forces of any sort. It is not at the present time menaced with attack nor, due to its position, would it be probable that the Soviet Union would launch an attack against Iceland because of its omission from the pact under consideration. It is not clear whether Iceland would be willing to subscribe to the pact.

Norway would be a desirable member because of the bases it could supply (and, although this was not mentioned, presumably because the same bases in Soviet hands would be a serious menace). The present state of Norwegian security was not touched upon, but it was considered that Norway would be willing to subscribe to the pact, especially if Sweden could be brought in, but possibly would be willing to do so anyway.

Sweden would be a desirable member but appears to be most unwilling to undertake any commitments with the western world. It was remarked, however, that the other two Scandinavian Foreign Ministers would try after the Swedish elections this fall to persuade the Swedish Foreign Minister to throw in his lot with the west.

Denmark would be a most important member as it could contribute Greenland to the northeast staging route for aircraft passing from the United States to Europe. The Netherlands representative also thought that Denmark was important as controlling half of the Kattegat. (He thought Swedish membership was important in order to control the other half.) It was considered that Denmark would be willing to be a member, possibly even if Sweden declined membership.

Spain. It was considered that in the long run it was fundamental that Spain should be a member of whatever organization springs from the pact envisaged by these conversations. It was recognized, however, that so long as the present government is in power in Spain it would be politically impossible for either the United Kingdom or France to countenance Spanish membership. Both the United Kingdom and United States members remarked on the extreme importance which was attached to Spanish bases by their respective General Staffs. It was considered that the omission of Spain from the pact, however, would not menace Spanish security, and might not even be particularly important as Spain would be compelled to go to war against the Soviet Union if shooting once started.

Portugal was considered a desirable member, principally because of its possession of the Azores. A disadvantage to Portuguese membership was considered to be Portugal's desire (shown during negotiations during the recent war) that any guarantee extended to Portugal itself should also be extended to all Portuguese colonies, including Timor. Portugal's security was not considered to be under immediate threat and it was the general opinion that Portugal would ultimately be involved for the same reason as Spain.

Switzerland was considered to be a desirable member but it was generally thought that it was pointless to discuss Swiss membership or to extend an invitation to Switzerland as that country would probably flatly refuse to depart from its policy of neutrality.

Western Germany was considered to be a desirable member. Though no definite reason was stated for its desirability, by inference German industrial potential would be its principal asset. It was also mentioned that the deliberate omission of Germany at the present time might have the effect of turning the Germans toward the Soviet Union. The French member immediately raised the question whether this meant that the United States envisaged the rearmament of Germany. After some debate it was decided that in effect Western Germany would automatically be a party to a pact of the North Atlantic and Western European countries for the reason that its territory was in a position little different from that of a colony of the United Kingdom, the United States or France.

Austria was considered eligible for membership in theory, though there were serious difficulties in practice, because the Soviet forces control most of Austrian industrial potential. It was generally agreed that Austrian membership should be considered in the same manner as Italy's membership.

Italy was considered a borderline country. While it would be very little of an asset, its omission would invite Soviet interference. Rather to keep Italy out of Soviet hands than from any desire to secure whatever help Italy might have to offer, it should be a member. The French representative introduced some objections to Italian membership on the ground that Italy was a Mediterranean rather than an Atlantic country, but it was pointed out that it would be politically impossible for the United States to guarantee the security of almost every country of Western Europe except Italy in view of the large Italian population in the United States.

There was some discussion of Greek and Turkish participation. It is known that the Turkish Government is most anxious not to be omitted from any pact of the nature envisaged by these discussions, but it was the opinion of the meeting that if the pact were extended from the North Atlantic and Western Europe, first to Greece and later to Turkey and possibly Iran, it might end up in China too. The general opinion, therefore, was that participation in this arrangement should be confined to the countries of the North Atlantic and Western Europe (including Italy and possibly Austria), but that however desirable it might be to protect the security of Greece, Turkey and Iran, it would be necessary to leave that problem to be decided elsewhere.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Hickerson is now back from a holiday and is attending meetings of the working group for the security talks. Yesterday at lunch I asked him to give me his present estimate of the possible timetable. He said that in his judgment the Administration here will not be able to commit themselves definitely to any scheme for an agreement before mid-November. He thought that the elections would have to take place before the commitment stage was reached, and that there would have to be time after the elections for them to count heads in the Senate to ensure that there would be a safe margin of approval over the necessary two-thirds in the Senate. He, therefore, is not anxious that at this time we should press on too hard with the talks, although they should be continued steadily through meetings of the working group, perhaps three times a week.

By the time the commitment stage is reached it should be possible to summon a conference fairly promptly, and the conference ought not to have much real work to do. Two or three days of speechmaking and discussion might suffice. He thinks the conference on the whole should meet in Europe. If it were to meet on this side of the Atlantic, it would be preferable in his judgment for it to meet in Canada rather than in the United States.<sup>59</sup>

They are anxious in the State Department to maintain pressure on the Brussels Powers for the achievement of concrete results in the military sphere and for some extension of the Brussels Treaty. They recognize that some of the countries of Western Europe whose participation in a North Atlantic Pact would be very desirable, if not essential, would not be willing to adhere to the Brussels Treaty as well. They must, however, if they are to carry opinion here with them, have evidence that Western European union is more than a name in both the economic and the military spheres.

I should judge from this that the probability is that the talks will proceed in a fairly leisurely fashion through the summer, but might be speeded up a little in the early autumn. As usual, the timetable has to be governed by domestic political circumstances in this country, but no one can deny the relevancy of these considerations in an election year such as this. Few things could be more damaging than the signature of a North Atlantic Agreement which failed to secure the approval of the Senate. The introduction of the issue into the campaign might result in a number of commitments by individual candidates which could not readily be undone.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

Washington, July 29, 1948

Dear Mike [Pearson]:

I think that I should perhaps try to give you a very brief report on progress from meeting to meeting in the working group of the security talks. As Hume [Wrong] told you in a letter today, it now looks as though the group will meet Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays during August at least. The meetings normally last from 2 to 2½ hours.

As you know, at the last two meetings<sup>60</sup> we have been discussing Item 3, particularly (a) What countries should be covered in any North Atlantic security arrangements?

We have been wandering backwards and forwards over Western Europe and the North Atlantic and finally yesterday we generally agreed that insofar as immediate participation in a Western European — North Atlantic security arrangement is concerned, the following countries should be approached. The list below is, of course, additional to the seven countries which are participating in the present talks.

- (1) Norway.
- (2) Denmark.

It was generally agreed that both Norway and Denmark would participate.

- (3) Sweden.

It was generally agreed that Sweden would be very hesitant and would probably refuse if approached now. The fact of Norwegian and Danish participation, however, would certainly carry considerable weight. It was also thought that the situation might be changed by the results of the forthcoming Swedish elections.

- (4) Iceland.

It was considered that Iceland might hesitate. She has the disadvantage of having no armed forces whatsoever, as well as a clause in her Constitution outlawing war. (A similar clause, you will recall, was removed from the constitution of Luxembourg some time ago.) It was the general view, however, that Icelandic security would not be materially affected whether she joined or not. Hickerson also reported that some time ago when some Icelandic cabinet ministers were in Washington, he arranged for some of the top planners on the military side here to give them, without any mincing of words, a picture of Iceland's importance strategically from the United States point of view in the event of war, and, in consequence, how Iceland would have to be used by the United States forces. This came as no surprise to the ministers. A thought in connection with Iceland which must be borne in mind is that at the present time the Communists are relatively stronger there than in any of the Scandinavian countries. They do not, however, hold any cabinet posts.

(5) Ireland.

It was felt that Ireland would almost certainly join, particularly after the encouraging speech on foreign policy which McBride<sup>61</sup> gave some days ago, in which he surveyed the world situation rather more realistically than has been ever done before the Dail before.

(6) Portugal.

Hoyer Millar observed that Portugal would, from the U.K. point of view, have to be invited to join, but that she might be a little hesitant because of the position of Spain. Hickerson observed, of course, that the importance of the Azores made it essential for Portugal to be a party to any arrangement.

(7) Italy.

It was generally agreed<sup>62</sup> that Italy should be invited to join and that the possibility of her being a member at the same time of a Mediterranean security arrangement should not be lost sight of. It was very definitely the general view that the security risk of leaving Italy out would be very much greater than the security risk of taking her in. The French put in some mild reservations about the advisability of including Italy. One of their arguments was that the participation of Italy would increase the provocative effect of any arrangement. Hickerson observed that the provocative versus the deterrent effects presented a problem which must be very carefully studied at some stage, and he added that some of his colleagues in the State Department had their honest doubts on this point. He did not think, however, that the inclusion of Italy would materially increase the provocative effects of any arrangement. The French on the whole in their reservations about Italy were on pretty weak grounds in view of their own relations with Italy at the moment. I feel that their reservations in this matter are just part of their general tactics to keep the arrangement as exclusive as possible, having lost any hope of getting what they really want, which is a unilateral guarantee of their territorial integrity.

(8) Switzerland.

It was generally agreed that Switzerland would be a most desirable participant, but that she would almost certainly choose to maintain her centuries' old neutrality policy. It should, however, be explained to the Swiss that an invitation to them was not forthcoming because it was felt it might embarrass them. If, on the other hand, they wished to be invited, they certainly would be invited to join.

<sup>62</sup> Celle-ci et les trois notes de renvoi suivantes sont des notes marginales par L.B. Pearson :
This and the following 3 footnotes are marginal notes by L.B. Pearson:

We devoted some time to discussing the three countries which eventually might become parties to any arrangement, as follows:

(1) Austria.

It was the general view that Austria should be invited on the signature of a treaty of peace.

(2) Spain.

It was the general view that Spain should be invited whenever an invitation becomes politically possible. The British and the Americans both pointed out that there would be a deep difference of view between political and military thinking as regards Spain, but that political thinking in both countries would probably have to prevail. The French said that any consideration of Spanish participation would be quite impossible as far as they were concerned at the present time.

(3) Germany.

It was felt that any paper that the working group should produce must mention the future possibility of German participation. By "future", we were thinking in terms of at the conclusion of a treaty but not later than the end of military occupation. The French alone took the strongest exception and said that any mention of German participation in even a working paper would have to carry also an indication that they were opposed. We may be able to find words which might satisfy the French, but their feelings about Germany go so deep apparently as to make it impossible for them to envisage that country ever again becoming a respected and respectful member of the Western European — North Atlantic community of nations. Their arguments are purely emotional and have no basis of logic.

At last Monday's meeting there was a lot of rather confused discussion during which it developed on several occasions that people simply did not know whether other people were talking about Brussels Pacts, North Atlantic Pacts, or North American Pacts. After the meeting, therefore, I wrote out a little paper, a copy of which I enclose, and which Hume and I have been over and revised, which I had intended tabling yesterday. I discussed it with Jack Hickerson before yesterday's meeting, however, and he thought it was a little premature, although he personally fully agrees that alternative (B) must be our goal. The Americans, however, attach such importance to the extension of the Brussels Pact that they will almost certainly use first the possibility and, if it develops, the actuality of their participation in a broader arrangement to bring the strongest kind of pressure on the Brussels Pact countries to take in more members.<sup>63</sup> As Jack told Hume yesterday, they intend to make absolutely certain before they put it up that any agreement which does go before the Senate<sup>64</sup> will be ratified. I think they feel that the ideal arrangement which they could put before the Senate would be a proposal of a security pact to which the three parties would be: the United States of America, Canada, and the United States of Western Europe. Since they cannot achieve this ideal situation they honestly feel that the more evidence that they have in hand that Western Europe is tending towards unity the easier will be their selling job.

I am not sure that it will now be necessary to table this paper or one like it. In his opening remarks yesterday Jack went far towards clarifying the basis of the discussion which followed by suggesting that we should all understand that in discussing these various countries we were discussing them only in connection with their possible adhesion to a Western European — North Atlantic Pact and without any reference to the possible extension of the Brussels Pact. At practically every meeting, however, the Americans do bring up the question of the extension of the Brussels Pact and ask for the views of the Brussels Pact governments on this point.<sup>65</sup> The present views of all of the Brussels Pact countries, some stronger than others, as it now turns out, are those given in note (i) under alternative (A) in my paper.

This paper, or one like it, might serve a purpose later on, however, and it would be useful if I could have your comments. One thing which it would do would be to place on the table of the working group several points which were pretty well threshed out in the Pentagon talks.

Yours ever,

[Washington], July 28, 1948

There has been some confusion in the talks regarding ultimate objectives and means of achieving them. Some clarification came out of Monday's meeting. It might, however, be useful to set down some thoughts which might serve as a guide to further discussions.

Two alternatives offer:

(A) an extension of the Brussels Pact followed or accompanied by the formation of a North Atlantic regional arrangement between the Brussels Pact powers and the North American group.

Notes on (A):

(i) The Brussels Pact countries are apparently reluctant to proceed at once with an extension of their pact to include other countries, even if other countries would be willing to join, which is doubtful. There has been no knocking at the door yet and it is doubtful that there will be without something more tangible than a vague plan to form a North Atlantic regional arrangement. The attitudes of both parties and non-parties to the pact towards its extension are based, of course, on considerations of the effect of this on their "security risk". This alternative (A) presents, therefore, the problem of the hen and the egg, and any timetable which might ensure its success is difficult to foresee at this stage.

<sup>65</sup> Surely the Americans must see that no one is going to join the Brussels Group as long as the question of U.S. association with Atlantic security is not decided.

(ii) The Brussels Pact contains military guarantees which are firmer than the Rio Pact, which means that they are firmer than the United States could give.<sup>66</sup> This might make for complications if a North Atlantic Pact were made between groups of countries where the groups would to some extent constitute "units" even though each country would, of course, become party by its own act. Similar complications might arise from the fact that United States-Canadian mutual defence arrangements are not comparable to the Brussels Pact in form or substance.

(B) A security arrangement between the countries of North America and Western Europe which would be sui generis, not directly depending on the existence of the Brussels Pact or the U.S.-Canadian mutual defence agreements.

Notes on (B):

(i) This is not to say that existing regional arrangements will not help in completing the North Atlantic arrangement. They have, in fact, sown the seed in the public mind. They do not provide, however, exact models for more comprehensive arrangements.

(ii) The Brussels Pact does indeed provide a hard core in Europe and, whether or not it be extended, it is further evidence of the tendency among the countries of Western Europe to work together for many purposes. This tendency has also been demonstrated in other ways.

(iii) It should be noted, however, that some European countries whose participation in a North Atlantic arrangement is important or even essential would be unwilling<sup>67</sup> to join the Brussels Pact under any circumstances but would accept a broader agreement.

(iv) It would be quite impossible for Canada and the United States to sign the Brussels Pact as it stands. Here there is a tendency to argue around in circles. It is true that North American participation in any security arrangement would make it much more attractive to many countries, and in most cases would be the determining factor in their decision to join. The particular regional arrangement which is under discussion now would not, however, be conceivable without North American participation. Therefore, it cannot be achieved by the extension of the Brussels Pact.

(v) The conception to aim at is, therefore, a security arrangement between the North Atlantic countries, which is internally braced and strengthened by more intimate and far-reaching arrangements between some of the parties, such as the Brussels Pact (in its present form or with some extension) and the arrangements between the United States and Canada.<sup>68</sup> The North Atlantic arrangement, however,

Dear Mr. Pearson:

With reference to my letter dated July 29th on the security talks, I neglected to mention that the question of Brazilian participation in North Atlantic security arrangements was also raised. While the importance of Brazil to North Atlantic security was recognized, it was the general feeling in the working group that the participation of this country would present complications. It was considered that Brazilian, as well as other Latin American cooperation, would perhaps be assured in case of need through the Rio Pact in view of the fact that with common United States membership in both arrangements the two security pacts would be interlocking.

The question of North Africa was also raised, but it was considered that North African participation would be assured by that of France.

With reference to your letter of 30th July regarding membership in the North Atlantic security group, I agree without reservation that Brazil should not be included. DESPATCH 453

Ottawa, August 4, 1948

TOP SECRET

Sir,

I have read with much interest your despatch No. 231 of July 22nd.† In connection with paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 dealing with the "Washington talks", I feel that the French and Belgian point of view on security as reported is both short-sighted and wrong. In this regard, C.R.O. telegram 148 of 27th July† reporting on the meeting of the Consultative Council states that the French and Belgian delegations showed themselves restive at the slow progress of the Washington conversations. I had assumed that this referred to the Washington political security conversations and that, therefore, the view expressed did not coincide with that which you gave in your despatch under reference of the French and Belgian reactions. However, I note that in your despatch No. 228† you state in paragraph 4 that the French and Belgians had expressed their anxiety at the slowness of the progress made in arranging United States military support to Western Europe. There seems to be a discrepancy here as the Washington conversations in question are not concerned directly with military support, but with the formation of a political security grouping. It is true, however, that the French and Belgian representatives at these talks have on occasion confused the two things with consequences which, as I shall try to point out below, are unfortunate.

2. It would be surprising to me if representatives of France and Belgium, in the light of the history of the last forty years, expressed less interest in a long term security policy than in measures to meet the short run emergency. Surely they must realize that there is now an opportunity to work out formal treaty arrangements by which the United States will accept its full share of responsibility for the security of the West European and North Atlantic democratic community, and that it is vitally important to take full advantage of this opportunity. If discussions to this end interfered with arrangements for meeting the present emergency or increased the danger of Soviet aggression, I could understand the hesitation of the French and Belgians. But, as I see it, this is not the case. The Americans have made it clear that they will do what they can to help immediately, provided the Brussels countries are themselves doing everything possible, individually and, even more important, collectively to strengthen their own defences. Naturally, with American troops in Europe they are bound to take this attitude because they know that, along with the Western European countries, they will at once be at war if and when the Russians commit an act of aggression. But to build long range policy on this situation; to assume that all that is required is a flow of arms to the European countries from the U.S.A. and to assume that first priority should be given to the consolidation of the Western Union group with United States military support displays, so it seems to me, a serious misunderstanding of the present position. What is required, I think, is for the Brussels powers to push ahead with a regional collective security pact under the United Nations, which would include the United States and Canada. The European countries have everything to gain and nothing to lose by this, as it would not interfere with any immediate assistance to Europe which the U.S.A. is willing to give. There is no possibility of any formal unilateral backing of the Brussels countries by North America, and it is folly for the French and Belgians, misled possibly by the fact that Germany is now garrisoned in part by U.S. troops to think so.

3. At the recent Washington talks, M. Bonnet took at the beginning the narrow view that all that mattered was immediate security, and what North America could do at once to prevent Europe being over-run by an aggressor. But he was very clearly told by Mr. Lovett that what was required was much more than this; that the U.S.A. was not interested in providing unilateral guarantees, but very interested in giving and receiving assistance within the framework of a regional security agreement. The Canadian position is, of course, similar. We would have nothing to do with any unilateral guarantee. Emphasis on such a guarantee by continental countries merely strengthens the suspicion that the European countries are interested, not so much in building up an effective collective security grouping, as in securing military supplies and assistance from across the Atlantic.

4. Of course, it is quite true that the security talks begun in Washington in July cannot result in any concrete results until after the U.S. elections. (The attached letter from Mr. Wrong will give you some idea of the possible timetable.) But there is a great deal of preparatory work to be done and it will create a bad impression — indeed it has already done so — if the French and other European delegations to these talks hang back and hesitate to take any initiative, in the absence of instructions from their governments.

5. For the first time in United States history, developments in domestic policy and the consciousness of a great menace to her security (the two are, of course, tightly related) have made it possible for Washington, not to follow, but to take the lead in working out collective security arrangements — not merely for an emergency but as part of long term policy. These arrangements will cover countries which have suffered grievously in the past because such arrangements did not exist until after war had begun. I should have thought that a change of this kind in U.S. policy would have been greeted in Paris and in Brussels with great relief and enthusiasm and that they would have pressed ahead with all speed to reduce to a treaty commitment a policy which would have saved them in 1914 and 1939 and which may be more difficult to implement in 1952 than in 1948. Any holding back or reservations now by European countries would be disastrous. If the U.S.S.R. attacked Western Europe during the next, say, twelve months, nothing that the U.S.A. would be able to do during this period — under any emergency arrangements — could prevent Soviet forces over-running continental Europe. But if the U.S.S.R. were tempted to commit an aggression three or four or five years from now, the certainty that an attack on any one European state would be an attack on the U.S.A. as a signatory to an Atlantic Pact, might prevent the aggression taking place. Furthermore, the other signatories to that pact during these years would secure more material help from North America for their own defence than they could in any other way. I suggest, in fact, that only within the framework of such a security arrangement can the maximum military assistance which may be required in the years ahead be granted.

6. That is why I feel certain that the European countries concerned have everything to gain and nothing to lose by concluding such a pact at the earliest possible moment. It is depressing that some of them seem unable to see this.

7. Since beginning this despatch, I have received a further communication from Washington which is attached herewith and which deals with the matter discussed above.<sup>69</sup> I would call your attention particularly to the last paragraph of Mr. Stone's letter.

8. I am sending a copy of your despatch and this reply to London, Washington, Paris and Brussels.

Washington, August 4, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I was shown today at the State Department a copy of a telegram from the United States Embassy in Brussels giving a summary of Spaak's present views on a North Atlantic security arrangement as expressed to Alan Kirk there.

Spaak described the Washington conversations so far as "confused and rambling". (The date of this telegram was July 25th). He expressed the view that a North Atlantic Pact would be premature; he did not think it wise, for example, to invite Norway and Denmark as long as the military potential of the west remained at or near its present level. Greenland and Iceland he thought might be in a different position, but he still had doubts about the timeliness insofar as they were concerned. Furthermore, he thought that the provocative effect which the conclusion of such a pact would have on the Russians was also not justifiable if one took into account the present military potential of the North Atlantic countries.

Spaak said, however, that he would be prepared to accede to the United States wishes if the United States on her side was prepared to back up a regional commitment of this kind in a substantial manner. The Brussels Pact, for example, contemplated immediate military action by all signatories in the event of an attack upon one. He doubted that the United States could make this kind of commitment, and he said that some of his colleagues were doubtful about what action the United States would take were Russia to march into Germany now. Spaak said that he himself had no doubt in his mind that any Soviet aggression which would bring Soviet military forces into the United States Zone of Germany, and, therefore, into conflict with United States forces, would mean war in which the United States would participate, and he added that he had made an effort to convince his doubting colleagues that this would be the case.

On the receipt of this telegram from Brussels and of another one along similar lines, although not quite so strong, from The Hague, an instruction to the Ambassadors in all the Brussels Pact countries was drafted in the State Department. I enclose a copy of this draft which Achilles gave to me today. This instruction was not, in fact, sent, not, Achilles said, because it was disapproved by his superiors but because it was decided to use the arguments in it in the discussions here, rather than to start arguing, as he put it, "all over the place".

I am not sure that Lovett has seen this draft telegram, but Achilles did say that Bohlen has approved the substance of it, and it was Bohlen's idea that the case which it makes should be presented in the discussions in Washington. The draft, therefore, is important as indicating State Department lines of thought, at least for the working party talks and I am, therefore, sending a copy of it along to you.

Yours sincerely,

T.A. STONE

[Washington, n.d.]

Substance of following should be communicated orally to Spaak and foreign ministers of other Brussels Treaty countries (Embtel 1484 July 24 and Hague tel 455 July 21):

Vandenberg resolution lays down framework and essential conditions for US support for Brussels Treaty countries. These are: (1) US association must be within framework of UN Charter, (2) it must be by constitutional process, i.e. treaty obligations must be clearly defined and approved by two-thirds of Senate and material assistance will require legislation and appropriations, (3) arrangements must be based on continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, i.e. US assistance must supplement rather than replace efforts of others and must be two-way with Europeans contributing maximum to US security, and (4) arrangements must affect (i.e. increase) US national security.

Parties to Brussels Treaty are among most geographically secure of European states. US Govt has made amply clear its desire to assist in restoration their collective military potential subject (repeat subject) to all of foregoing conditions. We do not (repeat not) consider that US can effectively support Brussels Treaty arrangement as presently constituted except within framework of North Atlantic arrangement, terms of which would fulfil all four conditions. Treaty establishing North Atlantic collective arrangement within Charter framework would clearly define obligation of all parties including US (conditions 1, 2 and 3) and provide basis for implementing legislation and appropriations. Membership is particularly important to condition 4. In our view any arrangement which did not include Greenland (Denmark) Iceland and Norway would not (repeat not) adequately enhance our national security. We consider these areas vital both to our own defense and to maintenance of sea and air communications essential for any operations on European continent. Military weakness of those countries is immaterial, what is essential is keeping their territory available to west and denying it to east.

We fully realize importance of avoiding appearance of provocation. References in both reftels to possibility of Soviets considering Atlantic arrangement as threat are comprehensible only insofar as Soviets would so regard any (repeat any) arrangement for US military cooperation with, or support for, western European countries. Charter framework and provision for positive cooperative development of common western civilization as well as common defense should reduce this danger. We are convinced that, until military potential of western world can be restored over long-term, best short-term protection for west and deterrent to aggression from east lies in proceeding quietly but firmly to confront Soviets with organized determination of west to resist attack.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

The time is approaching when the security talks working group will be considering the actual clauses of a possible North Atlantic-Western European Pact. You will recall that at the Pentagon talks we drew up an outline of a possible pact. For convenience of reference, I attach this outline with some modifications which I have made in it, with a view to having it tabled in the working group, bearing in mind that four of the countries there represented are unaware of the previous Pentagon talks.

The modifications which I have made are as follows:

(1) In paragraph (a) I have added the last sentence.

(2) In paragraph (e) I have removed the details of the geographical delineation which was suggested at the Pentagon on the assumption that this would have to be worked out afresh.

(3) In paragraph (h) I have removed the suggestion of a definite number of years on the same assumption as above.

With reference to the last sentence that I added to paragraph (a) (Paragraph (1) above), I had a talk with Achilles yesterday and I find that the State Department are very much in favour of the idea that the pact should contain some very positive statements about the intentions of the signatories to cooperate in the economic, social and cultural fields and that it should set up, of course within the framework of the Charter, some kind of machinery for this purpose. In this connection, Achilles has had what seems to me an interesting idea, on which he has put a memorandum into circulation in the State Department. He has gone to the Preamble of the Constitution of the United States and lifted from it the six objectives therein stated which he thinks might in some cases with modification and in some cases without be incorporated not only in the Preamble of a pact, but in articles. The objectives, as you know, are:

To form a more perfect union

To establish justice

To ensure domestic tranquillity

To provide for the common defence

To promote the general welfare

To secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

It is interesting that Achilles in his memorandum says with reference to the first objective, "To form a more perfect union", that whether we like it or not, the only ultimate answer to the problem of establishing any kind of comfortable security must be the creation of authorities, both political and military,<sup>70</sup> to which countries of Western Europe and the North Atlantic would have to surrender some degree of their national sovereignty.

I shall not go into this matter any further now, but I shall, of course, keep you informed as to how far some of these ideas are injected into the present discussions. Mr. Reid will be interested in Mr. Achilles thinking.

In the meantime, it would be useful if I could have any ideas which you might wish put forward in the talks when we reach the question of the actual form of a pact.

Yours sincerely,

THOMAS A. STONE

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE MAIN PROVISIONS WHICH MIGHT BE CONTAINED IN A NORTH ATLANTIC — WESTERN EUROPEAN SECURITY PACT

(a) Preamble combining some of the features of the preamble to the Five-Power Treaty and making it clear that the main object of the instrument would be to preserve western civilization in the geographical area covered by the agreement. The Preamble should also refer to the desirability of the conclusion of further defence agreements under Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations to the end that all free nations should eventually be covered by such agreements. The Preamble might also contain a direct reference to the intentions on the part of the signatories to cooperate positively in the economic, social and cultural fields.

(b) Provision that each Party shall regard any action in the area covered by the agreement, which it considers an armed attack against any other Party, as an armed attack against itself and that each Party accordingly undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self defence recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.

(c) Provision following the lines of Article III, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty to the effect that, at the request of the State or States directly attacked, and until coordinated measures have been agreed upon, each one of the Parties shall determine the immediate measures which it will individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity.

(d) Provision to the effect that action taken under the agreement shall, as provided in Article 51 of the Charter, be promptly reported to the Security Council and cease when the Security Council shall have taken the necessary steps to maintain or restore peace and security.

(e) A clause which would contain a delineation of the area covered by the agreement.

(f) Provision for consultation between all the parties in the event of any party considering that its territorial integrity or political independence is threatened by armed attack or indirect aggression in any part of the world.

(g) Provision for the establishment of such agencies as may be necessary for effective implementation of the agreement including the working out of plans for prompt and effective action under (b) and (c) above.

(h) A clause setting forth the duration of the pact with provision for automatic renewal.

Washington, August 6, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Under cover of my letter of August 4th I sent you a copy of that part of the final Pentagon paper in which were set forth provisions which might be included in a security pact for the North Atlantic area. I now enclose a copy of a redraft of this extract which has been prepared in the State Department. I must emphasize that when this paper was given to me in the State Department it had not gone very far. By Monday morning next, however, it will probably have been considered by Bohlen, Hickerson and the other top working level officials there and at that time I hope to be in a position to let you have further observations on it.

I thought I would send you this draft, however, in view of the fact that I am inclined to think that it will be substantially approved for presentation in the working group. I gather that it is quite possible, although not at all definite, that Bohlen may still speak a little piece in the working group raising some doubts which he apparently still has in his mind as to the advisability of attempting to conclude any formal pact at the present time. I am sure, as has been indicated by evidence which I have sent to you, that any doubts in Bohlen's mind on this score are very much less serious than they were some weeks ago and I would certainly much prefer in present circumstances that any divergence of views which may exist between him and his colleagues in the State Department should be settled in the bosom of his own family rather than in open discussion with the representatives of six other countries in the working group. I have hinted as much in conversations with officials of the Department, drawing their attention particularly to the French and Belgian attitude, which I do not think should be encouraged and which might be by Bohlen's piece. It is difficult, however, in matters of this kind, even when one is on intimate terms with officials of the Department, to do more than hint, especially in view of the fact that although I have not talked with him direct in the matter, I have been given to understand that Hickerson feels (perhaps Bohlen insists) that he, Bohlen, should speak his piece.

I do not think that the enclosed document or any revision of it as may be made will be tabled at Monday's meeting of the working group by the United States representatives. It will, however, be brought forward soon and as I suggested in my letter under reference, it would be most useful if I could have your views.

Yours sincerely,

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE MAIN PROVISIONS WHICH MIGHT BE CONTAINED IN A SECURITY PACT FOR THE NORTH ATLANTIC AREA

(a) Preamble combining some of the features of the preambles of the Charter, the Rio and Five-Power Treaties and making it clear that the main objective of the instrument would be to preserve and develop western civilization in the geographic area covered by the agreement. It would refer to the desirability, until the United Nations is in a position to assure universal security, of the progressive development of regional and other collective arrangements for the maintenance of international peace and security. It would express the determination of the Parties to unite their strength, on the basis of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to maintain international peace and to increase general and national security.

(b) Provision similar to Articles I and II of the Rio Treaty, condemning war and undertaking not to resort to force in a manner inconsistent with the Charter or the present agreement and undertaking to submit all controversies to methods of peaceful settlement.

(c) Provision for individual and collective effort to promote the economic well-being of their peoples, achieve social justice and further the development of free democracy and individual liberty.

(d) Provision for individual and collective effort, on the basis of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to strengthen the individual and collective capacity of the parties to resist aggression.

(e) Provision that each Party shall regard an armed attack in the area covered by the agreement against any other Party as an armed attack against itself, and that each Party accordingly undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter, each Party determining for itself whether in fact an armed attack has occurred.

(f) Provision following the lines of Article III, paragraph 2 of the Rio Treaty to the effect that until coordinated measures have been agreed upon, each one of the Parties shall determine the immediate measures which it will individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity.

(g) Provision to the effect that action taken under (e) and (f) above shall, as provided in Article 51 of the Charter, be promptly reported to the Security Council and cease when the Security Council shall have taken the necessary steps to maintain or restore peace and security.

(h) Delineation of the area covered by the agreement.

(i) Provision for consultation between all the Parties in the event that any Party considers that it is threatened by armed attack or indirect aggression.

(j) Provision for the establishment of such agencies as may be necessary for effective implementation of the agreement, including the working out of plans for prompt and effective action under (e) and (f) above and for the progressive attainment of the objectives listed under (c)

(k) Clauses providing for ratification and setting forth the duration of the pact with provision for automatic renewal in the absence of denunciation.

Ottawa, August 10, 1948

Following for Stone only from Pearson, Begins: Security talks. Your letter of August 6 enclosing draft memorandum of August 5 on provisions which might be contained in a security pact. Following are my comments on paragraphs of memorandum:

Paragraph (a). This would be improved by adding at the end the sentence from your draft of August 3, "The preamble might also contain a direct reference to the intentions on the part of the signatories to cooperate positively in the economic, social and cultural fields." This is covered in paragraph (c) but the objective could also appropriately be mentioned in the preamble.

Paragraph (b). It might be better to say "all controversies between them".

Paragraph (d). This would be improved by amending the last line to read, "to resist direct and indirect aggression".

Paragraph (e). (1) It is, of course, most undesirable to underline the reservation that each party determines for itself whether an armed attack has occurred. I sincerely hope that the State Department can eventually persuade the Senatorial leaders that such a provision is unwise and unnecessary. If the State Department insists on putting this reservation in, you should urge them to accept the language of the Pentagon draft, "Provision that each Party shall regard any action in the area covered by the agreement, which it considers an armed attack against any other Party, as an armed attack against itself." This is bad enough but not as bad as the language in the August 5 draft.

(2) It is probable that we shall have to be content with the Rio formula but that does not mean that we should not associate ourselves, particularly at the beginning of the talks, with efforts of the Brussels countries to get something which will sound more reassuring to their peoples, such as, "and that each Party accordingly undertakes to give immediately to any other Party which is attacked all the military, economic and other aid and assistance in its power." This is more or less the Brussels formula. The advantage of the Brussels formula is that the parties promise to fight an all-out war if one of them is attacked. They obviously will have to fight an all-out war so why not say so instead of using the vague term "assist in meeting the attack" which hostile critics could say means the kind of assistance Mexico gave in the last war.

(3) If the U.S. worry is the constitutional right of Congress to declare war, isn't that point met by the words "in its power."?

(4) This formula would not mean that the U.S. would necessarily throw all their forces into Western Europe. They would remain the judge of how and where the military aid could best be given.

Following for Stone only from Pearson, Begins: Security talks. Your letter of July 29 enclosing draft paper which you prepared on the subject of the relationship between the formation of a North Atlantic pact and the extension of the Brussels pact.

1. In your letter you said that this paper, or one like it, might possibly be tabled at some time in the discussions.

2. I am in general agreement with the paper. A number of small points have, however, occurred to me.

3. [Aii]. I think it would be unwise for a Canadian representative to table a paper containing an acceptance of the State Department line that the United States will not give a military guarantee firmer than that given in the Rio pact. I have developed this point in my teletype of today commenting on your letter of August 6.

4. [Biii]. In line 4 I suggest the substitution of "might" for "would".

5. [Bv]. Is it quite correct to speak of the defence arrangements between the United States and Canada as being more intimate and far-reaching than those which may be made under a North Atlantic pact? The North Atlantic pact would presumably contain contractual obligations and there are no contractual obligations of importance between Canada and the United States.

6. I sympathize entirely with the desire of the United States that Western Europe should demonstrate its willingness to unite politically and economically. The slow pace of the movement towards the unification of Western Europe is disappointing. However, I think that it may well be true that the goal of unification of Western Europe can be reached more quickly by approaching it indirectly through the conclusion of a North Atlantic pact than by attempting to reach it more directly. Once the Western European countries get a firm guarantee from the United States and machinery set up for the coordination of defence planning and for the pooling of resources, they will be given that renewed confidence and vigour which will make it easier for them to go ahead with plans for the unification of Western Europe.

7. Certainly it cannot be expected that the Brussels signatories can take on additional security risks by the addition of new members until the North Atlantic pact has come into force.

8. In your letter you give a list of the countries which it is generally agreed should be invited to join the North Atlantic pact. As you know, we have always been doubtful of the wisdom of inviting Portugal on political grounds, unless the strategic considerations are overriding. Also, I see great difficulties to the inclusion of Italy in any North Atlantic regional Pact. Once you depart from this regional concept, how can you object to the inclusion of Greece or Brazil or even Australia.

TOP SECRET

Washington, August 10, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

Yesterday afternoon the Working Group in the seven-power security talks reached Item 4 on the agenda: the nature of the association. The general character of the discussion was an explanation of the United States' position by Mr. Bohlen, a statement of their frustration by the French delegation, and an attempt by the United Kingdom, ourselves, and the Netherlands to reconcile the French to political necessities: the Belgians, as usual, contributed nothing.

The United States' position, as stated by Bohlen, was as follows. There were two problems in relation to European and American security, one short-term, the other long-term. The short-term problem, in the United States' view, had two aspects: first, the provision of military supplies to the powers signatory to the Brussels Pact, and second, the fact of the presence of United States troops in Germany. (I shall refer to this second aspect later.) In so far as the provision of immediate military assistance to the Brussels powers was concerned, Mr. Bohlen thought that this question was altogether outside the purpose of these meetings. It must be, and presumably was being, explored in London. Bohlen did not say where the decision as to what should be done should lie, but, by inference, it would be taken by the United States alone. He laid emphasis on the fact that the United States Government actually does not know yet just what types of materiel the Brussels powers need. General Lemnitzer is in London to secure that information.

Hoyer Millar later asked whether the existence of a long-term arrangement would not influence the Congress in its action on the short-term needs of the Brussels powers. Bohlen replied that he thought its existence would be helpful but not vital: the long-term arrangement would be slow in maturing and could not be rushed for the purpose of influencing the Congress.

Armand Bérard (French Minister) stated that his Government had thought the present conversations were to be concerned with military aid to the Brussels powers rather than with the formation of a larger association. The French people, he said, were like a man who has been told that, if he will but climb 2000 feet up a mountain, he will secure a wonderful view. But, having made the ascent, he is told that the view cannot really be obtained from there after all: let him climb another 2000 feet and he will surely secure the view. He thought that overcoming the "deception" that the French people would feel would present a major political problem. The French, having risked the Brussels Pact, now want some security before they undertake further risks in a larger association. This argument was never fully countered. (In fact, it did not need to be as the analogy was not altogether a true one: the United States did not promise anything at the end of the first stage.) Bohlen pointed out, however, that for the United States the Brussels Pact was not enough. If the United States confined its efforts to the Brussels powers, then it would by neglect jeopardize the security of other countries which would be left out — Norway, Denmark, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Portugal — and with those areas endangered, or lost to the enemy, United States help to the Brussels powers would be small. Indeed, as he pointed out later, without the Azores, Iceland, and Greenland, help could not be got to Europe in significant quantities at all. Furthermore, on the other side of the picture, any pact which did not include these areas vital to the defences of North America would fail, at least in part, to meet one of the United States desiderata — that it must contribute to the security of this country.

Turning to the long-range problem, Bohlen said that the United States wanted to know with what it is being asked to associate itself. It could not undertake a multitude of small arrangements (United States-Brussels Powers; United States-Norway and Denmark; United States-Italy, etc.). The Congress will require security in a "single package", to include not only the Brussels powers but also the otherwise-neglected countries: Denmark (including Greenland), Norway, Sweden, Iceland, Ireland, Portugal and Italy.

The United States would like to see as large a European union as possible, but realized that in the present talks we must try to decide whether such a union is possible before or after an Atlantic pact, whether as an extension of the Brussels Pact or through some other instrumentality. In his words, "Is the Brussels Pact a period, or a first step capable of expansion?" He emphasized that, though the direct contribution of countries like Iceland, Denmark, and Portugal might be negligible, they are of vital importance as providing the bridge from the United States to Europe through Iceland, Greenland, and the Azores.

For the United States, the Rio Pact was the point of departure, capable of some variations certainly, but not variations which would bring it into line with the European pacts which provide for automatic action. He stressed that Europeans should not expect the United States public radically to change long established habits of thought overnight. It had come a long way, but was not yet ready to participate in treaties of the European alliance type. He thought, however, that the effect of Article 3 of the Rio Pact was just as prompt as that of Article IV of the Brussels Pact. In both pacts, each country was the final judge of its own contribution.

In considering the second aspect of the short range problem Bohlen thought that the presence of United States troops in Germany afforded the best guarantee the United States could possibly give to the Western European countries. In fact, the United States was likely to be attacked before those countries. A pact at the present time could therefore add little or nothing to the real commitments of the United States, nor could any sort of engagement or undertaking on its part change the present situation one iota. The real value of a pact in the short term view would derive from its psychological effect on the people of Europe and from its assuring that vital strategic areas would be available for our use. Bérard pointed out that the French "could not accept" a pact which did not provide a guarantee of some pre-planned immediate help in case of attack. While he did not reply to this directly, Bohlen had already made the points, that nobody need ever expect the United States to maintain a field-force of fifty or a hundred divisions (its contribution would be in air and sea power), and that the United States would be bound to consider the over-all strategical picture rather than the territorial integrity of any one party to the arrangement. In so far as "pre-planned immediate help" was concerned it was pointed out that a pact would in all probability set up organs of consultation — indeed the present military talks in London might be regarded as indicative of the kind of closer relationship in all matters of defence which might develop between the signatories.

Bohlen stated that there were two fundamental provisos in relation to any pact for North Atlantic security if the United States is to be a party: (1) the pact must come within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, and (2) the pact must allow for the division of powers in the United States constitution, which gives to the Congress the right to declare war.

I said that I thought that Bohlen had made a useful contribution to the discussions in drawing a clear distinction between the short and long term considerations. I doubted, in fact, that except in so far as the two points mentioned were concerned — the importance of safeguarding for our use vital strategic areas and the psychological effect on Western Europe — short term considerations came within the terms of reference of this group. Nothing that we could do or say here could in any way alter the facts of the present situation and it seemed to me hardly our business to talk about it except incidentally to our real business — ways and means of assuring the long term security of the North Atlantic-Western Europe area. I emphasized again our view that what we must aim at is a common pool of security. In so far as we in Canada were concerned, some comfort could be drawn from an arrangement under which European countries would come to our assistance in the event of an attack launched at us over the North Pole.

I had the impression that Bérard took Bohlen's remarks to heart. He was made to realize to some extent at least that he was flying well off the beam — especially when Achilles read to him excerpts from some of the early Marshall-Bidault-Bevin telegrams out of which these talks grew.

The next meeting of the Working Group is set for Thursday, August 12th, at 3:00 p.m. It is possible that by the middle or end of next week we may be far enough advanced to call a further Ambassador-Lovett level meeting which I hope you would be able to attend.

Yours sincerely,

Following for Doré only from Pearson, Begins: My letter of August 4 on Washington security talks, enclosing copy of our despatch No. 453 of August 4 to the Canadian Ambassador in the Netherlands.

Since writing you I have received further disturbing reports of Spaak's hesitations about an Atlantic security pact. He is reported to have said that he thinks it is premature and that the provocative effect on the Russians is not justifiable if one took into account the present military potential of the North Atlantic countries.

2. If you see no objection, I think it would be useful if you could discuss this matter with the Foreign Office on an informal basis. You could put our views along the lines set forth in our despatch No. 453.

3. The reports which we have received from Washington indicate that the trend of thinking in the State Department is in the direction of a Pact. This trend would, I think, be reversed if the Brussels countries are hesitant and negative in their attitude. On the other hand a forthcoming attitude by the representatives of all the Brussels countries in the Washington discussions might make it possible to get a North Atlantic pact much closer to the Brussels treaty than to the Rio treaty.

4. I would hope, too, that Spaak's brilliant and creative mind would be impressed by the possibility of our being able this year to give an institutional form to the North Atlantic community. This community is a real commonwealth of nations which share the same democratic and cultural traditions. If a movement towards its political and economic unification can be started this year, it would be a great accomplishment.

Mr. Hickerson read an article from the New York Star of 11th August (written by Kuh),<sup>71</sup> speculating on the substance of the seven-power meetings and on the demands of the respective parties. It was agreed that there was sufficient accuracy in the account to show a leak had taken place. Mr. Hickerson also noted that there had been a Soviet broadcast along the same lines, but less well-informed, on 7th August. It was agreed that the press should receive No Comment to enquiries, but should be referred to the earlier release.

2. Proposal for a Pact

Mr. Hickerson: Suggested taking the pre-amble of the U.N. Charter word for word.

Mr. Bérard: Asked whether agreement on common measures against an attack would take place before or after the attack?

Mr. Hickerson: Thought after. Human ingenuity could not foresee circumstances of attack.

Mr. Bérard: Chief pre-occupation of the European countries is with preventing an invasion.

Mr. Achilles: Rio Pact does not preclude prior planning, but neither does it make it mandatory.

Mr. Hickerson: It would be possible to prepare plans beforehand, but the treaty could not contain any requirement that the plans go into effect automatically.

Mr. Reuchlin:<sup>72</sup> In view of Article 3 of the Rio Pact, would the situation not be like that at Pearl Harbour (i.e., if an attack against any was an attack against each, would the U.S. not regard itself as directly attacked as at P.H.).

Mr. Hickerson: The President can take steps as Commander-in-Chief but if the treaty bound him to take those steps before Congress had declared war, the Senate would not approve the treaty. The 3rd Rio article really promises merely that something will be done, that Congress will be consulted. But the Senate will not approve a treaty which binds a future congress to declare war. The State Department is anxious that no pact should be rejected by the Senate, or accepted with many reservations.

Mr. Reuchlin: Then article 3 would allow preparatory planning.

Mr. Achilles: So would article 10.

Mr. Stone: Pre-amble should say something about economic and cultural co-operation.

Mr. Hickerson: Agreed.

Mr. Bérard: To what area is treaty to apply?

Mr. Hickerson: The State Department has an absolutely open mind and would welcome ideas.

3. Pact the only solution.

Mr. Stone: What answer is there to item 4 of the agenda of the working-group other than a pact?

Nobody produced one.

to Ambassador in France*

TOP SECRET

Ottawa, August 13, 1948

Dear General Vanier,

On August 4 I sent you an exchange of despatches between The Hague and Ottawa on French and Belgian reactions to the Washington security talks. I have now received the enclosed top secret letter from Mr. Stone reporting on the discussions in Washington on August 9 of the Working Group. At this meeting they dealt with the nature of the association which might be formed by the North Atlantic powers.

2. It is discouraging to read Mr. Stone's account of the line taken by the French representative in these discussions, particularly since it appears that he was acting under instructions from his Government.

3. I hope Mr. Stone is correct in his impression that the French representative took to heart the remarks made by Mr. Bohlen and that he will soon receive new instructions from Paris.

4. Since the national interests of Canada are so deeply involved in the success of the Washington discussions, I should be grateful for anything which you could do in Paris to help convince the French Foreign Office that the national interests of France require the conclusion at the earliest possible date of a North Atlantic pact.

5. Since the discussions in Washington are at present on the level of second-in-commands of missions, it would not, I think, be appropriate at the present time for the matter to be discussed direct with the French Foreign Minister or on anything but an informal basis. If you see no objection, however, I think it would be useful if you or Mr. Ritchie could as soon as possible discuss the matter with the appropriate official or officials in the Foreign Office on an informal basis.

6. In all the capitals concerned I think the reports of the Washington discussions have been given a very restricted circulation. It would therefore be necessary for you to find out which officials in the Foreign Office are familiar with what is happening in Washington. You will know much better than I who would be the best person to talk to. The only person I can think of at this distance is Mr. Dennery.

7. Our despatch No. 453 of August 4 to The Hague, which I sent you on August 4, contains a statement of some of our views which you might find useful in your discussions with the French Foreign Office.

8. I do not think you need deal with Mr. Bérard's contention that the French were "deceived" about the nature of the conversations in Washington. The preliminary correspondence between Mr. Bevin, Mr. Marshall and Mr. Bidault made the nature of these conversations clear.

9. The important thing is that the French seem to be so obsessed by the dangers of an immediate Soviet occupation that they do not realize the benefit to them of a long term commitment by the United States.

10. I realize that the French may be somewhat cynical about impatience over their concentration of interest on the short run danger, shown by overseas countries where distance still gives relative security against armed invasion and occupation, though not against air attack. I do not think, however, that either we or the Americans are impatient with them on this score. We fully realize how exposed they are and we know that France would probably never recover from the effects of a Soviet occupation. If we had any reason to believe that the conclusion of a North Atlantic pact would make more likely the Soviet occupation of France, we would therefore comprehend fully the apparently negative attitude which they appear to have adopted towards the conclusion of a North Atlantic pact.

11. However, it does not seem to me that the conclusion of a North Atlantic pact would increase the danger of a Soviet occupation of France. Indeed, it seems to me that on balance it would progressively lessen that danger.

12. One way in which war may occur in the near future would be as the result of the Soviet Union thinking that the Western powers were bluffing in their opposition to Soviet demands and that they would not, in fact, be prepared, regardless of what they say, to carry their opposition to the point of actual war. A formal treaty commitment by the United States would make it less likely that the Soviet Union would make this miscalculation.

13. Another danger is that the United States may press the Russians too hard and too fast and not leave them a way out which would save their faces. To lessen this danger, the Western European powers will have to exert a steady and constructive influence on Washington. The establishment of a North Atlantic union will give them additional channels through which to exert this moderating influence. Under a North Atlantic pact there would presumably be established a Consultative Council of Foreign Ministers, a Council of Defence Ministers and a combined Chiefs of Staff, as well as some permanent consultative committee. The pact will also contain undertakings among the members to consult. There will thus be established, at least in outline, a semi-constitutional structure of the North Atlantic powers.

14. The establishment of this kind of constitutional structure serves the interests of countries like France. Arnold Toynbee, in his recent book Civilization on Trial, made some illuminating remarks about the advantages to countries like France and the United Kingdom of some constitutional form of world government. His argument has a bearing on the present proposals for the formation of a North Atlantic union. The passage which I have in mind reads as follows:

“It is only if there is some constitutional form of world government that powers can continue to count as great powers — and really to play that part — in spite of their war potential being no longer a match for the war potential of the Soviet Union and the United States. In an even partially constitutional world community, Great Britain, the continental West European countries, and the Dominions can still have an influence in international counsels far in excess of the ratio of their war potential to that of ‘the Big Two’. In an even semi-parliamentary international forum, the political experience, maturity, and moderation of countries like these will weight heavily in the balance alongside of the grosser weight of Brennus’ sword. In a pure power-politics world, on the other hand, these highly civilized but materially less powerful states will count for nothing compared with the United States and the Soviet Union.”

15. One argument which some of the French may use to explain their lukewarmness to a North Atlantic pact is that it would be provocative to the Russians — the argument that the Belgians used against staff talks a few weeks before the Nazis overran their country. It would seem to me that, while weak measures might be provocative, firm measures might well prove a deterrent. If the history of the last twenty years doesn’t prove that, it doesn’t prove anything.

16. I agree that the Russians might provoke a war if they considered that the balance of forces was rapidly and progressively tipping against them. However, if this argument is pursued to its logical conclusion, it means that the North Atlantic world should continue to be weak.

17. But the French do not want to remain weak. They want to receive immediate assistance from the United States in building up their armed forces. They should be the last, then, to argue that one way of not provoking the Russians is for the West to refrain from strengthening itself. If this strengthening is to go on — as the French and Belgians agree it must — what argument is there against doing it within a collective security Pact?

18. So much for the short-run considerations. I am convinced that, on balance, even the short-run considerations make it apparent that it is in the interests of France to press for the conclusion of a North Atlantic Pact. The argument from long-run considerations is even more apparent.

19. The events in the United States Congress during the first half of June reveal very clearly the wide differences between the right-wing Republicans who control the House of Representatives and the Republican supporters of a bi-partisan foreign policy. This emphasizes the importance of a multilateral agreement binding the United States for not less than ten years, because such an agreement would commit the whole Republican Party and considerably reduce the range within which the compass needle of United States policy could swing. The difficulty from the point of view of the United States is that a formal alliance would be a tremendous reversal of the traditional national policy of the United States. This very difficulty, however, is the reason why the alliance would be of great value to Western Europe: it would be the outward and visible sign of a revolutionary change in United States foreign policy.

20. Another advantage to France of a treaty commitment by the United States (and by Canada) is that it would embody the element of mutual assistance. Without such a guarantee of mutual assistance, persons in the United States and Canada who are opposed to our giving a guarantee to Western Europe could ask why the United States and Canada should pledge themselves to come to the assistance of Western European countries if those countries are not willing to accept similar obligations to us.

21. The French must sometimes be somewhat concerned by statements made in Canada and the United States about the measures we are taking to defend North America from outside attack. We, too, here have been worried by the possibility that our defence planners might be tempted to an unrealistic concentration on the passive defence of North America. One of the advantages of a North Atlantic treaty is that it would help the planners in Ottawa and Washington to see the problems of a passive North American defence as a small part of a larger plan, the purpose of which would be to defeat the enemy by offensive operations.

22. The French, particularly from their experience in the last war, must be worried by the possibility that if war should break out they will have little or no say in the making of the larger political and strategic decisions by the Western allies. The conclusion of a North Atlantic treaty would make it possible to set up formal international bodies, not only for making plans for preventing war, but also for making plans for the waging of war. The establishment in peace time of these bodies would help to ensure that in the event of war France and other Western European countries had a say in the making of the larger political and strategic decisions.

23. If the United States and Canada are to continue to give economic and military assistance to Western Europe it is essential that the people in both countries look upon the Western European countries as partners and not as clients. It is not going to be easy, particularly in the United States, to secure general acceptance of this truth. It will be easier to get this general acceptance if we are members together of a North Atlantic union.

24. It is not going to be easy for our friends in Washington to get agreement within the administration and in Congress for the kind of North Atlantic treaty which the present situation requires. Their task would, however, be made much more difficult if France is hesitant and querulous.

25. It will not, in any event, be possible for France or any other country to get into the North Atlantic treaty every provision that it would like to see in it. It may be that the final treaty will be vague where we would like it to be precise.

26. I know that it is easier for some one reared in the British constitutional tradition to accept imprecision in a matter of this kind than it is for a Frenchman. However, I hope that the French will realize that a North Atlantic treaty, even if it is not as precise as they would like it to be, will create a new living international institution which will have within itself possibilities of growth and of adaptation to changing conditions. The North Atlantic community is a real commonwealth of nations which share the same democratic and cultural traditions. If a movement towards its political and economic unification can be started this year, none of us can forecast the extent of the unity which may exist five, ten or fifteen years from now.

Yours sincerely,
[L.B. PEARSON]

Following for Pearson only from Stone, Begins: I am transmitting below the text of the paper which the United States group submitted to the Working-Group yesterday as a basis for discussion. In presenting the paper, Hickerson emphasized that it was put forward solely to give direction to the discussion, and did not constitute an American attempt to lay down terms to the European participants. The paper does not try to set forth any specific wording, but confines itself to outlines; no attempt to arrive at a wording will be made until the Ambassadors and Mr. Lovett have met once more. Perhaps one caveat ought to be mentioned in this respect, however: the United States group is very much attached to the wording of the Rio Pact about "to assist in meeting the attack" (proposed Article 3). Hickerson acknowledged that this paragraph is going to be the most difficult in the whole Pact, and the one requiring most extensive negotiation.

2. The text in its entirety is as follows, Begins:

(Draft)

TOP SECRET

August 10, 1948

PROVISIONS OF THE RIO TREATY WHICH MIGHT BE SUITABLE FOR INCLUSION IN A NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY ARRANGEMENT

Note

This paper represents no commitment, expressed or implied, or position of the United States Government. It represents merely a compilation of provisions in the Rio Treaty which, in the informal opinion of the State Department Working Group, might be contained in a North Atlantic security arrangement to which the United States might become a party. Certain commitments which the group is strongly of the opinion should not be included in a North Atlantic arrangement are indicated at the end of this paper.

The State Department Working Group considers that in any such North Atlantic arrangement Canada and the United States would constitute the North American anchor point and the parties to the Brussels Treaty the European anchor point. It also considers that such an arrangement would neither increase adequately the national security of the United States nor provide the Western European countries with adequate assurance that North American ground and air forces or supplies could effectively be brought to their assistance in time of war if the two anchor points were not connected by inclusion of the vital North Atlantic territories of Denmark (Greenland), Iceland, Ireland, Norway and Portugal (the Azores).

Preamble

A statement of the parties' desire to consolidate and strengthen their relations of friendship. (Par.1)

A statement that the parties wish to establish a system, consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, dealing with those matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which are appropriate for regional action. (Par.3) (See Brussels, par.5)

A statement that the obligation of mutual assistance and common defence between the parties is essentially related to their democratic ideals and to their will to co-operate in the fulfillment of the principles and purposes of a policy of peace. (Par.6) (See Brussels, par.2)

A statement that peace is founded on justice and moral order and, consequently, on the international recognition and protection of human rights and freedoms, on the indispensable well-being of the people, and on the effectiveness of democracy for the international realization of justice and security. (par.7) (See Brussels, pars. 1 and 2)

A statement that the parties have concluded the treaty in order to assure peace, through adequate means, to provide for effective reciprocal assistance to meet armed attacks against any of them, and in order to deal with threats of aggression against any of them. (Par.8) (See Brussels, pars. 5 and 8)

Articles

1. Condemnation of war and undertaking not to resort to the threat of use of force in any manner inconsistent with the provisions of the Charter or of the Treaty. (Art.1)

2. An undertaking to submit every controversy which may arise between the parties to methods of peaceful settlement. (Art.2) (See Brussels, Art. VIII)

3. Provision that an armed attack by any State against a party shall be considered as an attack against all the parties and that, consequently, each party undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence recognized by Article 51 of the Charter. (Art. 3, par.1) (See Brussels, Art. IV)

4. Provision for individual determination by each party, pending agreement upon collective measures, of the immediate measures which it will individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity. Provision for immediate consultation with a view to reaching an agreement upon collective measures. (Art.3, par.2) (See Brussels, Art. IV)

5. Delineation of the area within which an armed attack will bring paragraphs 3 and 4 above into operation. (Art. 3, par.3 and Art. 4) (See Brussels, Art. IV)

6. Provision to the effect that measures of self-defence taken under paragraphs 3 and 4 above may be taken until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. (Art.3, par.4) (See Brussels, Art. V)

7. Provision to the effect that the parties will immediately advise the Security Council fully concerning measures taken under paragraphs 3 and 4 above. (Art. 5) (See Brussels, Art. V)

8. Provision for consultation if the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of a party should be affected by indirect aggression or by an armed attack outside the area delineated in paragraph 5 above. (Art. 6) (See Brussels, Art. VII, par.2)

9. A statement that none of the provisions of the Treaty shall be construed as impairing the rights and obligations of the parties under the Charter. (Art. 10) (See Brussels, Art. V)

10. Provision for the establishment of agencies to implement the treaty. (Art. 11 and 21) (See Brussels, Art. VII)

11. Provisions covering accession, ratification and duration. (Arts. 22-25) (See Brussels, Arts. IX and X)

In the opinion of the State Department Working Group, the United States Government could not constitutionally enter into any Treaty which would provide that the United States would automatically be at war as a result of an event occurring outside its borders or by the vote of other countries without its concurrence. The group does not consider the provisions of the Rio Treaty concerning voting (Arts. 14 and 16-20) or any provisions concerning voting suitable for conclusion in North Atlantic security arrangements. Text ends.

3. I should very much like to have your comments (by teletype if possible) by Monday noon. The next meeting of the working group is at 3 p.m. on Monday. Ends.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

With reference to paragraph 5 of your despatch No. 453 of August 4th to the Canadian Ambassador to The Netherlands, I think it is worth putting on the record a solemn and serious statement made by Hickerson at yesterday's meeting of the working group.<sup>73</sup> You will recall that during the Ambassadors' meetings Lovett made a similar statement.

Hickerson said that the fact that these talks were taking place in Washington was indicative of the most radical change in United States foreign policy which had ever taken place and he wanted the representatives of the countries present to appreciate this fully. With a thorough appreciation, Hickerson said, he thought that other countries would be able to understand that, in so far as the State Department was concerned, its officials were unwilling to risk failure in implementing this new United States foreign policy. It would be disastrous if they were to put forward to the Senate an unacceptable act or treaty. It would be almost equally disastrous if a pact or treaty were to be ratified with a series of hampering reservations after protracted debate. During negotiations, therefore, it was the intention of the State Department to maintain the closest possible contact with political leaders in both Houses and to take their advice and counsel as to the phraseology and the content of a pact or treaty which would be acceptable to the Congress. I have no doubt in my own mind that, in so far as Hickerson personally is concerned, he will press for a pact under which United States obligations will be clearly expressed and as broad as is constitutionally possible.

Yours sincerely,

THOMAS A. STONE

Washington, August 13, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

In my letter of 29th July I gave you an outline of the thinking on which discussion of Item 3 of the agenda of the working group of the Washington Security Talks was based. After several further meetings the working group produced a paper on the same plane as the paper of 22nd July on Item 1, forwarded to you on 29th July by Mr. Wrong. I enclose copies 22, 23, and 24 of the new paper on item 3.<sup>74</sup>

Your message EX-1979 of 11th [10] August raises questions as to the participation of Portugal and Italy. From my report of 10th August on the meeting of 9th August, you will, I think, see that the United States group is of the opinion that strategic considerations are over-riding in the case of Portugal. The United States group has maintained throughout that, to fulfil the desideratum that the arrangement must augment United States security, the pact must deny the stepping-stone islands (both northern and southern) to the prospective enemy, and must ensure their availability to the Western European and North Atlantic bloc. The inclusion of Italy is based partly on strategic considerations, but possibly even more on political necessity: it would be almost (probably entirely) impossible to get the Senate to ratify a security pact from which Italy was excluded. The working group's comments on Italy in the paper on Item 3 (last sentence of 2(f)) show that Italy is regarded as a country which ideally should be in at least two security-groups.

One argument which the United States group uses with respect to countries like Italy and Portugal is as follows. There is a large body of sentiment in the United States (and in the Senate) which wants to see a confederation of Europe. No steps can be taken by the Executive which might offend these people by appearing to hamper European unity. Therefore no security pact can be so drawn that it is possible for Europe's well-wishers to say that the pact tends to divide rather than to unite. Consequently, the security pact must include all western European countries if possible in order to give them uniform defence-interests. Spain is excluded only reluctantly, on the part of the United States, at least.

I shall comment on other points in your EX-1979 later as discussion of Item 4 progresses.

Yours sincerely,
T.A. STONE

TELEGRAM EX-2013

Ottawa, August 16, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Stone only from Pearson, Begins: Your WA-2253 of August 13. United States paper submitted to the Washington security talks.

1. Heading of paper. I do not like the reference to the Rio treaty in the heading, though I of course realize the domestic political reasons which presumably led the United States to use this heading. I hope that any paper submitted by your Working Group will not, repeat not, contain a reference to the Rio treaty in its heading. The heading could read "Provisions which might be suitable, etc.", and the references in the paper to the Rio treaty could be put on the same footing as the references to the Brussels treaty, e.g., "See Rio, paragraph 1".

2. Preamble. (a) There is nothing in the preamble about the intention of the signatories to cooperate positively in the economic, social and cultural fields. I wonder if you brought this up at the last meeting and if you were turned down. In any event, you might try again.

(b) There is no mention in the last paragraph of the preamble of indirect aggression. It would be better to say, "to meeting armed and other forms of attack against any of them and in order to deal with threats of aggression, direct and indirect, against any of them."

3. Article 3, Pledge. (a) As I said in my EX-1978 of August 10, I think the use of the Rio language in this article is unwise and unnecessary. "Assist in meeting the attack" is certainly susceptible of the meaning "all aid short of war", and this is surely not, repeat not, the intention of the State Department. If this were the nature of the undertaking in the North Atlantic treaty, might it not mean that Canada would be fulfilling its obligation under the treaty, in the event of a Soviet attack upon the United States, if its assistance to the United States went no further than United States assistance to Canada in the last war up to Pearl Harbour?

(b) Even assuming that the United States is not constitutionally able to enter into a treaty which would provide it could be automatically at war, this does not, repeat not, mean that the United States could not undertake to go to war if the United States decides that an attack has taken place.

(c) I would suggest that the use of the Rio formula is inconsistent with the draft of the paper on the first item of your agenda dated July 28, † "Weak measures might only be provocative; firm measures may well prove a deterrent". Surely it is essential in the treaty to make clear to the Russians that the signatories are prepared to embark on an all-out war against them if they should attack. Surely it is also necessary, as your paper points out, to remove the sense of insecurity felt by the peoples of Western Europe.

4. Provisions missing. I regret to see that there are no provisions corresponding to the useful paragraphs (c) and (d) of the draft paper of August 5 which you sent us on August 6 — “Provision for individual and collective effort to promote the economic well-being of their peoples, achieve social justice and further the development of free democracy and individual liberty” and “Provision for individual and collective effort, on the basis of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to strengthen the individual and collective capacity of the parties to resist aggression”, adding “direct and indirect” before “aggression”.

5. Voting provisions. I hope that the meaning of the draft United States paper is that the United States is not going to insist on a specific mention in the treaty of the right of each signatory to decide for itself whether aggression has occurred. I should be grateful if you could confirm this.

6. I assume that your discussions of this point in your agenda will not be concluded today as I may have some more suggestions to make after I have received the report of today's meeting.

Procès-verbal de la réunion du Groupe de travail

Minutes of Meeting of Working Group

TOP SECRET

Washington, August 16, 1948

Discussion on the United States paper of 10th August, on articles from the Rio Pact which would be suitable for inclusion in a North Atlantic Pact.

Bérard: Meetings are exploratory, just to draw up papers for the Ambassadors to discuss. French not in a position to discuss long-term measure unless short-term measure associated with it.

Preamble. Not favourable to quoting preamble of Charter. This might well detract from the UN, by making it appear we are trying to set up a competitive and more efficient UN. Instead, should insist that signatories are peace-loving, and trying to preserve the ideals of democracy. Agrees there should be allusion to development of economic welfare of signatories.

Arts. 3 & 4. Brussels article IV promises immediate military help before consultations in event of attack. Promise of military help should be in article 3 or 4 of outline paper. If US constitution prevents this, must try to put something to produce that effect in article 10.

Kennan & Stone: Agreed meetings exploratory only. Same applies to ambassadors' meetings.

Millar: Problem of short-term help outside terms of reference.

Stone: Agreed. Nothing we could do or could sign now would change situation one iota. Short-term problem is a military problem; ours is political.

Kennan: Agreed.

Bérard: Could not contemplate long-term pact unless short-term problem settled here, London, or elsewhere at same time.

Millar: Three military governors are discussing present measures in case of USSR attack in Germany. Therefore immediate problem is already under discussion.

Stone: Like to make three changes in preamble: (1) Eliminate reference to Rio Pact in heading; (2) Put something about economic, social, etc. co-operation in preamble; (3) Say something about indirect aggression in preamble.

Reuchlin: Suggested ambassadors talk over papers 1 and 3 of working-group, as well as US paper. Proposed that there be no working-group paper about an out-line pact.

Millar: Sir Gladwyn Jebb arriving Washington 25th August.

Kennan: Where do we go from here?

Kennan: Must accept idea that some sort of security arrangement is necessary for ourselves, but should draft it so as to make it not too difficult for people like Czechs to join later if they get some sort of chance.

Meeting returned to discussion of US paper.

1. Preamble.

Agreed that para. 2 meant to apply to arts 51, 52, and 53 rather than Chapter VIII; security council not meant to serve as vehicle for obstruction.

Stone: Something needed to show pact more than purely military document. Economic & social co-operation would make pact more positive.

Millar: Wanted to make sure pact did not conflict with OEEC, ECE.

Kennan: Does not want article unless something is going to be done about it.

Achilles & Millar willing to talk in preamble of "recognizing" importance of such co-operation.

Kennan: Thinks such an article might take some of the anti-Russian appearance out of the pact.

Butler: Suggested implementation might come under article 10.

Agreed: To put "recognizing the economic, social, and cultural ties by which they are united . . ." in first or fourth sentence.

Kennan: In relation to idea of saying something about not using force against one another, liked the idea of noting existing non-use of force, or re-affirmation of the practice.

Reuchlin: Might be handy to have such a provision because Portugal, for instance, is not so obligated (not signatory to Charter).

U.S.: Would be easiest if in form of reference to charter.

Reuchlin: Should it be an article or a paragraph in the preamble?

US: Redraft last clause of para 2 of the preamble to include it.

Stone: Para. 5 of the preamble should be redrafted to include a reference to indirect aggression.

Millar: Would seizure of power in a member-country bring the treaty into force? I.e., what would be done? UK thinks there should certainly be provision for consultation but not sure whether we should go to war for it.

US: Might get around it by reference to "territorial and political integrity" in para. 5.

Millar: Should anything be said about countries left out? Thinks there is recognition that other regional systems may be set up.

2. Articles 3 & 4.

Bérard: The ambassadors should discuss this.

Millar: Assistance should be defined more closely. Is first sentence of article 4 necessary? Goes without saying.

US: Might accept provision for rapid consultation.

Bérard: Must be provision for previously-planned, automatic measures.

Millar & Bérard: Article 3 must include military aid.

US: Senate likes idea of individual effort prior to consultation.

Stone: Suggests use of "in its power" as way out.

Kennan: That would probably be acceptable. Take it under advisement.

Bérard: Liked idea of reversing order of articles 3 and 4.

US and Bérard: Since 3 and 4 are centre of pact, might put statement to that effect in covering paper and incorporate in same paper suggestions made in meeting.

3. Article 8.

Taymans<sup>75</sup> & US: Might consult concerning non-members who are the victims of indirect aggression.

Millar: Might also consult if situation arose of interest from point of view of security, of general nature.

4. Article 10.

Bérard: France would like something to ensure that prior planning would be instituted to help an attacked country.

5. Additional Articles.

Stone: Would like provision for economic aid, and for self-help and mutual aid in furthering industrial potential.

US: Salazar<sup>76</sup> might boggle at promotion of economic well-being at home.

Millar: Had some doubts about the whole idea, in relation to Spain and Portugal. Afraid of having a clause which leads to hot air and no action.

Kennan: Thought pact should say nothing about internal affairs of any given country unless their affairs affect their ability to fulfil their obligations under the pact. Apprehensive about Salazar. Keep away from internal policies as much as possible.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY

A meeting was held this morning, August 20th, in Mr. Lovett's house to discuss the above subject, at which the following were present, besides Mr. Lovett and myself:

The French Ambassador, M. Bonnet,
The Belgian Ambassador, Baron Silvercruys,
The Netherlands Ambassador, Mr. Van Kleffens,
Mr. Derek Hoyer-Millar (U.K. Embassy), and Mr. T.A. Stone.

The meeting was entirely informal, no records were kept, and no secretaries attended.<sup>77</sup> A meeting of this kind, rather than a more formal meeting at the State Department with advisers present, was suggested, apparently, by the Belgian Ambassador, who felt that it would provide a better opportunity for a very frank and full discussion than if remarks were being recorded. Baron Silvercruys had indicated to Mr. Stone and me the night before that he was very worried about the position that the French representative might have to take at a formal meeting and that Mr. Van Kleffens also, it seems, had received instructions from his government which he hoped might be modified later in the light of views that could be expressed only at a very informal, off-the-record gathering. Another reason why the meeting was held at Mr. Lovett's house was to avoid any danger of publicity.

At this morning's meeting the discussion, which was very frank, centred around four main subjects, as follows:

1. The importance attached by the United States to an Atlantic Pact.
2. The relationship, if any, of long-term security arrangements embodied in an Atlantic Pact to plans for meeting the present short-term but dangerous emergency caused by Soviet policy.
3. The countries that should be included in any Atlantic Pact.
4. The extent and character of obligations which the United States Government could accept for inclusion in such a pact.

As to the first, it was made clear by Mr. Lovett, in reply to specific questioning by the Belgian Ambassador, that the United States Government attached the very greatest importance to a formal North Atlantic Security Pact and that it was felt that no alternative arrangement, such as a unilateral guarantee by the United States of the Brussels Pact or unilateral assistance to the signatories of that Pact, would meet the essential consideration which guided American policy in this field, namely, whether the national security of the United States was increased by any particular measure. Mr. Lovett felt that only a full-fledged multilateral security arrangement, which included certain essential countries, could secure approval from Congress, as meeting the above consideration, namely, an increase in national security. He would not go so far as to say that if no such pact could be agreed on, that no help might not be given in some other form to the European countries concerned, but he did emphasize that the conclusion of such a pact would make it much easier for the United States to provide that help, even for the short-term emergency.

<sup>77</sup> Pour le compte rendu de Lovett au sujet de cette réunion, voir :

For Lovett's account of this meeting, see:

FRUS, 1948, III, pp. 214-21.

Mr. Lovett emphasized that he was speaking purely personally and that there were for the U.S.A. a good many unknown factors in the situation, particularly the composition and character of the next Congress and the next Administration. However, he felt that he was reflecting opinion in the United States in the view he had expressed above.

In stating what I thought would be the Canadian position, I made the same reservation, that I was speaking personally and unofficially, a reservation which was later made by all the others. I said that I thought the following would sum up the Canadian position in this matter:

1. The extension of the Brussels Pact to include trans-Atlantic countries was impracticable and undesirable. The very terms of the Pact made this clear. There was agreement on this by all present.

2. A unilateral guarantee of the Brussels Pact countries would not be given by Canada. Any obligations would have to be on a fully reciprocal basis. This was also agreed to by all present, though I am not sure how far Mr. Bonnet's agreement was unequivocal or represented the opinion of his government.

3. What was required, then, was a North Atlantic security pact on a fully reciprocal basis, which in its terms would provide for agencies for consultation and collective security, including a joint defence committee.

4. In our view, only within the framework of such a long-term collective arrangement could Canada or any other country be expected to give maximum support for measures to solve the short-term emergency.

2. The long-term plan vs. the short-term emergency.

In the minds of the working party these two problems, the short-term and long-term, overlapped and caused confusion. It seemed also clear that there was real anxiety in the minds of certain European members of the working group that the concentration on long-term arrangements might prejudice the success of necessary measures to meet the short-term emergency. I pointed out that, in my view, the two subjects could and should be kept entirely separate and that to relate them would cause confusion and frustration. I took the position that the long-term arrangements could not possibly prejudice short-term emergency plans and would, in fact, facilitate them, unless it were felt that the conclusion of the long-term arrangements would provoke the Russians into an immediate attack. This caused a discussion on the provocative, compared with the deterrent effects of an Atlantic security arrangement concluded at this time. It proved useful to bring this matter right out into the open, as it was clear that it had been a real, though at times a concealed, stumbling block in reaching agreement in the working group. I argued that there were four sets of circumstances which were related to this question of provocation, and hence security:

1. Where the countries concerned were not politically united but were individually weak. This constituted the greatest provocation because it was the greatest temptation to an aggressor.

2. Where the countries concerned were divided but were getting stronger individually. This was also a dangerous situation, because the Soviet might be provoked, by this strengthening process, to take action against the individual states or against a European group which, in the absence of a Security Pact, would be without the formal assurance of United States assistance. If, for instance, the Soviet attacked Norway, where there are no U.S. troops, would the U.S. be automatically involved? If not, would not the conquest of Norway be almost as great a menace to France as the conquest of the Netherlands? It would be the beginning of the piecemeal process.

3. Where the European and Atlantic countries were united in a pact and growing stronger individually and collectively. Here the security situation would be much better, though of course there was some risk of provocation while the process of strengthening was going on. Any action taken now to conclude a pact would have some risk of provoking the U.S.S.R., but the real act of provocation would not be the signing of a pact, but the increase of the military strengths of the members of that pact. Yet those who are most worried about the provocative effect of a pact are most insistent on increasing their own military power. On this basis, the only way to avoid provocation would be to have everybody remain weak, which, however, is in fact the greatest provocation and which nobody wants!

4. Where the Atlantic countries are united in a political security pact and are strong individually and collectively. This is the formula for peace and security, and it is this, I thought, which we should strive to attain.

The others seemed to agree with this analysis of the position, though M. Bonnet kept referring to immediate insecurity and to how the French peasant kept worrying about invasion and occupation. The rest of us tried to show our understanding of this preoccupation, but also tried to point out to M. Bonnet that nothing that could be done within the next six months could in any event give the European countries an assurance of inviolability. Mr. Lovett, who eventually showed some impatience with the narrowness of this French point of view, tried to drive home to M. Bonnet that while the long-term arrangements were being worked out, the United States was doing everything it possibly could to help meet the short-term emergency. He spoke very frankly indeed and gave some very important details on this subject, which I think made some impression on M. Bonnet. He talked about strategic planning of the Commanders in Germany and the military discussions going on in London. He mentioned the movement of aircraft and supplies across the Atlantic and the building up of an American air striking-force in Europe. He asked M. Bonnet what more they could do in present circumstances.

I said that nothing could be more deplorable than a lukewarm reaction on the part of European countries to an offer by the United States of a political security arrangement, especially when that arrangement did not interfere with, but indeed would facilitate, United States efforts to meet the short-term emergency. I pointed out that, while the French might have been justified in the pre-war period in arguing that there could be no security without disarmament, they were defeating their own ends if they tried to argue now that there could be no pact without security, as the pact was an essential element in such security.

There is no doubt that the Americans are becoming profoundly impatient with the attitude of the French in this matter, an attitude which may be shared to some extent by the Belgian and Netherlands governments, but certainly not by their representatives in Washington.

Mr. Lovett told me very confidentially after the meeting that M. Bonnet had called on the Secretary of State the other day and had had the effrontery to suggest that the French would only accept an Atlantic security pact on the following three conditions:

1. Unity of command at once.
2. Immediate movement of U.S. military supplies to France.
3. Immediate movement of U.S. military personnel to France.

This reaction had had such an irritating effect on General Marshall that, according to Mr. Lovett, he felt like calling off the Atlantic pact negotiations at once. Mr. Bonnet certainly did not go nearly so far as this during the morning's discussions, and in fact indicated at the end that he accepted without reservations the desirability of a North Atlantic pact. It is a strange and depressing thought that the French have to be convinced of the desirability of this.

3. Countries that should be included in any Atlantic Pact.

In answer to a question from Baron Silvercruys, Mr. Lovett indicated that the following countries were absolutely essential, in addition to the Brussels countries, because of the contribution that their inclusion in such a pact would make to United States national security:

- Denmark (especially for Greenland),
- Norway, and
- Portugal (for the Azores).

Mr. Lovett went on to indicate that if such a thing as a competition developed for U.S. military supplies, which he hoped would not be the case, it might be that Congress would feel that building up U.S. strength in the above areas was quite as important as building up Dutch, Belgian, and French military strength.

Mr. Van Kleffens expressed the fear of his government that an Atlantic pact might be so widened in its membership that certain countries would be included who were more of a liability than an asset. He had Italy particularly in mind and met with considerable support from others in his emphasis on the disadvantages of Italian inclusion. Mr. Lovett said they had an open mind on the inclusion of Italy. Mr. Bonnet felt that certain countries might desire to be included but would not be willing to accept as precise and far-reaching obligations as other members. No conclusions were reached as to what countries should be included in the pact beyond recognition of the American position that Norway, Denmark, and Portugal were indispensable.

4. The extent and character of obligations which the United States Government could accept for inclusion in such a pact.

There was a short discussion of this subject, during which Mr. Lovett emphasized the difficulties in securing congressional approval for any obligations wider or more precise than those accepted at Rio. I pointed out that, while everyone must be aware of the difficulties of the U.S. position and of the necessity for avoiding a congressional rejection or crippling amendments, nevertheless the more precise and exact the obligations, the more confidence would be built up in the minds of Europeans that the pact would be of immediate value to them. The matter was not, of course, one of short-range importance because the presence of United States soldiers on European soil ensured that any attack on a continental European country would bring the United States into war automatically because it would become an attack on United States personnel. However, once these soldiers had left Europe, the problem became of more than academic importance. I expressed the hope that in any document which was to be submitted to governments, two things should be kept in mind:

1. The undesirability of including any explicit reference to the fact that the determination of an armed attack or an aggression could only be made by the individual members of the pact. This should be left implicit or should be covered by some form of words, such as "any action which a member considers to be an armed attack on another member should be regarded as an armed attack on itself, etc."

2. The desirability of making the pledge of assistance as impressive as possible. It might even be possible to mention military assistance if it could be coupled with some such phrase as "subject to the requirements of constitutional processes".

It was agreed that this whole subject should be given further and very careful examination.

I also had a separate talk with Lovett and a meeting this morning with the British. The attitude of the French is causing increasing impatience and irritation here and is incomprehensible to everybody.

The working group will meet next week to consider, among other things, certain changes to the papers which I have suggested as a result of studying them here. The Ambassadors will meet again at the end of the week or early in the following week, after which the working papers will be referred to Governments. Ends.

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I enclose three copies of a draft of the outlines of articles 5 and 6 of the annexe to the paper on the nature of a security arrangement produced by the Working Group. This revision was produced by the drafting committee this afternoon after two hours' discussion.

Perhaps the most noteworthy event in the discussion was that the European representatives failed to accept the Canadian proposal as a suitable compromise only because of the use of the words, "subject to the requirements of its constitutional processes". The United Kingdom, Netherlands, and even French representatives were willing to accept this phrase, but the Belgian representative insisted on "through its constitutional processes", so the other Europeans sided with him. This was unfortunate, because our phrase is particularly necessary to the United States side.

Mr. Achilles said he prefers the Canadian to the United Kingdom compromise because of the last clause in it. He likes it, not so much because it seems to bind the parties to an all-out effort, but because the United States military would be able to point to that phrase as a reason for refusing to line up their divisions along the Rhine: defeating the aggressor is on a par with assisting the attacked member in the Canadian version.

Yours sincerely,
T.A. STONE

5. Provision for the mutual assistance in meeting an armed attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter. (Rio, Article 3 (1), Brussels Article 1 (4)).

Note:

A. The United States representatives, feeling that approval of any treaty by their Senate would be greatly facilitated if the Rio text were adhered to as closely as possible, suggested that this provision should be on the following lines:

An armed attack by any State against a Party shall be considered as an attack against all the Parties and that, consequently, each Party undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual<sup>81</sup> self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.

B. The European representatives felt that their Governments would wish to see the provision conform as closely as possible to the corresponding article in the Brussels Treaty, and that it should therefore be drafted on the following lines:

If any Party should be the object of an armed attack in the area covered by the Treaty, the other Parties will, in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter, afford the Party so attacked all the military and other aid and assistance in their power.

or collective

The following alternatives have been suggested as possible bases for compromise:

C. Provision that each Party should agree that any act which, in its opinion, constituted an armed attack against any other Party in the area covered by the Treaty be considered an attack against itself, and consequently should undertake to assist, through its constitutional processes and in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter, in repelling the attack by all military, economic and other means in its powers.<sup>82</sup>

D. In the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter, each member shall regard any action which it considers to be armed aggression against any other member as an attack against itself and, subject to the requirements of its constitutional processes, shall consequently give to the member so attacked all the military, economic and other aid within its power and which may be necessary to defeat the aggressor.<sup>83</sup>

6. Provision for immediate consultation in the event of armed attack with a view to reaching agreement upon collective measures and, pending agreement upon collective measures, provision for the taking of such immediate measures as are within the power of each Party in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding article and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity (Rio, Art.3, Par.2; Brussels, Art.IV).

Note:

The United States representatives believed that this provision should also be patterned on the Rio text and suggested that it should be on the following lines:

Each Party, pending agreement upon collective measures, will determine the immediate measures which it will individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity. Immediate consultation shall take place with a view to reaching agreement upon collective measures.

Washington, August 26, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

As I told you by teletype yesterday, † the meeting of Ambassadors scheduled for Friday has been postponed without any forecast of a probable date. The main reason for this is that many representatives seem to have had second thoughts about the countries which might suitably become parties to the proposed arrangement.

So serious are these second thoughts that the United States delegation yesterday showed the split which exists inside the State Department: Mr. Hickerson believes that the exclusion of Italy would have very serious effects abroad (he fears Italy would feel deserted, and that the U.S.S.R. would make the same interpretation); Mr. Kennan, on the other hand, thinks that the pact ought to be confined, now and for all time, to the north Atlantic countries. He envisaged the prospect of a series of pacts (i.e., there would some day be a Mediterranean pact, and possibly an Eastern European pact); but he was anxious that these local arrangements should be based, not on the common factor of hoping for United States military assistance, but on the ultimate object of European union. There may shortly be a clarification of the United States position; in fact, the Working Group is not scheduled to meet again until the United States knows what it wants.

The Netherlands representative yesterday admitted that his delegation had been acting without instructions hitherto. The instructions have now arrived and call for membership to be restricted to the seven countries participating in these talks. The United Kingdom representative promptly made plain that Norway was vital to his country's defence.

The subject of membership was passed over a little too quickly in the Working Group and now appears to be going to require much further discussion.

Yours sincerely,

THOMAS A. STONE

P.S. As I told you by telephone the working group is now to meet tomorrow morning presumably because U.S. thoughts have crystallized somewhat.

P.P.S.S. It's hard to keep up with things — tomorrow's meeting has now been cancelled!

I am sending you herewith a report of a meeting held in Washington, which I attended, to discuss North Atlantic security arrangements.<sup>84</sup> I am afraid that from this report it looks as if I did most of the talking. This is not the case: however, I thought that you would be particularly interested in the views that I expressed and, therefore, I have reported them at somewhat greater length than those of the others. In any event, it is of course, always easier to remember your own words than those of others at a meeting of this kind. Possibly I should add that Mr. Lovett more than once gave emphatic endorsement to the points of view which we put forward.

The discussion in Washington was, of course, purely informal and off the record and there will be at least one other meeting of the Ambassadors before the documents which have been prepared by the Working Party are approved for transmission to governments. Once that transmission has taken place, then the discussions will, I assume, be elevated to a governmental level.

copy of this letter which was, I think, sent out on August 24. The only other person to whom I am sending Mr. Lovett's letter is Mr. Robertson.

I hope that Mr. Caffery can be depended on to use his own judgment in interpreting the instructions in Mr. Lovett's letter. With a great deal of what Mr. Lovett says I am of course in complete agreement but I do not like the impression Mr. Lovett gives that he is thinking in terms of the Western Europeans as clients and not allies. It seems to me essential, as Mr. St. Laurent has pointed out in a number of his speeches, that the members of the North Atlantic Pact on both sides of the Atlantic should realize that they are partners.

Nor do I like the insistence that the United States Military must keep a free hand on what United States strategy would be in the event of war in Europe. If all the partners of the North Atlantic Pact insist on keeping a free hand, there is not going to be any real joint planning of pooling of resources.

It is not going to be easy to bring the United States along on this point but, as I have indicated before, I think that the establishment under the Pact of agencies for joint planning will make it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the United States to refuse to give an assurance that they will have certain ground forces available to send immediately to Europe to defend France in an emergency.

I would myself be prepared to accept the change suggested by the European representatives. It seems to me that the U.S., if they are prepared to accept the rest of our draft, could also accept this change. "Through its constitutional processes" could, it seems to me, be interpreted by the United States as meaning "through the acceptance by the Senate of a recommendation by the President that the United States declare war."

2. Our alternative, if it includes this revision, might read better if it were split into two sentences along the following lines:

The working group met on the morning of September 2nd<sup>85</sup> and the drafting committee on the same afternoon.<sup>86</sup> The Ambassadors had a long meeting on the afternoon of the 3rd,<sup>87</sup> which was intended to result in the immediate submission of the papers to governments for their consideration but which ended in recognition of the necessity of some further revisions. meeting of the Ambassadors consideration was confined to the territorial scope of the North Atlantic arrangement and to procedural questions.

2. At the working group, Jebb reported Bevin's objections to the inclusion in the pact of definite provisions for co-operation in the economic, social, and cultural fields. He said they would agree to a reference in the Preamble, but would prefer no mention in the body of the agreement and particularly no provision for the creation of agencies by the parties for these purposes. This was based on an understandable desire not to complicate the work of O.E.E.C. and other European organizations now occupied with problems of economic co-operation. I pointed out that O.E.E.C. was a temporary organization whereas we were considering long-term arrangements, and that it was wholly appropriate to recognize in the agreement the need for close collaboration in other than military matters. I added that our proposal was not intended solely or even mainly to bring about multilateral action under the agreement, but that its purpose was to give a general blessing to intimate collaboration between any or all of the parties in economic, social, and cultural matters. It was finally agreed to eliminate the provision (in para. 12 of the Annex) that agencies should be established under the agreement for these purposes, while retaining a general article; the reference in the Preamble was also modified. I think that this will safeguard our basic interest. The French later joined in the British objection during discussion in the drafting group, but the matter was not mentioned at the Ambassadors' meeting.

3. At the working group we were confronted by a new draft, prepared in the State Department, of the paper dealing with the territorial scope of the arrangement. This had been the subject of intense discussion inside the State Department, but it appeared at the Ambassadors' meeting that those responsible for the draft (who included Kennan, Hickerson, and Achilles) had not fully explained to Lovett the changes which they had made.

4. As this paper is undergoing further revision, I think it best not to send it to you for consideration just yet. Its central feature was a proposal to provide for three categories of relationship to the North Atlantic pact:

(1) Full parties, who would be the United States, Canada, and the parties to the Brussels Treaty, present or future.

(2) Norway, Denmark, Iceland, possibly Ireland, and Portugal (if they did not adhere to the Brussels Treaty), who would receive a guarantee of assistance in the event of attack in return for a promise to make facilities available on their territory.

(3) Other countries in the O.E.E.C., the position of whom would be covered by a joint statement by the parties to the North Atlantic agreement, saying that any threat of aggression, direct or indirect, against them would require consultation between the parties with a view to taking necessary action.

The paper would leave to the European countries responsibility for proposing whether Italy should join the Brussels Treaty or establish some special relationship with it. Otherwise, Italy would presumably fall into the third category.

5. The important change made by this proposal was the requirement that full participation in the North Atlantic pact would be open only to those Western European countries which accepted all the obligations of the Brussels Treaty. The drafters of the paper in the State Department put this forward for reasons not mentioned at any of the meetings, but explained privately to me. They consider that it would increase the influence of the United States in promoting a closer political relationship among the Western European countries leading to the establishment of a European federation. They think that the United States would be able to employ the North Atlantic agreement to exercise pressure on the Brussels Pact powers, collectively and individually, towards European federation, if the full advantages of the North Atlantic pact were restricted to those countries that assumed all the obligations of the Brussels Pact. Kennan at the working group kept referring to their proposal as establishing group responsibility between the parties on each side of the Atlantic. He was, however, not at all clear on what this would involve. We were not asked to approve the paper as a joint proposal to our governments, but only to agree that it provided a useful basis for further consideration.

6. The Ambassadors' meeting was convened with the intention that it should be the last in this series and should end in consent to despatch the papers to governments today. This procedure was in fact accepted by the majority early in the meeting. After a good deal of beating about the bush, however, we got into a discussion, in which Van Kleffens, Franks, and I took a leading part, of the wisdom of requiring the European partners to secure full membership in the North Atlantic pact only by passing through the ante-room of the Brussels Treaty. It came out that Lovett had thought that this was not the effect of the paper, and when we examined the possible reluctance of Norway, Ireland, and eventually Spain, to accept the Brussels Treaty, and their possible readiness, except for this, to join the North Atlantic group, Lovett expressed the view, to the discomfiture of his advisers, that it ought to be possible for such countries to become full members of the North Atlantic Pact while not ratifying the Brussels Treaty. It was therefore decided to resubmit the paper to the working group, and the State Department drafters this morning are scratching their heads over what to do.

7. The present intention is that the working group should go into the matter once more early next week and that the Ambassadors should meet toward the end of the week to consider the results and forward them to their governments. It is obvious that the proposals will have to be discussed between the Foreign Ministers of the Brussels countries. The Brussels Consultative Council must meet before the middle of October, and the papers should therefore be received by the Foreign Offices by the middle of this month in order to enable their full consideration before this meeting.

8. I was glad that the discussion took the turn it did yesterday, as Canada does not fit easily into the scheme of establishing a European and a North American group inside the Atlantic system. I think that our position would be easier if there were other countries besides ourselves and the United States which were full members of the North Atlantic agreement but not parties to the Brussels Pact.

9. The proposal for a second category of associate membership in the North Atlantic treaty appears to me to have merit principally in relation to those countries which can provide only essential facilities. Iceland, Greenland, and possibly Portugal, are the best examples. These stepping stones across the Atlantic are incapable of a useful military contribution. I should myself favour the assumption by Norway, Denmark, and Ireland of the full obligations of the pact.

10. The discussion about the position of Italy did not throw much further light on what ought to be done. The State Department, in effect, has said that this is a European problem and that it is up to the European countries to propose a solution. They also said that a solution satisfactory to the United States was essential. The French reported that de Gasperi was weakening on Italian adhesion to any security pact, Brussels or North Atlantic, but no information to this effect has reached either the British or the Americans.

11. We heard much less at these meetings about the French fears for their immediate security. Bonnet went over some of the old ground in his diffuse manner, but did not press for anything in particular. He welcomed, however, the suggestion that the European parties should be only the Brussels group, and he obviously disliked the line of criticism which the rest of us followed. The meeting was the worst of the series at which I have been present. After a week's delay so that the State Department could iron out its own differences on the scope of the arrangement, it was revealed that they had not in fact done so, although they thought they had. Their "solution" for Italy, also, was to leave it to the European governments to propose a solution, while saying it must provide for Italian participation in a manner satisfactory to the United States.

United States Re-Draft of Pages 2(a) and 3 of Paper on Territorial Scope included in the complete revision of 2nd September

Mr. Wrong: Is it a correct interpretation of this document that a country joining the Brussels Pact does not necessarily become a full member of the North-Atlantic Pact?

Mr. Achilles: It means that Italy could get a guarantee from the North-Atlantic countries collectively without joining the North-Atlantic Pact.

Mr. Kennan: thought the relationship to Italy would be a group relationship.

Mr. Wrong, Mr. Hoyer-Millar: did not see how it was possible to extend a collective guarantee.

Mr. Kennan: admitted that he was not sure if it is possible to have a collective guarantee. If it is not possible the meeting might as well stop talking about an anchor-point.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: said he did not know what an anchor point was. The idea of extending a collective guarantee was a new one to the European countries.

Mr. Achilles: explained that Italy would benefit by invoking the Brussels Pact and the Brussels Pact Powers would then invoke the North-Atlantic Pact. This was a sort of indirect guarantee.

Mr. Havel: expressed his views as to the usefulness of using membership in the Brussels Pact in the third paragraph on page 2(a) of the United States re-draft. He understood from the last meeting that countries could become full members of the North-Atlantic Pact either through the Brussels Pact or else directly. He did not see why Italy should have to join the Brussels Pact to become a full member of the North-Atlantic Pact.

Mr. Achilles: remarked that Italy could still become an associate member without joining the Brussels Pact.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: said he was not sure whether Italy could become a member of the North-Atlantic Pact in any case. Italy may be somewhere between full membership and associate membership but probably nearer the latter while the Peace Treaty is still in effect.

Mr. Havel: The last paragraph of Section II on page 3 should, in his opinion, specify "the other OEEC countries".

Mr. Kennan: asked Mr. Havel if he thought full membership should be open to anybody physically capable of undertaking the burdens of full membership.

Mr. Havel: did not answer this question directly. He suggested there should be a permissive clause allowing full membership of other states, subject to negotiation.

Mr. Achilles: said the line must be drawn somewhere. He did not see how countries which are not North-Atlantic countries could be allowed to become full members.

Mr. Havel: again objected to the necessity of joining the Brussels Pact as a vehicle for getting into the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. Bérard: said that he did not think that the Paper should be drafted in order to fit particular nations, such as Italy. He thought a suitable provision for membership would be as follows: There would be the natural members in Europe and North America (The Brussels Pact Powers, Canada and the United States). Then there would be the stepping-stone countries (Ireland, Portugal, Iceland and Denmark) which might be either full members or associate members, according to their ability and their wishes. Finally, there would be those who would join later and these might participate in the Pact either as full members, as associate members or as protected countries. He suggested that Article IX of the Brussels Pact could serve as a model for this part of the proposed North-Atlantic Pact. He did not think that collective guarantees could be given. He did not like the principle of going through the Brussels Pact in order to become a full member of the North-Atlantic Pact. He suggested that this was an imposition upon the Europeans. He also said he thought the description "natural member" was a misleading definition.

Mr. Kennan: said that for him a natural member meant a member whose territory bordered on the Atlantic.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: said that he had read this Paper, in the light of a statement made some meetings ago by Mr. Hickerson, to mean that Italy must be a party to the Brussels Pact as he understood Mr. Hickerson to mean Italian inclusion in the North-Atlantic Pact was a sine qua non for United States interests.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: asked if the object was to bring Italy into the North-Atlantic Pact without making it undertake the full obligations of the Pact.

Mr. Achilles: said that this might be the case.

Mr. Bérard: asked what the United States' objection was to a proposal like Article IX of the Brussels Pact.

Mr. Kennan: asked if a pact which set no limits on the countries which might adhere could still be called a North-Atlantic Pact.

Mr. Wrong: said that possibly there should be a reference to Western Europe included in the description of the Pact.

Mr. Kennan: asked if Mr. Bérard meant that the final decision as to the type of membership of later joiners should be left to the actual members as each case arises.

Mr. Bérard, Mr. Havel: said that that was the case.

Mr. Achilles: said that in that case he was not happy about the use of the phrase "natural members".

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: said that the countries whose status is in dispute are either natural members or else of vital interest to the natural members.

Mr. Wrong: said he was inclined to agree with Mr. Bérard's suggestion about membership but that if it was adopted it would require further revision of the whole Paper. He wanted to be sure that the North-Atlantic Pact would not do anything to prejudice Italian entry into the Brussels Pact. He said that it was difficult to get any meaning out of the phrase "collective guarantee".

Mr. Kennan: said that his Government held no brief for the collective idea and suggested that it be dropped. Anchor points did not mean anything in the terms of the Treaty.

Mr. Wrong: The concept of an anchor point could not be written into the Treaty but it will continue to exist anyway.

Mr. Havel: asked whether there should not be a paragraph to the effect that associate members should not participate in the military staff talks.

Mr. Achilles: agreed that this was the case.

Mr. Bérard: said that he felt sure that Italy wanted to be either a full member or associate member but not just a protected country.

Mr. Achilles, Mr. Hoyer-Millar: both said that they inclined to the belief that Italy wanted to be a full member.

Mr. Bérard: again pressed the use of Article IX of the Brussels Pact. The use of this formula might allow the original members to create special categories for countries like Italy and Sweden.

Mr. Havel: agreed with this suggestion.

The Nature of the Agreement

Mr. Havel: On page 3 of the Paper on this subject attached to the Draft of 2nd September under the heading "Criteria", asked if there should not be something about the area in which the Pact is to operate (C.F. outline Article 7 of the Pact).

Mr. Kennan: thought that the area in which the Pact would operate would be more or less automatic by definition (i.e. would apply to the territory of the member countries).

Mr. Wrong: This question would have to be gone into in detail later on with a view to making sure that the stepping-stone countries should not have a veto over the conclusion of the Pact by declining to participate. He agreed that something about operative area should be included among the criteria.

Mr. Havel: turning to the paragraph numbered C. on page 4 of the same Paper said he would like something about reciprocal assistance put in this section (by this he meant that it should be understood that the Europeans were not necessarily obligated to send troops to the defence of Alaska).

Mr. Wrong: This paragraph is tied in with outline Article VI of the proposed Pact.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: said that he would not object to the inclusion of something along these lines in paragraph C but he thought that it should be plain that it did not mean "individual right to do nothing".

Return to United States Paper (pages 2(a) and 3)

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: thought that the second paragraph on page 2(a) should be interpreted to mean that not everybody should have a seat on the Military Committee.

Mr. Wrong: From the drafting of this paragraph it was not clear whether it was meant to refer to the present talks taking place in London or to the Brussels Pact Committee on the one hand and the P.J.B.D. on the other. This should be corrected.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: emphasized that in his opinion only full members should have a seat on the Military Committee.

Mr. Kennan: agreed

Mr. Wrong: suggested that paragraph 2 on page 2(a) might be dropped for the time being and inserted later in a negative form.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: suggested that the substance of this paragraph might appear in negative form after the paragraph on associate members, i.e. saying that they would not have representation on the Military Committee.

Mr. Bérard: agreed. He also asked if the reference to anchor point was to be dropped.

Mr. Hoyer-Millar: suggested that the idea of anchor points grew out of the idea of a hard core.

Mr. Kennan: said he was not holding out for the anchor points, though he liked the idea.

Mr. Wrong: suggested that speaking of a collective basis might add more confusion than it clears away. The effect of the Pact might be collective but the form could not be.

Mr. Havel: agreed that the collective aspect would emerge after the conclusion of the Pact.

Mr. Kennan: said (sadly) that in his opinion a Europe showing a desire to unite might be a more effective ally than a Europe of individual states.

Mr. Bérard: We want to conclude the Pact this year.

The working party turned to a discussion of the technique of re-drafting the United States Paper.

TOP SECRET

Washington, September 11, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I enclose copies numbered 21, 33, and 34 of the paper dated 9th September, resulting from the Washington exploratory conversations on security, produced for consideration by the governments of the participating countries. It is hoped that Governments will be able to study this paper and to resume the conversations around the middle of October — probably after the Foreign Ministers of the Brussels Powers have had an opportunity to discuss it at their next meeting.

It was agreed in yesterday's meeting of Ambassadors with Mr. Lovett that the attention of Governments should be drawn to the need to elucidate the references to the territorial area in which the proposed pact would have effect (page 11, para. 8(4),<sup>90</sup> and page 18, Art. 7).<sup>91</sup> This is a topic which has been consciously avoided during the conversations because it would require definite guidance from Governments.

Another point which has been passed over is referred to in the note on page 19.<sup>92</sup> The European representatives are not asking their governments to give special attention at the present time to the terms on which participants might be deprived of the benefits of the pact by reason of a fall from grace. Possibly this will not be so easy to settle as they now assume.

The foregoing points, however, are aside from the main issue which is placed before Governments by the submission of this paper. Chapter I of the paper gives a summary of the background thinking which led to the assumption that the only useful type of arrangement is a North Atlantic pact. You have already had an advance copy of this Chapter; it has not been altered.

Chapter II has been the principal subject of discussion during the week which has elapsed since I sent you my letter of 4th September. A week of steady campaigning by the Brussels Powers and ourselves has led to the clarification of the conditions under which powers in addition to those participating in the conversations may adhere to the proposed pact. It is no longer necessary for European countries to adhere to the Brussels Pact in order to participate in a North Atlantic pact with full responsibilities and full privileges. The idea of group responsibility has also been abandoned, although not without reluctance on the part of George Kennan and others in the State Department. The choices left open to joiners are now more flexible than they were under the original State Department proposal; it is possible for a country like Italy to be in a special category of its own. This Chapter supersedes the preliminary paper on this subject which was forwarded to you on 13th August.

Chapter III was ironed out before Chapter II was finally settled. You will note that in paragraph 5 of the Annex there is no longer a separate Canadian compromise. Our compromise was so similar to the amended United Kingdom version that it seemed foolish to clutter up the paper unduly. I told the Ambassadors that it was not important whether we used "subject to" or "in accordance with" in front of "constitutional procedures". Mr. Kennan was apologetic over the need, for domestic reasons, of introducing any phrase of this sort.

The changes in this Chapter are for the most part of little substance. I have already reported that I had to agree to the modification of paragraph 3 of the Annex about collaboration in other fields, and to a consequent change in paragraph 12. In addition, changes have been made in paragraphs 5 and 10. The other paragraphs have not been altered from the earlier version.

The record of yesterday's meeting of Ambassadors will be forwarded shortly.† In it you will see the statement which I made about the extreme importance of the proposals. I had had it in mind for some time to speak with a good deal of emphasis on this at the last meeting of this phase of the discussions, in the hope that my colleagues in referring the matter to their governments would not confine themselves to an analysis of the document and the means whereby it was produced, but would also seek to put the proposals in a broader setting. I think that I was at least partially successful, since the Belgian, French, and British Ambassadors have all told me that they are including my statement in their telegraphic reports to their governments. Mr. Hickerson also greeted it enthusiastically and said that he agreed with every word. Mr. Bonnet, to whom it was really addressed, was not so responsive.

At the end of yesterday's meeting, Mr. Lovett wisely brought up again the need for preserving absolute secrecy about the contents of the paper. Now that a plan has been submitted to governments for consideration, the preservation of secrecy is even more important than it was earlier in the discussions.

Mr. Bérard of the French Embassy has made the good suggestion that an agreed French translation of the paper should be prepared. The French Embassy will, I think, undertake the production of a draft, which will be gone over by the drafting group. I shall send copies of this when it becomes available.

Yours sincerely,
H.H. WRONG

WASHINGTON EXPLORATORY CONVERSATIONS ON SECURITY<sup>93</sup>

This paper has evolved from the exploratory conversations on security problems of common interest which have taken place between the Ambassadors of Belgium (who also represented Luxembourg), Canada, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada and the Under Secretary of State of the United States of America. It is the result of study and exchanges of views concerning the following agenda:

(1) The situation in Europe as it affects security, including the question of Soviet intentions, the nature of the threat confronting the Western world, and the possible effect upon Soviet policy of action by the participating countries to increase their collective security.

<sup>93</sup> Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Miss Rump: This copy contains Mr. Pearson's comments. E. R[eid]
Mr. Pearson return to E. R[eid]

(2) Security measures taken and to be taken in Europe by the Parties to the Brussels Treaty. The importance of this aspect was fully recognized but it was agreed that discussion in the current conversations would be impracticable pending receipt of fuller information concerning the results of the military conversations proceeding concurrently in London.

(3) Security relations of the nations participating in these talks with other Western European countries, with particular reference to the territorial scope of any security arrangement linking Western Europe and North America.

(4) The nature of North American association with such a North Atlantic security arrangement, including the basic criteria and the particular considerations of both the European and the North American countries concerned.

As will be clear this paper represents no firm conclusions. It represents only an agreed statement on the nature of the problems discussed and the steps which might be practicable to meet them.

Developments in the international situation since the end of hostilities make clear the urgent need for further measures which will contribute effectively to peace and security.

The establishment of the O.E.E.C. and the signature of the Brussels Treaty are important achievements which indicate the intent of the peace-loving countries of Europe to work together in their common interest, and additional steps designed to bring about a substantial and permanent degree of cooperation and unity among these countries would materially improve the present position. But the situation demands further measures: those nations having a primary interest in the security of the North Atlantic area should collaborate in the development of a regional or collective defence arrangement for that area. Such action should be taken within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations.

1. The Situation in Europe as it Affects Security

1. The war, by weakening the Western European countries and by creating a vacuum in Germany has increased the strength of the Soviet Union relative to the strength of Western Europe. This has resulted in a situation in which the security of this area is immediately threatened and that of North America is seriously affected.

2. Soviet ideology is self-admittedly expansionist. Moreover, according to this ideology and doctrine the peaceful coexistence of the Soviet and non-Soviet worlds is impossible on any permanent basis. The Kremlin leaders aim at the maximum extension of their power and influence. International communism serves them as a powerful instrument for the achievement of this aim.

3. The westward expansion of Soviet power since the defeat of Hitler has rendered the Soviet Union strategically capable at the present time of dominating the continent of Europe by force. Soviet forces are so grouped and organized that they could take the initiative in military action at short notice. The military strength of the Soviet satellite countries of Eastern Europe has been so organized as to make a material contribution to Soviet striking power. These factors support the Kremlin program of intimidation designed to attain the domination of Europe. The Communist International under the new title of the Cominform is again active in the field of indirect aggression.

4. While there is no evidence to suggest that the Soviet Government is planning armed aggression as an act of policy, there is always the danger that, in the tense situation existing at the present time, some incident might occur which would lead to war. War might also come about by a miscalculation of western intentions on the part of the Soviet Government. Alternatively, a sudden decision by the Kremlin leaders to precipitate war might result from fear: (1) that their own personal power was being undermined, or (2) that Soviet strength in relation to that of the western nations was declining, or (3) that these nations had aggressive intentions toward the Soviet Union.

5. Soviet plans have suffered a political setback as a result of the implementation of the European recovery program, the growing determination of the western powers to draw together for their well-being and mutual protection, and recent developments in Europe such as the trend of events in Greece and Tito's breach with the Cominform. There remains, however, a justified sense of insecurity among the peoples of Western Europe. The continued presence of U.S. forces in Western Europe is important since an attack upon them would bring the United States immediately and directly into war. Nevertheless, something more is needed to counteract the fear of the peoples of Western Europe that their countries might be overrun by the Soviet Army before effective help could arrive.

6. The U.S.S.R. under Kremlin dictatorship, utilizing the technique of indirect aggression and the threat of direct aggression, is an implacable enemy of western civilization and the present situation in Europe must be regarded as extremely insecure. The problem is to consider how the countries of Western Europe and those of the North American continent can most effectively join together for mutual aid against this common danger and achieve security. The immediate purpose is, in the first place, to prevent a Soviet attack; in this respect weak measures might only be provocative; firm measures may well prove a deterrent. In the second place, it is to restore confidence among the peoples of Western Europe. United States and Canadian association in some North Atlantic security arrangement would be a major contribution to this.

II. Territorial Scope of a North Atlantic Security Arrangement and its Relationship to the Security of Other Nations

1. A North Atlantic security system composed exclusively of the United States, Canada and the present parties to the Brussels Treaty would not be fully effective. On the other hand, even the combined military resources of these nations would be inadequate to warrant their assuming hard and fast commitments for the security of a large number of geographically scattered countries. A line must be drawn somewhere. The problem is to devise an arrangement which would best meet the security needs of the nations here represented without over-extending their military capabilities.

2. To be fully satisfactory, a North Atlantic security system would have to provide not only for the security of the countries mentioned above but also for that of the North Atlantic territories of Denmark (especially Greenland), Norway, Iceland,

Portugal (especially the Azores) and Ireland, which, should they fall into enemy hands, would jeopardize the security of both the European and the North American members and seriously impede the flow of reciprocal assistance between them.

3. Furthermore, other free European nations must be taken into account in view of: (1) the effect on the security of the nations participating in these talks should the political or territorial integrity of these other nations be menaced; (2) the necessity for maintaining and strengthening their Western orientation; and (3) the importance of avoiding any Soviet miscalculation to the effect that these nations could be absorbed into the Soviet orbit with impunity.

4. The circumstances and capabilities of the North Atlantic and Western European countries vary widely. Taking these variations into account rather than attempting to fit each nation into a uniform rigid pattern may provide the solution. It is suggested that the concept should include different categories of nations: (1) those whose membership of a North Atlantic Pact would involve maximum commitments for reciprocal assistance (with due regard for the resources of each party), and participation in the development of coordinated military potential; (2) those whose membership in the Pact would only involve limited commitments as, for example, to provide facilities for the common defence in return for commitments by the full members to defend their territories and (3) other nations, not members of the Pact, a threat to whose political or territorial integrity would require action by the full members.<sup>94</sup> The division of nations between these categories need not be rigidly fixed but should permit flexibility.

5. Full membership in a North Atlantic security system would involve undertakings for mutual assistance in the event of armed attack upon any party, provision for consultation if the security of any party was otherwise threatened directly or indirectly, and provision for the establishment of agencies to implement the treaty. The original full members would be Canada, the U.S., the parties to the Brussels Treaty and such other members of the North Atlantic community as are ready to undertake the requisite obligations<sup>95</sup> and are acceptable.

6. While it might well be desirable to have Norway, Denmark, Portugal, Iceland, and Ireland as full members, these countries may not now be prepared to accept fully the requisite responsibilities. They should be consulted before conclusion of the Pact and, if they are not then willing to assume such responsibilities, they should be invited to accede to the Pact with limited commitments, the exact nature of which would be determined in negotiation with them.<sup>96</sup> The nature of such commitments might vary as between countries but would be generally such that: (a) the full members would agree to regard an attack on any of these countries as an attack against themselves; (b) these countries would agree to defend their own territories

Why should anyone take on the commitments under 1 when they can get all the benefits under 2 or 3?

<sup>95</sup> Note marginale :/Marginal note:

No one else is likely to do this.

This will be very difficult for Canada.

to the limit of their capabilities and to make available such facilities as are within their power, whenever required, in order to provide for the protection of the North Atlantic area.<sup>97</sup>

7. Provision should be made by which the parties may by agreement invite any other state in or bordering upon Western Europe, the maintenance of whose territorial or political integrity is of direct concern to the security of the parties, to accede to the treaty on conditions to be agreed between them and the state so invited. These new participating countries might enter the pact either as full members, or with limited commitments as indicated above, or under such special arrangements as might be necessary owing to their geographical position or to their international obligations (Sweden, Italy).

8. The case of Italy presents a particular problem. It is not a North Atlantic country and it is subject to the military limitations imposed by the Peace Treaty. On the other hand its territory is of strategic importance to the nations here represented and its Western orientation must be maintained and strengthened. The United States representatives felt that a satisfactory solution of the problem of Italy must be found, either within the formula referred to in the preceding paragraph or otherwise.

9. The original full parties to the North Atlantic Pact would issue a joint statement at the time of its conclusion to the effect that any threat of aggression, direct or indirect, against any other OEEC country (including Western Germany, Austria, and Trieste) would be regarded by them as a development calling for consultation with the object of taking any measures which may be necessary.

10. It was recognized that the ultimate relationship of Spain and Western Germany (if Germany remains divided) to a North Atlantic security arrangement must eventually be determined but that it would be premature to attempt to do so at this time.

III. Nature of a Possible North Atlantic Security Arrangement

1. Any North Atlantic security arrangement should be clearly and specifically defined, since the respective governments and peoples must know exactly what the arrangement is and what advantages and obligations are involved. The obligations and commitments of each party should of course be undertaken by constitutional process. With the exceptions noted in the preceding section, the security arrangements should be generally reciprocal in nature. The preference expressed in the U.S. Senate on June 11, 1948 that U.S. association with any such arrangements be effected by treaty has been noted, as well as the Canadian position in regard to such an association stated by the Prime Minister of Canada in the House of Commons on March 17, 1948.

2. The presence of U.S. troops in Germany not only entails U.S. participation in the security problems of Europe but also would in most contingencies, as long as they remain, involve the U.S. in any hostilities were they to break out there. The problem is, however, to recommend a long-term arrangement binding the parties to meet aggression jointly from whatever quarter and at whatever time. If the arrangement is to fill this requirement and those outlined above and to contribute to the restoration of confidence among the peoples of Western Europe, it would not be possible to base it on the presence of U.S. troops in Germany.

This would really commit them to active participation in war and be considered by the Soviets as provocation as taking on the other commitments.

3. No alternative to a treaty appears to meet the essential requirements.

4. Consideration has been given to the question of whether or not conclusion of such a treaty might be considered provocative by the Soviet Government. Any arrangement linking the defense of Western Europe with that of the U.S. and Canada would reduce the chances of successful Soviet expansionist moves and would therefore encounter Soviet opposition as bitter as that which the European recovery program has encountered. Half measures might prove both ineffectual and provocative, whereas unmistakably clear determination to resist should serve to deter, and minimize the risk of, armed aggression. Soviet criticism could be offset by fitting the arrangement squarely into the framework of the United Nations and by providing not merely for defense but also for the advancement of the common interests of the parties and the strengthening of the economic, social and cultural ties which bind them.

5. Furthermore the existence of a treaty containing unmistakably clear provisions binding the parties to come to each other's defense in case of attack would hearten the peoples and leaders of the countries concerned. It would assist them to surmount the difficulties still besetting them, particularly in Western Europe where confidence is essential to full economic recovery.

6. Inasmuch as the conclusion of such a treaty might increase the existing tension with the Soviet Government, the Western European countries are the more anxious that the assistance given to an attacked country should be immediate, and military as well as economic and political. It also seems necessary that, within the limits of sound military practice, the military and other measures to be taken immediately by each participating country should be planned and decided beforehand by the agencies established for effective implementation of the treaty. It was appreciated that some of these military matters were being studied in London at the present time and that the military meetings there might be considered as indicative of the sort of consultation which might take place under the treaty, in the military and other fields.

7. Consideration was also given to the effect of the conclusion of such a treaty upon the security of other free European nations which may not become parties. It must be made clear that its conclusion in no way implies any lack of interest on the part of the parties in the security of such countries. This difficulty could to some extent be met by providing in the treaty for consultation in the event the security of any of the parties is threatened by armed attack upon a non-signatory or by any other fact or situation.

8. The foregoing considerations have led to agreement upon the following basic criteria for such an arrangement:

(1) It should be within the framework of the United Nations Charter, demonstrate the determination of the parties fully to meet their obligations under the Charter and encourage the progressive development of regional or collective defense arrangements.

(2) It should contribute, through increasing the individual and collective capacities of the parties for self-defense, to the maintenance of peace and the greater national security of the parties.

(3) It should make unmistakably clear the determination of the respective peoples jointly to resist aggression from any quarter.

(4) It should define the area within which aggression against any party would bring the provisions for mutual assistance into operation.

(5) It should be based on and promote continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid in all fields.

(6) It should be more than an arrangement for defence alone; it should serve both to preserve the common civilization and to promote its development by increasing the collaboration between the signatories and advancing the conditions of stability and well-being upon which peace depends.

(7) It should provide adequate machinery for implementing its terms, in particular for organized coordination and strengthening of the defense capacities of the parties, beginning immediately it comes into force.

9. In addition, the representatives of the European countries emphasized that it was particularly desirable that the arrangement should provide for the speediest practicable measures of material assistance in case of an armed attack, including individual military assistance by each of the members accepting full commitments as soon as such an attack is launched against any of them.

10. The U.S. representatives emphasized that U.S. association with any security arrangement must be within the framework of the Resolution adopted by the U.S. Senate on June 11, 1948 (S.Res.239, 80th Congress, 2nd session). Of the four conditions specified by that Resolution three are covered by the basic criteria cited above: (1) that the arrangements must be within the framework of the Charter, (2) that U.S. association with it must be by constitutional process, and (3) that the arrangement must be based upon continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid. It was made clear that the third condition meant that U.S. assistance must supplement rather than take the place of the maximum efforts of the other nations on behalf of themselves and each other, and that assistance must be reciprocal. The fourth condition was that the arrangement should affect (i.e. increase) the national security of the U.S. In this connection the U.S. representatives made clear their belief that a North Atlantic security arrangement, if it is to increase adequately the security of North America and provide the Western European countries with adequate assurance that North American ground and air forces and supplies could effectively be brought to their assistance in time of war, should include the North Atlantic territories of Denmark (Greenland), Iceland, Ireland, Norway and Portugal (the Azores).

11. The United States representatives also considered that some of the articles of the Rio Treaty, which had been approved by the U.S. Senate, provided a useful basis for the formulation of an arrangement which would meet the requirements. At the same time they fully recognized the relevance of provisions of the Brussels Treaty. They considered certain articles of the Rio Treaty, notably those concerning voting procedure, unsuited to an arrangement for the North Atlantic area.

12. The United States representatives emphasized that the United States could not constitutionally enter into any treaty which would provide that the United States would be at war without a vote of Congress. All representatives stressed that their respective constitutional processes must be observed and agreed that, as in any similar treaty, the question of fact as to whether or not an armed attack had occurred would be a matter for individual determination.

13. The Canadian representatives emphasized the importance which they attached to provisions, in any treaty which might be concluded, for the encouragement of cooperation in fields other than security. Such cooperation would contribute directly to general security. In other words, they felt that the purpose of a treaty should not be merely negative and that it should create the dynamic counter-attraction of a free, prosperous and progressive society as opposed to the society of the Communist world. The treaty should provide a basis for the organization of an overwhelming preponderance of moral, economic and military force and a sufficient degree of unity to assure that this preponderance of force may be so used as to guarantee that the free nations will not be defeated one by one.

14. The conclusion of an arrangement of this general character appears practicable. There is attached an outline of provisions which it might include.

[ANNEXE/ANNEX]

OUTLINE OF PROVISIONS WHICH MIGHT BE SUITABLE FOR INCLUSION IN A NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

Preamble

The preamble would combine some of the features of the preambles to the Charter, the Rio and the Brussels Treaties. In it the parties would express:

(1) The belief that, until security under the United Nations is assured on a universal basis, the security of free nations can best be strengthened by the progressive development of arrangements for collective self-defense as provided for in Article 51 of the Charter (Vandenberg Resolution);

(2) Recognition of their common traditions of democracy, personal freedom and political liberty (Rio Pars. 6 and 7; Brussels Pars. 1 and 2; Charter, Par. 2), their common interests, and the economic, social and cultural ties which bind them (Brussels, Par. 3);

(3) Determination to co-operate in fortifying and preserving this common heritage and, by uniting in continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, (1) to maintain international peace and security (Rio, Par. 8; Brussels, Pars. 5 and 8; Charter, Par. 6; Vandenberg Resolution), and (2) to provide for effective reciprocal assistance to repel armed attack against any of them and to meet any act of aggression or threat to their political independence or territorial integrity (Rio, Par. 8; Brussels, Pars. 5 and 8);

(4) Resolution to combine their efforts in a North Atlantic organization designed effectively to accomplish these aims in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter (Rio, Par. 3 and Par. 8; Brussels, Par. 5 and Par. 8).

Articles

1. An undertaking not to resort to the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter or of this Treaty, (Rio, Art. 1).

2. An undertaking to submit every controversy which may arise among the Parties to methods of peaceful settlement (Rio, Art. 2; Brussels, Art. VIII).

(Note: Articles 1 and 2 might be omitted and replaced by reaffirmation in the preamble of the obligation in the Charter to settle all disputes by peaceful means. These articles would, however, provide a substantive obligation for parties not now members of the United Nations (Portugal and Ireland). Their inclusion, by providing Charter limitations upon the conduct of the parties, would be of assistance in countering charges that the treaty was directed solely against the Soviet Union.)

3. Provision for the encouragement of efforts between any or all of the parties to promote the general welfare through collaboration in the economic, social and cultural fields (Brussels, Arts. 1, 2 and 3; Charter, Art. 55).

(Note: This provision, if included, should be qualified by a statement similar to that in Brussels Article 1 to the effect that the cooperation envisaged "shall not involve any duplication of, or prejudice to, the work of other (economic) organizations in which the Parties are or may be represented but shall on the contrary assist the work of those organizations." Its inclusion would give substance to the concept of a positive rather than purely negative treaty.)

4. Provision for individual and collective effort, on the basis of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to strengthen the individual and collective capacity of the parties to resist aggression (Vandenberg Resolution).

(Note: This would provide the basis for the reciprocal extension of material assistance, in advance of any armed attack or threat to the peace, and for coordinating arrangements for production and strategy.)

5. Provision for mutual assistance in meeting an armed attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter. (Rio, Article 3(1); Brussels, Article IV).

(Note: With respect to the commitments of full members:

A. The United States representatives, feeling that approval of any treaty by their Senate would be greatly facilitated if the Rio text were adhered to as closely as possible, suggested that this provision should be on the following lines:

An armed attack by any State against a Party shall be considered as an attack against all the Parties and, consequently, each Party undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.

B. The European representatives felt that their Governments would wish to see the provision conform as closely as possible to the corresponding article in the Brussels Treaty, and that it should therefore be drafted on the following lines:

If any Party should be the object of an armed attack in the area covered by the Treaty, the other Parties will, in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter, afford the Party so attacked all the military and other aid and assistance in their power.

The following was suggested as a possible basis for compromise.

C. Provision that each Party should agree that any act which, in its opinion, constituted an armed attack against any other Party in the area covered by the treaty be considered an attack against itself, and should consequently, in accordance with its constitutional processes, assist in repelling the attack by all military, economic and other means in its power in the exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.

The Canadian representative thought that the Canadian Government would prefer a provision along these lines.)

6. Provision for immediate consultation in the event of armed attack with a view to reaching agreement upon collective measures and, pending agreement upon collective measures, provision for the taking of such immediate measures as are within the power of each Party in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding article and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity (Rio, Art. 3, Par. 2; Brussels, Art. IV).

(Note: The United States representatives believed that this provision should also be patterned on the Rio text and suggested that it should be on the following lines:

Each Party, pending agreement upon collective measures, will determine the immediate measures which it will individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of mutual solidarity. Immediate consultation shall take place with a view to reaching agreement upon collective measures.)

7. Delineation of the area within which an armed attack will bring articles 5 and 6 into operation. (Rio, Art. 3, Par. 3 and Art. 4; Brussels, Art. IV).

8. Provision to the effect that measures of self-defense taken under articles 5 and 6 may be taken until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. (Rio, Art. 3, Par. 4; Brussels, Art. V).

9. Provision to the effect that the Parties will immediately advise the Security Council fully concerning measures taken under articles 5 and 6. (Rio, Art. 5; Brussels, Art. V).

10. Provision for consultation (a) in the event of a threat to the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or the political independence of a Party, (b) in the event of an armed attack against a Party outside the area delineated in article 7, (c) if the security of any Party should be affected by an armed attack against a nation not a party to the Treaty, or (d) in the event of any other fact or situation which might constitute a threat to the peace. (Rio, Art. 6; Brussels, Art. VII, Par. 2).

11. A statement that none of the provisions of the Treaty shall be construed as impairing the rights and obligations of the Parties under the Charter. (Rio, Art. 10; Brussels, Art. V).

12. Provision for establishment of agencies necessary for the effective implementation of the Treaty, including in particular Articles 4, 5 and 6, such agencies to be so organized as to be able to exercise their functions continuously. (Rio, Arts. 11 and 21; Brussels, Art. VIII). Provision that any two or more Parties might establish or maintain special machinery between themselves to facilitate the execution of the agreement.

13. Provisions covering accession, ratification and duration. (Rio, Arts. 22-25; Brussels, Arts. IX and X).

(Note: The question of including a provision for disqualification under certain circumstances of any of the signatories from enjoying the benefits of the Treaty requires further consideration.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The Washington exploratory conversations on security, in which officials of the U.K., U.S., France, Benelux and Canada have been participating, have resulted in the submission to governments of a document, dated September 9. This document represents no firm conclusions. It represents only an agreed statement on the nature of the problems discussed and the steps which might be practicable to meet them.

2. This document has been sent to the participating governments for their urgent consideration so that each government can now decide whether it is prepared to sign a North Atlantic Treaty of the kind contemplated in the document. It is hoped that governments will be able to come to a decision on this point by the time the Washington discussions resume about October 15. It is also hoped that governments by then will have given instructions to their representatives in the Washington talks on the line they should take during the second phase of the talks.

3. Presumably during this second phase, the participating governments will seek to reach agreement on (a) the states which are to be sounded out on whether they would accept an invitation to attend a conference to draft and sign a treaty; and (b) the text of the memorandum which will be sent to those governments when they are being sounded out. This memorandum would outline the provisions which the inviting governments consider suitable for inclusion in the treaty. It is possible that there may be a third phase of the talks during which the inviting governments may attempt to prepare an actual draft of a treaty to be put before the formal conference.

No timetable has been set but the hope is that a treaty will be signed either late this year or early next year and will come into force within a month or so thereafter — i.e., February to April, 1949.

4. The document of September 9 which has now been forwarded to the Canadian Government for consideration includes an annex entitled "Outline of provisions which might be suitable for inclusion in a North Atlantic Security Pact."

5. The essential feature of the proposed North Atlantic treaty is that it would create a defensive alliance of the North Atlantic states primarily directed against aggression from the Soviet Union. Each would undertake, subject to its constitutional processes, to come to the assistance of any other member of the group which has been attacked. The treaty would, in addition, encourage cooperation between the signatories in fields other than security in an effort to create and maintain a North Atlantic Community which would provide the dynamic counter-attraction to totalitarian communism — a free, prosperous and progressive society.

6. Under the treaty, agencies would be set up for its effective implementation. These agencies would, no doubt, be similar to, though not necessarily identical with, those which have been or are about to be set up by the Brussels Powers under the Brussels Treaty. From the presence of a Canadian observer at the meetings of the military organs of those powers, we know the kind of organs which would likely be created, the kind of planning which they would do and the kind of problems which they would put up to governments for consideration.

7. Thus there would probably be under the Atlantic Pact a Consultative Council of Foreign Ministers, a Council of Defence Ministers, a Chiefs of Staff Committee and a Supply Board. These would be served by a combined staff and secretariat. If the Western Union pattern is followed a supreme commander would be appointed to take over command in the event of war. Under him there would be a commander-in-chief for the army, one for the navy and one for the air force, and subsidiary commanders for designated areas. The supreme commander, his deputy and the three commanders-in-chief would constitute a commanders-in-chief committee which would plan the joint strategy.

8. The task of the North Atlantic Chiefs of Staff Committee would be to prepare recommendations to the Defence Ministers setting forth an agreed allocation of responsibilities among the allies, since, as the document of September 9 points out, "it seems necessary that, within the limits of sound military practice, the military and other measures to be taken immediately [on the outbreak of war] by each participating country should be planned and decided beforehand by the agencies established for effective implementation of the treaty."

9. It is, of course, impossible now to assess with any degree of accuracy the extent and nature of the allocation which it would be considered fair and reasonable that Canada should bear. So far as armed forces are concerned, however, the commitment by Canada would presumably be to have certain forces available on D-Day. Canada might also be expected to put its war industry into shape for increased production.

10. Increases in defence expenditure by Canada may be necessary in any event, regardless of the Atlantic Pact, because of the probability that the existing state of international tension will continue. Under the Atlantic Pact, however, the rearmament of the North Atlantic States will be the result of an agreed and coordinated plan under which resources will be pooled and where each will undertake the task which it can perform most efficiently. For the present it is impossible to go further than to say that after the Pact has been in operation for some six months or so, and unless the present international tension has sensibly diminished, the Canadian Government may be asked to authorize commitments by Canada, the cost of which would be in excess of the present level of defence expenditures. These costs would be for the purpose of maintaining our own armed forces and our industrial machine in a state of readiness and, possibly, for assisting in the rearming of the Western European countries.

11. In favour of the project, it can be argued that, if a pact along the lines contemplated by it had existed in the later 1930's, there would have been no war in 1939. Consideration of the horrors that the world might have avoided sharply underlines the enormous importance of the project. If a pact of this nature would have deterred Hitler, it would certainly be likely to deter Stalin. Hitler was a fanatic with a mission, unable to bide his time, but the Marxists are under no such dictates of urgency, since their very ideology requires them to refrain at a given time from taking any action which might prejudice the eventual overthrow of capitalism.

12. One of the greatest advantages which the creation of the North Atlantic security system would bring would be the attainment of continuing certainty about the long-term position of the United States as a partner in a North Atlantic security system. This alone would seem to far outweigh whatever new risks might conceivably arise from the conclusion of the pact.

13. The project for a North Atlantic Treaty, as set forth in the document of September 9, would appear to meet the objectives of Canadian policy as set forth during 1948 by the Canadian Government. By the membership of the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Benelux, it would provide the basis for the organization of an overwhelming preponderance of force — military, economic and moral — over the Soviet Union and a sufficient degree of unity to ensure that this preponderance of force may be so used as to guarantee that the free nations will not be defeated one by one. It is based on the concept that the Western European countries are our allies whose assistance we need in order to defend ourselves. It carries out the principle of a pooling of risks, of resources and of combined control over policy. It establishes a constitutional basis for a devolution of power in peace and war from the Grand Alliance to its organs and agents, as compared with the arrogation of power by the Big Two or the Big Three in the last war. It creates a new international institution which will have within itself possibilities of growth and of adaptation to changing conditions. The North Atlantic Community is today a real commonwealth of nations which share the same democratic and cultural traditions. If a movement towards its political and economic unification can be started this year, no one can forecast the extent of the unity which may exist five, ten or fifteen years from now.

14. It is therefore recommended that the Canadian Government inform the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg that it is ready to enter into a treaty with those countries and such other countries as may be agreed upon, along the general lines of the annex to the document of September 9, 1948.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY

22. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that the Washington exploratory conversations on security (upon the progress of which reports had been made to the Cabinet from time to time) had now resulted in the submission of a document describing the nature of the problems discussed and the steps which might be practicable to meet them.

This document had been sent to participating governments (the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Benelux and Canada) for their urgent consideration so that each could now decide whether it were prepared to sign a North Atlantic Treaty of the kind described therein. It was hoped that decisions on this point could be made by the time the Washington conversations resumed about the middle of this month, and that by then governments would have instructed their representatives on the lines they should take.

23. Mr. Pearson read a memorandum describing the contents of the document referred to and the procedure proposed for the next phase of discussions.

During this second phase, agreement would be sought on the states to be invited to attend a conference to draft and sign a treaty and on the text of a memorandum to be sent to such governments outlining the provisions of the treaty. It might be that a third stage would be necessary when an actual draft treaty would be put before a formal conference. It was hoped that the treaty would be signed later this year, or early in 1949.

The document submitted to the participating governments included an "outline of Provisions which might be suitable for inclusion in a North Atlantic Security Pact." The essential feature of the proposal was the creation of a defensive alliance of North Atlantic states under which each (subject to its constitutional processes) would come to the assistance of any other which had been attacked. Cooperation between the signatories in fields other than defence would be encouraged. The object was the creation and maintenance of a North Atlantic community as a dynamic counter-attraction to totalitarian communism.

Under such a treaty, agencies would be set up probably similar to those established by the Brussels Powers under Western Union — Councils of Foreign Ministers and Defence Ministers, a Chiefs of Staff Committee, and Supply Board served by a Combined Staff and a Secretariat. Presumably similar command arrangements would also be involved and agreed allocations of responsibilities would be made upon combined military advice.

It was, of course, impossible now to assess accurately the extent and nature of Canada's obligations under such arrangements. It might be assumed, however, that these would involve military and supply commitments requiring increases in defence expenditures (which might, in any event, be necessary in a continuing state of international tension).

In favour of these important proposals, it might be argued that, had such arrangements then existed, they might have prevented war in 1939. And the greatest advantage of creating a North Atlantic security system would be the continuing certainty of participation by the United States.

The project set forth in the document submitted to the government appeared to meet the objectives of Canadian policy as set forth during 1948 by members of the government. It would provide the basis for the organization of an overwhelming preponderance of force which would ensure that the free nations could not be defeated one by one. It was based on the concept that the Western European countries were our allies and it carried out the principle of a pooling of risks and resources and a combined control of policy. It would have the advantage of providing for a devolution of power in peace and war from the alliance to its organs and agents as compared with the arrogation of power by the Big Two or the Big Three in the last war. It would create a new international institution having within it the possibility of growth and adaptation to changing conditions.

Copies of an explanatory memorandum were circulated for the purpose of discussion and then returned to the Secretary.

(External Affairs memorandum, Oct. 4, 1948 — Cabinet Document 754).

24. The Acting Prime Minister observed that the proposals submitted represented the logical development of the policies which the government had advocated, particularly over recent months. In effect, they followed as a natural consequence, the statement made by the Prime Minister in Parliament on March 17th with the approval of the Cabinet, in which the government had welcomed the conclusion of the Brussels Treaty.

(Unrevised Hansard, Mar. 17, 1948 — p. 2303).

Furthermore, these proposals were in line with U.S. policies concerning the economic recovery of Western Europe, in which Canada was intimately concerned. Canadian participation in a North Atlantic treaty of the kind proposed would no doubt encounter opposition from extremists on both sides. It was nonetheless the proper policy for Canada and it would require extensive and careful explanation to the Canadian people.

25. Mr. Pearson said that the U.S. officials engaged in the Washington discussions had taken great care to consult opposition leaders in Congress. They felt confident, as a result, of strong Congressional support and that they could rely upon the Vandenburg Resolution as authority for U.S. participation.

French representatives had been apprehensive lest these long-range plans prejudice their chances of immediate material assistance from the United States. They were also worried about the possible provocative effect on the Soviet Union. However, French authorities now appreciated that their participation was in fact a condition precedent to emergency assistance and they were inclined to accept the general feeling that the alliance might be less a provocation than a deterrent to the U.S.S.R.

U.S. officials were anxious that at least Iceland, Portugal and Norway would agree to come in, and possibly Ireland.

26. The Minister of National Defence referred to the military implications of Canada's adherence to a North Atlantic treaty to which reference was made in the memorandum submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In this connection it was to be noted that Canada could not have armed forces in peacetime much beyond the size of present establishments. The current recruiting campaign was an evidence of this. Compulsory service in peacetime was not favoured by the Chiefs of Staff; it would be costly and impractical. Consequently the numbers of men which could be sent to Europe for training would be small.

The possible implications as regards equipment were very important. Industrial preparations would be required and these would be helpful. If it were possible for us, in return for U.S. types, to release present U.K. types of weapons and supplies for use by European allies, this would be of mutual advantage from both the military and economic points of view.

27. The Minister of Finance suggested that the obligations of Canada under such arrangements would make it necessary to re-examine carefully the nature as well as the extent of Canadian defence expenditures in order that the Canadian contribution would be the most effective and suitable to our resources and circumstances.

28. Mr. Pearson said that, throughout the Washington discussions, the U.S. representatives had insisted upon the necessity of control by the United States of the nature and extent of their contribution to such security arrangements as were contemplated. The same position had been taken by Canada, so that the Canadian government would be in a position to exercise control over the character and nature of any Canadian contribution.

29. Mr. St. Laurent observed that the obligations contemplated by the proposed North Atlantic Treaty would not differ fundamentally from those which Canada had already accepted in a wider framework under the Charter of the United Nations. In present circumstances, however, they were more likely to have more realistic results.

30. The Cabinet, after further considerable discussion, agreed that the governments of the United Kingdom, United States, France, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg be informed that the Canadian government were ready to enter into a treaty with those countries and such other countries as might be agreed on the general lines of the proposals contained in the document submitted and that Canadian representatives to the Washington discussions be so instructed.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Before the next phase of the Washington security discussions opens, it will be necessary for the Canadian representatives to have instructions from the Canadian Government on the following questions:

- (1) The nature of the pledge of mutual assistance in the treaty.
- (2) The territorial scope of the treaty and the suggestion that there might be various types of membership.
- (3) The area within which aggression against any member state would bring the provisions for mutual assistance into operation.
- (4) The terms on which members might be deprived of the benefits of the pact by reason of a fall from grace.

The nature of the pledge

2. The United States representatives in the discussions have suggested a pledge as close as possible to the Rio pledge, the European representatives a pledge as close as possible to the Brussels Treaty pledge. The texts worked out in Washington are as follows:

A—Based on Rio:

“An armed attack by any State against a Party shall be considered as an attack against all the Parties and, consequently, each Party undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.”

B—Based on Brussels.

“If any Party should be the object of an armed attack in the area covered by the Treaty, the other Parties will, in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter, afford the Party so attacked all the military and other aid and assistance in their power.”

C—Compromise.

“Provision that each Party should agree that any act which, in its opinion, constituted an armed attack against any other Party in the area covered by the treaty be considered an attack against itself, and should consequently, in accordance with its constitutional processes, assist in repelling the attack by all military, economic and other means in its power in the exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter.”

3. Clearly the firmer the pledge, the greater is the possibility that the treaty will deter Russia and restore in Western Europe the confidence which is necessary both for Western European economic reconstruction and for Western European rearmament.

4. It is therefore recommended that the Canadian representatives use their best efforts to secure a pledge as close as possible to the Brussels pledge.

Territorial scope

5. Chapter II of the Washington paper<sup>98</sup> deals with the possible territorial scope of the Treaty. The whole of the chapter deserves close study and no useful purpose would be served by trying to summarize it.

6. The first question is whether, if countries such as Norway, Denmark, Portugal, Iceland and Ireland are not willing to assume the responsibilities of full membership, they might be invited to become second-class members with more limited commitments.

7. There would be certain advantages in Portugal being a second-class member. It is generally agreed that the Treaty should be more than a negative anti-Comintern pact; that it should affirm the dynamic positive values of Western Christendom which are the common heritage of all free peoples — “the principles of democracy, personal freedom and political liberty,” as the preamble of the Brussels Treaty puts it. The present regime in Portugal can scarcely be said to be based on these principles. To include Portugal as a first-class member would therefore be to lessen the moral effect of the treaty, and what we are interested in is increasing to the greatest possible extent the total moral strength as well as the total military and economic strength of the North Atlantic Community. On the other hand, the cooperation of Portugal in providing bases in the Azores and elsewhere is essential for strategic reasons.

<sup>98</sup> Se rapporte à la pièce jointe du document 398.
Refers to the enclosure, Document 398.

8. It is therefore recommended that the Canadian representatives support some formula which would ensure the necessary degree of military cooperation from Portugal but which would not result in Portugal becoming a first-class member so long as its regime is not based on the Western European principles of democracy, personal freedom and political liberty.

9. So far as the other potential second-class members are concerned, it is hard to see that they would be more willing to be second-class members than first-class members.

10. Iceland, for example, as a second-class member, would be required to put facilities in Iceland at the disposal of the North Atlantic Community in peace and in war, since otherwise Iceland's membership would be of no value to the Community. Iceland, as a first-class member, would scarcely be expected to do much, if anything, more.

11. The opposition in Iceland to Iceland becoming a second-class member is likely to be just about as great as the opposition in Iceland to Iceland becoming a first-class member. Membership of any kind would commit Iceland to membership in an anti-Soviet alliance and would therefore be opposed by Icelandic communists and fellow-travellers and be repugnant to Icelandic parochialists.

12. The volume of public support in Canada for full Canadian membership in the North Atlantic Community would be greater if as many as possible of the other North Atlantic nations which are not great powers also became full members. If only the U.K., the U.S., France, Benelux and Canada become full members, some Canadians may ask why Canada should make greater commitments than Norway, Denmark, Iceland and Ireland, which are more directly menaced by Russia than we.

13. On the other hand, it is essential to Canadian security that the other keepers of the North Atlantic Bridge be united with us in an alliance against Russia.

14. It is therefore recommended that the Canadian representatives should (a) oppose giving Norway, Denmark, Iceland and Ireland any indication that there is a possibility that they could become second-class members of the alliance with limited commitments; and (b) oppose any discussion in advance of the possibility of their being offered second-class membership if they turn down first-class membership (since news of this may leak to these countries and encourage them to refuse first-class membership).

15. If any one of these countries refuses first-class membership, the inviting governments could consult on what they should then do to ensure the granting of necessary facilities in the country or countries concerned.

16. So far as Italy is concerned, it is recommended that the Canadian representatives oppose the issuance of an invitation to Italy to become either a first-class or a second-class member. Italy is not a North Atlantic nation and, if Italy is invited, why not Greece or Turkey? If Greece or Turkey, why not Egypt? A line has to be drawn somewhere and there is logic in confining a North Atlantic Treaty to countries which border on the North Atlantic.

17. The case of Italy and of other countries, the maintenance of whose territorial or political integrity is of direct concern to the North Atlantic nations, can be met by a provision in the treaty under which the North Atlantic Community may, on conditions agreed on by the member nations, extend the pledge of guarantee in the Treaty to any state whose defence is vital to the defence of the Atlantic Community.

The area to be covered by the provisions for mutual assistance

18. The pledge in the Brussels Treaty comes into operation if any one of the signatories is "the object of an armed attack in Europe." The geographical region to which the Rio Treaty refers is precisely defined in Article 4 of the Treaty.

19. It is recommended that the Canadian representatives support a formula under which the pledge in the North Atlantic Treaty would come into operation if any one of the signatories is the object of an armed attack in Europe, in North America, or in the North Atlantic. North America would be defined to include Canada, the continental United States and Alaska.

Disqualification of signatories from enjoying the benefits of the Treaty

20. The concluding note of the Annex to the Washington paper reads as follows: "The question of including a provision for disqualification under certain circumstances of any of the signatories from enjoying the benefits of the Treaty requires further consideration."

21. Presumably the "certain circumstances" include the coming into power of a communist-dominated government.

22. Perhaps the only workable formula for disqualifying a member would be that a member could be expelled or suspended by a unanimous vote of all the other members.

23. It is recommended that the Canadian representatives might put this suggestion forward tentatively and report to the Canadian Government on the reactions of the other representatives to it.

NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY PACT

At the meeting of the Cabinet Defence Committee on October 8th, the Minister of National Defence reported that the Cabinet, at their meeting of October 6th, had agreed that the Canadian government were prepared to work toward the conclusion of a treaty along the lines worked out in preliminary conversations in Washington.

The Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that consideration was now being given to the detailed implications of a North Atlantic pact.

In Mr. Wrong's view, it was likely that a conference of participating countries would be held in December, though this depended on political developments in the United States. It was intended that the Washington conferences at the diplomatic level be resumed as soon as possible after the presidential election.

It was of interest to note that, according to information recently received from Washington, the United States were prepared to equip three French divisions from present stocks. Mr. Schumann had been advised of this development.

In general it appeared that Messrs. Dewey,<sup>99</sup> Vandenberg and Dulles had been kept informed of developments, though the full implications of a North Atlantic Security Pact were perhaps not fully appreciated in that quarter.

The Committee noted these remarks.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

Just before Mr. Pearson left for his constituency, I prepared for him the attached draft, dated October 7, of a memorandum setting forth the nature of the instructions which might be given to the Canadian delegation when the talks on the North Atlantic Treaty are resumed.

2. Mr. Pearson did not have time to read this document before he left, but he asked me to send it to you and to Mr. [N.A.] Robertson so that you might both be able to telegraph me your suggestions for revision.

3. I wish that I had found it possible to do a more carefully considered draft memorandum on this subject but the pressure has been pretty great during the last few weeks. Please consider the attached draft, therefore, as a very hastily prepared tentative first draft.

4. Mr. Pearson is hoping to be back in Ottawa a week from now — Saturday, October 16, and Sunday, October 17. I would like, if at all possible, to have a new draft of the memorandum ready for him when he gets back. It seems to me that it would be desirable if we could get this memorandum cleared as soon as possible. You would then be able, if you thought it wise, to pass on to the other participants in the Washington discussions some of the ideas contained in our instructions.

5. I do not know how far you will agree with paragraphs 7 and 8 which have to do with Portuguese membership. I am strengthened, however, in my belief in the general line taken in these paragraphs by some things I have read lately about the importance attached by the chief Western military strategists to the launching of an ideological counter-offensive by the Western powers as soon as possible, if war is to be prevented. They feel that such an offensive ought to make it possible for us to create confusion, uncertainty and mistrust, if not in Russia itself, then among its satellites. They feel that the successful conduct of this method of cold warfare depends upon the creation of a positive and united ideology which can be effectively opposed to the creed of communism.

Dear Norman [Robertson],

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

You may remember that when you were in Ottawa we had a talk about the Departmental memorandum of June 1 setting forth the reasons why, from Canada's point of view, a treaty would be much better than a Presidential or Congressional declaration. You said to me that there was one argument which we had left out of our memorandum of June 1 and that was that the establishment of a North Atlantic Union under a treaty would mean that in another war the organs of the alliance could be created by the alliance as a whole and could derive their authority from the alliance.

You may have noted that, as a result of this remark of yours, Mr. Pearson developed your point in his speech at Kingston on September 21. I attach the relevant passage of this speech.†

We also put it in the memorandum to Cabinet of October 4 which has been sent to you.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

You might wish to inform the Cabinet<sup>100</sup> that, in accordance with the decision reached at the Cabinet meeting on October 6, Mr. Wrong will deliver either today or tomorrow to Mr. Lovett or Mr. Hickerson of the State Department the following "oral message":

"The Canadian Government has considered the proposals set forth in the paper prepared in Washington as a result of the discussions during July, August and September between the Under-Secretary of State of the United States and the Ambassadors of the United Kingdom, France, the Benelux countries and Canada, and is ready to enter into a treaty with these countries, and such other countries as might be agreed, on the general lines of the annex to this paper."

2. Mr. Wrong will consult with the State Department on whether the other parties to the Washington discussions should be informed direct by him or through the State Department. Mr. Wrong thinks it might be best if they are informed through the State Department since, as the time for a conference approaches, the State Department will undoubtedly become the repository of the views of the governments concerned and will assume the responsibility of keeping the other participating governments informed of what is going on.

3. I have informed our representatives in London, Paris, The Hague and Brussels that Mr. Wrong is delivering the "oral message" to the Department of State. I have marked the communication to these representatives for their personal information only. It seems to me, however, essential to inform them since otherwise they would be embarrassed if they learn of the Canadian Government's decision through the governments to which they are accredited instead of from us.

I shall have a number of comments to offer, but I cannot let you have them by this weekend. There is no great hurry about preparing our observations, and I doubt that we should communicate them to other Governments until we know more of the reception of the proposals in European countries.

2. There are some points in your draft with which I am not wholly in agreement, some which require expansion, and some omissions. In particular, our views should be expanded on the question of the area to be covered (your paragraphs 18 and 19). One cannot reach a final judgment until we know what countries are ready to participate, but we should give thought to the position of the parties in the event of

3. Your draft says nothing about the duration of the treaty, a point not covered in the paper. I know that Dulles would favour a short term, probably five years. I am also uncertain whether something should go in the Agreement to make provision for consultation and a common policy in the event of civil war or prolonged civil disturbances in one of the parties not caused by indirect aggression from outside.

Dear Hume [Wrong],

I have tried my hand at doing a draft memorandum for the Minister on "The North Atlantic Treaty and the Canadian Armed Forces Programmes."<sup>103</sup> As you will see from the memorandum, I am worried about two things. The first is that the democracies may be going to make the same mistake they made from 1936-39, and especially from September 1938 to September 1939 — the mistake of not rearming as quickly as the enemy. The second worry is that some of the members of the Cabinet may not be sufficiently aware of the probable scale of defence expenditures to which we are likely to be committed in the course of the next eighteen months or so.

2. I think, therefore, that it would be useful if I could put a memorandum up to the Minister before he leaves for Paris. It would be for him to decide whether he

[Washington], October 23, 1948

SUGGESTIONS FOR CANADIAN COMMENTS ON THE PAPER DATED SEPTEMBER 9TH, 1948, RESULTING FROM THE WASHINGTON
EXPLORATORY TALKS ON SECURITY

1. The comments of the Canadian Government should probably be in a form suitable for circulation to the other representatives, either before the talks are resumed or at the time of their resumption; they should also serve as instructions for the Canadian representative during the next phase of the talks.

2. The comments should allow a measure of leeway. On questions on which there were differences during last summer's talks, they should set out not only the best solutions from the Canadian point of view but also the limits of negotiation that would be acceptable. We should not be in the position of advocating the better solution to the point that it becomes the enemy of the good solution.

3. Procedure

It would be advisable to include some suggestions on procedure from this stage onwards. The time-table must be left mainly in the hands of the State Department, because domestic politics in the U.S. provide the dominant considerations. I suggest (a) a further series of "informal and non-committal" meetings to consider comments from governments, and possibly to prepare a draft treaty; (b) a quick reference to governments; (c) a sounding of other governments the participation or association of which is desired, probably best done by the U.S. and U.K. (and perhaps France) in the name of the group; (d) a diplomatic conference for final drafting and signature. The conference might be held in one of the smaller countries unless the U.S. is ready to act as host. While its locus is hardly part of a comment on the paper, it would be useful to know fairly soon whether the Canadian Government would be willing to act as host if this seemed the most acceptable course.

4. The Nature of the Pledge in the Treaty

Commenting on paras. 2 to 4 of Mr. Reid's draft of October 7th, I have been myself inclined to consider the differences between the three suggestions in para. 5 of the Annex to the paper of September 9th as not very important. The U.S. will not agree to the Brussels Treaty language, and we shall probably have to accept the Rio formula. I think the Brussels Treaty language might be interpreted as dictating strategy in the event of war — e.g., as requiring the parties to conduct the war so as to relieve or liberate any party who had been attacked, as directly and rapidly as possible. The language should bear the construction that the obligation is to do what each party can to defeat the enemy by the most efficacious means (arrived at in concert) — even if it involves temporary abandonment of another party. No party should have a right to demand a second, third, or fourth front to relieve its own immediate tribulations.

5. Territorial Scope

Mr. Reid's draft uses the phrase "second-class member" for those not willing to assume the full responsibilities. I should avoid this. If Iceland promises facilities, she has offered all the other parties need. They might prefer Norway to be a friendly non-belligerent rather than an active ally — if the enemy left Norway alone. Portugal (with Spain still in the lazaretto) would almost certainly rather tie herself to the parties in some special way. Ireland might be bullied into joining (and the Irish are a martial race), but some indirect form of association may be the best solution in the long run. Portugal, Ireland, and Iceland are not exposed to the danger of direct attack at the outset of war with Russia, and are in a position to bargain. Let us bargain, if necessary, the promise of defence by a powerful alliance against the grant of facilities. It is the facilities that the other parties want in these cases. If we object to Portuguese ways (Mr. Reid's paras. 7 and 8) and cite them as a reason for not asking Portugal to join, we probably insult the Portuguese and make them sticky about facilities in the Azores which we need. I think that on balance it would be better to leave it to them to back out. They will do so, I believe.

Our purpose throughout must be to get what we need from these small countries — and the outcome may show a variety of association. I doubt that diversity of obligation (cf. Mr. Reid's para. 12) would have a serious effect on Canadian opinion. Effective association should be the aim, and uniformity of obligation is not essential to this end.

6. The Case of Italy

It will not do to write Italy off as outside the scope of the agreement, and it is possible (though not now desirable in my judgment) to include Italy while logically excluding the countries of the Eastern Mediterranean. The Western World will be at war if Italy is attacked by Russia; therefore an attack on Italy would in fact turn out to be a casus foederis under a North Atlantic Agreement, whether Italy were associated with the Agreement or not. Guarantees are to be avoided as unacceptable to the United States — and, I believe, to Canada. They have no element of mutuality in them. But Italy must be hitched up in some way — or so the U.S. representatives have argued. I think a special association should be envisaged, permitting Italy to stay neutral (or non-belligerent) unless attacked, on the lines of the British proposal for Sweden (cf. my letter of October 18th).†

7. Area in Which the Casus Foederis Will Operate

This is a very difficult problem, to which we can get no answer without knowing what the other North Atlantic countries will do. There are grave arguments against agreeing that a "safety zone" should be created, within the geographical limits of which any act of aggression would mean war with all the parties to the treaty. Such a proposal would give all the other countries within the zone a very good reason for doing nothing in the way of "mutual aid and self-help" (as demanded by the Vandenberg Resolution); they would be assured of very powerful allies without sticking out their necks — or undertaking to furnish facilities. If the casus foederis, on the other hand, were limited to attacks on the parties, the effect would be to make it appear not so very risky to attack (or conduct indirect aggression against) a non-party — such as Sweden. If we want all the countries in the area, the defense of which we consider essential, to join in one way or another, we shall probably have to limit the casus foederis to attacks on parties, whether full-time, dues-paying, members or those tied up in one way or another. The bait for Scandinavia, Ireland, Portugal is that they get a promise of powerful allies if they are put on the spot. To give them the promise without asking them to run risks is to throw away the bait. We should leave this issue open until soundings have been taken — but should be ready to be tough and to make the Swedes or the Irish feel very naked and exposed when we want to do so.

There are other difficulties about the area to be covered. We must insist on the inclusion of Alaska and Northern Canada. Yet if we talk of geographical zones in a North Atlantic Agreement, what about our own Pacific Coast? The Hawaiian Islands may in a short time be a State of the United States — should they be covered? (This last query should not be raised by us, in my view.) The point is that we must not be picky about Europe, when we have a much larger territory to worry about — even if ours is a good deal safer at present. If we go in for zones, cannot the Europeans argue for a zone excluding territory to the west of the Mississippi and Hudson Bay?

8. Disqualifications

I have played with the idea of an experiment in weighted voting for expulsion of members, and have rejected it as complicating what should be a straightforward treaty of not more than 10 or 12 articles. I think we might accept a two-thirds vote of the parties for expulsion — in case any party goes too far left for our taste — but one cannot be sure until one knows how many parties there will be.

9. Duration of Pact

I believe that we shall not get the agreement of the United States to a long-term initial engagement — and therefore should not press very hard for it. Ten years initially is what I should like, renewable automatically for five or ten years if not denounced. On demand of any two parties, a conference looking to revision should be held at the end of the firm period; and denunciation by any party should likewise bring about a conference. We shall never get as long a term as 25 years. This question must be judged in the light of the strong sentiment in the U.S. in favour of European federation. A lot of intelligent people, such as Senator Vandenberg, J.F. Dulles, George Kennan, probably Governor Dewey, certainly a number of Members of Congress, would regard a North Atlantic Agreement as a temporary encouragement towards European unification. We may look at it differently in Canada — but our main purpose is to tie the U.S. in to underwriting European security for as long as we can. Let us be very flexible about the term. From our point of view, also, what long-term obligations we should assume in Canada depend on what results from the Brussels Treaty and O.E.E.C.

10. What Happens in the Event of Civil War in any Party?

It may be that para. 10(d) of the Annex covers the position adequately. "Indirect aggression" (let us not seek to define it) is covered by 10(a), as we now envisage the risk. The treaty should require consultation when any party gets to the point of extensive internal fighting, whether or not outside prompting (from Russia) is apparent.

11. General Political Objectives

We should regard the negotiations as looking towards (a) the creation of an effective defensive alliance between the countries bordering on the North Atlantic; (b) the development of joint agencies of recommendation, and in the event of war of military decision, which will bind the United States to the democracies of Western Europe and ourselves, and serve to encourage the public acceptance of the community of interests between the parties; and (c) the integration of the Western European countries for purposes of defence, so that at worst they will be in the same boat, if war comes, from the first, and at best provide so firm a front that the risks of Soviet attack will be obviously too great to be run. The general effect should be to make it evident to the Russians, as well as to doubters at home, that nothing more will be surrendered to Soviet pressures and demands.

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. PICKERSGILL

I enclose a copy of a memorandum of October 26, which I have put before Mr. Pearson, on the subject of "The North Atlantic Treaty and the Canadian Armed Forces Programmes".

2. I submitted this memorandum to Mr. Pearson under a covering note which reads in part as follows:

"I attach a memorandum of October 26, which I have done "The North Atlantic Treaty and the Canadian Armed Forces Programmes". This memorandum was occasioned by my worry that the western world may be entering the same sort of period as it entered in 1936 or in September 1938 — a period during which our foreign policy was based on the mistaken belief that time was on our side.

The memorandum also deals with the question which Mr. St. Laurent raised in Cabinet Defence Committee on October 8 and which has not been satisfactorily answered. Mr. St. Laurent believes that Canada should make the most effective contribution possible to the strengthening of the North Atlantic alliance. He doubts whether we would be making the most effective contribution if we build up a "balanced" force.

You will note that I have included, in paragraph 6, the latest information available on the percentages of national income which are being devoted to preparations for war by the Soviet states and by the Western states. These statistics were secured by J.I.B.

The figure for Canada for 1947 is 1.8 percent of the national income. The figure for the fiscal year 1948-49 will be almost exactly 2 percent ($240 million out of a national income of $12 billion). It would look as if the figure for next year would be between 3 percent and 4 percent."

3. I discussed with Mr. Pearson the advisability of sending the memorandum, at this stage, to Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Claxton and Mr. Abbott. Mr. Pearson felt that it might be as well to defer sending the memorandum to them for some weeks, and has asked me to keep in touch with Mr. Heeney and yourself on this question.

4. Perhaps, therefore, you will be good enough to let me know when you think the time has come when this document might be distributed. I will then consult Mr. Pearson by telegram.

5. I am sending a similar memorandum to Mr. Heeney.

THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY AND THE CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PROGRAMME

The Chiefs of Staff, in presenting their briefs at the Cabinet Defence Committee on October 8, based their argument for increased appropriations for defence on the necessity of Canada taking steps now which would help to ensure that its armed forces were in a state of readiness if war should break out in the near future. They made almost no mention of a second consideration which seems to me to be even more important. This consideration is that the creation, as soon as possible, of an overwhelming preponderance of force on the side of the Western world would serve to lessen the possibility of war breaking out. For this purpose, what is essential is force in being, not potential force. It is particularly important that the forces in being of the Western powers in Western Europe should be strengthened. Until the Western powers are in a position to hold the Rhine line, the Russians are encouraged to take risks of precipitating an incident which might lead to war. From my reading of the papers prepared by the military organs of the Brussels powers, it is this second consideration which is paramount in their minds.

2. It would be completely unrealistic to argue that any conceivable increase in the strength of the Canadian armed forces or any conceivable assistance by Canada in re-equipping the armed forces of Western Europe would do much to redress the present disparity of striking forces on the continent of Europe. The only way in which the disparity can be redressed quickly is by action by the United States. However, I assume that we may reasonably expect the United States to take the same line with us over Canadian assistance in the rearming of Western Europe as Mr. Hoffman<sup>105</sup> recently took with Mr. Abbott over Canadian assistance in the economic reconstruction of Western Europe. Thus we can expect spokesmen for the United States Administration to argue that they would be greatly assisted in getting larger defence appropriations from Congress if they could tell Congress that countries like Canada are bearing their fair share of the load.

3. If this argument is sound, an increase in Canadian defence expenditures might be of some considerable assistance in hastening the creation of an overwhelming preponderance of force against the Soviet Union and in redressing the present dangerous disparity between the strength in Western Europe of the striking forces of the Western powers and those of the Soviet Union.

4. It seems to me that the general international political policy on which all the Western powers are agreed is that we must all do everything we can to diminish the possibility that the Russians may precipitate a war in the next two years or so. The assumption on which this policy is based is that two years from now the Western world will be relatively stronger vis-à-vis Russia than it is today. However, that assumption will, of course, be valid only if the Western powers make better use of the next two years than the Soviet Union. I am very apprehensive that this may not happen.

5. My apprehensions stem from the fact that, in peace time, democracies find it more difficult than do dictatorships to divert men and resources from production for civilian consumption to production for defence purposes. These apprehensions are not lessened by the latest statistics which are available on the percentages of national income which are being devoted to preparations for war by the Soviet states and by the Western states.

6. In 1947 (the latest year for which statistics are available) the percentage of national income allocated for military purposes was:

U.S.S.R.	15.5
Yugoslavia	10.2
Czechoslovakia	4.8
United Kingdom	9.7
United States	5.3
France	7.5
Netherlands	10.2
Sweden	3.6
Belgium	2.6

Paul G. Hoffman, Administrator, Economic Cooperation Administration of United States.

Norway	2.7
Denmark	1.8
Canada	1.8

7. If these estimates are anywhere near correct, it would look as if the expenditures on defence of the Western powers, taken as a whole, will have to be increased during the next two years if the Western world is not to run a grave danger of finding itself, at the end of two years, in a relatively weaker position vis-à-vis the Soviet Union than it is today.

8. Once the North Atlantic alliance has been consummated, representatives of the Canadian Government will be sitting down with representatives of the other North Atlantic countries in an effort to work out an agreed equitable distribution of responsibilities in rearmament. I suppose that the problem will first be discussed by the North Atlantic Chiefs-of-Staff Committee, who will report to the North Atlantic Council of Defence Ministers, and that the problem will then go to a meeting of North Atlantic Finance Ministers and perhaps to a Consultative Council of Foreign Ministers.

9. I do not suggest that in these discussions anyone would be so naive as to propose that the members of the alliance should each devote exactly the same proportion of their national income to defence purposes. This would be as absurd as proposing that the citizens of Nova Scotia should contribute the same proportion of their total income to the federal budget of Canada as the citizens of Ontario, in which the per capita income is much higher.

10. However, I think it is reasonable to assume that in a North Atlantic alliance, based upon the principles of the pooling of resources, of risks and of control over policy, there will be some narrowing of the present disparities between the proportions of national resources in men and materials which each of the allies contributes to the common defence.

11. Therefore, if it is considered reasonable that, say, 10% of the total national income of all the North Atlantic powers, taken as a whole, is to be devoted to defence, I should think that an agreed allocation of responsibilities among the members of the alliance might result in the proportions ranging between, say, 6% and 12%.

12. Defence, in this context, would mean not merely expenditures on our own national armed forces and defence facilities but also assistance in the re-equipment of the armed forces of Western Europe. It could also properly include such expenditures as are necessary to build up Canada as an arsenal of democracy, as, for example, expenditures necessary for the expansion of our steel industry.

13. It would seem to me, therefore, that some months after the North Atlantic Treaty has come into effect the Canadian Government may well be faced with two important questions:

(a) How great and how rapidly does it think the rearmament of the North Atlantic Community, as a whole, should proceed — i.e., how big an insurance premium should the North Atlantic Community pay each year?

(b) Approximately what proportion of Canada's national income does it think reasonable to put into the common defence pool — i.e., how big should Canada's share be of that annual collective insurance premium?

14. Some of the considerations on which the answer to the first question would be based will emerge from the discussions of the North Atlantic Chiefs-of-Staff Committee. Indeed, they are already emerging as a result of the studies being made by the military organs of the Brussels powers. These organs are attempting to estimate (a) the strength of the forces which Russia could throw into an invasion of Western Europe, and (b) the strength of the forces necessary to hold them east of the Rhine, on the Rhine, or further west. It looks as if these studies will demonstrate that the problem is of about the following magnitude: if the Western powers are to be in a position to hold the Russians east of the Rhine, they will require something like three times the forces which they now have in being in Western Europe. On the basis of some such conclusion, it would be possible for the experts to work out the scale of rearmament required to ensure that these forces are available a year or two years from now, whatever may be decided upon.

15. In addition to the two questions set forth in paragraph 13, there is a third question. This third question would be the one to which Mr. St. Laurent alluded at the meetings of the Cabinet Defence Committee on October 8: what is the general nature of the most effective contribution which Canada can make to the common effort to rearm? Here it seems to me that the Chief of the General Staff did not fully appreciate the point which Mr. St. Laurent was making. At least he gave me the impression that he thought that this was the sort of question which could be worked out by our representatives in their consultations with the other members of the North Atlantic Chiefs-of-Staff Committee.

16. It seems to me that our Chiefs of Staff would be put in a most difficult position if they were expected to make recommendations to the Canadian Government on a matter of this kind. Each of them is a representative of one of the three branches of our armed forces and each of them would find it difficult to discuss with an open mind the possibility of his branch — whether army, navy or air — making only a very limited contribution to the common task of the defence of the North Atlantic Community. They would also find it extremely difficult to balance objectively the arguments for Canada concentrating on the production of war supplies for our Allies against the arguments for, say, a large expeditionary force.

17. It would seem to me, therefore, that what will eventually be required will be a political decision by the Cabinet made in the light of the reports which we will be receiving from our representatives on the North Atlantic Chiefs-of-Staff Committee, and on the other committees of the North Atlantic Community. The choice will be between —

(a) a "balanced" or "dispersed" programme, that is the building up of all four factors in defence — army, navy, air and defence industry; or

(b) a programme which concentrates the effort on one, two or three of these four factors.

The decision might, for example, be that the most effective assistance which Canada can render would be by concentrating on helping to re-equip the armed forces of the Western European countries and on providing a sizable Canadian air force which would be ready to take action on D-Day, and which could be expanded rapidly during the following twelve months.

Following for Reid only from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-2525 of November 1st, North Atlantic Treaty. †

I have discussed the contents of the note from the Brussels Powers and its effect on the timetable with Hickerson this morning. He is proceeding on the assumption that the next stage should be a further meeting of the Ambassadors as soon as they have received the instructions from the Brussels Permanent Commission. The State Department does not know what reservations or conditions may be attached by the Brussels Powers, and until this is known they cannot get any definite clearance from congressional leaders and from the Republican high command which would enable them to accept the project in principle. Hickerson is optimistic that no serious domestic obstacles will arise, but in the tricky atmosphere of the probable interregnum he wants to be very sure of what is to be put up to the Republicans so that it will not have to be modified later. He says that they will start their soundings very soon after the election, but that they cannot go so far as to seek a formal acceptance in principle (as Canada and the Brussels Powers have done) until the comments of the Brussels Powers have been considered.

2. He considers it most likely that, even if all goes well, Mr. Dewey would insist on the deferment of the signature of a treaty until after his inauguration. I agree with him in this.

3. From our point of view there are also advantages in keeping the next phase of the discussions under the informal and exploratory label. As I suggested in my WA-2825 of October 30th, † para. 4., the political soundings here may result in proposals for modifications or conditions which we would find it difficult to accept. Therefore, I favour our preserving the possibility of considerable manoeuvring and maintaining complete secrecy on the contents of the papers. Ends.

Dear Mr. Pearson:<sup>106</sup>

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I enclose a draft of November 6th of comments of the Canadian Government on the paper dated September 9, 1948, resulting from the Washington exploratory talks on security.

2. I had hoped to be able to have this new draft prepared before now, but my time over this week has been very badly upset by a series of difficult discussions on the reply which the Canadian Government should make to the proposals on Commonwealth consultation. Yesterday I repeated to you in Paris two telegrams to London on this subject.

3. The Democratic victory in the United States will probably speed up the timetable of negotiations for the North Atlantic Treaty. It will probably, therefore, be necessary for us to clear the Canadian Government's comments on the paper of September 9th with Cabinet, on Wednesday, November 17th.

4. I know that this gives you very little time to make your comments. However, if you could possibly let me have them by telegram by November 15th, I would be most grateful.

5. I am also giving copies of the enclosure to Mr. Claxton, Mr. Wrong, Mr. Robertson and Mr. Heeney.

6. You will notice that I have included in my revision, all the suggestions which you made to me before you left Ottawa. Thus:

(1) the reference to Portugal has been very much toned down;

(2) I put in a statement that we would have to consider very carefully whether we can guarantee any country which does not reciprocate;

(3) I have included your statement that while uniformity of obligation is not essential, it is most desirable;

(4) I have omitted the final two paragraphs of the previous draft of the memorandum which dealt with the place at which the formal conference might be held.

7. Since you will not have in front of you the previous draft of October 27th† on which you commented, it might be useful to you if I were to set forth in this letter the principal points on which you gave your opinion.

This letter was addressed to Pearson at the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations in Paris.

(1) Italy—You agreed that it would be very difficult for the Canadian Government to defend an invitation to Italy to become a member of the North Atlantic Alliance. A line has to be drawn somewhere, and there is logic in confining the North Atlantic Treaty to countries which border on the North Atlantic.

(2) Sweden and Ireland—You agreed that we should be ready to be tough and to make the Swedes and the Irish feel very naked and exposed if they are diffident about coming into the Alliance.

(3) You agreed that the Canadian Government should favour a pledge which would be as close to the Brussels pledge as the United States feels it can go.

8. You will note that a great deal of the memorandum is a paraphrase of various statements made during this year by Mr. St. Laurent and yourself. I thought, however, that it was not necessary to give references to the speeches which are being paraphrased.

9. The memorandum has been drawn up in such a way as to make it possible to circulate it to the other governments participating in the Washington talks.

Yours sincerely,

1. General Political Objectives

The Canadian Government regards the forthcoming negotiations as looking towards:

(a) the creation of an effective defensive alliance among the countries bordering on the North Atlantic, based on self-help, mutual aid, and the pooling of risks, resources and control over policy;

(b) the creation of joint agencies, which in peace-time would be agencies of recommendation and in war-time agencies of decision; these agencies would serve to encourage acceptance by the public in all the member countries of the community of interests which binds the North Atlantic Nations together in a North Atlantic Community;

(c) the integration of the defences of the North Atlantic countries in order to deter the Russians from making war, and, if war comes, to bring us victory as speedily and as cheaply as possible.

The effect of the Treaty should be to make it evident to the Russians, as well as to doubters at home, that nothing more will be surrendered to Soviet pressures and demands.

2. Spirit and Language of the North Atlantic Regional Security Pact

The Canadian Government believes that one of the chief obstacles today to the creation by the Free Nations of an overwhelming preponderance of military, economic and moral force over the Soviet states is the despair, the apathy, and the doubt which is so widespread in the Western world. The existence of this despair, apathy and doubt makes it essential that the North Atlantic democracies make a bold and imaginative move sufficient to raise in the hearts and minds and spirits of all those in the world who love freedom that confidence and faith which will restore their vigour.

3. In our opinion this means that the North Atlantic Pact must be more than a mere military alliance or a negative anti-Soviet pact; it must be the outward and visible sign of a new inward and spiritual unity and purpose in the Western world (See below, paragraphs 13-15). The institutions set up by the Treaty should have within them the possibility of growth and adaptation to changing circumstances. They should be given titles symbolic of the ultimate goal of the world order which we have in mind and of which we are building an essential foundation.

4. For this reason we suggest the use of such terms as these in the Pact:

- (1) "North Atlantic Treaty" instead of "North Atlantic Regional Security Pact";
- (2) "North Atlantic Community" for the international organization established by the treaty;<sup>107</sup>
- (3) "North Atlantic Nations" instead of "signatory states" or "contracting parties";
- (4) "Council for Collective Self-Defence" instead of "consultative council";
- (5) "North Atlantic Assembly" instead of "assembly of the organization".

5. Because the treaty should be a human and compelling document, calculated to strike the imagination of the peoples of the Free World, it is important that every effort be made to write it in simple, every-day language understandable by the ordinary man. This means that ancient forms and terms should be avoided. We would hope, for example, that the preamble could be written in the name of the people of the North Atlantic Community and not in the names of the heads of the contracting states; and that the preamble would not be couched in the "whereas" or "considering" form but be a simple, direct recital of the creed of our North Atlantic Community. We would hope, as already mentioned, that such terms as "high contracting parties" or "signatory states" can be avoided. We would hope that it may be possible to use simple, direct and crisp language.

6. It is also important that it be made clear in the Treaty that the Treaty is a treaty for peace and not a treaty for war. Its purpose is to keep the peace by deterring the aggressor. Only if it fails in this purpose does it become the basis for a coalition to wage war and make peace.

7. Agencies to be Established Under the Treaty

The only agency mentioned in the Brussels Treaty is the "Consultative Council". Under the Brussels Treaty, however, a number of other agencies have been established, among them a Chiefs-of-Staff Committee, a Commanders-in-Chief Committee and a Military Supply Board.

8. There is much to be said for this method of drafting a treaty. It allows flexibility and leaves room for growth.

9. However, if the North Atlantic Treaty follows this form, there is danger that it will create serious public disappointment in Canada and perhaps in other North Atlantic nations. The people of Canada expect a good deal of the proposed Treaty. They will feel let down — and this feeling will lessen public support for the treaty — if it does not include provisions calculated to demonstrate that the members of the new alliance are setting up effective agencies for carrying out the purposes of the Treaty.

10. Consequently the Canadian Government suggests that the Treaty should include (perhaps in an Annex) provisions setting up not only a consultative council under some such name as a "Council for Collective Self-Defence" but also

- (a) a North Atlantic Council of Defence Ministers;
- (b) a North Atlantic Chiefs-of-Staff Committee;
- (c) a North Atlantic Commanders-in-Chief Committee; and
- (d) a North Atlantic Military Supply Board.

The Treaty might also state that a Supreme Commander shall be appointed. The functions of these organs should be defined in broad terms.

11. In the view of the Canadian Government it is of the utmost importance that these agencies should be established as the result of a constitutional grant of power by the states which are members of the Alliance. The formation of the Alliance means that we shall be sharing our risks, our resources and our obligations. These obligations will be heavy. They will be borne more willingly by peoples of democratic countries if the fair sharing of obligations is accompanied by a fair sharing of control of policy in peace and in war. Otherwise, without the consent of the others, the policy of one or two or three members may increase the risks and therefore the obligations of all.

12. This does not, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, necessarily mean that every member of the North Atlantic Alliance need be represented on all levels in all organs of the Alliance. To insist on this would make some of the organs unworkable. But it does mean that every organ of the Alliance must derive its powers from a constitutional grant to it of those powers by all the North Atlantic Nations.

13. The Treaty as a Basis for an Ideological Counter-Offensive

The Canadian Government has, from the beginning of the discussions on the proposed treaty, emphasized (a) that the best guarantee of peace today is the creation and preservation by the nations of the Free World, under the leadership of the United Kingdom, the United States and France, of an overwhelming preponderance of force over the Soviet Union and its potential allies, and (b) that this force, to be overwhelming, must be moral, as well as economic and military.

14. This means that the North Atlantic Treaty should provide a basis not only for political, economic and military cooperation against Soviet threats but also for what might be called either a "spiritual mobilization" of the liberal democracies or "an ideological counter-offensive" to counter the demoralizing and insidious propaganda weapons of Soviet diplomacy. The launching by the Western powers of an ideological counter-offensive ought to make it possible for us to create confusion, uncertainty and mistrust, if not in Russia itself, then among its satellites.

15. The successful conduct of this method of "cold warfare" depends upon the creation by the Western World of a positive and united ideology which can be effectively opposed to the creed of communism. This means that the members of the North Atlantic Alliance should be bound together not merely by their common opposition to totalitarian communism but also by a common belief in the values and virtues of Western civilization, by a common concept of democracy and a positive belief in it and by a determination to make their kind of democracy work for the promotion of mutual welfare and the preservation of peace, for others as well as for themselves. These common beliefs would, no doubt, be set forth in the preamble to the North Atlantic Treaty in much the same language as they are set forth in the preamble to the Brussels Treaty — "the principles of democracy, personal freedom and political liberty, the rule of law and constitutional tradition". These beliefs should also permeate the rest of the document.

16. Original Members of the Alliance

It is unfortunate that the present regime in Portugal can scarcely be said to be based on these "principles of democracy, personal freedom and political liberty, the rule of law and constitutional tradition". Consequently the inclusion of Portugal as an original member of the Alliance would cast doubt on the good faith of the signatories when they claimed to be bound together by a common belief in these principles. This would be seized upon by Russian propagandists. The usefulness of the Treaty as a basis for an "ideological counter-offensive" would be seriously impaired.

17. The Canadian Government fully recognizes, however, the necessity of the North Atlantic nations securing defence facilities on Portuguese territory. It therefore suggests that the special case of Portugal might be met by a provision in the Treaty under which the North Atlantic Community could, on conditions agreed on by the member nations, extend the pledge of guarantee in the Treaty to any state whose defence is vital to the defence of the North Atlantic Community. Under such a provision, a bargain could be made with Portugal — Portugal would get a promise of defence by a powerful alliance and in return would grant defence facilities.

18. So far as the other possible North Atlantic members are concerned, every effort should be made to persuade them to come in as original members of the alliance. This applies to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland and Ireland.

19. It is particularly important for Canada that as many as possible of these smaller countries come into the alliance. Otherwise some Canadians may ask why

Canada should make greater commitments than other North Atlantic democracies which are more directly menaced by Russia than is Canada.

20. On the other hand, it is essential to Canadian security that the North Atlantic Alliance should secure the facilities which it needs from the Scandinavian countries, Iceland and Ireland.

21. Consequently the Canadian Government believes that every effort should be made to persuade the Scandinavian countries, Iceland and Ireland to become original members of the Alliance. If one of them refuses to come in, it will be necessary for those states which are willing to join the Alliance to consider very carefully whether the Alliance can guarantee any country which does not reciprocate. Certainly any guarantee which is given should be given only as the result of the driving of as hard a bargain as possible. The state concerned should be required to grant to the Alliance, in return for a promise of defence, the defence facilities in peace and war which the Alliance requires. Such a state would become "associated" with the Alliance though not a member of it. It would provide defence facilities and the Alliance would agree to defend those facilities.

22. So far as Italy is concerned, the Canadian Government recognizes that a Russian attack on Italy would so endanger the security of the North Atlantic countries that it would precipitate a world war. Nevertheless, the Canadian Government would find it difficult to defend an invitation to Italy to become a member of a North Atlantic Alliance. Italy is not a North Atlantic country and, if Italy is invited, why not Greece or Turkey or Mexico or Brazil? A line has to be drawn somewhere and there is logic in confining a North Atlantic Treaty to countries which border on the North Atlantic.

23. Italy might, however, be associated with the Alliance in somewhat the same way as it has been suggested Portugal might be associated, that is, under a provision in the Treaty by which the North Atlantic Community could, on conditions agreed on by the member nations, extend the pledge of guarantee in the Treaty to any state whose defence is vital to the defence of the North Atlantic Community. The conditions would include a grant by Italy of defence facilities to the Alliance in peace and in war.

24. A variety of association might emerge as a result of the working out of such a provision in the Treaty. Effective association should be the aim. Uniformity of obligation, though most desirable, is not essential to this end.

25. The Area to be Covered by the Provisions for Mutual Assistance

The pledge of mutual assistance in the Brussels Treaty comes into effect if one of the signatories is "the object of an armed attack in Europe". The pledge in the Rio Treaty comes into effect "in case of any armed attack which takes place within the region" described in the Treaty; it therefore comes into effect if a non-member state in the region is attacked.

26. There are grave arguments against the inclusion in the North Atlantic Treaty of a "safety-zone" provision similar to that in the Rio Treaty, within the geographical limits of which any act of aggression against any state would mean war with all the parties to the Treaty. Such a proposal would give all the other countries within the zone a very good reason for doing nothing in the way of "mutual aid and self-help" (as demanded by the Vandenberg Resolution); they would be assured of very powerful allies without undertaking any commitments, even a commitment to furnish facilities. On the other hand, if the casus foederis is limited to attacks on the members of the Alliance, the effect would be to make it appear not so very risky for the Soviet Union to attack (or to conduct indirect aggression against) a non-party — such as, say, Sweden.

27. Since we want all the countries in the North Atlantic area either to become members of the Alliance or to become "associated" with it in one way or another, it would appear wise to limit the casus foederis to attacks on members or associates. This issue will necessarily have to be left open until soundings have been taken of the North Atlantic countries not represented in the Washington talks. We should, however, be ready to be tough and to make the Swedes or the Irish feel very naked and exposed if they are diffident about coming into the Alliance.

28. The Nature of the Pledge

The following three possible formulas were worked out in Washington: one based on the Rio Treaty; one based on the Brussels Treaty; and one a compromise:

(A) Based on Rio:

"An armed attack by any State against a Party shall be considered as an attack against all the Parties and, consequently, each Party undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter."

(B) Based on Brussels:

"If any Party should be the object of an armed attack in the area covered by the Treaty, the other Parties will, in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the Charter, afford the Party so attacked all the military and other aid and assistance in their power."

(C) Compromise:

"Provision that each Party should agree that any act which, in its opinion, constituted an armed attack against any other Party in the area covered by the treaty be considered an attack against itself, and should consequently, in accordance with its constitutional processes, assist in repelling the attack by all military, economic and other means in its power in the exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter."

29. Clearly the firmer the pledge, the greater is the possibility that the treaty will deter Russia and restore in Western Europe the confidence which is necessary both for Western European economic reconstruction and for Western European rearmament.

30. The Canadian Government therefore favours a pledge which would be as close to the Brussels pledge as the United States feels it can go.

31. Disqualifications

The concluding note of the Annex to the Washington paper reads as follows:

"The question of including a provision for disqualification under certain circumstances of any of the signatories from enjoying the benefits of the Treaty requires further consideration."

32. Presumably the "certain circumstances" include the coming into power of a communist-dominated government.

33. Perhaps the only workable formula for disqualifying a member would be that a member could be expelled or suspended by a unanimous vote or a two-thirds vote of all the other members.

34. Duration of Treaty

The Brussels Treaty remains in force for fifty years. The Rio Treaty remains in force indefinitely but any state can denounce the Treaty and its denunciation becomes effective two years later.

35. Generally speaking, the longer the initial duration of the Treaty, the more effective it is likely to be as a weapon in psychological warfare against the Russians. The Canadian Government has, however, no fixed views on the precise period of the duration of the Treaty. It would itself be prepared to accept an initial duration of twenty-five years, renewable automatically for ten-year periods if not denounced. It believes that it would be useful to include in the Treaty a provision that, on the demand of any two parties, a conference looking to revision should be held at the end of the firm period. Denunciation by any party should likewise bring about a conference. A revisionary conference might also be held at any time at the request of half of two-thirds of the members.

36. Future Procedure

The following procedure is suggested:

(a) a further series of "informal and non-committal" meetings in Washington to consider comments from the governments and possibly to prepare a draft treaty;

(b) a reference of this draft treaty back to governments so that they may decide whether they consider it a suitable basis of discussion at a diplomatic conference;

(c) a sounding of other governments, the participation or association of which is desired; and

(d) a diplomatic conference for final drafting and signature.

In general I think your paper is written in larger language than is appropriate or required. I see no need for rhetoric in a secret working paper for circulation to Governments which, when they meet together, will have already agreed on the main objectives of a North Atlantic Regional Defence Pact. Specifically, I would cut out all the three-decker phrases (three in paragraph 2), most of the double-barrelled ones, and any remaining echoes from the Anglican prayer book.

2. I am not satisfied that a case is made out for the initial establishment of the whole apparatus of organs enumerated in paragraphs 4 and 10. I think there is more to be said for starting modestly and creating specific agencies to do specific jobs as the need for them becomes clear to the partner Governments.

3. I think the omission of any reference to the United Nations would be unfortunate and misleading. It is, I think, important at this stage at all events to keep the new organization within the framework of the United Nations, perhaps specifically linked with the Charter under Article 51. Certainly I think the impression that we were trying to sponsor an alternate world organization to the United Nations would be strengthened if we pressed the argument of paragraph 3 and proposed the use of the terms suggested in paragraph 4.

4. I find it difficult to comment on the argument of your paragraph 5 without reviving old debates which may be as fresh in your mind as they are in mine, but I fear you still have your phobia about lawyers' jargon. It is hackneyed, but it often helps precise statement; I see no point trying to work in sub-crusades for basic English and simplified spelling with the principal object of getting the countries around the North Atlantic to combine their strength for their security.

5. I agree completely with the argument of paragraphs 11 and 12.

6. I do not like paragraphs 13, 14 and 15 at all, and do not think that they belong in a document of this kind. The political and strategical implications of a North Atlantic alliance will, of course, be brought home to people everywhere through the press, the radio, and every other medium of public opinion, and are among the most immediate and valuable of the good results we should expect to get from the conclusion of an alliance. However, I think the argument of these three paragraphs could safely be left to Walter Lippman and Dorothy Thompson rather than spelled out in a communication from the Canadian Government to the other Governments taking part in the discussions.

7. In general, the argument as to who should be original members of the alliance and what their relation should be to the associated States seems to me reasonable, though the old difficulty of squaring ideological and strategic criteria for membership remains unresolved. I do not think there is any formula that can be consistently applied; we shall simply have to try to strike a balance of profit and loss in individual cases; e.g., on balance, I should think a North Atlantic alliance in present circumstances would probably be stronger without Spain than with it. As regards Sweden and Ireland I see nothing to be gained by being "tough" with either of them. I should hope that circumstances and the development of their policies would make it possible for both countries to associate themselves with a Western alliance, but I do not think there is anything to be gained by trying to compel them to come in. Ends.

Following for Reid only from Wrong, Begins: Reference my WA-2833 of November 1st.

We have been discussing with the State Department and the British Embassy the changes in the timetable for the negotiation of the North Atlantic Treaty which are now likely in view of the Democratic victory. The State Department is ready to resume at any time the informal and non-committal discussions with the Ambassadors of the other countries, and they hope that talks on this basis will be started as soon as the representatives of the Brussels Powers receive their instructions. We understand from the British Embassy that the Brussels Permanent Commission will take the matter up on November 11th with a prospect of completing the instructions in about a week. It may, therefore, be possible for Mr. Lovett and the Ambassadors here to meet again some time between November 18th and 23rd.

2. A copy of the paper of September 9th was given to the President before he left for his rest in Florida. He appears to have approved the principle, and has taken the paper with him for further study. Senator Vandenberg has also been given a copy of the paper and one will be given to Senator Connally as soon as he returns to Washington. Further soundings in Congress are planned by the State Department shortly after they receive the views of the Brussels Powers and ourselves.

3. The State Department hopes that a draft treaty might be prepared as a result of the informal discussions, and that it could be signed after a brief formal political Conference. This might take place in December, but the date would depend on the results of the next series of informal talks. We can get as yet no clear idea on the procedure contemplated to bring other Western European countries into the discussions. Ends.

TELEGRAM 1908

Ottawa, November 11, 1948

TOP SECRET

Following for Robertson only from Reid.

Repeat to Pearson only in Paris No. 239 and to Wrong only in Washington No. EX-2629, Begins: Your No. 1987 of November 9, North Atlantic Treaty.

Many thanks for letting me have at such short notice your most useful suggestions for revision of my draft of November 6 of instructions to the Canadian representatives when the Washington security talks are resumed. I shall be sending you by next air bag a draft of a treaty text for your comments. I think you will find less to object to in the treaty text than in the draft instructions and that the treaty text will make clear some of the points which I had in mind in drafting the instructions which, because they were prepared in a hurry and late at night, were not made clear.

2. Following are some comments on the numbered paragraphs of your telegram:

Your paragraph 1. I agree that there is too much rhetoric, but I had, in any event, decided to remove or change substantially the phrases to which you take exception, since I am pretty sure they are a direct quote from a telegram early this year from Mr. Attlee to Mr. King, which I should guess was written by Jebb.

Your paragraph 2. I would have thought that our participation in the Western Union defence organs has indicated pretty clearly that the North Atlantic organization will, in order to be effective, need to have from its beginning most, if not all, of the organs which Western Union has by now found essential. The only additional one which I have suggested is an Assembly and on this I should appreciate your further views. It seems to me that, since each national government can control the representatives from its country to the Assembly, its establishment could do little harm and might do much good. Is there not a possibility that the United Kingdom might find it useful to have such an Assembly established? It might, for example, lessen the pressure on the United Kingdom to concur in the establishment of a Western European Parliamentary Assembly.

Your paragraph 3. I agree there should be some reference to the United Nations, but I felt that, in a secret working paper for circulation to governments, it was not necessary, as it still is in public and would be in the text of the Treaty, to make too deep a bow to the United Nations. The official attitude of the Canadian Government is that the road we are on is, we hope, leading to the establishment of a world organization of the remaining free states. In a paper for governments would it not be as well for us to indicate indirectly that we are conscious that the establishment of effective regional security organizations will inevitably, so long as the Soviet Union paralyzes the work of the United Nations, result in these new organizations doing much of the work which we had, three years ago, hoped the United Nations could do.

Your paragraph 4. Canadian adherence to the proposed Treaty will constitute a revolution in Canadian foreign policy and it would be easier to get full public support for this revolution if the Treaty is as easily understandable as possible. It would also, I hope, not be written in the language of tired civil servants. That is all I am after.

Your paragraph 6. Paragraph 14 of my draft and the first sentence of paragraph 15 are paraphrases of reports approved by the Western Union Chiefs of Staff. Almost all the rest is from speeches by Mr. St. Laurent, in which he has tried to make clear to the Canadian public that he shares fully the views on this matter which have been arrived at by the Western Union defence experts. I would doubt whether these views are entirely shared in certain quarters in Washington, and it would seem to me therefore that it might be wise and useful for us to emphasize them in our paper.

Your paragraph 7. The language used in the references to Sweden and Ireland was originally suggested by Wrong, and Pearson concurred. Perhaps, therefore, you could discuss the question with Pearson. Pearson is, in my opinion, very properly apprehensive that opponents in Canada of the treaty will be presented with what is at least a good debating point if Canada is the only country other than the Brussels Powers and the United States to become a member of the North Atlantic organization.

3. I have repeated your telegram No. 1987 to Pearson and Wrong and am repeating to them this reply. Any further comments which you can let me have by Saturday would be greatly appreciated, since it looks as if it will be necessary for me to have a revision of the draft instructions ready first thing on Monday, November 15th, for circulation to Cabinet. Ends. Message ends.

Ottawa, November 12, 1948

Dear Mr. Pearson,

I have tried my hand at preparing a tentative draft of a North Atlantic Treaty, and now enclose a copy dated November 9.<sup>108</sup> I should be most grateful for any suggestions for the revision of this document which you can find time to send me.

<sup>108</sup> Pour une ébauche subséquente, voir la pièce jointe du document 467.
For a later draft, see enclosure to Document 467.

You will note that this draft differs very markedly from previous drafts which I have prepared.

2. Clearly the United States would find it hard to accept some of the clauses in this draft in their present form. However, my feeling is that our representatives in the forthcoming negotiations should aim at this kind of Treaty, and it may be that we will be able to get more than it would now be reasonable to assume we can get from the United States.

3. The influence which you have been able to exert during the past six months or so on the negotiations for the Treaty has been very considerable, and I think that, if we play our cards well, we ought to be able to exert a decisive influence on the rest of the negotiations.

4. I wish that you could be in Washington when the conversations are resumed.

5. Next week I hope that the pressure on this office will have let up a bit, and I will be able to write you an informal note on various things that have happened since you left. I feel guilty that I haven't written such a letter before now.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

CHAPTER ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL COOPERATION<sup>109</sup>

From the very beginning of the discussions in Washington, we have, in the secret discussions and in public, emphasized the importance which the Canadian Government attaches to the inclusion in the Treaty of provisions for the encouragement of cooperation in fields other than security. In our view this cooperation would contribute greatly to the general security of all the North Atlantic nations. We have also emphasized that it is important to include these provisions in order to make it clear that the purpose of the Treaty is not merely negative but that it should create the dynamic counter-attraction of a free, prosperous and progressive society as opposed to the society of the Communist world.

2. The other participants in the informal and exploratory discussions in Washington have concurred with us in this matter. Thus among the basic criteria which they have set forth for the Treaty are that —

“(2) It should contribute, through increasing the individual and collective capacities of the parties for self-defense, to the maintenance of peace and the greater national security of the parties.

(5) It should be based on and promote continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid in all fields.

(6) It should be more than an arrangement for defense alone; it should serve both to preserve the common civilization and to promote its development by increasing the collaboration between the signatories and advancing the conditions of stability and well-being upon which peace depends.

(7) It should provide adequate machinery for implementing its terms, in particular for organized coordination and strengthening of the defence capacities of the parties, beginning immediately it comes into force.”

3. It has not been easy to get this measure of agreement on objectives. It will, however, be much harder to get specific provisions in the Treaty on how best to meet these objectives. The corresponding provisions of the Western Union Treaty, concluded in Brussels on March 17, 1948, are:

“Article I. Convinced of the close community of their interests and of the necessity of uniting in order to promote the economic recovery of Europe, the High Contracting Parties will so organize and coordinate their economic activities as to produce the best possible results, by the elimination of conflict in their economic policies, the coordination of production and the development of commercial exchanges.

The cooperation provided for in the preceding paragraph which will be effected through the Consultative Council referred to in Article VII as well as through other bodies, shall not involve any duplication of, or prejudice to, the work of other economic organizations in which the High Contracting Parties are or may be represented, but shall on the contrary assist the work of those organizations.

Article II. The High Contracting Parties will make every effort in common, both by direct consultation and in specialized agencies, to promote the attainment of a higher standard of living by their peoples and to develop on corresponding lines the social and other related services of their countries.

The High Contracting Parties will consult with the object of achieving the earliest possible application of recommendations of immediate practical interest, relating to social matters, adopted with their approval in the specialized agencies.

They will endeavour to conclude as soon as possible conventions with each other in the sphere of social security.

Article III. The High Contracting Parties will make every effort in common to lead their peoples towards a better understanding of the principles which form the basis of their common civilization and to promote cultural exchanges by conventions between themselves or by other means.”

4. I doubt whether it would be possible to get the United States to agree to the kind of language in Article II “to develop on corresponding lines the social and other related services of their countries”, or to the two sentences which immediately follow.

5. The draft which I have prepared of a chapter on Economic, Social and Cultural Cooperation for the North Atlantic Treaty reads as follows:

Article 12. In order to promote the general welfare, the North Atlantic Nations undertake to make every effort in common to eliminate conflict in their economic policies, to coordinate their production, and to encourage the greatest possible development of trade between them.

Article 13. The North Atlantic Nations undertake to make every effort in common, both by direct consultation and in the United Nations and in the specialized agencies, to promote the attainment of a higher standard of living by their people and greater economic and social justice.

Article 14. The North Atlantic Nations undertake to make every effort in common to lead their people towards a better understanding of the principles which form the basis of their common civilization and to promote cultural exchanges between themselves.<sup>110</sup>

Article 15. The cooperation provided for in this Chapter shall not involve any duplication of, or prejudice to, the work of<sup>111</sup> other international economic, social or cultural organizations in which the North Atlantic Nations are or may be represented, but shall assist the work of these organizations. In order to attain as rapidly as possible the objectives set forth in this Chapter, and thus to create in the North Atlantic Community the economic and moral basis on which to maintain an overwhelming preponderance of force on the side of peace, the North Atlantic Nations undertake to use their best efforts to secure those amendments to the international instruments setting up the specialized agencies of the United Nations as are necessary to ensure that the agencies become the most effective possible instruments for the speedy attainment of the objectives set forth in this Chapter."<sup>112</sup>

I doubt if agreement can be obtained on much more than this — plus ECA. It is just a hope & common prayer.

TELEGRAM WA-2912

Washington, November 12, 1948

TOP SECRET

Following for Reid only from Wrong, Begins: Reference my immediately preceding message,† here are my comments on your draft paper dated November 6th.

Paragraph 1. In (a) omit "the pooling of risks, resources and control over policy." This follows from "the creation of an effective defensive alliance based on self-help and mutual aid."

In (b) shorten to "the creation of joint agencies of recommendation, and in the event of war of military decision." It is necessary to insert "military" before "decision"; we are not establishing a federation but an alliance. If the rest of your draft has to go in, avoid the phrase "North Atlantic Community". It should be dropped passim.

Omit the final sentence of the paragraph.

Paragraphs 2 to 6. In my judgement these paragraphs contain suggestions which have no chance of acceptance and which might endanger United States ratification of the treaty if they were accepted. I should omit them completely. They are not really comments on the Washington proposals of September 9th. Diplomatic papers should err on the side of under-statement — particularly at this stage of an important and tricky negotiation. I should certainly find it hard to defend most of the nomenclature proposed in paragraph 4 or the forms suggested in paragraph 5. Remember that the Brussels and Rio treaties must be the general models. I repeat that we are making an alliance not a federation. I agree that the treaty should be as simple as possible, but I consider your proposals would complicate it and disguise its real nature.

If something has to go in on the lines of paragraphs 2, 3, and 6, tone down the language — such as "despair, apathy and doubt" and "hearts and minds and spirits of all those in the world who love freedom" in paragraph 2.

I add the general comment that this treaty will include only a fraction of the countries of the western world, and that the North Atlantic group cannot claim to speak for all of them. Another point is that we must make the language fit with that of Article 51 of the Charter.

Paragraphs 7 to 12. We should never secure acceptance for spelling out in detail the agencies to be set up, and we cannot foretell now what agencies may be required. Furthermore, if we were to list the agencies it would greatly delay the course of negotiation, for it would be reasonably demanded by some or all the representatives that their composition, terms of reference, methods of reaching decision, and so on be determined at this stage. A Council with power to create such other agencies as may be required is, in my view, all that should be directly established by the treaty.

What does "a constitutional grant of power" in paragraph 11 mean? It sounds as though it meant something a good deal more formidable than agreeing to set up Councils and Boards as agencies of joint recommendation.

I suggest omission of paragraphs 9 and 10, and tying paragraph 12 to paragraph 8 by sentences on the lines of the latter part of paragraph 11.

Paragraphs 13 to 15. These are not comments on the paper of September 9th, except the reference to the preamble in paragraph 15. Cut them out, as they are material for a speech, not a contribution to a negotiation.

Paragraph 16 and 17. I gave you my views on Portuguese membership on October 23rd before I knew that the United Kingdom had sounded out Portugal already. This news strengthens my opinion that Portugal should be given the chance of joining if she wants to do so.

With regard to the proposal in paragraph 17, I doubt that any such general provision should go in the treaty. There will have to be special arrangements with some individual countries, I expect, but they will not follow any one pattern.

Paragraphs 18 to 21. Run these together, and substitute for the word "essential" in paragraph 20 the word "important". Otherwise it is implied that Iceland or Ireland, by staying aloof (as they well may), could kill the project. The first sentence of paragraph 21 is repetitious. The most effective means for persuading some hesitant countries to join may turn out to be the extension by the United States of military aid only to the full members. This might count a lot with Norway, Denmark, and possibly Sweden. It should not be mentioned in this paper.

Paragraphs 22 to 24. I agree with the general line on Italy. The limitations imposed by the peace treaty might be mentioned.

Paragraphs 25 to 27. Agreed — except that we should not specially single out for mention in a formal document the Swedes and the Irish (end of paragraph 27).

Paragraphs 28 to 30. Agreed, but substitute for the last words "as the Government of the United States is prepared to accept."

Paragraphs 31 to 33. Run into one paragraph. Change the formula to read "expelled or suspended either by a unanimous vote of the other members or by a vote of perhaps two-thirds of all the members."

Paragraphs 34 and 35. Run these together. I suggest omitting the reference to psychological warfare, and substituting "both as a deterrent to aggression and as an encouragement to self-help and mutual aid", or something like that. Personally, I doubt the wisdom of as long a term as 25 years. Ends.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

With reference to your memorandum of November 8,† I submit the following suggestions for revision of the instructions contained in "Comments of the Canadian Government on the Paper dated September 9, 1948, resulting from the Washington Exploratory Talks on Security" in its draft of November 6.

2. In my opinion neither the report of September 9 of the Washington conversations or the comments thereon contained in your draft of November 6, bring out sufficiently clearly the distinction between the functional arrangements under Article 51 and the regional arrangements under Article 53. I would, therefore, suggest the inclusion of comments along the following lines in the instructions, which might come under the heading "Nature of the North Atlantic Treaty as a functional Pact of collective self-defence under Article 51."

"The Report of September 9 on the Washington conversations, while containing an adequate appreciation of the military and ystrategic situation in Europe which makes a defensive alliance necessary at this time, does not, in our opinion, relate this problem sufficiently to the United Nations and in particular to the terms of Article 51 of the Charter. This is reflected in the absence of any statement of the relationship of the proposed treaty to the United Nations in the body of the Report of September 9.

"The proposed North Atlantic Treaty is to be within the terms of the United Nations Charter. The necessity for making such a treaty arises from the powerlessness of the Security Council at present to apply the enforcement measures of Chapter VII of the Charter in the event that armed attack is committed by one of the Permanent Members of the Council. If one of the Permanent Members makes an armed attack, and the Council attempts to take measures to restore international peace and security, it may be expected that the Permanent Members will exercise its veto to prevent action being taken by the United Nations. In particular, should the Soviet Union be the aggressor, it may be taken for granted that the Soviet representative on the Security Council will veto any action proposed in the Council.

"Article 51 specifically provides for the exercise of 'the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.' For the purpose of the North Atlantic Treaty, Article 51 must be taken as the constitutional basis for collective and self-defence, rather than the provisions of Chapter VIII (Regional Arrangements), because in Article 53 it is stated that 'no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authority of the Security Council with the exception of measures against an enemy state.' On the other hand, under Article 51, members of the United Nations can take action in self-defence, provided that the action taken is immediately reported to the Security Council and that the Council has not itself taken action to maintain or restore international peace and security.

"The question arises whether actions of collective self-defence can be taken in advance of an armed attack under Article 51, such as those contemplated under the present treaty. It must be recognized that in view of the powerlessness of the Security Council to take action against one of the Great Powers, and bearing in mind the present policy of the Soviet Government, the inherent right of collective self-defence must be regarded as necessarily embracing preparatory measures of collective self-defence required to meet the conditions of modern war. If no measures of self-defence are taken until armed attack actually occurs, defence would almost certainly prove ineffective under conditions of modern warfare. This interpretation of Article 51 of the Charter is required to justify the collective measures of self-defence contemplated under the North Atlantic Treaty. The defensive and preventive nature of the proposed Treaty, as well as its constitutional basis under the Charter, should be clearly brought out in the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty.

"Also, the North Atlantic Treaty should be clearly an agreement of a functional not a regional character, between nations willing and able to assume specific obligations to pool their resources in the preparation of their self-defence against the risks of armed attack."

3. If you agree with the approach suggested in the comments above, I would suggest the following revision of paragraph 1 of the instructions:

"General Objectives of the North Atlantic Treaty

"The Canadian Government regards the forthcoming negotiations as looking towards —

"(a) The creation of a pact of collective self-defence under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter by treaty between those countries who are willing and able to pool their resources on the basis of self-help and mutual aid to meet the risks of armed attack.

"(b) The prevention of general war by enabling the signatories of the treaty to integrate their defence preparations and so place them in a position to deter a major aggressor from making war and, in the event of war, to ensure victory as quickly and economically as possible.

"(c) This treaty of collective self-defence would be concluded initially between the countries bordering on the North Atlantic which have already expressed their willingness to cooperate in measures of collective self-defence; it could be extended to other like-minded states willing and able to accept fully a uniformity of obligations.

"(d) To create such joint agencies of consultation as well as of decision and executive action as may be necessary to provide effective measures of collective self-defence; these arrangements to provide effective control of resources and policies for all the signatories of the treaty.”

4. If you agree with the foregoing, you may find it necessary to make a few minor consequential changes in the other sections of the instructions to bring out more clearly the distinction between an agreement on functional rather than regional arrangements.

*Memorandum for Acting Under-Secretary of State

[Ottawa], November 12, 1948

Your Memorandum of November 8th† asked for my suggestions on your draft instructions of November 6th to the Canadian Representatives when the talks on the proposed North Atlantic Treaty are resumed.

2. I have not had an opportunity to study the provisions of the Brussels or the Rio Treaties, nor am I in a position to make precise suggestions on the relationship to the U.N. Charter of the provisions of the proposed Treaty set out in general terms in the Annex to the Report of September 9th on the Washington conversations.

3. I shall therefore confine my comments to:

- A. The general nature of the instructions to be sent to our Representatives
- B. Items which should be covered by the instructions.

A. In general, I think instructions should be based on references to the Report of September 9th and its Annex. If we accept the propositions outlined in the Report, we should say so. Where we disagree with the Report we should list seriatim our reasons for disagreement, with instructions on the line to be pursued during further talks. It seems to me unnecessary to restate the propositions outlined in the Report, if they are acceptable, in the way in which the present draft does. To me, the latter process adds nothing, and tends to confuse the issues by restating the objects of the Treaty in forms which vary from the Report.

B. Thus, I should be inclined to draft the instructions on the following lines:

(i) We accept the appreciation of the present “Situation in Europe as it affects Security,” as set out in the Report of September 9th

(ii) A criticism of Part II of the Report and instructions as to how our representatives should approach the various points at issue, e.g., Relationship of the Treaty to the Charter; whether the Treaty should be designed to admit any like-minded country wherever situated, etc.

(iii) A criticism of the proposed Treaty Provisions contained in the Annex, and instructions in precise terms as to the line our representatives should take.

(iv) I should accordingly suggest eliminating paragraphs 2 and 3 of the draft instructions.

(v) I would question paragraph 4, if the object of the organs set up by the Treaty Powers are not to be regarded from their names alone as excluding other than North Atlantic powers from joining the alliance.

(vi) While I agree with the desire to eliminate legal language so far as possible, as set out in paragraph 5, I do not feel that precision should be sacrificed in favour of more human generalities.

(vii) I question the workability of the proposals set out in paragraphs 7-12. Are we really prepared at this stage to derogate authority to the agencies set up? For example, if the Joint Planners propose that Canada's contribution now should be so many aircraft a month, will we accept automatically such a proposal if it has the agreement of a Headquarters on the S.H.A.E.F. pattern? If we are not prepared to accept such proposals, I think we should be wrong to instruct our representatives to spell out the nature and powers of the organs to be set up, unless we are now prepared to derogate powers to them. In my view, nothing would be more fatal than, if having given powers to these organs under the Treaty, the Canadian Government should refuse to accept particular commitments which a joint staff has concluded we should accept. I should accordingly prefer instructions along the lines of the Brussels Treaty in order to avoid what I can only feel would lead to an embarrassing situation.

(viii) In addition, it seems logically difficult to stress the peaceful nature of the Pact, while only mentioning the setting up of organs which are essentially military in nature.

(ix) In regard to paragraphs 13-15, I suggest we might state that we accept the principles set out in the preamble to the Brussels Treaty, on the grounds that we should make clear the positive virtues of Western Civilization. While no doubt this element in the Treaty is important, I should be much more concerned with the action taken on signature of the Treaty. I think that the Western European has long since become sceptical of statements on a high moral tone. For example, perhaps no one action brought the United States into disrepute with the Italians during the war so much as the printing of the four freedoms on the back of the U.S. military currency.

(x) In regard to paragraphs 16-24, I wonder whether we have gone far enough in considering the organs to be set up under the Treaty to press for the inclusion of other members at this stage. It will certainly make the task of forming effective organs more difficult.

4. While I realize you wish the instructions to be in a form which you can circulate to the representatives of other governments, I think we should seek either in the instructions or separately, answers to the following questions at an early stage:

A. What organs should be set up to implement the Treaty, and what will be their powers?

B. Is it anticipated that most of the planning will be done by a Headquarters on the S.H.A.E.F. pattern, or will there be separate planning on the part of the United States and Great Britain? While the latter point could scarcely be raised in any plenary session, it has, I think, some importance for us. I doubt that the United Kingdom and the United States would be prepared to pool all their knowledge, and accordingly we might find ourselves left out of the planning which they do on their own. We know, for example, that the U.S. and U.K. have already written an intelligence appreciation without us being present, and it might well be that they would consider that representation on the organs set up under the Treaty would be sufficient for our purposes. I am not satisfied that this is so. I feel this is an important point which will affect the structure of our planning organization.

Alternatively, will there be planning bodies outside the structure of a Combined Headquarters? If not, we might find it very embarrassing to turn down plans drawn up by such a Headquarters. Representation in a Headquarters like S.H.A.E.F. could not, in the nature of the organization, ensure that Canadian views would be given their full weight.

The type and the powers of the organs to be set up should, therefore, depend from a Canadian point of view on how far the Government is prepared to go in its contributions, not merely at D-day, but during the interim period. Indeed, the whole point of the Treaty is to prevent war; which, if it is to be effective, means the marshalling at an early date of a preponderance of power. This can hardly be done if the contributions to be made by Canada are limited to the suggestions contained in paragraph 9 of Mr. Pearson's Memorandum to Cabinet of October 4th.

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Repeated to London for Robertson only as No. 107. Following for Reid, Begins: Your recent letter of November 6th on North Atlantic Security Pact together with Robertson's observations on our draft comments:

I agree generally with his view that the language in places is somewhat high-flown and that we should if possible include some reference to United Nations although I appreciate the point made in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 239 which has just arrived.<sup>113</sup>

2. I have no strong views about the specific mention in our comments of institutions to be set up by the Treaty. It might suffice to state that certain agencies will be required to carry out the purposes of the pact along the lines of those found necessary under the Brussels Pact. I agree however that without giving any impression that we are initiating a "sub-crusade" we might mention without making too much of the fact that the language should be clear, unambiguous and as far removed from "officialese" as possible.

3. Paragraphs 13, 14 and 15 should, I think, be compressed into one which might include present paragraph 13 with second and third sentence of paragraph 15. We should not overlook our doubts about the desirability of different types of membership even though we may later have to yield on this point. For that reason we should not at this stage cast doubts on desirability of Portugal for full membership and I hope that paragraph 16 might be amended accordingly.

4. I do not object to your emphasis that every possible effort should be made to persuade a maximum number of eligible countries to become members of the alliance but I am somewhat worried about paragraph 21 which again reverts to the idea of associated members. I admit of course that this may eventually be necessary but I do not think we should support it at this stage. For that reason I also am worried about paragraph 24 which I would prefer to read somewhat as follows:

"Uniformity of obligation is what is required and this should be our objective. However, if this cannot be secured, then a variety of association might emerge providing that in every case the association is not merely nominal but effective."

5. These are somewhat casual observations as I have not had an opportunity to study our draft as carefully as it deserves. I hope, therefore, that in sending forward our comments we make clear that the observations which are now being forwarded are preliminary ones and may have to be modified in the light of further consideration and exchange of views with other governments. Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-2930

Washington, November 13, 1948

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Reid only from Wrong, Begins: Since despatching my comments yesterday on your draft paper on the North Atlantic Treaty I have had a further talk with Hickerson on the next stages, at which the following points were made:

He confirms that what they desire in the State Department is another bout of informal and non-committal talks with the Ambassadors here. The duration and substance of these talks cannot be determined until the comments of the Brussels Powers have been received. The State Department will wish to pay particular attention to the scope of the Treaty. They retain the concern which they have displayed throughout the talks that Italy should be effectively associated with the North Atlantic Pact in some way. Hickerson considers that the British proposal for possible Swedish association does not go far enough in the case of Sweden and would not be satisfactory if applied to Italy. What he wants is that Italy should join the Brussels Treaty. Whether this would mean full Italian membership in the North Atlantic Pact as well, or indirect association through the Brussels commitments, is not clear, but I rather think that the latter is what they have in mind here. They think it is up to the Brussels Powers to propose a satisfactory formula covering Italy.

2. The talks would also deal with the procedure to be followed in widening the circle to include other North Atlantic countries. Possibly some of them might be invited to be represented by observers at this stage.

3. He does not know whether a complete draft of a Treaty will emerge. They have a draft in the State Department which they have prepared only to see how the annex to the paper of September 9th looks when put in treaty form. It lacks authority, and they do not intend to produce it at present. While a complete draft, informally accepted by the Governments, should be prepared before a formal conference is called, there will be other matters to settle, especially the scope of the treaty, before discussion of a draft should begin. Ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

2. Mr. Reid said that the date on which the Washington talks on the proposed North Atlantic Treaty would be resumed was still uncertain but it was now almost certain that when they did begin they would be on the ambassadorial level. As in the first phase of the discussions which took place in the summer, beginning July 6, the talks will probably continue to be non-committal and exploratory but with two important differences: in the second phase each participant will have been furnished with a statement of the views of his government on the issues set forth in the agreed paper which resulted from the first phase of the Washington talks; and in the second place each government will, it is assumed, have agreed in principle to conclude a North Atlantic Treaty.

3. It is probable that in the course of the discussions Mr. Lovett, the Acting Secretary of State of the United States, and the ambassadors concerned will attempt to draft the text of a treaty for submission to their respective governments for their consideration. On any points about which complete agreement cannot be reached, it is likely that alternative texts of articles will be provided. The names of other states which might be invited to become original members of the Alliance will also probably be agreed on during the course of the talks for reference back to the governments of the states participating in the Washington discussions.

4. Reports of the discussions will then be referred by the participants back to their respective governments for consideration before any formal diplomatic conference is held to conclude negotiations and to sign a treaty. No date has yet been set for such a conference but it would certainly be convenient to the Canadian Government if the formal conference could be terminated by about January 15, because, after the opening of the Canadian Parliament, it might be difficult for Canada to be represented by a Cabinet Minister.

5. Mr. Reid added that we had for some time known that officials in the United Kingdom had been preparing a draft treaty text and that officials in the State Department were doing likewise. From what appeared to be authoritative press reports, it seemed evident that both France and Belgium had also prepared draft treaty texts. We might therefore be in a weak position in the negotiations unless we too had a draft text. Fortunately a tentative draft had been prepared many months ago in the Department and a new draft (the fifth) had just been prepared.<sup>114</sup>

6. Mr. Reid said it would be necessary to send instructions to the Canadian Ambassador in Washington prior to the opening of the talks. Mr. Wrong has asked that these instructions be in a form suitable for circulation to the representatives of the other governments participating. This will require the preparation of supplementary instructions for Mr. Wrong to cover points which might not be appropriate for inclusion in a document which is to be circulated to other governments.

NOT FOR THE FILE

Dear Mike [Pearson],

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I enclose a memorandum, in draft form, which I have just prepared for Mr. St. Laurent, which is dated November 15.<sup>115</sup> I also enclose the latest draft of November 14 of the statement of the preliminary views of the Canadian Government on the paper of September 9 from Washington.†

2. As you can well imagine, I am in a considerable jam. Brooke<sup>116</sup> knows very little about what has been happening in this matter during the last eight months. He, therefore, and I think quite properly, does not feel that he can, on his own authority, approve for submission to Cabinet the draft statement of the views of the Canadian Government, but that it must first receive Mr. St. Laurent's approval.

3. Mr. St. Laurent, particularly this week<sup>117</sup> when he will be incredibly busy, will have virtually no time to go over these two attached documents carefully. I fear, therefore, that he will be reluctant to put the matter before Cabinet unless he receives a blanket endorsement from you.

4. The matter is urgent since the second phase of the Washington discussions will probably begin on Thursday, November 25, and we must have in Wrong's hands before that day the necessary instructions and guidance from the Canadian Cabinet on matters which are so important to Canada's future.

5. It is for that reason that I am hoping, very much, that you can tear yourself away from the UN Assembly and lock yourself in your room with the phone down for a couple of hours in order to go over the two enclosed documents and send me, the same evening, a telegram which I will immediately put before Mr. St. Laurent.

6. I have gone very far in the new draft of November 14 to meet the criticisms expressed by Norman [Robertson] and Hume [Wrong]. I have not, however, felt that you would agree that I should revise in accordance with their views if that revision meant that we would depart from the line which we have consistently taken for the past fourteen months — and which has been taken publicly by Mr. St. Laurent and yourself.

7. What I would like most of all from you, of course, would be a telegram which simply said "Reference Reid's draft of November 14 of a statement of the views of the Canadian Government on the Washington security paper of September 9. I am in complete agreement with this statement and hope that it will receive the approval of my colleagues in Cabinet. I am also in agreement with the supplementary views set forth in Reid's memorandum of November 15 to the Prime Minister, and feel that, in order to avoid the delay that would be consequent upon preparing supplementary instructions to Wrong, this memorandum of November 15 to the Prime Minister might be sent to Wrong as embodying his supplementary instructions."

8. I would not, however, want you to send a telegram giving this 100 percent endorsement if there is anything in either of the two documents which causes you concern.

9. Consequently, if there is anything that you want to have revised, perhaps, after giving a general endorsement in one telegram to me, you might say that your immediately following telegram contains suggestions for revision of the two documents. If you could put your suggestions in language in which I could incorporate them immediately in the documents, this would make it easier for me to get the documents circulated to Cabinet at the end of this week for a meeting of Cabinet a week today, Monday, November 22.

10. If I can't get them discussed by Cabinet on Monday, November 22, it is going to be difficult to get the documents to Washington in time.

11. It is, I think, in our interest to get the Washington discussions resumed quickly, and I point this sort of problem out in the concluding paragraph of the draft statement.

12. The better the statement of the views of the Canadian Government and the better the treaty text which we prepare and circulate in Washington, the more chance there is that the first phase of the Washington discussions will conclude quickly and will produce a good draft treaty.

13. This would, in turn, result in a relatively brief interval between the conclusion of the second phase of the Washington discussions and the holding of the formal conference and would also, I hope, result in the formal conference being brief.

14. I think it is very important that you should be at the formal conference throughout, and I know that this is going to be most difficult unless the conference is concluded before Parliament opens, which I assume will be around the 20th of January.

15. I shall, by tomorrow's bag, be sending Norman and Hume copies of the two enclosures.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

P.S. I hope I have met your point about Portugal, and your dislike of the term "Associate member of the organization" by the language which I have used in paragraph 28, 30 and 33 of the Statement of Canadian views. You will see that I spoke in terms of an "arrangement" between the North Atlantic Organization, once it has been set up, and Portugal and Italy.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

After our talk yesterday, I substantially revised the 6th November draft of the statement of the preliminary views of the Canadian Government on the Washington paper of 9th September. I enclose a copy of the revised draft which is dated 14th November. † This is preceded by a copy of a memorandum of today's date to the Prime Minister,<sup>118</sup> transmitting to him the draft statement of 14th November.

I have sent both these documents to Mr. Pearson today by air bag and am asking him to cable me whether he has any suggestions for further revision. This does not give us much time, but as soon as I receive a telegram from him, I could revise the text of the draft statement immediately in accordance with his instructions and then, if the Prime Minister and you agree, have it circulated by Mr. Heeney to Cabinet for consideration at a special meeting on 22nd November. It would be running things too close if the discussion by Cabinet were delayed beyond Monday, since the second phase of the Washington talks will probably be resumed in only over a week's time and Mr. Wrong feels, I know, very strongly that it would be most unwise from the Canadian point of view to put him in the position of participating in the second phase of the talks without the benefit of the necessary instructions and guidance from the Canadian Cabinet.

The other document which I enclose is a letter of today's date to Mr. Wrong,<sup>119</sup> in which I explain to him that, so far as I know, the only suggestions from him and from Mr. Robertson which I did not accept were ones which it seemed to me could be interpreted as involving a departure from the line which the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson have constantly taken on this subject during the past fourteen months.

PROPOSED STATEMENT OF VIEWS OF THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ON THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I. Future Timetable

1. Mr. Wrong has reported that the State Department is in favour of another series of informal and non-committal talks with the Ambassadors in Washington before a formal conference is called, and that the State Department hopes that the talks will be resumed as soon as the representatives of the Brussels Powers have received their "directives" from the Permanent Commission of the Brussels Powers, which is now meeting in London. You may recall that the identic notes which we received on October 29 from the Brussels Powers included a statement that the Western Union Consultative Council was going to send "instructions" by November 8 to their Permanent Commission in London to enable the Permanent Commission to draw up, in its turn, directives for the Western Union Ambassadors in Washington.

2. We do not yet know the precise date on which the informal talks in Washington will be resumed. Mr. Wrong, however, is fairly certain that it will be not later than the middle of next week.

3. Mr. Wrong has asked for instructions on the line which he should take on the many and difficult questions which will be discussed in the talks. You might, therefore, wish to have Cabinet consider, at the beginning of next week, a draft statement of instructions.

II. Nature of Proposed Statement by the Canadian Government

4. Mr. Wrong, in recommending that the Government be asked to approve a statement of the views of the Canadian Government on the Washington paper of September 9, suggested that this statement should not only serve as his instructions but that it should probably also "be in a form suitable for circulation to the other representatives, either before the talks are resumed or at the time of their resumption." Mr. Pearson has concurred in Mr. Wrong's recommendations.

5. I enclose for your consideration, and if you agree, for submission to Cabinet, a draft dated November 14† of a statement of Canadian views which has been prepared in a form in which it could be circulated to the other representatives in the forthcoming Washington discussions. This is the fifth draft of this paper, the first having been prepared on October 7. Mr. Pearson and Mr. Wrong commented on the first two drafts. The third draft was sent to them and also to Mr. Claxton and Mr. Robertson. On November 13 this draft was revised in the light of their comments. Mr. Claxton went over with me yesterday the November 13 draft† and the enclosed draft of November 14 is the result of my talks with him.

6. In order to prepare a statement which would be suitable for circulation to other governments, it has been necessary to leave out certain considerations which could appear appropriately only in an instruction to the Canadian representation. I shall, therefore, within the next few days, prepare for Mr. Claxton's consideration, a draft of an instruction to Mr. Wrong which would supplement whatever statement is agreed to by Cabinet. Mr. Wrong would like to have this done if at all possible.

III. Proposed Supplementary Instruction to Mr. Wrong

7. Perhaps the main thing to point out in the supplementary instruction is that the Canadian representative in the forthcoming series of discussions in Washington will be in a fairly strong bargaining position. The Democratic Administration has just received a vote of confidence from the American people and has satisfactory majorities in both Houses of Congress. Moreover, many of the leading isolationists and unreconstructed Republicans have been defeated. The United States Administration has not yet gone as far as the Brussels Powers and Canada in informing the other governments concerned that it accepts in principle a Treaty along the lines set forth in the Washington paper of September 9. Nevertheless, the Administration, by statements it has made in public and off-the-record, has committed itself to the Treaty to such an extent that it would be difficult, and perhaps damaging to its prestige, for it to draw back now, especially since the proposal for the Treaty seems to have met with little adverse criticism in the United States.

8. For the past eight years or so a favourite argument which the United States has used in discussions with us has been that, when they are attempting to persuade Congress to adopt legislation or ratify international agreements in which we are interested, we should help them in various ways to ease their situation in Congress.

9. The boot may now be on the other foot. If so, our representative in the forthcoming discussions in Washington on the North Atlantic Treaty, may be able to use with effect, in discussions with the United States, the kind of argument which they have been using with effect in discussions with us for the past eight years or more. The fact, therefore, that the forthcoming session of the Canadian Parliament may be the last session before a general election may be a source of strength to us in the negotiations rather than the reverse.

10. This means, it seems to me, that our representative in the discussions in Washington might usefully, on occasion, point to public statements made during the past year on the subject of the North Atlantic Treaty by yourself and other members of the Cabinet, say that these statements have met with the overwhelming approval of the Canadian people, that the Canadian people are expecting from the discussions in Washington the kind of Treaty which has been advocated by the Canadian Government, and that if the Treaty which results from the Washington discussion does not go far to meet the objectives publicly set forth by the Canadian Government, the Canadian Government may not be able to secure in Canada the enthusiastic public support without which it would not be wise or useful for Canada to undertake the heavy obligations which will be inherent in membership in the proposed North Atlantic regional security organization.

11. I have, therefore, in the attached draft statement of the views of the Canadian Government, included recommendations and suggestions which have been expressed or implied in Canadian ministerial statements on the North Atlantic Treaty, even though some of these proposals may not be received, initially, with much favour by the State Department.

12. I do not suggest that it would not have been wise for us in any event to have considered putting forward many of these proposals. The State Department has, ever since last March, been most receptive to our ideas on this subject — to such an extent that the paper which resulted from the Washington discussions owes a good deal more to Canadian than to United States authorship. The State Department is also, I think, grateful to us for the influence we exerted on Paris and Brussels at the critical stage of the discussions last summer when, as Mr. Lovett put it, the French were “getting into his hair”. At that time, as you will recall, the State Department asked and received our permission to send as “directives” to their Ambassadors to France, Belgium and The Netherlands, the letter that we had sent to General Vanier outlining the arguments which he might use in trying to persuade the French to be more forthcoming in the discussions then going on in Washington.

13. My suggestion is that the present domestic political situations in Canada and the United States perhaps make it possible for us to exert a greater influence in the forthcoming Washington discussions than we normally could expect.

IV. Points in the Attached Draft Statement Which May Not Fit in With Present State Department Thinking

Appointment of Supreme Commander

14. The attached draft statement insists that the Supreme Commander, if another war should occur, must not be appointed, as in the last war, by the United States and the United Kingdom, but must be appointed by a Council on which all the states concerned are represented. We have recently learned that top United States and United Kingdom military people assume that, in the event of war, the Supreme Allied Command and the various subsidiary commands would be responsible to the Anglo-American Chiefs of Staff and they in turn would be responsible to the United States and United Kingdom Governments. It seems to me of the greatest importance that we should, as soon as possible, and as firmly as possible, make clear to the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States that, while we accepted during the last war a similar arrogation of power by the Big Two or the Big Three, we are not prepared to accept it either now, in peace time planning to prevent war, or, if war should break out, in the conduct of that war. Circulation now to the governments which have been participating in the Washington discussions of a statement of the views of the Canadian Government on the North Atlantic Treaty provides us with a useful opportunity to do this.

Interim Arrangements Agreement

15. Linked with this question is the proposal, in paragraphs 11 to 17 of the draft Canadian Statement, that the Canadian representative in the Washington discussions be instructed to recommend that an Interim Arrangements Agreement be signed simultaneously with the Treaty and come into force immediately on signature. This would mean that the day the Treaty is signed, the Western Union Chiefs-of-Staff Committee, the Military Supply Board and the Commanders-in-Chief Committee would in fact pretty well cease to exist and their place would be taken by the corresponding interim organs of the interim North Atlantic security organization. From the general point of view, this would be desirable. The Russians must be worried by the actions which their principal potential enemies are taking to perfect and coordinate their defences. They must therefore be tempted to strike before the process of the mobilization of the North Atlantic democracies has gone so far as to leave them in a good deal relatively weaker position than they are today. Consequently the sooner the joint military organs of the North Atlantic democracies get down to business the shorter ought to be the period of acute danger.

16. A special Canadian interest would also be served by the earliest possible establishment of the military organs of the new Atlantic security organization. The sooner we secure a position of complete legal equality with the United Kingdom and the United States on a North Atlantic Chiefs-of-Staff Committee, the easier it will be for us to protect our position from efforts of the United Kingdom Chiefs-of-Staff to speak for us and the rest of the Commonwealth, and from efforts of the United States and United Kingdom Chiefs-of-Staff to freeze us out of some of their most important joint military planning, even though this planning involves us very directly.

Positive Non-Military Content of Treaty

17. The draft statement emphasizes, at various points, your thesis that the proposed North Atlantic Alliance must be an outward and visible sign that the North Atlantic Nations are bound together not merely by their common opposition to Communist totalitarianism but by a common belief in the values and virtues of our Western civilization and by a determination to work together for the promotion of their mutual welfare and the preservation of peace. The United States Administration has hitherto been inclined to look upon the proposed Treaty as little more than a military alliance with a few trimmings and they may not be entirely happy about this emphasis or about the proposals in the draft Canadian statement on economic and social cooperation, on the peaceful settlement of disputes and on the language of the Treaty.

18. (So far as Canada is concerned, the proposal in paragraph 42 of the draft statement that we accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court over disputes with other signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty does not mark any departure from existing policy. You will recall that in June of this year we informed the other Commonwealth Governments that the Canadian Government was proposing to make a new declaration without reservation. Such a declaration would apply to all states which accept the optional clause not merely to the contracting states in a North Atlantic Organization.)

A "Deliberative Body" for the North Atlantic Alliance

19. In paragraphs 21 and 22 of the draft Canadian statement, it is proposed that consideration be given to including in the Treaty a provision setting up a "deliberative body", the powers of which would be limited to making recommendations to the Council of the North Atlantic organization or to the member states, on matters within the scope of the Treaty. It is further suggested in these paragraphs that the principle which might be followed in determining the number of representatives which each member state would have in such a deliberative body might be somewhere between representation by population and equality of representation for each state. This would mean that in a deliberative body of, say, one hundred members, the seats might be divided somewhat as follows: the United States — 40, the United Kingdom — 18, France — 14, Canada — 6, Belgium and the Netherlands — 5 each, Sweden — 4, Norway, Denmark and Ireland — 2 each, Iceland and Luxembourg — 1 each.

20. When I first made this suggestion in one of my earlier drafts, I called this "deliberative body", "the North Atlantic Parliament". Mr. Pearson changed this to "North Atlantic Assembly" since he felt that "parliament" might have too Anglo-Saxon a flavour for Western Europeans. Mr. Wrong, however, fears that the State Department might interpret a suggestion from us that a "North Atlantic Assembly" be established as indicating that we are thinking in terms of the new North Atlantic Organization as a federation or quasi-federation and not simply as an alliance and this might frighten the Americans away from the whole project. (He and Mr. Robertson have much the same objection to the suggestion that the new organization be called the "North Atlantic Community".) Alternatively, Mr. Wrong fears that, if the United States Administration accepted the proposal for a "North Atlantic Assembly", this might endanger ratification of the Treaty by the United States Senate. Mr. Robertson feels that the creation of a North Atlantic Assembly might give the impression that the powers signing the North Atlantic Treaty are trying to sponsor an alternate world organization to the United Nations.

21. Part of my reply to Mr. Robertson's criticism has been that you have constantly stressed in your public statements since September 1947 that what you want ultimately is a Union of all the Free States; that, therefore, our hope is that the road we are on is leading to the establishment of a world organization of the remaining free states; that it is inevitable that the establishment of effective regional security organizations and ultimately of an organization of the free states will, so long as the Soviet Union paralyzes the work of the United Nations, result in these new organizations doing much of the work which we had, three years ago, hoped the United Nations could do; and that therefore we have been in effect sponsoring a world organization which, if not an "alternate" to the U.N., is a supplement to it. This, it seems to me, was indeed the core of the thesis you put forward in the Assembly in New York a year ago.

22. My reply to Mr. Wrong would be that, with public opinion in the United States moving as fast as it has been for the last eight years, we should not reject the possibility that large and influential sections of the United States public might welcome enthusiastically the inclusion in the North Atlantic Treaty of a provision setting up a North Atlantic Assembly, and that instead of criticizing their government for going too far they might criticize it for agreeing to a Treaty under which the powers of the Assembly were narrowly limited to the making of recommendations.

23. I have a feeling that the prevailing mood in North America, as in the United Kingdom and Western Europe, is still "doubt, despair and apathy" — the phrase, I think, is Mr. Bevin's — and that the great majority of the peoples of the North Atlantic Democracies would be uplifted and encouraged if their governments signed a Treaty which established a parliament or assembly (and which called the new institution which was set up a "Community", and in French, a "Ligue" and not a Union, Alliance or Organization, which are cold words not calculated to stir people's hearts).

V. Mr. Pearson's Views

24. Mr. Pearson, would, I think, be in substantial agreement with the attached draft statement and with this memorandum to you. He has from the beginning been impressed by the necessity of pressing the project forward as a crusade. I would hope that the only point of substance on which he might differ from the views expressed in the draft Canadian statement are the references to Portugal in paragraphs 26 to 28 and 30. He doesn't like the idea of some of the North Atlantic states being given some sort of guarantee by the North Atlantic Community even though they are not full members of it. Consequently, he is not convinced that we should, at this stage, cast doubts on the desirability of Portugal becoming a full member of the North Atlantic Community. He has, however, from the beginning of the discussions last March constantly pressed the argument that the purely military advantages of including Portugal must be weighed very carefully against the very considerable disadvantages which would flow from including in an organization, which will derive much of its moral strength from being composed of countries which have the same liberal and constitutional ideals, a country which has the kind of regime which Portugal has. He may therefore agree with the reference to Portugal as I have now phrased it.

VI. Preparation of a Canadian Draft of a Treaty Text

25. We learned some months ago that a draft treaty text was being prepared in the United Kingdom and that the State Department was also working on a draft treaty. Since then, the newspapers have stated, in what would seem to be authoritative stories from London, that the French and the Belgians have also prepared draft treaty texts.

26. Experience has generally demonstrated that one is put in a weak position in international negotiation if most of the other participants have prepared draft treaties in advance and you have not. On the other hand, if you have a draft treaty prepared in advance and can get it accepted as the basis of discussion or as one of the bases of discussion, you are put in a strong position. This certainly was our experience at the Chicago International Civil Aviation Conference in 1944. At that conference, the United States, for the first three or four days, strenuously resisted every effort to have any other text than the United States draft taken as a basis of discussion in the committee dealing with the structure of the organization and with rules on international air transport. They finally had to give in to the point where they accepted the Canadian draft as a basis along with the United States draft. However, our draft was so much better than theirs that after about one meeting ours became the only basis of discussion with the result that we were able to get a much larger number of our proposals accepted than otherwise would have been possible.

27. Consequently, in addition to preparing the attached draft statement of Canadian views, I have prepared a draft treaty text. This is now being gone over carefully by our Legal Adviser. In its present form it, of course, reflects the views set forth in the attached statement. When, however, Cabinet has approved a statement of Canadian views for the discussions in Washington, I shall revise the draft treaty text to accord with that statement and shall submit it to Mr. Claxton and yourself for approval.

28. I am sending Mr. Pearson by air bag today this memorandum and the attached statement, and am asking him to cable to me whether he has any suggestions for further revision. I hope that we shall have his reply by Friday, November 19th. This does not give us much time, but I could revise the text of the draft statement of Canadian views immediately in accordance with his instructions and then, if you agree, have it circulated to Cabinet for consideration on Monday, November 22.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I enclose a memorandum of 15th November to the Prime Minister and the draft of 14th November† of the statement of the preliminary views of the Canadian Government on the Washington paper of 9th September. I have sent these to Mr. Pearson today in Paris and I am asking him to cable me whether he has any suggestions for further revision. I hope that I can have a reply from him by Friday of this week, 19th November, and that the matter can be considered by Cabinet a week today, Monday, 22nd November.

In order to give you more time, I will of course send you copies of the memoranda at the same time as they are circulated to Cabinet, which would, if the timetable works, be Saturday of this week, 20th November.

As I said to you over the telephone this morning, I am very grateful to you for the suggestions contained in your teletype WA-2912 of 12th November, for revision of my draft paper of 6th November. I went over these suggestions carefully on Saturday and went as far as I felt I could in accepting them. I did the same with the suggestions from Mr. Robertson.

Where I did not accept either yours or Mr. Robertson's completely or in part, it was (subject to omissions as the result of working under pressure) because I did not feel that it was proper for me to make any revision which could be interpreted as a departure from the line which has been taken publicly by Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson during the past fourteen months.

All best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I regret that the two memoranda which I have prepared on this subject are so long, but I thought you would want me to cover all the more important issues involved in the forthcoming discussions.

2. I have sent Mr. Pearson copies of the two memoranda and have asked him to cable me whether he has any suggestions for further revision of the draft statement of Canadian views. I hope that we shall have his reply by Friday, November 19. I could then revise immediately the text of the enclosed draft statement of Canadian views in order to embody his suggestions for revision and then, if you agree, have the draft statement circulated by Mr. Heeney to Cabinet on Friday or Saturday of this week for discussion at a Cabinet meeting early next week.

3. I am reluctant to suggest a special meeting of Cabinet but, if the draft statement is not discussed until the regular weekly meeting on Wednesday, November 24, we may be running things a bit close.

4. I hope to have before you by Friday a draft of a letter from you to Mr. Wrong, supplementing the statement of Canadian views. The statement has been prepared in a form in which it could be circulated to the other governments represented in the Washington discussions and it would, therefore, appear desirable to supplement it by a letter to Mr. Wrong. Mr. Wrong agrees with this.

5. Perhaps the proposed supplementary letter to Mr. Wrong might cover all the points in paragraphs 7 to 23 of the attached memorandum to you of November 15 with which you agree.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

You might wish to make a progress report to Cabinet tomorrow on the North Atlantic security discussions.

2. Pursuant to the decision of Cabinet on October 6, an "oral message" was sent to the other governments participating in the Washington discussions informing them that the Canadian Government was ready to enter into a treaty with them, and with such other countries as might be agreed, on the general lines of the annex to the Washington paper of September 9.

3. At the end of October, our High Commissioners in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa were asked to pass this information on to the Prime Ministers of those countries. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has been keeping these Prime Ministers informed in a general way of the progress of the Washington talks.

4. When our High Commissioner in New Zealand delivered the message to the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Nash, Mr. Nash said that he received the message with the utmost satisfaction — "the best bit of news received in some time and most reassuring." Mr. Nash also expressed the hope that this might lead to further defence arrangements under the United Nations which would bring in other countries with the same outlook as the North Atlantic powers.

5. On October 29, the representatives in Ottawa of the Brussels powers presented identic notes to Mr. Pearson. It was stated in these notes that the Consultative Council of the Foreign Ministers of the Brussels powers had at their meeting in Paris on October 25 and 26 "agreed in principle to negotiate a North Atlantic Pact with Canada and the United States." The notes went on to say that the Consultative Council proposed by November 8 to send "instructions" to their Permanent Commission in London to enable the Permanent Commission to draw up in its turn "directives" for the Western Union ambassadors in Washington.

6. Mr. Wrong has reported that the State Department is in favour of another series of informal and non-committal talks with the ambassadors in Washington before a formal conference is called, and that the State Department hopes that the talks will be resumed as soon as the representatives of the Brussels powers have received their "directives" from the Permanent Commission.

7. We do not yet know the precise date on which the informal talks in Washington will be resumed. Mr. Wrong, however, is fairly certain that it will be not later than the middle of next week.

8. Mr. Wrong has asked for instructions on the line which he should take on the many and difficult questions which will be discussed in the talks. Mr. Wrong, in recommending that the Government be asked to approve a statement of the views of the Canadian Government on the Washington paper of September 9, suggested that this statement should not only serve as his instructions but that it should probably also "be in a form suitable for circulation to the other representatives, either before the talks are resumed or at the time of their resumption." Mr. Pearson has concurred in Mr. Wrong's recommendation.

9. The Department of External Affairs has for some time had under preparation a draft of a statement of the preliminary views of the Canadian Government on the more important issues which will be coming up in the discussions in Washington. A copy of the latest draft was sent on November 15 to Mr. Pearson for his comments and it is expected that a reply will be received from Mr. Pearson before the end of this week.

10. It will then be possible to submit to Cabinet, for its consideration, a draft statement recommended by Mr. Pearson.

NORTH AMERICAN [SIC] SECURITY; RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS

19. The Minister of National Defence, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, reported that pursuant to the decision taken at the meeting of October 6th, the other governments participating in the Washington discussions had been informed that the Canadian government were ready to enter into a treaty on the general lines of the Annex to the Washington paper of September 9th. The other Commonwealth countries had also been informed of our attitude.

The Brussels powers having agreed in principle to negotiation of a North Atlantic pact with Canada and the United States, the U.S. State Department now proposed further informal and non-committal talks with the Ambassadors in Washington before a formal conference were called. It was expected that these talks would begin by the middle of next week.

The Department of External Affairs were preparing a draft statement in detail on the proposed treaty as a basis for instructing the Canadian representative on the more important issues which would now be coming up for discussion.

There would be no opportunity for Cabinet consideration of these draft documents before the talks were resumed. As had been indicated, however, the discussions were to be informal and non-committal at this stage and any conclusions reached would of course be subject to approval by the government. Any instructions given to Mr. Wrong would, in any event, accord with the decision taken by the Cabinet at the meeting of October 6th when approval was given to Canadian participation in the negotiation of a North Atlantic pact along the lines then proposed.

(External Affairs memorandum to the Minister, Nov. 16, 1948).

20. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the Minister's report.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Pearson only from Reid, Begins: North Atlantic Treaty. On November 15 I sent you by air bag a personal letter under cover of which I transmitted the latest draft of November 14† of the statement of the preliminary views of the Canadian Government on the Washington paper of September 9 and a covering memorandum in draft form of November 15 for Mr. St. Laurent. This memorandum went forward unchanged to Mr. St. Laurent, with that date, on November 16.

2. I hope you will be receiving my letter and these papers today or tomorrow. The envelope is marked to be delivered to you immediately and I hope very much that you can make arrangements to get away from Assembly work for a couple of hours so that you can go through the papers and send me a telegram containing your suggestions for revision of the statement of Canadian views.

3. My immediately following telegram† gives you the amendments which have been made in the November 14 draft of the statement since it was sent to you. Ends.

TOP SECRET

Following for Reid from Wrong, Begins: Your letter of November 15th.

I have only had time to go hurriedly through your redraft of the comment concerning the North Atlantic Treaty. I note that it keeps growing longer instead of shorter, and I think that it should be cut down sharply. The following are particular suggestions:

Paragraph 3. Omit the annexes<sup>120</sup> and the last sentence.<sup>121</sup>

These consisted of excerpts from statements by Canadian ministers and officials.

<sup>121</sup> "Canadian policy and action must be determined in the light of the brutal reality that if a third world war should break out, Canada could not be neutral."

Paragraph 4(c). Omit as this argument is for domestic, not European consumption.<sup>122</sup>

Paragraph 4(d). Omit last phrase<sup>123</sup> for the same reason and also the word "constitutional" which is ambiguous.

Paragraph 4(e). New international institutions have lost their appeal.

Make this read "It could contain within itself", etc.

Paragraph 4(f). This is in too large language.<sup>124</sup>

Paragraph 7.<sup>125</sup> Omit entirely. It interrupts the argument.

Paragraph 8(d) and (f).<sup>126</sup> These suggestions would greatly complicate the task of negotiation, and I doubt their value in any event.

Paragraphs 11 to 17.<sup>127</sup> The conclusion of an immediately effective interim agreement might well prejudice approval of the treaty by the Senate. I consider it quite superfluous in any case. I find your references to public opinion in paragraphs 16 and 17 unconvincing. Remember that the more complex the agreement the greater the delay in negotiation and ratification. I am all for a simple treaty of perhaps a dozen articles.

Paragraph 20.<sup>128</sup> This is hardly a comment on the Washington paper. I think we cannot face these questions at this stage and that they should be settled by the Council.

Paragraphs 21 and 22. I see no useful role for "a deliberative body". Surely the Council ought to deliberate as well as decide. We have too many international agencies already.

Paragraph 23.<sup>129</sup> Add at end of first sentence "with full obligations".

Paragraph 25. Last sentence.<sup>130</sup> What more do we want from Iceland than this, and yet you press for a fuller Icelandic obligation? I would omit this.

<sup>122</sup> "It could be a recognition of the fact that the best place to defend Canada is as far away from Canada as possible."

<sup>129</sup> Se rapporte à la participation de pays plus petits. Reference to participation of smaller countries.

<sup>130</sup> Se rapporte à la protection des installations de défense islandaises si l'Islande accepte de les rendre disponibles en temps de paix et de guerre. Reference to defence of Icelandic defence facilities if Iceland agrees to make them available in peace and war.

Paragraphs 26 to 28.<sup>131</sup> You know already that I do not agree with your suggestions about Portugal.

Paragraph 29. Omit third sentence and first part of fourth.<sup>132</sup> I find it much more logical to include Italy than the other countries named.

Paragraph 30.<sup>133</sup> Omit or modify drastically.

I would omit paragraphs 37 to 40. I believe the economic and cultural agencies established under a North Atlantic pact would create confusion and get in the way of effective work by existing agencies. Furthermore, these paragraphs, and especially paragraph 38, sound like preaching to the Brussels Powers. This paragraph contains an implied promise of further Canadian aid.

Paragraphs 41 and 42.<sup>134</sup> This introduces an unnecessary complication. I suggest omission.

Section 13.<sup>135</sup> These suggestions would give rise to endless argument, and, if adopted, might well prevent United States ratification. Omit the whole section.

Section 14.<sup>136</sup> For reasons already stated by Robertson and myself I regard these proposals as superfluous and impracticable. I should strongly dislike having to defend some of them.

Section 15.<sup>137</sup> This might go in a separate message to me as it is not an integral part of a comment on the Washington paper.

2. I am most anxious at this stage that we should stick to the central purpose in these negotiations, which is, put bluntly, the creation of a military alliance encircling the North Atlantic. The numerous omissions which I suggest are designed to avoid confusion of the issue and to facilitate rapid negotiation. If we pushed hard for all the proposals in your draft, we would secure no support at all in many cases, and the greater the support we got for some of them the more protracted would the negotiation be. If we put forward a project like your draft treaty and it was seriously considered, the negotiation would last at least until midsummer. Ends.

Reference to 'special arrangement' with non-member Portugal in exchange for use of defence facilities in Azores.

<sup>132</sup> Se rapporte au fait que l'Italie n'est pas un pays de l'Atlantique-Nord et que d'autres pays (la Grèce, la Turquie, le Mexique, le Brésil) pourraient revendiquer le même droit d'appartenance. References to fact Italy is not a North Atlantic country and that others (Greece, Turkey, Mexico, Brazil) might have similar claim to join.

Compares treatment of Italy (for geographic reasons) to that of Portugal (for ideological ones).

<sup>134</sup> Se rapporte au règlement de différends à l'amiable.

References to peaceful settlement of disputes.

I received your personal letter with enclosures yesterday and will be sending you my observations by telegram over the week-end. I doubt if I can get them to you before tomorrow evening, but I do not think that the urgency is as great as you indicate because my talks with Jebb here point to the fact that it would be extremely difficult for the talks to be resumed in Washington for another ten days or so. Brussels Powers are still concerting their views on the earlier memorandum and will need, I am sure, more meetings for that purpose. However, they seem to be making satisfactory progress in this regard and Jebb tells me that some of the earlier ideas that the French put forward and which were quite impractical and unwise have been modified. I agree, however, that it is important to get our own views to Washington as quickly as possible and I will do my best to get my final observations on the subject to you by tomorrow. Ends.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The following are my comments upon the draft "Statement of the Preliminary Views of the Canadian Government" sent me with your memorandum of November 15† and my own views on the procedure for consideration of this question by the government.

1. The Draft Statement of Preliminary Views is an able document. It is, however, my, perhaps unreasonable, opinion that it is too complete at this stage and that it would be preferable to leave out much of the detail at least until the Washington discussions have got under way again.

2. There is absolutely no chance of the Cabinet deciding next week, even tentatively, upon more than the most important general principles of the kind of treaty they would be prepared to recommend to Parliament. The Cabinet have already gone some distance in accepting for purposes of further discussion the Washington document of September 9th. I think they should not be asked to go much further until we have some idea of what the other governments are likely to do.

3. It is felt, I know, that it would be helpful tactically if Wrong could be given, before the talks resume, the kind of detailed guidance which would enable him to circulate early in the talks a Canadian draft. I simply do not believe that authority for this can be obtained, and I am not sure that it should.

4. It may turn out that we shall be substantial contributors to the North Atlantic pool because of our position and resources, but we should not take too leading a part in the negotiations until we have more definite indications of what our treaty obligations are to be in men, money and materials. There is, in my view, real danger that we may be open to the charge of speaking loudly but carrying a pretty small twig.

5. My comments on the detailed proposals follow:

Para. 4(c).<sup>138</sup> Might well be omitted. This surely is for domestic consumption.

Para. 4(d).<sup>139</sup> Reference to command organization in the last war should be omitted. It was pretty successful and inclusion of this reference might merely annoy.

Para. 4(e).<sup>140</sup> "Within the framework of the United Nations" might well be added here.

Para. 4(f).<sup>141</sup> This is rather high flying and might be left to speeches. Anyway, the term "commonwealth" should be avoided.

Para. 5(b). As I shall indicate below, I am still doubtful whether the whole paraphernalia of organs and agencies should be blueprinted at the outset.<sup>142</sup>

Para. 8(f).<sup>143</sup> This is probably a good idea but other members of the United Nations might have grounds for objecting to any formal ganging up to obtain amendments of the charter.

Section V.<sup>144</sup> As I have indicated, I am worried about blueprinting the agencies at this stage. Would it not be better to wait and provide for them as the need is established? I have become allergic to functional charts and Section V clearly calls for one to be inserted. No doubt the Council should be established at the outset, but couldn't the rest come later?

The Interim Arrangements Agreement seems to me a good idea.

Para. 20.<sup>145</sup> Here you may be in real difficulty. "Certain" contracting states raises all the difficulties encountered during the last war in the dealings of the rest of us with the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

Para. 21. I am frankly apprehensive about the proposed "deliberative body". Logically, I agree it completes the picture but I can imagine what frustrations and delays would attend its deliberations. I certainly wouldn't be inclined to put this forward at the outset.<sup>146</sup>

Section VII.<sup>147</sup> What about Western Germany? To include her in the "safety-zone" will be almost as difficult as to leave her out.

Para. 35. We are still some way yet from having a government in Canada ready to recommend to Parliament a pledge unlimited by constitutional safeguards.<sup>148</sup>

Section IX. Canada's capacity to contribute further economic assistance depends in large part upon conditions beyond her control, principally the maintenance of a satisfactory balance of payments position. On this aspect of the treaty obligations we would have to keep our economic vulnerability in mind.<sup>149</sup>

Section XIV.<sup>150</sup> Admirable but perhaps unnecessary.

Para. 56.<sup>151</sup> I doubt the feasibility of this timetable.

6. I have sent you my suggested revisions for your summary of the draft statement. As shortened and revised, this summary might be distributed at next week's Cabinet meeting. If approved, this should provide quite sufficient authority for Wrong at least at the beginning of the discussions. The longer draft as finally revised and in the light of Mr. Pearson's comments might then go to Wrong as merely a working paper.

7. These comments are, I am afraid, almost wholly negative. Not that I am unenthusiastic about the "crusade", — quite the contrary. But I am far from being convinced that the Canadian people have as yet by any means such a clear and

It seems clear that the document which we have hitherto entitled "Statement of the Preliminary Views of the Canadian Government" should be given the simple title of "Commentary on the Washington Paper of September 9, 1948" and that all references to suggestions or proposals "by the Canadian Government" should be deleted. Where, for example, there is a passage which reads "the Canadian Government suggests that the preamble might include", the underlined words would be deleted.

2. I have made these changes in the commentary.

3. I am awaiting Mr. Pearson's telegram from Paris giving his decision on the commentary. As soon as I have received his revisions, I shall have them made in the commentary and shall have a clean copy of the commentary sent to you.

4. It would seem desirable that a paper be prepared for possible circulation to the members of Cabinet which would summarize the commentary. I have prepared such a memorandum which is entitled "Instructions to the Canadian Representative". This may not be perhaps the best possible title and I would welcome your suggestions for revision.<sup>153</sup>

5. I am finding it very difficult to reach a meeting of minds with Mr. Wrong, who will, of course, be our representative in the Washington discussions. I have therefore this morning dictated a first draft of a teletype to him<sup>154</sup> in reply to a teletype from him which I received yesterday. I enclose these two documents.

DRAFT TELEGRAM (NOT SENT)<sup>155</sup>

Ottawa, November 20, 1948

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL.

Following for Wrong only from Reid, Begins: North Atlantic Treaty. Your WA-2980 of November 19.

I am sorry that you had time only to go hurriedly through my redraft of November 14† of the Commentary on the Washington paper of September 9. What I had very much hoped I might receive from you was a precise statement contending that certain specific proposals which you had made previously and which I had not incorporated in the November 14 draft were consistent with the policy of the Canadian Government as declared in numerous public statements by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence. You will recall that in my letter to you of November 15 I said, with reference to your proposals, that "Where I did not accept either yours or Mr. Robertson's completely or in part, it was (subject to omissions as the result of working under pressure) because I did not feel that it was proper for me to make any revision which could be interpreted as a departure from the line which has been taken publicly by Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson during the past fourteen months." I had hoped that I had made it clear in that letter that what I had been trying to do is not to make proposals for the kind of treaty which I want, but to make proposals for the kind of treaty which the Canadian Government wants. My own view as to the kind of treaty which I would like to see drawn up as soon as possible is set forth in my draft treaty of a year ago.

2. In the last paragraph of your teletype No. 2980 you state that "you are most anxious at this stage that we should stick to the central purpose in these negotiations, which is, the creation of a military alliance encircling the North Atlantic." I agree with you that the numerous omissions which you suggest are designed to accomplish this purpose.

3. However, my reading of the statements made publicly by the Canadian Government leads me inevitably to the conclusion that the Canadian Government would not be satisfied with the mere creation, as a result of the Washington discussions, of "a military alliance". Mr. St. Laurent has, during the past six months or so, stated repeatedly, both on public platform and in the House of Commons, that a military alliance is not enough, that the treaty must have a positive content and that it must be the basis for a mobilization not only of military strength but of economic and moral strength. The same point has repeatedly been made by Mr. Pearson.

<sup>155</sup> Notes marginales :/Marginal notes:

Draft only — not sent to Mr. Wrong.

Copy of draft sent to Mr. Pearson under No. 280 of Nov. 20/48

4. It would seem to me, therefore, that unless you would desire, at this late date, to ask me to put before the Prime Minister a message from you setting forth your reasons why you think his policy is mistaken, and ask him to reconsider the basis of his policy, there is no alternative but for us to use our best efforts in discussions in Washington and through normal diplomatic channels to secure the kind of treaty which Mr. St. Laurent has declared that he wants.

5. In an effort to outline certain provisions which might be included in the treaty which would carry out Mr. St. Laurent's declared purposes, I included, in the Departmental draft of November 14, Section 9 on economic and social cooperation and Section 10 on the peaceful settlement of disputes.

6. A number of the passages in the Departmental memorandum of November 14 to which you take exception have been inserted at the express request either of the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Acting Secretary.

7. The last sentence of paragraph 3 and paragraph 4(c) were inserted by Mr. Claxton.

8. I had previously transmitted to Mr. Pearson your arguments, which you repeat in your teletype No. 2980 in your comments on paragraphs 23, 25 and 29, and Mr. Pearson has, after careful consideration, maintained his line on these questions. It would seem to me therefore that no useful purpose would be served by continuing to press him on these points. In a telegram to me from Paris of November 13,<sup>156</sup> he said, with respect to any suggestion that there might be some sort of associate or second class membership, "Uniformity of obligation is what is required and this should be our objective." In discussions with me before he left for Europe, Mr. Pearson emphasized this point very strongly and he instructed me to remove any suggestion from any paper we might prepare that there could or should be any sort of second-class or associate membership in the North Atlantic organization.

9. Similarly, Mr. Pearson has considered, on numerous occasions during the past six or eight months the question of whether Italy should be invited to become a member of the North Atlantic organization, and he has always rejected this proposal. The language in paragraph 29 of the Departmental draft of November 14, to which you take exception, was put in at Mr. Pearson's request. Here again, I cannot think that any useful purpose would be served by raising this issue again with Mr. Pearson.

10. The language in the last sentence of paragraph 53 of the draft of November 14 is also little more than a paraphrase of a recommendation made by Mr. Pearson from Paris a week ago.

11. An effort was made in drafting Section 9 on economic and social cooperation, and the corresponding section in the draft treaty, to ensure that the treaty would not repeat not require the North Atlantic organization to set up special economic and cultural agencies. However, in the interests of flexibility, it would seem to us that the door should be left open for the creation of such special agencies if, at any time during the life of the treaty, they should be considered by the contracting states to be desirable.

12. Canadian newspapermen like George Ferguson have recently, in talking to me, urged how essential it is that the document signed at the end of the conference on the North Atlantic treaty should make reference to, and if possible establish immediately, organs similar to those already established by the Western Union powers. They contend that, unless this is done, an important section of Canadian opinion may feel that the Canadian Government has failed in what Mr. St. Laurent has called its "crusade". It was to meet this kind of apprehension that we have suggested the conclusion of an Interim Arrangements Agreement. Ends.

Paris, November 21, 1948

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Reid from Pearson, Begins: Your telegram No. 269 and letter of November 15th, North Atlantic Treaty.

Following are my observations on draft statement of Government's views and draft memorandum to Mr. St. Laurent:

1. Government Statement

I think that on the whole this is an impressive document and the sooner it gets to Washington the better. I would like to suggest, however, certain changes as follows:

Paragraph 3: Last sentence should be omitted as inappropriate for submission to other Governments though suitable for purely Canadian consumption.<sup>157</sup>

Paragraph 4: First sentence should end with words "existing international situation".<sup>158</sup>

Sub-paragraph (a). For "Soviet Union" read "any aggressor".

<sup>158</sup> Cette modification éliminerait la locution :

This amendment would delete the phrase:

"and go far to meet the publicly stated objectives of Canadian foreign policy."

Omit sub-paragraphs (b) and (c)<sup>159</sup> for same reasons as stated above re paragraph 3.

End sub-paragraph (d) at "organs and agents".<sup>160</sup>

In sub-paragraph (f) for "Commonwealth" read "group" and for "alliance" substitute "collective security system". Omit words "in the course of this generation" and insert word "closer" before "unity".<sup>161</sup>

Paragraph 7: Take Mr. St. Laurent's speech out of text and attach it as Annex A to the statement, with consequential changes to this paragraph.<sup>162</sup>

Paragraph 8: I feel that there is a possibility of sub-paragraph (d)<sup>163</sup> being misunderstood but will leave its inclusion to your and Claxton's judgment.

I like the idea of the interim arrangements agreement but on further consideration think that paragraphs 21 and 22 should be omitted altogether. I think to include them at this time might provoke unnecessary controversy and discussion though some development of this sort may ultimately be desirable.

Paragraph 25: For "drive the hardest possible bargain" read "consider very carefully".<sup>164</sup>

I doubt whether the suggestion in the last sentence of this paragraph is really a very good one or would make much appeal to doubtful States. It seems to me that it implies a distinction without really a difference between membership and partial membership. The defence of facilities in another country would certainly involve that country in war between the Atlantic Organization and an aggressor.

After giving further consideration to the question of Portugal, I now feel that last sentence of paragraph 27 and paragraph 28 should be replaced by a short paragraph along the following lines:

"There will be a difficulty in reconciling the above principles with the membership of Portugal. Only the most important strategic considerations can therefore justify Portugal's inclusion."

As far as Italy is concerned, the French are now strongly of the view that Italy should be included, but I think none the less paragraph 29 should remain as it is,

On (c), see Document 433n.122. Sub-paragraph (6) refers to Canadian need for assistance of Western European allies to defend itself.

<sup>160</sup> Supprime la locution à laquelle Wrong s'objectait dans le document 433, note 123.

This eliminates phrase to which Wrong objected in Document 433n.123.

Reference to relationship between failure by others to honour obligations under UN Charter and release of members of North Atlantic Treaty from their own obligations under UN Charter.

<sup>164</sup> Se rapporte aux négociations avec les pays scandinaves, l'Islande et l'Irlande.

Reference to negotiations with Scandinavian countries, Iceland and Ireland.

though paragraph 30 would now have to be changed.<sup>165</sup> As Italy may be anxious to join and for other reasons, the arguments against this kind of partial association which seem to me to be valid in the case of Ireland and Sweden do not apply in the same degree to her.

Paragraph 37: The last sentence should, I think, be omitted as more suitable for a Canadian than a Western European audience.<sup>166</sup>

Paragraph 38.<sup>167</sup> For "will be required" substitute "may be required".

Paragraph 40: Omit "great" before "importance".<sup>168</sup>

2. So far as your telegram No. 270 is concerned, I agree with the amendments therein except that in paragraph 7.

3. There remains the memorandum for Mr. St. Laurent:

Paragraph 2: Last line to read "be soon".

Paragraph 3: For "about a week's time" read "shortly".

I am not much impressed by the arguments of paragraph 8 or 9 but do not, of course, object to their inclusion in a memorandum from you or Mr. Claxton to the Prime Minister.

Paragraph 12: For "a good deal more to Canadian than" substitute "as much to Canadian as".

I think paragraph 13 should be omitted.

Paragraphs 19 to 23 should be altered in line with my suggestions for amending the statement, though I have no objection, of course, to some reference to the fact that consideration may have to be given later to the establishment of a deliberative body.

Paragraph 24 will have to be altered also in view of the amendments to the statement. It would be appropriate, however, to call Mr. St. Laurent's attention to the arguments for and against admission of Portugal and to the general question of associate membership. In other words, I do not mind putting forward certain arguments and counter-arguments in a memo to the Prime Minister which would not, in my opinion, be suitable for inclusion in a statement to other governments.

4. May I end by sending you and the others concerned with this work my very sincere congratulations on such a quick and effective job. Ends.

<sup>165</sup> Le paragraphe 29 s'oppose à l'adhésion italienne puisque l'Italie n'est pas un pays de l'Atlantique Nord, alors que le paragraphe 30 suggère un arrangement comparable à celui proposé pour le Portugal.

Paragraph 29 opposed Italian membership as Italy is not a North Atlantic country, while paragraph 30 suggested an arrangement comparable to that proposed with Portugal.

Paragraph 37 emphasized the importance of European reconstruction for Canadian prosperity and security.

Paragraph 38 refers to continuing North American economic assistance to Western Europe.

<sup>168</sup> Cette modification assouplit l'insistance à certaines clauses économiques du traité.

The amendment softens the insistence on economic clauses in the treaty.

RE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

With reference to your memorandum of November 20th:

Your paragraphs 1 and 2 — I agree.

Your paragraph 3 — noted.

Your paragraph 4 — I would suggest "Memorandum for the guidance of the Canadian representative." My suggestions for further revision are indicated in pencil on your draft returned herewith.

Your paragraphs 5 and 6 — My memorandum to you of November 20th contains my comments on the draft "commentary" and my reactions to many of Wrong's suggestions for deletion and amendment can be surmised therefrom.

It seems to me that before the commentary can be put in final or even "some final" shape, we should be clear what use is to be made of it. If it is still regarded as a document for circulation to the representatives of other nations, I agree with a good deal (but not by any means all) of what Wrong said in his teletype WA-2980 of November 19th. If, however, the commentary is intended primarily for the further guidance of Wrong as our representative, a good deal more detail can be left in it.

For reasons which I indicated in my memorandum to you of November 20th, I do not believe that, in the time available, it is practicable or indeed desirable to try to obtain decisions by Cabinet upon all of the points discussed in the commentary. For that reason, I think we should consider the document as a detailed expression of departmental views for Wrong's guidance. As such, of course, it would have to be consistent with principles approved by Ministers. After Wednesday's Cabinet meeting, you should be in a position to make it such, for it is the Minister's intention at that meeting to submit the briefer document referred to above as the "Memorandum for guidance of the Canadian representative."

I would be inclined, therefore, to defer further revision of the commentary until after Wednesday's Cabinet meeting. You will then be in a position to know what revisions will accord with the Ministers' views. For the same reason I would defer answering Wrong's teletype.

Your paragraph 7 — This memorandum is being sent to you through Crean.

TELEGRAM 463

Paris, November 23, 1948

TOP SECRET

Your telegram No. 280 North Atlantic Treaty:<sup>169</sup> I have now been able to give more careful consideration to draft statement, particularly in light of Wrong's comments. Naturally full consideration must be given to these comments on points which, in his opinion, are likely to prolong and confuse initial negotiations and to prove unacceptable to the United States. I have consequently re-examined the draft carefully. Many changes suggested by Wrong have been already recommended in my earlier telegrams and the elimination of paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 has already been reported by you. In regard to Wrong's further suggestions which have not already been dealt with, my views are as follows:

I have no strong views about 8 (f). It might be retained and we can tell Wrong in supplementary instructions that this is not a matter to be pressed strongly if objection develops.

Section 5: Though still appreciating the ingenuity of the idea of an interim arrangements agreement, I am impressed by Wrong's argument that such an agreement might cause delay in negotiation of Treaty and prejudice and delay its approval by United States Senate. The nomination of specific persons at the Governmental Conference for specific jobs would certainly cause long discussion and possibly much controversy. Furthermore, if countries acceded to Treaty later, it would be more difficult to establish their relationship to agencies, the personnel of which had already been appointed. I suggest therefore, that paragraphs 11 to 17 be excluded and the following sentence be added to paragraph 10:

The Atlantic Treaty, therefore, should contain a reference to the desirability of the earliest possible establishment through the Consultative Council of the necessary agencies. This will underline the intention of the member States effectively and speedily to implement the Treaty and to get down to business without delay.

I would retain paragraphs 18 and 19 but omit paragraphs 20, 21 and 22. You already have my views on the Portugal paragraphs.

Paragraph 29 on Italy should, I think, stand, though as previously stated, paragraph 30 will now have to be amended.

Paragraphs 37 to 38 might be omitted but 39 and 40 should stand.

Section 10 should, I think, stand, but Section 13 might be taken out of the statement as arousing unnecessary American suspicions. In supplementary instructions, however, Mr. Wrong might be told to bring the points up on an appropriate occasion.

Section 14 might stand, but our preference in 54 (a) might be omitted at this stage.

Mr. Wrong's suggestion that Section 15 might come as a separate message to him seems sensible.

Please revise draft statement accordingly. This will, of course, also require consequential changes in memorandum to Mr. St. Laurent. Message ends.

Washington, November 23, 1948

Mr. Claxton telephoned me this morning about the negotiations for the North Atlantic Pact. He said that they had just heard from London that it was unlikely that the Brussels Powers would be ready to resume discussions in Washington for another fortnight. He was worried about the line that we should take, and I agreed with him that this delay made it unnecessary for us to clear our comments on the project with the Cabinet before next week.

He had been studying a new draft comment prepared by Mr. Reid dated November 22nd, † which I have not yet seen, and had read some of the comments on the earlier drafts, in particular Mr. Robertson's caustic telegram No. 1908 of November 11th. He apparently had not seen my more detailed comments, and he wanted to consult me at this stage as to the general line which I thought should be taken.

On this point I went over with him what I regard as the essentials, and proposed that we omit suggestions, at this stage in any case, for an interim arrangement agreement, a self-contained procedure of amendment in the treaty and other additions which were not essential to the central object of securing a military alliance. I also argued my view that the aim, particularly with several of the smaller countries, ought to be effective association and not uniformity of obligation. I made it clear that we would have to associate Italy in some way unless the U.S. Government completely reversed the position it has consistently taken.

He asked me whether we need put in any comment at all. I said that I thought that we should, but that it should be brief, not more than seven to ten pages, and confined principally to the essential points which we knew were still debatable. He then requested my view on the role which we should seek to play in the further negotiations. I told him that I was pretty certain that in fact the problem would be to reconcile the views of the Brussels Powers and the U.S., and that we could not secure and should not aim at securing detailed consideration of an extensive Canadian draft. We might be able to do a good deal to compromise differences, but it would only complicate and prolong the negotiations if we took the initiative in pressing for the inclusion of new matter not necessary for the conclusion of the alliance. I emphasized in particular that a detailed discussion now of the agencies to be set up under the pact would open up all the very difficult questions about their composition and representation on them. While these matters would have to be faced, it seemed to me better to set up a council of the parties and leave it to them to work out the procedure and powers of various other agencies.

He said that he, on the whole, agreed with my views. I then told him that the last of Mr. Reid's drafts that I had seen contained what seemed to me to be a good Canadian comment on the paper if it was cut down in the manner which I had indicated in my message to Mr. Reid of November 19th.

He had not seen Mr. Reid's draft treaty.
