UNITED NATIONS LEADERS

REPLIES TO MESSAGES SENT TO MR. CHURCHILL AND MR. ROOSEVELT ON MARCH 4

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday the 4th instant I read to the house copies of telegrams which I had dispatched earlier in the day to the Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, and to Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America. To these messages I have received the following replies:

From Mr. Churchill, a message dated London, March 6, 1943, as follows:

I am deeply touched by your very generous message and I send to you and to all members of the parliament of Canada my heartfelt thanks. I recall with gratitude the warmth of the reception which you all gave me when I visited Canada in December, 1941. In the darkest days Canada, under your leadership, remained confident and true. Now the days are brighter, and when victory is won, you will be able to look back with just pride upon a record surpassed by none.

I might add that this message was read over the radio last night and has appeared in the press of to-day. I have ascertained that it was given out in London on Saturday night, and that the Associated Press received the message from there. It was not given out from my office. Had I had control of the situation I should have held the message and given it to parliament in the first instance.

From Mr. Roosevelt I received this morning a message dated Washington, March 8, 1943, as follows:

The greetings of old friends have always been especially welcome to me, and so please accept my warmest thanks for your message on my tenth anniversary as president. My good neighbours, the Canadians, are kind indeed to have remembered me on this occasion; and I hope you will convey to them, especially to your colleagues in parliament and the government, my cordial appreciation.

The emphasis in your message on the success of our arms and the growing power of our offensive, strikes a prophetic note. Our people, like yours, and those of all the united nations, are determined that there shall be no faltering in our march towards victory whatever the obstacles. In this year, above all, we shall support to the limit our troops of land, sea and air in the grim fighting which lies ahead. All Americans are proud to know of the great sacrifices which their Canadian comrades have made so that Canadian men and materials could contribute so vitally to the struggle.

With cordial good wishes to you, as always,

Franklin D. Roosevelt.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REFERENCE OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated on Friday that I would refer the report of the auditor general to the public accounts committee to-day. I now move, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar):

That the public accounts and the report of the auditor general for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words with regard to this motion. First I would draw attention to the fact that the motion will deal only with the report of the auditor general as it affects public accounts up to March 31, 1942. Since this motion will be the terms of reference to the committee, it will, as I understand the situation, limit the investigation of that committee to accounts up to that time.

I have a motion on the order paper which, I note, has been relegated to the graveyard of motions by private members and therefore is not likely to be discussed by the house. I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that his motion be made to extend the terms of reference so that the committee may be allowed to investigate not only accounts up to the end of the fiscal year, 1942, but also accounts up to the present time, and particularly with reference to the work being done by the office of economy control set up by the government.

The house is already familiar with the statement made or alleged to have been made the other day to the press by the director of economy control, Colonel Thompson. Those statements are pretty serious. When a paper with the position of the Ottawa Journal proceeds to quote the director's statements, putting them in quotation marks, it seems to me the house and the public accounts committee should take serious cognizance of the fact. The press statement says:

Colonel John Thompson, the government's uncompromising economy director, to-day had just about reached the end of his tether.

He had found it increasingly impossible, he told the Journal, "To cope with all the crazy waste and extravagance which some eight months ago he was assigned to control if not eliminate".

Then in quotation marks:

"Evasion, subterfuge and outright trickery" are being used to nullify the work of the office of government economy control.

Thousands of dollars have been spent on office supplies, furniture and equipment, he charged, without the requisitions ever having been submitted to him for examination and approval or rejection.

Piled on his desk this morning were many of these requisitions which had reached him only after the orders had been placed and filled, and the bills for them accrued.

With these requisitions were the "accounts payable" for supplies which had been purchased without his authorization.

One of those accounts was for $2,500, covering but one printing job.

Colonel Thompson has kept a file of such records of "subterfuge, evasion and trickery", to prove, if necessary, how the office of government economy control has been short-circuited.

Each time the colonel has received these "accounts due" for office supplies, which have been purchased without his approval, he has marked them, in red ink, "payment refused".

Some of the accounts have been accrued with private business houses and with printing shops other than the government's publishing establishment.

"I don't know who will pay them, or how", declared the colonel, "but certain it is that I will not approve payment."

I want to draw the attention of the house to the fact that those statements have been made by an official. I know nothing about his qualifications, but I assume the government must have been satisfied with them when they appointed him to this office. He has made what amounts to a very serious charge with reference to waste and extravagance in the conduct of government business.

It seems to me that this is not a matter merely for the executive or for the government; it is a matter for the entire House of Commons, something which ought to be gone into thoroughly by a standing committee. It is true that there is a war expenditures committee, but that committee recognized that there were certain limitations to their work. I should like to quote from page 92 of the minutes of proceedings No. 3 of that committee, which contains the following in regard to the acquisition of the air field at Gimli:

It is not the duty of this subcommittee to supplant the responsibility either of the public accounts committee or the civil courts. This subcommittee does not express any opinion as to the need for further inquiry. In the light of the request made by the solicitor for the Winnipeg Tribune the subcommittee believes that such an inquiry, if deemed necessary, could be more satisfactorily made as above indicated.

I quote that for the purpose of pointing out that the war expenditures committee recognized that matters of this sort, dealing with money already spent or with the manner of the spending of such money, is a matter for discussion by the standing committee on public accounts. This is a matter to which the house ought to give serious consideration. It has often been stated that many of our functions have been usurped, but there are two great functions which this house still has. One is the duty of voting supply, and the other is the duty of scrutinizing all accounts paid or payable.

If we allow a situation of this kind to go unchallenged and without investigation, then we private members of the house are derelict in our duty. I want to make this appeal to the government and to the house. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has told us that during the next year the people of Canada are going to be asked to lend to the government the sum of $2,750,000,000. That is a tremendous figure. It will be lent to the government only as a result of considerable sacrifice on the part of the people of Canada. The members of this house will be asked, to urge upon the people of Canada that they make this contribution, and they will gladly do so. But if the people of Canada ever come to feel that this money is not being spent to the best possible advantage; if we ever allow the people to feel that there is waste, extravagance, or, as this report says, subterfuge and outright trickery, then we shall weaken in every fibre our war effort. This house can strengthen the morale of the Canadian people by asking the public accounts committee to examine the public accounts not only up to March 31, 1942, but all accounts up to the present time, and to have Colonel Thompson appear as a witness to discuss these questions which have been raised in the public press. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy):

That the motion be amended by adding the following words:

"and that the committee be empowered to examine accounts up to the end of February, 1943, and to investigate the work being done by the office of the government economy control."

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before this amendment is put I should like to say a word or so in connection with the argument which has been made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). On Friday last, on the orders of the day, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he would permit the auditor general's report to be brought before the public accounts committee. I had it in mind that that should be an automatic procedure, one which I think should have been adopted in previous years as well.

There are many reasons which would move one to make that suggestion. Far too little attention is given by the House of Commons to the auditor general's report. On that occasion I was careful in my phraseology in order to indicate that the whole house must share some responsibility with respect to it, since perhaps the excuse may be made that from time to time a motion might have brought the auditor general's report before that committee. It will produce a much more healthy condition with respect to our whole scheme of expenditures to have these expenditures come before the public accounts committee year by year. It will not only provide an opportunity for that committee to deal with the various items in question, but it will also have the effect of putting a brake upon some of the spending if the departments know that each year the public accounts committee will give close scrutiny to the auditor general's report.

I spoke mainly with the idea of providing the first step toward having a closer scrutiny of accounts generally by this parliament. Coupled with that suggestion to the Prime Minister was the suggestion that Colonel Thompson, who had made certain charges as reported in one of the Ottawa newspapers, which charges were enlarged upon by the hon. member for Weyburn and also, on Friday last, by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), should be brought before the public accounts committee. My suggestion was that Colonel Thompson should be summoned as a witness before that committee. I was saying then what the hon. member for Weyburn has said to-day in different words. I should like to associate myself with the suggestion he has made and to say that we in this parliament, particularly the members of the opposition, have a duty to see to it that no avenue is closed to the house or to parliament by which a full disclosure and complete scrutiny of the money being spent in Canada during this war-time period can be made by this House of Commons. There are in this dominion large sections of our people who are paying taxes in amounts which they have never been called upon to pay before. Because of that and for reasons of war there is growing consciousness among the people generally, amounting to a great pressure of public opinion, that every means should be adopted by members of the house to see to it that every dollar and every cent of that money shall be spent to the best possible advantage and in the most effective way towards the winning of this war. That is a duty which the public expect of the government and it is a duty which the government owes to the public.

I am glad to associate myself and this party with the amendment which has just been made, and I think we should go to the full extent and avail ourselves of every possible avenue through which these accounts can be closely scrutinized. We should not be in any way restricted or limited with respect to the time element in our inquiry into these accounts. Wherever there are matters which should be scrutinized or accounts which should be audited let us not be guided simply by a matter of dates; let us go back to the time when these accounts were incurred and the expenditures made, and then where necessary let us turn the accounts over to the public accounts committee so that it may scrutinize them in detail.

I would therefore ask the government if they would on this occasion enlarge the scope of the scrutiny of these expenditures to include any and every expenditure made up to the present time, so that the public will know that no stone has been left unturned by parliament in attempting to ascertain whether or not every cent that has been spent has been properly and well spent by the government and by parliament.

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat at a loss to understand upon what authority it is taken for granted that the director of economies control actually made these statements to the press. I am not in a position either to affirm or to deny that he did. As I said last week in this house, I instituted inquiries as soon as the matter was brought to my attention late that afternoon.

I submit to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Graydon) that it may not be wise to give a wrong direction to this matter by speaking of charges or accusations at least until we know who has said anything and what he has said. The only thing I am yet able to bring to the attention of the house in connection with this matter is a memorandum dated Saturday last, March 6, addressed to me by Colonel John Thompson, director of government office economies control, which I should like to read:

Apropos of an item I saw in the press, either last night or the night before, I wish to say that at no time has there been any interference by the government, or yourself, or any member of parliament, with this office in the performance of the duties allotted to it by order in council.

The word "no" in the memorandum is underlined, and the letter is signed by John Thompson, whose full title is Colonel John Thompson, director of government office economies control.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that all that there is in the memorandum, may I ask?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, and may I repeat what I said a moment ago, that I have brought to the house all that I have from Colonel Thompson as yet.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may ask the minister a question, is that the only memorandum that has come to him from Colonel Thompson?

Mr. LaFLECHE: Yes, that is the only memorandum that I can find touching upon the question under discussion in this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Had the minister seen the item in the Ottawa Journal and brought it to the attention of Colonel Thompson prior to his sending that memorandum?

Mr. LaFLECHE: On Friday last I made it very clear that as soon as I saw that article I instituted inquiries, and of course I wrote to the director.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister seen the list of specific charges in Saturday's Toronto Telegram and to-day's Ottawa Journal?

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I say that with the best of will or the worst I cannot take it for granted that these charges have been made by Colonel Thompson. I know him as an honourable gentleman, and I would remind the house of what I said in that connection last Friday, that particularly in the case of such a very old servant of the country as Colonel Thompson is—for years he was head of the pension commission—I would expect that had he any complaints to make he would make them to his minister direct. In their absence I am not in a position to add one word to what I have already said. I have already given to the house all the information that I have.

[Mr. LaFleche.]

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister one other question? Has Colonel Thompson denied to the minister the charges that were made in the Ottawa Journal?

Mr. LaFLECHE: I can only repeat—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would point out that there is a motion and an amendment before the chair. We are not in committee and questioning cannot be permitted.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Personally I think the only manner in which this matter can be cleared up is to have the committee sit and have Colonel Thompson appear before it to substantiate or deny that he ever gave such an interview. The statements that appeared in the press quoted Colonel Thompson, and my experience with the newspaper reporters, particularly those in the gallery of this house, is that when they quote someone they endeavour to quote accurately. I have not known them to do otherwise deliberately. I suggest that the men in our gallery at Ottawa are reliable when they give statements within quotation marks. Moreover, I cannot quite understand the situation, because Colonel Thompson said in his quoted statement that he had made repeated representations to the minister, and the minister has just said, as I understand it, that he has no representations of this sort on file from Colonel Thompson.

I think that the amendment should carry and that the matter should be dealt with under the procedure laid down by parliament. The committee has the power to call witnesses and question them under oath and to go to the bottom of the whole matter in a proper manner. I believe we would be derelict in our duty if we did not follow that procedure, because the charges which are said to have been made are of a serious nature, and ought to be gone into very carefully indeed by a committee of this house. The proper committee is the public accounts committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say first of all that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) asked me last week if I would see that the auditor general's report was referred to the public accounts committee and I said that I would. I have gone him one better by moving that the public accounts be referred as well. I made a mistake in replying to my hon. friend when I said that I thought the auditor general's report had in previous years been referred automatically to the public accounts committee. I agree with the leader of the opposition that it would be desirable that the auditor general's report and the public accounts should be referred to the public accounts committee as soon as tabled and the public accounts committee set up. I think that should be done every year. It has not always been done; it has sometimes been done; when it has not been done, it is because the opposition no less than the government were content to have matters as they were.

In regard to the amendment which has just been proposed, may I say first of all that I think it is out of order. I think it is out of order for the reason that it is a substantive motion in itself and therefore cannot be moved as an amendment. His Honour the Speaker has already given a decision to that effect in this session.

But I do not wish to allow the matter to rest there. I am in complete accord with the leader of the opposition and with all hon. members of the house in their desire to see that every possible restraint is placed upon possible unnecessary expenditures and, certainly as far as it is humanly possible so to do, to prevent wasteful expenditure of any kind. The more we can apply safeguards in that direction, the better it is going to be for all concerned. At the same time I do think it is necessary that in these matters we should adopt a procedure which at least carries with it a sense of the responsibility of a great assembly such as this House of Commons with respect to matters that are to be made a subject of public inquiry. Newspaper articles have been read. They contain certain allegations and representations. Some of these allegations have already been discussed on the floor of this house as if they were charges. They have been spoken of as charges and the word goes out from the press gallery that the government has been charged with this and that, that there has been a charge that such and such has taken place, that there has been a charge also of such and such waste. When the matter is truly stated, it is seen to be only a report in a newspaper. Whether it is within quotation marks or not does not matter. If this House of Commons is going to begin to assume as evidence of bona fides everything that appears in the public press in the nature of representations or allegations against some officer of or matters connected with the government, and take that source as the one from which investigations are to be made, it must be apparent that we shall be making a farce of our whole procedure.

I have just as much respect for the gentlemen in the press gallery as my hon. friend has; but he has no guarantee that the particular report which he says is in quotations was from any journalist in the gallery. It may have been from some reporter who is not in the gallery. I cannot say. At any rate, I hope my remarks will not be taken as reflecting at all on any journalist, one way or the other. What I say is this. The press has its responsibility, and the House of Commons and its members have their responsibility; and if there is to be an investigation of any matter I submit that at least before an inquiry starts before a committee of this parliament, some member of the House of Commons should himself take responsibility for asking that the matter in question be investigated. I think we should have something more to go upon before a public inquiry starts than simply an item in a newspaper.

It is free to any member of this house to ask that the public accounts committee be convened at any time it is desirable to have it so convened, and when the public accounts committee meets it is open to the members of that committee, which contains representatives from all sides of the house, to make what requests they wish with respect to the parties who are to appear. So far as I am concerned, and I am certain my colleagues would join me in this, if when the public accounts committee is called together hon. members wish Colonel Thompson to appear before it, we will not have the slightest objection to having Colonel Thompson so appear. If it is going to serve a helpful purpose to have the statements that have thus far appeared in the press made the subject of inquiry and Colonel Thompson called as a witness, the government will be only too ready to meet the wishes of the committee if that particular request is made. But I wish to make this perfectly clear, that in so doing it should not be assumed that we are establishing a precedent, so that any time anyone wishes to begin an investigation before the public accounts committee, a representation in the press may be taken as sufficient ground for the instituting of a public inquiry.

There is one other point. It is in reference to the public accounts. I understand that the auditor general goes through the public accounts and audits the public accounts before they are made public by tabling in the house. I cannot say how soon the accounts of the current year can be made available to parliament and tabled; that is a matter upon which I would have to get further information. I mention this because I believe the motion I have made goes as far as any similar motion has gone in any previous year, —as far as at this particular moment I feel it is possible to go.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I draw the attention of the house to one or two things. First, the memorandum read by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFlèche) does not deal with the question under discussion at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman speaking to the point of order?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No. A point of order, I understand, has not yet been raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was speaking on the amendment. I did not know that a matter of procedure had been raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman moved an amendment and spoke to it. He cannot speak twice unless he is speaking to a point of order. If any hon. gentleman wishes to speak to the point of order I should like to hear him now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling on the point of order, may I suggest that the amendment is properly an amendment to a motion, that all it does is to suggest that certain words be added to the motion extending the terms of reference. If the procedure is such that hon. members are precluded from amending a motion of this description, drawn in general terms so that general terms can be extended to include something specific, it seems to me that the house is being denied a right which it ought properly to have. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) endeavoured to place his suggestion before the house by giving the required notice under the standing order providing for forty-eight hours' notice, not knowing that this motion was to be introduced by the government, and he finds that the motion which he filed in the usual way is being relegated to such a position on the order paper that in all probability it cannot be reached this session. If the ruling of the Chair should be that one cannot move an amendment extending the reference to cover a matter which cannot successfully be made the subject of a substantive motion because of the position in which it is placed, under private members' resolutions, on the order paper, I submit that that ruling would deny to this house a right which hon. members should be able to exercise.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BOUCHER: Speaking further to the point of order taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), it seems to me that the attitude of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is particularly appropriate when one couples with it the statement I understood the Prime Minister to have made, that to refer a matter of this kind to the public accounts committee, some hon. member should take the responsibility of laying a charge. If that is so; if a member of the House of Commons must lay a charge and accept the responsibility of doing so before a matter can be referred to the public accounts committee, a substantive motion of this kind, enlarging the scope of the terms of reference to the public accounts committee, would apparently be out of order. But on the other hand how could a matter be referred to the public accounts committee unless an individual charge were made? The motion itself seems to imply the reverse of the statement that an individual member must make a charge before the matter is referred to the public accounts committee. One cannot but be forced to that conclusion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is:

That the public accounts and the report of the auditor general for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

To that an amendment is moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy):

That the motion be amended by adding the following words:

"and that the committee be empowered to examine accounts up to the end of February, 1943, and to investigate the work being done by the office of the government economy control."

I have listened carefully and given due consideration to the statements made by the hon. member for Weyburn and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with regard to an amendment to a motion such as we have before us. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of the extension of the motion and the adding thereto of a period during which these accounts could be examined. The hon. member did not refer to the latter part of the amendment, which states:

". . . and to investigate the work being done by the office of the government economy control."

I am of course concerned with the procedure of the house. In my judgment it would be a dangerous precedent that any motion such as that which is now before the house should be added to and a reference made to an investigation to be made. Such

I would also point out to the house that under the reference which is made to the public accounts committee and all standing committees, persons and records may be brought before that committee; there is nothing to prevent members of the standing committee, when these matters are under discussion, from asking for the attendance of any witness, because they have that power now under the standing order; and the committee then will be the judge as to whether or not the investigation shall be completed, and if necessary they in turn can come back to the house for further instructions.

In the meantime we are faced with a motion, and, as I am of opinion, a substantive motion moved as an amendment, which is not in accordance with the rules of the house. Therefore I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. HARRY LEADER: (Portage la Prairie): Perhaps it will be in order for me to say a word or two, Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion. I believe I am a member of the public accounts committee, and therefore will have the opportunity to discharge my duties in that capacity. I was struck by what the Prime Minister said a few moments ago, that the members of this house owe a duty to parliament, and I presume that includes those who elected us to parliament. I believe that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), instead of being declared out of order, should have been accepted by the Prime Minister. I have not even read the newspaper article referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn. But I have gathered that suspicion will be aroused in the minds of the taxpayers, and we should do everything within our power to see that their minds are not poisoned. If the information is false, we should see that everything is brought out into broad daylight.

I was going to give an example of what happened years ago. The auditor general's report was being discussed in the house. I had gone through that report pretty thoroughly, and I noted that the auditor general brought to our attention the fact that there had been overpayment in a department of government. I am not saying it was altogether when the Liberals were in office; it was going on when either party was in office. But the watchdog of the treasury drew the attention of the members representing the people of Canada to the fact that overpayment had been made and had never been repaid. I ran across this also, which goes to show that something can be done even in parliament. A certain civil servant was moved from Ottawa to new duties in Calgary. He was a surveyor, receiving, if I remember correctly, a salary of over $4,000 a year. When he was moved to Calgary he was given a living allowance, I believe about six dollars a day. After about a year he was brought back to Ottawa, and I think for two or three years after he returned to Ottawa he was still getting his salary plus living allowance.

When I noted that the auditor general drew the attention of members of parliament to the fact that these overpayments were being made, as a representative of the people I thought it my duty to bring the matter before parliament, which I did. It was in the department of the Minister of the Interior of that time. When I mentioned it he said he was not aware that that situation existed, and being very sympathetic I asked the minister if he had not the information at the time to bring it down later. He promised to do so, and later did; he said that the situation as depicted by the member for Portage la Prairie was true. I met him on the street some time later and I am not giving away any confidences—he said, "Harry, I did not know anything about that."

There is an example. Such conditions as these things existed then and perhaps they exist now. We have charges to-day, or a quotation from a civil servant, as reported in the press, and the Prime Minister should be the first to say, we must explore this to the limit. I want to make my position clear. If a vote is taken on this amendment I shall have to vote against the government. My conscience dictates nothing else.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) in the course of his remarks stated that the Prime Minister should accept the amendment. I should like to point out to the house that only during the last two weeks an amendment was accepted by the house which, as I indicated, if it had been placed before the Chair I should have ruled it out of order. Following that, within a week, another similar amendment was made and I had then to rule it out of order. I would say to the house that if the Prime Minister had moved the adoption of this amendment as part of the motion I should have felt it my duty to point out to him that it was entirely contrary to the rules of the house, and I should have to declare it out of order.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): No more important duty rests upon this house than careful scrutiny of all expenditures. Where there is any suggestion of over-expenditure, as is alleged to have been stated by Colonel Thompson, the place to determine that is in this house or in the committee, and not in newspaper articles. We now find ourselves in this position. One newspaper says that Colonel Thompson made a certain statement; other newspapers say he did not make it. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) in a statement on Friday which was very difficult to follow, seemed to take no stand whatsoever on the question. The position now is that although allegations have been made in a responsible newspaper, the members of this parliament are not to have the opportunity to examine the accounts. It is all very well to say, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, that the public accounts committee will be convened and that Colonel Thompson may be called before it if the committee so decides. You will have a committee of fifty members—and as in all committees the government will have an overwhelming majority. Why the government should seem to be desirous of not having Colonel Thompson brought before this committee I do not know. I suggest that the attitude will not be changed when the public accounts committee is convened.

We have the war expenditures committee which meets behind closed doors. When the committee was set up the Prime Minister said that the committee would meet in the open except when otherwise decided. Yet from the very beginning as soon as we got into the committee there was no question about it at all. The decision announced in the house by the Prime Minister was not carried out.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will my friend permit an interruption? I know he does not want to misrepresent—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will permit an interruption when I am through with my argument. As soon as the subcommittees were set up the motion was made and in every case it was decided, except in the case of one subcommittee, that they should meet behind closed doors. What is the result? Everyone knows that a certain degree of secrecy must be observed, the paramount desire being the safety of the state. But the safety of the state does not demand that instances of over-expenditure should not be brought to the attention of parliament when heard in the war expenditures committee. Yet the lips of every member of the war expenditures committee are sealed as to the information they secure in that committee; they may not bring it before parliament.

Mr. CLEAVER: Before leaving that would my hon. friend allow me? I know he does not wish to leave an incorrect impression.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the question?

Mr. CLEAVER: Is it not a fact that it was left with the individual subcommittees to determine how each of their sessions should be held, whether in camera or in public. Also is it not a fact that as to the subcommittee on which my hon. friend sat for one entire session of the house no motion was ever made that it should sit in public? I am chairman of that subcommittee and I make that statement.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All I know is that the Prime Minister gave the promise that the committees would meet in the open except when in the interests of the safety of the state the committee might otherwise decide; and in every case when a vote took place the vote was always that they should meet in secret.

Mr. MAYBANK: Would the hon. member permit one more question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. MAYBANK: I would ask the hon. member whether he himself ever proposed a motion that they meet publicly, and had it voted down. It does not seem to agree with what was said across the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I raised the matter in this house—

Mr. MAYBANK: In committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, and raised it in the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Just a minute; I raised it in the committee, and other members of the opposition raised it in the committee, and in every case they were voted down. Now—

Mr. CLEAVER: I do not like to have to interrupt again, but I was chairman of the committee on which the hon. member sat, and he did not nor did any other hon. member move such a motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not interrupt.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not mind answering questions, but I do object to speeches being made. The fact that such conditions do prevail in the war expenditures committee, where many matters were brought up, such as war-time housing, elementary flying training schools, air observer schools, information which would not have been of assistance to the enemy, has aroused the suspicion—

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a point of order. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman is entirely out of order in discussing the war expenditures committee, and in dealing with war-time housing or any of these other matters on the motion now before the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not agree that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is out of order. He is speaking with regard to public accounts, and in illustration he mentioned these other points. He is in order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to add this, that the very fact that the subcommittees of the war expenditures committees have met in secret has aroused a feeling that we in this parliament are not discharging our responsibilities, and that we are not properly scrutinizing public expenditures. And when an allegation of improvident expenditures is made in the press, by a man holding one of the most responsible positions in the service of his country—

An hon. MEMBER: He did not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, he is alleged to have made certain statements—

An hon. MEMBER: That is different.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —and now the opportunity comes to have him brought before a committee, he should be given the opportunity to give his evidence. I ask the Prime Minister if he will give parliament and the country the assurance that if any hon. member on the public accounts committee will call Colonel Thompson, his evidence will be accepted in the committee.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Speaking, sir, to the present motion, and following Your Honour's recent ruling in regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and answering the suggestion he has been good enough to make, that government supporters on the public accounts committee will gang up on him and prevent evidence from coming out, I should like to make one or two remarks. The hon. member for Lake Centre made the statement, in regard to the work of the war expenditures committee, that all the sittings of the committee had been in camera, although the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had declared to the house these would be open, except where for military reasons or otherwise they should not be open. I should like to make a few comments in regard to the hon. member's statement, just to keep the record clear.

The committee was given the fullest possible powers by the house with regard to its sittings. It had the power to hold sittings in open or in camera. The main committee, in turn, passed on that same power to the subcommittee, and it was left to the discretion of each individual subcommittee as to what, if any, of their meetings should be held in camera, and as to what, if any, should be held in public.

The hon. member for Lake Centre was a member of subcommittee No. 1, for one session of the house. I was chairman of that subcommittee, and I say as chairman that the hon. member did not at any time move that a sitting of that committee should be in public, nor was any such motion ever voted on, or voted down, as he inferentially suggested a moment ago.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to allow that last statement to be accepted as covering the activities of all the committees. I would correct it to this extent, that when we met in general committee, comprising all those making up subcommittees 1, 2 and 3, I had the honour on each occasion to move that all meetings be held in open session. On every occasion we were voted down by those who support the present administration. Then, in turn, as subcommittees convened, the same question arose and in the case of subcommittee No. 2, on which it was my privilege to serve, they did open up the session and we had open discussions. This arose from a little generosity on the part of some of the members supporting the government, and from the fortunate absence of another. The vote carried by a majority of one, which kept the sessions open. On a later occasion, to the embarrassment of the chairman, the sessions were again opened, and the chairman immediately adjourned subcommittee No. 2 on that particular day to consider the position. His ideas were voted down. But he was kind enough to reconvene the committee in open session afterwards. It is patent therefore on the very surface of it that government majorities on committees almost always—at least as far back as I can remember—vote the way the treasury benches want them to vote in handling any matter which is the subject of inquiry before any committee. That condition obtains in the work of the war expenditures committee.

Mr. G. R. BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) has risen in the house to make it perfectly clear, so far as sittings of the war expenditures subcommittees are concerned, that each is left to its own discretion as to how it shall operate. In the past year I had the honour of being on subcommittee No. 1. True enough, the main committee did delegate to the subcommittee the power to decide whether it should or should not sit in secret. True it is also that in subcommittee No. 1, on which the hon. member for Halton was chairman, a motion was made at the very first sitting dealing with war-time expenditures in which it was asked that the sittings be in secret. And true it is that the motion was defeated.

Mr. CLEAVER: It was withdrawn.

Mr. BOUCHER: The hon. member for Halton may speak again after I have finished. Subcommittee No. 1 sat in secret throughout the whole of the session, dealing with many things which in my humble opinion did not warrant the slightest secrecy. Therefore I say to the hon. member that when dealing with the question of secrecy, in order that what occurred may be perfectly clear, and perfectly understood by hon. members, let us face the fact that it has been impossible for members who wanted public sittings in either the main committee or the subcommittees to be successful in their applications.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the motion now under consideration is that the public accounts for the year ended March 31 last be referred to the public accounts committee. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was perhaps a little less than fair in the remarks he addressed to the house a short time ago. I do not think it is proper to have an impression go out to the country that the government desires to withhold the consideration of public accounts before the public accounts committee. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) that there is probably no more important duty for parliament than the consideration of public accounts. The whole origin of parliamentary government arises out of the question of the expenditure of public moneys and the manner in which those moneys should be raised. No duty resting upon parliament is more important than that of scrutinizing and investigating closely how moneys placed at the disposal of the government are spent.

Let me make it clear that there is not and never has been any reluctance on the part of the government to have the public accounts fully investigated and scrutinized by the public accounts committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The public accounts committee has not sat since the war started.

Mr. CRERAR: But if this motion passes, the accounts will come before the public accounts committee. In past years there seems to have been an impression that the government failed in its duty because public accounts were not scrutinized by the public accounts committee. Well, the public accounts are the record of the manner in which various government departments have spent moneys voted by parliament to the government for the purpose of carrying on the business of the country. As to the propriety of the expenditure of a single dollar in past years, it was open to any member of parliament, and it was particularly the responsibility and duty of the opposition, to have such an inquiry made.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is what we have been trying to do to-day, and the minister sees how successful we are.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, no. If my hon. friend will be patient I shall come to that in a moment. So much for that. Perhaps I should not discuss the motion of the hon. member for Weyburn since you, sir, have ruled it out of order, but I would point out that it had to do with public accounts that have not yet been considered by the auditor general and consequently are not in a position to be referred to the public accounts committee. The other point which he made, and which was made a great deal of by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—the hon. member has considerable skill in presenting a case of that kind and leaving impressions that are probably not wholly warranted—was in respect of the duties discharged by Mr. Thompson as director of government office economies control. The Prime Minister stated in his remarks that it was open to any member of the public accounts committee to ask that Mr. Thompson or anyone else come before the committee. The Prime Minister also stated that if the public accounts committee wants to investigate these allegations, if they may be termed such, of Mr. Thompson which have appeared in the newspapers, it can be done.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the minister how it can be done when the terms of reference are limited to discussing public accounts up to March 31, 1942?

Mr. CRERAR: As Mr. Speaker pointed out, if the committee wants to investigate that and their powers are not broad enough, they can come back to this house and get the necessary powers. When the committee is set up, as it will be under this motion, and it meets to consider the public accounts if it wishes its powers expanded in order to consider these newspaper allegations, so-called, of Mr. Thompson, it can come back to the house if necessary and have the matter considered then.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. CRERAR: Just a moment. These allegations or so-called allegations of Mr. Thompson have been the subject of a good deal of discussion here this afternoon. You can scarcely pick up a newspaper to-day, particularly newspapers opposed to the government, without finding somewhere some criticism of the expenditures of the government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But that is not by a government official.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRERAR: As the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) has pointed out, what proof has the hon. member for Weyburn that Colonel Thompson ever made those statements?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what we want to find out.

Mr. CRERAR: If we are going to investigate everything of that kind, every rumour that appears in the pewspapers, this house will be busy doing nothing else. I rose mainly to make clear to the house that the government has no objection nor does it take exception to an investigation of the public accounts by the public accounts committee. I feared that the remarks made by the hon. member for Lake Centre—I do not think he wished to convey that impression—might be taken in the country as an indication that the government had something to conceal in the public accounts and was reluctant to have them considered by this committee set up specially for the purpose.

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have tried two or three times to get the floor. I just want to say a word in regard to the remarks that have been made by certain members of the war expenditures committee. I do not intend to discuss anything that took place in the meetings of the war expenditures committee that were held in camera; I am going to discuss only what happened in the open committee. Each subcommittee was given the right to determine whether it would sit in camera. Personally I was against holding open sessions of the main committee, and I would vote against that procedure in a committee such as the war expenditures committee. I want to be practical in this house. I am not going to spend my time in a committee for the purpose of helping certain members of the committee to get publicity in the newspapers, to have their speeches go out to the public. That is what would be done. If I am ever put on a committee of that kind again I certainly will not stay on it unless it sits in camera, because I am not going to waste my time in that way.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has said that the members of the committee on the government side voted as the treasury benches wanted them to vote. I want to say that every member on the government side of the house has just as much responsibility and feels his responsibility just as much as any member of the opposition in regard to any matter brought before a committee of this House of Commons. No member of the government, the whip, no minister, no member of the cabinet intimated to any member of the committee on the government side what he should do in regard to matters that were to come before the committee. It is not very judicious, it is not very nice for the hon. member for Danforth to make a statement of that kind when he knows as well as I that no one ever said anything to the members on the government side about what they were to do in that committee, any more than anyone would say anything to him about it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): He knows they were voted down.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You know you were voted down? Each man took his own responsibility in the voting; it was not at the instigation of any member of the government or of the treasury benches in this house.

I do not know a thing about the matter that is before the house at the moment, except from what the minister referred to a moment ago. The hon. member for Weyburn makes quite a little noise in this chamber every once in a while, and sometimes he makes quite a little noise in the country. He generally asks or tries to ask for something which he knows cannot be done.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not in this case.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Not in this case? He is asking that the public accounts to the end of February of this year be brought down. That is an utter impossibility, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Nonsense.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Something that happened six days ago. Surely he does not mean that seriously?

Mr. COLDWELL: He certainly does.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It would be utterly foolish to pass a motion in this house that we should bring down the public accounts of this country up to February 28, just a week ago.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): This committee is being set up and specific duties are being assigned to it. Certain matters are being referred to the committee and I think they should be cleared up. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) made reference to some of the decisions arrived at in one of the subcommittees of the war expenditures committee. I was a member of that committee and I want to say that he extended to me every courtesy, but I must take exception to what he has said in this house.

I took the stand in the committee that information with regard to the expenditure of public moneys should be disclosed to the public and that I, as a member, was not entitled to information not available to the public unless it was information which, if disclosed, might give comfort to the enemy or be detrimental to our war interests. That is the stand I took. Several important subjects were referred to subcommittee No. 1 of the war expenditures committee. Among these matters was war-time housing, involving at that time, I believe, an expenditure of $67,000,000. There was also the aeroplane industry, which involved the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and in connection with which there had to be considerable secrecy. There was also war-time shipping, which involved many millions of dollars.

The first subject which was set up for investigation was war-time housing. I could not conceive that there was anything having to do with war-time housing that could give comfort to the enemy or that would be contrary to our military efforts. I made a motion, I think at the first session, that all evidence and information given before the committee having to do with war-time housing should be made available to the public. That was supported by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), but it was voted down at the instance of the chairman, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), and the other members of the committee.

My colleagues and I then had to decide whether we should continue to act when our wishes were not complied with or whether we should retire from the committee. An important responsibility had been assigned to us and we felt that it was our duty to discharge that even under those limitations. We therefore decided to stay. I went on record then, and I go on record now, as not believing that the expenditures having to do with war-time housing should have been withheld from the public. I did not believe there was any necessity to sit in camera, but I complied with the request of the majority of the committee that the evidence be taken in camera, in secret. A copy of the evidence was not made available to me, although it is true it was in the hands of the chairman of the committee and I could go to his office and look it over. But I was handicapped and curtailed to that extent. Therefore I have to take objection to the statement made by the hon. member for Halton that we were not voted down but that we were allowed to make our investigations and give the information to the public. In making the motion that the evidence be made available to the public, I also made this condition, that even in the investigations with regard to war-time housing, matters should not be disclosed to the public which would give comfort to the enemy, and I was quite willing that such evidence should be taken in camera.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we seem to have gone off at a tangent in the debate on this motion. As I understand the motion made by the Prime Minister, it is to refer the auditor general's report for the fiscal year ended March, 1942, to the public accounts committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the public accounts.

Mr. MacINNIS: And the public accounts, yes. Some of us on this side of the house would like to have the term of reference extended, and if my opinion is of any value to the government I suggest that they are really standing in their own light if at this time they oppose that extension. As has already been pointed out, the people are being asked to make substantial sacrifices, and they are prepared to make them because they believe that they are being asked to make them for a cause that is worth while. But the people are suspicious that there is a great deal of waste and extravagance, and if at this time they find that the government is opposed to investigating charges that have been made, not by a member of this house, not by the newspapers, but by a responsible official, then I am afraid that the repercussions will not be good.

There is no use in saying that charges have not been made. Charges certainly have been made, and when the minister in charge of the department concerned comes into the house and says he does not know whether his subordinate has made charges or not, he is simply playing with the house. Either his subordinate made charges or he did not, and when the minister comes into the house he should be prepared to tell the house that his subordinate made these charges or that he did not. It is not good enough to say, "I do not know whether or not Mr. Thompson made these charges." Mr. Thompson is a subordinate in the minister's department, and the minister can ask Mr. Thompson to come before him and can say to him "Mr. Thompson, did you make these charges or did you not?" Then the minister would be prepared to tell us that Mr. Thompson did or did not make them. That is all it amounts to. It is not a question of rumour at all. It is a question of fact.

In order to bring the matter before the committee and in order that the house may have an opportunity to extend the reference to the committee, I move:

That the motion be amended by adding the following words:

and that the committee be empowered to examine audited accounts up to the end of February, 1943.

I do not believe that there is any substance in the statement that the public accounts committee can examine only those accounts that have passed through the auditor general's hands. I believe the public accounts committee can demand and examine any account and find out whether that account is in order or not. There is no limit to what the members of this house can do in the way of investigating the public accounts. For that reason I have moved my amendment and I hope that the government will realize the necessity of accepting it.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words because for the last year I have been chairman of the war expenditures committee. That committee was set up two years ago on the suggestion of the then leader of the opposition. I recall that he quoted in the house the reference made in the British house to their committee on national expenditures. That reference was adopted in this house with but a few changes in the wording. We tried from the outset to follow the procedure followed by the British committee on national expenditures. In the first year our war expenditures committee sat as a general committee for two months investigating the functions, set-up and procedure of the Department of Munitions and Supply. Later we subdivided into three subcommittees. The main committee decided not to sit in public but left it to the subcommittees to decide how they would sit. I happened at the time to be chairman of subcommittee No. 3. We sat in camera. Other subcommittees, the one on which the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) was a member, sat in public, and if hon. members will look up the report of that committee they will find that it is a public document containing not only the committee's recommendations but also the evidence taken before that subcommittee. Everything that was said there was made public. Other subcommittees sat in camera where the evidence adduced was of such a nature that it could not be made public. We could not make a public inquiry, for instance, into the building of tanks, giving all the specifications, detailed costs, and even the contracts with the companies manufacturing the tanks. The members agreed at that time that we could not make that information public.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Are we discussing a motion and an amendment, or are we discussing the work of the war expenditures committee? I do not wish to shut off the Minister of Public Works. I agree that you cannot discuss in public such matters as the building of tanks and munitions on which details must be kept secret. But the point of order I am raising is that we are getting away from the motion and the amendment. I submit, sir, that the present discussion is entirely out of order, and I ask for your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was interrupted with regard to the relevancy of the remarks he was making, he was dealing at that moment with secret sessions of committees and was speaking to the motion for setting up the public accounts committee. As I understood his speech he was arguing that the committee should not sit in secret. I did not anticipate then that we were going to have a debate on what the war expenditures committee did last year, and I trust that members will confine themselves as far as possible to the motion and the amendment.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, of discussing the war expenditures committee. There is a resolution on the order paper which will come up in due time and give hon. members an opportunity to discuss all the proceedings of that committee. I was drawn into this discussion by the remarks of the member for Lake Centre, who said that as the government members were in a majority on that committee the opposition were overridden; and he stated that the committee sat in camera although members of the opposition had wished it to sit in public. I still favour sittings in camera for the examination of war expenditures where information of value to the enemy might be disclosed. There seemed to be an implication in the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre that because the government had a majority on one of the committees we did not realize our responsibility and would try to hide something which should be made known to the public. I wish to protest against that implication. All the members of the war expenditures committee were ready to report everything that would help in the war effort.

As for the present motion to refer the public accounts to a committee, hon. members who desire that to be done, once the motion is made by the government, start a debate as to what shall be referred to the committee. I thought that the public accounts committee was ready to hear any charges of maladministration, extravagance, trickery, subterfuge—call it what you will—if anybody would lay a charge or call the attention of the members of the committee to the facts. I believe the committee is entitled to call any witnesses to establish facts which are alleged by responsible parties. But up until now, having read the papers and seen the representations contained in them, I am at a loss to know who is laying charges, against what departments charges are laid, or what specific charges there are against individuals or officials or departments. It is very difficult to inquire in a committee as to the truth of a general representation such as that everybody is dishonest or that nobody is doing his duty. When an inquiry by the committee is asked for, it seems to me one should have something specific on which the members will be called upon to decide. Up until now we have had general talk in the papers that there may be extravagance, unjustifiable expenditures. But where, and when, and by whom?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is what the committee would have to find out.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is what would interest the committee. But nobody seems to wish to stand up at this moment and say, "Extend that present motion and refer to the committee these charges." I believe that if charges were preferred the government would immediately refer them to the committee.

I am convinced that the committee should sit every session and inquire into all these expenditures, so that officials might perhaps be more careful in the way they are handling procedure and administration. It cannot do any harm, at all events, because when somebody knows his actions are going to be inquired into he is probably inclined to be more cautious than if he knows that a committee will not sit for five, ten, or fifteen years. As to the war expenditures committee, I hope that when later on we have a discussion with regard to it, the facts will be presented, so that the public will know exactly why we proceeded in the way we did.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is an amendment before the house. Does any hon. member wish to speak to the relevancy of the amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the amendment is out of order because, in the first place, it asks to refer to the public accounts committee, accounts which have not yet been tabled. The public accounts for the present fiscal year have not yet been placed on the table. Until they have been tabled they cannot be referred to the public accounts committee. My motion is to refer to the committee such accounts as have been tabled.

Speaking on the point, may I say that this parliament has enacted statutes for the purpose of dealing with matters of revenue and expenditure. There is the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, which covers these matters. We can amend the act if we wish to do so, and after it is amended if a different procedure is set forth, if may be followed. But so long as the statute remains as it is, this parliament would be wise, I think, to follow the procedure which has been adopted in previous parliaments. Section 49 of the act reads as follows:

> The auditor general shall report annually to the House of Commons the result of his examination and audit of the accounts of Canada in such manner as will exhibit the true state of each account at the termination of the fiscal year last ended.

Until the auditor general has performed that function, I submit, his report or the public accounts to which they relate cannot be tabled, and until they are tabled in whole or in part they cannot be referred to the committee on public accounts. That does not mean, and it does not imply, that an important matter of a public nature which hon. members may wish to have inquired into, something concerning which they have grounds to believe there has been an irregularity, may not be made the subject of a motion in this house, a motion to have such matters referred to the public accounts committee, and that such motion cannot be debated and discussed like any other motion. The section of the act certainly relates to public accounts generally. It is obviously necessary that some statute should govern these matters.

This afternoon reference has been made from both sides of the house to what in the opinion of certain hon. members I, as Prime Minister, should have done. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) says that the Prime Minister should have accepted the proposed amendment, and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) says that the Prime Minister should tell the house now that he will see that the public accounts committee does so and so. Well, a grievance I have had against some prime ministers has been that they have assumed altogether too much the role of dictators, that they have tried to take away from the House of Commons the rights which private members have, and to take everything into their own hands. I have tried to see that the rights of private members were protected, and I propose to follow that course. The rules of this house have been framed, not for the purpose of enabling a government to refuse to do things which are in the public interest, but to help to protect private members in their rights; and experience in this house has taught me that as soon as one begins to interfere with the rules of the house as they have been established out of the wisdom of many minds and the experience of many years, one is likely to be taking a course which, instead of increasing the rights and privileges of hon. members, will be depriving them of some of those privileges and rights. That is sound and true and cannot be too carefully remembered.

If I had done what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie said he thought I should do, and agreed to the reference of some subject because it was one of suspicion, although I knew that the rules of the house had been framed so that among other things the time of the house would not be taken up in hunting out and running down suspicion wherever it arises but should be devoted to matters which are of importance and of real concern, I might have sought to follow his suggestion but the only effect would have been, as Your Honour has said, that I would have been ruled out of order by yourself. It is part of my duty as well as the duty of Mr. Speaker to see that the rules which this house has adopted and the statutes which govern its procedure shall be observed, and I am only discharging my duty to the House of Commons as its leader when I take steps to point out that a motion is out of order when the rules of the house clearly indicate that such is the case.

Now, as to instructing the public accounts committee on what they should do: I think the gentlemen on that committee are quite capable of arriving at their own decision as to what they should do, and I do not propose to interfere with them at all. If they reach a decision that a certain individual should appear before the committee or a certain matter should be investigated, and so report to the house, I shall be prepared to back the report. If they come here with any request I shall certainly take cognizance of it, and act in accordance with what I think is the right procedure. But I claim it is altogether wrong for a—

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister speaking to the amendment or is he speaking to the point of order? If he is making a second speech it is not at all in order on the point of order as to which you, Mr. Speaker, asked if there were any remarks to be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am perfectly agreeable to saying nothing further, but I would point out to the hon. member that he, of all hon. members, takes up plenty of the time of this house in discussing amendments. I have no desire to delay the house, but I do object to hon. members on the other side being permitted to create the impression through the country that the government is seeking to prevent investigation and inquiry, while I myself am not to be permitted to make perfectly clear that we are allowing the fullest inquiry that can possibly be allowed.

I have already said that the public accounts committee has the full right, if the house approves, to inquire into anything which its members may ask to have investigated. On that committee are hon. members representing all parties in this house. It is true that it contains a majority of government supporters, but the people of this country are going to take account of whether the majority does or does not do what is right.

I was about to say when I was interrupted that I do not think it is right or proper for any hon. member to say that the members of any committee, be it public accounts or war expenditures or any other, are fashioning their conduct in accordance with what direction may come to them from the treasury benches. I have been on the treasury benches for a good many years, and in all the years I have been a member of any government I have never once asked any member of a public accounts committee not to have a particular matter investigated which ought to have been investigated. May I say further, so that my position will be perfectly clear, that if any hon. member of any party knows of anything which is wrong, any expenditures which should not be permitted, any waste or extravagance, if he wishes to bring that matter before the public accounts committee I for one will back him to the full in endeavouring to see that an investigation is made. I am anxious, the government is anxious, as indeed we all are, to see that every possible brake is put upon extravagance and waste and that wrongdoing is prevented and punished. But that does not mean that we should lend ourselves and the time of this house to attempting to run down all the suspicions, newspaper allegations and the like which may be raised.

We had that matter up only a day or two ago, in connection with an article in a magazine called Boating. It contained a number of allegations, and several hon. members talked about "charges"; the press was full of "charges" being made against the government. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) made a statement to the house giving the true position, and we have not heard a word of the matter since. Yet the allegations of the publication in question were all set forth as charges that ought to be investigated by some committee of the house. I submit that the way to maintain the morale of this country at this time of war is not to create all kinds of groundless suspicion based on newspaper statements, but rather for everyone to join in seeing that before charges are made which are calculated to create suspicion in the public mind there are grounds for them.

Just this word in regard to the public expenditures committee. There are two sides to every question. The idea that the procedure of obtaining information in camera is followed because the government is merely seeking to avoid inquiry in an entirely false conception of the purpose that holding meetings in camera is intended to serve. Our committee on public expenditure is following precisely the method followed at Westminster. I think our people are no better and no worse than are those at Westminster, but at Westminster they have had a degree of experience in regard to some of these matters that we in this parliament have not had, and I think in this particular we are safe in following the example of the old country. The reason inquiries are held in camera in the war expenditures committee is that that method furnishes a better guarantee that all information will be readily given and given without fear of it being misconstrued and misused. Take an inquiry in the open; a question is asked of a witness on the stand, no one present knows what the question is going to be until it is asked, whether it is a question which if answered will give comfort to the enemy or if not answered will give equal comfort to the enemy because suspicion is aroused. If the question is asked in the open the witness has to hesitate and ask himself, will I be justified in giving this answer, or will I be blamed after it has been given for having told something I should never have told? That is the purpose of having the inquiry in camera. It is in order that it may be possible to elicit from officials and every source as full information as possible.

The thought that when a member of the committee gets hold of information with respect to some wrongdoing he is precluded from having that subject subsequently investigated is a wrong inference altogether. There is no ground for that. The inquiry in camera affords to hon. members of this house an opportunity of getting hold of wrongdoing in a way that they would never have otherwise, just because they are able to probe into such things to an extent they could not do in public. If a member investigating in committee finds something that is wrong I have said over and over again that it is his duty to come and report the wrongdoing to the minister of the department concerned, to the Prime Minister if needs be, thereby to give the government opportunity to see whether a prosecution should be started immediately or some other step taken. But if a member does not care to take any of these steps, if he has in his possession information which is evidence of wrongdoing, let him bring the matter up in the public accounts committee. Surely it is not too much to ask that he should be in a position from information he himself possesses to take the responsibility himself of saying, this ought to be investigated.

Surely parliament at a time like the present must, in its actions, be governed by responsible considerations, if matters are to be investigated by parliament. An investigation by parliament is not a small thing, it is a big thing. If there is to be an investigation by parliament on any matter, let the inquiry be based on some reliable and responsible action on the part of some member of this house, not on some newspaper article the representations of which may or may not have any foundation.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not sure whether we are discussing the point of order or the amendment. I wish to speak briefly to the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The relevancy of the amendment.

Mr. COLDWELL: To the relevancy of the amendment. The Prime Minister has made much of the fact that any member of the public accounts committee may bring to the attention of that committee something which he considers should be brought before it. I point out that the motion moved by the Prime Minister referring the public accounts and the report of the auditor general to the public accounts committee deals with the public accounts to the end of March, 1942. My understanding is that in all probability the gentleman who made the statement which has created a suspicion—because, Mr. Speaker, we are not creating a suspicion in this house; the suspicion has already been created, and what we are anxious to do is to prove whether or not that suspicion is ill-founded—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend think it is the duty of this house to start an investigation in relation simply to matters of suspicion?

Mr. COLDWELL: No; I say the suspicion has been created. This man is an official hired by this government, a man called controller of government economy, or director of government economy, one of the important officials appointed, we thought, to safeguard public expenditures in wartime. What did we attempt to do? We attempted to amend the motion, and as I understood you, Mr. Speaker, you ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that we could not pass an amendment which was a substantive motion to investigate work being done by the office of government economy control, that that would be something new and substantive and that therefore you could not accept that amendment. Accordingly what have we done? We have cut off the objectionable part, and the amendment now reads:

and that the committee be empowered to examine audited accounts up to the end of February, 1943.

We know perfectly well that the accounts are audited not only at the end of the year but from time to time throughout the year. It seems to me, I believe I am stating a fact, that it is the right of this house at any time to examine any account, whether it be audited or not and whether it be laid on the table of this house or not; for, after all, the only control we have of any government is our right to grant supply to his majesty. If we fail to keep that tightly under the control of this parliament then we fail in our duty to the country and to the traditions of parliament.

One thing more. My colleague the hon. member for Weyburn tried to bring this matter to the attention of the house in what he thought to be the regular and proper manner. Before the matter was raised on Friday afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), my colleague had already filed a motion with the proper officer of this house. That motion of course is placed at the end of private members' motions. How can we bring something to the attention of this parliament? If a motion is filed, giving the forty-eight hours' notice, it is placed at the foot of all private members' notices already filed for discussion, which will never be reached. Where does the right of the private member come in?

In this connection again let me say that I would not take the responsibility of saying that Colonel Thompson's statements are correct and placing them in the form of a charge; of course I would not. I have had no opportunity to investigate whether these statements are correct or not. But when a man who is the head of a particular branch of government, particularly dealing with expenditures to be authorized by this house, is reported to have made the statements that are attributed to him, then I submit that we are derelict in our duty if we do not bring this matter to the attention of the house and use every means in our power to call Colonel Thompson before the proper committee and either accept responsibility for the statement or deny its truth. I submit that under the rules of the house the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is in order and ought to be accepted by the Chair and voted upon if necessary by the house.

Mr. LaFLECHE: May I make an attempt to assist this hon. house in better understanding this particular matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I do not want to prevent the minister from making a statement, but he must do it at the proper time. We are discussing a point of order; I understand the minister is proceeding to make a statement.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I take it one is always in order in attempting to help people who do not seem to understand.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are dealing now with the point of order raised by the Prime Minister in regard to the relevancy of the amendment.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): The statement made by Colonel Thompson is extremely serious. He asserted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already called the attention of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. LaFleche) to the fact that we are dealing now with the amendment to the motion, and I have asked hon. members who wish to speak to confine themselves to that, not to enter into a discussion of the merits of the matter.

Mr. LACOMBE: I understand that we are keeping closely now to the point of order. I draw the attention of the Chair to standing order 63:

(1) At the commencement of each session, a special committee, consisting of five members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the following standing committees of the house.

(a) On privileges and elections, . . .

(e) On public accounts, to consist of 50 members, 15 of whom shall constitute a quorum.

I should like now to be permitted to cite some decisions respecting standing order 63. I turn first to paragraph 593 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. It is as follows:

There shall be a standing committee, to be designated "the committee on public accounts", for the examination of the accounts showing the appropriation of the sums granted by parliament to meet the public expenditure, to consist of eleven members, who shall be nominated at the commencement of every session, and of whom five shall be a quorum.

This is a decision given in the parliament at Westminster. Then, in paragraph 599 I find the following decision:

It is then moved that the said standing committees be severally empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Then again, this decision in paragraph 604:

A committee which is appointed beforehand, for the consideration of all subjects of a particular class, arising in the course of the session, is denominated a "standing committee".

And this decision in paragraph 605:

Generally speaking, the proceedings of a select (special) committee are assimilated, like those of standing committee, to those of a committee of the whole house.

And this last decision, in paragraph 618:

The committee can obtain directly from the officers of a department such papers as the house itself may order, but in case the papers can be brought down only by address, it is necessary to make a motion on the subject in the house through the chairman.

This decision is reported in Bourinot, at pages 470 and 471. I submit respectfully that the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not know whether I would be speaking to the point of order or to the amendment.

Mr. COLDWELL: Make up your mind.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have been trying to make up my mind as to just how I should direct my few remarks, because if I speak to the point of order in the manner followed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I should have a good deal of latitude. However, I would prefer to save my remarks until Mr. Speaker's ruling has been given, at which time I would be in order in making my observations.

Mr. SPEAKER: We now have an amendment before us, and I am asking hon. members if they now wish to speak as to the relevancy of the amendment. If hon. members confine themselves to that, I shall be in a position afterwards to give my ruling as to the relevancy of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I shall wait until after Mr. Speaker has given his ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Since it appears that no other hon. members wish to speak I would say that I have listened carefully to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). He has quoted standing order 63 respecting the constitution and quorum of a committee. He makes further reference to paragraph 593 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, but I would point out that that paragraph deals only with the rules applicable to the British House of Commons. I think there can be no doubt in the minds of hon. members as to the position of a standing committee, namely, that all matters submitted to it are of course bound by the reference from the house to the committee.

The rules are perfectly clear and well understood, where they state that any matter which could be called a substantive matter cannot be moved as an amendment, but must be distinctly the subject of a motion. The amendment now before us is substantive. I think without doubt it is a substantive motion, and therefore is not in accordance with the rules of the house.

The Prime Minister has quoted the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, sections 49 and 50, which state:

49. The auditor general shall report annually to the House of Commons the result of his examination and audit of the accounts of Canada in such manner as will exhibit the true state of each account at the termination of the fiscal year last ended.

50. (1) The reports of the auditor general shall be laid before the House of Commons by the minister on or before the 31st day of October, if parliament is then sitting or if not sitting, then within one week after parliament is next assembled; provided that if the minister does not, within the time prescribed by this section, present to the House of Commons any report made by the auditor general, the auditor general shall forthwith present such report.

The position we are in to-day is that under the act as it stands at present the auditor general's report is not in the possession of the house, and cannot be submitted to the house by the terms of the act; and, moreover, as I stated when dealing with the former amendment, the committee of itself has power to obtain all that is being asked for on the floor of the house to-day. Witnesses can be summoned before the committee, and can there be interrogated. Any member may move in the committee that the scope of the reference be further enlarged and a report applying for further powers may be made to the house.

For the reasons I have already given, although this is only part of the original amendment, it is irregular because both parts were out of order. And while I stressed in my former ruling the investigation as something which should not be done, and which would create, if allowed, a dangerous precedent, yet I have no doubt in my mind that this amendment is also out of order. The present amendment was incorporated in the first part of the original amendment, and therefore I rule it out of order.

The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to say a few words—

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, with regret I have to appeal against your ruling. I cannot now go into my reasons, but I must appeal against it.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this motion before it carries. While the amendment proposed may not have been in order, I think it was a very fair request to make of the government. If the government desired, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has intimated, that these matters should be brought before the committee I do not think there would have been any objection had the amendment carried. The Prime Minister went to great length to assert that his desire was to have all these matters brought before the public accounts committee. I am glad he did that because a charge of the nature of the one which has been made is sufficiently serious to warrant a thorough investigation into it.

I have in mind asking the Prime Minister to hold a secret session of this house in order that we may discuss some of the matters investigated by the war expenditures committee. It was not my intention to cause any scandal, and therefore I ask the government to hold a secret session in order that hon. members may become conversant with some of the matters dealt with by the war expenditures committee. I felt sure and I feel yet that if the members of this house knew the way in which large sums of money have been spent they would want an investigation by the public accounts committee.

The Prime Minister may say that if I have a charge to make, I can make it before the public accounts committee, but I should like to draw to his attention the fact that I cannot do that because the information I have was obtained during sittings of the war expenditures committee which were in camera. I cannot go to the public accounts committee and say to them, Here is my reason why I think you should investigate this case because it was all held in secret sittings. I shall draw only one or two instances to the attention of the Prime Minister. These were recorded in the report tabled in this house by the war expenditures committee, subcommittee No. 1. The first was in connection with a contract in which reference was made to sales commission. I think the words of the report were that something like fifty per cent of the capitalization of the company was given to a salesman as sales commission. That reveals only part of the story because the capitalization of the company runs into thousands and thousands of dollars. Take half of that and you still have a quarter of a million dollars. That is a great deal of money. I think these matters should be brought before the public accounts committee, and if this money has been wrongly got it should be returned to the government. But how can I go to the public accounts committee and state my reasons why I think the committee should deal with these matters? It is most important that they should be dealt with.

I am not conversant with the charges made in the house by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), but I say that if there is any room for suspicion the public accounts committee is the place where it should be aired. I have in mind a reference to insurance that was made in subcommittee No. 1. There, again, may I suggest to the Prime Minister, is a good case to bring before the public accounts committee. It runs into thousands and thousands of dollars. But again I cannot even express the reasons why I think this should be done because the meetings of the committee were held in camera.

The Prime Minister has spoken of the great need of holding these meetings in secret. In part I agree with him because some things that were discussed by the war expenditures committee could not very well be made public. I have reference only to those things which indicated our production or related directly to the designs of our aircraft, ships and guns. As far as the financial transactions are concerned I cannot see why they should not be made public. Therefore I would say that there are times when meetings should be held in camera and definitely there are other times when the meetings should be public. Usually a more thorough investigation will be obtained if the meeting is held in public.

There has been some discussion as to the vote that was taken in the subcommittee for secret meetings. With all due deference to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), as I recall it there was a vote taken as to whether that subcommittee should hold secret or public meetings. I do not recall that the motion was withdrawn, and I cannot see how he could argue that, because the committee could not have sat in secret if there had not been a vote to that effect. I have not looked up my notes, but my memory is that a vote was taken on that question.

The Prime Minister should get over this technicality of ruling these motions out of order. If the Prime Minister really desires an investigation into these matters, I am sure he will make it feasible for that to be done. There is a suspicion in the public mind that large expenditures of public money have been made unnecessarily.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has stated that I have ruled these motions out of order. I am not the Speaker. It is the Speaker who is the custodian of the rules of the house, and whose duty it is to see that they are observed. I do not wish the impression to go abroad that I am usurping the Speaker's authority.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I should not like that inference to be drawn, but the Prime Minister will agree that he does a great deal of guiding the Speaker in his judgments because when the Prime Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I regard that remark as a reflection on Your Honour, and it should be withdrawn at once. One of the first rules of the house is that no member has the right to reflect on His Honour the Speaker in the discharge of his duties.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member will withdraw.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If the Prime Minister thinks I have imputed motives I certainly withdraw that remark. But I will say this, that there was a great deal more latitude given to the Prime Minister in his remarks when speaking on the point of order than was given to the other members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure the hon. member does not wish to imply that partiality has been shown in the course of this debate, but that is the only inference that can be drawn from his remark. I must ask him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If I have offended the Chair, I shall have to withdraw that too, but I think the record will bear out what I say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must withdraw without reservation.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I will withdraw it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, not Mr. Chairman. The house is not in committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It seems to me that the government is exceedingly anxious lest this matter be brought before the public accounts committee, and it leads me to believe that there is something behind the accusations. If the public is thinking along the same lines that I am, knowing what I do about some government expenditures, the government would be well advised to have the public accounts committee investigate this charge.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member is saying either too much or too little. He had better inform the house and the country what the charge is that he is prepared to make.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think I can answer immediately if the Prime Minister will give me permission to reveal some things that came to light in the war expenditures committee. That is why I asked for a secret session to discuss these things. I am not permitted to say what I have in my mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister does not give permission or withhold permission. This house has decided what is right and what is wrong in the matter of procedure, and it is by the rules of the house the hon. member is obliged to abide.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The Prime Minister has withheld from this house the privilege of having a secret session in regard to these matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has not. He had a conference with the leader of the hon. member's party and with the leader of the opposition, and the leader of the other group. We discussed the question of a secret session and we decided that a secret session would be held, but at a time that is likely to suit the convenience of all parties in this house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am extremely pleased that the Prime Minister is to have a secret session, but I would suggest to him in all fairness that it be held in sufficient time to allow these matters to come before the public accounts committee. That is as far as I shall go at the present time.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): This has been a rather hectic, windy afternoon. Perhaps that is because the day is Monday. I feel that there is some danger of the real point being overlooked in this debate. To my mind that point is this: Are the public accounts committee to be limited in their investigations to what took place before the 1st of April, 1942, or are they not? There has been much talk around the subject but that point has not been made clear.

The reference to the committee to-day is that they deal with the auditor general's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, and with the public accounts up to that date. May I suggest to the Prime Minister that the settlement of this point, a decision as to what the public accounts committee are to consider, should be a matter of government policy? That question cannot be evaded by saying: Oh, it is up to some private member to bring in a motion. Or by leaving the matter to the public accounts committee itself. This is too serious a matter, and it is important enough for us to have a statement of government policy. Talk of leaving it to the committee! Well, there has been much said this afternoon about the war expenditures committee, and well we know what happened with that committee. In 1941, when the war expenditures committee was set up for the first time, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) told us in the house when the motion was under discussion that the sittings of the committe would be open except where something might come up that would be of help to the enemy. In other words, we understood that secrecy would be the exception rather than the rule. But what happened when the committee sat? I have here the proceedings of that committee and I refer to the eleventh report, dated May 5, 1941. At that time this question of secrecy was considered. There was a debate in the committee and this motion was passed:

That the sittings of subcommittees be in camera except as the subcommittee may otherwise from time to time determine.

Some hon. members speaking to-day have said, "Oh, it was all left to the subcommittees."

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): So it was.

Mr. GREEN: But I suggest that, from the very wording of this resolution, the dice were loaded in favour of secrecy. In other words, secrecy was to be the rule rather than the exception. That was pointed out by members of the opposition on the committee on that very day, May 5, 1941, but we were voted down by a vote of twelve to three.

Then last year, when the committee for 1942 was set up, the same resolution was passed. In other words, for all practical purposes, most of the meetings of the subcommittees were to be held in camera. Therefore we have no grounds for believing that if this matter is left to the public accounts committee they will make a decision which will result in all the questions being discussed and all the facts being brought out.

The report of the war expenditures committee of 1942, which was filed in this house on January 27, 1943, contains, at page 96, a paragraph which I suggest to the Prime Minister should be brought to the attention of the public accounts committee at its first sitting. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has referred to it. I will read this paragraph to the house:

In its investigations the subcommittee—

That is subcommittee No. 1.

—found in one instance that an aircraft producing firm agreed to pay a salesman for release of an existing sales contract an amount equal to fifty per cent of its firm capital.

Presumably that money came out of the treasury; undoubtedly the country paid it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a minute. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I feel very strongly that we ought to seek to get on with the business of the house. I submit that this discussion is entirely out of order. On the order paper there is a resolution which relates in specific terms to the setting-up of—a select committee . . . to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services. . . .

—the so-called war expenditures committee. I have not the rules in front of me, but my recollection is that there is a rule of the house that where there is on the order paper a motion which relates to a specific subject, the house cannot anticipate the discussion of that particular matter but must take for its consideration the time that is assigned to it on the order paper. I feel that almost the entire afternoon has been taken up in discussing a matter which ought to be discussed if so desired, on the motion with respect to the setting-up of the committee on war expenditures and not at this time. Unless Your Honour rules to the contrary, it is, I feel, a part of my duty to seek to have the house get on with the business which was fixed for to-day, namely, the debate on the budget, and not to have this discussion now, when without question it will be had all over again when we come to the motion to deal with war expenditures.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, on that point, the Prime Minister himself has made this afternoon two somewhat lengthy speeches—perhaps three or four; I have lost count—and this war expenditures committee has been dealt with by at least five or six other hon. members. I propose only to read the remainder of this recommendation, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that in the interests of good government in Canada the discussion be not stopped at this time, because this particular paragraph is of the greatest importance, and I should be allowed to finish reading it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the control of the business of the house.

Mr. GREEN: The right hon. gentleman raised the point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is part of my duty to bring to the attention of Mr. Speaker an occasion where I believe rules are being violated. I have done that, and in the interests of all hon. members of the house I have asked Mr. Speaker for a ruling. I am not trying to stop any hon. member. When the resolution respecting war expenditures is before the house the hon. member may read all he wishes of what he has in hand at the present time. But I am trying to give the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) the opportunity to make the speech which it was announced last Friday evening he would make this afternoon, in presenting the views of the opposition with respect to the budget. I must say I think it has been a great discourtesy to the hon. member that this afternoon should have been taken up, in part by hon. members of his own party, in a manner which will prevent him from bringing before the house until this evening the matters with which he will wish to deal in the most important speech he will make this session.

Mr. GREEN: This motion before the house is of great importance, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that this is no time for him to try to shut the mouths of hon. members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take exception to the statement that I am trying to shut the mouths of hon. members, and I will ask my hon. friend to withdraw those words. He has no right to say that I am trying to shut the mouths of hon. members, and I ask him to withdraw. I am in part responsible for seeing that the business of the house is carried on in accordance with the rules, and with due regard to its importance, and I am trying so to do, with as little interference as possible with any hon. member, but we have taken the whole afternoon in discussing a matter for which on the order paper due provision is made and which should be taken up at the appropriate time, later.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order has been raised, and of course I must decide. There has been considerable latitude in this debate, due in the first instance to the speech made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who was dealing in his argument with the secret session and supporting it by instances of past procedure of the house and the committee, and therefore I allowed him to speak. But I must say that since then there has been more latitude taken than is warranted by the motion before the house. My attention has now been drawn to standing order No. 41, and citation 293, which states in part:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not: . . .
> (d) anticipate discussion on a motion set down for future consideration.

A notice of motion was given by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) with regard to the amendment which I have already discussed and ruled out of order, and exception might be taken to it. But in view of the fact that it is at the end of the notices of motion and that there is doubt whether it would come before this present session of parliament, I did not take it into consideration. But now that this matter has been brought to my attention, as to the procedure before the house, and having regard only to the procedure, I must ask the hon. member to continue only with regard to the motion itself and without regard to matters which took place and were discussed in connection with another committee.

Mr. GREEN: I submit to Your Honour that that is exactly what I am doing. You have mentioned this report from which I am quoting and which was tabled on the last day of the last session. It has nothing whatever to do with the notice on the order paper for the setting-up of a war expenditures committee for this session, and therefore I submit that in mentioning it I am not discussing anything which is on the order paper for consideration by this house at a later date; I am stating what I think should be considered by the public accounts committee; and I submit that in doing so I am entitled to refer to this statement contained in the report of the war expenditures committee of last session and to ask that the allegations contained in this paragraph be placed before the public accounts committee and be considered by them very, very carefully.

The paragraph goes on to say—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I say that my hon. friend is out of order. Not only that; he is an old member of this house and one who has had some experience in its proceedings, and he knows he has no right to defy Mr. Speaker in the manner in which he is doing.

Mr. GREEN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I wish to ask this further question—

Mr. GREEN: I rise to a point of order. The Prime Minister has accused me of defying Mr. Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER: So you did.

Mr. GREEN: The Prime Minister has raised that point, and I suggest he must withdraw his statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. I rose for another purpose.

Mr. GREEN: Just a minute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask my hon. friend to withdraw the statement he made with regard to myself.

Mr. GREEN: On a point of order, I would ask that the Prime Minister be ordered to withdraw his statement.

Mr. GARDINER: Withdraw your statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the hon. member spoke I raised a point of order with respect to his saying that I was trying to shut the mouths of members of parliament. I asked that that statement should be withdrawn. I do not think my hon. friend has withdrawn it.

Mr. GREEN: I will withdraw it. The effect may have been that, but I withdraw that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already given a ruling. The hon. member is an experienced parliamentarian and a competent lawyer. He states on his responsibility as a member that what he is preparing to read is relevant to the reference to the committee, which is the subject-matter of the motion. If the hon. member is satisfied that this is perfectly relevant to it—and of course I cannot say until I have heard it whether it is relevant or not—I ask the hon. member to complete his statement with regard to what he says is relevant to it.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps we can get everything in order, if the Prime Minister will now withdraw his statement that I was defying Your Honour. I ask that that statement be withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to embarrass my hon. friend in any way.

Mr. GREEN: You are not embarrassing me, but I want it withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to withdraw it. But I am doing so because my hon. friend says from now on he is going to try to have peace and order.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GREEN: Now, Mr. Speaker, this paragraph——

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GREEN: They do not like this paragraph.

Mr. CLEAVER: I state that the hon. member is reading from a war expenditures committee report which will be properly under discussion when the motion now on the order paper is before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not for me to make a tit-for-tat ruling. I must hear what the hon. member reads and must judge then whether he is in order or not. But I am placing the responsibility for its relevancy on the hon. member himself, who is an experienced parliamentarian and an accomplished lawyer.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will Your Honour ask him if he is reading from a war expenditures committee report?

Mr. GREEN: If I may be allowed to go on I am suggesting that this paragraph should be considered by the public accounts committee, that they should be given authority and power wide enough to be able to consider it. It reads:

> In its investigations the subcommittee found in one instance that an aircraft producing firm agreed to pay a salesman for release of an existing sales contract an amount equal to fifty per cent of its firm capital and which agreement the subcommittee believes to be an improvident agreement and should not have been entered into had the facts been brought to the attention of the department promptly.

I submit that that should be considered by the public accounts committee. And may I say again, if this is to be left to a private member to raise there will be no results obtained. Members of the ministry say a private member has the right to have these questions aired, but in actual practice they are not aired unless it is the policy of the government that they should be. Therefore I ask the Prime Minister to let us know to-day what the government's policy is with regard to the matters to be considered by the public accounts committee. I ask him to give us the assurance that the ministry will recommend to the public accounts committee not only that they call Colonel Thompson but also that they consider these reports by last year's war expenditures committee, and further will recommend to the public accounts committee that there should be the widest possible investigation of all public expenditures right up to date, not only expenditures that were made prior to April 1, 1942, but expenditures right up to the present time. In conclusion may I point out to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance particularly that you are expecting too much if you expect the Canadian people to raise five and a half billion dollars either by taxation or loans if you are unwilling to go to the root, quickly, of all these cases where there may have been a waste of money. These matters must be investigated and investigated quickly and far more thoroughly than would have been the case in peace time. Otherwise you cannot expect the people of this nation to stand behind you in raising five and a half billion dollars during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. LaFLECHE: With my respects to the Prime Minister and to the hon. member for Danforth may I take just a moment—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not want to stop the minister, but may I ask what the minister is speaking on? He has already spoken once, and since both amendments have been ruled out of order he must be speaking to the motion.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I was speaking on the amendment which later was declared out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I recall, the minister spoke on the amendment. The amendment has been disposed of. We are now dealing with the main motion, and he is speaking now on the main motion.

Mr. MacINNIS: He has already spoken on the main motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not sure of that.

Mr. LaFLECHE: If I recall, I was speaking on the amendment. Now may I speak to the main motion? I rise for just a moment—

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like your ruling, Mr. Speaker. If the amendment is ruled out of order, can one speak to that amendment or must he speak to the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister spoke on the amendment, as I recall, and prior to that he did speak on the point of order. He is now speaking to the main motion.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am afraid that the temperature of the country is pretty high after what has been said. May I ask what is the reason for the rise in temperature? It started, as I understand, on the strength of a press report. Many persons, it seems to me, have taken for granted that everything that appeared in the first article was words given out by the director of economies. If it is found that he did not do so, then what is the position? To come to that point now, may I read from another newspaper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but he is now dealing with what was the subject of the amendment, which has been disposed of. The only question before us now is the motion. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I have tried to say something on this for most of the afternoon. I am disappointed that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should have raised the point of order he has in regard to the amendment. If I followed him correctly and this resolution carries, it means that under this present system we shall not be able to correct a mistake, if we see one, until that mistake is completely audited and the report tabled in this house, of course after the money is spent. In other words, the door is locked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not correct.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Prime Minister has pointed out the procedure that must be followed. I venture to say that the chairman of any committee feels exactly as the Prime Minister has expressed himself on that point. I remember, when the war expenditures committee was being set up, that the Prime Minister made remarks very similar to those made this afternoon, that he wanted everything investigated. Then I remember the speech delivered in this house by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) on March 11 or 12, 1941. I think I would read charges in that speech. He certainly built up a strong case, saying that if this matter was continued, namely the establishment of a certain plant at Winnipeg, it would mean an annual waste of $200,000 a year. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said with some heat that if that were correct it should be investigated in the war expenditures committee. If I had more time I had intended to quote the speech of the minister and the hon. member at that time. However, the hon. member suggested that if that was right it was a case of locking the door after the horse was gone. This matter was raised in the war expenditures committee, and the then chairman, Mr. J. T. Thorson, ruled that the terms of reference would not allow its consideration. I submit that this is the proper place and time to set up the proper terms of reference, because, irrespective of what the Prime Minister thinks, the chairman will base his ruling upon the terms of reference under which the committee works, which will mean, if this resolution carries, that we cannot investigate anything that has taken place since March 31, 1942, in the matter of public expenditure. There is a great deal taking place across this country to-day in which the public is very much interested, and we are not doing our duty if we do not set up proper terms of reference under which these matters may be investigated at this time.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at 8 o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—BROCKVILLE DISTRICT PROSECUTIONS

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. How many prosecutions have been instituted by the wartime prices and trade board district headquarters at Brockville?
2. What are the names of the parties representing the crown at these prosecutions?
3. How much money has been paid to each of the said parties?
4. How are said parties chosen?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Prosecutions of seventy persons for alleged contraventions of regulations of the wartime prices and trade board were conducted in the area served by that board's regional office at Brockville, to the end of January, 1943.

2 and 3. Names of counsel who acted as agents of the Minister of Justice and payments to each with respect to these prosecutions.

A. B. Collins K.C., $50.50; Rodolphe Danis, K.C., $31.61; R. A. Downing, $226.25; W. O. Dwyer, $77; L. V. Fitzpatrick, K.C., $40; Arthur Flynn, account not yet rendered; J. S. Latchford, $30; J. R. Maclaren, K.C., $200; Henri Proulx, $100; T. J. Rigney, K.C., account not yet rendered; S. G. Robertson, $246.95; G. F. Smith, $63.90.

4. Chosen by the Department of Justice.

FORT NORMAN, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES, OIL AREA

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. Is the dominion government doing any exploration, drilling, construction work, etc., in the Fort Norman area in the Northwest Territories with respect to the oil development there?
2. To what private company or companies have oil leases in this area been granted?
3. What is the total number of wells drilled in this area?

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

4. What was the 1942 production from these wells?
5. To what private company or companies has permission been granted for the construction of pipe lines from this area?
6. Is the construction of a highway from this area to Alaska proposed?

Mr. WRIGHT: I ask that this question be dropped.

Question dropped.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY SERVICE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. At what exact time did the ferry steamship Charlottetown strike a shoal and become damaged?
2. At what exact time did she sink?
3. Was Captain John Lefurgy Read the master in charge?
4. Did Mr. Justice Archibald in his findings dated February 25, 1942, find that Captain Read, the master, (a) did not choose a proper and safe course; (b) that his navigation was faulty and improper; (c) that he did not take the necessary and proper and adequate measures after the striking to ensure the safety of the vessel and to obtain assistance?
5. What salary and other allowances were paid to Captain Read, the master?
6. At what date did the payment of salary and allowances terminate? Was he dismissed from the service?
7. Is Captain Read paid a retiring allowance or superannuation and, if so, what amount per year and from what date did payment commence?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Approximately 10.54 a.m., June 17, 1941.
2. 7.07 p.m., June 18, 1941.
3. Yes.
4. (a) Yes; (b) Yes; (c) Yes.
5. It has never been the policy of the Canadian National Railways to publicly disclose the salaries of officers of the company.
6. Salary terminated February 25, 1942. No.
7. Captain Read was a contributor to the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways employees provident fund, and under the rules of the fund he was entitled to a retiring allowance of $135.54 per month which commenced September 1, 1942.

Mr. MACMILLAN:

What steps are being taken, (a) to improve the facilities of the Borden-Tormentine car ferry service, which has been curtailed by the sinking of the ss. Charlottetown, (b) to arrange for the replacement of the ss. Charlottetown?

Mr. MICHAUD:

(a) Immediately following the loss of the ss. Charlottetown extensive enquiries were made over the whole of North America to ascertain the possibilities of securing a relief vessel either to replace the Charlottetown or to supplement the service affordable by the ss. Prince Edward Island, but no vessel suitable for the special class of service called for could be found.

The steaming qualities of the ss. Prince Edward Island have been considerably improved by partial conversion to oil burning equipment and she will be fully so converted as the oil situation improves. Additional passenger accommodation by way of a new lounge room over the auto deck and other improvements were also made, the total cost of these improvements amounting to approximately $100,000.

The traffic handled during 1942 as compared with 1940 was as follows:

(1941 was handled partly by one ship and partly by the other).

	1942 Prince Edward Island	1940 Charlottetown
Number of crossings..	3,886	2,772
Tons of revenue freight	479,600	356,071
Number of passengers.	121,272	117,077
Number of vehicles (including railway equipment)	9,465	25,759
Number of loaded freight cars	22,449	19,449
Number of empty freight cars	12,020	11,315
Number of passenger train cars	3,055	2,117

(b) Possibilities of replacement of the ss. Charlottetown have been fully explored. Competent naval architects have been engaged and plans are in course of development to enable construction of a new vessel to be proceeded with. It is proposed that tenders will be called for as soon as the plans are ready with a view to putting the work in hand with the minimum delay when shipyard facilities become available. In preparing the new plans full advantage is being taken of the experience gained through the operation of the ss. Charlottetown and of the increase in technical knowledge and practical experience that has developed in the whole field of vessels performing the class of service required since that vessel was built. Both the existing and the anticipatible services required are being taken into consideration towards the provision of a vessel that will have the utmost in power, structural design, manoeuverability and modern equipment in all respects essential or desirable for this special service.

HOUSING COORDINATION COMMITTEE

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What recommendations have been made by the housing coordination committee (set up by P.C. 10797) regarding the need for the construction of additional housing accommodation in particular communities?

2. In what communities have surveys of the adequacy of housing been made by this committee?

3. What are the findings of these surveys where they have been made?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No recommendations have been made by the housing coordination committee regarding the need for construction of additional housing accommodation in particular communities. The committee is not an originating committee but considers and coordinates recommendations made to it by departments or other agencies of the government charged with the particular responsibility of providing housing accommodation or appraising the need of such in particular communities.

2. The committee has made no surveys in any communities with respect to the adequacy of housing. This is the responsibility of Wartime Housing Limited with respect to housing for munitions workers and of the real property administrator, and both this company and the administrator have made many surveys in the course of their duties.

3. Answered by 2.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—RATION COUPONS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. What financial arrangements have been made by the wartime prices and trade board with the chartered banks for the handling of ration coupons under order effective March 1, 1943?

2. When will the government issue coupons covering rationed commodities which will be a claim for goods without the limiting financial factors?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The ration administration of the wartime prices and trade board has arranged with the chartered banks that they shall be reimbursed for the handling of ration coupons on a cost basis. The formula for deriving this cost figure will be worked out between the banks' accountants and the comptroller of the wartime prices and trade board.

2. This question relates to a matter of policy and it is not the practice of the government to disclose policy in giving answers to questions.

BREWERS AND DISTILLERS—HOUSE OF SEAGRAM

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of National Revenue been drawn to the large advertisements by the House of Seagram appearing in Canadian daily papers?
2. Are such advertisements allowable as costs connected with the industry when computing corporation, income and excess profits taxes?
3. Will it be possible for brewers and distillers to publish this type of advertisement in the light of the Prime Minister's broadcast on December 16, 1942?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. Yes.

2. Yes, but to-day's advertising costs are not permitted to exceed a reasonable relationship to the advertising costs incurred in the standard period.

3. Yes, as they do not advertise spirituous liquors.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—HEALTH AND MORALE OF WAR WORKERS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Is there a recreation programme under national selective service designed to sustain and improve the health and morale of war workers?
2. If so, who is in charge of, and responsible for, the programme?
3. What budget has been allocated for the programme?
4. Of what does the programme consist?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1 and 2. Mrs. Rex Eaton, assistant director of women and welfare division, has under study the question of war-time recreation. A number of conferences have been held with provincial authorities and others interested. The underlying principle of the development of recreation by the national selective service is to foster, encourage and develop the essential attitude of mind on the part of war workers and their families to partake in healthful, wholesome activities.

3. Authority has been granted for all national selective service activity out of the war appropriation vote.

4. In areas where war industries are established efforts are made to encourage existing groups, clubs and organizations to organize their programmes to meet the present war-time recreational needs of their community; to place their facilities at the disposal of war workers at hours convenient to the workers and to give leadership in the recreational activities. Cooperation of management of war industries in the improvement of existing facilities and leadership is being encouraged. Where no such facilities and leadership are available a survey is being made of essential requirements and upon the basis of such a survey the necessary plans will be given effect.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—ST. CATHARINES WOMEN'S HOSTEL

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What was the cost of preparing plans and specifications by Wartime Housing Limited for the women's hostel in St. Catharines?

Mr. MICHAUD: $1,449.47.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—HAMILTON PERMANENT HOUSES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What was the cost of preparing plans and specifications in connection with the permanent houses proposed by Wartime Housing Limited for Hamilton?

Mr. MICHAUD: $326.61.

STORAGE OF BUTTER IN WAREHOUSES

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Is there a quantity of butter stored in warehouses in Canada?
2. If so, how many pounds?
3. Will such butter be made available to the public?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Total stocks of creamery butter in warehouses in Canada, March 1, were estimated to be equal to about one pound per person or about half the quantity held at that date last year.

2. Total stocks held in storage warehouses and creameries in Canada March 1 are now being compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics and will be announced March 10. Stocks in the nine principal cities of Canada, March 1, 1943 already announced by dominion bureau of statistics totalled 4,552,227 pounds compared with 13,079,288 pounds March 1, 1942.

3. All butter held in warehouses in Canada is available to the public. No stocks are being withheld from sale and there is no incentive to do so for the price cannot advance and no carrying charges can be earned. Measures taken by the wartime prices and trade board would effectively prevent withholding butter, should any attempt be made to do so.

BORROWINGS FROM BANK OF CANADA AND CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. SLAGHT:

1. How much of the $983 million which we shall have borrowed during the current fiscal year from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks, will come from, (a) the Bank of Canada; (b) the chartered banks?

2. What are our total obligations for borrowings, and which we owe to, (a) the Bank of Canada; (b) the chartered banks?

3. What portion of such total obligations are secured by, (a) bonds; (b) treasury bills; (c) other forms of security, if any?

4. What are the maximum and minimum rates of interest on our total obligations to the chartered banks?

5. On what terms, and on what form of security do we borrow from the Bank of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. (a) $192,831,000 (estimated); (b) $790,000,000 (estimated).

2. The periodic reports required from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks do not disclose the holdings by these institutions of dominion short or long term obligations separately from their holdings of provincial short or long term obligations. While the purchases at time of issue by the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks of dominion obligations are of official record, there is no official record of subsequent sales or purchases. Information in regard to sales at time of issue of dominion securities is given on page 34 of the appendix to the budget speech for the fiscal year 1942-43 and similar information is to be found in the public accounts for each of the earlier war years.

The monthly return of the Bank of Canada shows that on January 30, 1943, the Bank of Canada held dominion and provincial government short term securities in the amount of $767,974,194.26, and other dominion and provincial government securities in the amount of $231,759,686.80.

The monthly return of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks of Canada shows that on January 30, 1943, the chartered banks held dominion and provincial government direct and guaranteed securities maturing within two years in the amount of $1,262,628,974 and other dominion and provincial government direct and guaranteed securities in the amount of $742,822,904.

3. (a) See answer to No. 2.

(b) See answer to No. 2.

(c) Dominion of Canada deposit certificates estimated to be issued to the chartered banks by end of fiscal year—$790,000,000.

4. See answer to No. 2. However, Dominion of Canada deposit certificates bear interest at the rate of ¾ of 1 per cent per annum; Dominion of Canada treasury bills have been sold in the past year on a yield basis of slightly over ½ of 1 per cent; and the short term maturity (three and one-half years) of the third victory loan was sold to yield 1¾ per cent, while the short term maturity (two and one-half years) of the second victory loan was sold to yield 1½ per cent.

5. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, the Dominion of Canada sold to the Bank of Canada the following securities:

April 15, 1942, one year 1 per cent notes at par—$250,000,000 (replacing a like maturity);

April 15, 1942, two year 1½ per cent notes at par—$100,000,000;

June, 1942, two and one-half year 1½ per cent bonds at par—$92,831,000.

CALGARY ROLLING MILLS

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. Has there been a second blast furnace added to the Calgary Rolling Mills plant at Calgary, Alberta?

2. If not, when will this be done?

3. When this blast furnace has been added will the rolling mills section of the plant be working to full capacity?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. There are no blast furnaces at the Calgary rolling mills plant. A second open hearth furnace has been installed, doubling the former steel-making capacity.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. It is expected that the plant will operate at full capacity, but this will depend upon the sizes of materials required to be rolled.

FARM LOAN BOARD

Mr. REID:

1. How many applications for loans were made to the farm loan board during the year 1942 from each province?

2. How many loans were granted and what was the total value, in each province, during the year 1942?

3. What was the total amount collected by the board in each province during the year 1942?

4. What was the total expenditure in connection with administration of the farm loan board in 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY: The following return is furnished by the Canadian farm loan board to cover its operations for the period April 1, 1942, to January 31, 1943:

1. Province	Applications for loans received
British Columbia	59
Alberta	89

New Brunswick	104,550
Nova Scotia	138,144
Prince Edward Island	112,494
	$4,613,980

4. $258,706.

FARM LOANS

Mr. DORION:

1. What amounts have been allotted to each of the provinces by the Canadian farm loan board to loan to farmers?

2. What is the number of loans authorized in each of the provinces by the Canadian farm loan board since its inception to January 1, 1943?

3. What amounts in each province have been loaned to farmers by the board since it commenced operations to January 1, 1943?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No allocation of funds by provinces. Moneys loaned on the basis of applications received.

2. and 3.

Province	Number of loans authorized	Amount loaned
British Columbia	1,121	$ 2,590,437
Alberta	4,963	9,004,840
Saskatchewan	3,800	7,990,865
Manitoba	2,711	5,798,914

REGINA RUBBER CONTROL

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What building is occupied by the rubber or tire controller in the city of Regina?

2. What is the type of the building?

3. What is the rental per square foot?

4. Were any changes necessary in the office space, and if so, what is the cost of said changes to the government?

5. Does the rental include heat and light?

6. What was the building previously used for?

7. What is the term of lease and is there a termination clause in same?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Office space in Silverman building.

2. Two storey and basement, solid brick, stuccoed, with patent roof.

3. 72·84 cents per square foot.

4. Nil.

5. Rental includes heating but not lighting.

6. New building not previously occupied.

7. Lease expires six months after cessation of hostilities by his majesty, with option to the crown to renew thereafter for two further periods of one year each.

MILITARY COURTS-MARTIAL

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. How many military courts-martial have been held in Canada since the declaration of war in September, 1939?

2. How many in each military district?

3. In how many have the proceedings been public; what are the districts and what is the nearest city or town thereto?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. 3,398 up to 28th February, 1943.

2. Military district No. 1, 147; military district No. 2, 633; military district No. 3, 563; military district No. 4, 122; military district No. 5, 349; military district No. 6, 350; military district No. 7, 167; military district No. 10, 253; military district No. 11, 93; military district No. 12, 99; military district No. 13, 103; Pacific command, 129; Petawawa, 94; Camp Borden, 96; in various formations apart from districts, 200.

3. With the exception of three (3) courts-martial, all proceedings were in open court and therefore public. The proceedings of the three (3) courts-martial mentioned pertained to the escape of certain prisoners of war from internment camps and for reasons of security they were not held in open court. They took place in military districts Nos. 2 and 3.

Remainder of question answered as far as possible by No. 2.

MILITARY TRIBUNAL—MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 5

Mr. GAUTHIER:

What is the amount in Canadian dollars of expenses incurred by the Department of National Defence for the military tribunal held at Quebec (military district No. 5) during the months of November and December, 1942, and January, 1943?

Mr. RALSTON: All accounts relating to these courts-martial have not yet been received by the department.

PUBLIC COURTS-MARTIAL, MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 5

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. How many public courts-martial have been held in military district No. 5 from November 2, 1942, to February 1, 1943?
2. How many private courts-martial for the same period in the same district?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Forty-nine courts-martial.
2. None.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WINNIPEG WINTER CLUB

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the government purchased the property formerly held by the Winter Club, situated in the city of Winnipeg?
2. If so, on what date was the purchase made, and what price was paid?
3. What was the assessed value of the above land, and the improvements thereon, at the time it was purchased?
4. How many shares had been issued by the above-mentioned Winnipeg Winter Club?
5. What was the market value of the above shares at the time of the above purchase?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Return tabled.

NEWSPRINT

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What was the total Canadian production of newsprint during the years 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942?
2. During the same years, what was the total production of newsprint in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec?
3. What has been the approximate reduction of newsprint, in tons, in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec, in accordance with federal regulations?
4. What mills in Ontario and Quebec were affected by such reduction in the production of newsprint?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

MONTREAL WINTER CLUB PROPERTY

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. Has the government purchased the property in Montreal formerly occupied by the Winter Club, situate in the city of Montreal?
2. If so, on what date was the purchase made, at what price, and for what purpose?
3. What was the assessed value of this property, (a) for land, and (b) for improvements, at the time it was purchased?
4. What was the issued capital stock of the Winter Club?
5. Had the said shares any market value at the time of the purchase?

J. K. L. ROSS PROPERTY, MONTREAL

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. Has the government purchased the property in Montreal formerly owned and occupied by J. K. L. Ross, Esquire?
2. If so, on what date was the purchase made, at what price and for what purpose?
3. What was the assessed value of this property, (a) for land, and, (b) for improvements?
4. Was the property occupied for any purpose before the purchase, and if unoccupied, how long had the property been unoccupied?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—ARCHITECTS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. The names of all the registered architects employed by Wartime Housing Limited.
2. The total amount paid in salary and expenses to these architects.
3. The names and addresses of the architects in Canada who have been engaged by Wartime Housing Limited, and the amounts paid to each for their services and expenses.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—CHAIRMAN

Mr. BENCE:

For a copy of all orders in council relating to the powers and authority of Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board.

UNDERPAYMENT OF WAGES ON DOMINION GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and memoranda, and other documents from November 1, 1941, to the present, exchanged between the Department of Labour, or any official of said department, and the Department of Labour of the province of Manitoba, the Manitoba regional war labour board, the national war labour board, the Department of Justice, and any other departments or officials, relating to alleged underpayment of wages on dominion government contracts, as discovered and submitted by the Department of Labour of the province of Manitoba, with respect to the following firms: Claydon Co., Ltd.; Rayner Construction Co., Ltd.; Tomlinson Construction Co., Ltd.; and Duff Construction Co., Ltd. Also for a copy of all correspondence and documents, dated from November 1, 1942, to the present, relating to any other cases of underpayment of wages on dominion government contracts which may have been reported to the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, with reference to this motion I wish to state that on February 25 last, Mr. T. W. Laidlaw, K.C., of Winnipeg, Manitoba, was appointed an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner to investigate charges that certain companies holding government contracts, including one of the companies specifically referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), had not met in full the requirements of the labour conditions governing contracts awarded by the dominion. Until such time as the commissioner's report is received, it would not be in the public interest to divulge the correspondence and documents asked for.

I discussed this matter with my hon. friend before the house met this afternoon, and I think he agreed with the position I took.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is quite true that the minister telephoned me before three o'clock this afternoon, and stated that for the reasons he has now given to the house he would prefer that this motion stand. It is not correct to say that I agreed to that, but I had to accede to what he proposed. As a matter of fact, I do not think that the reasons he has given for failing to bring down the documents for which this motion asks are valid because I have in my hand a copy of a return which was tabled recently in the Manitoba legislature—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable. Stand.

Mr. COLDWELL: Surely when the minister makes a request that a motion stand, the mover has the right to explain why he does not wish the motion to stand, and I understand that is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is doing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may proceed, but I would ask him to make his explanation as brief as possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In a return recently tabled in the Manitoba legislature the statement was made, and is now public property, that on January 14 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) wrote to the department of labour of the province of Manitoba giving certain information which I have here, which would indicate that at that time the matter was in the nature of a closed book.

Mr. SLAGHT: I rise to a point of order. The minister, as I understand it, did not ask that the motion stand. He gave reasons why it could not be agreed to. The hon. member who has just taken his seat had the right, I think, to explain that he did not acquiesce in the reasons given by the minister, but that does not permit him to make a speech and to explore the matter further. That is my point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the point of order, the minister has the right to make his statement that it is not in the public interest to divulge some of the documents and correspondence asked for in the motion. That is the ruling I give.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dropped.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that if the motion is not in the public interest it should not stand but should be dropped.

Mr. MITCHELL: As I stated, I discussed the matter with the hon. member before three o'clock. I have no objection to allowing the motion to stand, but there is a commissioner in Winnipeg inquiring into the matter and it seems to me that the most practical thing to do is to await his report. I would make this further observation. Hon. members will understand that the province of Manitoba has some right to be consulted as to whether any of this correspondence should be brought down.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that a correct statement, that the province has to be consulted with respect to bringing down correspondence between the province and the dominion? The province is not a sovereign state like a foreign nation. The suggestion is entirely new.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The minister has stated that he is agreeable to letting the motion stand.

Motion stands.

WEYBURN, SASK., MILITARY BARRACKS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of all reports and recommendations to the Department of National Defence regarding the use of the International Harvester building at Weyburn, Saskatchewan, as a military barracks.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think my hon. friend will press this motion. It covers a class of documents which are not the subject of returns. As my hon. friend knows, the reports of departmental officials are not brought down. I could not consent to the motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not going to press it, but I would say that the information in the report that was sent to me from the minister's office does not tally with other reports that have come to me. I thought it would save time, when the war appropriation is under discussion, if we could have the information asked for in the motion.

Mr. RALSTON: It would save time if the hon. member would have a word with me. These documents are not made the subject of a return.

Motion dropped.

GRAIN POLICY

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF MARKETING PROPOSALS FOR 1943 CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the substantial increases which have taken place in the prices of wheat and oats on the Chicago market since the quota restrictions were removed, prices having reached the highest in fifteen years, will the minister reconsider his marketing policy for 1943 and take into consideration increasing the price to the Canadian producer, and increasing also the quota to be delivered in order to put the Canadian producer on a fairer basis with the United States producer?

I would ask another question while I am on my feet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Put it on the order paper.

Mr. PERLEY: It is not a question for the order paper. This question is based on a report from Winnipeg, dated March 7, Sunday, to the effect that the Winnipeg market made quite an advance on Saturday last, a three-cent rise since Thursday. The report states that 15,000,000 bushels were sold in three days on the Winnipeg market, chiefly to United States houses. Will the minister state under what conditions this wheat is being sold to Americans and whether it will interfere with the export of our wheat board wheat? Also, will the minister in the next day or two—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: —make a statement with respect to sales of Canadian wheat of the 1942 crop, and generally with respect to his marketing policy?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member should give notice.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member has covered a very wide range in the various questions he has asked. The answer to the first question or two is that the subject of the inquiry is a matter of government policy and will be dealt with and announced in due course. I may add that the matters referred to by the hon. member have received and are receiving the earnest and careful attention of all those especially interested in the handling of our wheat and coarse grain crops.

There has been an unexpected and very much appreciated rise in the price of wheat on the Winnipeg grain exchange. Over the past few days the price advanced several cents, this being caused by purchases of our wheat in the United States. As a matter of fact the wheat board have been called in for consultation with the wheat subcommittee of the cabinet, and the whole matter is receiving very careful attention.

Transportation difficulties, both present and prospective, are of very great concern to us as affecting the government's wheat policy for this year.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister make a statement to the house in a day or two?

FLAX PRODUCTION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE AS TO SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): In view of the reported statement on March 3 of L. H. Lehberg, technical adviser to the federal oils and fats administration, that United States crushers were in the market for Canadian flax; in view of a press dispatch from Ottawa in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of March 1 that a campaign to increase flax acreage by one million acres would be launched; in view of the fact that a question of mine was answered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on March 4—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to put his question as briefly as possible.

Mr. BENCE: I have practically finished. I am trying to demonstrate the importance of the question.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no "whereas" to a question.

Mr. BENCE: —in view of the fact that a question of mine was answered by the Minister of Finance on March 4 that the flax crushing capacity of all the plants on the north American continent exceeded the anticipated total of the crop grown on the continent in 1942 only by approximately two and a half millions of bushels, and in view of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture on January 29 that there is no assurance that flax seed from an additional acreage in Canada can be disposed of in 1943—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member must realize that it is absolutely impossible for the minister to answer that question. The hon. member should put it on the order paper to enable it to be properly answered.

Mr. BENCE: I am asking the minister to make a statement because of the facts. The urgency of the situation would not permit of my putting the question on the order paper.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, the hon. gentleman quoted an answer I made relating to the flax crushing capacity of North America. At the time I gave the answer I qualified it by saying that I could take no responsibility nor could this government take any responsibility for the United States figures.

Mr. BENCE: Quite right. I wish to finish the question, if I may. Will the Minister of Agriculture make a statement as soon as possible to clear up the whole situation and advise the farmers what is expected of them in this respect?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I made a statement on December 9, and I made another statement about the middle of January. In the latter statement I said to the farmers of Canada that before seeding time a final announcement would be made with regard to the flax situation. I think that is the explanation which is required.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): On February 24 I addressed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the reference of the annual report of the wheat board to the committee on agriculture. He stated that he was referring it to them. How soon will that report be released so that we shall have a chance to discuss the marketing policy of the wheat board for this season.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will take any formal steps necessary to have the annual report of the wheat board referred to the agriculture committee immediately.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people, all of whom are interested in the gigantic struggle which is being waged at the present time, are thinking about what is taking place here, and all of them undoubtedly studied and gave a good deal of thought to the budget brought down by our Minister of Finance, when they read for the first time his statement that the economic and financial requirements of war become greater and more exacting as the scope and thoroughness of our plans grow. On reading this statement a second time they may have thought to themselves, is the scope of the plans growing as fast and with all the intensity that it should grow? Is the thoroughness of the plans as complete as the capacity of the Canadian people to make them thorough?

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): My hon. friend is worrying about my remarks not being sufficiently loud. Some day the end of the world will come; the angel Gabriel will descend from the heavens and, placing one foot on the land and one foot on the waters, will say that earth shall be no more. And my hon. friend will say "Louder!"

The fifth war-time budget, even though it exceeds all other budgets and all previous standards, even though it makes provision for expenditures on a scale never before known in Canada, still leaves room for even greater achievements of which I believe the Canadian people are capable. I am satisfied that they can rise to greater heights in this emergency if they are made to realize the necessity of greater industry, greater thrift and more provident living. As I see it, each of us in this chamber has a direct responsibility to the Canadian people if we are to face up to these tasks. Last year's budget did bring our people very sharply to their senses. The measures contained in last year's budget made the people realize that our freedom was at stake, that Canada would be in jeopardy if we were to lose this struggle. In the kindliest possible way I would say to the minister that the budget this year is weak, that compared with the budget of last year it is very weak. To my mind the measures which have been taken will not do very much toward stopping or even slowing down the carnival living and the spendthrift tendencies of many of our people who now have aggregate incomes in their homes much greater than they ever experienced before. In this budget there is not enough drastic legislation to make such people stop and realize their responsibilities.

The minister went on to say that the current fiscal year had brought to fruition all our major production programmes. Surely that is not so; surely all our major production programmes have not yet reached full fruition. If they have, I say at once that we are culpable in that we did not set our programmes sufficiently high to ensure an all-out war effort. We have not reached our full capacity; industry, invention, and science have not reached their limits; and in addition we have a power being used to-day to a greater extent than ever before in our history. I refer to the use of woman-power in all vocations. The women of Canada are just beginning to realize what they are able to do, and the full momentum of their energy and effort in all lines of endeavour is still not realized. As we go on we shall find that by the use of woman-power we may achieve results of which we have never dreamed. The same applies to the youth of our country. Before the war it was not quite the thing for high-school students to work in the mills, the factories, or even on the farms. Ten years ago it was not quite fashionable for teen-age girls to work in market gardens or to act as farmerettes; it was not done. It is now being done. The whole high-school population of Canada is available; and the job of harnessing the power of our teen-age youth has not been carried out to anything like one hundred per cent. There is great opportunity to use that power to increase our production programmes in all directions. Therefore, when the minister said, in making his economic and financial review, that all our major production programmes were coming to fruition, and that as we approached our full capacity the over-all increase in production became less marked than was the situation last year. I say we have not yet approached full capacity. I believe we have the capability to reach even greater heights. In my opinion our people ought to be encouraged to believe that this can happen.

Then we come to the shifts in production from non-essential to essential industry, which have been mentioned quite often. We have not made real shifts from non-essential to essential industry. We have made, on account of a shortage of certain raw materials or for other reasons, some changes which have been obvious; for instance, we have, by order in council, stopped the production of certain lines of goods, and so on. But have we taken Canada as a whole and said, this non-essential industry must be stopped and that essential industry must be continued. We do not need to police industry or to be a Hitler to do that, because our people are anxious to do the right thing. They want to do what is right, and they want some suggestions, some leadership from those of us who are charged with responsibility, so that they may know what is to be done. Believe it or not, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have an idea that you and I and others in this House of Commons know something about the affairs of Canada. They have an idea that we know something about the seriousness of the present war situation. When an order is issued by this government that order is looked upon with respect, and the people are anxious to carry out the will and intent behind it. Consequently I say that without acting as Hitler would act we should give instructions to our people that we desire them to produce this and not to produce that; that we shall give them some direction, and I believe we shall be able to increase all our major production programmes.

I am still of opinion that there is room for even greater support to the men and women in the armed forces, at home, at sea and abroad. This budget does not contain very much in the way of a suggestion emphasizing our determination to support our men and women to the very limit of our resources, in every activity making for an all-out war effort.

Any economic review that we find in the budget is so far removed from the days of Fielding, White, Dunning, or Bennett that we really find ourselves in another era. I hope my criticism of this budget will be constructive; I approach it in that spirit, to see if we can bring some human element into the equation. I approach it from the point of view of the activities of individual Canadian citizens; yet in the final analysis it makes up to what will take place by reason of policies of finance and production. Even though this is not a budget of the Fielding type, at the same time I am of opinion that the Canadian people will have to come back to fundamental principles of thrift and provident living which made it possible for us to achieve the progress made in earlier times.

The movement from production of consumer goods to production of implements of destruction is of a magnitude not conceived, and will be greater yet, and that adds to the burden and to our responsibility in approaching the problem of how it is to be financed. What applies in that field applies also to employment. It applies also to income. If it applies to income it must apply to the curtailment of private spending.

During the last four years we have seen our federal revenue move from $500 million to $1,500 million, and this year it will reach well over $2,000 million. Our duty is very plain in regard to ordinary expenditure. I had hoped ordinary expenditure would have been kept below the $500 million mark but I see it is $610 million.

In dealing with ordinary revenue and expenditure the thought occurs to me, What right has our administration to attempt to freeze normal enterprise at the levels of 1936-39 and pass scores of orders in council to hold our economy, namely, the economy of ordinary production, particularly in secondary industry, to the 1940 level, as far as price and volume are concerned, unless the administration make a determined effort to do likewise in the matter of ordinary government expenditure. We have probably had enough discussion about that in this chamber this afternoon, but I shall deal with that part of the problem a little later. Our war economy demands intensive exploration looking to the increase of production for the war effort, so that our national income can stand the strain of war costs and it is made more and more possible to pay as we go.

Canada has the man-power, if we use every one available; Canada has the woman-power; Canada has the willingness and the enthusiasm. But Canada lacks a man-power policy; it lacks all-out direction; it lacks equality of sacrifice; it lacks driving force. Before we can say we have an all-out war effort Canada requires adequate reinforcements, trained men to keep high the morale, the courage, of our gallant lads who fly over Europe, those who make up the front line in the United Kingdom, those in our navy, those who go down to the sea in ships. This is a first and all-important necessity, to achieve which those at home must produce, economize and give everything that they have.

Before I leave the economic situation I wish to depart a little from the usual form of criticism and bring to the attention of the house the need of maximum effort.

It is not enough to point to the men who are in the services to stir up the enthusiasm of our people at home. We shall have to go farther; we must give consideration to their social security and the security of their boys and girls when they come home after the war; we must dispel from their minds the fear of want in this land of abundance.

How are we going to do it? I can put my idea in simple language. As I see the problem, it is to keep a floor under our people which is based on a reasonable standard of living, based on the cost of efficient production. It is the duty of government to maintain that floor. At the same time a ceiling must be kept over our economic structure so that monopolies shall be controlled and income taxed to help provide the revenue to maintain the floor which is kept under our people. Between that floor and that ceiling every encouragement for maximum production, and compulsion if necessary, should be resorted to. There are some idlers who will not work; hold them on that floor, do not let them get down in the depths, down into poverty and slum conditions; if necessary, compulsion will have to be resorted to. But encourage the great body of our people who are between that floor and that ceiling to combine their individual initiative with intelligent industry coupled with integrity, and there will be ample room for the development of our Canadian economy in this land of opportunity.

I might enlarge on that with regard to a ceiling on prices and commodities, especially in the field of industry. Put a ceiling on the price of goods, whether wheat or bacon or beef, or a secondary product, and say that the price shall go no higher than such and such a figure. As our economy goes along in this difficult time, it will be necessary for us also to put a floor under the price of these commodities. It is within the memory of hon. members when hogs, for example, sold as low as 3·5 cents a pound, when everyone knew they could not be produced for that price. Hon. members will remember a long list of other commodities in 1931 which had no floor under them. I am not so much concerned about the commodity itself as I am in the production of that commodity by which the individual Canadian made his living. Had that commodity been held at a floor which was at least equivalent to the cost of production, then many thousands of our Canadian people would have been able to carry on their vocations, and the collapse of our system would not have been as imminent as would seem to be the imminent situation now unless a floor is put under that commodity, and under commodity prices generally, as well as under the people themselves.

This particular portion of the discussion may sound rather pessimistic, when one is speaking about this Canada of ours. I do not wish to leave one note of pessimism in any remarks I make to-night. I have great hopes. In fact, if one thinks the thing through he must conclude there is no other place in the world where the citizens have greater opportunities than they have right here in Canada—and we are not the only people who know that. There are other people who know it. The field, the farm, the forest and the factory of Canada would be a great prize packet for the axis powers, if we were to lose this struggle. I hope hon. members, and people throughout the country will ponder those words.

We are trying our best to hold our economy together by controlling prices. In this year's budget we find a little more control. What concerns all is that there is no long-range plan for control. It is true that it is a difficult task; but even if we had a short-range plan we would know where we were going. A man who happened to be in a certain industry would not wake up to-morrow morning only to find that the price had been set at such and such, and that he was out of business, as far as his line of goods is concerned.

The whole programme is spotty, a kind of patchwork. Each day sees a new order in council adding restrictions to whole lines of endeavour, and thereby destroying the possibility of a well-balanced price structure. Price control may be necessary, but it must be adjusted to meet conditions, in justice to the primary producer, secondary industry and labour.

May I explain what I mean by saying that we have failed, not dismally, perhaps, but in large measure to take into consideration, in the control of prices, what is happening in other economies similar to our own. The particular one to which I should like to refer to-night, the one which perhaps receives more discussion, and concerning which there are more experts in this chamber than there are with respect to any other line of industry, is the industry of agriculture. To prosper and to be satisfied, all that agriculture asks is equality of reward for the industry and application they put into the working of their farms. Some people call it parity. But, call it what you will, if the Canadian farmers are given an even chance, not only in Canada but in competition with any other agricultural country, they will give a good account of themselves, and come out on top.

Bank of Canada figures illustrate this point, and in order to make it clear I shall place on record a short review of wholesale prices in Canada, as they are found at page 11, section 8 of the statistical review published by the Bank of Canada. This review sets out wholesale prices in Canada for farm products in the different years going back to 1926. Then it gives wholesale prices on food made from farm products. In like manner it gives prices in the United States with respect to those two classes of commodities.

Taking 1926 as a base of 100, we find that in the depression of 1932 farm products dropped in Canada to less than half the wholesale price in 1926, namely, to 48·4. Farm products have not even yet come back to the 1926 figures. They still lag at 87. On the other hand, foods, which were 100 in 1926, and which might be considered as secondary products to those produced on the farms, have now risen to 101·6. Despite these conditions, the return to the farmer stands at only 87.

While this condition prevails with respect to farm products in Canada, the return to farmers in the United States does not lag behind returns for other commodities. Returns to farmers in the United States have maintained a fair relationship, and have been kept on a parity with the prices the consumer has to pay for food. The return to the farmer in the United States to-day, as compared with 1926, is 113·8, whereas in Canada it is only 87. The production of other materials, in like manner, lags behind by 13 points in the return to the Canadian primary producer.

I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would agree with me that if, as some people say, we were to pierce the ceiling and let prices run riot, we would be taking action fraught with a good deal of danger. I am not asking for that. I would be one of the last members in the house to support any measure of inflation. The figures I have before me are as recent as January of this year and, while the condition may right itself, even during this year, it seems that up to the moment, and particularly during the last three or four years, there has been a lack of understanding on the part of those charged with the responsibility of providing equal reward for agriculture as compared with the rewards from secondary industry and food products, or as compared with returns from other primary products, or the secondary products made therefrom.

In Canada, possibly on account of the great distances and the smaller quantities, as compared with the economy of the United States, it does not seem possible to overcome the wide spread between producer and consumer goods. That is a problem to which we should address ourselves. And when I say "we" I am thinking not only of the Minister of Finance, but rather of the membership of the house as a whole. Why can we not harness the membership of the House of Commons, and put it to work? I am thinking of the house as a whole, not of just the Minister of Finance.

Once in a while some one will break forth with a thought. We had an example when the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Mills) pointed out the danger of price control as it applied to beef cattle, and showed that the control did not give equal reward for the energy and industry expended in production. He pointed out the difficulties arising from bootlegging and black markets.

Once in a while an hon. member will rise in his place and point out the way through some of our difficulties. Only a short time ago the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt) made a suggestion. I shall have more to say on his point later with reference to wages. I should like to see emanate from this discussion a greater use of the brain-power and man-power of this Canadian House of Commons.

I suppose it was a dollar-a-year man or somebody else who originated subsidies calculated to keep down consumer costs, as well as the matter of bonuses. All this is fraught with danger. To my mind they are not the result of the considered opinion of the members of the Canadian House of Commons, and I think they should be. We are elected by the people. Of course we can review these matters; of course we can discuss them, but we are not doing enough of the actual work.

One of the most glaring examples of the absence of parliamentary control in these matters occurred a week ago last Thursday when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) announced to the Canadian press that he would build up in his department an organization to take care of bonuses to farmers on farm products. The facilities of the House of Commons were open to the minister, but they were not used. I suppose he has a reason for that. The Canadian press were advised that the new organization would be in charge of recommendations for all subsidies and bonuses, including those which were at the time under the prices board. The news item stated that in the present fiscal year production bonuses and consumer subsidies would total around $100,000,000.

Not only is this system of bonusing and subsidizing foodstuffs reacting unfavourably in the minds of the Canadian people, but there is also an unfavourable reaction in connection with subsidies paid to certain secondary industries. I should like to use an example which I am sure many will recall. It is probably not generally known, or not as well known as it should be that the soap industry of Canada is receiving large subsidies on production. Ordinary soaps are subsidized anywhere from thirty cents to one dollar per 100 bars, this subsidy being paid from the treasury of Canada. When one considers this in terms of a production of 60,000,000 pounds or more he gets some idea of the cost of subsidizing this particular industry.

The cost of the necessities of life must be kept down, but I would point out some of the weaknesses in the control of this particular industry, which happens to be one which I think illustrates the difficulty. The cost of maintaining the ceiling prices of September, 1941, will run into scores of thousands of dollars. Because the wholesalers had considerable floor stocks on hand, it was found necessary to push the ceiling price back to the price of June, 1941, with an added cost to the treasury of Canada of many thousands of dollars for this particular industry. Large sums of money which are paid out in advertising go into the cost of manufacturing this necessity. Every few hours during the day and during the night the radio blats out all sorts of advertising, stories of fiction, fact and fancy, the cost of which is added to the cost of this essential, namely, soap. If this House of Commons should determine that it was not necessary for the Canadian broadcasting corporation and the other broadcasting corporations to carry this advertising, that they did not need it to keep them going, I am satisfied that the industry would be prepared to economize in that regard and money would be saved for the treasury. To my mind this is price control which illustrates the lack of control.

People will use soap anyway. Perhaps if they did not pour so much down the sink and waste it, it would be better for our economy at the present time. They still believe that cleanliness is next to godliness and they will keep clean from the cradle to the casket. They also know that there is a war on. Hon. members know that there is a great shortage of the raw material which goes into the making of soap. As long as there is a shortage of that material, as long as this difficult time is on us, we should have a moratorium on wasteful expenditures of this kind. If the broadcasting corporation cannot balance their budget without the revenue they receive from this advertising, they might just as well fold up. The power could be saved for more essential war needs during the peak loads; or, if the power consumption is not serious, if it is not great enough to worry about, they could use a little canned music by taking some records off the shelves. In any event it would be just as elevating as the advertising propaganda which comes over the air. Our women could knit much faster to the recordings of music than they are able to weep to the fiction of the radio soap ads. The Prime Minister finds difficulty in understanding that, but I can tell him that it is the fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not given up using soap.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I witnessed thirty or so Red Cross workers at work and I have heard them say, "Shut off that soap advertisement; we have dishpan hands and we do not want to be reminded of them". Some music was put on and the knitting needles went that much faster.

I come now to the matter of the control of income. The most important feature of the attempt to freeze incomes is that section which affects a million and a half employees who depend on their weekly pay envelopes for their sustenance. Not nearly enough publicity has been given to the Canadian public, particularly the wage-earner, about the energy and the effort that have been put into the price control system in order that costs of living shall be kept down. When you brought the price of eggs down to forty cents a dozen you should have made some noise about it. I think we have been a little neglectful about this kind of advertising. We should let the working man know that he is getting a square deal. You should have said more about it when you brought down the price of eggs, oranges, tea and what-not. I feel tempted to tell an advertising story, but perhaps I will let it go because this is rather a serious matter.

Too much emphasis is being given by the press and others to those things which worry the working man. According to the headlines he is told that there is no fuel, no coal. He is told that housing accommodation is short; that he will get no shelter. If the opposite factors were stressed we would have a more contented working population and more production. Great publicity is given by our friends to beer, butter and beef shortages, but very little with regard to matters that are costing the people a good deal less than they cost them previously. We do not seem to have laid out our legislation from one year's budget to another with sufficient consideration for the conditions under which our working men have to make a living. We have failed miserably in our tax structure, and I shall give illustrations of that in a moment or two when I discuss income taxation. Our present system does not encourage absenteeism, but it makes room for absenteeism and certainly it does not penalize absenteeism. I shall have more to say on that in a moment.

I now come to the control of supplies. An organization has been set up to control supplies. That organization requires more coordinated direction. The controllers seem to be a law unto themselves. Each is functioning as best he can in his own field without sufficient regard to the requirements of the controller in another field. It must be remembered that the finished goods of one industry are very often the raw materials of the next industry; and with a ceiling on the finished product of the second industry, and a ceiling on the raw material which that industry must buy, there is brought about a static condition in the conduct of business. That static condition is not good for business. In many lines there is not much room any more for salesmanship. It is becoming a lost art because the spread in many instances is not sufficient to take care of the cost of management, distribution, and particularly transportation. With ceiling prices set, what incentive is there to put merit into your goods and to develop salesmanship? I mention this merely with the idea that we must get back to the old conditions. We must not regiment our entire production. I mention it also for this reason, that this control leads to a concentration in the hands of a few of the control of necessary commodities. There is no room for the small operator when ceilings are set on the cost of both the raw material and the finished product. So much for the general picture.

If we look at the geographical picture, what do we find? There is a concentration of industry in the central provinces and little opportunity for the development of industry in the western provinces. In those provinces labour is available at certain times of the year, while in the central provinces there is practically a shortage of labour all the year round. The monthly review of business statistics for the month of January shows that the expansion of industry and the physical volume of business and employment have increased from the 1926 base to 186 in Quebec, 178 in Ontario, and only 127 in the prairie provinces. Under our present controlled system that condition will become more aggravated as we go along. I think it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who said a few weeks ago that there were 5,000 unemployed in Winnipeg. If we could so arrange our economy as to have more industry in the west and in the maritime provinces, these surges of unemployment could be taken care of.

Another matter which I would bring to the attention of the house and the country—I have mentioned it before in this chamber—is the possibility of transferring or transplanting to western Canada industries which are at present in Great Britain. There are a number of industries in Great Britain which have had their factories bombed, but the machinery could be salvaged and the technicians in those industries who are not required for Britain's defence and who are eating up the food in Great Britain which is required for other purposes could be transplanted with their families to western Canada. Many of those industries were exporting to Canada prior to the war, and they would be quite satisfied to establish a branch of their industry in Canada to take care of their Canadian business which has decreased by reason of the war. I put this suggestion on the record of Hansard again because I feel that our commercial intelligence branch and the industrial departments of the railways should take this matter in hand. Some might ask: Why do not the Canadian people establish those industries here themselves? If they did they would be faced, in the days to come, with serious competition from the United Kingdom which previously had a share of the Canadian market. But if we could encourage our British friends to come here with their plants we would have the advantage of their long experience in different lines. No one knows the woollen goods trade or the linen trade and other needle trades, for example, better than do the British people. The same is true of many other lines of industry. I could mention half a dozen others if time permitted. There are the nut-oil pressing trades, for instance; the pressing of oil seeds for the manufacture of shortening and things of that kind. No one knows this trade better than do the people of Great Britain. If we could persuade them to establish branch plants here we would have something which would remain with us after the war, and that would be better than trying to do it ourselves in the absence of their expert technicians and tradesmen who have been engaged in these trades for eight or ten generations. We could cooperate with them and in that way add to our Canadian economy other lines of industry which will be very necessary when the war is over.

Of all the difficulties that Canada has had ever since confederation, transportation has been one of the greatest. It has engaged our attention more perhaps than any other phase of our national life. We have great distances, an abundance of raw materials, with a small unit cost per ton. All these factors have made our transportation problem one that requires our everyday study and attention. The actual facts of transportation costs in Canada are startling. I raise this question because it is of vital importance to Canada. I am so fearful of a collapse or even a partial collapse or slackening off in our transportation system that I ask the house to bear with me while I enlarge a little on this subject, which to my mind did not receive sufficient attention in the budget and must engage the attention of all members of the house.

The monthly review of business statistics for December shows that the average income for the last twenty years in Canada was as follows: primary production, 25·8 per cent; secondary production, 20·7 per cent; trade, 12 per cent; services, 11·5 per cent; finance, 8·5 per cent; government, 11·4 per cent; transportation, 10·1 per cent. In passing, I would remind the Canadian people that the last three items are out of all proportion in a well-balanced economy. There is no reason why the national income of those living off the government in this economy should be 11·4 per cent. That figure should be reduced substantially and as quickly as possible; it is out of proportion. In like manner consider finance; the national income from this source, 8·5 per cent, is quite high.

I do not complain of transportation being 10·1 per cent; I mention it merely to draw attention to its importance. Transportation divides itself naturally into two divisions: domestic transportation, and transportation to support our war effort overseas.

As regards domestic transportation, not nearly sufficient control and direction is being given to this problem. I regret that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud) is not at the moment in the house. I would say to him that we must have direction and drastic control, and they must be such as will keep high the morale of our fighting forces. Priority must be given to the young men and women of tender years who are wearing the king's uniform, so that they can get home to their people and their friends whenever they have leave. This will tend to keep high the spirits of those young people and of the parents and cousins and uncles and aunts whom they visit on their leaves.

On the other hand, civilian traffic made possible by higher incomes must be definitely curtailed. I am of opinion that it should be rationed. The strain on our transportation system demands that priority be given to labour, materials and supplies for the railroads.

What applies in passenger movements also emphasizes the importance of freight movements. The right of way must be given to essential services and food supplies, munitions and everything directly connected with an all-out war effort. The movement of non-essentials must be curtailed. We must improve and expand railway facilities which are essential to our war effort. We are in this particular spot just now: carloadings, which averaged last year 280,000 cars, have increased 33⅓ per cent, largely on account of war freight. War freight is heavy freight. War freight moves long distances, and our ton-mile next year will increase 100 per cent compared with pre-war figures. I ask the Minister of Transport, who is charged with the responsibility of the railways, if enough attention is being given to the rehabilitation of our transportation system. He will speak in this chamber either on the Canadian National railway estimates or during this debate, and I say to him now that he has the responsibility of being able to assure the Canadian people that our rolling stock and transportation system generally are being maintained and improved. We must remember that the whole Canadian transportation system has had a very hard winter. When the frost comes out of the ground, floods will follow in the spring and many weak spots will develop in an already overburdened system. Attention must be given to priorities all along the line for the preservation of this most vital part of our Canadian economy.

As to railway finance, it should not be a burden on the Canadian people in the coming year. The overflowing revenues which have resulted from the doubling of ton-mile traffic over that of pre-war days have temporarily done away with railway deficits. Nevertheless I would guard very carefully the revenue which is in excess of operating costs. I throw out the warning that it should not be used to rehabilitate the financial interests of those of our investors who made improvident investments in railway enterprises in pre-war days. There are not very many of them, but I would ask for some vigilance on the part of the government with regard to this particular feature of our economy. For example, exhibit 5 of the report of the Canadian National Railways investments in affiliated companies shows that the national railway holds stocks and bonds to the extent of $35,000,000 in companies or organizations whose stocks have a par value of $78,000,000. It is true that the greater part of that sum represents necessary joint enterprises; there is, for instance, the Toronto terminal, which is not being run primarily for profit. But we ought to be very careful that this expanding revenue of ours is not used to recoup the financial position of any of the owners of the non-par value shares associated with the Canadian National Railways, who own the other $42,000,000. While these pre-war concerns did not go through bankruptcy, it would have been well if, to use an expression of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), they had gone through the wringer at the time. But while in financial difficulties they have been maintained and built up until to-day they are worth $78,000,000. However, as I have said, this is no reason why we should recoup the unfortunates who made the improvident investments in days gone by.

In saying this I am thinking not only of the Canadian National Railways but of the other railroad and of various other large organizations in Canada, particularly those which have monopolies in different lines of industry and production. I give them the solemn warning that, if it is necessary to put a ceiling and price control on commodities, incomes and supplies, with which I have already dealt, it is also necessary to do the same with pre-war investments.

Transportation is so vital that I should like to think of it now in regard to getting our supplies to the scene of action. There are various estimates as to the tonnage of commodities necessary per year to keep one fighting man in the field. I have seen an estimate as low as four tons of goods and commodities per year per soldier, while the highest I have noticed is sixteen tons per year. One can readily see, therefore, that each one hundred thousand of our fighting men will require at least one million tons of commodities per year. When one takes into consideration the question of distance, we are faced with an astronomical figure if we reduce the equation to ton miles of transportation required to give a full-out war effort. This branch of our transportation system must be given first attention, while everything non-essential must be reduced to a minimum. There are different methods of transportation; and the one which will not be much of a problem when the war is over is, to my mind, air transportation. In the meantime, however, it must be brought to the attention of the Canadian people that within the next few months or perhaps even weeks great strides must be made, from the point of view of the war, in regard to air travel. With our aircraft production reaching a figure of $268,000,000 last year, representing 400 planes a month, we must organize ourselves to meet this strain on the national economy; but at the same time I say that new means of transportation will have to be developed to take care of the submarine menace. With all the research at present being conducted in this connection, as hon. members know, I believe this house would be well advised to give the Minister of Finance a free rein in loosening our purse-strings in order to support air research to the very limit. Perhaps I should say that here I am speaking as the member for Danforth, and it is the privilege of any of my colleagues to disagree with me, but I believe we should support to the limit the research work that is so necessary in this field. That is so for the simple reason that our greatest hope of meeting the submarine menace rests with those boys who fly up and down our coast, searching for submarines.

This brings me to the question of merchant shipping. I believe the submarine is the greatest menace to be faced in this war by Canada and the United States. The production of millions of tons of shipping is not enough; more and more attention must be given to saving our shipping from loss by submarine action, for it is not only the loss of the vessels themselves that is important; it is also the loss of the strategic war materials they carry. I wonder if perhaps I have said too much, but I do not think those remarks require censoring, for I think they are common knowledge. I am quite in agreement with the censoring of any information considered important by the censorship branch; it is necessary that zippers be placed on the lips of all employees and servants of the state. But we must keep our people informed as fully as possible if we are to hold their confidence and if they are to face up to the huge expenditures, the energy and the effort that are necessary, and we must make them realize the gravity of the situation.

Let me pause here for a moment to say that in my opinion we should more frequently make available the facilities of this house to the various ministers of the crown, to permit them to make statements which will keep Canadians informed of the progress of events, instead of having to get their information through the press. I believe more official statements pointing out the dangers and difficulties, the need for greater production here and there, and that sort of thing, would keep our people informed and enable us to retain their confidence. On February 25 of this year we had an example of this sort of thing when the British war secretary, Sir James Grigg, made a statement in regard to the movement of supplies. Why should we not have a statement like that from one of the ministers of this government? We have not heard at all this session from some of the ministers, and that does not inspire confidence. You do not tell us what you are doing, and we do not like it. The old adage, "Get them young, treat them rough and tell them nothing," is not good enough. We want to know, and Canada wants to know.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

The British house was told that in 1942 a million tons of supplies, five hundred thousand men, fifty thousand tanks, guns, armoured vehicles and all the rest of it, had been sent around the Cape of Good Hope to various destinations. That must have inspired confidence; it must have built up the morale of the British people. They were also told about the landings in north Africa; that Britain moved 185,000 men, 20,000 vehicles and 220,000 tons of stores in three weeks, requiring 440 special troop trains, 680 freight trains totalling 15,000 cars, and so on. I offer this suggestion in order that we might impress upon the Canadian people the magnitude of the problem we are facing in this war, and also that it might be impressed upon the members of this house and those charged with the responsibility of looking after our transportation system. I mention it in the hope also that the way may be paved for the application of some restrictions by the transport controllers to eliminate non-essential travel and the shipment of non-essential freight.

I come now to the matter of government accounts and finances. I am of opinion that with all our war expenditures Canada can maintain a sound financial position, but it will be necessary for our people to observe a few cardinal principles which I enunciated in the early part of my remarks and which I shall enunciate again in few moments. For the moment let me say that I believe those charged with the responsibility of raising funds for various purposes should give a clear right of way to our victory loans. I believe we are a little late with our first loan for this year, and in a moment I shall give my reasons for that statement. We should encourage the purchase of more and more war savings certificates, and their regular purchase week by week and month by month. It was disappointing to hon. members to learn that subscriptions to war savings certificates, which we had hoped would run well over $100,000,000 a year, have fallen to something like $77,000,000 this year. Red Cross drives should be spaced in such a way as not to interfere with victory loan drives. Campaigns that grip the imagination and the heart of our people, such as the funds for British war victims, Russian war victims, the Queen Mary fund and so on, should be encouraged because they keep our war interest to the forefront and maintain morale among our people.

Of course we must continue our present economy and support the churches, educational institutions and hospitals. Large sums of money are collected under our present taxation system for unemployment insurance, forced savings, the refundable portion of our taxation and many other items which now go into the consolidated revenue fund, the only place into which, of course, it can go; but I say the government accounts should show this money received for these purposes earmarked as a liability. I am glad to see the minister is giving some sort of certificate now for the savings which are being deducted, although I am not just in accord with the way in which he is doing it. It is true the employee has a record of his unemployment insurance in his unemployment insurance book, but a corresponding receipt or certificate is not given to him for the portion of his wartime earnings which is kept from him until after the war. Employees who have these deductions made and the receipt held back until the end of the year are not satisfied; they demand that some sort of weekly or monthly certificate should be issued when the deduction is made. They might save them up in the same manner as one accumulates war savings certificates. No doubt in reply the government will say it is just like superannuation. But forced savings are not the same as superannuation. Superannuation is an old-established art for the purpose of having people save money for themselves; it is a contract between the government on the one hand, or perhaps an organization, and the employee on the other, and is thoroughly understood by both parties. I hope the minister will give some consideration to revising the receipt or certificate given for these deductions.

I come now to our expenditures, which occupied so much of our time this afternoon. They fall into two categories; ordinary expenditures and war expenditures. I hope that what I say in this regard will be considered constructive.

We must service our national debt, carrying charges for loan flotations. We find ourselves forced to compensate the provinces for invading their tax field. But we can and must reduce our ordinary expenditure. Another field for reducing our ordinary expenditure is found in paternal legislation for relief and works projects, wheat acreage reduction, and the operations of the wheat board and other government enterprises such as harbours and railways. Many of these organizations will have profits instead of deficits and will be able to recoup the treasury to a certain extent; they should certainly call for far less than in previous years. Their calls demand the scrutiny of every member of this house if he is to discharge his responsibility in regard to examining expenditures. That is our duty; every dollar saved is a dollar earned, and should be used to increase our war effort.

The other field of expenditure, namely, war expenditure, has not had the care and attention from members of the house that the vast sums spent demand. Every criticism unfortunately seems to take on a political angle, and this attitude defeats any good intention hon. members might have in making their criticisms. Hon. members will recall that the Prime Minister said this legislation was an opportunity for the private member to be of service to his country. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said on various occasions that he welcomes the committee and that the committee would be of some assistance to him, that the committee could review the expenditures. But we all know that it has been a failure as far as accomplishing the task which its name implies. The lack of representation of minority groups, the secrecy forced on the activities of the committee—I do not intend to enlarge on this subject now because I realize I am out of order, that it is on the order paper to be discussed in a day or two—these things all tended to restrict the possibility of our doing an efficient job. These expenditures are the concern of every member of the house. Ten per cent of the membership of the house is not enough to assume the responsibility of checking seventy per cent of Canada's expenditure. The entire House of Commons for years devoted itself to examining estimates amounting to $500 million. In days gone by I have seen the whole membership sit for months, discussing estimates. Yet now it is suggested that ten per cent of the membership can examine and report back on expenditures more than eight times as great. It is out of all balance. It is another evidence of the fact which is so patent that no effort is being made to use the man-power of this house in an orderly way. I say to hon. members supporting the government, the futility of your service to the nation in this time of stress is to be deplored. In party warfare the vulgar expression is used that those supporting the administration are rubber stamps. I would hesitate to say of this house in these serious times that the members are just rubber stamps, but I should like to leave that thought with them; let them examine their own conscience and see if they can bring themselves to believe that they are doing everything humanly possible to help in this war effort. I suggest to them that the whole matter of war expenditure should be overhauled; I leave it there until the committee is introduced.

I come now to the subject of borrowings. The success which attended our victory loan is something in which Canada can take pride. I was of opinion then, and I am now, that we did not ask for enough money. If our national income a couple of years ago was $4,500 million and we raised $1,000 million, then if it is now $5,500 million, we could raise more than $1,000 million. If this year it is to be $7,000 million we are out of balance if we try to raise only $1,000 million. In my opinion we must set our sights higher and go after this money. I will give my reasons in a moment why this must be done. I say to the Minister of Finance: set your sights high; get your campaign under way as early as possible. We have not had the same degree of success with war savings certificates and stamps. Part of the reason undoubtedly lies in the new forms of taxation introduced in last year's budget. People who previously started buying war savings certificates found themselves letting their money go into other taxation avenues. And part of the reason—one I should like to see dispelled as quickly as possible—is the allegation of waste in war expenditures. Whether it be gossip, rumour, or something else, there is no doubt that there is something disturbing the confidence of the Canadian people in the operations of the affairs of the country. Our people must be reassured that every dollar taxed and every dollar borrowed are put to the best possible use.

I was a little disturbed when on February 9 the Minister of Finance gave a statement to the house, as he said to allay the damage being done to our victory loan by wholly inaccurate statements regarding victory bond sales. As I listened to the statement it occurred to me that the inaccuracies in the public mind which the minister was thinking about had to do with the money which was provided for the victory loan by the banks of Canada. Individuals subscribed $401·1 millions, leaving all other kinds of subscribers $590·4 millions. The minister's statement reads:

> There was only three million purchased by the banks, 2·5 million out of Quebec savings banks and a half million by the chartered banks.

That is the minister's statement and, literally, it is correct. The minister emphasizes the insignificant volume of purchases by the chartered banks. But this compilation made on February 9 does not give a clear picture to the Canadian people of what actually has occurred. The minister knows, and the house knows, that even though the chartered banks as such purchased bonds to a value of only half a million dollars, in the last billion dollar loan, they certainly used the people's deposits to finance a very large portion of that victory loan. That is elementary; we know that.

Take, for example, the $298,000,000 subscribed by firms and corporations. A very large portion of this subscription was financed by business firms and corporations borrowing the people's money from the banks. In like manner many patriotic citizens borrowed from the banks, in many instances—and I know of a number—as a patriotic gesture paying the full rate for overdraft interest, in order that they might bear their full responsibility as citizens of this country.

It is not enough to say that you have discouraged participation by chartered banks in the purchase of victory bonds. You must tell the people at the same time that you have encouraged the banks to have their clients buy victory bonds, whether those clients have credit balances or debit balances. In other words, my criticism is that there is a tendency to make statements which do not carry the whole picture. More confidence would be inspired if the statement covered the amount of money borrowed by our people from the banks to make the loan possible. And more confidence would be engendered in the minds of our people if they were given the plain facts that during the current fiscal year we shall have borrowed direct from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks the amount of $983,000,000. Of course we did not borrow the $983,000,000 to subscribe to victory loans; they are two entirely different matters. However it is still money required to take care of our war expenditures. And when we say that only half a million dollars came from the chartered banks we must give the other side of the picture. At the same time let us be—I cannot think of a better word than frank—let us be frank enough to say that we found it necessary to borrow $983,000,000 from the banks in order to discharge our obligations. I believe the minister and the house will agree that this is a dangerous situation. It is dangerous to borrow this money, but it had to be done. To my mind nothing will start the spiral of inflation faster than will the government borrowing money from the banks, and leaving the people holding considerable savings for their own account. That is why I said a moment or two ago that we must be closer up on the heels of our spending, as far as our victory loans are concerned, or we shall be culpable and guilty of starting a dangerous spiral of inflation, and thereby destroying all the work done in an effort to control in the last three or four years. To my mind the minister spoke a truism when he said, "If the government borrows from individuals, the government spends the money. The individual does not."

We are face to face with the fact that this $983.000,000 cannot be spent by each of us. That is to say the government cannot spend it on the one hand, and the people spend the same amount on the other. If the people spend it, it will not be in the banks for the government to borrow next year, or even now. I therefore throw out the warning that the government must get possession of this spending power if next year we are to be able to meet our war obligations. Of course they say the obligations will be met with the next victory loan. I must repeat, however, that the amount of loan is not sufficient, because the savings of individuals are held by the individuals in the banks of Canada. They are there; we ought to find the means of prying this money out, so that the government rather than the individual will have it to spend. It is possible that the individual may not spend it as providentially as we might wish him to spend it. If, in order to avoid the chaos of inflation which will be forced upon us, we do not acquire immediately a victory loan of magnitude in order temporarily to freeze up this liquid money, we shall find it has been spent by the people themselves. I entreat all those who have the interests of Canada at heart to place every available dollar in the service of the nation at this critical time. If the present condition continues, business enterprise will be unable to borrow, interest rates will go up, and the whole financial structure will be out of hand.

Mark you, twelve months ago it was reported to the house that there were no borrowings by government from the banks. That was a fairly healthy condition. We now find that in one year the borrowings from the banks have risen to $983,000,000. What will it be in two years? Where will private enterprise be able to borrow funds with which to carry on, if the government has borrowed all the money from the banks. To borrow $1,000 million in the next victory loan is not enough. To say that fifty per cent of your expenditure is pay as you go is not enough. It is always the extra five dollars earned by a bread-winner that makes it possible for him to balance his budget and make an investment. That particular bread-winner is earning that extra $5 to-day, every week he is working. It is always the last few dollars of the hundred dollars in a transaction which provide the credit balance. Anyone who is in business or in production knows that we have not seen a profitable year like 1942 for a long while. Wage-earners were not seeing the $5 left over at the end of the week to the same extent as they did in 1942. Therefore I say that it should not be at all difficult to secure a good deal more money for the next victory loan.

I reinforce that suggestion by saying that we are now experiencing a velocity of turnover of all commodities which provides larger credit balances. The acceleration which turnover of money and commodities has experienced leaves the Canadian people to-day with more income and more spending power than they have ever before been accustomed to. One of the main factors in the turnover of commodities has been the necessary restriction which has been brought about in the number of lines a merchant may carry on his shelves. The more articles of food, clothing, shelter and personal services are standardized, the faster will be the turnover of inventory. The faster inventories are turned over, the greater will be the credit balances available for taxation. In passing, I warn the administration that we have come to the end point in many commodities, but this condition has been going on since the war started and we have not taxed into that position sufficient to check extravagant spending.

We must do it. Improvident spending and carnival living which have been so rampant this winter will break out again with renewed intensity with the advent of spring and the Easter bonnet unless something is done. Surely we do not have to wait for a blood-letting tragedy overseas to sober us. The government has a responsibility; the government has no alternative but to take this situation in hand immediately. It is a delicate matter to deal with; it is fraught with many dangers, but the delicacy of the situation and the dangers involved are not to be compared with the danger of inflation. That is most difficult to keep in rein. If it ever breaks loose, the damage done to this country by the runaway horse of inflation will bring us into financial chaos.

In regard to this question I bring to the attention of the house a factor in connection with the raising of funds to which perhaps not much consideration has been given. There are, according to a return tabled in this house a few days ago, 734,760 farms in Canada. During the time of the spring victory loan there will be incidental expenses to these farmers in getting their seeding under way, buying machinery and equipment or putting it into service. They will have to make cash outlays for a certain amount of seed, grasses, fertilizers, fence repairs and other items which will run far in excess of $100 per farm. The fishermen on our inland waters, as well as those on our seacoasts, will have to rehabilitate their equipment. If we add to the farmers and the fishermen those who are engaged in other vocations and who must increase or establish their activities in the spring of each year, we find we have a million people spending anywhere from $100 to $300 each. This means that $200,000,000 or more will be used up by primary industry and will not be available for the victory loan. In order to meet this situation I make a suggestion which I hope will be considered constructive. Our primary producers should be given an opportunity to subscribe in the spring and to pledge payment with the harvest.

Last year we gave the United Kingdom a billion dollar credit, made up of food and supplies. Along with the repatriation of securities, this is now a part of Canadian war expenditures.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Louder, please.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I invite my hon. friend to come and take a seat here close to me. He will then be able to hear what I am saying.

This is now part of our Canadian war expenditures and should be a matter of study and review—in this regard I am expressing my own opinion—by the banking and commerce committee of this House of Commons. I suggest this because some agents of Hitler have been confusing the public mind by telling them that the United Kingdom sold a good portion of these gifts to other members of the united nations who are fighting our battles in the south Pacific and in North Africa. The budget this year provides ways and means for a billion dollars to the united nations. The Hyde Park agreement assists us in making this possible, but in order to allay criticism in the minds of our people against such gifts, the whole matter should be reviewed by the banking and commerce committee and reported to the house.

I also make the observation that every possible expansion of our trade with the western hemisphere should be explored. Ten years ago we received the benefits of the empire trade agreements. They did a great deal to re-establish Canada as a great trading nation. The war requirements of the United Kingdom are helping us to-day to maintain our export position as far as the natural products and war supplies produced by this country are concerned. Our exports are ever increasing to the United Kingdom. The billion dollar credit to the United Kingdom has made this possible.

I have no objection to the billion dollar appropriation to the united nations. In fact, the Hyde Park agreement on the one hand, and the courageous offensive of the Russian people and the long suffering tenacity of China on the other, make it imperative that we support the cause of the united nations. At the same time our allies in the united nations will not deny us the privilege as well-grown cubs to support the mother lion of Britain in her days of travail. Much more will this be so when we bring to the attention of the united nations the fact that thousands of our finest sons and daughters, in common with those of other units of the empire, stand shoulder to shoulder with Britons in defence of freedom.

I come now to the matter of the trade of Canada. There seems to have been a falling off in the discussion of ways and means of increasing our trade, which we all realize is and recognize as the blood-stream of the economic life of this country. I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) is in his seat. I say to him that we have not had very much success in expanding our trade as far as the western hemisphere is concerned. I hope he has some plan with regard to trade to lay on the table of this house or discuss when he comes to speak on this budget. The usual budget speech in days gone by contained a lot about trade, but he will find very little about it in this budget speech.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In accordance with the aims of the Atlantic charter Canada should join in setting up effective national measures with a view to making world resources available for the satisfaction of human needs. That was a long sentence, Mr. Speaker, and I wanted to get it on the record before permitting this interruption.

Mr. SLAGHT: Does the hon. member not think it fair to suggest that the reason why we have not increased our trade with South America is transportation difficulties? They are primarily responsible for the absence of a showing for the time being.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That is patent on the surface. Anybody who reads the press would know that. At the same time there is no reason why we should not have some word from the minister as to what he has in his mind for the future. We have a great opportunity to cooperate with the united nations and organize our trade in such a way that we shall assure our people of gainful occupation and a high standard of living, and at the same time assure a fair price to the consumers. To reach these objectives it will be necessary to establish a foreign trade advisory service to assist exporters. We must train men for foreign selling—and this in part answers the question of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will tell us about this when he makes his speech in this debate. We must, as I said, train men for foreign selling and place them abroad, first, among the united nations, and, second, in strategic places where they can facilitate the sale of Canadian goods and act as a medium for the purchase of imports to aid our export sales.

At present not nearly enough attention is being given to the home consumption of our natural products. We should not wait for war shortages to force us from the consumption of luxury foods imported from abroad while our own equally nourishing products lie in storage. Let me take a homely example, so often referred to, the Canadian apple—and here I purpose using a confidential figure with regard to imports of fresh fruits and vegetables and other commodities which are really luxury foods. While the figures are confidential, I do not see anything in them that will give comfort to the enemy, and very little in them that will give comfort to the administration, and I will take the full responsibility for using them.

Last year we imported $24,476,326 worth of fresh fruits. There is no reason at all why we should not replace a very large portion of this from our own natural production. I mention this to try to encourage and inspire our Canadian people to produce more during the current year. I mention it not so much as a criticism as to bring it to the attention of the Canadian people and of the house. We imported dried fruits to the value of $5,199,003; fruit juices were imported to the value of $1,852,067. Our fresh fruit imports in 1934 amounted to $10,576,033. Even in 1938 they reached the sum of only $16,000,000, as compared with $24,000,000 to-day. This trend is an indication of our high living and improvident tastes and should be taken definitely in hand, not only to save foreign exchange, but also to make more of these supplies available to the United Kingdom. These luxury foods should be made available to the people of the United Kingdom and not be brought into Canada. Why should the people of the United Kingdom have to starve for lemons and oranges? Why should traffic on the embankment in London be held up by the sight of a girl eating a banana? The people had not seen one there for such a long time. Our troops overseas should have first call on luxury foods. Fruit juices of the orange and grapefruit could be very readily replaced by apple juice and tomato juice. This coming year we should produce more and more tomatoes and apples for this purpose and also to replace our heavy imports of vegetables. The Prime Minister has taken some lead in the restriction of beer and alcoholic beverages. As a suggestion, I would say that it might be a simple matter to encourage in some of us who have old-fashioned traits, the consumption of cider to replace this extravagant drinking of beer and alcoholic beverages.

Mr. SLAGHT: Hard or soft cider?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It depends upon the taste of my hon. friend. I say that cider and grape juice could replace this extravagance. Our fruit juice imports have doubled in four years. Our imports of fresh vegetables last year were $9,190,192; in 1934 they were $3,545,725. Why should we now be importing almost three times as much and waste our exchange on imported luxury foods when the money is so badly needed for war purposes? Our total import of fresh vegetables in 1939, the first year of the war, was only $5,338,140, against $9,000,000 now, which means that we have almost doubled our imports of fresh vegetables since the war began. Not only that, but we are subsidizing out of the treasury the consumer purchase of some of these commodities which are wasting our foreign exchange, while our own fruit and vegetables are running up improvident storage charges and so on.

If we are to have gainful occupation for our people when this war is over, and if we are to have revenue from customs and excise by which we can run the affairs of this country, we should be careful not to let our financial structure in the control of imports entirely collapse. In the matter of manufactured goods, Canadian industry is agreeing to millions of dollars of imports without tariffs while the war is on. The same spirit will prevail during the period of reconstruction. Whereas it is good business for Canada as far as war supplies are concerned, at the same time it should not be allowed to apply to non-essential supplies that have no relation to the war effort.

World trade and world economy changed very considerably and very quickly with the advent of the war. Some two years ago I made a compilation of the world's supply of raw materials. I took the Geneva figures for all the countries of Europe, Africa and Asia, deducted imports and exports one to the other, took into the equation the grand total of production and the grand total of consumption, and I make this observation now because I did not have an opportunity of doing so a year ago. I am of opinion that a nazi-controlled Europe and a Japanese-controlled Pacific almost make the axis powers self-sufficient. That is a startling statement. Our dream of economic starvation of the axis powers is a dream of yesterday. It does not obtain to the same extent to-day. But with respect to many raw materials it is still possible. The outstanding example of this condition of self-sufficiency is the control that Japan has taken of the Pacific—tin, rubber, oil and vegetable oil.

The house will recall that in 1936, 1937 and 1938 I placed on the record the position this country would be in if we did not produce more and more oils and fats. I pointed out at that time that for every pound of creamery butter produced in Canada we were importing almost as much palm, peanut and other vegetable oils. The figures given were the production by Canada of 250 million pounds of creamery butter, and at the same time we imported a like amount of vegetable oils. I pointed out that if anything ever happened to our vegetable oil supply from the Pacific we would be so short of fats in this country that even butter would have to be rationed. We have seen the rationing of butter. We are now face to face with a problem which I enunciated five, six and seven years ago. Quite true, the problem was approached from another point of view, but one of the outstanding merits of that approach is the fact that it was not economic for this country to be bringing in these materials when it was possible to produce our own fat requirements in this northern clime. Therefore I would trespass on the time of the house long enough to bring this picture up to date, as I see it, as far as butter is concerned. My purpose in doing so is to be constructive, to urge our people to produce more and more of this natural commodity which is so necessary to the life of Canada.

To meet the situation it is necessary to produce more and more butter fat. If we are to support the effort overseas we shall have to restrict further the high per capita consumption of fat at home so that we may have an exportable surplus of butter in the days to come to feed our troops overseas.

For years butter production in Canada has been growing. When I discussed this matter some five years ago we were producing two hundred and fifty million pounds a year. To-day the production is two hundred and eighty-four million pounds of creamery butter and eighty-five million pounds of farm butter. But that growth has not exceeded to any appreciable extent the increased consumer demand on account of the natural increase in our population and an increase in the demands and requirements of our people. I went to school with some men who are now members of this house. The pupils of that school had beef dripping on their first course for their frozen lunch; on the second course they had corn syrup; on neither course did they have any butter; and substantial men were raised in that day and generation from that fare. About the only time butter found its way to the table was when company came in on a Sunday afternoon prior to going to church. We may have to go back to those conditions.

It is true that at times much is said about surplus, or exportable surplus, but when we come to deal with that surplus we find it usually does not amount to as much as five per cent of the total production. It is practically negligible; we are able to make barely enough butter to supply our own people; and as our tastes become more extravagant with increased incomes we shall not have a surplus here to supply the boys overseas in case they need some of the butter which is being produced here. We must demand of our people greater production. I intend to suggest one or two ways by which this may be done, and done early enough, so that the farmers of Canada can do their planning now. Small and all as this surplus may be, nevertheless it is a depressing factor and one which has been with us long enough to be dealt with on some fair basis, so that its depressive influence may disappear. If we consider that butter production represents more than forty-two per cent of the total utilization of milk in Canada, it is a problem which justifies the most careful and constructive attention which can be given to it. True, in war time the importance of this great agricultural production has been impressed upon the government of the day. Subsidies are being paid, not for the purpose of dealing with surpluses, but to stimulate production. I am in accord with that. But what has been done has not been sufficient and has not taken into account the increased consumer demand which has been apparent at least since the first year of the war. It is true that the bait of subsidies has been thrown out to the cream producer, but these subsidies have been a hit-or-miss proposition and have been paid without due regard to the price relationship to other items of utilization, such as cheese, evaporated milk, and milk for fluid consumption. Furthermore, for the past year at least, the farmer was not told of subsidies until his programme of operation for the year had been decided upon. I suggest to the government of the day that the butter subsidy is less than it should be, and that the government's policy in respect of the subsidy and the requirements should be announced now, early in the year, right now, rather than late in the season, when milk producers find it difficult or impossible to accommodate themselves to what is required of them.

The production of butter cannot be divorced from the need for oils and fats already being pressed upon us by one department of government, and there is nothing more national in character than agriculture, since we are fortunate in having agricultural activities in every province. With feed aplenty and an undiminished cow population, there should be no butter shortage in Canada. The minister may challenge that statement. Some of us imagine, from the gossip we hear, that cows are being killed in great numbers because there is no help on the farms to look after them, no milking machines to milk them, no spare parts for the milking machines, and so on. But I have enough trust and confidence in the Canadian producer to believe that he will find ways and means of getting milk and turning it into butter if we find ways and means of giving him that parity of price, that fair reward for the knowledge and effort which he puts in on the farm to produce butter. We should have some surplus, too, which we can send either directly or through our friends across the line to countries starving for oils and fats.

I come now to another section of the same discussion, and in this connection I wish to pay tribute to one or two of the departments for something they are trying to do. The waste of inedible oils and fats in Canada has been appalling for many years. I am putting some facts on the record for the purpose of encouraging those who are trying to lessen this waste, and in the interests of the national economy. If one will take the time to read Hansard of 1936, 1937 and 1938, and particularly the evidence given at the hearing of the tariff board on December 9, 10 and 11, 1936, he will find that our waste of fats and greases amounted to fifty million pounds a year. The salvage department of national war services, and the oils and fats administrator for Canada, Mrs. Phyllis G. Turner, with Mr. Laferle of the national war services organization, have been indefatigable in their efforts to rectify this situation. I would say from observation that they have saved Canada's economy about twenty million pounds a year of what previously went to waste. The women of Canada and the municipalities are doing a fine job, from both a voluntary and an economic point of view, in saving fats. There is room for great improvement in fat and grease salvage, and I urge all concerned to do everything possible. One hundred pounds of this commodity will produce from ten to thirteen pounds of glycerine. Thirty million pounds extra saved per year will produce three million pounds of glycerine. Three million pounds of glycerine manufactured into explosives could blow the city of Ottawa to smithereens and shake the entire Ottawa valley. I mention that to try and impress even Kingsmere; I see the Prime Minister is getting worried. I make this statement in order to encourage those patriotic women who are voluntarily working to save this material; to encourage the street cleaning departments of our cities and towns and all those who are trying to assist the Department of National War Services in this very necessary work.

We have still another opportunity to increase our production of edible fats. Let the government increase the weight allowed for hogs before they are slaughtered, and make sure that the producer receives the maximum price even if the hogs are heavy, because there is no easier method of manufacturing fat than by means of the hog. The government has gone some distance in this direction by allowing top prices for hogs put on the market at weights greater than obtained before the war. It is freely admitted by those who know anything about the trade that the last twenty pounds are the cheapest and quickest to put on the hog, and this would help out by increasing the consumption of our mixed grains. So that we would be serving two ends: on the one hand we would be feeding our grain, of which we have a large surplus, and on the other we would be producing heavier hogs, thereby increasing the available amount of a by-product of which we are short to the extent of 200,000,000 pounds a year. We depend upon the British market, of course, to consume all our export surplus of hog products, though nowadays I imagine our production is more for export than for home consumption. It is my opinion that the United Kingdom has no appreciable surplus of fats and would not be averse to accepting heavier Wiltshire sides. If we pointed out to the United Kingdom how easy it was for us to add an extra ten pounds before slaughtering a hog for the British market, they might concede a point and allow us to export bacon as a means of shipping an extra supply of mixed grain in the form of heavier fat bacon.

As far as the domestic consumption of pork is concerned, I would be even more drastic. I believe that in connection with many commodities this government should tell the people what they have to put up with in regard to what they eat, what they wear and what shelter they have. The people should be reminded that there is a war on; that if they do not put up with inconveniences of one kind and another perhaps something will happen to us and we shall have somebody placed over us who will see that we get very little of the extras we are getting now. Therefore, in connection with the domestic consumption of pork products I say the government should come out boldly and tell the Canadian people that we are not going to allow small shop hogs to be slaughtered and sold in the butcher shops, but that Canadians must acquire a taste for heavier pork. I believe the public would be receptive to a campaign of this kind, and the result would be that our supplies of fats would be supplemented, our coarse grains would be used up, and at the same time Canadian hog producers would make some real money. I believe this matter deserves the attention of this house, so that if I seem rather ponderous or appear to take up a great deal of unnecessary time in this connection, I make no apology whatever for doing so, because I am not one of those who in days gone by have taken up very much time in this House of Commons.

I come now to a short discussion of the meat situation. We still import $2,000,000 worth of meat a year, but the big problem in connection with this natural product is the export problem. The relation of fat to beef has been partly dealt with during the last six months by the muddle in connection with the ceiling prices on beef. While this fuss has been going on, the cattle raisers have been holding their cattle in the feeding barns. As a result, the weight of these cattle has gone up, and in my opinion that is a quite satisfactory result, because we have been placing much heavier cattle on the market than was the case before the war. As I say, this result was brought about by the muddle in connection with ceiling prices, but I am hopeful that the dissatisfaction which has been expressed by the producers of beef cattle will result in the government bringing forward some sort of policy that will enable us to get away from rumour and gossip, and the black market.

Undoubtedly there was a good deal of truth in what the hon. member for Elgin had to say about the prevalence of a black market, and I notice that those who sniped at him, both in the press and elsewhere, found it difficult to enunciate any policy that would avoid a recurrence of this situation. I agree with the hon. member for Elgin and with the press that once the government has put its hand to the plough in the matter of controlling the price of beef or any other commodity, it should at the same time control those people in the trade who violate the regulations. You cannot maintain a price ceiling without controlling those who have to deal with a particular commodity. It would not be a difficult matter to ascertain whether or not there is any truth in the accusations of the hon. member for Elgin. We have the mounted police in every town and city throughout the country; we have records of the hides taken off all beef cattle, so that we can tell whether a man slaughtered ten cattle in 1937 and 100 in 1942. In every village and town throughout the country we have investigators in the various departments of government; for example, I saw a question on the order paper the other day with regard to prosecutions in the town of Brockville. Let these various officials be charged with another responsibility, namely, that of running down all this bootlegging and these black-market activities. Take a firm stand in that connection, and we shall realize that we have an administration that is taking some action to control those who would violate its regulations. Never in the history of Ontario have so many cattle been slaughtered by individuals in small slaughter houses, which has resulted in great economic waste in connection with the by-products. That is a very serious matter. One thing is sure; these people would not be in this line of business if they were not getting a good profit out of it.

The other fact in the equation is that in the United States, which so vitally affects our economy, the average price for all kinds of agricultural products was 113, while ours was 87. This applies to a degree also with regard to live stock, though perhaps not to the same extent. We must make an attempt to meet part of the situation. Give the live stock producers a fair reward for their industry and you will soon eliminate any vestige of black markets. With the advent of the war the government seems to have entirely neglected the matter of trade and commerce. I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he will be expected to give some report to the Canadian people.

I come now to a subject which I would say was rather smuggled into the budget. I hope to have time to complete my remarks on that before eleven o'clock; if not, we might run through to twelve o'clock with the permission of the house.

The minister says an exchange of notes took place with the United States on November 30 last. I should like to have those notes laid on the table so that we might have them before us during this budget debate. The minister is one who favours trade agreements; he favours empire trade agreements. I ask him, when he is thinking about this exchange of notes regarding trade, to enlarge the empire trade agreements and at the same time give consideration to trade agreements with the united nations. Let us not be too quick to pick out one member of the united nations whose economy is so close to ours, and ignore the others. Other allies, China and Russia, require food and munitions. I have no objection to trading to the utmost with the United States, but with the war and our dependence on a joint effort of all the united nations in the struggle this is not a good time to make a trade agreement with any one unit of the united nations, which to my mind might be a panicky agreement; that is to say, decisions made in that particular agreement might be based on a reason which was evident to-day on account of war pressure but might be dispelled to-morrow. The present agreement carries on until six months' notice of abrogation is given. Let us not disturb the situation. When the envoys of China and of Russia are at Washington, why have them studying the fact that Canada, one of the members of the united nations, and the United States, are making an economic deal, and divert their attention from the war effort, or even divert our attention? Let the matter rest. Let us be fair with all members of the united nations while this war is on. These are delicate subjects, and all concessions should be distributed equally among all the united nations without picking out any one nation for special attention. It is all fraught with danger. This task of revising and opening up proceedings with the United States is too serious to be taken up at this time; let us get on with more vital war matters and not divert the mind of our people. We have only to read our history to know how easily the mind of the people in Canada is diverted when a matter of this kind is under discussion. Some hon. members can remember back to 1911 and to the United Kingdom trade agreements of a few years ago. Why do we want to stir that matter up now? There is no necessity for any real changes; any change which is an economic necessity on account of the war, as the minister very well knows, is being made very freely now by what one might term gentleman's agreements between the industry in the United States and the industry in Canada, with the knowledge and consent of the government officials, waiving duties during the time of war. That in itself ought to be sufficient.

Not only that; this situation is even more serious. I see one of the hon. members from Essex in his seat. I should like to hear what he would have to say in regard to opening up negotiations for a trade agreement with the United States at this critical time. How does the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) feel about disturbing the peaceful relations of the automobile trade at this time? Bear in mind that when this war is over—and remember it can be over soon—we shall have thrown into the picture about five hundred thousand wage-earners who will be looking for employment. Almost that many will come out of war industries alone. We shall have to transfer them to some other vocation. Do not interfere with our present trade position, or we shall find it very difficult not only to find vocations for those, but also to keep established our economy as we understand it to-day. I know that the authority of the President of the United States to amend the rates of duty expires in June, 1943, and may not be extended, but I also know that the people of the United States, when the proper time comes, will be responsive and ready to make an agreement with us.

Just to give an idea of the magnitude of the study required when one comes to deal with a trade agreement of that kind, I have here what took place with regard to the last Canada-United States trade agreement, and the effect it has in upsetting trading in the different items. The final result was almost six to one against Canada. This is taken from the files and from the trade of Canada; Canada gave this large handful and in return got this small lot. We gave that much extra trade to the United States. I do not want to have to work on this thing while the war is on. I do not think the people of Canada or the press of Canada want at this time to discuss negotiations for a trade treaty with the United States; the time is too serious. I say this not from the picayune sense that it might be a little tariff advantage here or there to an industry, but in a big broad sense. And I say it, not in the broad sense, as it concerns Canada and the United States, but in the greater and broader sense as it concerns the saving of our civilization and the saving of freedom, through the keeping of a united front by the united nations.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss the national debt. I wish to make some observations and offer some constructive suggestions as to how we might improve our taxation position. I also wish to make a few remarks concerning annuities, concerning the Ruml plan and the Ilsley plan, and I suggest, sir, that you might call it eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Harris (Danforth) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 9, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DORION—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" OF TUESDAY, MARCH 9

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I read in this morning's Ottawa Citizen the following statement under the title, "Will probe charge of waste only if M.P. makes claim," which appears in the first column on the first page of the issue:

> Against the government on division were Progressive Conservatives, C.C.F., Social Credit, several independents in the "rebel" corner—

According to the Oxford dictionary the word "rebel" means:

> A person who rises in arms against, resists, or refuses allegiance to the established government; person or thing that resists authority or control.

I have no doubt that the 67,000 people living in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house will resent this insinuation, and in their names, as well as in my own, I protest strongly against it. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not at all afraid of what this paper may write about me. I do not want its support and I do not fear its insinuations, but I have always been of the opinion that a newspaper worthy of the name at least should be honest and fair even toward those who have the right to support a different point of view.

MR. MACKENZIE KING—HEADING OF ARTICLE IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF TUESDAY, MARCH 9

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to refer to a matter which concerns the house. My attention has been drawn to the heading of an article which appears in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Tuesday, March 9, 1943, reading as follows:

> Speaker foils move to probe Thompson case. Opposition groups ask in vain for inquiry by commons committee.

I realize that Your Honour the Speaker is not in position to draw the attention of the house to this article, but it has been drawn to my attention and I think it is only right that I should make clear to those who are outside the house as well as to hon. members in the house that Your Honour the Speaker had nothing to do, as far as I can realize, with what is described as the foiling of a move to probe a case that was brought before the house yesterday. I have been reading the article and I cannot see anything in it which really justifies the heading that has been placed upon it. I do not want to attach undue importance to it, but I think it is due to Your Honour that the country should know that the Speaker of the House had not prevented any inquiry being made into the Thompson case.

Mr. GRAYDON: No doubt the article refers to the fact that the Speaker had ruled out of order the motion which is dealt with in the article. I have not seen the article myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It conveys the impression that His Honour the Speaker was responsible for some inquiry not being permitted. His Honour the Speaker discharged his duties as Speaker in seeing that the rules of the house were obeyed and in giving a decision on the motion that was before the house in accordance with those rules. It is most important that no impression should go abroad that His Honour the Speaker, who is the presiding officer of this house and who in the discharge of the duties of his office must preside impartially, has been partial where in fact such is not the case.

JAPANESE VESSELS

TABLING OF REPORT OF HON. MR. JUSTICE SMITH

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): I wish to table the report of the committee headed by the Honourable Mr. Justice Sidney A. Smith, of Vancouver, appointed by order in council of January 13, 1942, P.C. 288, for the disposal of immobilized vessels and equipment owned and operated by persons of the Japanese race in British Columbia.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo) presented the first report of select committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FUEL

PRICE PER CORD OF BUSHWOOD IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I have information from Vancouver that wood that was selling at $9 per cord has been raised to $13 per cord. The increase in price, it was said, was on instructions from the wartime prices and trade board. Can the minister inform the house whether such instructions for raising the price were given, and if so, why?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I made some inquiry about this matter. The price was not raised on instructions from the wartime prices and trade board, but it would probably be true to say that the price was raised with the authorization of the board. One has to understand the situation there to appreciate it. This particular kind of wood, bushwood fuel, it is called, was sold in very small quantities until recently because most of the wood fuel required came from sawdust or mill wood, by-products of the lumber industry. When this latter fuel became very scarce the other form of fuel became more important, and as there were few suppliers, and they supplied only very small quantities, individual price ceilings meant very little. A maximum price for the kind of wood referred to by the hon. member was accordingly set for the whole zone or area. That maximum price was fixed at $13 a cord, the price that was deemed to be necessary to assure a supply.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is it illegal to sell this fuel in Vancouver below $13 a cord?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

PRICE SITUATION AT NEW BRUNSWICK BORDER POINTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I call the minister's attention to the situation obtaining on the border in New Brunswick? The price ceiling on hardwood fuel in New Brunswick is $12 a cord. In the United States, immediately across the line, the price is $15 a cord. Canadian producers are and have been for some time carrying fuel wood from New Brunswick across the border into towns such as Houlton and Calais, Maine, where they receive $15 a cord plus the exchange. It is feared that if this situation continues into another year, no fuel wood will be available at border points in New Brunswick. What does the wartime prices and trade board intend to do about it?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will bring the facts to the attention of the board.

POWER ALCOHOL

ROSTON MEMORANDUM ON UTILIZATION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I am informed that a man named Roston, who was owner of one of the largest power alcohol plants in eastern Europe, named Kutno Limited, situated in Poland, has made a report to the minister on the utilization of agricultural products in Canada. In view of the prevailing interest in the production of power alcohol from farm products in Canada, will the minister make this report available to members of the house, either by tabling it or by providing each member with a copy?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Roston has made representations to me personally with regard to the possibilities in connection with the production of alcohol, but he has made no report to me as Minister of Agriculture. I have had forwarded to me by a gentleman named Monahan on two different occasions a memorandum prepared by Mr. Roston on the production of alcohol, but it is in no sense a government document or even an exposition of government policy or departmental views with regard to the production of alcohol. I do not think it would be proper for me as a member of the government to distribute memoranda prepared by Mr. Roston or any one else who might be promoting some particular production.

OIL

BONUS ON IMPORTATION OF CRUDE OIL FROM MONTANA INTO ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the absence of the Minister of Munitions and Supply I should like to put a question which may be looked upon as a notice, because probably no one else can answer it now. I received to-day a communication from western Canada to the effect that some governmental authority, presumably the oil controller or what-not, is paying a bonus on the importation of crude oil from Montana into the province of Alberta. I should like to know if there is any truth in that report, what is the basis of it, and what is the justification for it. It was represented to me that this was discrimination against the producers in western Canada.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Acting Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, as this is something new I shall take the question as a notice and will try to bring down the information as soon as possible.

WAR REFUGEES

REPORT AS TO UNITED STATES PROPOSAL FOR PRELIMINARY DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. A Canadian Press dispatch dated at London, March 7, reads as follows:

> The Press Association said yesterday it learned that the British government has accepted the United States government's proposal for a preliminary two-power discussion on the refugee problem.
> The United States suggested the meeting be held at Ottawa, but the meeting place is still under discussion along with the composition of the British delegation.

I wish the Prime Minister to amplify, if he will, the reply which he gave on March 4 to a similar question. Perhaps he will also be good enough to reply to the following: Has the Canadian government issued an invitation for the conference to be held in Canada? Secondly, will the dominion seek representation independently, or as a component part of the British empire, or not at all?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There are a good many "or's" in my hon. friend's question, but I shall try to remember them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are better than "but's".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. First of all may I say that I have not received any information additional to that which I imparted to the house on the day I replied to the question to which my hon. friend has just referred. The communications were communications between the United States government and the British government, referring to a conference between the United States government and the British government. They were in the nature of what might be called exploratory communications. There was nothing final about them. As I stated at the time, the Canadian government had had some communication with the British government on the question of refugees. But the particular correspondence referred to by my hon. friend originated with the United States government, and we had not had any communication at all from the United States government. I am unable to say whether the two governments have agreed on having a conference. It was suggested tentatively that Canada might be a convenient place to have the conference, but this suggestion was without any prior reference to Canada in the matter, undoubtedly because, as I have said, the communications were tentative and the United States was endeavouring to find out from the British government whether or where the British government would agree to have a conference.

If we are invited to attend the conference I have not the least doubt that our government would be prepared to accept. But I do not think it would be either right or proper for Canada to extend an invitation to the United States and Britain to meet in Canada in regard to a matter about which they themselves are conferring at this time.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the Prime Minister seek representation notwithstanding the remarks he has made?—because he himself on March 4 said:

> The Canadian government . . . will . . . be glad to examine any suggestions which the United States government may wish to put forward as a contribution to the alleviation of a grave and distressing problem.

Surely we in this country are as much interested in the refugee problem as they are in the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we receive communications on this matter, and the nature of the communications permits, I shall be pleased to inform my hon. friend as to the reply.

RATIONING

ADDITIONAL CHARGE BY PUBLIC CATERERS FOR TEA, COFFEE OR MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): In view of the recent increase allowed by the wartime prices and trade board in the price of tea, coffee and milk used as a beverage or as a luncheon, which will increase the cost of living by approximately fifty-five dollars a year to all who are compelled to eat in restaurants, and for which increase in prices there would not seem to be any justification, will the government consider having this order of the wartime prices and trade board cancelled?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to be a little surer of some of the facts which the hon. gentleman incorporated into his question before I make an answer.

For instance, is the fifty-five dollars a year based upon a meal in a restaurant three times a day and every day in the year?

Mr. FAIR: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a dollar and a half meal in a dining car you pay five cents extra for a cup of coffee. It is ridiculous.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should not like to say that the matter will be reconsidered. It has been considered, and the reasons were given in the house the other day.

Mr. FAIR: I will point out that part of the—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FAIR: Then I would say this, Mr. Speaker, that some low salaried people will be compelled to drink water with their meals. Surely this will not be the new order we are promised.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

THE ANGUS SHOPS

DISMISSAL OF WORKERS PREVENTED THROUGH ACTION BY THE MINISTER OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the honourable the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) for the action which, as a result of representations from Montreal members, he has taken with the management of the Angus shops with a view to preventing the dismissal from those shops of 2,000 employees who would thus have been out of work.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, before discussing the matter of ways and means of raising the revenue under the present budget, and before we come to a review of the forecast for the coming year, I should like to say a word or two with regard to the national debt.

The minister has given us some stupendous figures with regard to our proposed expenditures, which will necessitate not only extraordinarily high taxation, but also heavy borrowing in the current year. Although the bookkeeping figures might show that over one-half of our expenditures will be paid out of revenue, the actual fact is that we shall be unable to pay as we go. Last year we acquired assets and certain government obligations held in London and certain sterling balances, which our Canadian bookkeepers have considered as a $700 million loan. We might call them investments, but if they are; they are frozen investments; they are not liquid. We have bereft ourselves of these sterling balances and they will not be there next year or at the close of the war to be used to pay for our exports to Britain. In the present budget there is no concrete answer to the problem of how we are going to assist Great Britain to pay for our future exports. One problem, then, is how can we increase the earnings and the savings of our people so that we may lend more to our country and replace the sterling balances of which we are bereft, on the one hand, and in the second place, the $983 millions which it was necessary for Canada to borrow from the banks. If Providence is kind to agriculture, and if our Canadian people apply themselves assiduously to the task, we shall be able to increase our earning power. There will be shortages of material, scarcity of power, and difficulties of transport. But it must be remembered that the need for war production is still very urgent, though many contracts for munitions and supplies are well ahead of schedule. We must replace inventories of goods that we require for the war effort even if we go short of civilian goods. More production will require more money. The more that is produced, the more money there should be for the wage earner.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) says it is not the size of the debt that matters. To my mind that is a dangerous statement, even though it is a fact, and perhaps it should not be referred to too often. After all, he says, the debt is an obligation of the people to pay the people the bonds which they hold, and therefore it is a matter of the distribution of the debt. I agree that it is a matter of distribution. I hope to make a constructive criticism in considering ways and means which, to my mind, will help spread the debt. It is a matter of importance to see to it that the average Canadian citizen holds these government obligations. Therefore we must have more savings to the credit of the wage earner so that he will build up for himself a cushion for the after-the-war period.

Unfortunately both in Canada and the United States there seems to be a falling-off of the wage-earner's desire to save to the maximum of his ability. This falling-off of the desire to earn and save is slowing down production, and it can best be illustrated by a few words about absenteeism. Thinking of ways and means, I would bring this subject as forcibly as I possibly can to the attention of Canada and of the minister. Absenteeism does not produce wages; if wages are not produced the income tax on the wages does not flow into the treasury of Canada. Absenteeism, which has become rampant in Canada and the United States, has created one of the most serious problems which we face. I quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, February 27, headed "Lost Time in War Work." It states:

Habitual absence from work in war industry, according to a report of the United States House Naval Committee, constitutes "a very ugly situation." Judging from reports that continue to be made, the absentee habit in war plants in Canada amounts to very much the same thing.

The U.S. committee admitted itself unable to say why this offence against production has become so prevalent. The New York Herald Tribune has attempted to enlighten the committee. It offers "a very simple explanation of the phenomenon," to wit:

It is that we are spoiling our war workers with wages which most of them never before dreamed of earning. They can get now in a third or half the time what they were accustomed to finding in their pay envelopes at the end of a full week. . . . Since the worker to-day has less of an outlet for his greater pay than he had for what he used to make, one powerful incentive to keep his nose to the grindstone is missing. The principal luxury remaining to him is leisure. So he buys that. It is a simple explanation. In fact, it is a little too simple. To suggest that war plant workers absent themselves merely because they are paid higher wages than were available before the war is to place their patriotism at a rather low level and to pass over a mass of other reasons that are varied and complex.

But beyond question there is a considerable amount of absenteeism that comes from high wages and temporary economic security. In normal times the cultivation of leisure is not necessarily an evil. But in times like the present it is different. The remedy is not lower wages, however, but the application of rules that will bring home to slackers the importance of their full-time cooperation in the war effort. In Britain, a worker who stays away from his job one shift is required to give an acceptable reason. Otherwise he is liable to a fine. If he persists, he can be jailed. If this sounds drastic, let it be remembered that the fight for survival is far from having been won . . . and the fighting men cannot go absent whenever they feel inclined to take it easy.

It is time that the rules applying to men in the armed forces should be made to apply to all the rest of us while the war is on. We have a similar situation in Canada, but the cause is largely improvident taxation. I would ask the minister to bear with me a few minutes while I substantiate what I say.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Mrs. NIELSEN: May I interrupt the hon. member? I am sorry to say that down at this end of the chamber we cannot hear a word he is saying.

Mr. GARDINER: We cannot hear it over here, either.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): May I pay my respect to the hon. member for her kind thought. The same thought was running through my mind. Perhaps in view of the fact that what I am going to say is very important we might have just a little more order in the house. To those who cannot hear what I say I suggest that they gather around my knee, so that I shall not have to strain my voice.

I should like to put on record a few observations which to my mind are sufficiently constructive to assist in increased production by labour, and the removal of one of the worst menaces to our production schedules. It is commonly called absenteeism. Labour is not to blame for absenteeism; the major portion of the responsibility lies directly on the shoulders of the administration. This condition arises because the taxation brought down in the last budget has made it easy for labour to stay away from their places of employment during these extra hours that we are exhorting them all to put at the disposal of the country to increase our war effort. I will recite the problem and make a suggestion as to how it might be adequately met, without any undue hardship on the honest and patriotic employee. In fact I am of the opinion that the income tax rate on that portion of labour which is paying income tax could be considerably reduced and at the same time more man-hours of work be given by employees to their country. Under last year's legislation this is what actually happened.

An employee who is single without any dependents and works a full week of 48 hours at 60 cents per hour has a pay of $28.80 a week. To simplify the computation I am omitting the sixty cents paid as cost of living bonus. He pays an income tax thereon of $4.90, deducted at the source. Part of that, it is true, is savings. If that same employee works a 40-hour week at one place of employment, namely five days only, he pays an income tax of $3.56 a week. If he works four days a week he pays an income tax of only $2.27 a week. It will be seen at once that he would be better off to work the full six days rather than the four or five days; but at the same time his income tax is doubled if he works six days a week rather than four. Rather than give to the government the extra

$2.63 in taxation he will stay at home and probably spend his time in improving his home, working in his garden, or taking leisure, with the net result that the government receives only half the income tax that it expected to receive from that individual.

The next case I recite is that of the married man with no dependents. In this instance the amount of income tax paid, if he works the full six days of 48 hours at 60 cents an hour, is $2.68; whereas if he works five days his tax is 21 cents. If he works four and a half days he pays no tax at all, and the treasury is bereft of $2.68 a week on that employee, the national production is correspondingly lowered, and the morale of the employee who works alongside of him, honest and full time in an all-out war effort, is lowered, with the result that he becomes dissatisfied.

Let us now take the case of the third man, who is married and has two dependents. His taxation at 60 cents an hour for 48 hours is 39 cents, whereas if he works five days it is nil. He too becomes dissatisfied when he finds his mate at the next bench losing time. This entire situation is accelerated and exaggerated when men anxious to finish jobs and anxious to put in overtime find they work an extra number of hours.

The loss in Canada's production on account of absenteeism is a problem which must be grappled with immediately. The loss in revenue on a payroll which it was my duty to examine a week ago was equivalent to 400 man hours of work per week against a payroll which had 8,000 man hours of work per week; in other words it was equivalent to five per cent of the production, plus the loss through inefficiency on account of shortage of labour on certain days. The present income tax legislation on wage-earners tends to encourage this condition. I suggest that we reduce the rates. In this way we would get more revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If the minister will bear with me for a minute until I finish this statement, I shall try to answer his question. I have suggested that we spread the tax so that it will affect more absentees. Have more of our people paying income tax, and thereby avoid a condition under which many of our wage earners are entirely free from taxation. I have in my hand the table of tax deductions under the Income War Tax Act. It is well worked out, but it illustrates the difficulty. Take the first column, a single man, and say he is fortunate enough to have a job at a dollar an hour, $48 a week. He must pay into the treasury of Canada, part by way of income tax, part by way of forced savings, a total of $12.02 if he works a full week of forty-eight hours. In other words, twenty-five per cent of his earnings is taken in the form of tax and what is to be returned to him two years after peace is declared. But if that same individual works only three days during the week, and stays home the rest of the time and potters around his house or garden, he pays only eight per cent of his earnings. Working half a week he pays eight per cent; working a full week he pays twenty-five per cent, which means that in the last three days of work some forty per cent of his earnings is going into the treasury of Canada.

I leave the schedule for hon. members to study. I come now to a married man with no dependents; if he works the same number of hours for the same pay he is taxed a total of $9.63 and he has a saving of $4.32. In other words for the first three days he works he pays no tax or forced savings, whereas for the last three days he pays eleven per cent of his total earnings, which for the last three days is equivalent to twenty-two per cent of his earnings.

In like manner a married man with one dependent pays no tax if he works half the week, but if he works the full week he pays $8.02 on his $48, of which $4.68 is savings. For the married man with no dependents the total deduction is twenty per cent. If he works three days a week he gets a dollar an hour during those three days, but for the next three days he gets about eighty cents an hour, and he does not feel happy about working while his mate is absent, or about not getting a similar return for the effort and energy he is putting into his work.

The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt) is one who is accustomed to large payrolls, and there are many others in this chamber who know what it is on Fridays to have to find many dollars for payrolls. They are worried about this matter. I hope that before the debate is over the minister will put on record the number of wage earners who are not paying any income tax or contributing to forced savings. When he does so I am of opinion that we shall find that half of the wage earners in the old standard lines of business—I am not saying so much about wartime or new industries—are not paying any income tax at all. My suggestion that the idea be considered of spreading that tax over the whole field of absentees either on a small percentage basis in the smaller brackets or on a more or less uniform percentage basis of some kind; or at the very least apply this legislation as it at present stands and collect it on a daily basis. There is provision for doing that. There would then be no encouragement for the individual to absent himself from his place of employment. I had hoped that this legislation would be amended, because the minister must have had scores of representations made to him, apart from those made by his own followers, particularly the one mentioned.

A weak effort was made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) to remedy part of this situation. When he speaks on the budget I should like him to make some sort of recommendation, but unfortunately in the conduct of our affairs the Minister of National Revenue is meticuluously careful at no time to enunciate any policy in regard to taxation. He leaves that field entirely to the overburdened Minister of Finance and says: I am merely a collector of the taxation the Minister of Finance puts upon the statutes. However, he did give instructions to employers with regard to deductions to be made from employees on account of income tax, including forced savings, under date of August 1942, on page 4 of which we find the following provision—I will read the provision and then explain it:

"Established payroll periods" refers to that period in any business which, as a regular practice, pays at the close of the pay period, even though an employee worked only part thereof, and the deductions will be made under the table of tax deductions for such pay period.

Here is the weak clause in these instructions; it must be weak because there is no legislation to cover the point:

If however in the course of an employee's continuous association with his employer the employer observes that such an employee is more or less habitually working three days or less in the established pay period of one week he should deduct on the factual experience of the employee and in lieu of deducting on the established pay period basis will deduct on a daily pay period basis.

Legislation should have been brought down to change "should" to "shall," and I hope it will be amended when the resolution is under consideration. Then we shall be able to bring those who absent themselves half the week in the pay period to a sense of their responsibility and collect the tax on the daily basis. At the present time that does not obtain, and you cannot ask an employer to try to implement the intention of this clause when he is not reinforced by legislation which says that he shall deduct on the factual experience of three days.

But three days is not enough, because there are very few individuals earning more than $48 a week, with the result that they may work three and a half days and still be excluded from paying taxation. If that schedule of taxation filled in all the blanks, even if the rate were very small, not only should we relieve the pressure of absenteeism on our economic system, and increase our production, but we should broaden the base of forced savings among many more thousands of our people so that they would have a cushion after the war. Briefly, it is only half the possible individual items of taxation which might be collected, but I do admit that it is not just half of the possible taxation. It is far more than that. Those in the brackets I have mentioned are paying far too much into the treasury as compared to those who pay nothing at all. An equalization of the situation would obtain and even increase the present revenues; it would maintain the savings which are to be returned after the war, and could be so designed as to increase those savings. Certainly it could be designed in such a way that it would encourage the workers of Canada to work a full week and even work overtime if necessary. In the final analysis, it would bring about increased production in secondary industries throughout Canada by anywhere from five to twenty per cent, which would still further offset the words of the Minister of Finance when he intimated that we were fast approaching the complete fruition of all our production programme.

I should like to refer for a moment to another item appearing in this budget, the matter of the tax on liquor, though I feel disposed to leave this question to be dealt with by the experts, and anything I say on it will be my own personal view. It does seem to me, however, that of all the items contained in the present budget the one having to do with liquor is the result of political disagreement between the provinces and the dominion as to who should operate, restrict or control this traffic. The Minister of Finance tried valiantly to keep out of this field, but either force of circumstances or the Prime Minister got him back into it. In the earlier days the government expressed the fear that if this tax were increased, bootlegging would become rampant. Now they have reversed their stand; this problem is back on their doorstep, and it will have to be faced. Having in mind the necessity of getting every possible dollar into the treasury of Canada, I suggest that the government give immediate attention to the problem of bootlegging before it gets completely out of hand. By all means control the consumption of liquor. My personal view is that we should let our citizens have beer if they want it. Let us do away with the spectacle that we see in our large cities to-day, with individuals rushing to the brewers' warehouses to buy up all the day's quota of beer, then in the evening parading from hotel to hotel and exhausting the supply of each tavern. That is a spectacle which should not be seen during these serious times. Let us have temperance in all things and prohibition in none, except where it may be necessary to bring about an all-out war effort. On Saturday last I was sorry to learn that in one institution the workmen, who under the terms of their union agreement had free access to a bulletin board, had placed on that board a sign saying, "No beer, no bonds." That is not a satisfactory condition; it is a very serious matter, and it must be remedied. I hope during the course of this debate the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) will tell us what he intends to do in order to give some respectability and restriction to this traffic which is always with us.

I come now to a matter with which I should like the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to deal. We have invaded the sacred precincts of the Post Office Department and demanded an additional $8,000,000 in revenue through an extra one cent of postage on letters, postcards and first class matter. This is another tax which business will have to pay, and I do not think business will complain very much about it. This additional money will be very difficult to find, except of course in those businesses which are in the excess profits bracket, and there are not so many in that group despite what may be said by some of our demagogues. But in my opinion, this extra tax will not produce a clear $8,000,000, for various reasons. First, there will be economizing on the part of business organizations; second, there will be less social correspondence; third, companies now paying excess profits tax will reduce the amount of such excess profits tax payable to the government and will even reduce the tax paid on their ordinary profits by including this extra amount for postage as a proper charge against the conduct of their affairs. I can understand why there should be no extra taxation on second class matter such as newspapers, and daily, weekly and monthly periodicals. An additional tax on this second-class matter would be out of proportion as compared to what business might stand, because the distribution of newspapers and periodicals is so great and postage forms such a large part of the actual expense of carrying on their business. In an ordinary business house the cost of postage probably amounts to less than one-half of one per cent of the cost of the year's operations, while in the case of newspapers and periodicals undoubtedly it is many times that percentage. At the same time I have no doubt there is a political reason, which I bring to the attention of the administration in as kindly a manner as possible. I suppose any government would put its political life in jeopardy if it added fifty per cent to the cost of circulating these newspapers and periodicals. But now that we are going to collect more money from the Post Office Department, some means should have been found to spread that increase over the whole gamut of the post office business, making exceptions here and there as might be necessary. I believe the government should have had enough courage to impose further taxes upon third-class matter, being careful to exempt literature for the blind, school examination papers, and other items which directly affect the welfare of the state. All the welter of unnecessary circulars should bear its full share of the cost of our mail service. Over fifty per cent of the third-class matter, which is the portion of the mail that breaks down the constitution of our letter carriers, finds its way to the desk of the individual to whom it is addressed, where it accumulates until in his spare time he finally drops it into the waste paper basket. That part of our third-class mail could very well afford to bear a greater share of the cost of our postal service, in the interests of the economy of Canada. It is an economic waste, and should be curtailed if it cannot bear its fair share. I would ask the Postmaster General to give the house some explanation as to why the government did not cover the entire field when once it entered upon the sacred precincts of the Post Office Department in connection with taxation.

I now come to a matter which has been engaging the attention of the press and public of Canada. I refer to what some call the Ruml plan, but what I call the Ilsley plan, in regard to the payment of income tax. First may I be permitted to make this observation to this house, to the press and to the people of Canada. The adoption of the Ruml plan or the adoption of the Ilsley plan is not going to save the nation. Far too much emphasis is placed upon and far too much attention is being paid to this one item in our taxation. It is a question whether we are being fair to Canada's war effort by occupying the time of our people and the time of this house in worrying about this particular item.

I have looked over the proposals of the minister and I cannot bring myself to agree that he is carrying out the Ruml plan. A better name for this partial application would be the Ilsley plan. It is difficult to understand why, the tax for the four months at the end of 1942 having been deducted at the source, the minister used the figure of fifty per cent for the delayed collection and the forgiven portion. Why did he not use 66⅔ per cent? A clean sweep has not been made to deal with this matter for all time. There is imposed an unjustifiable hardship because the minister in his budget has pursued the policy which to my mind takes so much cash in settlement of a debt, to be paid in two instalments in 1943 for taxes accrued during the year 1942, and the taxpayer finds that he must liquidate this indebtedness and at the same time assume the full obligation for the prompt payment of the 1943 tax.

The intention of the Ruml plan, as I understand it, is that the 1942 balance of debt should be erased from the books of the government, should not be there, while in the case of the Ilsley plan we find that we have compromised the debt. I dissociate myself from the Ilsley plan for that particular reason. As an illustration I would cite the case of a married man, with one dependent, receiving a salary of $3,000. In March, 1942, he paid an income tax amounting to $170 and in the same year a defence tax of $86. In the months of September to December, 1942, he paid deductions amounting to $105. In 1943 he will pay $427, including the adjustment with respect to the 1942 tax of $65, and in March, 1944, he will have a final payment of $49 to make. In other words he will have paid an income tax in two years of $788 and will still owe $49 to be paid in the following March.

What I am trying to impress on the house is the fact that we have not made a clean sweep of this particular innovation in the matter of taxation. This income tax legislation is an added burden in the form of income tax upon those who draw from $1,500 to $5,000. It is a heavy burden to that class which is very often called the forgotten class. I have a short schedule showing the payments of those receiving salaries of from $1,500 to $5,000, and with the permission of the house I should like to place it on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

It is pointed out to the Canadian people that our income tax is the highest in the world, but it is sometimes forgotten that the period given the taxpayer within which to pay has been reduced more severely than it has been in any other country. The spirit of Canada does not permit of any challenge to its desire to go all out in every conceivable way in its war effort. This imposes a great responsibility upon the government, and perhaps the time has now been reached when the people should be taken more fully into the government's confidence with respect to the broad principles of public finance which the government has laid down for itself.

It is true, as the minister says, that we have more physical goods in Canada than they have in Great Britain, for example, but by the same token we eventually shall have less cash and government securities, less insurance protection, fewer owned homes, et cetera. This of course is accentuated when a comparison is made with the United States. The tougher the government makes it for the taxpayer, the more right the taxpayer has to ask that the government go to some pains to explain its long-term planning.

The British government has had a much wider and longer experience with income tax imposts, and it would scarcely seem that our government should exceed the limits which the British government have decided upon without at least explaining more fully than they have just why they are doing it. We are disposed to have confidence in the judgment of the British government. In fact, it would not seem unreasonable to take the stand that they know a little more about taxation principles and points of saturation than does Canada. The people of Canada are not averse to spending every last cent they can in the war effort; they are ready to save, to buy bonds, to pay their taxes and to act as good citizens. However, they want to feel that "the government needs the money" is just a slogan and is not the government's long-range fiscal policy in this regard.

When the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) first raised this question in the house and suggested the adoption of a plan, his suggestion received the approval of a large body of Canadian citizens. Let me make this observation. If this legislation had to come, it is unfortunate that it came at a time when incomes are so high. It would have worked out to much better advantage to the treasury of Canada if it had been put into effect some years ago. Many incomes will never again be as high as they were in 1942. Those with high incomes braced themselves without a murmur to pay the 1942 income tax. If they had high incomes, they must have had capital assets from which they received income apart from their earnings as wage-earners. I am of the opinion that they were ready to liquidate those capital assets and pour them into the revenues of Canada as a contribution, not only by way of high income tax but as a contribution to the war effort. But there are others in the same groups who are not so prone to take a serious view of Canada's position. They are not so ready to help out. Perhaps they are anxious to help, but they do not stop to think of the entire situation. I am going to say a word to them.

I have not much sympathy, particularly in war time, with that class of people known as globe-trotters, non-producers and holiday makers, those who are able to spend the winter months in Florida or California. If they are able to do this, they are able to pay heavy income taxes. With the war on, some means ought to be found to force the wealthy and healthy non-producer idler into production. For those in poor health who must have a change of climate I recommend the Laurentian hills of Quebec, the maritime climate of southern British Columbia and the northern highlands of Ontario.

I come now to another matter of ways and means which has not been enlarged on in this budget and which should receive some attention, namely, succession duties. Last year, as reported on page 5296 of Hansard, I said that I was in accord with heavy taxation on estates during war time. If there is wealth in estates and Canada needs the money, let us go and get it from those estates. At the same time I drew the attention of the Minister of Finance to the hardship imposed on those who receive annuities from estates and are faced, on the one hand, with the payment of succession duties on the capital amount represented by the annuity, and on the other with an income tax on the actual annuity. I think the minister agreed with me, as reported on page 5300 of Hansard of last year, that wills drawn up ten years ago should be revised so that annuities would not become liabilities during the first few years of the life of the annuitant. Briefly, the outstanding example—the others will be found in Hansard—was that of an individual, no relation to the deceased, who received an annuity of $2,000 a year. He found that it was capitalized by the federal authorities at $31,365 with a succession duty payable of $3,465, while the same annuity was subject to a provincial succession duty capitalized on $28,976, amounting to $12,664. In other words, the total succession duty on that portion of the estate which is lifted out of the capital sum to provide an annuity of $2,000 amounts over a four-year period to $16,129, one-quarter of which is $4,033 yearly, in order that the recipient might receive an annuity of $2,000 per year. At the same time, in the case I recited, the income tax from the receipt of the $2,000 amounted to $1,065, with the result that the individual had to find four annual tax payments of $5,097, after which there would be no further succession duties. In my opinion our statutes ought to be amended so that the first charge against any estate would be the collection of succession duties, and that should be made a statutory provision in each and every will. In that way many estates which now escape succession duty would be taxed, and at least the treasury would have the first call on the estate and would be paid first, with the beneficiaries having the second call.

I come now to the matter of annuities. The high income tax rates which are necessary have destroyed the incentive to buy annuities. I should like the Minister of National Revenue to deal with the unfairness of income tax on annuities. Many Canadian citizens abhor taking an old age pension from the state. They are honest citizens with some pride in themselves and their families, and they cannot bring themselves to believe that when they reach the age of seventy they have the right to accept an old age pension. They would prefer to sell their house and lot and some of their other assets and put the money into an annuity. But the present system of taxation is destroying the whole philosophy which underlies the purchase of annuities. The Canadian citizen who abhors taking an old age pension from the state converts his capital assets into an annuity and finds that he pays the full income tax on capital so invested as well as on that portion which represents interest. On the other hand, if he buys a war savings certificate or a victory bond, his capital is returned to him without income tax on the principal sum. Of course he pays taxation on the interest which the victory bond earns. There is no practical reason why the capital portion of an annuity should not be returned to the taxpayer in like manner as he would liquidate a victory bond or a war savings certificate. This was brought to the attention of the government last year by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and I am disappointed that nothing has been done about it.

The simplest way for me to explain the matter to the house is to read into the record a letter from a cattle rancher in Alberta. He says:

I was a cattle rancher in Alberta until last year. The department of defence expropriated my property for military purposes. Being 74 years of age I did not wish to start again. In order to assist in the war effort I considered placing funds in victory bonds or government annuity. As far as the war went I could see no difference. In both cases I lent a certain sum to the government. In each case it went into the treasury and was used the same way. In each case payment is provided for at a specified time. I put part of my savings in each but in one case the interest only is income but in the other the whole of my savings is to be subject to income tax when returned. This does not make sense to me. The use of a mortuary table to determine the amount necessary to deposit to receive a certain yearly repayment does not alter the principal. It is either income or returned savings. I have no objection to paying war taxes but I do not like paying income tax on the return of my savings.

As you will know, when the dominion government was put into effect it was income tax free and called for very reasonable rates. Later the rates were raised about 15 per cent and income tax clause struck out.

In my letter to the deputy finance minister I suggested that the low rates be restored and the tax free clause also, that investment in dominion government annuities be advocated to finance the war along with victory loans and war savings certificates, and after the war to continue the compulsory savings to an extent sufficient to eventually replace the old age pension by government annuities.

He goes on to say:

On page 11 of the dominion government annuities pamphlet we are told from statistics,

"Poor when old will be the fate of every other Canadian we meet." Surely we can do better than that.

We need something better and more dignified than old age pension for half of our people even though part of the necessary funds came from the national treasury.

I should like to place on the record the case of a married man with one dependent and an income of $3,000 per year. It shows that if he buys government annuities he pays a total tax of $776.40, whereas if he and his employer pay into an approved superannuation fund his tax amounts to only $369.40. To save time, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the permission of the house to place this short calculation on Hansard; it sets forth the figures which I have recited.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the permission of the house.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The table is as follows:

I come now to another income tax situation which is disturbing the minds of a great number of our farmers, and that is the income tax with respect to cooperatives. A farmer joins a cooperative organization. My view always was that he felt that that organization was part and parcel of his farm. He felt that when he had an income from his farm he should not be taxed on the surplus which came from his cooperative organization. Have I made myself clear? In the business field an incorporated business, of course, pays the corporation tax, but it is difficult to make the farmer believe that when he is a member of a cooperative enterprise he is in a business which is operated for profit to the shareholders. With the change in the organizing, financing, and the operating methods of cooperatives because of conditions and new market requirements, we also have a change in the policy of the income tax department which desires to discontinue the exemption from income tax on patronage dividends. If this income tax exemption is abolished and confirmed by the court and made retroactive, it will have a disastrous effect on the reserves of the cooperatives. This legislation should be clarified, and consideration should be given to the condition which obtains in the United States where the members of the cooperatives can distribute exempt from taxation the surplus funds they have left over from their transactions. The taxation will come off the dividend—or so-called dividend; for to my mind the word is a misnomer—the return of the money of the farmer who belongs to the cooperative will be added to his income tax as an individual, raising him perhaps to the higher bracket, and you will get a large percentage of the tax as the outcome of this suggestion, due to the fact that one hundred dollars, we will say, added to the income of $3,000 which he is making ordinarily on his farm, would bring the return to $3,100.

The forecast which the minister gave the house is to my mind very disappointing. He anticipates by way of increase of revenue from the budget proposals which he recites, $5,000,000 from the excise duty and $33,000,000 from other excise taxes, and he says he gets $105,000,000 from personal income tax. But we are not getting that out of this year's budget; that $105,000,000 has come from the legislation which was incorporated in last year's budget, the surplus from the enactment which was adopted last year. It is therefore unfair to suggest that our total of $136,200,000 represents an increase from this year's budget proposals. A careful analysis will probably show that all of it derives from last year's legislation. There is not much courage or conviction in reciting that we have to have more revenue if there cannot be found within this year's budget any increase in revenue from these proposals. That is what makes some people say that probably this is an election budget. That is what discourages a large number of our people who are anxious to cooperate with the government in every possible way. We need cooperation of the kind which gripped the imaginations and hearts and minds of the Canadian people when war was first declared. The minister knows the class of people to whom I refer. Patriotic citizens who had means and were anxious about the war were writing letters—I will read a portion of one—in the days of 1939 and 1940, and very seriously and in all sincerity were placing everything they had in the world, not only their sons but all their material interests, at the disposal of the state. Here is a portion of a letter dated October 22, 1940, addressed to the Minister of Finance:

> This will serve to confirm a telephonic conversation of Thursday, October 10 at some length at the expense of the taxpayer, not charged to the government as some people are so prone to do when they call a government department, franked back against the government to pay for, and an exchange of wires of the same date paid for by this taxpayer, and an interview given the writer in Ottawa, Tuesday, October 15, at his own expense and paid for by that taxpayer. At that conference it was intimated to you in a like manner as I previously intimated to the Hon. Mr. Howe and the Hon. Mr. Ralston, that I am anxious to do everything possible to assist Canada with her war effort.
> I therefore place at the disposal of the government of Canada my services as an individual to serve anywhere in any capacity, and my interests as they may appear in the ownership of three or four different industries.

Doubtless in the early days there was a lot of correspondence of this kind. But with a weak budget such as the present one there will be a tendency, I believe, for that interest to slough off. I ask that something be done to stimulate in our people again the idea that they must give more and more, and not slow down just because we are having a few victories in Africa and because Russia is doing a big job somewhere else. We must harness this power and use it in every possible way we can.

The minister has had months to prepare this budget, and he knows about it. Those of us who are charged with the responsibility of constructive criticism have had months to think about it, but very few days to know about it. We are not fortified with a corps of economists, doctors of philosophy, professors and what-not to assist us. I sometimes wonder if more facilities of that kind should not be given to those who are in opposition, and who are supposed to add something to the welfare of the state, to assist them in making constructive suggestions.

I thank the minister and the house for their understanding courtesy towards me in this particular job of work. I am going to make a suggestion to the press. It is embodied in an old adage which, I believe, was repeated in this house some years ago: "Criticize this criticism if you must; praise it constructively if you can; but for goodness' sake do not forget it, and do not let the Canadian people forget it."

I reiterate that this is a very weak budget and it looks like an election budget. "Work and save" is not enough. It is not sufficient for the minister to say that there are two things, and two things only, to do. The minister mentions first our ability to strike hard, and he says, in the second place, that the time to relax is when our enemies have surrendered. He says we know these things only. He must know that our people can apply themselves more assiduously to their daily task. He must also know that our people are willing to make great sacrifices. He knows that our air force on the Atlantic coast line could do very well with faster and better planes to search out the submarines. He has been told often enough that there is waste and extravagance—I call to witness the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean) and the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone)—which members of this house, if we organized ourselves into a body of men without any political interest to serve, could search out. He knows that the membership of this house is capable and willing and anxious to help the operations of this country in every possible way. He ought to know that that membership comprises many men well able to assist in designing the policies which now emanate from the economists, scientists, doctors of philosophy and what-not in the building here to my left. We are in fairly safe hands with the minister, because he can hold this group of economists in check. But if he does not realize it, I tell him now that they seem to be lacking in business ability to consider a business budget for Canada; and when he is preparing his budget he would be far safer in the hands of members such as the hon. members for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew), Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt), Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), Cumberland (Mr. Black), Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), Skeena (Mr. Hanson), and Haldimand (Mr. Senn).

These hon. members, who have business experience but who are not consulted, would give you their confidence; they would not betray your confidence, and the net result would be that we would not only have something more acceptable to the Canadian people but something which would more nearly balance our budget. How humiliated and exasperated are the members at the little they are able to do in the war effort, particularly when they know so much about Canadian conditions.

The minister knows that victory will come only with tears, sweat and blood. Are we so medieval that we will not bestir ourselves until we have a blood bath in Europe? Our duty is to sweat now. We must realize that Germany works from the centre of Europe out to the perimeter. She is bounded by oceans and water on three sides and, thank God, by Russia on the other. We are many thousands of miles away, and must fight from the outside of the perimeter. Our air force has overcome part of this difficulty. We have partly overcome distance; we have partly overcome difficulties; we have partly overcome disaster. And even though the road be long and hard, the growing strength of our united nations is fast overwhelming the enemy by the magnificence of the performance of the fighting men of the united nations.

Let us then pray, petition and plead that Providence will vouchsafe us an abundance of agricultural increase in the coming year. Let that faith be accompanied by works, and we shall have answer to our prayers. Let us be loyal to our king, and affirm our faith in the British partnership. Let us strengthen, reinforce, support and buttress our British commonwealth. Let us associate ourselves more closely with our allies of the united nations, and pledge ourselves to our fighting services wherever they are. Let us encourage, stimulate and urge more application by those charged with secondary production. Let us assist and cooperate with labour-management production committees, and foster sound labour relations. Let us invigorate individual initiative by rewarding integrity and intelligent industry. Let us give freedom of enterprise to our people, between the floor and the ceiling. Let us honour our partnership between the two races with equality, justice and toleration. Let us harness and put to work the power of this Canadian House of Commons.

Let us add magnitude to our effort, and then nothing can stop us from final victory. Let us save our democracy by applying ourselves. We dedicated ourselves to the task in September of 1939; we should then this day, this very hour, rededicate ourselves to its accomplishment.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, since I have been able to hear what the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) said, it has been a real pleasure to listen to him. I took occasion to read from Hansard his remarks of last night, and I was impressed not only by the breadth of vision he displayed, but by the amount of care and study he had devoted to the preparation of his speech. I believe the house is indebted to the hon. member for the effort he put forth, and the manner in which he presented his speech to the house.

I believe, too, that the house is indebted to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I do not agree with the manner in which the minister is endeavouring to conduct the financial affairs of this country, but no man who watches him can doubt his sincerity. Certainly any man must admire his energy, his earnestness, and his incessant endeavour to conduct the affairs of the country in the best way he believes they possibly can be conducted. I thought his speech well prepared and well delivered. I did not gather from it, however, the impression gained by the hon. member for Danforth, namely that it was a weak budget. On the contrary I had the impression it was a rather strong one and, as one of my colleagues points out, one with plenty of kick in it.

Before turning to the minister's speech I should like to give some attention to what has been said by the hon. member for Danforth. Anything I say I shall say in all earnestness, humility and sincerity. There is a distinct difference between the points of view of hon. members in my group and those of other hon. members in the house. We believe that there is a new way of doing things financially in this country, and that that new way ought to be tried. We look with respect upon the opinions of others, and we beg permission to differ, earnestly and sincerely, and we do not so differ without having given the whole matter of finance a considerable amount of attention.

The hon. member for Danforth said, if I remember correctly, he hoped we should be able to keep the financial system of Canada sound. Perhaps I should read his words. Far be it from me to misrepresent any hon. member; it is hard enough to understand each other, even when we represent correctly and with the greatest of sincerity our respective views. As reported at page 1064 of Hansard the hon. member said:

> I come now to the matter of government accounts and finances. I am of opinion that with all our war expenditures Canada can maintain a sound financial position, but it will be necessary for our people to observe a few cardinal principles which I enunciated in the early part of my remarks and which I shall enunciate again in a few minutes.

May I hasten to inform the hon. member that hon. members in this group are by no means endeavouring to introduce into Canada any financial system which is unsound. It is our earnest contention, and one which we will maintain, that the principles which are at present being followed are the unsound ones. In order that we may make this quite clear I would ask the hon. member for Danforth, after he has had time to consider the question, to enunciate to the house what he considers to be the principles of sound finance. What does he mean by sound money? Must it be money which is backed by gold? No. Must it be money created by banks? Must it be money which is lent, and therefore paying interest? Must it be money which is scarce? Must there be plenty of it in order that it be sound? Must it be properly circulated in order that it be sound? Does the price structure in a country have anything to do with the soundness of that country's money? Many questions of this kind the hon. member for Danforth will have to study with care, and give the answers with accuracy, before he will be in a position to tell us whether or not the system we are now pursuing is a sound one.

The hon. member for Danforth referred to borrowing from our chartered banks as a dangerous practice. As I recall, the minister himself indicated some misgivings with respect to that part of his transactions. I say to the hon. member for Danforth that I do not agree that borrowing from the chartered banks is necessarily unsound or will necessarily lead to inflation. I am not advocating that we borrow from the chartered banks, but my chief objection to borrowing from them is that in so doing we incur additional debt and burden this country with the obligation of paying additional interest. But when one looks at the whole financial operations of this country from a long-range point of view, those two characteristics do not make the whole transaction unsound. Before the hon. member for Danforth can be sure whether or not the borrowing of this money from the banks will cause inflation he must know what inflation is. Does he? He must know what causes inflation. Does he? He must know how the causes can be overcome. Does he? With all deference to the hon. member I submit that he is unable to answer accurately any one of those questions; otherwise he would have been more guarded in the things he said concerning borrowing from the chartered banks.

The hon. member would prevent extravagant spending in the country. How would he do it? Would he increase taxation? Would he increase the base, the number of people who are paying taxes? Is he in favour of rationing as a means of preventing people from spending extravagantly? I should have been pleased to hear the hon. member discuss and answer these questions. Now I leave the hon. member's remarks and turn to the Minister of Finance.

First of all I tell the minister that in my judgment he has shown a great deal of wisdom. For example, his statement to the effect that he had decided to pay subsidies to keep down prices; that is one very wise decision and an indication of vision and understanding on the part of the minister. There are other things in his speech which I would commend. But it is not my purpose particularly to single out the commendable features of his speech, not because I begrudge the minister the credit due to him, but simply because I believe it is my business first of all to express my criticisms concerning the budget and then to suggest what I consider to be ways in which the weaknesses of the budget can be remedied.

First I would say something to the minister which will sound quite harsh but which I believe can easily be established. The Canadian government is leading Canada in an accelerating headlong rush towards repudiation of debt, towards fascism and scarcity, if not actual famine. The definition of each of these terms will be necessary in order that all may understand what is meant by them, in order that they may not seem extreme.

This budget is heaping up debt on the Canadian people. It certainly is not a pay-as-you-go budget. Whether it is possible to pay as you go is a question which I am not going to discuss at this time. The net increase of debt from 1942 to 1943 was $2,261 million, according to the minister's own statement as recorded on page 842 of Hansard. The increase from 1941 to 1942 was only $413,681,000, as recorded in Hansard of 1942 at page 3575. The increase of debt in this year we are now closing is more than five times as great as the increase in the previous year. Can anyone by any exercise of the imagination characterize a budget which increases the debt of the country at that appalling rate as a pay-as-you-go budget?

Canadians have never yet paid the financial cost of the last war; witness the three-cent postage stamp. In the midst of the last conflict our postage rate was increased from two cents to three cents and we were told it was a war measure, but when the war was over the three-cent stamp remained, and everyone who sent a letter from that time to this has been helping to pay the burden of the last war.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is incorrect.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should be glad to have the minister tell us why.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was a period between 1926 and 1931 when the postage was reduced.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then we will make that exception, but up to 1926 and from 1931 on, that generation was certainly paying for the last war. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Danforth say that we ought to be frank and tell the truth, that we ought not to deceive the people. One of the deceptions which a good many of the public men of Canada indulge in is that we are going to pay the cost of this war during the war. Now, we are not paying it.

Mr. MARTIN: Who said that?

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody ever said it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not come prepared to prove it, but I can and will do it from the words of various public men in Canada. Let it be understood that we are now preparing to pass on to future generations a crushing debt, and they are going to assume that debt at a time when perhaps it will be necessary for them to be preparing for another war by expenditures the like of which we have never deramed of.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will it not be a debt due from one part of the future generation to another part of the same generation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe that is true. But may I point out another fallacy or semi-fallacy which men are endeavouring to persuade the people of Canada to believe. Before I finish I intend to point out that the bonds of the last war debt are held by about fifteen per cent of the people of Canada, but they are owed by all of us. I am not saying the figures are exactly right; grant that they are held by twenty per cent of the people; in effect that renders eighty per cent of the people of Canada hewers of wood and drawers of water to the twenty per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: These people are changing all the time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But they are all among the same group. I shall discuss that at greater length. To say that because we owe the debt to ourselves we need not worry about it is to delude the people of Canada.

Canadians have not yet paid for the last war. Now we have a four-cent postage stamp imposed upon us to afflict future generations. Let no one imagine that once this four cent rate is established it will ever be changed, unless some tremendous revolution takes place. Under the present system the Canadian people will and can never pay off the debt of the last war. Under it they will and can never pay off the debt of this war. According to the minister's figures, as of March 31, 1943, our national debt will amount to $7,861,000,000, and if I interpret the minister's words correctly the annual charge at 2·6 per cent is $205,000,000. If we add $2,250,000,000 a year for the three more years which it is likely this war will last, we shall add $6,750,000,000 to that colossal debt, and Canada will find herself saddled with a debt of some $14,000,000,000.

For the last number of years the Minister of Finance was able to encourage the house with the statement that the interest rate was going down even though the debt might be going up, but I ask what guarantee the people of Canada can have that the interest rate will continue to go down. If we are committed to a debt of $14,000,000,000, who is to say that the group of men holding that debt will not, at some time, agree among themselves to increase the interest rate; and what power would the Minister of Finance or the government of Canada, as at present constituted, have to prevent such an increase in the interest rate? Suppose the rate of interest was increased to 3, 3½, 4 or 4½ per cent; imagine what would be the condition of the people with a contractual obligation of that kind, which is supposed to be as sacred as though it came from the sanctum sanctorum, the holy of holies of all time.

Turning to the expenditures in connection with this war, I wish to declare definitely that we cannot avoid those expenditures, and we would not if we could. But I submit that this house would be remiss in its duty if it did not give earnest attention and careful examination to any set of proposals which offered a way whereby we might be able to manage our affairs without the dangers which evidently we are incurring, and thereby to introduce a saner system of managing the financial affairs of Canada.

There is another feature with respect to the budget which I indicated a moment ago. Not only does the size of this debt disturb me, but the ultimate number of the holders of the debt, the personnel of the creditors, greatly alarms me. Let it be borne in mind that a Canadian government bond constitutes a mortgage on every piece of property in Canada, that with the taxation structure which is now imposed, and which can be aggravated, it constitutes a mortgage on the very life of every individual in Canada, be he worker or anybody else. All the property of the people of Canada, particularly of the producers, is being mortgaged to a few Canadians. The bonds are gravitating into the hands of a very, very few, as all the records tend to show. There is no evidence that this trend will be in any other direction in future; in fact the evidence all goes to show that as days go by the bonds will come into the hands of a progressively smaller number of Canadians. Those individuals are accumulating so many bonds that they will be able to live upon the interest of those bonds. They will not invest in industry because their money will be safer in bonds. They will become a special class of gentlemen of privilege. The bondholders will be people who will have no interest at all in the welfare of the people generally, producers or consumers, and no interest in Canada. Their only concern will be to keep Canada alive and sufficiently strong to give them their pound of flesh from time to time. They will control the laws of this country because they will control parliament, which makes the laws. They will control government policy, because governments will bow down to the simple wave of their hands. They will also control the banking policy of this country. Therefore, as I said a short time ago, from eighty to eighty-five per cent of all Canadians will become hewers of wood and drawers of water for the remaining fifteen per cent; in effect, eighty-five per cent of Canadians will become hopeless serfs. One of the characteristics of a serf in olden times is, I am told, that he was unable to leave the estate on which he was employed. Well, the people of Canada who will be bound by these debts certainly will be unable to escape their bondage by any means. They will be serfs.

The men who are now overseas, your sons and mine, after having risked their lives, after having done their bit heroically, nobly and effectively during this generation, will come back here and become members of the serf class almost to a man. I ask, is that democracy; is that what the members of this house will permit these boys to fight for? The condition toward which we are drifting is fascism, the rule of a few wealthy men over all the rest, a rule that cannot be shaken off by any means.

Some hon. members may wonder why I speak so feelingly on this matter. Well, I come from a province which has been struggling to extricate itself from the condition I am picturing, the condition into which Canada is rushing wildly. Does anyone think we can extricate ourselves from the toils of the monster that has gripped us? Not by any means; not by any possible effort we can exert. Every move we take is blocked by the courts. And, after all, the dominion is only a big province; it is only nine provinces joined together.

There is another aspect of this question. The financial policies of the minister are palpably failing to stimulate Canadian producers and workers to satisfactory production. That is not altogether the fault of the minister or of the government. It is the result of the faulty financial system which they are endeavouring to make work in these times. The minister is always worrying about where money is to come from. Not very long ago I had the privilege of going with a delegation to ask the minister for a certain amount of money for a most important health work in Canada. The minister gladly granted that our case was just; there was no doubt about that. But did the minister ask, "Are there enough doctors to do all the work which would be involved in examining the people? Are there enough hospitals to treat the people whom you wish to treat? Is there enough medicine to give them the medical care they should receive?" Those were not his questions. Those questions would have been calling forth the human and material resources which are at the disposal of Canada. His comment was, "No, I cannot afford the money," which is the clearest possible evidence that the minister is bound by financial considerations rather than by considerations of the material and human resources which Canada possesses.

Mr. ILSLEY: What was that occasion? I do not remember that at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not wonder the minister does not remember it. The hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) was one of those who went in to see if we could get a certain amount of money, and I think one of the members from Manitoba was with us. I can soon refresh the minister's mind on that.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was about a year ago.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Only the other day the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) referred to his inability to get money for the things which he needed. He realized that he needed things and it was simply a question of money. Time and again it has been declared in the hearing of every member of this house that financial considerations would not be allowed to be a hindrance to achievement in this country, that the only consideration would be our material and human resources. But such is not the situation. Did the minister borrow that money from the chartered banks because he wanted to do it? Did he do it because he did not have the material and human resources in Canada which were necessary to achieve the ends which he wished to achieve with the amount of money he borrowed from the banks? Not by any manner of means. Despite his protestations that he will make financially possible whatever is physically possible; despite the brave front which he puts on from coast to coast of Canada and for which everyone admires him; despite his strenuous efforts the minister is hampered by the limitations which result from the financial system which he is endeavouring to make work in this country.

I say that the time has come for a change. In the interests of the minister; in the interests of Canada's war effort; in the interests of the future the time has come for this chamber to consider the advisability of making a change. I, therefore, move as an amendment to the motion of the Minister of Finance:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor:

"this house regrets that the government still disregards the possible uses of government-created national money to the end that in so far as taxation and the borrowing of the people's savings fail to meet government expenditures the government might employ national money:

(a) To relieve the debt situation which threatens the ownership and control of a great many private businesses, factories, farms and other means of production.

(b) To pay farmers and other primary producers fair prices thereby stimulating the production of food.

(c) To provide workers with adequate purchasing power.

(d) To alleviate the distress of the aged and others in needy circumstances.

(e) To prevent inflation by the subsidizing of industry where costs are uncontrollable, adopting where necessary a more aggressive and consistent rationing policy."

[Mr. Blackmore]

The matter with which I am going to concern myself more particularly is the impairment in production which has developed as a result of the government's financial policy. The Minister of Finance is paying far too little attention to the production of the needs of life in this country. From the beginning of the war too little attention has been given to the influence of wages and prices upon production. The armed forces have taken away our man-power, as has been urged with great eloquence and persistence in this house, and the wages paid to workers in munitions plants have drawn workers away from agriculture and other primary industries. The result is that there has developed the alarming shortage of labour which has been elaborated upon in this house.

I am not saying that what was done was not quite satisfactory. I am not saying that those two measures for obtaining men should have been avoided. I am not in agreement with those who would have impaired the chances of increasing this country's munitions production and this country's armed forces in order to take care of agriculture. But I contend that there were ways of overcoming this labour shortage in agricultural and other primary industries. Efforts should have been made to subsidize or bonus wages in our primary industries in order to draw into those industries women, elderly men, and many of the more or less unemployable who would have been willing to do all they could to help.

I am not sure that the house completely senses the seriousness of food in our war economy. I think that factor has been rather neglected. I should like to read to the house some quotations from the statement of Mr. Herbert Hoover. These have been gathered together by Mr. M. M. Robinson, manager of the Ontario food distribution council. I draw particular attention to the following:

Food supply has now become secondary only to military operations in determining the outcome of the war. And it will take first place in saving the world from anarchy after the war.

And again:

The burden of furnishing food supplies to the united nations now and to a starving world after the war rests largely upon the American and Canadian farmer.

Again:

Agriculture simply must be envisaged as a munitions industry. The farmer must receive men and tools if he is to perform his part.

And again:

The news comes daily from all parts of the country that the farmer is sending his dairy cows to slaughter for lack of labour. And this is amply verified by the arrivals at the slaughter houses.

And further:

The shortage of labour, of machinery and methods of price control are limiting the vitally essential expansion of this production and the flocks and herds upon which production depends. And unless we can quickly realize and quickly reverse these limiting forces there are dangers to the conduct of the war.

And again:

But there is an even deeper cause of these shortages. We had all these burdens and difficulties in the last war. We are to-day exporting less than half the meats and fats to our allies that we did in the last war, for we then had to support France, Belgium and Italy also. Yet with this lesser burden of exports we are threatened with greater shortages of meats and fats on our home front than in world war I.

And again:

After all, the best remedy for price is increased production.

May I pause there to point out that apparently the hon. member for Danforth quite overlooked this factor in the matter of inflation. Inflation is, after all, a rise in price, and that arises from a shortage of goods. If we can stimulate our production sufficiently we need not fear a rise in price. Again I quote:

But the first and imperative necessity is to get more production. The American farmer will do it if he gets a chance. And the fate of the world may depend upon it.

I believe that with very slight modification every one of those quotations could be applied to the situation which exists in Canada. I maintain that the minister and the other members of the government should have been much more careful to leave in the essential industries a good many more effectives than they did. I believe that there was carelessness on the part of the ministers of defence in taking away too many key men, but I am not going to press that because it is water under the bridge.

Every precaution should have been taken to give prices, bonuses and other forms of encouragement such as credit to the farmers, access to live stock, access to materials, so as to enable them to produce at maximum capacity. In my own constituency this year I was called into a conference by machinery agents and was really astounded to learn to what an alarming degree the farmers in my constituency were to be deprived of essential machinery for the conduct of this year's operations. We simply have not given the attention we should have to providing the farmers with the necessary means of production, and in many respects that is the result of our financial policy. We should have brought into production every potential producer of dairy products, honey, eggs, wool, poultry, beef, pork, fruits, wood, fish, lumber, et cetera, from coast to coast in Canada. There should have been not only a ceiling which was high enough but a floor which was also high enough to guarantee to the producer not only the cost of production but such a reward as would enable him to live and encourage him to continue producing, and guaranteed prices should have been established to continue for two or three years after the war.

I was talking with a farmer in my constituency just before I left for Ottawa. He was contemplating the purchase of a valuable Ayrshire cow costing a considerable amount of money, but he said, "I am afraid I had better not buy that cow because just about the time I get through paying this fancy price for her and getting an expensive shed built for her and other equipment purchased, the war will be over and I shall have the cow on my hands and be out my money." That is a characteristic and very common reaction among the farmers. It leads to uncertainty and hesitancy and militates against the war effort because, beyond question, it militates against production. There are thousands of farmers, villagers and townspeople who would produce honey if they could get bees, who would raise chickens to produce eggs, who would raise cows or sheep and provide the facilities for taking care of them if they were certain that a remunerative price would be guaranteed for long enough after the war to enable them, as they say, to get out from under. That guarantee is freely given to those who go into the production of munitions. If the farmers were sure that they would be able to market at remunerative prices all the eggs they produced, there is no question that production would increase, and the same with other farm products. One would think that anyone with sufficient intelligence to be selected for any post of responsibility in the conduct of this country's affairs would be able to see that. Are we to imagine that the minister was unable to see it? Are we to imagine that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) were unable to see it? Then why did they not take care of the matter? Purely on account of financial considerations. In other words, they were bound by financial restrictions, not by the question whether bees, or cows, or sheep, or lumber, or all the other necessities for production, could be bought. They were not bound by the question whether or not there were plenty of men to help them produce, but by financial considerations, and they neglected to give those forms of encouragement which they knew were necessary in order to stimulate production in Canada. The attitude which they took in their heart of hearts would be the normal attitude of men in their circumstances. Their attitude would be: We will trust to Providence that it will work out all right because we cannot do any better anyway on account of financial restrictions.

Just to show that what I am saying is not out of line with what is thought by sober-minded men, let me give a quotation from the submission made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to the government only this year. I read from page 7, under the heading "Dairying":

> A satisfactory price for dairy products sufficient to induce production is necessary.

The clear implication is that there is no such satisfactory price at the present time. Again:

> The price control policy, mitigated by subsidizing on a very piecemeal basis—

You see what the farmers think of the means which the minister has so far used:

> —has created uncertainty and anxiety with regard to the future. Assurance should be given that subsidies when given will continue for a reasonable time to give stability to the industry.

I believe that that statement regarding the dairy industry applies in greater or less degree to every branch of agriculture in Canada. Even those who are producing hogs at most attractive prices and those who are producing beef at most attractive prices are filled with anxiety if the question arises whether they should purchase a choice sire, which might entail an outlay of one thousand or fifteen hundred dollars, to increase the quality of the calves they are raising, with the hope that in two or three years those calves will be old enough to sell. That anxiety tends to make them let their stock run down, and that is all to the detriment of production in this country.

A great many more men would labour in agriculture if they were assured of a living. I have two letters here which I shall read, but before doing so may I make this general comment? I believe we have a tremendous capacity in Canada for singling out and emphasizing the wrong thing. So much stress is laid to-day upon the shortage of labour. That is something which cannot be overcome now by recalling men from the armed forces or from war industries. Instead, stress should be placed upon prices and wages which would tend to alleviate agricultural conditions by drawing into the industry people who dare not come in now on account of the low remuneration. One of these letters is from the far east and the other from the far west, and evidently both are written by good men. The first one comes from Moncton, New Brunswick. If some one asks me to name the writer of this letter, if I am called upon to do so I shall do so, but I hope that no one will invoke the rules of the house because I would prefer not to give this man's name. The letter is right here, and anyone can see it. It is dated March 2, 1943, and reads:

> Dear Sir,
> About all you see in the papers and hear over the radio these days is what our wonderful government intends to do "when the war is over."
> What about now, when thousands are idle and in want and cannot get work anywhere? The labour department says "shortage of man-power." Where? Winnipeg paper says 8,000 idle there, and that applies to all over Canada. Personally I have tried several times this year to get work but employment and selective offices say "no work." I am past military age and strictly temperate and offered to accept any suitable job but answer is always "no work". It is about time they changed the head of the labour department and put a real man in who will help win the war.
> Would appreciate your opinion on the above letter.
> Thanking you and wishing you every success, I am, sir—

This man tells me in his letter that he is a consulting specialist on all classes of brick, stone, tile and concrete masonry. Whom does he blame? He is blaming the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Who is to blame? The Minister of Finance? Not the Minister of Finance, but the financial system under which he is working.

Let me read another one now. This comes from Taber, Alberta. This man had written to me to see if I could find him a job. He is a returned man from this war. I had told him I was having difficulty in finding a job for him. He replies:

> Your letter of February 17 received for which I thank you. In regard to where I stand with the selective service office in Lethbridge I will state I have been registered with them ever since shortly after I left the army on October 10, 1942. I have asked to be placed on different jobs if they came up such as grain buyer or a plant guard at the Trail Smelter, etc., but to date they have not been able to line up anything. Once when I was in there I showed them an application I had filled out applying to the civil service in Ottawa for a position in a government elevator or terminal, and they said "that's fine," for me to send it in by all means, so as far as they are concerned I can accept the first position offered me. I was becoming desperate for a job and that is the reason I have taken the matter of a position up with you as I figured I would get quicker action and better results through you than waiting for the Lethbridge office to get me something. The veterans' welfare officer in Calgary has worked hard to try and get me placed through the Lethbridge office but so far has had no success. I am hoping that through your efforts I soon will be able to get placed at work and I wish to thank you for your interest in my behalf.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two witnesses, and I will wager you could bring others from a thousand places in Canada, or more. Yet we are supposed to be short of labour. Is it to be imagined that a man of the quality of these would not go into agriculture if he had an opportunity to get enough money to keep his family? Is it to be imagined that he would not work on a farm? Yet what prospects would he have? About twenty-five dollars a month during all the months except the harvest season; during the harvest season, perhaps five or six dollars a day. I ask anyone, what chance has such a man of keeping a family on an income like that?

The reason why men of that calibre are not absorbed into agriculture or other primary industry is simply the matter of wages. It is a matter of price, pure and simple. The farmers are unable to pay them any better prices. Something must be done; the only power in this country able to do anything is the Department of Finance, and they apparently are unable to do anything as long as they are under the present system.

Most of the flaws in our organization for production can be blamed only upon the Minister of Finance. He alone can provide a remedy, but budgets such as this are not providing the remedy; budgets such as this are actually destroying incentive. They are drawing off savings which could go into production. They are aggravating the debt.

Last year I urged most earnestly, just as long as I felt it was becoming that I should, that the minister make allowance in the income tax for people who owed debts which they had contracted honourably prior to the introduction of the tax. But the only consideration he would give was in regard to mortgages and agreements of sale of homes. But there are people, tens of thousands of them, in this country who are deeply in debt and are being threatened with foreclosure, eviction and other misfortunes, and who are rendered utterly helpless to discharge their obligations because the minister has put them in that position through the financial system under which he is working. He says "I have to have the money."

May I give an idea how serious the debt situation is? I shall choose just one province, namely, Saskatchewan, which I do not happen to come from, and I hope hon. members from Saskatchewan will pardon me if I seem to be taking up a task which, I know, they would gladly take up if they had the opportunity. I chose Saskatchewan as an example of the provinces of Canada. According to the figures I have, there is a debt of $630,000,000 on the farms in Saskatchewan, which amounts to $21 an acre of the thirty million acres of farming land in that province. The average debt on the better land is perhaps $30 an acre. At present, 45 per cent of the crop is required to pay the interest on the debt alone. Just to show how farm organizations are concerned about this matter, and that they have expressed their opinion very definitely, may I read from a pamphlet which I have in my hand, "U.F.C. Information," published in Saskatoon. The particular issue is February, 1943, and I read as follows from page 2:

> As mortgage companies call for one full third share of the crop, to apply as mortgage payment, it should be clear that even this full one-third is insufficient to meet the existing obligation. This deficiency, plus an amount less than one-third which also cannot be paid except in exceptional years, is pyramiding upon unpaid principal. 1940 produced the second highest provincial farm income since 1930, i.e. $142,000,000, and in that year $42,000,000 was required to service the farm debt of the province, leaving about $100,000,000 as the fundamental maintenance for our provincial economy, or slightly over $100 per person.

Probably that was never brought to the minister's attention. But I ask him now, does he imagine that people can carry on and produce when all they have to live on is $100 a year—and many of them not that—when they are badgered, beset, driven by creditors writing them offensive threatening letters, until they dread to go to town to get the mail? When they are threatened with foreclosure on such and such a date they struggle away in order to raise enough money, somehow or another, to stave off their creditors. And they are not sure whether they will be able to hold their farms until the next crop period is over. Under such circumstances how can they produce with any degree of assurance? This whole matter should be taken care of in a way which will relieve our producers from the handicaps which are now preventing them from producing. The whole matter boils down to this question: Where is the money coming from? And that again boils down to the financial system under which the minister works.

May I read a quotation from this "U.F.C. Information Bulletin". I find this at page 1:

> Give the farmers a chance to produce, the same chance as the manufacturers, and we shall have food in abundance for the armed forces, for export and for the civilians.

There is no doubt about that. I read again:

> We admit that the situation is difficult; but on the other hand much of the man-power which could be utilized for chores, feeding and the care of live stock and hogs on a farm is now frozen. In this time of emergency, many people above middle age who manage to exist by state or other assistance, would willingly work on farms and could do quite a lot of work if they were not expected to do a full man's job and if they were allowed to retain their state allowance or pension and, in addition, be paid a reasonable wage for services rendered. In this kind of work, the aged and crippled men and women and thousands of boys and girls can be utilized.

I think hon. members will be just about as distressed as I was when I tell them of two instances which came to my attention in the last year. One of them had to do with a man who served in the last war, and who is receiving a war veteran's allowance. This man was skilful in the production of poultry. I believe the finest poultry establishment I ever saw, and the best results from poultry I have known, were through the efforts of this man. At the same time he was able to work, and gladly. He told me he dared not produce more than just so many eggs, because the inspector came around every year and nosed into all his affairs to find out whether he sold an extra egg, or whether he possibly had obtained two cents more than the amount of the money he was allowed to earn before being rendered liable to cancellation of his war veteran's allowance. This man lives in Lethbridge. He was taken by a certain farmer to his farm to pick carrots. He said to me, "I can do a good day's work in the field," and he told me the number of days he worked bringing in carrots. At the end of a certain number of days and a certain number of hours he quit working on the carrots, because by that time he had earned all the money he could be allowed to earn, without losing his war veterans' allowance.

I ask any hon. member this question: When in the department of which the minister has charge such conditions as that exist, how can he possibly assume and assert that this country is exerting its maximum war effort in production. There are tens of thousands of men in that class.

Here is another example—and I will not tell where this man lives, although he happens to live in my constituency. He is seventy-three years of age, but hale and hearty, because he has lived well. He has been a hard worker all his life, and is still able to do a lot of hard work. In response to the urgent call for help this man went into the fields to stook grain. He was urged by the man employing him to go on stooking, and to do other work, with the result that he earned a few dollars more than he was permitted under the regulations governing old age pensions. As I stand here now I am mortified, humiliated and ashamed to think I had to have that man tell me that they had cut off his old age pension.

It is time the minister set a whole body of people to work cleaning house and scrapping a whole collection of silly, useless regulations which are trammeling and impeding this country's war effort right and left from the top to the bottom. I believe if he will do that he will find a great deal of the man-power difficulty will be cleared up.

I read again:

> We have men, material and national resources, but we lack the medium to facilitate production and distribution. That medium is money and credit. The banks and other lending institutions do not function. Therefore parliament must exercise its power, release and govern a systematic flow of money and credit, which is the life-blood of civilization, and thus make it possible for farmers to do their bit in providing food.

The banks are lending money now much more freely than they have been for a long time. But still there are scores; yes, I suppose there are hundreds of thousands of men who are unable to get the credit they need to establish themselves in a way which would enable them to produce. This quotation justifies the statement I make. I read further:

> Well, if the government will provide parity prices for farm products, farmers will be "good risks", for borrowing purposes.

The writer has been discussing the fact that a banker has said that because a certain farmer has lost everything he is no longer a good risk, and is therefore unable to borrow.

> In Saskatchewan the farmers are being persuaded to sign quit claims and to become tenants, which is perhaps more peaceful and not so costly a method of bringing about the transfer from ownership to tenancy.

Why is that condition permitted to exist? Because the Minister of Finance does not see how he can remedy the matter, and he fails to see how he can remedy it because he is bound by restrictions of an absolutely outmoded financial system. It is not that there are not enough resources and men in this country to remedy that situation. The only difficulty is that the money is not available.

Referring to page 4, so as to give another aspect of the farmers' troubles, I find that prairie wheat production in 1917 was 233,742,850 bushels, while in 1941 it was 279,000,000 bushels. Hon. members will note that this is almost 46,000,000 bushels more in 1941. Let us see what the income was. The average net price per bushel in 1917 was $1.94, while the average net price in 1941 was 50 cents. The net value in 1917 was $453,038,600, and the net value in 1941 was $139,500,000. Then we find this paragraph:

Thus, while wheat production in 1917 was 45,257,150 bushels less than in 1941, the western farmers in 1917 received $313,538,600 more for their crop than the wheat farmers in 1941 received for their greater production.

I wonder if the minister realizes the significance of these appalling figures. I wonder if hon. members realize what they mean in sabotage of the production effort of the agriculturists in Saskatchewan. Yes, it is sabotage. It is sabotage by the financial system, pure and simple. They have not talked about the quota and all the damage it does to the farmer. I read another one:

During the present war, farm prices in Canada have been substantially below prices in practically every one of the warring nations.

I interject to ask the Minister of Finance if he can conceive of a reason why agricultural prices in Canada should be lower than in any other country of the warring nations. What has gone wrong with Canada that she should become all of a sudden so meticulous about giving farmers low prices? Is she producing a different type of farmer from what the other countries are producing?

This situation followed a ten-year period of extraordinarily low agricultural prices. Wheat for instance reached the lowest point in three centuries. Prairie farm income dropped $2·5 billion in the seven-year period following 1930 as compared with the seven-year period prior to that date. In the year 1926 agriculture received 24 per cent of the national income. In 1931 it received only 14·83 per cent of the national income. The figure for recent years has reached about 15 per cent. As one-third of the people in Canada are actually engaged in farming, it is obviously unfair for them to receive only one-sixth of the national income.

Yet in a country where conditions like that have been allowed to come to pass the minister tells us that Canada has reached her peak of production. And would the hon. member for Danforth, if he were in his place at the moment, tell us that the financial system is sound which permits a thing like that? It is not sound.

An hon. MEMBER: Except for the banks.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is not sound even for the banks, for the banks are losing their money. How will the banks and mortgage companies get their money if they utterly impoverish the people who owe the money? Apparently their only object is to get the land. Why do some men in Canada want to get all the land? If their desire to get that is not clear evidence that fascism is already rather firmly established in this country, that they simply want to get the titles and deeds to make it that much more effective, will someone explain it?

I read further:

It is true that the government is spending a substantial sum of money annually for bonuses to farmers, but these bonuses do not begin to make up the difference between current prices and parity prices such as are now being paid to the farmers of the United States.

I think those are all the excerpts from that publication that I need to read in order to establish my point, namely, that the minister administering the present financial system is simply not encouraging the people of Canada to produce to the maximum the food which may be the determining factor in the prosecution of this war.

May I now read one quotation which comes not from farmers but from a source which certain hon. members will perhaps accept as being more dependable. This is from the Canadian Bank of Commerce monthly letter for February, 1943:

Our index of farm revenue rose to 88·8 (1926—100) the highest level since 1930, compared with 83·6 for the preceding twelve months. The rise was due mainly to greatly increased returns from live stock and milk, which more than offset smaller sales of wheat. Farm costs however rose from 89·5 to 98·5 owing chiefly to higher wages, with the result that farm purchasing power (revenue divided by costs) fell from 93·4 to 90·1.

It seems a reasonable conclusion, however, that some improvement occurred in the last quarter of 1942.

The writer did not take pains to elaborate. Could one have more convincing testimony to the impoverished condition which generally prevails in agriculture in this country?

As an illustration of the kind of thing which these men have evidently been using in making their computations may I read from the latest Searle Grain Company letter of March 3, 1943:

The Searle index of the cost of things farmers buy (147 items) now stands at 153·7 (1913-14 equals 100). This means that these same things cost farmers of the west at the present time 53·7 per cent more than did similar items of the same quality in 1913-14. (These costs have risen 17·3 per cent since August, 1939.) The price of wheat is now 5·5 per cent higher than it was in 1913-14. The purchasing power of a bushel of wheat is now, therefore, only 68·6 per cent of what it was in 1913-14.

Why do conditions like that exist? Because there is a faulty financial system in this country. If the financial system is unable to remedy that defect the financial system is due for a change, long overdue. The dominion government must discover and introduce a financial and economic system which will render what is physically possible financially possible, so that Canada may have a genuine pay-as-you-go policy.

The minister has reported to this house year after year greatly enhanced revenues. Why have the revenues increased? Because the income of the people of Canada has increased. Is it to be supposed that if the income of the farmers be increased a few hundred million dollars the minister would not have derived more revenue from them? And will not the same rule that applies to manufacturers of other commodities also apply to producers of food? That gives point to the statement that we could have a pay-as-you-go policy if we managed things rightly.

Such a system has been discovered in social credit, and can be put into operation by an application of the monetary reform proposals of social credit, which will enable Canada to make a greater war effort without destructive taxation, without overburdening Canada's future with debt or impoverishing the Canadian people or endangering their democratic freedom.

There will be people who will challenge what I say. I invite them to make good their challenge. The simple fact of the matter is that this government has stubbornly refused to pay any attention whatsoever to the social credit system during these years, notwithstanding the fact that our need for a change is the gravest that has obtained in all our long history. Any financial and economic system capable of achieving the results necessary must be based upon the broad principle of the creation by the state of purchasing media that can be spent into circulation by the state without capital debt or interest charge. Such a system has been proposed by the social credit movement in Canada.

The dominion government must guarantee or cause to be guaranteed such prices and wages in such primary industries as agriculture, fishing, lumbering and mining as will positively assure Canadians of adequate supplies of food, clothing and shelter.

Generally speaking, all increases of prices and wages involved in the implementing of such guarantees must be in the form of bonuses or subsidies which will not cause added costs to consumers. The dominion government should pledge the Dominion of Canada to maintain such guarantees of price and wage levels for at least three years after the war. The state must create a substantial amount of the money needed so that it can be spent into circulation without capital debt or interest charge.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

What has the government done with the Bank of Canada? Let us look at page 873 of Hansard of this session. There we learn that the government borrowed from the Bank of Canada $443,000,000, including $250,000,000 in renewal of a loan, which, if I understand it correctly, means that the government borrowed this year from the Bank of Canada only $193,000,000. I wonder if the minister would feel himself free to tell us why he did not borrow $200,000,000; why stop at $193,000,000? I should like to know why he did not borrow $1,000,000,000 from the Bank of Canada. There it was; and I ask, what was the reason for creating the Bank of Canada? Was it simply to be a dignified ornament? The dominion government borrowed from the chartered banks some $790,000,000, up to March 31. Apparently the hon. member for Danforth does not know that every single dollar of that money was created. He imagined that the money borrowed came from the deposits of the people. He needs to learn more about banking. What we want to know in this house and what we have a right to have the minister declare to us, is why the government did not borrow that $790,000,000 from the Bank of Canada. I should like to read some quotations, particularly for the good of the hon. member for Danforth and the hon. gentlemen around him who applauded some of his unwise remarks about finance last evening. I am reading from the evidence before the banking and commerce committee in 1939:

Q. But there is no question about it that banks create that medium of exchange?

Mr. Towers: That is right. That is what they are for.

The minister will find that quotation at page 287 of the proceedings. Perhaps in the midst of his anxieties he forgot to refresh his memory as to what took place before that committee. Mr. Towers says definitely that the banks are there to create credit. Well, what is the Bank of Canada there for, if it is not to create money? Let me read further:

Q. And they issue that form of medium of exchange when they purchase securities or make loans?

Evidently that is created money.

Mr. Towers: That is the banking business, just in the same way that a steel plant makes steel.

That is also at page 287. How can one conceivably place any other interpretation upon those words than that the banks create the money which they lend?

In the light of those solemn and definite pronouncements, will the minister tell this house why he did not have the Bank of Canada create that money and lend it to the Dominion of Canada rather than have the chartered banks create the money and lend it to the Dominion of Canada, thereby creating a debt and necessitating the payment of interest for years and years by the dominion, interest which was lost to the people of Canada, while that interest might have gone to the Bank of Canada and come into the possession of the Canadian people, inasmuch as that is a national bank. This is the sort of thing we want to understand, we want to know about, we want explained. I reassert that money can be created by a bank; both types of money can be created, both currency, which is bills, and credit, which is figures in a book or cheque-book money. If the Bank of Canada is a genuine bank, is there any reason why it cannot also create both bills and credit; and if the government chooses to have credit rather than bills, for some reason or other, surely the Bank of Canada can accommodate it. Why does the government persist in disregarding the Bank of Canada in connection with this function of creating money? I say it should have borrowed that $790,000,000 from the Bank of Canada.

The minister probably will reply, as he has replied already in this house, that if the dominion government borrowed Canadian one dollar bills from the Bank of Canada, then those one dollar bills would come into the hands of the chartered banks who would expand those bills ten to one, as is their privilege under the banking laws of Canada, thereby creating an excess of circulating medium which would put us in danger of inflation. That would be the minister's answer. Let me reason with him for a moment or two. Why not overcome that difficulty by having the Bank of Canada print the one dollar bill and then lend the Dominion of Canada the ten dollars credit? Then why should not the Dominion of Canada spend the ten dollars credit; and when that ten dollars gets into the hands of a chartered bank why not have the chartered bank present the cheque to the Bank of Canada and receive in exchange the one dollar bill, so that the chartered bank can expand ten to one, thereby giving it the cheque-book money with which to meet the obligation it incurs when it receives that cheque on deposit?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess I was arguing that the present financial system under which the Minister of Finance is endeavouring to conduct the affairs of this country in time of war has failed us signally and is threatening us with serious difficulties unless something is done about the matter. I moved an amendment to the motion of the minister in which I conveyed the idea that a change should be made at once, a change based on the general principle that state-created money which could be spent into circulation without capital debt and without interest charges should underlie the new system which should be introduced to make better Canada's war effort and to render it possible to make what is physically possible in Canada financially possible.

I asked the Minister of Finance why it was that the government persisted in disregarding the use of the Bank of Canada for financing the war. Specifically I asked why the $790,000,000 which the government found it necessary to borrow from the chartered banks this year had not been borrowed from the Bank of Canada. I foresaw that the minister would answer such a question in the usual way. He would say that if the Bank of Canada printed one dollar bills and lent them to the government and the government spent them, then the chartered banks would get the one dollar bills into their possession and would use them as a basis of expansion ten to one, as is their right and privilege under the Bank Act, and thereby they would greatly increase the amount of the purchasing power in circulation and produce a tendency to inflation which might be uncontrollable.

I pointed out that the government could adopt a technique which might overcome that difficulty. Suppose that the government desired to borrow $10—I am using the smallest sum to illustrate—from the Bank of Canada, it would not ask the Bank of Canada to grant it ten one dollar bills, it would ask the Bank of Canada to print one one dollar bill. That one dollar bill could be expanded at the rate of ten to one, which ought to be the privilege of that bank as well as the privilege of any chartered bank, and the Bank of Canada could then lend the government nine figures in a book or nine credit dollars which would constitute a checking account against which the government could issue a ten dollar cheque. The government could issue that ten dollar cheque for government expenditures, for example as payment of dependents' allowances. The ten dollar cheque would then come into the hands of a chartered bank, say the Bank of Montreal.

The chartered bank would discover immediately that it had ten dollars more bank credit than it had cash on hand to support, according to the ten to one ratio. It would, therefore, apply to the Bank of Canada for some remedy. The Bank of Canada would ask that they send the ten dollar cheque to them, whereupon the Bank of Canada would send a one dollar bill to the Bank of Montreal which would immediately give the Bank of Montreal a basis for an expansion of ten to one which would enable it to expand its credit or its deposits sufficient to equal the ten dollar deposit which had been placed with it by the cashing of the cheque.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How will it reach my pocket? That is what I am interested in.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not know the hon. member was so much interested in banking. I did not know that he was an important shareholder.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want the dollar bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am astonished that the hon. member cannot follow this line of reasoning. I do not think I will repeat it just now, but I will give him another illustration after a while. Obviously the government under these circumstances would have got into its possession ten dollars from the Bank of Canada. This would be government money capable of being spent into circulation without an increase of capital debt or without incurring interest charges except with respect to the Bank of Canada, a government-owned institution. The government would then have ten dollars which it did not need to borrow from any organization except its own bank, or itself, and upon which it would not have to collect any taxation.

If that technique were followed the government would be able to prevent undue expansion on the part of the chartered banks. The Bank of Montreal would not be able to expand any further than the ten dollars which would be the exact equivalent of the cheque which was placed in the hands of the bank by the person who received the cheque from the dominion government. From that time forward the Bank of Montreal would have ten dollars more money in circulation as a result of the government's expenditure. The ten dollars would be made up of a one dollar bill which it would keep in its vaults as backing for the nine dollars cheque-book-money expansion. It would have a one dollar bill and nine dollars credit, which would constitute ten dollars more in circulation. But the bank could not expand that any further than the government's expenditures had expanded it. The same principle could be applied to $100,000,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why not a billion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We shall come to that in a minute; one step at a time. If the government desired the Bank of Canada to lend it $100,000,000, it could call on the Bank of Canada to print ten million dollars of bills, keep the bills in their vaults and give the government a credit of $100,000,000. The government could write a cheque on that money. When the money went out into circulation it would get into the hands of the chartered banks. The chartered banks would submit a cheque to the Bank of Canada and would receive ten million dollars in bills as a basis for the creation of credit to equal $100,000,000 which had been spent and which had come into their hands.

If this technique is followed, all tendency to inflation through credit expansion by chartered banks will have been overcome. There would be no more of an inflationary tendency than there would be if the dominion government spent $100,000,000 which it had got from any other source—even borrowed from chartered banks. There may be some technical difficulties in the way of the application of the principle, but I submit that if there are any technical difficulties they can be overcome under the War Measures Act. Far more serious things have been done under the War Measures Act. The result of the whole procedure would be that the dominion government would be able to have money to spend which would not cause taxation of the people or incur permanent debt.

This raises the whole question of inflation which we have discussed time and again, and which I shall discuss briefly once more. I heard that a great reformer was once asked why in the world he repeated a thing one hundred times. He answered that he did so because ninety-nine times were not enough. If I repeat this a few times more I do it because I have not found that what we have said already is enough. First of all, what is inflation? Inflation is a rise in prices and cost, nothing more. The people have been taught to think that the German inflation consisted of something that had happened to German money. What actually happened was that German prices went up in terms of that money; the money stayed as it was, but the prices went up in terms of the money. That is all that that inflation was. The same thing happened with respect to the assignats in France during the revolutionary days. Prices went up for various reasons. Once we lay down the principle that inflation is a rise in price we are able to deal with it as something concrete and we are able to take measures to overcome that rise in price.

There are three causes of inflation. First, there is deliberate manipulation. When the war broke out, certain concerns in Canada raised the price of lard immediately by two or three or four cents. Immediate government action forced them to put the price down again. That was a case of inflation by pure manipulation, for which there was no justification whatsoever. That rise in price was made purely for purposes of exploitation. That is one cause of inflation which has nothing in the world to do with money.

The second cause of a rise in prices is what is called the price spiraling. If wages go up, the cost of production goes up and the price of the product goes up. The product goes into circulation and raises the cost of living; then labour asks for a rise in wages, and the result is that we have the spiral.

The third cause is scarcity. Spiraling has very little to do with money, and scarcity has very little to do with money in circulation, either the kind or the amount of it, but those are the three causes of inflation and they are the only causes as far as I have been able to discover.

What can be done with respect to each of these causes? Price fixing will overcome the first form, deliberate manipulation. The government proved that in the early days of the war, and it has been proved a hundred times since.

Take the second cause, spiraling. The government has to step in and absorb the spread by means of subsidy, which the wartime prices and trade board, greatly to its credit, has proved to be a perfectly feasible device. The discovery has been made that spiraling can be prevented provided the subsidies are sufficient.

The third cause, scarcity of goods, can be overcome by price fixing, by stern repressive measures. One of the devices for overcoming a rise in price owing to scarcity is either to increase the amount of goods in circulation or else to ration the goods, one or the other, and usually the two devices together will overcome this third cause of inflation.

Looked at in this way, inflation loses its horror. It becomes no longer something dreadful, unknown, unfathomable. It becomes a reality with which the people can deal effectively in a concrete tangible way. The war is teaching us several important things. It is teaching us many things about inflation. First, it has taught us what inflation is. Second, it has taught us that it can be controlled. And, third, it has taught us how it can be controlled. The war is therefore conferring upon this generation a great benefit. It remains to be seen whether this generation is clear-headed enough to take advantage of what it is being taught and to apply to its own betterment the results of what it has learned.

This war is dispelling many delusions regarding inflation, such as that new money is inflation. Before the war broke out, the minute one spoke of the government creating a dollar bill people cried out at once, "Oh, that is inflation." That has been proved to be a lie, perhaps deliberately concocted and deliberately propagated among the people by certain selfish interests. That delusion has been dispelled.

Second, there was the delusion that new money necessarily causes inflation. That was an assumption quite commonly made. When the social credit movement commenced in Alberta we commonly heard all these untruths, these delusions, urged against the social credit policy. Most of them have now been dispelled.

The third delusion which has been dispelled is that creating money is or necessarily causes inflation; the fourth, that money without gold behind it is or necessarily causes inflation; the fifth, that state-created money is or necessarily causes inflation; the sixth, that money not lent by a bank is or necessarily causes inflation. Every one of these was a delusion. Many of them were taught in the schools to keep the people ignorant concerning the all-important matter of money. But the war is, as I have said, dispelling these delusions. We are learning to realize the truth of Mr. Hoover's remarks which I quoted earlier this afternoon, that the best remedy for a price increase is to increase production.

The experiences of Britain are most enlightening with respect to inflation. May I refer to the experiences of Britain during this war. There was great danger of inflation in Britain on account of the fact that there you have forty-seven million people living in a small island, with rather meagre resources in some respects. Under those conditions, as soon as the war broke out and restricted imports, there was every danger of inflation because great sums of money were being spent in the country in the conduct of the war. J. R. Scott Watson who was recently in Canada made known to us that the United Kingdom in 1939 had only thirty million acres in agriculture; much of that land was poor, much of it not in use. But Britain undertook to feed her forty-seven million people from those thirty million acres. The product of the thirty million acres provided about thirty per cent of the food requirements of the people before the war, in 1939. Now, after three years of war, Britain has so stimulated her production that she is supplying sixty per cent of her food requirements, and her danger of inflation has greatly decreased as a result of this increased production.

There is another reason why Britain was in great danger of inflation, and the same reason applied in Canada. In the first place, individual incomes greatly increased in Britain, as they have done in Canada. The figures I have, indicate that individual incomes above £110 during the war and above £125 before the war rose from £3,000,000,000 in 1938-39, just before the war to £4,250,000,000 in 1941-42. That constituted an increase in the incomes of the people of 42 per cent, which certainly would be accepted as a cause of inflation. The mass of incomes in Britain between £125 and £500 rose from £1,850,000,000 in 1938-39 to £2,815,000,000 in 1941-42, or an increase of 52 per cent in the money in circulation. Thus we see that the monetary factor making for inflation was certainly there. The money was out in circulation; there were meagre resources for producing food; ordinarily one would expect inflation to follow. Not only that, but there was a dwindling of supplies in Britain. In December, 1942, civilian consumption in Britain in textiles is reported to have been only 25 per cent of the pre-war consumption. Just imagine if we in Canada had been obliged to wear only 25 per cent of the clothes we wore before the war! We should feel that we were rather restricted if we had only as few clothes as that to spend our money on. The pressure tending toward inflation would be very great under those circumstances because there would be so much money to spend on other things. Clothing consumption was only 45 per cent of pre-war consumption, and household textiles only 10 per cent of pre-war consumption. In addition, the paper available for use in Britain was only 20 per cent of what it was in pre-war days. The consumption of general essential civilian goods was only from 20 to 25 per cent of what it was in pre-war days. Put all these factors together and you have a tremendous inflationary pressure tending to pierce the price ceiling. What did Britain do about this situation? Certainly the stage was all set for inflation. How did she manage it? Did she control it, or did she succumb to it?

In the first place, Britain subsidized production—as I have advocated three or four times on the floor of this house—of all essential foodstuffs. She subsidized flour and bread and meat and bacon and milk, which means that she gave such income to the producers of all these, in various ways, as made it possible for them to produce much more successfully. Later on she subsidized cheese and tea and eggs and butter and potatoes and animal feeds. This she did by selling the goods on the market for less than she gave for them. As one illustration, in 1941 Britain paid the producer of eggs seventy-five cents a dozen and sold the eggs on the market for fifty cents a dozen, the state absorbing the twenty-five cents. Here was subsidy with a vengeance; but that sort of subsidy enabled the producers to produce to the maximum and enabled the consumers to consume without absorbing the shock. In other words, production was stimulated to the highest degree, but the cost of living was not raised thereby.

Again, Britain used a system of rationing. She rationed all clothing. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) were with me in Britain in the empire parliamentary delegation during 1941, and they will remember the very great difficulty there was in purchasing clothes. When we went into the country they gave us a card, and they told us with great care that if we used the privilege on that card to buy shirts we could not use the privilege to buy stockings, and so on.

An hon. MEMBER: Socks.

An hon. MEMBER: What kind of party was that?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should have said "socks". Hon. members are amused. So am I, looking back at it. But the point is that the amount of money which could be used for clothing was rigidly limited. If you bought one kind of clothing you could not buy another. That was a system of rationing which certainly had people under restraint. On account of the rationing system, a millionaire, walking along the streets of London, could buy no more than a person with a very moderate income. That system was designed to prevent inflation, to prevent a pressure on the price structure arising from an opportunity for people to spend a large amount of money. People with large incomes could not spend those incomes simply because they were not permitted to do so, just as we here are not permitted to buy more than a given amount of sugar, no matter how much money we may or may not have.

The rationing extended to most kinds of clothing, to soap, and to gasoline.

The third device which Britain used to prevent inflation was the siphoning off of surplus incomes. Every device which the minister has used, Britain also used. They broadened the taxation base to bring a great many more people under taxation than had previously been subject to it. Besides increasing taxation, they sold bonds and certificates, as the minister has done. The same devices were used in Britain as in Canada. But one device which has not been used in Canada with anything like the carefulness or consistency which characterized it in England was the rationing device and, probably, the subsidizing device.

What happened in England? In the first place, during the first four months of the war, there was a rather rapid rise in prices, as there was here. From then on until the spring of 1941 prices rose very slowly. In 1941 the government, assuming that the price structure had reached a level which should probably be maintained, instituted a policy of stabilization, and they extended this in such a way that the cost of living index was not to be permitted to increase beyond 25 to 30 per cent above what it was in pre-war days. And their system worked. Now, if we take the price index as it stood in August, 1939, as 100, then the price index in April, 1941, was 129. So that prices had then risen almost as high as the authorities intended to permit them to rise. By September, 1942, a good many months later, they had risen only one more point, to 130, which indicates how perfectly the British had brought the price structure under control by the devices which they had used. During this time foods actually declined in price from 124 to 116, which indicates again what masterly control they exercised over the price structure. Such rises in price as had taken place were partly due to certain measures which were applied by the government and which had nothing to do with money. The government increased the taxes on sugar, tobacco and matches—much as taxes are increased here—causing a rise in price. Everybody realizes that the rise in the price of candy following the minister's last budget was due, not to the shortage of candy but to the tax placed on it. A rise in price all over the field can be caused by taxation, but has nothing to do with the money in circulation.

Another thing which caused a rise in price in Britain was a purchasing tax of 66⅔ per cent on the wholesale value of some luxuries. Another was a purchasing tax of 16⅔ per cent on the wholesale price of many other goods. This was nothing more or less than a sales tax. Naturally it caused a rise in price, but again, that rise had nothing to do with the money in circulation.

The result of all the devices which the British used is that the pound sterling has become the world's most healthy currency.

The hon. member for Danforth in his fine address spoke of sound money. If money is to be sound, prices must be stable. The first important thing in the maintenance of the value of the currency unit is stable prices, so that a man may know that with a dollar he will be able to buy as many pounds of butter, let us say, two years from now as he can buy to-day.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would there never be any fluctuation, then?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would not say there would never be any fluctuation, but the amount of fluctuation could be controlled in such a way that the price could be maintained stable. This is the ideal of monetary management. When prices are stable, and the money is suitably circulated, and there are markets available, the tendency is toward sound money.

The word "inflation" has virtually been eliminated from the English vocabulary. I read in an article published in the Christian Science Monitor of January 30, and written by one René Cross, the last few lines as follows:

> The pound sterling is the world's healthiest currency. The word inflation can safely be eliminated from the English vocabulary.

Thus have the English people controlled their pound; thus have they managed inflation in these most trying times during war days.

Britain could have done just as well; she could have eliminated inflation just as effectively, if she had used to a considerable degree one pound notes spent into circulation without capital debt and without interest. May I illustrate? I have brought to the attention of this house two or three times, in the course of the years I have been here, the fact that during the last war Great Britain used money which was really a treasury note, and which was called a Bradbury. A good many hon. members have seen the Bradbury. It is nothing but a treasury bill valued at one pound. The Bradbury became to all intents and purposes a second currency. With the Bradbury the British fought the war, and with the Bradbury the British won the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: How did it get the name Bradbury?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Because it was signed by Lord Bradbury who, if I remember correctly, was head of the board which issued them. People called them Bradburys jocularly, and so originated the name of that famous British money during the last war.

Mr. HOMUTH: But there was still gold behind it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Only a very small amount. They had behind it the treasury notes redemption fund, in which there was never at any time sufficient gold to give anything like backing. My hon. friends will find this dealt with most interestingly and scientifically in a book called "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges", by William A. Shaw, who was secretary to his majesty's treasury. That book is in the library; hon. members will find it very good reading, and most instructive. It shows how Bradburys were used in the conduct and in the winning of the last war. It is written by a man who undoubtedly is an unchallengeable authority, namely, Dr. William A. Shaw.

If in this war the British people had been using the Bradbury, which was issued without debt by the treasury, and without interest payable by the treasury, they could have applied the same anti-inflation devices exactly, namely, first of all subsidizing production to increase the amount of goods on hand; second, rationing and subsidizing prices, and, third, siphoning off. They could have used these three devices and could have controlled their prices just as accurately and effectively as they could, using the money they now use.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, any number of them.

Mr. HOMUTH: Under the social credit scheme, from what I have been able to learn in the speeches to which I have listened in the past few years I would understand there would be no such thing as rationing, because there would be no necessity for it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a very fine question. The important point to be borne in mind is that we are now at war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member has a chance to learn something, if he will listen. As soon as he sees a chance of getting something which will enlighten him, he shies off.

The point is that in war time there are always scarcities of goods. Social credit is designed to be a scientific method of distribution applicable in an age of plenty. It presupposes, therefore, an age of plenty. We are now in an age of plenty, or will be in the midst of it as soon as we are at peace.

The mere fact that we had overproduction all during the terrible thirties is clear evidence that there was an abundance of goods, and therefore rationing was unnecessary. Is that clear to my hon. friend? But when you come to a war and begin to use social credit devices in war time, of course you must use rationing in order to prevent evils which will naturally result from there being more purchasing power in the people's hands than there are goods to purchase.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is because there is a Liberal government in power.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would not draw that conclusion. I suppose the hon. member is referring to the shortage of goods.

Mr. HOMUTH: And the shortage of government, too.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend may make that allegation about the Liberals, but I do not propose to do so at the present time. They are guilty of some misdeeds, but they cannot overcome the scarcities which naturally result from war.

Mr. MITCHELL: What happened to the Bradbury in 1919?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was the soundest money in the world.

Mr. MITCHELL: Except that the cost of living index was 98 per cent higher than in 1914.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but it was higher in the United States than it was in Great Britain. Laugh that off.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member was talking about the Bradbury.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The cost of living was higher in France than in Great Britain. Laugh that off.

Mr. MITCHELL: You laugh off the Bradbury.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is very apparent that the hon. member has a little information, but a little learning is a dangerous thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: My information arises from the fact that I spent Bradburys in 1919 and I know what they were worth.

Mr. HOMUTH: You did not spend enough.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And if my hon. friend had been spending dollars in the United States he would have known what was wrong there —or dollars in Canada. Conditions in the United States were not as good as they might be.

The trouble was that in the last war Great Britain had not perfected the techniques which she used to prevent inflation in this war. There was inflation at the time of the last war, and there would have been with any kind of money. Bank of England pounds were just as weak as Bradburys in Great Britain. I think I have dealt with that, but if there is any further question with respect to Bradburys, now is the time to ask it.

The point I wish to make is that the British government would have been able to manage its price structure and prevent inflation just as well if it had been using Bradburys, which were government-issued debt-free pounds, free of capital debt and free of interest—just as well as it has been able to manage with the regular money of the realm in this war, if it had only used the technique used in the last war. It could have subsidized production with Bradburys just as well. It could have subsidized consumption just as well with Bradburys. It could have rationed: it could have siphoned off just as well. The result is that it would have controlled inflation.

With respect to what Canada can do, let me say that Canada, with state money, could do just as well as Great Britain. Dominion dollar bills were just as good as were Bank of Canada bills. Money which hon. members used in Canada all the way through, until the time of the establishment of the Bank of Canada, were either dominion bills or bills of one of the chartered banks. And the dominion bills were just as good as bills of the Bank of Montreal, or those of any other bank. They were state issued, and the state did not owe anybody for one of them, and could have used them—

Mr. TUSTIN: Could those Bradburys be used outside England?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course not. Can the English pound be used outside England?

Mr. TUSTIN: Certainly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sorry; I apologize to the hon. member, because I did not understand his question correctly. Bradburys could have been used exactly the same as Bank of England one-pound notes—exactly the same, no better and no worse. Does that deal with the hon. member's question? The question which I think is in the hon. member's mind is as to whether or not they were as good on the exchanges, and whether the exchange rate on them was as good. May I say to him it was just as good.

As I was proceeding to say, in Canada before the formation of the Bank of Canada we were using dominion dollar bills. They were just as good as Bank of Canada bills have been since that time. They were just as good as any bill of any bank in Canada, up to that time. During the last war the dominion government printed 26,000,000 dollars in bills and spent them just as they would spend ordinary revenue. Hon. members will find an account of that in the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada. This was published in 1933 and I have a copy of it. This is what I find at paragraph 47 on page 22:

> In the war session of 1941 parliament raised the partially covered issue of $50,000,000.

That was partly covered with gold.

> Subsequently an issue of $16,000,000 was made against a deposit of railway securities—

No gold behind those.

> —guaranteed by the dominion government, as well as an uncovered issue of $10,000,000 for governmental purposes.

I contend that if the dominion government were printing bills to-day in the manner that they printed those twenty-six million and were applying the anti-inflationary devices which the British have applied with such success we would completely overcome inflation in Canada, just as successfully as we are overcoming it with the money we now use. And that money could be used to subsidize production and consumption just as well. And by rationing and siphoning off we would keep our economy free from inflation just as well as we can do with the debt money which we now use. The dominion government issued the money to which I have referred, the $26,000,000, under the Finance Act of 1914. Another finance act of 1923 permitted the dominion government to issue money in a similar way. It was understood that there was gold behind the dominion bills. In fact, there was gold behind dominion bills. Probably the gold gave a certain amount of value to the bills until April 10, 1933, when the gold redemption clause was suspended. After that there was behind the dollar bills no gold that could be called for; there was no redemption; still the dollar bills continued just as valuable as before. That indicates clearly that it was not the gold behind those bills that gave them value, and it was not the fact that the bills were printed or lent by a bank that gave them value. They were of value because the state printed them and behind them was the goods-and-services-producing-power of the nation.

I say that Canada to-day could use the Bank of Canada, the bills and money issued by the Bank of Canada, for the financing of a large measure of the cost of this war. I will not say how large a percentage, but certainly the $790 million which we borrowed from the chartered banks could have been provided from the Bank of Canada. Canada could either cause the money to be issued by the Bank of Canada or she could establish a currency commission of the treasury board which could function as efficiently as the treasury board did in 1914 to 1917 in issuing money.

Mr. REID: If the hon. member would permit two questions: Under that system would there be taxation? And if there would be taxation, in what proportion would the issue of dollar bills be to the taxation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There would have to be taxation while the war is on. One device for overcoming inflation is siphoning off the money the very device used by Britain. The minister uses them all, taxation, borrowing from the people by savings certificates or bonds.

With respect to the second point, I am not able to say at the moment what the percentage should be because I have not given thought to that matter. I would have to give it some thought.

I contend that in the light of the evidence which is available to-day members of this house are neglecting their duty to the people of to-day and to the people of the future if they do not canvass with the greatest thoroughness all the possibilities which might result from a proposal to finance in whole or in part the activities of this country with money which may be created by the state and spent into circulation rather than lent into circulation, and spent into circulation without debt and without additional interest.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak at the same length as those who have preceded me. I think two speeches have taken five and a quarter hours, and I am sure the house is weary of long speeches.

First let me say that in common with all hon. members of this house we of this group are anxious to make the greatest possible contribution to the successful effort of this country in cooperation with the united nations in the winning of the war. However to-night I am going to discuss the budget. I would delight to enter into a theoretical discussion of the fundamentals of certain social theories which I hold, but I do not believe this is the time or place to do that. I do, however, want to say a word with regard to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and some statements he has made, because he has moved an amendment, and consequently one must, in passing, at least say something about it.

The hon. member for Lethbridge said he did not know what those of us in the other groups regarded as sound money; did we think that money with gold behind it was sound money, or money with anything else behind it? My understanding of sound money is money that is directly related to the goods and services which that money is designed to account for and to circulate in society. In order to get that sound money, society cannot rely upon any law of supply and demand in a social field in which great monopolistic enterprises, either financial or industrial, are predominant, and therefore the time has come when, if we are to have sound money, we must of necessity be able to plan our production and distribution in such manner that we are able to relate directly the purchasing power that is produced when goods are produced to the goods produced. We cannot regard money as anything but a rough and ready measure and medium of circulation for goods. It seems to me that my hon. friends to my left mistake money for wealth. In other words, they mistake the shadow for the substance. In my view sound money is money that is related to goods and services. If we stimulate the production of goods out of proportion to the amount of money in circulation, we have that bitter thing that we call deflation. If on the other hand, without regard to the goods that can be consumed in a nation, we circulate vast quantities of money, then we have the equally evil thing, inflation.

War demands at present have made it impossible for consumers' goods to be placed on the market to the extent that we are placing money in the pockets of the people who are producing goods, and consequently what the minister is up against to-day is not a shortage of purchasing power but the question how to extract the potential purchasing power from the pockets of those in the community who possess it. If the hon. member for Lethbridge would just examine one step further into the British scheme of things he would find that in addition to the very heavy taxation, at this very moment they are asking the public to raise a voluntary gift amounting to the enormous sum of $3,000 million for the purchase of aeroplanes. I refer to the "Wings for Victory" fund. That is to arouse the enthusiasm of the British people in order that they will surrender to the government a portion of the purchasing power that otherwise might create a demand for goods that cannot be satisfied.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That of course is a form of siphoning it off.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is, but if you are continually siphoning off, what is the object of continually pouring in something you have to siphon off?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If my hon. friend will permit a question; if the minister was so much interested in taking the money out of the pockets of the people, will he explain why he took $790 million from the chartered banks and put it back into the pockets of the people?

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will have to answer that himself. Sometimes the loud laugh just speaks the vacant mind.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not in this case.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members to refrain from interrupting the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and then I will not make any more remarks of that description. Under our present banking system, when the Minister of Finance goes to borrow funds from the chartered banks he borrows something from the private institutions that they are able to lend him because they are basing their credit upon certain notes and securities which they have obtained in various ways from the Bank of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: At the present time, yes; and for every dollar the Bank of Canada issues, when it goes to the private chartered banks—and I use the term "private chartered banks" advisedly—they can lend, as the hon. member for Lethbridge properly said, at least $10 which they consider safe or, under our law, $20 if they so desire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Certainly; that is the law. For every dollar of Bank of Canada money they hold they can lend up to that amount. Consequently, as the minister explained very fully last year, the issue of currency to meet our war obligations directly by the Bank of Canada is to that extent more inflationary than the direct borrowing of money from the chartered banks of Canada. The minister explained that very fully during last session. Now I am just a little tired of being lectured, and I sometimes think that, after all, we have in existence in Canada one government which represents in part the views of my hon. friend. This afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge gave some instances of poverty in the province from which I come. I was going to give some of those instances myself to-night, but I shall not do so because that has been done. But let me point out that poverty on the prairies is not confined to Saskatchewan. It is also rife in Alberta, where in 1935 a government took office which said it would wipe poverty off the map in that province or the premier himself would take to the tall timbers.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is not right.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have in my hand one of a good many letters I have received from Alberta this session. I want to put it on the record, because letters were placed on the record to-day from my own province, and quite properly; I am glad that was done. This letter was written to a friend of mine in Saskatchewan, one of my supporters in my constituency. It is dated from a little place in Alberta, January 25, 1943, and says:

Dear Mrs.——

Seeing your add in the Western Producer where you have . . . turkeys for sale, I was wondering if I would be in time to get a hen and what would you sell one poor mother one hen for? The reason I am asking is, you see, we did not get any threshing done and then we have lost three litter of pigs, and then I am letting you know, but give you my word, as our good Lord knows that it is the truth. That is why I would like to get a start with turkeys so as to see if I could get a little money, as it sure is hard on a mother who has four boys to make clothes over for all the time until there is hardly anything to do anything with, so I hope you will help one poor mother out. My, you do not know how much it would mean to me. So what will you charge me? Let me know. Must close.

Mrs.—

Then there is a postscript:

P.S. Excuse this personal remark, but I have had no underclothes on all winter, and I am cold. —— would be the best place to send the turkey hen, as the station is half a mile and the above post office is five miles. Do let me hear.

Then the last sentence:

Do you listen to the Heaven and Home hour?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is that?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a radio broadcast from Alberta. Therefore when we are talking about poverty, let us look at ourselves just a little. I noted that in the budget of the province of Alberta recently brought down in Edmonton there is a surplus of two or three million dollars; yet look at the poverty in that province. And still we hear so much about what will be done in the future.

Mr. HLYNKA: What has that to do with this budget?

Mr. COLDWELL: This afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge indicated the poverty of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Only as an illustration.

Mr. COLDWELL: And I am indicating, as another illustration, the poverty in Alberta, where my hon. friend's party is in power.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am very glad you are doing it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Now let me say that my hon. friend's ideas and our ideas about money are quite different. I have given what I believe is a correct definition of what sound money ought to be. We do not believe in the present system. We believe that all money should be national money. We believe that the whole financial system should be a national system. That was illustrated last year in an interchange which took place in this house and which appears at page 3108 of Hansard for June 5, 1942. The Minister of Finance referred to the hon. member for Lethbridge, and said:

> The hon. gentleman seems to argue part of the time that we should run the banks. That is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation policy. He seems to object to the private banking system. Instead of allowing the banks a profit on the carrying on of banking activities, he suggests that the government should carry them on; and, as presumably he would say, that the government should have the profit themselves. Is that the position of social credit?

The hon. member for Lethbridge replied in these words:

> No; that is not quite correct. The social credit movement believes that the banks can work for the government. The banks do not necessarily belong to the government. It may be quite all right for the government to buy the whole banking system. We would certainly never favour having the government seize it or cause any harm to the bankers.

If I have learned anything since I have been in this house, I thought from the point of view of our social credit friends the bankers were the big shots who were entirely responsible for every evil that has cursed this country since confederation. Then he went on:

> We do believe in private enterprise. That, the minister will find, is the distinctive difference between our movement and the socialistic movement, which seems to favour government ownership and direction. We believe it is better for the country to have private ownership.

I find it very difficult to understand exactly what is involved in that answer, but let me say this to my hon. friend. When he was speaking the other day, after I had spoken, he said that we of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were "shifty." I want to say that I know of no more shifty statement on the records of this house—

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was completely consistent.

Mr. COLDWELL: —than that, which was applied to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group.

In order that we may place our position clearly before the house, I wish to move an amendment to the amendment which has been moved. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis):

> That all the words after "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets the failure of the government to provide for the nationalization of the banking system so as to make possible the full utilization of the Bank of Canada for the financing of the war;
> and further this house regrets the failure of the government to provide for increases in the amounts paid to old age and blind pensioners, or to make adequate provisions for veterans of the last or the present war, or their widows and dependents;
> and further this house regrets the extent to which the government has vested the control of the Canadian economy in monopolistic industry and finance."

There we place our position in the clearest possible language. We believe that if we are to have a financial system that will be an instrument of the country in which we live, the financial institutions must be the property of the nation. Some may disagree with that, but that is the position we have taken in this house throughout the years, and that is the position taken by all democratic groups like ours wherever these are to be found throughout the world.

I want to get down to some of the things in the budget. I am sure that none of us in this house is envious of the task that had to be performed by the Minister of Finance. That task is easily illustrated if we look up the record for a few years back. For example, we find that in the fiscal year 1938-39 the total revenues of Canada were the paltry sum, as we think of it nowadays, of $502 million. I recollect how we were told that we could not find an additional $100 million to provide work for those who were unemployed and travelling from place to place across this country. Last year the total revenues in round figures were over $2,200 million. A comparison of the expenditures shows the same state of affairs. The total expenditures in 1938-39 were $553 million, leaving a deficit of $50 million. The total expenditures in 1942-43 were nearly $4,500 million, and with revenues of less than $2,225 million, there was an estimated deficit of just over $2,225 million.

I wonder how many members realize that if you add up all the appropriations we have made, since September, 1939, including the one now covered by the resolutions before the house, you will find they total $12,500 million. I looked up the Canada Year Book to see what the total estimated wealth of this country was. The last year for which it was given was 1933, when it was shown as $25 billion. In the four years of war we have spent a sum of money equal to one half of the estimated total wealth of Canada in 1933.

Mr. SLAGHT: That was a bad year.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the hon. member for Parry Sound will do what I did and look up the figures for 1927 he will find that the estimated national wealth for that year was not much higher. I have just forgotten the figure, but I know it is not much higher. It seems to me that there are valuable lessons to be learned from this. We have been told to-night that we live in an age of potential plenty. I believe that in normal times planned scarcity ought to be regarded as a high crime on the part of any government. What we have done during the war has not been done by means which are at all mysterious.

I remember in 1933 during the course of some public addresses which I made, one of them over the radio, I said that if all our people in Canada were put to work, if all our idle machines and resources were used we could provide goods and services to furnish on the average every Canadian family of five with approximately $4,000 worth of goods and services. I was laughed at, but the governor of the Bank of Canada estimated just recently that the gross value of the national output for this year will be approximately $9 billion. With 700,000 of our young men and women out of production and in uniform we have been able to produce in Canada goods and services to a value rapidly approaching the figure I mentioned for a family of five. It has not quite reached that figure, but it is rapidly approaching it.

We are producing more goods, but we have not had the benefit of them in our own communities because the goods we are producing to-day are not civilian consumption goods—they are goods for war. If we organize our industrial and economic life as we ought to, we should be able to produce goods for peace to the same amount, or even more because we would have 700,000 more men and women in industry. However, the unfortunate factor is that in normal times the main stimulus to economic activity is not defence of the nation or the good of the community, but the making of profit. To my mind that motive is wrong, but it is the motive which sets the wheels of industry in motion and keeps them running. May I say to my hon. friends to my left that it is this constant dipping by the great financial organizations, the taking out of purchasing power that they cannot use for consumption goods, that causes stagnation and ultimately ends in depression.

The interest of the people is sacrificed in such times by government non-intervention, but that is the price we pay for free enterprise. We take the position that in any proper form of society human needs ought to come first and that the making of profit ought to be a purely secondary consideration, instead of reversing the position. Let me say that the fateful years through which we passed condemned not only the people but the nations to insecurity and inequality. We then got the ultimate result—war.

My adverse criticism of the budget is that it contains no attempt whatsoever to relieve poverty and to remove trade barriers which will be a potent factor in the post-war world, nor does it prevent control of our economy by monopolistic industry and finance. To-day, in this war, sacrifice to be just must be equitable. We have no right whatsoever to ask the aged, on their old age pensions, and the widows and dependents of the men who perished in the last war or in this war to accept, during this war, a sacrifice which is inequitable. Of course, we are told that undoubtedly when the war is over, better times will be ahead. Well, I view promises with a good deal of suspicion. There have been too many promises, and the vain repetition of promises is useless in these days to satisfy the people of our country. In 1919, if I may quote again from a document from which I quoted the other evening, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) attended and was elected leader at the great liberal convention in this city. He moved a resolution there on social security and said this:

The committee feels that this war—

That was the war of 1914-18.

—was a war for freedom. It was a war to bring about throughout the world a larger measure of human freedom; and that the men who sacrifice their lives do so that there might come into the world a newer and higher civilization. Those who did live through these stormswept, war-swift years in France and Flanders were not preserved that they might return to conditions of warring factions in industry. They have come back with the hope of helping to bring about a condition in which the life of the people shall be made a life of greater freedom, a life of greater human happiness for the masses; a life of social, political and industrial freedom in so far as it is possible to make it such.

He went on to say—this was on August 16, 1919:

It is not enough to have work one day and unemployment the next, to have work at one time and then when sick be helpless. . . . The Liberal party of Canada in accepting this programme in its entirety to-night is taking a position which in the course of time will be regarded as historic; it is declaring itself the first political party in any country in the world to accept this programme and to ask its followers to join with other nations in carrying it out.

Those were noble words, but need I say to this house that those promises have been unfulfilled? If you look at Britain, Australia or New Zealand, you find that those countries have gone far beyond what we have done. Since that day the Prime Minister spent seventeen years in power in this country. During his regime we drifted into a depression, we saw the League of Nations destroyed; we helped to arm the aggressor powers, we shipped nickel, copper, aluminum to them. I think that is sufficient condemnation.

The Minister of Finance also spoke of the tariff. He said that to-day the tariff had little effect. The revenue last year amounted to $118,000,000; that was the estimated receipts in this year's budget. My suggestion is this, that if tariffs amount to very little these days, why not remove the tariff altogether on the essentials for war and on the necessities for life? That would indicate Canada's stand. It would be a fine gesture.

When I was on the war expenditures committee, as other members who were with me will recollect, when we were looking at the expenditures we would find from time to time tariff duties on machines brought into Canada for war purposes. Here we are in the middle of a war importing necessary machinery, and may I add, vital repairs to the machines used in our agricultural industry, and those war machines and those agricultural machinery repairs have to run the gauntlet of the tariff.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And the exchange tax.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, and the exchange tax.

To-day the nations' trade is run through national boards. The Minister of Finance also said this:

There again, however, will be a time when the tariff will be an important instrument of trade policy.

It is left for a future decision. I thought the Liberal party had made a decision on that subject long ago.

I listened carefully last night to see where the Progressive Conservative party stood in relation to trade. I must say that I could not hear very well from where I sat, but I listened carefully and I read their spokesman's address in Hansard this morning. It seems to me that the critic for the Progressive Conservative party looks forward to the time when the industries of Canada will be protected again by a fairly substantial tariff. That was the correct interpretation, I think, that should be placed upon the hon. gentleman's remarks. All through the years, Mr. Speaker, we have stood by this statement—I am quoting from our manifesto of 1933:

The strangling of our export trade by insane protectionist policies must be brought to an end. But the old controversies between free traders and protectionists are now largely obsolete. In a world of nationally organized economies Canada must organize the buying and selling of her main imports and exports under public boards.

That is precisely what the nations are doing now and what I believe they will do in the future. Instead of a large number of individuals going on to the speculative market and buying various commodities, we shall find the government doing the buying through boards. That is something we heard about last year when we were on the other side of the ocean. If that policy was correct in any particular in 1933, it is much more correct to-day.

I pass on to something else. More disturbing still is the situation in regard to our war industries. When I look around I find that representatives of big business control a number of the major economic functions of the state to-day. Orders in council have been passed by the thousands giving them power, with no adequate supervision, and, indeed, no opportunity for this house to make the intensive studies of these 35,000 orders in council that ought to be made—there are too many of them. If I may refer again to 1919, there was no more caustic critic of government by order in council than the present Prime Minister who on August 6, 1919, moved a resolution in this city reading thus:

...restoration of the control of the executive of parliament...

I skip a few words:

...and the discontinuance of government by orders in council.

Those were the words of the present Prime Minister after the experiences of the last war.

When I speak of these things, let me say that there are other disturbing factors. The war expenditures committee pointed out the necessity for looking into agreements that contained clauses for accelerated depreciation or for rebates from the Excess Profits Tax Act. I brought down with me, so I thought, two or three orders in council that were tabled recently. After the last session of parliament I did discuss one of these agreements, not the one tabled recently, but one tabled last session, and when I first mentioned it I made an error in my interpretation of it which I corrected.

But let us look at two or three of these contracts. Here is P.C. 2846, an agreement made with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada under the War Exchange Conservation Act, the one made last April to which I have referred. What is that agreement in brief? This company agrees to construct an additional power plant at an estimated cost of $9,256,000. This plant is to be leased to a subsidiary of Consolidated Smelters, the West Kootenay Light Company Limited. In return the agreement states that in the computation of the amount of the profits of the company for the purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, to determine the liability of the company to pay tax under these acts for each of the years 1941, 1942, 1943 and 1944, a special deduction from profits is to be permitted each year. The amount of the special deduction is not to exceed fifty per cent of the total expenditures made on the power project; that is to say, not more than one-half of $9,256,000. This, I submit, is equivalent to the government making a gift of over four and a half million dollars to this company.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not.

Mr. McLARTY: It is a maximum.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is the maximum, and they will get the maximum.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, that remains to be seen.

Mr. COLDWELL: As will be done by the next one to which I shall refer.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is merely a write-off which would have taken place in the normal course, but over a little longer period; that is all.

Mr. COLDWELL: "Over a little longer period." We pay for it during the war, and the company has the plant.

Mr. JACKMAN: The country has the plant.

Mr. COLDWELL: Consolidated Smelters has the plant.

Mr. JACKMAN: The country has the use of the plant during the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: And we pay for it. I refer now to P.C. 7819, made with the Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited. Under the same act, this company was assured of a contract through the war production board of the United States to purchase ten million pounds of nickel in matte during 1942 to 1945 at a price which included six cents a pound extra to repay the company, over the life of the contract, for the capital costs incurred in fulfilling the order. The company claimed that unless special depreciation allowances were granted to enable the company to amortize the costs of the additional facilities in mine, mill and smelter over the life of the three-year contract, the expenditure necessary to provide the facilities would be wholly unjustified on account of the small net return and doubtful value of the additional plant and facilities after the war. Now what does the government allow? The government has allowed the company, in computing the amount of profits for purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, a deduction by way of special depreciation allowance as follows: for the year 1942, twenty per cent of the cost of depreciable assets, not to exceed $131,346; and for each of the years 1943 and 1944—each of the years—forty per cent of the cost of the depreciable assets, not to exceed $262,690 in each of the three years. And who is going to own the plant and the depreciated assets at the end of the three years? This nickel company.

Mr. McLARTY: What is wrong with that?

Mr. COLDWELL: The other day I asked some questions in the house about the Shipshaw development. I wish to say that I object to the government of Canada giving anything to either the nickel company or the aluminum company. The Aluminum Company of Canada Limited was the predominant partner in the Alliance Aluminum Company of Basle, Switzerland, in 1931, when the world was divided up among German and other companies. I do not want to name them all.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. COLDWELL: Because, to be perfectly frank about it, I do not happen to have them on the tip of my tongue. The Aluminum Company of Canada was the predominant partner when the markets were allotted in July, 1931; it had the largest amounts allotted to it of any company. What do we find? We find that that agreement stated in effect—and they varied that agreement a little later on so that they would not interfere with one another in the export market—that each member of the Alliance could manufacture up to the limit in its own domestic market. We find to-day, as a result of that policy, that we have to gather up the old aluminum pots and pans throughout this country and in the United States because during these years, under that agreement, the Germans had built up the largest aluminum development in the whole world.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no, the United States has the largest.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can give my hon. friend the figures. I am not speaking without having studied this matter fairly intensively during the past few weeks and examined the records of the committee which sat in the United States the other day.

If you look at International Nickel and the other nickel companies you find the same thing. Yet under policies like this we are handing over the control of plants and resources to these powerful monopolistic industries which will, if they have the opportunity, regain some sort of liaison with the great companies in the countries with which we are at war Therefore I say that I object strenuously to the alienation of our resources and the depreciation of our national investments in this manner to companies of this description.

One other example—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has exceeded his time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I moved a subamendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member says, he moved a subamendment. But I have examined the question whether the hon. member is entitled to longer than forty minutes, and I have come to the conclusion that he cannot be permitted to continue beyond that time except with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you. May I point this out, that last year, when the hon. member for Lethbridge was in exactly the same position as I am in to-night, he was allowed to continue, and it was stated that he had the right to continue. I did not think of bringing down this evening the copy of Hansard which bears on that point because I did not think the matter would be raised. Had I done so, I would have been quite prepared to discuss the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us have a ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no recollection that such a privilege was given to the hon. member for Lethbridge; but I was considering, while the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking, whether the point might arise, and I think the house is entitled to know the reason why I should object to the hon. member continuing.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, Mr. Speaker, if there is any question about it—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us hear Mr. Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member with the consent of the house wishes to continue longer, of course the Chair will agree; but in the circumstances here perhaps it might be well if a ruling came from the Chair, because the same situation arose on the debate on the address; the question was then raised, but not presented to the Chair for any decision. I think it might be well that the hon. member should continue, because that appears to be the feeling of the house. Nevertheless, for the guidance of hon. members in future, I think the house should know the position I would take with regard to this question.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let us have the ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 37 states:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

A close examination of that standing order shows that it had been drafted without having in view the complex situation which has arisen, as we have it to-night, and as we had it during the previous debate on the address. The principle that each amendment or subamendment is a separate question only applies to relevancy and to the right of a member to speak again. It has no relation to the special rule limiting the length of speeches, and it does not alter the fact that when the house is seized of a motion of want of confidence all the allegations which make up that motion must be decided together. Members may vote against the amendment and for the motion, or vice versa. In any event the final decision of the house can be ascertained only after the amendment has passed through all its proposed alterations, and resolved on its final phraseology which will be the real motion of want of confidence put by the Chair. Such a motion cannot be divided.

The hon. member's subamendment is as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets the failure of the government to provide for the nationalization of the banking system so as to make possible the full utilization of the Bank of Canada for the financing of the war;

And further this house regrets the failure of the government to provide for increases in the amounts paid to old age and blind pensioners, or to make adequate provisions for veterans of the last or the present war, or their widows and dependents;

And further this house regrets the extent to which the government has vested the control of the Canadian economy in monopolistic industry and finance."

That is an amplification of the motion of want of confidence, as embodied in the amendment of the hon. member for Lethbridge. There cannot be two motions of want of confidence at the same time before the house. There is only one now, and it consists of the amendment together with the subamendment. The vote on the subamendment will not be final, but it will have to be followed by the question: "Shall the amendment as amended carry?" If it carries, "no confidence" will have been voted against the government. For these reasons I rule that the hon. member is not entitled to speak longer than forty minutes.

However, if there is unanimous consent of the house, I presume the hon. member may continue.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Speaker, in view of your last statement, although perhaps not strictly in order I should like to mention the reason why I think all hon. members ought to permit the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to continue his speech at least to a reasonable degree. My reason is this: Under a friendly arrangement, on a major debate it has been arranged that one of them shall precede the other, and that in a following debate the other should come first. As hon. members know, this arrangement gives the leader who speaks first the right to move an amendment to the main motion, thereby gaining the right to address the house without restriction.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: Under those circumstances I appeal to hon. members to permit the hon. member to proceed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where are you going to draw the line?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my ruling. The hon. member for Parry Sound must realize that when a question is put to the Chair all the Chair can do is to give an interpretation of the rule. I have endeavoured to do so, and in my judgment the hon. member cannot continue, under the rules. However, with unanimous consent the house may permit the hon. member to proceed, and I take it that it is the wish of hon. members that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar should have that privilege.

Mr. ILSLEY: Go ahead.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall draw my remarks as rapidly as possible to a close—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. COLDWELL: —leaving out some of the things I had intended to say.

Mr. HOMUTH: Go on; the Liberals want to hear you.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I am glad to know the Liberals are courteous enough to want to hear me; but I believe the hon. member who has just interrupted will agree with me when I say I have not spared the Liberal government to-night.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am always interested.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before taking my seat I wish to say something about some other matters which are related to the ones I have just mentioned, and which I believe are disturbing. I am not going into this fully to-night, because there will be other opportunities. I am, however, thinking of the tremendous expansion which has occurred in the last four years in the air transport system of Canada. I am thinking, too, of the fact that when we set up the Trans-Canada Air Lines it was generally understood that years ago we had made a mistake in not keeping the railways as a national organization. It was pointed out that at least we ought to keep the air free for the people, and unalienated in any degree. And yet during the past year we have witnessed the tremendous growth of the new Canadian Pacific air lines. We notice a statement from L. B. Unwin, president of the Canadian Pacific lines, in which he states:

During its first year of operations Canadian Pacific Airlines flew approximately 6,000,000 schedule airplane miles in 1942.

Passengers and mail carried were more than double the previous year. Air cargo reached a record total of close to 10,000,000 pounds. The company now employes over 6,000 employees in its commercial operations, air training schools and overhaul plants.

Then we are told that it played a major role in the construction of the Alaska highway. It did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It shows what a private enterprise will do.

Mr. COLDWELL: A private enterprise based on heavy expenditures made by the people of Canada. What have we done? We have provided them with all the facilities required. We have provided the long and more expensive hauls across the country, leaving the short and more profitable hauls in the hands of the private organization. Let us remember that it entered the field only since the war. And what it has built up to date has been built through war traffic, mainly through carrying government men, government equipment and government freight.

What about it in the post-war period? Well, we have to watch. The president the other day was quite frank in this statement:

In this regard the Canadian Pacific, as a long established world-wide transport system, will undoubtedly through the extension of its air operations, take its natural place in the development of world trade and travel routes.

In past months I have had some little opportunity to sit in on discussions dealing with post-war air traffic, and I want to say that as a country we are making a mistake if we do not do what other countries are doing, namely, safeguard our airways, and our own publicly owned air corporation.

In the United States they have the great Pan-American Airways Limited, a private organization. I say that that organization, in seeking to gain control of certain airways in this world, will create considerable difficulties for the great nation to the south of us, and make it more difficult, in some respects, perhaps, even to reach the kind of international agreements we want to reach.

Mr. MARTIN: It is backed by the United States government.

Mr. COLDWELL: Great Britain has kept her airways under her control, Imperial airways, British airways, government controlled organizations, and we should see to it that since we control the vital air route between great populated areas of the world in Europe and Asia we do not allow the alienation of our great air routes.

There are one or two other observations I wish to make, but I will be very brief. We are pleased that the government has adopted the pay-as-you-go plan of income tax payment. We are under no illusions, however; we know we are going to pay more this year in most of the brackets. But I believe the change will relieve a good many people of worry about the hang-over from the previous year, and with the high taxes we have I think it is important that we should have no hang-over of any description, if I may put it in that way. I am pleased also that the minister has exempted government annuities; that is something that I thought it was a pity was not done last year.

Mr. HOMUTH: He has not told us that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes, that is the intimation in the budget speech.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether hon. gentlemen are thinking about the same thing. I stated in the budget speech that payments on government annuities purchased before the date of last year's budget and being paid before that date would be allowed as offsets against the refundable tax.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right, placing such annuities on the same basis as life insurance was on the same date. I am very sorry that we are continuing the system of encouraging prospecting by mining companies by means of rebates of their war taxes. I think again we are allowing the alienation of our natural resources to private corporations when the time has come when we ought to be doing some of this prospecting and developing ourselves.

In relation to income taxes generally, I suggest to the minister that while the computation of farmers' income taxes on a two-year basis is better than on a one-year basis, speaking particularly for the farmers in the prairie provinces where we sometimes have quite long periods of drought and disaster, that period is not long enough. It should be an average of five years, or three years at the very least.

We from the prairies are disturbed about the threat that we hear that the cooperative societies may be assessed for income tax. We hear rumours to that effect. I suggest to the minister that he follow the example of other countries where cooperatives have been in existence for a long time and treat them here as they are treated there. These societies are not corporations; they are simply mutual aid societies, not out for profit making but purely to perform a service, and anything that accrues to the members in the way of patronage dividends is incidental to the real purpose of the society.

I did intend to say something about the national debt, but I shall leave that until the resolutions are under discussion. I want to thank the house for the courtesy it has extended to me to-night. I did not wish to trespass upon the time of the house beyond my forty minutes when I discovered that was all I was entitled to, and I am very grateful for having been given this courtesy.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): I know that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth party (Mr. Coldwell) who has just taken his seat will excuse me if for a moment only I deal with some of the incidents of the last twenty or twenty-five minutes. First may I say, partly in joke but only partly so, that I could see a little chuckle of delight on the part of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) at the commencement of the hon. member's address when he took issue with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) over the allegation that the province of Saskatchewan is in worse shape than the province of Alberta. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture was delighted to hear a defence of the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. COLDWELL: Anything but that.

Mr. TURGEON: I know, but that was the effect. The other thought I want to express in connection with his general statements is as to what he said about this government permitting private air companies to operate. What will be the proper solution of our air problem when this war is over is a question on which at the moment I cannot state an opinion. It may be the duty of Canadians to see that Trans-Canada Air Lines is enlarged so as to include all air transport. Personally I am doubtful of it. But what I wish to point out is that if what the hon. member said to-night had been the considered policy of this government during the last ten years, all that part of British Columbia known as the Cariboo country, which extends almost from within touch of Vancouver city clear to the Yukon and across the mountains to the Northwest Territories would have been without its one saving feature in transportation; it would have been without airways. The first air company operating in that whole part of British Columbia was the originator of the Yukon Southern. It was greatly extended until that part of British Columbia north of the main line of the Canadian National Railways from Edmonton to Prince Rupert had an air service where before it had no transportation whatever except seasonally down the waterways. That air service was then extended until Vancouver and the Peace River block, White Horse in the Yukon Territory and Edmonton were all connected by air service. And it was only after those air services were in operation and that part of British Columbia enabled to come in small measure into its own that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company came in and bought out the existing companies. If it is the considered policy of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to see that no private companies be permitted to run in such areas as that, I must take exception to it.

Before speaking on the budget and in connection with money matters, with which parliament naturally has so much to do, I wish to say a word concerning my young and very good friend the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and to congratulate him and the Progressive Conservative party upon its choice of him as its leader in this house. The hon. member has been in my constituency; he has been in that part of the Cariboo which started the population trend in British Columbia, that part where the Cariboo gold rush took place. He has not been in the other part of my constituency which is becoming famous on account of the very air services of which I was speaking a few moments ago. Speaking here to-night, I want to tell all the supporters of the Progressive Conservative party in my constituency that they can be satisfied that they have conducting their party affairs in this house an honest, good Canadian.

But may I express just a word or two of wonderment. Since he has taken over the leadership of his party in this house I have noticed that, quite naturally, he has been very proud of the word "Progressive" which has been attached to the word "Conservative" in the re-naming of the party. I am inclined to think that the Winnipeg conference was an excellent thing for the Conservative party, and I believe it will turn out to be a good thing for Canada, because it has helped to focus attention upon the need for reform. It has directed attention to those groups of men and women who in days gone by, when reform was not as popular as it is to-day, were trying to bring about a condition under which reform could take root and grow. Since the Winnipeg convention, every time the government has made any suggestion of a movement looking to reform, either the leader of the Progressive Conservative party or someone behind him has stated that the inspiration came from the Winnipeg convention. He has not yet claimed that the Atlantic charter was inspired by that convention; and while at that convention many glowing references were made to our relations with the United States, neither has he claimed that the Ogdensburg agreement or the Hyde Park agreement, which followed from it, were inspired by the Winnipeg convention. However, as I have said, it is a good thing that the Winnipeg convention took place. The Progressive Conservative party have confessed and have repented, though I am afraid they will have to remain in sackcloth and ashes for quite a while yet. I feel certain that if the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) were sitting in the place of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), he would say to my friends opposite, as St. Matthew said, "Are you simply fleeing from the wrath to come?"

I should now like to put on record a letter that I received some years ago. There is no doubt at all that throughout Canada there is suspicion of men in public life. That has not come about only during the last few years. I can remember when I was first elected to a seat in the legislative assembly of Alberta, away back in 1913. I had not been a member of that legislature very long until I could feel that I was not held in quite such high regard as I had been before I permitted myself to become a candidate on behalf of a political party, and had the good or bad luck to be elected. We in this house have been talking a good deal about reconstruction, and a great deal has been said about what members of parliament and what parliament itself should do. Hon. members must not permit themselves to forget the suspicion with which I am dealing, which is felt by many people in Canada with regard to men who are in public life. To-day the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party read a resolution which was proposed by the present Prime Minister at the Liberal convention which took place in 1919. I should like to read a letter in order to show how the Prime Minister has been viewing these matters of reform ever since 1919. This letter comes from the office of the leader of the opposition in Ottawa and is dated April 2, 1931:

J. G. Turgeon, Esquire,
744 Hastings Street West,
Vancouver, B.C.

My dear Turgeon:

I thank you for sending me a copy of your recent interesting address before the Progressive Liberal Association.

With your general point of view I am, as you would know, in complete accord. I question, however, the wisdom of including in the Liberal programme the policy of state life insurance until, at least, we have succeeded in getting a national system of social insurance, which will include unemployment, accident, invalidity, old age, etcetera. The worst feature of the social insurance problem to-day is that each province is attempting to cope with it more or less in its own fashion. What is needed is a national scheme which will provide like standards in all the provinces. I am inclined to think that there should be a readjustment of the financial relations between the dominion and the provinces, which would involve, on the one hand, either a lessening or eliminating of federal subsidies, and on the other, the assumption by the federal government of social insurance obligations in the directions indicated. It is a large reform and I recognize it is full of difficulties, arising out of the desire of the provinces to continue their control in many of these matters. Sooner or later, however, the change will be made and I, for one, would be happy if it should come in our lifetime. Personally, I feel that the time to take on a programme of state life insurance, if it is to be taken on, would be after headway had been made in the other direction.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

That letter was written to me after I had sent the Prime Minister a newspaper report of a speech I had made before a Liberal association—a Progressive Liberal association—in Vancouver, in which I urged that the Liberal party should give consideration to the insurance problems affecting the people of Canada, with a view to seeing, first, whether the Liberal party should recommend a programme of state life insurance or, second, whether the Liberal party should recommend that there be a cooperative effort between the great insurance companies and the governments of Canada, so that the experience and knowledge of the insurance companies should not be lost but that at the same time we should not lose sight of the human values and the human welfare which could be put into insurance in greater measure by governmental motivation and under governmental direction.

I listened to some of the speeches made during the last debate, and I have read newspaper accounts of speeches made in this house and outside about the inspiration that came to the Prime Minister from Winnipeg. I thought immediately of that particular letter, and I know that every member in this house perhaps can think of conversations he has had relating to matters of reform which would on their own prove that one of the great motivating desires of the Prime Minister throughout the years has been gradually to bring about a condition where human welfare and human needs will be the foundation of a higher and better standard of life.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) covered a great deal of ground when speaking last night and to-day. Among other things he referred to the way in which the House of Commons sitting either as a house or in committees, deals with public affairs in connection with governmental expenditures. He threw out a warning to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and through him to the government. He warned that the things that are being done are not being properly publicized, and he referred particularly to labour. He said that labour was told about the lack of fuel and about the hardships which a condition of war imposed upon the people of Canada, but he said that labour was not told properly of the great things that were being done, such as keeping down inflation.

As I listened to the hon. member, I thought of the attempt which is being made to show the people of Canada a certain side of affairs which might possibly have some foundation. Reference was made yesterday to graft in connection with the carrying out of some contract. If the hon. member for Danforth is right and we are making a mistake and not properly building up the morale of the people of Canada by telling them of the good things being done by this government, are not those—I speak now without the slightest thought of criticism, I am thinking only of war morale—who are referring to the hiding of certain things which they claim are taking place, making an effort, without knowing it, to destroy public morale?

I remember, and I think every other hon. member will remember—again I am speaking without any critical attitude—the days before the war when the time of this House of Commons and the people of Canada was taken up for a year or a year and a half by an investigation into the Bren gun contract. Again remember that I am not talking critically because that event is past. But if Hitler himself, in the preparations for war against the world which he then was making, had asked any body of Canadians to help him, what more could have been done for him than to stop the government of Canada for a year and a half immediately prior to the war from making the efforts then made under the direction of the minister from British Columbia to prepare for war days.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Examining a contract does not stop you from making machine guns.

Mr. TURGEON: To examine the contract in the manner in which my hon. friend and some others were speaking yesterday, would give the same result as the examining of the Bren gun contract.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It did.

Mr. TURGEON: It did break up the morale of the people and stopped us from taking our proper place in the first year of the war.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It got you a much better contract.

Mr. REID: You wanted it rescinded; you did everything possible to stop it.

Mr. McLARTY: They wanted it cancelled.

Mr. TURGEON: I am speaking without any thought of criticism and in all seriousness. We are facing what will be the most tragic days we have ever had. It will not be long before our boys overseas will be engaged in a slaughter, perhaps unequalled since the war began. I am asking members of this house to be careful of the way in which public opinion is aroused in these days of preparation for what is coming to us from overseas.

Speaking of the way in which the House of Commons conducts its business, I intend to take the liberty of putting on the record something which is rather old. This is taken from the official records of the legislative assembly of Alberta. It is a motion presented by me on March 2, 1920, just 23 years ago, and it reads:

Moved by Mr. Turgeon, seconded by Mr. Davidson:

Whereas under the generally accepted interpretation of the working of the British parliamentary system it is assumed that the defeat of a bill or measure presented to the legislative assembly by a minister of the crown officially on behalf of the government is in itself a defeat of the government; and

Whereas the members of this legislative assembly feel that the time has come when members ought to be free to vote either for or against any bill or measure before the house without thereby expressing lack of confidence in the government;

Therefore be it resolved that this house express its desire that the premier ought not to consider the defeat of any government measure a sufficient reason for tendering the resignation of his government, unless such defeat be followed by a vote of non-confidence in the government.

In 1923, about three years after, an hon. member from Alberta who then sat in this house introduced a similar motion, but it was not carried either. I proposed that motion not because I was young and did not know what it was all about, but because conditions were such that it seemed to me as a member of the assembly that a resolution of that kind was essential if we were to have parliamentary government. I have been in Ottawa for seven years since 1935, and I take the liberty of saying that I now firmly believe that the motion which I have just read and which I presented many years ago is not needed in this House of Commons in Ottawa.

Why is it not needed? I should like to answer those who are critical of the manner in which the business of parliament is carried on. I have heard it said here, and I have read it in the newspapers that members on the government side of the house were merely rubber stamps. I think that was said yesterday. We have been told also that when committees are set up, the government members on those committees are instructed as to what attitude they must take and they follow those instructions. I am not a rubber stamp. I have been a faithful member of this government and of the Liberal party, but I am not a rubber stamp.

I have been on some important committees of this house. I was on the defence of Canada regulations committee under the chairmanship of the Minister of Finance, and I was on the pensions committee of last session. This session I am on the reconstruction committee. On no occasion has any minister of the crown ever made the slightest suggestion to me as to what should be my attitude toward any question coming up before any of these committees. During last session I happened to be chairman of one of the committees. At no time has any suggestion ever been made to me about the attitude I should adopt on that committee in connection with any question whatsoever.

I attend faithfully the caucuses of the Liberal party. A great deal has been said about government caucuses and about the whip hand held over members on the government side of the house. I can speak of the whips because I have been the deputy chief government whip, and the whips, in Canada at least, are simply the organizers of the business of parliament. They work hard and well without any remuneration, and I should like to take this opportunity of paying tribute to all those men who during this parliament and the last have been whips for the different parties. I cannot speak of caucuses of the Progressive Conservative party, or of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, or of the Social Credit party, or of any of the newly-formed independent parties in the house, but I can speak for the Liberal party and say that every member of the Liberal party emerges from a Liberal caucus just as free as when he entered.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): And just as pure.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

Mr. TURGEON: Somebody says, "and just as pure." I say that he leaves the caucus just as free as when he entered it. There is nothing binding on any member on this side of the house through his attending the caucuses of the party. For these reasons I say that this motion which I have made, in spite of the fact that I was a supporter of the government in power as I still am, was not in the least degree needed in this House of Commons.

Just one further word with respect to the speech of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, and I mention it in closing because I want to throw out in that connection a suggestion or two about my own constituency. The hon. member spoke of prospectors and denounced the arrangement made by the Minister of Finance for prospectors to go out into the country where minerals abound and prospect for them. I must say that if the hon. member's advice were taken, semi-ruination would come to certain parts of the constituency of Cariboo and to other constituencies in British Columbia.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He did not speak of prospecting by individuals, but by mining companies, giving them concessions.

Mr. TURGEON: He used the term "prospectors" and said that all that work should be done by the government. If my hon. friend will look at Hansard to-morrow he will see that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) used the term "prospectors".

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He was speaking of prospecting by mining companies, not by individual prospectors.

Mr. TURGEON: That is prospecting. What I was about to say when my hon. friend interrupted, which interruption I do not resent in the least, is that some years ago as a result of the discovery of fraudulent practices by some of the brokerage companies the provinces became panic-stricken and passed certain legislation which almost killed prospecting, and to-day British Columbia is full of old prospectors who, because they could obtain nothing for their discoveries, found it useless to go on their prospecting trips. Therefore, while my hon. friends opposite may be sad, I was happy when the Minister of Finance arranged for a reduction of taxation to permit prospecting again to take place.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I express the hope that the Minister of Finance will always keep one thing positively in his mind when dealing with the financial administration of this country. I feel for the farmers; I feel for labour; I feel for industry; I feel for the aged people; I feel for the workers in industry. But the one thing which this government must never forget is that no matter where the money is to come from, when our men come back from overseas, from the air force, the army, the navy and the merchant marine, when this war is over, there must be no question of giving them relief, but instead they must be assured of a proper standard of living based upon employment, and for those who are disabled a proper standard of living based upon a disability pension. In this connection I recommend to the government, to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and the ministers of the defence departments, that they give further consideration to the proposal to restore the insurance principle in pensions. With that thought, Mr. Speaker, and with one word more of praise and appreciation of the efforts of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I conclude.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) caused quite a commotion among many people of this country and it will cause many more to be startled. Is it fair to bear down in such a manner as this budget does upon the taxpayer who is in receipt of a small income? What are the intentions of the government? On the one hand it passes measures of social security, and then on the other hand it counteracts the effects of those measures by levying taxes so heavy that they threaten both the family and society. It is certainly not in the best interests of the country to spend sums so enormous that the whole economy of the nation is threatened and in danger of crumbling under the weight of taxation. If the Canadian people are compelled to accept the sacrifices called for in this budget, certainly they will not be capable of bearing them all. We are already bending down under the weight of the present excessive taxation, and now the government imposes still more and more taxation. Our man-power, our economic and financial position will not be able to absorb these billions of new taxation. The government is leading the country to bankruptcy without a thought for agriculture and the working classes who are the main source of the substance and man-power required for the production of food and munitions.

What is the government doing to remedy the lack of man-power in the agricultural domain which is threatening our production of food? On March 1, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) denounced in this house the capitalists who are taking advantage of the present state of war in order to exploit small owners. Their greed is becoming even greater. During many years the farmers and the consumers have been the victims of the trusts of this country. The proof is found in the high prices paid for fertilizers and feedstuffs which are necessary to agricultural production. The rationing of butter and sugar deprives the consumer of the first necessities of life, while there are millions of pounds of butter stored away in warehouses. The farmer will not be able fully to develop his sugar bush and thus provide against the rationing of tea and sugar. There is in Canada an ever-increasing scarcity of beef, veal and pork. Why this ridiculous situation in a country overflowing with wheat and the grain by-products which form the basis of dairy feedstuffs? The government should at least prevent the large milling combinations and all greedy intermediaries from exploiting farmers and consumers. Who will dare contradict me on this point, when everyone knows that wheat sells for the ridiculous price of eighty cents or ninety cents a bushel, while the consumer must pay almost four dollars for 100 pounds of wheat flour? Who will claim that I am distorting facts, when feedstuffs, by-products of wheat flour, sell as high as $2.75 and $2.90 per 100 pounds? If you add to all this the military call-up of farmers and war workers, you will have the real causes of the agricultural, industrial and economic turmoil which is afflicting this country. What measure is this budget proposing to remedy this deplorable state of affairs? It is imposing new taxes which affect the small owners and the working classes. This is where our participation in this war is leading us—unrestricted participation, and consequently a participation above our strength.

On September 9, 1939, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, I condemned this participation. This is where it is leading us, this mobilization act which was adopted on June 19, 1940, after the amendment which I moved, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, was defeated by 202 against 2. That was a success. Is the government satisfied with its works? Will those who shared and are still sharing the most formidable responsibilities continue to vote with serene coolness the billions which are fatally leading us to the abyss?

Mr. Speaker, this deplorable picture of the actual situation will remain unchanged as long as our best energies remain paralyzed by a destructive policy. The lack of balance in our farm labour and our industrial labour is about to destroy the economic life of the country. From 1929 to 1939 we witnessed a great exodus of our rural population toward the cities. We saw hundreds of thousands of families on relief; thousands of labourers were out of work, and thousands of farmers were compelled to sell their farms because they could no longer make a living out of them. Confusion had set in everywhere. That was the post-war period, when the collapse was preceded by an artificial prosperity. What will the next post-war period bring us? Confusion, unemployment and anarchy, most likely.

How can we prevent these calamities? By taxing to the extreme limit those who take advantage of the war; by controlling and readjusting the salaries received by war workers; by exempting completely farmers from military training; and by granting the farmer and the labourer adequate representation in the cabinet. Briefly, by adopting social measures in accordance with the needs of the present and the requirements of to-morrow.

We shall not cure the great evils of this period with a multiplication of commissions of all kinds and with a bureaucracy which is not responsible to the people. We shall not improve this state of affairs by ignoring parliament. If we destroy responsible government we shall also destroy democracy. The united nations are fighting for democracy. Canada is fighting for its survival, and everything in this country seems to be conspiring to destroy it. Who could number the contradictions in the various attitudes taken by our statesmen? How many solemn pledges did they not violate? How many sacred commitments were not trampled upon? The country, which was already distrustful, is now wondering where the government is leading us.

The Minister of Finance attached great importance to the so-called extension granted to farmers in the paying of their income tax. We all know that the average farmer can barely make both ends meet, and how many still feel deeply the effects of the crisis, which lasted too long. When they were about to recover, the government deprived them of their best farmhands by calling their sons for military training. It also put a ceiling price on food. This ceiling price resulted in a discrepancy between ceiling prices of farm products and the purchasing price of foodstuffs, which I mentioned a while ago, the prices which must be paid for his clothing, that of his family, and those necessary objects he could not produce himself.

Furthermore, it is now impossible for them, and for quite a while they will not be able to renew their farm implements, because the production of farm implements has been discontinued. In many districts they have been deprived of the privilege of developing their bushlands, because last fall the wartime prices and trade board set the price of cordwood so low that it was not worth while cutting any more. But the government got panicky and all of a sudden changed its mind. On March 4 it announced a subsidy of a dollar a cord on all cordwood. This was a useless measure, because it was taken too late. Last fall it practically killed all production of fuel wood, and now the government cannot redress the harm done to the trade and to industry, to the army and to the civilian population. This error cannot be rectified. How can the government now recover this cordwood which is definitely lost? Bushmen and farmers are now handicapped by snow, and in a few days there will be tremendous floods.

There is a time for everything, and I say to the Minister of Finance it is impossible to replace man-power and production by subsidies and orders in council. The government does not take into consideration the high cost of farm help. These powerful commissions which sometimes seem to ignore everything about agriculture have set ceiling prices on farm products and on cordwood, without giving due consideration to farm hands. As a consequence, in a few months we shall be facing a serious shortage of food and fuel. The government may boast of its love of the farmers and labourers, but those farmers and labourers will never swallow this heaviest and most insinuating budget the country has ever known.

You cannot tell the farmer, "I am granting you an extension to enable you to pay your income tax", because he will answer back "Give me back my best helpers, my sons whom you called up for military training; give me back my best farmhands, my most industrious and most experienced labour; give me the tools to produce, the tools for victory for which Mr. Churchill asked. My war work is to supply food to the army, to the industrial war workers and to the civilian population. You want me to pay income tax? Then take my farm; take this farm, which is only half cultivated because you did not allow me to do my share."

These are the complaints voiced by the agricultural classes in Canada. I do not invent them, and I do not betray them. The government has already heard those complaints, as voiced by the representatives of the people. Many requests have been sent in by agricultural associations; protests have come in from every district. Therefore the government cannot claim that it is not aware of these representations, all of which deal with matters of national importance.

(Translation): Before concluding my remarks, I cannot ignore the serious wrongs which constantly result from the thoughtless application of the mobilization act. I have so many times requested the government to transfer back to their respective fields of activity the farmers' sons and the war plants' workers now in training whose services are essential to the victory of our armed forces, that it would perhaps be idle to do it again Besides, mobilization means conscription. Is that not what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated himself during the debate on the repeal of section 3 of the mobilization act? That happened in July, 1942. There was a hectic atmosphere in this house, so much so that the Prime Minister reminded parliament that conscription had been in our statutes since June 21, 1940.

In conclusion, I shall quote an excerpt from "Relations" which strikingly resumés all the speeches delivered in parliament by those of my hon. fellow-members who are imbued with a truly Canadian spirit:

We know that Ulster, South Africa, India, and Australia, have not enacted conscription and as the Australians regret that they did not stay at home in order to defend their country, we hope that Canada will organize her own protection of the Maritime provinces and British Columbia, whose men are taken away. While appreciating devotion to the empire, we would rather protect our own interests. Gratitude for our hard-won survival, for theoretic or genuine rights does not imply for us the obligation to die for people who have neither killed nor deported us. In the words of René Johannet "an individual can or must, as the case may be, remain aloof. A group (a people) never has such a permission, which is the permission to commit suicide."

We do now disavow Sir John Macdonald's national policy; we have no desire to police the continents, or to redress world wrongs; we do not like to be handled like bundles by self-satisfied colonials—from both parties—who know nothing of the Westminster Statute and who deal with us not in the tactful British manner, but with the harshness of "quality niggers" watching their brothers; we have no confidence in exclusive brain trusts whose stock is watered; we have read the militaristic epic of Sir Basil Zaharof, the Levantine who made millions out of the life blood of nations, and we fear that he may have emulators; we are the uncomplaining witnesses of the waste of military supplies—"Waste, the enemy at home", you say—and of the profits which are thereby made by Canadians too recently arrived in this country; we wish that the loan may be a success and that it may be better used; we bear insolence better than hypocrisy.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): There are several matters with which I should like to deal in this debate, and it being impossible for me to complete the whole of my speech by eleven o'clock I wish to deal now with one particular phase which I believe is of the utmost importance to the farmers of the prairie provinces and to the citizens generally of that part of the country. It has to do with the production of flax for linseed oil. Flax is produced in this country for two purposes, one for the production of fibre and the other for the production of linseed oil. Flax for fibre is produced mainly in Ontario and Quebec; that for linseed oil is practically all grown in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. According to the information I have, which information I understand was produced to the agricultural conference held in Ottawa on December 9 last, in 1942 the seedings to flax in 1942 were:

	Acres
Manitoba	227,000
Alberta	183,000
Saskatchewan	1,056,000

The total Canadian flax acreage for last year was 1,492,000 acres.

As a result of the conquest by the Japanese of the sources of eastern vegetable oil supplies there was a great shortage of vegetable oils, and this continent found itself in a position where it had to accelerate its production of vegetable oils. It did so by various means. It endeavoured to increase the production of linseed oil as well as to produce a considerable quantity of oil from soya beans, sunflowers, and in the United States I understand that, in addition, they used peanuts. As a result of the requirement for greatly increased production, considerable stress was placed in the press and over the radio on this necessity. Therefore the farmers of the prairie provinces began to plan early last year for a tremendous increase in flax acreage. The return obtained from flax last year was very good; it was purposely good in order to increase the production as largely as possible. It seems to me and it seemed to the farmers on the prairies that the sensible and practical thing to do was to turn to production of flaxseed for oil purposes, something largely required for our war effort, and away from the production of wheat of which we have an overabundance and which constitutes perhaps the greatest agricultural problem in this country to-day.

I emphasize this point, that the farmers of western Canada during last summer and fall were planning for a large increase in flax acreage this year. They bought their seed, in many instances at fairly high prices, ranging I think from $3 to $5, and by reason of the necessity for increased oil production from flax it was decided at an agricultural conference held in Ottawa on December 9, and I believe the following day or two, that the flax acreage for oil production should be increased in Canada by one million acres. Announcements were made to the press, and the farmers went on making plans for such production.

Then in the middle of January the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) rather suddenly made the statement that as a result of a conference held in Washington at which he was present it had been decided that no additional flax acreage should be put in during 1943. He stated that whereas the acreage in Canada in 1942 amounted to 1,492,000 acres and despite the fact that they had decided at this agricultural conference in December to increase the acreage to 2,500,000, at this conference held in Washington they found it was not feasible to carry out the increase that had been proposed, and he asked the farmers to go back to the original plan and produce from the same acreage as in 1942.

What I should like to know is why the Minister of Agriculture did not find out before January that it was not feasible to produce the additional acreage of flax which had been decided upon in Ottawa on December 9. After all, the United States had the whole key to the situation, and it seems to me they should have been consulted and that the Minister of Agriculture should have been fully aware of the situation which existed on December 9 when that conference was held in Ottawa. It is inconceivable to me that the authorities who had knowledge of the situation in Washington were not just as well aware at that time as they were a month later. The first announcement by the Minister of Agriculture that the plan arrived at on December 9 for the increased acreage would not be carried through was made at a meeting in the city of Saskatoon on January 14. I believe a similar announcement was made a day or two previously in Winnipeg, though I have not the press reference in that connection. Then to further confuse the situation, on January 17 there was a press release from the publicity and extension service of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, which was referred to in an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune under date of February 6, as follows:

> The United States department of agriculture, according to the latest survey, estimates that that country faces a shortage of close to a billion pounds of fats and oils for food and industrial purposes in 1943. To help overcome this shortage the government of Canada is asking for increased production of oil-producing plants such as flax, soybeans, sunflowers, etc. The objective for flaxseed is an acreage increase of 68 per cent.

This was just three days after the minister had made the statement that there was to be no increase in acreage for 1943. Then on January 29 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), speaking in this house on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, in effect stated that there was no assurance that flaxseed from any additional acreage could be disposed of in 1943. Then to confuse the situation even more, on March 1 there appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix a dispatch from Ottawa under the heading "Flaxseed campaign expected" as follows:

> Definite announcement is expected in a few days that Canada will launch a flaxseed campaign this year to increase sown acreage by 1,000,000 acres. In 1942 flax acreage was 1,500,000 acres, and the 1943 objective is expected to be not less than 2,500,000 acres.
> The flaxseed situation is rapidly clarifying, it is learned, and the original production objective of the Department of Agriculture is expected to be retained. In December the department called for an increase of 68 per cent in flax acreage, but in January plans were revised though the final 1943 objective was left open.
> Last Tuesday Doctor Phyllis Turner, Canadian administrator of oils and fats, stated in a Toronto speech that Canada's minimum requirements of flaxseed would be 20,000,000 bushels. Confirming this to-day, she said this meant 2,500,000 acres would be required. Disposal of 20,000,000 bushels of Canadian flax grown in 1943 could be made, said Mrs. Turner, to fill Canadian, American and British requirements.

Then on March 3 in the same newspaper there appeared a press dispatch dealing with a meeting of the national barley and linseed flax committee at Winnipeg, in which reference is made to a statement by Mr. L. H. Lehberg, as follows:

> L. H. Lehberg, technical adviser to the federal oils and fats administration, told the committee's annual meeting that supplies of vegetable oils received from the United States had been below expectations and that U.S. crushers were in the market for Canadian flax in addition to overseas demand.
> In addition to domestic supplies, there were indications that upwards of 10,000,000 bushels of flax will be wanted by the United States and a like amount wanted for export overseas it was stated.

Yesterday I managed to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would make a statement in this connection, since I believed it imperative that the whole matter should be cleared up as soon as possible in order that the farmers of the prairie provinces might know their position, but the only response I could obtain was in effect that a statement would be made before seeding time. I do not believe the farmers should be treated in what I might describe as this rather cavalier fashion. If administrators and officials of various departments, who are supposed to have knowledge of this matter, are making statements to the press that this increase in acreage is to be brought about, surely the farmers should be given the definite information by the minister himself as soon as possible. I think Mr. George W. Robertson, secretary of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, put the matter very clearly in a radio address on January 15, during which he referred to the necessity for early knowledge on the part of the farmer in order that he might make his plans for the coming year. Mr. Robertson said:

> There is amongst western farmers a feeling of confusion as to just where they fit into the general picture. This is illustrated by the flax situation. With limited man-power, limited ability to secure the implements of production, if we are to obtain maximum farm output there must be a very great deal of careful preparation carried on by the producers themselves. Plans cannot be adjusted at a moment's notice and farmers have a right to know what this country expects of them.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know, and I am sure the farmers would like to know, just what took place at that Washington conference early in January and why it was decided at that time not to increase production. Was it on account of lack of crushers? It may have been. How has the picture changed between January 1 and the present time?

On motion of Mr. Bence the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 10, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PEAT

Mr. MacKENZIE (Neepawa):

1. (a) How many investigations into peat possibilities have been carried on by the dominion government, (b) in what years, (c) at what cost, (d) briefly, with what results?
2. (a) How many peat bogs in Canada have been investigated, (b) in what provinces were these investigations made?
3. How many tons of peat are estimated to exist in Canada?
4. What known deposits close to large centres in Canada have been surveyed?
5. Was the removal of water from Canadian peat successfully accomplished and maintained?
6. Which methods of drying were successful in Canada?
7. What has been the European experience in artificial drying and what conclusions did Hausding arrive at?
8. (a) What companies have been formed in Canada for peat production, (b) what was their capitalization, (c) which were successful?
9. What are the conclusions of the Department of Mines as to the economic possibilities based on experiments performed?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. (a) and (b) The status of the peat industry was investigated in Europe in 1908, and in Canada in 1909, and in 1914.

Nine peat processes have been investigated.

Two investigations on the manufacture of peat fuel were made, one at Alfred, Ontario, 1910-11, and a second at Alfred from 1918-22. The second investigation was carried on jointly by the dominion department of mines and the Ontario government under the direction of a joint peat committee.

The plant at Alfred was sold to a private company which undertook to remodel it in accordance with the recommendations of the joint peat committee and to operate it for the production of peat fuel. The company being unsuccessful in its endeavour the dominion department of mines leased the plant, moved it to a new location on the same bog, reconstructed it in accordance with the recommendations of the committee and operated it during the season of 1928. This was the last experimental investigation.

A committee was appointed by the minister of mines in 1935 to proceed to Europe for the purpose of investigating the engineering and business aspects of the Peco process for the manufacture of peat fuel.

Surveys have been and are being carried out from 1908 to the present time.

(c) From 1908 to 1942 inclusive, the net expenditure by the department of mines was approximately $327,000: this does not include the cost of the regular departmental field investigation of peat bogs, the cost of which has not been segregated.

(d) The joint peat committee concluded from its experimental work that peat fuel could be manufactured, under conditions existing then, at a total cost of approximately $3.50 a ton f.o.b. cars at the bog in a 20-hour day operation.

The operations by the joint peat committee between 1918 and 1922 and by the department of mines in 1928 demonstrated that peat fuel suitable for use in the beginning and end of the winter season could be successfully accomplished and that the briquettes would stand up successfully in exposed storage piles.

The committee on the Peco process referred to above was of opinion that the progress of the operations at the plant in Ireland should be carefully observed for the next two years and that no attempt to apply the process in Canada be made until it had been definitely proven that peat fuel briquettes had been produced by this process on a commercial basis. Reports received from Ireland in subsequent years and up to date were to the effect that this process has not proved commercially successful.

2. (a) and (b) The number of peat bogs examined as a source of fuel was approximately 100. These are located by provinces as follows:

Province	Peat fuel bogs
Ontario	45
Quebec	26
New Brunswick	8
Nova Scotia	9
Prince Edward Island	2
Total	96

3. It was estimated many years ago that in Canada there was an area of 37,000 square miles overlaid by peat, but it is the opinion of departmental officers that only a small portion of this would be suitable for the manufacture of peat fuel.

The estimated available tonnage of peat fuel of 25 per cent moisture content contained in the bogs so far surveyed is estimated as approximately 200,000,000 short tons.

It is impossible to estimate the tonnage of peat available in all the peat areas in Canada without making at least preliminary surveys.

Large centre	Name of bog
Toronto	Holland river
	Marsh Hill
	Amaranth
	Luther
Montreal	Large tea field
	Small tea field
	St. Isidore
	Holton
	L'Assomption
	St. Hyacinthe
	Lanoraie
Ottawa	Mer Bleue
	Richmond
	Perth
	Alfred
	Newington
	Brockville.

5. By the air-dried machine process it was demonstrated that the production of peat fuel with a moisture content of from 25 to 35 per cent could be maintained continuously during the favourable operating season.

6. The only method for drying peat fuel which has proved successful in Canada is air-drying whether the peat is manually or mechanically excavated.

7. Generally speaking the results of all efforts to replace the air-drying method have not been demonstrated to be successful commercially. This statement is based on investigation by officers of the department and information secured from investigating officers of foreign governments. Authoritative information from continental Europe has not been available since 1939.

Hausding arrived at the same conclusion as is stated above.

8. (a) and (b). See page 16 of mines branch report No. 614 for a partial list of companies incorporated up to 1923. Several small peat operations have been carried on subsequently but generally without incorporation. In each case the quantity of peat fuel manufactured has been comparatively small.

The capitalization of the companies listed in report No. 614 is shown therein and amounted to several millions of dollars. A record is not readily available of the capitalization of the companies incorporated since.

(c) Of all the incorporated companies none were commercially successful.

9. The only processes for the manufacture of peat fuel which offer any hope of successful economic development in Canada are those employing air-drying for the removal of the water content. As the Canadian public is not educated to the use of peat and in normal times high class fuels at reasonable prices are readily available, the department is of the opinion that large scale development of peat bogs in Canada would not prove economically successful but small scale development for local use might stand some chance of success.

INCOME TAX—ARREARS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. How many persons, firms and corporations have filed their forms but have not yet paid their income tax for the years 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941?

2. What is the total amount due and unpaid on income tax?

3. Of this amount, how much is entirely uncollectible?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. (a) 480,698 returns were filed in 1938; 504,417 returns were filed in 1939; 1,023,536 returns were filed in 1940; 1,234,428 returns were filed in 1941. (b) Information not available.

2. Unknown as amount fluctuates from day to day.

3. Up to date there has been transferred to head office as uncollectible $1,804,255.45 for all years from inception of act, out of a total collected of $4,159,089,585.00 up to February 28, 1943.

INTERNMENTS—CAMILLIEN HOUDE

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Does the National Registration Act of 1940 embody specific penalties for violations, and if so, what are they?

2. Is Mr. Camillien Houde detained in an internment camp under the said act?

3. If not, then under what other statute?

4. If Mr. Houde is detained under an act other than national registration, what is the penalty imposed by such law?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. There is no national registration act of 1940. If this question refers to the national registration regulations 1940, these regulations were made under The National Resources Mobilization Act 1940 and the War Measures Act, and they provide specific penalties for offences described in regulations 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27 and 29, the maximum penalties being, under certain of these regulations, a fine of $500 and imprisonment for three months, and under others of these,

a fine of $200 and imprisonment for three months, and, moreover, to a further penalty not exceeding $10 for each day after the day upon which a person should have registered, during which he shall continue to be unregistered.

2. No.

3. Regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations made under the War Measures Act.

4. Detention under regulation 21 is a preventative action and not punitive. When prosecutions are instituted for past offences, the maximum penalty for contravention of the defence of Canada regulations is, on summary conviction, a fine of $500 and twelve months imprisonment and upon indictment, a fine of $5,000 and five years imprisonment.

INTEREST PAYMENTS TO CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. SLAGHT:

At what rates and in what amounts will the government have paid the chartered banks in interest during the current fiscal year?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Bank Act does not require that the chartered banks submit details of their holdings of various dominion of Canada bonds, treasury bills, etc. The monthly return of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks does not disclose the holdings of dominion of Canada short or long term obligations separately from their holdings of provincial short or long term obligations. As a large part of the funded debt and treasury bills of the dominion of Canada is in bearer form, it is not possible to state what amount is held by the chartered banks of Canada. Consequently it is impossible to state what amount will be paid in interest to the banks during the current fiscal year.

On their holdings of dominion treasury bills, the banks would receive slightly over ½ of 1%; on their holdings of deposit certificates ¾ of 1%; on their holdings of short and medium term dominion bonds, from 1½ to 2%; and on such long term dominion bonds, as they hold, probably about 3%.

JAPANESE FISHING VESSELS DISPOSAL COMMITTEE

Mr. NEILL:

1. What are the names of the members of the Japanese fishing vessels disposal committee?

2. For what purpose were they paid $19,000?

3. How did the government become responsible for payment of $80,000 for damage claims re Japanese vessels?

4. Of what did the damage principally consist and how did it arise?

5. Give the details of amounts over $25 making up the item of $4,000 paid to "Fisheries" under the head of sundries?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. This committee terminated its duties December 31, 1942. Its members were: Honourable Sidney A. Smith, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, Chairman; Commander B. L. Johnson, D.S.O., R.C.N.R.; Mr. Kishizo Kimura.

2. Members of the committee were not paid $19,000. They served without remuneration. The sum of $19,000 was allotted under the War Appropriation Acts, 1942-43, to meet, in part, administrative expenses to enable the committee to carry out its terms of reference. Revenue derived by the committee largely offset these administrative costs.

3. Pursuant to report and recommendation of the Japanese fishing vessels disposal committee that there was a responsibility to the owners to make good certain damages and losses that occurred to vessels and equipment during process of immobilizing and while under impoundment.

4. Damage and loss in respect of hulls and equipment suffered incidental to large scale impounding action under emergent conditions.

5. Sundries item under heading "Fisheries", War Appropriation Acts, 1942-43, detailed as follows:—Canned lobster control scheme, $3,000; Wartime fisheries advisory committee, $1,000.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER

Mr. BENCE:

1. Are there any synthetic rubber plants in Canada?

2. If so, where are such plants located?

3. From what raw materials is such rubber being manufactured?

4. Are any synthetic rubber plants to be erected in Canada?

5. If so, where are they to be located?

6. What raw materials will be used in the manufacture of rubber in such plants?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No.

2. Answered by 1.

3. Answered by 1.

4. Yes.

5. Sarnia township.

6. Butadiene—made from petroleum; styrene —made from coal and petroleum.

HAMILTON, ONT., NAVAL BARRACKS

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

1. Have arrangements been made for the construction of a naval barracks at Hamilton, Ontario?

2. If so, what is the estimated cost thereof?

3. When will construction be commenced?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. Yes.

2. Land, $20,000; building, $211,000. Total, $231,000.

3. Working drawings and specifications have been completed and passed to Department of Munitions and Supply for calling of tenders on 19th February, 1943. It is expected that tenders will be received not later than 17th March, and that a contractor will be appointed as soon as possible after that date.

J. GORDON FOGO

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Is Mr. J. Gordon Fogo, barrister of Halifax, in the employ of the dominion government?

2. If so, in what department?

3. At what date did he enter the service and in what capacity?

4. What salary does he receive?

5. What amount of allowance and expense has he been paid to December 31, 1942?

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes.

2. Department of Munitions and Supply.

3. (a) October 31, 1942.

(b) Associate Co-ordinator of Controls.

4. None.

5. $1,225 plus $55.35 travelling expenses.

PULPWOOD PRODUCTION AND NEWSPRINT PRICES

Mr. O'BRIEN:

In view of the announcement in the press by the wartime prices and trade board that an increase of $4 per ton has been allowed on newsprint what provision, if any, has been made so that the independent primary producers of pulpwood may be reimbursed on pulpwood they produced and which is presently held by newsprint producers as inventory?

Mr. ILSLEY: One of the major factors contributing to the necessity of an increase in the price of newsprint was an increase in wood costs to newsprint mills. These increased wood costs were in part paid to independent primary producers of pulpwood. In view of these circumstances no provision has been made to increase payments to primary producers of pulpwood.

POST-WAR CIVIL AVIATION

Mr. GREEN:

1. Have explanatory talks taken place between Canada and the United States concerning post-war civil aviation?

2. Has the government received any assurances from the United States that Canada will be kept informed of any agreements or negotiations between the United States and other powers relating to post-war civil aviation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. In the frequent discussions which take place between officers of the Canadian legation in Washington and officers of the state department on questions of common concern, reference has been made to the problems of post-war civil aviation.

2. No assurances have been asked for from the United States and none has been received that the United States will keep Canada informed of any agreements or negotiations between the United States and other powers relating to post-war civil aviation. The Canadian government, however, assumes, in view of the general nature of its relations with the United States government, that on questions of this character each government will keep the other informed of important negotiations which are being conducted with other powers on the subject of post-war civil aviation.

CIVILIAN PASSENGERS FLOWN IN CANADA BY UNITED STATES PLANES

Mr. GREEN:

1. Have civilian passengers been flown in Canada by any United States planes without the proper authority having first been obtained from the Canadian authorities?

2. If so, what action, if any, has been taken by the government in regard thereto?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government has been informed that on one occasion a civilian passenger was flown in Canada by a United States plane without proper authority.

2. This report has been brought to the attention of the United States government and is being investigated.

PERMITS FOR EXPORT OF FLAX AND COARSE GRAINS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. Are permits required for the export of Canadian flax and coarse grains?

2. If so, have any permits been granted for the export of Canadian flax and coarse grains to the United States since August 1, 1942?

3. What are the names and addresses of firms to which such permits have been granted, and for what amounts?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes.

2. Yes—the procedure is as follows:

Application is made to the Canadian wheat board for a permit to export coarse grains. After satisfying themselves that the domestic market is properly taken care of, the wheat board approve of the export. It is then cleared through the agricultural supply board of the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Trade and Commerce issue the permit. No permits are issued for the exportation of eastern oats and barley.

Applications for permits to export oil bearing flax are first considered by the oil and fats administrator before permits are issued.

3. The application for an export permit bears the following quotation:

"The above information is for the confidential use of the Canadian government and it will not be, in whole or in part, given to any unauthorized person."

The release of such information would disclose to their competitors the details of business carried on by individual firms and as the information is furnished in confidence, that procedure is not considered to be in the public interest.

CANADA HANDBOOK

Mr. WINKLER:

1. How many copies of the Canada Handbook have been printed by years for the past five years?

2. By years, how many were given away and how many sold during the above period?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. The following numbers (combined total English and French editions) were printed: 1938, 49,157; 1939, 39,093; 1940, 44,529; 1941, 31,199; 1942, 43,176.

2. (a) The following (total free distribution for English and French combined) were distributed free of charge to public libraries, leading newspapers, contributors and the list authorized by order in council, etc., 1938, 5,562; 1939, 6,661; 1940, 5,935; 1941, 5,915; 1942, 6,042.

(b) The numbers (combined total English and French editions) sold were: 1938, 43,495; 1939, 32,374; 1940, 38,339; 1941, 24,662; 1942, 31,188 (this last figure covers sales to Sept. 1942 when sales were still in progress).

The larger part of the balance left on hand, at that date, has since been sold, mainly to the United States public.

JAPANESE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the total population of persons of Japanese origin in the province of British Columbia at the time the order was made for the evacuation of the Pacific coast defence area?

2. How many of such persons of Japanese origin were (a) Japanese nationals, (b) naturalized Japanese, (c) Canadian born, (d) citizens of other countries?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. 21,975.

2. (a) 9,382; (b) 6,497; (c) 6,084; (d) 12.

CLOVER SEED

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Is there a shortage of clover seed in Canada?

2. If so, what steps will be taken to procure the necessary quantities for the use of farmers before seeding time?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. There is a shortage of red clover and alsike clover seed in Canada.

2. It is expected that purchases will be made in the United States to meet, as far as possible, shortages here.

ALFALFA SEED

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Is the government aware that there is a shortage of alfalfa seed in the country?

2. If so, what is being done to meet the requirements of farmers for this class of seed?

3. Will the government take the necessary measures to procure a supply?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The government is aware that there is a shortage of alfalfa seed in eastern Canada.

2. Purchases are being made now by the agricultural supplies board of surpluses in western Canada for the purpose of meeting eastern Canadian needs.

3. See answer to No. 2.

NURSING SERVICE FOR CHILDREN OF MOTHERS IN WAR INDUSTRIES

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Has the government taken any steps to provide a "nursing service" for the care of children of mothers engaged in war industries?

2. If so, what has been done and when will such service be in full operation?

3. How many nurseries will be opened?

4. Where will they be located?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. An agreement has been signed with Ontario and Quebec under the terms of which the two governments are to provide day care for the children of mothers engaged in war industries on a 50-50 basis, the provinces assessing the needs. The provincial health authorities arrange with the local boards of health for the examination of the children before admission and for medical and nursing inspections, several times a week and on call of the nursery.

2. Fourteen day nurseries have been approved by the two governments, nine of which are operating at the present time. In the other six the necessary alterations are under way and they will probably be opened between the 1st and 15th of April. Medical and nursing service is provided as stated in (1) above.

3. Additional day nurseries will be authorized wherever the need arises and is presented by the provinces.

4. Day nurseries now approved are located in Brantford, Galt, Oshawa, St. Catharines, Toronto (6) and Montreal (4).

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SCRAP IRON AND STEEL—ALBERTA

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

How much scrap iron and/or steel has been shipped out of the province of Alberta during the years 1941 and 1942?

METEGHAN, N.S., FISHERMEN'S RESERVE

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. Has the government expropriated the Meteghan fishermen's reserve situated at Meteghan wharf in the township of Clare, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, for what purpose?

3. If the said expropriation has taken place, has the property been disposed of by lease or sale to the Clark Shipbuilding Company Limited? If so, on what terms?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

4. Has any settlement been reached with the proprietors expropriated on this area? If so, what are the terms of such settlement?

5. How many proprietors have been settled with and how many remain to be settled with?

6. Is it the policy of the government to use its power of expropriation with respect to private party and hand the property expropriated over to another individual or corporation?

PURCHASE OF BUILDINGS OR PROPERTIES SINCE BEGINNING OF WAR

Mr. REID:

1. How many buildings or properties has the government purchased in the city of Ottawa since war commenced and up to the end of February, 1943?

2. For what particular branch of government or war department were the buildings or property procured?

3. What amount of money was paid for each building or property?

4. How many buildings or properties exclusive of air fields or military camps have been purchased in each province since September, 1939, and up to the end of February, 1943, with (a) the total cost of all buildings or properties concerned?

RECREATION AND HEALTH SERVICES FOR WAR WORKERS

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Was a plan for a recreation programme proposed by Lieut. Ian Eisenhardt?

2. If so, at what date?

3. Was it approved by the director of selective service?

4. Was it approved by the Department of Pensions and National Health, as a health measure?

5. Was it submitted to the Minister of Labour for his approval?

6. If so, at what date, and did he approve?

7. Was any action taken by the Minister of Labour to implement this plan and, if so, what action?

8. Has provision been made by the government to enable the director of recreation to put into effect the health and nutrition services for war workers?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ROAD BETWEEN TADOUSSAC AND LABRADOR MILITARY STATIONS

Mr. DORION:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the government, dated during the past two years, relating to the building of a road on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river between Tadoussac and the Atlantic military stations situated on Labrador coast.

Mr. RALSTON: I spoke to the hon. member and he is going to send me some correspondence on the matter. I presume the motion can stand in the meantime.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all communications and other documents, from January 1, 1941, to the present, exchanged between the government, including any department or official thereof, and the governments of the several provinces of Canada, relating to the following matters: (a) increasing the amount of the old age pension; (b) lowering the pensionable age; (c) the making of changes in the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It should be understood that it will be necessary to communicate with the provinces in the first instance and ascertain their readiness to have the correspondence tabled.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that the procedure which is usually followed? The provinces are not nations beyond this country involved in negotiations with the government. It seems to me that that is extending the ruling too far. This is a sovereign parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will realize that there is probably no matter on which the provinces are more sensitive than that of being ignored and action being taken by the federal government without any prior conference with them. I would think that it was most desirable, apart from all else, that we should avoid giving grounds for an impression of the kind being created. The provinces have their own jurisdiction and they are partners in the work of government of the dominion. As between partners there should at least be the courtesy of asking consent to tabling correspondence to which both have been parties, before having it brought down.

Mr. GRAYDON: For the purpose of clarifying this particular point, I ask, where a question of a similar nature is asked in a provincial legislature, does the provincial government seek the consent of the dominion government where there is correspondence of this kind to be brought down?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I could not say offhand, but I should say they ought to, if they do not. I might point out in any event that the administration of old age pensions is under the provinces. There is a special reason therefore for communicating with the provinces in the first instance.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

STATEMENT IN QUEBEC LEGISLATURE RESPECTING SINKINGS IN ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I draw the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) to the question which I directed to him in his absence last Friday in connection with the debate in the Quebec legislature, and ask him if he is now in a position to make any statement in that regard. I raise the question only because there has been a further press report of proceedings in the Quebec legislature dealing with the same subject upon which he may want to say something to-day.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I could make a statement on the question now, but inasmuch as the matter seems to have developed into a difference of opinion between myself and the Hon. Mr. Gagnon of the Quebec legislature as to the number of ships sunk, I stating that there were twenty, and he stating that there were more than thirty—

Mr. GRAYDON: Upwards of thirty.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): —I have suggested to him that the best way to deal with the matter would be to let the naval services department appoint one man, and let him appoint somebody, and have them choose a third neutral man to determine which is correct. I have made that suggestion to Mr. Gagnon; I hope he will accept it, and if he does I believe it will end the controversy one way or the other.

I could make a statement to the house to-day merely repeating what I have already said several times, that our records show twenty merchant ships sunk in the gulf and river St. Lawrence in the year 1942. That is all I know of and all that I can find anything about. I have asked Mr. Gagnon if he knows of other ships beyond that number, to give me their names and the dates and places at which they were sunk, and I would carry on an investigation. If he does not wish to give me that information, I suggest the only other way to determine the matter would be to have a committee appointed.

Mr. HOMUTH: Waste money on a commission.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It need not be a waste of money. There need not even be a commission. It can be a purely private matter. I will name a naval officer familiar with the river St. Lawrence. It will not take more than a day or two to ascertain the truth. Then the public will be satisfied.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): These twenty or thirty were sunk by Atlantic submarines. Is the minister not aware that Dr. Goebbels in a radio address forecast that Germany will have a thousand submarines in the service this year, and that one hundred were in the Atlantic last December and January? Washington stated before Christmas that a homeward bound Atlantic convoy met a whole pack of them and was attacked for four days continuously. Surely the minister must give the house this information. I will give him information later on in the day to show where these submarines in the St. Lawrence came from.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I did not catch what my hon. friend said. I believe he was referring to some statement made in the United States. At any rate it has nothing to do with the point before the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may say so, I do not think that what the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services has said is an answer to the question which I propounded to him in his absence on Friday. It is not quite enough under the circumstances. I believe the house is entitled to a statement from the minister setting out his point of view and giving us whatever information he or his department is able to give on this particular subject. It may be all very well to speak of a commission or a commit'ee or a private gathering of three people to determine this. But should the minister not be able to determine it himself with the facilities at his disposal? In to-day's Montreal Gazette appears a statement by another member of the Quebec legislature confirming the one which was made by the Hon. Mr. Gagnon. I do not want to go into the proceedings of the Quebec legislature, but the minister ought to give the house a full statement covering a matter which is so serious and which has had the public reaction which this appears to have had.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I shall make a statement, but it will not satisfy the Hon. Mr. Gagnon, or Mr. Langlais, who repeated Mr. Gagnon's statement. They know my view of the matter. I shall repeat to the house what I have already said several times in the press and elsewhere.

In one dispatch by the Canadian Press Mr. Gagnon was credited with saying that not twenty but upwards of thirty ships were sunk in the St. Lawrence river and gulf last summer. A dispatch which appeared in the Montreal Star of March 5 stated that Mr. Gagnon had said that not twenty but in reality thirty ships had been sunk by enemy submarines in the St. Lawrence. Another report contained in the French language newspaper L'Action Catholique under date March 5 quotes Mr. Gagnon as follows: "More than thirty ships were sunk in the gulf and river last summer." The Ottawa French newspaper Le Droit quotes Mr. Gagnon to the same effect.

I have stated several times that twenty merchant ships have been sunk in the St. Lawrence gulf and river during the navigation season of 1942 as a result of enemy action. I made that statement at a press conference in Ottawa on November 24. At that time I was dealing with and replying to somewhat similar charges made, I think, in some cases by members of this house, or made by public men of some sort or other, to the effect that forty ships had been sunk.

Mr. HOMUTH: What does the minister mean by "some sort or other"? To whom is he referring?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a derogatory statement.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I said that so far as I could recall, the statement concerning thirty ships having been sunk was made by a member of this house—I am not sure as to that, but if not it was made by a public man of some sort or other. I do not know whether he was a member of a legislature; at all events he occupied some sort of public position; he was in the public eye. In reply to that statement, I declared that the number sunk was twenty. It seems necessary to continue to make these denials indefinitely.

Going on a little further, Mr. Gagnon is quoted in the press as having said that on one day, September 10, five ships were sunk in this area. In that statement Mr. Gagnon is absolutely wrong. There is no record of five ships having been sunk in the river on that date.

Mr. Gagnon is further quoted as saying that two United States destroyers were sunk, presumably in the same area. In reply to that statement I can say that there is no record of any American destroyers having been sunk at any time in this area.

Mr. Gagnon says that he has a list of the names of the ships sunk and the dates on which they were sunk. I asked Mr. Gagnon to produce this list for my investigation. I have asked him by telegram and he replied that surely my own department has the information. My department cannot have this information on ghost ships having been sunk—flying Dutchmen or something of that sort. My department has information as to the sinking of twenty ships, and I have told Mr. Gagnon that if he has information to the contrary and makes statements to the contrary, it is his duty to make good those statements. Every time I have made the statement as to twenty ships having been sunk I relied for my information upon the records of the Department of Naval Service. I may say that twenty may be a high figure, because included in the twenty are at least two ships which might properly be said to have been sunk outside the gulf area proper.

Mr. Gagnon goes on to say that control from Ottawa is responsible for delay in attacking the submarines after they have been sighted. I say definitely that so far as the naval service is concerned any naval ship sighting an enemy submarine anywhere would attack instantly without awaiting instructions from anybody, because that is what they are there for. I say further that the general control of these matters is in the hands of the naval officer in charge either at Gaspé or Quebec or Halifax, and no direction or concurrence from Ottawa is needed to carry out an attack.

Mr. Gagnon also makes a reference to the Royal Canadian Air Force, which he criticizes in somewhat the same terms. I believe that what I have said about the naval ships would apply with equal correctness to the air force. In any case I think the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) some time ago dealt adequately with a charge of this sort.

In the debate in the legislature last week some reference was made to the fact that there might be refuelling bases in the river and gulf of St. Lawrence for enemy submarines. All I can say to that is that no trace of any such bases has ever been discovered although most thorough investigations have been made. Any one who reflects on the matter will realize that the difficulties of establishing such bases on the shores of the St. Lawrence are so great as to render such a proceeding very unlikely. I have said in this house, and I have said it several times elsewhere, that the fuel capacity of modern submarines is ample to allow them to cruise from their bases in Europe to the shores of the north American continent, to do their work there for some weeks even, and then to return to their base in Europe without the necessity of refuelling. A round trip from a submarine base at Lorient, for example, on the coast of Europe, to the St. Lawrence, is no more than six thousand miles. German submarines can cruise twice that distance, and some of them do even better than that. They can remain away from their base for many weeks. It is possible that refuelling is done from mother ships, as they are called, somewhere on the sea, although we have no definite evidence of that.

I should like to point out that there have been many more sinkings in the gulf of Mexico area than in the St. Lawrence area. These two areas are comparable in that they are both bodies of water to which access can be obtained only through comparatively narrow straits and they are both protected by islands and peninsulas. Yet the gulf of Mexico, some two thousand miles further away from the European bases of German submarines than is the gulf of St. Lawrence, has had twice as many sinkings as the gulf of St. Lawrence has had, and I have heard nobody in the United States suggest that the whole United States fleet should be diverted from its other duties to protect the gulf of Mexico.

Some reference was made in the same debate to spies and to the fact that there might be some spies on the shores of the St. Lawrence. I think that hon. members of this house, and I should hope hon. members of any house, would realize that it is very dangerous to begin to talk about spies at such a time as this. To publish information about spies or about the capture or the presence of spies, would be helpful to the enemy rather than helpful to this country.

I should like to say finally that in about two months time a new navigation season will open in the gulf and river St. Lawrence, and no one can prophesy what action will take place in that area during the navigation season. I believe I am safe in saying that every possible precaution will be taken by the Canadian armed services, the navy, the army and the air service, to deal with every situation which can be expected to develop. To cope adequately with a problem of this kind, however, involves the cooperation of citizens in the area and the cooperation of members of this house and of provincial legislatures. To disclose information which might be helpful to the enemy by asking questions in public or by making statements in public is not doing a service to this country. For the welfare of the parts of the country which are directly affected by this discussion, and for the protection of the lives of the men who must fight every threat which is made, I ask for all the cooperation that it is possible for hon. members of this house and for all the citizens of Canada to give to the armed services.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the latter part of the minister's statement is very reassuring and I am sure that it will make an appeal to the people of Canada. I rise only to ask a supplementary question. Is there any truth in the report that at a certain period of time last summer one of our naval patrol vessels was absent from duty carrying a party from Rimouski to a fishing river on the north shore?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That statement I think has been denied already within these walls. If it has not been denied, I deny it now completely. I wish to say that I have telegrams and letters from those who are accused of having used the naval vessel for that purpose and they deny absolutely that any naval vessel accompanied them on the fishing trip in question.

Mr. CHURCH: I would call the attention of the minister to one fact which he has not disclosed to the house and which we are entitled to have. At the very same time that these twenty or thirty vessels he speaks of were sunk in the St. Lawrence, a United States convoy was attacked off the Canadian coast. The news was given out in London and Washington, and the names of the ships were given. They were attacked by the same pack of submarines. The house is entitled to the information. I can give the information to the minister either privately or publicly because it has been given by a celebrated admiral and naval critic, H. G. Thursfield, who has written articles in United States and English papers. I shall refer to the article later. I can tell the minister Canada had better wake up. She cannot depend very much on General Winter for help.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Is my hon. friend asking whether more ships were sunk than those referred to as being sunk in the gulf of St. Lawrence? It is obvious that ships are being sunk in the Atlantic. It needs no naval expert to assure us of that. We know that submarines are operating there and sinking ships.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

QUESTION AS TO OPENING TO SHIPPING IN COMING NAVIGATION SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) in reply to a question with regard to the sinkings in the St. Lawrence, said that in about two months' time navigation would open in the St. Lawrence. Can the minister tell us if it is the intention to open the St. Lawrence this summer to ocean shipping? The longshoremen in the port of Saint John would like to have information in advance if there is to be employment there this summer, because many of them do not live at the port but in other parts of the province, and if they go to their homes and engage in other work it will be difficult to get them back if their services are required.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): All I can say is that no decision has been reached to close the St. Lawrence to shipping this summer. Beyond that I do not care to go. All these matters must be decided in the light of circumstances at the time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LABOUR-MANAGEMENT PRODUCTION COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). On February 22 he answered two questions which I placed on the order paper. They are found at page 581 of Hansard:

1. How many labour-management committees are functioning in Canada to-day?
Approximately 631.

2. How many employees are engaged in the plants where such committees function?
Approximately 327,395.

Subsequently I asked for lists of the committees. To-day's issues of the Montreal Gazette and the Toronto Globe and Mail report that yesterday at a meeting which the minister attended he said, and the statement is in quotation marks as though they were the minister's own words:

"Labour management production committees were to be extended, and already there were 360 organized covering 325,000 workers."

My question is which of these statements is correct, and when will the minister table a list?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The first statement is correct. I was speaking from memory and I guess I got the figures mixed.

OIL

BONUS ON IMPORTATION OF CRUDE OIL FROM MONTANA INTO ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (for the Minister of Munitions and Supply): Yesterday the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) asked a question at page 1075 of Hansard, the substance of which is whether a bonus is being paid on the importation of crude oil from Montana into Canada. The answer is that no bonus or subsidy is being paid on the importation of crude oil from Montana into Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it being contemplated?

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

BUTTER

RESOLUTION OF THREE RIVERS TRADES AND LABOUR COUNCIL AS TO RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): I should like to ask a question of the government. I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the trades and labour council of Trois Rivières, Quebec. It reads as follows:

Whereas the ration of butter actually available is totally insufficient for the worker who brings his meal at the plant;

Whereas such a rationing, besides allowing an insufficient quantity of butter might prove to be a serious impeachment to the war effort of the worker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have heard sufficient of the question to understand the purport of it, and I suggest that it is one that should be placed upon the order paper.

MILITARY SERVICE

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REGISTRATION OF SINGLE MEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I desire to address a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) arising out of an item appearing in to-day's press, which reads in part as follows:

Labour minister Mitchell announced last night that, by order in council, the date for registration of single men under the military call-up has been extended to March 15. The final date for registration previously had been fixed for March 1. . . .

Mr. Mitchell said there still seemed to be confusion in some men's minds over whether or not they were "single" for military call-up purposes. The further extension, the minister said, will help these men to determine their status.

My questions are—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that is a question that should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I ask the question, sir, and then you can determine whether it is proper? The question I wish to ask is this. In view of what is said there in this press item, has there not been strict enforcement of the regulation against defaulters during the last few months? During what period has an amnesty prevailed, and after March 15 is it the intention of the government to go after the defaulters?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the minister may take that as notice of the question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is ready to answer the question now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Although the minister may be ready now the questions asked would be just as much at fault. I think they should not be answered.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): When the house adjourned last night I was dealing with the problem which had arisen in western Canada in connection with the production of flax. My remarks in that connection are practically concluded. I referred to the fact that whereas on December 9 last it was decided to increase flax acreage in this country by one million acres, about the middle of January the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) announced that it was not desirable to increase the acreage. Subsequently a statement was issued from his department to the effect that the increase was desired, and subsequent to that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) stated in this house that they did not want the increase.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No, I did not say that.

Mr. BENCE: Well, I could give the minister the exact words, but in effect what he said was that so far as they could tell at the present time there were no indications that the flax acreage was to be increased this year as compared with last year, which is exactly the same thing. Subsequently statements were made by responsible officials of some of the departments that the flax acreage was to be increased. All I have to say, Mr. Speaker, is that this matter should be cleared up as quickly as possible in order that the confusion which has been caused to the farmers may be removed.

Before I leave this subject. I might say just a word in connection with the processing of flax in this country. It appears that Canada produces considerably more flax for oil purposes than we can process. This information was given to the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on February 22, when he stated that the net marketable crop last year was 13,230,000 bushels, whereas the total capacity for flax processing in this country was only 6,395,000 bushels; and of course it may be that the explanation for the change in the policy of the administration with respect to this year's flax production is that we have not the flax processing plants on the north American continent. But, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the same question to which I referred a moment ago the information was given to this house that there were in operation, in Canada nine flax processing plants with one under construction. Three are in the city of Montreal; two are in the city of Toronto; one is at Baden; one is at Winnipeg; one is at St. Boniface; one is at Medicine Hat, and there is one under construction at Hamilton. What I should like to know, and what I believe many people in this country would like to know, is why a plant is being constructed in Hamilton, which is already surfeited with industries, where already they are having great difficulties in regard to housing and other matters, and where it will be many hundreds of miles from the source of supply. As I demonstrated last evening, the great bulk of the flax produced in this country for oil purposes is grown in Saskatchewan, which is the province more particularly interested in this problem than any other. But that province has no flax processing plant. I do not know the reason for this, but it does seem to me that if we are to have an effective and efficient war effort the government must have its mind continually trained on problems such as these. Here is the situation. We produce the flax in Saskatchewan, and we ship it to Hamilton or Toronto or Montreal or some other place in order to have it processed. If it were processed in Saskatchewan we would save a great deal of labour on the part of the employees of the railways; we would be able to use the freight cars for other purposes—

Mr. GIBSON: Is the hon. member suggesting that the plant in Hamilton is being constructed by the government?

Mr. BENCE: No, I am not suggesting that at all; I never made such a suggestion. I said a plant was being constructed in Hamilton.

Mr. GIBSON: Not by the government.

[Mr. Bence.]

Mr. BENCE: I did not say that. I suggested that if we were to have an efficient and economic war effort the government must train its mind on the problem of having these plants where they will be most effective; and surely if we are to solve some of the labour and transportation problems we now have on our hands the government should decide where these plants should be located in order most economically to produce these very necessary materials. Would it not have been far better to locate this new plant in the province of Saskatchewan, rather than in Hamilton, in order to avoid all these transportation difficulties? I do not know how it came about that the plant was located in Hamilton, but what has the government done about it? What attempt has been made to solve these problems? To me this is a demonstration of a waste of man-power and effort which we cannot afford to have at this time, to which I shall refer more particularly in a moment.

I do not propose to deal specifically with anything set out in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, except to make some brief reference to the pay-as-you-earn plan. The whole question of the budget and all its ramifications was admirably covered in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), and it gives me a great deal of pleasure indeed to congratulate the hon. member upon the diligence with which he prepared that address and the manner in which he delivered it in this house. In reference to the pay-as-you-earn plan I merely wish to emphasize that it is not the Ruml plan. As I see it, the difference between the Ruml plan and the plan which has been introduced by the Minister of Finance is that under the Ruml plan we would skip one year's taxes, while the minister's plan merely provides that we must pay two and a half year's taxes in the space of two years. The mistake the administration has made lies in the fact that last year they put into effect what I would refer to as a half-baked sort of Ruml plan, whereas if they had adopted the principle in toto last year we would have it on a proper basis this year. In my judgment the Ruml plan appealed to the people of Canada, but I rather fear that they will be disappointed in the plan that has been presented by the minister because, as I said before, in effect what it means is that over a period of two years we are to pay two and a half year's taxes.

During the current year we shall be required to raise the sum of $5,500,000,000, and whatever anyone else may say about it, I believe this is going to be a tremendous financial burden, particularly upon the small people of this country. Further drastic restrictions will have to be imposed, which will bring about a further lowering of our standard of living and in some cases, particularly in connection with those having small and rigid incomes, there will be a certain amount of want and suffering. And, Mr. Speaker, because the people of Canada are so vitally affected by the budget; because their standard of living is being reduced so drastically; furthermore and particularly because their loved ones and their friends are offering their lives in all parts of the world in defence of freedom, they are determined that the war effort of this country, from a production point of view, must be as efficient and as economical as it is humanly possible to make it. I do not desire to make any charges or to suggest that anything is wrong in the sense that there has been corruption, but in my opinion there has been a great deal of wastage in our war effort due to a lack of foresight and a lack of planning on the part of the administration. The flax situation, to which I referred a short while ago, is one small example of lack of foresight and planning so far as saving man-power, energy and material is concerned. As I see the picture there has been a lack of cohesion, a lack of coordination and a lack of long-range planning in connection with many phases of Canada's war effort. The position is this, that in many cases things have been done the hard way, and when they have been done the hard way they have been done the costly way. Many problems have not been squarely faced until they have been right upon us, and the methods then adopted to cope with them necessarily have been hastily conceived and badly carried out.

I have in mind at the present time one striking example, namely, the construction of temporary buildings in Ottawa for the purpose of endeavouring to house practically the whole of our administrative effort in this beautiful city. I referred to this before when I spoke in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne, and I intend to refer to it again, because it is the kind of suggestion which hon. members should make to the government in order to relieve some of the unnecessary wastage that is going on.

First of all I would point out that there seems to be an attitude of mind that it is necessary for every part of the administration to be housed in Ottawa, and the person who is in control of any administrative effort seems to feel he must be down here at what he considers the head of affairs. If the situation is considered carefully, and if these people would only look at the whole picture, they would realize that they can carry on their work just as easily in some other part of the country, and if they did there would be no necessity for the erection of these temporary buildings at tremendous cost.

In a return to the house on June 1 last it was shown that since the beginning of the war there had been constructed or there were then under construction in Ottawa eleven temporary buildings and one annex, at a total cost of $5,411,099.76. On the first of June of last year only half of those buildings had been built; the rest of them were still under construction. This was the condition, mark you, practically three years after the beginning of the war, when labour and materials were getting scarce; yet half of the buildings were being constructed at that time. That might have been all right at the beginning of the war, when we had plenty of labour available and an abundance of materials; but every possible step should have been taken to avoid that unnecessary expenditure and that unnecessary condition at a time when the material was so badly needed for other purposes.

Not only that, but the condition is continuing. On March 8 there were tabled the answers to some questions I had asked earlier. One question was as to how many more temporary buildings were to be erected in Ottawa, and at what cost. I received the answer, with respect to the Royal Canadian Air Force, that land and buildings for certain constructions were to cost $312,000. Land and buildings for another department were to cost $54,205; and in addition to that, for the purpose of office accommodation for the wartime prices and trade board, there was to be a building costing $450,000.

At the same time may I point out that there appeared in the press of February 26 the statement that the government approved the building programme under the National Housing Act, and that in Ottawa and vicinity a million dollars was to be spent on the construction of houses. Of that amount a quarter of a million dollars was to be paid by the government.

I suggest that in large measure the reason for this lies in the fact that there has been such over-congestion in Ottawa, and so much of the work has been done here that it is necessary to go on putting more nails, more steel, more lumber and more energy into coping with problems which have been created by the government's action. We need that labour, we need that lumber, we need that steel and those nails for other purposes, and I suggest to the house that there should be no building in Canada to-day which is not absolutely required for our war effort. I say that because I believe we have sufficient buildings in this country to take care of our war programme, and we must make the most of what we have. We need this labour to make munitions of war, to produce foodstuffs, and for dozens of other essential things. We need, indeed, the labour and the lumber for the preservation of our own people.

The other day we received an announcement through the mail, one which had been given out by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) indicating that the wood fuel situation in Canada is desperate. It showed that next year there was likely to be a worse condition, because not only are we using up last year's supply, but that lumber which was being cut and was intended for next year is already being used in order to heat houses and to do necessary cooking. We know, too, that there has been a desperate shortage of coal this winter, and that that shortage will be even greater next winter.

If this extra labour is available it should be used to produce what is necessary to keep our people from freezing. The labour should be directed to other purposes than erecting more buildings in Ottawa. If the situation had been properly canvassed many of those buildings would not have been necessary. In Canada to-day many buildings are being used for non-essential purposes. Many factories are still producing non-essential goods. Why was not the whole situation canvassed thoroughly by someone with over-all authority who could say to these various departments: That building is not necessary, because we can send you here, or we can send you there? Why is there not someone who would have the job of investigating and determining whether or not certain factories could be used for these purposes, if at the present time they are not producing something essential?

The buildings being erected in Ottawa are temporary, and they are intended as nothing else. Many stores are curtailing their hours of sale because of lack of goods to sell and lack of labour. Several examples can be found right here in Ottawa. Along some of the main streets one can see cards in the store windows stating they will not be open until such-and-such an hour. Why can we not work out a plan under which some of these store buildings could be used for housing administrative workers? Why could not stores be doubled up? There is no necessity for having two stores open a half day when one could be open a whole day and the other be made available for other purposes.

[Mr. Bence.]

Large department stores find that their counters are bare because they have not the goods to sell. I am not criticizing anyone because the goods are not there. We cannot continue to produce non-essential consumer goods. This is a necessary result of our war programme. There is no reason why all these stores should be operating when one building could do the work now being done by four or five. Some of them could then be used for the purposes for which the temporary buildings are being constructed. I do not think this is an unreasonable suggestion. It may be the kind of thing which would be considered drastic in peace time; but when we are in a life and death struggle we can put up with inconveniences. We shall have to put up with many more before we have finished.

There are many possibilities which could be canvassed with a view to providing necessary office accommodation. Let us go outside of Ottawa, to the various cities across Canada, and utilize the buildings that are available. But even in Ottawa I think more diligence could have been shown in finding available accommodation.

I believe members of parliament could be asked to put themselves to some small inconvenience. In many cases we have comfortable private offices. Many of them are now accommodating only one member. Surely we could make some kind of arrangement to double up—and I am sure the senators would agree to a similar arrangement. They would probably agree to come from the other side of the building, and we could make some provision whereby we could provide accommodation for some of the additional workers now in Ottawa.

Every possible step should be taken to avoid unnecessary construction at the present time. This is not a question of money; it is a question of man-power and material. If there is already office space in the country which can be used, then certainly we should not be constructing new buildings in Ottawa.

A moment ago I referred to the fuel problem, and I shall conclude my remarks by making a further reference to it. As I stated, the Minister of Munitions and Supply issued a press release from his department in which it was asserted that the wood fuel situation was serious, and he made certain suggestions as to how the problem might be solved. One was that the government was going to pay an additional dollar per cord to the fuel dealers. Another was that farmers might go to work cutting fuel in their off season, and that they would not thereby lose the privileges they have at the present time under the national selective service regulations. I presume that some legislation is to be introduced or some order in council passed to make that official. At present it is merely a statement that the selective service officers will consider farmers doing this work as not losing their exemption under the regulations. But I do not know how that is to be accomplished officially. In any event the problem will not be solved in that way, because the farmers are just getting ready to put in their crops, and this wood fuel problem is one that must be solved now. Next winter will be too late. The fuel problem is a very serious one, and the people will suffer unnecessary hardships if it is not tackled immediately, and with courage, and with some measure of efficiency and effectiveness. The problem is of first importance and its solution is the job of those who have been given a mandate to carry on the affairs of this country. The only solution as I see it is a proper plan of allocation of labour which will take out of unnecessary production workers who can be put at this particular kind of labour. We have not yet effectively tackled this question of taking workers out of non-essential work. But when we face the danger of our people suffering and even freezing to death next winter, something should be done without further delay.

Mr. H. A. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the budget I first want to pay tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for bringing down the budget so early in the session. It must have meant long and arduous hours of labour to bring down a budget providing for the raising of such a colossal sum of money. It is very difficult indeed to allocate the burden of taxation fairly among the taxpayers of Canada when taxation is called for upon such a stupendous scale, but I believe that the people as a whole regard this budget as a very good one and are prepared to accept the challenge to work and save which the Minister of Finance made to the people in his closing remarks the other night.

I wish to discuss particularly some problems pertaining to agriculture. A return that was brought down the other day was interesting to me. It showed that in the fiscal year 1942-43 only about 1,500 farmers paid income tax to an amount of approximately $150,000. The minister's estimate of income tax receipts for the fiscal year 1942-43, which ends on March 31, 1943, was approximately $842,000,000. That means that the farmers paid approximately five cents each in income tax, because according to the census of 1941 the farm population comprises 28 per cent of the total population of the country, or about three million people. If this is a fair estimate of what the farmers are supposed to pay in income tax, they are not getting a fair share of the national income. If we are ever to settle the problems of agriculture satisfactorily the remuneration for the products of the farm must be raised to a comparable basis with the products of industry. We must also provide some relief from the drudgery of farm work, and make farm homes more attractive, with conveniences more in line with those found in the homes of city dwellers. We are asked to produce, but the farmers get very little encouragement to produce. It is true that in most long wars food products play an important part in the long run, and that is true of this war. It is probable that the foodstuffs of the world will play an important part in the final outcome of this war. That is why our farmers are being asked to produce more of all kinds of farm products.

In the matter of hydro extension, the farmers, and I am speaking particularly of Ontario, have been discriminated against. About two years ago an order was issued that no new installations of hydro should be made in rural communities. Three factors entered into this picture. There was the hydro-electric power commission, the power controller and the metals controller. The order provided that no new installation of hydro could be made, except under permit, if the home was more than 250 feet away from the transmission line. During this time houses were being built in towns, cities and incorporated villages and hydro was installed there without any restrictions at all. Fixtures also were allowed to be installed. But all this was denied to the rural people. In many of the rural districts the hydro transmission lines run down the concession lines, but the farmers were denied the privilege of hydro. At the same time this right was extended to city dwellers. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of rural Ontario are more entitled to the use of hydro power than people who live in incorporated villages, cities and towns, because our farmers have to work long hours before daylight and after dark and have great need of hydro power. I am glad to note that the hydro commission is now cooperating with the controllers on a scheme whereby hydro can be extended to the rural people. Less than thirty per cent of the people in rural Ontario have hydro or running water in their homes, and until we can make these conveniences available to people in the rural districts we can never solve the problem of a happy and contented rural population. I shall discuss agricultural problems further, probably on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. But for the moment I wish to talk about economies on parliament hill, in the houses of parliament as now constituted.

The question has been raised in this chamber by hon. members of practically all groups, by the press throughout Canada, and by individuals in public speeches and addresses, that the cost of government services is too high. Even prior to the present war the matter was one of public discussion. To go back a few years, around 1906 to 1908, the expenditure at Ottawa was approximately forty to forty-five million dollars. In 1939, the budget which was approved before the outbreak of war, and which made provision for a large expansion of national defence, was about $550,000,000. The provision for expansion of the Department of National Defence was made because war seemed inevitable, although some groups in this house did not appear to think so. Many hon. members will recall when old age pensions were first discussed in this house, and also pensions for the blind. Everybody admitted that there was merit in those demands, particularly those on behalf of people who were so unfortunate as to be blind, but the invariable answer from the government of the day, from the then Minister of Finance and his colleagues on the treasury benches was, "We appreciate all that, but where will you get the money from?" We are now in the fourth year of the war, and war, at best, is waste, not only of material things but of life itself, and that of our own soldiers as well. The peoples of Europe, Africa and Asia are sacrificing their lives by thousands if not millions. In the fourth year of the war we are budgeting for an expenditure of five and a half billion dollars, or practically ten times as much as we budgeted for in 1939. Therefore it is pretty hard for the people to go back to the belief that if the occasion demands, whether it be a national crisis or a specifically economic crisis, the money cannot be procured if it has to be got. But the people would feel more satisfied if they were assured that money was being carefully expended and rigid economy practised with respect to government expenditures. We should turn from habits of extravagance to habits of saving. As it is, the fear is expressed by many people throughout the country, particularly where large construction work goes on, that the money is not being carefully expended, that rigid economy is not being practised, and that the country's savings are being wasted. We are asked to save; we are even forced to save. We are expected to refrain from luxuries and to be content with the necessities of life.

[Mr. H. A. MacKenzie.]

I do not intend to enter into a general discussion of whether Canada is overgoverned. If I did, I think the answer would be emphatically, yes. In this dominion, with approximately eleven and a half million people, there are over four thousand money-spending municipalities. Apart from that, in this dominion and nine provinces there are over eight hundred and fifty lawmakers—more than in any other country in the world with the possible exceptions of the United States and Great Britain. It is true that Ontario, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia have made moves to lessen the number of their legislators, and we here could very well follow their example. Following the 1931 census, provision was made for two hundred and forty-five members of the House of Commons. In accordance with the census of 1941 the number will be reduced, particularly from Saskatchewan and Manitoba, but there could very well be a further reduction by a general reallocation of seats throughout the dominion. I do not propose to discuss at any length the position of the upper chamber, because it was a subject of debate at some length both last year and this year. In fairness it must be recognized, I believe, that the upper chamber is composed of honourable and capable men. But if we go back we shall find that in 1891 the Liberal platform contained a plank called "senate reform". The subject was debated in this chamber at some length in 1909 and 1910, and at that time the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen voted for senate reform. Since that time he has been in the upper house and out of it, but there is no record that he made any reference to it while he was there. It was, I believe, in 1942 that the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone), speaking in this house on July 7, said, as reported at page 3991 of Hansard:

> The other house should be used or disbanded altogether. There are highly qualified and experienced men in that house who should be given an opportunity to render service to Canada. We are paying them and letting them die of dry rot.

This House of Commons was in session for six months last year, and during that time the upper house met only twice for short periods. It is true that just recently, when the 1942 war appropriation supplementary estimates of around $858,000,000 were passed in this house, there were at that time, according to the press, only twenty members of the upper house who thought it important enough to assemble to discuss that matter of a mere $858,000,000.

Again, we find that last year, as reported in Hansard of May 6, at page 2183, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) said:

Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgency of the situation and the desirablity of strengthening in every possible way our parliamentary institutions by recruiting thereto men and women of outstanding ability, will the Prime Minister tell the house when he will be in a position to announce the appointment of men and women of ability to the Senate of Canada to fill the many vacancies at present existing?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) replied:

I shall be glad to take note of my hon. friend's desire to be considered in that connection.

Why should such appointments be necessary? If we have any thought of reducing government costs in this country and in the House of Commons, should they not be reduced in the other chamber as well? Either the number of members should be reduced or that house should be abolished altogether. As the hon. member for Wellington South said last year, they should be given some useful work. Why can they not institute some useful work of their own? I notice that this year they are appointing some committees to study rehabilitation and reestablishment, and also social security. That is fine, but I believe they should also be able to do something useful to help the House of Commons in the problems which annually confront us in this chamber. For instance, a war expenditures committee appointed by this house has been operating for the last two years. It is composed of twenty-four members. They have done some useful work. A question was asked in the house recently about the cost of that committee. I am not in a position to say how much it is, but it must be considerable. The members of the committee get $15 a day, and there are additional expenses in connection with stenographers, stationery, and so forth. Is there any reason in the world why the upper house should not perform the duties of that war expenditures committee?

Mr. SENN: The $15 a day is not taken by all the members.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): That is what is provided. Whether they take it or not, I do not know. For several years we have been talking in this house about appointing a committee to study the estimates, but nothing has been done. Every session since I have been here the Ottawa Journal or the Ottawa Citizen has commented on the millions that are passed in a minute or two in the closing days of the session. Is there any reason why the upper house should not study these estimates, so that when they come here for final adoption we shall be able to vote on them at least intelligently? It is true there is an opposition, and it is rather amusing to watch them at times feebly asking questions about this or that expenditure. The information given is supplied by the departments, and those asking the questions get very little information.

These estimates are prepared by the different departments. In reality most business is done by orders in council and the estimates are prepared by the civil service. In my opinion the upper chamber is not given any useful or contributory work to do. On different occasions the Prime Minister has stated that he favoured senate reform. In view of the fact that there are eleven vacancies, I suggest that he pull the plug and let them all go. It would mean a saving of at least $380,000 a year, besides saving other expenses.

Mr. MacNICOL: This house cannot abolish the senate.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): True, we cannot abolish the senate, but if we refrain from appointing them it will abolish itself in time. Last year the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean) said something about government costs. I am quite in accord with what he said. If we are asking the people of this country to save and conserve, to exercise economy, I think we should set our own house in order and practise economy here, thereby giving an example to the Canadian public. Speaking in the house last year, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said:

In my judgment, parliament is more and more on trial at the bar of public opinion. There is something wrong with this House of Commons. I am not reflecting on the house and I do not know what is the cause, but there is something wrong with it and I have asked myself, "is it the fault of the government in any way?"

Let me offer some suggestions which I think will help to solve some of the problems that confronted the Minister of Finance when he asked that question. I believe, and I think many other hon. members agree, that far too much of the time of the house is taken up in asking questions of the members of the government who sit on the front benches. Much of the information asked for in these questions could be obtained from the departments without taking up the time of the house. I quite appreciate that some questions have to do with matters of national urgency, but there are many others that should be directed to the departments.

Many of the speeches made in this house are made for home consumption, for the purpose of getting them on Hansard. On February 25, 1892, an order in council was passed regulating the franking privileges enjoyed by hon. members of this house and of the senate, as governed by section 43 of the Post Office Act. This section reads as follows:

> Letters and other mailable matter addressed to or sent by the Speaker or Clerk of the Senate or of the House of Commons at the seat of government shall be free of Canada postage, and letters and other mailable matter addressed to or by any member of either house at the seat of government during any session of parliament, or to any of the members at the seat of government as aforesaid, during the ten days next before the meeting of parliament, shall be free of Canada postage.

These franking privileges have been abused from time to time by the members of this house and the members of the other house. Reports have come to the Post Office Department—this is definitely on record—to the effect that members have abused this franking privilege by conducting their private business under the frank. It is also true that members and senators living outside Ottawa have sent mail in bulk to the Speaker of the House of Commons or the Speaker of the Senate respectively to be mailed under the frank.

The reading of speeches is still adhered to. The rule should be either that we should be permitted to read them or that we should not be permitted to read them. When some hon. members make speeches—the house knows this is correct—they have thousands of copies printed which are mailed free on government stationery to their constituents.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member knows that we have to pay for the printing of those speeches.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I said that they were sent out on government stationery and mailed free of postage to constituents.

Mr. MacNICOL: The postage is free.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): And the stationery is free. They go out in Hansard envelopes, which are supplied free.

Mr. MacNICOL: The member pays for the paper.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): The member does not pay for the Hansard paper.

Mr. MacNICOL: Oh, yes; and for the printing.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I will come to that a little later. Some members or groups of members in this house use the House of Commons and the Post Office Department as a clearing-house through which to spread their political propaganda and doctrines to their constituents at the public expense. There is no doubt about that. I have seen rooms of members filled with stenographers and messengers stamping envelopes which would be sent down to the paste room to be sent out to the post office.

An hon. MEMBER: They would be Liberal members.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I am not saying what particular members they were. I have seen trucks loaded with this stationery to such an extent that one would think they were moving the stationery department. These trucks are filled up with literature being sent to the paste room to be mailed at the taxpayers' expense. The stationery supplied to the members of the House of Commons during the last few years has cost from $35,000 to $40,000 a year. According to a report which I received, 400,000 Hansard envelopes were supplied to members of the House of Commons in 1942. Surely the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) does not contend that he is paying for these Hansard envelopes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said that I paid for the printing of any speech that I mail out.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): The hon. member may pay for the printing of his speeches, but they are sent out on government stationery and mailed free of postage at the taxpayers' expense.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I may correct the hon. member again. I believe that in paying for the printing of such speeches, I pay for the paper upon which they are printed, as well as for the printing.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): And the Hansard envelopes?

Mr. MacNICOL: No; I get those free, the same as every other member.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): If this franking privilege granted to the members of the House of Commons and the Senate were abolished, it would reduce the length of the session by months and the stenographic and messenger staffs could be reduced by one-third. It would save tens of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money. Imagine the cost of transporting all this mail that goes out free! I feel sorry for the rural mail carriers who have to deliver this mail up and down the country because it is all sent out free of postage.

Then there is another factor that we must remember. A man might want to start a leadership league, and he would advertise in all the papers and send them free to members of the House of Commons. The house will remember that two years ago hundreds and thousands of letters came to this house because they were free of postage. If the two post offices in the houses of parliament were amalgamated there would be a great saving. At the present time there are two post offices, under the jurisdiction of the respective Speakers. They should be amalgamated and placed under the direction of the Postmaster General. It is claimed by the post office authorities that the franking of mail matter of the Senate and the House of Commons each year would amount to approximately $55,000 or $60,000 if postage were paid. I admit that in the original plan the intention of the franking privilege was that members of the House of Commons should be able to conduct their correspondence relating to government work free of postage. And in view of the income tax that hon. members have to pay, it probably would be a hardship to abolish that privilege. They should be allowed a small amount for postage on their mail while parliament is in session. The present legislation regarding franking was enacted many years ago, and it applies to the other government departments as well. It reads as follows:

> All letters and other mailable matter addressed to or sent by the governor general, or sent to or by any department of the government at the seat of government, shall be free of Canada postage under such regulations as are, from time to time, made in that respect by governor in council.

Post office officials to whom I have talked at different times regarding this are of opinion that the abolition of the franking privilege of the House of Commons and the Senate would do more for economy and save more than any other single factor. To be sure, if none of the departments were free from postage it would probably mean taking money out of one pocket to put it in the other, but it would more than any other factor induce them to conserve and save. A few years ago the cost of mail sent out from the departments was approximately $750,000. That has increased to $2,500,000 and is increasing daily. So that if this franking privilege were abolished it would help more than any other factor to solve the problem of extravagance at Ottawa.

If freedom of speech is the bulwark of democracy, let us not talk it to death in this house. It is true that in the United States congress the members may send their speeches to the Speaker and have them printed in the record without the trouble of delivering or reading them in congress.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are not allowed to read them in the United States congress.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): But I understand they may be handed in.

Mr. MacNICOL: If a congressman wishes to speak he can rise in his place and make his address, but he is not permitted to read it.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Also if he wishes to have it taken as read he can hand it in. I am confident that seventy-five per cent of the speeches made in this house are not listened to at all except by the Hansard reporters.

Can one imagine why we should have two post offices in this building, manned by two separate staffs, one under the jurisdiction of the Speaker of the Senate, and the other under the jurisdiction of the House of Commons? If we do not change our rules regarding these houses of parliament, a wave of sentiment throughout the country will change our rules for us. I think that of all systems of government, ours, which is copied from the British parliamentary system, is the very worst. It was invented two hundred and fifty years ago to break the power of a parliament which was not disposed to do anything but compete for places on the treasury benches and raise money for war against Louis XIV.

I shall offer a few suggestions to the Minister of Finance and to this government which I think would go a long way to solve the question of what is wrong with our houses of parliament here in Ottawa.

The first is the amalgamation of the post offices in the parliament buildings into one and to place that one entirely under the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General. The second is the abolition of the free franking privilege of members of the House of Commons and the Senate as well as of all government departments. The third is the abolition of the senate or at least the reform of it. Members of the senate should retire at least at retiring age.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the rules do not permit speaking disrespectfully of the Senate.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I did not think I was speaking disrespectfully of them.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is pretty close to it.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Let me qualify it. I said at the start that I believe they are an honourable and capable body of men, but they are like a fifth wheel on a coach.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is going further than he intended. I suggest that he should not make any such reference.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Then I say that public sentiment believes that at least there should be a retiring age for the members of the senate, because every other public body has a retiring age. And fourth, I would say that there should be a change in the rules of this house so as to provide that private members must confine their speeches to twenty minutes instead of forty as is now the situation.

I am sorry if I have transgressed the rules, but I make these statements because I believe that we are abusing the privileges and rights that belong to us as a parliament.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am rather amused at the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie) who has just taken his seat. He went out of his way to reprimand other hon. members for speaking in such manner as would tend to give them publicity in their own constituency; yet I would think the speech of the hon. member would be a proper one to have been made in a Liberal caucus. That is where he should have his fights; after all, a Liberal government is in power and it is up to them to take measures to counteract the things of which the hon. member is complaining. Further, I wish to say that the members of our group never do speak for home consumption; they try to give something constructive.

It would appear from the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that farmers are to receive no increase in income despite the universally recognized fact that all costs of agricultural production have gone up. It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that agriculture is this nation's basic industry and that without a prosperous and virile agricultural population this country will never reach the height of prosperity that is so essential to the welfare of Canadians and so necessary to our war effort. Agriculture is also a vital war industry, just as truly as are those other industries which are producing the munitions of war, and I believe that unless we recognize that fact and face the problems of agriculture immediately, there is grave danger of an economic collapse on our food front. That is why I wish to direct my remarks this afternoon more particularly to agricultural matters, because in my opinion such a collapse on the agricultural front would be just as disastrous as a collapse in the manufacture of the munitions of war.

Such direction as the government has given agriculture so far has, in my opinion, resulted only in confusion, not only among the farmers but among the ministers of the crown themselves; and on account of this lack of proper direction the farmers are becoming desperate, for they see no solution of the problems with which they are faced. I think it is a well known fact that many leaders in agriculture are now coming to the point where they are implying, if not suggesting, that the only way in which agriculture can bring its problems definitely to the attention of the government is by going on a sitdown strike. That is not the best solution, yet for some reason or another it seems to be the only way in which not only agriculture but industry itself, and especially organized labour, can get results, either by the threat of a strike or by actually striking. That may not be the best thing to do, but I do not see how else the government is to be moved. That is not a healthy condition to have in this country.

One of the matters in which I am particularly interested is the problem of man-power. With this in mind I have gone over the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) as well as the budget speech of the Minister of Finance to try to find out what is the proposed man-power policy in regard to agriculture. I must confess that it is very confusing to me, as I am sure it must be equally confusing to the farmers of western Canada and, in fact, to the farmers throughout Canada as a whole. I am amazed at the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture toward the man-power problem. I think it is safe and fair to say that he does not fear the man-power problem at all, in fact that he sees no shortage of man-power on our farms. He is peculiar in that regard; certainly he is the only western man I know of who does not see that difficulty looming before us. On February 9 the minister made a speech dealing with this problem, and in the course of his remarks he referred to the large number of farmers and farmers' sons and daughters who had left the land and gone into other occupations, particularly in war industries. I wish to quote a few of his words, as they appear at page 269 of Hansard:

> Although we did that, what has been the result? Not long ago I was speaking in Saskatoon to a group of farmers. I had been asked the question that has been asked in the house on numerous occasions since this debate began: Is there going to be a labour shortage this year? I had to say that we had been building up our objectives year after year while the number of persons on the farms has been going down year by year; we have not yet reached the peak of production under these conditions, and until we have done so I cannot say with absolute assurance that lack of labour will prevent us from reaching our objectives this year.

I do not think I can be accused of being unfair when I say that the minister does not view the labour problem with alarm, for he says he is quite sure we shall reach our objectives this year without any additional farm help. He goes on to say:

I have this to say as well, and every member of this house, on both sides of the house, knows it is a fact. For eight years before this war started, boys and girls brought up on farms never intended to remain on the farm. They had been directed, from their childhood up, towards some other activity, but they found it impossible to get off the farm.

It is probably quite true that large numbers of people, particularly young people, were extremely anxious to leave the farms, but why? I think the answer should be obvious to the minister or to anyone. The reason was that there was not a decent living to be had on the farm for the farmer and his whole family. Agricultural conditions were such that they could not maintain a decent standard of living, and consequently they sought employment elsewhere. Then he goes on to say:

With regard to overall production, our farms to-day, with these 250,000 gone, are producing more than they ever produced before.

He is again emphasizing the fact that there is no danger from a man-power shortage, and he is so emphatic in that regard that he concludes his remarks with these words:

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that those of us who have been speaking on agriculture have been emphasizing the necessity for labour during the coming year. I am going to repeat that I have not been convinced by any arguments I have heard in the house, nor am I convinced by our experiences of the past, that we cannot reach the objectives which we have placed before the farmers of this country for this fourth year of war.

With that summary he definitely concludes his argument, saying that although we have asked for a much greater production from the farms in this, the fourth year of war, he sees no difficulty whatever in reaching that objective with the present labour on the farms, despite the fact that more than 250,000 people have left the land. But the Minister of Agriculture seems to have overlooked the fact that the only ones now left on the farm, as a result of government policy, are the more elderly people. All the young men have been conscripted for the army, and the young women have joined the armed forces as well. In some instances, of course, they have gone to industries. The result is that the only ones left are those people who are no longer young, who are not mechanically minded and who have never had any experience in operating tractors or combines. These are the developments in agriculture, and as a result farmers will face difficulties this year.

The Minister of Agriculture may say that we do not want our people to raise too much grain, and that he would like them to devote their time and energy to stock-raising. But if he takes that view I think he is definitely showing his ignorance in regard to farming because, without question, there is a great deal more work, especially in the winter time, when a farmer has to feed and water stock, whether it be cattle or hogs. If farmers are to increase their cattle and hog production, then they will have a great deal more labour than ever before was required on their farms. It seems strange that the minister does not realize that in the west to-day the farmers face a peculiar situation. I believe I am conservative when I say that at least forty-five per cent of crops are still out, and unthreshed. The reason why the grain is still out is that, through government policy, the young men have been taken off the farms. Last fall, when threshing operations were in progress, there were not sufficient young men to make full crews on threshing machines. The result was that the rate of threshing was greatly reduced. With the early fall—and I am not blaming the government for that—over forty-five per cent of the crop was left to lie under the snow.

But the minister disregards that entirely. He says quite definitely the farmers do not need to worry about help on their farms, because they have sufficient help now. That is his statement, despite the fact that over 250,000 have been taken off the farms. That is one point of view.

I said a moment ago that there has been confusion in the government itself, among cabinet ministers, in regard to the man-power problem. I should like to prove that assertion, and I believe I can do it to the satisfaction of the house. I have set out the view of the Minister of Agriculture in regard to this problem. Now for a few moments I shall refer to what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has had to say. As I read the minister's statements in regard to man-power I believe the remarks made by the last speaker were appropriate when he said that much of this stuff was just for purposes of propaganda. I believe the proposals of the Minister of Labour were mostly that.

Hon. members will recall that when the minister spoke on February 26, as reported at page 741 of Hansard, he referred to his concern about the question of man-power, and read a special letter on this subject from Mr. MacNamara which had been sent out to the boards. The minister was turning his attention here, there and everywhere in an endeavour to find men for the farms. Why? Why was the Minister of Labour so anxious to get men for the farms this summer when the minister in charge of agriculture—the Minister of Agriculture himself—says there is no danger whatsoever? It would appear that the Minister of Labour has not consulted the Minister of Agriculture in this regard—either that or he is woefully ignorant of the facts.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think a statement like that is very elevating, when the hon. member does not even know what he is talking about.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We will just see about that. Let the Minister of Labour keep his ears open, and he will find out. I think the Minister of Labour will agree with me that the Minister of Agriculture does not view with the least bit of alarm the man-power problem on the farms. I do not hear the minister make any remark on the point, and accordingly I take his silence as consent.

Mr. MITCHELL: And you do not need to do that, either.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not know whether your opinion would be worth very much, when contrasted with that of the Minister of Agriculture. But I am trying to show the contention of the Minister of Labour, and I hope he will—

Mr. MITCHELL: To be fair—and you started this argument—the conclusion in my hon. friend's mind is not in the mind of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I will put the facts on Hansard, and hon. members can judge for themselves. I do not think anyone will doubt what I said with regard to the stand taken by the Minister of Agriculture.

Now then, let us see what the Minister of Labour had to say in regard to the regulations concerning man-power. I have said he was looking here, there and everywhere else; and I am convinced it was mostly propaganda stuff. I say that because this is his solution: He is going to take boys and girls from the schools, and put them on the farms. Why put boys and girls from the schools on the farms if they are not needed? Anyone who has worked on a farm knows it is not a summer resort. We tried that plan out to a degree last year, and it was successful only to a certain extent. But those of us from the west know that the young people who went from eastern Canada to work on the western farms, despite their willingness—and I am not questioning that for a moment—just did not know how to go about their work. If the Minister of Labour thinks for a minute that these young and inexperienced people, some of whom never saw a cow in their lives, and the great majority of whom did not know how to run a combine or how to work efficiently, were sufficient to answer the need, then I say he is mistaken. Some of them did not know how to handle a fork. True, they were earnest, and some worked almost to the point of exhaustion; but even then they did not accomplish much.

Despite their work, over 45 per cent of the crop is now under the snow. I believe I have given sufficient proof that that policy will not work; and yet that is where the Minister of Labour is to get his help for the farms. If that does not work, what will he do? He will put prisoners of war and internees to work on the farms. I suggest that in doing so, he is just beating around the bush, and that he is not really serious in his attempt to solve the problem—if there is a problem, because the Minister of Agriculture says there is not.

It may be necessary to put some of those people on the farms, but I suggest that the Minister of Labour will have difficulty in doing it. There might not be the same danger from using prisoners of war on farms as there would be from using them in industrial plants. But certainly the element of danger is not eliminated. We know that a prisoner of war could just as effectively interfere with agricultural production as he could with production in industry. For instance, it would be very simple for one of them to ruin a tractor in ten minutes. He could destroy a combine and thereby impair the efficiency of agricultural production. There again I fear the Minister of Labour will have difficulties. Whether he believes seriously that either of the two procedures I have mentioned are sufficient to settle the man-power question, or that they will be effective, I cannot say. But from a practical point of view his suggestion does not appear sound to me.

If that does not work—and, you see, these are all so vague; all these propositions by the Minister of Labour are just straw men to take care of a problem the Minister of Agriculture says does not exist—the Minister of Labour will try something else. If that does not work he will draft the conscientious objectors. If that does not work he will take men from the reserve army who can establish that they are urgently needed on the farms. It is not up to the farmers, but up to the individuals themselves, to establish that they are urgently needed on the farms. These men whom he will take and put to work on the farms are men in the lower medical categories who have been rejected for the army on account of physical unfitness. In all seriousness I suggest to the Minister of Labour—I cannot believe that he has ever been on a farm—that a farm is no health resort, and if the farmers are to be compelled to take these men who are physically unfit the minister will find himself in difficulty again. I can speak from practical experience, and I wish to assure him that work on the farm requires a healthy body. It is exceedingly heavy work; the hours are very long. If a man is not in good physical condition he simply cannot stand up to the strain, and agricultural production will suffer in consequence.

I come now to the last suggestion, and it amuses me as I am sure it did the Minister of Labour himself when he put it down. His last suggestion is the temporary closing of manufacturing plants. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we have not reached the stage where we have to close down our production plants in order to take care of the man-power shortage on the farms. Does that indicate careful planning? Surely the Minister of Labour is not serious in his suggestion that our production plants must close down. If so, why? It is true that at Calgary two or three hundred men have been laid off work at the Ogden shops and it is likely that more men will be laid off there. But if we have to start to close down our production plants to take care of the labour shortage on the farm, then definitely there must be something wrong with our production planning. I cannot think that the Minister of Labour is serious in that suggestion. I have a clipping here from the Ottawa Journal of February 25, 1943, which, discussing the minister's emergency farm labour plan, says:

> Most drastic feature of the farm labour programme was the plan for the calling up for agricultural service men now in low medical categories. It was believed that the men drafted for this work would draw army pay—not less than $45 per month and full maintenance—to be paid by the farmers employing them.

If that is true, and I do not hear the Minister of Labour contradicting it—the Minister of Labour can take this as a joke, but the farmers do not consider it a joke—

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not taking it as a joke. It is my hon. friend.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do say that either the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Agriculture cannot be serious about this man-power shortage on the farms when he would make this recommendation. He is going to make the farmer pay $45 a month, plus all maintenance charges, for men in low medical categories who take up farm work despite the fact that we cannot have any increased prices for agricultural products and despite the fact that the farmer is able to sell only so many bushels under the quota system. If that does not work, the minister will then see what he can do about sending the women out to work on the farms. If that does not show a sad state of confusion over this man-power shortage problem I should like to know what would. I suggest to the Minister of Labour and to the Minister of Agriculture that if they want to learn the best way to solve agricultural problems, let them consult the farmers themselves. Then they will get a solution. It is not sufficient for these two ministers to disregard the farmers as not knowing how to handle their own problems. When an industrial problem comes up you go to the industrialists, and properly so. I wonder what the business men, the industrialists who are producing war supplies, would say if the government went to them and said: If you want any more help, any green hands to train in your factory, you must bear all that expense alone—you must pay them so much per month, plus their maintenance. Why, they simply would not pay any attention to the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Agriculture or anybody else because that is not the way in which business is done. That is not the way in which business has been done since the beginning of this war. When we were training men for war industry, almost without exception every war contract was on a cost-plus basis; when green hands were sent into these war industries to be trained, that expense was added to the cost of producing the product, and the industries got their profit on top of those costs.

I should like to read a letter in regard to the difficulties of agriculture with respect to man-power. This letter comes to me from men who are right at the source of the trouble and know what they are talking about. It is from the Drumheller board of trade. These men are business men and farmers. They are right on the ground and know their own problems, and I would suggest that the Minister of Labour pay some heed to this. The letter is addressed to myself, and is dated, Drumheller, February 6, 1943. It reads:

> Our board have written Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture), Hon. J. A. MacKinnon (Minister of Trade and Commerce) and Hon.

Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour), pointing out the serious situation in the big Drumheller agricultural district as regards the unharvested 1942 crop and seeking their co-operation in having sufficient men released from the Canadian forces to assist in taking off the balance of the 1942 crop as soon as it is possible to get at this work.

A survey of the situation would go to show that there is about 45 per cent of the 1942 crop in this district yet to be harvested, while some of the farmers were only able to harvest 10 per cent of their 1942 crop before the early winter set in and made further harvest work impossible.

Of course, so many farm workers enlisted or took war jobs, while the outstanding record of enlistments from this valley and the shortage of coal miners made it impossible to replace these men on the farms. Then, again, labour from outside was impossible to secure. Bad harvest weather and an extra early winter put the finishing touches on one of the most disappointing harvest seasons in our district's history.

However, you know the situation in Alberta and it is not necessary to elaborate further, but the main point is that the only solution, in our board's opinion, is to release a sufficient number of men from the Canadian forces to make possible the harvesting of the balance of the 1942 crop and that arrangements should be made right away so that when it is possible to do this work there will be no delay in dispatching the necessary men to the various points in the prairie provinces.

This work must be done before the regular spring work and if a plan is adopted now and the machinery created so that when the call goes out for men, then things will run smoothly.

Naturally, the problem is being considered at Ottawa at the present time—

They ought to know in what manner it is being considered.

—but it must not be forgotten that there is a shortage of men on the farms right now and even if no more farmers or farm workers are called up the farmers will not be able to cope with the 1942 crop situation unless they get the assistance along the lines our board suggests. The unharvested 1942 crop is too vital to the nation not to be harvested in its entirety.

Thanking you in advance for your usual kind cooperation in this urgent and important matter, I am, upon behalf of our board,

Faithfully yours,
John A. Mackay,
Secretary.

These men realize the difficulty and are pointing it out to the government. Here we have one cabinet minister saying that there is no danger at all; that we shall produce this much larger crop than we have ever asked for before; that we shall reach the maximum of production for 1943, and that no more farm help is needed. But these men who are right on the ground know differently. The other day the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) outlined a questionnaire which was sent from the municipal district of Wainwright, in a different part of the country altogether, and they have the same idea. I will not take time to put the questionnaire on Hansard, because the house is already informed of it.

I wish now to turn my attention for a while to parity prices, because I find just as much confusion in the government ranks over this matter as there is over the man-power problem—and goodness knows that is bad enough. Let us see what has happened in this country regarding agricultural prices since this Liberal government took office in 1935. I recall that when we came to this house in that year the price of wheat was 87½ cents a bushel. But immediately this government reduced it to 80 cents. Then an act was brought down to make it 60 cents; then it was raised to 70 cents, and afterwards it was changed from 70 cents to 90 cents. Those hon. members who were in the house a few years ago will recall that Professor Hope, of the university of Saskatchewan, who carried on an investigation of farm prices, stated that when you took into consideration the interest charges which farmers have to pay, the price of wheat should be at least 95 cents a bushel at the point of production.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member will agree with me when I point out to him that, when he says there was an "act" brought down, it will be interpreted to mean that the house passed a bill which became an act. There was a bill before the house, but it did not become an act or legislation.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I accept the minister's correction; he is right.

The social credit party has on the order paper a resolution asking that at least one dollar a bushel be paid for wheat at the local elevator. I think that is only fair. The amount is not sufficient; it should be more, but at least that should be a basis to start upon. The Minister of Agriculture knows that that is not very much to give our farmers. I have under my hand a clipping from the Western Producer of January 21, 1943, which I will not take time to read, but which states that in the United States they are paying $1.13 a bushel, including some storage charges, at the local shipping point in the form of an advance. Note that that is only an advance, and the situation of their farmers bears no comparison to ours, who receive only 90 cents. It must be understood, too, that the 90 cents is for wheat at Fort William, and the freight in some districts is as high as 21 cents. That is not an average, but I understand it is even higher than that at some points. On everything western farmers sell they have to pay the freight; that is, it is taken out of the price they get; and to everything they buy, freight is added. I ask the minister how long our munitions industries would put up with conditions like that. He knows as well as I do that no industrialist in this country would consider for five minutes a set-up of that kind. They have told the government, and they told me when I visited their plants, that they intend to have the cost of production, and when they speak of the cost of production there is no fooling about it. All the freight charges, depreciation, insurance, and everything else one can think of—even the heating and lighting of the plant—are included, and on top of that they get a clear profit. Surely such discrimination is bound to end in disaster, and the government is directly responsible for such neglect and anything which may result from it.

I was interested in the minister's proposal to appeal to the government for increased prices, because I am sure he realizes that the farmers are not getting enough; otherwise he would not have said that he intended to appeal for an increase in prices.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not what I said.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Parity.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say "prices".

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Increased revenue, was it—income? Well, that is money anyway. But the Minister of Agriculture knows he is knocking his head against a rock wall. Nobody knows that better than he does. He says, as reported in Hansard, at page 273:

> I am going to make an appeal to the government—and I am sure it will be listened to—

I do not think he was serious in that.

> —to give as high returns as possibly can be given for the commodities that are produced—

And this is the sticker:

> —always keeping in mind the fact that funds must be found for other things as well as for paying for food.

Surely the Minister of Agriculture has not forgotten the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) not so long ago when he said that money was not going to stand in the way of production. He has not forgotten that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said that the only limit to our production will be the natural resources, the materials and the man-power. Yet the minister is trying, I was about to say, to put a little propaganda across in his constituency, but he would not do that; he is holding up the bait, the carrot, in front of the farmers, and he says "I am going to appeal to the treasury for more money for you." But he knows quite well that he will not get it. He knows quite well that the Minister of Finance, speaking in Toronto a while ago, is reported to have said that Ontario farmers could not get adequate prices for their farm products without this causing disastrous inflation. If we stabilize farm prices, I would ask the minister, would that ruin our financial system? He knows better than that. Certainly it would not. If it does, it is a complete condemnation of our financial system.

Let me read for the guidance of the Minister of Agriculture what the Minister of Finance had to say in his budget speech. He said, as reported in Hansard, at page 845:

> Receipts from the sale of farm products are reported to have reached a higher level in 1942 than in any year in the past two decades. Receipts from the sale of farm products are not equivalent to farm income. Farm costs have also risen but there is very evidence that farm incomes are at more remunerative levels than in any but the record years.

The Minister of Finance is definitely stating that the farmers do not need any more because they have a higher income than they ever had before. He continues:

> Average weekly earnings of employed persons are at higher levels than they have been since the inflation boom following the war of 1914-1918. Thus there has been a far-reaching and important change in the distribution of income in the country. On the whole, the directions of the change have been desirable and the government has welcomed and facilitated it. The increases, by and large, have gone to those who needed them most.

He does not say that they have gone to agriculture. But this is the point:

> But we have reached the point where the demands of some labour representatives and of some farm representatives cannot both be satisfied.

When you combine with this the statement which the Minister of Finance made in Toronto, I am afraid the Minister of Agriculture knows he will have no success.

I wanted to deal with the argument which the Minister of Agriculture put up in regard to parity prices, and in the little time which remains to me I wish to put on Hansard two statements on this matter. One is the definition of the Minister of Agriculture. This is what he said, as reported in Hansard, at page 272 as regards parity definition, and I quite agree with him:

> Parity price is the price of the commodity which will give a purchasing power with respect to articles the farmer buys equivalent to the purchasing power of such commodity in the base period.

I do not think there is any argument on that definition. But I will now state, right after that, what is contained in the Searle Grain company's letter, their index with regard to parity prices:

The Searle index of the cost of things farmers buy (147 items) now stands at 153·7 (1913-14 equals 100). This means that these same things cost farmers of the west at the present time 53·7 per cent more than did similar items of the same quality in 1913-14. (These costs have risen 17·3 per cent since August, 1939.) The price of wheat is now 5·5 per cent higher than it was in 1913-14. The purchasing power of a bushel of wheat is now, therefore, only 68·6 per cent of what it was in 1913-14.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I shall conclude with these remarks, Mr. Speaker. The minister's definition of parity may be quite sound, but when you compare that with the Searle index, which has been carefully compiled for years past, even the hard-headedness of the Minister of Agriculture should permit him to see clearly that agriculture cannot continue producing under the cost of production. No industry, I do not care whether it is agriculture or munitions or anything else, can carry on indefinitely under the strain that agriculture is under without at least having its cost of production. As long as that condition exists you will have people leaving the farms, and this situation will be aggravated all the more. Therefore I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he get in touch with the Minister of Labour and come to an agreement on this man-power policy, and then get in touch with the Minister of Finance and arrange to give the farmer his cost of production plus a fair commission.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this budget has been received favourably by the people of Canada from one ocean to the other. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stands high in the estimation of the Canadian people, and I believe he will stand even higher when the purport of this budget is thoroughly understood. His last words in his budget speech were, as reported at page 864 of Hansard:

Our soldiers, our sailors, or airmen will do their part. They are well trained; they are well equipped; they are well led; their courage and devotion are beyond praise. But what they achieve, they cannot achieve alone. It must be shared by the farmer at his work, the mechanic in the shop, the housewife in her home—in short, by every Canadian. Their achievements will be shared by each Canadian who, this year, and to the end of the war, carries out unswervingly, skilfully, relentlessly the watchwords of this budget: work and save.

I desire to bring to the attention of the house one or two problems which I believe are important at the present time. The output of the average Canadian worker in every sphere of industry is lessened by one factor which definitely can be reduced. I refer to ill health. The national industrial conference board in the United States estimates that the average worker loses about ten days a year on account of sickness. The "Personnel Journal" of November, 1943, estimated that the cost of these losses to the industry and the worker is around $70 a year.

Here in Canada we have the health league which has estimated that the average Canadian worker loses about nine days a year on account of sickness and industrial accidents, and about one-half day a year on account of occupational accidents. In Alberta the workmen's compensation board kept careful records for years of the causes of accidents, and then measures were taken to eliminate those causes. In that way the number of accidents has been reduced greatly. Macy's store in New York put into operation a sickness prevention programme which reduced absenteeism from 4·56 per cent in 1928 to 2·44 per cent in 1937. The cost of such a preventive programme was about $4 per worker.

Every war industry in Canada should have trained supervision, and causes of illness and accidents should be carefully recorded. In one plant absenteeism from ordinary colds was greatly reduced just by shutting off drafts. Nutrition should be supervised as well as rest periods, sanitation, hours of work, the ability of a worker to stand the stress and strain of his work, the causes of infection and all such matters. Every industry should arrange for periodic medical examinations because it is only in that way that men can be kept up to efficiency.

Modern research has reduced mortality and morbidity in typhoid fever, tuberculosis, appendicitis, scarlet fever, diphtheria and so on, and these diseases no longer are the dread things they were. The new sulfa drugs when given under supervision usually have a magical effect in lessening the virulence and shortening the duration of such things as tonsilitis, pneumonia, meningitis, gas gangrene and a long list of infectious troubles. Cancer has been the great scourge of the human race since the dawn of recorded history. If reported early, provided it is in an accessible place, X-ray, surgery or radium will generally bring about a cure.

In ending this portion of my remarks, I want to bring to the attention of the house one disease which at the present time might well be called the captain of the men of death. I refer to heart disease. Statistics do not always give a true picture, but one large life insurance company found that of 100,000 policyholders the death rate in 1922 from heart disease was 92·6, whereas in 1938 it had risen to 195·1. The three structures, the heart, the arteries and the kidneys, are subject to the same diseases and usually there is the same tragic end. Statistics have been assembled from 190 life insurance companies, and it is shown that from twenty-four to thirty-nine per cent of deaths are from heart trouble. The causes of heart trouble are given as over-eating, overdrinking, lack of exercise, lack of rest, anxiety, noise, focal infection and the stress and strain of modern life. Undoubtedly each of these causes has some effect, although the precise effect has not been demonstrated. Therefore careful records should be kept to estimate the effect of each of these causes upon this very serious disease. I believe I am voicing the opinion of millions of men and women when I say that man's years upon this earth are far too few, and that the days of youth and usefulness pass all too rapidly. The frailties of age, the effects of disease come on before the fulfilment of many worthy tasks, and therefore the experience and skill and knowledge of many people are lost before their work is completed.

To turn now to another point, at this time there surely can be no argument against the statement that irrigation is very necessary in order to make agriculture as productive as it should be. It is nearly one hundred years since large irrigation schemes were started in the United States. During the last fifty years irrigation has been developed on a large scale. We can take the Grand Coulee scheme in the state of Washington where a million acres have been put under water. We have heard lately a good deal about India. Britain's greatest accomplishment in India was the building of irrigation schemes. The same applies to Egypt. The Arabs have a saying that "all sunshine makes a desert", and we know that where the sun shines almost continuously very little will grow unless other factors are brought into play. Long experience in southern Alberta has shown that the wet years come so seldom that it is not possible to depend upon moisture from the sky and the moisture must be obtained in some other way. The great areas of abandoned land and the many deserted buildings indicating blighted hopes, impoverishment and despair amply prove this statement. In southern Alberta there are about half a million acres under water; there is sufficient water, and other conditions are favourable to irrigate two million acres. But it is impossible for private capital to carry out this work. It has been shown and is now accepted as a recognized principle that the initial capital cost of irrigation must largely come from public money. The Wilson report in the United States and the Ewing report in Canada amply and abundantly bear out this statement.

I desire to bring to the attention of the house the possibilities of just two of these schemes. The Canada land and irrigation scheme, including the Redcliff Ronalane scheme, was originally started by British capital. The original plan was to settle some 530,000 acres, of which 200,000 acres were irrigable. About 42,000 acres of this have been under water for a great many years in what is called the Vauxhall district, but the whole scheme has not been completed and the cost of completing it and bringing an additional 157,000 acres under cultivation would be only about $2,500,000, or from $17 to $18 an acre. The intake of this district is from the Bow river about thirty miles east of Calgary. There have been constructed a great artificial lake, reservoirs, and a canal about a hundred miles long. If we allow eighty acres of irrigated land and 160 acres of dry land for each settler, that district would make homes for 2,000 farmers, returned soldiers who have indicated that they wish to go farming, or farmers who could be moved from the marginal areas where they are subject to devastating drought and uncertainty.

The other scheme is one which has received unreservedly the recommendation of a committee appointed by this government. That committee reported in February, 1942. It consisted of Mr. Victor Meek, controller of the water and power bureau at Ottawa; Mr. George Spence, director of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; and Mr. William Hunter of the accounts branch of the Department of Finance. A thorough investigation was made. It is the St. Mary and Milk river scheme. Those rivers run through both Canada and the United States, and the use of their waters is controlled by the joint international waterways commission. It is governed of course by treaty between Great Britain and the United States. This committee found that up to 1940 the United States people had constructed irrigation works sufficient to make full use of their share of the waters and also make full use of the unused Canadian share. Accordingly the committee recommended that the people of Canada should at once construct works to make beneficial use of this water because it would supply districts which now have not sufficient water, and would bring 345,000 acres under the ditch.

If the scheme were completed it would do much to balance production, so that we would not have so much wheat on our farms. It would be a great blessing to the farmers, to the community life of the district, and to the province and the whole dominion. About $15,000,000 would be required to bring 345,000 acres under irrigation. If the dominion put up $7,000,000 for the main reservoir and connecting canals and the provinces did the rest, it would cost them $8,000,000, part of which could be recovered.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the hon member if the reservoir areas are available to store the surplus water?

Mr. GERSHAW: Yes, at Spring Coulee there is a reservoir site. It would take about three years to construct a reservoir. The scheme has been carefully gone over by engineers, is considered feasible in every way and would bring an enormous area under water.

The value of the live stock marketed in Alberta in 1941 amounted to $65,000,000, and the amount for grain, hay and seeds was only $62,500,000. Of every five hogs shipped to Great Britain in that year from Canada two came from Alberta. But a purely agricultural province is weak from an economic point of view. Irrigation would help to maintain the balance between industry and farming; sugar production could be proceeded with, as well as the canning of fruits and vegetables, the finishing of cattle instead of shipping them as feeders, the manufacture of commercial milk and so forth.

Some one may say, But the Canadian Pacific Railway Company spent millions there and never recovered it from the sale of land. That is true, but at the same time the Canadian Pacific Railway turned a great unproductive area into one where there are attractive and comfortable homes, thus greatly increasing the traffic over their road. Before they went in, when you drove over the prairie the air was dry; the cattle were thin; the vegetation was sparse and the dust rose in clouds. After irrigation was put in, you could see comfortable homes surrounded by grass, trees, shrubs and flowers. Small fruits could be grown; dairy products could be produced for the farmer and his family. Some will say that the provincial governments had to take over the bonds of some of those districts, to the extent of $6,138,500. That is true, but it is also true that during the drought years, from 1931 to 1938, various governments spent not $6,000,000 but $51,000,000 for relief, none of which went to the irrigated districts. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act some $2,000,000 is collected through the one per cent tax on grain, but in the average year about $12,000,000 is spent under that legislation in connection with crop failures.

I bring these matters to the attention of the house because they are necessary to bear in mind if we are to have a maximum war effort and also for the welfare of the post-war period, which we now see so dimly and in so many colours. When the Titanic was sinking, a woman who had found a place in a lifeboat asked for three minutes in order to return to her cabin. There she saw her diamonds and jewels, but she reached past all those to grasp three oranges. Disaster had struck the Titanic and in a twinkling all values had changed. Now a storm is abroad in the world; values are being transformed, and the really precious, worth-while treasures are being appreciated and recognized.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I seem to be a handy man to have around the house at times, when others are not prepared to go on. I want to say a few words about the budget, since I come from a city that is now the manufacturing, financial and industrial metropolis of Canada, which has surpassed the great city of Montreal and become the first city of the dominion, but before doing so I should like to refer to one other matter.

To-day I had occasion to ask one of the ministers a question, in a desire to encourage him in his work. Before the war, when the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) was Minister of National Defence, he brought down increased estimates covering the army and navy, and I was one of those who supported those estimates, because I saw the war coming. Those estimates were opposed by a great many hon. members on the other side of the house in 1937, 1938 and 1939. Since the beginning of the war I have believed in giving the government of the day all possible support, because they are the government and need encouragement. Our forces on land and sea and in the air have been magnificent. The history of courage has been gloriously rewritten in this war by those young Canadians who are serving in our armed forces and by the splendid showing of our navy.

During the session of 1937 I quoted Jeremiah for the benefit of some of our pacifists who believed in disarmament, and for some of my hon. friends from the province of Quebec. You will remember that he said, "Where are now your prophets that prophesied unto you, saying that the king of Babylon would not come against you, nor against this land?" Now we see what has happened since in the St. Lawrence. I sympathize with the hon. gentleman who is head of our department of naval services; he is not to blame, but I must say that a year ago I pointed out to him the condition that had been found by General de Gaulle around St. Pierre and Miquelon and in the gulf of St. Lawrence and the German submarines there. General de Gaulle warned Canada and the United States. Mr. Churchill happened to be in Washington at the time, in December, 1941, and the United States ambassador to Britain, Mr. Winant, cabled Washington in regard to certain occurrences in the gulf of St. Lawrence at St. Pierre and Miquelon. An attempt was made by Mr. Cordell Hull to prevent any joint statement being made in Canada in this connection, but Mr. Churchill sided with General de Gaulle, and Mr. Roosevelt also gave out a joint statement from the White House, overruling Mr. Hull. When Mr. Churchill was here he said that he believed ninety-five per cent of the people of France were with General de Gaulle and the free French movement.

At that time I also told the minister that we were in danger of being invaded; as the axis had submarines capable of crossing the Atlantic without refuelling; and all during the sessions of 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939, until the war started, speaking from the place now occupied by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) I asked if we were to wait until the enemy came up the St. Lawrence by land, by sea and in the air and blew up the citadel before doing anything to defend ourselves. I referred to and gave a record of the submarine menace during the last war, and pointed out the grave danger of invasion which faced Canada at that time. I do not see very many of the newspaper columnists in the press gallery to-day. Perhaps I should first have asked their permission to speak, but I do not need any dictation from one or two of the newspaper columnists at times. Now we have the present situation on our hands in the St. Lawrence.

As you know sir, Mr. Lyttelton, the very able minister of production in Britain, spoke in New York on armistice day, November 11, 1942, and warned the United States and the allies of the very grave danger in connection with sinkings in the Atlantic and the approaches to North America. On February 24 I placed his full statement on Hansard. We are building ships, but as fast as they are built they are sunk. We are trying to get the people on our farms to produce more food, but the ships carrying that food are being sent to the bottom. Mr. Lyttelton referred in New York to that magnificent armada, consisting of 500 merchant ships and 350 warships to Morocco and Algiers by means of which the north African campaign was started and went on to say that this armada was escorted to North Africa by 120 escort ships. What has been the result? Those 120 escort ships cannot get back to the north Atlantic again, because they are needed in the Mediterranean. We have seen the magnificent victories achieved by General Montgomery, General Alexander and General Wavell, who has been called by the Russian generals at Stalingrad the greatest marvel in all military history. The other day in this house one hon. gentleman said that the advance achieved in North Africa had been an Anglo-American advance. It was not. The advance across Libya, a distance of 1,600 miles, was made by the 8th army under the command of General Montgomery, General Alexander and General Anderson. But an increased strain has been placed upon Atlantic shipping as a result of that north African armada, because, as you know, ships are still being sent, as they have been for over three years around the cape of Good Hope, a distance of ten thousand miles. The distance through the Mediterranean is only three thousand miles, so that you can see the great saving that would be made if that route could be kept open for food and munitions to the far east. The cost of that African armada was phenomenal, and it has had a great bearing on the number of sinkings that have taken place in the Atlantic, because the best part of it, the Anglo-American fleet, was formerly on north Atlantic war convoy work, and we are thus short, and the submarine menace is very grave, since we yet have not found a solution to the new German U-boat that hunts at night in packs on the convoys and does not appear in daytime on the surface. The war is lost unless this is solved, and we cannot do anything until the allies regain command of the sea.

They now have to defend the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Mediterranean. They are up against the axis fleet, and the air force of the axis powers. In addition to that, the whole question of submarine warfare had been changed by Germany, who saw in it, with all the coast from Norway to Spain, a chance, with a new type of submarine, to win the war. No war is the same as the last one. Submarine warfare at the time of the last war nearly cost the allies the victory.

There have been references to sinkings in the St. Lawrence river, and off St. Pierre, twenty miles from Newfoundland, and this has become a problem. This is one of the main reasons why the allies should immediately try to get bases in Eire. Since the beginning of this war we did not have those bases. We had them in the last war, and the submarine menace, even with them there, nearly cost us the war. I say those bases should be immediately secured. They belong to our empire. The United States has asked for them, and so has Britain. Cities such as Cardiff, Coventry, Plymouth, Bristol and Birmingham have had their houses destroyed, and thousands of men, women and children have perished for lack of those bases, and our ships have to take the more dangerous north passage. I favour taking them, or the battle of the Atlantic may be lost, since we would have lost the last war without them.

Mr. Churchill made a statement with respect to U-boats on September 27, 1939. We had a submarine menace at the time of the last war, and we have a much more grave one in this war. Germany was quick to realize that she did not have a navy; she got one presented to her by the United States isolationist policy for two years, with the result that she developed new types of submarines, and we have had great loss of shipping in the Atlantic. Speaking on September 27, 1939, in the House of Commons, London, he said:

> I see how much greater are the defences which we possess to-day in coping with the U-boat than we did in the first U-boat campaign twenty-five years ago. In those days there were moments when the problem seemed well nigh insoluble. Very often to hunt down a U-boat it was necessary to use a flotilla of fifteen or twenty vessels working together for a whole day on the vaguest indication. Now two destroyers or even one can maintain a prolonged and relentless pursuit.

This new equipment and the thorough training which the navy's light craft had had in this particular duty made it possible for a heavy toll to be taken of the U-boats from the start.

With regard to the present situation in the St. Lawrence of twenty or thirty, or I know not how many sunk, may I say that I warned the minister a year ago about the situation at St. Pierre and Miquelon, and in reply he said that he would find out what the situation was.

The submarines that operated there last December were from the Canadian Atlantic. We have never heard a word as to St. Pierre and Miquelon from that day to this. General de Gaulle sent Admiral Muselier at the request of the inhabitants to seize these islands. Mr. Hull pleaded the Monroe doctrine; Canada wavered. Mr. Churchill, standing here where our respected clerk, Doctor Beauchesne sits, said that the name of the Free French will be held and is being held in increasing respect by nine Frenchmen out of ten.

Rear Admiral H. G. Thursfield, one of the greatest authorities, is a man upon whom Mr. Churchill has been relying for advice. In an article in the February, 1943, issue of the National Review he discusses the U-boat menace and its solution. He points out that unless we solve the new U-boat situation in the Atlantic, the war is lost. There can be no doubt about that fact. This Admiral said:

> There can be little doubt now that the German rape of Norway was a part of this plan, designed to provide the German navy with secure bases which were not dominated geographically by the British isles. The conquest of France fitted into the plan, too, as was shown by Hitler's contemptuous exemption of Vichien France from occupation, and his seizure only of France's Atlantic coastal provinces. By June, 1940, German U-boats had at their disposal both the fjords of Norway and the French harbours of the bay of Biscay whence they could reach the open Atlantic without the necessity of running the gauntlet through the North sea or English channel. Moreover, German possession of the Danish, Dutch, Belgian and northern French coasts gave them more or less sheltered corridors by which their ships and U-boats could reach those advanced bases from Germany with a fair measure of safety and immunity from serious British interruption.

The article then goes on to refer to the number of ships which had been sunk. The statement was given out in Washington where Mr. Churchill said that we are not yet destroying U-boats as fast as new ones are being put into service by Germany. That was stated by Mr. Churchill last September, and repeated by a Washington naval authority last month, January, 1943. The result is that the number of U-boats is still increasing. The same Washington authority put the number operating in the Atlantic in the middle of January, 1943, at one hundred, which would indicate at least some four hundred in service altogether. That figure is borne out by the experiences of a homeward bound allies Atlantic convoy early in December, the story of which was released a month later in January last. It was attacked over and over again throughout four days and nights, and no less than thirty-five actions were fought against U-boats, in the course of which two of them were almost certainly sunk, and others damaged. The names of the ships were given out by Rear Admiral H. G. Thursfield in this article and also by the British and United States press. It was stated that the British destroyer, H.M.S. Fame and corvette H.M.S. Vervain, the Polish destroyer O.R.P. Burza and the Norwegian corvettes H.N.M.S. Eglantine, Rose and Potentilla all took part in the defence, as well as aircraft of the coastal command and of the United States Navy. Yet the convoy referred to did not escape without some loss.

The intensity of the attacks on this occasion clearly indicates that a large number of U-boats must have been engaged, a number quite compatible with the 100 throughout the Atlantic mentioned in Washington. That number is still growing, and will grow. Goebbels has forecast 1,000 U-boats in service this year, and indeed that fantastic figure might almost eventually be reached if we do not succeed in achieving a rate of destruction greater than the rate of new production by Germany. It will not suffice merely to beat off the attacks which U-boats make on convoys. The U-boats themselves must be destroyed at an increasing rate if the battle of the seas is to be won, and without the allies regaining command of the sea, the war cannot be won.

On motion of Mr. Church the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 11, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FEED AND COARSE GRAINS—FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. BRUNELLE:

Since the inception of the freight assistance scheme on feed grains or coarse grains, (a) what quantity of oats and barley has been shipped from the west to each of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; (b) what is the amount of the total transportation cost paid by the dominion government to each of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; (c) can such feed grains be shipped to an individual purchaser, or is it necessary that it be shipped to an agricultural company, association or society; (d) what proportion of the freight does the dominion government pay on feed grains shipped from Fort William to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER:

(a) To February 28, 1943—

	Ontario (Bushels)	Quebec (Bushels)
Oats	10,871,840	8,627,913
Barley	7,586,059	6,946,522

(b) Transportation costs on feed grains up to February 28, 1943—

Ontario	$4,292,674 20

(c) The freight assistance may be applied for by an individual purchaser. If a farmer brings grain from the west and conforms to the regulations, there is a special form provided upon which he makes application for the amount of freight assistance to which he may be entitled.

(d) The amount of freight assistance on grain moving to Ontario and Quebec is based upon $4.50 per ton for points within the Montreal freight rate zone. Where the point of delivery normally takes a rate higher than the Montreal rate, the balance of the through carlot rate as published in the railroad freight tariffs is paid.

REQUIREMENT AS TO TAKING FLOUR WITH PURCHASES OF BRAN AND COARSE MEAL IN QUEBEC

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Is the government aware that for each load of bran and coarse meal sold to the retailer or farmer in Quebec, the vendors of these grains require the purchaser to take at the same time 150 sacks of flour?

2. If so, do the same conditions prevail in the other provinces?

3. If not, will the government take steps to put a stop to this condition of affairs in Quebec?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The government is aware that for some years millfeeds have been sold to dealer subject to orders for flour. The practice varies seasonally to some extent depending upon supply and demand for millfeeds. Under present conditions the demand for millfeeds exceeds the supply including millfeeds derived from the milling of wheat into flour for export.

2. Similar conditions prevail in other provinces.

3. Answered by number two.

CHARLES S. HENLEY

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Is Charles S. Henley in the employ of the Department of Labour in the province of British Columbia?

2. If so, what is his position and what were his qualifications for appointment thereto?

3. What salary is he paid, and is he entitled, in addition, to a living allowance or expense account, and if so, on what basis?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. Special representative for British Columbia on the staff of the director of national selective service. His qualifications for appointment are experience as deputy registrar and chief public representative for Alberta under the Military Services Act during the period 1917-1919.

3. Salary at the rate of $3,600 per annum and actual living expenses while in Vancouver on departmental duty.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—ORDER IN COUNCIL RECOMMENDED BY E. M. LITTLE

Mr. BENCE:

1. How many copies of "Copy of Proposed Order in Council Recommended by Mr. E. M. Little, former director of national selective service" were printed by the government?

2. How many of such copies were sent out for distribution?

3. What was the total cost of such printing?

4. What was the purpose of having these copies printed?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. English copies, 9,500; French copies, 3,500.

2. English copies, 9,400; French copies, 3,500.

3. $558.48.

4. To satisfy the demand in the public press that the text of the proposed order in council should be released. After this was done there came numerous inquiries from individuals and organizations indicating keen interest so it was decided to have copies printed and sent to all members of the House of Commons and the Senate, members of provincial assemblies, labour organizations and business associations.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

R.C.A.F.—TORONTO MANNING POOL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the manning pool, R.C.A.F., Toronto, been placed under quarantine?

2. If so, for what reason, by whom and for what length of time?

3. How many are under quarantine?

4. How many times has this depot been quarantined since the war began, and on what dates?

5. What action has been taken to improve the health and sanitary conditions at this depot?

[Mr. Cardiff.]

COLONEL JOHN THOMPSON

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was Colonel John Thompson, (a) a member of the board of pension commissioners, (b) the chairman of that board, (c) the chairman of the Canadian pension commission?

2. If so, for what period in each capacity?

3. What (a) salary, and (b) what amount for travelling expenses were paid to him each year?

4. Was he also appointed dominion franchise commissioner and for what period? If so, what was his salary per annum and what total amount was paid to him for travelling expenses?

5. What was the number of his staff and the total amount of the salaries paid to them during the above period mentioned in number 4?

6. What was the cost of (a) the furniture, and (b) supplies including stationery for the offices of Colonel John Thompson as dominion franchise commissioner and for his staff?

7. Did he send any reports in such capacity to the Hon. Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons and, if so, how many?

8. When were they published in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons and how many pages did they cover?

9. Was he entitled to a pension (a) as a member or chairman of the board of pension commissioners, (b) as the chairman of the Canadian pension commission, (c) as the dominion franchise commissioner? If so, what was the amount in 1919, in 1933, in 1934, and when the position of dominion franchise commissioner was abolished?

10. Was he awarded a pension of $5,000 per annum? If so, when, why and in virtue of what authority?

11. What was the total amount paid to Colonel Thompson, (a) for various salaries, (b) for travelling expenditures, and (c) for pensions since 1919?

12. Was he appointed to another position in 1942 or 1943? If so, what was it?

EXPORTS OF LUMBER TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How much lumber in quantity and value has been exported to the United States during each month since January, 1942?

2. Is there at present any order in effect whereby such export is prohibited? If so, when was it made and what is the nature and effect thereof?

3. Have any exceptions to such order been made so as to permit any corporations or persons to make exports, and if so, give names and addresses of such exporters and the value of the lumber exported by each of them?

WOODEN SHIPS FOR WAR PURPOSES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. How many naval ships, merchant ships, landing scows or other craft built of wood have been ordered since the beginning of the war for the account of the British government to be built in Canada?

2. What are the names of the contracting firms, the location of the yards, the number, kind or class, and value of ships, scows, etc., in each order placed?

3. What were the dates when contracts were placed and the contract date of delivery?

4. Were tenders called for? If not, in what manner were contracts let?

5. How many wooden ships, scows or other craft were ordered since the beginning of the war for Canadian account, stating particulars?

MILITARY SERVICE

CALLING UP OF MEN ENGAGED IN AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Is the Minister of Labour aware that many men engaged in agriculture in Saskatchewan are being called for compulsory military service, contrary to the declared intentions of the ministry? Also, will the minister inform the house what steps are being taken to ensure that the government's intentions in this matter are being observed by the selective service boards?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Complaints have been referred to me, by members of parliament, as to men engaged in agriculture being called up for military service. On inquiry it has been found that in many of the cases the complaints were made before the board had given its decision. All cases brought to the attention of my department have been and will continue to be looked into promptly and carefully, and where there are meritorious circumstances the mobilization boards are asked to review the cases. The associate director of national selective service, military division, is now in western Canada conferring with the mobilization boards, and I am sure that as a result of his visit the situation will be clarified and improved.

QUESTION OF APPEALS FROM DECISIONS OF SELECTIVE SERVICE BOARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): May I ask whether or not the government has given consideration to the appointment of a supreme court judge to sit by way of an appeal court in order to ensure uniformity of interpretation and enforcement of the regulations throughout the dominion?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

CALLING UP OF MEN ALREADY ENLISTED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the Minister of Labour a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Yorkton? Is the minister aware that there is a continuing recurrence of call-ups of men who have already enlisted voluntarily, in some cases of men who have been enlisted for some time, and in one case that I know of, of a man who had recently become a casualty? I know it is a matter of administration and that the minister himself cannot be held in any way responsible. Perhaps my question will serve as an interrogatory to call attention to a situation that sometimes creates, shall I say, a good deal of sadness.

Mr. MITCHELL: Nobody regrets more than I do that sometimes these things happen. I can say from my own experience in the last war that through some slip-up I was reported blown up on a ship—perhaps some people wished I had been. My hon. friend can rest assured that it is purely a question of mechanics and organization and that every step is being taken by my department to see that so far as it is humanly possible these things shall not occur in the future. It is not always the fault of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not suggesting that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Sometimes it is the fault of the individual himself.

BUTTER

RESOLUTION OF THREE RIVERS TRADES AND LABOUR COUNCIL AS TO RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the government has taken any measures towards granting the request sent to the Prime Minister by the trades and labour council of Trois-Rivières, Quebec, asking for a greater ration of butter for those bringing their meals to the plant.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): That is a matter under the jurisdiction of the wartime prices and trade board. I did not have notice of the question, but I think I can answer it. It is not administratively possible for the board to make any difference in the butter ration as between various persons or groups in the country, and any request for larger rations for one group or another have I think been consistently refused, and necessarily so. I might add that the butter ration is being increased this month, as the hon. gentleman knows.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 10, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon during this debate, which is the only opportunity we have aside from the war approriation bill, I proceeded to say a few words about the conduct of the war. As you know, sir, in the parliament at Westminster ninety-five per cent of the time is taken up with war measures.

I agree with what has been said, that there is no such thing as home defence in this country. Norway found that out; Denmark found it out; Holland, Belgium and France found it out. All their home defence amounted to nothing against these mechanized hordes, and the same is true of all the occupied countries of Europe. We shall find out the same thing if they come here. We shall find that the way to fight our enemy is to fight him on the seven seas wherever we can find him. The First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Alexander), referred in London yesterday to the battle of the Atlantic and the submarine peril along the same lines as what I said here yesterday.

I may say that first Germany relied on her air arm in attacking shipping, and on a secret weapon, Hitler's magnetic mine. That continued for the first year and a half of war. It did not prove a success, as was expected, and the enemy then turned to the submarine, which had proved so disastrous to the allies in the last war. Germany accordingly went in for the building of larger and improved submarines in an effort to defeat Britain at sea and starve Britain. That submarine campaign has been a great success so far for Germany, and unless the allies solve this problem the war cannot be won.

Notwithstanding the brilliant advances made by General Montgomery, General Alexander and General Anderson in the Libya campaign, where the enemy was chased for fourteen or fifteen hundred miles—and that was really our first success in the war—the battle of the Atlantic cannot be won without the allies, especially Britain, the United States and Russia, gaining command at sea. Germany's submarine campaign, under skilful direction, is now to attack allied shipping at long range from their advance submarine bases in Norway and the bay of Biscay and we shall have to have more escort ships to protect our convoys in the Atlantic against these attacks. In 1940 we received fifty old destroyers from the United States, which were a great help in our convoy system then, but we need still more escorts to win the battle of the Atlantic. I referred yesterday to 120 escort ships we cannot get back from the North African Armada. The situation is grave, as the First Lord of the Admiralty said. I recall the time when he was a pacifist, just a few years ago. Before the war he was in favour of reducing the number of our capital ships from seventy-five to fifty and was responsible for changing at the Washington conference the definition of a capital ship and for preventing the building of more and rearmament. Sometimes chickens come home to roost, and that applies to the pacifists in the old country as well as to those in the dominions who supported complete disarmament. Some of my friends to my left were wrong. They relied on pacifism and disarmament before the war. That was their blueprint. A few also wanted to reduce the estimates for the armed services to the sum of one dollar. The result was that when the war broke out practically all we had to rely on if attacked, as I said before the war, was the girl guides, the boy scouts and the honorary colonels.

I believe the time has come when we should discard politics. The winning of the war is all that matters. We had politics in this parliament for four months in 1942. We had a long debate on Bill No. 80 and time taken up with a referendum and all that kind of thing, and the war was only secondary. The war situation this year is too serious for that. There are many domestic problems of great magnitude and importance that affect our mode of living, but the war is primary and the rest are secondary, and must await a later day. As General Sir Bernard Montgomery said in January, 1943:

> If each one of us, whether front line soldier or officer or man whose duty is performed in some other sphere, puts his whole heart and soul into this next contest, then nothing can stop us. Nothing has stopped us since the battle of Egypt began October 23, nothing can stop us now. We will all be in the hunt eventually:

on to Tripoli. Our families and friends in the home countries will be proud when they hear we have captured this place.

It was a 1400-mile British advance in Libya not an Anglo-American advance. Canada did not congratulate those brave generals of our own; another novice ambassador though, has congratulated another allied general on his successes in the east. I contend that we should also congratulate our own people, and give them equality of treatment.

In connection with the budget I wish to say a few words, I am sorry the minister is not in his place. I cannot agree with the glorious company and the hallelujah chorus and the brass bands and the hip-hip-hurrahs about a five billion dollar budget for this country. The situation is too grave for all these mansions of finance in the sky. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is one of the pacifists—one of many in all parties—responsible for this gigantic budget. They thought we could make peace pacts, protocols and paper and disarmament agreements and be protected, when they well knew the situation. The minister himself went to the league of nations the year before, to this talk-fest in Geneva; he must have known that a disarmed Britain just meant invasion and insult and in the end extinction. The pacifists in and out of the house must shoulder some of the responsibility for this gigantic expenditure. I doubt if the money is being well spent, these astronomical figures; when you get up in the sky five or six miles the money is less likely to be well spent than a moderate sum would be. When I go back home I see the retailers and wholesalers who pay the taxes, and the working classes of this country, and remember that they have already committed themselves on mortgages and agreements for sale of land and small houses and fire and life insurance. In Toronto the assessment commissioner's report used to show that fifty-five to sixty per cent of the people owned their own homes, because Toronto is a city of the middle classes and the toilers and workers of this country. My friends to my left have not been unmindful of the condition of these people, nor have the Conservatives who sat in this house, because they have been the friends of labour and their policies for many years past have been for the benefit of labour.

Do not forget that Canada is the highest taxed country in the world. The minister talks about the United States and Britain, but in the United States there is no sales tax; here there is a sales tax on almost everything, even coal and on everything used in the kitchen. I do not care whether the stand I take, that of saying they are taking too much money from the people, is popular or not, but the people back home know more than the people in Ottawa. They are complaining and trying to find ways and means of paying these new forms of taxes. They do not object to paying taxes for the war, but in this budget we find many millions not for the war at all; look at the increase of civilian estimates. What is the use of establishing embassies across all the seven seas in time of war? Are those things necessary? Do they contribute anything to the war or defence on the home front? These novice ambassadors are bad in peace time but more dangerous in war time. You can go over many of the other items in the estimates and find the same sort of thing. Not a man or woman in Canada objects to what is necessary for war purposes; the government can go the limit to win the war, but when you find a lot that is not for war you do complain. Notwithstanding all that was said about the four freedoms and all this kind of thing, we are going to be a desperately poor people after this war.

We have squandered our resources at a great pace. We are spending money like water and wasting our national resources and the products of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mine. I have here a return for four years before the war, showing the quantities of base metals supplied by us to our enemies—copper, platinum, nickel, some sixteen of them. You allowed these people to get all those natural resources from us and by reason of the policy of isolation on the part of our great ally to the south our enemies, the Germans and Italians, built a navy in the Atlantic.

A civil war was fought in England for nearly a hundred years to gain control of the exchequer, but to-day this house has lost that control; with all the controllers and subcontrollers we are the forgotten agency of government. So much is this so that we were in session last year five months to the first week of July and never discussed one item of the estimates, there was so much politics in connection with our discussions in 1942. This budget shows no attempt to put on the brakes. Alexander Mackenzie sat on the strong box and we had an auditor general named McDougall who had power to veto expenditure. That proviso has been taken away now from the auditor general, and the budget from first to last shows the dead hand of the treasury and no authority and absolute failure to check all this expenditure. Too much money altogether is being taken out of the taxpayer and too much is charged to income and not enough to capital. This generation is suffering in flesh and blood, and future generations should pay also.

The last war was said to be to make the world safe for democracy. When the troops come home from this war they will find that this war was fought to make the world safe for bureaucrats, Donald Gordon and all his regiments and colonels and lieutenants wearing the epaulettes of this whole control system, part of which is necessary but which is overdone, and some of the people not able to get a bit of beef, butter or sugar. There are pictures in all the papers of this commander-in-chief of the bureaucratic forces waving his ration book, and pictures of his sisters and his cousins and his aunts and all his family and of his inability to get butter at his club while parliament sits here, the forgotten agency.

I have a letter here from the auditor general, a good official, Mr. Watson Sellar. I asked him what power of veto he has over expenditure. He has none. He replied to the extent of two pages, and he points out that under the appropriation bill there is a comptroller of the treasury who has little control, and that there is a two billion dollar war appropriation which he can do nothing about; parliament only authorized it in a few sentences, without any items being given. Why did we authorize it? When parliament passes a blanket appropriation bill we lose all control over it. What have the war expenditure committee ever done? They took a Cook's tour of Canada accompanied by Mr. Fogo and they were stuck in some of the fog at the head of the lakes. They divided into subcommittees to investigate technical problems and where is their report? What did they find out? Not a thing to put the brakes on. They have divided themselves into subcommittees to investigate a great many technical problems about which they know no more than the average county councillor, or perhaps not one-tenth as much. If we had in our municipal systems the antiquated federal practice in force here, I believe the tax rate would be a great deal higher in local systems because these municipal councils know how to stop a great many of such unnecessary expenditures. The auditor general might just as well be said to have no control; for every controller is his own auditor and there is no head to the whole thing. We are getting to be a nation of auditors, and we have so many of these controllers that they do not know what they are supposed to control. Take the question of potatoes. We were told over the radio that there was a great shortage of potatoes, but now we are told that the situation is not nearly as bad as we supposed. I had a letter from a prominent public man in Toronto the other day in this regard, telling me that his wife heard over the radio that potatoes were scarce and everyone should put some in. I wrote the wartime prices and trade board in this regard and had a letter back from the young gentleman who is now secretary of the board and who seems to have great influence with the government, since he goes from one federal job to another. Mr. Fowler said that in a letter he had received from a member of the advisory committee for potatoes in Toronto he was given this information:

> Let me inform you that prescent short supplies are not as serious as many would declare. Moving along such streets as Bloor street, St. Clair, Jane and Annette streets in Toronto, all stores have potatoes for sale, mostly in ten and fifteen pound packages.

Then he adds that seventy-five pound bags are also available in some stores if desired. This is a conflict of rival people, all contradictory on the matter of potatoes, and small potatoes publicity people.

There is one thing we shall have to do before the soldiers come back. There has been too much bullying of the public in this country by the wartime prices and trade board. It should be called the wartime tower of Babel board, with all the lectures it gives the people and its male and female announcers, or the wartime prices and farce board. What do some of these unpractical, young people know about business practices? One young man was appointed "to simplify practices in small businesses connected with clothing." He ordered the cuffs taken off trousers, narrower collars, and so on. Where was he employed before he undertook to tell the retail storekeepers, all their life in the retail trade, what to do? He was working in a well known brewery; and there was no scarcity of beer at that time That is the sort of control we have here. Dia Mr. Donald Gordon have any training in any competitive business? He did not. Does he know anything about butter, coffee, tea or beef? All the butter, potatoes, beef and coffee he ever saw were what he consumed himself; yet he is placed in authority over the wholesalers and retailers of this country. It would have been far better to have the control of our food supplies with the food men in the business. I agree with the statement made the other day in a land of plenty by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that rumours have caused rationing. I think we should have followed England's lead and left these matters under the control of those who have looked after them all their lives, business men who are actually in business, instead of appointing a great many highbrows; because you have to be a highbrow to get a job as a controller or subcontroller, while the "real men" are serving at the front. Not long ago when I was going into the union station in Toronto I saw a young fellow in uniform, a soldier, on the right of way tracks, who was shovelling snow for the Canadian National Railways. He had been a teller in a bank. He did not enlist to shovel snow; he enlisted to fight Hitler.

In my opinion the people will stand for whatever is really necessary in the way of regimentation for actual war, but they will not stand for anything they do not feel is absolutely justified and will not help one iota for war purposes. If we do not do something about it the people will do something about us. Why, they have a small standing army of prosecutors, investigators and enforcement officers peeping through keyholes to see whether blackouts are being observed, and all that sort of thing, though in England blackouts have been largely eliminated as the right hon. the Home Secretary said, curtailed and further regulated. I have complained about the matter of the length and frequency of these blackouts in central Canada for two years to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), under whose authority these blackouts are held, because that authority is delegated to other people over whom there is no control. The people who are in charge of these blackouts are good, patriotic people; they are law-abiding, patriotic citizens doing a great public service, voluntarily, but I believe it would be far better if they were in the reserve army or getting better results in other form of war work, doing something that would be of more practical value to the people of this country. I appreciate the fact that in my own city many public-spirited men and women have done a great deal of good work in this connection, but I believe they could be given better and more valuable war work to do in these times. You cannot beat Hitler by turning a light on and off. In Norway and Finland everyone was taught to handle a rifle, and I think that should be done here. Then we have all these hundreds of advertisements printed in both languages in an English-speaking province. Why is that necessary in the English-speaking province of Ontario? It is just a waste of money. I ask hon. members from the province of Quebec if they think money should be wasted in that way. I say it is not necessary, and all this duplication should be stopped.

If it is necessary to ration tea, coffee, sugar and butter, why should there be all this talk about it? No one will object if it is necessary, but when you find one agency saying one thing over the radio and other agencies saying other things in the press and in interviews and speeches, it is a different matter. If we had left the distribution of these commodities to the food industry in Canada who understand it, we would be far better off. No doubt there would have been some difficulties, but I think we would have had greater food reserves if that had been done. As a prominent man, a great economist, in England, Lord Perry, said not long ago:

> A completely socialized Britain would mean that all power was vested in the permanent officials. A free-enterprise Britain, such as our fathers and grandfathers knew and upon which our national prosperity rests, means that bureaucratic power is severely limited. Therefore, the further Britain is taken from free enterprise and the nearer she is brought to state ownership, the more complete is the power of the bureaucrat.
> Let it be emphasized that whatever new fields of government the bureaucrat commands, he does not add to his responsibility. That is still borne by the political ministers whom he directs, whom he tutors and whom he paralyses. The natural trend, then, of a political minister's professional advisers is toward legislation which gives wide scope to the department which launches it. It is this thirst for power which inspires that type of legislation which Lord Hewart in his "The New Despotism" found so objectionable—legislation which leaves departments free to lay down rules and to impose regulations against which there is no appeal either to the courts of law or to parliament itself.

In this budget there is little comfort for the small retail dealer or wholesaler or toiler who has been put out of business by some of these controls. Then, as I say, I do object to the cost of it, because last year I asked the minister what the cost of this pegging ceiling policy was, and he did not know. At Easter-time of 1942 Mr. Gordon made a speech in Winnipeg in which he said it was $2,000,000. Later the minister made a statement in the house corroborating that figure. At the end of last session, in a return brought down at my request, $50,000,000 was the amount stated for this control. I do object to some of the big-stick bullying tactics used when dealing with the public. They are unnecessary in Canada, because our people are progressive, law-abiding and willing to do anything that is necessary for the winning of the war.

Many poor labouring people have suffered because of a coal famine brought about by a lot of useless orders and failure to see ahead. Credits were curtailed by order No. 225 of the wartime prices and trade board. The result was that these people had to pay the amounts owing by the 25th of the month. The coal dealers were not complaining; we have a fine patriotic lot on the whole in Toronto; they were willing to extend credit to their customers, some of whom had bought from the same firms for fifty years. In some instances two generations had dealt with the same coal companies, but the coal dealers could not send coal to a poor customer who might have been out of work and could not pay cash, or to a home in which a soldier's family may have lived. They could not get a ton of coal without paying for it before the 25th of the month, or cash on delivery. This absurd order brought about untold privation and suffering among the poor and was legislation against human nature.

Last session I urged, and I urge again at this session, that there be a fixed date for the presentation of the budget. I ask again that a ways and means committee be set up to deal with matters contained in the budget. The budget now before us is copied from Washington.

I have in my hand the annual review of the National City Bank of New York, issued in February of this year. It deals with the United States President's address in which he transmitted to congress his hundred billion dollar budget for 1944. From this publication I read the following quotation:

> In transmitting to congress the new budget of over $100 billions for the fiscal year 1944 the President referred to the budget presented a year ago as "An instrument for transforming a peace economy to a war economy."
> The present budget, he said "presents the maximum programme for waging war."

In the United States they have reached their maximum. What is our objective? We hear it said that it is five billions of dollars. I venture to say there will be a deficit of two billion dollars before this year is over. And with a further deficit on current account and on civilian estimates we do not know where we are going to land. There are practical business men in the house who could serve on a committee. On some of the committees now sitting here the work is being done by able business men, capable of giving sane advise to the ministry instead of a number of teachers, former teachers, former professors and some highbrows. For these reasons I recommend the setting up of a ways and means committee, to go over the budget first.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with many other hon. members who have spoken in this debate I wish first of all to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the splendid presentation of the fifth war-time budget. The task of a minister of finance in peace time is heavy, indeed; but the task in war time is much heavier and more onerous. I say without fear of successful contradiction that the minister who has just brought down the fifth war-time budget ranks high in comparison with ministers of finance who have preceded him; and in my opinion his ability in the house as Minister of Finance has not been excelled.

The magnitude of the war is not yet fully realized by many people in Canada. In this connection I am reminded of a sign I noticed when, as a member of the war expenditures committee, we visited the Curtiss aeroplane plant in Buffalo, New York. It read thus:

> Never in all human history have so many people known so little about so much.

Before dealing with the matters under my hand I should like to say a word or two respecting the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Mackenzie), who spoke in the debate yesterday afternoon. He had many suggestions to make, and made several criticisms respecting what takes place in the house. With much of what he said I agree, but I do take exception to his suggestion that we cut down to twenty minutes the speeches of hon. members, and I take further exception to his deprecating speeches made generally in the house. It is true that we might do without many of the speeches; many of them are perhaps not worth while sending home. But after all, a member of parliament has a duty to perform. His is the only voice in parliament speaking for the people he represents. If he sits on the government side and remains silent, he does more harm, I believe, to our democracy than do members on the opposition side, and some few on the government benches, who make criticisms as well as suggestions. If free speech is ever curtailed in the house it might be, in my opinion, the beginning of the curtailment of free speech outside the house. The right given to every hon. member to speak freely and as often and long as he likes in parliament, distasteful as it may be to some, is still a great safeguard and bulwark of democracy, and grievances must be sometimes aired in the House of Commons.

I compliment the minister upon bringing down the pay-as-you-earn plan. By some it has been called the Ruml plan, and the other evening the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) described it as the Ilsley plan. To my mind the Minister of Finance need make no apology for the plan he has presented. True, it does not go as far as many had expected, because, as we pointed out in a recent issue of the Ottawa Journal, many people had an idea it would do away with much of our taxes. At least this much can be said about it, that through its minister of finance the government has adopted the principle of the Ruml plan. I find it amusing to note that Mr. Ruml is still travelling the length and breadth of this country, lecturing the Canadian people about the Ruml plan, despite the fact, as I learned in the press a short time ago, that the plan as enunciated by him has been definitely turned down by the people of his own country. I am reminded of speeches made up until 1939 about peace in this country when we did not have even a gun to defend ourselves—a fact we have regretted since.

Our views have changed somewhat in the last few years. While the government is not going as far in matters of finance as many of us would like it to go, still the minister should be complimented upon moving forward—some might say to the left. At least in his speech he did leave the impression he was fully aware of what had been proposed by many of us in days past, and what we still propose, that what is physically possible is financially possible. When he spoke about the $983,000,000 he had had to borrow from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks I was glad he admitted the dangers in these borrowings. May I point out to him that before the war ends he may well have to consider the issuing of national funds or loans from the Bank of Canada, because we are not yet through with the war. When one realizes that our deficit this year will be $2,899 million, that on top of that the Canadian banks hold in securities well over two billion dollars, and that our dominion debt is close to eight billion dollars, making a total national debt of eleven and a half billion, one is startled by the figures of debt. One must stop to consider these mounting debts. We wonder where it will end. If the minister cannot obtain all the money from the people of Canada, the problem is indeed a serious one. I for one would like to see him give further consideration to dealing more, in some controlled way if he must, with the Bank of Canada. It is not for lack of savings, because we should realize that over three billion dollars have been contributed by the Canadian people through the purchase of war savings certificates and bonds since the war commenced. The number of bank accounts has increased since 1939, as well as the number of depositors. I was glad to hear the minister comment favourably upon the voluntary work done by the war savings committees and those handling the sale of war bonds. I want to add my meed of commendation to those willing workers who helped put this over. The minister referred also to the thousands of citizens who have been redeeming their bonds. To me that is a serious thing because, as the minister pointed out, the redemption of bonds weakens the home front, and we cannot afford to allow any front to be weak in this war.

The minister spoke also of price control. It is not my purpose this afternoon to deal with the prices board. I have dealt with it before and I shall deal with it at a later stage of the session. But he said that while there had been criticism of the wartime prices board, no one had yet seen fit to suggest its elimination. I may say to him that if no one has seen fit to do that it is because many of our people are afraid that if they did so they might be called unpatriotic. In my travelling back and forth across this country I find that there is a growing storm of protest which has been kept down only by the patriotism of our people. It may well break out at the end of hostilities.

I know there will be those who will contradict what I am going to say now, but it is my opinion that no great trouble was encountered during the last war because prices and wages rose. I am not advocating that there should be no control; I am simply pointing out to the house that it was not until well after the war, when the collapse of the boom had taken place, that any tragedies occurred, if there were tragedies. I think we should have a far-sighted policy. I am just wondering whether the people of this country will be ready to permit the wartime prices and trade board to operate as it has been since its inception, especially when the thought is in the minds of many of our people, particularly our merchants, that large business is consolidating its position during this time, to the detriment of the individual merchant.

In the debate last year I brought up the matter of the position of the Canadian and the United States dollar, and asked the Minister of Finance for a statement as to why our dollar should not be at par with the United States dollar. I pointed out to him that the definite statement had been made officially in the United States that the fact that the Canadian dollar was ten per cent under that of the United States was due entirely to the request of the Canadian government. Personally I cannot understand, when we are all allies in this fight, when we are trading under lend-lease and every other kind of trade arrangement, when we are pooling our forces, why we should be called upon to pay ten per cent more for a United States dollar than we should have to pay.

According to the latest trade returns, the premium on United States funds cost Canada $45,000,000 extra for the goods we bought in the United States last year; since the war commenced we have paid more than $150,000,000 extra because our Canadian dollar was at a discount. I am going to ask the minister now, and I shall ask him again when we are in committee, to explain why the Canadian dollar should not be on a par with that of the United States.

The minister told us that there would be tax increases on essential and non-essential goods. Additional taxes have been placed on cigarettes, tobacco, wines and spirits. Some may argue that these are essential goods, and others will argue that they are not. I am not going to take up the time of the house this afternoon by entering into a debate of that kind. But I do ask the government to give some consideration to the motion picture industry of this country.

Let me say at the outset that I realize that motion picture theatres play a big part in our lives. I appreciate also the difficulties faced by many of the smaller theatres in our small towns. It may interest the house to know that there are only some eleven theatres in Canada that charge fifty cents and upwards for admission. The lowest charge is fifteen cents. There has been a considerable increase in the number of admissions. Almost all our citizens are gainfully employed and enormous numbers are working in factories. They have crowded into our cities, and everywhere we see long queues in front of the theatres, especially those in Ottawa. One wonders whether a small tax could not be placed on these theatres. After all, the war must be financed, and I am of the opinion that this tax would not keep one single person from entering a picture theatre. I am sure that no great protest would be raised when the people realized that the money being taken from them by way of tax was for war purposes. I leave this thought with the minister and the government for further consideration.

Mr. TUSTIN: Does the hon. member not know that there is a twenty per cent gross tax on theatres?

Mr. REID: Perhaps there is, but—

Mr. TUSTIN: On the small theatres.

Mr. REID: I said that there might be some difficulty in connection with the small theatres. I was thinking more of the larger cities where hundreds of thousands of people are working in industry. I do not think there would be one admission less if we put on a little tax. The small theatres would have to be given consideration.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. TUSTIN: The hon. member apparently does not realize that at the present time there is a twenty per cent gross tax on theatres.

Mr. REID: Evidently it has not cut down the admissions. I notice that the receipts from 1939 to 1941, the latest for which I can get them, have increased over $7,000,000, while the attendances have jumped from 138,000,000 to 162,500,000. Even though there may be a twenty per cent tax, I still maintain that the matter could have been considered. I repeat that some consideration might have been given to the smaller theatres.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the hon. member give the amount of money exported from this country to the film producers?

Mr. REID: I am not sure whether that information is in this bulletin. Most of the information regarding pictures is given, but I do not think it gives the amount of money sent out of the country. I have read it from one end to the other. I shall endeavour to find out and let my hon. friend know.

Another matter I want to touch upon is one which has been referred to by many hon. members in debate, both this session and last session. I refer to the Old Age Pensions Act. In the estimates this year is an item of $400,000 for pensions for war widows. I am sure this announcement will be well received throughout the country, and I commend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) for taking this action. I should like to say a word or two about old age pensioners and the effect that the present low amount of pension is having upon some of them.

Some members from the middle provinces and the east may get a little impatient with our representations in connection with social legislation, especially old age pensions. Let me point out to them that the western provinces have led the way in social legislation. Had it not been for the lead of the western provinces I doubt if old age pensions would now be paid in some of the provinces. I say that without fear of successful contradiction. Some credit therefore is due to the western provinces, especially British Columbia, for giving that lead. The old age pension association, I believe, sent a resolution to the government. I am not going to read the entire text; copies went to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Labour. Amongst other suggestions they asked that the age limit be reduced, and that the amount be increased to $30. They asked that the regulations be amended—and something in that respect should be done without delay. They asked that the value of the home should not be taken into consideration unless it is worth more than $3,500. They asked also that the residence clause be amended, and particularly, that the regulations be stripped of all features which tend to reduce the pensioner to a pauper of the state.

I could read to this house many letters which I have received, and no doubt many other hon. members are in the same position, and I shall cite only one case to show how the regulations affect some of our people. It is the case of a man who had two sons in the services and whose cheque was withheld by the department at Ottawa. When eventually it was paid it came too late, for the old age pensioner had died. Not content with that, the department followed the matter up with a request that a deduction of seven days be made on the ground that the man had died two days before Christmas. I think every hon. member will agree that that was going a little too far. That is what often happens with members of the finance control sitting in Ottawa with a blue pencil, looking over accounts which come in. Everyone must be incensed at incidents of this kind of callous treatment. I urge upon the government first of all that the regulations be amended and revised from a more humane point of view; also that until the matter has been dealt with by the committee on social security the government should at least match the allowance of five dollars which is now being paid by the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta. As you know, those two provinces are giving five dollars extra to all old age pensioners and calling it a cost-of-living bonus. The cost-of-living bonus given by the dominion government is greater in most instances than the entire amount allowed to old age pensioners. Remember that actions speak louder than words; and when we are speaking of a new era after the war, and thinking of the gallant young men and women who have offered their lives, one wonders how they will regard all this kind of talk if no practical steps are taken, especially in behalf of our aged citizens.

I shall now deal for a few minutes with another matter which has been brought up in the course of this debate; it was mentioned by the Minister of Finance on March 2, when, speaking about tariffs, he said, as reported in Hansard, page 861:

> The customs tariff has fallen from the high position it has previously held as an instrument of fiscal and economic policy. Under the circumstances of war, the tariff has little effect except as a producer of revenue.

He said further:

> There will again, however, be a time when the tariff will be an important instrument of trade policy and when this country will have to decide whether it will play its part with other countries which are prepared to help in freeing the world's trade, in enlarging markets, and in promoting the full and effective use of the world's resources.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) also mentioned the subject. He took the stand in his address that nothing should be done now in connection with the tariff, that it should not be disturbed, and that no approach should be made to the United States or any other country until the war is over. I differ entirely from the view held by the hon. member for Danforth, because it is my belief that if we wait until the end of the war and a depression sets in, at least until industry can change over, there will be little hope of ever reducing the tariff protection given to the manufacturers of this country, and there certainly will be no hope that United States manufacturers will be willing even to discuss tariff reductions, let alone change their attitude. Now is the time that the approach should be made looking towards world free trade as referred to in the speech of the Minister of Finance.

The other evening the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), speaking in the debate on social security, referred to private industry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Private enterprise.

Mr. REID: Private enterprise. I am just wondering what the attitude of private enterprise in this country will be when changes in our tariff structure are suggested. I will place before the house a few figures in support of what I have just been saying.

In the manufacturing concerns of this country are employed at the present time 1,879,845 persons. In the two provinces of Quebec and Ontario there are 1,318,716 in manufacturing concerns. In other words 80 per cent of the workers in our factories and industries are in the two central provinces.

As regards the capital investment, $4 billion has been invested in all industries in Canada, 80 per cent of which is invested in the two provinces I have named. The position of each province as regards capital invested in industry is as follows:

Prince Edward Island	less than 1 per cent
Nova Scotia	2·8 per cent
New Brunswick	2·5 per cent
Quebec	32·4 per cent
Ontario	48·3 per cent
Manitoba	3·3 per cent
Saskatchewan	1·0 per cent
Alberta	2·0 per cent
British Columbia	7·6 per cent

I have before me another interesting schedule but which has only been referred to in this house and has never been refuted by anyone. It relates to an investigation held by the government of Nova Scotia, who engaged the late Norman Rogers, then a professor at Queen's university, to investigate economic conditions in this country. He found that the tariff benefited only two provinces, namely Quebec and Ontario. The gain to Quebec was about $32 millions and to Ontario about $52 millions; all the other provinces had a net loss. The tariff policies of this country emanate largely from those two provinces, and the eastern Atlantic provinces, British Columbia and the western provinces have been paying tribute, in the matter of buying goods, to those two provinces. I wonder just what headway this or any other government will make in this respect when the war ends; because everyone knows the powerful lobby these interests can put up, particularly the closer you get to Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member tell us what the Liberal party did about it when they got the opportunity to correct the condition which he alleges exists?

Mr. REID: That is another question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is very quiet about it, though.

Mr. REID: No, I am not very quiet.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Better page the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). He was the father of that report.

Mr. REID: The hon. member should be fair. I am criticizing the government right now. I have not heard any of the hon. members who are sitting on that side doing the same thing; and I have sat and watched them from 1930 to 1935.

Regarding British Columbia's position, there are one or two figures I want to place on record. In the last year for which I have figures, British Columbia exported goods worth $160 million and imported to the value of $100 million. British Columbia was compelled to purchase the same year from Quebec and Ontario $63 million worth of goods, but those provinces bought from her only $21 million worth. British Columbia had to sell her products, her fish and lumber and the rest of it, on a world market, to obtain money so as to pay tribute to those two highly industrial provinces. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that we could not even get a small steel plant for the province of British Columbia during this war?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Shame.

Mr. REID: From 1935 to 1939 we shipped out something like 130,000 tons of scrap metal. Scrap metal since the war has been going east from British Columbia on a freight charge of $15 per ton, and coming back on a freight charge of $25. Although we pleaded with the government and at one time were actually promised that we would get a small furnace to melt scrap—no, Mr. Speaker, we have not got it yet.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Shame.

Mr. REID: We talk of the new order! If we cannot fix up our own house I wonder just how we are going to lead the world in free trade. Only a few days ago a small aluminum plant in Vancouver was compelled to close down. It employed twenty-five experienced men and could easily use seventy-five. That plant had been going for twenty-five or thirty years. But it was shut down, and all the aluminum we need now comes from the east. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation referred to the large aluminum companies; I trust that some improvement will be made in the industrial conditions in British Columbia. One suspects that behind all this there is some hand operating to prevent us from getting what we believe to be fair treatment in the matter of industries. Now is the time that changes should be made.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) in his address to the house, the other day wondered what was going to happen to his city after the war. I can tell him. British Columbia and Nova Scotia both have a blackout now, and after the war the same thing is going to happen to Nova Scotia as to British Columbia—we are going to have an economic blackout if the matters mentioned are not remedied.

I wish to speak of another matter which has been brought up at every session I have attended when the Ottawa agreement bill, under which the dominion government pays $100,000 to the city of Ottawa, comes up for discussion. I mention particularly the city of Ottawa, but my purpose is to draw the attention of the house and the government to the seriousness of the problem of tax-free crown lands in cities and districts all across this country. The situation is becoming very serious, and Ottawa is just one example. The total assessment of the city of Ottawa is in round figures $162,000,000, and the assessment of tax-free government property is this year $61,500,000. The loss in taxes to the city of Ottawa through the government taking over this property will be $2,345,322 in actual cash in 1943. You might think that Ottawa was about the worst case in the dominion, but it will surprise many members to know that it is not. We have districts in British Columbia where the situation is even worse. In Esquimalt eighty per cent of the total assessed property in the municipality is tax-free government or crown property. I have another case where the percentage is ninety, and if I had time I would give the complete figures. In Coquitlam the total assessment is roughly $7,500,000, and the tax-free government property is $6,200,000; in other words ninety per cent of the total assessment is exempt from taxation. Another ten per cent and the government will own the whole municipality! Vancouver's loss in taxes this year through tax-free government property is $1,270,778. Ten per cent of the total assessment is tax-free government property. In my own city of New Westminster the loss in taxation from this same cause is $27,000. One could go on from city to city. I merely cite these instances to bring them to the attention of the government and to ask that something be done about it.

The Alaska highway was mentioned the other evening by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) when he was speaking of airfields and highways through Canada to Alaska. First of all I wish to compliment General O'Connor and his staff of United States officers upon having done a splendid job there. But I am going to suggest to the government that even though the United States is putting up the money for the highway, this government should have some say as to the route. The present route connecting the airfields almost by-passes the whole province of British Columbia. Dominion engineers some years ago had made extensive surveys and laid out two routes designated as A and B, which go through country far superior to that traversed by the present route. If any member thinks that the new Alcan highway is going to develop northern British Columbia, he had better investigate a little further. From the information I have, it runs through the poorest kind of country. The country through which the two other routes run is far superior. Moreover, the Alcan highway has grades of twenty per cent, while routes A and B, as laid out by dominion government engineers, have grades of less than one per cent. Canada should take some definite stand in this matter. We should not just let the United States engineers go in there and have all the say as to the route. We are looking for great developments after this war; we shall require good land on which to settle many of the returned men who may want to go on the land. I ask the government to take note of what is taking place in that part of the country, and I would point out to the United States authorities and their engineers that any future route should be one of the routes which we ourselves have already laid out. The present route will not develop our northern British Columbia country as it should be developed.

My time is up, Mr. Speaker, and I shall have to leave until a later occasion many other matters on which I wished to speak.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I join with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) in paying tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his presentation of the budget to the house. He made a very fine speech, and I have just this further observation to make in connection with it—that it would make one of the best election speeches I have ever heard. The speech from the throne itself would also make an excellent election manifesto.

I realize the position of the Minister of Finance in working out the budget that he has just presented to the house. He has one of the most difficult jobs in Canada, and he is doing it as well as anyone in the country could do it so long as the rules of the game are what they are. His job during this war is to keep the present capitalist economy in balance, and he has done an excellent job so far, with a lot of assistance, of course, behind the scenes from those who are interested in no other order of society but the one we have. In view of the fact that there is practically no change in the rates of taxation in this budget, it is quite clear that the Minister of Finance and his advisers recognize that they have gone as far as they can with respect to taxation under the present rules of the game. I am afraid that if the war lasts another two or three years, and if we are successfully to carry out our part in it, fundamental changes will have to be made with respect to the bases of society in this country. This budget is a clear indication of that.

The house now has something definite to discuss. The Progressive Conservative party must regard it as satisfactory, in view of the fact that they have not proposed any amendment to it. They are satisfied that it should be our guide or yardstick until the next budget is presented. The Social Credit party has proposed an amendment; the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group have proposed an amendment to the amendment, and

I shall try to relate my remarks to the subject matter now being discussed as closely as possible.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group decided after scrutinizing the amendment of the Social Credit party that it was necessary to move an amendment to the amendment, because we could not see that the Social Credit amendment proposed any basic changes as far as our economic system is concerned. We believe that if changes are not made along the lines proposed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment we shall not be able to weather the storm that we see ahead.

We are fearful of the growth of monopoly in Canada, and it is on that point that I wish to dwell this afternoon. We realize that those who are interested in private enterprise, as they call it, and a smaller concentration of the direction of private enterprise in the hands of a smaller group than has had it during all our lifetime, certainly are not supporting what will build a democratic order of society. What I shall endeavour to show this afternoon is concrete evidence of that development. I do not question the sincerity of members of the government who are bringing in measures and appointing committees with respect to social security, advocating old age pensions and allowances of all kinds and setting up committees to do research and bring in recommendations with respect to social changes after the war. What we are fearful of now is that the group who control are away ahead of the government in their post-war plans. I see to-day in Canada through the manipulation of industry and finance, and the concentration of that manipulation in the hands of fewer and fewer people, the laying of the plans now for what we are going to have in the aftermath of the war. All these committees represent one point of view and one only. All the recommendations are along certain lines. They are building an order of society now that means complete control by themselves after the war. I do not make that statement for the purpose of creating unrest; I believe it is an actual fact.

I know that the boys in the army are fighting for social changes. None of them wants to come back to what we had. I cannot see any of those who have had the administration of affairs by manipulating the economic resources of the country, who have done the job that private enterprise under that particular control has done during the past twenty-five or thirty years, making changes in the social order that prevailed prior to the outbreak of the war. In my opinion they are building a machine that will guarantee control by themselves after the war. Through the medium of our war boards you have the heads of the large corporations sitting in and taking advantage of the seriousness of the war situation and the necessity for production. The large corporations are sitting in on the boards now and not only planning the war effort but utilizing the plants created by the government and routing them into the economy of the country so that when the war is over they will own them; also setting them up to their own advantage, as they have certain arrangements with respect to writing off the money put in by the government. The thing is so arranged that when the war is over they will own and control these plants. We have example after example right across the country. The wartime prices and trade board have authority to close out some twenty thousand non-essential industries, and they are doing it step by step in the different provinces. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) a moment ago referred to the closing of a war plant, an aluminum plant, in his section. Production is concentrated in some plant in central Canada, centralizing control in the hands of one small group. This is not an isolated instance; it is taking place all across the country.

Another example is the malleable iron works in Oshawa, a plant employing some 125 men. I have had letters in recent weeks concerning it. This plant has been and will be in the future necessary to that community, and its closing will be a loss to that community. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) no doubt will try to find employment for those men elsewhere; nevertheless in taking the plant from that community the men are being scattered across the country and their homes broken up. The significant feature is set out in the following paragraph:

> The O.M.I. plant used to do a lot of work for McKinnon Industries, St. Catharines. The orders were pulled out by McKinnon and now McKinnon has a request for men to go to St. Catharines. We were once told by heads of selective service that they would bring the jobs to the men and not the men to the jobs.

McKinnon Industries in St. Catharines is a fairly large organization, and it was handling the work from this smaller plant. Now with its priorities it is in a position to close out the little plant and take the employees to St. Catharines to work for them there. This malleable iron works was on war work, making a definite contribution to the war effort, and it was necessary to that community. The men who worked there will have to leave that section and go elsewhere and their homes will be broken up. I do not think there is any justification for actions of that kind. It is an indication of monopoly control gradually closing the smaller industries out of the picture.

Only last summer I had this experience in Ontario. After speaking at a meeting one night a man came to me and introduced himself as the manager and part owner of a plant in that section. He employed some eight hundred men. He said, "I want to have a talk with you. Could you send over to my plant an organizer from steel workers to organize my plant?" I replied, "Well, that is a peculiar request to come from the owner and manager of a plant. What is the catch?" "There is no catch at all," he said. "We find ourselves in this position: a small industry not linked up with the large corporations who now control the field through the medium of the war boards and the priorities boards. We cannot get priorities on materials, and as a result our business is shrinking so that unless something is done within the next year or so we shall be completely closed up. This business means something to this community; it has been here for many years, and the only way we see to secure redress is by allowing our employees to organize in a union, link themselves up with the legitimate congresses in Canada, and have them make the necessary fight to keep this plant in operation."

That is the situation in these smaller plants, and those are only two examples. That was why we thought it necessary to place this amendment before the house. I do not expect my words to change anyone's vote, but those hon. members who listen and understand the reasons for these things but are not prepared to do anything about them will have to take the responsibility in the aftermath of the war, when the situation I am now describing will be so solidly established that we will not have a chance of changing it. Then with respect to exemption from taxes, we find the Minister of Finance announcing that the lumber industry of British Columbia is to be granted a tax exemption privilege.

Mr. GIBSON: That does not make them tax exempt.

Mr. GILLIS: This is a special exemption. I should like to read something on that point:

> For every thousand board feet of timber produced, the operator's taxable income will be reduced by $1; and for every thousand feet in excess of the 1941 cut, another dollar may be deducted. This means that if the 1943 cut equals the 1941 cut, $1.40 per thousand may be deducted on the whole cut which, in 1941, amounted to 1,750,000,000 feet board measurement.
> In other words the lumber operators of the Pacific coast are to be allowed to withhold the income tax on approximately $2,500,000 of income. This measure, in Mr. Ilsley's words, is designed to encourage production of lumber. This is a frank admission that lumber production has been falling, not only because of the shortage of man-power, which is undoubtedly serious, but also because the lumber companies have been deliberately curtailing production.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it is the prices.

Mr. GILLIS: You can place your own construction upon it. That is not my analysis; it is the analysis of people who are watching these things and analysing them. If that is not correct I think the Minister of Finance should correct it.

Mr. MARTIN: What is that quotation from?

Mr. GILLIS: It is from News Comment, which is written by men who are capable of analysing these matters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Isn't the situation in the lumber industry the result of the price ceiling?

Mr. GILLIS: Not according to this article. This would lead me to believe that they were deliberately curtailing operations, in other words going on a slow-down strike. I thought I should place that on record, because I have listened to the miners being hauled over the coals because they were looking for enough to eat, not to mention any exemption from taxes. My object in mentioning this matter and putting it on record is to show that there is not equality of sacrifice.

There is another matter I think we should thoroughly understand, one in which every hon. member should be interested; for after all, regardless of the party to which we belong, each must satisfy his own mind in regard to these things. We are all Canadian citizens and we represent Canadian citizens, and we shall have to take our full share of the responsibility for the conditions that prevail after the war. These matters should be looked into and efforts made to correct them. I refer now to the system followed by the government with respect to the setting up of new plants, the creation of crown emanations. I hold in my hand the summary of an agreement between the government and Norwegian Canadian Packers Limited under the War Exchange Conservation Act, dated March 4, 1943. This is a new company that has been formed; apparently to-day the name "Norwegian" is popular. I believe this is a fish packing plant which is to be set up in the province of New Brunswick. A special depreciation allowance has been fixed against plant expenditures of $105,000. The plant is located at Chamcook, New Brunswick, and the government has allowed the company a special deduction based on export sales of a maximum of $80,000 which may be written off in the three years 1943, 1944 and 1945. I interested myself in this matter because I believe the government is making very generous provisions in regard to the establishment of this company, and I know that so far as the fishermen of New Brunswick are concerned the greatest efforts that have been put forth looking to their rehabilitation have been made by the extension department of St. Francis Xavier university of Nova Scotia, which went in there for the purpose of organizing and educating the fishermen of that province, to assist them toward a solution of their own problems. I believe this Norwegian Canadian Packers Limited is a combine from some other part of Canada which sees the possibility of the fishermen of New Brunswick being taken out of the hands of the private fish buyers, and as a result the elimination of a great deal of exploitation. I believe the company is cutting in there now, while we are in the process of fighting this war, in order to bring the fishermen of New Brunswick back under the wing of the private fish buyers. If that assumption is not correct I want somebody to correct it when he has had time to check up.

This is a further development of the monopoly which is spreading across Canada from section to section. To-day we find Canada Packers interested in other things than the processing of meat. They are not standing still; they are planning, too, and from coast to coast they are entering other fields than meat packing; chickens, chicken farms, dairies and so on. They are not planning their production or distribution for war purposes; they are cutting in and consolidating their position now in order to be sure of holding the whip hand when the war is over. Only this morning I had a letter from an individual in Nova Scotia who is very much interested in the development of cooperatives. While I am on that point let me say that as far as I am concerned I visualize the future of Canada from the point of view of cooperation. Any economic system in this country must be based upon the principle that the people will have a major say in its development, on the basis set out by the extension movement in Nova Scotia to which I have referred. It seems to me that any economy based on any other principle can only move in the direction of the order of society against which we are fighting to-day overseas. It cannot go anywhere else. This order of society, in the opinion of men who have studied it and who are speaking and writing on it, can extend in only one way, the way Hitler represents in Europe, the way he is fighting to foist on the rest of the world. Unless the people themselves get together and organize the economic processes of the country, have a say in the marketing and in all phases necessary to the life of the people, we shall have lost the very objectives for which we are fighting the war.

I said a moment ago that from one end of Canada to the other Canada Packers are moving in, doing their own organizing and laying their own post-war plans. Not only are they laying them, but they are actually putting them into operation. Let me read one paragraph from a letter:

> Here in Nova Scotia there are some interesting stories about farmers who through group action, that is cooperation, organize to do their own business. In the Annapolis valley the creameries are nearly all in the hands of private operators—there is only one little cooperative. Last year these creameries paid five cents a pound less for butter fat than the farmers were getting in northwestern Nova Scotia where the great Scotsburn cooperative creamery is the yard-stick for the price. Five cents a pound on butter fat means that a farmer who has ten cows pays a toll to these operators of $12 a month, or $144 a year. It can easily be seen that this extra tax from one hundred farmers is a tidy little sum over and above the regular returns of the business. In other parts of Nova Scotia the private creameries paid last year seven cents a pound less for butter fat than was received by the farmers of the Pictou, Cumberland, and Colchester areas, where the cooperative creamery sets the price.

This paragraph brings to our attention the fact that in that section Canada Packers moved in last summer and endeavoured to buy up the privately-owned creameries. Had it not been for the fact that the cooperatives stuck together and recognized the trend of events, protecting the farmers from taking any action, Canada Packers would have full control of the distribution of milk.

I believe every hon. member should be raising his voice against the lack of representation on boards from the average ordinary citizens of the country. On boards which are now planning I note a complete absence of the rank and file of our people. For instance, in connection with the distribution of food we might have called in representatives from the cooperatives and have given them an opportunity of sitting on boards. Regardless of what anyone's opinion may be about Canada Packers, and with all due respect to the men who have been selected, I say that no man is in a better position to sit on a board set up for the purpose of arranging for the marketing and distribution of foodstuffs than a man who has spent the last twelve or fifteen years working among the people, organizing and perfecting his organization. Nevertheless we do not see any of those people consulted. They are not represented; they are passed by. I note that on the new fuel control board there have been appointed a lawyer from Halifax, the head of the Bank of Canada, and another king's counsel from Quebec. These are the men who head up the fuel control policy in Canada. I have no doubt that in their own fields these men are experts, but when the government is endeavouring to lay down a fuel control policy for Canada it might select men who have had a closer connection with the problem. There is no doubt that this is a big job, because distribution of any product in Canada is difficult. We know that. I do say, however, that on that board there should be men who, through the medium of their organizations, represent the workers. These are men who for the past twenty-five years have made a road to Ottawa, presenting brief after brief to the government on the question of the development of a national fuel policy. Surely they should be called in and given a place on the board, to attain a solution of the problem—that is, if anyone honestly wants a solution. Sometimes I wonder if the whole machine is not designed to create confusion and chaos, and to keep control within the hands of a certain small group. The average citizen who might get in on these boards might learn too much. That is my honest opinion as to why they are not taken in. They might see too much or find out too much, and they might expose manipulations to the people.

I have heard it stated by many hon. members that we must set up some kind of machinery for the distribution of foodstuffs. Whether it would require the establishment of another ministry is a matter entirely in the hands of the government, but some machinery will have to be perfected to see to it that essential commodities are properly distributed across Canada, so that they may reach the working people who are slaving in the plants and factories in order to make our war effort a success.

I raise this point this afternoon because in the last few weeks I have received many telegrams and letters from Nova Scotia respecting shortages of essential foodstuffs. Let me now pay my respects to the editor of the Ottawa Citizen. I have some respect for the average newspaper editor. I believe many of them have a lot of common sense, and at least they try to keep informed of matters they are writing about. But in this instance the editor of the Ottawa Citizen in his comments was neither fair nor informed respecting the rationing of foodstuffs in Nova Scotia. First he belittles the miners in their gesture to the government to get the necessary rations, and then he creates the impression that there was only a shortage of butter in the area. He played up the suggestion that there had been a threatened strike because of the butter shortage. He goes on to point out that the miners were looking for rations greater than those of the average citizen in Canada.

A newspaper editor, who is responsible to a great extent for the moulding of public opinion, should check his facts more closely than apparently the editor of the Ottawa Citizen did in this instance. That shortage was not temporary. It was not something which developed overnight. It was not a shortage of butter only. The fact is that it was a shortage of practically every commodity. Seven weeks ago I was on the island of Cape Breton. I know that servicing on the island, so far as food is concerned, is done through the medium of cooperative stores in the mining areas. While on the island I visited two or three of the stores and noted that the shelves were practically empty. On a Saturday evening I had a conversation with the manager of one of those stores, which catered to about two thousand people, and he pointed out they had practically no butter, and that there was no meat to be sold—bacon, ham or beef. The only meat which could be had was fowl. One could buy chickens, but he would have to pay a fancy price. That condition had prevailed for some time. There was no substitute for butter. One could not buy jam, syrup, or anything of the kind. In short there was a scarcity of every commodity.

For the benefit of the Ottawa Citizen and its manager, may I point out that the percentage of enlistments both in this war and in the last one from among the miners in that area was the highest of any point in Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: That applies to the whole of Nova Scotia.

Mr. GILLIS: But there is a higher percentage in this particular area than in the rest of Nova Scotia. In the town of Glace Bay alone over 1,500 ex-servicemen, veterans of the last war, are mining coal to-day and have been for the last twenty years.

Mr. MITCHELL: To be fair to the miners, is it not so that two of the largest locals repudiated the idea of a strike?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but the Ottawa Citizen did not. It created the impression throughout central Canada that the miners of Nova Scotia were proposing to go on strike because of a shortage of butter, or because they wanted a larger ration of butter than that granted to anyone else in Canada. Such was not the case. I am ready to take the editor of the Ottawa Citizen to Nova Scotia and I will ask him to assume the responsibility of maintaining a family of four children while working as a miner. The editor of the Ottawa Citizen appears to be a great believer in private enterprise and all those things, but I think I am safe in saying that if he sticks out the life of a miner and accepts his obligations for one month, he will come back to Ottawa a communist.

The thought I want to leave with members of the house is that there is no one on the north American continent who works as hard as the coal miner. He must be fed, and fed properly, otherwise he cannot do the work. He gets out of bed at five o'clock in the morning and drops down a shaft a thousand feet deep to go out six miles under the Atlantic ocean. You do not work as the average man works; you must strip yourself to your shoes and overalls. You have to live practically on a can of tea. There is no sunshine and you practically sweat blood. You arrive home at five o'clock in the evening so tired that you cannot even read the newspaper. That is the life the miner is obliged to lead 365 days in the year. These are the conditions that exist at present and have existed practically all of my lifetime. There is nothing to look forward to except the breadline, and the chances are that you have not too long to live. If you stick it out and are an extra good worker you may be able to meet your legitimate obligations at the end of the week. But you must be fed, and well fed.

There is a shortage of every kind of commodity and has been for some considerable time. I think the situation is sufficiently serious to warrant the government's taking hold of it immediately. There is no shortage of foodstuffs in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think my hon. friend will find that the government did send a committee in there. I know it came before my department.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): You would not want to eat a committee, would you?

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps if my hon. friend were a member of it, they might.

Mr. GILLIS: I discussed the matter with the Minister of Finance and was given the assurance that everything possible was being done. That was early this week, but I received a telegram only this afternoon giving a list of the commodities which are short. If extra rations have been sent in, apparently that fact has not seeped through to these people. Last summer there was a shortage of butter in Toronto. This was sufficiently serious to make the civic authorities talk about setting up their own rationing programme. In my opinion butter was drawn from other sections of the country and sent into that section in order to quiet the holler that was being made. The result was that a shortage was created somewhere else.

Only a couple of weeks ago Toronto was advertising the fact that there was a surplus of butter in that section of the country and they wanted the ration increased. According to the Ottawa Journal of this morning, butter production is up 27·6 per cent in February of this year as compared with February, 1942. There was not a serious shortage of butter in February, 1942, and if production has increased 27·6 per cent, there should be no shortage of butter now. I am not going to read the press clippings from all sections of the country, but I have gathered them together because I am interested in this matter. In different parts of western Canada and Ontario the plea has been made by the farmers that they should be permitted to market their surpluses of butter.

As I said a moment ago, it is a matter of distribution. I do not think a committee going down there to look into the situation, especially when it has been shown that there is a shortage, is going to remedy things. The fact is that the president of the district organization of the united mine workers has given warnings of these shortages from time to time to the wartime prices and trade board, and representations have also been made by the heads of the cooperative societies.

What should have been done was to determine in what sections butter was available and to ration on that basis. There should be sectional organizations to handle the distribution and marketing in the different provinces according to what is available and the requirements of the people. This complaint comes not only from the miners but from people in every class of society in Nova Scotia. Evidently there is a real shortage of foodstuffs. I hope that the government are doing something about it. If they are, apparently the word has not got through yet.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) make the announcement while the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) was speaking that provision had been made for the payment of pensions under the War Veterans' Allowance Act as recommended by the last parliamentary committee on pensions. I got the impression that this matter would be taken care of immediately, but in checking the thing over I find that the present position is that the estimates contain an item of $400,000 to provide for the payment of allowances to the widows of members of the armed forces in the last war. It seems that this cannot be made operative until after the estimates are brought forward. What the minister should have done was to have an order in council passed authorizing the payment of these allowances, pending the estimates being brought forward. I suppose like myself every hon. member has been receiving letters from widows of ex-soldiers pointing out that the minister had made this declaration and asking just when and how the pension was to be paid. In asking around I find that it may be a couple of months before the estimates are brought down.

There are two or three other matters I should like to mention to the minister but I notice that Mr. Speaker is getting restless and I suppose I shall have to defer them to another day. I ask hon. members to consider and check my remarks this afternoon with respect to the development of monopolistic control in Canada. With all due respect to the committees which have been appointed to work out programmes for social change, I am of the belief that those in control, those who have been in control for the past seventy-five years and who hold the purse strings behind the scenes, are not only making their own plans but are putting them into operation and will offset anything we have in mind unless parliament is prepared to accept its full responsibility and protect the people from the developments that are taking place.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to devote my time to one subject only, but I cannot resist the impulse to deal with one or two of the items brought up by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Particularly is that so when I notice that other members of the group to which he belongs have raised the same matter and discussed it from the same angle.

I notice that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group are putting on a determined attack upon free enterprise—

Mr. WRIGHT: Monopoly control.

Mr. GRAHAM: —and one of the arguments they advance against that particular type of economy is that monopolies have grown up and continue to be strengthened in this country, and that because that is the situation the only alternative is the replacement of capitalism and free enterprise by socialism or, as I call it, state-ism, or collectivism.

Mr. GILLIS: What about cooperation?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will deal with that in a minute. I suggest to the hon. member for Cape Breton South that he could interview every member of this house without finding one who is in favour of monopolistic control in any shape, manner or form—

Mr. GILLIS: That is why I appeal to them.

Mr. GRAHAM: —and that is true of a great many generalizations made by members of his particular group, if I may say so. All the people of Canada, with the exception of a few who are profiting thereby, are a unit in opposition to the growth of monopoly. We do not need to argue about that. But I suggest to my hon. friend that we have learned a great deal about the matter of monopoly by incorporated companies. I would recall that the joint stock company as we now know it, a useful adjunct if properly used in the conduct of the nation's business, is of comparatively recent origin. As with all types of new entities, it has taken the democratic process, and particularly our legislative assemblies, some time to discover and realize some of the abuses which may attend the use of that particular entity, the corporate set-up; but I suggest to the hon. member, recalling what has taken place in the United States, Great Britain and our own land, that we now know some of the dangers of abuse through a study of the operations of joint stock companies, and that it is an easy matter, now that we understand them, to correct any evils, not only evils of monopoly but any others which may accompany the growth of what otherwise is a fairly useful instrument in the conduct of the business of this country.

I ask my hon. friend to consider the attitude he takes. What he proposes as a cure for a situation which we all agree must not exist is to remove the paramount authority, namely, the government or a free parliament, which is always there to control all such evils and has the power to do so. If you concentrate those industrial agencies in an organization clothed with all the powers of a government, there is neither a court of appeal nor any other authority above that particular instrument. We would be the unwisest people on earth to give to any group, government or otherwise, complete control of the business agencies of this country, because then we would in very truth be creating a monopoly without any power to destroy that monopoly if it functioned against our interest. That is a point we must not forget.

I find, and I say this with deference, a certain fuzziness of mind in the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group as to what their policy means. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), a very able representative of the farming community of my province, makes the mistake of thinking that his party is identified with the growth of cooperative enterprise. Let me say to him that I am at least a sincere friend and proponent of cooperative enterprise. In our own province it has shown more growth than in any other province of this dominion or any state of the United States of America. But the truth is that if you adopt socialism, or centre the industry of this country under government control, you do away with the need of cooperative enterprise. Cooperative enterprise knows that; its leaders in this country are well aware of it. The use of the word "cooperative" in the name of the party which the hon. member supports is a misnomer if he wishes to apply it to the type of cooperative enterprise that he and I support.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South, speaking the other day at Hamilton or some other eastern point, suggested that during war time the government now in power has taken unto itself by order in council so much power that it is almost in the position of a totalitarian authority. I think he described it as state-ism.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yet it will be noted that those of us who realize the necessity imposed upon us, not by agencies within Canada but by Hitler and Mussolini and the Japanese—outside agencies over which we have no control—sensibly accept the discipline which must go with the conduct of this war, and willingly submit, subject always to parliamentary control, to this method of getting quick action and determination of any matter which demands prompt decision. But that is a wholly different thing from accepting in ordinary times, under the normal conditions of peace, that measure of control which, if my hon. friend will study the history of his own party and the announcements of his colleagues, he will find is suggested by them not only for war time, but to be continued permanently and forever.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Quote the instances.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for Cape Breton South—

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has no right to put words in the mouth of any member of this house unless he is prepared to quote his authority. Already he has made a great many statements which are not in accordance with the facts. I think he ought to substantiate what he has said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the point of order, I listened very attentively to the hon. member who is speaking at this time. He made no personal references. He was making reference only to the policies of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. That is the interpretation I gave to his remarks.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He made reference to members of this group having made statements.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They admitted making them.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, and I will repeat them.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me quote one particular instance. I refer to the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who, the other day, with the honesty which distinguishes that particular member of that particular group, in his argument in this chamber clearly outlined the real struggle between individual enterprise and collectivism. That is the term he used. No more honest and complete presentation of his case could have been made than that of the hon. member for Vancouver East, and nothing could be clearer than the meaning which all of us read into that term "collectivism". Therefore I suggest that the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, who seemingly do not know, as we who live in the province of Saskatchewan claim, at least, to do, the purpose and ultimate objective of the group's policy—I suggest particularly, with deference and with considerable admiration for the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that they and he spend some time in studying the real fundamentals of the party which he supports in this house. I would give like advice to the hon. member for Melfort. They will find I am right when I say that it spells the doom of cooperative enterprise in this country if ever socialism is adopted as a national policy in Canada.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The doom of the Liberal party, you mean.

Mr. GRAHAM: I return to what led me to rise and speak in this debate, and I hope I shall be able to make a more constructive contribution on this subject than on what has occupied my time so far. I speak on it because of a certain portion of the budget address of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and because I attach to it the greatest possible importance. I believe the time has now come when we, as the governing body of this country, in surveying the present and the near future must spend considerable time in appreciating the importance of the fiscal policy which this country proposes to carry through, not only in the days of the war, but in the very difficult post-war days.

We have heard a great deal in this house, and quite properly, about rehabilitation, reconstruction, reestablishment, social security and all those other subjects that are more or less allied to our intention to better the economic position of all the people of Canada. I think one thing all of us will agree we must do, even in approaching these most important social measures, is to see to it that they are needed as little as possible. Some of our young men when they come back from this war may want to adopt the army life as their career; but the vast majority of the young men who come back when victory is won will be farmers, lawyers, working men, merchants and other civilians who have been torn out of their civilian life and called to the country's service in the armed forces; and in discussing measures of reestablishment we must always keep that in mind. I can readily recall, as can every other veteran in the house, that when we came back from France after the last war at least ninety per cent of the men in uniform had one desire and one desire only, and that was to get out of uniform and back into their civilian careers as quickly as possible. It will be a regrettable necessity if we have to pay to large numbers of men now in the navy, the army and the air force their pay and allowances for any extended period after the war, but we may have to do so. While that may satisfy their immediate needs it certainly will not satisfy their mental and spiritual desires. We must make of Canada a country that will absorb their efforts in the vocations they want to follow. In that way, and in that way only, can we find a satisfactory solution of the problems in which we are all so vitally interested and of which we are a unit in attempting to find a worth-while solution.

What truths have been emphasized by this war? One of them is the interdependence of nations one upon the other, and that the welfare of one has a relationship to the welfare of the other. If that is true in the international field, it is also true that the welfare of the people of Saskatchewan is of importance to the people of Ontario, and the same with regard to every other territorial economic unit in this dominion of ours. Then let us apply the wise principles which we so often quote with regard to charity. Let us apply these wise principles of interdependence to our own country and then extend them to the other countries of the world.

Another truth that has been emphasized by the war is a keener realization of the place of money in our economic life. We now know that the total annual national income is best expressed in the total of the goods and services produced or acquired by all of the people of the country, and that the standard of living of an individual is determined by his securing for himself an equitable and reasonable portion of that total annual national income of goods and services. Obviously, therefore, any fiscal policy, if it is a wise one upon which to lay the foundation upon which we are to build this better life which we all desire so much, will be one that seeks to create the greatest possible annual national income. Then we must see to it that that largest possible total is distributed so far as is humanly possible equitably and fairly among all the people of this dominion. These should be the general aims of a wise fiscal policy.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) pointed out on Tuesday night a very striking truth, namely, that during the war we have spent some twelve and a half billion dollars and that that total equals one-half the total accumulated assets of Canada in 1933. He drew certain conclusions from that. I would draw another. He and his group, as I have understood them in this house, have frequently said that we should in some way take hold of that accumulated wealth, without paying interest or any reward to the persons who accumulated that wealth. We, on our part, have attempted to point out the very great relative importance of our annual production of wealth expressed as I explained in the earlier portion of my remarks. The very statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar illustrates more clearly than I was able to do the relative unimportance of the accumulated wealth of this country as compared with the importance of the annual national income that Canada is capable of producing. Our annual national income is that which we should safeguard, and we should increase and encourage it so that there will be a greater total to distribute among the Canadian people.

Saskatchewan, in the Sirois report, by the late Hon. Norman Rogers, a man most highly respected and honoured in this country, by many other economists, and by all hon. members from that province, has been pictured as the orphan in our economic family. We say there is a measure of truth in that. Like the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), I regret the stories told in this house of individual cases, because I do not believe their recital by some hon. members properly describes the magnificent people we have in Saskatchewan. You know, Mr. Speaker, how diligently we who come from that province have struggled to get for its people a certain measure of equality in the governmental and departmental policies adopted for the government of this country. But I feel certain that I speak for the vast majority of the people of that province when I say that we would readily surrender all of the bonuses and benefits that we have received by way of compensation from the federal treasury, or what are sometimes described as hand-outs from the federal treasury, if we could secure an equality of opportunity for the people of that province to produce the goods they can, and to find the most advantageous market at reasonable prices for their products, and in turn to buy whatever they require in the cheapest and best markets of the world. That is the gift I would wish the Liberal party to give to the people of my province, because that would put them in the position of that honest dependence on their own efforts which every free British citizen so much desires.

If that is the case, I think, in view of the statement by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, it is necessary that we get to these fundamentals in the remaking of this country. I wish to repeat his statement; it is not lengthy and on account of its importance I should like it to appear again and again on the records of this house. I should also like to see the same sentiments uttered by members of parliament from the central provinces of this great dominion. The statement to which I refer is as follows:

> There will again, however, be a time when the tariff will be an important instrument of trade policy and when this country will have to decide whether it will play its part with other countries which are prepared to help in freeing the world's trade, in enlarging markets, and in promoting the full and effective use of the world's resources.
> The government has already, by an exchange of notes with the United States on November 30 last, undertaken to enter into conversations with that country—

If I may interject, I heartily congratulate the government upon that particular step.

> —and with other countries, for the purpose of formulating programmes of agreed action directed to the expansion, after the war, of production, employment, and the exchange and consumption of goods, to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce and to the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers.

I am happy indeed to note that the government feels committed to these projects.

> Committed to these objects and having in mind particularly the vital concern of this country in access to the selling and buying markets of the world, the government is prepared to discuss with the government of the United States, the government of the United Kingdom, or the governments of other countries with which we trade, reciprocal trade arrangements wider in scope and longer in duration than have hitherto been made, provided always that the advantages of such arrangements shall be open to other countries willing to adhere to the same terms.
> We believe that questions of post-war commercial policy must be tackled broadly and boldly; we believe that world trade must have a more liberal and dependable charter than it has had in the past two decades; and that countries, such as Canada, for which world trade is the very blood stream, should be prepared, not merely to accept desirable arrangements but to take the initiative in working out a plan mutually of benefit to ourselves and to other countries. We believe that countries, which have had long experience of friendly relations should associate themselves with that initiative and furnish to others examples of concrete accomplishment in the distribution of the world's products for the mutual welfare of all people.

That, I say again, if it is meant—and I make no suggestion that it is not fully meant by the Minister of Finance or the government of which he forms a very important part—is a very important pronouncement of policy by this government and one to which I hope to give every assistance in carrying to fruition, the fullest fruition possible, because I believe it means the greatest prosperity for this country in which we are all so vitally interested.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A little late, is it not?

Mr. GRAHAM: Better late than never. I want to deal with that phase of this question. The Liberals of western Canada have been most vociferous, our hon. friends would perhaps say, or, as we say, the most concerned, about the establishment of such a policy in the past years of Canada's history. Why? The answer of course is quite obvious, namely, that on the prairies we grow immense surpluses of foodstuffs and we must find a market for those surpluses. We could legislate here until doomsday, but unless we find markets at reasonable prices for the products of the west no legislation could be enacted that would make those people prosperous and contented. We must fundamentally shape our fiscal policy to encourage the finding of markets for those surpluses. In eastern Canada as I met them I found most hon. members who come from rural districts agreed with the classical argument, if you wish to call it that, for free trade; they were fundamentally in favour of free trade, but on account of the industrial centralization in this part of Canada they had to some extent a home market for the farm produce of this part of Canada. That produce is of course that best suited to Ontario agriculture and their local market, namely, the raising of hogs and other live stock and the production of dairy products. Consequently, we never did get from eastern farm representatives the support to which I always felt the western people were entitled in their struggle to find markets for their products. But I want eastern members to note the tremendous change that has taken place during this war. Until the commencement of the war we in western Canada were concerned chiefly with the production of grain; to-day Alberta leads Ontario in the production of hogs, for example.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): So does Manitoba.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. I mention that merely to illustrate the fact that western Canada has embarked upon a policy of producing immense quantities of the very things that were formerly left to Ontario and Quebec farmers to raise and market in the central provinces. This fact will have very great impact on the agricultural situation in this country. I am hoping, therefore, that the farmers of Ontario and Quebec will realize quickly that they, like us, must find foreign markets for the surplus goods that we can so well produce. If we could find in the north-western United States a market for the hogs, cattle and dairy products of western Canada we would not be in competition in the domestic market with the farmers of eastern Canada. But if you confine us by a protective tariff to attempting to find sale for our products in this small market, the products of Ontario and of the west will inevitably come into disastrous collision, and this will have a serious effect on agriculture in our whole Canadian economy.

Then let us look at the industrialization of Canada. For many years those who most favoured the protective policy were naturally those interested in the building up of manufactures in this country. We have all heard of the "infant industry"; although we do not hear that plan advanced so often now as formerly. But I say again to the industrialists of Canada, the war has shown that their possible production greatly exceeds the requirements of our domestic market. Their plants have been expanded; power facilities have been greatly increased, and the manufacturers of Canada will find themselves in alignment with the farmers of eastern and western Canada in seeking foreign markets for their surplus products. Therefore I am hoping that at this historical moment the government will take full advantage of the opportunity presented to us now to put into effect some of the policies to which to a large extent the people of Canada have agreed but consider impossible of adoption for various local reasons. I know it takes at least two to make a bargain, even though we have the greatest desire in the world to adopt such a beneficial policy. But I must say that the advisability of adopting that policy would not depend on whether or not other countries did the same thing, though I know the attitude of the other country concerned would greatly influence the attitude of the average person toward such a policy. I think if the Minister of Finance were to study the history of that great country to the south, those 130,000,000 people who border us from the Atlantic to the Pacific, he would find that they, too, have learned many lessons as a result of this war and the last war. Perhaps never before, certainly never in my lifetime, has there been such an opportunity as is presented to this Liberal government to weld these countries together, to their mutual advantage.

To those who suggest that this would not be in complete consonance with our relationship to the mother country let me say in all sincerity that we must remember the position of Britain to-day and what will be her position after this terrible and prolonged war is over. Having in mind what will be Britain's financial position in the world after the war, I think we can best contribute to the British commonwealth of nations by making this Canada of ours as strong, as populous and as contented as we possibly can. Let us open our trade routes by sea, by rail and by air so that not only shall we profit by the exchange of goods that will follow, but we shall also help in the reconstruction of a world which will be sadly in need of the beneficent effects of such a wise policy. My purpose in making this speech to-day is solely in order to strengthen the hand of the government, for I have in mind that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has so capably acted as an intermediary between the United States and the mother country in the past. Let him complete that life work by taking the initiative in this matter as he took the initiative in uniting the war efforts of those countries, and in my opinion his name will be called blessed by the people of this country and particularly by the people of my own province.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his budget speech, and to a certain extent sympathize with him in the gigantic task of looking after the finances of this country in these very difficult times. In my opinion he is one of the most conscientious, hard-working members of the government. I should like also to offer my congratulations to my colleague the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) upon the very able manner in which he presented his criticisms of this budget. He certainly covered a wide field and did it very well.

The budget presented on March 2 calls for the raising of $5,500,000,000, which is certainly a sizable increase over the figure of $3,900,000,000 called for in the 1942 budget. The people of this country are prepared to pay, to work and to save, as they have been asked, provided there is not too much extravagance in the expenditure of public money. But when the government's director of economy is quoted in the press as was the case of March 4, as saying that evasion, subterfuge and outright trickery are being used to nullify the work of his office, then one wonders what is going on. Many people throughout this country are asking themselves questions when they see instances of money being wasted. In my opinion there is evidence of great waste in the expenditure of public money throughout this land, and I intend to deal with this matter at a later date. The rates of income tax in Canada are probably higher than those in any other country in the world; and with the exemptions lowered as they were a year ago, together with the increased demand for foodstuffs, many farmers have been brought into the income tax bracket for the first time. The minister stated that we are reaching the stage when we are producing all we can possibly produce from the resources and manpower at our disposal; and he went on to say that if we had no shortages, no vexatious restrictions, no farm labour problems such as have been debated in this house in recent weeks, then we could be certain that we were falling far short of an all-out war effort. I maintain that there has been an entire lack of coordination between the various departments of government in connection with our man-power problem. Up to the present it has been a case of inefficiency and muddling. If the Minister of Finance has any doubt as to that he might refer to the letter of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) under date of January 16, to the speech by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in Saskatoon on January 21, and to the farm labour policy announced by the Minister of Labour on February 26. If these various statements are compared, it is enough to make one wonder whether there is any coordination at all in connection with this matter; and then when one considers the competition offered by industry and the armed forces with regard to man-power, it is no wonder that things are in such a muddle.

I have taken part in every budget debate in this house since 1940, and each time I have asked that the farmer's income should be averaged over a period of at least three years. I am pleased to note that the minister has gone at least some distance in that direction. Recently, however, a return was tabled in the house showing the number of farmers who have paid income tax each year since 1930, and it shows that in 1942 there were 1,488 farmers in that class. Many farmers are operating to-day under great difficulties, being very short of help. Where the wife or the teen-age boys and girls are doing the farm work—and in many instances doing it more efficiently than any hired help that might be obtained under the new farm labour set-up—they should be placed upon the farm payroll and their wages allowed as deductions in the income tax return. In the case of new machinery the farmer should be allowed to write it off on the same basis that is granted to industry during the war; that is, over a period of three years. The farmer is allowed to write off twenty per cent the first year and ten per cent thereafter in connection with the purchase of new equipment. The food supply is now second only to military operations in determining the outcome of this war, and it will take first place when it comes to saving the world from anarchy after the war is over. Yet the Minister of Finance or the government of the day has so far refused to allow parity prices for agricultural production in the same manner as is done for industry and organized labour.

Doctor Wallace, principal of Queen's university, and chairman of the subcommittee on natural resources of the dominion, committee on reconstruction, said last night, in the railway committee room of this building, when speaking under the auspices of the dominion command of the Canadian Legion, that the success of the nation would depend on the rural life of Canada; that next to equalized remuneration, which to me means parity, rural electrification probably meant more than anything else to the rural people of Canada. I am happy to know that a year ago the government of my native province of Manitoba produced a blueprint for rural farm electrification in this country.

But if we cannot establish during these critical times a parity price for essential goods and services, then the chances for post-war reconstruction and parity prices are, to say the least, not very bright. Great Britain is now producing approximately sixty per cent of her own foodstuffs. In Great Britain during 1939 there were some 12,000,000 acres under cultivation; to-day 18,000,000 acres are under cultivation. There were 53,000 tractors in use there before the commencement of the war. There are now 120,000 tractors, and other power machinery has increased accordingly.

In Canada this year new tractors supplied will number about 5,000. This is less than a third of the number sold last year. And most people will realize that the acreage under cultivation to-day in this country is practically three times that of Great Britain. I believe that the approximate number of tractors in Canada would be in the neighbourhood of 120,000, or the number in use in Great Britain. The latest figuers I have for Canada show that two years ago we had approximately 107,000 tractors.

In more normal times, some years ago, the farmers of western Canada spent about $50,000,000 annually upon farm implements. On account of depreciation, and as a result of lessened purchasing power for a number of years prior to the outbreak of war in 1939, it was estimated at that time by implement manufacturers that it would require approximately $200,000,000 to bring our farm implement equipment up to date.

The point I should like to make there is that, with our farm labour shortage, tractors, and especially combines, should be made available to as great an extent as is reasonably possible, in order to assist in solving our labour problems. I realize that the Minister of Agriculture who, I am glad to see, is in his seat, does not believe in the use of a tractor on a farm. That is his statement made in a recent debate.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that. I said I did not use one, but I did not say what the hon. member has just stated.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, if there is any misunderstanding as to what the minister said, I shall quote it. Speaking on May 21, 1941, as reported at page 3028 of Hansard, the minister said:

> I should like to say that I have a farm in western Canada and I have never had a tractor.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I said that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And further on—

Mr. GARDINER: But that is not what you said.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just a minute. The minister continued:

> If I were dependent upon my farm for a living, as I have been at times, I certainly would not use a tractor.

And you can draw whatever inference you like from that.

Mr. GARDINER: That is on my farm.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): After all, the hon. member is Minister of Agriculture, and I think he should be setting an example to agricultural producers in Canada. I have read his opinion in that respect, as expressed in the house, in answer to a question asked about his view as to the use of tractors on farms in these days.

Mr. PERLEY: Did you ever run one?

Mr. GARDINER: I can run one.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not only can one operator accomplish so much more work with a tractor than with horses, but it has been proven to be much more economical. In that respect I should like to quote from a report which was prepared by an official of the minister's department—true, it was nearly ten years ago—to prove the point. I am quoting from a cross-section test on the prairies, conducted by Doctor Hopkins of the federal Department of Agriculture in 1932 with regard to the cost of producing wheat. This information was obtained from certain farmers who had kept records, together with the records of the experimental farms, based on an average yield of eighteen bushels to the acre:

Quarter-section	Per bushel
1 man and 5 horses, threshing hired.	$1.02
Half-section
1 man and 7 horses.....	0.795
1 man, 15 horse-power tractor and 2 horses.....	0.85
One section
2 men and 14 horses.....	0.774
1 man, 15 horse-power tractor and 2 horses.....	0.712
2 men, 6 horses, 15 horse-power tractor and thresher.....	0.778
1 man, 15 horse-power tractor, combine and truck.....	0.636
Two sections
4 men, 28 horses, combine.....	0.642
1 man, 20 horse-power tractor, combine and truck.....	0.554
Three sections
2 men, 20 horse-power tractor, combine and truck, land ploughed...	0.542
2 men, 20 horse-power tractor combine and truck, land one wayed..	0.511

As I said, that survey was conducted in 1932, when the cost of production was considerably less than it is to-day; and, of course, it was based on eighteen bushels to the acre. Various other tests have been conducted throughout the country.

Other hon. members have quoted Professor Hope, and I should like now to refer to Professor Hope, who has charge of the department of farm management, university of Saskatchewan. He points out that the average cost, plus interest on debt, throughout Saskatchewan in recent years has been ninety-one cents a bushel, on the basis of an average yield of fourteen bushels to the acre, which is still considerably higher than the average yield throughout Canada. If one takes into account to-day the higher cost of living brought about by the recent budget it will advance those figures to considerably more than a dollar a bushel.

Professor Hope stated, as did Doctor Hopkins in his survey, that the most economic unit to operate in the prairie provinces was a two-section power farm with tractor combine and truck, and that that is the most efficient wheat-producing unit it is possible to set up at this time. But less than one per cent of the farms in the west are as efficiently operated as that unit. I cannot recollect the exact figures, but I know the average farm operated in the west is in the neighbourhood of a half-section. As a matter of fact, I think it is a little less than a half-section. That is the basis upon which we have to consider the cost of production, as far as the average farmer of western Canada is concerned. And what applies to wheat production is equally true of feed grains.

I have also another article by J. E. Lattimer, professor of agricultural economics at Macdonald college. It deals with crops and wars. He has in this article a chart on which he gives some details as to the acreage of improved farm land per farm worker in the principal countries to date. These are the figures as of October, 1939, the year of the war:

Country	Acres
Canada	76·9
United States	50
Great Britain	30·3
Ireland	17
Denmark	14·7
Norway	14·7
Spain	12
Sweden	11·6
Switzerland	11·2
France	10
Poland	5·7
Bulgaria	4·2

Then he goes on to point out the values of land in 1914, and in various periods up to the present. Land in 1914 was $38 an acre, on the average, while in 1938 it was $24, which is quite a reduction. On the other hand, farm wages, including value for board, during 1914 stood at $323, while in 1938 it was $405, and at the present time it is considerably higher than that. As has been pointed out repeatedly, it is almost impossible to obtain help.

I have before me a short article on distribution costs which was issued by the 20th century committee on distribution. It is pointed out here that approximately 59 cents of the consumer's dollar goes for the services of distribution and only 41 cents for the services of production.

As was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham), we in western Canada have made rapid changes toward diversified farming. I believe he stated that both Alberta and Manitoba now produce more hogs than Ontario. On February 4 when I spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I used a chart to show prices in Chicago and Winnipeg as of that date. In the case of hogs, both were quoted at $15.35 per 100 pounds, but that was dressed weight at Winnipeg and live weight at Chicago which meant approximately 25 per cent more for pork in the United States than was being received in Canada. The choice hog in the United States weighs from 190 to 330 pounds, as I then pointed out, while in Canada it runs from 190 to 230 pounds. You can put weight on a hog much cheaper per pound after 200 pounds is reached than you can up to that point.

All producers will realize that to produce the 800,000,000 pounds of pork with hogs of 165 pounds each, dressed weight, will require the raising of approximately five million hogs at 220 pounds live weight, or three and one-third million hogs at 330 pounds live weight. This means that the producer would need to carry only two-thirds the number of brood sows now required to produce the 800,000,000 pounds of pork asked for by the department. I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture and the government that for at least the duration of the war our hogs should be marketed on the same basis as in the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: Would you suggest the same type of hog?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not think it is necessary to have exactly the same type of hog. In the United States they are marketing their hogs and are receiving 25 per cent more money than we are. Since the minister has raised the question, may I ask him if he has discussed with the proper authorities in Great Britain whether they would be satisfied to have this type of hog for the duration of the war?

Mr. GARDINER: We did discuss at a conference last fall of representatives of all the provinces of Canada and the farm organizations the question now raised by the hon. member. With the exception of the representative of one province it was agreed that we should abide by the present policy on account of the fact that it has been made known to us at all times that Britain prefers our product. The reason why she is buying our product in present quantities is that she prefers what we are producing.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I understand the minister to say that the various provincial departments of agriculture agreed that we should maintain the present standard; that is, with the exception of one.

Mr. GARDINER: I said that at the conference last fall those who represented the different provincial departments and the other organizations all with the exception of one, spoke in favour of abiding by the present policy.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This has not been discussed with the food authorities in Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Did they complain?

Mr. GARDINER: I would imagine that if we said we wanted to send that type of hog over they would have to accept it, but Britain prefers what we are sending now.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If there is any chance of a shortage of beef or beef products occurring, either in Canada or among the united nations, I suggest that the slaughtering of beef calves be prohibited for the duration of the war, more especially heifer beef calves. If the government feel that we cannot be granted access to the United States cattle market on the basis prevailing to July 1, 1942, I would then ask for a resumption of operations of the wartime food corporation in line with the operations of that body during the period July 1 to August 18, 1942, so that producers of beef cattle in this country may receive prices for their live stock reasonably related to the prices on the markets in the United States. The cattle producers now bear the entire cost of subsidizing consumers in order to keep down the cost of living in this country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to refer for a few moments to the production of flax for linseed oil. It is practically all grown in the prairie provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The 1942 acreage was:

Manitoba	227,000
Saskatchewan	1,056,000
Alberta	183,000

The total Canadian flax acreage for last year was 1,492,000.

The production of flax seed for oil purposes is now largely required for our war effort. During last summer and fall the farmers of western Canada were planning for a large increase of flax acreage this year. Many of them had bought seed at prices ranging from three dollars to five dollars a bushel. But, following the agricultural conference which was held in Ottawa on December 9, it was announced that the flax acreage for oil production should be increased by one million. The farmers went on making plans for increased production. About the middle of January the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) announced, rather suddenly, that as a result of a conference held in Washington at which he was present it was decided that no additional flax acreage should be put in during 1943, and he asked the farmers to go back to the original plan and produce from the same acreage as in 1942. A few days later there was a press release from the publicity and extension service of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, stating:

> The United States department of agriculture, according to the latest survey, estimates that the country faces a shortage of close to a billion pounds of fats and oils for food and industrial purposes in 1943. To help overcome this shortage the government of Canada is asking for increased production of oil-producing plants such as flax, soy beans, sunflowers, etc. The objective for flax seed is an acreage increase of 68 per cent.

Following a meeting of the national barley and linseed flax committee at Winnipeg on March 1, Mr. L. H. Lehberg, technical adviser to the federal oils and fats administration, said that supplies of vegetable oils received from the United States had been below expectations and that United States crushers were in the market for Canadian flax in addition to overseas demand.

In addition to the domestic supplies, there were indications that upwards of ten million bushels of flax will be needed by the United States, and a like amount required for export overseas.

Among western farmers there is a feeling of confusion as to where they fit into this general picture. This is well illustrated by the flax situation. Up to the present, with limited man-power and limited ability to secure the implements of production, of which I spoke this afternoon, they feel, as I stated, rather frustrated. The net marketable crop of flax last year was some 13,230,000 bushels. The total capacity for flax processing in this country was only 6,395,000 bushels, there being in operation nine flax processing plants, with one under construction at present. There are three of these plants in Montreal, two in Toronto, one in Baden, one in Winnipeg, one in St. Boniface, one in Medicine Hat, and one now under construction at Hamilton. It is rather surprising that this plant now being constructed at Hamilton should not have been built adjacent to the raw materials and abundance of cheap power which we have in the prairie provinces.

This afternoon, when the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was speaking, he pointed out that at present some eighty per cent of the capital in industry in Canada is invested within the two provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and that approximately eighty per cent of the industrial workers are located within these two provinces. As I have already indicated, this situation has been greatly aggravated during this war by the government of the day, by way of capital assistance to industry in Quebec and Ontario. I have placed on Hansard the sums of money which have been advanced, and which run into many hundreds of millions of dollars. Centralization apparently continues. A return of June 1 last shows that since the beginning of the war there had been constructed or were under construction in Ottawa eleven temporary buildings and one annex, at a total cost of $5,411,099.76. At that date, practically three years after the beginning of the war, only half of these buildings had been built. On February 26 there appeared in the press a statement that the government had approved a building programme under the National Housing Act and that in Ottawa and vicinity the sum of $1,000,000 was to be spent on the construction of houses, of which amount a quarter of a million was to be paid by the government.

Yesterday the Ottawa Journal published an editorial article entitled "More 'temporary' buildings," from which I quote the following:

> The government announces that an office building for the staff of prices board is to be built on Sussex street, at a cost of about $450,000. Prices board staff now is scattered about several rented premises. The government is to spend also $312,000 for a building for the women's division of the R.C.A.F., and $54,205 for a men's canteen. All of these are to be "temporary" structures.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

In the grand total of war expenditures $800,000 does not rank as a major item, and yet we think the people—who pay the bills—would like more assurance than appears on the surface that these buildings are an imperative necessity. That is especially the case as they are still in the plans stage, and if we may judge by the progress of work on the women's hostel the buildings would not be ready for use before next Christmas. The point is, do we really need these costly and elaborate "temporary" buildings when the war will be well within its fifth year?

Further on it says:

> A few days ago Mr. Ilsley announced that indefinite extension of government-financed housing would be impossible, because of scarcity of labour and materials, and to relieve the housing shortage, he said, the government would depend upon "private enterprise, rent control and decentralization". Some progress in decentralization already had been made, he added, pointing out that more than a dozen branches of prices board had been moved to Toronto and Montreal; that munitions and supply had established oil control in Toronto, transport control in Montreal.
> Obviously, the extent to which the government proposes to pursue this policy of decentralization must be a factor in the case for these new buildings. And at this stage of the war the demand for new office space by any department or agency of the government, or any uniformed service, needs to be viewed with healthy scepticism and an inquiring mind.

As most people know, we have at the head of the wartime prices and trade board Mr. Donald Gordon, a banker, who has not any experience whatever in production, distribution or merchandising within this country. The price of fuel wood in parts of Canada has been increased, by a stroke of the pen, from $9 to $13 a cord. You pay an extra five cents for a cup of tea or coffee for your meal. Yet the agriculturists of Canada are asked to produce foodstuffs for much less remuneration than the agriculturists of any other of the warring nations receive at this particular time. If we are to enforce the principle of price ceilings the price must be on a basis of parity prices for essential goods and services. This is something which to date the government of the day has not recognized. As I have pointed out before, the agriculturists represent thirty-three per cent of our entire population. They received fifteen per cent of the national income in the past year, 1942, and during the years from 1915 to 1919 they received thirty per cent of the national income. Certain large business concerns are now consolidating their position in this country under the present scheme of things.

May I add with respect to the wartime prices and trade board that on June 29 of last year I placed on the order paper a question asking for detailed information as to the board's staff. That question remained unanswered on the order paper until prorogation on January 27 of this year. I again placed it on the order paper on January 29 of this session, and it was passed as an order for a return on February 8, but to this day the return has not been brought down. A lot of pertinent information should be brought down in that return. I do not want to weary the house by giving the details of this question because it is lengthy, but I would point out, as was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for New Westminster, that there is great discontent throughout this country because of the operations of the price control administration under Mr. Donald Gordon, and the only reason why people are not saying more about it is their patriotism in this time of war. I am satisfied, however, that there must be a basis of parity prices for goods and services which are essential to the war effort; otherwise the board cannot continue to operate.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to speak on that aspect of the budget which I wish particularly to discuss, I should like to make two or three observations of a general nature. I believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in his recent remarks with respect to financial policy, which of course have their counterpart in economic policy, has served to prove more effectively than he could have done so deliberately the truth of many things which we in this group have been asserting over a period of time.

We believe that time will be the best test of right. We also believe that over a certain period of time certain prejudices which have existed will gradually disappear. We feel, as I said before, that the minister could not have been more successful in attesting the authenticity of many of these things that we have declared to be facts if he had deliberately set out to do so.

A few days ago a member of this house, sitting to the left, Mr. Speaker, expressed the fear that through the enormous financial expansion and through the enormous allocations of real wealth taking place in this country there was a danger we might go bankrupt. In reply to that expression of fear the minister made some significant declarations, and it is about those declarations that I should like to make one or two observations.

The Minister of Finance said that to speak of bankrupting this country simply because of the expenditure of billions of dollars or because of the consumption through war or otherwise of vast quantities of our production was simply to bring forward a bogey. He asserted that an individual or a group of individuals might go bankrupt in that way, and that even a nation might go bankrupt in that way as far as the supply of foreign exchange was concerned. But he said that as far as the nation itself is concerned it is fantastic to assume that we might become bankrupt in the sense that we shall run out of money. In fact, he said, the danger in war time is just the opposite. If we are going to become bankrupt because of these actions of ours, is it not a strange thing, he asked, that at the same time we are doubling the national income, wiping out unemployment, learning scores of new skills, and that we have expanded and diversified our productive equipment, enabled millions of our people to secure a nest-egg for the future, and developed a sense of productive achievement hitherto unknown in this country? He stated that no country goes bankrupt in that way; no country goes bankrupt through expanding its productive capacity. That, Mr. Speaker, was a significant statement. I know that it has been responsible for a number of very strange expressions which have emanated from certain members sitting on the government side of the house.

In the years of the depression members of this group advocated the stimulation of production through government grants. The Minister of Finance of that day—not the present minister, but he seemed to think along the same lines—threw his hands up in the air and screamed blue ruin. Yet to-day we find the Minister of Finance of the present government asserting that if we spend more money to expand the productive capacity of our country it is utterly impossible for this country as a consequence to go bankrupt. That should make us think. At this time we have about 600,000 of our men and women in uniform. They are not engaged in a productive capacity. We have taken up the slack as far as unemployment is concerned; yet we find that we are producing more than twice as much as we ever produced before. That is enough to make anyone stop and think. As we reflect upon post-war conditions we shall also bear in mind the statements made by the Minister of Finance to the effect that there is no danger of bankrupting your country by putting further quantities of money into circulation and vastly expanding the productive capacity of your country.

I wish to devote my time this evening mainly to the one aspect of war finance. Probably I should clarify my statement by saying that I intend to deal specifically with the war savings aspect of our war finance programme. I do so because I am afraid that many hon. members are not aware of the situation that has developed in this country with respect to war finance.

The minister stated the other day that the expenditures during 1942—I assume that means until March 31 of this year—will amount to $4,470 million. He stated further, either directly or by implication, that that volume of money in circulation, or at least a large part of that money which will be put into circulation, may, on account of the lesser amount of consumer goods available, create a dangerous condition of inflation. And because of that danger he will have to institute upon a larger scale his war savings campaign in order to tap from the finances in circulation in the country that portion which is likely to cause a condition of inflation.

At this point I should like to make one thing clear. There are many hon. members in this house and people in this country who actually believe that the only purpose of a bond campaign is to secure money with which to purchase ships and shells and guns and tanks. I have stated that one of the major purposes of a bond selling campaign is to drain off the excess purchasing power, and I have been roundly criticized for that statement. In order that my position in that regard may be made quite clear I should like to quote three or four statements which I have before me. First, I have a statement of the financial secretary to the British treasury, speaking in the British House of Commons on April 8, 1941. He said:

> What you have to emphasize is not so much the money that you are going to get in but the fact that what you are after is reducing consumption.

Then we have the Royal bank monthly letter of August, 1941, saying:

> It is, therefore, vitally important that taxation and borrowing should be considered not merely as devices to raise money but rather as measures to prevent money from being spent for non-essential purposes.

Professor Plumptre is reported in the Financial Post of October 5, 1940, as saying:

> It must be remembered primarily and seemingly paradoxically, that the government object is not to get money, but merely to reduce the public's spending. . . . The government can always "get money" because it may as an alternative to borrowing or even to taxation, create the required funds.

Then we have P. M. Richards, financial editor of Saturday Night, saying on March 28, 1942:

> The hard truth is that the government didn't itself want our money as much as it wanted to deprive us of it.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Then we have the Minister of Finance himself, speaking in the House of Commons on November 21, 1940, saying:

> That the task of finance is not only to provide the funds which are used to pay for the war services but more fundamentally is, by taxing and borrowing, to restrict the civilian demand for economic resources.

My purpose in quoting as I have is to be able to deal with the situation which has developed with respect to the war savings campaign. I shall deal with that a little later. I say the purpose of the bond, war savings certificates and stamp sales is primarily to drain off the surplus purchasing power and thus lessen the danger of an inflationary condition developing.

I stated that I should like to give some information with respect to the trend in connection with bond sales. In the second victory loan, of about a year ago, the government secured about $843 million from the Canadian people. If we forget for the moment the conversions that took place during that time, that sum exceeded the objective by about forty per cent.

Then we come to the third victory loan of last fall which secured, I believe, about $991,500,000 which, if considered less conversions, was approximately thirty-two per cent more than the stated objective. I would point out that not all the money so acquired came from savings; a large part of it came as a consequence of payroll deductions and other payments out of current income. Between February, 1942, and November, 1942, namely, between the second and third victory loans, there was a total of 339,000 conversions. Those conversions were mainly of $50 and $100 bonds. In October, 1942, alone the conversions numbered 78,000, or approximately 3,000 per working day. That is startling. Of the 339,000 conversions to which I have already referred, 268,000 represented bonds of $50 denomination, and 71,000 those of $100 denomination.

I have some figures which are very interesting. They are month by month figures from March to November of 1942, as follows:

	Conversions
	$50 bonds	$100 bonds
March	2,174	1,414
April	10,665	4,756
May	14,512	5,978
June	19,461	7,222
July	26,809	8,449
August	40,604	10,682
September	41,193	11,723
October	65,108	12,792
November	36,812	7,825

In the second victory loan I believe we had approximately 1,120,000 subscriptions for $50 bonds and approximately 746,000 subscriptions for $100 bonds. The dollar value of the conversions was not high, but the important thing to bear in mind is this. The minister has stated from time to time that through his bond selling campaigns he has endeavoured to spread the purchases over as broad a base as possible, thus depriving a greater number of those in the moderate income brackets of a part of their purchasing power, because, after all, they comprise the largest single group of all those in receipt of salaries. I believe the number of subscribers to the second victory loan totaled 1,681,000, while the number who subscribed to the third victory loan was slightly in excess of 2,000,000. Therefore, if the conversion of $50 and $100 bonds is going on now as rapidly as it did prior to November, 1942, I am of opinion that by the middle of next summer we shall have over 400,000 conversions.

I would ask that these figures be kept in mind, because I am leading up to something which I believe to be of extreme importance. In the second victory loan I understand that something like 800,000 workers participated in the payroll deduction plan, subscribing approximately $65,000,000. In the third victory loan there were about 1,200,000 who subscribed approximately $90,000,000 under the same plan. These were mainly bonds in the $50 and $100 denominations, and I would say it is in those brackets that we face the greatest number of conversions. Those conversions were extremely heavy last September, and I believe the reason was that bonds purchased during the second victory loan matured, if that is a proper word to use, about that time. This leads me to believe that a very large number of those who purchased bonds during the second victory loan campaign cashed them in just as soon as the law permitted them to do so. I think the same applies also to the sales of war savings certificates. I understand that of the $6,000,000 worth of certificates sold between the second and third victory loans, approximately $2,000,000 were handed in for redemption.

This is extremely important, I believe, in the light of what I have to say in a moment or two. It seems to me the results of such a scheme are extremely obvious. On the surface it would appear that the very fine machinery set up by the minister in order to handle the savings aspect of his finance policy is breaking down much more rapidly than many people anticipated; I was going to say more rapidly than the minister expected. but I do not think that would be fair because I believe he appreciates the situation that is developing. Let me give what I think are the reasons for so many conversions in the $50 and $100 brackets. The first is the nature of the campaigns that have been carried on; I believe that is responsible to a certain extent. You cannot withhold from the people the fact that the main reason for pushing the sale of bonds, war savings certificates and stamps is to reduce the public demand for consumer goods. They find it out sooner or later. I know that many persons sacrificed beyond their capacity because they were assured that the only way in which we could produce ships, shells, guns and tanks was for them to deprive themselves in order to purchase war savings stamps, certificates and bonds. As a result, the moment the time arrived when they could legally convert those bonds into cash, they did so.

I should like to develop that point just a little further. If one of the principal reasons—and I dare even go so far as to say the major reason—behind the bond sale campaign of the government is to reduce the public demand for consumer goods, in my opinion it is a serious thing to say in theatres, at public meetings and in various other ways that a certain boy on a certain ship will not have a gun if you do not deprive yourself of some necessity in order to buy a bond. The people find out the real reason sooner or later. For instance, all they had to do was to pick up Maclean's magazine for last October 13 and read the article in which the minister definitely asserted, in reply to a question, that one major purpose behind the campaign was to reduce the public demand for consumer goods. His salesmen go to old age pensioners, for example, and in some instances they have actually made them feel that if they did not subscribe they were subversive. I am not blaming the minister for that; I am blaming some of the salesmen who apparently have not been properly advised with respect to these points. No one is capable of putting up a good argument to the effect that an old age pensioner receiving anywhere from $10 to $25 a month has any surplus purchasing power which will endanger the national economy. The same can be said of a widowed mother, a man in receipt of war veterans' allowance, or even a man in receipt of a veteran's pension. They resent it when somebody comes along and puts pressure on them, compelling them to make sacrifices out of all proportion to what Canadians generally are sacrificing. Consequently the moment they can do so many convert their bonds into cash.

I should like to say a word about payroll deductions. In doing so, I wish to talk about the civil service. All across this country we have thousands upon thousands of people in receipt of incomes far below those to which they are entitled in order to meet the increased costs of living. The government has not set a very good example in this regard, because government offices in Ottawa and across the country are filled with young girls and young men whose incomes are certainly not adequate to meet the costs of living with which they are confronted.

The war savings committee goes to those young girls and young men and makes their contributions almost a condition of employment. No wonder the minute they have an opportunity of converting their purchases into cash, they do so! I made a rather strong statement when I said that even in the civil service contributions are practically made a condition of employment.

In that connection let me quote from something which came to my hand. It is a pamphlet headed "The federal civil service organization", and makes reference to the third victory loan campaign. I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that we are always using the word "voluntary" and emphasizing that all these contributions are voluntary. The pamphlet reads, in part, as follows:

> The federal civil service forms part of payroll savings section of the national war finance committee's organization for the purposes of the third victory loan.
> The appeal to you—

And I ask hon. members to mark the word "appeal".

> —as a Canadian is to share in the subscribing of $750,000,000 for the national war effort. The demand of you—

Note those words:

> —as a civil servant is to organize and support the loan in order that the flag may fly high in your locality.

And listen to the next paragraph:

> The governor in council has directed that every civil servant invited to serve on a committee organized by or for the national war finance committee shall accept the task as an act of duty.
> Every civil service victory loan group officially organized for the purposes of the victory loan is subject to such direction and supervision as the national war finance committee, or its provincial or local divisions and units, may deem necessary.

I shall not go beyond that point, but I believe I have read enough to indicate that no government employee, regardless of whether she or he is receiving $55, $60 or $70 a month dared refuse to subscribe. And I know that some of these young employees who have been drawn from the west to work in Ottawa—because you will not give us industry or war departments to any extent out in the west—try to save their nickels and dimes so that they may go home for two weeks during the summer. No wonder thousands of them have quit! No wonder that when I called for a return showing how many had quit I was told that the government did not have the information!

Those are some of the reasons. Let me emphasize the fact that while these young employees are underpaid, while they are having this pressure put upon them to purchase, it is no wonder that after the great machine is paid to collect they turn around and convert their bonds.

Then, there is another reason, which has to do with our boys and girls in uniform. I contend that when we stop to consider what they are being paid—and I am not complaining about it for the moment, although I certainly think it is inadequate—we must remember that they are prepared to make the supreme sacrifice. Yet I should like to tell the house what happened in connection with this same war savings campaign in the military camps. I know of eight hundred soldiers right in this province who were taking a special course. In the third victory loan campaign they had placed upon their shoulders a quota of $16,000, which meant $20 per soldier. Any soldier who did not subscribe to the extent of $20 was paraded before his commanding officer, and when that happened he had to give good reasons for not having subscribed. I dare say that rather than be paraded before his commanding officer the average man would sacrifice, or would have his family make sacrifices, in order to keep up his head among the other men in his unit. But the minute it became legal or possible to convert those bonds into cash, naturally they would do so.

Then, there is another reason. I wish to refer to the contents of a letter which came to my attention only two days ago. The Minister of Finance is not in his seat at the moment, but I should like to have someone tell him about this, so that he can check it. This letter from my constituency states—and I shall not quote the man's exact words—that the collector for the International Harvester Company in that part of our province stated he had been instructed by his company to secure $3,000,000 in bonds on past due accounts, as well as on new accounts. If that is true—and I am sure the minister would get the significance of it—it certainly should be checked. I am told in the same letter that a certain bond salesman in that town purchased all the bonds he could possibly buy with the spare cash he had on hand, then went out and flourished those bonds under the noses of prospective subscribers, to show them what a patriotic man he was. Very shortly after the campaign closed he went to the bank and had his bonds converted into cash, following which he installed an expensive electric lighting plant in his farm buildings.

Those are practices which are not good. When the people in that community find out that such things took place they will naturally endeavour to dispose of their bonds as quickly as possible. I say that if the minister does not want this great war savings campaign machine to bog down he had better do something about repairing some of the broken parts in it, and apply a little oil; because, as sure as can be, if the rate of conversion continues it will be only a short time until our conversions are almost equal to our purchases, and this very danger about which he has been warning us will be upon us, and upon us before he realizes it.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of features of this year's budget concerning which our people will exercise their right to grumble; but in the main I am satisfied the people will accept the budget, because of their willingness to put everything they have into their endeavour to achieve victory, in the hope and determination that after the war has been won we shall win a people's peace here at home. Perhaps more important than any grumbling on the part of our people, one should state that this is a budget which they will not forget. I am referring not to its severity, but rather to the way in which it turns the searchlight on the importance of the common man. In particular this budget points out that it is impossible to collect in taxes the amount of money that is necessary to wage the war without dipping very heavily into the pockets of those with meagre incomes. The budget also points out that it is impossible to borrow sufficient money to meet the requirements of the war without calling upon the common people, the great mass of workers and farmers, to give of their savings. The budget also points out that in the matter of restricting the demands for domestic goods, again the appeal must be made to the common people. We cannot restrict that demand sufficiently by asking the well-to-do to go without their luxuries; the only way it can be done is by getting the common people to curtail their purchases of some of the actual necessities of life.

We in this group, and many throughout the country, are not satisfied that this budget goes as far as it should in placing the proper share of the burden upon those in the upper brackets, but we admit that the budget draws attention to the fact that even though heavier burdens are placed on those in the upper brackets, it is still necessary to call upon the great mass of the common people, the workers and the farmers, if we are to find the wherewithal to wage this conflict. In other words, this budget turns the searchlight on the importance of the common people. It is the common people who must fight the war; it is the common people who must produce the munitions of war and the food; and it is the common people who must provide the finances, and refrain from demanding domestic goods so that we can divert the portion that is necessary to war materials. I urge, as I have already stated, that the common man be not forgotten. If he is so important to-day, he will be important to-morrow.

In my view there would be less complaining about the budget if there were a few gestures on the other side to the importance of the common man. In addition to the importance given him through asking him to fight the war, to produce the goods and to provide the finance, his needs should be recognized to a much greater extent than is the case as far as this budget is concerned. I wish to speak specifically about two or three groups of our citizens for whom it seems to me this is the time that consideration should be given. I shall refer first to the old age and blind pensioners.

In 1939-40 the total expenditures of this government were $680,794,000. The budget for this year calls for $5,500,000,000. In other words, this year's budget is $4,819,206,000 greater than the expenditures of 1939-40. Back in 1939 old age pensions were being debated in this house. I find on page 1746 of Hansard of that year that the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Dunning, dealt with this question by pointing out that in order to lower the age at which old age pensions would be paid to sixty-five years—that was the matter being discussed at that particular moment—would cost the dominion alone the sum of $18,859,000. That amount simply could not be found, and therefore no change was made in the Old Age Pensions Act.

I go back to the figures I gave a moment ago. In 1939 it was impossible to find $18,859,000, but the expenditures to be made this year will exceed the total expenditures of 1939-40 by 255 times the increase which could not be found in 1939.

I hold in my hand a copy of a letter written by the attorney general of Manitoba to the president of the old age pensioners society in that province under date of June 18, 1942. In this letter Mr. McLenaghan quotes part of a letter which he had received from the Minister of Finance of this government. The Minister of Finance, referring to the total cost of old age and blind pensions for 1941-42 had this to say:

> If the maximum pension had been $300 a year the total cost of pensions would have been increased by approximately $9,870,600.

The writer of the letter then goes on to set out the portion of that amount which the provinces would have been required to contribute, but that portion is included in this total sum of less than ten million dollars. Ten million dollars sounds like a lot of money, but it represents only an additional one-fifth of one cent for every dollar that we shall spend this year. The amount is so small, such a drop in the bucket, that it seems to me deplorable, if not disgraceful, that no provision for an increase in the amount to be paid for old age and blind pensioners is being made in this year's budget.

It is rather sad to note that according to the estimates the amount to be voted for old age pensions this year is $126,000 less than was voted last year. I take it there are only two explanations for this. Either the amounts are being cut down by means of the various regulations, or the old people are dying off. One cannot be surprised at that when he thinks of their trying to exist on $20 a month. On the other hand, I note that the estimates provide for an increase of nearly $3,000 in the amount required for pensions to retired judges.

I think the views of the people generally, outside the house, and of the majority of those inside the house, although these views do not often find expression from the government benches, are very well put in the report of a sermon delivered recently by Reverend Father Wood of St. Mary's Cathedral, Winnipeg. I should like to quote from a report in the Winnipeg Tribune of January 26, as follows:

> The way we are treating our old pioneers by granting them the magnificent sum of $20 a month each is a disgrace to any civilized country, Rev. F. R. Wood said at St. Mary's cathedral Sunday.
> "You know the situation regarding old age and blind pensions," he said. "The sum is so small as barely to exclude starvation, especially when the recipient is deprived of almost everything he possesses before even this miserable pittance is granted.
> "If two people succeed in building a home and then in their old age lose their income, the authorities seize this last thing and insist on rendering them destitute before granting them $20 a month."
> "We are not actually guilty of killing our old people, but we are approaching as close to that state as we dare go without being brought into the courts."

I hope that the day will come when the attitude in this house toward old age pensions, instead of making possible statements such as this I have read from Father Wood, will be that which has been brought to the attention of this house before from a sister dominion. I quote from what was said in the parliament of New Zealand on September 1, 1936:

> All social legislation, and especially that providing for pensions, is a recognition by the community of the fact that the recipients of the pension have in a very large measure been responsible for the development of the country and the vast accumulations within it. One of the points to be recognized is that such allowances made by the younger generation to their forebears are by no means a charity but in reality a recognition and a return to them of what they themselves have put into the nation.

A few days ago I asked some questions in the house concerning this matter, whether or not this government had given any hope to the various provinces that some adjustment in the amount of the old age pension might be made; and among the answers that I received, I find that I was referred to a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), I believe it was in 1941. On looking into that statement I discovered that one of the points which the minister laid down on that occasion was either his belief or the belief of his party that the only way in which we could hope for an increase in the amount of the old age pension was to put it on a contributory basis. I think the answer to that point is very clearly put in the words I have quoted from the New Zealand Hansard, to the effect that our old people have already contributed to the wealth and well-being of the country and, because of the contribution which they have made, if for no other reason, they are entitled to decency and dignity in their old age—which is not possible on the $20 a month we are giving them at the present time.

Not only are there our old people, but there are other groups in the community for whom, it seems to me, this budget should have made better provision. A number of us in the last day or two have had the privilege of meeting with a group of ladies who are in the city at the present time, representing the non-pensioned widows of veterans of the last war. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) stated this afternoon that the country would receive well the item of $400,000 which is in the estimates to make some provision for these people. He is perfectly right; this country will receive well the fact that something is being done: but it seems to me that the country will not rest at all easy when it realizes that that provision boils down to $20, or in special cases to $25 as a maximum, a month for these women when they are in necessitous circumstances and when they meet certain other regulations which will be laid down from time to time. It seems to me that this is a disgrace to the memory of the men who gave their lives in, or as a result of, the last war; that it is a disgrace, in the light of the things that are being said about what this war is being fought for, if this is the best we can do for these women. I sincerely hope that hon. members by an overwhelming majority will have so much to say on this matter that a change of policy will be made by the government before this session is over, either that the amount to be granted to these people will be raised, or that the possibility of any means test will be eliminated, or both of these, with other provisions as well. I suggest that if a few gestures of this nature could have been provided for in the budget, it would have eliminated any grumbling about it on the part of our people, and it would have done the thing I suggested earlier; it would have made our people, the workers and the farmers, feel that not only were they important when it comes to fighting the war and providing the goods and paying for it, but their needs also are important, and they have the right to participate in the wealth and well-being of this country. I hope that before this session is over, despite the fact that the policy has been announced and the estimates have been laid on the table, a revision will be made, recognizing on that side of things the importance of the common people of this dominion.

I turn now to another matter. A very large section of these important common people, these people who fight the war and produce the supplies and pay for it, are working men and women. The attitude of this government toward labour is a matter of great importance to them. Thus far that attitude does not give them a great deal of hope for a better day. I want to refer to what I have in my hand as an example. This document is a copy of a return tabled in the Manitoba legislature on February 22. It sets out certain facts which are public property: first of all, that in November, 1941, certain underpayments of wages on dominion government contracts within the province of Manitoba were discovered. On looking into this matter, I find that the wages paid were in accordance with what this government requires as a minimum but they were underpayments as far as legislation in the province of Manitoba is concerned. The then minister of labour of Manitoba, according to a press report of his remarks in the legislature, said quite definitely that for a period of a great many months his department was given to understand that the dominion government would require the enforcement of Manitoba fair wage legislation on dominion government contracts within the province, even though the wages required there might be higher than those required by the regulations of this government. This document which I have in my hand says further that in March, 1942, a report on these underpayments was made to the Department of Labour of this government. The department of labour of Manitoba asked the permission of the Department of Labour here to collect these alleged underpayments. The federal Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) agreed to this proposal on April 17, 1942. I suggest that the statement in this connection in this return supports the contention made by the former minister of labour of Manitoba, that for a time at least he had the approval of this government for the enforcement in Manitoba of the province's fair wage legislation with respect to dominion government contracts in that province. But in the course of time—again I am reading from the return which I have in my hand—one of the companies there protested and wrote to Ottawa, referring the matter to the chief of wages branch of the national war labour board; and on October 7, 1942, the chief of that branch wrote to the then minister of labour of Manitoba advising him that the matter had been referred to the federal Department of Justice. Matters went on until January 14 of this year when the federal Minister of Labour reported to the regional war labour board of the province of Manitoba the decision of the Department of Justice at Ottawa. I shall read the important clause, clause (c):

> The works in question are not subject to the fair wages act, 1916, of Manitoba.

Yesterday when I had before the house a motion asking for the tabling of certain documents passing between this government and the provincial governments, respecting the matter of old age pensions, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made the reservation that the documents should not be brought down to the house until the provincial governments had been consulted. I quote his remarks from page 1129 of Hansard:

> The provinces have their own jurisdiction and they are partners in the work of government of the dominion.

In another passage he says that the provinces are sensitive about the federal government stepping in. But when it is a case of provincial wage legislation calling for slightly higher wages than the dominion legislation calls for, this government does not hesitate to step in and, in effect, nullify that higher wage legislation of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do I understand that the correspondence which my hon. friend has read is the subject of a return brought down to this house?

Mr. KNOWLES: The correspondence I have read is from a return tabled in the Manitoba legislature. When I asked questions concerning this matter in the house a few days ago, the Minister of Labour stated that a commissioner had been appointed to make an investigation. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter for investigation; it is a matter of policy. The companies concerned do not dispute the question of the wages which were paid to their employees or the hours their employees worked, but they dispute the right of the Manitoba government to insist on the payment of Manitoba wages on dominion government work.

What has happened is that there has been a reversal of policy on the part of this government. The policy enunciated by the Minister of Labour on April 17, 1942, was that this government agreed to the right of the Manitoba government to enforce its own wage legislation, but on January 14, 1943, we find that this government changed its policy. I know there is a reference to a ruling from the Department of Justice, and in the minds of some people there is something very sacrosanct about a ruling of the Department of Justice. But after all that is not a ruling of the courts. It is simply a ruling of another department of the government. Undoubtedly there has been a change of policy on the part of the government, a willingness to interfere and actually to nullify the wage legislation that exists in Manitoba. I repeat, that is not a matter for investigation; it is a matter of policy.

This attitude on the part of the Department of Labour of this government does not alleviate the grumbling of our people about the budget. On the other hand I feel that if we had a labour policy moving in a progressive direction we would have less complaining about the severity of the budget.

There are one or two other related matters which were given publicity in the press of Winnipeg, following an address in the provincial legislature of Manitoba by the former minister of labour there. About an hour ago some of us had the privilege of sitting down to a delightful dinner as the guests of one of the hon. members from Winnipeg, and because of the nature of the food served we had some very good fish stories. This is a fish story that is not quite so enjoyable.

An hon. MEMBER: How were the fish?

Mr. KNOWLES: The fish were lovely. I quote from the press report:

> In December, 1941, a complaint was received that a fish company supplying fish on a war contract, was not paying the minimum wage.

That is the Manitoba minimum wage.

> An inspector investigated. Attached to the contract was a wage schedule. On inquiry it was found the company owed $67 and gave a cheque for it.
> Mr. Farmer told the house his department was asked to send it to Ottawa from where it would be disbursed to the persons entitled to it. Some time after the men asked when they could expect their cheques. In March, 1942—

Note, that was in March, 1942, and yet a month later, on April 17, 1942, the Department of Labour here was still giving authority to the Manitoba department to enforce these wages. I continue the quotation:

> In March, 1942, he discovered that the cheque he had collected had been returned to the fish company with the explanation that the contract did not come within what were interpreted as war contracts.
> On another occasion, training schools were set up in certain clothing factories and other industries under dominion regulations with respect to the war emergency training programme. As one inducement to get trainees the dominion published a schedule promising wages of 35 cents an hour to those who took the course. During the training period the apprentices were paid by the dominion.
> Some employers who took on the trainees, after they had finished the course, employed them at the minimum wage, 25 cents an hour. When attempts were made to collect the 35 cents promised, word came from Ottawa that the whole thing had been a mistake.

There you had on the part of the province of Manitoba a readiness to enforce, to go out diligently to enforce a wage scale slightly better than the wage scale of this government. But this government, which, as I suggested from the Prime Minister's remarks yesterday, at times declares that it does not want to interfere in provincial matters, did not hesitate to step in and nullify the provincial wage legislation. Then they wonder why there are complaints about the labour policy of this government.

Closely related, turning for a moment to the agricultural community, is the concern—and some of us are beginning to get quite a bit of correspondence about it—as to whether cooperative organizations will have to pay taxes on the money which they save by their cooperative endeavours. There are very disquieting rumours. If this should be the case; if there is to be a policy that will ruin the cooperative movement in this country, as well as having an anti-labour policy, I suggest that the people are going to wonder whether there is anything at all to the professions that are frequently made around here about this being a war for a better world when victory is won. If some of the aims of our social legislation which I have suggested, an increase in the old age pension, an increase in the amount set aside for widows of veterans of the last war, and an increase in wages along the lines I have just suggested were granted, I realize that we would be moving slightly in the direction of a better order, slightly in the direction of a greater share by the Canadian people in the wealth they produce. There may be some who do not like that idea. But supposedly that is what this war is all about, and I suggest that if the people of this country are as important as they are when it comes to fighting the war, producing the goods required, and paying for the war, they are important in these other respects as well.

There is another matter which has been of deep concern to the people of Winnipeg. It is perhaps only a small matter taken by itself, but if it is a sample it creates misgivings. Not long ago the government purchased for war needs, I believe by the Department of National Defence for Naval Services, a property in Winnipeg formerly known as the Winnipeg Winter club. I made inquiry both in Winnipeg and here concerning this purchase, and I hold in my hand a copy of sessional paper No. 193. I asked several questions, two being particularly relevant. I endeavoured to ascertain the assessed value of the property and to discover what had been paid for it. According to the sessional paper the assessed value of land and buildings was $129,365. In that connection may I say I have secured similar information from the assessment commissioner of Winnipeg and it tallies with this figure, but I make this comment, that the figures I received from Winnipeg give the amount on which the taxes were paid as $94,090. The assessment commissioner, however, advises me what percentage of the market value these figures represented, and when you adjust that figure, the $129,365 represents the market value as computed from the assessed valuation. But the price paid for the land, building and equipment was $256,000. I wish to make it perfectly clear that the assessed value did not include the equipment while the purchase price did, but there is a spread there of over $126,000, which is a lot of money for the equipment which could have been in that property.

I find as an explanation of this purchase that the price was arrived at after consultation between a member of the Montreal real estate board — not the board — and members — not the board itself—of the Winnipeg real estate board, and the real estate adviser of the Department of National Defence. And then note this sentence. I suppose it is a defence; I need not comment on it:

> A condition of the sale was that the Winnipeg Winter club would invest the total net proceeds in victory bonds—

"the total net proceeds", I wonder what that "net" means.

> —and would undertake to retain and not to dispose of by sale at least fifty per cent of the said bonds for the duration of the war.

That sort of thing puzzles people who are asked to pay in the way our people are asked to pay, when $256,000 is paid for a piece of property the market value of which, as adjusted from the assessed value, was only $129,365.

Another matter which causes deep concern to our people is the amount of unnecessary advertising which is being circulated in our newspapers and put upon billboards across the country. I hold in my hand a full page advertisement; it does not matter whose it is because a great many firms are doing it. It offers nothing for sale; but apparently the money has to be spent in some way; the newspapers have to be kept going, or perhaps what is more to the point private industry has to be kept in the field until the war is over. Some may say, What is wrong with that? But I insist that that is not what the common people are fighting for, for the maintenance by private industry of a grip on our economy. Our people are concerned about a new economy in which they will have the opportunity, free from the restrictions of private profit, to produce an abundance of wealth and forthwith to share in that wealth.

In closing, let me say that some of us regret very much that into this budget debate there has come the old issue of tariffs and free trade. It has been introduced on the one hand by the Minister of Finance and on the other hand by the first speaker for the official opposition.

It causes some of us misgivings to feel that possibly when this war is over, our boys will come home to be handed once again the age-old political battle between these two groups. The point was very well put in a recent broadcast over the C.B.C. in which Mr. J. W. Dafoe, editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, took part in which he made a statement something like this—I am paraphrasing it, but I think I have the sense of what he said: The trouble with the planners—and when the Winnipeg Free Press talks about "planners" it is usually talking about the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—is that they aim at sharing what we have within our country on a subsistence basis. The trouble with the planners is that they do not realize or are not prepared to try to take advantage of the values to be had from foreign trade.

I say that that last charge is not correct; we are deeply concerned about the values to be had by foreign trade; but what we wish to point out to those who think like Mr. Dafoe, is that you can have a trade policy that will result in gains for Canada as a whole, but unless within the country you have some sort of planned economy, the common people will not profit from those gains from foreign trade. In other words, we believe that what is needed is a wise policy as far as foreign trade is concerned so that we shall reap the advantages to be had by an economic division of labour among the various quarters of the earth, and in addition an internal policy on the basis of a planned economy so that our people will share in the benefits to be gained from that foreign trade, as well as from our own production.

We in this group are sometimes accused of not being interested in the matter of trade. We are deeply interested. But we deplore the fact that those who are concerned primarily with tariff matters do not realize the importance of the other side of the picture, namely, the ways and means within our country whereby we can share the wealth we produce or gain by a wise trade policy.

I believe that the subamendment moved by this group expresses very well the views of the people of this country, particularly the workers and the farmers, with respect to the budget: first of all that there should be the nationalization of our banking system. We are able to follow the arguments of the Minister of Finance concerning the necessity of borrowing from the chartered banks, under the set-up that now exists. But we see no reason why this government, since it has supreme control over banking and monetary policy, should not nationalize the banks and then see to it that the amount of money we have to borrow to supplement savings and taxation is borrowed from our own banking system without mortgaging the future of this country in terms of heavy interest payments.

Second, our subamendment proposes—and I am sure it represents very clearly the views of our people—that there should have been provided increases in our social services, particularly larger payments to old age and blind pensioners and the other group I have talked about to-night, the widows of veterans of the last war, as well as the veterans themselves, of the last war and the present war.

Finally, with respect to the third part of our subamendment, evidence in support of which has already been given so well by other speakers of this group, we feel that the time has come to reverse the present trend in the direction of monopolistic control. We believe it is time we moved in the direction of more cooperative control, in the direction of the sharing by the people in the control of the economy of this country. In fact in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that we shall not have security in this land; we shall not play our part in making possible the century of the common man; we shall not achieve the things for which our people are fighting, until the control of the economy of this country is where it ought to be, in the hands of the common people, so that it may be made to serve their interests.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow closely the speech delivered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I could not help thinking that his remarks were rather far removed from the facts when he said the people of this country individually were not sharing in the general wealth and prosperity of Canada more than at any other period in our history.

It has been my privilege to sit in this house for many years, but never have I heard a budget speech presented during a period more difficult than that through which we are now passing. As I listen to the socialistic speeches of hon. members to my left, and those of the hon. members to my right who form the right wing of the government of the day, when they speak about the things that are to come after the war and the problems we may have to face when our boys return, I wonder if we sometimes forget that we are a nation at war; that we are struggling with our backs to the wall to save not only our own country but all civilization and freedom. We talk about the four freedoms that will flourish when peace returns; yet we hesitate and hazard the main freedom that is at stake in time of war. I listened to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) give his side of the controversy with the premier of Quebec or the members of the legislature of that province as to the number of boats sunk in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It was not a controversy with the premier of Quebec.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. gentleman need not rise to interrupt me. The minister did not hesitate to deal with what was said by one who disagrees with him politically, but he was very careful not to repeat what was said by the premier of Quebec, who was absolutely in accord with the statements made in that province.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I must correct my hon. friend. The premier of Quebec was not in accord with most of the remarks made by Mr. Gagnon.

Mr. ROWE: He may not be in accord with most of the words that were uttered, but he was in accord with the kernel of what was said, that in the province of Quebec and along the St. Lawrence river there were all sorts of trouble of which the people were not aware.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Did he say so?

Mr. ROWE: Yes, he said so in the Quebec legislature, as my hon. friend well knows.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I do not know that.

Mr. ROWE: I do not want to get into any controversy, but we might as well face the facts. We have been playing politics in this country all along the line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), who applauds, should know better than anyone else, because no one plays politics more viciously than he does.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: I have the floor, Mr. Speaker. I do not interrupt my hon. friends when they make their political speeches; I do not interrupt the hon. member for Vancouver Centre who, though a minister of the crown, makes political speeches for the sake of the people of Vancouver. I am not trying to emphasize the number of boats that have been sunk in the St. Lawrence. The navy minister knows very well that I have not taken advantage of any information I may have obtained, that I have observed the etiquette which I believe an hon. member should observe in time of war. I have not been in agreement with all that has been said, nor have I agreed with all the criticism in regard to boats sunk here or boats sunk there. I do not propose to tell Hitler anything if I can avoid doing so; I do not want to say that this boat was sunk at my back-door, or anything like that, but I do not intend to sit idly by and listen to a minister shield those of his own political faith while he tries to place the responsibility for everything upon the shoulders of those who normally are of a different brand of politics.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to be unfair, but the controversy between the Hon. Mr. Gagnon and myself arose as to the number of sinkings in the St. Lawrence. On that point the premier of Quebec made no statement whatever.

Mr. GRAYDON: But he did with regard to spies.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): He did not make any statement as to the number of ships sunk, but the Hon. Mr. Gagnon, a former colleague of my hon. friend, did, and my hon. friend cannot escape responsibiilty now—

Mr. ROWE: I am not trying to escape responsibility, nor am I going to let the minister escape responsibility.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am not trying to. If your former colleague has the courage to come forward, we shall place the responsibility where it belongs.

Mr. ROWE: I want to tell the minister that I have as much courage as he has; that I was here before he was, and that I may be here after he leaves. Knowing the astuteness of those in this house who are so careful of those who support them, I was rather amused at the way in which Mr. Godbout, premier of Quebec, was carefully protected in regard to anything he said concerning German spies being in the province of Quebec, telling the boats where to land and so on, while Mr Gagnon was chastised in this house because he said there were more than thirty boats sunk instead of twenty. I did not intend to mention this matter to-night. I am not saying how many boats were sunk, because I do not know and evidently the minister does not know either.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, I do.

Mr. ROWE: Perhaps Mr. Gagnon does not know; probably the premier of Quebec does not know. I mention this matter not to cause the minister any embarrassment but in order to emphasize the fact that we are now passing through the most tragic, most difficult and most disastrous days Canada has ever experienced; yet during this debate we have heard hon. members to my left plead the cause of the fiddler at the Chateau Laurier and those to my right plead the cause of those who must have security without work when the war is over. All this time of war our boys are flying through dangerous mist and fog, fighting the battles to preserve our right to sit here. Surely it is time we stopped and looked at the signs which are apparent to us all. We are facing the most crucial days this nation has ever faced. This war has only begun. Why, Mr. Speaker, we have not won the battle of Africa; we have not concluded the battle of the Mediterranean; we have not started into Europe. We failed to get into Dieppe and we boasted about getting out of Dunkirk.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): We did not boast; we took justifiable pride in getting out.

Mr. ROWE: Oh, my hon. friend may take justifiable pride in being here representing Brantford City.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I do indeed.

Mr. ROWE: He may take justifiable pride in the fact that we got out of Dunkirk, but let us get down to the task that lies before us, the winning of this war. Let us forget about post-war problems for a moment. Let us win the war before we plan the peace. Let us plan for the boys who are fighting for us, while we are talking about some happy new form of security, something that may be used as a political catchword to appeal to the man on the street, something a little better than anyone has mentioned before.

I listened to the budget address with great interest. I have great admiration for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. ROWE: "Why?" somebody asks. Because he is carrying a load my hon. friend may never carry; because he is trying to turn a people who are peace loving into a battling, fighting nation, to save this situation; because he is trying to raise five billions of dollars.

An hon. MEMBER: Five and a half.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, five and a half billions of dollars. Half a billion does not matter much, when you get into those figures. I remember when I came to this house first, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and the Hon. Hugh Guthrie were trying to carry out their duties, and at that time the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the late Mr. Lapointe and others stormed and fumed and worried when we got up to $400,000,000 in expenditures. But when we spend five and a half billion dollars, most of which is for fighting purposes, to save ourselves when we have our backs to the wall, not so much is said about it. In 1925 we would not have thought it possible.

I say the Minister of Finance has a gigantic problem. To him I give my utmost sympathy, and I give to him, as well, my co-operation; that is all he ever asks me for, and it is not a heavy burden on my part.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am amazed when I listen to the budget and realize the modesty with which the budget impositions strike the people of Canada, and the tenseness with which news strikes the mothers of the boys who fight overseas. Oh, it is all very well to wipe fifty per cent off your income tax. It is all very well to say, We are not raising your taxes. It is all very well to have a budget which is lighter on the people than the budget of last year, despite the intensity of the war, the obligations which face us, and the task which lies before us greater than it ever was before. I am wondering whether it is the beginning of the end of this government. Surely the government would not plan an election budget in a time like this. If they have, then I want to compliment them upon having planned a very good one. I do not think they would be indulging in any such light gymnastics in a time of crisis. But it would take the cabinet working day and night for some time to think up a finer election budget than we have at the present time.

I will not go into details of it. However, I am rather amazed to find that our expenditures on civil and ordinary accounts are higher than they have ever been before—and at a time when they should have been lower. I realize that probably much of that increase might be correlated with indirect effects of the war. But when the people of Canada are struggling; when our people from the labouring man to the highly paid salary man are paying more income tax than any other people in the world, when we are facing a task such as we never faced before, then surely it is time we curtailed ordinary expenditures. Surely it is time we faced the task which lies before us. That task is the winning of the war.

No wonder our people are restless. No wonder they are discontented. No wonder they are worried whether we shall or whether we shall not have an election. No doubt my hon. friends to my left will worry if we are to have one. Some of them will worry if we are not to have an election, because no doubt they can see the public growing more restless every day. And why are the people growing more restless? They are restless because, as I have said, we have in Canada the greatest national task which was ever placed before a Canadian people—and that greatest national task with the least possible planning. We have no plan. We have no plan for our armed forces. If the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) wishes to interrupt me I should like him to tell me if the government have sufficient reinforcements for this spearhead that they boast about, which will face the hun in Europe.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I have no doubt we have sufficient reinforcements, and Canada will have no doubt about it.

Mr. ROWE: All I can say to my hon. friend is that he should be thankful to have such confidence with so little reason. Because surely my hon. friend, as a military man, knows that when there are not more than twelve per cent reinforcements in England for the Canadian corps to reinforce what will be the spearhead—surely there is nothing to boast about. The government have no military plan. They have no plan for production. The government know it, and so does every member of the cabinet. Probably that is why they are all out now, with the exception of one.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): My hon. friend has asked a question and he has answered it himself. He says that we have only twelve per cent reinforcements. All I will say is that he is incorrect, and that our reinforcements are ample, as he will soon learn.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Speaker, if you will observe, that is a very vague answer. If I were not a farmer, and if I were a lawyer like him, I could make a better answer than that, because he does not give the number. I have found out from the very best military authority I can find, that we have less than ten per cent. I said twelve per cent so that I would not be lower.

Mr. McNIVEN: Would Hitler not like to know the truth?

Mr. ROWE: Yes, and the people want to know that, too.

Mr. McNIVEN: But Hitler—and I am not going to tell him.

Mr. ROWE: This is the type of interjection from people who evidently know less about the matter than I know myself. They are not very impressive in the house, and less impressive to the mothers of the boys over there who will fight this battle.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Why break down confidence?

Mr. ROWE: I am not breaking down confidence. Why don't you build up confidence? Why don't you build up confidence, to have Canada know what you know as a military man, what is needed in this country, when we are facing the foe.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They are building it up, in spite of what you are doing.

Mr. ROWE: They are building it up in spite of what you are doing. You are building it up by the most haphazard, piece-quilted, slap-dash methods any government ever approached a problem. I am asking you: Can you tell me now what your man-power policy is? You cannot say what your agricultural policy is, or your military policy. The world knows it is the most hypocritical expression of Canadian sentiment we have ever known. Your government has started—

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): If my hon. friend is asking me these questions I should be allowed to answer them. I cannot answer unless I am given the opportunity. I can assure him these questions will all be answered, but it will take more than just a sentence to answer them.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend wants to answer them by telling me they will be answered in due course by someone who can answer them better than he can. In its war policy and on its war plan the government has started too late. Our farmers produce at less than cost, but our manufacturers of munitions and supply produce at cost plus ten per cent.

Mr. McLARTY: Not ten per cent.

Mr. ROWE: No. Some of them get twenty per cent; some get twenty-five per cent and some get more.

Mr. McLARTY: Let us keep the record straight.

Mr. ROWE: If this answer is not any better than I have heard before, I shall have to use my own judgment to see whether it helps the record.

Mr. McLARTY: Let us keep the record straight. My hon. friend does not suggest ten per cent, fifteen per cent, twenty per cent and twenty-five per cent? I know he does not mean to suggest that. The profits on manufactured goods going into the war contracts are much less than that, and he knows it. There is no use in becoming hysterical about them. Let us deal with the facts, and deal with the fair facts. I think he will agree that his statement is a definite exaggeration.

Mr. ROWE: Well, I do not know that the minister has added a great deal. I assume the minister, realizing that I am a farmer, knows that no farmer in Canada has ten per cent. I was speaking on behalf of the farmers who have worked longer for less than any other class of people in this country. Nobody knows better than he that friends of his government have received not only ten per cent, but some have received one hundred per cent in the last year or two.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Name one.

Mr. ROWE: You have not named anything yet to-night, so that you might as well keep your seat.

Mr. McLARTY: Just in case silence may be thought to indicate consent, I wish to say that I now contradict that statement that my hon. friend has made.

Mr. ROWE: Go ahead; you have lots of time.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Go on; let us have your speech.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Churchill?

Mr. ROWE: I am not speaking for Churchill, and neither is Churchill speaking for Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): He spoke a word for Canada the other day.

Mr. ROWE: That is the first time I have seen the government setting up Mr. Churchill to speak for them. Talk about the sovereignty and independence of Canada! I want to say that following this war it will not be Churchill who will be held responsible; it will be the minister and the government. They are the people who will be held responsible. After all, if we are thinking of this great Canada as an independent and sovereign state, we had better speak for ourselves and not rely on the haphazard complimentary laurels of Churchill or the facetiousness of Roosevelt. I realize that the government is quite glad at a time when they are a little doubtful about themselves to have a statement made such as the one Mr. Churchill made the other day. But I suggest that you cannot fight next year's battle with last year's requirements. We are facing the greatest battle that this country has ever faced.

[Mr. McLarty.]

My hon. friend talks about how much the people have made in this war. I can take him through the country which he has not had the time to go through; I can take him into parts of my own district, and I think I can take him into parts of his own district and show him farmers who are paying three times as much for their labour to-day as they paid before the war. I can show him farmers who are making less money to-day than they made before the war. I can show him farmers whose little sons of fifteen and sixteen years of age are earning more money, working for men who have war contracts on a cost plus ten per cent basis, than their fathers on 150 acres of land.

Yet we speak of equality of service when there are provinces where thirty-two to thirty-nine per cent of the population have enlisted in the services as compared with nine and five per cent in other districts. Then we pull out the old bogey of national unity. You had better put alongside its old stablemate of equality of service. Let us face the facts. Let us face them as they should be faced by the Canadian people. Have you some mysterious formula by which you can encourage the farmers by patting them on the back, by saying they have been the backbone of Canada since confederation? Are we to tell the farmer, you are the type of man who will fight; you are the type of man who will work; you are the type of man who will toil from the early hours of the morning to the last dark hours of the night; you do not need a profit because of your love of service to the empire; you will do it anyway. Then you go down the line and you find a munitions manufacturer who has been given a cost-plus profit. We tell the farmer that we will select the men who will fix his prices; that we will make sure that none of his representatives is on the board; that we will fix prices so that when cattle are highest he will be encouraged to buy them, and then when we know that they are ready for market we will say they have dropped three and a half cents a pound. We will play to the consumers' market and we will tell them, we will give you a cost-of-living bonus.

This has been the most muddled policy that has ever been used in connection with any problem. What does our agricultural policy consist of? It is simply a conglomeration of ceiling prices and ration cards. It is simply telling the consumer, We are trying to make you buy less; we want you to eat less, and then telling the producer, We want you to produce more even though at less profit. I doubt if there is a member within sound of my voice, even the more socialistic members to my left, who would attempt to condemn too vigorously the price ceiling. There are many who believe that there is some mythical or mysterious way in which we can maintain the solvency of Canada for the years to come. I have grave doubts whether the panacea or the medical treatment we are being Gordonized with in this country is not worse than the disease itself. I cannot help thinking that the people whom this will help the most are those who will be clipping the most coupons in the years to come. I am not so sure but that the fear of inflation is causing more harm in this country than a degree of inflation itself. I see my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, is here.

Mr. GARDINER: He has been here all the time.

Mr. ROWE: I knew he was here. I do not know whether he will agree with me. He seldom does—

Mr. DONNELLY: He is wise.

Mr. ROWE: He is wise, my hon. friend says. I would not like to say what I might say. The minister is an astute politician but a poor agriculturist in times like this. I remember his speech in 1939 when he told us we would have plenty of pork, and now I observe his speeches when he says that there must be rationing. I remember when he said that we would have so much production that we would not know what to do with it, and now we have rationing. I remember when he bonused the farmers of western Canada not to grow wheat, to grow mixed grains instead. I recall also how he bonused the western farmers eight cents a bushel over the farmers of eastern Canada in order to enable them to produce mixed farm products at a profit in competition. Probably in the over-all performance it will serve a good end.

We talk about national unity; yet we practise all sorts of sectional policies. I am holding no brief against the farmers of western Canada because they have not as much as they might have, but I urge the Minister of Agriculture not to forget entirely that there are some farmers in eastern Canada, in Quebec and Ontario. The minister is two years behind with his agricultural policy. I remember saying to him when he was sitting in his own seat—I notice he is moving further back all the time—that this country would be faced with a food crisis before many years. I well recall when he came into this house first he laughed at me and said that western Canada would be the grain basket, the flour basket, or the bread basket of the world for years to come.

Mr. GARDINER: He is still laughing at you.

Mr. ROWE: Yes; he is still laughing at me, but he who laughs last laughs best. And your particular basket is so full it is running over, and now you have become accustomed to it running over, but you do not know what to do with the surplus wheat. You have produced more wheat, it is true, than we did in those years, but the fiasco of price ceilings as far as agriculture is concerned has been the joke of the North American continent. My hon. friends who sit to my left have talked since 1911 on the theme of dollar market prospects. I remember it coming up in 1911, at the first political meeting I ever attended. I drove a number of people to the meeting for my father, who saw a chance to defeat the Liberal government.

Mr. WOOD: Just go back to 1932 and tell us about that.

Mr. ROWE: Probably my hon. friend cannot go any further back than that, but I remember the speeches which were made in 1911, and how they pleaded with the farmers of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): "No truck or trade with the Yankees."

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) was young at that time, and he is young yet. I remember how they talked at that time about what the farmers of Canada would be able to do if the great markets of the United States of America were opened up to them.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): They were.

Mr. ROWE: They were, and they were closed to you so fast that it made you dizzy. They were closed in 1922, and again in 1928, and in 1929. My hon. friends pictured to the farmers all over this dominion what a great haven of possibilities the United States market would be, how you could sell your fat cattle from western Canada over there.

Mr. DONNELLY: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend says "hear, hear". Yet you named a corporation recently when you had the market open to you, and under this policy, even though they want our stock, our feeding cattle and fat cattle will sell for three cents a pound less on Canadian markets than in the United States. Rather than let the farmer get that extra price, you establish a stabilization fund and buy the stock yourselves. What is the idea? Is the farmer of Canada the forgotten man?

Mr. GARDINER: A year ago the hon. member was shouting about there being no beef in Toronto.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, I was, and since then there was no beef in Toronto.

Mr. GARDINER: That was because it was going to the States.

Mr. ROWE: And you sent your representatives to buy beef, and I should like you to tell this house how much money they made on the beef they bought and how much they kept from the farmers of this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And what class of beef they bought.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, what type of beef they bought. There are scores of obvious reasons why the farmers of Canada are dissatisfied. There are scores of reasons which lead them to believe they are not only the forgotten men but the persecuted men of this war economy. I have heard a great deal of talk to the effect that farmers' sons are not engaging in this struggle, but I will venture to say that there is as great a percentage of farmers' sons fighting our battle overseas as any other class of the Canadian people.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Whoever said that farmers' sons were not taking part in the war?

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend is neither a farmer nor the son of a farmer, and I do not know why I should charge him with making a statement like that. He makes so many other statements which are inconsequential that I would not charge that one to him.

But our man-power planning has been a fiasco. It has been the monument of error of this government. Nobody knows that better than the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) whom I see across the floor. No wonder that Mr. Elliott Little, ex-chief of the selective service of this country, has quit. Who would not quit? I was amazed he stayed on as long as he did. Why should he be expected to stay to direct the man-power of Canada when the government for which he was working had no man-power policy? If they had a man-power policy would they have let ten thousand men go over to the United States to find employment in the same kind of work in which our labour force was thirty per cent short in Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to ask the hon. member where those ten thousand men went.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. gentleman knows the answer so well that it would needlessly take up my time and the time of the house to tell him. He has admitted that 3,500 went over, and he admitted there were others whom he did not know anything about.

Mr. MITCHELL: If all the remarks of my hon. friend are as correct as that, there is not much to be said for his figures.

Mr. ROWE: If my remarks are no better than the adequacy of the minister's labour policy, the house would be foolish to listen to me very long. The government have no labour policy. They have no man-power policy. There is a policy which says in effect, in one district we will call all the farmers up, but not in another district; if your boys are loyal and courageous enough to enlist and volunteer, we will take them whether the farmer is crippled or not. I have in my mail to-day—there is no use in handing it to the government because they must be swamped with such letters from all over the dominion—a letter from a man seventy years of age, with 200 acres of land. The hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) laughs, but I can tell the Postmaster General from what I know of the people of his constituency that he had better get back to York North and talk to the farmers if he expects ever to be returned to this house, because he knows very well that nobody has neglected their interests more than he has. They know that old farmers, tottering almost to the grave, have no other help than that of their wives and daughters. As a farmer wrote to me to-day, "I am seventy years of age; I was in bed for six months; my two sons are overseas; I have got a little girl thirteen years of age and my wife milking fourteen cows. Is there any chance of getting one of these boys back?" If we had a man-power policy; if we were facing this war courageously, facing it as a national problem, do you mean to tell me that we would not be able to let these boys know not only where they could not go but where they should go? I can tell my hon. friends of farmers in my own district who have four sons on 100 acres of land and none of the boys are in the war. What type of haphazard policy is this? How are you going to meet this crisis? We shall meet it if Russia stands for a while, and if old Britain and the United States of America, who have not hesitated, who have not rested on the laurels of a great production of guns and tanks and material things, but who have paid with their life-blood for our glory, will continue to do so—we shall meet it then. But I shudder to think of what will happen if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) are right in telling us that we are about to face the greatest battles which we have ever faced, and that our brave boys in Europe are to be the spearhead of this great and gallant task. If that is so, I say that the responsibility of having these boys assured before they go over the top that we have reinforcements behind them does not rest with the Churchill statement; it rests with the government of Canada; it rests with us, the parliament of Canada. Do not make any mistake about that. If, as the military people tell us, we are going to suffer casualties as high as seventy per cent, we shall hang our heads in shame if we find that we can replace them only to the extent of ten or twelve per cent. The hon. member for Brantford City says he knows the provision is ample, but he will not tell us the percentage.

An hon. MEMBER: He does not know.

Mr. ROWE: If he says it is more than ten per cent, I should like him to rise. If he says that it is twenty per cent, I should like him to rise. He will rise and nod his head in doubtful consent, but he does not know, for I have often seen him rise before when he did not know.

We have heard a great deal about all our post-war policies. I do not intend to deal further at this time with our agricultural problems. I should know something about agriculture. I do not know as much about it as I should, but even that is more than the hon. member for Brantford City professes to know except at election time.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I have never set myself up as an agricultural expert.

Mr. ROWE: I should hope not from now on.

We have listened to a great deal of talk on post-war planning. As I listened, I thought of the farmers in my own district, and the same is true of many other districts in Canada, who are struggling to make a living and paying three times as much in wages as they were paying before the war, who are making no profits and have mortgages still hanging darkly over their heads, whose wives are working on the farm and wrecking their health, who themselves have to work so hard and long that many of them have to go to bed with a heart condition while their sons are fighting overseas. It is difficult for them to understand why the government places a ceiling price on what they have to sell and charges them three times as much for what they have to buy.

We have heard a great deal about post-war planning and a lot of social security dreaming. It is about time that we paused and started to study present-war planning rather than post-war security. It is about time that we hesitated to dream of security at a moment when this nation is on fire. There are plenty of post-war possibilities. Hon. gentlemen to my left say that the old order must go. Perhaps. But many brighter men than they are, thought that long ago. As I read history —I do not get much time to read it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: Perhaps the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) has had more time to read history because he has left a lot of other things undone, but as I read history I recall that in 1782 William Pitt said that he saw nothing but ruin and depression in front of him. A little later on, Wilberforce said that he had met a girl whom he loved and would like to marry, but he never would while the future was so dark and uncertain. I recall that in 1839 Lord Elgin said that everything tended toward revolution and that in 1846 Disraeli saw no hope ahead for industry, commerce or agriculture. I recall that when Wellington was dying in 1852 he said that he was glad he was passing on before the ruin of depression gathered around him.

My hon. friends to my left have new ideas, but let me say to them that if we would only face the task that lies before us the future is not quite so dark. They have new plans. They want security so that those who are healthy will never be sick and those who are sick will be made well again, security for the people whether they want to work or not, security for those who even want to play as well as work. But let me say to them that under our present system of democracy, which is to disappear when their regime comes in—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, no.

Mr. ROWE: I have read your booklets and I realize that under your plans the whole present system must be changed. I even might expect to be working for some of those fellows in agriculture if their dreams came true. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that under our present system we have not done so badly. Let us look back to 1900. I do not give all the credit for what has happened since, to the Liberal party. After all, in their policies there has been some sense and soundness mingled with a lot of errors. Under our democratic form of government on the North American continent we have made progress since 1900, greater progress than has been made anywhere else. In 1900 only one out of a hundred on the North American continent had a buggy to drive. When this war started one out of five had an automobile.

An hon. MEMBER: They haven't now.

Mr. ROWE: In 1900 our people had only eighty-six dollars per capita invested in life insurance; to-day they have $600 per capita, almost eight times as much. Therefore, I say to my hon. friends to the left, set about to improve the old system, or in better words of another, lop the mouldered branch away, before you attempt to cut down the tree that has sheltered you and under which you have prospered enough to be here, happy but discontented.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, having just heard a speech in the language of Shakespeare, you will have no objection, I am sure, to my using for a few minutes Racine's idiom and affording thereby some rest to your ears.

Mr. Speaker, I have noticed in the speech from the throne that was read in the house—a speech on which we should have liked a vote to be taken although for one reason or another that has been impossible—that the government have taken election precautions probably to lessen the impact from the budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has recently introduced with such a high degree of courage. We note in the speech from the throne many precautionary measures intended for the electors not only of the dominion but especially of certain provinces, such as the appointment of a committee on post-war reconstruction and re-establishment, a national social security programme, including social insurance and even health insurance, which matters will all be investigated by committees whose work may not have been completed before the end of the session. Just the same, appearances shall have been kept up and if I may borrow a phrase from the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), a twig from the Christmas tree has even been included, as a scrap of comfort, when the 1938 dish was rehashed and the appointment of parliamentary secretaries was mentioned again. I realize that in order to make us swallow the budget recently introduced some kind of a sop was necessary and I also realize that, in view of the stand of certain provinces with Liberal leanings such as Saskatchewan and Ontario, which will soon have reached the end of the term of office, a chance had to be given to provincial followers, where, should the occasion arise, an election would probably be held. As regards the province of Quebec, those who have read the speech from the throne know where they stand and in all probability the Liberal party in Quebec will sacrifice itself and will be the first to take the plunge in order to show to the dominion Liberal government how risky it is at this time to face the electors.

Much has been said about farmers' sons since the beginning of this session, and indeed since the outbreak of war. I remember that motions calling for the exemption of farmers' sons have either been ruled out of order or voted down by the majority.

I do not doubt for a moment the sincerity of the hon. members who derived great satisfaction from these motions being declared out of order nor their sincerity in voting against the motion calling for exemption in favour of farmers' sons, nevertheless, one may well wonder if at the present time, had the government given more consideration to these requests in favour of farmers' sons, we would be facing such distressing problems concerning farm labour in Canada generally. Only last night, I heard the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) showing how the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) made contradictory statements, one to the effect that there need be no fear of any farm labour shortage while the other worried about this same shortage. One thing stands out, however, and that is a lack of cohesion, a lack of cooperation between the departments of government and I recall the speech made on March 24, 1942, in this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which appears on page 1562 of Hansard, which I quote:

> The production of food in war time is one of the most essential tasks. To the extent that food is produced for Britain or other allied countries, or for Canada's own fighting men, it is a direct war service. If this aspect of Canada's total effort is not to suffer, the man-power required for food production must be kept available.

And I find on page 1567 that the Prime Minister also stated:

> One of the man-power problems with which the country is faced is the growing shortage of agricultural labour.

What must we think, Mr. Speaker, of such statements? Everybody admits that thousands of farmers' sons are still in the army, that thousands of others had to remain there two, three, four and even six months, before being released. And during all that time farm work remained undone; those who did not have the money required for the hiring of hands had to leave their crops on the fields to spoil under the snow. A certain amount of wheat remained under the snow, as the hon. member for Bow River stated last night. An appropriate policy regarding farmers' sons would have prevented such a shortage of labour. I do not deny, Mr. Speaker, that it is honourable and praiseworthy to show as much courage and intrepidity as the farmers' sons who have enlisted voluntarily for Overseas service. On March 24, 1942, the Right Hon. Prime Minister stated, as reported on Hansard, page 1657:

Voluntary enlistment of farmers and agricultural workers in the army, the navy and air forces will continue to be encouraged. It is felt that the privilege of serving voluntarily in the armed forces should not be completely denied to a whole class of the community, however important may be the service its members are at present performing.

At different times, the government has announced, both in this house and in party newspapers, that farmers' sons would be exempted from military service, and the Prime Minister stated that voluntary enlistment of farmers' sons must be encouraged. I wonder, —and everyone is entitled to wonder—whether the government policy calls for leaving on the farms all the help needed. If agriculture ceases to produce, our soldiers overseas will have to go hungry. It is all very well to say that farmers' sons who have enlisted will be replaced by women, prisoners of war, Japanese or invalids. Even students have been put to work; such was the case last summer and such it will be again. But, Mr. Speaker, the farms need trained hands and nimble brains to accomplish the tasks necessary to produce all we need in a time of war not only for civilian consumers, but for the armed forces as well. In my opinion, the government's farm policy has proven wholly inadequate, completely lacking in both cooperation and coordination.

It may be thought that we too often dwell on this matter. Yet, we have every right to do so, indeed it is our duty to do so, since our repeated warnings to the government both inside and outside this house have ostensibly given them time to consider and adopt an adequate policy with respect to the people and the war effort.

Mr. Speaker, when a member of the Bloc Populaire or of any other opposition group from the province of Quebec rises to address this chamber, I understand how one might become fidgety and hark back to the example of France that owed her tragic fate to the large number of her political parties. I do not claim, neither have I the right to do so under the rules of this house, that when the Prime Minister referred to the unduly large number of political parties in this country, he was merely trying to advance his own fortunes. I do not claim either that the Prime Minister views with alarm the establishment of opposition parties through which his personal desire to remain at the helm might find its Waterloo. The rules of the house prevent me from saying so. Anyone who asserts, giving France as an example, that the establishing of a large number of parties would be detrimental to the country, seems to be unfamiliar with history. Or could it be that the rise of too great a number of opposition groups from the province of Quebec is particularly irritating in certain quarters?

Anyone familiar with the causes of the downfall of France knows that her fate was not due to the multiplicity of her political parties but rather to the manifold international interests which weakened her and prevented Germany from paying off the full amount of the reparations due; which allowed the demilitarization of the Ruhr and subsidized the electoral campaigns of certain French politicians. These, and not the unduly large number of her political parties really brought about the downfall of France. Any comparison between France and Canada must needs be unsatisfactory. I repeat there is a pretense at being unfamiliar with international history.

The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) made an inquiry regarding a resolution which came to me from the city of Three Rivers. If I may refer to the subject, without incurring the hon. member's displeasure, the resolution reads as follows:

To the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Whereas the present butter ration is wholly inadequate to the war worker who takes his lunch to the factory; and

Whereas such ration, in addition to being inadequate, is calculated to cause serious prejudice to the worker's war effort; and

Whereas so harsh a measure obviously discriminates between those who are in a position to abide by it and others which it too severely affects;

Be it therefore resolved that the dominion government be respectfully requested to do everything in its power to improve the untenable situation in which the Canadian worker now finds himself through the action of the wartime prices and trade board, and to impress upon the board the urgency of giving full priority to the needs of our workers engaged in this country's war production by requesting that they increase the ration of essential commodities granted these men, particularly their butter ration.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, is self-explanatory. And notwithstanding the reply given this afternoon to the hon. member for Gaspé, I cannot understand that the workers, whether employed in our war plants or in our mines, at any rate, all those who must carry their meals with them, who have no time to return to their homes either at noon or in the evening, these need a more substantial butter ration than office workers who take their meals at home or in a restaurant.

I hope that the provincial treasurer and the government will reconsider this decision and that employees of all classes will be allowed more butter for their meals.

The sinking of ships in both the river and the gulf of St. Lawrence has been the cause of quite a controversy. It is neither my duty nor my intention to stand in this house for the member for Matane, the hon. Mr. Gagnon nor is it my intention to take the defence of the provincial government; far from it. It does seem to me, however, that this government should have listened to the claims and the warnings, though mild they may have been, that we have expressed in this house and elsewhere since 1937. They should also have devoted their attention primarily to the defence of this country. I admit that different theories have been expounded in this house to the effect that we should go to meet the enemy wherever he may be rather than have him attack our shores. To this I have replied recently that the same principle applies to all countries and not only to Canada. I understand also that the government only acted under pressure from total-war men since the start of the war. I also fully realize that they may have somewhat forgotten to give the St. Lawrence gulf and even the river the appropriate defence they deserved. It was, however, most important that they send soldiers overseas. That was urgent. Food had also to be sent. I have shown, a few moments ago, that not only had they forgotten steps to defend the country and the St. Lawrence shores, but they had ignored agriculture as well. This controversy had originated from statements made by two members of the Quebec legislature which had been referred to in this house. I am not concerned with the number of ships sunk either in the gulf or St. Lawrence river, but one thing is certain—I say it without any intention of giving out information that may be helpful to the enemy—if adequate defence works had been provided, if the government had been interested first of all in the defence of our country, we would not have to announce sinkings in the gulf and St. Lawrence river. Indeed, those who are conversant with existing conditions, who know where enemy ships and submarines enter, also know that protection against the entry of these enemy ships would be a relatively easy matter.

Mr. Speaker, while discussing the increase in military appropriations, in 1937—

Mr. DUPUIS: Has the hon. member voted in favour of these appropriations?

Mr. GAUTHIER: I have voted in favour of a part of them, but I was the first to propose an amendment, with the support of another hon. member representing a Quebec constituency. We requested that a certain appropriation be decreased. Three other similar amendments were also proposed.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. member's friends, for their part, cast their votes for the national defence appropriations.

Mr. GAUTHIER: We have voted in favour of a number of appropriations, while insisting that others be decreased, because, as we stated, the government policy was not merely concerned with the defence of Canada, but with that of the empire at large. In support of our claims we referred to a statement of Hore-Belisha who, at a banquet held in London, at that time had said that a colonial defence policy could not be considered within the empire, but that the defence of the empire should come first. The hon. member must remember this.

Mr. DUPUIS: And since that time he has been out of the cabinet.

Mr. GAUTHIER: It does not matter whether he has left the cabinet or not. There are so many who wish to enter it.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is why my hon. friend now sits on the other side of the house.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I never asked or expected it. I am here because I am not like my hon. friend who has broken his pledges and his word.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is impossible!

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend will keep quiet.

In 1938 and 1939 we have raised the same objections, always urging the government to give particular attention to the defence of our country. We were then against participation in outside wars. On account of that stand, we were well supported by our electors in the by-elections of 1937 and 1938, and we have enjoyed such support for twenty years, as my hon. friend from Chambly-Rouville no doubt remembers. We were not campaigning alone, we had the help of men who were eloquent speakers, we were helped by outstanding men whose views were similar to our own. Conditions have changed, we were told, when we spoke against participation. We are told, in this house one year after: How can we participate in a war and do it on a moderate scale? That is the only consideration we have received for having believed what we were told. Mr. Speaker, we have to a certain extent accepted participation in outside wars but under the solemn pledge that conscription would never be enforced in this country. However, the government had a conscription act passed last year.

Mr. DUPUIS: It has not yet been enforced.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Let my hon. friend be patient.

Mr. DUPUIS: I say that it has not been enforced.

Mr. GAUTHIER: If my hon. friend were willing to look into the situation he would find that a 25-year-old physician, who is a married man has been called for military service under the National Resources Mobilization Act; the only thing this young physician can do is either to serve as a private within the country under the Mobilization Act or to volunteer for overseas service. That is a splendid voluntary system. I could mention, as I have already done in this house, some of the means to which the government have resorted in order to obtain the men they need to bring the army up to strength.

I am glad my honourable friend interrupted me. He has reminded me of something. When I voted for the National Resources Mobilization Act, I thought that the government intended to use it merely to call up men for service within this country, but I found out the other day, during the debate on the subamendment moved by the honourable member for Richelieu-Verchères that the government had another objective and another intention. In reply to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères the Prime Minister had this to say in connection with the suspension of the Mobilization Act. I quote from page 558 of Hansard, February 19, 1943:

> Those men who are a long distance from home, who are helping to protect this country and to save it from disaster, would be asking themselves: Is this the kind of support we are getting from our country and from our government? Is our parliament going to support that kind of action? Does it mean that while we are fighting here we are not going to get the reinforcements that we had hoped would be ready to come, if they were necessary?

In what manner would suspension of the Mobilization Act hinder reinforcements going to our active army if that act had applied to service in this country only?

Mr. DUPUIS: Will my hon. friend allow me—

Mr. GAUTHIER: Let my hon. friend not interrupt.

Mr. DUPUIS: If my hon. friend will allow me, I will answer him immediately.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I ask my hon. friend—

Mr. DUPUIS: Is the hon. member afraid?

Mr. GAUTHIER: When the Prime Minister in reply to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) said: "Where will those men get reinforcements if we suspend the operation of the National Resources Mobilization Act?"

Mr. DUPUIS: My hon. friend does not wish me to answer?

Mr. GAUTHIER: One minute. What impatience! How can you say that the Mobilization Act was for service only in this country when it was the intention of the government to reinforce the depleted ranks abroad. A mobilization act for this country, for this country only, and intended to fill the gaps in an army overseas. Such is the measure of voluntary enlistment favoured by the government according to the Prime Minister's own words in this house.

Mr. DUPUIS: Draftees allow those who have voluntarily enlisted to go overseas. They take their place. That is the situation.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Is that all that the hon. member has to offer for an answer?

Mr. DUPUIS: Certainly.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I put a case to the hon. member just now. He made no reply. I will give you another method, besides that of the Mobilization Act as adopted by this house, used for compelling our citizens into overseas service. The heads of families seeking employment in the different departments must obtain a release from the army. Such is the voluntary system. What does the hon. member think when he says: Wait, the measure is not yet in force? My hon. friend comes from Montreal and I see other hon. members who also come from Montreal. I have yet to hear any protest voiced regarding the port of Montreal, but last year that port and the St. Lawrence river were almost empty of ships.

I humbly submit that an adequate coastal defence would have facilitated traffic up the St. Lawrence and the bringing up of supplies to the port of Montreal, whereas part of that harbour's business is being carried by rail to eastern ports. I am waiting to hear any protests from the hon. member on this point.

Mr. DUPUIS: Had the Bloc Populaire voted for that in 1937, the harbour of Montreal would be better protected.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Let my hon. friend possess his soul in patience. He will feel the Bloc sooner than he expects.

I enquired the other day, Mr. Speaker, about broadcasts and put the following question to the government:

Is the dominion government responsible for, or author of the sketch "Our Canada" broadcast over the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

And the government replied:

"Our Canada" is a programme of the national war finance committee broadcast over a French network.

While listening to that programme one evening, I realized that the government, as stated in the fourth answer, besides giving a translation of Colin Ross' book, had seized the opportunity to advertise the speeches of the Prime Minister. The sponsor said before the opening of the programme: "It is an absolute truth which we must swallow if we are to be immune from dangerous suggestions, as our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated last week in the House of Commons when he said that he did not think that we can too strongly dwell on the gravity of the present situation and on the effort we shall be called upon to make. He wished to caution the people of Canada and the members of parliament against such a thought, and added that it would be dangerous to believe that the war can be won this year as no attempt had yet been made at invasion of the continent."

And a few minutes later, in the programme "Notre Canada", some noted and talented actors were reporting that the continent had been invaded and that the Germans were having trouble with the people of a certain village.

Mr. DUPUIS: My hon. friend is himself making propaganda in favour of the government.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Speaker, I would like hon. members to be a little more polite.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Bradette): Order! Order! If the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) wishes to ask questions of the hon. member who has the floor, he must ask his permission and if that permission is not granted he should let him speak without interruption.

Mr. GAUTHIER: My hon. friend from Chambly-Rouville is annoying me. Not that his questions are dangerous. Nor is he himself for that matter.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Bradette): Order! I would ask the hon. member for Portneuf to restrain his language.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Then let him tone down his own.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. member is making propaganda in favour of the Liberal government.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government to use a little more tact in outlining its policies and to refrain from spending public funds on government propaganda, although I do not mean to object to war propaganda as part of the government's policy.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I again refer to the creation and existence of several political parties in Canada and I know that our people, not only in the province of Quebec but in the whole of Canada will, at the proper time and place, recognize on the one hand those who have been frank, who kept their word, showed themselves honourable men, honourable statesmen and kept their pledges to the taxpayers and, on the other hand, those who miserably and woefully failed to do so.

On motion of Mr. Gray the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, March 12, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

PRESS REPORT AS TO ENLARGEMENT OF MEMBERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, items appearing in certain newspapers indicate that the government has under consideration an enlargement of the membership of the national war labour board. Is the Prime Minister in a position to make any announcement to the house with respect to these additional memberships?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not in a position to make any statement at the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the Prime Minister expect to be able to make a statement shortly?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was asked a similar question some days ago and I replied that I had made "a very full statement in the house with respect to the organization of the board, and if there are to be any changes or additions the house will be informed in due course." I am afraid I cannot go beyond that at the present time.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATION OF AGRICULTURE AND WAR VETERANS ON ADVISORY BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): The press to-day carries the announcement of the Minister of Labour that the national selective service advisory board has been reconstituted by order in council. The board appears to have a membership of some nineteen persons, but there seems to be only one representative of agriculture and one representative of war veterans. Will the minister explain why these two important sections of our people are not more fully represented on the board in relation to others?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend is correct in saying that there are nineteen members of the advisory committee of the national selective service. I think he will agree with me that the soundest thing to do in setting up such a committee is to keep it as small as possible, having due regard to the interests that should be represented. That, by the very nature of things, when you are dealing with man-power, involves government departments. If the hon. gentleman reads the order in council he will find that the Department of Agriculture is represented, the deputy minister being on that committee, and that defence, finance, and the prices board, are also represented, because they necessarily come into the picture. What we try to do is to get a broad crystallization of opinion, representing what may be called the dominant vocations and interests of the country. Practically all of these are represented — the construction industry, the railroads, industry in general, general stores, the big departmental stores, and the banks, also, as my hon. friend says, the organized veterans. The veterans did not ask for representation, but we felt that they should be represented. If you go through the list you will find among the representatives of other callings many ex-service men of the last war. What we have tried to do, and I believe the soundness of our position will be apparent if it is examined, is to get as broad an opinion as possible in an advisory capacity on the question of man-power.

Mr. GRAYDON: One of the great industries which is suffering with respect to lack of man-power is agriculture. The minister may be right when he says that the deputy minister of agriculture is one of the nominees—I see here the name of Doctor Barton—but he is grouped with a number of government employees who are working together in regard to this matter. The minister should give further consideration to the appointment on behalf of agriculture of another representative with practical experience. It seems to me that one representative only of agriculture is an underestimate of the situation in respect of agriculture and man-power at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL: Doctor Barton has a wealth of practical advice behind him. My hon. friend's complaint is not fair. Coming as my hon. friend does from a partly rural constituency he knows Doctor Barton has expert advice in his own department and opportunity to obtain advice on every matter that may come up affecting agriculture. With respect to the appointment of a representative of agriculture, of course we went to the agricultural organizations for that nomination.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will the minister consider immediately the appointment of a representative of western agriculture? The only practical agricultural representative on the board is from the province of Quebec. Following what my leader (Mr. Graydon) has said, it seems to me that western agriculture should be represented by a practical representative. Labour has five representatives.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think my hon. friend will agree that twenty-three members is a large number for an advisory council. What we have endeavoured to do is to go to the national organizations. It so happens that the farmers' organization that was consulted was a national organization, and they made that appointment. If all these industries were given representation on a reasonable basis you would probably have an advisory council bigger than this House of Commons, which would make its functioning almost impossible.

MILITARY SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO TRACING OF DRAFT EVADERS BY ASSOCIATED CREDIT BUREAUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In a news service issued to-day the following appears:

> Task of tracing evaders is to be carried on by Associated Credit Bureaus of Canada Limited, an organization with some fifty-eight offices across the country.

Has any arrangement been made under which Associated Credit Bureaus are to be connected in any way with the location of defaulters?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Might I ask my hon. friend a question first? Would he give me the source of his information?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes; it is a weekly news letter.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to have the name of the source of information. I think that is a fair question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Surely, if it will help the minister. It is "Trend." Now, what is the answer?

Mr. MITCHELL: My friend should take it in the light of whence it comes. There is no truth in the statement printed in "Trend."

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR EARLY STATEMENT OF POST-WAR POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): I should like to ask the government a question based on an item in to-day's Globe and Mail:

> Sweden To Take Hand in Broad After-War Air Route Expansion
> Stockholm, March 11.—A new Swedish company, known for short as Sila, has been formed to develop Sweden's intercontinental air routes after the war—especially those to the United States. Backed by Swedish shipping companies, industries and banks, a minimum capital of 30,000,000 kroner (about $7,500,000 at par) has been guaranteed. Agreement has been reached between Sila and the existing government-owned Aero Transport which was organized in 1924. Before the war Aero Transport had air routes in Scandinavia as well as to European points. Sila's aim is to build up intercontinental air traffic in collaboration with Aero Transport which has put its technical organization and experienced management at Sila's disposal.

In view of the importance of air transportation and the fact that many of our men in the Royal Canadian Air Force are applying to privately owned air transportation companies for positions after the war, would the government undertake at an early day to announce its policy in regard to post-war civil air transportation?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have allowed the hon. member to state his question and read the information on which he bases it, which was rather long. It certainly is a question which should be placed upon the order paper. The hon. gentleman has asked for a declaration of policy. In this connection I should like hon. members to observe the rulings I have already given in regard to asking such questions on the orders of the day. Such questions must conform to the rules of the house as they have been laid down and practised from year to year.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

REPORTED CLOSING OF TRAINING SHIP ESTABLISHMENT AT SAINT JOHN, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). It arises out of an article that appeared in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick, on March 9 last. This article reported that Saint John is to lose the Royal Canadian Volunteer Reserve training centre that has been established there for about two decades and is now known as His Majesty's Ship—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have listened to the hon. gentleman's question and I think I know what it contains. I suggest that it should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I think, Mr. Speaker, you are taking a pretty severe attitude—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: After all we have not asked very many questions before the orders of the day are called. I think they are all on matters of urgent importance, at least in the minds of the hon. members who ask them. I would ask you, sir, to grant at least a little more latitude and leniency in reference to the few questions that are being asked from time to time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question asked by the hon. member deals, as I understood, with the closing of a naval establishment. That surely is a matter not requiring an immediate answer, and certainly such an answer could not be given by the minister without some consultation with his advisers. It is a question which I think ought to be placed on the order paper. When matters are of immediate urgency and a reply is necessary because otherwise the incident to which the question relates would evaporate over a period of forty-eight hours and hon. members wish to know what the position of the government is in regard to such matters, I think it is proper to ask such questions on the orders of the day. But when hon. members ask questions which must necessarily be referred to the departments in order that a reply may be given, the position is different. I have every desire to give as wide latitude as possible to hon. members; nevertheless I am bound by the rules, and therefore I must ask that these questions be considered in the light I have indicated and be placed on the order paper.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. ROSS W. GRAY (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, reading the speeches that have been delivered by hon. members this session one is struck by the fact that up to the present—and we have now been in session for some six weeks—in the main the speeches have been devoted to the new and very broad subjects of social security and post-war reconstruction, while man-power, the most important subject of all, has been given scant attention. I do not suggest that the problems of social security and post-war reconstruction are not important, but I do say that a committee is the proper place for their study, before we become too enthusiastic in our attempts to outdo each other and thus forget that almost everything in connection with the winning of this war still remains to be done.

I do not propose to discuss the financial side of the budget, except to say that I join with others in this house in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon being able to present to a nation of eleven and a half million people these astounding figures of revenue and expenditure for the present and the coming fiscal year. I said I did not propose to discuss the financial side of the budget, but any full discussion of the man-power problems of this country would entail an investigation into the ability of the man-power of Canada to raise more revenue, and a further survey of the allotment of such man-power and the money required to maintain it either in production or on the firing line. Speaking from my place in this chamber last year I urged the government then and there to bring into operation a compulsory selective service unrestricted by geographical limits with regard to the army, combined with a scientific allocation of the man-power of this country as between industry, agriculture and the armed forces. I have never had occasion to change that opinion; in fact as the months went by and we witnessed the terrific toll of casualties at Dieppe, I am sure more than one of us stopped to consider gravely whether or not we had sufficient trained volunteers should this be the beginning of the real drive against Hitler. In those intervening months we have witnessed labour disputes and strikes of major proportions; we have watched the farms losing their man-power, while louder and louder became the cry for still more production.

Let us for a moment consider where our failure to adopt an all-out selective service, applied to all alike, has led us with respect to farming. Hon. members may ask what a lawyer knows about farming. I know very little about it, I admit, but I do know a great deal about the man-power distress of the farmers of western Ontario, particularly of those of my own riding, and it is concerning that distress that I now propose to speak. Let us review the situation. Under order in council P.C. 2252, dated March 21, 1942, all persons who on the 23rd day of March, 1942, were wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture were to be granted a postponement order until further notice. But what happened? The divisional registrars under the war services department continued to send out notices, either of their own accord or on instructions; and knowing the very fine and fair registrar we have in our district, Mr. W. A. Martin, I must take it that this was done upon instructions. I want to give this house an exact copy of a notice, leaving out only the name and the call number. It is as follows:

Department of National War Services,
London, Ontario, September 21, 1942.

To . . . Call Number . . .

Dear Sir:

Kindly be advised that the commencement of your further training period has been deferred until approximately December 31st, 1942. A notice to report specifying the date and military training centre will be forwarded to you in due course.

Yours truly,

Is there anything indefinite about the date of postponement? Is there anything indefinite about what is to be expected at the expiration of the three months' period? Is there anything in that notice suggesting to this young farmer that at the end of that period he has a right to apply for a further postponement? There is not a word to that effect. That young man as others like him did, believed that on the expiration of that period he was headed for the army. What was the result? Sell the stock; sell the farm; leave the father alone. There appeared to be no option. Thus we continued the back door method of obtaining so-called volunteers for the army.

About the same time there appeared another form of notice, differing only in its length. Shortly after—and all within one month—there appeared still another form, this time containing a clause advising the applicant that any further request for postponement should reach the registrar about thirty days before the expiration date. So that within one month three different forms of notices were sent out to different farmers. Is it any wonder there was confusion? Is it any wonder that these notices led to uncertainty and unrest, and, in my opinion, definitely hampered production? What about the fall work? What about the purchasing of winter stock? What about the renewing of fall leases? These were the matters that disturbed the farmers of western Ontario, and no doubt farmers elsewhere.

When this matter was called to the attention of the then Minister of National War Services in October, 1942, I received in reply a long-winded press release issued by the former minister in April of 1942; only that and nothing more. In all fairness to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who these days is receiving more brickbats than bouquets, I am bound to say that since national war services came under his department the form of notice has improved, and in my district at least applicants are given a term of postponement sufficiently definite to enable them to complete one full season's work.

That, however, is only one phase of the farm man-power problem. Men are still being encouraged to leave the farm and join the army; and are doing so, I am afraid, without any definite policy on the part of the Department of Labour in regard to remedying the situation. Read the nine points with regard to farm labour presented to this house on February 26. All through that memorandum you will find the word "will", not the "will" denoting determination but the "will" signifying future consideration. I cannot do more in connection with this phase of the man-power problem than reiterate that it is not a matter for surveys; it is a matter for action now. Let me repeat that until you have in Canada an over-all compulsory selective service, you cannot properly assign men and women to their tasks and thus bring about a measure of total war.

I come now to deal with man-power and labour, and I make this assertion. Until we are prepared to put into effect unrestricted compulsory service we shall have labour unwilling or refusing to move from one industry to another; we shall have delays in industrial war construction, and we might just as well face the fact that we shall continue to have absenteeism, which is all too prevalent to-day. Make no mistake about this; too many men and women are staying away from vital war jobs. We cannot quarrel with the man or the woman who stays away from his or her work by reason of sickness or accident. Nothing less should keep one from his job. Nothing else would suffice on the parade ground or on the firing line. I know that this is a subject matter which is giving much concern to the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Minister of Labour, and I simply call attention to the fact that as matters now stand national selective service officers are without power to deal with a situation which, to put it in its mildest terms, is deplorable. I would further urge that there be repeated checks made by the Department of Labour in industry and on construction in order to stamp out as far as possible the draft evasion all too prevalent at this time.

Turning finally to man-power and the armed forces, I believe with those who have declared that in a free society the obligations and privileges of military training should be shared generally in accordance with a fair and just system of selective compulsory training, and that such service should be without geographical restriction.

I anticipate that the house may be told we are obtaining sufficient men for the army through the volunteer method. I ask this question: How can we say that we have sufficient man-power enlisting when our soldiers have met only one real test, Dieppe? Last year I gave some figures of battle casualties suffered by Canadians in world war No. 1. On the Somme, in round figures the Canadians suffered 23,000 casualties; at Vimy, 13,000; at Passchendaele, 24,000; and at Dieppe, according to reports, we lost some 67 per cent of our effectives. Before we say we have sufficient men we would do well once again to pause and study these figures. It is imperative that we should have trained and equipped for service anywhere a sufficient number of men to support the Canadian corps in any emergency. It is only by being ready to take that stand in the house that those of us who were members of parliament when war clouds were gathering, and did not prepare, can in part atone for the great responsibilities which lie upon our shoulders.

I listened a short time ago to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) asking for an investigation into the attack made by the Canadians against Dieppe. I do not for a moment doubt the hon. member's sincerity, but as I listened to him talk glibly on military matters I could not help recalling that not very long ago the party in which the hon. member is one of the chief lieutenants was opposed to sending any men from Canada for military service overseas. I am prepared to assume my share of responsibility for having failed to urge greater preparedness. I have a right, therefore, to place on the shoulders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation a part of the responsibility for the failure to have at the very outbreak of this war an unrestricted selective service programme. Why do I say that? For the reason that I read from page 55 of Hansard for the war session of 1939 this declaration of policy by the present leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation:

> In view of these considerations, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes that Canada's policy should be based first on the fundamental national interests of the Canadian people, as well as on their interest in the outcome of war. Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

I repeat the words, "and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force." That sentiment is unfortunately not confined to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. There are adherents on this side of the house. And, apart from the former leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who has remained true to his convictions, I am bound to say that in their zeal for a new leader, a new name, and a new platform, the man-power issue has become a good deal more cloudy on the opposition side than it was last year under the leadership of the hon. member.

Be that as it may, I speak to-day with sincerity and from personal observation. I rejoice with others in what Canada has accomplished. I regret with others that there is not an equality of sacrifice among us. In this respect I make no exception of the member of parliament; and yet there is not a member of this house who is not prepared to do more, provided that he is given direction. Members are helpless without it. They would be included in any all-embracing plan.

The crucial months, Mr. Speaker, are at hand. Can we say that we are ready? Are we to continue to sidestep this issue until we are in an emergency? Time has been on our side; it has been good to us. But soon the starter's gun will be raised. The men are on their marks. Are we ready to take the baton at the end of the first lap? Are we ready to take it at the end of the second lap? Are we ready to marshal our forces and to carry it over the finish line? That is the question which must be faced, not in the heat of battle but now, before it is too late.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to say I feel that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) deserves a great deal of credit for the budget he has brought down this year. I believe his is the hardest job of any minister of the crown, because unless his department functions with hundred-per-cent efficiency the other departments will not function.

The minister has been extremely—I was going to say "hard", but I will say "tough"—if one may judge from his manner in the house when hon. members in the opposition have asked pertinent questions with respect to his department, and requested that this or that be changed so as to help the taxpayers. But I often wonder if this tough or hard front is not only a bluff, and that really at heart the minister is rather soft, especially when some other minister of the crown comes to him and says, "I am going to put in supplementary estimates this year for such-and-such an amount."

Each year after the budget is brought down supplementary estimates are tabled, and each year they become greater and greater. Last year, including the amounts in the supplementary estimates, the budget called for $3,592,000,000. Before the session was over the Minister of Finance asked for another $858,000,000. The ministers in their respective departments like to show, in the estimates, that their departments are spending less money than they spent in earlier years, but when one adds the supplementary estimates he generally finds that departmental expenditures exceed those of the preceding year. Last year the supplementary estimates looked like the national debt of 1914. I said last year, and I say it again this year, if as much care was taken in the spending of these billions of dollars we are being asked for as is taken in collecting them, the country would be much better off financially and the taxpayers would be greatly benefited.

The Minister of Finance is the keeper of the government's purse and it is up to him to check the departments as much as possible to see where savings can be made. He must remember that the taxpayer has only one earning power. The worker can work only so long. At the present time the industrial and other workers must work so many weeks in the year to pay their income taxes. They are not working for themselves during those weeks; they are working for the government. I do not believe the taxpayer feels hurt because his employer deducts his income tax before he really has his fingers on his wages, but he feels that every cent he gives should be spent with as much economy as possible and that value should be received for every dollar. The $1, $2 or $3 that the worker pays out each week in the form of income tax may not seem to be much, but to him it may mean an extra pair of socks—or a pair of stockings if it is a woman; an extra shirt or perhaps a pair of shoes for the baby. Many workers have had to go without an extra sandwich in their lunch boxes because of this tax. They are not kicking; they are satisfied as long as this country is doing what is right.

The worker in the plant has had to do without much of the food that he really needs. Bread is called the staff of life, but it is hard to eat dry. He is rationed to less than half a pound of butter per week. Jam and marmalade is practically off the market, so that there is no substitute for butter. Two weeks ago I tried several different stores in Ottawa but I was unable to find even one small jar of jam or marmalade. This is true, in spite of all the ballyhoo the wartime prices and trade board are sending out in their press releases. I received a press release just the other day headed, "Lenten menus, for release to evening papers, Monday, March 8, 1943." It reads:

> Shrove Tuesday comes on March 9, this year, with Lent commencing on the following day, and pancake Tuesday can still be observed, wartime restrictions notwithstanding. There'll be plenty of pancake flour in Canadian grocery stores this month, and tasty sausages for that favourite waffle supper.
> There'll be some frozen salmon on the Lenten markets, and lots of fowl. Some of the 1941 pack of canned salmon is still being released, and can be found for Lenten meals, together with frozen halibut, cod and haddock and Canadian freshwater fish.
> Salad items will play an important part in any wartime menu this year, with a good supply of lettuce, celery, green onions, radishes, cabbage, oranges, grapefruit, and other fruits and vegetables featured in grocery stores across the dominion.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser]

Most of our fruits and vegetables come from the United States. This press release is absolutely wrong. Frozen salmon can be had only in certain stores throughout the country; the supply is limited. It states that there is plenty of fowl available, but two weeks ago I could not get a decent hen or a chicken, although I tried a dozen different stores. I doubt if any member of this house can find a tin of sockeye salmon on the shelves of any store across the country. Pink salmon is soft and is not much good as food for a working man. Freshwater fish are few and far between and only certain stores carry them. Pancake flour may be plentiful, but the workingman will not take pancakes to-day because there is nothing he can put on them. He is limited in his supply of butter, and needs every ounce to put on sandwiches for his lunch box. Corn syrup is curtailed, and there is no honey to be had.

The budget this year was not the shock to the people of Canada and the taxpayers that the budget of last year was, although the Minister of Finance has asked for a billion more than he asked for last year. The budget and the supplementary estimates last year totalled $3,592,000,000, and with $858,000,000 added to that we have a total of $4,450,000,000, which is a fraction under a billion dollars less than is being asked for this year. The $5½ billion we are being asked for this year is ten times what the national debt was in 1914. Some day, Mr. Speaker, ask the Minister of Finance to lend you $5½ billion in one dollar bills. If you lay them out in a straight line end to end you will find that they will reach around the world, taking the world as being 25,000 miles in circumference. The minister is not asking for chicken feed this year; he is asking for real, hard, cold cash. I do not think he cares how he is going to get it; he is going to get it, come what may, and out of a population of just a little over 11,000,000.

We have not the resources to-day that we had some few years ago. They have shrunk, especially our forset resources. During the last hundred years our forest reserves have dwindled until to-day one wonders how long they will last. The forest reserves in the United States have shrunk from 900,000,000 acres down to 200,000,000 acres. The $5½ billion that the Minister of Finance is asking for means this year $500 from every man, woman and child in Canada. Of course some do not pay taxes, and you generally find that those who do the most kicking about taxes and about the running of the country are those who do not pay taxes, sometimes those who are not even naturalized.

As I said, the budget this year was not the shock to the people that the budget last year was. Speaking to a joint meeting of the Rotary and Lions clubs in Peterborough, on October 5 of last year, I said that in 1942-43 I expected that the government would spend at least $4 billion, although they were asking for only $3,592 million. I also said that the people of Canada would be much better satisfied if the government would spend five billion dollars because they would know then that we were turning out that much more production. We cannot expect production unless we pay for it. When I mention production I think we should page the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), because food production is just as important as, if not more important than the production of ammunitions, guns and tanks.

Speaking of munitions, I hope the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is having a strict check kept on all the munitions and supplies that are being stored in fields along our railway lines. Acres and acres of munitions are stored along our railway lines. I wonder if Canada has reached the saturation point in certain munitions, as Britain has, and whether the minister should not slow down the production of some lines and speed up others.

I have a letter here from a man who thoroughly understands the boat-building industry. He has just returned from an inspection trip in the United States, and he puts this P.S. at the bottom of his letter:

> My trip to the U.S.A. both amazed and annoyed me—I found more actual war effort by far over there in real sincerity. I see orders being placed in common sense looking away ahead whereas here they dribble out in a few and make production impossible. I see a co-operative principle between their different departments that makes our shipbuilding division look like a cocked hat in a ten-cent circus parade—I am too disgusted to write any further.

That man understands thoroughly shipbuilding as it should be done.

Last year when I spoke in the budget debate I likened the Minister of Finance to King Midas. This year the Minister of Finance makes King Midas look like a piker, because Midas could only turn into gold whatever he touched, while the Minister of Finance brings down a budget that touches every taxpayer throughout Canada.

I wish to say a word on behalf of the men who are working long hours, hours they should not work because of their state of health—

An hon. MEMBER: You must mean farmers.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I mean not only farmers, but those who are engaged in business and drawing salaries. These men are working long hours in order to do away with Schickelgruber as soon as possible. They are working extra hours for that purpose but they are not allowed to have their salaries raised. But men working for the government are allowed to have their salaries raised. One commissioner had his salary raised from $6,600 to $10,000. It does not matter whether that commissioner is doing extra work or not, because these other men are also doing extra work, perhaps more work than this commissioner, but the commissioner happens to be paid with the taxpayers' money and so perhaps the government feels that is all right. Perhaps they feel that the taxpayers' money can go out in any way. The man I refer to is John Grierson, and he gets a big salary too. I have here a newspaper clipping about his salary increase:

> Film commissioner John Grierson has come in for a whacking salary boost, from $6,600 to $10,000.

Mr. MARTIN: He got an additional job.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, and throughout this country there are thousands of men doing additional jobs and working fourteen and sixteen hours a day, and doing more work than this man is doing. But they are not allowed to have their salaries raised five cents. In the other case, though, it is the taxpayers' money that is being spent; therefore the difference. I know men handling their own business who are not allowed to take one extra cent out of their own till, although they might be doing twenty times more business this year than they did in 1940.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true of civil servants unless they are promoted. They get no increase in pay unless there is a bona fide and true promotion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they get a cost-of-living bonus if they are in the lower brackets.

Mr. ILSLEY: So do employees of private industry.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This is only one commissioner. It is likely that a lot of other commissioners are in the same boat. This man evidently is a civil servant. There is something wrong here, and I feel that it should be corrected.

There are many phases of the budget with which I do not agree, but which I can take up when we are in committee of ways and means.

I wish to say a word or two about women and girls who are working in different war plants. Many of these girls started to work last August or during the summer months. They do not understand at all the income tax set-up. All they know is that money is being taken out of their wages every week; they do not know what for. There are many women and girls in munitions plants receiving the cost of living bonus who believe the government is giving it to them, not the employer. I know that is a fact. That may be Liberal propaganda; I am not sure. These girls did not make $660 last year, 1942, and they have to wait for a year for a refund of excess income tax deducted from their wages. This year they will have to pay the additional income tax, and it is going to be mighty hard on them. I think the government should send to every wage earner a form showing how these deductions are made and how the employees can get a refund. I have mentioned in the house before that one girl had waited eleven months and had not yet received a refund, and she needed it because she was in the hospital. There are others in the same position.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech tried to make the taxpayers throughout Canada believe that he was handing out a lollypop to everyone when he said that half the 1942 income tax would be forgiven. That is all right as far as earned income goes. Investment income is exempt up to $3,000, and that is all right. But take the case of a man who in 1942 had a fairly large investment income. Under the proposal of the Minister of Finance, half of his 1942 income tax liability has to be paid out of his estate when he dies. He might die in 1945 or 1950, and then, instead of having any capital, he might have only a small income. His estate would be burdened with the payment of half his 1942 income tax liability, and succession duties, which of course would not amount to much if the estate dwindled; but you would have current taxes, and in many cases the widow would have this ball of 1942 taxes around her neck, and would be left holding the bag and perhaps have to go on charity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know that is right; for it does not follow, because your income was so much last year, that it will be the same next year or the following year. Your income last year might be $10,000, but in 1945 it might fall to $1,000, making it impossible for you to pay your income tax of 1942, or even half of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is investment income, though.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know; but we have had slumps before and we shall have them again. Investments might be entirely wiped out. I know of properties for which $10,000 could have been obtained ten years ago which the owners would be glad to sell to-day for $2,000. Twenty years ago that property might have been bringing in an income of a thousand dollars a year; to-day it may bring in only a hundred dollars, or not enough to pay taxes. So that deferring the half of the investment income until a man dies is not handing the taxpayer anything; it is just that much worse for the widow. In this regard, if the minister does not intend to clean the claim off the books, I think he should make arrangements whereby the taxpayer can pay it off during this year or next year, at a time when the government needs the money. It might be paid either in a lump sum or in small instalments. Under some such plan, which I believe is feasible, the taxpayer might be able to furnish the money, although I have some doubts. At any rate it would not hurt to try it. The minister should give a discount for payment of that income tax, and it could be worked out on the expectancy of life principle as used by insurance companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will try to meet the hon. member on that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I thank the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be far better if the minister would forgive it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The reason I believe there is no more than a chance of a taxpayer being able to pay it is that this year, operating on the quarterly plan basis, he had to meet his taxes on January 15. He then paid one-quarter of the 1942 taxes, which brought his payments on last year's taxes to one-half. But on March 31 he has to pay twenty per cent of the 1943 taxes, on June 30, twenty-five per cent, on September 30, twenty-five per cent, and on December 31, a few days after Christmas, thirty per cent of the 1943 taxes is loaded upon him. In other words the Minister of Finance says, "Look, taxpayer, I want taxes; whether there are toys for your child or not is up to you, but I want the money first." And he will get it, there is no doubt about that. The taxpayer this year is paying, therefore, 125 per cent, or a year and a quarter's income tax. That is the way I figure it out; I may be wrong, but I do not think so.

I have spoken about the working man and the working girl and the effects upon them of this income tax. I know of young people of both sexes who have taken jobs in munitions plants. They moved from their homes so as to be near their place of work, and figured that they were going to have so much to spend; they were told they would have so much. But when they got their pay envelopes they found there were deductions for this, that and the next thing, and on top of that came this income tax. I have a letter to-day on this matter. In one boarding house which has only four bedrooms there are sixteen boarders, or four people to a bedroom. They are sleeping in shifts; that is why they call it "shift sleeping". The reason they are doing it is not that they like to do it, but that it is the cheapest way, and they are trying to save an extra dollar. I believe it is the income tax which compels them to resort to this kind of thing. In the case I have mentioned they said that the beds did not even have a chance to get cool. That may be all right in zero weather, but certainly it is not healthy. It is the amount of income tax these people are paying which puts them in that position. They do not mind that; they want to win the war and they will do anything possible to win it.

While on the subject of boarding houses, I wonder how these places are going to be heated next year. I know that in the city of Peterborough last Monday there was hardly a shovelful of anthracite coal. While I was in one fuel office a lady came in and asked for a cord of wood. The manager of the office said, "We have some wood, but we have no man to run the machine to cut it, nor have we a man to put on the truck to deliver it." Shortly after that, another woman came in on a similar errand and received the same answer.

Part of the trouble with our fuel situation, especially as regards wood, is that the subsidy of one dollar a cord which is now in force should have been granted last September. The operations of selective service are not allowing men to go into the woods; at any rate it did not allow them to do so. The snowfall this winter, of course, has been exceptional; also the farmers have not had their sons at home and one man cannot cut wood. I believe the dollar subsidy applies up to the end of June, but I do not believe we shall find men going into the woods now to cut wood. Spring is coming on, and the snow in the woods is in some places three and four feet deep—I know that because I was in the woods last Saturday—and it will be wet, and men will not cut wood all day long when they are wet from head to toe. The situation is extremely serious, and I fear that next winter many a home will be without wood. The dollar subsidy will not attract men to go into the woods this summer to cut wood, because the black flies and mosquitoes will be at their worst in the spring and early summer, and the subsidy will not be in force after June 30. In my opinion mighty little wood would be cut even if the subsidy were increased to two dollars a cord. The only way that I know of to help the situation would be for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to have his selective service board arrange for gangs of men to go into the woods to cut as soon as possible, or alternatively, after the season of flies and mosquitoes is over. I will quote from a letter:

> Regarding being unable to get labour to haul wood in our yard, we believe it is because of the severe weather conditions which have existed during the past two or three months, also because the average labourer refuses to do outside work when there are so many jobs available in different local factories, therefore we are not the only firm suffering accordingly.

In the Farmer's Advocate of February 11, 1943, the editor remarks:

> The woodlot is taking on a new significance this year, but owing to deep snow and ice in many districts it is a frozen asset.

That is perfectly true because the farmer has not been able to cut wood in his woodlot. There is another thing which I think is wrong. In the release of March 8 from the office of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) it is said:

> The staffs of the coal administration and of the dominion fuel board have been transferred to the munitions and supply department. James McGregor Stewart, K.C. is now coal controller and will retain his title and powers as coal administrator, under which he will continue to regulate prices of coal, coke, and wood fuel.

I think the government would have been a lot better off if they had secured a practical man for that position instead of a lawyer. I have much respect for lawyers, but in this instance a man who knows the woods and the cutting of wood and the handling of coal should have been secured instead of an office man. This is a case where a controller will be needed to control the controller.

The Minister of Finance in his budget is relieving those who have government annuities and allowing them to deduct from their compulsory savings the premiums on those annuities. This I know will meet with the approval of many annuity holders in Canada; in fact I have received a dozen or more letters already this session in regard to it.

I had a letter the other day from a farmer—in fact I have many; they are all frightened about the income tax. They are afraid they will not get the returns in in time; they do not know whether they should deduct for the food they grow and consume on the farm; they are all muddled up. The sooner the minister gets out a booklet instructing these farmers how to make out their income tax returns the better it will be. Just this morning I heard a gentleman say he thought the Minister of Finance had gone into the clothing business—I should say, designing clothes; because, he said, this year the Minister of Finance is making sure that there will be no change in the taxpayers' pocket. No, not a cent.

This war is being carried on on a tremendous scale; therefore the taxpayer has to expect to pay a tremendous amount of money for carrying on the war. The British navy is fighting at the present time on a front of sixty million square miles on the seas. I notice in a booklet I have here that his majesty's ship Cumberland, for example, was at sea for 206 days out of 215. The men on those ships are not shirking, and I know the people of Canada will not shirk.

Mr. C. R. EVANS (Maple Creek): In rising to speak at this time on the Ilsley pay-as-you go budget, I should like to add my word of congratulation to the minister for forgiving at least half of the 1942 income tax on earned income. This goes a long way to relieve the minds of many persons in the lower paid brackets so that they can budget and be at least even or practically so at the end of 1943.

We are living to-day in a world of rapidly changing events. Governments which are responsible for the administration of affairs either civil or in connection with the war have to try to foresee what may happen within twelve to twenty-four hours, or a week, or a month. I doubt if many governments to-day under existing conditions foresee much beyond one year.

From time to time we have heard considerable criticism in this house of the government's agricultural policy. Last evening we had that bombastic bombardment from the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), and prior to that we had many criticisms of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his agricultural policy. Coming from an agricultural constituency and having been connected with agriculture more or less all my life I believe I can speak with some degree of assurance on agricultural matters. Therefore in this debate I shall direct my remarks closely to agriculture and agricultural problems.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Let me take hon. members back to 1939, the first year of the war. I well remember that, in December, 1939, the Minister of Agriculture, speaking in Winnipeg before an agricultural organization, outlined what he recommended to the farmers as the agricultural programme they should follow, at least for 1940, in food production. In 1941 and 1942 the minister has followed that policy very closely, enlarging upon it to some extent as the demand for certain food products increased.

The main feature of that 1939 broadcast was production of live stock, dairy and poultry products. He told farmers that these would be needed in great quantities in both Canada and Great Britain. If we review the three war years, 1940, 1941 and 1942, we find that our cash income from agricultural products in Canada has increased each year until 1942 was possibly one of the highest years in our history, with the possible exception of the boom years 1928-29. We find that in 1940 Canada's cash income from agricultural products totalled $753 million. In 1941 it increased to $898·9 million, while in 1942 it reached $1,083 million. So that none will question that the agricultural cash income for the whole dominion has shown a substantial rise over the three war years. Included in that income is the bonus paid on dairy products, I believe, but not other assistance given to the prairie farmers. Therefore, if we include last year, 1942, we find that the income of the prairie farmers was increased by almost another $100,000,000.

This afternoon I intend to direct my remarks more particularly to agriculture in the province from which I come. In the main, Saskatchewan was a cereal producing province prior to the outbreak of war and for at least one year after. When the Minister of Agriculture advocated a change-over from the growing of wheat to an increased production of coarse grains, live stock and dairy products, the Saskatchewan farmer answered that call. I should like to place upon Hansard a few figures indicating to what extent the farmers of my province have increased food production in response to the minister's request. First let us look at the live stock programme. In 1939 we had in Saskatchewan 1,170,200 head of cattle. In 1940 this number increased to 1,249,200, and by 1942 it had increased to 1,395,200. Our marketings increased also. In 1939 we marketed 172,865 head, while in 1942 that figure had jumped to 252,186, an increase of about 70 per cent. I believe these figures will indicate that our income from live stock products has greatly increased. The same can be said about hogs. In 1939 we had only 470,000 hogs in Saskatchewan, as a result of the drought years we had prior to 1939, but between 1939 and 1942 the farmers of Saskatchewan increased the hog population of that province by about 400 per cent, which I think is a very good showing. We also increased our marketing of hogs during the same period by about the same percentage, and it is estimated that in 1943, the year we have just entered, our hog marketings will be increased by another 150 or 200 per cent. The same thing is true of dairy products. In 1939 Saskatchewan produced only about 25,000,000 pounds of butter, but this increased in 1942 to 41,306,000 pounds. In 1939 we produced 35,550,000 dozen eggs, while in 1942 our egg production amounted to almost 47,000,000 dozen. In 1939 we produced about 212,000,000 pounds of poultry, while in 1942 we produced almost 259,000,000 pounds. This was all done as a result of the appeal by the Minister of Agriculture that the production of essential food products be increased.

I have given the figures showing the cash income from agricultural products for the whole of Canada. I wish to deal now with the figures concerning my own province, for after all that is what I am mainly concerned with, and I know the house will bear with me if I deal with provincial matters for a few moments. I should like to give the figures for the three full years we have been at war, and during which the policy of the Minister of Agriculture has been in operation. In 1940 our cash income from grain was only $109,343,000, and from other field crops, $326,000; from live stock products, $27,255,000; from dairy products, $7,375,000, and from all other sources, including eggs, wool, honey and miscellaneous products, about $8,000,000, making a total cash income from all sources of $149,429,000. I am informed that this figure includes the subsidies paid on butter and dairy products but does not include the various bonuses paid to the farmers of western Canada, so that to that figure we must add something like $27,000,000, which would bring the total cash income of the farmers of Saskatchewan for 1940 to about $170,000,000.

Let us now look at the picture for 1941, to see how our income has increased as step by step the farmers have diversified their farming operations. In that year our income from grain was practically the same, $101,288,000; from other field crops, $350,000; from live stock, $38,235,000; from dairy products, $12,934,000, and the income from all other farm products increased in about the same proportion. Therefore we find that our total cash income for 1941, as a result of the policy that has been so much criticized by some of our hon. friends from Saskatchewan, amounted to almost $159,000,000. Again this does not include the bonuses paid to the prairie farmers, and estimated in that year at about $35,000,000, which means that the cash income of the farmers of Saskatchewan increased in 1941 to about $197,000,000.

Let us now look at 1942; and when we compare these figures with those for 1939 who will say that we have no definite agricultural policy in this country? In 1942 our cash income from grain was about the same, $110,421,000, and there was a slight increase in the income from all other field crops, to $356,000. Just in passing let me say that we have heard a great deal about Saskatchewan not being able to produce certain commodities, but part of this amount was realized from home grown fruits and vegetables. Live-stock production income in 1942 jumped considerably. We find that our income from this source was $53,327,000. Income from dairy products increased to the sum of $16,556,000. Then we must take all other income from agriculutral products such as eggs, wool, honey and miscellaneous items. We find that in respect of these items there is an increase to $8,898,000, making a total income for 1942 of $189,558,000. This figure does not include bonuses paid to the prairie farmers. In 1942 it is estimated that bonuses paid to Saskatchewan farmers amounted to about $40,000,000, making a cash income of $229,558,000, or practically 60 per cent higher than it was in 1939, at the outbreak of the war.

Mr. WOOD: What is the number of farms in Saskatchewan?

Mr. EVANS: I think it is about 140,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would the hon. member explain the figure of $40,000,000 for bonuses in 1942. I know of only the wheat acreage bonuses. Is he including subsidies as well?

Mr. EVANS: There was a carryover from 1941. That was not included in the bonuses I added to 1941 income. We have had it broken down to show what was paid in 1941, and the amount paid in 1942. There is still some bonus money standing on account of wheat acreage reduction. This is a carryover for 1942, and is not included in the items I have mentioned.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Where did the hon. member get the $40,000,000?

Mr. EVANS: It was given to me by the Department of Agriculture, and I believe their figures are fairly accurate. As announced by the minister in Saskatoon, in January of 1943, we are carrying on our 1943 crop production programme along the same lines as were followed in 1941 and 1942, although extensions have been made where necessities have arisen for greater production.

I believe the Minister of Agriculture is faced with the greatest production task faced by any minister of agriculture in any country of the world. He is asked to produce in quantity and quality, and must produce his quantities under a price ceiling regulating the prices of food. That is a difficult task for any minister, but I must say the present one has made a wonderful job of it so far. I believe that in 1943 the farmers of Canada will answer the appeal by producing more and more foods in the quantity and quality required successfully to carry on our war effort.

For a few moments I should like to outline what is being done in Saskatchewan in 1943. I believe this outline is important on account of certain criticisms and statements which have been made respecting conditions of agriculture in that province. I hold in my hand an issue of the Regina Leader-Post of March 5, and I wish to place on Hansard a short extract from it. This is a press dispatch respecting a statement issued by the former food controller in Canada, the present minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, Hon. J. G. Taggart. The statement was made before the annual convention of the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities. The article states:

The agricultural minister said it was imperative that the farmers of the province comply with the dominion government's agricultural policy for 1943, to produce more cattle and hogs, because they were going to be needed to win the war.

"If they are needed to win the war, that's surely reason enough," Mr. Taggart told the convention, "but there is another reason. It will be to our advantage to follow this programme. Price of dairy products, meats, poultry, are above parity approximately 20 per cent, while wheat, oats, rye and barley are as much as 40 per cent below. Therefore the demand is for products with higher parity prices and the figures show the advantage in producing materials that are demanded."

The transformation of Saskatchewan farms from wheat-growing into stock-raising would not be such a large job, Mr. Taggart said, because figures proved that Saskatchewan had been swinging that way gradually for the past four years. He said that in 1938, 211,000 head of cattle, valued at nearly $6,000,000 was marketed in inspected slaughter houses, while last year the number had been increased to 328,000 head, and the value had reached $22,000,000. Hogs valued at sale a total of nearly $4,000,000 in 1938 and four times that price last year.

That is in 1942.

[Mr. Evans.]

Mr. WOOD: This is a most informative address. In view of increased production on the farms of Saskatchewan, is there any indication that the farmers are liquidating their debts and mortgages?

Mr. EVANS: Yes. Without doubt I believe the last survey indicated that that was so. I was talking to an official of one of the large implement companies who told me that in the district from which I come every account contracted in 1941 and 1942 had been paid. Those are, of course, only implement accounts. It was pointed out that substantial payments are being made on mortgage indebtedness. I do not wish it to be understood that we are liquidating our back debts, because I think anyone in business must know that under existing price conditions with respect to agricultural products, particularly those products produced in large quantities in western Canada, and concerning which quota marketing arrangements have been made, it is difficult to liquidate debts accumulated prior to the outbreak of war. Under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act there has been a general reduction of debts. I am sorry I have not the figures here, and I should not like to quote them unless I could be fairly accurate. I believe, however, that the average adjusted debts in Saskatchewan would amount to about forty-four per cent. If my memory serves me correctly the exact figure is 43 point something or 45 point something.

I understand the agricultural programme is the same in all the provinces, because the programme outlined by the federal minister has been passed on to the provincial departments in each province, for coordination and cooperation. In Saskatchewan I believe our position is unique. In the last two years we have heard criticisms of our organization for the production of agricultural products throughout Canada. References have been made to organizations in the United States, and possibly I might be permitted to tell what we are doing in Saskatchewan. I do so because I believe ours is one of the first moves in Canada to get in direct contact with the individual farmer. In that province we have organized every municipality, so that in each we have a win-the-war committee consisting of members of municipal councils and other outstanding farmers. The duty of that committee is to interview every farmer in the municipality and to make a record of the man-power, the machine power, the number of cattle and other live stock held on the farm and to find out how we can assist, through the department of agriculture representatives and through the federal Department of Agriculture, the farmers to produce more in 1943 of the required food products. That is the first step we have taken.

But we have extended that. As I pointed out, our sales of hogs in Saskatchewan have increased 400 per cent over the 1938 figure. We have gone a step further to increase that production. I said that we might produce from 150 to 200 per cent more in 1943. Every municipality is taking an active interest in this production campaign. From information I have received from my own constituency I know that the municipalities and the agricultural improvement associations have organized. Brood sows are being shipped into the municipalities and the local improvement districts. These are bred and sold at market value, the average price being around $25 to $30 apiece. You can imagine what it will mean in income next fall to the average wheat farmer in Saskatchewan if he has one, two or three of these sows on his farm.

I happen to have in my constituency an area which in normal crop years produces possibly as much wheat as any other area in Saskatchewan. I refer generally to the area surrounding Shaunavon and running down into Aneroid and into the Kincaid district, represented by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly). I went to Shaunavon during the recess of 1941 and talked with the wheat farmers there and the municipal authorities and others about the possibility of changing from wheat production to the production of other agricultural products. I think all members will realize that it is hard work to get a wheat farmer to adopt any other viewpoint than that of higher prices for wheat and the production of more and more of that commodity. I happened to be in the reading room the other day and on reading the Shaunavon Standard I noticed that in one month the farmers of the Shaunavon area had shipped out 1,868 cans of cream. They have organized themselves and are going into hog production. The editor had a good write-up on the programme that they intended to follow in that wheat growing area. The leadership being given by the Minister of Agriculture to farmers, not only of western Canada but all over Canada, will produce this year the greatest quantities of food that we require in Canada and to feed the peoples of Great Britain and any other united nation that may need food. We are going to do more than we ever did in the past.

There has been another extension of our production programme in Saskatchewan. It will be recalled that in the winter of 1941-42 the farmers of Canada were asked to produce more wool. In my constituency there is a large ranching area along the southwest and western side. This area produces vast numbers of sheep and cattle. Last year I think we produced something over a million pounds of wool from the flocks we have there. But that was not enough for the superintendent of the experimental farm at Swift Current. He undertook to increase sheep production in that southwest corner of the province and in the constituency represented by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham). In that area there are great natural resources which lend themselves to an increased production of sheep.

In my own constituency there are three major irrigation projects where vast quantities of alfalfa, coarse grains and other winter feeds are grown. Mr. Thompson set out to organize the farmers around each of these irrigation projects. Sheep cooperatives were formed at Valmarie, Eastend and Maple Creek. He has increased the holdings of sheep by ten thousand head. Taking an average of seven to eight pounds a fleece for a range sheep, this means an increase of something like 80,000 pounds of wool. But he was not satisfied even with that. He went out among the farmers all through Swift Current constituency and through my own, in fact all the way west from the third meridian to the Alberta border and north to the Saskatchewan river. He encouraged the farmers to raise small numbers of sheep, anywhere from ten to a hundred head. The result was that the sheep holdings in that area increased by about 40,000 head, which means a greater production of wool for 1943.

I shall not take up any more time in discussing these matters, but I wish to make it perfectly clear that the farmers of Saskatchewan will produce this year more and more of the food products that are required for the winning of this war. The testing time for Canada is about to come. This year we shall be asked to work, to save and to lend. I am sure that the people and the farmers of Saskatchewan will do their utmost to be true Canadians and be ready to serve their country by working and saving and lending any spare money they may have.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I intend to preface my remarks to-day by reading the message of March 6 from Prime Minister Churchill to the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King). He said:

I am deeply touched by your very generous message and I send to you and to all members of the parliament of Canada my heartfelt thanks.

I recall with gratitude the warmth of the reception which you all gave me when I visited Canada in December, 1941.

In the darkest days, Canada, under your leadership, remained confident and true. Now the days are brighter and when victory is won you will be able to look back with just pride upon a record surpassed by none.

He pays a tribute to the tremendous contribution that Canada is making to the great struggle in which the world is now engaged. I should like to apply Mr. Churchill's statement as a direct and highly deserved tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) by using these words:

> In the most difficult days of financing Canada's war effort under the leadership of our Minister of Finance, the people of Canada have maintained utmost confidence. After the war we will look with pride upon a record in finance surpassed by none.

I have one suggestion to make in connection with budget speeches, that is, that each year this speech should be broadcast. It seems to me that this is the one speech delivered in parliament to which the people of Canada from coast to coast look forward. While it might be an innovation in parliamentary procedure, I believe that great value would accrue if it were possible for the people to hear these budget speeches. The speech of the Minister of Finance, if broadcast over the radio, would have convinced all Canadians of the magnitude of our task and would have been an inspiration to a red-blooded effort on their part. The position of the Minister of Finance is extremely difficult. He is the balance wheel in our national economy. People are not critical about the money he takes from them, but they are critical about the way in which the various departments expend their money. On this point I shall have more to say later, especially in the discussion on the war expenditures committee.

This war eflort, Mr. Speaker, is entirely different from the experience of Canada in the last war. I should like to discuss it briefly under three headings: (a) the fighting forces; (b) equipment; and (c) civilian participation.

The fighting forces must be highly trained in the use of all the new implements of war which science has devised. Armoured tanks ignore fortifications and terrorize fleeing civilians. Bombers rain deadly explosives on charted targets. Fighters dive at 550 miles an hour to rout the enemy. Battleships to-day must lurk in secluded bays while speedy long-range submarines prey on ocean traffic. Protection for this ocean traffic comes from aircraft carriers, and from small speedy warships of various designs. Our fighting forces on the land and sea and in the air must undergo special training in order to handle the modern implements of war with which they are equipped.

The equipment demands have been almost completely revolutionized since the last war. In the last war we placed the emphasis on guns and shells and trenches. In this war we have modern implements of every description designed by skilled scientists and technicians. In the last war our munitions board occupied a few rooms above stores on Sparks street. In this war we have buildings galore all over the city of Ottawa and also in the cities of Montreal and Toronto. We have scientists, technicians and specialists designing and producing these modern implements. The whole country has been harnessed to their production so that perhaps upwards of a million workers are engaged in our war factories. Of necessity boards have had to be set up in order to handle this great programme and direct these huge organizations. These boards have come under criticism, as is always the case where the human element is involved.

Civilian participation in this war is entirely different from that in the last war. I am sure the people of Canada quite generally are satisfied with our munitions programme. I am sure also that they are delighted that our prices have not soared as they did in the last war. I am sure that they are pleased that our whole economy has been kept well balanced and on a fairly even keel. But the people are often irritated over some of the seemingly senseless orders of these boards. They are irritated also by the expenditures of these boards, expenditures which so often appear to be wasteful and unnecessary. The very fact that values have not soared as they did in the last war will be a decidedly favourable factor at the conclusion of this war, when we shall not have the disastrous effects of large depreciations. Those soaring values in the last war brought trouble to many people during the intervening years.

I wish to devote a little time to considering to-day and to-morrow. We have prosperity to-day to a very large degree. It is true that in places some adjustments should be made. It is true that in places adjustments have come rather too late. It should be our endeavour to stabilize this prosperity if at all possible for the future days. It should be our endeavour to get away from these cycles of prosperity and depression so often recurring.

The great mass of our people, generally speaking, may be divided into two classes, agriculture and labour. My home is in the good county of Wellington, which generally is favoured with good crops. Years ago fine houses and good barns were built in the county. I often wonder how, under present conditions and methods of operating, those fine houses and good barns could be replaced. Many of them are going into disrepair. It seems as though something may be wrong if we cannot to-day build as our grandfathers were able to do years ago. Is it a matter of buying prices and selling prices? Are there some other reasons why the farming community is not in as prosperous a condition as it was years ago? Possibly it is due to too much overhead, to high labour costs. Recently a study has been made in the British isles pertaining to agriculture. The farmers were classified in three types, A, B, and C. The A class included those who were making a success of farming, the B class those who could be helped, and the C class those who should be removed to some other vocation. It does seem to me that our institutions of science and agriculture through the instruments of our departments of agriculture, federal and provincial, should lend more direct assistance to the farmer. A more intensive survey and study of the operations of individual farmers might be made in order to give to the individual farmer directly the benefit of the findings of these institutions of agriculture through study and research.

Western Canada is a great producer of wheat, but one wonders whether we can continue to produce in such enormous quantities, since other countries are likely to endeavour to become, in the largest possible measure, self-contained. One wonders also if something cannot be done to equalize the spread between prices in Canada and in the United States, as illustrated by a differential of fifty cents per bushel of wheat. One wonders if a little scaling up of farm prices would be a serious handicap to the consumers in our towns and cities; because if by some such system we can give the Canadian farmer greater prosperity, it must be remembered that when he makes a profit he spends it in the purchase of goods produced in our factories. We should encourage diversification of our products—a proceeding which happily is going on now in western Canada. We should develop to the utmost our resources of every description, in order that those employed in connection therewith may become purchasers and consumers of the products of the farm.

We should encourage agriculture for another reason. Very fine citizens are produced on the farm. Boys and girls grow up with good habits of right living. They learn how to work. They learn how to save money. They learn much of life through contact with nature. It often seems to me that some means should be undertaken by which every boy in the cities and the larger towns would be given an opportunity to spend six months continuously on the farm. His education could very well be interrupted at some point, say between the ages of fifteen and seventeen, to enable him to do that.

Employment in our factories is contingent on the need for goods. If we give the farmer prosperity it will result, through his greater purchasing power, in larger demand for the goods of our factories. Likewise as regards the development of our other resources: there will be a consequent demand for goods from our factories; and these all together, will produce a cycle of continuous demand for the products of the farm.

Another large group to be considered is that which is made up of the white collar workers; clerks, teachers, executives, scientists and all the professional class. Their position will improve and can only improve with the development of markets and fair prices for our farm products and the further development of our varied resources. The depression which affects the farmer producer hits everybody in the city.

I can think of another scattered group, the schemers and filchers and near-shylocks; I mean those who live by their wits and their scheming at the expense of others. May I suggest that we devote some of our attention to correctives which will give a fair opportunity to the great mass of the people, and take from those who have now, in one way and another, unfair advantages. We need not destroy the desirable things that have been accomplished in the past to get rid of the barnacles that are a handicap to the higher development of the great mass of the people.

When the war is over, half a million or more soldiers will return for other work. We shall release from our munitions plants upwards of a million people who have been diverted to new work during the war. All these people, soldiers and munitions workers alike, will have acquired new training, and will be better fitted to take on larger duties than any they performed before they entered various aspects of war service and production. It seems to me that there will be an opportunity of utilizing their services in cooperating with science in the development of our resources. But of course there will be those who are sick and maimed and who must receive our generous consideration in the matter of homes and pensions.

Finally, there is another class, the aged and the needy, those who have reached a stage when they are no longer able to find work. To them we should extend the utmost generosity, in order that they may enjoy during their latter years a decent standard of living. In view of our enormous expenditures, and the apparent readiness with which we can provide money for destructive purposes, I believe the government should pay heed to the insistence from every quarter of this house that some means be speedily found to recognize and recompense the older people who at present have not enough to give them the essentials of a decent life.

Another challenge has come to Canada. It comes to us in the increasing ratio of marriages in this country during recent years. I am sure every Canadian will feel delighted that our young people believe their outlook to be such that they can take upon themselves the responsibilities of supporting a home. This should be encouraged, through our efforts to give them assurance of income and prosperity for the future. Looking over the days past, I consider it regrettable that so many young people have never felt the assurance that would justify them in taking on the responsibility of maintaining a home. I cannot but recall in this connection a little poem we had in one of our school readers entitled "The Hanging of the Crane":

> O fortunate, O happy day,
> When a new household finds its place
> Among the myriad homes of earth,
> Like a new star just sprung to birth,
> And rolled on its harmonious way
> Into the boundless realms of space!

What is the basis for greater and steadier employment for labour and for the white-collar people I have mentioned? It seems to me it is vision as to the possibilities, and statesmanship in organizing for the development of those possibilities. Other countries I am sure will not be short-sighted in developing their resources and doing their utmost to create conditions favourable to their own people. Therefore, it is up to us as Canadians to make an extraordinary effort to develop the great resources of this land. We must bring science to bear on that development in many fields; in agriculture, of which I have already spoken, in connection with our forests, which we ought to conserve and protect and which we should assure for the future by modern methods of reforestation, and in the development of our mines. Encouragement should be given not only to prospecting but also to development on a sound basis. The same is true with respect to our great oil resources. Surely here we have a field of great opportunity. Various speakers have mentioned our power resources. Almost all across Canada we have water powers that can be harnessed for the benefit of the people. And with the extended use of electric power in our homes there will be demands for various articles operated by electric power, creating a demand for these electrical goods and work for our factories.

The building of necessary highways should be and no doubt will be encouraged. These should be encouraged along channels that will attract tourist traffic. Our efforts in regard to tourist traffic should go far beyond merely advertising for people to come. Facilities should be provided on a large scale for these tourists who will come from the great country to the south. I do not know what is to be done with many of the temporary types of houses that have been built during the war, but, if it is feasible, I suggest that in a large way many of these houses should be taken down carefully and re-erected in localities where tourists visit. Communities of such houses could be established in pretty summer resorts under careful government supervision, and possibly it could be made a source of livelihood for one of our returned men who could take over the management and perhaps a small store operation.

One thing we should guard against is abuses in one way and another, too high prices and unreasonable charges and inadequate service that would tend to discourage tourists and cause them to send unfavourable word back to their friends at home.

Can we not have constructive vision as to the possibilities of our country? We are faced by a threat of destruction; we should be branded as criminals if we slumber amidst our great undeveloped resources. Wherein lies the risk of failure in the development of this dominion? It will be, I contend, through lack of vision. We have the resources and we have the talent. Let not those who have selfish designs discourage us or defeat us.

I intended to have a word to-day relative to an item that should properly have come in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but it may not be out of place to refer briefly to it; that is to comment favourably on the proposal of the government to appoint parliamentary assistants. This is a matter that I have advocated in parliament for some years. I came to parliament with an idea of assisting in promoting business methods in government, and in this connection I have advocated various measures from time to time. At one time I proposed a ministry of economy; in another case I had the pleasure of introducing a resolution to revise the rules of the house, and more recently I have had on the order paper a resolution relative to greater participation by members of parliament in our war effort and post-war planning. Now that parliamentary assistants are to be appointed, I trust these will not be made mere chore boys for the ministers, but that they will be given opportunity for some really constructive work in the department in two directions—in the direction of curtailing unnecessary expenses and also in the direction of planning greater usefulness of the departments in the interests of the development of our country.

Objection has been taken to the use of parliamentary assistants on two scores. The first is that our conditions are not similar to those in the British isles where parliamentary secretaries and undersecretaries are employed. I may point out that we have some nineteen ministers engaged in the supervision of our war effort in Canada, whereas in the British cabinet there are in all about eighty ministers, parliamentary secretaries and undersecretaries. Speaking in this house on February 12, 1942, the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr Slaght) urging the appointment of undersecretaries, used these words, as reported in Hansard at page 539:

> My recent visit to England has confirmed me tenfold in that view, and I will mention one incident. We were privileged to visit eleven cabinet ministers, including every member of the war cabinet, for half an hour privately in their rooms.
> I was in Mr. Herbert Morrison's room, and there was with him, a young gentleman, a member of the house, whom he introduced as his parliamentary secretary. Mr. Morrison turned to him at times for verification of certain figures, and this young gentleman was very helpful. I said to Mr. Morrison, "I don't suppose you could carry on without your parliamentary secretary." He answered, "Carry on? I could not possibly. I have three parliamentary secretaries, and with them I find it difficult to do all the work I have to do."

Another objection taken in this house to the appointment of parliamentary assistants was that they would be as a fifth wheel to a coach. Well, I would remind the hon. member who took that objection that in the transportation of passengers to-day, safety and speed require that coaches have six wheels. It may be said also that in some departments, on account of illness or for one reason or another, officials have been distinctly handicapped and prevented from giving the best possible service because they have had to wait for instructions and directions. I could enlarge upon this point, but I do not propose to do so at this time; perhaps the question will come up at a later date.

When I attended a little red school there was another boy in our group who was the winner in most of the fights. We were happy when he was removed. The star player in a hockey game is often sent spinning to the boards. The winning horse is frequently crowded to the rail. We are envious of our rivals; we like to get rid of them, because they are obstacles to us. This is true in politics also. Particularly will the monopoly controls and selfish interests endeavour to destroy those who stand in their way. Our Prime Minister has been a great obstacle to rival parties, and certainly they would like to get rid of him. Is there an hon. member who would not like to change some item in some policy to suit particular conditions in his own riding? I do not hesitate to say that some features of our man-power policy are not to my liking, that I have disapproved various regulations issued by some of the boards which have been set up and which have incurred not a little criticism in many parts of Canada on the grounds of waste and extravagance. But some hon. members would acclaim the very thing which I would disapprove, and so it goes all the way across the country. Taking Canada's war effort as a whole, I say the sum total of that effort as represented by the armed services, our munition production, our food production, our financing and so on, is a most creditable record. We shall be judged not by individual items, not by those little things that may irritate our people back home, but by the sum total of the contribution of Canada at this time to the support of our allies. I stand to support any policy of progress looking to the broad development of the resources of our country.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gladstone) upon the subject matter of his address, which was very much to the point.

While listening to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) I found it very difficult to picture in my mind what these tremendous sums of money really meant, and I believe an ordinary citizen of this country would find the same difficulty. Most of us are accustomed to speaking of money in terms of ten dollars or a hundred dollars, and when we get into the millions and billions we are rather at a loss. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that if you had been born in the year one and had spent a thousand dollars a day, every day, up to the present time, you would have to live another 790 years, spending a thousand dollars a day, before you would have spent a billion dollars. When you think of it in that way it seems like a lot of money; and we in Canada are spending five and a half billion this year, an amount equal to the value of all our agricultural land together with the stock and equipment on it. We are going to raise that money in Canada this year, I think without too much difficulty.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Evans) called ours a pay-as-you-go budget. I would hardly call it that, when we shall have to borrow at least fifty per cent of the total, if not more. Nevertheless this amount of money represents the physical effort that we are to put forth in carrying on this war during the coming year, and looked at in that way it does not seem so bad. It means that we shall have to do without some of the things to which we have become accustomed, but I think the people of Canada are prepared to do that provided the government will use the money to the best advantage. When we see certain reports in the newspapers, however, and read certain findings of committees set up by this house in regard to the expenditure of public money, a certain amount of doubt is created as to whether this money is being spent in the best way. During the war we have had more prosperity than we had for several years prior to the war. We have also had more equality of sacrifice than we had for a considerable period before the war, and I think the minister is to be congratulated in that his budgets have tended to bring about that equality of sacrifice, because we cannot have a complete war effort in this country without it.

My chief criticism of this budget is that it has not gone just one step further in that direction. Apparently the minister is satisfied that we have in Canada to-day equality of service, but before I am through I hope to point out a few of the ways in which I believe we can have even greater equality. I believe this equality of service is the reason why Great Britain has been able to make such a great war effort. There has been an increased recognition of the value of the common man, which has greatly stimulated the war effort in that country.

A story is told of the Hon. Mr. Bevin. Shortly after he was taken into the cabinet he was called into conference with a group of bankers. Apparently they were trying to impress upon him their importance in the war economy of the country. His answer is reported to have been this: "Gentlemen, if a bomb were to drop here this minute and you were annihilated, it would not make a particle of difference to the war effort of Great Britain; but if a bomb were to drop in one of our factories and were to kill one of my workmen who is making a ship, a plane, a tank or a gun, that would make a difference to our war effort." I believe it is the realization of that principle in Great Britain which has placed them where they are to-day. We must recognize the same principle in this country.

Speaking yesterday, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said that this war was being fought by the common man, that the materials were being produced by the common man, and that after it is over it will be paid for by the common man. I believe that is right. An editorial which appeared yesterday in the Ottawa Journal made me feel rather sick, particularly when I thought back to the late war, its mud and filth, the sacrifices made in the trenches of France; when I thought of our young men in this war who are going over Germany every night in bombers; when I thought of Dieppe, and when I thought of the battles still to be fought. That editorial criticized the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation for certain criticisms it had made respecting dollar-a-year men brought to Ottawa to assist the government. The editorial pointed out that these men, in leaving their homes and coming to the crowded city of Ottawa to live at the Chateau Laurier, with from $10 to $30 a day expenses, as well as their regular salaries at home, were making tremendous sacrifices. To my mind, it just did not seem to make sense.

I should like to point out three ways in which I believe we could have more equality of service, without in any way detracting from our war effort. It is my belief that my suggestions would have the effect of adding to our effort. My first suggestion is that we should have more equitable prices for certain primary products produced by our farms. Apparently the Minister of Finance thinks that parity prices on agricultural products would tend to bring about inflation. I cannot agree with him in that respect. Despite the very fine picture painted this afternoon by the hon. member for Maple Creek with regard to conditions in Saskatchewan, I know a large share of the money received in that province from increases in prices of agricultural products would go toward paying off past debts. Ninety per cent of the farms in Saskatchewan carry encumbrances, and the paying of that debt would certainly not have any inflationary effect. Therefore I say if we are to obtain maximum production from our farms we must give prices which will meet the cost of production, and leave something over for the people who are producing.

My second suggestion to bring about a more equitable effort and a more equitable sacrifice is that we should have a higher minimum wage than is being paid in many of the provinces. Certainly many of our working people to-day are not receiving sufficient to give them the minimum nutritional standard of living they should have to maintain health. We find that condition right in Ottawa, among government employees. No girl getting $60 a month, plus a cost of living bonus which is exhausted almost entirely by deductions from her salary, can possibly have the standard of living she should have. If she must pay any additional expenses, such as medical operations, dental care, or other exceptional expenses she would be in debt for years to come, if she has no other income or if her parents are unable to meet those expenses. In several provinces minimum wages are so low—from twenty to thirty cents an hour—that those in receipt of them are not receiving the remuneration they should have for the service they are rendering the state.

My third suggestion for a more united war effort is the payment of higher old age pensions, widows' allowances and veterans' allowances than are now being paid. We should also have health insurance provisions. Many hon. members, from all sides of the house, have spoken concerning old-age pensions. I have not yet heard one who has advocated our present scale of payments in this connection. It is ridiculous to think that in a civilized country we give such miserable pittances as we are giving to-day. It has been said that the treatment of old people, and the sick and helpless is a mark of civilization. If $20 a month is Canada's degree of civilization I am not very proud of it, and I am sure many hon. members will feel as I do.

We learn it is a custom among some of the African tribes that when a person becomes too old he is wrapped in a skin, taken out and left in the bush for the jackals to eat. At least their suffering is over in one night. In Canada we give this miserable pittance to our old age pensioners, just enough to prevent their dying, but not enough to live on. It is slow starvation, and a system which reflects no credit upon us. Surely this is one of the things about which our social security committee should do something—and do it at once, not a year from now or two years from now.

In his speech yesterday the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) tried to tell us what the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation platform is. Well, when I want to know the tenets of the Presbyterian faith I do not go to a Hindu. When I want to know the principles upon which the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is founded I certainly will not take the word of the hon. member for Swift Current. Apparently he thought I did not understand the platform of this party. Well, for his information I would point out that I have been a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation since its inception, and that I believed in the principles incorporated in our platform for many years before the political organization was formed. Apparently he does not realize just how our platform is formed. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation platform is formed by the small committees which meet in the constituencies throughout Canada. These local committees meet and draft resolutions; every year there is a constituency convention to which the resolutions are sent, and from there they go to the provincial conventions which are held each year. I know of no more democratic way than that of forming a political platform.

He made reference also to the fiscal policy of the present government, but I wish to point out to him that the growth of monopolistic control in this country has been greater during the last twenty-two years than in any other period in Canada's history. Of those twenty-two years his party were in power for seventeen years and the party to my right were in power for five years. It is the result of their policies and their encouragement of monopolistic control in this country that brought about the formation of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation by the people of Canada for the purpose of overcoming these very evils. He gave us certain ideas with regard to the fiscal policy of this country, but I should like to read what the platform of his party was in 1919 with regard to tariffs. This is the report of the national Liberal convention held in Ottawa in August, 1919.

Mr. GILLIS: The last one held.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, I believe it was the last one held. The resolution on tariffs reads:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance. First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; Second: reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net twines and fishermen's equipments; cement and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

That is some twenty-three or twenty-four years ago. Before going any further, I should like to point out that the tariff is not the only means by which protection is given industry in this country. Protection is given also by the manipulation of exchange. During the last ten or twelve years industry has received as much protection from the manipulation of exchange as it has from the tariff. Having said that, I wish to point out what our position is to-day with regard to the tariff on some of the farm machinery which the Liberal party said in 1919 would be removed as soon as they were returned to power.

Take tractors, for instance. There is no duty on tractors coming into this country, but there is an eleven per cent exchange on the Canadian dollar and there is a ten per cent war exchange tax, or a total of twenty-one per cent protection on tractors entering this country. The farmers of Canada pay twenty-one per cent more for their tractors than they would have to pay if that exchange were not there. Combines are being used more and more in this country. There is a seven and a half per cent duty on these, a ten per cent war exchange tax and an eleven per cent exchange, or a total of twenty-eight and a half per cent protection.

Milking machines are needed to obtain the required increased dairy production. There is a 10 per cent duty on these, a 10 per cent war exchange tax and an 11 per cent United States exchange or a total of 31 per cent protection. Small gasoline engines are used on nearly every farm for pumping water, for running the milking machine, for running the separator and for a hundred and one other duties. The duty on these is 25 per cent; there is a 10 per cent war exchange tax and an 11 per cent United States exchange. I give a tabulation of these figures as follows:

	Duty	Sales tax	Excise tax	War tax
Tractors	Free	None	None	10%
Combines	7½%	None	None	10%
Engines (washing machines)	25 %	8%	None	10%
Milking machines	10 %	None	None	10%
Cream separators	12½%			10%

On the washing machine that is used on nearly every farm, the machine operated with a small gas engine, the duty is 25 per cent; there is a 10 per cent war exchange tax and an 11 per cent exchange, or 46 per cent protection in all. Let us see just what is the accumulative effect of all this upon the price of a washing machine. In the first place, a machine which would cost $100 in the United States, with a duty of $25 would cost in Canada $125. The war exchange tax of 10 per cent would increase this to $137.50, and the regular exchange would bring it up to $151.25. So far it has cost $51 more for this machine in Canada than would be paid for it in the United States, but let us carry on a stage further. There is an 8 per cent sales tax on this machine which increases the cost to $163.45. The wholesaler or importer who brings in the machine will want a commission of 10 per cent, which would bring the cost to $179.34. The retailer's commission on this type of machine is at least 30 per cent, which brings the cost to $233.72. That is the total cost to the farm home in Canada. I do not know just how my hon. friend can justify the policy which has been followed by his government which has been in power in Canada during seventeen of the last twenty-two years. It seems to me that it is time something was done with regard to these additional costs which are placed on the agricultural industry of this country.

My hon. friends to my right know that from 1932 to 1935 the difference in exchange between the British pound and the Canadian dollar was something over 18 per cent; the British pound was worth only $3.86. At that time we were selling practically all our exports on the British market; we were not selling any beef on the United States market. Our beef, our pork and our exports of wheat and coarse grains were all going to Great Britain and we were getting only $3.86 to the pound.

We were losing fifteen cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat we sold from 1932 to 1937, when wheat in western Canada dropped to as low as twenty-three cents a bushel. We were losing three cents a pound on every pound of beef we exported and losing two cents a pound on our hogs when we were selling them for three cents a pound. Is it any wonder, then, that agriculture in western Canada is in the position in which it is to-day? What is taking place to-day? That is the basis on which we are doing our purchasing. Then, when we go to sell our agricultural products what happens? When we attempt to sell our beef to the United States we find that that market is closed to us and that our price is based on the ceiling price that has been set on beef in this country. When we try to sell our flax to the United States—again, the ceiling price; when we attempt to sell our coarse grains—again, the ceiling price. We do not get the advantage we would have if we could sell in the United States market, and in addition we lose the advantage of the exchange. To sum it up, on everything we purchase we pay the toll. When we sell, we sell on the basis of a fixed price at home. Agriculture cannot get into any better position than it is in to-day as long as those conditions continue, and I urge my hon. friend the member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) to continue to bring pressure on the government for the next twenty years and perhaps then something might be done about it.

I should like to say a word or two about the loans which we shall have to float during the coming year. We have to raise $2,750,000,000. That is a lot of money. It would not make so much difference, in my opinion, if all the people of Canada were able to subscribe equally to these loans because then we would simply owe the money to ourselves. But that is not the case and has never been the case. In the first victory loan floated the quota for Saskatchewan was set at $8,000,000 by some of the best financial experts we have in this dominion. It was their opinion that that was the amount of money which could be raised in that province. In the last loan, if the reports that came over the radio were correct, one mining company in Canada, International Nickel, subscribed $10,000,000. I ask hon. members, do they consider that we have a balanced economy in Canada when one mining company can subscribe more to a victory loan than the quota allotted to 870,000 people in the finest agricultural province of this dominion? It just does not make sense, and unless more of the people are able to subscribe to these loans, unless we can have a more equitable distribution of them, we shall have a very serious condition in Canada after this war.

I would point out that a very small proportion of these loans is being taken by our soldiers. How much are the 650,000 men who are in our armed forces able to subscribe to our war loans? A very small proportion. How much are the people engaged in agriculture able to subscribe? Again a very small proportion. How much are the men in the income groups below, say $1,500 a year able to subscribe to our war loans? They are able to buy war savings certificates and take the odd $50 or $100 bond, and that is about their limit. Yet the three groups I have just mentioned comprise approximately seventy per cent of the population of Canada. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the remaining thirty per cent of our population are buying seventy per cent of our loans; after this war is over, that thirty per cent, through their holdings of these loans and the interest which will have to be paid on them, will be able to command the services of the other seventy per cent of the population of Canada, and that seventy per cent will have to continue to pay tribute not only for one generation but for generation after generation. That is not a healthy condition in any country. It is not a healthy condition for our soldiers when they come back to have to find that for generations they will be paying interest on the loans for the war which they fought and won. These loans should be placed on a different basis. We should have interest-free compulsory loans levied according to the ability to subscribe of the great corporations and holders of wealth. That is the only way in which we shall obtain an all-out war effort in this country with equality of sacrifice.

Mr. WOOD: Does the hon. member realize that some of these large financial companies, like insurance companies, which have subscribed to the war loans, are simply investing the collective savings of the ordinary common people of this country?

Mr. MacINNIS: The widows and orphans again!

Mr. WRIGHT: I cannot see that the $10,000,000 which International Nickel subscribed has anything to do with the accumulated savings of the ordinary people of this country.

Mr. WOOD: There is nothing to prevent anybody from holding stock in International Nickel.

Mr. WRIGHT: The funds of some of our insurance companies represent the accumulated savings of our people, but that is not necessarily true of all of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: They get a lot of money from mortgages.

Mr. WRIGHT: If you look into the affairs of insurance companies you will find that the small policyholder is very often wiped out before he ever gets any benefit from his insurance. As a matter of fact, in Saskatchewan during the depression years I am sure that well over sixty per cent of the policyholders—

An hon. MEMBER: Ninety per cent.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am putting it conservatively when I say that sixty per cent of the small policyholders in Saskatchewan were wiped out. If we are to achieve the all-out war effort that we should have in Canada and that we can make, we shall certainly have to do something about some of these inequalities which exist in our system to-day.

On motion of Mr. Perley the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, March 15, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

ANGLO-AMERICAN CONSULTATIONS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave to move the adjournment of this house for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance. I refer to the matter of Canada's participation or non-participation in the present talks being carried on by representatives of the British government and the President and other officials of the United States.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under standing order 31 an hon. member desiring to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance rises in his place and gives notice and sends to the Speaker a statement of the reasons for his motion. The matter must be one of urgent public importance. If the matter is not in the opinion of the Speaker of such urgent public importance he may not put the motion to the house. In the suggestion made by the hon. member now I do not think there is such urgency as to justify the motion he has made; therefore I do not present it to the house.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SELECTIVE SERVICE—SINGLE MEN ON FARMS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Did the government authorize the director of selective service to announce that single men eligible for military training would be taken away from their farms in order to undergo military training?

2. If so, was this announcement broadcast by the C.B.C., and when?

3. Has the government authorized the same official to announce that single men as above mentioned, will be replaced on farms by unmarried men not qualified for military service?

4. If so, was this statement, (a) broadcast, (b) when, (c) over what network?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. No.

2. Not to the knowledge of the government and certainly not with the authority of the government.

3. No.

4. No.

PRAIRIE FARM INCOME BONUS—HOEY, SASK.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. Was the prairie farm income bonus paid to either Dr. F. P. Moreau or W. A. Boucher, of Hoey, Saskatchewan, or any member of their immediate family?

2. If so, what is the amount of the bonus paid?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN COLLIERIES LIMITED

Mr. O'NEILL:

1. Is any monetary assistance being given by the government to Canadian Collieries Limited, Dunsmuir, B.C.?

2. If so, on what basis and what amount has been paid to this company to date?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. (1) Assistance paid to Canadian Collieries (Dunsmuir) Limited in recovery of the cost of living bonus not covered by surcharge Sept. 1, 1941-Dec. 31, 1942, $74,373.88.

(2) Assistance under Order in Council P.C. 3971 of December 5, 1939 in respect to coal sold for ships' bunkers calendar year 1942, $103,950.96.

(3) Payment by emergency coal production board as an accountable advance for production subsidy for November and December 1942, $62,850. This covers losses incurred due to increased costs and increased wage scales.

CANADIAN ARMY (RESERVE)—MARRIED MEN UNDER THIRTY

Mr. GREEN:

1. Are married men under the age of thirty years eligible for enlistment in the reserve army?

2. If so, when was the change made which enables them to enlist?
3. Have there been any other changes since July 1, 1942, in the qualifications for enlistment in the reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Yes, provided they are not within the age classes designated by proclamation for military training under the national selective service mobilization regulations. Married men under the age of thirty years are therefore eligible for enlistment in the reserve army if

(a) they are between the ages of 17 and 19;

(b) born during the years 1917 to 1924, provided those born in 1924 have attained their nineteenth birthday and (1) they have been granted postponement of military training; or (2) they have been called but are found to be in a medical category below that prescribed as acceptable for military training under regulations made pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

(c) they were born prior to the year 1917;

(d) they belong to the classes of persons to whom the national selective service mobilization regulations do not apply, such as judges, clergymen, members of municipal police forces or fire brigades, etc.

(e) students undergoing approved military training under the national selective service mobilization regulations.

2. February 17, 1943—Canadian army order No. 86.

3. No. The only change made by Canadian order No. 86 was to provide that all married men born prior to 1917 are now permitted to join the reserve army, whereas previously those under the age of thirty were required to be in a medical category lower than "B".

INVENTIONS BOARD

Mr. SHAW:

1. When was the inventions board established?
2. Was this board established by act of parliament or by order in council?
3. Who are the members of the board?
4. What is the procedure with respect to the handling of proposals, suggestions, etc., submitted to the board?
5. How many have been submitted to the board since it was established?
6. How many have been accepted in whole or in part?
7. What is the usual procedure with respect to the compensating of persons whose inventions have been accepted?
8. Who are the members of the examining committee of the inventions board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. January 24, 1940.

2. Order in council, P.C. 239.

3. The acting president, National Research Council, Chairman; acting deputy minister, Department of National Defence (Navy); deputy minister, Department of National Defence (Army); deputy minister, Department of National Defence (Air).

4. Proposals relating to inventions that are received directly by the board or referred to it by government departments, are submitted to an examining committee for investigation. The committee endeavours to ascertain if the invention contains any feature of practical utility not already known to those responsible for the prosecution of the war and is empowered to seek the advice of appropriate scientific or military consultants. The consultants include members of the scientific staff of the National Research Council and specially qualified officers of the armed services. Inventions considered to be worthy of development are referred to appropriate government departments or other organizations. Inventions are rejected on the grounds of impracticability or lack of novelty, or because the invention, though sound, is not needed, is already in use, or would require too long a time to develop to the effective stage.

5. To December 31, 1942 the total number of inventions received was 10,424.

6. The inventions board is not empowered to accept inventions. Its functions are to examine inventions, reject impracticable and unsound proposals and to assess the value of promising ideas and place them before the appropriate government officers. From 10 to 15 per cent of the proposals received are of such evident merit that they must be referred to the appropriate panel of consultants before a decision can be reached regarding them. About four-fifths of the proposals now being received deal with ideas which have been previously considered by the board or that are of slight technical interest but of no immediate military value.

7. The department which accepts the proposal is responsible for making all necessary agreements.

8. The secretary of the board, Mr. H. V. Haight, Mr. P. L. Pouliot.

GORDON MURCHESON

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Is Mr. Gordon Murcheson an employee of the government?
2. If so, what is his position?
3. When was he appointed to this position?
4. What is his salary and allowances?
5. What was his former occupation and where?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes.

2. Director of soldier settlement, and director, Veterans' Land Act, 1942.

3. Appointed director of soldier settlement on March 1, 1938. Appointed director, Veterans' Land Act, with effect November 25, 1942.

4. $8,000 per annum for the combined positions. No allowances other than travelling expenses.

5. Chief executive officer of the Canadian Farm Loan Board for the province of Alberta at Edmonton.

WAR SAVINGS STAMPS AND CERTIFICATES—VICTORY BONDS—SALESMEN ON SALARY

Mr. GREEN:

1. How many persons in each province are in receipt of a monthly salary from the national war finance committee for the sale of war savings certificates, war savings stamps and/or victory loan bonds?

2. Are such persons engaged on a full time basis or are they at liberty to carry on some additional business or occupation?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1.

Province	Total personnel as at January 31, 1943
British Columbia	46
Alberta	27
Saskatchewan	43
Manitoba	22
Ontario	192
Quebec	112
New Brunswick	5
Nova Scotia	6
Prince Edward Island	2
Total	455

2. Of the above number, 78 persons are engaged on a part-time basis and are at liberty to carry on some additional business or occupation.

MOBILIZATION ACT—POSTPONEMENTS OR DEFERMENTS OF CALL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men of call-up age, by provinces and/or military districts, who are serving in the reserve army, have thereby secured deferment from call under the National Resources Mobilization Act, or have not been required to report for medical examination, or have been granted postponement?

2. Of these, how many hold, (a) commissioned rank, (b) non-commissioned rank, in the reserve army?

Mr. MITCHELL: To obtain the information to answer this question would involve an examination of the individual files in each mobilization administrative division which would necessitate a special staff and additional office space, neither of which is available. It is not considered in the national interest to undertake the work which would be involved in answering this question.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—PRICES AND SIZE OF NEWSPAPERS

Mr. TUSTIN:

Does the control of the price and size of newspapers come under the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; however newspapers have been exempted from section 7 of the maximum prices regulations since in general it is not possible to arrive at a common measurement of value for publications, nor to establish for the publishing business any general principle to determine what price increases should be permitted and what the extent of such increases should be.

The size of newspapers is not directly limited by the board but the supply of newsprint to publishers of newspapers is controlled by the wartime prices and trade board through the administrator of publishing, printing and allied industries.

SHACKLING OF WAR PRISONERS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are there at present any Canadians in shackles in German prison camps? If so, how many?

2. Have protests against this practice been made through neutral sources by the Canadian government?

3. If so, have any assurances been received that this practice will be discontinued?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The indications are that some prisoners of war are still shackled in German camps and those shackled include Canadian prisoners. Exact figures of the numbers involved are not available. Representations have been made through the Swiss government acting as protecting power, but it would not be in the interest of the prisoners themselves to indicate at this time the status of the negotiations.

TIMBER CONTROL—A. S. NICHOLSON

Mr. REID:

1. On what date did Mr. A. S. Nicholson become associated with the Department of Munitions and Supply?

2. On what date was he made timber controller?

3. What was the total amount paid him by way of salaries, expense account and living allowances?

4. On what date did he tender his resignation?

5. During the period of his association with the Department of Munitions and Supply, what amount of purchases were made through or by the Department of Munitions and Supply from Nicholson and Cates, Burlington, Ontario?

Mr. HOWE:

1. July 16, 1940.

2. Appointed assistant timber controller, July 16, 1940; appointed timber controller, June 15, 1941; appointed associate timber controller, Nov. 2, 1942.

3. No salary or allowance was paid to A. S. Nicholson but actual expenses from the date of his appointment, July 16, 1940 to January 19, 1943 to the amount of $17,072.76, were paid.

4. His resignation was tendered verbally and went into effect on January 19, 1943.

5. $87,259.47.

WOMEN'S LAND ARMY

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has Canada a women's land army?

2. If not, does the government contemplate the organization of one?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. In Ontario during the last three years the dominion and provincial governments, under the terms of a joint agreement, have organized various groups of women, including the women's land brigade; the farmerette brigade; the farm girls' brigade; the farm commando brigade; and the canning industries. This type of organization has proved most effective and is considered a more satisfactory and practicable method of organizing women farm workers, particularly in those provinces where the seasonal requirements fluctuate very extensively. A uniformed women's land army as such has not been organized.

2. Yes, in any province where this type of organization seems advantageous and is recommended by the provincial government.

DECENNIAL CENSUS—FAMILIES AND CHILDREN

Mr. DORION:

According to 1941 census, what is for each of the provinces, (a) the number of families, (b) the number of children, (c) the number of children of every family?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Preliminary figures from the 1941 Census based on a 10 per cent sample

(a)

Province	Total families
Canada	2,486,920
Prince Edward Island	21,370
Nova Scotia	128,730

PRICE CEILING—MILK

Mr. ROY:

What were the price ceilings per hundred pounds, of milk purchased in 1942 from producers by the distributors in the different zones in Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are no price ceilings on milk or butterfat sold by the primary producer to manufacturers or distributors. A producer is only affected by price ceilings when he sells milk or butterfat directly to the consumer.

NEWSPRINT PRODUCTION—SHORTAGE OF ELECTRIC HORSE-POWER

Mr. BRUNELLE:

What was the shortage of electricity in h.p. which caused the federal government to reduce newsprint production, in 1942, (a) in Ontario, (b) in Quebec, (c) in other provinces?

Mr. HOWE: To insure against shortages of power required for war production it was decided that power use would be required to be reduced:

(a) 200,000 h.p. in Ontario (Niagara system).

(b) 200,000 h.p. in Quebec.

(c) Nothing (not in shortage area).

SELECTIVE SERVICE—TRAINED PERSONNEL EMPLOYED BY DISTILLERS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Has the selective service department taken any steps to ascertain whether any of the distilleries in Canada are retaining more chemists and other trained personnel than are absolutely essential?

2. Have any steps been taken by selective service to ensure that such surplus personnel is being transferred to essential war industries?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, and it has been ascertained that there is no surplus. At the moment the distilling industry has asked for nineteen chemists or chemical engineers who have not been supplied.

STEEL CONTROL—SALE OF IRON FENCING

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Did any officer of the salvage department of the air force receive permission from the steel controller's office to sell by tender, or otherwise, any quantity of iron fencing on or about October or November, 1942?

2. From what office did this iron fencing come into possession of the air force?

3. To whom and for what price was the fencing sold?

4. Was this fencing shipped to Toronto?

5. Was the cartage paid by the seller or the purchaser?

6. What was the amount of cartage paid?

7. How many pounds of such material were sold?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. No. There was, however, a quantity of iron fencing accruing from the construction of the building on Cartier square which was referred to the scrap disposal branch, Department of Munitions and Supply, by the engineer in charge of the job for disposal. This was in accordance with procedure promulgated by the Department of Munitions and Supply as received by air force headquarters under cover of letter from the treasury office (salvage division) letter S.3592-A F.D.83 dated 3rd September.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

2. This iron fencing was authorized to be disposed of as indicated previously, by the deputy minister, Department of Public Works, province of Ontario.

3. To Louis Rubin, Esq., 42 Beatrice street, Toronto, under salvage minute 20913 for $167.50, later corrected by salvage minute 21409 and the addition of $44.89, making the final selling price $212.39.

4. Yes.

5. By the purchaser.

6. $58.33.

7. 12,680 pounds.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—PROPERTY INVESTMENTS AND BANK DEPOSITS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Did the foreign exchange control board require every person, firm or corporation to report property investments and bank deposits held in foreign countries?

2. If so, what is the total amount of investments held by Canadian banks in Cuba?

3. What is the total amount of investments, held by Canadians, other than banks, in Cuba?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The foreign exchange control order, which was passed on September 15, 1939, required that all foreign exchange and foreign securities in the possession, ownership or control of any resident of Canada (including Canadian firms and corporations) on that date be declared to the foreign exchange control board unless the board otherwise provided. For the purposes of the order, "foreign exchange" included any foreign currency and any bank balance or other deposit payable in any foreign currency; "foreign securities" included stock, shares, bonds, debentures, etc., issued by or on behalf of any government, municipal or other authority outside Canada or by any society, company or corporation whose head office is outside Canada.

By regulation the board provided that foreign exchange or foreign securities in the possession, ownership or control of any Canadian resident having a value not exceeding, in either case, $1,000 in Canadian currency need not be declared. No reports were required under the foreign exchange control order of property other than foreign exchange and foreign securities.

2. In the case of Canadian banks and insurance companies doing business outside of Canada, reports required by the foreign exchange control board related to the total assets and liabilities of such corporations in terms of each foreign currency, with a view to establishing the net capital investment, if any, outside of Canada. Details of their holdings of foreign securities by issues or countries were not obtained.

3. The returns made to the board disclose that on September 15, 1939, residents of Canada (other than Canadian banks and life insurance companies) held bonds of Cuban companies having a par value of $31,000 in U.S. funds and £18,667 and a relatively small amount of shares in Cuban companies. No information is available as to the value of these holdings.

REPORTS ON COBALT, LORRAINE AND GOWGANDA ARSENICAL ORES

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

What are the essential differences between the report on arsenical ores at Cobalt, Lorraine, and Gowganda, submitted by Mr. John A. Reid, M.E., to the metal controller within the last month and that submitted by Mr. Reid to the metal controller on or about the end of October, 1942?

Mr. HOWE: There is no essential difference in the two reports.

RADIO BROADCASTING—NEWS

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. What were the names of the news broadcasters over C.B.C. from November 1, 1942, to January 20, 1943, on the French and English networks, stations CBF, CBM, and CBV?
2. What was the salary of each?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. (a) Roger Baulu, Miville Couture, Georges Lambin, Marcel Ouimet, Marcel Paré, Marcel Sylvain—over stations CBF and CBV of the French network.

(b) Clarence Grant, Douglas Monk, Guy Vaughan, Lamont Tilden—over station CBM of the English network.

2. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises that it would not be in the interest of the corporation to give this information.

RADIO BROADCASTING—SKETCHES

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. What number of programmes (sketches) are broadcast by authority of the federal government over the English network of the CBC?
2. What is the name of each programme or sketch and the name of the commentator?
3. How many times weekly are these programmes broadcast?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1 and 2. The national war finance committee, Department of Finance, has requested the services of the CBC's network to broadcast the following programmes:

"Highlights for Today";
"They Tell Me";
"Soldier's Wife".

At the request of the Department of National Defence (Air), the R.C.A.F. is broadcasting over the CBC a "Quiz Show".

No commentators are attached to the above programmes.

2. (a) "Highlights for Today" is broadcast once weekly;

(b) "They Tell Me" is broadcast five times weekly;

(c) "Soldier's Wife" is broadcast five times weekly;

(d) "Quiz Show" is broadcast once weekly.

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. How many programmes or sketches are broadcast by government authority over the French network of the CBC?
2. What is the name of each programme or sketch and the name of the commentator?
3. How many times weekly are each of these programmes broadcast?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1 and 2. The following programmes are given by arrangement with the department indicated:

(a) "Le Courrier du Jour"—Wartime Prices and Trade Board, Department of Munitions and Supply;

(b) "La Métairie Rancourt" and "Notre Canada"—National War Finance Committee, Department of Finance;

(c) No commentators are attached to these programmes.

3. (a) "Le Courrier du Jour" is broadcast five times weekly.

(b) "La Métairie Rancourt" is broadcast five times weekly.

(c) "Notre Canada" is broadcast twice weekly.

GANARASKA RIVER WATERSHED

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Was a survey made recently of the Ganaraska river watershed?
2. If so, what are the findings and to what extent is the flooding of that river in springtime caused by the dams built and owned by private individuals and industrial corporations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The survey of the Ganaraska river watershed is still in progress, and only an interim report will be available at the end of the present fiscal year. The final report will include chapters on all the physical features of the area, and on all aspects of conservation and employment projects. At least one of these chapters will assemble such information as is available on the flooding of the river, both in the past and at present; but this chapter has not yet been written.

The survey is a cooperative project in which staff of the provincial government and of the dominion government are each making contributions; but the direction of the actual field survey, and the preparation of the final report, are in the charge of the chairman of the interdepartmental committee on conservation and rehabilitation of the Ontario government.

The objectives of the survey are referred to in P.C. 97/8097, September 9, 1942, which authorizes the dominion share of the financing, as follows:

(i) To ascertain in detail the measures and techniques needed for the rehabilitation of this deteriorated area.

(ii) To evaluate the amount of employment which can be provided by the conservation projects required to rehabilitate this area.

(iii) In general, to serve as a demonstration study and a yardstick by which other areas in Canada could be appraised for similar purposes.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CONTRACTS WITH PRINTING FIRMS IN MANITOBA

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. To what printing firms in the province of Manitoba has the king's printer, or any department of the government, let contracts, between April 1, 1941, and the present?

2. What are the amounts and the dates of such contracts?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

OFFICE ECONOMIES CONTROL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. On what date was Colonel John Thompson appointed director of government office economies control?

2. Do his powers extend to all departments of government? If not, what departments are excepted from his jurisdiction?

4. What is the value of purchases or expenditures made for, (a) furniture, (b) rugs, (c) other supplies, that did not receive the approval of the said director, or were purchased without requisitions having been first submitted to him for approval?

[Mr. Ian A. Mackenzie.]

FARM WORKERS IN WAR PLANTS

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many farmers and farm workers have been authorized to take work in war factories since October 31, 1942?

2. How many who have received such authorization have actually taken work in war factories?

3. Will any of those who have been granted such authorization be permitted to continue in factory work after April 1, 1943?

4. Who will have the final say as to whether or not a farmer or farm worker who has been authorized to engage in work other than farm work is essential to the work in the war plant?

5. How many applications have been received from such employees asking that they be permitted to remain in war plants?

6. How many applications have been received from employers of such persons asking that the employees be left in war plants?

7. How many farmers or farm workers who have taken work in war plants since October 31, 1942, have been authorized to remain in such war plants after April 1, 1943?

Mr. McCULLOCH:

Do soldiers, sailors and air force personnel in, (a) Great Britain, (b) Bermuda, (c) British West Indies, (d) Newfoundland, (e) Iceland, (f) or any place where they happen to be stationed outside of Canada, have to pay duty or any other charges on parcels forwarded them, post paid from Canada?

NATIONAL SEAMEN'S ASSOCIATION—H. N. MCMASTER—RIKER'S ISLAND INTERNMENTS

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. Has the government any information regarding the activities of H. N. McMaster and the national seamen's association, of which he claims to be the governor?

2. How many Canadian seamen have been interned on Riker's island as a result of representations made by the above named association?

3. Will the government investigate the past activities of this man and this association?

COST-OF-LIVING BONUS IN INDUSTRY AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. What is the maximum salary in private industry upon which the payment of a cost-of-living bonus is compulsory?

2. What is the maximum salary in government employment on which the payment of a cost-of-living bonus is compulsory?

3. What is the maximum salary in the civil service upon which the payment of a cost-of-living bonus is compulsory?

4. What are the reasons for these differences, if any?

ELDORADO REFINERY, PORT HOPE, ONT., GUARDS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. By whom are the guards at the Eldorado refinery in Port Hope hired and paid?
2. How many of such guards are employed at that plant?
3. Are they all discharged soldiers?
4. Are any of these guards liable for present military service?
5. Has the government granted any loans, or given any financial assistance, to this company for building, or equipment, or any other purpose?

NAVAL SERVICES—DEEP BROOK, N.S., PROPERTY

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has property been acquired for the Department of National Defence for Naval Services near Deep Brook, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, for what purposes was it acquired?
3. From whom was property purchased stating the acreage of each lot and the prices paid or offered each owner?
4. Were contracts entered into for improvements and buildings, if so, state names of persons or firms tendering and amounts of different tenders?
5. To whom were contracts let, stating the bases of contracts, the amount of same and the nature of the work contracted for?
6. What is the total expenditure to March 1, 1943; also the total estimated cost of completed project for, (a) land, (b) buildings, (c) grading and roadways, (d) drainage and water supply, (e) electric services, (f) wharves, (g) dredging, (h) furnishings and equipment, (i) other expenditures, (j) total?
7. Were any persons in training March 1, 1943, at Deep Brook, Nova Scotia, and what number were on the operating staff?
8. What number of persons is it planned to train at one time when completed; also how many will be on the staff?
9. What is the estimated annual operating cost when completed?

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—ADMINISTRATOR OF SHIPS STORES

Mr. STOKES:

1. Is D. R. Townsend administrator of ships stores under the wartime prices and trade board?
2. Is D. R. Townsend an officer or owner of shares in Townsend Company Limited, dealers in ships supplies of Montreal?
3. Did Townsend Company Limited supply all stores (deck, engine room and steward's provisions) to six Swedish ships that were loaded at the port of Saint John with Red Cross supplies for Greece this year?
4. Were orders issued by the agent of these ships at Saint John, N.B., that no firms were to submit prices to the masters of these ships for necessary stores required for ship's maintenance and provisioning of the steward's department while at that port, and if so, on whose authority were the orders issued?
5. Were Townsend Company Limited the only company allowed to supply these ships on previous loadings at Montreal?
6. Have Townsend Company Limited the sole privilege under the metal controller of supplying zinc boiler plates for use in steam boilers, both industrial and marine, at Montreal?

JAPANESE FISHING VESSEL DISPOSAL COMMITTEE

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has the Japanese fishing vessel disposal committee spent or incurred the spending of any sums of money beyond the $80,000 authorized for that purpose by P.C. 3737, dated May 5, 1942, for the payment of claims made upon the government for damage to vessels owned by persons of Japanese racial origin?
2. If so, to what extent and how was it authorized?
3. Are there any claims still outstanding or anticipated, or has the matter been closed?
4. If it were necessary to spend such large sums to put these boats into position for resale, were the expenses of so doing allocated to each individual owner and charged to him when sale was made and, if not, why not?
5. Order in council 6787, dated July 31, 1942, providing for the payment for claims for skiffs, lifeboats, galley equipment and personal effects, why was it necessary to make payments for the loss of any of these articles if they were actually on the boat at the time of the seizure and the boat was kept under complete government control and guard from that time until sale?
6. What is the amount of claims authorized under P.C. 6787?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ROAD BETWEEN TADOUSSAC AND LABRADOR MILITARY STATIONS

Mr. DORION:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the government, dated during the past two years, relating to the building of a road on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river between Tadoussac and the Atlantic military stations situated on Labrador coast.

Mr. RALSTON: I have no objection to the motion passing, Mr. Speaker, with a reservation in regard to any correspondence which it may not be possible to produce for reasons of security. As a mater of fact I do not think there is anything which cannot be produced, but I just want to make that formal reservation.

Motion agreed to.

UNDERPAYMENT OF WAGES ON DOMINION GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and memoranda, and other documents from November 1, 1941, to the present, exchanged between the Department of Labour, or any official of said department, and the Department of Labour of the province of Manitoba, Manitoba regional war labour board, the national war labour board, the Department of Justice, and any other departments or officials, relating to alleged underpayment of wages on dominion government contracts, as discovered and submitted by the Department of Labour of the province of Manitoba with respect to the following firms: Claydon Co., Ltd.; Rayner Construction Co., Ltd.; Tomlinson Construction Co., Ltd.; and Duff Construction Co., Ltd. Also for a copy of all correspondence and documents, dated from November 1, 1942, to the present, relating to any other cases of underpayment of wages on dominion government contracts which may have been reported to the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no objection to this resolution passing, except in regard to the last four lines, which read:

Also for a copy of all correspondence and documents, dated from November 1, 1942, to the present, relating to any other cases of underpayment of wages on dominion government contracts which may have been reported to the government.

It does seem to me that if the hon. member has knowledge of any particular case, he might list that case as he listed the others. It does not seem practicable to go on a fishing expedition, if I may put it that way, into the large volume of correspondence we receive in the Department of Labour in connection with matters of this kind.

Motion agreed to.

COLONEL JOHN THOMPSON

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence and requisitions of Colonel John Thompson with the Department of Public Works in his capacity (a) as chairman of the board of pension commissioners and also of the Canadian pension commission from 1919 to 1924, and (b) as dominion franchise commissioner, first, for his office and its personnel; second, for furniture and other accessories, stationery, etc., since 1919, as well as all correspondence and memoranda of the Department of Public Works on the same subject.

REGINA, SASK., BUILDINGS PURCHASED AND OFFICE SPACE RENTED BY DOMINION GOVERNMENT

Mr. BENCE:

1. For a list of all the buildings purchased by the government, or its agencies, in the city of Regina since the commencement of the war, together with the following information in each case, (a) the name of the vendor, (b) the selling price, (c) complete description of the property acquired, (d) the purpose for which the property was used immediately prior to purchase, (e) the assessed value placed thereon by the city of Regina, (f) the purpose for which each building is used.

2. A list of all the buildings and other space presently rented by the government, or its agencies, in the city of Regina with the following information, (a) the name of the landlord, (b) the purpose for which each building and other space is used, (c) the date of the first leasing by the government, or its agencies, (d) the yearly rental, (e) complete description of the property, (f) the value as placed thereon by the city of Regina, (g) the length of the lease and whether there is a termination clause.

Mr. BENCE: With the consent of the house I should like to have the word "assessed" inserted before the word "value" in clause (f) of paragraph 2.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): That is probably the only information we would not have in the department; that would originate in the city of Regina. I am not sure that we have the assessed values of those properties.

Mr. GRAYDON: If you have it you should give it.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion as amended?

Mr. BENCE: Subject to the change in wording.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS AND AUTHORITY OF E. M. LITTLE, FORMER DIRECTOR OF NATIONAL SERVICE

Mr. BENCE:

For a copy of all orders in council relating to the powers and authority of Mr. E. M. Little, former director of national selective service, at the time of his resignation from the government service.

AMNESTY TO FARMERS' SONS OF MILITARY AGE

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, memoranda, and other documents, in the possession of, (a) all departments of war services, and (b) the Department of Labour, with reference to an amnesty project applicable to farmers' sons of military age.

Mr. MITCHELL: This will be subject to the usual reservation, that privileged documents, from officials to the minister, will be excepted.

Motion agreed to.

AMNESTY TO FARMERS' SONS OF MILITARY AGE—MEMORANDUM OF CLAUDE MELANÇON

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of memorandum of Mr. Claude Melançon, of the selective service, with reference to an amnesty project applicable to farmers, and sons of farmers of military age.

Mr. MITCHELL: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a privileged document. It is a memorandum, if such exists, addressed to the minister from an official of the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there such a memorandum?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know.

Motion dropped.

RIGHT HON. ANTHONY EDEN

VISIT TO THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA—QUESTION OF HIS ADDRESSING MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I note that an item appearing in the press indicates that the British Foreign Secretary, the Right Hon. Anthony Eden, may very shortly honour Canada with a visit. Is the Prime Minister in a position to tell the house when he may be expected in Ottawa, and whether or not it is the government's intention to invite him to speak to the members of the House of Commons?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was advised some weeks ago that it was the intention of the Right Hon. Anthony Eden, Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, to visit the United States, and that at the time of his visit to the United States he would also visit Canada. Since Mr. Eden's arrival in Washington I have been in communication with him to ascertain just when we may expect the honour of his visit to our country. The Foreign Secretary is not in a position to say at once how long he may be in the United States before coming to Canada. I think the time may possibly be a fortnight. I have already extended an invitation to Mr. Eden to address the members of the House of Commons from the floor of the house, when he visits Ottawa, should he find it possible to do so.

QUESTION AS TO FOREIGN SECRETARY APPEARING BEFORE CERTAIN HOUSE COMMITTEES

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): May I thank the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Graydon) for asking the question I was going to ask. Might there not be the possibility not only of Mr. Eden's addressing this honourable chamber but also of his appearing, either as a witness or otherwise, before the special committee on post-war reconstruction or the standing committee on international relations?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us win the war first.

Mr. HANSELL: If we do not win the peace we certainly shall not have won the war.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be pleased to bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom, and will let him know of the hon. member's desire to have him appear before a committee of this house. I imagine however that the Foreign Secretary will have many engagements, and I cannot say how much time he may have to spend in Ottawa. I know his desire will be to stay as long as his time will permit.

WHEAT

TAXING OF POOLS—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER AS TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), of which I have given notice? Has the department reached a decision with reference to the matter of taxing the wheat pools of western Canada? If so, what decision has been reached?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The matter of asking questions on the orders of the day was discussed last week. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has now asked whether the Minister of National Revenue is in a position to make a statement respecting policy in his department. This is a question of the kind which I have said hitherto should be placed on the order paper. I should like to state more clearly what the position is respecting questions asked on the orders of the day.

The attention of the house ought to be drawn to the growing practice of asking, when the orders of the day are called, oral questions which should be placed on the order paper.

We must not forget that putting questions to the ministers at that phase of the day's proceedings is not allowed here by any rule, whilst in the United Kingdom house an hour is set aside for questions under a special standing order, which also requires that——notice of any such question must appear at latest on the notice paper circulated on the day before that on which an answer is desired.

On that point May, at page 243, says:

After private business has been disposed of, and not later than three o'clock on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays, the Speaker calls on the members who have given notices of questions to which oral answers are desired, but no questions can be taken after a quarter to four o'clock, except questions which have not been answered in consequence of the absence of the minister to whom they are addressed, and questions which have not appeared on the paper, but which are of an urgent character and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business. As each member is called, he rises to ask the question, standing in his name; but in case the member responsible for a question does not answer to the Speaker's call, a minister may rise and make such statement upon the question as the public interest demands.

As long as our standing orders are unchanged, the only questions permitted on the orders of the day being called must be confined to very urgent matters, personal explanations, inaccurate reports of speeches delivered in the house, denial of charges, dilatoriness in obtaining returns, or other similar matters closely connected with the routine business of the house. These questions must be brief and must not be prefaced by any argument. Standing order 44 gives members ample opportunity to place on the order paper any number of questions they desire with respect to public affairs. Reading telegrams, letters or extracts from newspapers as an opening to a question when the orders of the day are called is an abuse of the rules of the house. It is not good parliamentary practice to communicate written allegations to the house and then to ask ministers either to confirm or to deny them. It is the member's duty to ascertain the truth of any statement before he brings it to the attention of parliament. This has been decided long ago in the United Kingdom House of Commons. On June 14, 1882, Mr. Speaker Brand, in preventing a member from reading a telegram from a newspaper and founding a question on it, pointed out the extreme inconvenience of founding questions on every telegram in every newspaper. "I am bound to say," he added, "that it does appear to me that before questions of such gravity are put, an hon. member should take some measures to ascertain the truth of the telegram." This quotation is from Denison's and Brand's Decisions, page 230.

I feel it is my duty to explain to the house the procedure with regard to questions, and I hope that in applying it I shall have the cooperation of all members of the house.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): On the point of order which has just been discussed, may I point out to Your Honour that I am not asking the minister for a statement of policy; I am asking him if a decision has been reached with reference to a matter of interpretation of law. I would point out to Your Honour also that the matter of urgency is present, because the question of issuing interim dividends is involved and the decision which has been reached by the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Justice is important.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: What I have stated already with regard to the question asked by the hon. member, and which I quoted at the beginning of my remarks as I had heard it, was that he was asking for a statement from the minister with regard to the assessment of cooperative elevators. Am I correct in that?

Mr .DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Prima facie there seems to be no doubt that a question such as this is a matter of perhaps anxious consideration, shall I say, on the part of the minister, but the minister should not be required to give a ruling on a question on the floor of the house at this stage of the proceedings. It is true that the hon. member has asked that a statement be made as to what the decision was, if such has been arrived at; yet that question could be included and placed on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just say a word on this point? My understanding of the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn is a little at variance from that of Mr. Speaker. My understanding is that the hon. member for Weyburn simply asked the minister if he was in position to answer a question which previously had been propounded to the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: Every hon. member has a perfect right to ask that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition did not get the question as I obtained it from the hon. member for Weyburn. His question was: Is the minister in position to make a statement with regard to the assessment of cooperative elevators. I think he confirmed that when I asked him.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that that was predicated upon a question which had been asked previously.

Mr. SPEAKER: It was not so phrased. I have already given my ruling and the house will of course recognize it. As I said before, these questions are always difficult for the Chair to decide upon, but I have reason to believe that I shall receive the cooperation of all hon. members of the house in endeavouring to apply this procedure.

NORTH AFRICAN CAMPAIGN

PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR DUFFERIN-SIMCOE AT MEETING OF DOMINION PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to refer to a report in a Toronto paper of the speech made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) at the annual meeting of the Dominion Progressive Conservative association on Saturday. The portion of the report to which I should like to refer reads:

Canadian military officers wished to send a contingent to participate in the North African campaign but lack of reinforcements prevented it, Hon. W. Earl Rowe, M.P., hinted at the annual meeting of the Dominion Progressive Conservative association held here to-day.

"To-day we have the humiliation of listening to rumours that many military officers wanted our forces to enter the African battles but it was not possible because there were not sufficient reinforcements over there," said Mr. Rowe.

I just want to say that the statement or the rumour or the suggestion that it was not possible for Canadians to participate in North Africa because of insufficient reinforcements is without foundation in fact. The composition of the force for North Africa was determined by those who had the responsibility for allied strategy in Europe and who were in a position to judge what employment of allied troops, both for these and for other tasks, would best serve the common cause. From personal inquiries which I made when I was over there I am quite satisfied that their decision in respect to the composition of this force was based upon that principle.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of Your Honour's ruling of a moment ago that anyone raising a question in the house shall first of all verify the truth of the statement involved, I was wondering if the minister had gone to that trouble.

Mr. RALSTON: I assumed at least that the newspaper was truthfully stating what the hon. member had said. I indicated that I had verified that the statement he made was not correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think he made the statement.

TRANSPORT SERVICES

INCONVENIENCE TO TRAVELLING PUBLIC IN GETTING SEATS ON DAY COACHES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud) a matter which is causing a great deal of inconvenience to the travelling public at the moment. I sent him a notice that I would do so to-day. I do not wish any remarks I may make to be considered as criticism of the railways, whose task at the moment is a tremendous one,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. BRUCE —but the travelling public are experiencing a great deal of inconvenience.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: I am coming to the question in a moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member is asking a question he may not preface it with a statement of fact or anything that is argumentative. He should simply ask the question; and I expect him to follow this procedure.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to know if some arrangement could not be made so that passengers travelling on the day coaches will have an opportunity of getting a seat when they get into those coaches. At the present time there is a mad scramble—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —to get to the entrance and on to the train, which is unseemly and dangerous to the public.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): I shall make it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

MILITARY SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO TRACING OF DRAFT EVADERS BY ASSOCIATED CREDIT BUREAUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): On Friday last the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) quoted the following paragraph from a weekly publication:

Tasks of tracing evaders is to be carried on by Associated Credit Bureaus of Canada Limited, an organization with some 58 offices across the country.

My comment on that was that there was no truth in it. Actually the answer I gave my hon. friend was correct, because we have not made any definite arrangements with the Associated Credit Bureaus of Canada or any similar organization to trace evaders under the National Resources Mobilization Act. It is a fact, however, that consideration is being given to the possibility of using any organization there may be in Canada already established for tracing the addresses of people who cannot be found. The national selective service officials are studying the matter, and if a plan of this kind can be developed usefully and with less expense to the dominion government it certainly will be given careful consideration. It goes without saying that we are using every possible avenue to trace those who may be delinquent under the National Resources Mobilization Act. We are making use of the names compiled by credit agencies, street directories, telephone directories and in fact any other information available. Up to the present this work has been done by special staffs employed for this purpose. If we find that we can use existing agencies effectively and with less expense we will do so.

It is my desire at all times to give hon. members of this house all the information I can, and the correct information. Therefore in fairness to the hon. member for Lake Centre, I felt I should make this statement to the house.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, March 12, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can be charged with having taken up too much time of the house this session, but as you accorded me the adjournment of the debate on Friday last I should like to make a few observations and one or two constructive suggestions on the budget.

This is a war budget. We might be asked, what are we going to do about it? So far as the opposition is concerned I think the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) set out clearly what we are going to do about it. Since no amendment was moved by the opposition, this budget of course is going through so far as we are concerned. The hon. member for Danforth reviewed in detail and in a very moderate tone the proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and offered some constructive suggestions. I commend his speech to every reader of Hansard in Canada. Since he covered the subject so well it remains for me only to refer to the budget in so far as it affects the province of Saskatchewan, one of the constituencies of which I have the honour to represent.

Like every other budget, this one contains some good features and others that are not so good. The minister budgeted for a deficit, not for a surplus. But we are at war, and that deficit will have to be met in some way. It may be taken up by the people in loans, and perhaps a supplementary estimate will also be brought down. But the winning of the war is the first and all-important thing for this house to consider. I am sure that the Canadian people are willing to pay any taxes that may be necessary and do anything within reason to win the war.

The Minister of Finance in presenting his budget said that his income tax proposals contained no very great changes. But when you come to dissect those proposals, Mr. Speaker, you find that we have to pay two and a half years' income taxes within two years and that $105,000,000 more is to be extracted from the people of Canada this year, at the same rate of taxation, than was taken from them last year. As I have said, the people of Canada are willing to pay any taxes that may be necessary, but certainly they want to be assured that in the expenditure of this money there will be no extravagance and no graft and that every cent will be expended carefully.

There are three main problems before the country. First there is labour; second, the soldier; and third, industry. Much has already been said and more will be said about labour; therefore I shall not dwell on that; suffice it to say that labour undoubtedly has the right of association and the right to organize. Labour has also the right, and the people of Canada expect it of them, to give a full day's work for a full day's pay, and to receive fair treatment. I shall refer to labour a little later in connection with the farm labour shortage.

Next is the problem of the soldier, not only the soldier in the armed forces here and overseas, and the question of reinforcements, but the question of taking care of the soldiers when they return from the war.

Industry is the third factor, and I refer to agriculture in particular because I think it plays the most important part in the industrial life of Canada to-day. The minister said that so far as taxes are concerned the farmer does not fare too badly. I shall refer to that later. What I wish to say at the moment is that both during the war—and it is not ended by any means; nor is the end even in sight—and during the reconstruction period more will be expected of agriculture than of any other industry. Agriculture up to the present has met every demand made upon it and will continue to do so, but the most serious obstacle to the production programme which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has asked the farmers of Canada to carry out is the man-power shortage, which demands immediate consideration and a prompt solution. The price problem also looms large. If the lack of man-power shackles the farmer, unsatisfactory prices must weaken his desire to produce. So, Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious problem.

In this connection the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) referred to an order in council passed recently, P.C. 246. Hon. members will find his statement in Hansard of February 26. One would judge from that, that the Minister of Labour was going to follow the principle on which the Minister of Agriculture acted on March 23, a year ago, when by order in council he froze farm labour. The Minister of Labour is going along practically the same lines. I wish these two ministers would get together, because if the policy which the Minister of Labour enunciated the other day is not carried out any better than was the order in council of the Minister of Agriculture last year, we shall continue in the same mess we are in to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: If I may correct my hon. friend, the regulations of a year ago were brought in by the then minister of war services.

Mr. PERLEY: But the Minister of Agriculture took all the credit. There is one satisfaction I have in speaking to this house, that before very long I have the Minister of Agriculture rising to object.

Mr. GARDINER: Because you were wrong.

Mr. PERLEY: The farmer is working under serious difficulties. To no class has the war brought more production problems than it has to the farmer. At the present time, as we all know, he can get scarcely any new machinery. Even repairs are difficult to get. This may be on account of war production. Shortages of labour, gasoline and tires are some of his headaches. He cannot compete in the matter of wages with war industry. So I say there are many problems brought about by the war with which the farmer is confronted. Some hold that his difficulties would be solved by an increase in the price of farm products; but the situation to-day is such that the farmer does not know whether he will be able to continue in business.

Let me at this point make a brief comparison between the position of the Canadian farmer and that of his cousin across the line. I recently brought to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) the fact that when the quota restrictions over there were lifted, wheat went to $1.50 and oats to the highest price in eighteen years. In the last three weeks under their new regulations they sold a hundred million bushels of wheat. The farmers over there have a storage allowance of one cent per bushel per month for seven months for grain stored on their farm, and advances have been made to them in respect of the grain stored there. What have we in Canada? Our farmers are still under the quota restrictions: wheat remains at 90 cents, and for oats 51½ cents is the limit. There is no farm storage allowance, and no advance against grain within the quota still undelivered, on the farm. This is not fair to our farmers. What has brought about the increase of price in the United States? In three days the United States houses and mills bought fifteen and a half million bushels of wheat on the Winnipeg market. The situation was so serious that the minister called an emergency meeting of the Canadian wheat board,—one of whose members, I regret to say, passed away on Friday last. I should like the minister to make a statement as to what is to be done. What are the circumstances under which the Americans are buying this wheat? Why is it going over there?

I come now to the debt burden of the western farmer. Under our quota delivery system, the creditor, whether a loan company or any land owner who has leased land to a tenant, gets one-third of the crop delivered under the quota; I refer to the undeliverable portion of one-third of the crop which is grown on the farm. But the loan company should not be allowed to charge the farmer interest on the amount or value of the undelivered portion. He would deliver it if he could; and I hope this grievance will be rectified as a result of the conference which is now being held in Ottawa. I hope too that the conference will result in some arrangement respecting the handling of farm debts in the west. I suggest, without going into detail regarding the situation in each of the prairie provinces, that a permanent board of review be established with power to adjust, either up or down, the payments which any farmer has to make in a given year. I would give the board blanket power to cover the province—I speak now particularly of Saskatchewan—in any one year to meet circumstances such as a general crop failure, and I would recommend that their rulings apply to all farmers, not to individuals, as they generally do.

Another suggestion I would make with respect to debt adjustment is this. For years I have consistently urged in this house that if the government had written off the debt arising from soldier settlement in respect of the last war, the country would have saved money. I advocate that as part of the proposed debt adjustment the soldier settlers' debts be written off. I have a letter from one district in which, of the twelve original soldier settlers, only one remains, and he is making a great effort to carry on. After all, this concession would do no more than repay these men in some small measure for what they are doing in the present war. Their sons were the first to enlist and their daughters have followed—they are in the army too. Many of these settlers have left the farms to join the reserve forces or are members of the home guard. Their wives are carrying on with Red Cross work, preparing parcels for overseas, and engaging in other war activities in their districts. After all, the amount of the write-off would be comparatively small.

Mr. McNIVEN: What would you do for those who have already paid for their land?

Mr. PERLEY: That is one of the things which would remain to be considered—what we should do for the others.

Let me now refer briefly to the matter of parity prices. I believe this principle should be adopted at once. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and I introduced a resolution two years ago calling for the enactment of this principle, and I have now on the order paper a resolution on the subject. I believe farm prices, particularly the prices of grains, should be adjusted in relation to the farmer's costs of production. I will not read my resolution, because time is short, but will simply say that because of the important part which wheat plays in our national economy, there should be taken into consideration the setting of an initial price of $1.10, as a step towards a parity price. I would then set the domestic price at $1.25, and I would pay storage for grain remaining on the farm which comes within the quota; also I would make an advance on grain still on the farm coming within the balance of the deliverable quota, up to seventy-five per cent of its value. That has been my stand for years.

[Mr. Perley.]

In 1938 I moved in this house a resolution calling for a thorough consideration of prices from the long-term point of view, and suggesting one dollar for wheat. I was right, and those in authority are beginning to see it now. It is a matter of satisfaction to me that the federation of agriculture has approved the figure of one dollar, with $1.35 for wheat required for domestic consumption, and has made representations accordingly to the government. The pools ask for that. The grain men go a little further. I contend that so far as the domestic price is concerned there is no sound argument against it. We have the principle adopted to a certain extent in the processing tax. It has to come.

In a copy I have before me of the Leader Post, reference is made to the Votes and Proceedings of the Saskatchewan legislature, and to the fact that a Liberal member there, Mr. Danielson, moved in the house a resolution of which this is part.

> That it is essential to the economic welfare of Saskatchewan that production of wheat be recognized as our major source of income and that the federal government be urged to accept through the Canadian Wheat Board no less than 280 million bushels of wheat at parity prices with an initial advance of not less than $1 a bushel.

It is with some satisfaction I see these men catching up, but they are several years late. I hope the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) and other western men will support my resolution when it comes up. They are closer to the government than I am and may be able to convince the cabinet. I know what some will say when we take up this resolution. The hon. member for Moose Jaw will say, what are you going to do with the surplus? I venture to say that before this debate closes there will be many pages of Hansard setting out figures with respect to our crop production and surpluses, how they have disappeared in other years, how they may disappear now. These figures are so much eyewash. The principle of parity prices is there and this surplus need not cause any worry. I am not a pessimist. If the war ended to-morrow this surplus would disappear inside of six months. If the war ends next year the surplus may prove a blessing, because it will be needed to feed nations who are fighting beside us. I am not worrying about the surplus.

Another important matter, that of reconstruction, has been pretty well discussed, so that I shall not go into it now.

As to social security, the best form of it is an opportunity to work and an incentive to save, so that people may make sure of their own security. When the men come back from the war we shall have to be ready to give them employment, to reestablish them. Many of them were high school students or graduates of universities who never had a job. When they come back our economic system must be so managed that we can provide them with food, clothing and work. There must be no lapse of time between their discharge and their finding full employment at reasonable remuneration. Here again much will be expected of agriculture; it is one industry that can do much in absorbing these men. Many of the men will go back to their farms and take up farming as their life work. When we realize the contribution the farm makes every year to the national income it is something worth considering. Having regard to what has been done during the last two or three years in meeting the demands for increased production of animal products and other forms of food, and the contribution to the national income that the farmers have made, it is regrettable that they receive only about fifteen per cent of it in return.

I have a suggestion to make to meet this reconstruction period. It is that a thorough survey be made in Saskatchewan as to the possibilities of improving agriculture and farm as well as urban homes. The adoption or application of the housing scheme might be considered, as well as the question of power equipment for the farm home. Why should not every farm home, wherever it is possible, have electric light, refrigeration, and conveniences of the kind? There is also the possibility of developing power from our rivers and coal fields, as referred to by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in this house on many occasions. Such a survey could do much towards providing employment for these men when they come back. There is the development of our oil fields and tar sands. I venture to say that in five minutes I could name five men as a board to make such a survey, and they could put 200,000 men to work in two months after the war in that province. These would be practical men who would do a job. The farms could easily absorb 100,000 men. I could mention also reforestation and roadbuilding. It appears to me that the government is not very anxious to have some of our natural resources developed as they should be, some of our products processed as they should be. The other day I asked the Minister of Agriculture if he had received a report from a Mr. Roston, who was head of a large power alcohol plant in eastern Europe, with respect to the utilization of agricultural products in Canada. He said he had had a conversation with him and in a certain roundabout way had a report on this work from a Mr. Monahan. That report evidently might be of value to us.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Chicago Tribune of February 13, 1943, reporting a statement made by one William J. Hale, of Minneapolis, who is research consultant for the Dow Chemical Company, of Midland, Michigan. He charges that an unpublicized reciprocal trade treaty had been made with South American nations providing for the destruction of all United States synthetic rubber plants after the war, which was the real reason for the reluctance of many companies to start rubber production. He went on to say:

> We have signed an agreement in South America saying all plants built to make synthetic rubber will be wrecked after the war. . . .

He said that the rubber industry's birthright had been signed away. I am not going to read it all, but it is an interesting article. If such a thing is going on, does this government know anything about it? Does this government know of any agreement to destroy these synthetic rubber plants? Has it had any part in such agreements? I should like them to answer some of the questions put on the order paper with respect to the synthetic rubber plant that is proposed to be built at Sarnia. Under what conditions is that plant to be built? Is it receiving any government assistance, and do they know anything about this agreement I have just mentioned?

Now I come to the income tax as it applies to the farmer. During the course of his address the minister said the farmer's tax had been eased in that it was proposed to enable a loss to be carried forward two years, so that if a farmer suffered a loss in 1942 he could charge it against the 1943 or 1944 tax. This is a step forward, and I commend the minister for having taken it, but I suggest that he is a little late, since last year that concession was given other businesses but was not extended to agriculture. In a return tabled not long ago it was stated that only 1,488 farmers in Canada had paid income tax last year, to an amount of $150,000 or an average of practically $100 each. There are 750,000 farmers in Canada, of whom approximately 150,000 are in Saskatchewan. I am going to offer a suggestion with respect to these farm incomes, because the tax collected really does not make it worth while bothering 750,000 farmers. I am going to suggest that the farmer, especially the farmer of western Canada, be allowed to charge as part of his operating cost a fair wage paid to his wife and daughters and young sons who help him on the farm. I am going to go even further. If the minister will not consider taking that action, I am going to ask that every farmer in Canada be given exemption from the payment of income tax unless he can show $2,000 of a net income. These are two points I should like the government to take into consideration. I have received many letters asking me to bring them forward. Why should not the farmer be exempt? Industry is working on a cost plus basis; and compare the lot of the farmer with that of the salaried civil servant here in Ottawa. Why should not the farmer be exempt up to $2,000? I would remind the house that in many cases industries are writing off their capital investments in three years, and I believe the farmer should be given greater consideration along this line than he is receiving at present.

I come now to a matter which has been mentioned already in the house, the question of taxing cooperative dividend payments, or what are called patronage dividends. I trust the government will not consider imposing a tax upon the cooperatives of western Canada. The attitude of the Saskatchewan pool, which is the largest cooperative organization in the west, is that these dividends should not be taxed until they have been distributed to the individuals, who then would have to consider them as part of their income. I could place on record the position taken by the representatives of the pools in this connection, but without doing that I trust the government will not consider the imposition of a tax of this kind.

Only a very small percentage of the revenue that will be raised through taxation will be returned to the farmer. The Minister of Agriculture has even reduced his estimates this year, and in some particulars I agree that this should be done. On the other hand, however, we had the announcement the other day of the setting up of a subsidies board, and it will be recalled that I asked the minister about this matter when it was first mentioned in the press, before he made his statement to the house. In the light of the statement of the Minister of Finance, however, in which it was estimated that nearly $60,000,000 will go to the producers this year, I venture to say that if they took only half that amount and added it to the price of grain in Canada, which on a 280,000,000 bushel quota would mean 10 cents a bushel, that would do more for agriculture generally than all the subsidies you could think of, having in mind all the boards and machinery that will have to be set up to carry out the administration of those subsidies. When the Minister of Agriculture provides for more boards to operate in western Canada, with priority on gasoline, tires and so on, it looks to me like an election year, and we think we know what we will be seeing out there this summer.

I should like to refer briefly to the subamendment, which asks that old age pensions be increased, that our banks be nationalized, and so on. I take off my hat to no hon. member of this house in my advocacy of adequate pensions for the old, for widows and for the dependents of soldiers now in the armed forces. I have been consistent in my attitude in this regard, and I still support these pensions. I might not vote for the subamendment, because it involves other matters as well, but in any case I have made my position clear on that point.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, all I am pleading for is a fair deal to agriculture, particularly in the prairie provinces. I hope the government will take some action in regard to the man-power mess that now confronts us. During the short time I have been speaking I have advanced seven constructive suggestions: (1) an increase in the price of wheat to bring it more nearly to parity level; (2) a domestic price; (3) a permanent board to review the debt of the province of Saskatchewan each year, with blanket authority to deal with the matter; (4) farmers to be allowed to charge to the cost of operation a wage allowance for their wives and daughters and young sons; (5) exemption of the farmer from the income tax; (6) the debt of soldier settlers to be written off; (7) bonuses and subsidies and boards to be discontinued and half the amounts set aside in the estimates for such purposes to be added to the price of our farm commodities. One or two of these suggestions are new, and I hope they will receive consideration. I could take some considerable time to deal with matters such as price spreads, and so on, but they have been dealt with already this year.

Let me say in closing that no matter what may be our political differences we should now get down to work and devote every possible effort to the winning of this war. Let us do everything we can to see to it that when the time comes our men fighting on land and sea and in the air will be reinforced by trained men, fully equipped and properly fed and clothed, so that in years to come we may have no regrets in connection with what we did in the year 1943. And may we be proud of the fact that we have placed Canada in the forefront of the united nations and of the empire, a place where it truly belongs.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I pay tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for the budget he has brought down, both as to its content and as to its method of presentation. Canada is indeed fortunate in having the present minister in charge of its finances during this time of stress. Financial measures are now such that we have a very large section of our population in the taxpaying class. There has been a great extension in this field.

Very little has been said in the debate about the commendable attitude of these taxpayers in meeting their obligations, as they have done in the last two years. I should like also to say a word of appreciation of the voluntary organizations, and the churches of all denominations, which have done so much war work and have done it so well. It seems to me that so many have done so much work in this time with so little expression of appreciation from any source.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to some matters concerning the administrative arm of the government. In recent years the trend has been for that administrative arm to become more and more important, and this trend has been accelerated since the outbreak of war. To-day the Canadian government is the largest employer in Canada. The civil service generally has done a magnificent piece of war work. It is interesting to note that we do not hear anything about absenteeism when we discuss this class of war workers. There are, however, some matters concerning them which I feel should receive immediate attention and correction. The act setting up the civil service commission comes directly under the supervision of the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), and he is responsible for its administration. But his authority over the civil service generally seems to stop there, and we have a situation wherein the public service generally is not directly under the control of any minister of the crown.

Under the guise of controlling expenditures, the treasury board has gradually and continuously extended its authority over the personnel of the civil service, and has done this without giving the civil service any right of appeal, either to the treasury board or from its decisions. From time to time the Minister of Finance has dealt with matters affecting employer-employee relations in the public service. His responsibilities in this connection however are not clear. At the present time I believe we have the most competent minister of finance we have had since confederation; and yet, with due deference to him, I suggest he ought not to be expected to deal with administrative matters affecting the civil service generally. They ought more properly to be dealt with by one of the other ministers who is not carrying the direct responsibility of a war portfolio. Either the authority of the Secretary of State should be clarified and enlarged, or that authority should be given to some other minister of the crown.

I have always held the view that the relationship between the dominion government as an employer and the civil service as a group of employees should serve as a model in labour or employer-employee relations for the country at large. In many respects long strides have been taken in the public service. In 1908 we had the adoption of the competitive system of appointments and promotions. That met with considerable opposition at the time of its adoption, and indeed at the present time there is still some little opposition to it. In 1924 we had the adoption of the present Civil Service Superannuation Act, which is probably the greatest boon ever given the public service in Canada. These two measures are indeed worthy of a model relationship. In some other respects, however, we have not gone forward. We are now at a point where there is some danger of these advances being to a very great extent nullified—nullified by the extension of treasury board control over the individual personnel of the service. It seems to me that this control by the treasury board is indirect control without direct responsibility.

There are many matters I could mention in this relationship as requiring attention. For purposes of illustration I shall deal only with four of them. I choose these four, not necessarily because they are the most important, but because perhaps they will better illustrate my point. The first matter has to do with what is known as the permanent-temporary quota system. Normally any person appointed by the civil service commission to a permanent position is given permanent appointment after serving a probationary period. The first serious interruption in this procedure came in 1932, when, by an order in council supplemented by a treasury board minute, the appointment of permanent employees was arbitrarily prevented, notwithstanding the nature of the work being done. That condition continued until July, 1935, when the ban on permanency was lifted.

The consequences of keeping an employee in a temporary category are grave. Apart from certain dislocations which must take place in the service there are two main consequences affecting such employee. One is that he cannot compete for promotion. He may have served many years in a temporary category; he may be the best employee for a certain kind of work, but notwithstanding these facts he is ineligible for promotion to the senior position next above the one he holds, in the event of its becoming vacant. The permanent employee, who may be doing inferior work, gets the promotion. In addition the temporary employee has not the right to contribute to the superannuation fund.

There are certain other inequalities affecting an employee who may be kept in a temporary category although doing permanent work. One of these is that he is not eligible for statutory increases. The unfairness and the dislocations can easily be seen.

After the lifting of the ban on permanency in 1935 the former condition was restored for some months. Then in 1936 the good work was undone by order in council 84978, and the temporary-permanent quota system was reestablished on a twenty per cent temporary basis.

Mr. REID: During the short period in which the ban was lifted, can the hon. member tell me how many civil servants were granted permanency?

Mr. McILRAITH: No, I am sorry I have not that information at hand.

Mr. REID: I am wondering if there were any.

Mr. McILRAITH: I cannot give my hon. friend the number at the moment. The order in council was not quite as serious as the order in council of 1932, but it embodied most of its fundamental faults, and it was the subject of continued and strong protests. In 1939 a committee of the House of Commons was set up under the chairmanship of the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to inquire into the administration of the Civil Service Act generally. Representations were made to that body, and as a result in 1939 the committee on the Civil Service Act recommended that the temporary-permanent quota system be done away with. The report of the committee will be found in Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of Thursday, April 27, 1939. Paragraph 18 of the report reads as follows:

18. Your committee is of the opinion that:

(1) a departmental division of eighty per cent permanent and twenty per cent temporary results in discrimination in certain branches where the work is entirely permanent and where twenty per cent have to wait years for any hope of permanency; and

[Mr. McIlraith.]

(2) disapproves of any practice which will result in a branch creating work to bring in extra temporaries so as to absorb into the permanent quota those who otherwise would not be permanent.

As a result of that recommendation of the committee the ban on permanency was again lifted in 1939. There was again general satisfaction throughout the service, but it was very short-lived. In May, 1940, the treasury board, by a minute of that body, established the quota system on a somewhat different basis but with all the primary faults of the old system. A percentage was established for each unit of the service on the basis of the total staff as of September, 1939. These percentages varied with the different units. It will be noticed that this is an absolutely rigid and arbitrary system and does not provide for any changing conditions in the departments. Under this system we now have many employees working in the public service for many years in positions of a permanent character. These employees have no right to contribute to the superannuation fund, nor do they receive superannuation benefits. They have no right to compete for promotions in their own branches to positions immediately above the ones they hold. Not only is an injustice done to the individuals concerned, but the public service suffers. These groups of employees are fairly well distributed across the country. The committee of the House of Commons dealt with this matter and made a recommendation thereon. Notwithstanding the fact that the government at that time saw fit to act on that recommendation, the treasury board reimposed this system upon the public service.

The second illustration I want to give has to do with prevailing rates employees and their exclusion from the benefits of the superannuation fund. The superannuation act has been in force since 1924, but a very large group of the public service of Canada are excluded from its benefits notwithstanding the fact that they may have worked in the public service for many years. The best example of this class of employee is to be found in the printing bureau at Ottawa. Many of the employees in the printing bureau have worked continuously for more than thirty years in the public service of Canada, yet they have no right to contribute to the superannuation fund, nor have they any right to receive the benefits from the superannuation or the retirement funds. We had an example last year of one man who had worked more than fifty years at the time of his retirement, but he was simply out, that was all.

Mr. REID: Was he a temporary?

Mr. McILRAITH: He was a prevailing rates man. This term is used in connection with employees paid on a certain basis, but it is somewhat misleading. To go into all the incidence of it would probably extend my remarks beyond my time. They are those who are paid on a basis other than an annual stated salary. They are paid on an hourly basis at the printing bureau but they do not receive overtime on the usual prevailing rates basis. The main point is that their salary is other than a stated annual salary.

A committee of the House of Commons was set up to deal with this situation in 1938, and it heard evidence during that year and again during the session of 1939. This committee made its final report to the House of Commons on May 5, 1939, in which it recommended that the prevailing rates employees should be eligible under the superannuation act. This recommendation is contained in paragraph 8, which reads:

> That provision be made in the statute to render prevailing rates employees eligible to become contributors subject to designation by governor in council on the recommendation of the treasury board of the various classes and individuals to be so rendered eligible.

Notwithstanding this recommendation, nothing has been done to extend the benefits of the superannuation act to this class of employee.

The third point I desire to make is that no holidays are given to certain prevailing rates men. In 1925, by order in council P.C. 1936, prevailing rates employees were granted one week's holidays with pay in each year, subject to certain conditions and limitations. Most of the prevailing rates men in the service have been brought under that ruling at one time or another since 1925, but in 1941 it was discovered that a group of these men in the mines and geology branch of the Department of Mines and Resources did not have this right. I took the matter up with the Minister of Mines and Resources and it was corrected. It was thought at the time that all employees in the department were covered, but in 1942 it was discovered that a small number in the forest products laboratory had not been brought under the benefits of the order in council. The matter was taken up with the department but the treasury board ruled that they were not eligible to receive one week's holidays with pay. The number involved is not large, but many of these men have worked continuously for the department for more than fifteen years, yet the treasury board ruled that they were not eligible to receive these holidays with pay.

It is interesting to note two things in this connection. Apparently the treasury board had jurisdiction and was able to rule on the matter, although it did not directly concern the expenditure of public funds. The second point is that a comparatively small number was involved in this routine administration matter, and yet the minister of the department could not deal with it. He did not have the authority, yet the treasury board were able to have jurisdiction and to deal with it.

The fourth illustration concerns a small number of prevailing rates men who are not paid the prevailing rates established by the Department of Labour. The number of employees is small and the amount involved is small, yet because of its effect upon policy it is a matter of major importance. I refer particularly to some of the prevailing rates men working for the Department of Agriculture at the central experimental farm. There are two classes of carpenters working there, and I deal specifically with them because I am more familiar with their status. There are public works carpenters hired by the Department of Public Works who are working at the experimental farm and paid at the prevailing rate of wages. Then there are two or more departmental carpenters hired by the Department of Agriculture, working at the same place and paid a few cents an hour less.

Mr. BOUCHER: If the hon. member would permit an observation, is it not a fact that at the experimental farm carpenters who are brought in under contract are paid, under departmental regulations, at a rate in excess of the prevailing rate?

Mr. McILRAITH: I was just coming to that. The hon. member anticipated what I was going to say. The Department of Labour fixes the prevailing rates for skilled workmen in the various areas throughout Canada. Not only that, but in recent years it has been the practice of the dominion government to insert a clause in all contracts for government work requiring the contractors to pay the prevailing rate of wages to each particular type of employee. I have always been very grateful for that clause, because I feel it has prevented a good deal of exploitation. It certainly has in this area at least. But notwithstanding the well-known policy of the labour department of establishing a fair rate of wages for skilled men, and notwithstanding the fact that it carries out that policy by inserting in government contracts the clause to which I have referred, and notwithstanding that practically all the departments of government have adopted that same policy, we find this small example in one of the departments where the carpenters are paid less than the prevailing rate. You may say: it is only a matter of a few cents an hour, and the number involved is very small. But that is not a sufficient answer. An injustice is being done. Further, labour generally sees this example, and, small as it may be, it tends to undermine their confidence in the will or determination of the government to carry through its policy as set out by the appropriate authorities. Therefore this becomes a very important matter and the situation ought to be rectified at once. It is interesting to note that these employees have not made a great deal of fuss about the situation; they are not too strenuous in their representations, but the fact remains that they have no right to appeal to the treasury board, the one authority who could deal with the matter, and not only have they no right to appeal to the board, but they would have no right of appeal from any ruling which the treasury board might give.

Mr. REID: Who are the members of the treasury board?

Mr. McILRAITH: I shall have something to say about that in a moment. I frankly admit that I have never been able to get the information I desire about the treasury board and its workings. If the hon. member or any other member is able to get all the information he desires about the treasury board he is more efficient in his duty than I am.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You are closer to them.

Mr. McILRAITH: Frankly I admit that I have not been able to obtain all the information about that board that I should like to get.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We gather that.

Mr. McILRAITH: I am glad the hon. member has gathered it. I mention only four of the problems that arise in the civil service but there are a great many others I could mention. There is the matter in the Department of Agriculture of the pay of certain technical staff doing research work, and their general reclassification. There is the matter of the cost of living bonus, bringing it into line with the standard set when the cost of living bonus was applied to private industry generally. There is the question of statutory increases. There is question of the cost of living bonus for superannuated civil servants. There is the question of these so-called staggered hours of work which are causing so much irritation. A great many other questions could be raised and discussed here. But perhaps the four I have outlined will illustrate what I want to say, and the details of the other matters can be discussed on subsequent occasions.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

The situation is that the treasury board is steadily and continually taking complete control of all matters affecting personnel in the government service, and this whether or not the direct expenditure of public money is involved. I am not aware that any government has at any time deliberately as a matter of policy decided that the treasury board should have this jurisdiction. The whole trend started in 1932. I am sorry to say that the then government was most ruthless and unfriendly towards the public service generally. That trend has not yet been checked, although many injustices have been removed.

Mr. BOUCHER: The ruthlessness has continued.

Mr. McILRAITH: No, the ruthlessness has not continued. The situation was corrected. The salary cut of ten per cent was restored; the statutory increases were forced back, and certain other injustices were corrected. I do not think that any government, after checking over the history of what went on in 1932, will ever suggest such a move again. My hon. friend, even though he was a strong supporter of the Conservative government in office at that time, can hardly now assert that he would bring that policy into force again if he had the chance.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that many of these practices have been discontinued, but the policy denounced by my hon. friend with respect to temporaries was restored in 1936 and still prevails in part.

Mr. McILRAITH: It was restored in modified form, and I am here protesting against it.

I have always held the view, Mr. Speaker, that we as members of the House of Commons are directly responsible for the expenditure of public funds, such is our traditional duty, and I feel perfectly sure that with the wide extension there has been in the number of taxpayers during the last few years we are going to be held answerable on that score. I do not think we should be under any illusions about it. Yet the present position is that in the House of Commons no minister is directly answerable as such for the administration of the public service.

The treasury board as a matter of practice has an enormous number of items coming before it for attention. As I said previously, I have never been able to get as full information as I desired about its workings, but I think it is reasonable to assume that the larger items receive the attention of the treasury board proper, while the smaller items, affecting small groups of personnel or individuals, are left to the staff of the treasury board. As nearly as I can find out, and judging from the letters and documents that are signed, it seems to be the practice for the assistant deputy minister of finance to deal with these matters for the secretary of the treasury board.

Having regard to all the problems which have arisen, and other difficulties with respect to demobilizing some of the temporary staffs in the war departments, an advisory committee was set up in January of this year. It consists of five members. The chairman is Mr. Coon, an executive at the head office of the Bank of Nova Scotia. The secretary is the assistant deputy minister of finance, of whom I have just spoken. Another member is Mr. B. J. Roberts of the National Harbours Board, formerly assistant deputy minister of finance —the position now held by the secretary of the civil service committee—and the other two members are civil service commissioners. This committee is set up to advise the treasury board on matters affecting the civil service. Mr. Ronson, the assistant deputy minister of finance who is secretary of the advisory board, is to advise himself. Just how that process goes on I do not know; it is worthy of Gilbert and Sullivan at their best. I know very little about Mr. Coon, the chairman of the board, but I hope that the relationship between the banks and their employees is not to be the model for the relationship between the dominion government and its employees.

There is in Saturday's Ottawa Journal a report of an interview with Mr. Coon. I will read part of it:

For bankers, he—

That is, Mr. Coon.

—told the Journal this morning, spend their lives handling the "human element."

Where, he wanted to know, did a man take down his hair and talk over his problems, if he didn't do it when going to his bank manager for a loan?

The "human element" which now confronted him comprised some 40,000 civil servants demanding compensation for what they claim have been long-standing injustices, and on the other side, the treasury board standing guard over the government payroll.

The "human element" of this problem, he believed, was no tougher to tackle than that which he has been handling through the years as a banker.

I do not think this requires much comment. Although I do not know the relationship between bankers and persons seeking loans, I had not thought that the human element was particularly emphasized; I supposed that they used strict business methods. Nor do I suppose that persons seeking loans of bankers constitute such a wide section of the community, at that. In any event he is the chairman of the advisory committee, and I have referred to the second and third members. As regards the two members who are civil service commissioners, I have nothing but the very highest praise for their work. Undoubtedly they would be the first witnesses called before any committee dealing with this matter.

The civil service generally has no confidence in the committee. I should have thought that a condition precedent to setting up any committee to deal with employer-employee relations would be that the parties concerned should have confidence in the committee. This is achieved usually in two ways. One is to appoint representatives of the employer on the one hand and of the employees on the other, and to have the chairman chosen by these two groups of representatives. That was not done in this case. The employees have no representation on the committee. Another method is to appoint an entirely independent committee, but that was not done in this case either. The complaint that the committee is not independent is, I believe, well founded, because the main representative, the secretary, is the person in the treasury board who deals with the matters out of which most of these complaints arise. A third method open in this case is a committee of the House of Commons. Such a committee could properly have been set up here, because the House of Commons after all is responsible for the administration of the public business and for the expenditure of the public funds. This method might well have been used in the present instance; it has been used in the past, and I have referred to some of the rulings of such a committee.

One thing I wish to say just before closing. In regard to the two members of the advisory committee to whom I have particularly referred, I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not discussing their records as public servants. I am well aware that civil servants in general have no method of replying when anything is said about them in the House of Commons. I appreciate that fact, and I am not in any way attacking these gentlemen as public servants; so far as I know their records as such are quite good. What I am attacking is their fitness to function on this particular committee. I believe that should be made clear; otherwise my remarks might easily be misconstrued.

I have taken some time to go into this matter of the administrative arm of the government service. I have done so because I fear what is taking place will work injustice to the individual employees concerned and also because the trend in this connection is important and significant. Originally after confederation appointments to the public service were made in a quite haphazard manner, and I fear, in many instances, without much examination as to the fitness and qualifications of the prospective employee for the work to which he was to be assigned. In 1908 was instituted the merit system of appointments and promotions. That was opposed at the time, but the opposition is gradually dying out and the system in general is well established throughout the service. In 1924 a very fine superannuation act was set up, and it has since been extended. All these progressive measures, all the improvements made over a period of some thirty-four years, are now in danger of being nullified by this insidious extension of authority of the treasury board over the personnel of the public service. This is an extension without the treasury board having been directly and immediately given authority over the personnel of the public service as such. It is an extension in a form which does not charge any minister of the crown with direct responsibility as such so that he may be answerable to us here in the House of Commons.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I have taken the time of this honourable house to-day to bring these matters forward.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I will not attempt to follow all the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. McIlraith) who has just taken his seat, but I want to assure him of my sympathetic assistance in getting for, particularly, the low-paid civil servants, a better deal than they are having at the present time. Evidently they have very good support in this city because I see in both the Citizen and the Journal that the cause of the civil servants is before the house. I am wondering whether the case of those to whom I now wish to refer will have the same line of publicity.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member will have to send his speeches to the papers first.

Mr. FAIR: Fortunately or unfortunately I do not write my speeches, so that I am unable to do that. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie) the other night proposed that speeches here should be limited to twenty minutes instead of forty. I think the house will readily understand that the hon. gentleman is on the government side so that he perhaps feels that everything is as it should be. But some of us in the opposition do not feel that way about it, and therefore believe that we are entitled to at least forty minutes to place before this house the views of those who are oppressed and to seek remedies for their troubles.

The budget address was one of the best I have heard here so far as delivery is concerned, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has been complimented from all parts of the house. I can extend my compliments to him as far as the presentation is concerned, but I think condemnation would come from certain classes by reason of certain things that are in the budget. I believe the minister is doing his best; he has a big job, and I am blaming to some extent his advisers and the system under which he is working for some of the wrongs contained in this budget. Before going further I wish to express an opinion which may or may not meet with the approval of the house, but it looks to me that there is an election pending. Not long ago the Minister of Finance went on the air, on a Sunday evening I believe, and announced a reduction in the price of tea, coffee, oranges and milk. We are now promised something in connection with tariffs. I will read the part to which I have reference, as reported at page 861 and 862 of Hansard:

> The government has already, by an exchange of notes with the United States on November 30 last, undertaken to enter into conversations with that country, and with other countries, for the purpose of formulating programmes of agreed action direction toward the expansion, after the war, of production, employment and the exchange and consumption of goods, to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce and to the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers.
> Committed to these objects and having in mind particularly the vital concern of this country in access to the selling and buying markets of the world, the government is prepared to discuss with the government of the United States, the government of the United Kingdom, or the governments of other countries with which we trade, reciprocal trade arrangements wider in scope and longer in duration than have hitherto been made, provided always that the advantages of such arrangements shall be open to other countries willing to adhere to the same terms.

I am wondering whether that is just a little bait. If a thing is good for this country, there is no poorer excuse for not putting it into effect than that there is a war on. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has told us on different occasions that reform must come, and if it is not brought about before the war is over, it will be too late. I realize as do all hon. members, that at the present time we are having better terms with the United States than we have had for some time past, and after the war is over perhaps we shall have difficulty in establishing trade relations with the United States which could be very easily obtained at this time.

I do not find any provision made in the budget for bringing up to parity the price of wheat. Perhaps before dealing with that question I might go back to tariffs, because I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) in his seat and because of what have been termed hand-outs to farmers of the west, particularly in the way of bonuses and acreage reduction payments, I wish to show that western farmers have been getting back during the past few years just a trickle of what has been taken from them in the past by way of tariffs as one instance.

The late Hon. Norman Rogers made a survey in 1931 which is the last survey that has been made as far as I know. That survey showed that Manitoba in that year paid by way of tariffs $29,185,740, equivalent to $13.25 for every man, woman and child in that province. The corresponding figures for the other western provinces were:

	Total paid by way of tariffs	Per capita
Saskatchewan	$29,228,285	$28 16
Alberta	27,909,396	26 93
British Columbia....	37,737,247	22 33

The total of these figures is $124,060,668. That would not be the average over a number of years past because in 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 we had very low prices for grain and for that reason were unable to purchase much of the supplies that were needed. So that for an average year we would be penalized at least $150,000,000 by way of tariffs.

Coming east, we find that in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario the shoe is on the other foot. In the case of Quebec there is a gain of $31,685,885, equivalent to a benefit of $11.03 for every man, woman and child in that province, and for Ontario, which has been referred to as the good old milch cow which has been milked by other provinces, we find the total was $51,989,761, or $15.15 for every man, woman and child in the province. The total for those two provinces is $83,675,646.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the people of Ontario had received the interest due them on Alberta bonds the hon. member could have quoted much higher figures.

Mr. FAIR: It looks as if the people of Ontario have milked Alberta dry so that Alberta was not able to pay the interest, and rather than pay it the government of Alberta had the good sense to see that they kept their people alive. I commend them for doing so. Give the people of Alberta a square deal and they will pay their interest. Furthermore, if they had had a square deal it would not be necessary for them to borrow all that money so that the interest would not pile up.

I said I sympathized with the hon. member who spoke just before me. Some time last month we find that the wartime prices and trade board passed an order giving restaurant keepers a right to increase the price of tea and coffee served with meals by five cents; that is, ten cents for tea, coffee or milk served with meals. They are also allowed to charge ten cents if a person sits down at a lunch counter and has a drink of tea, coffee or milk. On February 22 I placed some questions on the order paper in this connection; they were made an order for return and as yet I have not received the information; but as far as I can see, the restaurants were not justified in demanding this increased price, if they did demand it. Some say they did, while we find that other restaurants have not increased their prices. It seems to me that those who have increased their charges could very well get along without that increase, because I do not believe the restaurants of Canada ever had as much business as at the present time. Usually increased business tends to decrease the overhead, and I believe that is so in the restaurant business as well. In addition, we find that the servings have been very considerably cut down. When you get a serving of meat or fish, in many cases you do not get more than one-third the serving you got before the war; and when it comes to sugar with which to sweeten your tea or coffee, you find that the lump has been sliced in three. You are given three of those slices, which means you receive the equivalent of one lump.

In addition, I believe these restaurants are saving a little in connection with dish washing. Some of them are so rushed that they cannot keep their dishes properly washed. I was in a restaurant in this city not long ago when I saw five cups being given to five customers without the cups having been washed. One of the customers drew the attention of the waitress to the marks on the side of the cup where the other person had drunk the coffee. The waitress took a paper napkin, held it under a hot-water tap, went around, wiped off the cup and placed it before the customer. That customer had only about five minutes in which to get back to work, so that he had to go ahead and drink from a cup that had not been washed. This is not good enough. The people who go to the Chateau Laurier or some of the better restaurants do not get that sort of service; but the people who imposed this tax do not eat in the small restaurants of this or any other city in Canada.

Now we come to the low salaried workers, for instance the group who have $660 left after paying their income tax, of whom we have some thousands right in this city. My information is that it costs these people an average of $20 a month for a room, or $240 a year. Then I believe they are entitled to $1 a day for food, figuring 25 cents for breakfast, 35 cents for lunch and 40 cents for dinner. Certainly they will not overeat at that rate. This amounts to another $365, and when you consider the extra 15 cents a day that is charged by a number of restaurants in connection with beverages, you have another $54.75 tacked on to the living expenses of those compelled to eat in restaurants. That gives you a total of $659.75, which leaves a worker in this group with 25 cents with which to buy clothing and other necessities, soap, towels and all that sort of thing. Then people in this group are also asked to buy war bonds, war savings certificates and stamps; to help the Red Cross, the aid to Russia fund, the milk for Britain fund, the Chinese relief fund, and all the other funds that call upon the public for contributions. During the past two or three weeks I have had in this connection a number of letters, of which I am going to read two. One is from the city of Montreal; the other is from the city of Vancouver, which will indicate that people all across the dominion are feeling the effects of this new tax. The first letter reads:

Dear Sir,

I trust you will pardon the liberty I have taken in addressing you.

I note your remarks re "coffee price boost" and that any person obliged to eat in restaurants would increase the cost of living by about $55 a year.

If you lived in Montreal and was obliged to limit the cost of your meals to 30 cents, as I have to do, it would increase your living costs to $76.65 a year.

All meals of 35 cents and over are taxed 5 per cent, which means your 30 cent meal would cost 37 cents, made up as follows: meal, 30; beverage, 5; tax, 2. The party responsible for this unnecessary increase should have his head examined.

That is signed by J. Anderson, of Montreal. The letter from Vancouver is as follows:

Your remarks regarding the recent increase in the restaurant prices of tea, coffee and milk used as a beverage made in the house yesterday and reported in this morning's Vancouver paper are very much to the point.

This agency, which deals chiefly with the problems of unattached men, the majority of whom are in the low income group, and who live in rooming houses and obtain their meals in restaurants, has already found it necessary to give supplementary aid as a result of the higher cost of meals.

Of this group, the old age pensioners and recipients of war veterans allowances are particularly hard hit. The majority of these cases are unfit for employment and are unable to supplement their $25 a month income.

A rough breakdown of their living costs shows rent averaging $8 a month, miscellaneous items including clothing, laundry, soap, razor blades, car tickets, etc., $5, balance for food $12. On an average of a thirty day month this means that the man is required to purchase meals within a limit of 40 cents a day. The general practice is the purchase of two 20 cent meals. The five cents a meal increase for beverage amounts to $3 a month.

Unless some action is taken either to rescind the wartime prices and trade board order or to give a supplementary grant to recipients of old age pension and war veterans allowance, the already inadequate standard of living of these groups and other small pensioners, etc., will be considerably lowered.

I am wondering if the government or industry will pay a cost-of-living bonus to those who eat in restaurants, to recompense them for this inflationary rise in the cost of their meals. If that is not done I suggest now that labour see to it either that this bonus is paid or that the increase in the cost of these beverages is removed. There is no justification for it, in my view, and I should like to see something done.

If we listen to after-dinner speeches we will not believe that there are hard times anywhere in this country. I do not believe we can ever attain the golden age of economic life while we are living in the stone age of economic thought. We have to do much better than we have done in the past. On December 2 of last year the Prime Minister was in New York where he spoke to the Pilgrims of America. He is reported as having used these words:

The only path to prosperity and peace is the path of equality of cooperation and of human brotherhood. The new order must be a world order. It must be governed by a universal rule of law. It must be based on human rights and not on the right of property, privilege or position. An end must be put to monopoly of power by any country and by any class.

Again I remind the house that the Prime Minister has told us on many occasions that we must have reforms before the war is over; otherwise it will be too late. What are we doing about it? As I said at the commencement of my speech this afternoon, if something good can be put into effect, then the war would seem to be the poorest possible excuse for not taking action.

In Canada we have a problem respecting people who are not able to supply themselves with medical and hospital accommodation.

I am suggesting now to medical men in the house, and their friends outside the house who are well organized throughout the country, that they demand from this and from any other government which may be in office later, that free medical service and hospitalization be granted to all those unable to provide it for themselves. Prevention of ill-health would be the cheapest possible way of cutting down the number of heavy bills now being paid for these services.

Canada can produce sufficient to satisfy all the needs of our people, but apparently we are not able to produce enough for the human greed being practised. In respect of old age pensioners I do not think it is necessary for me to go into detail. Already several hon. members have brought the case affecting these pioneers to the attention of the house, and the letter I read in connection with the increase in the price of meals gives information respecting the distribution of the small amount they now receive. We continually receive letters from old age pensioners and potential old age pensioners asking that the age for the receipt of pension be lowered, and that the amount be increased to at least $30 a month, also that a pensioner be allowed a net annual income of $500 a year instead of $365 as at present. This I believe would not be any hardship on the country. We could make adjustments which would not injure anybody, but would greatly help these old people. Pensions paid other people, such as persons in other parts of this building, might very well be used along this line.

Then we must give consideration to veterans of the great war of 1914-18. A number of these men need assistance, and I am speaking particularly for the veterans who settled under the Soldier Settlement Act. I believe I stated their case fairly thoroughly and in some detail on February 3 last, and I shall not go into it at length at this time. I intend, however, to return to it on another occasion, and I hope hon. members will get some information respecting these men and be prepared before the close of the session to obtain something worth while, reasonable and just for these settlers.

On November 19 of last year order in council No. 10472 was passed. We were told that this order in council would improve the lot of soldier settlers. Having read it, I feel that it is no more or less than a sentence of another twenty years to the hell these people have been enduring for the last twenty or twenty-five years. This is not good enough. As their representatives, let us see to it that something reasonable and just is done.

Looking back over the years I have been in the house, I think of the letters I have received and of the delegations of widows of veterans of the last war. Very little has been done for them up to the present time. However I see in the estimates an amount is provided to make provision for these people. I do not believe the amount is large enough.

We now come to the men and women returning from the present war. On another occasion I asked that they be given a square deal now, rather than twenty years after the war is over. In this connection I received a resolution from the Lloydminster branch, No. 39, of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. This resolution, dated March 10, is as follows:

> Be it resolved that the Lloydminster Branch No. 39, Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L. records its protest against the inadequacy of the maintenance and unemployment benefits of $9 per week for single men, and $13 per week for married men, as set forth in Acts and Orders in Council governing the rehabilitation of returned soldiers; that we condemn the limitations contained in those Acts and Orders in Council, and deplore the fact that reestablishment measures, so far, have been based upon the presumption of the existence of a set of post-war conditions which we feel should not be taken into consideration in the framing of an effective rehabilitation programme.
> C. Bexson,
>
> Secretary,
> Lloydminster Branch,
> Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L.

This question will be dealt with later on, and I trust that hon. members and particularly those who served overseas in the last war, will see to it that something worth while is done for those men, upon their return; and that preparation be made before the war is over, because, according to our Prime Minister, that will be too late.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Saskatchewan Cooperative Consumer. I have used it before in the house, but I shall read it again because I believe it illustrates in a form better than I could offer the conditions now existing. It is headed with the word "Parable", and reads:

> Count Leo Tolstoy has written a parable concerning the private profit system, which portrays in realistic fashion a state of affairs that is all too true.
> I see mankind as a herd of cattle inside a fence enclosure. Outside the fence are green pastures and plenty for the cattle to eat, while inside the fence there is not quite enough grass for the cattle.
> Consequently, the cattle are trampling underfoot what little grass there is and goring each other to death in their struggle for existence.

I saw the owner of the herd come to them and when he saw their pitiable condition, he was filled with compassion for them and thought of all he could do to improve their condition.

So he called his friends together and asked them to assist him in cutting grass from outside the fence and throwing it over the fence to the cattle.

And that they called Charity.

Then because the calves were dying off and not growing up into serviceable cattle, he arranged that they should each have a pint of milk every morning for breakfast.

Because they were dying off in the cold nights, he put up well-drained and beautiful sheds for the cattle.

Because they were goring each other in the struggle for existence, he put corks on the horns of the cattle, so that the wounds they gave each other might not be serious.

Then he reserved a park in the enclosure for the old bulls and the old cows over 70 years of age.

In fact he did everything he could think of to improve the condition of the cattle, and when I asked him why he did not do the obvious thing, break down the fence and let the cattle out, he answered:

"If I let the cattle out I should no longer be able to milk them."

On behalf of those who are overseas fighting and those who are returning from the war and who in the future, if we do not take action, will be in the same class as those who are to-day old age pensioners, I would say that they are in the same category as and would compare with those referred to as cattle inside the fence. It is about time we broke down the fence and made available to these people the good things that this country can produce.

We have in this country an instrument that nullifies the rights of the elected representatives of the people. In another portion of this building is a body of men without any particular qualification except service to their political parties. These men under our present constitution have the right to nullify any act passed by the elected representatives of the people. We are told that many years ago the Liberal party were going to reform that particular house. We are told that there is a constitution which stands in our way, but as far as I am concerned that constitution is man-made and it can be man-changed and made to serve the people to-day rather than those interests which saw to it that when it was drawn up it would serve their purpose.

Perhaps we are not prepared to make this change in our constitution because we have not a quill pen to do it with. I understand that when this document was drawn up years ago a quill pen was used, but to those who would put forth this kind of argument I would suggest that we have many geese and turkeys running around our farmyards and it would be quite easy if it were thought necessary to take a quill from one of their wings to make the change. By doing this we would make available for other purposes thousands and thousands of dollars every year, and a number of offices now inhabited by people who are making no good use of them would be made available to others. We could stop appointing people to this house, and those who are there who can qualify for the old age pension could be granted $30 a month.

No reform can come to the common people unless the lawmakers are of the same mind as the common people. This may be a clumsy way of putting it, but I say that unless the common people get a majority of members in this house who are in actual sympathy with them, we cannot expect to have much change in favour of the common people. God must love the common people because he made so many of us. I have not much time left so that I shall have to hustle along a little faster than I intended.

We must have a firm foundation for our new set-up; otherwise it will crumble. In order to have this firm foundation, I suggest that there should be a better deal for agriculture. After all, agriculture is the basic industry of this country, the one that must stand the brunt of taxation, directly or indirectly, and the one that must provide the food for all of us in Canada, as well as many of the men who are being sent overseas to fight our battles. In order to give agriculture a square deal I suggest that there should be parity prices for all agricultural products.

We should have a long range programme so that the farmer can go ahead and make plans for a number of years instead of having to confine himself to a one-year programme. Farm debts have been accumulated under unjust legislation. When the prices of our products are forced down there is no talk of scaling down either interest rates or the debts themselves. The result is that our farmers are now in an impossible position and cannot hope to get on a sound footing until something is done along the line I suggest. I am suggesting that the wishes of the western debt conference which is meeting in Ottawa to-day be implemented and placed upon the statute books here because this government and the privy council claim that the provinces have not this power.

Tariffs should be removed. I think I gave enough figures this afternoon to convince anybody that an imposition has been placed on the farmer in this connection. I have some rather interesting information here in connection with income taxes paid by farmers. Between 1930 and 1942 an average of 1,191 farmers paid income tax, the average amount a year being $92,163. Because our farmers work longer hours than any other group; because they are not allowed wages for their wives or members of their families who may help them, I suggest that the government would not be losing much money to exempt the farmers from income taxation. This may seem to be class discrimination, but I think I am justified in asking for it on account of the conditions under which our farmers have been compelled to live during years gone by. If exemption cannot be granted, I suggest that the term for computing income tax be five years rather than the two as suggested in the budget. Proper steps should be taken to care for our aged pioneers who are underprivileged through no fault of their own, as well as for the veterans and veterans' wives of the first great war and the veterans and their families of the present war.

There is one answer and key to this—social credit. Since coming here in 1935 we have been laughed at on different occasions. As suggested the other night by one of the hon. members in front of me, hollow laughter means idle brains or empty brains, if you want to call them that. We do not have so much of this laughing now, and I think in future more consideration will be given to our suggestions. Up to the present time social credit has not been implemented. Let me say in conclusion that it is better to fail temporarily in something that must inevitably come, than to succeed in something that must ultimately fail.

Mr. J. A. GREGORY (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon bringing down a budget for the Canadian people which has added very little burden to their shoulders, notwithstanding the fact that Canada's contribution to the united nations has increased enormously. I believe that the budget delivered at this session will go down in history as one of the great documents in the life of Canada. I believe further that the name of the Minister of Finance will find a niche in the halls of the celebrities of Canada. I can only wish the minister a growing distinction, an added stature and increased usefulness in the public life of Canada.

I was very much impressed by an article written by the United States newspaper commentator, Ernest Lindley. This was written for United States consumption and is in praise of Canada's policy step by step in financing the war. He narrates these steps in controlling inflation, in establishing a price ceiling, in our payment of bonuses, in the refundable tax feature of the income tax and in the fact that the provinces were being reimbursed for vacating the fields of income tax, corporation tax and succession duties. He ends this notable article by saying:

> The war tax programme of the Canadian government has revealed a firm grasp of the essentials of wise management of the war economy which our tax programme—

He is referring to that of the United States:

> —has lacked.

His concluding remark is:

> Congress could profit by studying the Canadian budget messages.

I am sure that we as Canadians have reason to be highly gratified that we have been the forerunners, that we blazed the trail along these lines and that our great neighbours to the south of us are now following in our footsteps, at times rather haltingly, rather hesitantly, it may be, but nevertheless endeavouring to follow step by step the plan as set forth by the government of Canada.

When I last spoke in this house on February 8, I was predicting a change in the fiscal policy of Canada after the war. I had made certain statements to the effect that we would all be free traders or at least believers in low tariffs after the war is over, and I had started to develop that argument, sir, when my time was exhausted. I wish first to-day to finish that argument.

I said on that occasion that in the primitive days of Canada's industrial growth the home market was the only market Canada had for her manufactured products. Thus a policy of protection of the home market by a high tariff was built up as a policy for the protection of industry in Canada, and it has continued ever since the "national policy" of 1874 was first initiated.

As Canada's industries expanded, its surplus products looked for foreign markets. Thus arose our export trade. But the home market being the main market was still protected. This doctrine had its fullest practical scope during the Bennett regime of 1930-35.

We have, however, gone through an industrial revolution during the last two years. We have become a prodigy of industrial production. When peace returns and war orders cease, our factories must turn to peacetime production and there will be a feverish search for export trade to keep the factories going, to continue the employment of those at present engaged in those factories and to create jobs for the soldiers returning home. The tables then will have completely reversed —the home market will be the insignificant market and the export market will be the important one. It seems to me that the whole psychology of the people of Canada will change when this is realized. The psychology of the producer and the consumer, of the farmer and the businessman, of the worker and the management—the psychology of the whole Canadian people will have gone through a radical change. They will realize two great urges which will induce a change of tariff policy in Canada. May I indicate those two urges.

Efficiency and cheapness of production will be the essentials in order that Canadian goods may compete in price and quality in the open competitive markets of the world. I submit that high tariff protection is not conducive either to efficiency of operation or to cheapness of production.

The second urge may be put in this way. Exports have to be paid for, and how are exports paid for? Well, sir, the farmers of western Canada have always understood that very simple problem in arithmetic. Exports must always be paid for by imports. Hence the western farmers' consistent belief in free trade or low tariffs to permit a two-way traffic in commodities. I repeat what I said the last time I addressed the house, that after the war there will be no crusted high tariff Tories, that after this war is over we shall all be free traders or low tariff believers. The farmers of western Canada will welcome that day. It will mean the striking off of their chains of economic slavery. Poverty has been enforced on the western farmer by the heavy toll of freight rates on what he sells and on what he buys, by the artificially high prices which protective tariffs have compelled him to pay, and by a banking system unsuited in its structure and in its practices to be of service to the farmers of western Canada. I shall have something further to say as I develop my speech with respect to another kind of financing of western Canada, both in its activities and in its policies.

Leaving the question of a change which we believe is imminent in the fiscal policy of Canada, may I lay down the second proposition which to me is equally important. Not only must there be, after this war is over, a free interchange of commodities for the prosperity of Canada and the welfare of Canadian people, but there must be a free exchange of people. In other words, we must go back once more to an active, generous, comprehensive immigration policy for the Dominion of Canada, subject always, of course, to the application of certain approved standards of physical, mental and moral fitness of those who seek entry into this country. Just in passing, after forty-five years' residence in western Canada and having seen nearly all the immigration into western Canada, may I say that often in the past these standards of physical and mental and moral fitness were applied with most inexcusable laxity. I believe that vast groups of European people will be eager to come to Canada after the war, to leave behind them forever the regular periodical recurrences of invasion of their homes, the fleeing for their lives and abandoning of their possessions which has been the history of countless generations throughout the whole history of Europe. I wonder if we do not at times forget that the same hills and rivers which Julius Caesar fought for, the same hills and rivers which nations and tribes, before those nations, fought for throughout the ages of Europe, are the same hills and rivers which our soldiers fought for in the great war of 1914-1918 and which the German armies in this war seized in their conquest of Europe.

Canada will have an opportunity such as she has never had in the past of selecting and choosing, that is hand-picking, the kind of immigrant that she will accept after this war. This policy will not be, like past policies, agricultural, designed to fill up vacant lands, because all the good vacant lands in western Canada are already filled. It will be one of selecting skilled tradesmen, artisans, technicians and industrialists. Prior to the outbreak of this war the breaking-down of mass population and centralized industry had commenced. Indeed, the decentralization of industry and population was well on its way. The bombing plane has simply hastened this movement by destroying the physical assets of thousands of factories in Europe and ending the lives of tens of thousands of skilled artisans working therein. The urge to get away from this kind of thing, from this incessant scourge in Europe, will induce innumerable industrialists to pack up what remains of their plant and machinery, their assets, their currency, their finances and credit, bring with them their technicians and artisans, and cross the ocean to Canada and this great land mass of north America, where they can reestablish themselves on a smaller scale, and, if not entirely free from bombing planes, at least live on this new land mass of north America where no wars break out, and to attack which, bombing planes first have to cross two thousand miles of the Atlantic ocean or seven thousand miles of the Pacific ocean.

I believe that very often we fail to realize how fortunate we are in living upon this great land mass of north America. It is God's gift to the unfortunates of this war. Canada can be the land of the second chance for those who have lost their first chance in Europe because of the devastation of this war. I believe, then, that Canada will have a wonderful opportunity to enrich its economic life through a vast stream of wealth and credit, of industrialists, technicians and artisans, and the creation of a new population based upon secondary industry. The opposition of farm groups and farm organizations in western Canada to further immigration, an opposition which has been so prominent for at least the last fifteen years, will vanish, and the dawn of a new day will break on the horizon for western Canada.

What will the establishment of secondary industry mean to western Canada? Let me enumerate the answers in the following manner:

First, it will mean an increased home market for the consumption of commodities grown on the farm. It will mean the bringing of millions of new mouths to the grain fields of western Canada to consume our flour, meat and dairy products. Also, in time, it will mean the building up of a domestic price for flour, meats, dairy products and other farm produce; and the export price which now governs the price of western farm products, and which has been the economic curse of our farmers as long as I have known anything about the effect of markets upon our producers, will apply only to that small balance which is left over, which we will call the exportable surplus.

Second, it will mean employment for our boys and girls. I do not wish to enlarge upon one of the saddest stories with which we are afflicted in western Canada. In only the second generation of pioneers who went to the prairies—unlike Great Britain, which looked after succeeding generations, even to the tenth generation before its emigrants scattered over the world—our people have had to suffer the sorrow and ignominy of seeing their boys and girls, born in the west, growing up there, attending its schools, for the cost of which we were responsible, when they reached the age when they are bubbling over with enthusiasm and energy and the desire to do something in this world, look in vain for jobs in the country of their upbringing, and become compelled to go to other provinces and throughout the United States of America, where by their efforts they are enriching the life of other provinces or another country at the expense of the province in which they were born.

In the third place, it will mean relief from the heavy burden of taxation which weighs upon the towns and cities of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GREGORY: When the house rose at six o'clock I was trying to answer the question which I had put to the house, "What will the establishment of secondary industry mean to western Canada?" I had come to the third effect in answering that question. I had said it will mean relief from the heavy burden of taxes in our towns and cities, due to the increased assessment of factories, houses, warehouses, stores and all the development incidental to turning western Canada into a province of secondary industry.

Fourth, it will mean the turning of deficits of our two railway systems into permanent surpluses. Fifth, it will mean a reduced burden in servicing our bonded indebtedness, federal, provincial and municipal, on account of the increased realty values which will result in our towns and cities and farm lands and by reason of the increased number of wage-earners, the reduction of the per capita debt automatically will mean the reduction of per capita taxation. And sixth, it will permit the extension of increased social services for the reasons which I have stated.

It must be borne in mind that Canada has built up an overhead structure capable of maintaining a population of 50,000,000 people, in her railways, schools, civic improvements, legal structures of all kinds, publicly owned equipment, and in our mercantile and financial institutions. The burden of this structure on 11,000,000 people has become almost intolerable.

Following this war, certain things must be done to ensure the proper development of Canada along these lines. This evening I intend to lay three stones as a foundation for greater prosperity, greater happiness and a growing population in our national life.

I take the first stone, and a prominent stone in that foundation, to be the creation under the Bank of Canada of regional banks for the four natural regions of Canada. In order that this may be very plain may I answer the question, What are those four natural regions? In my judgment they are the maritime provinces, the central provinces, the prairie provinces, and British Columbia, all having natural resources and an economy all their own and a geographical position in accordance with the position which they must occupy in that national whole which we call the confederation of Canada. The creation, I say, under the Bank of Canada of regional banks for the four natural regions of Canada. For what purpose? To use the credit that can be created against the wealth in production of each of these regions. It will be done through subsidiaries of existing banks, setting up agricultural banks, long-term credit banks, by our present institutions or the setting up of a special agricultural bank structure under the Bank of Canada in each of those regions to encourage the development of new resources and industries based on those resources and the general balanced development of that region which it is its duty to advance.

I realize that in laying a foundation for a new Canada this immediately breaks up the present situation, whereby through the present banking set-up the credit of this dominion has been and is being used for the maintenance of the industrial and financial preponderance of the central provinces at the expense of the other provinces of the dominion. I do not need to explain this point; I have spoken fully concerning it in the past in connection with the unfortunate breaking down of the conferences having to do with the Sirois report. I do not intend to take time now to expand this point; I just say that in one short lifetime I have seen the obliteration of industrial and financial institutions and their subsidiaries, insurance and trust companies in the maritime provinces, either by absorption by or removal to the central provinces, or by bankruptcy. In one generation I have seen the prodigious wealth of the prairie provinces flow in irresistible tide to the central provinces, leaving those prairie provinces barren of wealth, sucked as dry as a squeezed lemon.

Surely, sir, this was not the design or pattern intended or anticipated by the fathers of confederation. Surely the fathers of confederation never visualized a lopsided development such as we have in Canada at present. Surely those famous fathers never intended to pour into any such lopsided mould from the melting pot of the four crown colonies comprised in confederation. I would rather think that the fathers of confederation conceived the idea of each part of the new Canada contributing to the welfare of each of the other parts, each contributing something to the common cause in making a greater, happier and more prosperous Dominion of Canada.

[Mr. Gregory.]

I believe the time has come to do something about this problem. We should start now and reshape this distorted growth that we call the Dominion of Canada.

The second stone to which I would refer as a foundation of a new and better Canada is the setting up of an economic board for each of those four regions to conduct a rigid research for raw products within that region and to aid in their manufacture.

Without dwelling on that point, I come to the third stone, setting up of regional research laboratories to conduct research into more varied use of the products and commodities native to each of those regions. Speaking of my own particular part of the country, I refer to such commodities as wheat, wild weeds, low grade coal, oil, gas, clays, and timber native to the region.

It may be said that it was the purpose of the Sirois report, if it had been implemented, so to equalize things in Canada that all these grievances to which I have referred would be remedied. It is true the Sirois report proposed the setting up of subsidies to the less favoured provinces in order to equalize the standards of living of all the provinces, to equalize educational opportunities and other standards in all the provinces, and to assist in the servicing of the provincial debt of these provinces. But even if we assume for a moment that all these things had been accomplished, there would still remain the hollow shell of economic deficiency in parts of Canada, in my part of the country, arising from lack of production, not primary but secondary. Eventually this will lead to economic discontent which may place a socialist or other non-democratic group in control in some of the provinces, and merely postpones the date of the internal disruption between the federal and provincial authorities.

Now, sir, I should like to mention, in addition to the three stones which in my judgment are essential as the foundation of a new and better Canada, certain aids to make this structure a success. I say, first, that we should begin now, particularly in the prairie provinces, to carry on the technical training of our youth in order to prepare them for the new day in secondary industry. You may say that the dominion-provincial youth training scheme is already in existence. That is quite true, and I am pleading simply for a continuation of that scheme following the termination of this war. Second, the time must come in western Canada when there must be more intensive farming to diversify and raise the value per acre of our crops and put more labour content into their production. Next I plead for a greater application of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, to take unsuitable land out of cultivation, and put it into community pastures, and to conserve water at every opportunity. I plead with this house and this government that larger and still larger sums be voted under that rehabilitation act for the purpose of carrying on conservation work in western Canada.

This brings me to the question of irrigation, and for a moment I should like to refer to an irrigation project which has nothing whatever to do with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. It so happens that near my home, in the valley of the Saskatchewan river, there is a thousand acres of pasture, scrub and alkali which in the early days of the northwest mounted police, when their headquarters were in Battleford, was used as a pasture for the horses. As a member of the provincial legislative assembly I had something to do with bringing to the attention of the government the possibilities of this thousand acres of pasture land if it were irrigated. Not long ago a start was made; a few hundred acres of this land were placed under irrigation, and the results obtained have been simply amazing. This project is under the control of the provincial mental hospital, with the staff and patients doing the work from spring till fall. The mental hospital is responsible for the care of the crops, but those crops have become so immense that even with all the stock on the farm and the population of three thousand people in the mental hospital, it is not possible to consume what is produced there. I should like to give one or two figures in connection with this project. I am not in a position this evening to give the exact number of acres under cultivation for the growing of vegetables and roots, but a very large part of the land being cultivated is used to grow oats, alfalfa and other fodder for the stock on the farm. There is a twenty-three acre field of oats which yielded a crop at the rate of 114 bushels to the acre. The alfalfa crop amounted to several tons per acre; I have not the exact figure per acre. Then we made a start in the growing of small fruits and vegetables, with these results:

	Pounds
Strawberries	1,176
Raspberries	787
Currants	930
Gooseberries	441
Crab apples	104
Plums	650
Beans, green	5,584
Beans, dry	4,500
Beets	69,975
Carrots	144,694
Cauliflower	9,329
Cabbage	125,413
Lettuce	1,000
Mangels	100,000
Onions	17,411
Potatoes	722,700
Peas, green	11,333
Peas, dry	10,800
Parsnips	29,870
Radishes	1,967
Rhubarb	1,695
Swiss chard	5,324
Turnips	204,560

This project has been under cultivation for only three or four years, but the results obtained already are almost beyond comprehension; it is necessary to go there in order to appreciate exactly what has been done. Since coming to eastern Canada I have heard critics in this house, more particularly those coming from Ontario, say that the western farmer is too lazy to go into mixed farming. It may not be known to many hon. members that in Saskatchewan there are large areas in which sufficient water cannot be obtained for domestic requirements and where stock cannot therefore be raised. In other regions the quality of the soil and the absence of moisture are such that coarse grain cannot grow and mature. However, in some sections we have made vast strides in regard to mixed farming. For the first time Alberta has led all the provinces in hog production. Saskatchewan has made progress also, and in a few moments I propose to read a few figures with respect to what has been done in that province. Before doing so, however, I would warn eastern farmers that if their advice were taken literally, the production of hogs, cattle, sheep, horses, eggs, butter and cheese in western Canada would swamp the market and break prevailing prices.

Now just a word with regard to stock production in Saskatchewan, as between 1941 and 1942:

	1941	1942
Horses	803,893	830,000
Cattle	1,245,537	1,395,200
Sheep	330,110	410,000
Hogs	949,000	1,325,400
Hens and chickens	9,649,460	13,127,000
Turkeys	990,650	1,616,000

Now just another figure or two with respect to another form of production. In 1942 our production of creamery butter amounted to 41,306,000 pounds, bringing us to third place in Canada, as against a production of 37,126,694 pounds in 1941. There is an equally remarkable increase in the production of honey, which amounted to 5,000,000 pounds in 1942, or an increase of 2,000,000 pounds over 1941. We ranked second in Canada in the production of honey, Ontario being in first place with 7,800,000 pounds. The number of sheep shorn in Saskatchewan during 1942 was 226,900 and the wool production was 1,815,000 pounds. In 1941 the number of sheep shorn was 183,100, and the wool clip amounted to 1,501,000 pounds.

Mr. Speaker, I see my time is passing quickly. I had intended this evening to make some reference to the growth of cooperative organizations in Saskatchewan and their purposes. As many hon. members know, Saskatchewan is the home of cooperation, leading all the provinces of Canada in its cooperative effort. This movement has been fostered almost entirely under Liberal administration in that province. On various occasions the provincial government has loaned large sums of money for the creation, development and maintenance of cooperative organizations.

There are two kinds of cooperatives in that province, namely, producer cooperatives and consumer cooperatives. I had intended giving the house to-night some figures showing the number of the various kinds of cooperatives, something of their membership and something of the branches they are operating at the present time in large numbers. I shall leave this subject to a later date. I had intended developing the subject further, after stating the purposes for which cooperative organizations are created, stating something of the nature of the various organizations, and stating just what producer cooperatives and consumer cooperatives are doing in that province. I had intended carrying the matter a trifle further to-night.

However, I shall leave this for another occasion. I had intended going into the question of just what atmosphere cooperatives operate in. Cooperative movements always operate in capitalistic or free enterprise provinces or countries. The cooperative organization is for the very purpose of assisting the producer, if it is a producer organization, or the consumer, if it is a consumer organization, to obtain a saving through operation in the cooperative set-up. They operate only in capitalist organizations; they have no place in socialist organizations. That brings me to a speech delivered a short time ago in Saskatchewan, having to do with the proposal that cooperative institutions should be used in a socialist state, in that province. But for to-night I shall leave the question right there.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, last Friday afternoon when the orders of the day were called I rose to address a question to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) for the purpose of learning if there were any truth in the report which appeared in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick, on the 9th instant to the effect that the government intended closing the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve training centre at that port which, for some time past, has been known as His Majesty's Canadian ship Brunswicker.

You ruled at that time, Mr. Speaker, that the question should have been put on the order paper. Consequently I was unable to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and to learn from him whether or not the report was true.

I do not rise this evening to criticise Your Honour's ruling, but I do wish to inform the minister, and through him the government, that the people of Saint John are very much perturbed over this report. I rise to ask the minister, and through him the government, that, if such move is being considered, it be not proceeded with, but dropped. I rise to ask him if such a decision has been come to it be reconsidered and that His Majesty's Canadian ship Brunswicker should be permitted to remain at the port of Saint John.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): May I reassure my hon. friend by saying that if it is at all possible to continue the establishment at Saint John, it will be continued there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has been there for twenty years.

Mr. HAZEN: I am very glad to have that assurance from the minister. This branch of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve was established at the port of Saint John two decades ago. In the years preceding the war many of our boys joined this unit. They obtained useful training there, and made friendships within the unit, with the result that an esprit de corps has been developed. The unit has its own traditions. It has become part of our community life. Many of the boys, both officers and men, enlisted when war was declared, and have given good accounts of themselves.

Since the outbreak of the war the work of the unit has been carried on in a more intensive manner. While I am glad to have the minister's assurance, I must tell him that if the report which has appeared in the press turns out to be true, and the unit is removed from Saint John, such action on the part of the government would be deeply, and I submit justly, resented by practically everybody in the community, irrespective of political affiliations. I must confess I was pretty hot under the collar when I read the item in the newspaper. I hope it will not prove to be true.

The feelings of resentment and indignation engendered by the report are not based on any loss of business, or any loss of dollars and cents. They arise from feelings which lie closer to the human heart and which, in the long run, are of greater importance. They are engendered by the fact that our people live in an old but modern and active sea port, one which has generations of sea tradition behind it, that has known great days in the past when it was the fifth largest ship-owning port in the world, and it looks forward, too, to greater days in the future, as our country develops. Our people regard this unit as part of its community life and part of its sea tradition.

I should think the feelings of the people of Toronto would be very much hurt if they were informed that the Queen's Own, or some other militia unit belonging to that city, were to be moved bag and baggage to the city of Quebec. The people of Ottawa would be equally disturbed if they were to hear that the Governor General's Foot Guards were to be transferred to Truro. And I say that the people of Saint John are very perturbed over this report.

There appeared in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick, on Tuesday last, an editorial, which I believe voices the feelings of the people of that city to a considerable extent. It is headed "Prevent this Injury", and states:

> The incomplete news received as regards what is to happen to H.M.C.S. Brunswicker gives rise to serious misgivings. If things actually proceed as they appear to be shaping, it will mean that the training of R.C.N.V.R. ratings will cease, or almost cease, here and be moved to a Nova Scotian port, leaving few more than a recruiting staff. The news is indefinite, but it contains a threat that hon. Angus L. Macdonald, Minister of Defence for Naval Services, has in mind some plan that, as at present represented, will be definitely detrimental to Saint John. No reason has been given.
> This, coming on top of the establishment of a naval signals training school in an inland town in the province of Quebec, seems to challenge every New Brunswick member of parliament and senator to combine and make their influence felt to prevent the plan being carried through. New Brunswick has no desire to attack Mr. Macdonald, but it has not the slightest intention of sitting down and permitting neglect and discrimination. When these are foreshadowed they must be prevented. During war time we all have enough to do to fight the enemy, and in New Brunswick at least we have more sense than to wish to join battle with a minister of the crown. However, if the latter starts something harmful to us, he will find us not backward in self-defence. Therefore it is to be hoped that joint action by all New Brunswick representatives in Ottawa, irrespective of party, will succeed in averting that which has the makings of very hard feelings.

When the war appropriation bill was before the house in committee last May and the minister's estimates were being considered, we were informed by him that $635,500 was being set aside for the erection of piers, buildings and the provision of other services in Saint John. Of this amount, $190,000 was a carry-over from the previous year. This amount was small compared with the $7,500,000 which we were told was to be spent in Halifax, with the $4,469,000 which we were told was to be spent at the Sydney base and with the $2,500,000 which we were told was to be spent at Esquimalt. We were not told on that occasion about the $20,000,000—I have not the exact figures—that was to be spent at Deep Brook in Annapolis county, Nova Scotia. No mention of the fact was made that a development was to take place there, and as far as I can recollect no mention was made of the fact that $2,624,000 was to be spent in constructing a naval establishment at the inland town of St. Hyacinthe in Quebec, although the plans for these establishments must have been well under way at that time. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services told us at that time that an administration building was to be built at Saint John at a cost of $25,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very modest.

Mr. HAZEN: Very modest, but we would have been glad to get it. We were told also that barracks costing $40,000 and a recreation building to cost $7,000 were to be erected. These are not large sums compared with what was being spent elsewhere, but we would have been glad to get them. However, as far as I know none of these building has been erected. If any building has been erected, I should like the minister to tell us just which one it is.

The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services has not found the time to visit the port of Saint John although he has found time to go about delivering lectures in different parts of the country. I suggest that he should come to Saint John and inspect the naval facilities there in order to see just what is needed at the port. It is about time that he came there. Judging from what has occurred since the outbreak of the war, I do not think we can look for much assistance from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud) who is supposed to represent New Brunswick in the cabinet. He has failed to look after the interests of our province. There is no naval establishment of any considerable size in the whole province of New Brunswick. I again ask the minister to visit our province and inspect the facilities there so that he may learn at first hand just what is needed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Would it be quite safe?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will have the bagpipes out for you.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be glad to go with you to point things out.

An hon. MEMBER: As a bodyguard.

Mr. HAZEN: I am glad to have the assurance of the minister that there is a probability —I think I understood him correctly—that this unit will not be removed from Saint John. If the government have in mind any such plan as I have mentioned I urge them to drop it and to see to it that the port of Saint John and the province of New Brunswick get what is justly coming to them.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, so far the debate on the budget has provided each of the political parties in the house with an opportunity to set forth its monetary policy. I wish to speak for a few moments on the amendment to the amendment, particularly the first paragraph. I gathered from listening to the debate that all members of the house are agreed on certain points. I think we are all agreed that money is the medium for the exchange of goods and services and that the chief function of money in our national economy is to provide for an equitable exchange of those goods and services. I think we are agreed also that the success of any policy can be determined by the degree to which it succeeds in distributing these goods and services equitably.

At least four of the parties in the house have expressed their opinion regarding the soundness of the government's policy. I think the financial critic of the opposition is more optimistic about the soundness of the present government policy than is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). For that matter the Minister of Finance and the financial critic expressed some concern over the fact that last year it was necessary to borrow so heavily from the banks—$983,000,000, according to the minister's statement, $790,000,000 of which was borrowed from the private chartered banks. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) made no distinction between the money borrowed from the Bank of Canada and that borrowed from the private banks. To him they were all just bank borrowings. I think the minister made it clear that he would have preferred to borrow more than he did from the Bank of Canada. I am sure if I am wrong in that he will set me right. I think I am correct in saying that he made it clear to us that the only reason why he could not borrow more from the Bank of Canada was that for every $1,000,000 he borrowed from the Bank of Canada the private banks would thereby be automatically able to advance by way of credit another $10,000,000, thereby multiplying the danger of inflation tenfold. Apparently the policy he followed was that of borrowing $1,000,000 from the Bank of Canada, and then taking up by government loan the $10,000,000 which the private banks could advance by way of credit on that Bank of Canada security. The chief concern of both the minister and the financial critic of the opposition regarding this transaction was the inherent danger of inflation. Another danger brought to the attention of this house by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was that while to-day the interest charges on those loans are comparatively low—I think the minister said 2·6 per cent over the whole borrowings—we have no assurance that in the post-war period we shall not be obliged to revert to pre-war interest rates. We have no assurance that the taxpayers of this country will not be required in future years to pay higher interest rates than those prevailing to-day.

The picture as I have been able to see it, listening to the minister and to his critic, is this: It is not this government which in the final analysis determines the monetary policy of the country. In so far as the minister is restrained from borrowing from the bank of Canada because of the power which that borrowing gives to the private banks, to that extent the private banks are determining the monetary policy of this government. I do not think any hon. member can escape that conclusion. There may be differences as to what the remedy is. We in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have attempted to make it quite clear and to set forth in our amendment that as far as we are concerned we do not believe that any control short of the socialization of the entire banking system which will make the branches of the private banks branches of the government-owned Bank of Canada will solve the difficulties of our monetary policy and make money what it should be, the servant and not the master of our economy.

There is a second feature of the government's fiscal policy with which we are in disagreement, namely, the level at which the government has found it necessary to freeze wages and farm prices. I know the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) does not like to hear that word "freeze."

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not true.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I will use some other word if he likes it better, but the meaning will be the same.

Mr. MITCHELL: Say stabilization. My hon. friend knows better.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Without going into details let us review a few of the most significant facts, and I ask the Minister of Labour to correct me in this wherein I am wrong.

The dominion bureau of statistics sets forth, as this house has already been told, the fact that in 1941, eighty-three per cent of the wage-earners of Canada were in receipt of incomes of less than $1,500 a year, or $29 a week. The next fact is that there are many industries, both essential and non-essential which were depressed and in which wages had not been adjusted at the time the government's policy came into effect. There is still a very wide variation in the amounts paid to workers by way of cost-of-living bonus oftentimes in industries in the same location and engaged on the same type of work. Increases or adjustments have been made from time to time by the war labour boards but I submit that in by far the majority of those instances the adjustments have been made where labour has been sufficiently organized to bring the case of the workers to the attention of the minister and his department, and in all those industries where labour is unorganized, where the workers have no spokesman to present their case to the minister or his department, wages still remain low. The argument which we hear raised particularly when large numbers of workers are involved is that adjustments will wreck the government's price-fixing and wage-fixing policy. I submit that any government policy which has to depend for its success upon the government's ability to keep vast numbers of our workers and vast numbers of our farmers in receipt of incomes below minimum standards is socially unsound. That, to my mind, is the weakness of the present government policy regarding farm prices and labour. Its success depends upon the extent to which the government can succeed in keeping those who are in receipt of low incomes at that low income level.

There is not an hon. member who does not agree that some restraints are necessary to curb the purchasing power of consumers or to keep it in line with the supply of consumer goods. We all realize that workers would suffer probably more than anyone else should inflation take place. But I ask the government, is it necessary, in order to prevent inflation, to keep eighty-three per cent of our wage-earners in receipt of income lower than that accepted by the government itself as a minimum standard of living? Surely not. If consumer purchasing power must be restricted—and I agree that it should—certainly those restrictions should fall upon all citizens impartially. Taxation and compulsory saving do just that; they make the burden fall fairly impartially if the taxes are properly distributed. But keeping wages in one industry lower than wages in another, or keeping wages in one province lower than wages in another, does not distribute the restrictions equitably; it has just the opposite effect; it imposes a special set of restrictions upon those in the lower income brackets.

The threat of inflation is used, I fear, as a bogey to prevent equitable adjustments of wages and prices. If we are not willing to make those necessary adjustments on purely humanitarian grounds, surely it has been made quite clear by private hon. members in this house that this policy, by reducing production, is defeating the very purpose we set out to achieve in our war effort. On this ground, if not on humanitarian grounds, I contend that we should find some way of preventing inflation without having recourse to a policy of depressing so many of our people.

I do not agree with or accept the remedy proposed by the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Danforth. He advocates reducing the tax rates and spreading the tax. I should want to know what taxes are to be reduced and where they are to be spread before I could accept that solution. He quoted from the New York Herald Tribune, and I take it he thereby sanctioned the quotation he read and committed himself and his party to the opinion expressed therein. This is what he gave as the reason for absenteeism. It is reported in Hansard, at page 1078:

> "It is that we are spoiling our war workers with wages which most of them never before dreamed of earning."

Later on he says that absenteeism—

> . . . arises because the taxation brought down in the last budget has made it easy for labour to stay away from their places of employment. . . .

I submit that these charges against the industrial workers of this country in war time are serious charges when laid by the financial critic of the newly formed or re-organized Progressive Conservative party, whose proclaimed mission was to bring light and hope to the masses of our people. I shall make no comment except to say that I cannot accept that as an explanation of the cause, the fundamental cause of absenteeism and reduced production.

One other remark made by the hon. member for Danforth calls for consideration. He exhorted the wage-earner to build up for himself "a cushion" for the after-the-war period. Had the hon. member already abandoned hope of his party ever being returned to power? Surely he was not thinking in terms of that marvellous Winnipeg programme when he spoke of the necessity of cushions to help us over depression, unemployment and so forth. Was he conceding the next election to the Liberals when he made that statement?

In speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I tried to show that in Great Britain they had controlled inflation without having recourse to the freezing of wages and prices to the extent that it has been done in this country. The minister was not satisfied with some of my explanations. Let us get the record straight. I have looked into this matter as carefully as I possibly can. This is what I find.

From the beginning of the war to the end of 1941, wage rates increased in Great Britain between 26 and 27 per cent. In 1941 wage rate increases added eight million dollars a week to the national payroll. Wage rate increases plus the longer hours of work and the greater number of workers increased the total weekly earnings of the people by 42 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is that not the point I made when my hon. friend spoke?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That is the point the minister was making, and I want to put this straight for my benefit as well as his. In 1942 wage rate increases added another $6,400,000 to the weekly earnings of approximately six million workers. Notwithstanding this vast increase in total wage-earner purchasing power the cost of living in Great Britain has risen only three per cent since the end of 1940. Since May, 1941, there has been virtually no increase in the cost of living. In the light of those facts I find it hard to believe that the government's wage and price fixing policy is designed exclusively for the prevention of inflation.

There are a few other matters in the budget on which I should like to comment. One is the change introduced in the income tax payable by officers in the armed forces. I confess I was unable to understand what the changes meant, and therefore I wrote to a friend of mine, an army officer who was a university graduate in mathematics. I concluded that no one who was not a specialist in mathematics could possibly interpret the regulations that the minister brought down. This is what my friend wrote in reply:

> I think that the attitude of the officers in this centre towards Mr. Ilsley's proposals could be summed up in two words, "incredibly stupid". We cannot understand why Mr. Ilsley found it necessary to create a Chinese puzzle in order to provide some measure of relief for junior officers.

As far as I can discover, the net result of those changes is that a few first-class warrant officers will pay a small income tax. Junior officers will receive relief to the tune of $150 or possibly $200 per year. Captains will receive a slightly reduced income rate, and all above the rank of captain will not be affected by the changes.

There are one or two things the minister should have kept in mind in this connection. In all fairness to these men we must recognize that many of them have assumed their present responsibilities at some sacrifice. In many cases that I know of personally there was considerable sacrifice. I think we can accept the statement that the salary an officer receives does not necessarily indicate a purchasing power of that sum. A salary of $3,000 in that position is equivalent, I am informed, to about $2,400 in civil life. Officers in the armed forces are the victims of a racket as far as clothes are concerned. I think every army officer in this country will agree that the prices being charged to officers for uniforms are unwarrantably high. They are the victims of another playful habit that Ottawa has, that of changing the regulations frequently as to what an officer shall or shall not wear. These regulations are changed so frequently that considerable expense is involved on the part of the officer in trying to keep up with the changing regulations.

The suggestion I would make in regard to this particular class is that the military pay and allowances of all ranks up to and including a first lieutenant be totally exempt from income tax, and that the tax on officers' pay above that rank be on a graded scale in accordance with the spread between their pay and that received by a first lieutenant.

The minister said that he had received not a single complaint from an army officer. The minister knows that the king's regulations prevent army officers from communicating with the government or with any officers of the government, and that they are liable to disciplinary action if they do so. That undoubtedly accounts for the minister not having received a single complaint.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Where does the hon. member find that regulation?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I think the hon. member will find it if he studies them carefully.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I do not think he will.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am informed not only by officers but by privates that that is the situation. In fact there is such an injunction imposed upon practically all government employees, particularly in the Department of Munitions and Supply. I find that my own constituents cannot talk to me about what is happening, cannot express any criticism of government policy on account of obligations they have been required to assume.

I am not sure that the distinction between those serving at home and those serving abroad is fully justified, certainly not in the light of experience up to the present time. Most of those men serving at home are at the government's disposal; the reason why they are not overseas is that the government wants them here. A great many of those who have gone overseas have been occupying administrative positions in England not radically different from those occupied by the men who have remained on this side.

A third matter on which I wish to offer some comment is the change in the regulations regarding the encouragement given to producers of oil. I brought this matter up in the house on several occasions last year. The point I am interested in is that we are not producing a very great quantity of oil in this country, and that we have resources which we are not developing. If these changes will facilitate the development of our own resources, I am sure we will pardon the minister, in order that we may get that vital necessity at the present time, even if some of these exemptions go to vested interests. In Alberta is produced ninety per cent of Canada's total production of oil, coming largely from the Turner oil fields. The Calgary Oil Bulletin, a fairly authentic publication, gives this information:

A week ago there were seventeen actively drilling wells in that field, whereas a year ago there were thirty-four. We were producing in February 25,000 barrels of crude oil per day as against 28,000 a year ago, a decrease of 3,000 barrels per day.

Notwithstanding the fact that there are 100 proven drill sites withheld and undrilled in that field by one major oil interest alone, we are to-day importing into western Canada from 200,000 to 300,000 barrels of crude oil a month. Seventy per cent of the oil of Alberta is produced from the independent wells, operated by independent companies which are financed through the sale of royalties, for the most part in the industrial centres of Canada. When the oil controller's regulations were put into effect last year the men who had been devoting their time to the sale of these royalties and the promotion of the development of the independent wells of that district were refused anything higher than category A, the same category that was given pleasure drivers. I personally went to the oil controller in connection with the matter, but his statement was that we did not need that oil; that it was not a question of a shortage of oil but entirely a question of transportation. Apparently to-day the ministry has taken a different stand and is bringing in concessions that will encourage the development of oil in our own country. I want to ask the minister concerned how he can justify the granting of only category A, the category of pleasure drivers, to men who are engaged solely in the promotion of the production of oil in Canada. Is there any other reason behind that action? Is it that these oil interests object to the independent companies developing the oil wells of Alberta? That, I submit, is a question which requires some investigation.

I had hoped to make some comment on the situation with regard to cobalt. A month ago I asked, through the medium of the order paper for official information. My motion was adopted on February 22, but so far the only information I have is what I myself have been able to gather. Therefore I should like to be corrected if in any particular my statements are wrong. My information is that to-day there is an abundance of cobalt in northern Ontario; that we are importing cobalt for refining in this country; that the owners of these properties in northern Ontario can secure neither permission nor priority rights to develop these properties; and that one mining corporation is gradually buying up all these properties. I asked for information with regard to a report made by a Mr. Reid, of the Ontario department of mines, which I understand was submitted to the metals controller last October. For some reason that report was withdrawn and was not published, and I am told that the revised edition of the report was made public only recently. I asked, through the order paper, what essential difference there was between the original and the revised report, and I was told there was none. I should like to ask the minister if it is not true that to-day there is only one small refinery for cobalt in northern Ontario; that the producers of that metal must accept a relatively small share of the returns, and that there was a recommendation in the first report that the government should assist in the erection of a refinery for cobalt. I understand there is no such recommendation in the revised report.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the thought uppermost in the minds of all of us each and every day is with regard to the progress of the war, more particularly with regard to our duty in this parliament. We are all concerned about the fortunes of our arms in the field, with their support and maintenance; and at the same time we must invoke the aid of science, industry and labour to the fullest possible extent in order that our country may become powerful and strong. Then we must use this power in the most intensive way in order to help our allies, the united nations, to achieve victory and thus secure the safety of the land.

It seems to me that the budget presented a little over a week ago will give to many the best possible picture of how great is the war effort of this country. It gives us a record of the achievements of the year just coming to a close, showing what our people paid in taxes and what they provided the government by way of loans. With balances it gives us the information so that we can go ahead intelligently to the year ahead. The budget also provides estimates and commitments, and shows us that during the year to come our burden will be greater than at any time in our history.

This budget has been before the house for over a week, and in that time has been criticized by the opposition and commended by hon. members on the government benches. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), in a long, exhaustive analysis, made some criticisms, and perhaps made some suggestions of value, which will have salutary effect upon the administration. He was most cordial about it all—and it seems to me he might well be, a man who had two weddings in his family in one day, just before his speech in the house. A man in that position might very well be cordial.

It is the duty of the opposition to be critical, and it is expected that the weak points or those points which can be improved will be dwelt upon by opposition members. It is in that way we bring out the truth, and make stronger our efforts in the interests of the whole dominion. It seems to me, however, that nothing seriously wrong was found with the budget. The fault-finding was of a general nature. The opposition offered no amendment. I believe that members of the Progressive Conservative party accepted the budget, not as one of desire but as one of necessity, and that they were proud of the accumulated results of the effort of our country. Therefore that party did not oppose the budget.

There are three common faults oppositions find with budgets. First, there is excessive taxation; second, hard times—and that is something which is always held against a government. I think we can say that from a commercial point of view there are no hard times at present in Canada. Third, extravagance is a fault which can be well found in respect of any budget or any government. Strange to say, however, from the groups in the far corner of the house came two amendments, both of which were unique in that they asked for more expenditure and more taxation on the people of Canada.

I admit that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), in the earnest and forceful way wherewith he presents his ideas on money, offered an amendment which he believes is an easy way to finance the war. I am afraid that way is too easy to be of any abiding benefit. To accept it in any degree would be a sign of weakness, not of strength—and we want Canada to be a strong country.

Then, a subamendment was moved by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and this subamendment is something along the same lines, except that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation wants to nationalize the banks. They believe we should have government banks doing the business of the country. Well, from a general point of view it would appear to me that, whatever virtue there might be in change, now is the time not to try any change; rather we should have stability and unity to carry on the war.

I have no brief for the banks, but I think that along with the merchants and the people in charge of industry in Canada, in the past decade the banks have done a fairly good job. I can recall the days of the depression when the banks of the United States had to close their doors. They had financial chaos, but in Canada the banks carried on and were a source of strength. But we must realize also that our banks succeed outside Canada, and it is a good thing when that condition prevails. The banks of Canada have agencies in the West Indies, Europe, Great Britain and even in New York, the centre of the money market of the world. I always thought that Canada was rather proud of her banking system, and that it was doing a good service and serving Canada in a healthy way.

We have the Bank of Canada, which is our national bank. It is a government institution. The Bank of Canada does control the activities of the other banks. If we had a government bank in every town in Canada we would have a political institution, and would thereby increase bureaucracy. While now a merchant or citizen can go to one bank and, if he is not satisfied, can go to another, if we had a government bank there would be no other to go to, and as a result he would have perhaps to submit to the arrogance and indolence of public officials.

It may be that the banks have a monopoly. I know one thing: They do not quarrel in public, and that is a pretty good sign. But if our friends in the far corner want banks, why do they not start banks in this country?

An hon. MEMBER: You will not let us.

Mr. KINLEY: Yes, we will let you.

Mr. QUELCH: What about the Alberta bank charter?

Mr. KINLEY: A bill came in from Alberta during the last parliament to create a provincial bank. It came before the banking and commerce committee. What did they want? They did not want to conform to the Bank Act of this country. They did not want to conform to controls of the government. They wanted a special act with special privileges in order that they could carry on banking as they would like it. There is no reason why provinces in Canada cannot start banks, and there is no reason why they could not carry them on successfully. The hon. member (Mr. Noseworthy) who preceded me spoke about borrowing money from the private banks. It is better to borrow money from the people, but the government used the private banks in an emergency, and borrowed at a price below the cost of doing business. Even if we had government banks I believe that the cost of doing business would be higher than it is at present, with the chartered banks, and that it would be just one step toward that state of socialism for which our hon. friends hope. At any rate the Bank Act is due for review, I believe, next year.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) does not like the profit motive in industry. May I point out that in a few weeks time seeding operations will be in order. The farmers of western Canada will have to plant. I wonder if they are going to plant their farms for fun?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what they have been doing for the past five or six years.

Mr. KINLEY: Or I wonder if they will expect a profit. There is a bit of a gamble in connection with it. If they get rain; if they have the proper conditions of atmosphere; if they have good soil, they can expect a good crop and an increase. If they do not get it, we shall hear about it in this parliament. Furthermore, I want to say the western corporations are very astute. For years they have been able to manoeuvre themselves into a position where they did not need to assume their obligations by way of payment of income taxes.

This afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked whether the wheat pools in western Canada would pay income taxes to the federal government. He probably knew that the Department of Justice had given a decision that the pools were not real cooperatives. I believe the matter is likely to be referred to the courts. The other day the hon. member for Danforth sang a swansong in connection with the taxes to be paid by the so-called cooperatives. I suppose that is a connection that they made at the Winnipeg convention. It seems to me that when they ask the government whether these organizations are to have to pay an income tax, we can assume that they have profits. If they have no profits, why worry about it?

We all realize that real cooperatives will not be asked to pay an income tax by the government of Canada. The hon. member apparently forgets that in 1929 there was an amendment to the income tax act in connection with the cooperatives in western Canada and that the word "reserves" was inserted. The result has been the piling up of millions of dollars of reserves in western Canada by the wheat pools and they have no income tax. I think it is only fair and reasonable that these people should assume their fair share of responsibility. The other day the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) had something to say about cooperatives. He quoted from a letter, although he did not say from whom it had been received. I should like to repeat part of this quotation as reported at page 1168 of Hansard:

> Last year these creameries paid five cents a pound less for butter fat than the farmers were getting in northwestern Nova Scotia where the great Scotsburn cooperative creamery is the yardstick for the price.

I have nothing against the Scotsburn creamery because it is a well run organization in Pictou county, but I think my hon. friend is wrong. My information is that the Tatamagouche creamery is privately owned and is one of the largest in Nova Scotia, doing about three times the business done by the Scotsburn creamery. It must compete with the Scotsburn creamery, otherwise they would not hold their business. The Tatamagouche creamery is about twenty-five miles from the Scotsburn creamery. To say that private business is not able to compete is not true. The same thing prevails all over Nova Scotia in connection with creameries. There is a cooperative at Antigonish, and as a rule their prices are lower than those paid in western Nova Scotia. The government is running three creameries in Cape Breton, and their prices are usually lower than the prices paid in Middleton and western Nova Scotia. This I have in a telegram from an informed source in Nova Scotia.

I believe in cooperative creameries for the farmer because I think they are fine things, but we must realize that the private creamery has an extra burden to carry in the payment of income tax. When a member from Nova Scotia comes to this house and tries to tell us that private industry in Nova Scotia is being backed to the wall, that it cannot exist and pay the prices as against the cooperative creameries, he is not telling a story that is borne out by the facts.

We hear a great deal about profits. I do not contend that profits are divine, but I think they have a place in the divine order of things. There is not a flower or a tree that does not profit in increase by reason of the elements and by reason of its life. In fact, all life must have an increase and profit or it will die. I have no apologies to make for seeming to try to reach out to the spiritual because that is one of the four freedoms.

I am free to say that I am not against big business as such, but I am against monopolies. No country ever became great without big business. While the capitalist system is not perfect, it has served the world for many years and has made Great Britain, the United States and Canada great free countries that we hope will prevail in the struggle in which they are now engaged. I do not think it is the capitalist system that hurts the world; I think it is greed. Greed is a human characteristic; it has not to do with the capitalist system alone. I think greed will be found in every system, and to control greed and those who would control others seems to me to be our object in the future.

It is not the capitalist system that hurts; it is the abuse of that system. War has purged the capitalist system and it has its benefits in that regard. No man can get rich during this war, no matter what services he renders. We hope that the cleansing that goes on, the cleansing that must come to every system from time to time, will prove of salutary benefit.

Our hon. friends talk about New Zealand. Distant fields look greener, and my hon. friends go about as far away from Canada as they can for their example. New Zealand is a little country of 103,723 square miles, half as large as Manitoba. It has a population of 1,500,000 and is completely surrounded by water. It has one government. It is a country largely engaged in pastoral pursuits, and the same viewpoint is largely prevalent. It is not hard for these people to divide their money and services among themselves as they want to, but it must be realized that they make their money by shipping their goods to capitalist England and other countries in the world.

The minister in his budget asked the people to work and save. That is an old and simple rule, but considerable resolution and discipline are required to carry it out. I read a story once of an ancient sultan who, when he sent his couriers over his empire, would seal his letters with a signet ring on which was this inscription—I translate into English—"You cannot go astray on a straight road." As far as work and save is concerned, the road is straight, but it is a hard road and I want to sound this note of warning. While the people will work and save, they also expect the government to work and save. They expect everybody down to the smallest official in the most remote place to save as much as they can and to stop improvident expenditure wherever possible. I do not mean that there should be cheese-paring, because the people of this country expect a little dignity and colour in their war programme and in the conduct of their officials. It will be recalled that Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, called on the housewives of this country to check on the merchants and storekeepers in order that the price ceiling would be maintained. I wrote a letter to the press in my riding telling my people that they should keep their eyes open and that if they saw extravagance or improvidence they should let me know and I would very soon bring it to the attention of the government.

While we are interested in the war effort, there is also a great wave of public opinion in this and other countries that we should be preparing for the future. It seems to me that there is to-day an atmosphere of good-will among the united nations which should be taken advantage of so that when the war is over and conditions are confused we shall be able to have something planned and ready. I think this atmosphere began with the Atlantic charter. That was followed by the mutual aid agreement between the United States and Great Britain. I wish to quote one article of that agreement which is contained in a publication put out by the magazine Fortune. It is a fine piece of institutional advertising for future unity. Article VII of the mutual aid agreement, February 23, 1942, reads:

In the final determination of the benefits to be provided to the United States of America by the government of the United Kingdom in return for aid furnished under the act of congress of March 11, 1941, the terms and conditions thereof shall be such as not to burden commerce between the two countries but to promote mutually advantageous economic relations between them and the betterment of world-wide economic relations. To that end, they shall include provision for agreed action by the United States of America and the United Kingdom, open to participation by all other countries of like mind, directed to the expansion, by appropriate international and domestic measures, of production, employment, and the exchange and consumption of goods, which are the material foundations of the liberty and welfare of all peoples; to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce, and to the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers; and, in general, to the attainment of all the economic objectives set forth in the joint declaration made on August 12, 1941, by the President of the United States of America and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

That is a very fine paragraph, but I submit that the text of it is to be found in these words:

. . . but to promote mutually advantageous economic relations between them. . . .

Note the words, "mutually advantageous". A pretty safe statement. It brings to our minds that notwithstanding the good feeling that exists to-day, in the future practically everything will have to be justified upon economic grounds, and not only shall we have to show that a thing is mutually advantageous internationally, but here in Canada, for instance, we shall have to show that a project is mutually advantageous to the different groups and sections of this country before we shall be able to make trade treaties with other countries. I believe that it will take all the ingenuity and all the good-will we have to prevent economic nationalism from arising in the days to come, and it is just as well to start early and to have the people informed. While leaders and governments make agreements, they have the habit of passing. We had an example of that after the last war when the idealism of President Wilson failed to come to fruition partly on account of what happened at Versailles and also on account of what happened in his own country. The only safe thing to do is to have the people well informed because, unlike leaders and governments, the people are always there and their will must prevail. Therefore let us start now and see to it that everybody in this country is informed about the good-will and cooperation that we all expect in the world that is to be.

I think the members of the house should tell here the story of what is best for their own districts. Since I come from the maritime provinces my thoughts naturally turn to the sea. I believe that as it was in the past so it will be in the future, and that if Nova Scotia and the maritimes are to prosper as a part of Canada it will be by reason of their activities on the sea. The Sirois report gives us a colourful account of the economy of Nova Scotia in what they call the golden age, in the days of the sailing ship. Nova Scotia was then outstanding as a result of her sea-borne transportation. It was then that we had banks, too. It was then that we had a balanced economy and were the most successful part of Canada. There is no reason why that cannot happen again. But after the passing of the wooden ship Nova Scotia never had a chance with sea-going vessels. The coasting trade is the nursery of the sea-going trade, and Nova Scotia never had a real chance even at her coasting trade. In 1894 the British Merchant Shipping Act was passed, section 736 of which reads:

The legislature of a British possession, may, by any act or ordinance, regulate the coasting trade of that British possession subject in every case to the following conditions:—

(a) The act or ordinance shall contain a suspending clause providing that the act or ordinance shall not come into operation until her majesty's pleasure thereon has been publicly signified in the British possession in which it has been passed:

(b) The act or ordinance shall treat all British ships (including the ships of any other British possession) in exactly the same manner as ships of the British possession in which it is made:

(c) Where by treaty made before the passing of the Merchant Shipping (Colonial) Act, 1869 (that is to say, before the thirteenth day of May eighteen hundred and sixty-nine), her majesty has agreed to grant to any ships of any foreign state any rights or privileges in respect of the coasting trade of any British possession, those rights and privileges shall be enjoyed by those ships for so long as her majesty has already agreed or may hereafter agree to grant the same, anything in the act or ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding.

That was the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. Ministers went from Canada to Great Britain on various occasions in order to get control of the coasting trade. In 1931 came the Statute of Westminster, one clause of which reads:

Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions of this act, sections 735 and 736—

Section 736 is the one I quoted.

—of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, shall be construed as though reference therein to the legislature of a British possession did not include reference to the parliament of a dominion.

That meant that the coasting trade of Canada would be in the hands of the Canadian government. That measure was passed on December 11, 1931. On December 10, just before the passing of the Statute of Westminster, the British commonwealth merchant shipping agreement was approved. It took away all that was given to Canada by the Statute of Westminster in so far as coasting shipping was concerned.

Part IV—Equal Treatment . . .

Article 11.—While each part of the British commonwealth may regulate its own coasting trade, it is agreed that any laws or regulations from time to time in force for that purpose shall treat all ships registered in the British commonwealth in exactly the same manner as ships registered in that part, and not less favourably in any respect than ships of any foreign country.

Article 12.—Nothing in the present agreement shall be deemed—

(i) to derogate from the right of every part of the commonwealth to impose customs tariff duties on ships built outside that part; or

(ii) to restrict the right of the government of each part of the commonwealth to give financial assistance to ships registered in that part or its right to regulate the sea fisheries of that part.

The last paragraph is a little difficult to understand. Article 27 states:

This agreement shall apply to all territories administered under the authority of the government of any part of the commonwealth and to ships registered there, or in any foreign port of registry, and fulfilling the requirements as to ownership set out in article 2 (1).

It can be seen that there is no nursery here for the coasting trade, which would have been the start of a revival of shipping. With the advance of steam and the building of iron ships, Nova Scotia shipping gradually disappeared. The United States has always protected her coastal trade by means of her coastal regulations. She has a higher standard of living than any other country in the world. One of the things this government should do when negotiating the next reciprocity agreement with the United States is to ask for reciprocity in the coasting trade. The St. Lawrence waterway will be built one of these days; Fort William at the head of the lakes will be an ocean port, and all Canadians will be interested in our coasting trade. It seems to me that for the promotion of good-will between ourselves and the United States, reciprocity in the coasting trade as between the two countries would be highly desirable. Now is the time for Canada to become sea-minded. Men from the Pacific coast, from Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Toronto and every port of Canada are on our coast at the present time manning the ships of the Canadian navy. The crews of our navy now number 52,000 men; there are 38,000 of our seamen in the merchant marine, and 22,000 who have foreign-going identification cards. To-day Canada is building ships. We are told that ninety-seven have been built in Canadian shipyards during the war, but only seven of them are operated through the Parke Steamship government owned company. For the dominion the others are operated and, I think, owned by the United States and other powers. I believe that shortage of crews has something to do with the limited number of ships we are operating, also that it is the intention that Canada shall operate twenty or thirty more next year. It is also my belief that we must take care to see to it that when this war is over we are operating enough ships to absorb the men who are now in the navy and in the merchant marine; that the future young citizens of Nova Scotia will be able to make a living on the sea, and that Canada will have a merchant marine of which she may be proud.

At this point I wish to say a word on behalf of the merchant marine. Herein is one fault I have to find with the budget. The losses of our merchant marine are upwards of a thousand men. Although I do not believe very much in tax exemptions, it seems to me, as a matter of right and equity, they should be extended to the men of the merchant marine as well as to the men in the armed forces. We call them our merchant navy. We have enough faith in the government to know that right will prevail, but right needs pressure and influence behind it if it is to prevail quickly. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if you lived on the eastern coast of Canada and knew at first hand the privations and hazards which the men of the merchant navy are facing, you would say that they, too, deserve all we can give them, and that whatever exemptions go to the soldiers and the navy should go to the merchant marine.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has already taken forty minutes.

Mr. KINLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to finish. With the permission of the house I will continue. The deep-sea fishermen of Nova Scotia go out on the banks of the Atlantic and are subject every day to the hazards of the submarine. Not only do they not get exemption on income tax but they must pay on the part of their wages represented by the food which they eat aboard the ships on which they go. I believe an exemption in this particular was allowed to the merchant marine, and I think it should be granted also to the deep-sea fishermen, many of whom come from my riding.

I hope that in the future we shall have free trade in fish with the United States. We had it during the last war. There is a quota at the present time on Canadian fish, but I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) will see to it that we get free entry of fish during the war, because then we shall be on the threshold of keeping it after the war is over and so extending the good-will which is so desirable.

The thought I wish to leave with the house is that Canada must become marine-minded. Our citizens must realize that this country faces two oceans, and that in the trade of the world transportation is one of the big factors. Although Great Britain always had an adverse balance of trade, she compensated for it with unseen sources of revenue, much of which was provided by her merchant marine, also by her great insurance companies and her investments all over the world. Do not forget that, after this war is over, the people of the maritimes will need to be re-established. They are now in the navy, many of them as volunteers, and if the government does this in a way that will stimulate our marine, give us a good big merchant marine, and keep our navy going as part of the protection of Canada to maintain her dignity and prestige, it will be doing something in the interest of the maritime people of this country.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I would have desired to offer some comments on this budget submitted to us by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). But since the question of the St. Lawrence has arisen again in the press, in the Quebec legislature and also in this house I shall postpone my remarks on the budget and shall rather make an attempt to make a survey of this situation.

Since last summer I have been under the impression that an inquiry was to be made by the government as to the activities of the corvette which was supposed to have escorted a boat called the Jean Briand from Rimouski to the north shore. But as far as I know we have had no report on the said inquiry, if there has been one. I should like to tell the house what information I have about this corvette so that people will be better at ease about it. It might also kill the rumours that are circulating.

At the time that three ships were sunk opposite Cap Chat in the first days of July the boat I just mentioned was carrying some sportsmen going on a fishing trip on the north shore. Said boat was escorted by a corvette as far as to the north shore, but if my information is correct, this corvette did not complete the fishing trip with the boat, but came back to the south shore. My information is that the boat was escorted at the request of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) because it was carrying the mail to the north shore. However, the boat never dropped off the mail on her way on but proceeded to the fishing trip for quite a few days. That is the information I have, and I do not think it can be denied. The captain of that corvette was later transferred to a "Q" boat which had since disappeared with him. The late captain was not to be blamed for having gone with the boat I mentioned.

Now I should deal with the number of boats which have been sunk in the St. Lawrence. This is quite a delicate matter. Since last November the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) has made quite a few statements saying that only twenty ships have been sunk in the St. Lawrence. On March 10 at page 1129 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> I could make a statement to the house to-day merely repeating what I have already said several times, that our records show twenty merchant ships sunk in the gulf and river St. Lawrence in the year 1942.

On the next page the minister continues, saying:

> I have stated several times that twenty merchant ships have been sunk in the St. Lawrence gulf and river during the navigation season of 1942 as a result of enemy action.

From those two quotations one observes that the minister mentioned "merchant" ships. And we know that there have been some war vessels, such as corvettes, destroyers and different types of war vessels; I do not know how to call them exactly, but there seems to be a play on words. I do not say there is; I say there seems to be. There might be a way for the minister to explain his statement when he says the number is twenty, and Mr. Onesime Gagnon of the Quebec legislature may be right also when he declares that there were more than thirty ships sunk in the St. Lawrence river and gulf. I will explain that. The population along Gaspé and the north shore—the population I know, to which I belong—our sailors in that section are accustomed to consider the waters of that section where Newfoundland is located as the waters of the St. Lawrence, because Newfoundland is located right in the mouth of the gulf of St. Lawrence. That makes quite a wider area than if you take only the middle of the strait of Belle isle and the strait of Cabot. One can find there an explanation of the differences between the minister, the Hon. Mr. Gagnon and myself because I sincerely believe that more than twenty ships have been sunk in that section. I will give an explanation of that. I have here a list of quite a few ships which are supposed to have been sunk in different places around Newfoundland.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is this list an official one?

Mr. ROY: If the hon. member will not interrupt me, I will give him information later on. For instance, there is supposed to have been one, the steamship Connecto, sunk at Otter Garnet, Labrador, but that is not in the waters included inside the two straits I mentioned. Also three boats are supposed to have been sunk at Conception bay; that is also on the other side of the Newfoundland coast. And I could give many other examples.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Does the hon. member call Conception bay part of the gulf of St. Lawrence?

Mr. ROY: I remind the minister that a few minutes ago I said that some people are taking this water around Newfoundland, which is located right in the mouth of the St. Lawrence, for waters which belong to the St. Lawrence gulf, and I am giving an example of that. Some boats have been reported sunk all along the coast, which might not be in the figures of the minister on account of the different interpretation that is being made in the delimitation of the waters between the Atlantic and the gulf.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): If I may ask the hon. member another question, has he ever heard anyone call the east coast of Newfoundland part of the gulf of St. Lawrence? I must say I have never heard of it.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the minister not think twenty vessels sunk in the St. Lawrence is enough?

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. The minister has no right to interfere in this debate, unless he raises a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Any hon. member of this house has a right to ask questions of a speaker, if he asks permission. The minister asked permission in this case, so that there is no point of order.

Mr. ROY: As I have said, it may be a matter of the interpretation of the delimitation of the waters, or it may be a matter of determining which of the various services was concerned. If ever we have a general inquiry to consider this whole question, I can tell the minister one figure that will come out of the bag; it will be thirty-seven ships. As I have said, all these may not be within the zone which is officially regarded by the government as the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence.

I do not claim that my information is always complete, though unfortunately on many occasions in the past the information I had was quite true, as it was proved to be by events which occurred, which became known later. In any event a member has the right to consider and depend upon the best information he can get from reliable sources. On the other hand we sometimes get information which is not correct. Thus last year, after some sinkings in the St. Lawrence, I wrote a private letter to the three ministers of defence pointing out the weaknesses of the defence of the St. Lawrence. I told them that we should have some radio facilities, a telephone line on the coast, and that the most important means of fighting properly the submarines would be to get some bombers at Mont Joli and at Gaspé. I received a reply from which I should like to quote a part. Some information contained in the letter is supposed to be secret, though it is not much of a type of secrecy. Let me read this part of the letter, in order to indicate that the information we receive is not always accurate. Speaking about the St. Lawrence gulf and river, the letter says:

> The area is regarded as one of extreme danger to enemy submarines venturing therein and one which can be given maximum protection at minimum effort, due to the closeness of shore bases.

In view of what has happened in the St. Lawrence since that time I venture to suggest that this information was not quite accurate. This brings me to speak again about the weaknesses of our defence on the St. Lawrence. After those first sinkings in May and July, and after what happened in this house, I kept trying to bring to the attention of the people of Canada the negligence and indeed the selfishness of the government in regard to the situation in the St. Lawrence. After the house was adjourned early in August I went back to my constituency and kept silent, but I did witness what was going on. For example, in the latter part of July, shortly before I reached home, on a sunny day exactly at noon, at Griffon cove which is right opposite my home, a battle was engaged between a submarine and two corvettes. As the battle was starting Mr. Laurent Giroux, a building contractor, rushed to a telephone and called the Gaspé operator, telling her to pass the word to Gaspé military base, where we were supposed to have some bombers. As a matter of fact we have some there, because day and night we hear them roaring in the air. As I have said, that occurred exactly at noon. The battle went on between the submarine and the two corvettes; I am told that later on there were two submarines, but I am not sure of that. The battle went on until half-past one, or for one hour and a half. No help ever came from Gaspé, though the distance to Griffon cove as a bird would fly is only about six and a half miles. No plane went over the area where the battle took place until five o'clock the following morning. Apparently the few boats we had there were not given adequate support by our air force. There was another attack made on the morning of September 16, at ten minutes after six, at Mechins; another at seven-thirty in the morning of September 11, at Cap Chat; another at two o'clock in the afternoon of a nice sunny day at Cap des Rosiers. The people down there know that our planes have never participated in any battle in the course of which ships have been sunk by enemy submarines; and our people wonder why those planes should be overheard day and night when nothing is going on, and that there are none to drop bombs on these submarines when there are fights going on and ships are sunk. That is hard for the people to understand. That is one reason why the people there are alarmed, and they wonder why the government does not take some steps to give better protection to the ships which are carrying supplies to our allies.

Let me give another example of the weakness of our defences in that area. On September 15 one submarine was seen only one mile from the lighthouse at Cap des Rosiers, at exactly eleven o'clock in the morning. The keeper of the lighthouse, Mr. Joseph Ferguson, telephoned right away to Captain Coté, who is in charge of what we call the A.D.C. and also in charge of the telephone exchange at Cap des Rosiers. He is also manager of the telephone exchange at that point. The same Mr. Ferguson telephoned to Fox River, to another man of the A.D.C., Mr. Walter Lequesne. He said he had seen a submarine exactly one mile northeast of the lighthouse, and had placed a board to indicate the right spot where he had noticed the submarine. That was exactly eleven o'clock in the morning. A few minutes later from the lighthouse a convoy could be seen coming up from the southeast, toward that very spot. It was evident that something was going to happen to the convoy when it would reach there. There is about ten miles as the bird would fly from Fox River to the place where the submarine had been seen and where two boats were sunk a few minutes later.

The young ladies of Mr. Walter Lequesne, through the call from Mr. Walter Ferguson of Cap des Rosiers, had been informed of the fact that the convoy was coming up, and that the submarine was there. These young ladies, and the young ladies of Mr. Albert Morris of Fox River, climbed up inside the church steeple to watch what was going to happen down there. A few minutes later the convoy was coming up, right on top of the submarine. The torpedoes started to run on the waves, and two ships went down. The first one was struck at 12.21 p.m. and the second one at 12.22 p.m. The first one went down at 12.28 p.m. and the second at 12.32 p.m. No aeroplane showed around there to help the corvettes. There were some corvettes and destroyers in the convoy. But why is it that the naval officers of the Gaspé base and all the men who could have taken care of the situation, and who are supposed to have the necessary powers to act by themselves, without being obliged to call for orders from Halifax or Quebec, did not give the proper orders to change the course of that convoy? They had plenty of time to do it. The civilian population knew what was about to happen. They were watching the events. It was only the navy and the air force which did not seem to be aware of those facts. There surely was a lack of organization. I could mention a few other events of that kind.

As I said, this happened on September 15. Some two weeks later, after I was sure of all the facts, I came up to Ottawa. I wrote a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asking him to convene parliament in order to discuss the gravity of the situation in the St. Lawrence. To be fair to the Prime Minister I must say that quite a few days later he wrote me a kind letter giving me the assurance that something was to be done, that the question was getting all the attention of the government, and that all means would be taken to improve the situation in that area.

May I be allowed to show that some declarations are not always wise, before proceeding with what occurred at the time the Prime Minister wrote me this letter. I wish to recall the declaration of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) on July 13, 1942. I find the minister's statement at page 4126 of Hansard, when he answers the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and when he deals with a statement I had made the week before. This is what the minister said:

> I am not ready to change the disposition of one ship of the Canadian Navy for him or all the questions he may ask from now until doomsday.

I was not asking anything for my own sake. It was not for my own sake that I was giving information about the situation there. I was asking for more and better means of defence, for more protection. It was not for myself.

At the time I received a letter from the Prime Minister I had the pleasure of learning —I cannot give the date, because I do not think it would be wise to do so—that an important step had been taken by the British Admiralty to give chase to these submarines in the St. Lawrence gulf. It was worth while to take these steps in order to meet the requirements of the situation, but at that time the battle of the St. Lawrence gulf was lost, through selfishness and lack of organization.

These very points I have mentioned, enlarged by a great number of rumours of all sorts, sometimes assumed fantastic proportions, and alarmed the people seriously. It is not only a question of the number of sinkings, but the point is that we could have saved some of those ships if we had adopted better means, and had paid more attention to them. That is the question. There is also the point of saving money for the country. Had we saved only five or ten ships out of those which had been sunk, and had those ships made only one more trip before the closing of navigation, we probably would not see so much war material on the sidings here and there. If some hon. members travelled between Montreal and Quebec I am sure they must have seen tanks and other war materials lying there to rot, through lack of means to send them to the places where they are so badly needed.

Further, the people think that if the St. Lawrence protection had been better organized last year, and if better protection had been given to our ships for the maintenance of that water route, there would not have been so much harm done to the harbours of Montreal and Quebec. They claim that the single-track railroad going to Halifax has been overloaded because of all the materials which have to be transported. They claim this water route deserves to be better protected, that it is the cheapest route, the shortest one, and the one with the greatest capacity for transporting materials overseas.

I now quote from an editorial appearing on Monday, March 10, in the Quebec Chronicle Telegraph. This is the last part of it:

> The St. Lawrence is a strategic factor of first-rate importance in the battle of supplies, as we have said before. It ought to be kept open and in use and there is no reason why it cannot be kept open and in use with reasonable safety—as much safety as can be claimed for any other Atlantic route. Hon. Angus Macdonald apparently prefers the easier way and the Ottawa Journal and St. Thomas Times-Journal are quite willing to let him take it without question. We are sorry but, even at the risk of irritating the former or of being disciplined at the behest of the latter, we cannot let so vital an issue go by default.

That is the opinion of business men and of the population in Quebec. That is why you hear so much talk there.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Does the hon. member think he is helping the river St. Lawrence traffic by making such a speech as he is making to-night?

Mr. ROY: I will answer that.

Mr. POULIOT: He is showing that the minister is incompetent.

Mr. ROY: Is this another threat from the minister to try to prevent the disclosing of facts that have been hidden from the population of this country? I am going to say this as long as I feel sure that it will not give information to the enemy. I believe I am doing my duty. Conditions would be better if the minister of the navy had paid more attention to what was told him. It would also have been better not to write letters such as the one I have mentioned which I received from one minister last summer to the effect that this section was the most dangerous for the enemy venturing therein and that it could be given the maximum protection with the minimum effort. That is the sort of declaration that was made to me last summer when I was trying to do my duty as a good citizen. I was told by the minister last year that he was not going to move one of his boats for my sake or because of my asking. It is things like that which have aroused the population of Quebec and myself and made us lose confidence in the minister. We know that these things are going on as we have witnessed them every day. We know what it means to the cause we are supporting at the cost of so many sacrifices.

I think it is important that if we should know the exact number of ships which have been sunk in the St. Lawrence, there are yet more other important matters which should be investigated in order to bring about better conditions next summer. Therefore, I submit respectfully that there should be a complete inquiry made by a royal commission so that the population may be exactly informed, and all responsibilities established.

Mr. L. P. LIZOTTE (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, lest the house be apprehensive I would state that I have no intention of speaking about U-boats which have visited the St. Lawrence during last year. It is a most important question and a fitting subject for a special debate after the adoption of the budget. I would fain, at this late hour, risk spoiling the sleep and repose of the hon. members of this house who well deserve their rest.

Ever since the opening of this important session, I have patiently awaited until now to speak on the grave problems which this house is called upon to discuss. I have deliberately taken time to observe what is taking place at present in this country and particularly to listen carefully to what is being said both here and among the electors at home. This will put me in a position, I trust, where I can express myself with more moderation, with greater impartiality and appropriateness.

As we look ahead, in this fourth year of the war, we find ourselves proceeding along a road to which there is as yet no visible ending; the horizon is hidden from us by the dense smoke arising from the most formidable struggle yet known in history.

Are we on the road to a victory which will reward us with happier days as a compensation for the sacrifices we have willingly accepted? I trust and believe this will be so. Will the road lead us on to material ruin whereby peace itself will be lost even while victory smiles upon us? I do not want to believe it, but like everyone else I am far from feeling reassured.

The problem which now confronts us is such that we should stop to ponder it. It is not by hiding our heads in the sand that we shall have a clear view of the situation. However, it seems to me that at this crucial stage all criticism should be constructive, that any discussion made for the sole purpose of furthering political interests, playing upon popular emotions or attacking individuals who are not here to defend themselves should be banned from this house. Some may not see eye to eye with the government on certain matters, but I believe that merely destructive criticism, or blind and systematic opposition against the present government are calculated to injure our fellow-citizens' interests. That is why, like most of my colleagues who have been wrongly represented as being rebellious, I have so far wanted to remain in the ranks of the party which has sent me here, while reserving the right to oppose again any measure which I consider detrimental to the interests of my fellow-citizens and this country, as well as the right to agree with whatever good this government may do. I believe that only by fighting fearlessly for those principles which we consider just, by endeavouring to change the opinions of those who do not think as we do, and by remaining consistent with ourselves and faithful to our pledges we can make ourselves truly useful here.

Is not the endeavour to reform our own political party preferable to the creation of a new one? In order to destroy political partisanship which is so often discussed why should some people want to form a new party which, in turn, if it would endure, would have to foster partisanship? I do not regret the stand I have taken so far, as I feel that I enjoy the full support of the good people who elected me as their representative.

We are now discussing the budget for the coming fiscal year. In his speech, the hon. the Minister of Finance has told us frankly about the financial situation of this country. As could be expected in this time of war, the main object of the budget proposals is to obtain an unusual military contribution in terms of money. For the coming fiscal year an expenditure of about $5,500,000,000 is foreseen, and it is estimated that the revenue will amount to about $2,500,000,000; there will thus be a deficit of about $3,000,000,000, which will increase our debt by a like amount. Thus, on March 31, 1944, Canada's national debt will exceed $10,000,000,000, being about $1,000 per capita. These are staggering figures. Yet they bear out the situation in all its alarming simplicity. One has to be a great mathematician not to become dizzy at such a state of affairs and no doubt confronted by these figures our good people, like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and hon. members of this house, will lose all notions of the old dollar sign.

According to estimates, an additional 284 millions of dollars will accrue this year from the income tax on individuals. It has been mentioned, quite seriously, by someone in the Progressive Conservative group that this must be an election budget on account of its being so mild. I hardly believe that the people will be very grateful over this election budget. It will rather be looked upon as a gift from the Greeks. In his speech, the official critic of the Conservative party (Mr. Harris, Danforth) has managed to blame this budget for not being heavy enough, saying that it falls short of a total war effort and that it does not call for all that the Canadian people can accomplish. Just think of it! Just imagine what it would be should his party be in power! After such extravagant language, one almost feels like thanking the Minister of Finance for his present gift.

In spite of present happenings, I say that the Canadian people will realize that they did well, in 1940, when they returned to office the party which is now directing our war effort instead of the extremists who would have caused strife and bloodshed had they succeeded in securing power. Last year, we have handed Great Britain a gift in war material and food aggregating a billion dollars, a step which I refused to countenance. We are now contemplating a grant of another billion dollars this year in favour of the allied nations and I reserve the right to object to such a measure. We have called to the colours about 800,000 men, organized a navy, air force and war industry of such tremendous proportions that they exceed all anticipations; still, we are told, in all earnestness, that our effort is insufficient, that our expenditures have not reached their proper level. It would be unbelievable had we not personally heard that statement.

I feel no hesitation in saying that I prefer the frankness with which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) honestly told us that the current budget was really heavy, that the taxes were truly high, even in comparison with what the Americans and Englishmen were called to pay.

Fathers of large families will feel the pinch to a greater degree than others. Will they be able to bear this burden without the health and morale of themselves, their wives, and especially their young children being adversely affected? I am afraid not. They are the hardest hit and they are more numerous in Quebec than in any other province; this is their reward for having given more children to their country. The minister's budget may well be considered as detrimental to the raising of families, unless some readjustment is made in favour of these fathers of numerous children.

What stand should we take on this budget when considered as a whole? To my mind some parts of it are good, others bad. I have just mentioned an evil which I detected in it. Here are some of its good points: the remission of half the tax on 1942 incomes, the imposition of certain new taxes as, for example, the tax on cigarettes and alcohol, which will, I am sure, occasion no hardships to women and children. During the last war, the government in office had access to the imperial treasury for the financing of the war. It is true that the sums so advanced were repayable with interest. During the present conflict, not only does our own treasury finance our understakings, but it must also supply funds for the imperial treasury as well as that of some allied nations. Both situations must be compared if we are to get an adequate idea of the adventure we have launched upon at the present time. In all fairness, we must also compare the magnitude of the two wars in which we have been engaged in the course of the past twenty-five years. The conflict of 1914-18 was called the Great War; but what name shall we give to the present world war, to this universal slaughter which we are witnessing with a sense of horror?

At this time when our liberty is at stake, we are not always in agreement as to what action should be taken. Our opinions have been widely at variance, but I think there is a point on which we all agree and that is, the absolute necessity of winning this war if we want life to be worth living. The financial sacrifices imposed upon us are tremendous; they may at times involve certain irregularities and social injustice, but these are nothing compared to the air raids, and to the slaughter of the peoples subjected to the assaults of the enemy. May Divine Providence keep such bloody devastation away from our shores. It is far better to pay taxes, to produce goods, to work night and day, if necessary, in order to avoid these misfortunes, and accept, if not with cheerfulness, at least with Christian resignation, the necessary financial sacrifiecs which we are asked to make.

We have gone to war, we can no longer avoid what is inevitable. It is a fit and proper time to say: "the wine is drawn, it must be drunk." I am afraid we shall have to drain the cup to the dregs.

Mr. LACOMBE: I am afraid it will be gone before that.

Mr. LIZOTTE: We must, however, realize the situation without losing our heads and make the best of the situation we have to face. A well conceived war economy requires that the national revenue be sufficient to meet our war expenditures and to maintain our production. To achieve that end Canada must have a normal and well balanced distribution of its man-power resources. To ensure a fair distribution, the Department of Labour must take time to investigate conditions prevailing in our production services. It is in order that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) might have time for that investigation that, on the Address, I voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). Even men married before July, 1940, are now being called up. We might give thought to this problem calling for a better distribution of our man-power.

I am particularly interested in the problem as regards agriculture.

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that at a time when the allied nations are asking us to supply the food required for their sustenance and that of the armies fighting our battles, some of our Canadian farms are either idle or slowing down production for lack of experienced farm workers. This condition should not and indeed would not exist had we kept close watch upon the selective service machinery set up for that purpose. We should not have allowed the calling-up, under the Mobilization Act, of men essential to agriculture. Both publicly and privately, I have repeatedly urged the authorities concerned to grant these recruits a postponement of a permanent character for an indefinite period. Elsewhere, I have expressed the view that the Government ought to recognize, not by words, promises and advertisements in the newspapers, but by order in council, that agriculture is an essential industry and that experienced labour should be dealt with accordingly.

Conditions obtaining in my own constituency, which is essentially agricultural, surely exist also in other rural areas of this country.

The farmers' outlook is one of mistrust and misgivings, and not without reason. How do you expect a farmer, with the sole help of one or two sons, to undertake large scale production if he is hounded by the fear that his indispensable help will suddenly be taken away from him and called into the armed forces? The three and six month deferments hitherto allowed have been inadequate and have kept farmers in uncertainty and suspense. These temporary extensions have deprived the farmer of his initiative and paralysed his courage and energy. I can sense it each time I come in contact with that worthy section of our population. There lies the main reason for the sluggishness and lessened efficiency in production.

It is however gratifying to realize that, this year, a wave of common sense seems to temper this frenzy of mass enlistments. From the ranks of the opposition, in and outside this house, we have had it dinned into our ears that the war effort amounted merely to building up large armed forces, and calling up men between the ages of 18 and 45 for the purpose of despatching them overseas. Those who dared to fight that crazy idea and who were in favour of a balanced war effort and of special treatment for the farm workers were called quitters. When these counsels of moderation were given by some one from the province of Quebec, he was called an isolationist, which was supposed to be the worst insult. What a fine revenge it is for all those who, like myself, have never ceased calmly to appraise the situation, without prejudice and in the interests of Canada, when they see our principal adversaries each in turn admit, in their speeches at least, that we were right. It must be admitted that we did not speak to the wind since those who did not want to listen to reason and who, in their morbid agitation, were ready to deprive Canada of her best workers, are now quieting down, retracing their steps, coming back to their senses, and asking that farmers' sons essential to agriculture be left on the farm. I suppose that the rationing of foodstuffs must have hit them in the right spot and inspired them with this wholesome conversion.

The government give us to understand, and I congratulate them in this regard, that they will ensure a more efficient co-ordination of our war effort in agriculture, industry and the armed forces through a better allocation of our man-power. At the beginning of February, the minister in charge of national selective service took the trouble to write to all mobilization boards in this country in order to tell them that the government's policy would tend to keep agricultural workers on farms, allowing them, after the working season, to accept temporary seasonal employment in lumbering or primary industries, provided they go back to farm work next season. That is an important concession we have secured. I hope we shall no longer meet with the difficulties we formerly had with the people whose duty it is to apply the Mobilization Act. Most of them, I readily admit, are well-intentioned, but their endeavours along the lines of tolerance and justice have often been hampered by the zeal of bureaucrats who are not accustomed to using their own judgment.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I draw your attention to the fact that it is eleven o'clock?

An hon. MEMBER: No, it is not eleven yet.

Mr. LIZOTTE: I would also like to discuss the fuel problem. A statement from the Department of Munitions and Supply has told us what we, who are from rural sections, already knew, namely, that the fuel situation has become alarming. In the town of Rivière du Loup where I live and which is close to huge timber limits, there has been a lack of cord wood during the coldest part of winter. All lumber yards were empty and the St. Vincent de Paul society perforce levied a few logs here and there from private cellars containing barely sufficient stocks, so that large families might be kept from freezing. This scarcity was due to a lack of men for wood cutting operations. The dollar bonus granted by the government on each cord of fuel wood is good policy, but I would recommend extending the time until September. This particular work requires hands which must be found and the solution of this problem is up to the selective service if a part of our population is not to freeze to death next winter.

My allotted time precludes any discussion of farm problems which are not without importance. I will take the matter up on another occasion.

Frankly I do believe such claims as I have put forth are quite legitimate. I have no intention of embarrassing the government and my only wish is to make them fully acquainted with the legitimate feelings of the electors. Let the government, even in war time, follow a truly social and Canadian policy, let them implement their plans for the social security of our population in the post-war period, let them see that everyone is treated fairly, that the minority get its appropriate share, not only of responsibilities, but of rights as well, and thus the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will be assured that harmony will easily be established at least among his supporters. This is the heartfelt hope of every one of us.

On motion of Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Lizotte.]

Tuesday, March 16, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

SOCIAL SECURITY

First report of special committee on social security.—Mr. Macmillan.

FUEL SHORTAGE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave under standing order 31 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the urgent need for prompt and drastic action by the dominion government to prevent suffering by the Canadian people through a shortage of fuel.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to hon. members that the time has come when this house must give the most careful consideration to the fuel situation in Canada, because in this country, whether we like it or not, fuel is a necessity of life and the fuel situation at the present time is very serious. I do not have to rely on my own opinion in making that statement; I have very good proof to support it in statements that have been issued by the government.

The first aspect of the situation is that there has been during the present winter a great shortage of fuel; and winter, much to our discomfort, still continues at least in this part of the dominion. Only a few days ago the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who is now responsible for Canada's fuel policy, issued a remarkable release dealing with the question. It is release No. 216a dated March 4, 1943; and dealing with the fuel situation during the present winter we find this statement:

> Despite appeals made last year for an increased production of cordwood, insufficient was cut to last out this winter and some sections of the country already have suffered extreme hardship.

Further along in the press release we find some details of this hardship:

> In one small town, within seventy-five miles of Ottawa, families unable to obtain fuelwood have been compelled to leave their houses and move into the already crowded homes of their neighbours. In the same town, and in other Ontario and Quebec localities, people have been obliged to burn fences, doors and flooring in order to keep warm.

In another portion we find the statement that there has also been a critical shortage of coal during the present winter. I think most hon. members will agree with me when I say further that there has been great suffering on the part of the Canadian people, and that there has been great loss to the war effort, in that through illness or for one reason or another men have lost many hours of work in war industry.

So much for the present winter. But there is also a serious danger of a greater shortage next winter unless immediate action is taken. I find authority for this statement in this same press release which begins as follows:

Canada faces a wood fuel famine so serious that unless immediate action is taken many thousands may be unable to heat their houses adequately next winter; families may be forced to vacate their homes, and the health of others may be adversely affected.

The statement goes on to quote the Minister of Munitions and Supply as follows:

"Generally speaking," Mr. Howe says, "the prospect for next winter is very serious for the tens of thousands whose homes are not equipped for heating or cooking with anything but wood. It is no less serious for those who have been burning wood in furnaces and stoves in which either coal or wood may be consumed, for the shortage of coal has been critical this winter, and there is every likelihood that it may become more critical in the coming winter. Because less coal may be available, the demand for wood fuel is likely to rise."

At the beginning of the concluding paragraph we find this sentence:

But if the shortages of wood fuel were severe this winter they will be much more severe next winter, unless immediate action is taken.

A few days later—in fact only five days ago, on March 11,—the Department of Munitions and Supply published an advertisement in many Canadian newspapers. I hold it in my hand, and I find that it is headed, in large type "Warning". Below that are the words "Canada faces a wood fuel famine next winter". The first paragraph reads:

Are you one of the Canadian householders who burned fences, doors and even flooring to keep warm in this winter's sub-zero weather?

Another paragraph says:

The dominion government recognizes that the wood fuel shortage is so serious that, even with the full cooperation of everyone in affected communities an adequate supply is not assured.

So that there can be no doubt whatsoever that the fuel situation is very serious.

Normally this would not be the concern of the dominion government; I realize that. Normally it would be left to the local authorities, and left of course to the law of supply and demand. In other words it would be a matter for the fuel dealers and the fuel producers, along with the people in the various communities. But now the dominion government must step in, because this is a war emergency problem. That fact is recognized in the same press release, where we find these words:

"The Department of Munitions and Supply," said the minister, "recognizes that this emergency situation has been created in large part by the war conditions."

Of this there can be no doubt. In the first place the dominion government has absolute and unlimited control over man-power. The dominion government has the responsibility for the distribution of man-power. It has the power not only to set a ceiling on prices, but also to say at what prices fuel must be sold. The dominion government has stepped in in many localities and set up fuel control boards which in a measure have interfered with fuel distribution in localities in which these boards are functioning.

I repeat that this is now a problem for the government of Canada. What has the government done about it Well, after a great deal of pressure and much delay it announced on March 4, or about that time—the date of this press release—what its fuel policy would be. I shall not read it in detail, but it may be summed up as follows:

First of all, there is to be a subsidy of one dollar per cord paid to the dealers on all commercial fuel wood contracted for and cut on or before June 30 of this year, and held to dealers' account on that date. Hon. members will notice that this applies only to wood contracted for and cut on or before June 30 of the present year—that is, within the next three and a half months. The coal controller has been authorized to pay such portion of the transportation costs as he considers proper in respect of fuel wood, particularly where dealers find it necessary to contract for fuel wood at locations outside the areas from which they normally derive their supply. The coal controller will repurchase from the dealer at the dealer's cost the fuel wood on which the subsidy of one dollar per cord has been paid, and which is still in the dealer's hands on the 31st of May of next year, 1944. Assistance is to be given in providing priorities for necessary equipment. Farmers who leave their farms temporarily in response to this appeal to engage in cutting fuel wood are to be deemed, by the national selective service authorities, to be carrying out their regular occupation as farmers, and to be given the right to deferment from military service which such occupation now carries. There is however a proviso, which, I think, renders the last-named promise much less effective by providing that such temporary absence should not interfere with agricultural production. In other words the farmer is to do his farming first; then if he has any time left he is to produce fuel wood.

That is the first branch of the government's fuel policy. Hon. members will notice that it leaves it to someone else to produce the fuel. These provisions go into effect only when somebody else has taken the initiative of getting out the fuel, or arranging to get it out. The way that works is clearly explained by an article which appears in the Vancouver Province of March 10, purporting to set out an interview with a fuel dealer. It states this as the opinion of the dealers:

Unanimously they declare the problem is one of man-power. "Get men into the woods, the mines, and the saw mills, and your fuel worries will be over," one dealer said. "Subsidies will not do any good if you have not got the men to produce the stuff."

Another dealer said:

Right now I have got carloads of coal idle on rail sidings without men to unload them, although I have had orders for labour with the selective service for several days.

In the Vancouver Province of March 11, we find pictures of these coal cars, for the unloading of which no men can be found. The article explaining the pictures says:

While many Vancouver homes are still dangerously short of fuel and local coal dealers attempt to cope with stacks of unfilled orders, carloads of coal are standing idle at railroad sidings here because of a lack of labour to unload it.

Milder weather in the past week has stepped up coal shipments from Alberta mines, dealers report, but their appeals to selective service for extra labour to shift the coal from box-car to truck have been in vain.

That shows just how far this fuel policy does or does not go when it comes to the working out of the policy in a community. But there is a second branch of the government's fuel policy, it is to shove off the problem on to the local authorities, on to the municipalities. In other words, the Minister of Munitions and Supply by his fuel policy is attempting to place the fuel baby right on the laps of all the city fathers across Canada. He explains that quite carefully in the press release from which I have quoted, where he says:

This is a problem which primarily belongs to municipal and township authorities.

I submit to you, sir, and to the members of this house that that is where the policy is dead wrong; that is where the policy must be changed. I submit that the primary responsibility must rest upon this dominion government rather than upon the municipal authorities. In support of my submission I propose to quote from a resolution which was passed by the city council of my home city of Vancouver on March 9, a copy of which was sent to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. It recites that on February 9 the council forwarded to Ottawa a resolution pointing out that the wartime prices and trade board had power to produce and distribute fuel and to require any person possessing fuel to deal with it in such manner as the board may prescribe. It says that the city council have no such power, and goes on to say:

And whereas the supply of man-power in the production of fuel and the prices to be charged for fuel are both matters solely within the powers of the federal authorities and are fundamental to any solution of the problem;

Another recital reads:

And whereas there has now been received by his worship the mayor two letters from the coal controller, dated March 6, 1943, suggesting that the question of the supply of fuel in this city should be assumed by this council, and urging that the city provide a large reserve stock pile of fuel wood in the city;

It then sets out the views of the council of the third largest city in Canada on this fuel question, the city which has been hardest hit. I quote:

Therefore be it resolved that this council reiterates its former stand that it has no such control of man-power or prices as would enable it to undertake the securing and distribution of fuel in this city, and repeats that it is without legal power to engage in the production of fuel This council again points out that the problem is essentially one of man-power and that only federal authority can control that man-power. Unless men are put to work in the coal mines and in the woods, the shortage of fuel must continue. Only Ottawa can give the necessary direction to man-power, and it would be deceiving the public to suggest that this council can do so;

I admit at once that the citizens in the various cities and municipalities and townships of Canada can help, and I think it is right that they should be asked to help as much as possible. But the dominion government must accept the primary responsibility. This means that the Minister of Munitions and Supply, even more so the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and perhaps also the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who got rid of the problem quite neatly by passing it on to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, must accept primary responsibility for the production of fuel for the citizens of Canada.

I do not like to close without offering some suggestions, for what they may be worth. Others may be offered, but these the government should certainly act upon. First of all, the government should declare both the production and the distribution of fuel an essential industry. The government should so distribute man-power as to provide the necessary man-power for the production and distribution of fuel; by this time the government should know what man-power is required for this purpose. The government should set fair wages for the men engaged in the industry, and should set fair prices for the fuel. Perhaps forestry companies or forestry battalions should be set up such as those Canada has in Great Britain; such a step might help in the solution of this problem. Finally, the government should be prepared if necessary to ration fuel for the coming winter. Fuel is a necessity of life in Canada. The government has announced that its policy is to ration the necessities of life when necessary, and should be prepared to do this in connection with fuel for the coming winter.

In conclusion I repeat that this is primarily a problem for the dominion government. It cannot be evaded by the government. I stand behind what is contained in the statement given to His Honour the Speaker that there is an urgent need for prompt and drastic action by the dominion government to prevent suffering by the Canadian people through a shortage of fuel. In the press release and the advertising from which I have read, both emanating from the Department of Munitions and Supply, stress has been placed upon the need for immediate action by the municipal authorities —in other words, the need for immediate action by someone else. I close by pointing out that the need for immediate action is a need for such action by the dominion government.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the present fuel situation in Canada is of such importance that it certainly deserves the consideration of the house. Recent press dispatches have indicated that there is a most serious fuel shortage throughout the entire dominion. The press dispatches quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) bear this out, as do the official statements made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). The release issued by the department states that this problem is one which belongs primarily to the municipal and township authorities. But in making that statement the minister overlooked the fact that the fuel shortage which has existed during the past winter and which still exists is due to the action of the wartime prices and trade board in setting a ceiling price in August, 1942, without any consultation with the municipalities to whom they now wish to pass the problem. They set a price which was far too low.

The village of Marmora is located close to large wood areas and woodlots. One local dealer contracted last summer to take out 2,500 cords of fuel wood. In August, when a price ceiling was placed on fuel, he cancelled every contract and did not take out one cord of wood. He could not operate at the prices set by the wartime prices and trade board. The action taken by this contractor in Marmora was duplicated in many other places in eastern Ontario. When the price ceiling was put on, the labour that was usually available in the fall for work in the bush and in lumbering operations was soon absorbed in the mines and industrial plants in the surrounding area. It is quite true that in January of this year, when the price was raised $2 a cord, the operators could operate at a profit, but the whole problem then was to obtain the necessary labour. The subsidy of $1 a cord to be paid to dealers, and the assistance that is to be given in transportation costs, will help. But it all comes back to the question of man-power.

The minister has announced that the wood fuel shortage within the next few months will be somewhere around half a million cords. I quite realize that it does not help at this late day to say that this shortage is due to muddling, but I do say it all comes back to the lack of a proper man-power policy on the part of this government. Until recently few people considered that wood was an essential, and very little attention was paid to the seasonal labour employed in cutting wood. These men were allowed to drift into industry or were called up for military service. In his statement to the house a short time ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) announced his plans for farm labour but made no reference to what he proposed to do with respect to the shortage of man-power in the fuel wood industry. It is strange that he failed to make reference to the serious situation that exists to-day in the fuel wood industry. That situation prevails in most of Quebec, and yet the minister and the government allowed a very large number of Canadian woodsmen to leave this country to work in the lumber and logging industries of the United States.

This release from the Department of Munitions and Supply also states:

> No central authority could with any degree of efficiency take the necessary steps to meet local demands which are so diverse in different localities.

I ask the minister, why, is it not possible to organize units which could be moved from district to district where wood is available for cutting? It seems to me that in view of the serious situation which now exists there must be some over-all organization established, with central authority, if we are to obtain proper results. Under the regulations for the control of man-power the minister has the authority and the power to transfer men from one industry to another and to place men wherever they are most needed.

As pointed out by the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) this release of March 4, 1943, does make some provision for farmers cutting wood; but as most hon. members know, the average farmer and farm hand at this late date in the season has very little time in which to engage in cutting wood. I wish to second the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South that labour battalions or forestry units be established. There must be many men in the home defence forces who have had experience in this type of work. In addition there are the conscientious objectors, and the Doukhobors and the German and Italian war prisoners. Surely from this large body of man-power the minister can obtain sufficient men to undertake this very important work.

Some time ago the minister announced that about four thousand coal miners had been returned to the coal mines in order to cope with the shortage of coal. Why, then, cannot men with experience in wood cutting be returned to do that kind of work?

There is also the question of the necessary equipment for cutting and taking out wood. The minister attempts to pass the responsibility to the individual municipality, but when you analyse that proposal, how can the individual municipality obtain the necessary equipment, trucks, and so forth, to transport the men many miles back and forth each day in order to furnish the municipality with its own individual wood supply? It seems to me that instead of having hundreds of small municipalities trying to operate on a very small scale, and considerable expense which must in the end be borne by the local tax-payer, we should have an over-all scheme, with central authority; the government should take over the entire responsibility for supplying fuel where a shortage exists.

Some years ago when the Ontario hydro put their power line through from the Gatineau to Leaside, they ran a very wide right-of-way through a heavily wooded section of the country; the hydro organized bush gangs, which were housed under canvas and moved from place to place, and in that way did a good job in a short time. This gives some indication of what can be done with properly organized labour battalions or forestry units. To-day in the district in which I live men are being offered $4 a cord to cut wood, but no men can be had at that price because no men are available. I suggest that the whole solution lies in the question of man-power, which is controlled entirely by the federal government, and that it is up to the federal government to supply the necessary man-power to meet this crisis.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the basic reason for discussing at this time this matter of public importance, namely, the shortage of fuel in Canada, is of long standing. It dates back to the beginning of the war—yes, and even farther back than that. The problem specifically before us arises from the bungling man-power policy of the government ever since the war broke out.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. HANSELL: Someone says, oh. It is a very easy word to say. Like some other things, it covers a multitude of sins. Had the government listened to this small group at the beginning of the war—I refer particularly to the speech that was made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) when this honourable house through its legislation declared war on the axis powers—we would not now be discussing this matter, because in that speech the hon. member for Lethbridge recommended the total mobilization of Canada's financial, industrial and man-power resources. His proposal was at once misinterpreted. People thought we were proposing that every man should shoulder a gun and be put into the battle line. That was not the intention. The intention was that every man should be called to his task, and one of the tasks in war time is to have a properly functioning industry which will promote the war effort up to one hundred per cent of the industrial and man-power capacity of the country, part of which is the coal mining industry. Had that proposal been accepted, had the government not been short-sighted in this matter, the coal mines of Canada to-day would be well manned and there would be no shortage of coal.

It is very hard for us to realize that in a country such as Canada, which contains fourteen per cent of the entire world's coal deposits, and includes, let me say, the province of Alberta, which has eighty-five per cent of Canada's coal deposits, anyone should go cold in winter time. Some of us have correspondence on this subject on our files, and the government are aware of it because they were approached during the past winter by many municipalities and cities in this country warning them that our citizens were going cold because they could not get fuel. The condition is a serious one, particularly when looked upon in the light of the fact that we have in this country so much coal and other forms of fuel.

Some of us come from coal mining constituencies. We are aware of the problem and we look at it in the light of the fact that coal mining in Canada is a large industry. About eighteen months after the war broke out I realized what might happen should there be a shortage of coal, and at once got in touch with the then minister of labour, the present Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty). I had a talk with him and as a consequence told him I would write him outlining my conception of a coal policy for Canada in the event of unforeseen circumstances coming into the picture. On April 4, 1941, I wrote this letter to the minister:

Hon. N. A. McLarty,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Minister,

Pursuant to my interview with you in regard to the coal situation in Canada as it is related to probable unforeseen events during time of war, may I present to you the following for your careful consideration.

Much has been said in the past concerning future markets in Canada for Canadian coal, and while I have consistently urged in and out of parliament that these markets be increased to a point where all Canadian mines are operating at full capacity, I would impress you, sir, from my observations I have concluded that although all coal mines in Canada, as presently equipped were producing to capacity, such production would not nearly supply Canadian demand without the aid of coal imports. This being so it therefore follows that the great industrial areas of Canada must be, at the present time, largely dependent upon the ability of the country to obtain coal from other countries, or increase considerably our own potential production.

This consequently raises the question of any possibility arising whereby difficulty would be faced in obtaining sufficient coal to avoid a break-down in our wartime production.

According to information published by the wartime economic coal committee only three per cent of the annual production of American coal finds its way to Canada. The meaning of this is alarming, when considered in the light of even a slight break-down in the American coal industry. Should the United States increasingly require coal for their own wartime industries, and anything happened which would reduce their own output by only three per cent thus making it difficult to supply Canada with coal, our own wartime industry would be almost completely stopped, and little or nothing could be done about it.

One might venture to ask what possibilities there are that would cause any breakdown in the output of coal. One answer to this is the likelihood of labour troubles. That, Mr. Minister, is my particular reason for addressing this to you, and I would earnestly suggest that you make suitable inquiries at Washington as to the labour situation as it exists or might eventually exist in the coal mining industry of America.

Quite recently the press have carried dispatches which show that labour is having its troubles in the United States. As you have noticed under date of March 31 news comes to the effect that the President of United States interceded to prevent a strike of some 330,000 coal miners.

I trust it will not be considered an imposition on my part to suggest to the government that they take special care to prepare for any eventuality which might arise. This can be done by so managing our affairs as to gradually bring the coal mining industry of Canada to a place where we are not dependent upon outside sources. I would urge that this is a serious matter as to deserve the very best attention of the government.

I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to the Hon. Mr. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, and to the Hon. Mr. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Yours very truly,

Ernest G. Hansell,
Member of Parliament.

I received a cordial reply from the then minister of labour. I might say in passing that I received an acknowledgment from the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) but not from the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). The then minister of labour gave quite an exposition of the situation as it existed. But one paragraph reads thus:

It is quite true, as you state, that the amount of United States bituminous coal imported into Canada represents about three per cent of the total United States output, to be exact it was 2·52 per cent in 1939 and 3·55 per cent in 1940. It must be remembered however that the four hundred and fifty-three million tons of bituminous coal produced in the United States in 1940 is still one hundred million tons below the average produced in the years 1923-29; in other words, the United States bituminous coal industry is capable of considerable expansion, and it is not probable that any serious shortage can be anticipated.

I would emphasize that last sentence. Commenting on that statement I may say that the Canadian coal industry also is capable of considerable expansion, and if an orderly expansion of the Canadian coal mining industry had taken place with a view to providing our own people with our own coal, we would not be discussing this matter to-day. I agree with other speakers that this is largely the responsibility of the government, because of its short-sighted man-power policy. Let me illustrate. In one family in my constituency there are six sons, all of them coal miners, with a widowed mother to support. When the war broke out this little family held a conference. The mines were working short time then; miners were looking for something else to do to keep out of the bread line. The boys said: "We will all enlist; we will volunteer to fight for our country." They looked at the youngest of the family, and they said to him: "We believe you should stay behind and take care of mother." The youngest of the family said, "All right; if you enlist I will stay at home and look after mother." The five of them enlisted. Some of them are overseas to-day. The time came when the government saw fit to put into effect the mobilization act. We thought then that perhaps the government was beginning to listen to the small group in this corner, but I am afraid that was too much to expect. The mobilization act was passed; the country began to call up its men. The youngest boy was called into the service. It did not matter whether he had four or five brothers fighting, he was called up, and he had to go. It was not until the government realized the seriousness of the man-power situation in the mines that this young boy was able to get a three months' leave. An extension of that leave was given to him. Now he will have to apply for another extension and then another. The situation has become so bad during this winter that the Minister of Labour has had to freeze all labour in the coal mines.

Surely it is obvious that if there had been an orderly mobilization of all our man-power, putting every man to his task and paying him what he was worth to the country, this situation would not be upon us to-day. There needs to be a review of our entire man-power policy in respect of this country's needs and the needs of industry.

We see the same thing happening in respect to farm labour. I am not going to discuss that now; I cannot because we are not on that subject. But there is a farm labour shortage, so that the government had to change its policy and send an interpretative letter to the various mobilization boards as to what it desired to do. But if these things had been done with a long-range view as to the best way of carrying on in Canada in time of war, this sort of thing never would have happened. When will the Liberal administration of this country do things in the right and proper way? That is the question I ask.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Speaking in the address in reply to the speech from the throne on February 4, I referred to the fuel problems of this country. Since that time they have in many respects become intensified. I pointed out that on November 21, 1942, I had sent a telegram to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointing out that:

[Mr. Hansell.]

Many municipal officials fear that due to lack of fuel with severe winter weather there will be undue hardship and suffering on the prairies. The present labour difficulties at the coal mines is the result of lack of proper co-ordination by various departments of the government. Imperative that immediate action be taken to avoid a very serious situation.

The Prime Minister replied saying that the contents of that telegram had been passed on to the ministers of the two departments concerned, the departments of finance and labour. I also sent a copy of the telegram to Mr. A. MacNamara, who had just been put in charge of man-power.

My home town of Melita is situated on a direct railway line within ninety miles of a coal field in Saskatchewan. It has been unable to obtain sufficient coal from those mines, and as a result the consolidated school in the area has been closed for lack of fuel.

I also made some reference to resolutions I had received from municipal officials and officers of the associated boards of trade of Manitoba at that time. A meeting was called by the mayor of Minnedosa, Doctor E. H. Clark, regarding the fuel situation, on January 27, 1943. Representatives were there from Brandon, Neepawa, rural municipality of Odanah, rural municipality of Saskatchewan, the towns of Minnedosa and Dauphin. Mayor Young stated that the fuel shortage was a national emergency and that pressure should be brought to bear on the government at Ottawa to do something about it. A general discussion took place, and the following resolution was passed:

It is hereby resolved that this meeting, representative of a large area of western Manitoba, take immediate action to impress upon the government of Canada the very serious fuel situation now facing the people of western Manitoba.

Be it further resolved that the government of Canada be requested to establish without delay, organize and operate necessary wood camps in Clear Lake national park and vicinity, providing necessary labour and transportation facilities to place such fuel at suitable designated points on winter highways. Sale and distribution of such fuel wood to be under supervision and control of officials appointed by the government of Canada.

I placed on Hansard on February 4, a copy of a resolution, which appears at page 137; I shall not repeat it. There was much other information which I received from those people. Under date of March 11, I received further information under the signature of Mayor Clark of Minnedosa. He said:

Re fuel situation in western Manitoba.

A further meeting of the associated boards of trade and municipalities of western Manitoba was held in Minnedosa yesterday.

Minnedosa has no coal or wood in dealers' hands. Neepawa has no wood. The committee has sent Superintendent James Smart a telegram offering $3.25 a cord for one hundred cords of dry wood piled just north of Clear lake. We cannot be sure of roads for a week ahead at this season and have asked for immediate instructions to the superintendent.

We learn that 1,000 to 1,500 cords of green wood may be cut by the A.S. workers now cutting in the park. This wood cannot be profitably hauled until next fall, green wood is too heavy to handle until then.

The fire-killed wood in the Lake Audy area should be felled as it was burned three years ago this spring. This wood, if made available, could be hauled through this summer and make certain that the community shall be supplied through 1943 and the winter 1943-44. The price should be set and the superintendent authorized to sell to the municipalities as required.

A much greater number of workmen must be put at the work if an adequate supply for summer and fall delivery is to be provided. If A.S. workers are not available the government should plan the provision of men. Shortage of labour is the whole reason for this short fuel supply and selective service under its control alone can correct this.

The camps now operating should be continued and greatly enlarged and a major part of the 100,000 cords made available for delivery through the summer and fall.

My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has referred to an advertisement which appeared in all the local papers throughout Canada, headed:

Warning

Canada faces a wood-fuel famine next winter.

It is published under the authorization of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. It goes on to say:

Are you one of Canada's householders who burned fences, doors, and even flooring to keep warm in this winter's sub-zero weather?

The shortage already has affected many communities . . . total stocks of dry wood are nearly exhausted . . . in some places the small supply of green wood cut for next winter is being used now to meet the present emergency.

It goes on to refer to the subsidy of $1 per cord offered under the new regulations. While I am on that point I should like the minister, when he replies, to tell us who ultimately gets that $1, whether the producer or the dealer. I find this at the bottom of the advertisement:

Municipal councils, farmers, fuel dealers, individual citizens, service clubs, and all other groups in communities where wood fuel is burned, are urged to begin at once a rapid survey of their local situation, and to take immediate action to relieve the shortage.

As has been pointed out by previous speakers, this is definitely a responsiblity of the federal government and not of the local municipalities, especially in time of war. In my opinion the man-power muddle and the operations of the wartime prices and trade board are responsible more than anything else for our present fuel difficulties. I have some personal knowledge of this problem, since I own a small river woodlot myself, as do several of my neighbours. Last fall and this winter I endeavoured to hire men and make arrangements to have that wood cut and taken out, but found that under the existing regulations of the prices board I could not hire a man to do this work and sell the wood at any profit at all. On March 9, 1943, at page 1075 of Hansard, the finance minister referred to the price per cord of bush wood in British Columbia. He said that with the authorization of the wartime prices and trade board the price had been increased from $9 to $13 a cord, and that this price was deemed necessary to assure a supply for that particular zone. I assure the minister that this same difficulty exists in a large part of the area which I have the honour to represent. A moment ago I referred to the resolution from the associated boards of trade, in which they pointed out that they had offered $3.25 for cut wood as it was piled in the national parks. Poplar wood, which is the poorest type of fuel wood you can purchase, sells in my home town for $8.50 a cord.

Speaking in this chamber on November 10, 1941, I referred at some length to the brief on man-power and national selective service which had been presented to the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet by the dominion executive of the Canadian Legion, on October 21, 1941, calling upon the Prime Minister to institute all necessary measures to place Canada on a total war footing. This brief asked that the mobilization of man-power should be undertaken immediately in order that our resources of man-power might be used to the best advantage, whether in agriculture, industry or the armed forces. In the advertisement to which I have already referred the minister makes a special plea to agriculture to assist in getting out this wood. Speaking further at that time I said, as will be found at page 4210 of Hansard for 1941:

I hope, therefore, that due consideration will be given by the government at once to instituting national selective service at this time, in the interest of people in all walks of life; for I am sure many ministers realize what their duty requires of them in the present situation.

I am more convinced than ever that the government should have taken that step at that time. It was essential then; certainly it is much more essential to-day.

I take it to be only fair that I should give any suggestions I may have as to a way out of this difficulty. May I suggest first that the price controller allow the necessary price adjustments so that people can afford to cut and sell their wood if the help is available. Then I suggest that wood camps be organized in such places as Clear Lake national park and other suitable points throughout Canada. Here conscientious objectors and draftees could be employed; and in certain cases, under proper supervision, prisoners of war could also be used.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does the hon. member mean by "draftees"?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the Minister of Labour, under whose department that comes, will explain all the details.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member should explain them; he is offering the suggestion.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In war time this fuel problem is definitely a responsibility of the federal government, not of the municipality.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the situation described this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was not unexpected by this group. From time to time in this house, in 1940, in 1941, and on at least three occasions in 1942, I pointed out exactly where we were heading so far as the future of fuel in Canada was concerned. On June 8, 1942, I pointed out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that the coal mining industry in the east, the west and the centre was working half time, and that we were fast approaching the time when the coal supplies of the United States, upon which we depended, would not be available. Again on June 18 and August 1, I brought this matter to the attention of the house, and since then I have waited patiently for the situation that has finally overtaken us.

I listened with great interest to the presentation by the hon. member for Vancouver South, but he made two statements with which I cannot agree, and I want to take this opportunity of explaining why. The hon. gentleman said this was a war emergency situation. I do not agree with that. This is a creeping paralysis that has been developing in Canada, so far as a fuel policy is concerned, for the past thirty years.

Mr. REID: Not in British Columbia.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not discussing wood just now; with the proper organization of our fuel possibilities in Canada we would not require so much wood. When I mention fuel I refer to the recognized national fuel of Canada, which is coal. Repeatedly, through their union representatives, the miners have waited on both Liberal and Conservative governments of Canada with respect to a national fuel policy and the full realization of the available fuel in Canada, properly organized and properly marketed. So that instead of characterizing the present problem as an emergency situation, I say it is just a matter of blundering on the part of both the old line parties with respect to the question of fuel. This situation has not developed over night; we have been watching its development for the past three years, and very little has been done about it.

I also disagree with the hon. member when he says that ordinarily this would not be a matter for the federal government. I think at no time and under no circumstances, in a country like Canada, with its nine provinces and its hundreds of municipalities, can you leave the organization, the marketing and the distribution of a natural resource which is absolutely necessary to the nation in the hands of small groups in the various communities, with any hope of working out any sort of proper solution. This is one problem which was always within the province of the federal government. It is a national industry, and we should have had a national fuel policy with a national marketing board who would have been cognizant of the situation which has developed, and who would have taken steps to offset it.

In the presentation thus far by hon. members one point has been completely missed. It has reference to the men employed in the industry. First we are told it is a lack of a man-power policy, a lack of this and a lack of that. As a matter of fact it is just a matter of getting enough men there to put them to work. If we are to have any satisfaction in the fuel industry of Canada we must have some recognition of the men who actually go below ground to produce the fuel. It is not just a matter of ordering men to go into the mines, or of sending them underground and expecting them to produce to a maximum. It just is not going to happen that way.

Mr. GREEN: I said there must be fair wages.

Mr. GILLIS: Let me point out to the hon. member for Vancouver South that according to a press report men were taken from the army and sent back into the mines. They worked there for a short time, and then went back to the army, issuing a public statement to the effect that they would not work under the conditions and for the wages which applied to miners in British Columbia. They said they were making more money in the army, and accordingly they went back to the army.

The first point to which consideration must be given, if the men are to stay in the mines and produce coal, is that of providing proper working conditions, paying proper rates of wages, and recognizing the problems of miners themselves. Coal miners cannot be kept in the mines if they are given an opportunity to enlist. Men are leaving the mines in large numbers and going into the army, because they are escaping something they know is worse than what they are going into. We must begin to recognize that fact, and make it a part of the organization of our industry.

I say to the Minister of Labour what I have said for the last three years, namely, that the mining industry stands at the root of our country's welfare and is essential to our war effort. The freezing of wages and the usurpation of the powers of collective bargaining of this group of men, who have been organized for the past thirty years, have definitely retarded progress in this field. Neither the miners of the east nor those of the west have been able to come to any understanding with the operators in connection with wages. There has been continuous strife in the mining industry, because they have had to come to Ottawa to iron out their grievances and have adjustments made in their wages.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think the hon. member wishes to exaggerate, but I must say that I saw in my office only a few hours ago the near completion of an agreement with the miners of Nova Scotia. I do not think it is fair to say what he has been saying.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not wish to exaggerate. The Minister may have signed an agreement with them a couple of hours ago. I have no way of knowing that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that.

Mr. MacINNIS: He saw it, which is a different thing altogether.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not see it, and the miners of Nova Scotia have not seen it yet. The minister knows, as do hon. members who read the press, that for three years there has been constant turmoil in the mining industry. One reason for this condition is that when this group of men come to Ottawa to negotiate an agreement they are dealing with men who have absolutely no conception of the conditions under which these people work. These conditions will have to be recognized. There has been a usurpation of the power to deal with employers, a power which was recognized in Great Britain at the outbreak of war. In that country they have never tied up the unions. They still iron out their grievances with their employers, a condition which ensures industrial peace. If the government is to have a national fuel policy it will have to give consideration to this fact. Men underground are escaping from this method of earning a living, and are going into the army, or anywhere else, in order to be clear of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member would not say they go in on a patriotic basis? I do not think that is a fair statement.

Mr. GILLIS: I say it without fear of contradiction, because I know what they are talking about. Anything is preferable to the kind of life they have to live. The mere getting of a sufficient number of men back into the mines to produce fuel is not enough; it will not accomplish anything.

I do not say the government lacks a man-power policy. I do not say it lacks a fuel policy. What I do say is that in the administration of its man-power policy the government is using men who are incompetent, and they are incompetent because they are doing a job absolutely foreign to their experience. They do not know the necessary machinery which must be put to work to organize the man-power of the country.

I have seen the policy on paper, and it looks all right. I have seen many other government policies on paper, and they look all right. But when it comes to putting men on the job, organizing ability is required. The government is doing something which in my opinion is going to tie it in a knot, and will continue to do so in the future. It selects men from every walk of life except the industry affected. There are no men heading up the fuel board who come from the fuel industry, or who know the industry, or have any ideas with respect to the marketing of fuel.

Mr. HOWE: What about Mr. Payne, who is a member of the fuel board?

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Payne?—the last order in council I saw with respect to a fuel board showed that it was headed by Mr. J. McG. Stewart. On the board were the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, and some other lawyer from Montreal.

Mr. MITCHELLL: Also Mr. Payne, one of the officers of district No. 18. He is a member of the fuel committee, and he is also a miner.

Mr. GILLIS: Another order in council was passed since that.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Payne is still there.

Mr. GILLIS: I received an order in council the other day. I think the minister is thinking about the fuel control board, on which Mr. Neate sits as secretary.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Another order in council has been passed. It sets up three men with complete directional jurisdiction over the board on which they sit.

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, that is the order in council I read a few days ago. I am sorry I have not a copy with me. I believe it was set out in a press release from the Department of Munitions and Supply. This press release referred to an order in council revamping the fuel control board.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Payne is still a member, and has been since the beginning.

Mr. GILLIS: His name was not mentioned.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member may be talking about something else.

Mr. GILLIS: No, I am talking about fuel control. The setting up of a board of four or five men here in Ottawa will not serve the purpose. It is necessary to have a board to direct distribution in each province, a board which will make an analysis of the requirements of a province. In this way the national board would have some idea as to the production required across Canada in order to meet demands. This has not been done.

I know, too, that so far as Nova Scotia is concerned there are shipping difficulties. We appreciate the difficulties, and we knew the condition was developing two years ago. I do not see why wooden ships, which can be turned out very rapidly, could not be used in the St. Lawrence trade. We will have to do something about these matters, rather than just think about them.

There is another aspect of this man-power situation. The hon. member for Vancouver South outlined the necessities of the man-power situation in that province. According to a return made to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), being sessional paper No. 149, as of January 14, 1943, there were registered at the unemployment and selective service offices in that province a total of 13,977 unemployed. According to this return the total unemployed across Canada numbered 96,331. If there is a shortage of man-power and the national selective service officials were cognizant of that development, as they should be, I do not think the situation in connection with these unemployed persons who are registered should have been permitted to develop.

Mr. MITCHELL: If there are any miners among that 90,000 they will be put to work in the mines within the month. The figures do not indicate that.

Mr. GILLIS: But they could all chop wood.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GILLIS: This is supposed to be man-power, not woman power. What is wrong with a man with two arms taking an axe and chopping some wood if it is necessary to the war effort?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sure that some of the members of this house who have two arms and two legs would not last very long chopping wood. You must be fair about these figures.

Mr. GILLIS: These are employable persons, and I would consider that most of the members of the House of Commons are unemployable. These are supposed to be men who are looking for work.

Mr. MITCHELL: A bank clerk may be employable, but in a bank.

Mr. GILLIS: As I said before, it has been a matter of putting the wrong people in the wrong place to plan this particular phase of our war effort. It all comes back to the government not recognizing that if there is to be successful administration of its war policy, there must be some planning. It is not a matter of taking in king's counsel and professors and men who may be able to write a book nicely; it is a matter of getting the people who actually produce, who know something about marketing. They should be given an opportunity to make a contribution in this field. If that were done I do not think you would run into these difficulties.

I urge upon the Minister of Labour that he make an examination of this question. It is not enough simply to take a man and say that you are going to put him down in a coal mine where he will have to work for the duration, that he will be frozen to his job. They discovered in the United States in 1918 that you could not dig coal with bayonets. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will remember that particular situation. You cannot freeze a man to a job and make him work; you must give him something to work for. You must recognize that he is a human being. If you are going to get out of this situation one of the first things you will have to do is to take members of the mine workers from the east, west and central sections and use them in an advisory capacity to Mr. Stewart, Mr. Towers and the others who have the technical experience to put this stuff on paper. But they need some practical help in working out a fuel policy.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my approach to this matter will be somewhat different from that of the last speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). As I understand it, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) moved the motion he did in the belief that there is a nation-wide condition which requires immediate consideration and action on the part of the government. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has emphasized the necessity of a national fuel policy, but I do not think the house is especially concerned with that at the moment. I do not mean to suggest that that is not an important matter; it is deserving of every consideration, and it has had consideration at the hands of every government I have known since I have been a member of this house. I am not prepared to say whether we have been successful in establishing anything that could be characterized as a national fuel policy, but I am afraid we have not.

A great many factors have operated against Canada having what might be termed a real national fuel policy. Most important of these is geography, something that is not always recognized, but it stares us straight in the face when we come to consider this situation. Then there is also the question of our territory being contiguous to that of the United States, and the question of availability of supply from their middle-west coal fields. This is a dominating factor in relation to any national fuel policy in Canada. While I might discuss this question from the broader point of view, it is my purpose to confine my remarks to the position of the Canadian fuel supply as it affects our own citizens.

I am afraid the situation has reached very substantial dimensions. I do not suggest that it is nation-wide, but I do suggest that it is a spotty condition that obtains in many of the provinces. I have no particular knowledge of the conditions in the west or in the prairie districts, so that I shall confine my remarks to the situation which exists in my province, as to which I claim to have some knowledge and information.

Under normal conditions we would not have a wood fuel problem in that province; under normal conditions production is usually about equal to consumption. However, we have a situation there which is perhaps different from that prevailing in most of the Canadian provinces. For a distance of 150 miles or perhaps longer we are adjacent to the United States border. This particular part of the United States has very little wood fuel of its own, and for a considerable period of time has drawn upon Canada for most of its needs. I think the situation could have been coped with had it not been for what I shall term the inflexibility of the policy of the wartime prices and trade board which put a limit of $12 per cord upon hardwood fuel in Nova Scotia. If one did not have to consider the conditions that existed in the immediately adjacent areas, I should have said that that was a fair price for hardwood fuel. I do not think the producers in my province would have raised any objection to that ceiling price if the conditions had been different. But what is the position? Within five miles of the Canadian border there is a series of towns where the ceiling price on wood fuel is $16 per cord payable in United States funds, which gives the equivalent of $17.60 per cord in Canadian funds. The additional truckage amounts to only five or six miles, and the result is that whatever surplus there may be or supplies available for home consumption are often trucked right by the doors of the Canadian consumers, driven across the line and sold for the equivalent of $17.60 a cord.

That is a natural outcome of the situation and I suggest that there is bound to be difficulty in dealing with it. I called attention to the matter in a question which I asked the other day of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I did not know at the time that he had unloaded this problem on the shoulders of his friend and colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). I do not think that my eye had caught the advertisement which was referred to this afternoon, but which I have since read.

I have tried to visualize in a sketchy way the situation which exists down there, and what is the proposed remedy? It is a subsidy of $1 a cord. To whom? To the wood dealers? To the producers? The minister can clear that up in a few sentences. His solution, the offering of a bonus of $1 a cord, is wholly inadequate and does not meet the situation. It is really a pitiful palliative.

In an advertisement to the public the minister suggests that all communities should set to work, and that municipalities are charged with the responsibility. May I respectfully suggest to him that that, too, is wholly inadequate. The municipalities have no authority to act, and the problem is so large now that they could not possibly act. The only people who can act are the federal authorities, under the provisions of the War Measures Act and all the other enabling legislation which this parliament has so generously granted to the government. Because of the very psychology of the situation the municipalities will not act. They say it is a federal responsibility. If the difficulty were a minor one the government could very well expect the municipalities to do the work even if they had to clothe the municipalities with the necessary authority, but the problem has reached such proportions that the municipalities cannot deal with it, and, as I have intimated, they have not the power and authority to go ahead and do it.

I can understand the minister saying: We cannot deal with the municipalities. Generally speaking, that situation should be avoided. But the minister and the government can deal with the provincial governments. And where is the provincial government of New Brunswick in this matter? Sitting down supinely, as usual. That government never do anything until they are driven to do it. All they do is to take the subsidies they get, and they do not use them for the purposes for which they are intended. They have a surplus of a million dollars and they refuse to give an additional cent for old age pensions. However, that is only in passing. When the provincial election comes on this summer they will hear from me about that sort of thing.

I want to get back to the situation in my part of the country. The wartime prices and trade board have had this matter under consideration for a long time. I understand that there has been set up an administrator of wood fuel, and that they have had an adviser in New Brunswick in the person of Mr. John C. Veness of my own city. Mr. Veness is a professional forester who knows the forestry business and knows the locality. In a report he made certain recommendations which, if put into effect would probably have taken care of the situation, but his recommendations have not been heeded. I have before me a copy of his report, made as late as January 13 last to Mr. D. Roy Cameron, deputy administrator of wood fuel of the wartime prices and trade board. The report is so long that I dare not take the time of this house to read it, but it is available to the minister and to the wartime prices and trade board. He does make a general recommendation against subsidization, and he makes constructive recommendations with respect to how the situation could be handled. I shall not read them, but I commend them to the minister.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

What I think we should do is this—and I offer the suggestion from the point of view of an observer, a layman if you will, but, I hope, an intelligent observer. I am not saying this in any critical spirit. Some sort of control should be established in relation to both production and distribution. It may be necessary that this inflexible price structure should be raised. I do not think that a subsidy is the right way to raise it. But when you have two price levels lying side by side you can see that, human nature being what it is, and as long as it is what it is, you are not going to have the local consumer protected when the producers can ship their wood across the line and get $5.60 a cord more for it than they can get at home. Surely these wood producers are entitled to a break. I can remember when they were producing wood in my own city for $6 a cord, and the work of producing that wood fuel I characterized as the refuge of the distressed. That was, of course, during the depression.

The suggestion I make would be that local controls in that part of New Brunswick, established under the authority which the government possesses, should arrange for production. It may be done through the stabilization corporation or some other government body which will see to it that a fair price is paid for the production of the wood.

There is a good deal of talk about the lack of man-power. I think that criticism generally is true, but I do not think there is any great lack of man-power for the production of wood fuel in New Brunswick—and I want it distinctly understood that I am limiting my remarks to the western part of New Brunswick. A good many men in that part of the province are engaged in the production of wood fuel, and February, March and April are the months in which fuel is produced in that province. Men who are at home while field crop farm work is more or less at a minimum are now concerned in getting out next season's supply of wood for the market. Encourage them all you can. See that the prices on the two sides of the border are more nearly equalized. I think the price on the United States side is too high. If it were not for that competition I would suggest that the price on the Canadian side is quite high enough, but it may be necessary in view of that competition to raise the Canadian price and have a little flexibility in the ceiling price.

Then arrange for distribution. See that local consumption requirements are taken care of first. After that is done there will still be a surplus to go across the line. I do not want to see any embargo on the traffic in wood across the line. The people over there need their fuel just as our people need it for home consumption, and it must not be forgotten that we have to get certain supplies of anthracite coal from the United States. There is the psychology of the matter to consider. If the supply of hardwood fuel going from New Brunswick to Maine were cut off, it would create bad feeling between the people of the province and the people of the state—and it is bad enough now as a result of tourist restrictions; let me tell you that. I do not think a greater mistake was made than was made by the foreign exchange control board in restricting tourist traffic through control of exchange. Canada lost money, on balance, by reason of that restriction. I do not think the foreign exchange situation is nearly as grave now as it was, and I urge upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he give consideration to the question of removing that restriction, because I believe that on balance Canada will gain. I know the gasoline situation is a factor, but that will have to stand on its own basis. But that is merely in passing. I would arrange for export under permit of the available surplus of wood from New Brunswick to Maine after our domestic requirements have been taken care of. Take care of our own requirements; let the primary producer have a decent price for his product; and be a good neighbour to the friends across the line who need that fuel.

But what is happening under to-day's conditions? Every cord of wood that is available is being trucked right past our doors over to Maine, and nothing has been done to stop it. The situation has just not been grappled with; that has been the condition all winter, and of course it should not be allowed to continue. I think probably we shall get through this season, but we must take a somewhat longer view; for this situation will obtain next year. There is time to plan and arrange for it. In this country we need fuel for heating purposes up to, let us say, the middle of May, and for cooking purposes all summer. Most people in my country burn wood for fuel. To prepare for next fall and the cold weather following, some kind of arrangement will have to be made, and I assume that the department could set up a plan to take care of the situation, patterned somewhat along the lines I have suggested.

Let me tell you what is happening in one part of New Brunswick. A substantial portion of the wood fuel for domestic use comes from the winter operations of the hardwood mills. I know of a place in the Tobique area where five winter mills are in operation, each of which will cut a million board feet of hardwood per year; that is five million feet. I am not prepared to say at the moment what quantity of fuel will be available from the five million board feet of hardwood lumber which will be produced by this firm in those five winter mills, but it will be substantial. I am informed to-day that all the fuel from those mills has been sold to truckers from Presque Isle and other places in the state of Maine, and that not one cord will be available to domestic consumers in New Brunswick. This is a condition which will be very profitable to the producers and the truckers. But the wholesale exportation of wood from that community should be not prohibited, but regulated. I believe I can get for the minister more information on this point if he requires it. I mention it merely as an illustration of what is going on down there to-day, and it is all due to the differential in the price.

I know that this question is not without difficulty. That is the local situation, with this price allocation and price fixing. There is glaring discrimination down there. I do not know whether anything could be done by negotiation with the United States; I do not offer any suggestions in that regard, but I do know that so long as there is a discrimination in price, a very grave difference, there will be trouble in that community and no fuel will be available next year for our consumers in that country.

The government policy of passing this matter along to the municipalities is not good enough, and certainly the offer of a subsidy of a dollar a cord for production is not adequate. To me it is just a pitiable palliative. We must have something a little more realistic. I press upon the minister and his advisers that they take action at once with respect to the immediate situation, and that they get busy on a long-term plan for the succeeding season.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): The subject of fuel having been brought up this afternoon, there are one or two suggestions I want to make to the minister and the government in connection with the fuel situation in Vancouver and the neighbouring district.

First, I disagree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who this afternoon, speaking on this subject, gave it as his opinion that the question of fuel shortage had been developing for thirty years. No statement is wider of the mark in so far as the Pacific coast is concerned than an assertion of that knid. To my mind it shows that at least in so far as British Columbia is concerned, and I speak particularly of Vancouver, New Westminster and the Fraser valley, the hon. member does not know the situation at all. For the benefit of hon. members, and in particular the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I will outline the fuel situation in those localities.

Coal has been mined in British Columbia for many years, and has been used as well as wood for fuel, but during the past number of years, especially since oil has been in fairly general use for fuel, oil has been utilized in many homes in both kitchens and furnaces. Following that, someone discovered that sawdust could be burnt as a domestic fuel, and certain firms started to manufacture equipment which could be put on a kitchen range or stove and also on a furnace whereby sawdust could be burnt.

To say that we would have had a critical fuel situation had the war not come along is ridiculous, because there was fuel in abundance in British Columbia, especially at the coast, until the war started. Those who transferred their ranges from coal or wood to oil were receiving oil from California and elsewhere, and many people turned from the burning of wood and coal to the burning of sawdust. Since there was unlimited sawdust, wood and oil for heating purposes, coal found itself looking for a market. I say that without fear of successful contradiction; and for an hon. member to rise in his place in this house and say that a condition of fuel shortage has been developing for thirty years is, I contend, not according to the facts, and I feel it my duty to rise and say so.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. REID: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question let him ask it, but I will not allow an interruption unless he asks a question, which I will do him the courtesy of permitting him to do.

Mr. GILLIS: I am rising to a point of order.

Mr. REID: Well, if the hon. member is rising to a point of order I shall have to sit down.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Vancouver—

Mr. REID: New Westminster. Keep that right.

Mr. GILLIS: —put words in my mouth. The hon. member for Vancouver East raised a national—

Mr. REID: He comes from Vancouver South.

Mr. GILLIS: —problem, and I discussed it in its national aspect. I was not talking about sawdust or wood.

Mr. REID: Is that the hon. member's point of order?

Mr. GILLIS: Just a moment. The hon. member has definitely stated that the coal of his province is looking for a market, and that is exactly what my remarks had reference to, not to sawdust or wood.

Mr. REID: Well, Mr. Speaker, you may see a point of order in what the hon. member is saying, but I do not. It may be that I do not understand all the rules. I repeat that it is plainly ridiculous to talk about a fuel policy in coal as affecting British Columbia, because coal, by the time the war came along, had been relegated in that province not to the bottom but to second or third place.

Mr. GILLIS: I was speaking for your miners.

Mr. REID: The hon. member should have kept to that, and probably he would have been far better off.

Mr. GILLIS: I did.

Mr. REID. He did not mention a national policy at all. Perhaps he will allow me to proceed. The situation in British Columbia was as I have described it. Then the war came along, and with the lack of tankers and the demand for fuel oil for war, many of those who were burning fuel oil found themselves at a disadvantage. Likewise difficulties arose with regard to the manufacture of sawdust. May I say at this point that I have every sympathy for the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) who has had this problem placed recently upon his shoulders, shall I say, and rather suddenly. It is rather interesting to note that just as soon as the wartime prices and trade board got rid of the problem the chairman, Mr. Gordon, writing to Vancouver, stated, "It is not my responsibility; it is the responsibility of the Minister of Munitions and Supply." As I have said, I sympathize with the minister whose problem it is, because it is not entirely a matter of lack of coal or lack of wood, although that is bad enough. Might I say in passing that coal is somewhat difficult to obtain. It takes a great deal of labour to produce coal, and not only that but there is also the transportation from the mines to the bunkers, then to wholesale firms and then the loading into trucks and taking it to the homes. I suggest to the Minister of Munitions and Supply that he give consideration to the possibility of bringing into Vancouver a small shipment of fuel oil which would relieve the situation there to a great extent. I also suggest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that instead of having some 150 men, conscientious objectors, planting seeds and little trees among the green timber for the provincial government during the war these men might be used for cutting fuel. Were some machinery and labour provided in the way of power saws and men who know something about felling timber, were groups formed and placed in strategic localities close to Vancouver and New Westminster, the fuel situation would be considerably helped. The hon. member for Cape Breton South spoke about any man with two arms and two legs cutting fuel. That is like the suggestion that men from the grocery or department stores or clerks could go to the farms and help the farmer with his harvest. Well, they can, but sometimes they are very much in the way. I have seen some men go to the woods with an axe, but at times you have to have a doctor handy because you cannot be sure how they will use that axe.

I take exception to another statement my hon. friend made, that perhaps many hon. members could be said to be on the unemployed list. I do not know what he was doing last summer beyond electioneering for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, but I know I helped to cut my own wood and so helped the fuel situation, and I certainly was not unemployed. That is more useful work than I believe the hon. member did.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): It is not my intention to cover any of the ground already dealt with, but I believe some of us who have had practical experience in the distribution of fuel might add one or two suggestions to those already given.

The matter was introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green); other important points have been brought out by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). I am speaking on behalf of a great many people in the southern part of Ontario, so that it is quite evident that this is a national problem. I recall that back in December, 1942, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) distinctly stated that there was a fuel shortage, to the extent, I believe he said, of some eight million tons of coal. That statement must have been the result of a study extending over two or three months at least, so that we can see that perhaps in the early fall of 1942 this serious shortage already existed.

There was some criticism of the effort that was made to correct that situation. During the past winter those who are interested in obtaining and distributing fuel of different kinds noted that even in such a town as Lindsay, Ontario, I think it was, right alongside an area where there is a great production of wood, the papers reported a great shortage of fuel, and people were even burning their furniture. Such a situation cannot be allowed to exist.

I say to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) from a practical point of view that not only did this difficulty affect ordinary established home owners in this country, but in my particular area there are nearly 1,000 war-time houses. These war-time houses are equipped with a special type of equipment known as the ordinary Quebec heater. They can burn wood. Then someone came along—I do not know how anyone could ever have conceived such an idea—and said they could burn bituminous coal in these small stoves. The wartime prices and trade board or some other constituted authority came out with great headlines saying there was plenty of bituminous coal. Well, if you attempt to burn that kind of fuel in the equipment provided in these war-time houses, in a very short time the lids and doors of the stoves are blown off and people are overcome with gas. In fact, I am satisfied I am right in saying that a few days afterwards three deaths as a result of coal gas poisoning were reported in the Toronto papers. This thing entered into the lives of war-time housing tenants, people who are working long hours to furnish us with the munitions of war. In that particular area if we are to burn wood it means transportation costs. It will not be an economic scheme to transport anthracite coal from south of the border past the doors of the thousand war-time houses in my area or in Toronto or Hamilton and take it to Lindsay, where they have plenty of wood, and bring the wood back to the Niagara peninsula. Therefore I urge the minister to get some coordinated form of distribution.

That raises another point which I personally took up with the regional war labour board and which I want to draw to the attention of the minister. A representative of the regional war labour board came to my area. We pleaded to be recognized as an essential industry district as far as the distribution of coal is concerned, and used as our illustration the 1,000 war-time houses there. But with no effect. You cannot get men; you cannot get trucks; you cannot get tires and gasoline. The gasoline situation is not so bad, but it is impossible to obtain the tires, men and trucks.

The hon. member for Vancouver South made some mention of coal standing in cars. We have a ceiling price; I am not complaining of that, but that ceiling price fixed the cost of delivery, and then arose the question of demurrage and the labour to unload these cars. In the early part of this year I have seen cars of fuel stand for days before men could be procured to do that type of work. The selective service boards have to be approached, and I think any hon. member who has had that experience will know that men cannot be obtained to do that type of work. Consequently we must have a coordinated national policy, because this is a national problem. I have no desire to discriminate when I say that anthracite coal should not be taken past the southern area to the northern parts of the province. There must be coordination by some central authority.

I do not know what the minister expected to accomplish by the advertisement referred to by the hon. member who introduced this question. I know that these advertisements have appeared all across Canada. Surely the wording in them will not solve this problem. It is just a foolish waste of money.

In all sincerity I ask the minister to put the distribution of fuel of all kinds on the basis of an essential industry. Surely what has been said this afternoon has shown that this action is necessary at the present time. I urge the minister to get together with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and work out some way by which men will be made available—not the floaters, the men who do not want to work—to deliver fuel, particularly to the homes of munitions workers. I have seen women come to the offices of fuel dealers with tears in their eyes, begging for fuel, willing to take a small parcel of it along home in the baby buggy. That is not hearsay; I happen to be in the business myself, and I have seen this occur. I ask the two ministers to approach this matter with determination, because something should have been done long ago. The regional labour board admitted to me that something ought to be done, but when I asked whether they had made representations to that effect they simply shrugged their shoulders. I ask the minister to work out a coordinated effort to overcome this difficulty. Do not try to dump this problem back on the municipalities, because some of us in this house have held high municipal offices. Some of us who were chief executives in cities and towns tried to have our municipalties handle these matters of fuel, and I think each of us lost money for our municipality.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not all.

Mr. LOCKHART: Most of us did, but of course the hon. member is exceptional anyway. It will not be sufficient to attempt to deal with this problem by expensive advertisements in newspapers or in any haphazard way. I urge the minister to establish a definite programme, national in character, so that those interested in the industry and those vitally interested in the distribution of fuel will be supported in their efforts to see to it that all our citizens are kept warm during the coming winter.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this question of fuel is a very serious problem in the province from which I come and particularly in Vancouver, a part of which I represent in this house. The crisis in the fuel situation has arisen, I believe, largely because we cannot have controls and still expect the law of supply and demand to operate. There is only one way to meet the situation in the present circumstances, namely, to extend the controls and also to extend the organization of production and distribution. That is what we must realize.

In normal times the distribution of fuel was one of the poorest paid occupations in and around the city of Vancouver. As was pointed out by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the greater part of the fuel consisted of millwood and sawdust, which is also a form of millwood, and the price paid the distributors for their work provided a most miserable wage. It is true that to the extent that the large fuel dealers handled wood, those who were delivering it earned a reasonable wage, but the fuel dealers dealt principally in coal, and a great deal of the wood fuel was distributed by what I might call casual labour. As soon as other employment became available, those people left the poorly paid employment and went into the better paid jobs. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has pointed out that the miners who were taken out of the army and put back into the mines are not staying there, because they can make more money in the army. I remember that last year, whenever the question of wages was discussed, certain hon. members always referred to the men who were working for $1.30 a day. Well, we in this corner of the house put a stop to that sort of talk; and if anything more is needed to prove the truth of our statements it can be found in the positive fact that men taken from the army and put to work in the mines will not stay there because they can make more money in the army.

The city of Vancouver, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), is faced with a serious situation, which cannot be dealt with in the way suggested in the letter from the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to the mayor of that city. In the first place the city cannot go into the fuel business without having enabling legislation passed by the provincial government. In addition it may be quite difficult at this time to get the equipment necessary to enable the city properly to carry on adequate fuel storage and deliveries. But it is not only in Vancouver that the fuel situation is serious. I have no doubt that other hon. members from British Columbia have received copies of a letter and resolution signed by the secretary of the Okanagan Valley Municipal association under date of March 5, 1943. This organization represents fourteen interior cities and municipalities, and it has this to say:

Whereas the present shortage in coal production is of grave concern, causing as it does dissatisfaction and discomfort to the civil population;

And whereas such conditions contribute much to the lowering of morale of those engaged in essential war industries with consequent retarding of the war effort;

And whereas to meet the labour shortage in the coal industry it is evident that methods to adequately meet the industrial and domestic coal requirements may result in the introduction of compulsory service in the mines, i.e., impressed labour working for private interests;

Therefore be it resolved that,

1. The federal government declare the coal mining industry to be an essential war industry and take over full control of the mines for the duration of the war.

2. That the provincial government cooperate in such scheme by relinquishing for the duration of the war any constitutional rights in, or control over, the natural resources of the provinces as may apply to coal.

3. As the government of Canada, through its monthly and annual returns of our economic needs, is fully aware of the necessary amounts of all essential commodities that are required to maintain our standard of life;

Therefore be it resolved that the government be requested to plan such production, through its control of labour and distribution, of such commodities, so that our economic needs be met without unduly upsetting our war needs. Such planning would avoid the unnecessary disturbance of supply and uneconomic distribution of supplies that we now suffer from.

This resolution demonstrates that the fuel shortage is felt throughout the whole of British Columbia, whether the people be dependent upon coal or upon wood fuel.

On January 16 the lower mainland of British Columbia experienced its coldest weather in thirty-three years. In twenty-four hours this brought about an acute fuel crisis. Many homes were caught without the necessary fuel. Young children had to be brought to the hospitals. People had to use their garden fences, and sometimes their neighbours' fences for fuel. Finally, after a week of frantic search as to what could be done, troops and conscientious objectors were used to cut wood.

Here is a peculiar situation: they had to make use of green fuel consisting of fir and alderwood cut adjacent to the city. The price set at that time for that type of wood was $9 a cord. A report in the Vancouver Province of January 25 said that experienced fuel men and military officials asserted that $5 a cord was a reasonable price for that kind of wood. However, the price was set at $9 a cord. This was the reason given by R. M. Brown, regional wood-fuel officer in Vancouver, for charging that relatively high price:

Wood prices, even if charged for army-cut wood, must have relationship to prevailing cost of cutting and distributing fuel on a commercial quality. If it were too low it would completely discourage private operators from cutting bush wood.

This seems to indicate that $9 a cord was a fairly high price for that wood. But within the last few days the price of $9 has been increased to $13. There may be plenty of wood, but if the price is set at a point the poorer people cannot afford to pay—and $13 a cord is a price poor people cannot pay—we have not solved our fuel problem.

I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South and other hon. members when they say that this fuel crisis has been developing for a considerable time. As is usual in so many of these questions, the party to which I belong is in the lead with a solution. The British Columbia section of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had made suggestions, as far back as last June, to meet such a crisis. At that time it made suggestions, many of which have been made in this house to-day. In a report following an investigation, this was said:

Fuel is a necessity of life, as food and water are, and it must be provided on the basis of need, not of profit.

Then the report went on to say that fuel should be declared an essential industry and dealt with as such by the federal authorities. Recommendations included the retention in the province of vital fuel supplies, the manufacture of sawdust for domestic use, the cutting of wood on publicly-owned lands, the establishment of a central office in each city, with power to pool orders and plan distribution, and the establishment of adequate hourly and weekly wages in the fuel industry in cases in which, as I have already said, the industry had been deserted by those formerly engaged in it, to take part in better paid occupations.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who made that report?

Mr. MacINNIS: It was made by a committee appointed by the British Columbia section of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in June, 1942. However, no attention was paid to the report, and very little was done about the fuel situation until the month of January, at which time it became clear that the situation was becoming acute.

Let it be noted that despite all efforts to maintain men in the mines, the number of men working, at least in British Columbia mines, has gradually decreased. I hold in my hand a copy of the votes and proceedings for the legislative assembly of British Columbia, under date of February 11, 1943. In this copy I find answers to a series of questions, the first of which was: "How many mine-workers were employed in and around the coal mines of the province of British Columbia in 1930?" There is a further question as to the number for the year 1940, and another as to the number at the present time. The answers are quite revealing, because they show that in 1930 there were 4,645 men employed in and about British Columbia mines. In 1940 that number had dwindled to 2,874, despite the fact that the demand for coal had greatly increased. In February, 1943, the number had dwindled to 2,365. So that we find that there were approximately twice as many men in British Columbia coal mines in 1930 as there were in 1940 when the demand was very much greater—possibly double that of 1930. Then, the number in 1940 was 500 more than that of 1943. These are facts which indicate what is wrong with the fuel situation at least in British Columbia. It is a condition which cannot be improved merely by tampering with price control structure.

The fuel industry will have to be organized under a competent authority. The whole industry will have to be surveyed to find out the need, and then the labour will have to be made available to meet the need. A difference of opinion arose this afternoon between the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Munitions and Supply with regard to who the members of the fuel control board are. I have here a press release dated March 7, 1943, which states:

> Under a new order in council, jurisdiction over the production and supply of coal, coke and wood fuel, has passed from the wartime prices and trade board into the hands of the wartime industries control board, it was announced to-day by the munitions and supply department.
>
> The order in council creates a new coal control, which will assume the powers, duties, and functions of the coal administration, including the continued operation of the dominion fuel board, which was absorbed by the coal administration in 1941. All supply orders issued by the administration have become orders of the coal control.
> The staffs of the coal administration and of the dominion fuel board have been transferred to the munitions and supply department. James McGregor Stewart, K.C., is now coal controller and will retain his title and powers as coal administrator, under which he will continue to regulate prices of coal, coke, and wood fuel. Frank G. Neate, who has been deputy coal administrator, is now deputy coal controller. D. Roy Cameron, formerly deputy administrator (wood fuel), and Gustave C. Piché, of Quebec and Montreal, a forestry engineer and formerly chief of the forest service for the province of Quebec, have been appointed as deputy wood fuel controllers.

It seems to me that the hon. member for Cape Breton South is rather better informed on this matter than the two ministers.

Mr. MITCHELL: In order to have the record straight—

Mr. MacINNIS: I am just about to finish, and the minister may say what he wants to say when I sit down.

I am not speaking now in a critical frame of mind because I realize that this is a situation which has developed on account of certain circumstances connected with the production and distribution of coal. As I have already said, I am satisfied it cannot be dealt with solely by tampering with the price control structure; it can be dealt with adequately only by organizing it on a national basis.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from the province of Nova Scotia and the county of Cumberland I am interested in this discussion, from the point of view of both production and consumption. Both the province of Nova Scotia and the county of Cumberland are exporters of coal, but notwithstanding this fact they have problems with respect to getting supplies to heat their homes and keep the industries going. There are two large coal fields in Cumberland county, Springhill field and River Hebert-Joggins. I have not the exact figures, but we produce annually in the county about three quarters of a million tons of coal. I believe that if this industry had been properly organized and the skilled miners retained, we could have enlarged the production beyond 750,000 tons of coal and we would be producing a million tons.

Since the commencement of hostilities, the mines of Cumberland and Nova Scotia have been greatly handicapped on account of a shortage of skilled man-power. I agree with what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has said with respect to the enlistment of miners who could have served their country better in the mines than in the armed forces, but I disagree with him in one respect. I do not believe the miners from the county of Cumberland enlisted because they wanted to get away from the coal mines. They enlisted from a sense of duty to their country; they enlisted voluntarily to serve in any theatre of war.

Some time ago 500 experienced miners had enlisted from the Springhill mines. I assume that the total figure is now 600 or 700. These mines require a daily working force of about 1,250 miners to carry on their present scale of production, but they have 1,600 to 1,700 on their payrolls. Many of the men are not experienced coal miners, and their morale has not been kept up as it should have been. The same condition applies in the River Hebert-Joggins field. In this district the mines are smaller and the seams are thinner, but I believe the percentage of enlistments has been as large as that from any part of Canada. These men also volunteered to serve in any theatre of war. The output of the mines has been reduced and the cost has been increased. If a proper policy of selective service had been put into effect early in the war, or were put into effect even now, it would have gone a long way in solving this fuel problem.

I referred to the morale of the miners in Cumberland and throughout Nova Scotia. This has not been what it should be, but I do not blame them. There has been dissatisfaction with regard to taxation, and this should have been avoided. However, most of the miners continued to work irrespective of the incidence of taxation. A single man begins to pay income taxes when he has earned $660, and a married man at $1,200, and they continue to work with hesitancy and without the goodwill they should have. When these earnings are exceeded almost 100 per cent is applied to taxation, and this leaves a bad taste.

Perhaps hon. members may have noticed in the press that the miners in Springhill have lately not been able to get coal which they mine themselves to heat their own homes. The coal had been assigned for shipment elsewhere. If things were properly handled, a condition such as this would not exist. The miners of the county of Cumberland and the province of Nova Scotia are willing and ready to do their duty, but they will not stand for injustice or unfair treatment.

There was also a feeling of resentment when the Minister of Munitions and Supply, (Mr. Howe), when he was Minister of Transport, converted the steamship Charlottetown from the burning of coal to the burning of oil without any explanation to the people of the coal producing communities which depended upon this for about 25,000 tons a year to give them a home market for their product. There was also resentment in connection with rationing because the miners felt that they should have been allowed larger quantities of food and beverages in their hazardous occupation. If they were satisfied that restrictions were necessary, they would willingly submit to them.

I agree with what the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said about the resentment over the fact that our coal mining districts have had no representative on the fuel board. The coal miners of our province would have more confidence in government policy if there were a representative of theirs on the fuel board. There are in that province a number of capable and experienced practical men who have the confidence of the coal miners. I was in the government at Halifax for eight years or more, and there was never a major matter having to do with the coal mining industry or labour when we did not consult the miners. On many occasions I came to Ottawa in connection with the payment of subventions which resulted in extending the market for Nova Scotia coal. We always consulted the heads of the miners' organizations, and on many occasions we asked them to accompany us and assist us in making our presentation to the government or to the fuel board and those in authority. In that way we obtained their good-will, and that feeling spread among the workmen in the industry. Had the government followed that policy and given our miners representation, it would have assisted in building up the morale of the miners in Nova Scotia and greatly helped the coal industry.

We have some capable men on the fuel board. Those of us in Nova Scotia who contended for many years for expansion of the Canadian market for our coal will be forever grateful to those responsible for putting our coal subvention policies into effect in central Canada. The man perhaps more helpful than any other is Mr. Frank Neate, who is now deputy coal administrator. The late hon. Wesley Gordon, at that time minister of mines, did us a fine service in approving a national fuel policy and appropriating large sums of money in order that we might market an additional tonnage of Nova Scotia coal in central Canada. It was our policy at that time to establish a market within Canada, for a minimum of seven million tons of coal a year. We had to extend our territory from Montreal as far west as Toronto in order to market that output, but to-day we are supplying a market only as far west as Levis. A long educational process was required to teach the people of central Canada to fit their boilers for the use of Nova Scotia coal. That will have to be done over again. Nova Scotia, in view of all the sacrifices made in confederation, contends that it is entitled to that market, and the coal mines of Nova Scotia should be kept operating, in the years after the war, in supplying that market.

We have now on the fuel board Mr. J. McG. Stewart, K.C., from Nova Scotia. It is true that he is a lawyer, but he is a very able man and has done excellent service for the benefit not only of Nova Scotia and all Canada as chairman of the fuel board.

Mr. McGEER: Then why the collapse if his services have been so wonderful?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): He did not have the responsibility for man-power and operating policies.

In Cape Breton there has been considerable dissatisfaction. The people there have not been able to understand why they have not been supplied with sufficient cargo boats in order that coal might be transported up the St. Lawrence. It is true that the submarine menace has become greater, but the hon. minister for naval services (Mr. Macdonald) is here and will no doubt in due time be able to make an explanation. It appears to me that the St. Lawrence and all such narrow waters should be made absolutely safe for cargo boats to proceed close to the shore. In this day of science no enemy submarine should be allowed to menace shipping within three or four miles of the shore. I shall not press that any further, but the minister should make an explanation. The shipping of Nova Scotia coal up the St. Lawrence is interfered with, and we have lost a considerable portion of that market.

There are other areas in Nova Scotia where coal mining could be developed. There is a large coal field at Thorburn, Pictou county. The boards of trade there and members for the county in the provincial legislature have requested that that mine be opened. That could be done at a small cost and a large production obtained. I understand that five million tons could readily be mined in that area.

The town of Amherst and other parts of the county of Cumberland have submitted to restrictions with respect to the marketing of coal. Many of our people have been accustomed to using Springhill coal, but are denied the use of that coal, while people ten miles away in Sackville and elsewhere are allowed to buy it. We in the county of Cumberland who produce the coal are denied that privilege.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the miners of Nova Scotia and the people of that province, if properly appealed to, will respond and do their full duty in mining and marketing coal and do their full duty as British subjects in winning the war.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity last fall to visit Drumheller valley, Blairmore, the Crowsnest pass, and that large mining area in the province of Alberta. When I was there the first cold snap of winter came, and there was a very sudden demand for coal. Frantic appeals were made in the newspapers for the miners to work in the mines of Alberta. A shortage of coal was experienced in all the places supplied by that coal mining area. It has been the custom for a number of years for the miners there during the summer to work for only a few days a week. They have to cut down the production of coal during the summer months, because the coal in that particular area is soft coal and does not keep well. My information from the miners was that for years now they have worked for only a day or two a week, and this irregularity of employment has been a very serious matter for them. They also told me that there is a process now whereby soft coals can be kept successfully and stored for future use. Some men in that area have worked in the old countries of Europe, and they assured me that the coal mined in the Drumheller valley is in some instances much better than much of the coal mined in some areas of Germany. They say that in Germany soft coals have been processed for many years, making it possible to store the coal and to mine it continuously all through the year. The demand for coal during the summer months is not so great, so that in the mining areas of Alberta production of coal is curtailed during that period, and toward the fall the miners come back to full production.

I was told that through the years the mining operators have resisted any attempt to have processing plants built in the Drumheller valley. From their point of view it was generally understood that to have men working part time during the summer months was certainly cheaper, and that if there were a scarcity of coal in the fall prices were likely to rise, so that it was generally advantageous to them to continue the present methods. I was talking to two men in particular who had been mining engineers for the greater part of their lives, and they assured me it was quite feasible to build a plant within that valley which could process the whole of the coal mined in the area, and that the initial cost would be in the region of $15,000,000. During peace time that may seem an enormous sum, but when we consider the amounts of money which are being spent to advance the production of war materials during this time of urgency, $15,000,000 is not exorbitant.

The question I would put to the ministers is this: have they explored every known possibility for the processing of soft coal, because, if there is a process which could be used, surely from every point of view it would be necessary in times like these to override the feelings of the mine operators and see to it that the processing of coal was carried on? In this way the miners of Alberta would be employed full time during the summer season, and coal then produced would accumulate toward the fall, to prevent shortages such as we have experienced this winter.

Mr. BERT H. SOPER (Lanark): I listened with some interest this afternoon to hon. members on the other side attacking the government over the fuel policy of the past winter. All of them seemed to come prepared. Evidently word had been passed around by the grapevine route that it was intended to attack the government, because all of them have quoted a number of figures, which I do not think amount to very much. They forgot to tell us that what happened to the fuel business this winter was that we had the most severe winter which Canada has known in fifty years, and that practically every house and every other building in Canada have burned from one to five tons of coal more than they ever did before. With the beginning of December came very severe storms and deep snow, something which we have seldom experienced. This prevented both the cutting and the trucking of wood. Consequently the coal men were called upon to supply people who formerly had burned wood. Then at the first of the year the coal strikes began in the anthracite fields of the United States. This held up shipping for about three weeks and practically exhausted the stocks of coal on hand, except those at the waterfronts where coal is brought in by water. At all points to which coal is shipped by rail our stocks were heavily depleted.

By November 1 of last year, through the policy of the fuel administrator, practically every coal man had delivered about seventy-five per cent of his coal, and we were expecting to go through the winter with a nice but not a large business; in fact some of us wondered what there would be for our help to do. This is where distribution troubles came in. We were not counting on a heavy winter's work and were not prepared to take care of all the extra business which was thrust upon us. Everybody came back for extra supplies, and we had to take care of many people who had formerly burned wood.

What has happened here this afternoon is the worst thing which has occurred for the fuel business, because within one month everybody will be clamouring for coal with the idea of hoarding it, and we shall be landed in the worst mess we have ever been in. I do not see anything for it now but that the fuel administrator will have to adopt rationing, assigning so much coal for each order received this spring. Hon. members have simply gone ahead and done what was done about butter. They started talking about rationing butter and sent everybody crazy. Watch what will happen in the next six weeks.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I realize that so much has been said on the subject before the house that there is very little one can add, but I feel that the situation in Saskatchewan should be brought to the attention of the minister. I do not agree, however, with the last speaker (Mr. Soper), when he stated that what has occured here to-day will cause serious consequences in the months to come, in that fuel will be hoarded; for the fact is that a month ago or less the minister himself put an announcement before the country to the effect that if something were not done, serious consequences would follow next winter. What the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has done is to rivet the attention of the country on the fuel situation and the necessity of action being taken now and has given the members of the house an opportunity to suggest what should be done.

As far as Saskatchewan is concerned, the government was warned last fall by the city of Prince Albert, which is represented in this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that serious consequences would follow unless something were done to assure a reasonable production of wood fuel in the area in the vicinity of Prince Albert. The wartime prices and trade board fixed the price of fuel wood in Saskatchewan on a 1941 basic price level, at which time the price of cordwood in Saskatchewan was scarcely higher than it had been during the years of the depression, when the getting out of cordwood was a means whereby many settlers were able to assure themselves of a livelihood.

Take, for instance, the price of poplar wood. A man working reasonably hard can get out two cords a day. For that he received wages of four dollars, or two dollars a cord, out of which he had to pay to the provincial government stumpage fees of twenty cents a cord, or forty cents. The return was so low that the settlers would not get out wood for sale.

They could not get any help and if they did get it out they were working at a wage far below that paid by lumber industries in the far west and in northern Ontario. As a matter of fact most men who previously got out wood in Saskatchewan went to northern Ontario where they received $4.80 for a double cord of pulpwood, and had their fare paid both ways. There was no incentive whatever for anyone to produce wood in Saskatchewan. In the fall of 1942 the wartime prices and trade board was asked by the city of Prince Albert, and I believe a like communication was made to the Prime Minister as member for that constituency, that prices should be fixed at a level which would assure those engaged in the production of wood of a reasonable wage. The prices suggested were, $6 for poplar, $6.50 for jackpine and $8 for tamarac. But the wartime prices and trade board refused to do anything in that connection, although in Kenora in northern Ontario, for like wood, $7.50, $8.50 and $10 were the prices permitted to be paid.

The situation in Saskatchewan having been brought to the notice of the government in the fall of 1942, the government must assume the responsibility for the shortage that occurred in January and February, 1943. If fuel conditions in Vancouver, where the climate is so balmy, caused the discomfort referred to by several hon. members, the situation in Saskatchewan during the past winter can be imagined. In Prince Albert for a period of ten days forty per cent of the population had little or no fuel; yet adjacent to Prince Albert and throughout northern Saskatchewan are vast fuel resources uncut for the reason that there was no selective service system that would put men out to cut this wood; uncut because it was not profitable for the farmers or settlers to get it out and because it was impossible to secure men to work at wage levels lower than those paid in British Columbia and northern Ontario for similar work.

I have three suggestions to offer to the minister. These have come to me from various settlers in northern Saskatchewan who believe they would assure an ample supply of the necessary wood during the coming winter.

1. The dollar subsidy, if I may call it that, paid to the dealers will not meet the situation, because it will not be passed back to the producers. The subsidy should be paid direct to the producer, the settler, the farmer, or the labourer as the case may be.

2. The dominion government in order to encourage production should pay the provincial stumpage fees.

3. There are any number of farmers living in northern Saskatchewan in the wooded areas who would be very glad to get out wood if they had the necessary finances or financial assistance to enable them to do so. I suggest that the government finance the farmers by advancing a portion of the price of the wood once it has been placed on the skidways. That will enable the farmer to get and to pay the necessary help, and the remainder of the purchase price would be paid to him at the time he makes delivery.

4. The Indian reservations in Saskatchewan afford an opportunity to get man-power for this work. There are not as many adult men on these reserves as their were a few years ago, for the Indians have made a contribution to this country, have given an example of service, unequalled by any other race. I think every able-bodied man in every reserve in Saskatchewan, certainly those in northern Saskatchewan, has volunteered. But those who are at home on the reserves, if they were given an opportunity to earn money by getting out wood, would do so, provided that their earnings were turned over to them, not handled through the Indian department or the Indian agencies. I have it on good authority that there are at least 700 to 800 men, Indians, both on and off the reserves in the northern part of Saskatchewan, who are available to go out and cut wood.

I believe that unless something is done immediately, the fuel situation in Saskatchewan next winter will be a desperate one.

A similar shortage in production prevails in the lumbering industry. The labour is not available, because the government has not seen fit to direct men into the service that they should serve in, and has given them freedom to go from one part of Canada to another where wages are highest. Our labourers, lumber producers and the like will not stay in northern Saskatchewan producing lumber and fuelwood when the wages there are about half of what they can get in British Columbia or northern Ontario. They go where the wages are best. In the production of fuel the government can carry into practical application the recent orders in council that, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said, promised that much would be done, that look well on paper, but are not being properly carried into effect.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the afternoon a number of hon. members engaged in the debate on the very important subject of fuel, and dealt with the conditions which prevailed earlier in the present winter and the conditions that may well be anticipated in future should there not be some radical change in policy with respect to the handling of the fuel question. My colleague the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) reminded the house that if other groups or political parties in this country had adopted the same attitude toward the manpower question that we adopted in 1939 and 1940, and in fact still hold, many of the troubles which now confront us never would have occurred. I say that if other political parties had not spent their time in what I call political tomfoolery, probably there would have been no necessity for the conglomeration of regulations which emanate from government offices almost every week, and which serve to do little more than further confuse us. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Soper) attributed a good deal of our uneasiness to pessimism, if I interpreted his words correctly. I understand he is a dealer and incidentally a consumer; but evidently he has very little faith in his own Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who indicated through the press that there was all the reason in the world for pessimism under the present government policy.

It seems rather strange that I, coming from the province of Alberta where we produce approximately eighty-five per cent of Canada's coal, and from a constituency in which there is a number of mines producing domestic coal, should have to take part in a debate of this kind on account of the fact that in my own constituency a good deal of hardship was caused by the acute shortage of fuel. So great was that shortage; so difficult were the problems which confronted a great many of the people of Red Deer constituency, that upon returning to this house in January I felt obliged to place upon the order paper a resolution, which I should like to read:

Whereas domestic fuel is a vital necessity in Canadian homes;

And whereas the acute shortage of domestic fuel available for home consumption has created severe hardship and in many instances acute suffering in many parts of Canada during the present winter;

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, parliament should immediately take such steps as are considered necessary to bring into production and distribution undeveloped fuel resources of Canada.

That resolution may appear rather restricted in its application. If I had been given an opportunity to sponsor the resolution, I would not have confined myself merely to the development and distribution of undeveloped resources; but having seen the figures of the estimated coal requirements in Canada, I was concerned about this fact, namely, that the sources of supply which had been developed could not, in my opinion, supply the needs. I do not intend to elaborate upon that resolution at this time. If I were sponsoring it, I would feel obliged to take the forty minutes at my disposal.

During the past winter, in the city of Red Deer particularly, acute hardships were experienced; in fact I am almost obliged to believe that the Minister of Munitions and Supply was referring to Red Deer or the residents of that city when he made reference to the fact that some people had burned their fences. I know that as a result of the shortage of fuel there the schools were closed and a great many business establishments either closed or nearly closed; and when I speak thus I do not confine my remarks merely to Red Deer but include many different towns in that constituency. Furthermore I know the situation became so acute that the two airports in that vicinity were contemplating either closing entirely or at least curtailing their operations.

The people of Red Deer were perturbed. The people of the other towns of my constituency were also rather disturbed. I must pay tribute to the dealers who in a splendid manner adopted a scheme of rationing, but I do not believe that responsibility should be placed on the dealers, for it put them in a very nasty position, if I may use that word.

Mr. HANSELL: You may.

Mr. SHAW: Thank you. A number of factors were responsible for the acute fuel shortage. I will not attempt for a moment to minimize the fact that we had a very severe winter, but as yet we have had no communique from anywhere indicating that next winter will be any milder. In fact, in war time, whatever the cause, we seem to encounter more severe weather than during peace time. I will not try to elaborate upon that; I could not. In any event we in Red Deer were confronted with a serious problem in regard to transportation. As I say, we have numerous small mines in that district, but there was difficulty in securing the trucks necessary to move the coal. The coal was available, but there was greatly reduced production by reason of the insufficient number of miners available to keep those mines operating to capacity.

May I point out that there are a number of reasons why our truckers have difficulty in carrying on the hauling of coal. In the first place they are having a much harder time in procuring parts for their machines. They have difficulty in obtaining tires—and I am not complaining about this unnecessarily, because it is a situation which confronts us. Not only that, but many of our truckers have been directed to other places as a result of the higher rates of remuneration to be found in those places. I have in mind particularly the large numbers of truckers who accepted work on the Alaska highway. I know, further, that the Canadian Pacific Railway was undoubtedly confronted with problems in connection with transportation. I am told that freight cars loaded with coal stood near the mines for days and days, and could not be moved. I do not know the exact reason for this, but I can surmise as to what it may be.

With respect to the actual production of coal, to the best of my knowledge none of the mines has closed in that constituency on account of a shortage of man-power. I know that many smaller mines in Alberta have closed down completely because the miners have been taken or have gone elsewhere. As I said, that is to a degree responsible for the situation. Many of our men engaged in the mining industry volunteered for service in the army, the air force and the navy. They were encouraged to do so. Probably they received that encouragement from a spirit of adventure. Probably they were encouraged by more attractive employment, as has already been explained to-day.

Mr. HOMUTH: Give them some credit for patriotism, too.

Mr. SHAW: I think I am about the last one in the world who would cast any reflection upon the patriotism of any young man. Many of these men joined the service voluntarily; many of them were taken under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act, and many others have taken employment in other branches of war industry because mine operators could not compete, from the point of view of wages, with the operators of other industries engaged in the production of war commodities.

From experience I know of the extreme difficulty with which many of us were confronted when we endeavoured to procure leaves of absence for some of the miners who were taken into the army under the National Resources Mobilization Act. I do not believe the government appreciated the situation. I will not try to determine the reason for that; but surely they should have had the facilities at their disposal to determine whether or not an individual was actually required in the coal mines, or somewhere else. But we went on for weeks and weeks and weeks until we have become sick and tired of the whole thing.

In order to conserve the time of the house I do not propose to elaborate upon these matters at any greater length. Let me come now to the question of wood. I am in absolute agreement with the hon. member who said this afternoon that we should give consideration to subsidizing the actual producer of wood—if "subsidizing" is the proper word. In my constituency the farmers in their spare time engaged in the cutting of wood. That is what they used to do, but now most of their labour has been taken, and as a result they have no spare time. When they had the spare time, however, they engaged in the cutting of firewood, and hauled it to town for sale. We have our dealers in the towns, too; but in my part of Alberta, in the smaller urban and rural areas, they constitute a small minority. I say we should give consideration to the subsidizing of those farmers, so that they will be encouraged to cut fuel and deliver it to the towns. Some of them have told me recently that it is not worth their while, and that they will not bother with it any more. In a sense, I do not blame them; and yet that course will not solve our fuel problems. On the other hand, I would urge that there be a redirection of miners from the armed services and from other branches of industry back to the mines. That is an absolute essential.

The question of the division of responsibility arises. My opinion in this connection is based to a great extent upon the statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply that we shall have a fight between the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipal districts. It will be most unfortunate if the federal government fails to recognize its responsibility in this regard.

The solution of our fuel problem will not come through these three bodies fighting until such time as the next winter is upon us.

There is another matter with which I should like to deal in conclusion. We still have 22,000 gold miners engaged in the production of gold in Canada. I know this is a touchy question in the minds of some people, but I would remind the house that the President of the United States showed courage when he dealt with it. I reminded the house on March 1 that a committee of the house of representatives had stated that it would not be the better part of wisdom for the United States even to contemplate the acceptance of gold after this war as a method of settling debts as between the United States and other countries.

Mr. HOMUTH: But they are still producing gold.

Mr. SHAW: True; but it will be noticed that the action taken in the United States is far more drastic than was ever contemplated before.

Mr. HOMUTH: They produced more last year than the year before.

Mr. SHAW: I would ask the hon. member to give me the date upon which the President issued his most recent order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I cannot keep track of those dates.

Mr. SHAW: Then why ask me to? I trust there is no scheme being concocted to put us back on the gold standard. I am of opinion, and there are medical men in the house who could confirm my opinion, that it is now realized it is not the best thing for one's health to put gold in his teeth. This all leads to a more limited commercial use of the commodity. I am of opinion, one which is held by many people throughout the country, that the 22,000 skilled miners engaged in the production of gold should be put to work producing something which has been proven to be of far greater value in wartime, namely, coal.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend know the difference between a hard-rock miner and a soft-coal miner?

Mr. SHAW: Under the present policy the government is placing the men in such a position that if the mines are to carry on, and supply even part of our needs, they will have to take workers who have not the skill or the adaptability that these 22,000 gold miners would have.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend know that coal mining is a highly skilled employment? In some provinces there are regulations an individual has to pass before he can work in a coal mine.

Mr. SHAW: The point is that they have to be trained, in any event. I ask the Minister of Labour where he will get the men who must be directed to the production of coal in order to meet the requirements of this country. I say that we can take a miner engaged in gold mining and train him for that purpose much easier and in a shorter time than we can many of those upon whom he may have his eyes at the present time.

I realized before I mentioned that subject that it would be a touchy matter with some people, but it will be noticed that in the light of that I did not refrain from mentioning it. I contend that unless we give sound consideration forthwith to the whole man-power question—after all, this is part of the man-power question—we shall shortly be confronted with difficulties which few anticipate at the present time. I know that some will say I am a pessimist. I would sooner be a pessimist and avoid a terrible situation that might come along later on than be an extreme optimist, or, in other words, an ostrich, burying my head in the sand and hoping and praying that everything will work out satisfactorily. We have had altogether too much of that up to the present time.

Mr. HANSELL: Especially from the Liberal side of the house.

Mr. SHAW: The hon. member for Macleod says that that is especially so from across the floor on the government side of the house. I agree.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the debate which has taken place this afternoon on the shortage of fuel, particularly wood fuel, reminds me of that old rhyme, "How much wood would a woodchuck chuck, if a woodchuck could chuck wood." I think this applies particularly to the remarks of the speaker (Mr. Shaw) who has just preceded me. It may seem strange that we should have a fuel shortage in the Yukon, but this is due, to some extent, to war conditions. Those in the Yukon who owned trucks and tractors and who would ordinarily be engaged in the transportation of fuel, have for the most part leased or sold them to contractors on the Alaska highway, thereby doing much better for themselves than if they had continued to use their machines. In addition, many of the men who would be engaged in this industry have volunteered for active service with the army, the navy or the air force.

Under an agreement between the governments of the United States and Canada, Canadian workmen are prevented from obtaining employment with United States contractors and earning the splendid wages paid United States workmen. I protested against this policy as being wholly unfair to Canadian workmen, but it is still in effect. Some Canadian workmen have been clever enough to find a way around this prohibition, and they are cutting poles for these contractors. I know of one expert Canadian axeman who cleared $135 in one day. One could not expect that man to cut wood for fuel when a ceiling of from seventy-five cents to $1 an hour was put on his wages by the labour board. As I say, the Canadian fuel shortage is due, to some extent, to war conditions, and also to the administration of the selective service policy.

I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) one instance that came to my notice recently. A group of young men were trained as welders in a Winnipeg trades school and were sent by the selective service bureau at Winnipeg to Toronto to report to the selective service bureau there. Immediately upon arrival at Toronto they were told that they were urgently needed at Transcona and would have to leave at once. When they said that they had just come from there the Ontario selective service officer said to them, "No; you came from Winnipeg and we are sending you to Transcona." Evidently the official in the selective service bureau at Winnipeg did not know that welders were needed at Transcona, while the official in the selective service bureau at Toronto did not seem to know that Transcona is practically a part of Winnipeg and that the workmen go back and forth daily between Winnipeg and Transcona. Surely the Minister of Labour does not approve such stupidity on the part of his officials. I suggest that he supply them with geographies.

Mr. MITCHELL: If what my hon. friend is saying is true, I should like to have the details. It seems almost incredible.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): If the Minister of Labour will apply to his own selective service bureaus at Winnipeg and at Toronto he will get the information officially. We hear about the overcrowding of railway trains. Why overcrowd a railway car to send a crowd of men from Winnipeg to Toronto and then back again to Winnipeg?

[Mr. George Black.]

In the Yukon we have no draft evaders, no conscientious objectors, no prisoners of war, no Doukhobors and no slackers, and we do not need any regimentation of labour. If the men there were allowed a fair wage for their work, they would get out the fuel. I say to the Minister of Labour that if he is so inclined he can solve the difficulty as far as the Yukon is concerned.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only two or three minutes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOMUTH: I knew that would be pleasing to the house. That is the best cheer I have got since I came to the House of Commons. There is a suggestion which I wish to make to the minister, and there is something which I should like to draw to his attention and which I think will at least help in solving the fuel problem in western Ontario.

In the first place may I preface my remarks by saying that this is definitely the government's responsibility, it cannot be placed upon the municipalities. Under the expansion of war services the dominion government have taken charge of practically every provincial organization. They have taken charge of the administration of timber, mines and everything else that ordinarily would come under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

In western Ontario we have a very serious situation with regard to gas and oil fuel. On several occasions I brought this matter up in the house. For a year and a half there was a rather vacillating policy; nothing definite was done, and the result was that many people in western Ontario suffered serious hardships and went to tremendous expense to remove the gas-burners from their furnaces and put in coal burners and other methods of burning fuel.

It was felt that the wealthy gas companies, controlled principally in the United States, should have been compelled to reimburse the people for the expenses to which they had gone. Either that, or the government should have reimbursed them for the hundreds and hundreds of dollars they had spent in taking out of gas fixtures and rebuilding their chimneys in order to burn some other type of fuel. But that was not done, and in a part of the country where over ten per cent of the men have volunteered to go to war, we perhaps do not criticize as vehemently as we might some of the regulations put out by the government.

The other day the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) brought a letter to my attention because we had been discussing the fuel situation only a day or so before, and I wish to read this letter to the minister and suggest that a great deal more of the cooperative spirit that is evident in this letter might well be shown in our war effort. The letter reads as follows:

Harrison, March 10, 1943.

Mr. E. Cardiff, M.P.,
Brussels, Ontario.

Dear friend:

I am writing you for information and advice, re the subsidy on fuel wood.

About February 1st a number of my neighbours who have no wood or bush of their own asked me to sell them firewood.

We have made a bargain whereby for every cord of firewood they cut and draw away they cut a cord for me. I am very proud of the way it is working. We have men from the village going in with farmers who have horses to do the hauling. We have had as many as 10 men and 4 teams working at once.

Now I think I am entitled to the $1 per cord subsidy, on all the fuel wood which is hauled away from my bush. There is no wood dealer involved in the whole transaction. No money is paid for the wood or for labour excepting to the man who operates the buzz-saw.

I do not think I am entitled to the subsidy on the wood which I keep and burn in my own home. I would be pleased to hear from you and have your opinion.

I know for a fact these men are not worrying about their supply of firewood for next winter, as we have about 120 cords cut already.

Yours truly,

Milton Leonard,
R.R. No. 2, Harrison, Ont.

That shows a spirit of cooperation which could be built up in Canada if the government would only go out and build it up. We have built thousands of homes across this country, war-time houses that are supposed to be wrecked when the war is over, but if we had carried on a campaign which would have aroused in the people a sense of their responsibility and of that patriotism of which they are capable it would not have been necessary to build a great many of these homes. We could have found many homes with rooms that are not occupied and many others which could have been subdivided, but the whole war-time housing programme was conducted through a series of newspaper advertisements, which must have cost a great deal of money, and nothing substantial came of it all. Surely the members of this house and the people of this country are prepared to carry on a campaign to stir up the patriotism of our people. Look at the tremendous number of war-time houses that have been built in the city of Hamilton, or in the city of Galt, in my riding, where fifty are being built now. If a campaign had been carried on to arouse the patriotism of the people, they would have opened their homes and taken people in, and these war-time houses would not have been required.

Similarly we could carry on a campaign to stimulate the cutting of wood fuel. There is no part of western Ontario that has not a good acreage of bush from which wood fuel could be cut. All that is required to stimulate production is cooperation. The writer of the letter I have read cannot get the subsidy. I called up the fuel controller's office and was told that under the order in council this man cannot get the subsidy. Why? Because he is not a dealer. Surely, Mr. Speaker, a man who is willing to sacrifice his bush and keep down the price of winter fuel ought to be entitled to the subsidy at least on that part of his fuel which goes to other homes than his own. Unfortunately, so many of these orders in council are drawn up by men who cannot see and have not seen or will not see the practical side of some of these problems. The hon. member for Huron North and I talked with Mr. Cameron, and he said, "It is a matter of administration. But the order in council does not provide for paying subsidy in this case." I believe that if the minister would advise his board to go out and try to build up some of the cooperative spirit shown by the writer of this letter, a great deal could be done to alleviate the fuel shortage across Canada. There is on the part of everybody in this country a spirit of cooperation and a desire to help the war effort. But these silly orders in council and these crazy regulations which make a man so dizzy that he does not know where he stands break down the desire on the part of the people to do something in the war effort. I point out to the minister that much can be done, not only in this fuel situation, but in connection with housing and many other problems that face the government if they would just approach the people in the proper way, explain the situation to them, appeal to their patriotism and be honest with them. There is no question that the people would cooperate heartily.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Soper) this afternoon said that this was an idle debate which would cause a run on fuel. Let me point out to him that every time any of the controllers appointed by this government announces that there will be no control or rationing of this or that commodity, the people immediately go out and buy it. Why? Because they cannot believe the controllers. They know that the controllers say in February, there will be no control—and in March control goes on. The controllers say in January, there will be no rationing—and in February rationing goes on. And so it goes. What we must have in this country is a spirit of cooperation, and I wish to tell the government that the people are prepared to cooperate with the government if the government is prepared to cooperate with them.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this question is a very important one. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the premiers of the various provinces have often, in interviews given to the press, drawn the attention of the public to the importance of the fuel problem. In our part of the country coal is imported from other provinces and from some of the eastern United States. But most people use wood for fuel, hardwood like maple, the wild cherry tree, birch and other varieties which are most suitable for making the homes of our fellow-citizens warm and comfortable.

It has been suggested by some of the members that a subsidy should be paid to the farmers to encourage them to cut wood for fuel. Of course, it is a work that requires experience. No novice can pick up an axe and go out into the bush and cut down trees and split wood, but in our part of the country there is not a single farmer or a farmer's son who cannot do that kind of work. They are all familiar with it; they are expert woodcutters.

Some one has complained of the number of Canadian woodsmen who are working in the United States. The main reason is obvious. It is that we have reached a point, mostly on account of forest fires, when United States forests supply some Canadian mills along the border.

But there is another reason why Canadians cross the boundary to chop lumber in the United States; it is because over there they pay fair wages, considerably higher than those which are paid by some companies, one of which operates in my county. It is not at all surprising that young men or older men refuse to work for a company which pays so much less by the hour or by the contract than do the United States companies.

Is this the right time to offer a subsidy for cutting lumber? We know that the time to cut trees is when there is no sap in them. Spring will start, officially, on March 21. We have at times spells of cold weather, but the sap is about to run in the trees. It will then be too late to cut them.

One reason for the present scarcity of lumber is the very large quantity of snow which has fallen in our forests and which has made the cutting of trees more difficult.

[Mr. Homuth.]

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) spoke of the labour board; and in this matter we have every reason to complain of the wartime prices board, because, by making public a certain price which has been established for kindling wood and for furnace wood, they have removed all possibility for those who look after the transportation of that wood from the forest to the homes of the people to continue that work. The price has been published. The producer asked for the price which was originally paid by the consumer, and the middleman has nothing at all wherewith to pay for transportation. These regulations have been made by men who are bookworms and who have no experience in the lumber trade, particularly in that regard. By trying to improve conditions they have made the situation much worse than it was.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) made some apt remarks about the difficulty of transportation by trucks. I will not repeat what he has so accurately enumerated, but this is a great difficulty which is not easy to remedy. Then, of course, there are also the railways. But at the present time the railways are jammed. It has been remarked that anyone who travels from Toronto to Montreal, or who goes to St. Lambert, near Montreal, will see all the sidings full of war material which was made a year or two ago and which has not been moved. It would be a great help if that material, whether munitions, aeroplanes, or otherwise, could be forwarded to Russia, the United Kingdom, China, wherever it is needed, but it is left here to rot. We hope that it will not be destroyed completely. But it is in boxes and cases; rain and snow have been falling on it for years, and now what is being done? Those boxes and cases are being painted. But it is too late. Would it have been easier to transport fuel than it has proved to be to carry that mass of munitions which we see on all the sidings in eastern Canada?

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) who for such a long time has been advocating total war, recited as his own this afternoon part of an article which I wrote in French and which was entitled, "Elliott Little was Right." Does he suffer from amnesia? I remember the time, which is not so far distant, when he insisted on sending all our young men to Libya. He blamed the government for not sending young Canadians to Libya; he wanted conscription for overseas at once. And now we see a number of these champions of conscription for overseas service asking the government not to apply conscription to the army. If they complain about something, they may weep for their own sins. We have heard hon. gentlemen opposite rising in their places one after another asking for the conscription of all men for the army.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no. Some of you fellows have been swallowing yourselves for years.

Mr. POULIOT: I can swallow myself without poisoning myself. It is different with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, you would be an awful mouthful.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Here I am to apply the twilight—you know, the one by which a certain operation is administered without pain. I remember the time when a Tory member for Toronto, who is now out of the house, otherwise I would describe him in a picturesque way, was bold enough to say the member for Témiscouata was helping Hitler by fighting against conscription of men for overseas service. I realize fully that Canada alone cannot win the war; we need our allies, and if we put all our men in the army, what will be the result? The result will be a still greater mess than we have now in the fuel business. Are these hon. members logical? The other day I praised the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) for a very good speech that he made about the farmers and the importance of agriculture for the welfare of our country. And what did I read in that fine newspaper called the Toronto Telegram, reporting the last assizes of the Tory—I beg pardon, the Progressive Conservative party, where the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe complained bitterly that insufficient reinforcements were sent to our boys in England. He also complained that it was the reason why Europe was not yet invaded. Does he not know that at the present time there are in the Canadian army many farmers who have been sent there, who, although they were willing to get into the army, and had no objection at all to enlisting, knew very well that as soon as they enlisted the padlock would be put on the ancestral farm, on the old homestead, because the father who suffers from rheumatism is unable to find help and unable to replace his sons who are going away. This is a well known fact. How many young farmers are there in the army, men who had no objection at all to enlist, men who are not Doukhobors, not conscientious objectors, not Mennonites, but good Canadians of British or French origin, whose presence was urgently needed on the farm of their father or their own farm, but who, on account of that false patriotism that was preached by all members of the Tory party without exception—and I speak of those who rose in their places after their new christening—

Mr. HOMUTH: Who took them into the army? Your government, the one you supported yourself.

Mr. POULIOT: They were acting on suggestions like that of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). The former leader of the opposition, who probably had to give up his seat for that very reason, was fighting me.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are you still with the government or against it?

Mr. POULIOT: I ask my hon. friend to keep quiet, otherwise I shall go to his home town and tell his constituents how he is thought of in this house. I have been before in the province of Ontario and I have never been afraid to attend a joint meeting anywhere.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is all I need.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend is ready to find time for a discussion I will bring Hansard with me and it will be his own condemnation.

Mr. HOMUTH: You can bring the government with you, too.

Mr. POULIOT: Now, sir, what happened? We had a chairman of a board called the national war services board, now called the mobilization board, who although he was a judge did not understand one iota of his duty, so much so that I had to bring his case to the officials of the department and to the minister, who decided it was important and in the public interest to see how many injustices were inflicted on account of the stupid and criminal decisions of that man. He is replaced now by a better man, I admit, but the farmers who have been suffering just because that man lacked judgment completely are still there; they cannot come back. I remember that on July 13 last year the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said from his place in the house that it would be very hard to give an opportunity to young men who are in the army, even if they did not volunteer, to come back to civilian jobs.

Who is the expert on fuel in the adjutant-general's branch? It would be interesting to know. At the present time it is impossible to get any definite information. I wrote today to an official of the department that when a man gets into the army he is under his commanding officer and he has to go to his officer commanding to ask for leave. How is it that I receive letters from the Department of National Defence to the effect that leave has been refused, not by the officer commanding but by that mobilization board? We never know where we are; we have irresponsibility from A to Z. And this, sir, is why the country is now complaining about the mess that exists and is in a state of fear for the future. How many little homes are there in every part of the country, some of them far away from the forests, who get wood in railway cars in winter and in summer on trucks? Now a much smaller quantity of fuelwood has been cut; conditions are harder than ever. How can men haul lumber in the forests when we can hardly walk on the streets of Ottawa? The winter has been very hard. The situation is very difficult.

Will it be remedied by a subsidy? If so, what will be the rate of the subsidy? A dollar? Why, it is a joke. The subsidy should be much higher than that. Our people in a great many instances have not enough wood to finish the winter. Who would think that at this time of the year we would have a cold spell like the one we now have? Who would think of that? It takes a lot of wood or coal.

An hon. MEMBER: R. B. Bennett did it.

Mr. POULIOT: The least we can ask is for all hon. members to try to find ways and means to solve that problem, provided that the matter is discussed without prejudice. What is the easiest way to come to that? It is for hon. gentlemen opposite, and those on the government side, who have been beating the drum of conscription for overseas service to beat their breasts and say "Mea culpa! It is our own fault, our own mistake if there are such conditions as we all deplore to-day." So should they say. They are too proud to admit it; they will never admit that they are wrong. But after a discussion such as we have had this afternoon and this evening, is it not time to think deeply, to think in all sincerity and all earnestness of the problems that confront us? In my humble view the farmer on his farm is perhaps not performing deeds as heroic as those of the boys who offered their lives at Dieppe or who went to Hong Kong and were made prisoners after a gallant fight. But the work of the farmer is just as noble as that of the soldier; and by "soldier" I mean anyone in any of the three branches of the service. I have respect for all, and now we see that we depend upon them to the same degree.

Therefore, sir, is it not time to consider Canadian politics from a Canadian point of view? We have heard too much of international affairs, of Canada being a citizen of the world, of Canada being one of the great countries, when really Canada is only the trailer of our major allies in this war as far as external policies are concerned. Is it not time to think of our own people, of those who at times work under very difficult conditions without complaining and who deserve the sympathy, encouragement and support of this house? Even though one was considered to be speaking of a foreign country if he mentioned the name of Canada in this house, I always believed that in external policies, just as well as in domestic life, charity begins at home. That does not mean at all that we are isolationists. It means that we should first consider our problems from a Canadian point of view. So much propaganda has been put out by the various government agencies and by the press, which is supported by the war profiteers, that it is important for hon. members to have the courage to change their past utterances and come back to cold facts, and to realize that for the future welfare of Canada it is most important to consider everything from a truly Canadian point of view.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to talk a little bit about fuel, after hearing everything under the sun discussed this afternoon. Hon. members ranged all the way from funny money to the plebiscite vote.

An hon. MEMBER: We shall have gas now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, it is the kind of gas that does not heat very well in British Columbia. I rather thought we would solve the whole problem here to-night, for apparently every other problem has been solved from Winnipeg. I do not know what happened to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), that he did not solve this problem also. I can see some advantages in his daily one o'clock conference; the filibuster that has been staged to-day must have been very well organized.

Mr. HOMUTH: Now, now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is all very well for the hon. member; he has had an intimation that a gentleman from Témiscouata is coming into his riding to speak. I do not want that gentleman in my riding; I do not know what might happen.

As I say, I should like to talk a little about fuel. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) does not always ask for my advice about what he intends to say. I do not always agree with him, but I do not think he should criticize everything that comes from this side of the house. Apparently I am the only private Liberal member who is to speak in connection with this matter.

Mr. HOMUTH: Have you any fuel?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Now, listen; you tried to make a speech and could not, so let me try. I am sure the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will be interested to know that I still get my home newspaper, and in every issue for the last seven weeks the main item, apart from a word about milk and something about the Japs, has had to do with fuel and the lack of it. It is a very serious matter. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has one of the largest camps in British Columbia in my riding, and at the height of the worst storm of the winter there was not a pound of coal in that camp. I do not know who fell down there, but to the credit of those soldiers be it said that they got out and cut wood for themselves and also for the civilians in the surrounding district.

I am not particularly worried about mistakes that have been made in the past, but I am interested in what is to happen next year. In my province we had a hospital with over fifty beds, and it had not sufficient coal. That is not good enough. It is up to us to find ways and means of seeing that there is a supply for next winter. There is no reason to worry about what happened this winter, but what will happen in the future? It is absolutely unfair to say that this is a municipal problem. Speaking as an ex-municipal official I say that is not so, that the municipalities have not the facilities, the finances or the authority to handle it. It is our responsibility as a federal government.

In connection with the subsidy, as I see it the only people who will be affected by it are the small farmers, and they are very much interested to learn who will receive that subsidy. If it is to be paid as all the other subsidies are paid, I am afraid it will go, as other subsidies have done, to the large shipbuilders, the large tank builders, the large aeroplane builders and not to the actual working men. An assurance should be given by the minister that the subsidy is actually going to the producers. Personally I am of opinion that one might as well have no subsidy at all as one of $1 a cord. I was interested in what was said by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) as to the price of hardwood in the maritimes. I think he said it was $16 a cord, in cordwood lengths. In the Fraser valley hardwood in stove lengths costs $10.50 a cord delivered. That is quite a difference. Two and a half months ago the federal government paid $5.50 a cord in British Columbia for cutting wood into four-foot lengths. That was what was done by the Department of Munitions and Supply. That being so, how are we to have stove-wood cut and delivered for $10.50? It simply cannot be done. Any man in British Columbia who wishes to cut wood can go into a logging camp, into a shipyard or anywhere else. The minister should revise the subsidy. I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he says that the subsidy should be based on the knowledge of practical men who cut wood, and not on the knowledge of experts from the Bank of Canada.

There is one other small item which affects British Columbia and which, I suppose affects the rest of Canada. A farmer cannot take wood weighing more than half a ton in his light delivery truck. In the constituency of Nanaimo one man was convicted and fined for doing what was advocated by everyone. He went out and cut wood for his own use and hauled it in his own truck. Because he hauled more than half a ton he was fined in the court at Nanaimo. Although the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is not in his place at the moment, I know that many farmers formerly crossed the river to bring wood, in small amounts, to their regular customers. They cannot do so to-day.

I do not wish to take up more time. There has been too much time wasted discussing conscription, and a few other items, instead of fuel. But for the benefit of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I have not taken back anything I said about compulsory selective service, and I do not intend to.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the whole problem comes down to a consideration of compulsory selective service. As long as we put off a proper consideration of this subject, we shall get nowhere. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said a few minutes ago that the problem confronting us is a Canadian problem; and that we should look at it from the Canadian point of view. His Canadian point of view may be different from our Canadian point of view, and my Canadian point of view.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely, surely.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are a great many people in this world who want us to look at this matter from the Canadian point of view—and not a selfish, national Canadian point of view. The whole thing is a national problem. As far as that is concerned, it divides itself into two or three different topics. There is the question of production, and the further question of distribution, each of which is most important. There is also the question of advance information to the public as to what they have to do.

Last year in the house the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) made a statement respecting fuel oil. Had I not questioned him next day on his statement, and had it been left as it stood for a couple of weeks, all the oil furnaces in Toronto would have been converted into coal-burning units. He said we would have no fuel oil—or practically no fuel oil—for domestic purposes. Well, the next day he changed his mind. His controller told him that he was not saying the same thing. The answer to that is that these controllers are fellows who make all the decisions for the minister. As a matter of fact, the ministry ought to be able to make up their minds about what is going to happen.

I have heard in this House of Commons a great deal about wood, and I am not going to emphasize the wood situation, more than to say that I think the whole fuel position in Canada is just a question of wooden-headed government policy. The government is not thinking far enough ahead.

Mr. HOMUTH: That should supply some fuel.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It does, as far as wood is concerned.

Mr. McNIVEN: You mean cool-headed?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I know a young woman who worked in Toronto, but who owns a little place outside the city. She cannot get help or transportation, and when she comes home every week-end she has to cut her own wood. However, I must say there are a tremendous number of difficulties in connection with the fuel question.

There was a strike in the United States which delayed fuel deliveries in Toronto, with the result that we have had a very hard winter. In addition, we had a great deal of snow, which complicated matters considerably, as far as deliveries around the city were concerned. The people of Toronto have been trying to be as economical as they possibly can in their fuel consumption. In this connection I might give one illustration of where one controller over-controlled another controller. I know of one apartment block in Toronto—and I have no doubt many hon. members know of similar situations—the owner of which went to his tenants to discuss the coal situation with them. This one took up the matter before the fuel controller issued his orders with respect to fuel consumption. The owner said, "We want you to be economical in your use of coal this year." As a matter of fact, he issued a manifesto to his tenants. I believe there were 345 apartments in this particular apartment block. The owner said, "Will you please be careful of your coal this year. Be a little more careful of your hot water consumption, because the heating of the water requires coal. Keep your room temperatures down to 65 degrees. Keep your windows closed; do not shove them up to the top when you require fresh air. If you wish to keep the place warm, and at the same time be economical of heat, keep your windows closed." Well, what happened? Along came the rent controller, and he said to the apartment owner, "You must give the same service as you gave before. You cannot cut down on heat. You must give the same service, because they are paying the same money." Well! Well! Well!

Another question arises. Where are they going to get off? As I say, the people of Toronto have been trying to conserve their coal. In spite of the hard winter they have had they have used very little more coal than in the year before.

Here is another point. There are so many orders coming around that one is all the time running and taking out orders about coal; taking out orders about this and that, with nobody caring. As the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) said, everybody is busy trying to keep up. One does not even have time to read the newspaper in the morning. The whole question comes down to one of national selective service.

What does one find when he visits 174 Spadina Avenue, Toronto? What do the returned boys call that place? They keep saying they want men. The returned boys call it the gestapo. If you are five minutes too early you have to wait; if you are five minutes too late you cannot get in. They just say, "You take the job." I know they told one man whom I know to take a job for three weeks driving a truck. This man was a machinist, but he accepted the truck-driving job. Now, instead of being classified as a machinist, he is classified as a truck driver. He cannot get a job as a machinist, because the gestapo has taken over. This all happens under the government's national selective service. The returned men are being treated like nobody's business, and something ought to be done about the matter.

The distribution of coal in Toronto is a most difficult problem. The coal dealers in Toronto can use every truck that they can get; yet who decides who is to have a trucking licence in that city? Is it the transport division of the wartime prices and trade board or the oil controller? A man goes down there and says he wants to get a licence. First, he goes to the city hall to get a licence for his truck. The police department have charge of that, but they have been told not to issue licences unless they first receive authority from the transport division of the wartime prices and trade board. Accordingly he goes there, but to whom do they send him? They send him to the president of the trucking association of Toronto. In this particular instance this man says, "No; we turn you down."

I called up the wartime prices and trade board and told them that all the coal dealers wanted trucks. I told them about this man, and they said that if he could get a say-so from the president of the trucking association he would give the green light on him. What kind of system is that? These men want to get licences to work, but they are under the control of the president of the trucking association of Toronto. That is the situation. The coal dealers in that city can use every truck they can get their hands on, yet they are limited in getting trucks by the president of the trucking association.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer. The people were asked by the minister to get in their coal last fall, or in other words to hoard coal, despite what my hon. friend over here says. They were told to get it in during the summer, and many did get coal in. A time-payment plan went into effect, and they budgeted for the amount of coal they needed. But this has been a heavy winter, and many find that they have run out of coal. They order five tons, two tons or whatever they think they need, and then what happens? They are all working people and they cannot pay for these commodities all at once. The next thing they know the twenty-fifth of the month comes along, and they are told they cannot have coal unless they pay for it in cash. The coal dealers in Toronto cannot give credit for this necessity of life to those who they think should have credit. That is a most ridiculous situation. A man may have only enough to buy half a ton, and that means that the dealer must go round half a dozen times before he has delivered all the man's coal.

This is about all I have to say, except that these controllers ought to get busy and use some judgment. The minister should get after them to see to it that they use a little judgment instead of putting everything on a hard and fast basis. As I say, we can use all the trucks we can get in Toronto; there is plenty of work for them, but the whole situation is controlled by the one man, the president of the trucking association.

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I was interested this afternoon to see the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) vying with each other in an effort to impress the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) with the fact that there was one experienced man on the board that governs fuel for this country. Be that as it may, to-day the government finds themselves in a most difficult position in regard to fuel. I intend to refer particularly to fuelwood.

In my district the people depend a great deal upon fuelwood for heating their homes. Shortage of labour has been blamed for the shortage of fuelwood, but I am not so sure that that is the situation. Personally I think the fault lies with the wartime prices and trade board. Last August, prices in my district were set at $2 a cord less than they were in the winter of 1941-42. A roadside price was set also. Just in passing, may I say that most of the fuelwood brought into my community must be brought a distance of about fifty miles. The roadside price was set at $6.50 a cord, and it costs anywhere from $4 to $5 a cord to bring it in; yet the ceiling price was put at $9 a cord.

Anyone who knows anything about cutting wood will realize that cutting must begin early in the fall. As I say, the price was set last August. That price was set either by a man who was inexperienced in fuel control, particularly as regards wood, or without any investigation whatever being made. There is a considerable amount of wood on the roadsides in certain parts of Ontario, but on account of the price that was set on it, it cannot be brought into the different communities to be disposed of.

It will be much harder to get wood in this winter because the placing of these controls upon the industry last fall has killed the industry entirely. It is too late now to give consideration to cutting wood for next winter's supply. The men who take out this wood usually work on farms in the summer months. In the very near future they will be upon the land. Another factor that had a great deal to do with the curtailing of the amount of fuelwood that reached the different communities was the order passed putting a thirty-five mile limit upon trucking. While this order has been postponed time and again, it placed the man taking out wood in an impossible position because he did not know whether he would be able to truck it to those communities where he could sell his wood.

There is only one way in which the fuelwood situation can be successfully solved. Reservoirs of fuelwood must be created in the different communities, and those reservoirs must be in the dealers' hands. Very few of the men who take out wood are in a position to cut it into stove or furnace lengths; they sell their wood in four-foot lengths. I was surprised to hear what the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had to say. He was quite vehement in some of his remarks about this group. Apparently he has made a right-about face. He seems to have forgotten what his leader said, and he seems to have forgotten also the statement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) within the last few days. I refer to the man-power situation.

On March 24 last the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that any man working on a farm would be frozen to that farm. In his announcement the other day the Minister of Labour said that any man who went to the bush to take out wood would be placed in the same category. I am of opinion that these men will not place any more trust in that statement than they did in the statement made last year by the Prime Minister.

I have not much more to say except that I was delighted to hear that the fuel control had been handed over to the Department of Munitions and Supply. In fact, it seemed to me, when I read that remark of Mr. Gordon the other day, that he was boasting of getting rid of it. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this country would certainly be much better off if the gentleman who is at the head of the wartime prices and trade board were able to hand over a great many more controls to responsible ministers of the crown.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, serious as the fuel situation in Canada appears to be, I certainly hope for the good of the Canadian people that it is not as serious as it has been represented to this house this afternoon and evening. Certain contributory factors to our present fuel situation should be taken into consideration. There has undoubtedly been underproduction, particularly of coal. I well remember deputations coming here from the east and from the west last spring and summer asking why the coal miners could work for only two or three days a week. Yet apparently no solution of that problem was found.

There are other factors over which not even the Liberal government with its safe majority has much control. As already pointed out, we have had a very severe winter. I do not know how other members have fared, but I have personally just about gone bankrupt paying for coal. There are still other factors. There has been a great demand for man-power. It is quite evident that we cannot have a man in the armed forces, working in agriculture, working in a munitions factory, and at the same time cutting wood or digging coal. There is also this factor, that we have in the past depended to a large extent upon men who were living near the margin of subsistence to dig our coal and chop our wood. To-day these men are able to find employment at better wages elsewhere and are not anxious to dig coal or chop wood.

The question has been raised regarding the effect of the wartime prices and trade board regulations upon the fuel situation. I suggest that the root of the trouble as far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned has not yet been mentioned in this house. To my mind it is this, that the regulations laid down by that board have in almost every instance militated against the primary producer and the small dealer. That has been brought out, I think, though it has not been specifically mentioned in the debate this afternoon and evening. We have learned that the primary producers of both wood and coal in New Brunswick, northern Saskatchewan and British Columbia were being underpaid and found it unprofitable to work in the production of fuel in competition with other lines of industry.

Last year I was approached by the retail coal dealers' association in Toronto, and it was pointed out to me at that time that more than one hundred small coal dealers in that city were forced out of business on account of government regulations and restrictions which favoured the big coal dealers in that city. I discussed that matter on numerous occasions with the coal administrator, and a special committee was sent to investigate the situation in Toronto. Our claim was that if these small dealers were forced out of business, there would not be sufficient equipment to deliver coal to the people of that city during the coming winter. The investigator who went to Toronto reported to me later that he was satisfied that the remaining coal dealers were quite capable of delivering all the coal that would require to be delivered in Toronto during the following winter, and that no danger would result from large numbers of the small dealers being forced out of business. Yet last winter we had the spectacle in Toronto of women and children coming with baby carriages, go-carts and anything with runners or wheels, to carry home coal from the coal yards, because a hundred or more coal dealers who were equipped with one or more trucks for the delivery of coal had been forced out of business as a result of the competition of the larger firms.

I maintain that our fuel situation, in so far as the wartime prices and trade board affects the situation, is caused by the fact that its regulations, unintentionally or otherwise, in every instance have favoured the big business man.

It has been the practice to-day to offer suggestions to the minister. I wish to offer one that I know he will not accept any more than he will accept any of the others that have already been offered. My suggestion is that the minister follow the example of the United States government and send every one of these dollar-a-year men, who are to-day being paid by big business, back to the firms from which they came. They found they had to do that in the United States. Those whom they retained as dollar-a-year men they retained only in an advisory capacity, and not in administrative posts. If the minister will surround himself, not by men recruited from big business who have the outlook and the point of view of big business only, but with some who know the needs and have the outlook of the common primary producers, the small business men and the small dealers of this country, and will take their advice occasionally, we shall not get into such a muddle regarding our fuel problem.

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a phase of the fuel situation which has not so far been discussed. It is true that it is somewhat of a local character and of local interest, but none the less it is important.

In the district from which I come and throughout all southern Ontario we have a fuel known as natural gas. It is used in the heating of homes, for cooking and also for lighting in a great many places, particularly where we have no hydro facilities. This gas is used not only in farm homes but in towns and villages, and is distributed in the larger centres such as Hamilton, Brantford, St. Catharines and so on.

This gas, as the house well knows, is produced from wells running anywhere from 600 to 1,200 feet in depth. The wells are put down by large drilling outfits which are operated by skilled labour, and each well costs anywhere from $800 to $1,500. Therefore the house will readily understand that the average farmer cannot himself finance such an operation.

The development is, of course, carried on by companies and syndicates, whose progress is seriously retarded for two reasons. First, there is the labour shortage. I can tell the minister of at least two large drilling outfits in my particular neighbourhood which are lying idle because the skilled labour that was operating them has been conscripted or taken into the army. The other reason, of which I would ask the minister to take particular note, is a shortage of gas pipe and casing for the wells. This material is, of course, made of iron or steel, and is very difficult to obtain at the present time, with the result that the development of these gas fields is being seriously delayed. Most of the operations take place during the summer months. It may be said that there will be little need of extra gas for fuel during the remainder of the winter or through out the summer; but if we are to have the operations expanded and the developments carried on, the work will be seriously affected if we have not some priorities for gas pipe and for the casings which are put into the well.

The supervision of this gas business has been carried on almost wholly by the provincial mining department. There has been a gas controller in our province for a great many years. However, last fall an order went out, I believe from the wartime prices and trade board, at least from the fuel administrator, disallowing the use of natural gas in furnaces. Many people were put to a good deal of trouble to re-equip their furnaces. In many instances they were unable to do so. Wood stoves and coal stoves are very difficult to buy at the moment, and their scarcity has caused many people a good deal of trouble in changing from the one sort of fuel to the other. After all, this gas fuel takes the place of coal and wood. It is very important in that particular district and, in fact, all through southern Ontario. I draw this matter to the attention of the minister because, if anything can be done to enable the companies which are developing these fields to get supplies, it would be of great assistance to the fuel situation in that particular district.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Although the matter I wish to deal with is substantially of a local nature, it is quite relevant to the subject under discussion.

In Port Hood, in my constituency, the people have been subjected to a serious shortage of fuel, and have suffered considerably as a consequence; and this, despite the fact that within the precincts of the town is a large block of coal, which is easily accessible, and which could be economically mined. A co-operative company which has in mind the opening of this mine would receive sufficient financial stimulus from the provincial government to start operations. An appeal has been made to the fuel controller, Mr. Stewart, but up to the present time nothing has been done: the request to open the mine has not been granted. In view of the conditions which prevail locally, the shortage of coal, the suffering entailed upon the people of Port Hood as a consequence, and the great cry which is heard now regarding the national shortage of coal, and in view of the fact that there is here a splendid block of coal which could be economically mined, and that there are enough men over military age in the town to do the work, it seems to me that it is rather senseless, and a demonstration neither of compassion nor of interest in the war effort to leave this block of coal unworked.

In the town of Inverness the largest producer has become somewhat reduced in volume, so that the production is not as great as it was some years ago. But there are in that area several seams which could be mined very economically and would produce large quantities of coal. I understand that the provincial government has in mind assistance for the opening and developing of some of these seams, but the retarding agency, as far as I can learn, is the fuel controller.

Last fall fifty per cent of the assessable property in the town of Port Hood was swept away by fire. The people are subjected to many economic disadvantages and are suffering in many ways. I believe that their ardour and morale should not be chilled further by requiring them, one might say, to sit on a great block of coal and suffer from the cold. The same may be said with regard to the town of Inverness. When the volume of coal mining was reduced, many of our miners had to go abroad. If these other seams of which I have spoken were developed, not only would something be done to alleviate the national fuel shortage, but it would mean something to the town of Inverness. Property holders who were obliged to leave the town would be able to come home, bringing their families with them. Any way you look at the subject I cannot see why, in instances of this kind, particularly in view of the complaints of shortage of fuel, these coal deposits at Inverness and Port Hood, which the provincial government is prepared to assist to develop, should be kept closed or undeveloped on account of what I would regard as a very foolish restriction.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): In view of the resolution to adjourn having come from a Vancouver member, I feel there is the possibility of the impression going abroad that that city suffers such a climate that a fuel shortage at any time would be a serious matter, and is an idea which we who pride ourselves upon the mildness of Vancouver's winter should not allow to go unchallenged.

No one has more disagreements with some of the price control regulations than I have. But to blame them for the weather of Vancouver and the Dominion of Canada is, I think, going a little beyond what should be considered reasonable condemnation. It so happened that this winter in Vancouver, according to the Conservative paper, the Vancouver Daily Province, the temperature dropped to four degrees above zero January 22, the lowest since 1909. But by 9 o'clock on the same morning the temperature had risen ten degrees. During that period of extremely unusual weather—and it is not often we have unusual weather in Vancouver—there was a fuel crisis. Hardship and suffering undoubtedly occurred, and there was a tremendously increased demand for fuel. Steps were taken to meet that unusual situation and on February 2 the Sun newspaper reported as follows:

> Army authorities to-day released figures showing a total of 690 cords of bushwood had been cut by soldiers Sunday.
> Army crews continued operation at the same rate Monday and to-day, and will continue felling trees until the civic fuel committee declares the emergency over.

Shortly after that, the army that had gone into the woods to meet this emergency ceased their operations and, I presume, did so because the emergency had passed.

On January 25 the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board came to Vancouver, and of course he was faced with the problem of the fuel shortage. According to the Province newspaper Mr. Gordon is reported to have defended the part played by the wartime prices and trade board in the fuel situation and answered a series of questions relating to his organization's operations in British Columbia.

He charged that the wartime prices and trade board had received no cooperation whatever from the marketing board.

He announced that plans were already being executed for the relief of the fuel situation in Vancouver and told of measures being taken to break the potato deadlock as well. Mr. Gordon, after pointing out that logs were now being cut in False Creek sawmills as an experimental expedient to solve the fuel problem, said that a general rationing of fuel such as had been done in respect of other products now on rations would be utterly unworkable.

The rationing of fuel in Canada, which is now proposed by hon. members opposite, would, I believe, be an extraordinary departure from the general underlying principle of rationing. True, wherever there is an actual shortage, and distribution on a basis of equality can be maintained only by rationing, all the difficulties and costs and inconveniences of rationing become necessary. But to suggest that here in Canada, with our abundance of coal and fuel, particularly in British Columbia, we must submit to all the inconvenience of rationing, when all that is necessary is to take some reasonable precautions to see to it that an abundant supply is available, is something that I cannot support.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the hon. member who suggested rationing fuel?

Mr. McGEER: The hon. member for Vancouver South, I understood.

Mr. GREEN: I said that perhaps rationing might be necessary.

Mr. McGEER: Oh, my hon. friend comes to "perhaps"; it sounded a little different as I got it across the floor.

Mr. GREEN: Well, read the speech if you do not believe what I say.

Mr. McGEER: I am not questioning the hon. member's word. I say that the force with which he presented it sent it across to me without the "perhaps." But I agree that "perhaps" rationing of everything may be necessary.

I appreciate, and I rather congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver South upon the course he has pursued this afternoon. I would not suggest for a moment that this fuel agitation is designed to counteract the influence of the social service programme announced in the press to-day by the government. I would hardly think there would be such a design as that, although it did seem to me, as I noticed the evident preparation of every one of the speakers who followed the mover of the motion to adjourn, that is was a fairly well-laid plan.

Coming from Vancouver, I know there are some persons there who do not believe that the government at Ottawa was responsible for the fuel shortage, and they were not Liberals. I quote from the Vancouver Sun of February 3, which says, "Labourites demand council supply wood." And the Sun reporting the meeting of the Vancouver and New Westminster district trades and labour council has this to say:

Full responsibility for the fuel shortage was placed on the aldermen by President Birt Showler as he countered a claim by delegate Jack Price, a city council member, that the coal shortage was partly due to down-town buildings changing from oil to coal. The coal used by large buildings could not be burned in a home furnace, the president asserted. The sole responsibility for the situation rests with the aldermen and they have done nothing but pass the buck to the provincial and federal governments.

I think this incident in the house this afternoon and evening does draw to the attention of the government the nature of the responsibility that comes with bringing down any programme of controlling prices and regulating production. If the government is to control the price of coal; if the government is to control the price of wood fuel or the price of any consumer's commodity, then the government must face the responsibility of guaranteeing or taking and exercising the powers of guaranteeing the supply of that commodity at that controlled price. I mention that because I believe I have observed a tendency on the part of the wartime prices and trade board to assume that mere regulation of prices is all that is necessary. Undoubtedly control of prices in this emergency is necessary. If prices had not been controlled in this emergency, and controlled in the effective way they have been, then the disaster to those unfortunates unable to pay the price that would have been demanded would have been much greater than their suffering from the temporary shortage which existed.

I think, however, the government would be well advised to take this as a lesson, and to recognize that controls go further than the mere regulation of price. I do not think we shall ever face a serious shortage of fuel on the Pacific coast, or in Vancouver, or throughout the west. True, we may experience extraordinary weather conditions from time to time; we may face the hardship of a temporary break in the fuel supply, but there are a great many other features of our price control that we shall have to meet as time goes on. I am not in a position to question the methods already adopted to avoid a repetition of what has happened during this winter, not only in the west but throughout the whole dominion; but if we are to make a success of the control and regulation of prices, I think it is now fairly evident that we must also take steps to guarantee the maximum possible flow, where there are shortages, and the essential flow where there are not, of supplies of consumer needs. I do not know that to-day there is any serious shortage of fuel in Vancouver; I telegraphed to ascertain whether there is or not, but all the information I could secure before I left that city was to the effect that the situation was reasonably well in hand and that with better weather coming the emergency would pass.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I had no notice whatever that this debate was coming on this afternoon. I wish to say that in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), who has just resumed his seat, as far as I know, this was no move whatsoever, political or otherwise, to counteract the valuable statement on social security which was made to-day by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). I do not think the hon. member does himself justice in making the statement he made.

With regard to this question of wood I should like to offer the suggestion that we utilize the services of prisoners of war on the bush lots of Ontario. Labour with which to cut the trees on the wood lots is practically non-existent. I know that to be so because I live on a wood lot myself. I believe prisoners of war would be only too willing to do this work, and the English experience has been that they are of great help. When that suggestion is made, the immediate reply is that a great many of them might escape. With that I disagree. The practice has been that those prisoners allowed outside the wire are the ones who have become known as reliable people and the experience in England has been that prisoners of war have provided very useful assistance in connection with agriculture. If their work can be utilized in England, which is in a far more vulnerable and in a far more dangerous position than Canada, surely we could try the experiment here and see if they could be used for work of this kind in this country, for among them are many expert woodsmen.

I wish to sound a note of warning in this regard. The farmers of old Ontario know how hard it is to get wood for fuel; there is hardly a farmer who has not gained that knowledge during the past year. As a result of this shortage there will be a tendency to go into the bush lots and wood lots of Ontario and further deplete them. This would be most dangerous. I believe there are sufficient windfalls already on the ground to provide a useful supply of wood fuel for a very large part of southern Ontario, and it is this fuel that I believe prisoners of war could harvest. I would further suggest that they could be utilized for reforestation work, to be done this year and this growing season. We know we are up against it for man-power. We know we have not the man-power for this type of work, and I suggest that it would be well worth while to make this experiment in the utilization of prisoners of war.

Mr. SLAGHT: Does the hon. member suggest that the farmers of Ontario would want, say fifty Germans, armed with axes, in their back wood lots?

Mr. ADAMSON: There would not be fifty; there would be perhaps four or five in any one place. That has been the practice in England. Could the hon. member imagine employing fifty men on one farm? They have proved eminently satisfactory and a great help in harvesting the crop that was grown in England this year.

Then I should like to mention the danger of overcutting and further denuding our forests in the agricultural districts of Canada. In this connection I wish to quote the editorial from this month's American Forest, to indicate the situation that exists at present. Speaking of Europe and the warring countries, it says:

> Most of these countries, even in peace-time, have to import lumber from the few nations with forest surpluses. As in England the war now is draining off forest growth over a wide expanse of the civilized world. Overcutting and destruction is reported everywhere in the warring and occupied countries. Every thinking forester knows that the forest depletion that is going on in England and European countries will have repercussions in America.
> Lack of wood and the tremendous demand that is building up for it when reconstruction of these countries is at hand means pressure on our own forests. It is a fair prediction that this pressure, involved as it will be in international relations, may be so great as to complicate seriously and intensify our own forest problems when the war is over. Skilful diplomacy will be called for in dealing with it; and that in turn will call for more exact information than we now have on our own forest situation and our own post-war needs. The one comforting fact is that we have the forest-growing soils in abundance.

This demand for farm wood, in order to keep the farm houses warm, must be scientifically administered. We cannot send the people at will into the remaining bush lands of Ontario, and say to them, "Go and cut the wood, at so much a cord." If we do that, we shall increase our problems of soil erosion, drifting and drought. There would be no surer way of causing permanent damage, damage that could never be repaired, than to allow indiscriminate, unregulated and unscientific destruction of our wood lots.

Mr. S. J. FURNISS (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise frequently in the house, but I feel I should say a few words to-night to relieve the minister of the responsibility for conditions over which he has no control. The district of Muskoka, which I have the honour to represent, is one of the greatest sources of firewood in Ontario. It is within easy trucking distance of the line where coal meets wood, and the cheapness of either decides which will be used to the greater extent for fuel.

When I tell the house that the official record of the fall of snow at Muskoka airport, in the centre of the district, was recorded two weeks ago at fourteen feet seven inches, hon. members will understand why little or no wood has been cut in that district this winter. To make matters worse, the snow came early, before there was any frost in the ground, with the result that there are some places where water stands, and on which there is no solid bottom to work. The wood was cut in the winter, and swamped out where it could be easily loaded on trucks and trucked away. That snow has settled to possibly five or six feet, and in some places seven feet.

Only recently a Muskoka resident told me that in some places in the bush of Muskoka there is a depth of seven feet of snow, and he said further that wood-cutting and lumbering is at an absolute standstill. The hon. member (Mr. Adamson) who has just resumed his seat spoke about cutting fallen timber for wood. A sawmill was located within a quarter of a mile of my home this summer. Lumber was cut out of a hardwood bush in that vicinity, and it was paid for by the thousand feet. The lumbermen took the tree only up as far as the limbs, and the result was that they left hundreds of cords of wood in the bush. That timber was cut when the leaves were on the trees. The leaves dried on the limbs, and now there is a canopy of snow over the top of the trees. That timber will lie there until the snow is gone.

I understand the subsidy is a dollar a cord on all wood cut until June 30. I would suggest to the minister that that time might be extended in some districts until the end of October. Muskoka is not the best farming district in the world. The land is in scattered patches, and the farmer is not occupied all the summer in farming operations. He and his son, if the time were extended, could cut a considerable amount of wood which otherwise would not be cut. I know that wood cut when the leaves are on is not as good wood as that which is cut when they are off. Any practical woodman will corroborate that statement. But second quality wood is better than no wood at all. I believe honestly that if the time of cutting were extended, thousands of additional cords would be cut which otherwise would not be available for burning next winter. I ask the minister to give this matter serious consideration.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, when the orders of the day were called the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) moved the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, to inform the house and the country of the acute fuel situation. He then proceeded to tell the house that the government had informed the country very fully on the subject some two weeks before he spoke. Then he read lengthy extracts from the statement issued by the government. It seems to me that under the circumstances he was scarcely bringing to the attention of the house a matter of urgent public importance with which hon. members were not familiar. The advertisement from which he quoted had been published in almost every newspaper in Canada, and in addition radio announcements had been made calling the attention of the public to the situation.

The government has, of course, from the commencement of the war, given continuous attention to the fuel situation. The fuel administrator was the first appointment made by the wartime prices and trade board in the direction of the administration of an industry. That appointment dates back to 1939. The fact that nothing has been heard until recently about difficulties in obtaining fuel is, I believe, a tribute to the efficiency with which the fuel situation was administered by the wartime prices and trade board, and by the fuel administrator. I can speak freely on the subject, for it is only within the last two or three weeks that I have been directly responsible for the administration of the fuel situation. I think a splendid piece of work has been done.

We can hardly discuss coal and wood fuel as a single problem, because they differ materially. Coal is undoubtedly a national problem. It was so considered before the war, and it certainly has been so considered during the war. The consumption of coal in war years has increased tremendously. In the pre-war year of 1939 the consumption was 29,600,000 tons. In the last calendar year the consumption was 43,000,000 tons, representing nearly fifty per cent increase. It is estimated that for the year 1943 the consumption will be 48,700,000 tons, a further very considerable increase. Of this coal only about one-sixth is used as domestic fuel. Of course the railroads are the largest single consumers, using about one-quarter of the total consumption. Heavy industry uses the remainder beyond that used by domestic users and the railroads.

The quantities of coal consumed have risen rapidly month by month, and probably will continue to rise as long as the present emergency exists. The production of Canadian coal unfortunately has not kept pace with the expanded consumption. Consumption of coal has risen almost fifty per cent in the period from the commencement of the war to date, while Canadian production has risen only fifteen per cent. Whereas Nova Scotia coal once came as far west as the lake St. John district, and Sudbury, and London and Hamilton, at the present time we find it necessary to bring United States coal as far east as Rivière du Loup. In other words, the maritime provinces production of coal is able to do little more than meet the requirements of the maritime provinces. Before the war the distribution of Alberta coal was a problem, while to-day we find that the prairie production of coal is barely able to meet the requirements of the prairie provinces. Therefore we must draw very heavily upon imports of coal from the United States. Imports of coal from England, which were very important before the war, have been reduced almost to nothing.

Last summer the difficulty of obtaining domestic coal was foreseen by the government, and hon. members will recall that an announcement was made that the government would arrange for the financing of purchases of coal by domestic users. This policy was taken advantage of to a considerable extent, with the result that far more coal was purchased last summer than is ordinarily the case. There was no difficulty about purchasing coal at that time; anyone could purchase all the coal he wished, and the financing was arranged for him by the government. I think people in general anticipated their normal requirements of coal and had that coal in their cellars. As the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Soper) has said, the dealers anticipated that the bulk of their distribution for the year had been finished last autumn, and expected to have little to do this winter. We all know that we have experienced a very severe winter, the most severe in fifty years, and the result has been that the anticipated requirements for domestic coal have been greatly exceeded. The householder who thought he had a sufficient supply in his cellar has had to go to his dealer for additional quantities of coal.

Coal was available in Canada but unfortunately it was not always available where required, and the problem of distribution became grave. I think the efforts of the fuel controller and his staff have succeeded to a large extent in overcoming the difficulties of distribution and have put coal in the hands of users when it was required, with a very few exceptions. I know there have been threats of serious coal shortages, threats that schools would have to close, threats that families would be without heat, but I think, with very few exceptions, the situation has been met in time, and these threatened emergencies have not actually occurred.

I do not think the problem of wood fuel can be regarded as a national problem. At the present time this country consumes about 10,000,000 cords of wood fuel. About three-quarters of this, or 7,500,000 cords, are cut by the consumers themselves. In other words, about three-quarters of the wood fuel never appears on the market. The farmer is the greatest consumer of wood fuel, and that fuel is cut by him as a normal part of his farming operations, is hauled to his house, and burned there, without appearing on the market.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would that not include sales in villages and towns roundabout?

Mr. HOWE: Not the fuel about which I am speaking. I shall speak about that in a moment. About 2,500,000 cords are consumed by urban users, and this represents the marketable fuel upon which the urban householder depends. It is anticipated by the fuel controller that we shall be about 500,000 cords short of the required supply, as the situation stands at the present time. In order to stimulate the production of fuel and have it move into dealers' hands to the extent of 500,000 cords, a campaign was undertaken two weeks ago to inform the public of the situation and to offer certain forms of cooperation by this government, to municipalities, cities and dealers, in order that this threatened shortage may be overcome.

It has been said here to-day that in suggesting that the municipalities have a responsibility in the matter, the government was attempting to relieve itself of the whole problem. I think that is far from the case. In fact, I think anyone reading the announcement will take the view that the government is offering a real and active partnership between itself and the municipalities in order to solve a problem that is local rather than national. In publishing this advertisement it was the wish of the government, first, to call attention to the situation; second, to be helpful in working toward a solution, and, third, to ask each municipality to direct a cooperative effort, in line with the broad needs of the locality, in an effort to meet its own particular situation.

The offer of the government has been stated here to-day. It is to pay a bonus of $1 a cord for wood cut before June 1 and in the hands of dealers on that date. The question was asked whether this $1 a cord would go to the dealer or to the producer of the wood. The $1 a cord is paid to the dealer, but it is not paid surreptitiously. Every producer is advised the the dealer is being paid this extra $1 a cord, and it is the intention of the government that he shall pass the bonus on to the producer. The dealers who have met with the government on this problem have all stated that it is their intention to pass on the $1 a cord to the producer, and I think I can say with great confidence that it will find its way into the pockets of the producer.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What about the producer who is also a dealer, the man who sells direct to the consumer? Will he get the bonus?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have definite instructions actually been given to the wood dealers throughout Canada to pass on the dollar to the producer of wood?

Mr. HOWE: We have been told that the dealers were unable to operate because the price was too low. This gives the dealer a chance to operate at a price on which we believe he can operate. The farmer knows that the dealer is getting the dollar bonus, and he knows the ceiling price, and I think the producer will hardly sell at a rate lower than the ceiling price plus the dollar.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am trying to find out whether or not the government has instructed the dealer to pass the dollar on to the producer, or has the government simply left it to the good graces of the dealer himself to pass the dollar on to the producer?

Mr. HOWE: I can hardly say that the government has issued specific instructions to the dealer, but certainly every implication is there that that must be done. I think there is every certainty that it will be done.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I ask a question?

Mr. HOWE: Every one has had a chance to speak.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This is a question I asked this afternoon. I wanted an answer.

Mr. HOWE: I have tried to answer it. I did not interrupt my hon. friend when he was speaking, and I would ask him not to interrupt me.

There were some difficulties last winter in the distribution of wood, and undoubtedly there was hardship in certain areas on account of the lack of wood fuel. It was due to rather unusual circumstances. In the Vancouver area it has been the custom to depend very heavily upon what is called mill waste and sawdust; that is, the chips and shavings which are surplus from the sawmills of that area. A great many householders in Vancouver have furnaces suitable for burning mill waste and sawdust but not for burning coal. There has been a reduction in the cut of lumber in the Vancouver area, with the result that certain mills which a year ago operated on a twenty-four hour basis have been operating on an eight-hour basis, and some have not been operating at all. The supply of mill waste and sawdust was consequently greatly reduced in that area. Another difficulty was that the snowfall in the Vancouver area stopped the production of logs for a considerable period, with the result that most of the mills were closed completely for a period of some two months. That was an interruption in the normal supply of wood fuel, which had a considerable effect in that area. Coal was diverted from Alberta into the Vancouver area to the amount of 100,000 tons. The fuel controller also arranged for the delivery of 100 million board feet of pulpwood, which was cut up into cordwood lengths and used as fuel. That very prompt action kept suffering to a minimum, but there was an unusual situation in the Vancouver area which caused hardship. The fuel controller did his best to meet that situation, and I think with some degree of success. That emergency has passed. It is to prevent exactly that kind of emergency that we are asking the cooperation of the municipalities with the government.

I have spoken of the bonus of $1 a cord to dealers. The notice mentioned several kinds of assistance from the government. It mentioned the fact that the government would assist in the transportation of pulpwood in certain cases, where the fuel controller may think assistance is justified. The intention is to assist in moving fuel from one producing area, where there may be a surplus, to a producing area where there is a deficit. It is also the purpose to help out in trucking the wood from the roadside to destination where local equipment is not sufficient for the purpose, and to help generally in the transportation and distribution of fuel wood.

The notice also offers the help of the government in securing priorities for necessary equipment for cutting fuel wood. It also asks the farmers to take an active interest in producing an extra supply of fuel wood and undertakes to protect them against any possible violation of the war service regulations when so engaged. In other words, the notice is an offer of cooperation on the part of the government, and an invitation to local communities and the citizens to cooperate with the government in solving a problem which no section of the community can claim as peculiarly its own.

We have had various suggestions offered to-day for a solution of the problem. I think the one most often given was to increase the ceiling price. That is an easy solution for a great many problems, but it must be obvious to every member that if we were to adopt the practice of increasing the ceiling price to meet every problem that comes along, we should soon have no price ceiling and no price control at all, and thus be well on the road to inflation. Five hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party offered that solution. I urge them to avoid suggestions of that kind if they believe that price control is a sound policy in times such as this, because that policy can be maintained only by rigidly observing existing price ceilings. One breakthrough for a particular commodity invites a break-through for a number of other commodities. To maintain a price ceiling policy with frequent exceptions is an impossibility.

One hon. member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation suggested that the answer would be to pay higher wages to wood cutters. That, I think, is not a solution. The production of firewood is not an industry in the sense that it lends itself to organization on a full-time basis. It is a part-time industry. It always has been, and I think it can be operated economically only on that basis.

Mr. GILLIS: I made no reference to higher wages for wood cutters. I was speaking of the coal miners.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made four constructive suggestions. I have dealt with one of them. He made the suggestion that the government should finance the producers of firewood. I think the policy of assisting the dealer and asking the cooperation of the municipalities leaves the way open to that kind of assistance. If the dealer is not willing to finance the producer, perhaps a plan can be worked out to meet special situations, where the financing of the producer would assist in the total production. That is a matter regarding which suggestions from a local organization would receive sympathetic consideration here.

We have had the suggestion from the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Furniss) that the date be later than June 1. The reason why June 1 was set as a date is that ordinary wood should be cut by the first of June in order to be dry for use the following winter. We hope that sufficient wood can be delivered to dealers by June 1, but if later on it becomes apparent that sufficient wood will not be in dealers' hands to meet the situation, I have no doubt that the period for the bonus will be extended.

I think that covers most of the points I wish to discuss. I ask for the complete cooperation of coal miners, producers of wood, consumers, dealers, and everyone associated with the problem in Canada. Part of the difficulties of the fuel controller has arisen from needless labour disputes. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) mentioned coal mining in his area. I happen to know that one mine in his area has been closed for two weeks over a trivial labour dispute arising out of a change of foremen. I sincerely hope that the practice of closing down this most essential industry for trivial reasons will not continue.

One of the difficulties on the Pacific coast this winter has been the fact that what was reported in the newspapers as a slow-down occurred in the mines of Vancouver island. In the period from June 1 to date the consequent reduction in normal production has amounted to 250,000 tons of coal in that area. Surely these situations can be avoided. I am sure that the Department of Labour is doing everything it can to maintain production at normal rates. The government asks for the cooperation of those engaged in these essential industries in seeing to it that Canada as a unit puts forth every possible effort to meet this situation.

I feel that our discussion to-day has been helpful. I hope it will assist the fuel controller in bringing home to the men and women of Canada, both consumers and producers, the gravity of the problem and the need for action.

During the coming year we hope to have an ample supply of coal, and we hope that every consumer of coal will lay in an ample stock for the winter months. We also hope that those using wood fuel will see to it that their winter needs are supplied. If they are producers as well as consumers, we trust that they will cut a little extra to make sure that they have sufficient for the winter, and if they are dealers or producers for sale to dealers, that they will make an extra effort to see that the dealer has ample stocks in hand.

Another announcement of the government to help the situation was the offer to the dealers to buy back in June, 1944, any wood bought before June, 1943, which had not been disposed of. That, of course, is an inducement to dealers to overpurchase rather than underpurchase to meet the situation.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I have to buy quite a few tons of soft coal yearly for buildings in Toronto. My superintendent tells me that never in his experience has he seen soft coal of such a wretched quality; that it is almost dust, and that it takes perhaps a ton and a half to two tons of soft coal this year to equal in burning value a ton of soft coal in normal times. Has such a situation been brought to the minister's attention?

Mr. HOWE: The Toronto district is dependent upon coal from the United States. I assume that the quality depends upon the colliery from which the coal is bought. If the hon. member's superintendent would buy from a well-known colliery, his difficulty might be lessened.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Coming from a district where there is a good deal of suffering, I would point out to the government that something should be done. Even if the dealers have coal, it is not possible to get it delivered. The men have been taken for the army and there is nobody to handle the deliveries. I cannot see that any appreciable progress has been made. The government can make all the statements it likes, but there are from eight to nine months in the year when we in Canada must have fuel, and in central Canada we are dependent upon the United States. We are away back to where we were during the last war, in 1917, when there was the same serious trouble. I fail to see that we are making any progress. The government is confronted with a most dangerous national problem in the present fuel situation. The first thing we know, the United States may put on an embargo, as they did in 1917. I urge on the government that something should be done. The small dealer cannot get men to deliver fuel. In 1922 I brought this national coal problem before parliament, but very little progress has been made. We are not through the present winter yet, let alone next winter.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I complete the question which I was trying to ask the minister? I inquired who actually got the money, and the minister said it went to the dealer. I am not just clear about the matter. Supposing a farmer producer with a wood lot cuts 100 cords of wood and sells it himself in town, is he entitled to the bonus, or must it go to a dealer?

Mr. HOWE: If the man in question cuts 100 cords of wood and sells it himself, he is a dealer and would be entitled to the bonus as a dealer.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister dealt with a number of suggestions which were offered this afternoon, but he said nothing about the question of man-power, and that is a particularly pressing matter with reference to the coal mines. The minister said that the prairie production barely met its own needs. I can speak only with regard to the part of the province from which I come. The southern part of Saskatchewan has tremendous coal potentialities, and they are not being fully used. Last year I took occasion to draw the attention of the government to the fact that the Estevan and Bienfait mining districts last summer were producing at about one-third capacity. Some of the pithead bosses told me that one mine normally producing seven hundred cars a month was down to about two hundred cars. A big briquetting plant which cost a million and a half dollars was completely closed for part of the year because man-power could not be obtained. That condition was remedied to some extent by an appeal being made in the fall for farmers who had any mining experience to go in the mines. A number of them have gone there, and the situation has been alleviated somewhat. These men will be going back to the farms within the next four weeks, or even less, and the situation will be back where it was.

I was hoping there would be some statement from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) as to whether it will be possible to get labour into these coal mines. The price is not so much a problem as getting the necessary man-power. It seems to me some man-power could be found that we are not using. I have in mind, for instance, some conscientious objectors in service camps, who were working in Banff putting in ski jumps and in the Prince Albert national park putting in tourist roads. I have in mind a number of cases of conscientious objectors who are in gaol. It seems to me that there is some man-power around that is not being used very beneficially. I should like the minister to make some statement as to whether or not it will be possible during the summer to have some man-power made available to the mines; otherwise next fall we shall have the same position as we have now.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I will say this to my hon. friend, and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) will understand it better than he does: you cannot call men by phrases. Coal miners are coal miners, and we did attack this problem in a resolute way this fall. I think if the hon. member goes back to his own province he will find that we more than manned the mines in Saskatchewan last fall. We reached the point where there was an actual surplus of labour in the mines of Saskatchewan. We have 3,300 additional miners in the mines of western Canada, which is, I believe, no small achievement.

I am not afraid of the man-power situation, but I do not think it will be solved by mere declarations expressed in a few words. War in its very essence demands substitutes. Every nation engaged in this conflict will be confronted with the problem as long as the war lasts. But it can be said to the credit of the Canadian people when you view the thing in a big way on the production front—and I shall have more to say about this later in the session—when you take into consideration the agricultural production and the men we have placed in the fighting forces, the achievements of this nation, notwithstanding the opinions of some hon. members, will ring down through the pages of history.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): These are more and more phrases.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; they are not phrases; that is what Mr. Churchill said the other day and what Mr. Bevin stated publicly when I was in England recently. I am not afraid of any debate on the so-called man-power muddle in this country. After all, it is largely a question of mechanics. With regard to people who talk about distributing the working classes of this country, I cannot altogether agree with that. I think it far better to make a man or a woman feel that he or she is part of the war effort and that they go voluntarily where we want them to go instead of being pushed around. I have always held the opinion that you can persuade the Canadian people, but you cannot boss them too much. As far as my department is concerned in our approach to the very difficult problem of man-power, my hon. friend who comes from the old country, where they have had this background of organization of the civil services, the development of unemployment insurance, and the use of the employment offices in connection with the man-power problem of that country, when he reflects on his own experiences, if he was old enough to reflect when he left there—

Mr. MacNICOL: Was he?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. I do not say that in a sarcastic way. I think he will agree that our approach to the man-power problem has been a sound approach, a rational approach, and as far as my department is concerned it will continue to be so. The degree of regimentation to which the Canadian people have subjected themselves even in the last six months redounds to their credit.

At the last session we heard about labour poaching; we do not hear about poaching to-day. We heard about labour turnover; we do not hear a great deal about labour turnover to-day. I never thought I should see the day when, within six months, we should practically move the whole industrial and agricultural population of this country through the employment offices under the jurisdiction of the labour department. It may be true that in some respects the machinery is creaking a little. That is inevitable when one considers that the personnel of the labour department in the last few years has grown from practically nothing to almost 7,000. When an organization is built up that deals with the very delicate problem of moving human beings from one job to another, people who have not had a great deal of experience with that form of machinery, I think it is to the credit of the organization engaged in that difficult task, and also to the credit of the working people of this dominion, that we have been able to face up to the coal situation, to the lumber situation. I shall talk about that later this session. I feel proud of the work of this government in manning the lumber industry of this country during last winter. I believe we have a worth-while policy, although, of course it will not cure the situation. Good heavens; look at Germany to-day! I have heard my hon. friend speak about organization and regimentation. Give me the power of Hitler, and I will put, not the people in this country, but the members of this House of Commons to work. They will not be making speeches here but doing what they are told. I think hon. members get my point. Even with the powers of compulsion that they have in the countries against which we are fighting at the present time there is a tremendous shortage of labour; in Germany they have to have a mass movement of the people from the countries that have been subject to their rule temporarily; they have had to pick up the populations of whole villages and put them down in Germany and set them to work.

I think our method of approach is the correct one, notwithstanding opinions to the contrary. It is largely a question of mechanics and machinery, and as our machinery gets, as I might say, more efficient—I am not taking the position that we have a perfect machine—when the people who are operating that machine gain more experience in the movement of labour in this country, they will reflect credit not only on the discipline of the Canadian people but also on the country as a whole.

Motion (Mr. Green) agreed to.

The house met at three o'clock.

FOURTH VICTORY LOAN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LAUNCHING OF CAMPAIGN ON APRIL 26 WITH MINIMUM CASH OBJECTIVE OF $1,100,000,000

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement with reference to the forthcoming victory loan.

In the budget speech I indicated that the estimated borrowing needs for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1944, would amount to $2,748,000,000.

As a first step in meeting these borrowing needs the national war finance committee will on April 26 launch Canada's fourth victory loan. We Canadians have reason to be proud of the record of our victory loan campaigns, and of our response to them. In October last the third victory loan was an outstanding success, accounting for $991,000,000 from over two million subscribers.

The present situation clearly calls for even more impressive results, and the minimum cash objective for the fourth victory loan will be $1,100,000,000. As I have emphasized in the budget speech we are primarily concerned with selling victory bonds in greater amounts and to a greater number of Canadians. The reason is threefold. First, because we have to raise huge sums of money in order that the war may be effectively prosecuted. Secondly, as I have pointed out many times, the increased spending power in the hands of our citizens, if not directed into savings, will lead inevitably to inflation. Thirdly, our desire is that more and more of our government obligations should find their way into the hands of our ordinary citizens—people of moderate means whose interests now and in the future can best be served by owning what I might describe as "a share in Canada". The fourth victory loan will present another opportunity for every Canadian citizen to acquire a proprietary interest in his own country and I hope that every Canadian will make a serious effort to take advantage of this opportunity.

In all these victory loan operations substantial support arises from the subscriptions of non-banking financial institutions and from industrial corporations. This source of borrowing can only go so far, however, as new corporate funds ordinarily available for investment are now subject to strict limitations such as the excess profits tax. In the third victory loan purchases by this class of investor accounted for the very large sum of $600,000,000. I am sure that such investors, as in the past, will do their utmost to provide leadership of the highest quality in the forthcoming victory loan.

It is evident, however, that in any case the balance remaining to be met by individual purchasers will be greatly increased. To succeed in passing the minimum objective of $1,100,000,000 will require purchases by individuals of $500,000,000 or more—an increase over third victory loan results of 33 p.c. or thereabouts for the country as a whole. To reach this objective for individuals we will need to obtain participation on a much wider scale than in the past, and individual purchases will need to be sharply increased. I am accordingly asking the national war finance committee to make every attempt to increase participation in the loan by Canadians in every walk of life.

I recognize that it will call for a supreme effort on the part of the Canadian people to face this new demand of the war effort. The fourth victory loan will be another challenge to the Canadian people—the greatest financial challenge with which they have ever been faced. While the need for money is greater than ever before it is equally true that the bond buying power of the majority of Canadians is greater by far than at any previous time. The coverage therefore must be broader; more individuals must subscribe if the bond drive is to play its part in this present emergency. The results of the fourth victory loan campaign will measure our determination and unity of purpose to attain the primary and outstanding goal for which we all live today—the goal of achieving a complete and overwhelming victory. I am confident that we can and will meet this challenge.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

AMENDMENT OF ACT CREATING DEPARTMENT—CHART OF DEPARTMENTAL ORGANIZATION

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): On March 1 last I tabled a chart of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and at the time the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) requested that additional copies be tabled for distribution. I now lay on the table 260 copies of this chart and would request that they be distributed to hon. members.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TRANSFER OF FUNCTIONS OF DOMINION FUEL BOARD TO COAL CONTROLLER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Under the provisions of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act, I table a copy of the order in council transferring the functions of the dominion fuel board to the coal controller and transferring the functions of the Minister of Finance related thereto to the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

SPECIAL COMMITTEES

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) be substituted for that of Mr. Hazen on the select committee on railways and shipping.

That the names of Messrs. Bence, Ross (Calgary East) and MacKenzie (Neepawa) be substituted for those of Messrs. Stirling, Gershaw and Maybank on the select committee on reconstruction and reestablishment.

That the names of Messrs. Maybank and Fulford be substituted for those of Messrs. MacKenzie (Neepawa) and Telford on the select committee on social security.

That the name of Mr. Edwards be substituted for that of Mr. Ross (Calgary East) on the select committee on the defence of Canada regulations.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. MULOCK

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR GASPÉ IN DEBATE ON MARCH 15

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) is reported at page 1267 of Hansard of March 15, 1943, in part as follows:

At the time that three ships were sunk opposite Cap Chat in the first days of July the boat I just mentioned was carrying some sportsmen going on a fishing trip on the north shore. Said boat was escorted by a corvette as far as to the north shore, but if my information is correct, this corvette did not complete the fishing trip with the boat, but came back to the south shore.

These are the words to which I object:

My information is that the boat was escorted at the request of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) because it was carrying the mail to the north shore.

That statement is absolutely and definitely not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At whose request was this boat escorted? Let the government tell us that.

Mr. MULOCK: I made a definite statement.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The boat was not escorted at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a question of fact.

JUDGES ACT

JUDGES NOT TO ACT AS COMMISSIONERS OR ARBITRATORS—TO BE BOUND BY DECISION OF COURT OF FINAL APPEAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Judges Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill contains two clauses. The first clause seeks to regulate the serving of judges on commissions, dominion, provincial or municipal, the work of which would take them away from their judicial duties. The second section deals with the question of judges following the decisions of the privy council or the court of last resort in connection with mixed marriages. Since the bill was before the house last year, only last week a judge in Montreal, Hon. Mr. Justice Forest, commented upon this to a representative of the church, Canon Morin, in a case before him. He said:

"Don't you think there should be some agreement between the Catholic church and the state on this matter of mixed marriages?" queried his lordship.

"I wish there were," replied Canon Morin.

I ask that this bill be given some consideration. This legislation is going to be more necessary than ever after the war, and I plead with the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to give consideration to both clauses of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN ARMY EMBLEM

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Has a distinctive emblem been adopted for the Canadian army in England?
2. If so, is it a banner or a flag?
3. Is the British flag that of the armies of South Africa, Australia and Canada?
4. Is there a non-official flag, but one recognized as that of the Canadian army overseas?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. See answer to question 4.

2. See answer to question 4.

3. The union, or union jack, is the device on the king's colour of Canadian regiments. The union jack is flown on selected forts, armouries, drill halls and other buildings occupied by the Canadian army in Canada.

4. Apart from, and in addition to, flags and colours carried by regiments, the King's regulations make provision for various flags to be flown at sea by members of the army council, by general officers commanding stations and by governors of colonies and lieutenant-governors. For use in the field, regulations provide for flags or pennons designating certain military headquarters and also for flags on motor cars and for mounted orderlies of general officers commanding-in-chief, and commanders of specified army formations. But there was no provision for a flag designating the commander or the headquarters of a dominion force at sea or in the field.

In 1939 Major-General (now Lieutenant-General) McNaughton suggested that a distinctive flag should be available to be flown by the commander of the senior formation of the Canadian active service force. A design was approved by the then Minister of National Defence, for the purpose indicated, and has been so used since the 1st Canadian division, then the senior formation of the Canadian active service force, proceeded overseas in December, 1939. Later the flag was successively transferred to the commander of the 1st Canadian corps and later to the commander of the first Canadian army, as each became in turn the senior formation of the Canadian army overseas.

This flag is for special identification: to afford a ready means of distinguishing the character of the headquarters over which it floats, and the portion of the commonwealth to which they belong. It has no status as a national flag. Its use does not interfere with, or infringe upon, the prescribed uses of the union flag.

Its use may be compared with the present use of the red ensign with the Canadian arms in the fly, flown on suitable occasions on buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situate without Canada.

MOBILIZATION ACT—KINGSTON ADMINISTRATIVE DISTRICT

Mr. BENCE:

1. What are the names of the members of the board under the N.R.M.A. for the administrative district with headquarters at Kingston?
2. What is the name of the divisional registrar?
3. What are the names of the officers of this administrative division responsible to the board?
4. How long has each been employed in his present position?
5. How much money has each received for, (a) salary, (b) expenses?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Chairman: Hon. Mr. Justice A. W. Greene; deputy chairmen, James Roderick MacLaren, Esq., William A. Parisien, Esq.; member, His Honour Judge J. C. Reynolds.

2. Lorne McDonell, Esq.

3. The registrar, Lorne McDonell, is the officer in charge of registration and procedure and directs the staff and is the contact official with the Board.

4. Lorne McDonell, Esq., was appointed August 28, 1940.

5. (a) Salary $9,038.78; (b) expenses, $392.87.

ST. LAWRENCE SUGAR REFINERY

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Has the St. Lawrence Sugar Refinery been closed down?
2. If so, on what date?
3. Was it closed because of lack of supply of raw cane sugar?
4. How much refined sugar was produced by this company during each of the years 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942?
5. Has the government adopted any measures adequate to make up the sugar deficiency resulting from the closing of this plant?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.
2. February 1, 1943.
3. No.

4. 1939, 178,322,940 pounds; 1940, 189,812,517 pounds; 1941, 190,543,837 pounds; 1942, 130,740,188 pounds.

5. There will be no sugar deficiency from the closing of this refinery. Arrangements have been made between the St. Lawrence Sugar Refineries Ltd., and the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company to refine all sugar in the port of Montreal in the plant of the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company. This is feasible with the reduced production due to rationing.

PRINCE RUPERT-CEDARVALE HIGHWAY

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What percentage of work was done on the Prince Rupert-Cedarvale highway up to March 1, 1943?

2. Have arrangements been made to construct the road east of Cedarvale to link up with the now existing highway at Hazelton?

3. Has the contract been let on this gap between Cedarvale and Hazelton? If not, what is the reason?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I understand the hon. member is willing to let this question drop for the time being.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I have obtained the information I need from the minister, so that I ask that this question be dropped.

Question dropped.

SASKATOON, SASK., NAVAL BARRACKS

Mr. BENCE:

What steps has the administration taken to provide for the erection of a naval barracks in the city of Saskatoon?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The general policy, so far as possible, is to provide satisfactory training and living accommodation at all Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve divisions.

Saskatoon is being actively studied with a view to providing better accommodation, but no definite decision has been reached as yet.

HELICOPTERS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Is the government now building helicopters in Canada?

2. If not, do they contemplate building any?

3. Is any research work being done in this direction?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. No.

3. No.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

IMMIGRANTS BY RELIGIOUS AFFILIATION, 1939-42

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. How many immigrants were admitted to Canada in each of the years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942?

2. How many of those admitted were Protestants?

3. How many were Roman Catholics?

4. How many were Jews?

5. How many had no religious affiliations?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Calendar year 1939, 16,994; calendar year 1940, 11,324; calendar year 1941, 9,329; calendar year 1942, 7,576.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Information is not available as to the religious persuasion of the immigrants.

EXPORTS OF DRESSED BEEF

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Was any dressed beef exported from Canada to the United States during the calendar year 1942?

2. If so, what amount?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling the official answer to this question. If the hon. member wishes to have certain other information—the whole information—for his own personal use, I have it here and shall be glad to send it to him.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister tables what he says is an official answer to the question, and indicates that there is further information available to the hon. member. I think we ought to have made clear the difference between an official answer and an answer.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have spoken at various times on questions of this kind. Censorship regulations rule out the publication of certain trade statistics, and these are in that class. I have no objection to giving the information to the hon. member for his own use, but we cannot start to pick and choose information to be made public in regard to shipping.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no censorship on parliament.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Under the censorship regulations these figures are banned from publication, but where a member of the house desires such information for his own more or less confidential use I see no reason why he should not be given it. In this particular case I have the information here and am ready to give it to the hon. member.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FINANCE EMPLOYEES IN DEPARTMENTS AND SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. What are the names of the employees of the Department of Finance in the various departments including the Senate and the House of Commons, and the years and service of each one?

2. What are their individual salaries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

INTERNMENT OF WAR PRISONERS—RATES OF PAY TO OFFICERS AND MEN

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Do German and Italian officers and men receive any pay from this government while they are in internment camps in Canada?

2. If so, what are the rates of pay for men, non-commissioned officers and commissioned officers?

3. Do the German, Italian and Japanese governments pay Canadian officers and men interned in their countries?

4. If so, do they receive the rates of pay customarily paid to Canadian officers and men?

ASSISTANCE TO FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What was the total financial assistance given by the federal government, by way of statute, bonus or otherwise, to the fishing industry (including shellfish), for 1942, (a) Atlantic coast, (b) Pacific coast, (c) inland fisheries, if any?

2. What was the amount in connection with shellfish?

GILMOUR BUILDING, REGINA—T. H. WOOD

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Has the government acquired the whole or any part of the Gilmour building on Scarth street in the city of Regina?

2. Was this building or any part of it leased by the government? If so, on what terms?

3. For what purpose?

4. Are any alterations necessary? If so, what is the cost thereof, and what part will be recoverable at the termination of the lease?

5. Were any tenants compelled to move from this building to get possession for the government? If so, how many?

6. Was one T. H. Wood, a photographer, allowed to remain in occupation of a studio in this building?

7. If so, was he treated differently from other tenants and why was he allowed to remain?

8. Has T. H. Wood a privileged position in the sale of photographic material to the government of Canada?

HAMILTON BUILDING, REGINA—M. L. FITZGERALD

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Is the Canadian government acquiring or has it acquired by purchase, lease or otherwise, the whole or any part of the Hamilton building, situate on the corners of Hamilton and South Railway streets in the city of Regina?

2. If so, from what person or persons?

3. How much floor space and upon what terms?

4. Are alterations being made? If so, at what cost, and who pays for same?

5. What alterations are being made and if any portion is being paid for by the government under lease arrangement, how much will be recoverable at termination of the lease?

6. Is M. L. Fitzgerald employed in Regina by the wartime prices and trade board?

7. If so, what are his duties?

8. By whom was he recommended for such position?

9. What is the rate of his remuneration?

10. Does the said M. L. Fitzgerald reside in the building above referred to?

11. Is he any relation to or connected with any of the owners from whom the government acquired the said premises?

12. For what particular use were the said premises acquired?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—REGISTRATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. What is the total number of permanent positions in the unemployment insurance branch of the government throughout the country?

2. Did the civil service commission in making these permanent appointments bar all competition from any persons outside the civil service?

3. If so, from whom did the civil service commission get permission to exclude candidates outside of the civil service from competing in these examinations?

4. Were the temporary employees, under the jurisdiction of the director of national registration of unemployment relief, blanketed into permanent positions in the unemployment insurance commission? If so, how many and why?

5. What is the name and present position in the civil service of the former director of national registration of unemployment relief?

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. What amount, if any, of the $76,150 recovered by the province of British Columbia from the estates of old age pensioners during the calendar year 1942 has been paid to the dominion government?

2. How much, if any, of this money is recoverable by the dominion government?

3. What amounts, if any, have been paid by each of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, from moneys collected from estates of old age pensioners to the dominion government in each of the years 1940, 1941, and 1942?

4. Is the placing of a caveat against the property of old age pensioners by the provinces required by the dominion government?

UPLANDS AIRPORT—IRON FIREMEN

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. How many iron firemen were installed in the Uplands airport?
2. What was the cost of each, and what was the total cost including installation?
3. From whom were the iron firemen purchased and by whom were they installed?
4. Have there been any complaints with regard to the efficiency of these iron firemen?

INTERNMENTS—CAMILLIEN HOUDE

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the Minister of Justice received copies of resolutions adopted by municipal councils in the province of Quebec requesting the release of Mr. Camillien Houde from the internment camp?
2. If so, what municipal councils have passed such resolutions and forwarded copies to the Minister of Justice?
3. How many of such councils have sent copies to the Minister of Justice?
4. Has the Minister of Justice received similar requests or resolutions from other public bodies in the province of Quebec?
5. If so, what are the names of these public bodies, and what is the total number?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRENTON COLD STORAGE LIMITED—SUBSIDIES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all letters, agreements, telegrams and any other documents in the possession of the Department of Agriculture, regarding the subsidies paid to the Trenton Cold Storage Limited, Trenton, Ontario, since 1939.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—MARKETING OF 1943-44 CROP

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda and other documents received from the advisory committee to the wheat board, agricultural and cooperative organizations with reference to the marketing of the 1943-44 crop.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I assume that this motion refers to correspondence, memoranda and other documents addressed by the organizations mentioned to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have no objection to the passing of the motion subject to the withholding of any confidential or privileged documents.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

AUTHORIZATION OF ANNUAL PAYMENT OF $200,000 FOR TEN YEARS FROM APRIL 1, 1943

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, by the authorization of payment to the federal district commission out of the consolidated revenue fund of a sum of $200,000 a year for a period of ten years from the first day of April, 1943.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): May I ask if there will be enough money in this appropriation to clean up the sidewalks around parliament hill, which are in a most dangerous condition? It is disgraceful in weather like this; someone will be killed. The matter is urgent and I am entitled to a reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that the question of the hon. member for Broadview is not in order, Mr. Speaker, either on the orders of the day, or on this resolution.

Motion agreed to.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

IRISHMEN AND THE WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. We who have had the good fortune to be born in Ireland are mighty proud to-day of the way in which Irishmen are conducting themselves in this great war. We have two reasons to be proud. First General Anderson, General Alexander and General Montgomery have stopped the German Rommel in his tracks. We are also proud that the young men of northern Ireland in 1941 enlisted one hundred per cent in the armed services, so that there is a greater dearth of farm hands in northern Ireland than there is even in Canada. An Irish soldier in Africa received a letter from his wife stating that there was no possibility of getting any men to dig the garden. He wrote back, "Never mind, the guns are buried there." This letter was censored. Very soon a lorry full of soldiers arrived to dig the garden from end to end, so that all the wife had to do was to plant the spuds.

To-day we pay honour to the splendid successors of Wellington and Kitchener, Lord Roberts and Lord French. We wish Montgomery godspeed and a splendid victory over Hitler.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the government has reached some decision with respect to the Easter recess. Is the Prime Minister in a position to-day to communicate the government's decision to the house?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government proposes to have a fortnight's adjournment at Easter, subject to one reservation, which is that sufficient progress shall have been made with certain measures which are on the order paper to-day to enable us to take the fortnight at Easter.

There will be an adjournment for certain from April 21 until May 3. The 21st is the Wednesday preceding Good Friday. However, if the government feels justified in taking a few extra days, provided that we have made sufficient progress we would adjourn on Friday the 16th. That would mean that hon. members would get an additional five days at a sacrifice of two and a half sitting days. I hope it may be possible to have the fortnight's adjournment.

CANADIAN FORCES

SUBSISTENCE ALLOWANCES—REFERENCE TO WORDING OF QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN ON MARCH 15

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): In Hansard of March 15, at page 1231 there is a question under my name of which the last part of the first paragraph reads: "and where are their barracks in Ottawa?" Preceding that should be inserted the words, "and who are stationed in Ottawa."

WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

PRESS REPORT AS TO PLAN TO MAKE ADVANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a report in the western press which I hold in my hand. It is dated March 13 and is headed "Plan to Give Farmers Wheat Rise Benefit". It states that before Mr. McIvor, chairman of the wheat board, came to Ottawa he conferred with members of the Winnipeg grain exchange with respect to the increased prices of grain, and that he was taking the matter up with the minister when he came to Ottawa. The statement adds that it is expected that the minister will shortly issue a statement dealing with coarse grain and perhaps with wheat, that is, setting out the plan to give an advance to the farmers. Will the minister tell us when he can make that statement?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this subject and kindred matters referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle have been under consideration by members of the cabinet and the Canadian Wheat Board. I cannot say at the moment just when I shall be able to make a statement. As hon. members know, there has been a regrettable and unavoidable delay in these discussions, but just as soon as possible a statement will be made to the house.

HOUSING

REFERENCE TO CONDITIONS IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): An order for return on housing was passed by the house on February 8, concerning the Department of Finance and the Department of Munitions and Supply. The return has not yet been brought down and I ask when we may expect it. A meeting in Massey Hall, Toronto, has been called for to-night in connection with housing and I should like to have the information asked for in the return. I do not like to move the adjournment of the house but I think I would be quite justified in doing so owing to the delay or inability of the two ministers to furnish this information or the failure to give a statement in the budget. I think I am entitled to receive it. The situation is grave, and if I do not get an answer I shall move the adjournment of the house.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The housing situation in Toronto has been under study more or less continuously for some months by the Department of Munitions and Supply and by the real estate administrator of the wartime prices and trade board. Until quite recently there was a difference of opinion within the government of the city of Toronto as to whether housing was needed, but within the last two or three weeks a unanimous request has come from the city government for housing. Since then new surveys have been made by both Wartime Housing and the real estate administrator and it has been found that the situation in Toronto is not so acute as to bring it within the purview of Wartime Housing Limited. The decision is that the situation in Toronto is not sufficiently grave to warrant action with respect to housing at this time.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): As a member of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations, I should like to know from the Minister of Justice when and by whom that committee is to be called together.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am not a member of the committee. I understand it is the privilege of anyone who is a member of that committee to cause it to be called at any time, with notice.

E. B. EDDY COMPANY

REPORT AS TO CLOSING OF NEWSPRINT BRANCH AT HULL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RODOLPHE LEDUC (Wright): Recently in the Ottawa press I read a report that the newsprint branch of the E. B. Eddy Company of Hull had been closed. Could the Minister of Labour tell me what has been done to take care of those who had been employed in that branch?

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a question of the kind which I stated the other day should not be asked on the orders of the day.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, March 15, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I hope that you and the house will bear with me this afternoon, because I am afraid my voice has been affected somewhat by a chill received from the terrible shortage of fuel which was brought to our attention yesterday in the house.

May I first of all congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the budget he has brought down this year. It is a budget which shows a great deal of courage and demonstrates that the minister and the government are well aware of the part they have to play in this war and are willing to do everything possible in the war to help our allies.

Speaking in this chamber a few weeks ago I mentioned the need of a plan for agriculture of five years or two years after the war. I did not mention that plan simply with a view of putting money into the pockets of the farmers of Canada, but because I believed that in the very near future the united nations would be sorely in need of food for human consumption and feed for live stock. North America must be relied upon to produce the needed supplies. Anything which can be produced in the Argentine or Australia cannot reach the European theatre of war, because of lack of transportation or because it may be needed in the Pacific zone.

The governments of Canada and United States and most of the people of both countries are viewing with a good deal of satisfaction what they think are huge surpluses of grain on the North American continent, not realizing that these stock piles of grain are being used up faster than they can be replenished.

I hold in my hand the best available estimates of the bureau of statistics of the grain position of the United States and Canada for wheat, corn, oats, barley and rye, projected until July 1, 1944 for the United States and July 31, 1944 for Canada. If the house will give permission I should like to place these on Hansard in order that people may see exactly what the stock piles are and the projected amounts until that date.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The tables are as follows:

Canada's Grain Supplies

	Wheat	Oats	Barley	Rye	Total
		(Millions of bushels)
Crop year 1941-42
Carryover, July 31, 1941	480	42	11	5	538
Production, 1941	312	305	111	12	740
Total supply	792	347	122	17	1,278
Total disappearance	368	319	110	14	811
Carryover, July 31, 1942	424	28	12	3	467
Crop year 1942-43

Note:

(1) In connection with the 1942-43 figures some allowance should be made for the possibility of further reduction in the 1942 harvest because of unharvested acreage.

(2) In the 1943-44 estimates production has been calculated on the basis of average yields on the acreage goals set for 1943 while liberal allowance has been made for feeding to animals and exports to the United States.

Note:

(1) In 1942-43 allowance has been made for record size feeding of wheat to live stock and for substantial imports of oats and barley from Canada.

(2) In the estimates for 1943-44 production is based on yields on the basis of the average of the past five years, but no allowance has been made for the increase in acreage to corn and wheat which might result from the recent measures which permit over-planting in both crops in 1943.

(3) In 1943-44 a high rate of wheat feeding and imports of oats and barley from Canada has been allowed for.

These figures may seem rather impressive to some, but to me they foretell a shortage of grain on the North American continent within fifteen to eighteen months. I have stated consistently in this house, since the beginning of the war, that all the wheat that could be grown in Canada would be needed and needed badly before the war was over. Let me say again that there will be a shortage of wheat in Canada and on this continent within less than two years. I believe 1942 will go down in history as the banner year on this continent for all farm products, but regardless of these figures, that entire grain surplus will have been used up by 1944 and we shall be eating heavily into the carry-over. The farmers of the United States and Canada have been asked to produce in 1943 some hundreds of millions more dozen eggs than in 1942, about three billion pounds more milk, five million more sheep, seven million more cattle, and forty-two and a half million more hogs. Under ordinary circumstances this would mean an additional one billion bushels of grain for feed, but these are not ordinary circumstances. To-day the continent of North America is short more than two million tons of high protein concentrates, and that deficiency must be made up by the feeding of additional grain, which will mean the addition of at least two hundred million bushels to the figures I have already mentioned. Figure it any way you like; in less than two years we shall land up without sufficient food in North America.

What of other foods? Again we set an all-time record of abundance in 1942; yet months before another harvest and even before some of the crops are sown they are beginning in the United States to ration peas, beans, dried fruits, canned fruits and vegetables, in spite of the fact that the crop of peas and beans in the United States this year was double the average. We in Canada took away from the west coast some twenty-five thousand Japanese who had been employed in fishing or in the production of fruits and vegetables; and just in passing may I tell the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that a few of them cut wood out near Vancouver. The government of the United States moved some 150,000 Japanese away from the west coast, practically all of whom had been engaged in the production of fruits and vegetables. In addition many thousands of people on this continent who were carrying on market gardening to some extent have now gone into war industries, so that to-day instead of producing food they are purchasing it.

Let me say again, Mr. Speaker, that we should establish dryers and storage facilities for dried fruits and vegetables in every province of this dominion. There are strategic positions, I do not doubt, in every province. Let me suggest that in the province of Saskatchewan one plant be established, perhaps at the Estevan coal fields, and another at Lloydminster, where there is natural gas. In Alberta, plants might be established at Medicine Hat and Edmonton. The production of these small fruits and vegetables will require no additional man-power. All that will be required is a guaranteed price f.o.b. cars in each province; and the women and children, the old men and women on the farms, in the villages and towns, will produce the goods. Dried fruits and vegetables, and other dried food products, will require only about one-tenth the tonnage that would be required to take overseas an equivalent amount of fresh fruits, vegetables, and so on. They can be used very readily for feeding the people of Europe. I will admit that it is a good thing to have a great deal of grain to send over there, but that grain also will have to be processed to a large extent before it leaves this country, because I question very much whether cities like Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Antwerp, Hamburg and similar places will have any mills left standing by the time we invade the continent of Europe.

In addition to the provision of food I suggest that the governments of Canada and the United States get together and arrange to set prices for farm products; that each should accept financial responsibility commensurate with its ability, and supply our allies with needed foodstuffs, at the same time pooling our supplies on this continent, with equal rations on both sides of the border and the elimination of the border altogether as far as foodstuffs are concerned. Food has been the problem of the ages. Until some three hundred years ago the population of the world was about what it had been for a thousand years, less than five hundred million people, all of whom were in constant dread of starvation. About that time men began to use their brains in an endeavour to increase the production of foodstuffs and we had the beginning of a scientific agricultural movement. With the use of fertilizer and the improvement of domestic animals we had an increase in the production of foodstuffs, and at the same time an increase in the population of the world. By the end of the eighteenth century the world's population had increased to about one billion, and at that time most of the thinking people of the world agreed with Thomas Robert Malthus in the great book he wrote to prove that the human population increased faster than the production of food supplies, and that misery, want, starvation and war were the inevitable consequences. Then began the machine age, the capitalistic system, so much maligned to-day by people who think loosely; the development of foodstuffs by the application of science and invention to agriculture; the use of machinery on the farm; careful development of farm animals for the production of meat, milk, fats and wool; the storing of food in order to carry the surplus of a bountiful period over to one of scarcity; the refrigeration of food; the canning industry; the transport system which transfers surpluses to areas of scarcity. These various developments under that system have brought the world to an era of plenty, in which starvation no longer faces the people but in which the problem is said to be one of too much food. The problem of the world to-day is one of the balancing of distribution of an abundance brought about not by outworn and outdated monetary theory, not by a planned economy of a few supermen and experts, but by the gradual evolution of democratic ideas, called by some the capitalistic system. My hon. friends of the Social Credit group would wreck the whole thing by issuing worthless paper money.

Mr. HANSELL: It's a lie.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say "it is a lie"?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did, and if I must withdraw I withdraw, but I am saying to the hon. member that what he says is not according to the facts.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member will have to withdraw without reservation.

Mr. HANSELL: I will withdraw my statement without reservation in respect to the term "lie", but I say that the hon. gentleman is not stating the truth. That is all there is to it. I suggest he should withdraw his statement; it is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman of course knows that what he is now stating is just an accentuation of the first statement. He must withdraw without reservation.

Mr. HANSELL: If that is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw. We still have some men to speak in the debate and we can correct the hon. gentleman's statement then.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The Social Credit party always have plenty of members who can speak in the debate, and they can state their own opinions, just as I am stating mine at the moment. My opinion is the truth to me; my hon. friend's opinion may be the truth to him.

I said that the Social Credit party would wreck this system by printing worthless money. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would cast aside the progress of ages and do away with the system that has brought all these benefits to mankind, because that system appears to be a little out of balance at the moment, has developed some minor defects. There in that corner sits the main reactionary group in the House of Commons. They would cast away all these benefits and take us back a thousand years.

I do not say these things to be unkind, as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) thought. I grant on the part of hon. members of the Social Credit party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation a sincere desire, as it is ours, to help the lot of mankind. But I submit that their theories are wrong. Along with many other people in this country I have perhaps gone through the throes of their loose thinking since 1930, in a sincere endeavour to explain the paradox of scarcity amidst plenty. One must endeavour to propose a remedy when one questions the sincere theories of others in this house. Let us therefore look to see where the flaw in the present system is. Let us go back to the start of this great acceleration of production. Before the machine age, before the steam engine was invented, the labour of at least four or five men on the farm was necessary to maintain themselves and one man in a city. At that time more than four-fifths of man's needs came from the farm. Then the machine age began, bringing greater demands for those things that can stand heavy pressure and hard use. And part of the production of the farm had to give way to the production of the mines. At this time one man's labour on the farm maintained him and one man in the city. Then came the full effect of the machine age, the use of science in both industry and agriculture. One man on the farm provided abundance for himself and nine men in the city. The product of the oil well, the mine and the forest advanced to the point where only one-third of man's needs came from the farm. Motive power changed from the horse, and the consequent use of millions of acres for feed, to coal, gasoline and electricity. Nature in her wisdom throughout millions of years has stored up the products of the farm and the forest in the oil well and the mine. It can therefore be urged that for a period at least man's labour can get four to five times the tonnage from the mine, the oil well or the forest than can be got annually from the farms. Therefore why waste labour on the farm? Is it not a good thing to produce more with less labour?

But labour is also wasted when it is available but not used. That waste is called unemployment. The most uneconomic period in the world's history preceded this war in what we call the great depression. What was the cause of it? In my opinion it was largely a loss of balance between agriculture and industry. Industry turned for its raw materials and its power to oil wells, mines and forests. Agriculture could no longer sell sufficient of its products to industry, and therefore farm products began to pile up in surpluses. Industry could no longer sell its products because the farmer could not purchase them. Industry declined and farm products piled higher. The products of industry piled up. Men were laid off by industry and were out of work. Machines were idle, and we had want in a land of plenty. That was the condition because the balance between industry and agriculture was gone. It can be corrected, because most of the raw materials taken from the mines and the oil wells are simply annual farm crops in a different form, but still containing the same ingredients which were placed in the ground by nature many years ago.

Can these raw materials be purchased by industry from the farmers? Largely they can. Industry and agriculture are natural partners, because when agriculture loses its markets industry suffers from a lack of employment for its thousands of men. Balance the two and you correct the evils of both. The time will come when most of the raw materials for industry will be obtained annually from the farms, and part of the processing will take place on the farms.

What can we in the house do to further these thoughts? When we reach the agricultural estimates it is my intention to move an amendment which I hope the government will see fit to accept. The purport of my amendment will be that the government appropriate $500,000 a year for agricultural research; that that research be carried on in the centre of the greatest agricultural section of the country; that if possible the contribution be matched by an amount of $50,000 to $100,000 a year from each of the nine provinces; that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association be asked to contribute $200,000 a year, as industry's share. May I suggest here that any Canadian industry should be allowed to donate, as a legitimate expense, a reasonable amount to a fund to endow this research.

Let me take four agricultural products, to illustrate what can be done. First of all, I shall discuss the question as it relates to wheat. For my purposes, wheat will be broken down into three component parts, namely, the starch, the protein or gluten, and the germ. I shall discuss starch, first, in detail.

Starch has been imported into Canada—corn starch, starch from tapioca, sago and potatoes. In Canada we have endeavoured to produce some corn starch and some potato starch. None of these is as good an edible starch as is that produced from wheat. Wheat starch demands a higher price in the textile market than does any other. It is used in the making of paper boxes, soap, perfumes, fireworks, asbestos, yeast, twine and cordage, window shades, wood veneers, glue, and dry-cell batteries. Pound for pound wheat starches produce syrup or glucose identical in yield to corn starch. This syrup or glucose is used as an industrial sweetener in jams and canned fruits, and for table use.

The difference between the flour produced in eastern Canada, known as cake and pastry flour, and that produced from western wheat, is the percentage of protein and starch in the flour. On the west coast we have been importing cake and pastry flours to some extent. Sometimes we have imported them into eastern Canada. The very same kind of flours can be made by taking wheat starch out of our western wheat, and adding it to the quantity of starch in high grade flours. Just as good, in fact better, cake and pastry flours can be made in this way.

There has been a great deal of talk about power alcohol in Canada. Both alcohol and glycol can be made from wheat starch, and can be economically transformed into butadiene, the major component of synthetic rubber. A new process of fermentation is now reaching a state of perfection which will produce alcohol and butylene-glycol, which can be transformed into butadiene more economically than that which is made from petroleum.

Wheat protein is used for many things. First of all, let me deal with gluten concentrate. In the past many countries bought a certain amount of Canadian wheat in order to strengthen their flour, and to increase the size of the loaf of bread. The reason for that was that Canadian wheat contained a larger amount of gluten. This gluten can be taken out of Canadian wheat, and the other parts of the wheat used in this country or others. The gluten concentrate can be shipped to these other countries to build up a new industry and a new outlet for the agricultural products of Canada.

Another commodity which prior to the war was made in Japan out of Canadian wheat was called sodium-glutemate. Sodium-glutemate was made from a secret process in Japan, and shipped to every other country. The fact is, however, that it came from Canadian wheat. It is a flavouring compound which produces a meaty flavour in soups, sauces, biscuits and meat-like concentrates, meat extracts and the like. It, too, can be made in this country.

Then, gluten as a plastic covers the field of artificial fibres, wool substitutes, rayons, and the new and improved methods of processing nylon.

I come now to plastics. Depending on price and combination with other chemicals, plastics can be used to make buttons, ornamental coverings, for the treatment of plywood, as plastic glues, protective coverings instead of oil paints, and in medicine for protective coverings for pills, capsules, et cetera, as an easily digestible protector.

Wheat gluten can be processed to be used instead of chicle in the manufacture of chewing gum.

Wheat germ is separated mechanically from the wheat in this country, but wheat germ oil is not extracted here. We import from other countries large quantities of germ oil which is processed from Canadian wheat. This wheat germ oil is the most concentrated form known of vitamin E, which is used for medicinal purposes to prevent abortion and to increase fertility in all forms of life. Wheat germ oil is an excellent means of preventing rancidity in various types of foods such as powdered milk, powdered eggs, butter, margarine, shortening or any of the edible oils. It takes only one-half of one per cent of added wheat germ oil to protect these products from rancidity for long periods.

Wheat chaff and wheat bran can be used for the purpose of manufacturing furfurol, which is the basis of a large group of plastic materials. It is used in the refining of oil and in the flotation process in the mining industry. It can also be produced from oat hulls. In passing, let me say that it is in large production in the United States to-day. As a matter of fact one of the large Quaker Oats mills in the United States is making furfurol from oat hulls. This is a primary product, and the highly advertised Quaker Oats are a secondary product of that mill.

Furfurol is used as a binder in plastics, for the manufacture of fibre-board, pressed woods, and the insulating and building materials so badly needed in the heart of the wheat country where lumber is so scarce. As a matter of fact, there is to-day in the once great timber producing state of Minnesota a company making a wood-like product for building materials from furfurol and wheat-straw wastes. Containers of paper-like substance used for the distribution of milk and other perishable products can be made from the now discarded wheat straw and chaff. To-day furfurol is bought in tank carlots and used as a germicide, a fungicide, a wood preservative, an improver of tobacco flavour, a solvent for dyes and leather dressings, and for plastics and nitrocellulose. So much for wheat.

Flax has been grown in Canada for many years. It contains about forty per cent oil, the remainder being a high protein feed of about thirty six to thirty nine per cent protein. Linseed oil which is manufactured from flax seed is used in paints, varnishes and enamels as well as in the manufacture of linoleum, oilcloth and gasproof clothing. On account of war conditions industrialists in Canada have learned to process a quick-drying oil from flax to take the place of tung oil or Chinawood oil, of which we used to import several million pounds from China prior to the war. It is replacing perilla oil which we used to import for the same purposes from Japan, and octicica oil, which we imported from Brazil. The replacing of these importations will be continued after the war. Within the past few weeks scientists in Canada and the United States have been able to perfect a process for deodorizing, stabilizing and hardening linseed oils in order to produce an acceptable domestic shortening.

Linseed oil also enters into the manufacture of a type of synthetic rubber known as norepal. This substance is in production, but I am afraid that at the moment the price factor is against it. Linseed oil is also used in the manufacture of the alkyd type of plastics. These are the durable, heavy duty plastics intended for long-wearing uses to replace wood and metal finishes, eliminating the need of refinishing or refreshing finishes, such as are used in pullman cars, houses, etcetera. So much for flax. I shall deal with the proteins later when I take up sunflower seed oil.

This country has ordinarily imported all of its vegetable oils for edible purposes and fifty per cent of its oils for non-comestible purposes, and therefore a vast new field is opened up in this connection for both agriculture and industry. Sunflower seed produces from twenty-five to thirty per cent of oil, depending upon the variety. The oil is an excellent edible oil, fully equal and in many ways superior to soybean oil, cottonseed oil and corn oil. For many purposes it is more adaptable than many of these oils. Sunflower seed oil is recognized as being by far the most available source of edible vegetable oil for Canadians.

In addition to its edible properties, the oil can be used in the manufacture of soap, as a textile lubricant, for sulphonation purposes in dyeing, in the leather and tanning industry, as a plasticizer in plastics and for certain types of lubrication. If the production of domestic shortening from sunflower oil and linseed oil is developed in Canada, this country can be entirely independent in the matter of edible vegetable oils, and there would be no need of further importations from any country in the world. I shall not give the exact quantity, but last year we imported several million pounds of sunflower seed oil from the Argentine with an unnecessary risk and use of bottoms. This product could have been produced in this country.

I speak with some experience in this matter. Sunflower seed is the Canadian counterpart of the soybean, the wonder bean of the United States. Every article that can be made in the United States from the soybean can be made in Canada from either sunflower seed or flax seed. Our climate is much more adaptable to the growing of these two crops. After the oil is compressed from flax seed and sunflower seed, there is left a protein meal of high feed value. Sunflower hulls can be used for the production of furfurol, which I have mentioned already.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Go ahead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Will hon. members give their consent?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is objection.

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Objection is taken.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Do my hon. friends object?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member appears to have his speech on paper.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I needed considerable notes to keep track of the different items.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is objection taken; there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had hoped that hon. gentlemen might withdraw their objection. This is a most interesting subject. Perhaps I am not without some self-interest because I hope to speak to-morrow and I may want five minutes more myself. I had hoped that hon. members might withdraw their objection and let the hon. member proceed.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that there is no objection to the hon. member continuing?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think the hon. gentleman has occupied his full time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should very much like to have heard the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) complete his address. One thing I noted was that when he reached that part of his speech which was replete with scientific and technical terms there were very few interruptions.

To come now to the budget, it is not my intention to devote myself to an examination of the financial side of the minister's proposals but I should like to deal generally with one or two matters which I wish to bring to the attention of the house.

As I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to-day announcing another victory loan campaign, it indicated to me that during the next year the war effort of this dominion is to be extended beyond that of the past year. At least the people of Canada are to be asked to contribute more in this loan than ever before. According to the minister, the borrowing needs of the dominion during the past year were $2,748,000,000, and the people of Canada will be asked in the new loan to contribute in cash $1,100,000,000. There has been a trend during the past year toward an expansion of borrowings from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks, amounting in all to $983,000,000. If that trend is not stopped, it must inevitably lead to a degree of inflation that we have not heretofore had.

The people of Canada will respond to the call of the Minister of Finance for larger and larger contributions, provided that he gives on behalf of the government the assurance that where there is wasteful expenditure it shall be stopped; for if there is one thing that the people demand and have a right to demand, it is that waste shall not become a virtue in any department of government. A few years ago when budgets were brought before parliament the aim was to lower taxes, to reduce the public debt, and to balance the budget. These are no longer the aims of ministers of finance. The people of Canada are willing to make sacrifices, but the government at the earliest possible opportunity should give to the Canadian people the assurance that there will be no wasteful expenditure and in addition should do its part to ensure that civil servants who can give evidence to this end should be called before the public accounts committee and given an opportunity of placing their views and suggestions before it. While we are increasing the amount of our expenditures in 1943, the year when we anticipate our armies will go on the offensive, many people in Canada have fallen within recent months into a lethargy, a passivity, that does not bode well for the war effort. They need to be told that the few successes we have had are but the beginning of the march to final victory. That can be done only by the ministers of the crown, assisted by the members of this house.

There was some reference by the minister to post-war trade and the necessity of making at this time arrangements in that regard with other nations. Parliament is concerned primarily with the winning of the war and with the measures necessary to that end. That must, of course, be the primary objective. Parliament to-day is concerned with post-war economic reconstruction within Canada. But there is another subject which I think parliament should have an opportunity of debating in this house, namely, international reconstruction after the war. The visit of the Right Hon. Anthony Eden to Washington at the present time has, according to press dispatches, for one of its purposes the securing of a united front among the united nations on after-the-war international problems. When Mr. Eden visits Ottawa the government will have an opportunity to place before him Canada's attitude in regard to international and political post-war problems. No longer can Canada stay in the position of isolationism, shall I call it benevolent isolationism, such as existed before the war, for with the air development that has taken place during the past three years Canada is on the air highways of the world. Canada, with its line of airports between Edmonton and White Horse, is placed in the geopolitical centre of the world, and her world position is more important than ever before. After the war no place on earth will be more distant than fifty hours' flying from any other place, and we must consider at this time Canada's relation to the post-war world in the matter of air development. It is things like these that might engender ill feeling between nations after the war unless arrangements are made beforehand.

Take, for instance, the production of cargo-carrying aeroplanes. The United States is producing them at a rate unequalled anywhere else in the world. She is also producing aircraft at the rate of 10,000 a month, as compared with Britain's 2,500, Germany's 2,500, and Japan's 500 to 1,000. When the war is over and aircraft transportation becomes of first consequence, one of the united nations will have practically all the cargo-carrying planes. Something should be done now to assure all of the united nations of a reasonable share in the distribution of these cargo-carrying planes after the war. As far as Canada is concerned, her aircraft production cannot be used for cargo-carrying purposes, and she will be dependent therefore on the other united nations. When the war is over, the freedom of the skyways may well during the next one hundred years be as important as the freedom of the seas has been in the past three hundred years. We should now be in a position to say whether, when the war is over, the many airports in the dominion and the air schools operated by private companies are to be returned to the government, whether Canada's position in this new world of air development shall be a state-owned air policy or a private ownership air policy.

I come now to the international sphere. In the British parliament opportunity is given on many occasions to hon. members to discuss the international situation as well as the relationships between the various component parts of the empire. A similar opportunity should be given to this parliament before the visit of Mr. Eden, so that the government will have before it the views of the people of Canada as secured from their representatives in parliament. In the international sphere the contribution of the people of Canada to the war effort has made this country a world power. Her sacrifices in the first world war gave her an empire and a world status. Canada to-day, the fourth trading nation in the world, must necessarily, by reason of her new national and international position, undertake after the war greater responsibilities in the new world of inter-empire and international relationships. I believe that, when the war is over, the United Kingdom should not be permitted any longer to assume the entire defence of the empire, if armaments must be maintained. Canada after the war will have great importance as a reservoir of food for many nations. With an enhanced position go increased responsibilities. Canada's parliament should declare now that Canada supports the declarations of empire statesmen that the axis nations shall be prevented from ever again plunging the world into war; that Canada supports the other united nations in assuring punishment to the axis criminals; more than that, because words without actions will mean little, that Canada will contribute her share to the measures necessary to achieve those aims, namely the establishment of a world court and an international police force. I repeat that Canada to-day, by reason of her contribution in this war, has achieved an importance which makes it necessary for her to express her viewpoint among the united nations. I believe that Canada's parliament, without neglecting the work of mobilizing for victory, should have an opportunity to express its views at this time, not after the war, on such questions as the establishment of a world monetary stabilization institution and a united nations tariff board to be set up with a view to preventing a recurrence of international trade jealousies and disputes after the war.

I believe, too, that Canada's parliament, without in any way detracting from her efforts to mobilize this nation for war, should be concerned as well, as one of the great nations constituting the united nations, with the new world political organization which has to come and which will come, in order to assure peace in the world. Canada can give leadership in determining now whether the nations of the world shall return to the nationalism which characterized many of them before the war, whether a new or better league of nations shall be set up and constituted, or whether there shall be a world federation of the united nations wherein each shall surrender a portion of its sovereignty.

These matters are important to-day. They are so important that statesmen in various parts of the empire are meeting to consider them. Mr. Eden has come to America to discuss with the United States, among other problems, these very questions. Our purpose should be, with and alongside of Britain to co-operate with the United States, doing everything we can to assure, before the end of the war, agreements among the united nations which will contribute to the future peace and welfare of the world. A reading of Lloyd George's "Memoirs" shows that if the representatives of the allied nations in the last war had been able to meet and exchange their ideas on international post-war problems before they met at Versailles, many of the difficulties which resulted in cleavages among the allies would have been avoided and many of the troubles which subsequently arose would have been prevented.

Three contributions which Canada is making to the war effort might be mentioned. The first is the production of munitions and ships; the second, the contribution of man-power, to assure supplies of man-power not only for the armed forces but for industry and agriculture; the third, food supplies or agricultural production. I will not deal to-day with the first named, because an opportunity will be given to discuss it when the war appropriation bill is before the house. I intend in the time at my disposal to deal first with the matter of man-power, and second, if sufficient time remains, with the matter of agricultural production.

In spite of the fact that one hon. member after another has raised the question on man-power in this house, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who is charged with the responsibility of administration in connection with this problem, has not yet seen fit to rise in his place and tell parliament and the country just what the plans of his department are. Last night he gave us some indication, but I cannot refer to that, because it is in another debate. He did not answer the suggestions which were made that selective service, as it is being practised, has fallen down.

Mr. MITCHELL: I had only ten minutes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have not been able to get any answer. For some reason we cannot get an authoritative declaration on this subject of man-power. Take, for instance, lumber production in Canada, which has fallen away below the war needs of this nation, solely because the necessary man-power has not been allocated to the work. In 1941 the production in this country was over five billion feet; in 1942 it was less than four billion feet, and the demands for defence purposes and other needs total ten billion feet. According to one of Canada's outstanding writers, this country cannot produce to-day beyond 25 per cent of the minimum requirements of lumber for the railways. The difficulty lies in the allocation of man-power rather than in shortage of man-power. The minister has had an opportunity to say what the government will do; for if 1943 is to be the year in which we move on the offensive, surely we have a right to know at this time what are the man-power plans. What allocation of man-power is to be made to industry, what allocation to the army? I will deal with the call-ups in a moment, but one circumstance is revealed in that connection, that during the past few months the needs of the army are not being met by the call-ups. Shortage of man-power? I do not think it is a shortage of man-power in Canada when we find some eight thousand employable people out of work in Winnipeg; I think it is a failure to carry into effect the principles that have been enunciated in orders in council, letters and directions.

Mr. MITCHELL: Where does my hon. friend get the figure of eight thousand employables?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I cannot get any figures from the minister, it is true, but I took that figure from the press, the only way in which members of parliament can get any information about the man-power situation, and there never was any denial of its accuracy. I also obtained some figures from some of the pamphlets put out by the government. Why, Mr. Speaker, the pamphlet "Canada at War" in its January and February issues told the story of man-power in the armed forces so graphically and showed that the situation had become so bad, that it exposed the government to criticism; and if you look at the March issue you will see that the portion dealing with enlistments and call-ups has been omitted. The only conclusion which can be drawn is that too much information was being furnished with regard to man-power and the armed forces. On January 7 the shortage of man-power in industry was as follows:

Lumbering	46,064
Coal mining	2,621
Other mines	2,406
Iron and steel	21,728
Railways	3,340
Construction	13,352

That is the statement that was given on February 8 as to conditions prevailing on January 7. Do those conditions prevail today? If they do they indicate a complete break-down in the administration of selective service in this country.

May I now pass on to the matters of call-ups, under the National Resources Mobilization Act? It is most interesting to note what is recorded in this pamphlet "Canada at War," which reveals three conclusions. The first is that Canada is not getting the men who are being called up. At page 23 is shown the record of men requisitioned by the army, which between March 20 1941, and April 9, 1942, amounted to 56,390, of whom 55,250, or 97·9 per cent, were accepted for training. But what about the next period, from May 15, to December 26, 1942? The men requisitioned numbered 94,000, of whom only 52,428, or 55·7 per cent were accepted. That must mean one of two things: either the selective service have no records as to the available pool of men and are calling up indiscriminately, whether men are in the services or not, or the number of defaulters is multiplying month by month. According to the records shown in "Canada at War" the number of defaulters is just under 100,000. The number must be a great deal larger than that; in fact, estimates up to 225,000 do not seem exaggerated. Is the army getting the required number of men by voluntary enlistment? Let us look at the records. None is given in the March issue, but a comparison of the figures for January and February would indicate that total enlistments in the army all over Canada in one month amounted to only 3,327 men.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend say that was for February?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; 3,377 men enlisted.

Mr. RALSTON: For what month?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The month of January.

Mr. RALSTON: For what period?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Thirty-one days.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid my hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then the record is wrong. I have in my hand a return brought down yesterday at the request of the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). Subtracting the number of men who are shown to be in the army as of January 31, 1943, from the number appearing in the last issue of "Canada at War" on December 31, 1942, you will find that the total enlistments during the month amounted to the figure I mentioned.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me, he is making some sort of arithmetical calculation. I do not have them right at hand, but I can give him the exact figures of enlistments for January, February and March. He does not have to take the strength of the army on one date and deduct the strength of the army on another date. That does not necessarily show the enlistments. It must be borne in mind that men are sent overseas.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: These records show that the number of men enlisted in the army up to the end of December was 433,876. The number of men who enlisted in the army up to January 31 was 437,203. Taking the one from the other leaves the figure I have placed before the house. There cannot be any different figures; those are the figures showing the enlistments.

Mr. RALSTON: I could give a different figure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, I should like it to be given. This session has been going on for several weeks now, and we have been asking for information. Several returns for which I have asked during the last two and a half weeks still remain as orders for returns, and we are unable to get the information for which we are asking.

Mr. RALSTON: As far as I know I have not been asked for information with regard to enlistments. I did not expect that I would make a statement with regard to the army, the enlistments and so on, until the war appropriation bill came up; I thought that was the proper place to give the information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not think we should have the information before that bill is brought down?

Mr. RALSTON: I am perfectly willing to give the information, but I do not propose to make three speeches on the subject.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us have the figures.

Mr. RALSTON: The figures are available; all my hon. friend has to do is ask for them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the figures in "Canada at War" are correct, then the figures I have placed before the house are correct; but if the minister says the conclusions I have drawn are not correct, then the information being put out in "Canada at War" is not correct.

Mr. RALSTON: I would say to my hon. friend that the enlistements for the thirty-one days of January were between 8,000 and 9,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not what the record shows.

Mr. RALSTON: That is one record.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The figures are given by military districts for enlistments in the army between December 31, 1942, and January 31, 1943, and I shall read them. I shall leave out the figure for Quebec, because it indicates that there were eighty-nine fewer on January 31 than on December 31, so that there is obviously a mistake, but the other figures are as follows:

London	271
Toronto	748
Kingston	100
Montreal	39
Halifax	614
Saint John	161
Winnipeg	358
Victoria	415
Regina	346
Calgary	358

Those are the figures gained from a comparison of the records in the February issue of "Canada At War", and the return that I mentioned, which was brought down the day before yesterday. That is one phase that I think should be brought to the attention of the country, namely, in connection with call-ups. I raised the question the other day in regard to enlistments. It is only fair that in the calling up of men for service under the National Resources Mobilization Act there should be as nearly as possible equality between all parts of Canada. I can see no objection to that.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me? I have the figures for January and February enlistments: January 11,631; February 8,927.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In the army?

Mr. RALSTON: In the army.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then the minister had better get in touch with the department of information and bring them up to date so that we can have correct information on the subject.

Mr. RALSTON: I am giving what the figures really are.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): Then the information is being concealed from the public.

Mr. RALSTON: It has been given to the public right straight along.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it has not. This is an official document.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with the matter of call-ups, at page 22 of the February issue there is a table showing by military districts the total male population between the ages of nineteen and forty-five. The next columns show the enlistments, in the army, the air force and the navy. Then appears the number of "R" recruits enlisted. In order to arrive at a true picture in this matter there must be subtracted from the total available pool the number who have enlisted. When that is done it will be found that in one province 10·6 per cent of the available man-power is being called up, and it ranges from that percentage to 4·7 per cent. I cannot understand the reason why, in the enforcement of a law to ensure the defence of Canada within the territorial limits of Canada, or as extended by order in council to Newfoundland and Alaska, there should be any inequalities in the matter of call-up. The country has a right to an explanation in regard to that question. If there is one thing that can be accepted as a canon of administration it is this, that in order to achieve a united confederation, in the execution of such a measure of compulsory military service it is absolutely necessary that the call-up shall be as nearly as possible equal in all parts of Canada. I think the people of Canada should be told frankly by the government why it is that there is inequity and inequality in the call-up under this act. I am going to ask the minister when he speaks to deal with that phase of the situation.

What is being done toward enforcing the law? I have mentioned the question of evaders. What did the government do? The enforcement officers brought fewer than three hundred before the courts. The government has now sent out a letter by the Minister of Labour which amounts to an invitation to evasions of the provisions of the act. This seems a rather unusual statement. Here are a few items that go to establish the accuracy of it. In an interpretative letter sent out to the various boards in Canada they were advised as to how they were to interpret the plain law. The law says that the only men who are entitled to postponement in so far as agriculture is concerned are men who were bona fide engaged in farming on March 23, 1942. That was in order to prevent men from going back to the farms in order to evade service. But the Minister of Labour sent out an instruction as to how the boards are to interpret that. In the letter he says:

> A person who may not have been employed in agriculture on March 23, 1942, but who has become engaged in agriculture since that time, and is shown to be essential to agriculture may be considered for postponement on application if the merits of the case are established.

In other words, a direction is given to the board not to interpret those regulations as the law reads and is to interpret them in a way that many constitute a complete evasion or a large measure of evasion of the provisions of the act.

Next, under the law, Doukhobors and the like are entitled to accept alternative service, for the duration of the war. A man who is called up for service in the army in Canada serves for the duration of the war, no matter whether he is a farmer or what he is. But what about the conscientious objector? This is what the letter says:

> Application for leave should be invited from agricultural workers engaged in alternative service, and such applications should be given favourable consideration.

The law says they shall serve in alternative service; the department does not change the law, but it asks the boards throughout Canada deliberately to flout the law and interpret it in accordance with the desires of the Department of Labour. Is there any wonder that when this letter was sent out there were some replies? I have tried to get all the replies from the various boards. I have not succeeded yet; I have had only two, one from British Columbia and one from Saskatchewan, both of which were sent to me by the Secretary of State. In both cases the boards are headed by judges, who are not asking to be told how to interpret the law. If the law is to be changed, let the regulations be changed; do not place the responsibility on a board to interpret the law contrary to its meaning. Mr. Justice Embury wrote from Regina on February 19, 1943, as follows:

> With reference to your interpretative letter No. 1:—

That is the interpretative letter sent out by the Department of Labour.

> This, of course, must be taken with this reservation that our board shall not be required to be a consenting party to a deliberate and patent evasion and that what appears to be a clear fraud on the country shall not be recognized as a basis for consideration.
> Yours very truly,
>
> Mr. Justice J. F. L. Embury.

Mr. Justice Manson from British Columbia said this, again with reference to the interpretative letter:

> I have seen a copy of the letter from the chairman of M division—

That is Saskatchewan.

> —to you, under date of the 19th instant. My board agrees with his comments.
>
> Very truly yours,
>
> Hon. Mr. Justice A. M. Manson.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about New Brunswick?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Two weeks ago I asked for a return with respect to the other provinces. I have been able to get only two as of this date; so that I do not know what replies were received from the other provincial boards.

I suggest to the government that if the law is to be changed and agricultural workers are to be granted postponements, whether they started farming after March 19, 1942, that it be placed in the regulations. I again point out that in Great Britain there are no regulations dealing with man-power; the law is in a statute. It was in a statute at the time of the last war. It should be in a statute to-day, for it is only when it is in a statute that the rights of individuals and the rights of the state are completely protected.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, it is now some ten months since the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) raised in this house the question of sinkings in the gulf and river St. Lawrence. At that time, in May of 1942, two ships had been sunk in the lower reaches of the river not far from Gaspé. My hon. friend raised certain questions in the house, and raised further questions in July—questions which, I believe from newspaper reports, were referred to by that gentleman known as Lord Haw Haw in Berlin on the very next night.

In one way or another, and at one time or another, through the summer, the autumn and the winter, certain newspapers and some members of this house, as well as other citizens in Canada, have returned to this question of sinkings. Some newspapers have demanded that the sinkings of ships should be made known immediately, in spite of the fact that that custom is not followed in any country I know of. But the whole matter has recently come into prominence because of a speech made in the Quebec legislature by the hon. Onesime Gagnon, a member of that legislature, formerly a member of this house, and also formerly a member of the Bennett administration.

Mr. Gagnon declared in a speech in the Quebec legislature that upwards of thirty ships were sunk in the St. Lawrence river and gulf last summer, and he alleged that the statement I had made to the effect that twenty was the correct number was incorrect. Mr. Gagnon went on to say that he took full responsibility for what he was saying, that he had the names of the ships and the dates on which they were sunk.

I have read the reports of Mr. Gagnon's speech as they appeared in many newspapers. I have read them as they appeared in the French newspapers Le Droit and L'Action Catholique, and in the English newspapers Montreal Star, Montreal Gazette, Toronto Globe and Mail, Ottawa Journal and Ottawa Citizen. Every one of these newspapers, without exception, in their headlines featured the statement that thirty ships or more than thirty ships had been sunk, showing clearly that they regarded the statement as the kernel, the core and the heart of Mr. Gagnon's remarks.

Since Mr. Gagnon's statement was in direct contradiction of an earlier statement of mine, and since Mr. Gagnon stated he could produce the names of the ships and the dates on which they were sunk, I asked him to produce those names and dates. Mr. Gagnon has not replied to that challenge or request. He has not replied to it because he cannot reply to it, and because more than thirty ships, or thirty ships, were not sunk in the gulf and river St. Lawrence. Consequently he is unable to produce, and those who speak for him are unable to produce, the names of any such thirty ships.

I made an offer to Mr. Gagnon to appoint a naval officer who would act with somebody appointed by Mr. Gagnon, and if necessary a third neutral person selected by the two, to investigate this question of sinkings. Mr. Gagnon has not seen fit to accept this offer either, though it was made some ten days ago.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in order that this matter may be set at rest—and I hope set at rest once and for all—I propose to give now to the house, and through the house to the public of Canada, the names of the ships sunk in the gulf and river St. Lawrence by enemy action in the year 1942. I know that in doing so I am adopting an unusual course. I know it is not the practice—in fact it is directly contrary to the practice of any of the allied powers to give public information of this kind in such detail. Nevertheless in this instance the sinkings have occurred at intervals of six to ten months, and unless I give the names to the people of the country, and of course to the house, I shall have to spend a great deal of time, and my staff will have to spend much time, in answering every rumour, every unfounded allegation, and every bit of gossip which may circulate in any part of the country.

Here, Mr. Speaker, are the names of the ships:

Leto	Mount Pindus
Nicoya	Oakton
Dinaric	Mount Taygetos
Hainaut	Saturnus
Anastassios Pateras	Inger Elisabeth
Chatham	Joannis
Arlyn	Carolus
Donald Stewart	Waterton
Aeas	Caribou

There you have the names of eighteen merchantmen which were sunk. In order that there may be no confusion, I add to that the names of two ships-of-war sunk by enemy action—at least one, the corvette Charlottetown, was so sunk, and the other, the Canadian ship Raccoon, is presumed to have been sunk by enemy action. No one knows just what happened to it.

There you have a total of twenty ships. There is only one possibility of the number being anything different, and I shall tell the house about that. It is with respect to the Frederika Lensen. This vessel was attacked by enemy submarine and was beached by her crew in an endeavour to salvage her. However, later she broke up, owing mainly, I understand, to the stress of weather and sea. I have not included her in the number.

There you have twenty ships of all kinds. I was more generous in some of my statements. I said that there were twenty merchantmen sunk, but I find that there were but eighteen merchantmen sunk, while two of the ships were—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister give the geographical location of those sinkings?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am coming to that now. These are the ships sunk in the gulf and river St. Lawrence. I take the gulf of St. Lawrence to include the strait of Belle Isle up to and including the island of Belle Isle, which lies at the northern mouth of the strait. I take it to include Cabot strait and that water which lies east and north of a line drawn from Scatari island on the east shore of Cape Breton through the south coast of St. Pierre to Taylor Bay in Newfoundland. All the area marked in blue on this map which I show to hon. members I take to be the gulf of St. Lawrence. I do not think anyone can enlarge the boundaries of that gulf beyond the limits delineated in blue on this map. I may tell the house that those are the limits fixed by the international hydrographers' association.

The waters in question extend from the city of Quebec to the furthermost end of the strait of Belle Isle, a distance of some 700 miles. It would be quite impossible for Mr. Gagnon, for the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) or for anybody else, even if he used the fastest aeroplane in the world, to obtain accurate personal knowledge of everything that went on in every part of that area. No man can be in two or a hundred places at the same time. It would be impossible for me to have, and I do not have, personal knowledge of these matters, but I think I can say that I know whereof I speak when I speak of these sinkings. Through a system of naval control of shipping we know the movement and the fate of ships moving in this area.

On the eastern coast there are six naval officers who are known as naval control service officers. They are stationed at St. John's Newfoundland; Sydney, Nova Scotia; Halifax, Nova Scotia; Saint John, New Brunswick; Quebec and Montreal. Under them are twelve other officers known as reporting officers, and under them again are eighty sub-reporting officers. Every port of any consequence whatever in eastern Canada, in Quebec and the maritime provinces, has stationed at it one or other of these naval control service officers or naval reporting officers or sub-reporting officers. They have complete knowledge of the movement of ships. They give orders to ships, certainly to all ocean-going ships, as to how and when they shall proceed. If a ship does not turn up at the next port, checking proceedings are instituted immediately and the fate of the ship is ascertained.

With this system of naval control, with the reports that we receive from our escort vessels, and with the other sources of information that we have, I think I can say that I am in a much better position to estimate the number of losses in this area than is Mr. Gagnon or the hon. member for Gaspé or even the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I have gone into this matter at some length because the question has narrowed down to a dispute between two men. I think it is proper to inquire what is the source of information open to these men. I think the answer to that question will have a great bearing upon the credence which can be given to any statement they may make.

I am speaking now from the official records of the naval department. Mr. Gagnon is speaking, the hon. member for Gaspé is speaking, and all who join with them are speaking, not from what they have seen, because they could not see everything; not from what they know officially, but from the gossip of the riverfront and the countryside. That is the source of their information.

These are the facts, facts which I think the people of Canada should consider. They are facts which they should consider when they are assessing the weight which can be given to the statements of Mr. Gagnon. I have named the ships sunk in this area. Let Mr. Gagnon now add to that list if he can. Let him produce the names of the ten other ships or the more than ten other ships which he claims were sunk in this area. If he cannot do that in a matter of this importance, then he is discredited before the people of this country. Perhaps some others will be discredited with him. Perhaps some of the hon. members of this house—they are not all in the far corner—who have apparently placed some faith in the statements of Mr. Gagnon will now change their point of view.

Mr. Gagnon's main theme in the Quebec legislature, as I have said, was to state the number of ships sunk. He made definite allegations in that regard. I immediately denied those allegations, and that is the question at issue between us. At the time of his speech in Quebec Mr. Gagnon said nothing, as I read the newspapers, about a commission to examine into other matters. I will agree that he did say something about the building of roads, about blackouts and about what he alleged was a long delay in getting an aeroplane to a certain point in the river. But he was completely, absolutely and entirely silent on the question of a general investigation.

But what does Mr. Gagnon do now? Finding that he cannot make good on his statements, finding that he cannot name the thirty ships, finding that there is a great difference between cold print and gossip, Mr. Gagnon resorts to a very ancient and palpable method of evasion. He says, "Oh, yes, I am willing to have a commission investigate the number of sinkings in the St. Lawrence, but I must have thirteen other matters investigated as well." He produced fourteen points. Some of Mr. Gagnon's statements are mere allegations, unsupported by any evidence whatever. Some of them are like the questions often put in this house. Hon. members make certain assumptions, and then try to turn the assumptions into fact and base questions upon those assumed facts.

For example, Mr. Gagnon wants to know why the navy department did not take measures to prevent disaster in the strait of Belle Isle. That is one of the things he wants a commission to investigate. Mr. Gagnon knows that we have taken measures. He knows that every warship that we have at sea, whether in the St. Lawrence or in the Atlantic or elsewhere, is protecting the strait of Belle Isle and the shores of this country. That is true, no matter where the ship may be.

Mr. Gagnon then went on to ask what orders had been given to officers of the navy and the air force concerning torpedoing and the direction of convoys. Mr. Gagnon knows very well that this sort of thing is secret and cannot be given to the public.

Nothing could better illustrate the unreliability of rumour and the folly and futility of accepting rumour without investigation than some of the statements made on Monday night in this house by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). I take, for instance, two or three statements in the speech the hon. member for Gaspé made on Monday night to show how little he has ever done to investigate rumours. In his speech on Monday night, near the beginning of his remarks he said this. He referred to—> —the activities of the corvette which was supposed to have escorted a boat called the Jean Briand from Rimouski to the north shore . . . I should like to tell the house what information I have about this corvette.

Then he went on to say :

> . . . in the first days of July the boat I just mentioned was carrying some sportsmen going on a fishing trip on the north shore. Said boat was escorted by a corvette as far as to the north shore.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

I need not read the rest. I think that is enough. My hon. friend makes the statement in this house that the Jean Briand was escorted by a corvette to the north shore, that the boat Jean Briand was carrying some fishermen on a fishing trip. It happens that I have some information on that point. I have in the first place an affidavit from Mr. Jean Brillant himself, the man after whom the boat was named, and the man who I think owns the boat.

Mr. POULIOT: He is dead.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is Jules Brillant, a relative of the man after whom the boat was named. Mr. Jules Brillant makes this affidavit:

> I, Jules A. Brillant, manufacturer and member of the legislative council of the province of Quebec, residing in the city of Rimouski, being duly sworn, state:—
>
> On June 17, 1942, I was a passenger on the Jean Brillant, the property of the Lower St. Lawrence Navigation Company, which left Rimouski on that morning for her regular trip, around 8.30 a.m. Neither at sailing time nor at any time during the trip, the said ship was ever convoyed or escorted in any way whatever.
>
> And I have signed.
>
> (signed) J. A. Brillant.
>
> Sworn before me, in Rimouski,
> this 21st day of July, 1942.
> N. Gendreau
> C.S.C. for Rimouski District.

Now I wish to read the affidavit of Mr. Seraphin Morissette, of the town of Rimouski:

> I, Seraphin Morissette, of the town of Rimouski, being duly sworn, state:
>
> I am the local manager of the lower St. Lawrence Navigation Company, in Rimouski. On June 17th, 1942, around 8.30 a.m., the Jean Brillant, a ship owned by the company which I represent, left Rimouski as usual with passengers for Baie Comeau and Sept-Iles, and freight. Mr. J. A. Brillant was aboard the ship as a passenger on his way to Natashquan, as he has been doing quite often for some years.
>
>
> I was present when the boat left on the morning in question and there was no escort accompanying her.
>
> And I have signed.
> (signed) S. Morissette.
>
> Sworn before me, in Rimouski,
> this 21st day of July, 1942.
> (signed) J. Gendreau,
> C.S.C. District of Rimouski.

Then I have here the affidavit of the captain of the ship:

> I, William J. E. A. Tremblay, Lieutenant Commander, R.C.N.R., of St. Joseph de la Rive, P.Q., being duly sworn state:
> I am Captain of the Jean Brillant, a ship owned by the Lower St. Lawrence Navigation Company and I was in charge of the said ship on the occasion of the trip from Rimouski to the North Shore on June 17th, 1942. At no time during this trip has the Jean Brillant been escorted or convoyed.

And I have signed.

(signed) Capt. Wm. Tremblay.

These are the affidavits of Mr. Brillant, a respected and responsible citizen of the province of Quebec and a member of the legislative council of that province; of Mr. Morissette, agent for the shipping company; and of the captain of the ship.

I have only one thing to add. After getting these affidavits I thought there might be some possibility that it was some other trip that was in question. So I wired Mr. Brillant and asked him if he had undertaken any other voyage on that ship. He replied under date of July 31 last year in these words:

No other voyage undertaken on the St. Lawrence river apart from the trip made on the 17th. Mailing copy Tremblay's affidavit.

J. A. Brillant.

In those affidavits and telegrams you have definite proof, as definite as proof can be, sworn proof of the inaccuracy of the statements made by the hon. member for Gaspé. I believe that from that evidence alone this house and this country will know how much reliance can be placed on anything else which that hon. gentleman may state.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Furthermore—

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order—may I ask the minister to sit down while I am stating my point of order?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I know the rules as well as the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Gaspé is not in his seat.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): He ought to be here.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has gone hysterical over this matter, and I think it is about time he levelled his remarks off.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member is not in order in making that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I rise to a point of order. The use of the word "hysterical" by an hon. member in this house in reference to another hon. member is unparliamentary.

Mr. GRAYDON: I withdraw the word.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a point of order; it is a question of privilege, if there is any.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): May I ask that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) be taught to observe the rules of this house about which he speaks so often.

Mr. POULIOT: I always do sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a point of order before the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I withdraw the remark which I made with respect to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, because I see that he has now regained his usual good humour. But I should like to say this on the point of order. The minister, if I recall aright, having tried to prove by affidavit or otherwise—

Mr. MARTIN: Having proved.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that he as a lawyer ought to know this—

Mr. HOMUTH: He is not a good lawyer, though.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is a point of order before the chair, and the chair wishes to know what the point of order is.

Mr. GRAYDON: I said that the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services attempts to prove, and I use the word "attempts" advisedly, for, as the hon. member for Essex must know, without cross-examination on an affidavit it is not necessarily any proof at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not evidence.

Mr. GRAYDON: When the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services tried to prove that certain things were not correct in the speech of the hon. member for Gaspé, I was prepared to allow that to pass unnoticed. But when he said that after this we shall all know how much dependence can be placed on the statements of the hon. member he said something which surely he must withdraw. If ever there was a reflection on any hon. member since I have been in this house, this is definitely one.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, even if the remarks of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services on one point were correct, which I doubt, he would not only be speaking against the rules of the house, but he would also be philosophically wrong, because he would conclude from the particular to the general. Therefore, sir, to act in accordance with the best traditions of this house when you are in the Chair, I hope that even if the minister is right on one single point he will not conclude that he is right on every other point.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order was raised by the leader of the opposition that a statement made by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services was improper, namely, as I caught it, that the country would know what reliance to place on the words of the hon. member for Gaspé in future.

An hon. MEMBER: The statements.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that that is a statement which should not be applied to any hon. member of the house.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am delighted, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw any statement which should not be made concerning any hon. member. But what I have said with regard to the affidavits and telegrams carries its own weight, speaks for itself, and I need say no more on that particular point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Much ado about nothing.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Oh, it is not much ado about nothing. The hon. member for York-Sunbury this afternoon tried to raise this same question. When the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) denied that he had asked for a convoy for that ship because it was carrying mail, the hon. gentleman still assumed that it was convoyed and said, "Then who ordered it convoyed?"

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I asked a question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No, the hon. member made a statement of fact. You said "Who ordered it convoyed?" My hon. friend assumed that it had been convoyed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Still much ado about nothing.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Well, Mr. Speaker, I will go on to another statement made by the hon. member for Gaspé. He referred to an important battle which had taken place near his home, off Griffon cove, a battle which went on between two corvettes and a submarine, lasting an hour and a half, and he said that no planes arrived in all that time to help out the corvettes. Well, I have investigated that. I have had reports from the logs of the ships, and I find that I must regretfully disappoint the hon. member for Gaspé; I must tell him that he has not had the privilege of witnessing a battle at all, and that all he heard was gun practice between two corvettes which were going up the river. Ships at sea, as hon. members realize, have at certain times to carry out gun practice so that their guns shall be in proper shape and the men shall receive a certain amount of training in gunnery. That was all my hon. friend saw. The point which I protest against, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all we are getting now, is gun practice.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Some of my hon. friends are not standing up to the fire very well, either. I think that shot went home.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And there are many more in the locker.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes. The point on which I criticize the hon. member for Gaspé in the Brillant case is this. He knows Mr. Brillant, he knows some of the other gentlemen who were on that trip, and he could have asked them. "Were you accompanied by a corvette when going on the fishing trip?" He never took that trouble; he assumed the worst. The same is true of this matter of the so-called fight between the corvettes and the submarine. The hon. member never thought of going over to the Gaspé naval base and asking the naval commander of the base what had happened in this fight, how it turned out, whether the corvettes prevailed over the submarine, or generally what happened. Apparently he made no attempt to investigate, but he comes to this house and says that for an hour and a half a battle went on, with no planes around, when there was no battle at all.

In the next place, in his speech he said that on September 15 ships were attacked somewhere in the vicinity of Cap des Rosiers and that no planes were around to help the ships. Now, I had that investigated, and I find that there was a plane with the convoy on that occasion. That plane at the particular time was flying some distance ahead of the convoy, as planes often do, and evidently the submarine was submerged when the plane went over the spot. Then after the plane had gone ahead, circling up the river, the submarine appeared on the surface, where it was seen by some people, and it did some damage. But there was a plane accompanying that convoy. A plane cannot be everywhere, and it was unfortunate that in this instance the luck of events went to the submarine in that the plane did not notice it. But I have it from the air staff that their aircraft have carried out eight attacks on submarines in the St. Lawrence area, during each of which depth charges were dropped. While they have no concrete evidence as to the results of the attacks, they believe that some damage was done on at least some of the occasions.

Let me say a word with regard to the sinking of submarines and the communicating of information to the officers in charge of either the navy or the air force. In this case on September 15 the naval officer at Quebec did did not receive any word about the submarine until after the submarine had launched its torpedoes. I do not know whose fault that was, if it was anybody's fault. I can understand that on a long stretch of coast where people may have to go some little distance to a telephone and make a call to someone else, who in turn perhaps has to relay the communication to some other person, some time might be lost. But I do know the time at which the naval officer at Quebec received the information, and unfortunately it was then too late to do anything about the matter. Submarines strike very quickly and they can submerge very quickly.

Mr. ROY: Can the minister tell the house whether there is a telephone in the lighthouse at Cap des Rosiers, and whether the telephone exchange is very far from this lighthouse?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I do not know definitely. I assume there would be a telephone in the lighthouse, but I do not know how far the man who saw the submarine had to go to reach the lighthouse; I do not know how long it took him to get there, nor do I know how long it took to get the call through to Quebec. All I am telling this house is that the naval officer at Quebec did not get the information until it was too late to do anything about it. In connection with this matter of sighting submarines, I want to say that eighty per cent of the reported sightings—I think that is the general figure throughout the world—turn out to be unsubstantiated; that is, the objects sighted and reported as submarines are not submarines at all. So that while it is all to the credit of the people in the constituency of Gaspé that they report everything they see which they think might be a submarine, the hon. member must not feel that every time they think they see a submarine there is actually one there.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry; the minister's time has expired.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I had hoped I might be able to go on, because I could finish in a few moments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I shall trouble the house for only a few more moments. In fairness to Mr. Gagnon I must say that I have no doubt whatever that he is acting on what he believes to be accurate information. I can understand how he might have one man reporting a ship sunk and another man perhaps reporting the same ship sunk. But what I do criticize in Mr. Gagnon, or in the hon. member for Gaspé, or in anyone else who talks as they talk, is that fuller and more complete investigation was not made by them before charges so serious were launched in this house or in the Quebec legislature, or brought before the people of this country.

As to an investigation, as asked for by Mr. Gagnon, I will say this: Mr. Gagnon or anyone else can have an investigation if some person with knowledge will make charges and take the responsibility for what he says. But if the charges are not charges at all but mere rumours, unconfirmed and uninvestigated, then the case is different. If at every time when a difference arises and allegations are made, one party to the dispute says, "Produce your proof or let us submit the matter to a third party who will ascertain the facts," and the other person says, "Now wait a minute; there are many other things to be considered"—if that is done you will never get the facts. It would be very much as if when one man accused another of being a thief, the accused should say, "Well, prove that I am a thief," and the first man replies, "Oh, no. We have to investigate a great many other things first. We have to determine whether you are a murderer, a wife-beater, a robber, a burglar and so on, before we can investigate the charge of theft. We must investigate twelve or thirteen other charges which I am now bringing forward." It would be very much like the radio comedian I heard last winter who said he went into a shop to buy a collar button and asked how much it would be. The clerk replied that it would cost $75. "Well," the comedian said, "that is a terrible price for a collar button." The clerk replied, "Yes, but with the collar button we throw in a dress shirt, collar and tie; a pair of dress shoes and socks, a tuxedo jacket and two pairs of trousers." If you go on adding this, that and the other thing you will never reach an end. Mr. Gagnon insists on an investigation, but the first thing to settle, the first thing in dispute and the issue I raised with Mr. Gagnon, is the number of sinkings.

To return to the hon. member for Gaspé. At page 1270 of Hansard he said that the battle of the St. Lawrence gulf was lost through selfishness and lack of organization. I say that the battle of the St. Lawrence gulf has not been lost. I am not going to give the exact figures, which would perhaps help the enemy, but I can say that of the total tonnage which used that river and the gulf last year, only three out of every thousand tons was sunk. That is a fairly good record. I know the general average of convoy sinkings throughout the world, and I can say that if you only lose three tons out of every thousand which you have at sea you are doing pretty well, in fact somewhat better than the average. We have not lost the battle of the gulf. Some people think the gulf is easily defended. Yesterday the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) said it was impossible for him to think that ships equipped with all the modern scientific appliances could not go up that river and be safe from attack. When some people speak of a river they think of a fairly small stream that can be bridged or that can be easily netted; they think of a river perhaps half a mile or a mile wide. Let them remember that the St. Lawrence river, at the point farthest inland where an attack was made last year, is thirty miles wide. This is almost like the open sea. It is wider than the straits of Dover between England and France. If the great British navy with all its experience and skill and strength and devotion to duty has not succeeded in making the straits of Dover absolutely safe from submarines—indeed only a year ago it was unable to prevent certain great enemy ships from going through the straits—if that cannot be done there, is it to be wondered at that we cannot guarantee complete immunity to ships in the river St. Lawrence, remembering that at points it is wider than the straits of Dover?

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister before he sits down if he would comment on what Premier Godbout said in the Quebec legislature, namely, that everyone knows there are spies all along the St. Lawrence and that there must be bases, perhaps not in the St. Lawrence but possibly in Newfoundland?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, I will divert for a moment to speak of that. The French version of Premier Godbout's remarks is not as my friend gave it. I assume Premier Godbout was speaking in French and I would assume that the French reporter would have a more correct summary of his speech.

Mr. POULIOT: It was a text.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The French version says that Premier Godbout said that there might be spies in the St. Lawrence area and perhaps in Newfoundland. That of course is so; I have said it myself.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about bases?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There may be bases in some remote spot; there is no knowledge of bases in my department or through the police or anyone else. It is a possibility, a remote possibility, I should think.

The St. Lawrence is not an easy river to defend, but as I said in another place two or three weeks ago, I believe the defence of the river this year, so far as the naval service is concerned, and I think so far as the air force and the army are concerned, will be stronger than it was last year. We shall have more ships, I hope, to guard the gulf and river. But I am not here to say that even if we double or treble the number of ships we had last year we shall be able to guarantee complete safety for every ship sailing up and down that river. It cannot be done; if you had the whole Canadian navy strung out in the gulf of St. Lawrence, abandoning all the other places you have to protect, you still could not guarantee complete immunity from submarine attack. That cannot be done; it has not been done by any nation in the world. To-day off the very shores of Japan United States submarines are operating and sinking ships; Japanese submarines approached the west coast of America last winter and fired shells on American soil; there are sinkings on the British coast; submarines get there in spite of all they can do. But every effort that can be made by the navy or the air force or the army will be put forth this summer in order to make that river and that gulf as safe as possible.

The hon. member for Gaspé referred to the worry of the people there. I question very much if my hon. friend's speech in this house, containing as it did certain matters which he had not investigated, certain matters which were pure rumour, will do anything to allay the worry of the people of his constituency and the people along the river. I think my hon. friend would have been much better employed if he had investigated some of these rumours, found out the facts and said to his people: I have looked into this matter, and there is nothing to worry about so far as this particular incident is concerned; I have looked into it and am able to tell you that. That would have been a better course, a more loyal course—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): —a course of more benefit to his constituents—

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister suggests that it would have been a more loyal course. I suggest that in making that observation the minister is imputing insufficient loyalty on the part of the hon. member.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend ought to read the old grammars on the comparison of adjectives and remember that there is a positive, comparative and superlative—many, more, most. I say my friend would have pursued a more loyal course to his own constituents and to this country if he had investigated these rumours and endeavoured to allay the fears of his people.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the minister make a statement about the escort strength? We seem to have been trusting to Providence more than the Canadian navy.

Mr. ROY: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the course I have taken is not a loyal one or not loyal enough, then it was disloyal to a certain extent. I ask the minister to withdraw that expression.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My time is up. I have spoken to the point of order and I declare to you that there is no reference there which is out of order.

I am sorry that I cannot answer the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) as it is six o'clock and my time has gone. On the war appropriation discussion I will deal with him and with the gibes which from time to time in this house he has made against the Canadian navy. I am getting heartily sick and tired of the sneers—

Mr. CHURCH: I never made any sneers or gibes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is now six o'clock and I move the adjournment of the debate. But before I do so I suggest to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services that he had better reflect on the reflections which he has made on the hon. member for Broadview.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

SOCIAL SECURITY

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens) moved:

That the first report of special committee on social security, presented on March 16, be concurred in.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to say about this. I wish to congratulate the hon. members of this committee on social security upon having made such a happy choice in the selection of a chairman. In fact there could be no better chairman than my hon. friend, the hon. member for Queens. I sincerely believe that social security will be in safe hands as long as he presides over the committee as he has over other committees during previous sessions.

I ask hon. members to be very careful about the report presented by Professor Marsh. I have glanced over it in the press, but have not yet had an opportunity to read the full text. I remember distinctly that a report on unemployment which he submitted some years ago to the federation of mayors was not at all comprehensive. I always have great fear about the idealistic tendencies of those who may be described as book worms. There are great differences between university professors. There are those who teach real science and are properly called learned men. There are others, of course, who live in the clouds and have but a vague idea of what is going on on mother earth. Those men are most dangerous. I am not ready yet to say that Professor Marsh is one of them. I shall wait and see.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Speaking, sir, to the motion to adopt the report of the committee I must confess that I was a bit alarmed at the tremendous publicity which this committee got at its first sitting. The material presented to the committee was hailed by press and radio as perhaps one of the greatest things that ever happened to Canada. I do not so regard it. I regard it as something that could have happened at any time. While the material presented to the committee was tremendously voluminous I think upon analysis it all boils down to one thing, that some scheme of insurance is being attempted that could have been attempted at any time and by any set of men who had desired to initiate some scheme —any insurance company, for instance. I say I am alarmed because I think there is somewhere in the picture a perfectly devised propaganda machine for the purpose of making something look big when after all it does not amount to a row of pins. That is my own conviction. I am not going to hold up the debate by any discussion of the details of the report, because the time will come when we can discuss it more fully.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

POSTAL SERVICE—LONDON "ECHO"

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Has the Post Office Department a certified copy of a list of bona fide subscribers to the London Echo?

2. How many of these subscribers are in the city of London?

3. Is the London Echo being delivered by letter carriers to non-subscribers at the same postage rate as that charged to subscribers?

4. Does the London Echo, which received the status of a regular newspaper in 1879, comply now with the present day statutory requirements?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. As previously stated, postal privileges were granted in 1879. It is not the practice to require publishers to file copies of their subscription list with the Post Office after statutory postal privileges have been granted.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Rate on copies mailed for local delivery within letter carrier area is the same for copies addressed to non-subscribers as that for copies addressed to subscribers.

4. Yes. See subsections (a), (b) and (d) of section 23 of the Post Office Act. As regards subsection (c), see answer to No. 3.

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR SERVICE LINE TO BAGOTVILLE, QUE.

Mr. WARD:

1. Has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company been granted a licence for a new air service line to Bagotville, Quebec?

2. If so, has the Trans-Canada Air Lines been given the refusal of extending its own services into this territory?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Owing to congestion on the railways the Canadian Pacific Air Lines have been given temporary permission for the carriage of mail and express between Quebec and Saguenay airport. No licence has been issued.

2. The matter was discussed with TCA and it has been decided that as this route is in the nature of a feeder line and not equipped with the regular aids to air navigation for a main line operation, the proposed service could be provided more conveniently by Canadian Pacific Air Lines for the time being as an extension of their existing Montreal-Quebec service.

NATIONAL WAR SERVICES—HELEN DOHERTY

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. In what capacity is Miss Helen Doherty employed in the Department of National War Services?

2. What are the duties attached to such position?

3. How long has she been employed in such position?

4. What is the total remuneration which has been paid to her, either by way of salary or honorarium?

5. What is the total which has been paid to her by way of travelling expenses and living allowance?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. General assistant.

2. Assists generally, makes surveys and special studies of activities of the department, exercises supervision as required.

3. Two years and six months.

4. $9,190.

5. $162.85 travelling expenses.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—NEW BRUNSWICK CONTRACTS FOR SHELL BOXES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many contracts have been let in the province of New Brunswick by the Department of Munitions and Supply for the manufacture of shell boxes?

2. What are the names of firms manufacturing shell boxes in New Brunswick?

Mr. HOWE:

1. 35 contracts.

2. Enamel & Heating Products Limited, Sackville, N.B.; J. & D. A. Harquail Co. Limited, Campbellton, N.B.; Murray & Gregory Limited, Saint John, N.B.; Provincial Wood Products Limited, Saint John, N.B.; T. S. Simms & Co. Limited, Saint John, N.B.; Wallace Manufacturing Co., Sussex, N.B.; Wilson Boxes, Saint John, N.B.

CHARTERED BANKS—RATION COUPON BANKING

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has any provision been made to reimburse the members of all chartered bank staffs in Canada for the increased duties imposed upon them by ration coupon banking, etc.?

2. If so, give the details.

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. This question relates to a matter of internal management of the individual banks.

2. See No. 1.

INCREASE IN RAILWAY PASSENGER RATES

Mr. GREEN:

1. Has there been an increase within the last three months in railway passenger rates to the Pacific coast?

2. If so, what was the amount of such increase?

3. Was it approved by the government or any board, agency, controller or other authority appointed by, or under the government?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes. Passenger fares from eastern Canada by Canadian Lines to Pacific coast points were on a lower than normal basis to meet the competition of the combination on the United States frontier plus the lower fares through the United States. The portion of these fares via United States routes which was charged within the United States was increased by order of the United States interstate commerce commission resulting in higher fares via the United States' routes than the lower rates available via Canadian routes. This situation affected not only fares from eastern Canadian points but also fares from many eastern United States points and the United States Lines insisted that the Canadian fares must be advanced to the level made effective within the United States; otherwise United States lines would be obliged to eliminate the Canadian Lines routings from their tariffs which would eliminate United States travel through Canada and have a very serious effect on the Canadian economy.

2. The amount by which individual fares were increased varies with the point of origin. Specimen of the one-way and round trip fares which were in force on the 19th January, 1943, and on the 20th January, 1943, showing the increase in dollars and the percentage increase in each case is attached.

3. Yes. The increase was approved by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and its decision was concurred in by the wartime prices and trade board.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COMMODITY STABILIZATION BOARD

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What amount has been paid out by the commodity stabilization board to date since it was organized?

2. On what commodities and what amount was paid out on each commodity?

COST-OF-LIVING BONUS—COST-OF-LIVING INDEX USED AS BASE

Mr. KNOWLES:

What commodities are used to arrive at the base for the cost-of-living index which is used in computing the amount of the cost-of-living bonus?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Return tabled.

FLAX PRODUCTION AND PROCESSING

Mr. BENCE:

1. Was there any flax seed from which linseed oil and feed products is manufactured exported from Canada in, (a) the month of January, 1943, (b) the month of February, 1943?

2. If so, how much was exported in each month?

3. Was there any flax processing plant in Canada idle at any time from January 1, 1943, to March 15, 1943, because of lack of flax seed?

4. If so, for what period or periods was any such plant or plants so idle and what was the name and location of any such plant or plants?

5. What was the reason for such lack of flax seed?

6. What is the estimated total amount of flax seed in Canada?

7. Has the government received representations to the effect that there is a demand for the oil cake and other feed products derived from the processing of flax seed, for live stock purposes?

8. Is there a shortage of oil cake and other feed products produced from the processing of flax seed, for the purpose of feeding live stock?

PENITENTIARIES—KINGSTON AND ST. VINCENT DE PAUL

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What are the working hours per day of the guards at, (a) Kingston penitentiary, (b) St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary?

2. What are the names of the permanent guards at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary?

3. How long have such permanent guards been employed?

4. Do guards at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary work on religious and legal holidays?

IRON ORES

PRESS REPORT AS TO OPERATIONS OF STEEP ROCK MINES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply or the Minister of Finance. I have sent a copy of the question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The papers to-day contain a synopsis of certain agreements relating to the exploitation of Canadian iron ores by the Steep Rock Mines Limited. Will the minister table any agreements made to provide subventions on the transportation of the ore or relating to financial commitments to the company or railways in connection with the provision of transportation facilities, and so forth?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the provisions in question were contained in an order in council and published in the Canada Gazette, which is a public document, but I shall be glad to find them and table them at the next sitting.

FARM WORKERS

ACTION IN UNITED STATES SENATE TO DENY AGRICULTURAL WORKERS TO THE ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the government based on a news report in this morning's paper. It is a dispatch from Washington, as follows:

> Washington, March 17.—Moved to militant action by reports of imminent food shortages, the United States Senate overrode war department protests to-day to pass, 50 to 24, a bill denying any more agricultural workers to the armed forces.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FAIR: Is it the intention of the government to take similar action here?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The other day I gave a ruling in regard to the reading of reports from newspapers and basing questions thereon, and I wish the hon. member would read that ruling again. The question is one that should be placed on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

OCEAN FALLS, B.C.—EVICTION OF FAMILIES OF MEN CALLED FOR MILITARY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I have received a telegram from the president of the paper makers' union at Ocean Falls, in which he calls my attention to a serious condition developing in that town. I should like to say a word as a background for my question. Ocean Falls is a company town. The houses in which the employees of the company live are company houses. When married employees of the company are called for military service—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am afraid I must refer the hon. member to the ruling I gave the other day with regard to questions on the orders of the day. The hon. gentleman is making statements of fact before asking his question. I gather that the question is not of sufficient urgency to warrant an answer on the orders of the day.

Mr. MacINNIS: I just wanted to give two or three facts in order to make my question intelligible.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Speaker is here to preside over this house and I shall be quite willing to abide by his decision. I wanted to give a few statements of fact as a background to my question so that it would be intelligible.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is doing what I was endeavouring to rule on the other day, making statements of fact. After all his question is being asked for the purpose of receiving an answer, not for the giving of facts. I suggest to the hon. member that he follow the ruling I have already given.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then I will ask my question at once. Can the minister assure the house that action will be taken to prevent the eviction of the families affected until other accommodation is provided for them? I am told that the situation is urgent.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of the question. I think I should say to him that this was the first I had heard of the matter, and it was just before the house assembled this afternoon. He can rest assured that I shall certainly have the matter looked into by my department in an effort to see if anything can be done, if the facts are as he has indicated them to be.

[Mr. Speaker.]

PASSPORTS

INCONVENIENCES RESULTING FROM RECENT CHANGES IN PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): One rises, Mr. Speaker, in some fear and trepidation these days to ask a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I assure the hon. member that he need not rise in fear and trepidation if his question is in order.

Mr. LOCKHART: I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Apparently I may not make any explanation. There is a definite misconception of the passport regulations at border points. The new regulations make it evident that a man living at say Kingston must come to Ottawa to have the new form completed, which is a very serious inconvenience. Will the Prime Minister see that a full and definite statement is made so that people will know whether it is better to follow the present procedure or whether they can choose between it and the old form of passport, which some of them seem to think they cannot now obtain because of the new regulations?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I made a statement on the subject at the time the change was made. But I shall direct the attention of the passport office to the apparent incompleteness of the statement in the light of what my hon. friend has said, and shall make a new statement at an early date.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. CHURCH

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES IN DEBATE ON MARCH 17

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. About the time the house closed yesterday afternoon, a derogatory reference was made to me when I asked a question about the very grave danger from lack of escorts in the Atlantic and the gulf of St. Lawrence. My remarks on this subject are reported in Hansard of Wednesday and Thursday, March 10 and 11, and I wish to read three or four sentences in justification of my position. On March 10, as reported at pages 1150 and 1151, I said:

To-day I had occasion to ask one of the ministers a question, in a desire to encourage him in his work. . . .

I then pointed out that I was one of those who supported the increased estimates brought down before the war, and I added:

> Those estimates were opposed by a great many hon. members . . . Since the beginning of the war I have believed in giving the government of the day all possible support, because they are the government and need encouragement. Our forces on land and sea and in the air have been magnificent. The history of courage has been gloriously rewritten in this war by those young Canadians who are serving in our armed forces and by the splendid showing of our navy. . . .
>
> I sympathize with the hon. gentleman who is head of our department of naval services; he is not to blame, but I must say that a year ago I pointed out to him the condition that had been found by General de Gaulle around St. Pierre and Miquelon and in the gulf of St. Lawrence and the German submarines there.

I said further, on page 1151:

> At that time I also told the minister that we were in danger of being invaded; as the axis had submarines capable of crossing the Atlantic without refuelling; and all during the sessions of 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939, until the war started, . . . I asked if we were to wait until the enemy came up the St. Lawrence by land, by sea and in the air . . . before doing anything to defend ourselves.

I pointed out, in general, the grave danger of invasion.

Now, one or two sentences from my remarks when I continued the debate last Thursday. I referred to the cry about home defence, and in support of what the minister had said, I pointed out that many of the countries of Europe had been invaded by mechanized hordes, that there is no such thing as home defence, that we have to go and meet the foe wherever he is. I had previously called attention to what Mr. Lyttelton, minister of production, had said in New York last November, and to the statement of Mr. Knox at Washington. I quoted statements made by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons on two occasions as to the grave danger to the North African expedition from lack of escorts, and endeavoured to strengthen the minister in what he had said to the people in Quebec as to the danger to Atlantic and gulf shipping.

I have been a member of this house for many years, and never in my life have I sneered or gibed at anybody. I believe the minister's statement was right that at times there is not the same danger in the gulf as out in the ocean, and all I was urging was that we should have a statement as to our escort strength in the north Atlantic and gulf and the approaches to Canada. If the minister had been good enough to respond to that question a month ago I believe the effects would have been very satisfactory. When the war started I urged the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to give the utmost information possible to the people. After all, I could have secured this information in the reading room, from our Canadian papers or from American and British publications.

All I want is fair play here. I admit I sometimes take part in debates, but I do so as a member of the opposition, not because I want to—far from it. Since I have been a member of this house I have never indulged in any sneers or gibes or said one word against the armed forces. The present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) when he was defence minister did do something to strengthen our military forces as did the late Norman Rogers, and I referred to this in my speech on March 10 and 11 on rearmament.

I am here for one object only. I am not a yes man or a nodder. While the war is on I shall support the government as long as they are the government and provided they make a total war effort, but I intend to do my duty no matter if I suffer from doing so.

May I say in conclusion that I think the remark of the minister was most unfair. However, I will let it go; I do not wish to have any run-in with the minister. I never met him in my life until he came to the house. I think that yesterday was a day he might have left an Irishman alone, since he is grand master of the knights of Scotland.

THE RED CROSS

QUESTION AS TO CONTRIBUTIONS OF WESTERN FARMERS IN THE FORM OF WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to address to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question which has to do with the current Red Cross campaign, namely, whether the government will give consideration to allowing farmers in the prairie provinces who wish to contribute to the Red Cross to do so by making deliveries for the purpose outside of the quotas now fixed for the delivery of wheat.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Lake Centre was kind enough to give me notice that he intended to ask this question. The government has not considered this particular charity but a great deal of consideration was given recently to a request on behalf of another charity in a similar campaign. The whole matter is tied up with the wheat quota existing in connection with farm deliveries in western Canada. The basis of that is to maintain equity between one producer and another; and, particularly this year, when there is such a lack of transportation and storage, our difficulties would be greatly augmented if we decided to accept quantities of grain over the quota.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is assumed that about a million bushels would be donated.

Mr. MacKINNON: Well, the greater the return in the campaign, the more generous the response, the greater the difficulty would be for those administering the wheat quota system. As a matter of fact there would be a direct detrimental effect to the other producers in the west.

RURAL MAIL COURIERS

STATEMENT OF POSTMASTER GENERAL AS TO STATUS AND COMPENSATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) has asked if I would make a statement to the house dealing with representations by the rural mail couriers' organizations, relating to permanency of appointment, basic salaries and allowances, as well as cost-of-living bonuses.

The hon. member's statement that representations had been made by rural mail couriers' organizations relating to permanency of appointment, basic salaries and cost of living bonuses, is correct. Action has already been taken under order in council P.C. 8490 of 31st October, 1941, to grant a bonus of five per cent to all mail contractors whose contracts were awarded on tenders dated on or before the 29th April, 1941, in accordance with section 66 of the Post Office Act, or whose contracts involving an annual expenditure of less than $200 were made in accordance with section 73 of the Post Office Act at rates determined on or before the 29th April, 1941, with the proviso that the increase shall apply only to payments made for work performed as from the 1st August, 1941.

On the question of permanency of appointment for rural mail couriers, which was one of the points raised by the hon. member for Peterborough West, I would advise hon. members that there are two serious objections to any such change being made at the present time.

The first objection is that if all the present mail couriers were given permanency, all men now serving in the armed forces of Canada would be automatically deprived of the opportunity of obtaining mail contracts for many years to come.

The second serious objection is that such a proposal presupposes that all the present couriers are the most suitable couriers obtainable. As a matter of fact, the present couriers secured their positions because they underbid the previous contractors under a tender system which they now criticize.

On the question of basic salaries, which is another point raised, payment is sought on a flat mileage basis rather than as a result of public tenders. The objection to this suggestion arises from the fact that no two mail routes can be regarded as identical. Road conditions, number of boxes and way post offices to be served, severity of weather conditions and hours of service, all vary to such an extent as to make the determination of a fair uniform mileage rate for the whole dominion impractical.

The whole question of mail contract procedure is constantly under review, and while it is admitted that the tender system may lead to the completion of some contracts at rates too low for the work involved, largely because the tenderer failed to make a proper estimate of costs, the difficulty is, no alternative procedure has as yet been advanced which under ordinary conditions would be any more equitable to all concerned. War-time conditions, however, have in a number of cases, resulted in greatly enhanced expenditures by the contractor, unforeseen when the original contract was signed. These may be adjusted while war-time conditions exist, but no general change in the existing procedure is contemplated at the present time.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 17, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a contribution to this debate I find myself in some difficulty. There is such a multiplicity of topics to which one could direct his attention that it is difficult to pick and choose among them.

I think my first duty is to make reference to the announcement yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) of the fourth victory loan, and to give him and the national committee the assurance that this party will be one hundred per cent behind this, the greatest national effort the Canadian people have ever made with respect to finance.

Financial support is one of the sinews of war; it is more than a mere measure of our effort. This nation will respond in full measure to the national appeal. With all my heart I endorse the minister's appeal. In the past as opportunity offered I tried to pull my full weight in these financial campaigns. The Easter recess will afford every one of us another opportunity for service to Canada, and I appeal to every member of parliament as he goes home for the recess to get in touch with his provincial and county committees, and to offer his services in any capacity, so as to help put this loan over the top. By so doing, hon. members will be rendering a national service and giving the leadership which is so necessary if this huge loan is to be a success. Members of parliament from one end of Canada to the other should be, and I hope are, leaders of public opinion in their respective communities. Here is another chance to show our people our faith in our country and the cause for which we fight.

I have said in the house many a time and oft that the Canadian people would support the government to the limit provided that they were sure of equality of service and equality of sacrifice, and that there should be an end to waste and extravagance. I wish I could think there has been an end to waste and extravagance in government spending, but in all truth and honesty I do not think so. I beseech the minister, the watchdog of the treasury, to prevent improvident expenditures.

I wish to make brief reference to the speech of the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray), who is now in his seat. Referring to the man-power question the hon. member made reference to myself and my stand on the policy of national selective service. I am grateful to him for his commendation of my stand, but I suggest to him that his remarks were hardly fair to the membership of this party and its stand on this important question. If the hon. member has not yet read the resolution of the national convention of the Progressive Conservative party as passed at Winnipeg, he should do so at once. In that resolution this party declared for compulsory selective service and total mobilization of resources, in the following words—I propose to put them on record:

> Recognizing that the world struggle in which Canada is engaged requires a total war effort, we believe in compulsory national selective service, and that all those selected to serve in the armed forces should be available for service wherever required. We believe in the effective total utlization and proper allocation for war, by compulsion where necessary, of all the resources of Canada, including agriculture, industry and finance, as well as man-power, and that our aim should be at all times to bring about, so far as human means can achieve it, an equality in sacrifice.

I commend to the hon. member and to the people of Canada the principles underlying this resolution. It is what I have been saying for a good many months past. By those principles the Progressive Conservative party stands and will be judged in the days to come.

The hon. member for Lambton West made his profession of faith in the following terms:

> I believe . . . that in a free society the obligations and privileges of military training should be shared generally in accordance with a fair and just system of selective compulsory training, and that such service should be without geographic restriction.

I commend that position also, and I suggest the hon. member might have gone further and told the people of Canada, as I tell them now, that without an acceptance of the national plan of military service there should be no demands for rights in the post-war world. We in Canada have never been taught our national obligations. I have referred on more than one occasion to the excuse—not the reason—which was given for the establishment of the thirty-day training plan. One of the main reasons alleged was that the youth of Canada had to be taught a sense of national obligation. I am not going to labour that point now, but I want to observe that while we are all clamouring for rights and privileges, national obligations have not found much place in our peace-time or war-time philosophy. If we are to believe the reports that have reached us in recent days and hours, there are momentous days ahead. From the Russian theatre of war we had until a few days ago very heartening reports which have raised optimism to the point of believing that Germany was in a state of collapse and that the end of the war is near, might even be expected this year. But events within recent days have dispelled that illusion. The display of German striking power against Russia in recent days has been terrific. Disaster has not come to German arms in that theatre of war. A titanic struggle is developing over there, with the approach of spring and summer, and the end is not yet.

Consider the battle of North Africa, part of the Casablanca plan and strategy. Reports indicate that the battle is developing into a major struggle, the result of which is still in grave doubt. Instead of being a matter of weeks it has developed into a battle of months, and in the meantime the invasion of the soft underflank of Europe has been indefinitely postponed. Clearly the next few months will be momentous, and terrific sacrifices will be demanded of the people of the united nations.

Instead of viewing these matters in their proper perspective, what are we doing, and what have we been doing in this house? We have been talking about social security and like matters, while the fate of the civilized world hangs in the balance. Let us get back to realities and face the facts. Let first things come first. Let us put our backs into the winning of this war. That is our first objective. Do not let our minds and attention be diverted into other channels; for that way lie defeat and disaster.

We are also hearing a good deal at this time about post-war international policies. There are even those who are drawing blueprints of a post-war international phase of the life of this globe. My colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) yesterday in an able speech delivered in this house, made some constructive proposals in that regard, especially with reference to the principle of the freedom of the air. I do not deprecate that; I am not opposed to that type of discussion. But it seems to me that concrete proposals are altogether premature at this time, when we do not know, when we are not yet assured, that there will be a post-war world in the sense in which we visualize it. Rather I am disposed to concur wholeheartedly in the statement of the President of the United States at a press conference at Washington on Tuesday last, in which he is reported to have indicated disagreement with those who would frame post-war international policies in detail now. He said that what the United States was trying to do was, first, to win the war; second, to work towards general objectives. With that statement I am in perfect agreement. He indicated that his administration did not favour any pronouncement at this time on post-war policy except as to general willingness to cooperate with all the other united nations.

There is one great principle however which Canada as a nation should ever keep in the forefront in dealing with this subject, and that is that Canada should never give countenance to any idea of dismemberment of the empire in the post-war period. The party to which I have the honour to belong and which I have followed all my life is unequivocally committed to the belief that the future of this dominion as a free nation can best be assured as a member of the British commonwealth of nations. By that declaration we stand or fall. We believe that second only in importance to the winning of the war is the maintenance of the British connection and our position as a component part of the British empire.

I have no intention of entering into any discussion of the policies and actions of the wartime prices and trade board; we heard something about that on Monday. But, representing as I do a semi-urban and rural constituency, I feel that some recent decisions of the board call for comment. First, I refer to butter. The situation with respect to dairy process butter in my province is still unsatisfactory, to say the least. There is still a discrimination between the price the farmer receives for butterfat delivered to the creameries and the price the farmer receives for his dairy butter. At first this discrimination amounted to as much as ten cents a pound, which for as long as that full rate lasted is lost forever to the producer. Recently a corrective order was made under which a portion—only a portion—of this spread was to be wiped out, by dairy farmers being permitted to sell dairy butter to wholesalers and retailers at an increased price. This is certainly a benefit and has gone some way toward ending the discrimination between these two classes of producers. But a portion of the differential still exists and is a cause of unrest and even anger on the part of our dairy butter producers; for in my province sixty per cent of the butter is produced by dairy farmers.

I wish to refer also to the action of the wartime prices and trade board in respect to the question of seed potatoes. Down in the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island we claim to raise the best seed potatoes on the north American continent. They are the cleanest and the freest from plant diseases. For a long time our agriculture departments, both provincial and federal, have been endeavouring to get our farmers out of the production of table stock and into the production of seed stock. The question has been largely one of markets. One of the best markets we ever had for seed stock was in Cuba. That market was closed to us, for reasons to which I will not advert at the moment. More recently, under the trade agreements with the United States, quotas were established for the entry of our seed stock into that country. The quotas were so small that I am informed by producers that the county of Queens, Prince Edward Island, could supply the whole quota in any given year. That may or may not be true, but in any case under the trade treaties we did get some access to the seed potato market of the United States. It is a market into which we have sought entry for a long time. They want our seed stock; their fields, particularly in northern Maine—and I say this with some deference—are old and diseased, and they cannot produce unless they have access to good clean stock. Prices for seed stock have always been higher than prices for table stock, but I understand that now the wartime prices and trade board have either imposed an embargo on the export of seed potatoes to the United States, or have made such export subject to licence. I suggest to the minister under whose control the matter would come that this is a mistake from every point of view. A determined effort should be made to change that position, and I would ask the member of the government responsible to direct that the whole matter be reviewed. Not only shall we lose the export market in the United States, and the greatly enhanced price of the product; we will lose what I consider to be of at least equal value, the good will of our customers across the line. They will resent that action. I do not know, but I would assume that so far as the New Brunswick product is concerned, there is an ample supply of table stock. According to the local newspaper, which I received at noon to-day, there are at present 16,000 more tons of table stock available in New Brunswick than were available at this time last year. Now, with the prohibition of the export of seed potatoes to the United States, there may be something of a glut. I do not know that this will be so, but I do know that the producers of seed potatoes will be obliged to accept in the local market the price of table stock instead of the greatly enhanced price they would have received had those potatoes been sold for the purpose for which they were produced, namely seed potatoes.

I should like to know what consultation there was with the trade before this action was taken. How can these men—none of them producers, so far as I am aware; economists and theorists if you will, office men—sitting here and looking at a picture on paper, looking at statistics, possibly know what should be done? I suggest to the minister that this position should be rectified at the earliest possible moment, and the producers allowed the price they would have obtained in this export field at least. I suggest also that if possible they be allowed to retain this market which has been laboriously built up over a period of years.

Then there is the question of the allocation of farm machinery under the greatly reduced quotas. Our farmers are confronted with an exceedingly grave problem, so I am informed, with respect to obtaining farm machinery and parts. A controller has been appointed with headquarters in Toronto, and he has allotted to the maritime provinces so many machines and so many parts. In New Brunswick the two principal companies supplying the market are International Harvester and Massey-Harris. The quantity allotted is exceedingly limited. The whole output of International Harvester is controlled in New Brunswick by one company, or rather I should say by two companies controlled by one man. They have the whole province divided among their branches, with respect to the distribution of farm machinery. For some reason one of the executives of one of these companies under the control of this one man has been made the farm machinery controller for the distribution of this machinery in New Brunswick. Well, I do not say there is anything wrong with that on its face, but I do say that the public down there are very suspicious about appointments of that kind. Why in the world should a high-salaried officer of these two companies, which between them control the major part of the marketing of farm machinery in New Brunswick, be placed in the position of controller for the whole province? You can draw your own inference. I am going to ask the minister to see that this position is reviewed and that some independent authority down there is made controller, if a controller is required. Human nature being as it is, you can guess as well as I can what will be the result. Within the last few days I was told that the quotas allotted to New Brunswick provided only ten or twelve potato planters for the whole province. This may be all that can be spared, I do not know; but the allocation of these planters already has been made through the medium to which I have referred, with no one else having a look-in at all. Then when the farmers, in anticipation of fall digging, applied for the purchase of diggers, they were told that it was too soon to ask for them. I suggest that the whole procedure is bringing into disrepute the system which is in operation, and it should be reviewed.

I desire now to say a brief word on the budget. I listened with undivided attention to the minister's address, and I am bound to tell him that my first reaction was that it might have been far worse than it was. But a careful re-reading and analysis has convinced me that while the minister intended to emphasize and did emphasize the fact that the rates of taxation were not being raised, the real truth is that the deadweight of taxation, especially on personal income tax payers, has been greatly increased. Those who sought relief are going to be speedily and quickly disillusioned. Holding the views which I do as to our first fundamental duty in this hour of crisis, I have no wish to appear picayune or to be unnecessarily critical. I had made some notes of criticisms I intended to offer on the general features of the budget, but as time is flying I shall confine myself to one or two points.

I wish to discuss briefly the Ruml plan and its application to Canada. The people of Canada, speaking generally, and the personal income tax payers in particular, are greatly disappointed at the minister's treatment of the proposal known as the Ruml plan. True, the reference in the speech from the throne itself was indefinite, but what the people of Canada believed from the information contained in the speech from the throne was that the plan and the principle underlying it would be implemented and put into operation, thus relieving personal income tax payers of the fear and anxiety of being perpetually indebted to the nation. Deadweight debt has a most paralyzing effect on individual morale and initiative.

What did Mr. Ruml propose in his plan for the United States, a plan which is applicable to Canada? He proposed that the United States should write off all 1942 personal income tax in order to put everyone on a current basis, without forcing anyone to pay two years taxes in one, and in order that the deadweight of debt on individuals should be wiped out. What have we instead? I characterize it as a hybrid proposal. The minister made us pay all our 1941 taxes by September 1, 1942, and then he asked us to pay one-third of our 1942 taxes. In other words, because of the delay in bringing down the budget last year until June 23, the personal income tax payers of Canada were forced to pay sixteen months taxes out of twelve months income and had to make the necessary arrangements in the six months of the last period of the calendar year. We were not told that we must do this until late in June when nearly six of the twelve months had elapsed. In other words, to put an extreme case, we had to pay sixteen months taxes with only six months in which to make our plans and provisions. It was a tremendous burden upon the personal income tax payers and was wholly unfair.

When the Ruml plan was suggested and acclaimed by almost everybody in Canada as a measure of relief I felt that the government was about to do justice to a group of loyal but hard-pressed citizens. What did we get? We got the Ilsley plan. The minister adopted the principle of current taxation, but he did not adopt the plan for making it current. There is a joker or a hang-over in it. I hope the minister will give consideration to the question of wiping out the arrears for 1942 and making the necessary adjustments. His plan falls far short of what was expected and what we had a right to expect. The Ruml plan, proposed to write off the 1942 taxation in order to put the tax payer on a current basis without forcing him to pay two years' taxes in one year. The minister's device is to write off fifty per cent of the 1942 taxes, but that leaves many people in substantial debt to the government. The full weight of the 1943 taxation is on us immediately and must be met out of incomes which are still further reduced. I am referring to incomes on investment. As a result of the last budget, whether we like it or not, capital values were diminished by hundreds of millions of dollars because of decreases in dividends for distribution to shareholders. The natural result must be that investment income will shrink, and I believe that that is the fact.

There is another aspect of the income tax law to which I desire to make reference, namely, the question of the taxes on annuities. Subsection (g) of section 3 of the Income War Tax Act as amended in 1942 provides:

> Annuities or other annual payments received under the provisions of any will or trust, irrespective of the date on which such will or trust became effective, and notwithstanding that the annuity or annual payments are in whole or in part paid out of capital funds of the estate or trust and whether the same is received in periods longer or shorter than one year—

Shall be deemed to be income. It declares by law to be income that which is not true income. It reminds me of a passage which the attorney general of New Brunswick once put into the succession duty act of that province years ago. It declared by law that property coming from an estate of a deceased person in another province falling into the hands of recipients in the province of New Brunswick was deemed to be property within the province and thus taxable. It aroused my ire that a thing should be declared to be that which it was not. This is in exactly the same category. I have always thought that this provision was most unjust.

The effect of this provision is to tax annual payments which a testator or donor has directed to be made out of the capital of his estate, usually to supplement an inadequate income. It is in essence a capital levy, and in the final analysis is pure confiscation. This amendment affects a substantial number of estates and trusts. I have been privileged to read a booklet issued by the National Trust Company, Limited, in which several examples are given. I shall confine myself to two.

A testator who died many years ago directed the trust company, as executor, to pay to his widow out of the residue of his estate, which amounted to approximately $36,000, a very modest estate, an annuity of $2,400, to be made up out of income and the balance out of capital. Owing to the heavy encroachments necessary to provide this annual payment, the capital of the estate has now been reduced to approximately $8,000, with an annual income of $260. In order to pay the widow $2,400 the executors must take $2,140 out of capital. Under the Income War Tax Act as it stands to-day, the total payment of $2,400, although approximately ninety per cent of it is pure capital, is taxed as income in the hands of the widow. The annual tax amounts to something over $800.

In another case the testator directed that his widow should receive $3,600 a year. The entire income of the estate did not exceed $800 per annum, so that the $2,800 required to make the annual payment had to be taken out of capital. Again the tax is based on the $3,600, and it amounts to $1,478.

This is confiscation pure and simple. I suggest to the minister that it should never have become law and believing him to be a man of just and equitable mind I urge upon him that he have this whole position reviewed in the light of the facts. I do not know who is responsible for it, but surely the minister did not understand the implications of the amendment to the act when he made it. There may be justification for it, but I am certainly not aware of it. I can think of many arguments against it. I have not the time to go into them to-day, but I do hope the minister will review this position. It gives rise to discrimination against a fairly limited number of income tax payers. It is all very well to say that you can overcome the difficulty by a will. But these injustices arise after the event. Wills which may have been improvident at the time they were made are effective once a testator dies. To adopt my suggestion would be but a measure of justice.

I want to refer to the method of income tax collection. We hear practically nothing about income tax collection except the quantum of the sum collected. The wide extension of the incidence of income tax in the last few years has undoubtedly led to a huge expansion of work in the income tax department. The view seems to be generally held that this department is grossly understaffed, and that, as a result the checking of income tax returns, both personal and corporate, is inadequate and very much behind schedule. I should like to know what is the number of the employees in the income tax department as of, say, January 31, 1943, as compared with the number on the same date in 1941, and generally what plans have been made to cope with the huge increase in volume of business which must necessarily take place with the filing of this year's returns.

I pause here, Mr. Speaker, to pay my personal tribute to the commissioner for his fairness and his sense of equity and justice. But it is only fair to say that he does not lay down policy. He is purely an administrative officer, administering government policies which are handed to him.

I want some information from the minister when the proper time arrives with respect to the operation of the board of review with respect to depressed industries. How many applications have been made for fixing standard profits or revising them upwards? How many such applications have been dealt with definitively by the board of review?

If, as I have been told, the total in suspense greatly exceeds those in connection with which decisions have been given, would it not be advisable to set up additional panels to expedite consideration of these applications? The present experienced board might then confine its work to important cases and reviewing decisions which are protested by applicants. I have no doubt that it is the practice of most companies, particularly large incorporated companies, to calculate profits and pay their taxes meticulously—that is my own experience—but the idea is held in some quarters that some private companies, partnerships and personal businesses are getting away with murder. That is a pretty strong statement, but that is the report I have had. I have been told also that in certain cases where evasion of income tax extending over a period of years has been brought to light the guilty parties have in many cases been let off with a compromise instead of being fined or prosecuted. If this is so, it is putting a premium on dishonesty. With the present high tax rate, human nature being what it is, it is inevitable that all legal means should be adopted to save the maximum amount from the tax collector, but, if we are not to put a premium on dishonesty, deliberate falsification of accounts should be dealt with ruthlessly and publicity given to the circumstances. That will stop the practice. I should like to know how many legal actions have been taken in the courts to recover income tax. I have never heard or read of one such case in the public press, neither have I heard of any case where there have been prosecutions in the criminal courts for violations of the act and fines imposed and collected. I should like to know what the position is in that regard.

I had intended to refer to the amendment and the subamendment moved by the parties to my left, but I am not sure that I have time. The main amendment moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) is in effect a repetition of the proposals which have been made from time to time in this house by that hon. gentleman and his followers, who are proposing a new and different and untried, and, may I say, unorthodox method of financing the national war effort. With great respect I entirely disagree with his policies, but I shall not pause here to debate either the merits or the machinery of the proposals which he advocates.

I do desire, however, to say something about the subamendment moved by the socialist party, in so far as it relates to the nationalization of the chartered banks and other financial institutions in this country. As to that part of the amendment which deals with the question of increasing the old age pensions, I wish the hon. gentleman had severed it from the rest, because I have arrived at the conclusion that old age pensions in this country will have to be increased, that the age limit for males will have to be lowered and the age limit for females lowered still further. Speaking for myself, if that portion of his proposals had been left to itself I should have voted for it.

With regard to his proposal with respect to the nationalization of our financial institutions, I am in entire disagreement. I believe in private enterprise, controlled, if you will, against abuse; but I have been a voice crying in the wilderness in this house. I do believe, however, that there is a multitude of members in this house who believe as I do, if they would only be true to themselves and get up on their feet and say so.

Mr. FULFORD: I do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to hear that, but that is just one, and if the hon. member will forgive me for saying it, perhaps his advocacy of the principle will not help it. I do not say that in any offensive sense at all, and my hon. friend will understand me, I hope. I do wish that the membership of this house who believe in the principle of private initiative and private enterprise would stand up in their places and champion that principle which has put them in this house and made it possible for the people of Canada to develop this country.

Mr. BLAIR: We all believe in it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. Then silence must give consent. What has brought this country to the high level of prosperity which it has reached? It is private enterprise which has built up and improved our economic system ever since the advent of the Christian era. And now at one fell stroke, if the policies of my friends to my left were put into operation, it would be wiped out and we should all be regimented by an army of government officials who would tell us when we should get up in the morning, when we should go to bed, what we should eat and what we should not eat for dinner. I am all against that. Mr. Coolidge was asked by his wife one Sunday when he came home from church what the preacher had been talking about. Mr. Coolidge replied "Sin". "What did he say about it?" she asked; and Mr. Coolidge replied laconically, "He was against it". I am against it. I believe that the thinking people of this country will stand behind the principle of private initiative and private enterprise which has made Canada as prosperous as she is, has made all the free democracies under the British empire as prosperous as they are, and has built up on this continent the great and rich and powerful republic of the United States. The system of free enterprise may have been exploited and abused, if you will. I admit that. But with all its abuses it is a far better system than government regimentation and national socialism. What does it mean? What is the ultimate aim of national socialism? Well, it is fascism.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is no national socialism in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They can deny it, but I can see as far through a stone wall as anybody.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not like to trespass on the indulgence of the house, but I shall not be very long. If I have not consent, I will not continue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: With unanimous consent.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Now that the hon. member has it he can go on as long as he likes. At any rate he can go another forty minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I shall not be long now.

I am not so much concerned with the economic theories of this group, because I know they will not succeed if the sober common sense of the people of this country is expressed at the polls and the people who think alike get together. But I am greatly concerned about their disposition toward society at large as we have built it up over a long period of years. The whole disposition of these gentlemen is to tear down and destroy the economic system which has been built up and improved, step by step, and stage by stage, ever since the advent of the Christian era. The underlying theme of their speeches is destruction of things as they are, and—I say this advisedly—they are developing in this country a policy of hate in their attitude towards our established society and all those great national leaders who are to-day guiding the destinies of this country and the allied nations.

Speaking in the city of Hamilton recently, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is reported to have charged that the workers of Canada had been denied their lawful rights. Have we not all been denied our lawful rights in war-time? Are not our liberties curtailed day in and day out? It is part of the price we pay for victory. The hon. member has no case there. The workers are in the same box with all the rest of us, and they will have to retain that position and forego what is denied to them and to us until the termination of hostilities, when I hope that all their rights will be restored to them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They have never had their rights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, they have had rights. No one has ever denied that they have rights. Then, as reported in the Hamilton Spectator of March 1, the hon. member for Cape Breton South went out of his way to attack Mr. Churchill, the greatest leader Britain and the other free nations have ever had. This is what he is reported to have said:

> Churchill hated Hitler and will fight him to the last ditch.

And then:

> That's the most I'll say for him.

Then, mark this:

> The people will have to get rid of the Churchills to attain their ideals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that report is not correct I should like to have the hon. member point out wherein it is not correct. But it has stood in the pages of that newspaper since the first of March and so far as I know it has not been repudiated by him. I want to ask this question: is that spirit the expression of the true philosophy of labour in Canada? I do not believe it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not believe it for a moment. Is that the spirit of his party in this house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it would appear to me to be so. If so, then I say to the hon. member and to the people of Canada that that is the grossest evidence of ingratitude that I have ever known. For Churchill more than anyone else has saved our Christian civilization.

Every time I hear one of these gentlemen speak on post-war problems and with respect to the world that is to be after the war, in this house in this debate and in the debate on the address, especially the speeches of the leader of the socialist party and his two leading lieutenants, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), I am reminded of the declaration of the late member for Winnipeg North Centre, the then leader of the party, who endorsed the statement made in this house on September 9, 1939, on the occasion of the declaration of war, by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who stated concretely, as reported in Hansard, page 55:

> In view of these considerations, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation believes that Canada's policy should be based first on the fundamental national interests of the Canadian people, as well as on their interest in the outcome of war.

This is the part to which I draw attention:

> Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

And to this day I have never known of any repudiation of that statement either on the part of the hon. member who made it, his chief lieutenants in this house, or his advisers in the country, and I challenge him to produce evidence that they do not still hold that view.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not correct. There are many statements on the record.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if I were to make an exception of anybody I should be disposed to make it in the case of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, that is not necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I have not yet found any evidence that they have ever repudiated the basic principles laid down in that statement of policy. I know we have had lip-service from these gentlemen.

Mr. REID: It is a good thing there is Hansard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, it is a grand thing sometimes that there is a Hansard to check people up. It has a salutary effect. I have found it has had a very chastening effect on my own soul. But I never yet heard that statement of policy and principle repudiated by the socialist party in this country, and so far as I know it never has been, from that day to this.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It has been, several times.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to tell the people of Canada—I do not need to tell the membership of this house—beware of these people; beware of this group of citizens who are out to destroy things as they are in this country; beware of these people who are advocating policies to-day which in their considered platform they argued in reverse. I say to the people of Canada that the membership of the Canadian cooperative federation—whatever name you like to call them; a rose by any other name would smell as sweet—by reason of their attitude towards society, by reason of their attitude towards things as they are, by reason of their declaration in respect to the war, are not worthy of the confidence of the Canadian people.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the former leader of the official opposition upon his opening remarks respecting the loan which will be launched in the near future. I believe one of the finest things in this time of war is the fact that all parties in the house have cooperated fully in every way in respect of each loan floated, and I was pleased to hear the hon. member speak for himself and his colleagues in a similar way with respect to the coming loan. May I say further that I was in entire agreement with much of what he said, particularly when he spoke about private enterprise.

May I at the outset of my remarks extend my congratulations to our good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his presentation of the budget a few days ago. I believe all hon. members realize the minister is carrying a heavy responsibility, a burden perhaps greater than that carried by any former minister of finance in our history. I believe we realize, too, that, as obtains in every country engaged in the war, our whole financial situation is always extremely difficult to handle, and is fraught with serious considerations. I sincerely hope all hon. members will consider these facts, and will take no action or make no statements which might in any way be interpreted as a want of confidence in the minister, or in his management of our financial affairs. In the position he now occupies I believe he is endeavouring to do a good job. I believe, too, that he has endeavoured to distribute taxation fairly and equitably, and it is my personal belief that anyone who would now take any action which might be interpreted as a want of confidence in the minister would be taking upon himself a serious responsibility.

All hon. members know that the present situation is created as a result of war and war-time conditions. That reminds us that another year of war has passed, a year in which at times our hopes have been badly shattered, a year in which at times our hopes have been revived. It has been one in which the faith of all Canadians as well as that of our allies has at times been strained almost to the breaking point, as the tide of battle has ebbed and flowed on our various battle-fronts. However our faith that right will finally prevail has held firm; and while I believe we all realize that the road to an allied victory is still going to be long and costly, events have indicated that victory for the allied forces will finally be achieved.

In the past year, throughout the British empire, the United States and other allied countries people have been forced to do things which they would have had no natural desire to do. We are a peace-loving people. We hate war with all its cruelty, its destruction, its reckless sacrifice of human life, as well as destroying ideals which for decades our leaders have tried to inculcate into the minds of our citizens. It is now about three and a half years since our empire was plunged into war, a war for which neither the United Kingdom nor any of the dominions was prepared. As a matter of fact we had all been advocating a policy of peace. It is well known that in our own country we have had a large body of public opinion which seemed to believe that money spent for defence purposes was really wasted. It was contended that no nation in the world had any designs on Canada or any desire to interfere with us in any way. I remember well many speeches made in the house along those lines since I became a member some years ago. Even during the regime of the Right Hon., now Viscount, Bennett these same attacks were made on defence estimates. At that time one hon. member seemed to think it was her particular responsibility to make an annual effort to have even the grant for cadet training cut to one dollar per year. Others of course felt it was their duty to attack larger expenditures.

In 1937 the government did increase estimates for defence purposes, but the records of the house will show the barrage of criticism the then minister of national defence had to face in piloting those estimates through the house. Attacks were made on the method of letting contracts for military supplies, and also made upon those to whom contracts had been let. I believe it is a well known fact that this criticism and this kind of action did much to delay the production of necessary military equipment, all of which went to create a situation in Canada which left us almost defenceless and with very little military equipment when, eventually, our country was plunged into war. In the face of this serious situation it became the task of our government, under the able leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to organize all the resources of the dominion in an effort to defend ourselves by assisting our allies in every possible way. The Prime Minister threw himself into the task in a manner which won high praise not only in Canada but from outstanding figures in all allied countries. The task with which the Prime Minister and the government were confronted at that time was enough to discourage any leader; but with typical coolness and clear thinking, always assuming his full share of the responsibility, he set things in motion by assigning to each cabinet post the man he felt was best fitted for the position. And while changes have had to be made through circumstances over which no one had control, nevertheless his selections indicated that in this, as in all other matters, he had given careful thought to the problems he had to decide.

Unfortunately there are some in Canada who seem to get a headache when anybody else gets a headline. Instead of appreciating the many difficult problems confronting the government when war was declared, and instead of giving every possible assistance, they set out to undermine not only the Prime Minister but the government itself. I should like to take a little time to refer to some of the criticisms then carried on—and still carried on, but, thank goodness, to a lesser extent.

Shortly after war was declared it became apparent to the Prime Minister that a determined effort was being put forth to create a want of confidence in the government. He recognized at once that if divisions of that sort were to take place they would spell disaster so far as Canada's war effort was concerned. Therefore the government was practically forced into a war-time election, at the very time when it should have been left free to devote all its time to organizing our nation for the great task to which it had been committed. The Prime Minister, however, accepted the challenge of those who had been asserting that his government had lost the confidence of the people, and referred his case to the court of public opinion. The decision given by the people is now a matter of history; but we cannot easily forget those who took the leading part in that movement to embarrass the government at such a critical time. I would not want to leave the impression, sir, that all who criticized were not honest in their criticism, because I believe there were many who wanted their criticism to be really helpful. But I think history will be much kinder to the Prime Minister and his colleagues than to those who for personal and political reasons took the course they did at a time when those in authority were doing their utmost to steer the ship of state through dangerous waters and to organize the nation for a supreme war effort.

Even after the matter had been referred to the people; even after the government had received a splendid endorsation from the citizens of this country, there were those who continued their bitter personal attacks on the Prime Minister. One is almost driven to the conclusion that these attacks were based on personal political hatred. Then there were attacks of another sort, not bitter, but at the recent Winnipeg convention we had a supposedly lifelong Tory giving an exhibition of his knowledge and veracity when driven to desperation to find something really bad to say about the Prime Minister, but the only bad thing he could think of was that the Prime Minister was the greatest Tory in Canada. Well, that is bad enough if true, but mark you, sir, it was said at a Tory convention.

On another occasion the same hon. gentleman—and I refer to the ex-leader of the official opposition—gave an exhibition of his knowledge of Ontario when, trying to cast a reflection upon and discredit western Ontario, he described it as the "brushwood" country. Well, if it was not that particular leader it is that sort of leadership which I think the Tory party were anxious to get rid of, even if they did have to select another Tory who for twenty years had been able to keep himself in office by pretending he was definitely opposed to all Tory policies. His pretentions worked so successfully for himself that he was able to persuade the whole Tory convention to adopt his stand. I wish to congratulate the convention upon having selected one of the smartest political acrobats who have ever come on the stage of the political life of this country. He is really a past master. Talk about hat tricks, I do not think there is any performer of hat-tricks who can pull fast ones as smartly as this new leader.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will my hon. friend allow me to make one interruption?

Mr. GOLDING: Certainly.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think my hon. friend on reflection will not want to continue that sort of diatribe this afternoon. This is war time, and I think the citizen to whom he is referring does not deserve that.

Mr. GOLDING: I am trying to express my own opinion; I did not know I was expressing yours. I was just going to say: talk about these performers of hat-tricks; one minute this gentleman is a united farmer, the next a Progressive Liberal. Then, when some more attractive job looms up he performs the disappearing trick, and presto up pops a brand new curly-headed Progressive Conservative, just like that. Well, I believe the Canadian people will take their own measure of theatrical stunts of that sort. I do not think they have forgotten that another gentleman tried a similar stunt in 1935, and I think they will come to about the same decision next time as they did then.

It has been really interesting to observe the tactics adopted from time to time by those who have been vigorous in their opposition to the present government. For a time there was a persistent demand that the Prime Minister should go to London. This demand became so loud and strong that one would almost be driven to the conclusion that if the Prime Minister had not made that trip the allies would have lost the war, and the whole responsibility for this terrible disaster would have been placed on the shoulders of Canada's Prime Minister. But the Prime Minister having made the trip and evidently saved us from such a terrible catastrophe, the critics still refuse to give him any credit whatsoever. There was also a persistent demand for an empire war cabinet. Those making this demand became urgent notwithstanding the kindly hints given by Britain's Prime Minister that he did not consider such a plan either feasible or practicable. However, the Prime Minister had to come right out in the open in stating his viewpoint, and since that time this demand seems to have died a natural death except for a slight echo heard at the Winnipeg convention, and then the leader of the opposition bringing it up again in his speech on the address in reply.

There was also a strong and prolonged demand for national government in Canada, but this demand also faded out of the picture completely when members of the official opposition who, it was generally believed, had tested their constituencies on the national government idea declared from their places in the house that they were not national government candidates at all and protested against the "N.G." being attached to their names.

Many times since war was declared our Prime Minister has had to pass through much the same situation as President Roosevelt did during the United States election last fall. The President was being attacked and denounced for not having opened a second front, and this campaign was turning thousands of votes away from his candidates. But the President had to remain silent, for he knew that the lives of thousands of allied soldiers were at stake. He knew that to reveal any of the allied plans might mean a major military disaster for the allied forces. Accordingly the President kept his secret, and I think history will write its own record as between him and those critics who I think every fair-minded person will agree were taking a desperately unfair advantage of the situation in which the President found himself.

Time after time this government has been attacked and criticized for not giving more publicity to the splendid contribution that this country has been making to the allied cause. Strangely enough, these attacks have come largely from speakers, periodicals and newspapers that have been diligent in spreading the gospel that this government has completely failed to comply with the wishes of the people in regard to directing an all-out war effort. It is all very well to criticize the government for being remiss in their duty, not telling the world what Canada has really been doing. But it does not help much to have editorials day after day belittling and denouncing the government's war effort and having these editorials reproduced in foreign papers. And it does not help to have speech after speech telling our own people and telling the world that our war effort is only a fifty per cent contribution. Action of this sort is about on a par with that of those who throw up their hands in holy horror at the idea that anyone would engage in politics when our country is involved in this life and death struggle, while they themselves have had their organizers scouting the country from one end to the other, have been holding political meetings and conventions, mending political fences and building their political organization just as efficiently and just as diligently as if there were no war on at all. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that some people collapse at crucial moments while under the terrific strain of trying to ride two horses at one time.

My opinion is that the Canadian people and the Canadian government need make no apology for the splendid contribution this country has made, a contribution which has received the highest praise from all allied leaders. Prime Minister Churchill described it as a magnificent effort. Foreign Minister T. V. Soong of China, speaking in Chungking at his first press conference after having visited the United States and Canada last fall, made the statement that Canada is conducting a wonderful war effort which in proportion to her population surpasses that of any other country. Information Minister Brendan Bracken, in introducing our own Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) at a press conference in the United Kingdom last fall, described Canada's war effort as one of the greatest in the history of the war and said that our production drive was amazing, while our total war effort was staggering. Statements such as these, coming from those outside Canada, would indicate that there is a sharp difference of opinion between those outside and some of those inside who are telling the people that our war effort is only a fifty per cent effort.

I think it would be really interesting to have those making such statements tell us honestly and frankly in which departments we are doing only a fifty per cent job. It is all right to make general statements; but let us pin them down; let us know what they mean. Is it in the armed forces, where our lads are being trained to a high standard; where they have played their part nobly at Dieppe and Hong Kong, or where they have withstood the monotonous grind of remaining on guard on Britain's shores month after month and year after year? Is it in the Royal Canadian Air Force, whose personnel has increased from 4,000 to some 150,000? Is it in this force, which includes some of our finest young men who have passed up opportunities to fit themselves for life and have staked even life itself in their determination to protect their home and their country, and to assist the allies in this great struggle for freedom and democracy? Is it in the commonwealth air training plan, which was conceived by our own Prime Minister, which has received such high praise from His Majesty the King, from President Roosevelt and others, and under which thousands of United Kingdom, United States, New Zealand, Australian and Canadian airmen have been trained and fitted for service anywhere in the world? Is it in the Royal Canadian Navy, whose personnel has increased from some 1,800 to 50,000 and in ships from fifteen to over 500? Is it in this force, where gallant young lads go down to the sea in ships, never knowing whether they will return; this service in which young men and older men have done their best to man our vessels in the fight against the deadly submarines, wherever convoys have been asked to go? I submit that these chaps have brought honour to themselves, to their parents, to their country and to their king. Is it in the merchant navy, in which hundreds of lives have been sacrificed as a result of the determination of these men to keep our ships at sea in order to deliver necessary supplies to all allied fighting fronts?

Is it in connection with the women who have joined the armed services, or those who are doing civilian work? Is it in connection with the civil service, where hundreds have worked hours of overtime with no additional pay? Or is it in our industrial production, where executives, engineers, draughtsmen and mechanics have toiled unlimited hours in an effort to organize their plants for the jobs they have been assigned; where men and women have toiled day and night in their effort to assist in winning this war? Is it in our gun plants, where records for production efficiency and low cost have been established? Is it in our shipbuilding plants, where new records have been set up in regard to the time taken to build, equip and fit a ship ready for service? Is it in our aircraft plants, where such a magnificent job has been done? Is it in our explosives plants, where our research engineers have designed explosives which are perhaps the most powerful now in use? Is it in our motorized equipment plants, where new records of production have been established, whose products are to be found on every allied fighting front? Is it in our shell plants, where the method of punching the bore of the shell was conceived and adopted, which method has brought about a tremendous saving in the man-hour and dollar cost? Is it in our tank plants, which received such high praise from all allied military leaders? Is it in our lumbering industry, which has been strained almost to the breaking point in an attempt to supply both ourselves and our allies? Is it in agriculture, where men and women, young boys and young girls are doing their utmost under adverse conditions to keep producing food for our own country and our allies? There are men and women on the farms to-day who have passed the age when they should be called upon to do what they are attempting to do now; but be it said to their credit that they have taken up their tools again and are doing their best day by day to assist in beating an enemy who they know would dominate their lives and the lives of their children if we should lose this conflict. Is it in our medical services or our nursing services that we are doing only half a job? Has the finance department of this country failed, or have the people failed to meet the tremendous demands that have been made upon them by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in connection with the enormous amounts of money which must be raised in order to carry on this war?

I believe these are legitimate questions. It would be interesting to know in what department we have failed so dismally as to be doing only a fifty per cent job. I agree entirely with those who contend that we should never reach the point where we are perfectly satisfied with our contribution. While we have almost performed miracles in organizing the resources of this dominion, I think every member of the government will agree that we have not reached perfection. Mistakes have been made, and there is yet much to be done. I believe every member of the government will also agree when I say that this government has received splendid assistance from the great mass of the Canadian people, in all walks of life, and that if it had not been for their fine contribution Canada never could have put forth such a magnificent effort.

There is no doubt that our man-power problem is serious; we all realize that. That is so in every country involved in this war, I do not care what country you name or what sort of policy it has adopted. Sometimes we are told by our critical friends that if we had just adopted a certain policy we would not have a man-power problem. I do not know of any country, I do not care what policy it may have, at present engaged in this war which is not faced with a man-power problem. I have been bewildered at times when I hear members with one breath say that we must have more men for the army, the air force and the navy and then with the next breath denounce the government for taking men off the farms, away from lumbering operations and out of industry. I cannot follow that kind of argument.

My opinion is that this country should not be expected to contribute to the armed forces the same percentage of its population as some other countries are contributing to their armed forces. Our potential agricultural and basic production is much greater per capita than that of any other nation. I am afraid that if we contribute the same percentage of our population to the armed forces as has been contributed by some other nations, it will mean that thousands of farms will have to be abandoned. I have not heard anyone in Canada or in any of the allied countries advocating a policy of that sort.

The selective service board under the able leadership of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has a real problem on its hands. I am afraid it will have to perform miracles if it is to meet the demands that will be made upon it. In any event strict attention will have to be given to and diligent and exhaustive research made of the essential requirements if the selective service board is to be successful in making a scientific and practical distribution of our man-power. It is not an easy task that has been assigned to the Minister of Labour, and I think any hon. member put in his place would realize that within twenty-four hours. The minister has my sincere sympathy.

This job will not be done by running away from it. It is not the chap who runs away from a battle who is recognized as the hero. I represent an agricultural constituency, and I know the situation in which our people find themselves. For many years our farmers have had a tough time with the price of their products at a point below their cost of production. The result was that the young men left the farm as soon as they could find employment elsewhere. There are hundreds of 100-acre farms where the son of the family must bear most of the burden because the father, on account of either age or physical condition, is not able to do a great deal. As a rule this young man must do the marketing of the products, put in the seed, harvest the hay and grain, put in the fall wheat, attend to the threshing, harvesting the fall crops, the fall ploughing and getting in a supply of fuel for the winter. That is a real man's job. If the young man is taken off a farm like that, the father cannot be expected to give the production the farm should give. The same can be said of 200, 300 or 400-acre farms, although these need a greater amount of manpower. If we are to expect these farms to supply all the beef, pork, cheese, vegetables, fruits and everything else, we must not take away the producers. As I said before, my opinion is that Canada will not make her greatest contribution to the allied cause if these farm lads are taken off the farm, leaving many of our farms idle or partly idle.

It is all very well to talk about sending inexperienced help to aid our farmers; but speaking as one who has had practical experience in farm work, I know it is absolutely essential to have on every farm someone who is able to give a lead in the work, someone who has a thorough knowledge of the production, care and feeding of live stock; someone who has knowledge of the soil and its adaptability for producing certain crops. Such a man needs to be a mechanic, a business man and a bookkeeper all combined. Mechanized farm equipment must have careful attention if excessive repair bills are to be avoided, and that attention can be given only by operators who are familiar with their machines. It takes time and instruction to obtain this knowledge.

I am quite sure that the selective service board will take all these matters into consideration. I congratulate the government upon having placed upon the statute books legislation which provides that bona fide farm lads will be left on the farm. I wish to take this opportunity to make an appeal to the selective service board, the government and the price control board to give careful consideration to the problems which our agriculturists have to face. I am perfectly satisfied that if they will do that they will be well repaid.

I believe that every member of this house and every citizen throughout the country were well satisfied when the price control board was established. There is far too much unnecessary sniping at these men who no doubt are trying to do an honest and conscientious job. I feel sure that if some of us were put in their positions we would soon have a different viewpoint. No doubt mistakes have been made; but I do not think these attacks should be made in a way to create want of confidence in the board, in its set-up and in its intended purpose. After all, I believe it is one of the finest things the government has done, and it has been praised and copied in many other allied countries.

In closing, I ask that we give some consideration to our Prime Minister who is carrying a tremendous burden of responsibility, to our cabinet ministers and to those men on the various boards who are trying to do what I believe is an honest job.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to observe that the hon. member (Mr. Golding), in endeavouring to give credit where credit is due with regard to the war effort was ready to give the people of Canada at least a little credit instead of attributing it all to the Liberal party. Before making the remarks which I propose to make relative to the budget, I should like to take issue with a few of the statements which have been made by hon. members during this debate with respect to the policies of the group with which I am associated. As one who believes more firmly than ever in the policies and the philosophy of the Social Credit proposals, I have absolutely no objection to anyone offering criticism with regard to the genuine proposals that we are making. But that is not what is done by most of the members of this house as well as by many people outside the house. A great number of them set up a straw man and call it Social Credit. They then knock the silly nonsense down on the pretence that they are destroying the Social Credit argument. They have neither the courage nor the ability to come to grips with the real issue involved.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) yesterday made a statement about which I should like to say a few words. During the course of his address he said:

> My hon. friends of the Social Credit group would wreck the whole thing by issuing worthless paper money.

That statement is quite similar to one which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made in his address. He said:

> It seems to me that my hon. friends to my left mistake money for wealth. In other words, they mistake the shadow for the substance.

Those two statements are, I think, on all fours. The obvious implication of both of them is that the Social Credit proposals suggest the issuance of money without any relation whatsoever to wealth. I want to say for the benefit of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, if he is capable of absorbing the point, that every single, solitary dollar that goes into circulation in a Social Credit economy represents one dollar's worth of wealth—call it goods or anything else you wish. The money which would go into circulation in a Social Credit economy would be no more worthless printing-press money than the $790,000,000 of money which the government obtained from the chartered banks during the course of the last fiscal year.

May I say again for the benefit of those who have set up these straw men that social crediters do not mistake money for wealth, neither do they mistake wealth for money, and that is the mistake which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar makes, I believe, and the mistake which most of the members of this house outside the Social Credit party make. They state or imply by what they say that wealth is money. They assume that when a thousand dollars worth of goods is produced there is automatically a thousand dollars worth of money somewhere in our economic system to buy those goods; that when the farmer produces a thousand dollars worth of wheat, there is automatically somewhere a thousand dollars of money to buy that wheat; and that when a manufacturer makes an automobile worth one thousand dollars, automatically there is one thousand dollars of money to buy that automobile. We in this group have contended constantly that that is not so, and the facts are there to prove it. Examine the financial statement of any company in the "Canada Year Book," and it is apparent that the national production is always in excess of the national income. That is a point which none of those who has attempted to refute the Social Credit contention has tried to dispute. I personally should like to hear that point debated. No one yet has admitted the chronic shortage of purchasing power that exists under our economic system.

On the point of worthless money may I suggest this to the hon. member for Moose Jaw and those who think like him. I direct his attention to a remark made by my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques), when he was speaking. He said that at the present time we, the people of Canada, are paying Hitler dividends to the equivalent of at least forty dollars a month for every man, woman and child in Canada. We are making him an outright gift of that money, and we do not expect anything in return; we do not even wish anything in return. Yet the hon. member for Moose Jaw would insist that the money which is used to give Hitler a dividend is sound money. On the other hand, if we were to use the same amount of money to give ourselves a dividend to buy our own production and enrich our own lives, the hon. member would call that worthless paper money. Surely that is the inference from the statement he made yesterday. All I have to say to him is that those who resort to such arguments are being taken less and less seriously each day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They are just confusing the issue, not trying to find a solution.

Mr. KUHL: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is greatly disturbed and perturbed lest individual initiative and private enterprise be jeopardized. No doubt he is aware that the Social Credit philosophy also stands for private intiative and private enterprise. We do not believe that it is necessary to destroy a principle in order to do away with its abuses, any more than it is necessary to get rid of a motorcar just because the carburettor does not function. The point I wish to make to the hon. member for York-Sunbury as well as to the government is that the financial policies for which they stand will not permit individual initiative and private enterprise to function as they ought to. They remind me very much of a drunkard who tries to cure himself of his evil habit and who tries everything except stopping drinking. Both Liberals and Conservatives wish to preserve individual initiative and private enterprise, but they are pursuing a policy which jeopardizes and tends to destroy the very thing which they are trying to preserve. I suggest that they would be well advised to take time off to study the philosophy and the principles of Social Credit, because I believe them to be the only principles which will preserve individual initiative and private enterprise.

I come now to the budget itself. It is quite obvious that the construction of a war budget involves considerably more work than the preparation of a peace-time budget. I join in the commendation which other hon. members have expressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for the energy he has displayed in conducting Canada's financial affairs in accordance with the policies in which he believes. I agree with many of the things which he is doing to enable Canada to make a maximum war contribution. Nevertheless there are things which he is doing to which I take objection, and he is leaving undone things which I think he ought to do. I draw a clear distinction between the purpose and object of a peace-time budget as compared with a war-time budget.

I think it is self-evident that if Canada is to make a maximum war effort, all the nation's production over and above that needed to provide a standard of living sufficient for maximum efficiency should be devoted to the prosecution of the war. If Canada is to do her best, no Canadian should expect to enjoy during the war any more than a moderate standard of living. Hence I believe that, to the extent to which a war budget brings about the greatest possible equalization of income, it is a good budget; and to the extent that it fails to bring about the greatest possible equalization of income, it is a bad budget. A war budget, or for that matter any budget, which permits discrimination against certain sections of the people in the matter of income is, I consider, unjust and unfair. This budget as well as others have done a great deal to reduce higher incomes, but I believe in certain instances they have failed miserably to raise many of the lower incomes to the place where the people are enabled to make their maximum contribution to the war effort. People simply cannot do their best if they are unable to obtain a wholesome diet, sufficient clothing, adequate housing and health services. A budget which compels part of the population to live on the ragged edge of existence is not a patriotic budget. Canada cannot afford to do less than provide all her people with at least the absolute essentials of life which they require to do their best work.

Those who have paid special attention to the farmers' position with regard to their share of the national income have elaborated extensively the farmers' point of view. Consequently I will make only a passing reference to this subject. It has been pointed out repeatedly that those on the farms constitute a third of the population and yet are receiving only one-sixth of the national income. I consider that a budget, whether for war or peace, which permits a continuation of that disproportion is manifestly unfair and unjust.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Will the hon. member permit a question? I have one of his "funny money" bills here. How much will he give me for it in national currency?

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much will you take for it?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I will take one cent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right; bring it over.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Sold.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will give you two, for good measure.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Are there any higher bidders?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will give you two dollars for it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Give me two cents for it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will give you two dollars for it—just to call your bluff.

Mr. KUHL: I was indicating that a budget which did not provide for a just apportionment of the national income was not fair and just. I was about to make a point which many have suggested, that the reason the farmers are not getting a fair deal is that they are not well enough organized. Personally I cannot see that any section of the population should be obliged to apply pressure upon their elected representatives in order to obtain simple justice. I regard it as the bounden duty of the people's elected representatives to discover and remedy economic injustices. Parliament is the most extensive organization which the people of Canada support, and farmers contribute to the support of this institution as well as do all other people in the community. Consequently I cannot see why they or any other class should be obliged to make a special appeal for justice to their elected representatives. Why should any citizen or group of citizens have to beg and plead and implore the government to deal fairly with them? Why should they be obliged to heave and shove and push their elected representatives into doing things which are nothing more than their duty? I believe that the representatives of the people should be the leaders of the people, that on their own initiative they ought to seek out and solve the problems of the people. It is the duty of governments to do for the people what they are unable to do for themselves. I can see no other reason for the existence of a government. If, through reasons beyond their individual control, the aged or any others in our society, whether farmers, labourers or fishermen, are unable to help themselves, the duty of the government is to intervene and help.

It is apparent from all the statistics which have been put on record that the farmers of Canada are not receiving a compensation commensurate with their contribution to the national wealth. I suggest in all sincerity that this government can guarantee and pay them a dollar and a half a bushel for their wheat. It can do so just as easily as it can pay ninety cents, and without increased taxation or borrowing. The government can also guarantee and pay subsidies to farmers in respect of every product for which they are not getting the cost of production, in order to raise their incomes to where they ought to be. If the government does anything less, it is not doing its duty.

The same reasoning holds true with regard to pensions for the aged, the blind, and others who are unable to take care of themselves. This government could pay an old age pension of fifty dollars a month just as easily as the present miserable and niggardly pittance of ten to twenty dollars, and—again—without increased taxation or borrowing. Members of parliament ought to hang their heads in shame at the manner in which the aged and the unfortunate in this country are dealt with.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Non-pensioned war widows, for example.

Mr. KUHL: If Canada were a desert or semi-desert there might be some excuse for dealing with them in this fashion. But our country is capable of producing not only abundance but superabundance. I say that in dealing with these people the attitude constantly adopted is to beat down their just desserts and to give them just as little as can be got away with. What we ought to do is to err on the side of generosity, rather than the reverse.

Another point in connection with pensions is this: I believe every aged person, not at seventy years but at least at sixty-five should receive his pension automatically, whether he be rich or poor, and without any application. That is part of the cultural and national heritage to which the aged are entitled, simply by reason of their citizenship in this wonderful country. I say, therefore, that although there has been much equalization of income, there are still many in the lower brackets whose incomes should be raised, before we can say there is the greatest possible equality of sacrifice. Just so long as that position obtains, I believe our war effort will be impaired.

There are many of the older generation, registered as unemployables, who would like to contribute each day an hour or a couple of hours of work of some kind, in order to make their contribution to the war effort. But on account of their meagre incomes they are unable to do so. They cannot avail themselves of the necessary health services, with the result that we are losing that much energy which could be directed toward our war effort if those incomes were raised to what they ought to be.

I have some further criticisms respecting the budget, and I believe these apply to a peace-time budget equally as well as to one brought down in war time. I contend that a budget proper should set forth in financial terms all that has taken place in physical terms. This budget does not do so. A budget proper should be a complete financial reflection of the physical realities of the nation. This budget is not such. A budget proper should not represent the creation of new and additional real wealth as a national liability. This budget does so. A budget proper should represent the production of all new real wealth as a national asset. This budget does not do so. A budget proper should not indicate that a nation is headed for financial bankruptcy, when it has greater real wealth producing powers than ever before in its history. This budget does so.

Both the Minister of Finance and the deputy minister have asserted that the real costs of the war are the men and materials, and that such costs must be borne by the generation fighting the war. I agree entirely with that position. But the point I make is that the minister's confession of faith, and his works, do not harmonize. The budget brought down by the minister is not a reflection of the real facts in his possession. In physical terms the armed forces and workers in munitions factories, the miners, lumbermen, fishermen and bank clerks, and all others, have met all the real costs of the war. On the other hand, the budget is not a reflection of that fact.

When we examine the budget we see that our national debt is to be increased to the extent of about two and a quarter billion dollars. That increase in national debt suggests that the people of Canada are not paying for the war as it is being fought. Speaking in Montreal, as recorded by the Financial Post, the deputy minister of finance, Dr. Clark, made the statement that by no financial sleight-of-hand can we pass on the burden of war to oncoming generations. But is that not exactly what is being done in the budget? The point I make is that either the minister's statements are wrong, or the budget policy is wrong. They cannot both be right, because one is a contradiction of the other. If the minister's statements are correct, then the budget policy is wrong. My personal belief is that the minister's statements are correct, and that the budget policy is wrong.

I contend that war debt is a positively false situation. War debt in a country with the wealth producing power of Canada is pure fiction. Canada has no real war debt. The only reason why the budget indicates that the people of Canada have a war debt arises from the fact that the government is pursuing an upside-down financial policy. It is a policy which conceals, rather than reveals facts.

I should like to make some remarks respecting the manner in which bond sales campaigns are conducted. I have several objections to the manner in which these sales are made. I was both shocked and amazed when I heard a statement made by those speaking on behalf of the workers who took part in the last victory loan campaign. I did not imagine that any responsible individual could make a statement so far from the truth. This is the question I heard asked over the air, one for which I have no doubt the war finance committee is responsible: "How would you like to fight Hitler without leaving your comfortable fireside?" I contend that a statement of that kind is not only false but actually subversive of the war effort. It fosters a false psychology in the minds of our people. It suggests that the purchaser of a bond is making a contribution almost equivalent to that made by the soldier, the sailor or the airman in the thick of the fight. It suggests that the purchaser of a bond is rendering a service equivalent to that of the individual who machines a gun barrel. I I object strenuously to that type of propaganda. The only way in which anyone can fight Hitler is by donning battle dress, shouldering a gun and participating in the actual conflict. To suggest that the purchaser of a gilt-edged revenue-bearing asset is making a sacrifice comparable with that of a soldier, sailor or airman is to be guilty of the basest blasphemy.

Another objection I take to the manner in which these campaigns are handled and the things that are said is that the people are led by the propaganda to believe that the government needs this money for the purchase of guns, planes, tanks and ships and other war material. In fact they are led to believe that the actual money produces the weapons. I have here a page from the Financial Post which bears out that point. This is an advertisement which came out during the last victory loan campaign. It says:

> What our $750 millions will do.
> Build 2,208 ram tanks for the army.
> Build 55 corvettes for the navy.
> Build 397 Lancasters for Britain.

I say that is giving an entirely false impression of the objects of a loan campaign. The minister has stated again and again that the object of the sale of bonds, war savings certificates and stamps is not primarily to raise money to buy ships and tanks and guns and munitions; that its major purpose, if not its only purpose, is to curtail civilian spending, to reduce the pressure on the purchase of civilian goods in order that more materials may be directed toward the war. If that is the true position; if that is the real object of the sale of bonds, I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he see to it that no other impression goes abroad among our people.

Another point I should like to make—it has been made already in previous debates by one of my colleagues—is with regard to paying interest on bonds, war savings certificates and stamps. If the primary, if not the only purpose of the sale of these bonds and certificates is to curtail civilian spending, then this money which is involved in their purchase constitutes savings. And I believe that if the people are to be permitted to make savings out of their war earnings they should do so at their own expense. Instead of the government paying the people interest on their savings, the people should be obliged to pay the government a service charge for handling their accounts for them during the war. The reason why the people expect interest on their bonds and savings certificates is that they have been led to believe that the government needs their money to buy tanks and guns and ships, whereas the fact is that as far as securing the money is concerned, if the government chose and wished to do so, the government could create in one minute sufficient money to run this war for the next hundred years. The extent of the money the government created would be simply a matter of the number of naughts they added to the first digit on the credit side of the ledger. In saying that, I am not implying that ships and tanks and guns can be manufactured overnight, but certainly the procuring of the money is the simplest thing in the world; it is nothing but bookkeeping entries.

Another point I should like to make in regard to taking money from the people in order to curtail civilian spending is that the present method through the sale of bonds, war savings certificates and stamps is extremely wasteful of materials and energy, if the primary purpose is to deprive the people temporarily of their spending power. The printing of those bonds involves skilled workmanship and high-class paper. That work and material is absolutely unnecessary. During these bond campaigns salesmen by the hundreds are spending their time urging the people to invest. This labour could be saved; these people could be far better employed behind a lathe machining gun barrels or something of that kind. That would constitute a real contribution. The same thing applies to advertising; the tremendous radio and newspaper and other advertising programmes are a waste of time, energy and material.

Another objection I have to the present policy is that because all people are unable to purchase bonds and certificates to the extent they would like, it places the majority of the people of Canada in pawn to about fifteen per cent of the people of Canada. The majority become bond-slaves forever to the few.

So much for my criticisms as to the present methods of taking from the people their surplus purchasing power. Let me now say a few words in connection with the sale of bonds to the chartered banks for the purpose of obtaining money. The objectionable features of the present method of handling bonds are bad enough, but those with regard to bank borrowings are infinitely worse. I would not object so seriously if the banks bought these bonds out of their earnings, but they do not. The $790,000,000 of bonds that were purchased by the chartered banks during the last financial year were purchased with money which they themselves created for themselves at no cost to themselves and without assuming any responsibility. The money which the government raised from the chartered banks to the extent of $790,000,000 last year was brand new money. It was purely bookkeeping entries, but brand new money nevertheless, additional to what was already in existence. My contention is that the right and privilege of creating this money is a crown prerogative; it is the highest prerogative that the crown can enjoy, namely, creating the money of the nation. But as a result of government policy, $790,000,000 at least was created last year by private institutions, and the people as a whole placed in pawn to the banking institutions. Mr. Barclay Smith, an Australian writer, in a book entitled "Victory Without Debt" has this to say on that point:

> It is infamous beyond words that private banks should have the power to make profits in perpetuity out of creating credit, when the government has full power to create its own monetary requirements without borrowing and taxing.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) this afternoon with regard to the coming victory loan; and I wish to assure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that as far as the section of Ontario from which I come is concerned, as in all other campaigns it will raise its share of the loan, just as already it has contributed its share during the current campaign for funds for the Red Cross.

In the debate on Tuesday concerning the fuel situation a great deal was said about the question of man-power, and I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) a matter in that connection which seriously affects eastern Ontario. I wish to quote from an article appearing in the Belleville Intelligencer of March 10, under the heading "Government officials to meet Ontario cheese men in city to discuss present shortage of factory help":

> Of 342 cheese factories in Ontario which replied to questionnaires sent out by the eastern, central and western Ontario cheese makers' associations within the past few days, 257 reported that they were in need of immediate help if the requested 1943 increased cheese production is to be achieved. . . . At a recent meeting, officials of the three associations endorsed a resolution recommending the sending of an official delegation to Ottawa to seek immediate alleviation of the labour problem. . . . In all, it was stated, the factories required 309 experienced men immediately if operations, which usually start between April 15 and May 1, are to get away on time.

Belleville is the centre of the cheese industry in eastern Ontario.

Last session I brought to the attention of the then Minister of National War Services, whose department at that time was administering the call up of men for the armed forces, the seriousness of the situation resulting from calling up experienced cheese makers and helpers for military service, but apparently nothing was done, since the divisional registrars continued to call up these men. Only a short time ago a cheese maker in my county came to me in regard to two of his experienced helpers who had been called up for training. With the time approaching for the opening of his factory, which would produce from 150,000 to 175,000 pounds of cheese per annum, he was confronted with the situation that he had no help. As everyone knows, the farmers have been requested to increase to a great extent their cheese production during 1943, and the average farmer has made provision to do so. It seems most unfortunate that at this time of year, when the factories are ready to open, we should find a most serious shortage of these skilled men, and I sincerely trust that the delegation which is to see the minister will be able to discover some way to remedy this situation.

In a return brought down in this house on March 15 last, sessional paper No. 139B, there are set out the enlistments in the armed forces up to January 31, 1943. An examination of this report shows clearly the farce of the term "equality of service and sacrifice" as applied across Canada. I should like to place on Hansard the figures showing by military districts the male population between the ages of nineteen and forty-five, and the number of enlistments:

	Male population 19-45	Enlistments
M.D. 1—London	147,800	32,649
M.D. 2—Toronto	408,700	95,596
M.D. 3—Kingston ...	150,000	42,144
M.D. 4—Montreal ...	423,800	50,654
M.D. 5—Quebec	214,300	17,403
M.D. 6—Halifax	118,200	35,226
M.D. 7—Saint John.	80,300	23,220
M.D. 10—Winnipeg ..	179,700	37,326
M.D. 11—Victoria	155,100	35,855
M.D. 12—Regina	177,200	31,602
M.D. 13—Calgary	160,700	34,983
		436,658

An examination of this return will clearly show that there is no equality of service spread evenly across Canada, and will show the heavy load some districts are bearing in comparison with others as far as voluntary enlistments are concerned. In the last issue of "Canada at War", at page 39 under the heading of "man-power" I note the following statement:

> Approximately 33 per cent of all male Canadians between the ages of 19 and 45 have enlisted in the armed services.

How much better it would have been to point out that in eight provinces of Canada the enlistments were well over thirty-three per cent, but that in Quebec, the ninth province, they ran somewhere between ten and fifteen per cent. In my opinion this condition can be corrected only by the introduction of a fair and just system of selective military service applied in the same manner and degree to all parts of Canada. On other occasions I have advocated the same policy in the house. I did so as far back as June, 1940. At that time one was almost guilty of treason or liable to be charged under the defence of Canada regulations if he made such a suggestion. Then, as now, it was claimed that the introduction of such a system would destroy national unity, but I for one could never understand why a fair and proper distribution of man-power to be called up for military service across the whole dominion should interfere with or destroy our national unity. The National Resources Mobilization Act has been a farce from the start. On February 26, 1943, replying to a question asked in the house, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that he had not changed his mind in any way about the amendment to this act passed at the last session, and that before the act could be put into force it would be necessary to come back to this house for a vote of confidence or want of confidence in the government. What a man-power policy to have in the fourth year of the war! What a farce the plebiscite turned out to be. With the zero hour for the invasion of Europe drawing closer every day, we have not as yet adopted a proper man-power policy.

With regard to the matter of reinforcements for our forces overseas I think all members of the house will await with interest the secret session at which I trust the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will take us all into his confidence and tell us quite frankly the whole story of our reinforcements for overseas. Dieppe showed casualties of some sixty-seven per cent of those taking part, so that it will be most interesting to hear from the Minister of National Defence the details of the provisions that have been made for providing reinforcements for our troops now in Great Britain.

Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) showed that the army was not receiving the proper number of reinforcements month by month. He based his remarks upon the official return No. 139B, which I now hold in my hand, and other figures contained in the booklet "Canada at War". The Minister of National Defence disputed the correctness of his figures, but he gave no explanation as to how the mistakes had occurred. I should like to point out to the Minister of National Defence that the error mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Lake Centre is not the only one.

If hon. members will look at page 14 of the January issue of "Canada at War", they will see under the heading "army" that the number of soldiers in the active army in Canada is given as 210,000. Yet this return shows the total number of men by military districts, attested for service anywhere but now serving in Canada, as 149,000 as of January 2, 1943. This is a mere difference of 61,000 men. On the same page of the January issue of "Canada at War" the number of men in the reserve army is shown as 200,000; yet in this return it is stated that the total number of men by military districts who were serving with the reserve army as of December 31, 1942, is 106,000. This is another slight difference of only 94,000 men. I assume that in the figure of 106,000, being the total number of men serving in the reserve army, is included the 60,000 to 70,000 men who received training for only one month.

The March issue of "Canada at War", which is just off the press, gives on page 14 the strength of the active army as 430,000; yet yesterday the Minister of National Defence pointed out that, according to the return brought down the strength of the army was 437,203; he gave the enlistments for January, 1943, as 11,631, and for February, 8,927, making a total of 457,761. This is another small difference of 27,761.

I do not suggest that the figures given by the minister are wrong, but it seems peculiar that when the ordinary private member is able to obtain information only from returns such as this and from official government publications such as "Canada at War", he should find these great discrepancies. "Canada at War" is issued by the wartime information board, a department of this government. It is only fair to assume that these officials have access to proper sources of information. Perhaps "Canada at War" is issued only for political propaganda purposes; I do not know. This return shows that up to January 31 of this year the number of men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act was 114,641. I think I am quite safe in saying that to secure this number of men, at least 900,000 notices would have to be sent out.

An examination of the table of enlistments on page 22 of the February issue of "Canada at War" shows that the call up of men under the National Resources Mobilization Act is not carried out on a proper percentage basis according to population. Let me take military district No. 1 at London as an example. This district has a population of 147,800, and it has supplied by voluntary enlistments a total of 32,378 men for the army. From this district there were called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act a total of 8,533. Compare these figures with those of military district No. 5 at Quebec, with a male population of 214,300. The increase in population over the other district is 66,500. Military district No. 5 at Quebec supplied 17,492 men for the army, which is considerably less than half the number supplied by military district No. 1 at London. Military district No. 5 has supplied only 8,874 men under the National Resources Mobilization Act. These figures can be compared with those of other districts and the same condition will be found to exist.

[Mr. White.]

I realize that the Minister of National Defence is not responsible in any way for the calling up of these men, but I think the time has come when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) should tell this house and the public of Canada the plan or the scheme or the method used in his department in calling up men under the National Resources Mobilization Act. When the appropriation bill was before the house at the last session I attempted to secure from the then Minister of National War Services information as to what plan he operated under, but all that he could say was that the calling up of these men was fairly administered. I submit that the proper answer is to be found in this table put out by the government in the publication "Canada at War", in its February issue, which clearly shows that under the National Resources Mobilization Act far more men were called up from one district than were called up from another.

The time has come for the Minister of Labour to tell us exactly how if, say, 10,000 men are required to be called up in March under the National Resources Mobilization Act, they are allotted according to military districts across Canada. Does he consider calling up according to population, those between the ages of nineteen and forty-five? Does he consider the number of men who already have enlisted voluntarily from certain districts in the army, navy or air force? Or, what plan is it that he follows? I hope that either to-day or very soon the Minister of Labour will make a clear-cut statement to the house so that everybody will know what system is to be followed in the calling up of men under the National Resources Mobilization Act. I repeat, that only by the adoption of a fair and just system of national selective service under which men will be called up in a fair distribution across the whole of this dominion, irrespective of occupation, race, creed or anything else, can we cure the present situation. After all, why should one section of this country supply a far larger number of reinforcements than any other section? To-day eight provinces in Canada are more than doing their fair share, both in voluntary enlistments and in supplying men under the National Resources Mobilization Act. The province of Quebec is far behind the other provinces in the number of men who have enlisted voluntarily and in the number of men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Yet there are men in this house who will talk day after day about equality of sacrifice and equality of service. But if anyone dares to suggest that Quebec lags behind, the old bogey of national unity is trotted out again.

Why must the eight other provinces submerge their interests in favour of the province of Quebec?

Press releases show that under the National Resources Mobilization Act the draft dodgers run well into hundreds of thousands; yet, according to the press fewer than three or four hundred of them have been located and prosecuted. Under such a system, how can the people of this country who have sons overseas be expected to be satisfied with or have any confidence in such a half-hearted slipshod method of administering the law of Canada? The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has on various occasions been prompt and alert to act when there have been alleged contraventions of the defence of Canada regulations. Perhaps he might as well devote some of his time to administering in a proper, just and fair manner the regulations under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

A short time ago there appeared in the press of Canada an announcement that high-school students would again be allowed to leave school early in the summer term to engage in farm work and in industries connected with the war effort, and that any such student who worked for thirteen weeks would be granted his standing for the year, subject to the recommendation of his teacher or the principal of the school. I have no quarrel or complaint with that. But I .would point out that on March 8, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) issued a statement in which he reviewed the educational qualifications of some 347,900 men in the armed forces. The statement showed that of that number the largest group, 102,892, were those in the junior matriculation class; those who had obtained their junior matriculation numbered 31,648; and those having their senior matriculation, 1,120. But the strange thing is that young men in the province of Ontario who join the armed forces in their matriculation year are not granted their standing for that year. Surely some plan could be worked out with the provincial educational authorities whereby any boy in his matriculation year who joins the armed forces would be granted his educational standing for that year. Many hon. members will recall what happened at the end of the last war when the boys came home. Hundreds of them who had not obtained their junior or senior matriculation were prevented from going on and undertaking university or other courses.

In the estimates for the present year, under the Department of Pensions and National Health there is an item of $400,000 for pensions to be awarded to widows of deceased soldiers, such pensions to be awarded on compassionate grounds. I would point out to the minister of pensions that while this is very commendable it merely touches the fringe of the whole question of pensions to widows of soldiers. As hon. members are aware, on the death of a soldier whose disability is fifty per cent or over, his widow continues to receive a pension. But on the death of a soldier having a disability of less than fifty per cent his widow receives no further pension. Take the case of a soldier with a wife, and receiving a monthly pension of $30 a month. Of that amount $20 is the pension awarded to the husband, and $10 is the amount payable because he is a married man. On the death of that soldier his widow does not continue to receive the $10 that had been paid on her account; she receives absolutely nothing. I suggest to the minister that since his department has recognized the principle that the widow of a soldier with a disability of fifty per cent or more is entitled to pension, surely the same principle should be applied to all soldiers whether their disability is five, forty-five or sixty-five per cent. I sincerely hope the minister will give that suggestion very serious consideration and do something about it.

In conclusion, I wish to refer briefly to some of the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) in dealing with the declaration made in this house by the present leader of the socialist party at the short session in December, 1939, when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) placed on Hansard the policy of his party. While the member for York-Sunbury was speaking this afternoon he was interrupted by various members of the socialist party who stated that there were several statements on record showing that they had repudiated that stand. But let me point out that during last session, when bill No. 80 was introduced to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, after a very long debate, when the vote was taken, every member of the socialistic party, for reasons known only to themselves, voted against that bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We also moved an amendment calling for complete conscription of everything.

Mr. WHITE: Just a moment. Does that not clearly indicate that the socialistic party have not changed their views or their stand in any way as enunciated in September, 1939?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It proves nothing of the sort.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) can speak afterwards. In voting against bill No. 80 and in taking the stand which they did, they showed to everyone in Canada that they were not in favour of supplying reinforcements and everything else necessary to the boys overseas.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WHITE: There is no point of order, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER: It is just a statement of fact.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member is making a statement which is not at all in accordance with the facts. He states that this group have taken a stand indicating that they are not in favour of sending reinforcements to the men overseas.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. member is making a speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no point of order there.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I contend that the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough has no right to make such a statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is just a matter of argument. I see no point of order in the contention of the hon. member for Weyburn.

Mr. WHITE: I repeat that the socialistic party, in taking the stand which they did in the vote on bill No. 80, voted against the sending of men overseas to support the troops there. I have always contended that when this parliament decided to send an expeditionary force overseas there was an obligation not only on every member of this house but on every citizen of Canada that these boys must be supported with all necessary reinforcements, the finest implements of war, and everything else necessary, no matter what the cost might be.

I should also like to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury when he advocated a policy of private enterprise and personal initiative. It seems to me that only under such a policy is there any hope for our children or for the boys when they return from overseas. The men who serve in this war will have had enough of regulation and regimentation, and will be only too anxious to regulate their own affairs. It is quite true that the controls we have to-day are irritating, but they are absolutely nothing compared with the controls and regimentation to which we would be subject under a socialistic party. Freedom, absolute freedom, is one of the things for which our boys are fighting to-day. We have in Germany an example of what happens in a socialistic state. There, instead of the state being subject to the will of the people, everyone was absolutely subject to regimentation and dictation by the state. I suggest that under the programme suggested by the socialistic party, whereby they would do away with private enterprise, there would be taken away from the youth of this country one of the biggest assets which youth has, namely, the ambition to succeed, to carve out a career for themselves, the right of each one to earn his own living under his own direction and to retain what he honestly earns and acquires, after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has taken his share. Take away this ambition to succeed and to carve out a career from the youth of this country, and you destroy one of the greatest assets youth has.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): I hope that the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough will not expect me to follow him in what seems to me was a rather distorted and inconsistent attitude in certain portions of his address. I desire at the outset to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for his great industry, loyalty, and devotion to duty. I intend to say very little about the budget, which is probably the greatest operation in the sphere of finance which Canada has ever known, but I am sure the people are grateful for having, in the person of the present minister, a man capable of doing the job. There is one matter in the budget to which I wish to refer, but the statements I intend to make are entirely upon my own responsibility. I refer to the allusions to the farmers and the income tax. The minister and his advisers have honestly, no doubt, attempted to meet the situation of the farmers, not realizing, I am sure, the position they hold in the national economy. The minister stated, as reported at page 849 of Hansard:

> It will be difficult to put farmers on a pay-as-we-earn basis because it is so very hard for them to estimate their income in advance. We are proposing to give them as much latitude as possible by simply requiring them to pay two-thirds of their tax any time up to December 31 —on the basis of a rough guess or calculation— and the balance when they file their final return in March of the following year. Higher agricultural incomes have now brought many farmers into the taxable income ranges, and I am glad to know that the Department of National Revenue is making special efforts to assist the farmer in reckoning his income and calculating his tax.

I pause here to point out that the farmer is the greatest income taxpayer in Canada. He pays a much larger income tax, because it is collected indirectly, than, probably, any other class. Let me give the house a living case in point. In my home town, with a population of five thousand, along with the rural municipality of the same name, in the last victory loan drive there were subscribed just under $300,000. The town of Dauphin is simply a large rural service station. We do not export anything, except a little electric power to some of the country districts surrounding the town. The town has grown to the size it has because it is in the centre of a very rich farming district. Of the $300,000 subscribed, only one-sixth came from the rural municipality; the remaining five-sixths came from the town. Who paid the remaining five-sixths? The town has no particular association with the outside world, no exports, so that the farmers paid every dollar of the $300,000; there is no argument about that.

I believe it was the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) who drew a comparison the other day between Saskatchewan and the city of Toronto. He pointed out that $10 per capita was asked from Saskatchewan, and I understand it was $259 per capita from Toronto. He pointed this out as evidence of what he thought was poverty in his province. Apparently he was not aware that Saskatchewan not only had to pay a good share of the income taxes of Toronto and all other industrial cities in Canada, but had to pay as well the income taxes of Saskatoon, Regina and other urban centres of that province. So that when the farmer got through paying the indirect income tax there was nothing left for my good friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson).

During the last victory loan campaign I was in charge of a good portion of the rural municipalities, and I was surprised to find that farmers who, I thought, should have been good for the purchase of at least a $1,000 bond would and could purchase only a $50 bond. They would tell me where the rest of the money had gone. It had gone to the indirect road, the purchase of supplies. That is true of the farmer throughout Canada as a whole.

Dealing with this matter the minister went on to say, as reported at the same page of Hansard:

> After some careful consideration of the special problems faced by farmers in regard to income tax, I am proposing another special measure to assist them in overcoming the extreme variation in income to which they are frequently subject because of weather and other changes.

He might have said that changes in government, too, sometimes affect the income of the farmer. He continued:

> Last year, the house approved a change in the income tax law enabling any business to carry forward a loss suffered in 1942 or any later year as a charge against profits in the following year. We propose now to enable a loss to be carried forward two years in the case of farmers—so that if a farmer suffered loss during 1942 he can charge that against the income from his farm during either 1943 or 1944.

After the minister made that statement I obtained a schedule from the bureau of statistics showing what the income tax of farmers had been in the past ten years, and also showing what their economic income had been. In 1931 the average income received by farmers in Canada was $353. I pause to inform the house that that was not the low year. In 1932 it dropped to $303.

In 1941 the income had risen to $1,067, or almost three and a half times as much. The point I make is that we cannot apply an equitable plan to farmers by simply taking two years; we must take at least ten. The average income for the farmers of Canada between 1931 and 1941 was just $710. The suggestion I wish to make to the Minister of Finance is that in view of the fact that the farmer is, indirectly, a very large income taxpayer, he should be eliminated entirely from the operation of the income tax act. It does not mean anything so far as he is concerned. In what is supposed to be the best year in those ten, namely 1941, the farmers paid only $204,319, or a matter of a few cents each, about enough to buy one good dinner away from home. Therefore I cannot believe that the tax collected amounts to much more than the amount paid for paper and the cost of administration. The minister would be well advised not to worry the farmer, because it is an annoyance to him. He is not a business man; he does not keep books, and it is a real trial for him to make out the income tax return.

I should like to pass along to another phase of the same schedule. Before proceeding further, however, may I say something I had intended to say last year when I spoke in the budget debate. I wish to compliment the Minister of Finance upon having discovered—and I think it was a discovery—the most effective system of wealth conscription that perhaps the world has ever known. I notice our hon. friends in the socialist group do not say anything more about wealth conscription. All my life I have held the view that it was morally wrong to conscript flesh and blood, and allow the more material things to go scot-free. During the last election campaign I opposed conscription. I voiced my opposition throughout my constituency, and said I was doing so on my own responsibility. But had the Prime Minister and the government been in favour of conscription, I would still have been against it. Why? Not that I was against conscription as a principle; but I was irrevocably opposed to the conscription of flesh and blood while at the same time more material things were allowed to be given voluntarily, or when the people felt like doing so. We had an example during the last war, when a flock of millionaires were created out of war profits. I have been told that 138 millionaires were created during the last war, and in one or two of the post-war years. Whether that figure is correct, I cannot say; but we know that enormous profits were made.

We had that example, and the only one we had. Consequently I was opposed to conscription, until I knew something more about what was to be done by the government of Canada. I am now grateful to the government, particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance, for the extent to which they have gone in conscripting wealth. Now that it has reached into the pockets of members of parliament; now that the income tax collector gets $800 or $900 from each of us, the argument is pretty well closed, so far as members are concerned.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I draw the hon. member's attention to the amendment moved at this session by the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation to the motion for an address in reply at this session, deploring the fact that the government has not conscripted wealth.

Mr. WARD: "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is true.

Mr. WARD: If from eleven and a half million people the treasury can step up the revenue by nearly two billions of dollars in three years, then I think that is conscripting wealth with a vengeance. I cannot imagine any system of conscription my hon. friend would put into effect, involving the taking over of factories, farms, mines and all the rest, which would leave behind it anything but chaos and liabilities, whereas the system we now have leaves behind it great assets.

I turn now to a statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), as reported in the press on January 23. This is the report of a broadcast delivered at the time of the steel strike, at which time the hon. member said that the arbitrary price and wage freezing policy adopted in this country decrees that men employed in that arduous and hazardous occupation should work for a wage that is demonstrably too low. I wonder if the hon. member has ever visited any of those steel mills. I have, on several occasions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And so has he.

Mr. WARD: I have been through several of the larger Canadian steel mills, and so far as arduous labour is concerned—well, yesterday we were talking about cutting wood—a good wood chopper will cut about two cords of wood a day. A man who cuts and piles two cords of cordwood a day does at least four times as much work as any man I saw working in any steel mill I visited. There is no comparison. The work in a steel mill is not arduous; I saw nothing arduous about it. And the hon. member says it is hazardous. I was indeed struck by the perfect lighting of the buildings, and the almost perfect atmosphere of the place.

Then he went on to speak of the wages being low. What were the wages paid in those steel mills where the men were on strike? The payroll average—nothing to do with salaries to foremen or managers—was eighty-one cents an hour. I do not call that low pay. If I could have my wages frozen at eighty-one cents an hour for the rest of my life I should consider I was fairly lucky.

Then he went on to say that war planning and post-war policies were two parts of the same fight for victory, and that we are indeed building the post-war world now by the way in which we organize the war. I want the house to get this, because it shocked me. He said:

> What can these men think of a war effort that does not hesitate to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to assist private industry?

He stops there. The hon. member knew just as well as I do that a meaner form of misrepresentation than that statement could not possibly have been made. Does he not know that war is expediency from the very battlefield where a general organizes his army to meet the enemy right back to the uttermost channel of our war effort? Truly the government are helping the industries. What for? To help our war effort. Helping them to build larger plants, to remodel their plants, to put in new machinery and tools and the myriad things that go to make up our war effort. Of course the government have helped, to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars. But they have not given it to private industry, as the hon. member would have us believe.

I should now like to come back to this table which I got from the bureau of statistics. One of the first things I did when I came here was to call up the bureau to get the average rate of pay in all the steel mills of Canada including the three where the men were then on strike. I obtained from the bureau the rate of wages paid in those three mills. I expected, of course, to find that the pay there was quite low. But that was not so; it was almost exactly on the level of the mill at Hamilton and the other mills throughout Canada. What is the fact? The average wage is $34.79 a week, or $1,809 a year, which is more than double what the average farmer in Canada receives, and this has been his best year. The shipyards of Canada are paying an average of $38.78 a week or $2,016 a year, which is about two and a half times the income of the average farmer. Aircraft factories are paying $35.50 a week, or $1,846 a year, which is again, more than double that earned by the average farmer.

I pause here to suggest to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Weyburn that they go out and tell their farmer friends that they have been damning the government because they did not rush to the rescue of a group of striking men who were in receipt of an average of eighty-one cents an hour.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Will the hon. member permit a question? Has he also the average salary paid to the operators and owners?

Mr. WARD: I will now come to the hon. member for York South. Speaking in the debate here a short time ago, the hon. member said:

> There is a second feature of the government's fiscal policy with which we are in disagreement, namely, the level at which the government has found it necessary to freeze wages.

I simply repeat what I have already said; that if I could have my wages frozen at eighty-one cents an hour for the rest of my life I should consider myself secure for life. I think the men in the industrial organizations of Canada are the highest paid, except perhaps for the few in the United States, of any such employees in the world. It is time we recognized the fact that our industrial organizations are doing well by their employees.

I pause here to say that I noticed the other day where Mr. Mosher made a remark that soon the unions would have the employers of Canada under their heel. Well, for years I talked about banks, mortgage companies, steel trusts and the like as being autocratic organizations that ruled the roost. But these people all had an investment in Canada; they had something to protect, something to guard.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Have not the workers?

Mr. WARD: Yes, they have their job to guard, but they do not guard it very well. I think we are just as safe under the heel of some of the steelmakers as we would be under the heel of an organized group of labourers who have no investment in the country. It seems to me we should be very cautious what we do in this regard. Labour unions are going much too far. I say to the government, that had I been the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister when the steel strike took place, illegal as it was—there was really no difference between that strike and a great system of stealing; it was against the law of the land. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and, I suppose, the rest of his followers aided and abetted this illegal act on the part of these strikers. Had I been the government I would have given these men just twenty-four hours to be back on the job, and if they were not back I would have had a uniform there for every man the next morning. I would have said, You will either put on the uniform and go into the army at $1.50 a day the same as the other soldiers, or you will go back to work. There might have been a few heart failures, because men producing steel products, the all-important product in the winning of the war, going on strike in the middle of the war when they were getting eighty-one cents an hour, are too cowardly to fight, to go to war. Of course they are. There would have been a few heart failures and likely deaths. I think the Minister of Labour and the government showed wonderful patience and consideration for these men, and I hope there will be no more strikes during the period of this war.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the hon. member a question? Did he offer a uniform to the manufacturers of this country in 1939 when they refused to manufacture war materials unless they got more than five per cent profit?

Mr. WARD: I am not discussing that. I am not a manufacturer; I know nothing about the business, but I did have the privilege of discussing this whole question with a man who I think was perfectly honest. He is the manager of one of the largest concerns in Canada producing munitions of war. I said, "Why did you men refuse to accept war contracts on a five per cent basis?" He said, "We would all have been in the poor-house; we could not have lived." I asked why. He replied, "If you knew the government inspectors and the extent to which they reject material, you would understand that by the time they get through, our five per cent would be all gone. We are not making any money even at ten per cent." I am only repeating what this gentleman said; I am not arguing the point, because I do not think it is pertinent to the discussion at the moment. But I think those men who are getting the wages now being paid in the industries of Canada should at least remain on the job until the war is over.

I was amazed the other day to hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the socialist group, repudiate the idea that he was a socialist or that he had any interest in collective ownership. I thought my hearing was fairly good, but after listening to the speeches that have been delivered by his followers I could hardly credit my ears. However, I thought I remembered a statement made by the hon. gentleman himself not long before which was rather incriminating. I looked it up, and here is what he had to say, as reported at page 1109 of Hansard:

> However, the unfortunate factor is that in normal times the main stimulus to economic activity is not defence of the nation or the good of the community, but the making of profit.

We all know that he and his followers did not have a great deal of interest in the good of the community a few years ago, when we were struggling to lay the foundation for a war industry in this country. He continued:

> To my mind that motive is wrong, but it is the motive which sets the wheels of industry in motion and keeps them running.

A little later he said:

> The interest of the people is sacrificed in such times by non-government intervention—

Well Mr. Speaker that is the kind of government I want; I do not want the government to interfere with me. I want to carry on my farming enterprise according to my own good or bad judgment. He continued:

> —but that is the price we pay for free enterprise.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there are only two systems, not half a dozen. You must have either collective ownership, which is socialism, or private ownership. He continued:

> We take the position that in any proper form of society human needs ought to come first and that the making of profit ought to be a purely secondary consideration. . . .

Let me go back to my own farm and my neighbour's farm. I shall be perfectly frank and tell my hon. friends that I farm, first, to make a living for myself and my family, second, because I like farming, and, third, for profit, just as every other farmer farms for profit. I thought the late Hon. Norman Rogers put the whole case very well during the last session that brilliant gentleman was with us, when he said, "Yes, as a professor of economics I am socialistically inclined, but as I look around Canada and see the extent to which free enterprise has developed this country, and the progress it has made, I cannot believe that this country would become socialist-minded in less than two hundred years." I think he was about right. My hon. friend can put that in his pipe and smoke it. Let him go back home and think that over.

May I now come to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and see what he thinks of collective ownership. As reported at page 164 of Hansard he said:

> For the past two or three months these newspapers have consistently referred to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation not as such but as the "socialist party." The socialist party is, of course, a left wing movement, and the Liberal party is a right wing movement, and therefore the Progressive Conservative party is going to get in the centre with a sound and sensible programme for the people of Canada.

He was worrying about that. A little later on he said:

> For at least twenty-five years I have had some knowledge of the different labour parties across Canada, from British Columbia to Nova Scotia.

I imagine he knows more about Ontario now, since I believe he spent most of last summer in this province. He continued—

> I know that in 1932 they came to the realization that there was no solution for our problems in the provincial fields, and consequently men and women who were active over that period of time met in Calgary and examined the problem on a national basis and set up a national organization, because our problems are national and not provincial.

That was where the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, a socialist party, was born. All through the speech there is this talk of socialism. He went on to say yes, that he was a socialist; he made no bones about it. That is the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

I come now to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), who said, as reported at page 510 of Hansard:

> Therefore we believe that for anyone to talk, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) did yesterday about social security on the one hand and retaining free enterprise on the other is a contradiction in terms, because rugged individualism has never produced for our generation anything but ragged individuals on the one hand and people wallowing in wealth on the other.

I want to remind the hon. member that the farmers of his own province believe in rugged individualism, and if they are ragged it is because nature has been unkind or because they are unkind to themselves. Then he goes on, and his speech becomes even more interesting. He said:

It is time we realized that to talk glibly—

Imagine the hon. member for Weyburn blaming anyone for talking glibly!

—about "social insurance" and "social security" and the "Beveridge plan" as though these things could be superimposed upon an economic system that has produced poverty on the one hand and plenty on the other—

So that by implication the hon. member says we shall have to do away with private ownership and establish collective ownership before we can bring about these other things. In support of his arguments he quotes a Mr. Ryan of Washington, who in an article published in the United States said:

I do not believe that an economy dominated by the philosophy of "free enterprise" will be able to meet that demand.

Well, I do not know what that means if it does not mean what it says.

I come now to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I counted the number of times he used the expressions "common man" and "common people," and found that in one column he had used them ten times. The people to whom he refers, the farmers, the working men, the small merchants and so on, are not, to my mind, the common people. They are the aristocrats of our country, the people upon whom we must all depend, the people who do the work of the country. They are the real people, but he refers to them as the "common people." Perhaps on account of his profession he does not know who are the common people of this country.

To come back to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that if we progressed no more rapidly in the next twenty-three years than we have in the last twenty-three years, there will be little hope for the future of the social security plan. I wonder where he has been during the past twenty years? After all, social progress is not just social progress. Tremendous economic progress was made long before my hon. friends were heard of, even before some of them were born. As I say, great social progress has been made, and nearly all under Liberal governments.

Do we want to go back to where we were prior to the last war when there was no social legislation on any of the statute books of this country? I do not think hon. members are fair, either to themselves or to Canada, when they talk that way. I do not believe that New Zealand or Great Britain or any other country, Russia included, is any more sincere, any more capable mentally, or any more willing or desirous of making progress than is Canada. We do not have to go clear across the world to New Zealand to find a way of dealing with our social and economic problems. We shall deal with them here just as the people of Canada feel it is propitious to do so, as we feel we are able to do so and when we feel it is the proper time. If the great social security plan now before the committee reaches full fruition, I think Canada will be in a most enviable position as compared with that of most other countries.

It may be that our friends of the socialist group feel rather badly. They may think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has stolen their thunder. But that is not the case; he is just carrying out the programme which many of us have watched progressing for many years. I will confess something. I came into this house over twenty years ago as an opponent of the Prime Minister. I did not know him, and I came here with some preconceived notions of him. It was not because of anything that happened with anyone else; it was only because of what occurred between the Prime Minister and myself, but the fact is that the longer I have known him, the greater has my confidence in him and my respect for him become. Instead of maligning our own country and our own people and our own government, we would be doing more for ourselves, more for posterity if we got down on our knees and thanked God for having such a government as we have, a government with the understanding and the courage to do the things they are doing.

When the government embarked upon a price ceiling scheme they knew it would be unpopular. But they did it. They had the courage to do it. For whom were they doing it? It was done for the working people of Canada. They are the people who will profit and benefit by the continuity that will follow after the war, the stability we shall have then instead of the terrific distortions that followed the last war. I can remember in the third year of the last war when sugar sold in our town for $26 per 100 pounds. There was never any stoppage in the flow of raw sugar from the West Indies to Canada at that time. As there is to-day there were no sugar mills standing idle in those days, as there are at present but sugar went to $26 per 100 pounds. Why? Because of the mad inflation that occurred. But this government has kept the prices of sugar down to near what it was before the war.

What about clothing? During the last war I can remember paying $100 for a suit. I could not afford that, but I had to pay it. I needed a suit. There was no reason for such a price. As there was never a day when the fine soft wool from the south stopped coming to Canada. We had a smaller army to clothe, but the price of clothing went sky-high. To-day one can go down to stores on Sparks street and buy a good suit of clothes for $35, the same price as he had to pay before the war. Why? Because we have a government that has had the courage to do the right thing —control prices.

I listened with interest the other day to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). I noticed that he was much more modest than usual, but he still got off the track two or three times. He criticized the government rather severely for not having done something about writing off soldier debts. He was a member of a party in power during five of the worst years agriculture has ever known in the history of Canada. There never was a time when the soldiers were more in need of their accounts being written off or written down, but very little was done during that period. He went on to tell us about his great interest in old age pensions. Old age pensions were almost hoary headed when he came into this house. They have been in effect in this country since 1926, and I do not know why he should show an interest in something which was in effect for almost ten years before he became a member.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevois-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this debate I have taken great interest in the speeches delivered by hon. members. Many of those speeches contained very good suggestions. Although I cannot agree with all that was said by my hon. friends, I have pleasure in mentioning especially the speeches of the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell). Those two speeches contained many constructive suggestions, and I have no doubt that if the ministers would listen to some of the views expressed therein, it would assist them in the performance of the difficult tasks they have to perform at the present time.

The remarks I intend to make on the budget and on the amendment will not be of the type used by masters of finance; they will be couched in the language of the man on the street. I must say that with a budget of $5,500,000,000 we are far from the moderate effort which was promised us by the leaders of the Liberal party during the 1940 election campaign. I cannot refrain from recalling this. Everybody knows that the government succeeded in obtaining the support of the province of Quebec because our people were told emphatically that, notwithstanding previous engagements, if the government had decided to participate in the war, it was very well understood that the participation would be a moderate one. We who opposed the Liberal party, tried to make the population understand that they were once more being duped, but the declarations of the leaders of the Liberal party were so emphatic that the people thought fit to give them their support. It was, I think, the first time in the history of mankind that a government decided to declare war against another country and at the same time maintained that they would make it just a smooth war. The people of Canada, remembering those engagements, and looking at the present budget, find that this smooth war has turned into a real war.

The second thing that comes to the mind of the man on the street is that this budget disregards too much the situation of the Canadian family. The exemptions provided for families with children are not adequate, especially when we take into consideration the obligations of those who have many children below the age of fourteen. I know that no one will be surprised to learn that in the province of Quebec, especially outside the cities, families of eight or nine children are numerous, and therefore it is in the province of Quebec that the burden will be heavier for the taxpayer. I have here an answer which was given to me in this house on the 15th instant regarding the 1941 census. It shows that families of five or more children, and especially those with seven or more, are found particularly in the province of Quebec. I shall give only a few figures to illustrate my point. They appear at page 1227 of Hansard of March 15 of this year. The table given there shows that there are in the dominion 98,500 families with five children. Of this number 34,340 families are in the province of Quebec. There are 63,240 families with six children, and of this number 25,760 are in the province of Quebec. Other figures show that there are 84,920 families with from seven to nine children each, and of this number 43,170 are in the province of Quebec. Then there are 20,890 families with ten or more children and of this number 13,220 are in the province of Quebec. I contend that if our objective is to do our utmost to win the war we must never forget that society in general for the safeguarding of which we are fighting is founded on the smaller society called the family, and if we have to protect the civil society we must of necessity bring our utmost protection to its essential element, namely, the family. I submit this point of view to the government. I believe that it will be necessary to review this part of the budget so as to give better protection to the heads of families. We should not take away from them the necessary means to provide for the raising of their children, and for this purpose they should enjoy a larger exemption from taxation.

The third point I raise is that it appears from the budget that the government does not take the money where it is, and here I cannot emphasize too much the statement of the leader of the Social Credit group when he said in this house, as reported at page 1091 of Hansard of March 9, 1943:

> All the property of the people of Canada, particularly of the producers, is being mortgaged to a few Canadians. The bonds are gravitating into the hands of a very, very few, as all the records tend to show.

Further on he said:

> Those individuals are accumulating so many bonds that they will be able to live upon the interest of those bonds. . . . They will become a special class of gentlemen of privilege . . . they will control the laws of this country. They will control government policy. They will also control the banking policy of this country. Therefore, as I said a short time ago, from eighty to eighty-five per cent of all Canadians will become hewers of wood and drawers of water for the remaining fifteen per cent. They will be serfs.
> The men who are now overseas . . . will come back here and become members of the serf class almost to a man.

I believe this statement is mostly true, and I do not hesitate to say that a system which brings about such a state of things is not sound.

But there is something more inconceivable. When it is a question of raising men for the war, we do not ask the soldiers, the sailors, and the airmen to lend their lives, at interest, to the country. We ask them to devote their youth and their energies, and even to give their lives to protect our country and our institutions. I cannot understand, and I know the people of this country cannot understand why, when it is a question of raising money, things should be altogether different. I cannot understand why we cannot ask those who have the money to give it for the protection of the country and for the safeguarding of their own capital. But instead we ask them to lend it, at interest. So that after the war those few people who already control finance will see their capital increased to a high degree. On the other hand, we shall see the soldiers come back home after having suffered, and many of them crippled, and we shall say to them: You have fought gallantly for your country, but now you will pay for the rest of your life the interest on the capital of those who lent their money to your country, and for the protection of which you have fought so hard.

I would also remind the government that I cannot accept the view of those who at the present time contend that if the government has found the way of raising money to produce so large a quantity of war materials, it will after the war easily find a way to provide the people of this country with the necessary means of living. I cannot accept this statement, and we must be very careful not to depend upon it, because I remember that twenty-five years ago we had a war which everybody remembers. The government at that time also succeeded in finding a way to provide our armies and our people with the necessities of life and the needs of war. Production was raised to a very high degree, and we believed then that the government had found a way to provide the people with the necessities of life after the war. This belief is substantiated by a statement which I find in the Sirois report, volume 1, at page 90, from which I quote:

> The success with which the dominion government had organized a peaceful society for combat showed how governments could alter the conditions of economic and social life. If governments could organize so effectively for destruction, they should be able to organize the conditions of the good life for their citizens. Under the pressure of social inequalities which became more and more evident, this changing philosophy of the appropriate sphere of state activity led straight to extensive government intervention in economic life and to the provision and further extension of social services.

However, a few years after the war our country came through the gravest crisis we have ever known. Every one remembers the dark days of the period from 1930 to 1939. If after the last war the government of this country did not succeed in bringing to the people the necessary means of living decently, I cannot attach much importance to the declaration of those who to-day maintain that this war teaches us how to get wiser means of providing for the people in the future the necessary means of life.

I believe the burdens of the war would be and should be lessened, by preventing gifts or loans to countries much more wealthy than we are. I do not hesitate to declare that I cannot understand how the people of Canada, bearing on their shoulders a heavier burden than any other allied country, can be called upon to help another country which is doing things like those that have been disclosed not long ago. We find, in the Magazine Digest of February, 1943, at page one, an article condensed from the Banker, of London. This article is entitled "A bank whose money we can do without." It is written by Mr. Paul Einzig, who is at the present time foreign editor of the Financial News and the Banker, in London. It deals with a bank called the Bank of International Settlements. I quote:

From the very first day of the war, private citizens and firms in Britain were ordered to sever all connections with those neutral firms which had been put on the black list because they were controlled by enemy interests. Failure to comply is severely punished. But the Bank of England seems to be an exception. Certain of its directors are allowed, even in 1942, to remain on the board of a bank the share capital of which is held by axis-controlled interests to the extent of seventy-two per cent.

And further on:

It is almost impossible to say whether any axis assets in this country, in the United States of America or in Latin America have escaped being frozen because they were camouflaged as Bank of International Settlements assets. . . .

Further, if we look at the composition of the board, we find that out of sixteen directors, only two are British and two neutral, while the remaining twelve are nationals of axis or axis-controlled countries.

This question was raised in the British House of Commons on October 13, 1942. In commenting on the debate, the article states:

The very situation, with whose description Sir Kingsley Wood sought to make the flesh of M.P.'s creep on October 13, would then arise.

If, as he emphatically claimed, the withdrawal of British directors from the B.I.S. would result in substantial advantages for the axis and grave disadvantages for the allies, why doesn't Germany bring about that situation by exercising the powers conferred by the axis control over the majority of voting rights at the shareholders' meeting and on the board of directors?

Instead, the Germans even continue paying interest on their debt to the B.I.S. after having defaulted on so many other financial obligations. Why? Because it obviously suits them to tolerate the neutrality of the B.I.S. and to secure the continued British participation in it, even at the cost of sacrifices.

And the last part I quote is this:

Since Germany is in a position to assume full control but prefers to tolerate British participation and "neutral" control, it would obviously be to her disadvantage, and therefore to the advantage of the united nations, if that country took the initiative in terminating its relations with the Bank of International Settlements.

The man on the street, the man who works hard to help the war effort of his country, cannot understand such a state of affairs; and I believe the government should give some explanation before asking us to give our money or lend it to a country in which some people are doing business with the enemy. I believe also that the government does not pay enough attention to the actual needs of our country, and that it should not withhold expenditures necessary to provide the country with the ordinary means of communication.

Speaking for the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I take it as a duty to advise the government that there are on the north coast of the St. Lawrence many small harbours which will not be utilized any longer if the government does not provide them with the necessary repairs to the wharves or does not undertake the necessary dredging. I receive every week news from different parts of my constituency, advising me to that effect; and if our fishermen cannot be provided with suitable harbours they will not be able to perform their usual tasks and the country as a whole might be deprived of the results of the work they used to do.

I wish also to draw the attention of the government to the question of transport to and from these new vast industrial areas of Chicoutimi and lake St. John where lately a dam was built at the cost of $65,000,000.

At the present time there is only one railroad linking these industrial areas with the rest of the country. Since it is an old railroad it happens very often that the carrying of war materials is delayed on account of a broken rail or some other defects. The passenger trains have been reduced to three a week although, according to the last census, the population of this area is about 20,000 more than it was a few years ago.

There would be one way to correct this situation, and I think the government should listen very carefully to the following suggestion. It would be the building of a railroad between Murray Bay and Chicoutimi, a distance of about sixty-six miles. This would complete a belt-line from Quebec to Chicoutimi. I know this question has already been studied, and that around 1917 there was a survey showing the possibility of this project, which if it were realized would be of a great help to the war effort of this country in establishing much better means of communication between the war plants of lake St. John district and the rest of the country.

It would also be of great advantage after the war for the development of this part of the country; and as I said in my speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the government should pay special attention to these works that will be as useful in peace time as they are in war time.

I must add that it would also be fair for the province of Quebec to have this railroad added to those we already have, because, according to the statistics, we find that the province of Quebec is the one in which the proportion of railroads is less than in any other province according to the area and the population.

Therefore I urge the government to consider this project, and I am convinced that they will easily come to the conclusion that it constitutes one of the good suggestions that could be made at the present time.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, I have tried to state as briefly as possible what the man in the street thinks of the budget now before us.

I must add that even in many industrial and business circles there is a feeling of justified uneasiness about the size of this budget. Thus, the bi-monthly bulletin issued by La Banque Canadienne Nationale, for January and February, 1943, contains the following comments:

An increase in the production of armaments is being contemplated again this year. But labour and raw materials now available in this country are so reduced that any such increase in that field will entail a further lessening of activity in numerous establishments catering to the needs of the civilian population and even in certain basic industries.

And further on:

Despite what has been achieved since the outbreak of war, food production is still inadequate in this country which is called upon to supply various foodstuffs to the armies and the civilian population of Great Britain and other united nations. That is why there is such an insistent demand for more consignments of our meats, eggs, dairy products and various other commodities. Now, Canadian farms, which military service and employment in war industries have deprived of about 250,000 farmers and farm workers since the beginning of 1940, are to-day facing a labour shortage the seriousness of which it would be dangerous to overlook. The restrictions imposed on farm implement factories whose production this year must not exceed 24 per cent of the 1940 figure, will add to the difficulties of the situation.

It is consequently imperative that some way be found of ensuring an adequate production of foodstuffs, since the latter are the most essential war munitions.

It is admitted even by those financial interests that we are now facing a situation which is becoming more and more alarming and it may be wondered what will happen if the war is to last many years longer and whether we shall always succeed in devising ways and means of meeting both our war requirements and the needs of our civilian population.

I wish to take this opportunity to express the feelings of all right-minded Canadians who witness to-day with deep concern the social disruption brought about by the employment of women in industrial plants.

It is not difficult to see that we are now preparing a generation that will suffer untold harm from the fact that women have been so ill-advisedly called upon to assume a share of the hard and tiring work performed in the shops. I do not hesitate to say that no medical specialist can possibly deny that working in a shop, night and day, among noisy machines, cannot but upset the nervous system of a woman and make her an easy prey for every kind of disease, especially tuberculosis.

Archbishops and bishops gave warning throughout the land. Medical societies echoed their uneasiness and all who would see a decent social and economic life maintained in our country are deeply worried by the part which women are taking in industrial activities.

This question is so important that the government should have a serious inquiry undertaken by competent men and themselves take such remedial steps as are necessary to correct the present system.

I feel in duty bound to quote briefly from an article by the Rev. Father Alexandre Dugré, S.J., presenting the best and most substantial argument on the subject:

Following their conscience rather than their interest doctors have denounced the terrible epidemic. I have treated healthy girls, says one, with a build as tall and strong as a man's, who were absolutely ruined after a year and a half, a record. They lived in an oppressive atmosphere and surrounded by a pandemonium of noise. Nervous overstimulation caused stomach and heart disorders.

And further on:

Soldiers will die or return, but women in the army or munitions plants will not quite die and yet they will never recover. They will never be the same. Something within shall have snapped. Woman intended to be a temple must never become a shop.

Still further on I find this:

When directors of the selective service and leaders in this country themselves proclaim that "the housekeeper, a front line trooper on the home front, carries on essential war work" (Mr. Goulet); that "disorganization of the home for the benefit of industry, far from helping the war effort, hampers it, delays it, and endangers our future" (Mrs. Eaton); that "women in the home no less than those in the shop make a direct contribution toward the preservation of that civilization which our enemies would destroy" (Mr. King),—they are right. We ask that action be in keeping with such splendid statements and that our readers cooperate by remaining at home, rendering the really great service which is expected from civilized women.

And finally:

In this war where we count so little, we put up with inconveniences, rationing and sacrifices. We supply the money, we give our sons, our blood. But we shall not sacrifice our women: it would mean setting ourselves back twenty centuries. That Hitler may be broken, some better means must be found than breaking up our homes by adding to the long roll of martyrs in the shops.

I cannot believe that the government shall not heed the almost desperate appeals coming from our doctors and economists and I trust a thorough study of this question will be undertaken immediately.

There is another matter which I would like to mention. This budget before us is the most formidable assault ever launched upon provincial autonomy.

There will come another opportunity for me to discuss this matter fully, but I wonder if we are not witnessing the application of the projects contained in the Sirois report which, as everyone knows, was rejected at the time of the interprovincial conference which was called to consider it.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks I wish to say that I cannot support the amendment moved by the leader of the Social Credit group. In fact, while I am in agreement with most of the suggestions contained in this amendment, I do not think it would be proper for the government to control private business factories, farms, and other means of production. If some distinction had been made with regard to these so-called means of production, I might have agreed that the government could control some of them; but they would have to be distinctly described.

I cannot agree either to paragraph (e) of the amendment. I will admit that rationing is necessary, but I contend that it should be more adequately put into force throughout the dominion. If, instead of the words "aggressive and consistent", the word "adequate" had been used, I would have been ready to support it.

I believe, however, the subamendment moved by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation reflects the general sentiment of the population of this country, and therefore I am pleased to say that I do not hesitate to support it.

Mr. J. M. TURNER (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, rising for the first time, and perhaps for the last time while you are in the Chair, may I at the outset offer to you, sir, my hearty and warm congratulations upon the high office you have attained.

Rising to say a few words regarding the budget so ably presented on the second day of this month, and in the fourth year of the war, I consider it my duty and honour to say I am of opinion we have one of the best and ablest ministers of finance we have ever had. Particularly, sir, do I wish to pay that tribute to our minister on behalf of many groups of people in my constituency, labour organizations and the like, who were so desirous of having a pay-as-you-go income tax plan put into effect. This has been done, and we are all very well pleased.

However, there is one thing I want him to do—and this is all I am going to say about it—namely, to fix up the old age pension and to do it quickly.

I need not remind you, sir, because you have been here many years longer than I have, and I have heard it said many times in this chamber, that the west has asked time and time again for more factories, more industrial plants. I mention it now for this reason, that a committee has recently been set up here to study the problems of rehabilitation and reconstruction. Judging from the personnel of that committee, we shall have a progressive and worthwhile report on the industrial needs and opportunities of western Canada which will be well studied by that committee. I would refer to the Defence Industries Limited plant near Transcona which is in my own riding; I do not want to see this plant closed down or salvaged immediately after the war. The same can be said of many plants all through western Canada. I hope at least to have a chance to obtain for the constituency which I represent some plants for western Canada. In my opinion it would be a shame and a disgrace to see that fine plant, in which two or three thousand men are employed, shut down and those men thrown out of work at the end of the war. I wish to pay tribute to those men for the fine work they are doing in this war effort, because we must remember that they were taken from the villages, the municipalities and the country; that many of them never saw the inside of a plant before, and that they are doing a splendid job, and it is my pleasure to pay them this little tribute to-night. When the war is over, these men will have had these years of extra experience and be fully prepared and equipped to carry on in similar capacities after the war. Therefore I urge with all the strength I have that that part of western Canada be kept in mind by the committee and the government. We should like to see that plant turned into a synthetic rubber plant or a plant for the manufacture of synthetic gasoline or plastic products, but certainly not destroyed and all those men turned loose to find other jobs.

I hope this government will not allow any immigration into this country after the war until at least all our returned men are taken care of; they should have first call and preferred jobs.

There is something not quite right in regard to our western industrial set-up when one considers even casually the immense possibilities for industry in the prairie provinces. Consider it only from the point of view of natural resources; look at what we have to offer industries: coal, timber, oil, the natural gas of Alberta in untold quantities, thousands of units of unharnessed electrical power, minerals of all kinds, and in my own constituency that new chromium deposit now in the experimental stage. It is well advanced; I believe 200 tons have been shipped. If this proves successful, I understand this will be the biggest development in recent years in Manitoba. These are only a few of the many things we have to offer. We have two of the best equipped and managed railways in the world to take care of the needs of industry. Behind all that we have great agricultural production in all its branches, capable of supplying a population five or ten times, possibly fifteen times what we have now, with the finest food this world can produce. There is only one answer, more and more factories because, if you get the factories, you get the population.

Speaking in this house on January 29 of last year about conditions on the farms as I saw them in my own constituency, I said, as reported at page 148 of Hansard:

> During the harvest period last fall I took a trip through part of my riding, and on one farm I saw a poor old lady, sixty-five years of age, on top of a grain stack, working away there when she should have been at home listening to the radio or at least doing some easier job. On another farm, on the next section, I saw a little girl twelve years of age driving the tractor, while her father operated the power binder behind. He told me that he had tried his best to get help, offering $4 a day, but had not been able to secure it. That little girl should have been out playing. I am sure she must have been tired at night.

That problem is now more acute than ever, as a result of the military call-up policy. There is hardly a day that I do not receive some complaints, particularly from the Tyndall and Melrose sections. I should like to read them to the house but I know the government must, by now, be aware of the situation. Let me, however, put this question to the government: Could you expect a young man who is the only boy at home, with three sisters, his father far from well—he has a doctor's certificate—to have in his mind a good, honest, clean thought about our war effort when he is taken into the army, leaving his sisters at home to look after thirty or forty head of stock when it is forty below zero, when he has been doing nothing but that job ever since he was old enough to drive a team of horses?

The principle that in this war agriculture is considered a major industry, along with munitions plants and the like, has, I think, been admitted on all sides of the house. Then why should not the solution of this farm labour problem be tackled along the same lines as in the case of any other war industry? Having said that, I would impress upon the government with all the strength and ability I have the need to remedy this serious situation, and the sooner the better.

In the extract which I have just quoted from my speech of January 29, I referred to the long hours which both young and old and even partly invalided people have to put in and the hardships which they have to suffer on the farms in Canada in order to keep up our war effort. They will continue to do so until the victorious end; we can depend on that. Therefore I make a suggestion to the government, and it is only a suggestion. It is this, that a part or all of the government's share of the excess profits tax taken since it was first started, on such companies only as use in their manufacture the basic products of the farm, for instance, malting companies, brewers, distillers, milling companies, bread companies, packers, elevator companies, should be held in trust by the government until the war is over and given back to the farmers of Canada, from whose hard toil it originated. This should be done because I believe the farmer is the one and only man who is coming out of this war on the wrong side of the whole show. This money would come at a time when he could use it for replacements, and the payment of debts incurred during the period of the war. It might be regarded as some kind of compensation plan to help these farm people for the long hours put in in all kinds of weather, who shifted from one line of production to another as requested by the government. It would help the farmer to get back to his proper position. It appears to me from a labour point of view that somewhere in that excess profits tax must be found some relief for the farmer. He should have the first call on some of that money after the war.

May I now be permitted to proceed to another subject, a subject I had hoped I would never have to speak on while a member of this house, namely, the restrictions on beer, particularly during a war session when there are so many matters of real importance to discuss. I always understood that this matter had been definitely settled years ago as far as any action by the federal government was necessary. But it seems that "to beer or not to beer" is now the question. I assure you, sir, that whatever I may say on the matter is said for no other reason than that I deem it my public duty as a member of this house, and as a result of the many protests I have received from farmers, industrial workers, business and professional men, municipal officials, and from my own study and observations. This matter is becoming more serious every day and, if allowed to continue much longer, will do great harm to our people.

In the first place, let me say that beer rationing is nothing new here in Canada. It has been in effect for many years, since just after the last war, under provincial government control, by means of the permit system. Years ago, and even to-day, your liquor permit was considered to be your ration book. The people of Canada want to know why beer should be further rationed. Who asked for it? Was it any of the members of the three armed services? I should not expect so. Was it anybody from the war veterans' associations or clubs? I have never heard that. Was it any labour group or any organization affiliated with labour? Not to my knowledge. Was it the Canadian federation of agriculture, or anyone else connected with agriculture? I have never been told that. I am sure it was not any of the provincial governments, because that is their main source of revenue. They might have agreed to it later, but they did not ask for it. It was not asked for by any authoritative body. The truth of the whole matter is that some group of prohibitionists and clergymen, mainly from Ontario, were the instigators of the whole thing. This group was headed by some representatives of the Ontario temperance federation, and they managed to exert enough pressure on our government to bring about this action. As a result, we have the present chaotic condition in the beer business.

[Mr. Turner.]

Let me take one thing at a time, and let me ask what I think is a fair question. Did that body of men who came here to ask the government to take this step tell the government that they would take full responsibility for the result of any action taken along this line? I venture to say they did not. I imagine they were like the handle on the pot; yes, we shall be there, but we shall not be in it. Such prohibitionists are men with one-track minds, and if you examine them very closely you will find that this track is not of standard gauge, but is the old, obsolete narrow gauge. Democracy is slipping a little in this country when a minority group, who have failed in their chosen mission of convincing the multitude by means of religious education, can by government action impose their will upon the majority.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that I have used the word "labour" frequently. I have done so because beer is known the world over as the working man's drink, as the poor man's beverage, and in many instances his only form of relaxation. I can speak with some authority on that point. For almost ten years I was a hotel keeper in the industrial section of Winnipeg, right down near the Canadian Pacific tracks. Many of the men who are now working in plants engaged solely in war work told me many times that they had never attended a show or watched a baseball game in their lives, and never would; that their only pleasure and relaxation, the only thing they got out of life, was sitting down in the beer parlour with a few of their friends, drinking a glass of beer, talking politics and condemning the government. This country is at war, and conditions are not normal. They will not be normal for some time, but these prohibitionists have no regard for that. They always were and always will be opportunists who will attack when the time suits them, regardless of the outcome; and truer words were never spoken. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) addressed the nation over the radio on December 16 last in connection with this question of temperance and the war effort. I have a copy of that address in my hand, and nowhere did the Prime Minister tell us who demanded that beer should be rationed. Perhaps he thought we should know. That is why thousands of our people were stunned by the action taken by the government. Naturally they are asking many questions, because they believe this is only a short cut to what happened during the last war, namely, total prohibition. The members of this house and the people of this country know very well what happened as a result of that action.

Therefore is it any wonder that the advertisement which I hold in my hand was published in all the newspapers in Canada? I will read it into Hansard in order to correct the false propaganda that has been circulated by temperance people:

Some plain talking about the beer shortage

Q. What is the extent of the shortage?

A. The available supply of beer under the new regulation is less than seventy per cent of to-day's demand with the expectation that the demand will become greater as time goes on.

Q. What has caused the shortage?

A. The dominion cabinet by order in council has restricted the quantity of beer which may be sold between November 1, 1942, and October 1, 1943.

Q. Why did the cabinet do it?

A. It is believed that the cabinet did it without careful study and principally to placate the prohibitionists who, by means of a powerful lobby, misrepresented conditions to the Prime Minister.

I agree with that.

In placating that element of society the government was placating the same class of people who years ago did everything they could to prevent Sunday street cars, who more recently have denounced the sending of beer to the very soldiers who, in the blistering heat of North African deserts, were fighting to preserve the liberties of the people back home; and who in their narrow-mindedness have effectively blocked proposals to have our picture theatres opened on Sundays for the benefit of enlisted men on weekend leave, who also even spread the false story—

I will come to this a little later; it is really good.

—that sugar is used in the brewing of beer in Canada.

Q. Was it necessary?

A. Beer has long been regarded the people's drink in the free democratic countries of the world. Canadian consumption has been low in relation to consumption in Great Britain and the United States. In 1942 Canada consumed 100,000,000 imperial gallons, equivalent to 1·3 pints per capita per week. The United States consumed 1,750,000,000 imperial gallons—

They can really drink it over there.

—equivalent to 2·0 pints per capita per week. Great Britain consumed 700,000,000 imperial gallons, equivalent to 2·3 pints per capita per week. Beer is brewed from Canadian ingredients which are in plentiful supply and not required for the war effort. Canadian beer contains no sugar. Tea, coffee and sugar are transported to Canada by sea and their curtailment has been made necessary only by a shortage of ocean shipping.

Q. What will be the consequences?

A. Many of the evils of the prohibition era will return. Many of our soldiers, sailors, airmen and war workers are already being deprived of the nourishment and relaxation provided by a glass of beer.

Q. What is the remedy?

A. In a democracy a government is the servant of its people. Governments are not infallible and from time to time, acting on bad advice, make mistakes. Whereas they should be quick to correct such mistakes, experience has shown that they are slow to do so unless the force of overwhelming public opinion makes itself known. The remedy in this case, therefore, is in the hands of the people of Canada, who believe in tolerance and moderation, to take every opportunity to publicly and privately express themselves against the government's too drastic restriction of the sale of beer. Otherwise a fanatical minority will be able to continue to impose its wishes upon the tolerant majority. In the last war (1914-18) the British government cut the production of beer but the indignation of the munition workers was so great that it had to be restored in order to maintain production.

Q. Have we published this advertisement because we face the loss of profits?

A. Emphatically no. This company's profits are not at stake because we are even now heavily into the 100 per cent excess profits tax category and any additional volume would only further wear out our plant without any compensation to our shareholders. We are making the fact known because we sincerely believe that the present shortage of beer is unnecessary and is not in the interests of true temperance, the maintenance of morale, and war production.

Canadian Breweries Limited.

In all fairness to the Prime Minister I must admit that one reason he gave for the cut was the labour problem, absenteeism and that sort of thing. Then it was said that an eight-hour day was sufficient for the sale of beer. That step already had been taken in my own province by the liquor control commission, with the full cooperation of the brewers and the hotel keepers. They voluntarily reduced the hours of sale from thirteen to eight; but the chaotic condition in which we find ourselves to-day did not result from the reduction in the hours of sale. It was brought about by the action of the government here in Ottawa. The hotel keepers are unable to get sufficient beer to enable them to keep open for eight hours, and now we have a new national anthem: "To beer or not to beer." The city hotels in particular are trying to operate on a "hit or miss—now you see it; now you don't" schedule because they have not sufficient beer on hand for the eight hours, and some days they do not have any at all. I am quite aware that it will be argued that the cut is thirty per cent now in order to get down to a ten per cent cut later on. But by that time the regular flow of business will have been diverted elsewhere. In many instances it has already gone elsewhere, and I am informed that this city is no exception.

This does not solve the problem in any way because to-day there is an increasing demand for beer. Can you imagine, sir, the condition we would find ourselves in if we followed the same course with respect to gas rationing? I think that is a good illustration. Can you imagine the chaos there would be if you called for gas at three o'clock in the afternoon and were told there was not any? I know the gas stations close at seven o'clock in the evening, but by that time everyone has been able to get the gas he needs. That is only one side of the story.

Here is another side. Look at what is happening to the ordinary citizen of this country who wants beer at home. In Ontario you used to be able to get a permit for twenty-five cents, but no more. It now costs you $2. I do not blame the government if it is in need of revenue; that is bad enough. In Quebec they now charge a non-resident fifty cents, and stamp his registration card on the back. But that is not all. In Alberta I am informed they intend to mark the conviction on the back of a man's national registration card if he is convicted of trying to obtain more than one permit. It is quite conceivable to expect in the very near future that we shall be required to have our photographs and finger-prints taken. Is this the kind of justice for which we are fighting? I do not think that sort of thing belongs with democratic ideas.

Is it any wonder that liquor stores are being robbed and doors and windows smashed, as reported occurred recently in Lethbridge? The remedy is simple. If a labour problem exists that makes it necessary to cut down, for heaven's sake make it eight or nine hours a day, but make sure that the public will be served during those hours. There should be sufficient beer on hand to serve everyone and not have us running around like a bunch of scared jack rabbits from one beer parlour to another. I am sure that if this reasonable request had been made of the provincial governments concerned in the first place, a favourable reply would have been received the next morning.

We are engaged in a world war where there is to be no saw-off to keep steady and cool at all times; we must keep our feet firmly on the ground. We must expect that our nervous strain and high tension will continue and sometimes be near the cracking point. It will be tougher this year than ever before if I understand the Prime Minister correctly. Therefore, is it not only right, fair and reasonable that the government, as well as all public-minded bodies and groups, should do as little as they possibly can to disturb, interfere, or irritate in any way the day-to-day life of the ordinary common people, who, after all, are the ones who really drink and enjoy their glasses of beer. I think that is a sound statement to make.

The United States are making a magnificent war effort, and there has been no drastic cut in beer there. They drink more per capita than we do. That country remembers only too well the era of gangsters, racketeers and kidnapping through which they passed. Canada was not exempt from the same troubles. Let me state at once that I believe it is partly due to that disastrous period through which this country also passed that we find in this country, where there is an abundance of food, where there is everything to make it the best and healthiest place in the world to live, that in order to get 1,000 men for the services we must call up approximately 2,000 men. I can understand that condition existing when for years thousands of our people were unable to get a clean, wholesome glass of beer, properly served, on account of the actions of a similar group or their forefathers. They were forced to drink vanilla extracts, moon, uppercut, red-eye and paint remover. I am surprised that the percentage of rejections is not even greater.

A new industry was then born in Canada. It still continues and probably will continue forever, and from it this government gets no revenue. One cannot forget that terrible episode which happened during the Christmas holiday season in Winnipeg when some fifty or more persons were taken at one time to the general hospital, two or more persons died and the rest just pulled through suffering from the effects of having taken canned heat. These people just pulled through, and we all still remember the stink of Hoffman drops all over the country. These things should be remembered.

My suggestion to the government at this stage is to stay on the beam and leave good enough alone. They should not interfere with the beer business, the working man's drink. Beer is the only alcoholic drink sold on draft for ten cents in Canada, and it can therefore be correctly labelled the working man's drink. The art of brewing is over six thousand years old, and there has never yet been found a substitute for beer. Let us then stop trying, until at least the war is won and victory has been secured.

This government has been criticized and bombed day and night from all altitudes as a result of the numerous controls it has imposed upon the people. Why should it take on something which was not asked for or which is not necessary? It has been condemned for passing too many orders in council. Here is one, No. 11374, which it should suspend or cancel immediately in so far as it affects beer, the working man's drink. You can always trust the working man with his beer. There is no shortage of grain or other materials used in the manufacture of beer, because, after all, it is about ninety per cent water.

Contrary to the belief held by some in Canada, I think it can be argued successfully that there has been no great increase in the per capita consumption of beer. The plain fact is that there are more people drinking beer in Canada than ever before. I believe that is a good sign. If people must drink, it is much better for them to drink beer. In this connection I should like to read an extract from an article written by a doctor of this province, a superintendent of a large institution. It was handed to me just a little while ago, and it reads:

> I don't think the government is doing a very good thing by restricting beer so much. The people, especially the working people are resenting it. They will stand for almost any restriction cheerfully if it is necessary but they have the idea in this case that the restriction was put on just because the government allowed itself to be stampeded by a few prohibitionists. There is certainly no shortage of grain in the country and the hard liquor distilleries can look after the alcohol. Strikes me as being one of the best times to really convert this country from hard liquor to beer. I suppose it is true that consumption has gone up in the last few years, but then again many poor devils are able to buy beer now that never were before, and incidentally able to buy bonds and stamps in quantities that they couldn't have touched three years ago.

It has been stated by the same group as part of their false propaganda that there is no food value in beer. I have here a letter which was written to the Free Press by Mr. Kensington Downes, a former member of the legislative assembly of Manitoba, and which I think will answer that once and for all. I shall not read it all, but I wish to read the last paragraph, in which Mr. Downes was answering an argument put forth by Doctor Cooper. This paragraph reads:

> If, in the opinion of Dr. Cooper, beer is harmful, how does he account for the following? Flight Officer C. P. L. Streatfeld, Squadron Leader A. K. Passmore and Pilot Officer S. G. Turney, of the R.A.F. voyaged from Java to Australia in a twenty-eight foot lifeboat. They and nine companions subsisted for forty-four days on 960 cans of beer (pints) which they found in the lifeboat. They had neither a morsel of food nor a drop of water, yet they are alive and well.

The same outfit to which I have referred has condemned the sale of beer because the breweries use large quantities of sugar. The fact is that no sugar is used in the manufacture of either beer or ale. Should I remind the government to beware of false witnesses? Perhaps these people are trying to catch a spot on the Fibber McGee programme. I have yet to see a sack of sugar in a brewery. However, I am not surprised at that outfit making that statement because in my opinion they could not tell a bottle of beer from the Empire State building.

How many times has it been said on the floor of this house that our army is the finest and the best equipped in the world? I join with others in that tribute. It has also been stated time and again by members on all sides of the house and by the Prime Minister himself, and with just pride, that our industrial production on all fronts, agriculture, implements of war, shipbuilding and so forth is greater now than at any previous time in our nation's history. How then can it be intelligently argued that beer restrictions were imposed on account of delays, absenteeism, and so forth? The very opposite is true. Under present conditions the worker has almost to take a day off in order to get a glass of beer. The case of the prohibitionists collapses completely in the face of the statement that I have just made.

The magnificent tributes that I have just mentioned as being paid to our armed forces were paid in the first place to our soldiers, sailors and airmen, but also to labour on the railways, for example, to the men who at forty degrees below zero make the railways safe for us to get here; to the skilled workers in the munitions plants; to the farmers and the fishermen; and to all those engaged in working in the mines and forests of our country. These people constitute the very backbone of Canada, and that they have done a magnificent job is admitted by all, including our own Prime Minister and Mr. Winston Churchill. They are by far the largest consumers of beer in Canada. Therefore, why should beer be rationed to them under pressure from a certain group of prohibitionists whose only contribution to the winning of this war, as far as I can judge, is in trying to stir up "internal combustion" in this country?

I have just mentioned that great leader, Mr. Churchill. It reminds me of the remark he made to General Montgomery when he met him in North Africa. He asked General Montgomery how he felt and the general replied, "One hundred per cent fit," and went on to say that he neither drank nor smoked. Churchill replied that he both drank and smoked and felt two hundred per cent fit. I also recall a statement of a man in whom my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) will be very much interested because he became a famous judge I am told.

This man said, "Before I have my ale I see things as they are, but after I have my ale I see things as they should be." I see my good friend the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) smiling. I have known him for a number of years.

May I digress at this point to pay a super-tribute to the officers and all those who assisted them on the war loan committee, and certainly to every person in Manitoba for their combined efforts in sending that province over the top first in the last victory loan drive.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, to keep the record straight and up to date as far as Manitoba is concerned regarding beer rationing, let me say now that in that province we have had four local option contests since the war began, and in all four contests the people voted wet by a majority of two to one. Surely that does not look very much as if they wanted any restrictions on beer there.

At this point may I pay a tribute to the hotel keepers of my province and the trade generally, who through maintaining a high standard of public service were in part responsible for that good majority in those four local option contests.

Why should we in Manitoba be penalized by some false propaganda prohibitionists when the people themselves there have voted as I have already indicated and shown plainly what they want. We rebel and protest against this, and Ottawa will soon know it because Winnipeg has been circulated with cards to be signed and sent here, and this is only the beginning.

Why did not these prohibitionists whose grief, if they had any, was supposed to originate around the Jarvis street section of Toronto, use their own forces in calling for a local option vote or for any number of them, thereby localizing the problem if there was any? But they had different ideas. They wanted to head out for total prohibition with its multiple troubles. They wanted to go for the jack-pot. They wanted to establish total prohibition while the war was on and press the government to use the War Measures Act, and they intended to do it by any kind of sales talk, false or otherwise. In any event they won the first round and the government did pull the main switch, so that to-day we find all Canada, including my own good province of Manitoba, sent hurtling down the hill toward total prohibition where she lay twenty-five years ago and from which she has never recovered fully; her wounds are not yet fully healed. That is the story as I see it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, having some knowledge of the situation to-day, may I ask the government before it is too late, and with all the sincerity and strength that I possess, to immediately rescind or cancel order in council No. 11374 in so far as it affects beer, in order to offset the present move toward total prohibition which, in the light of past experience, would not only undermine governments, both provincial and federal, but certainly destroy the morale of our citizens of all classes, who possibly never before in their life broke the law of the land but will certainly rebel against restrictions of this kind, which are not necessary and may unfortunately cause them to become law breakers.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member (Mr. Turner) who has just taken his seat has just made probably the best delivery he has ever made in this house, but he rather disproved his case since he did it all on water.

Returning to the budget—from the ridiculous to the sublime—one's first impression on looking at the 1943 budget is that it proposes no great changes in our approach to financing Canada in a time of stress. The rates of taxation on incomes, individual and corporation, the excess profit tax and the sales tax remain practically the same. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has adopted some principles of what is known as the Ruml plan, the pay-as-you-earn policy, and as a result those individuals who are paying taxes will find that their tax payments will be increased this year probably fifty per cent over what they paid last year. That is a disturbing consideration, but it is one of the consequences of the partial adoption of the Ruml plan. The minister outlined many of its advantages, but I would point out that there are also a great many disadvantages. In the first place the tax is based on an income which is unknown. Experience has shown that the income of a nation can vary considerably over a twelve-month period. An accurate estimate of the nation's income is impossible. Second, there are certain classes of income which cannot be taxed at the source. Payments on unregistered bonds and certificates, certain collections and note payments, cannot be closely watched unless revenue officers are to be in every office. But when personal income is unknown there is the added difficulty that the rate of taxation cannot be set. Those people whose sole income is salary or wages can be taxed easily at the source. The taxpayer must still make his final return; then the government can set its rate of taxation; then adjustments will have to be made.

I would offer this criticism, that the tax structure is becoming much too involved and will need simplification. Also the machinery of collection is far too complicated; it is leading to the setting up of a bureaucracy. When we remember that we have to pay in 1943 the remainder of the eight months of 1942 tax, in addition to the 1943 taxes, there will be some very severe cuts in family incomes. The worker will have extremely little left with which to purchase consumer goods. The people of Canada are asked to buy bonds, to buy until it hurts: billions of dollars will be required. Before these people will go out and buy bonds they will want to know two or three things. One of the most important is, that the money which the government is spending is being spent profitably, without waste. That is why I think the government would have been well advised to investigate all charges of waste, subterfuge and downright trickery, according to an alleged report a short time ago.

Mr. McNIVEN: What are they?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The charges of Colonel Thompson, I understand.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He has resigned.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Another thing of which they should be assured is that what happened to bonds after the last war will not be permitted to happen after the present one. I remember that, upon returning to civil life after the last war, I purchased a few small bonds. In later years, when the depression came and I needed a little money, I went to the bank to sell them. The banker said, "No, we do not buy bonds." I asked, "Where can I sell them? What good are they?" He said he thought he knew where I could sell them. I went round the corner and up a flight of stairs, and there the man in charge of one of our free enterprise businesses said he would give me about ninety-two cents on the dollar. We should guard against a recurrence of this kind of thing.

Mr. ISNOR: Those were not Dominion of Canada bonds?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: These were victory bonds of the last war.

Mr. ISNOR: And the bank did not take them?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No, the bank did not take them.

Canada's expenditures in 1942-43 chargeable to war appropriations will amount, according to the Minister of Finance, to the grand total of $4,558,000,000. Against that the government expects to raise in the fiscal year $2,218,000,000, leaving a balance to be borrowed, in the form of war loans, victory bonds and certificates, et cetera, of over $2,250,000,000. This amount will be added to the national debt, and interest on that debt must be paid. The debt is climbing rapidly. The minister himself estimated the national debt of Canada as of March 31, 1943, at $6,306,779,000. It has doubled since the war began. It has multiplied over twenty times in the last thirty years. The future of Canada is being mortgaged at an alarming rate. The workers, the soldiers, those engaged in war to-day are bearing the brunt of this battle; the great masses of the Canadian people are paying, and paying nobly, the heaviest tax which was ever placed upon the backs of the Canadian people. This year alone we are expected to pay approximately $500,000,000 more than the total cost of the war of 1914-18 and rehabilitation activities after that war; but in spite of that we are paying less than half of this year's expenditure on the war. Truly the world is learning that war is an expensive business, and unfortunately for the masses of the people everywhere war is a Business with a big "B." It is the people who have least to do with the causing of these wars who must do most of the suffering and the paying.

One fact with regard to money which I think everyone should realize is that, even though spent in war, it is not actually lost. When a shell costing $1,000 is fired into the air it does not mean that with the firing of the shell the money it cost is destroyed. When a $2,000,000 warship sinks in the Atlantic, it does not mean that $2,000,000 worth of cash money goes to the bottom of the sea. It is not entirely lost. Either it is in circulation or stored away in deposits of one kind or another. When we eat food we do not destroy the money which was spent to buy it. In contracting for war equipment, money goes to the contractor, who pays it out in labour, in payments to those who supply him with steel and other materials, and for transportation; he sets aside certain reserves, and he distributes the profits among the shareholders of the company. About $5,500,000,000 was spent last year in Canada. Most of that money is still in the country. Its circulation has resulted in one of the greatest industrial booms Canada has ever known. People's incomes have increased, and in spite of some of the heaviest taxation ever imposed, industry is still piling up profits. It would be foolish for anyone to deny that business is profiting, and profiting largely, out of this war. There are big accumulations of wealth in Canada. Some of them are greater as a result of the war.

But it ought to be remembered, along with that situation, that many families in Canada now have lost, and in future many more, if this war continues, will lose, fathers, brothers and sons. In view of the sacrifices which are being made of life and limb, nobody dares try to justify the amassing and hoarding of wealth through war. We of this group have continued to advocate that the government should levy non-interest bearing loans against these pools of wealth. If that were done, there would be no need of burdening future generations with a load of debt. If what happened after the last war happens again, in countries burdened with heavy national debts people will be denied a good living in order that they shall pay interest. According to the present set-up interest comes first, before food and clothing, before shoes for the children, before medical treatment for those who need it. In borrowing money, as we have done, to pay interest on our debt, we are doing nothing more than changing ordinary interest into compound interest. That, if it continues, is bound to pyramid to ultimate and inevitable collapse. It simply cannot continue. There must be some fundamental change in our whole financial set-up. I have heard advocated in the house that we must remember that we owe this debt to ourselves, that we owe it to Canada. We owe it to ourselves, yes, just like the mortgage on the farm. Some group of officials of the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation—and "permanent" is a good name—sitting in Toronto, own the mortgage. But we are not any better off on the farm because we owe the mortgage. We still have to go without the necessities of life in order to pay the interest on that mortgage.

Some so-called good Canadians have been reaping the fruits of the labour of the masses. If governments in Canada persist in thinking in these pre-war terms, we are going to fail. To return to an outmoded economy of the thirties will be a return to the bread-lines for the soldiers and sailors, the men and women who return from the war. We shall have unemployment, want and poverty again.

A great deal was said in this chamber recently about free enterprise. I think the term ought to be clarified. During those disastrous thirties, what was called free enterprise? It was the right of monopolies to carry on their exploitation, the right of people to form monopolies, the right of people to control complete industries, the right of people to control the credit and currency of the nation. That is what brought the world to chaos and to war. It brought people in Canada to poverty and need, and we sank into almost hopeless poverty.

I would point out to hon. members who are using the terms "free enterprise" and "private initiative" that the distress of the thirties did more to destroy individual initiative among the masses of the people than any other thing I know of.

We in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have for our objective the making of a society in Canada which will develop the initiative of the people, bring out the fullest expression of their talents and abilities. Nothing has done more to destroy this process than this so-called free enterprise in Canada. What we mean by free enterprise is the development of that initiative in individuals which has been crushed. What these other people are talking about when they refer to free enterprise is the right to create monopolies, the right to control, the right of privileged groups to have the power to work their will freely on the Canadian economy. It is quite clear to-day that many groups who have had that privilege in the past are doing their best to see to it that that power and privilege will be maintained in the post-war period. There must be fundamental changes, deep changes. There must be a different outlook.

I do not like to hear people using the term "free enterprise" when they mean almost the opposite. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment to the budget calls for the nationalization of the whole banking system of Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: Would the hon. member give his definition of free enterprise?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The right of the masses of the people, the right of everyone, to develop his own talents, abilities, and initiative. We want to see him have the right to own and develop those things around himself, but without the power to exploit his neighbour.

Mr. McNIVEN: And does that mean compulsory interest-free loans?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is an entirely different matter. We have advocated compulsory interest-free loans under our present system.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let them define private enterprise; they are advocating it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment calls for the nationalization of banks in Canada. The purpose is, first, to make a more effective war effort now; second, to prevent a large interest bearing debt from being placed upon the people after the war and, third, to lay the foundation for the rebuilding of a new Canadian society.

What have we in the organization of the banks, as we have them to-day? Why can we not leave the banks as they are? If we look over the organization of some of the banks we find some interesting things. We soon find out why it is they wish to maintain control over the currency and credit of the nation. The chartered banks constitute one of the bulwarks through which monopolistic enterprise works. They keep competition out of their own privileged fields, and maintain control.

I should like to place on record to-night the names of some of the companies in which some of the directors of three of our more important banks in Canada act as directors. I shall turn first to the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and I find that one of the directors is president of Dominion Securities Corporation Limited, Brompton Pulp and Paper Company Limited, St. Lawrence Paper Mills Limited, Debentures Securities, Confederation Life, Toronto Mortgage Company, General Shareholding Corporation Limited, and six other finance companies.

Another director is president of Sawyer-Massey Limited, president of Western Canada Flour Mills, and a director of Asbestos Corporation, the Hamilton Bridge Company, St. Lawrence Corporation and Brompton Pulp and Paper Company. This gentleman is also the oil controller of Canada.

Another director is chairman of the largest export company in British Columbia. He is chairman of British Columbia Packers, and is interested in British Columbia Plywoods and at least twelve other companies. He is director of International Nickel Company, of which I shall have more to say later, and a director of Western Trust, British Columbia Power Company, and Forest Investment Company.

Another director is president of Canada Packers and is also a director of British Columbia Packers.

Another director is a director of the Imperial Life Insurance Company, and is vice-president and director of the National Trust Company.

Then, turning to the Bank of Montreal, we find that one of its directors is president of the Royal Trust Company, and a director of the Canada and Dominion Sugar Company.

Another director of the Bank of Montreal was, a year or two ago, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, West Kootenay Power Company and Canadian Airways. He was also a director of the Royal Trust Company, the Sun Life Assurance Company, the Royal Exchange, the Waldorf-Astoria hotel, Canadian Industries Limited, and Canadian Investment Fund.

Another director was president of the Cockshutt Plow Company, and a director of Frost and Wood, Gypsum Lime and Alabastine Canada Limited, Bell Telephone Company, International Nickel Company of Canada, and on the advisory board of the Sun Life Assurance Company.

Another director is president of the Bell Telephone Company and the North American Telegraph Company. He is also a director of Northern Electric, the Royal Trust Company, Mutual Life Assurance Company, Consolidated Paper Corporation, Liverpool and Globe Insurance Company, Globe Indemnity Company and others.

Another director is director of the Mutual Life Assurance Company, the Bell Telephone Company, the Steel Company of Canada, the Royal Trust Company, Dominion Glass, and he, like the hon. member who preceded me, was interested, because he is a director of Borden's Limited and John Labatt Limited, in the beverages people drink, from the cradle to the grave.

Then we come to the Royal Bank of Canada and we find some very interesting directors. One is vice-president and executive manager of the Montreal Trust, director of Canadian Airways, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Sun Life Assurance Company and Ogilvie Flour Mills.

Another director is chairman of the Dominion Bridge Company, the Dominion Engineering Works, and a director of the Steel Company of Canada, Shawinigan Water and Power Company, Fairchild Aircraft, Montreal Trust, Consumers Cordage, and Canadian Pratt and Whitney Aircraft.

Another director is president of the Northern Electric Company, Amalgamated Electric, Canadian Associated Aircraft Limited; and a director of the Montreal Trust Company, Belding-Corticelli Limited, Lake of the Woods Milling Company, the Bell Telephone Company, Dominion Engineering Works, Dominion Bridge Company, Shawinigan Water and Power Company and others.

Another director of the Royal Bank used to sit with the party to my right in this house.

He was also a director of E. B. Eddy Company. He has now, I believe, gone to the House of Lords in England.

Another director was president of the Howard Smith Paper Mills, Canada Paper, Alliance Paper, Allied War Supplies Corporation, director of Montreal Trust Company, Adams Paper and Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Another director was president and managing director of Dominion Bridge, president of Dominion Engineering Works, vice-president and director of Canadian Car and Foundry Company, director of Bell Telephone Company, Canadian Locomotive, Northern Electric, Montreal Trust, Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, and, oddly enough, of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

Mr. MacINNIS: All competitors, of course!

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Last but not least I come to one of the directors of the Royal Bank who has rather a long list of companies. He is president of Dominion Steel and Coal, Dominion Coal Company, Halifax Shipyards Limited, Cumberland Railway and Coal Company, Seaboard Power Corporation, Security Fence Company, St. Lawrence Wire Company, Peck Rolling Mills, Dominion Shipping Company, Sydney and Louisburg Railway Company, Graham Nail and Wire Products, Canadian Bridge Company, Canadian Steel Corporation, Essex Terminal Railway, James Pender and Company, and Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, and director of, Eastern Car Company, Trenton Steel Works, Acadia Coal Company, Old Sydney Collieries, Canadian Iron Foundries, and Canadian Collieries (Dunsmuir) Limited.

Mr. MARTIN: Who is that?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is Mr. Arthur Cross, if you want his name.

An hon. MEMBER: Is this all secret information?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No. It can be found in the directory of directors in the library.

Mr. GILLIS: It is free enterprise in their own field.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is a great game.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: These men are the real directors of Canada. That is free enterprise according to your definition.

Mr. ISNOR: No one gave such a definition.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, they are working very closely with the government.

Mr. ISNOR: Name one member who has spoken who gave that as a definition.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You can make your own speech afterwards.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member wants to keep the present system, does he not? And that is the present system.

Mr. ISNOR: Name one member who has spoken up to the present time who gave that group as representing private enterprise.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Those speaking of private enterprise are constantly saying that private enterprise must be maintained in this country. This is what you have under your private enterprise. This is the root cause why the Liberal promises made in the 1919 convention cannot be fulfilled. Two things are seen pretty clearly: one, that the Canadian people will never know economic security, never be free from want and fear until the banks of Canada, the financial system of Canada, can be nationalized. That is why we call for it in this resolution. Two, the supply of new productive equipment to work on the nationalized resources of this country to supply the needs of the people of Canada can never take place under the present set-up, while the present privileged groups control our currency and finance and, through that, control the industries. A national banking system with its head at the Bank of Canada would be the proper means of nationalizing the financing of Canada. It then could control the price levels and regulate foreign exchange operations. That is one of the first essentials to social security. It was the first step that the farmer-labour government of New Zealand found necessary before they could institute any real reform within that nation.

I should like to place on record an example of how one of the largest monopolistic corporations of the world receives special considerations from this government. I maintain that this is not warranted when Canada is passing through a crisis such as that of to-day.

In August, 1941, a special agreement was entered into between His Majesty the King in the right of Canada and the International Nickel Company of Canada Limited.

On motion of Mr. Castleden the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 19, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

PASSPORTS

STATEMENT AS TO OPERATION OF NEW PROCEDURE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Pime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) asked a question respecting passport regulations. I should like to take this opportunity to reply.

The hon. member's question was whether intending visitors to the United States can choose between the new procedure of special border-crossing identification cards and the passport system. The answer is in the affirmative. The new simplified procedure does not supersede the old system but is offered as an additional facility. If an intending visitor should find it more convenient to get a passport than to get the non-immigrant border-crossing identification card, he may do so in the regular way. It is purely a matter of personal convenience, though I am sure that, for the great majority of intending visitors, the new system will prove much more convenient than the regular passport system. In this connection it must not be overlooked that under the passport system the passport alone does not suffice to secure entry into the United States. The holder must also secure a visa, for which a personal appearance before a United States consular officer is essential, or an ordinary border-crossing card, which requires a personal appearance before a United States immigration officer.

It is understood, of course, that in speaking about the new procedure I am referring only to visits of less than thirty days by Canadians and other British subjects permanently resident in Canada. I understand these are the classes of persons the hon. member has in mind. The new system, as has repeatedly been stated, does not apply to visits of thirty days or longer, and its privileges do not extend to other classes of persons who must use the regular passport system.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO SITTINGS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the public accounts committee was appointed on February 15, and on March 8 the public accounts and the report of the auditor general were referred to the committee. So far as I can learn, no steps have yet been taken to call that committee into session. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he will have the necessary action taken to call the committee at the earliest possible day. My understanding is that the customary practice is for the chief government whip to give the necessary instructions to the committee branch.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on more than one occasion I have stated that it is open to any hon. member to ask that the committee be called. As a necessary first step, the person to be approached in the matter is the chief clerk of committees and private legislation of this house. If the clerk of committees is approached by an hon. member to bring the committee together, the clerk will be perfectly free, indeed it would be part of his duty, to send a notice to the members of the committee. However, where a committee has not been formally convened and a chairman selected, the clerk might, for the convenience of members generally, confer with the chief government whip as to the best time for calling the committee. Thereafter the committee would decide for itself at adjournment when it would reconvene, or leave the decision "to the call of the chair". If any hon. member will make the request to Mr. Dun, that the committee on public accounts be called together, and the latter should speak to the government whip, the government whip will see to it that Mr. Dun is instructed to call the committee at a date which will appear to be suitable.

Mr. GRAYDON: I thank the Prime Minister for clearing up that point, because there seems to be confusion as to the exact procedure necessary to call the public accounts committee together.

FOREIGN POLICY

CANADA'S RELATIONS WITH THE COMMONWEALTH AND OTHER NATIONS—PRESS REPORT IN TORONTO "TELEGRAM"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister a newspaper dispatch from Washington in which serious allegations are made with respect to Canada's foreign policy. Will he make a statement, either now or at an early day, covering the points raised in the dispatch and indicating the policy of the government, so that there may be no public misunderstanding of Canada's position?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has just said, he has drawn my attention to a newspaper dispatch from Washington. He mentioned he would ask the question which he has just put with regard to it.

Perhaps I should say in the first place that the particular newspaper dispatch is a communication from the Washington correspondent of the Toronto Telegram to that paper. My hon. friend says that it makes quite serious allegations with respect to Canada's foreign policy. I have read the article. I hardly think that "serious allegations" is the correct term to apply to what appears there; I would say that "mischievous conjectures" would be a better term. But that is, of course, a matter of opinion.

However, with respect to a matter as all-important as that of foreign policy I hardly think that any statement from the government should be made on the basis of some press communication. There is no more important subject than that which relates to foreign relations and foreign policy. I should be prepared to answer my hon. friend and other hon. members at any time with respect to Canada's foreign policy, on questions which they themselves may address to the ministry. But I do not think I should be expected to deal with communications from press correspondents to different papers, and make these either the basis or the occasion of a statement on the country's foreign policy.

In order, however, that it may not be said that I am in any way seeking to evade an immediate statement with respect to Canada's foreign policy, may I say that at different times I have given a statement to the house on the subject. I made one at considerable length as long ago as May 24, 1938, which is reported in Hansard, page 3178. I shall read one paragraph from that statement. It was given as a statement of Canada's foreign policy at that time. It remains a statement of Canada's policy to-day:

> Our foreign and external policy is a policy of peace and friendliness, a policy of trying to look after our own interests and to understand the position of other governments with which we have dealings. It is a policy which takes account of our political connections and traditions, our geographical position, the limited numbers and the racial composition of our people, our stage in economic development, our own internal preoccupations and necessities—in short, a policy based on the Canadian situation. It is not and cannot be under these circumstances a spectacular head-line policy; it is simply the sum of the countless daily dealings with other countries, the general resultant of an effort to act decently on every issue or incident that arises, and a hope of receiving the same treatment from others.

I believe it is advisable for me to go a step further on this matter of Canada's foreign policy at this time, because in this article and articles which are appearing in other public journals there appears to be an effort to make what is obviously a difficult situation not easier but more difficult; I mean the kind of situation which has arisen everywhere to-day between the different governments which are united in a common war effort, in their attempts to find a common solution of some of the difficulties with which they are faced. So far as the present government is concerned we intend, wherever and as often as opportunity offers, to do our utmost to make difficult situations less difficult, and to further as far as we can what is likely to prove most in the common interest. That is a broad statement, but being broad it perhaps covers the attitude of the government better than anything else could.

The article to which my hon. friend has drawn my attention raises by implication a question which is the old question of the status of Canada—whether Canada in her international relations from now on is to proceed as a country having rights of her own, sovereign rights of her own; whether she is going to proceed only as one part of the British empire; or whether she is going to proceed as a north American country having special relations with the United States. Questions of the kind are being asked to-day, not for the purpose of helping to win the war, but rather for the purpose—I will not say what the purpose is, but I will say what the effect is—rather having the effect of helping to give enemy countries and their sympathizers who wish to create divisions between different parts of the British empire and between Great Britain and the United States and between the empire, the United States, Canada and other of the united nations, something to go on in the matter of alleging that the united nations are not a completely united body in dealing with questions arising out of the war. It is important I think to emphasize that fact, because it is all-important, more important to-day than ever, that the enemy should know that the united nations are united in their determination not only to win this war but to carry out a policy with respect to peace upon which they all will be agreed. This is doubly necessary for the reason that, the more public discussion is diverted to questions about what is going to be the attitude of this country and that country at the peace table and in the post-war period, the less the country will be impressed with the fact that this war itself is not yet won. Anyone who knows anything about the situation realizes that it is going to be a much longer time before the war is won than most of us recognize at the present time. I do not think that we in Canada have begun to appreciate the difficulties which lie ahead of us this year, with the situation confronting the countries which are associated under the name of the united nations what it is, in the winning of the war. The difficulties are far greater than any of us can begin to realize. I do again submit that our country cannot give too much attention to the fact that the winning of this war as soon as it can be won, is more important than anything else which can possibly be discussed at this time.

So that there will be no mistake, either in this country, the United States, Great Britain, or anywhere else in the world, as to what Canada's position is as a nation in dealing with other nations on these international matters, I am going to place on Hansard again a declaration, known as the Balfour declaration, which was made at the imperial conference of 1926 in London, and which has been agreed to by every nation of the British commonwealth, the United Kingdom and all the dominions, as setting forth the basis on which as between themselves and in their dealings with others, matters will be adjusted. I quote from the report of the imperial conference of 1926 summary of proceedings under the heading of "Status of Great Britain and the Dominions", page 12 of the report:

> The committee are of opinion that nothing would be gained by attempting to lay down a constitution for the British empire. Its widely scattered parts have very different characteristics, very different histories, and are at very different stages of evolution; while, considered as a whole, it defies classification and bears no real resemblance to any other political organization which now exists or has ever yet been tried.
>
> There is, however, one most important element in it which, from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards all vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.
> A foreigner endeavouring to understand the true character of the British empire by the aid of this formula alone would be tempted to think that it was devised rather to make mutual interference impossible than to make mutual cooperation easy.

Such a criticism, however, completely ignores the historic situation. The rapid evolution of the oversea dominions during the last fifty years has involved many complicated adjustments of old political machinery to changing conditions. The tendency towards equality of status was both right and inevitable. Geographical and other conditions made this impossible of attainment by the way of federation. The only alternative was by the way of autonomy; and along this road it has been steadily sought. Every self-governing member of the empire is now the master of its destiny. In fact, if not always in form, it is subject to no compulsion whatever.

But no account, however accurate, of the negative relations in which Great Britain and the dominions stand to each other can do more than express a portion of the truth. The British empire is not founded upon negations. It depends essentially, if not formally, on positive ideals. Free institutions are its lifeblood. Free cooperation is its instrument. Peace, security, and progress are among its objects. Aspects of all these great themes have been discussed at the present conference; excellent results have been thereby obtained. And though every dominion is now, and must always remain, the sole judge of the nature and extent of its cooperation, no common cause will, in our opinion, be thereby imperilled.

Equality of status, so far as Britain and the domiinons are concerned, is thus the root principle governing our inter-imperial relations. But the principles of equality and similarity, appropriate to status, do not universally extend to function. Here we require something more than immutable dogmas. For example, to deal with questions of diplomacy and questions of defence, we require also flexible machinery—machinery which can, from time to time, be adapted to the changing circumstances of the world.

To-day more than at any time in the history of the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations, by whichever name you wish to call it, is there a need from time to time of adapting to the ever-changing circumstances of the world the existing machinery which we have as between the different parts of the empire. I do hope that it will be recognized that whatever will help to interpret, not to our own people only but to the people of the United States and of other countries, the true and exact nature of the relations between the different parts of the British empire and between the British empire and other parts of the world, the more it will assist in helping the cause which we all have in common.

When this country went into the war it did so as a result of the action of this parliament taken on its own account, a decision reached in accordance with what it believed to be, and certainly was, the will of the people of Canada. In all our relations with other parts of the empire and with other countries, so far as the present administration is concerned, we intend to stand on the ground of a status of our own equal to that of each and all of the self-governing British communities—the dominions and the United Kingdom included.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I think it would be of value if at an early day the Prime Minister would call an item in his estimates so that there might be a discussion of Canada's external affairs. It would enable us to arrive at a clearer understanding of some of the things which, as he suggests, may becloud the issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am anxious that the house shall get on with its business as rapidly as possible. Before we take up any new subject for discussion we should conclude with the matters in hand.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree. I meant not to leave it until the dying days of the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall undertake with pleasure to see that matters of foreign policy are discussed before that time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFF OF MEN AT DEFENCE INDUSTRIES LIMITED PLANT AT TRANSCONA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North-Centre): Will the Minister of Munitions and Supply make a statement concerning the lay-off of 325 men from the Defence Industries Limited cordite plant at Transcona, of which I understand both he and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) have been notified by telegram? Does this lay-off apply in other explosives plants? What steps have been taken to place these men in alternative war industries? Will the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES:—give a clear statement as to government policy in connection with this plant?

Mr. SPEAKER: The first part of the question asked by the hon. member is of such a nature that I think it could be answered by the minister, but the latter portion I think would come within the category of questions which I have ruled should be placed on the order paper. However, if the minister wishes to reply to the first part of the question, it would be in order for him to do so.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I received a telegram this morning from the secretary of the union which is the bargaining agency for the Winnipeg plant, saying that a lay-off of 325 men was anticipated. I tried to get direct information from the management but have been unable to do so up to the present time. I do not know whether the statement contained in the telegram is correct. However, there is a very considerable overproduction of cordite at the present moment, and corrections will have to be made in several explosives factories. This sharp curtailment is due to a sudden cutting off of export demand. If there is a lay-off, either at Winnipeg or at any other cordite plant, alternative employment will be offered immediately through national selective service to those laid off.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIANS ON PROJECTS UNDERTAKEN IN CANADA BY UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has received an urgent recommendation from the Edmonton ex-service men's rehabilitation committee that the ban against Canadians taking work with United States contractors in that district should be lifted in so far as it may affect ex-service men. Apparently the rehabilitation of some of these men has been seriously hampered by that order in council.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have no knowledge of having received any information of the kind to which my hon. friend refers. As he said, he gave my office notice of his intention to ask this question, and I should like to make the following reply.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister not received a letter from me within the last few days? I wrote to him about it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I may have. In the twenty-four hours I try to read them all. I think I remember the letter.

It will be obvious to hon. members that control of placements on the various projects being undertaken by the United States authorities is absolutely necessary. Accordingly no one is allowed to take work with United States contractors unless he has a permit from the national selective service office at Edmonton.

Before the work was started an undertaking was arrived at with the United States authorities that Canadian labour could not be supplied in view of the tightness of the Canadian labour supply situation. Within the last few weeks we have found it necessary to enforce the regulation somewhat more rigidly because we found that the projects that the United States authorities have in hand were draining off the men needed in other industries, for example the lumbering and logging industry, and also from the city of Edmonton itself. I may say in passing that this sheds some light on some of the speeches we have heard from hon. members on both sides of the house.

This control will be carefully and sensibly exercised. We certainly will not allow a situation to develop where men are allowed to remain idle in Edmonton. The indications at present are that we shall be able to place promptly any men who find themselves out of work.

I think it will be agreed by all hon. members that you cannot have one policy in one place and another in another. We are trying as far as it is humanly possible to put into successful operation what I would call the selective service policy. Apparently it is working in Edmonton on all six cylinders so far as labour supply for what I might call vital war industry in that part of the dominion is concerned.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO NATURAL GAS INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a statement regarding one amendment that I propose to make to the budget resolutions. In the budget speech I outlined certain tax proposals designed to stimulate the search for oil. Since that time I have received representations urging that these proposed arrangements be extended to apply to the natural gas industry. When the house is in committee on budget resolutions I shall move an amendment to allow operators in the natural gas industry to accumulate expenditure on dry holes, the drilling on which was commenced between January 1, 1943 and March 31, 1945, and write it off against producing wells subsequently found. It is intended also to amend the regulations regarding drilling costs to allow labour costs to be written off as a current expense in the case of productive wells, the drilling of which was commenced in the period January 1, 1943 to March 31, 1945.

RADIO

SHORTAGE OF BATTERIES FOR RECEIVING SETS IN RURAL DISTRICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): On behalf of my deskmate (Mr. Lalonde) I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) whether the government has taken any steps to remedy the situation arising from the acute shortage of batteries for radio sets in the rural districts.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that question could be placed upon the order paper.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COLDWELL

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MEMBER FOR DAUPHIN IN DEBATE ON MARCH 18

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I see that the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) is in his seat. Had he been in his seat when the session opened this afternoon I should have raised a question of privilege at that time. I was unavoidably absent last night, having an engagement at Rideau Hall, and therefore was not in my seat. During my absence the hon. gentleman made a speech. In that speech he quoted part of a sentence from a radio address given by me. The part he quoted was this:

> What can these men think of a war effort that does not hesitate to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to assist private industry—

He placed a question mark at the end of that, whereas he should have continued—

> —but refuses to give 13,000 workers a couple of million dollars a year to improve their depressed and substandard condition?

He then ended with these words, and they are the words of which I complain:

> He stops there.

I did not stop there, as I have shown. Then the hon. member proceeds:

> The hon. member knew just as well as I do that a meaner form of misrepresentation than that statement could not possibly have been made.

He alleges that when I made that statement I knew it was a misrepresentation. That, Mr. Speaker, is entirely against the rules of the house. Had I been in my seat at the time I would have requested that you ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that aspersion, and I so ask now.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): If I am permitted to reply, I have not the press clipping with me at the moment; it is in my office. But in the clipping there is a period after the word "industry". Why should the hon. member not have gone on and explained to his listeners over the air—

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not discussing that phase of it. The hon. member could have obtained the original copy of my address from my office at any time. I ask that the accusation made be withdrawn. That is the point at issue.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is complaining that what was said by the hon. member for Dauphin is a misrepresentation of what he said, in that he did not complete the statement quoted from the hon. member's speech?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, Mr. Speaker, may I correct that? The hon. member said last night:

The hon. member knew—

That is, I knew—

—just as well as I do—

That is the hon. member for Dauphin.

—that a meaner form of misrepresentation than that statement could not possibly have been made.

That is, he said I knew I was making a mean misrepresentation. The hon. member's remarks are reported at page 1376 of Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had been in the house at the time that statement was made and if I had been in the chair and he had asked that the statement be withdrawn, I should have had to ask the hon. member to withdraw it. I think the hon. member should withdraw that statement as being an implication directed against the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. WARD: In the first place, of course, the speech was made outside of this house.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member's speech was made in the house.

Mr. WARD: However, sir, I bow to your ruling that it was not a misrepresentation. But while I am on my feet I should like to say this, that I took it for granted that the hon. gentleman was an intelligent man, and as an intelligent man he must have known it was a misrepresentation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Dauphin must realize that his last statement simply accentuates what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar complains of. The withdrawal should be unequivocal.

Mr. WARD: Then, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw.

[Mr. Ward.]

OFFICE ECONOMIES CONTROL

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESIGNATION OF COLONEL JOHN THOMPSON AS DIRECTOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. R. LaFLECHE (Minister of National War Services): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to make a statement. I wish to announce that Colonel John Thompson, D.S.O., K.C., has resigned from the position of director of government office economies control, and that his resignation has been accepted by order in council P.C. 2198 of yesterday's date, copy of which I should like to lay on the table of the house.

When Colonel Thompson informed me that he wished to retire I asked him to carry on, but he said he could not do so. I replied that if he insisted I should have to recommend the acceptance of his resignation, which I should do with deep regret.

It would seem to me to be in the national interest that I acquaint this honourable house with certain facts. My purpose is to make it possible to achieve the economies desired by the government when it created the government office economies control, to the directorship of which Colonel Thompson was subsequently called. There has been a good deal said and written around the personality of that gallant gentleman and officer, Colonel Thompson, and his activities as director of the control office in question. It would not be fair to the nation or to Colonel Thompson to fail to place these further facts on the record.

It will be recalled that the incident began with a newspaper article. The article quite naturally created some considerable interest; I may say that it did so far as I was concerned, because I had not the slightest intimation of what was coming. Since then the matter has received further publicity, with some asserting and some denying but few continuing to think much of the very purpose of the control office, namely economy. Recalling that public officials cannot do justice to their duties and cannot successfully carry on the nation's business in an atmosphere such as has been created; and so that it may be possible to carry on the government office economies control, let me read into the record the contents of the following documents. Following the appearance of the article on March 4 I wrote a memorandum to Colonel Thompson as follows:

An article headed "Crazy Waste Stymies Economy Director Thompson; Charges work is Hampered; 'Evasion, Subterfuge and Trickery' are being used" which appeared in the Journal this afternoon has been brought to my attention.

As I have told you several times, the task of director of economies is a difficult one. I also told you that one can best succeed in such a task by gaining the cooperation of all concerned.

You have explained on previous occasions that you do not give statements to the press. Therefore, I assume that whoever wrote the article in question did so without your authority.

I suggest to you that the Minister of National War Services is the person to whom you should report any evasion, subterfuge or trickery which you may encounter. It is very liable to arouse resentment on the part of departmental officials generally to read articles such as the one in question without having opportunities to explain to their superior departmental officers or minister. Without an opportunity of making known their side of the question, at the same time they are criticized publicly, can only create unrest and instill thoughts of unfair treatment. The article mentioned herein above is condemnation of officials without warning and, still more, without giving them any opportunity of bringing their explanations to attention. It is not permissible to compromise the reputation for loyalty and patriotism of officials.

I have already assured you of my support but I cannot make it effective without knowing your difficulties. In this connection let me repeat that I am convinced that the members of the public service are readily amenable to conviction. Indeed, in my opinion, they would be only too anxious to learn and to implement their desire to practise every possible economy. It must be realized that work cannot be done without the necessary tools; modern administrative practice demands certain facilities without which the costs of administration would be much greater than they would be otherwise. Our job is to see that the work is well done at a minimum cost.

I am sure that much can be done to make a success of the office of economies control and would like you to be guided by the principles herein set out. I think that together, you and I, we can bring to the attention of those concerned certain views regarding economy, which would be immediately accepted once known and appreciated. We can also arrange to relieve the departments of much of the pressure which is bound to make itself felt because of war time emergency, which is a very definite factor of many requirements.

The fact that you are serving without remuneration is much appreciated. Should the volume of the work you have undertaken be too great a burden upon you and your present staff, then I will be very glad to give you further assistance. Should this be the case, please let me have your remarks when I shall pass them on immediately to the Civil Service Commission.

On March 6 I had a memorandum from Colonel Thompson as follows:

Apropos of an item I saw in the press, either last night or the night before, I wish to say that at no time has there been any interference by the government, or yourself, or any member of parliament, with this office in the performance of the duties allotted to it by order in council.

Then we had an article appearing in the Montreal Standard on March 6.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Was there any answer to the letter to Colonel Thompson dated March 4, which the minister read?

Mr. LaFLECHE: It is like travelling through the countryside; as we move on we see other things. I shall come to that in a moment. This article in the Montreal Standard is headed:

Thompson Not Angry Before but Boy! Listen to Him Now.

Ottawa, March 6.—"I wuz misquoted," growled Colonel John Thompson, or words to that effect, as he wiped his forehead and reached to answer the phone.

"No, that wasn't what I said!" he shouted into the mouthpiece. "Do you think I'd use those words! There's been no interference from the government." Indignantly he banged down the receiver.

"Eleven million people in Canada and ten million are reporters and they've all called this morning," he said bitterly as the phone rang again.

I read this because I think Colonel Thompson has a right to be heard in these matters.

"Reporters," he declared as an afterthought, "it's getting so that it's not safe to say good morning to them. If they can find any way to make it come out 'good night' they'll do it."

The phone stopped long enough for the fiery colonel to launch a denial of quotations attributed to him. These quotations said that he had suffered government interference in conducting his economy drive.

The fracas started Thursday when the Ottawa Journal accredited the colonel with saying "He found it increasingly impossible to cope with all the crazy waste and extravagance, and that evasion, subterfuge and outright trickery are being used to nullify his work."

That was a natural. Gordon Graydon, house leader of the Progressive Conservatives, licked his political chops and used some strong words in the commons yesterday. He declared that Colonel Thompson should be called before the public accounts committee to tell the worst.

Whereupon, Major-General L. R. LaFlèche, Minister of National War Services and Thompson's boss, arose to say that he had never heard of any interference from departments, and besides, Thompson didn't make statements to the press.

"Subterfuge! Evasion!" said Colonel Thompson this morning with the look of a man who'd like to get his hands on a certain person. "Do you think I'd use words like that? Do you?"

To make his position very clear and definite, the colonel to-day dispatched by messenger a letter to his boss, General LaFlèche, in which he declared: "There has been no interference by the government or members of parliament, or yourself, with respect to the duties allotted to this office."

Colonel's Statement

Then, calming down for a few minutes, he said:

1—Gordon Graydon went out on a long, long limb by using the Journal story as a basis for a tiff. "He got off on the wrong foot. He may look silly."

2—If he felt the government interfered in his job to cut down expenses he'd quit in five minutes. He's a dollar a year man, thus independent.

3—He wuz misquoted.

"I'm pretty sore about anything I say in confidence and then have that confidence violated and grossly exaggerated," he said. "What I said originally was that I wouldn't be a rubber stamp. That is, I wouldn't stand for anyone ordering something and then presenting me with the bill when my approval was needed before the order was made.

"That's happened in a couple of cases, but 'subterfuge' and 'evasion'—after all."

Besides he wuz misquoted.

The public will have the chance to determine for itself who said what.

It was announced this afternoon that T. C. Douglas, C.C.F. member for Weyburn, Sask., had made a notice of motion that the standing committee on public accounts "be empowered to investigate the statement of Colonel John Thompson charging evasion, subterfuge, and outright trickery."

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have to mention family names; but everyone will understand the reason.

I come now to a memorandum dated March 10—this month. This is the reply I received, and it is addressed to me by Colonel Thompson:

Reference your memorandum of the 4th March, I stated emphatically and distinctly to the reporter that there was no news of any sort or description to give him. It is unnecessary for me to say that I did not use the language which appeared in the Journal.

As I informed you yesterday, I did mention a couple of matters which had, a considerable time ago, been disposed of, to the effect that the Minister of Finance had saved a considerable sum of money with regard to the proposed printing of a booklet, in respect of which I had appealed to him.

I have not spoken to you about the various protests that come to me from different boards and departments, as I considered that this was a burden for the director to carry himself. If every protest which is made to this branch is to be carried to you, it would appear to me that a fourth grade clerk could easily do that.

With regard to the question of staff, it is quite correct that we require additional staff, but not the type that one could obtain through the Civil Service. I have asked Mr. Stapleton, who is the economist of the Canadian National Railways, to have an interview with you with regard to the type of staff which we require and which, hitherto, we have been unable to induce the persons approached to give us as part time assistance.

On the 16th of this month the following memorandum was addressed to me by Colonel Thompson:

This is my resignation, to take effect on Saturday next, the 20th instant, or at an earlier date if convenient to you. My reasons for resigning are on entirely personal grounds.

I wish to add that at no time has there been any difference of opinion between us on office matters.

We come again to the newspapers, but I shall not take the time of the house to read them. Then follows a memorandum dated to-day, and handed to me late this morning. It is addressed to me by Colonel Thompson:

I enclose copy of a leter I wrote to The Honourable C. G. Power, with reference to an item in one of this morning's Ottawa papers.

I might add that I did not make any statement that I would be willing to appear before a parliamentary committee to give evidence of waste in the air force. I know nothing whatsoever about any waste in the air force.

Colonel Thompson kindly attached a copy of his memorandum of this date, which he had addressed to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). Here it is:

There is an item in one of the morning papers to the effect that I said there was waste in the air force, and that I would be willing to give evidence before a parliamentary committee to that effect.

I never made any such statement and, in a brief interview, I never mentioned the air force, either directly or indirectly.

I might add that the relations between the air force representative and this office, have always been most cordial, and any questions at issue have always been discussed in a frank and open manner.

I have already laid on the table of the house a copy of order in council P.C. 2198, but may I read into the record the letter I wrote Colonel Thompson this afternoon:

Dear Colonel Thompson:

I have just received the enclosed certified copy of order in council P.C. 2198 of yesterday's date from which you will see that your resignation from the position of director of the division of government office economies control has been accepted.

In forwarding this copy of the order in council mentioned hereinabove, may I again express regret at your resignation which has resulted in the termination of our official relations and express appreciation for the services you have rendered without remuneration.

It would be of assistance to me if you would kindly let me know just when you intend to leave as I must make necessary arrangements without losing any time to see that the work of your office is carried on without interruption.

Will you please accept my very best wishes for your happiness and success in whatever further occupation you may take up. I shall not fail to take advantage of your very kind offer to give me advice in the future for the furtherance of the very purpose for which the government office economies control was set up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By whom is that signed?

Mr. LaFLECHE: By me.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has Colonel Thompson received it yet?

Mr. LaFLECHE: He should have; I know the leader of the opposition understands.

Mr. GRAYDON: As a matter of fact I do not.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Then I regret that the hon. member does not. Recalling that public officials cannot carry on with the nation's business in an atmosphere such as has been created, and that I cannot make it possible to carry on the office of economy control without clearing the atmosphere, let me say that I entirely fail to see any charges or accusations of crazy waste, extravagance, subterfuge or trickery. On the contrary my impression is that turmoil has been created, perhaps thoughtlessly and more likely amusingly—

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister quoting from something now?

Mr. LaFLECHE: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood those words were used before.

Mr. LaFLECHE: I am quite certain the Prime Minister would tolerate no extravagance, subterfuge, trickery or evasion, and I know equally well that in view of the absolute necessity of helping to win the war by making a success of his fourth victory loan the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would not be a party for one second to such things as have been mentioned. I have done my best to find out what there was at the bottom of all this. I have certainly not wanted in any way to injure the reputation of one of Canada's gallant officers of the last war, and a gentleman who is known for his honesty and sincerity. On the other hand I do not want to be a party in any way to permitting anything to be done which would hinder the possibility of practising economies, wherever they can be made.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wonder if the minister would allow a couple of questions? Was there any reference whatsoever to waste in the air force in the first article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal? My recollection is that the one matter denied by Colonel Thompson, namely waste in the air force, was not referred to either directly or indirectly in the article which started this discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister did not say it was.

Mr. LaFLECHE: Because of my hoarse voice it is possible that the hon. member did not understand me when I read. Colonel Thompson makes it very clear that he refers to the papers of this morning.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was not mentioned at the opening interview which allegedly was given by Colonel Thompson.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may be permitted to ask a couple of questions, I am sure the minister will not object. Is there any denial from Colonel Thompson of the other allegations of waste allegedly made in the first interview reported in the Journal? And, my second question: Did the minister receive a memorandum in writing from Colonel Thompson or through the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) in reference to the question of economy, prior to the alleged interview in the Journal?

Mr. LaFLECHE: My hon. friend's first question resembles very much that which he put to me more than two weeks ago, as I recall it. I have asked my secretary several times to make absolutely certain whether or not I have received any such documents as mentioned by the hon. gentleman and the answer was no. That must be my answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What about the other matter?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Did the Department of Public Works in any way come under the jurisdiction of the government economy director, Colonel John Thompson? If not, why was that department not brought under his jurisdiction?

Mr. LaFLECHE: By the provisions of the order in council all the departments were brought under his jurisdiction.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Following up the question which my colleague put, will copies of the files or letters which were turned in to the minister by Colonel Thompson on his resignation be available to members of the committee on public accounts when it convenes?

Mr. LaFLECHE: That is a question that will be answered in due time. I am very sorry that certain gentlemen seem to take the information I have given in bad grace, or hesitatingly, shall I say.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, when the budget debate was adjourned last night we were discussing the term "free enterprise". The sooner that free enterprise becomes the line of real demarcation between the members of this house, the better. Then we shall have this house divided into two proper groups, those who are in favour of free enterprise as it is practised to-day, the coupon clippers, on the one side, and those working for humanity on the other.

Last night I was proceeding to give an example of the type of thing which we in this group oppose. I refer to an agreement, dated August 19, 1941, which was tabled in this house between His Majesty the King in right of Canada and the International Nickel Company of Canada. Reading from this agreement I find:

Whereas part III of the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, provides that, the governor in council, in order to increase or conserve Canada's supply of foreign exchange, may enter into agreements with persons to grant assistance by way of special tax credits. . . .

And further:

Whereas the company is the principal world producer of nickel and is actively engaged in serving the war and defence requirements of the British empire and the United States. . . .

I believe it was also actively engaged in serving someone else before the war. Then, after several more "whereases" I find this:

Whereas the company represents that from the standpoint of commercial considerations such an increase in capacity is in its opinion unwarranted, principally for the following reasons, viz., (i) to provide for a substantially greater output of nickel in 1943 would interfere with and adversely affect the company's long-range mining programme designed to preserve the life of the mines and stabilize costs for a long period of time; and (ii) the increase in capacity, with the attendant special capital expenditures, would be provided at a time when the outlook is most uncertain. . . .

In view of the various considerations thus set forth:

. . . the government under the provisions of part III of the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, hereby grants assistance to the company as follows:

[Mr. LaFleche.]

In computing the amount of the profits of the company for the purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, to determine the liability of the company to pay tax under the said statutes in each of the five calendar years, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945, a deduction by way of special depreciation allowance against the cost of depreciable assets included in the said project shall be permitted. . . .

Then on page 5 of the agreement these amounts are set out.

Up to December 31, 1945, not to exceed in the aggregate $25,000,000.

That is $5,000,000 a year. Then on the last page of the agreement I find the various expansion projects set out which are to be undertaken by the company at a total cost of $34,000,000, as follows:

Mining
Mine surface plants, shafts, permanent underground development, open pit development and permanent mine equipment.

Concentrating
Permanent plant building, extensions and crushing, grinding and flotation equipment.

Smelting
Reverberatory building extension, together with one additional nickel reverberatory complete with a superimposed bank of 6 roaster furnaces and one additional nickel converter.

Miscellaneous
Plant extensions and equipment for miscellaneous auxiliary services, such as transportation, power, et cetera.

Nickel Refinery
Plant extensions and equipment for additional electrolytic nickel capacity together with additional facilities for leaching, reducing and calcining department.

The total estimated capital expenditure is $34,000,000, against which the government is compensating the company by a reduction of their taxes to the tune of $25,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct. It is not a reduction from their taxes. It is a write-off of their investment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I read the exact wording.

Mr. ILSLEY: Read it again.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It reads:

In computing the amount of the profits of the company for the purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, to determine the liability of the company to pay tax under the said statutes in each of the five calendar years, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945, a deduction by way of special depreciation allowance against the cost of depreciable assets included in the said project shall be permitted. . . .

Mr. ILSLEY: Not from their taxes, though.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. From their profits for purposes of taxation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: For purposes of taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The excess profits tax is now 100 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is really 80 per cent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One hundred per cent with 20 per cent returnable.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know, and the hon. member does not know either whether the company is in that class. It may be in the 40 per cent class, in which event his argument goes entirely.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They are allowed in their returns an amount of $5,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly, $5,000,000 a year, to be deducted from their gross income for tax purposes. I would ask the hon. gentleman not to twist that into a statement that this means $5,000,000 off their taxes each year because it does not.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am just giving the words of the agreement as it stands. This is the company which in 1941 declared a net profit of over $34,000,000, and according to the press of March 16 last, its net profit for 1942 was $33,301,829. It seems to me that in view of the very favourable position in which this company finds itself it could have been expected to carry on this expansion programme on its own. But the government is really granting it for taxation purposes the amounts set out in the agreement. It would almost seem good business for the government to build a plant, rent it to the company for the duration of the war, and then perhaps sell it to the company. This company has the right to Canada's ore; it uses Canadian workers in its mines, declares immense profits, and then is allowed these large deductions from its profits in making its taxation returns for the excess profits tax, which now amounts to 80 per cent, the other 20 per cent being returnable.

Mr. HOWE: My colleague drew attention to the fact that this company is not in the 80 per cent class. I feel quite certain that that is the case. I think the hon. member should use the figure "40" instead of "80".

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, its profits over a period of years before the war were some of the best in the history of the company.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would put them in the 40 per cent class.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should be glad if the minister would make a statement as to where this company actually stands. This is the type of "free enterprise" to which we object. Apparently this company is granted certain privileges, although under free enterprise it is supposed to stand on its own feet.

Yesterday this group was attacked because of our stand last year on Bill No. 80, to amend the Natural Resources Mobilization Act. Our stand was this: We were quite willing to support the conscription of our man-power in the winning of this war if the government would spread that conscription and nationalization to include the industry and finance of this country. We believe that it is not right to ask men to give their lives while companies are permitted to continue to make profits.

I wish to compare the treatment handed out to this company with the treatment accorded to agriculture. There are 700,000 farmers in Canada; they represent about one-third of the population. In 1942 fewer than 1,500 earned sufficient to come into the income tax group—and our income tax for married persons is applied to earnings as low as $1,200. Any Canadian industrial concern whose industry was depressed in the period prior to the war is granted certain concessions, and any loss it may have sustained in the period 1936-39 is taken into consideration in computing excess profits and corporation taxation in time of war. I do not find in the present budget any such provision for the farmers. I believe that the statement was made that if any loss occurred in 1942 the farmer would be permitted to spread it over 1943 and 1944; but how about his losses in the past ten years?

Agriculture in this country, and I speak particularly for the province of Saskatchewan, in which I reside, as well as the west generally, went through almost ten years of merciless depression. I have lived among the western farmers all my life. I know their condition; I have shared their troubles; I have worked in their fields; I have taught their children. I have seen these people come through smiling after ten years of fruitless toil, disappointment and hopelessness. I have the honour to represent in this house a constituency one-third of whose population is of Ukrainian birth. These people are making a noble contribution to Canada in every field of national life; they are fine Canadians. Along with men of other nationalities they shed their blood at Dieppe and Hong Kong, and they are willingly making sacrifices. Those engaged in agriculture want to help with everything they can to win the war; and they know how to grow food. That is the farmer's business. The government has neglected to take into consideration the welfare of the people who are providing the life-line of Canada's war effort. The government has let them down seriously and badly. During the periods of depression most of the farmers were unable to get any return on their labour, and their debt piled up, interest being compounded on interest, until now that debt is almost unpayable. I should like people to realize what kind of job it is for farmers to work on day after day, year after year, with that load of unpayable debt, a debt which this government seems to be doing very little to remove. Preparation for last year's harvest, the largest in Canada's history, was extremely difficult. The farmer finds himself unable to plan his production this year, for many reasons. One of them is that he has no idea whether the boy who is still on his farm—if one yet remains—is to be allowed to stay there. The government should issue an order that any farmer who maintains a certain production, be it of dairy produce, beef, cattle, wheat or other necessary articles, will be guaranteed his labour. In that regard there has been no direct policy upon which the farmer can rely.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): I do not rise for the purpose of stating that I will not support the amendment or the subamendment to the motion, or that I will support the budget as presented by my colleague. My purpose in taking a few moments of the time of the house this afternoon is to set forth some facts which on their face may appear to have more of local than of national interest. But I believe that they are due to the people of this country, and particularly to the electorate of New Brunswick.

The first matter to which I wish to refer is the statement made yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) with regard to the disposal of potatoes from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I believe that, in view of the good reputation which the potatoes from the island and New Brunswick enjoy, not only on the Canadian market but on the United States market, and to relieve the minds of growers in both provinces, it is only fair that the explanation which was asked for yesterday should be immediately placed on record and brought to the attention of the public.

As reported in Hansard, at page 1355, the hon. member for York-Sunbury said:

Prices for seed stock have always been higher than prices for table stock, but I understand that now the wartime prices and trade board have either imposed an embargo on the export of seed potatoes to the United States, or have made such export subject to licence. I suggest to the minister under whose control the matter would come that this is a mistake from every point of view. A determined effort should be made to change that position, and I would ask the member of the government responsible to direct that the whole matter be reviewed. Not only shall we lose the export market in the United States, and the greatly enhanced price of the product; we will lose what I consider to be of at least equal value, the good-will of our customers across the line.

I have communicated with the department responsible for this situation and have received this statement, which I wish to place on the records of the house.

There is no embargo on the export of certified seed potatoes to the United States. For some time it has been felt that certified seed potatoes have been exported from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to the United States to be used as table stock, thus depleting the supply of seed potatoes required in Canada and the United States for seeding purposes this spring. The Department of Agriculture, in cooperation with the provinces, has undertaken to encourage potato growers across Canada to use certified seed this year in order to increase their production of potatoes. To prevent seed potatoes from being exported for use as table stock and to ensure sufficient seed to meet our own requirements, the export of these potatoes has been placed under permit. The export permits branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the Department of Agriculture, to whom requests will be submitted, may examine the bona fides of each shipment and decide whether or not a permit should be granted. Regard will always be had to the seed requirements of the Canadian growers. It will be seen that this regulation is not intended to prevent the growers of potatoes in the island or New Brunswick from exporting seed potatoes; its purpose is to ensure sufficient seed potatoes for the coming season, not only for Canadian growers but for those in the United States. People in the state of Maine have been buying our best potatoes as table stock. I am sure that the minds of the potato growers of Canada will be relieved and that they will feel satisfied that this regimentation has been adopted in their best interests.

There is another matter which I wish to bring before the house. For the last two weeks the opposition in the legislature of New Brunswick has seemed to give more attention to the discussion of federal problems and the federal government and federal ministers than to a discussion of their own provincial affairs. This was started on March 4 by the leader of the opposition in the legislature when he criticized the federal government for having failed to utilize the resources of New Brunswick in the prosecution of the war and when he charged the federal government with discrimination against New Brunswick in the expenditure of public moneys for war purposes. He stated that all that had been given to New Brunswick was "chicken-feed." This criticism was taken up and repeated by some of his followers in the legislature and, as was to be expected, it was echoed in this chamber on the night of March 15 by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen).

No objection can be taken to anyone in New Brunswick or anywhere else criticizing the action of this government and the manner in which public moneys are expended. We are fighting to preserve that right. If the matter had remained a purely local one, I would not take up the time of this house in discussing it. Until this morning I was at a loss to understand the reason for this sudden change of attitude on the part of the opposition in the New Brunswick legislature. If I recall aright, last year they took exactly the opposite attitude. They refused to the government the privilege of discussing federal matters and complimenting the federal government upon what it had done for the province. They based their argument upon the ground that this was not a matter that pertained to the provincial government.

We read in this morning's press a report of a news item from Montreal to the effect that the hon. member for York-Sunbury is to resign and Mr. Bracken is to run in his place. This may partly explain the sudden change in the attitude of the opposition in New Brunswick and their interest in federal matters. This report has been denied by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and I am afraid that this will act as a frustration of the enthusiasm of his hyphenated friends in the legislature. If it were only a matter of political expediency or tactics or warfare, I would not have mentioned it, but I am afraid that this criticism which has received headlines in the New Brunswick newspapers and recognition in the national press will lead to the belief that the resources of New Brunswick are not being utilized to the fullest extent. The natural deduction will be that New Brunswick is not contributing to the war effort to the extent of its capacity, and nothing could be further from the truth than such an assumption.

The resources of New Brunswick are being used 100 per cent in the war effort. The province has a recorded population of 457,401, of whom thirty-five per cent are of French extraction. The province has supported the war effort 100 per cent with its man-power, an achievement which has not been excelled by any other part of the country. The material resources of the province have been used 100 per cent in the war effort as have the financial resources. Quotas for all victory loans have been oversubscribed. The principal industries of New Brunswick are agriculture, lumber manufacturing and fishing. I defy anyone to say that the men engaged in those three basic industries are not serving their country in the best manner possible. They are working to 100 per cent of their capacity in their respective callings. The industrial and manufacturing facilities of the province are being used in the war effort 100 per cent. With a population of barely over 450,000 people distributed over a relatively large territory, it stands to reason that there are no large centres of population in that province. Moreover there is no large industrial centre in the sense that this term is understood in central Canada. Unfortunately we have no large electric power developments, no large manufacturing plants in the sense that this term is generally accepted. But we have a number of smaller plants distributed all over that province, and they have been used to their full capacity.

It is possible that those who have made criticisms are under the impression or labour under the delusion that war industries and war plants are being planted by the dominion government in different parts of the country to gratify local pride or political friends or special interests. I must say that the government's attitude toward using industry in Canada for the war effort has not been to create and develop industry in competition with plants and industries already existing. On the contrary, the efforts of the government have been to use fully for war purposes all industrial capacity which existed before the war. And no different treatment was meted out to that province than to any other section.

Unfortunately, on account of local conditions—lack of power, manufacturing facilities, and technical labour—it was impossible to establish large industrial war plants in New Brunswick. But if there had been such facilities, why is it that those who are interested and who are now criticizing did not offer their services, their capital, their management talent, their manufacturing facilities? All the industrialists of the province—and there were many—who volunteered their services, who wanted to contribute something to war industry, who had something to contribute, have not only been encouraged to do so but have been helped financially to place their facilities at the command of the government.

What did take place? When the war started I took it upon myself to see that New Brunswick should be given an opportunity to contribute to its maximum capacity toward the war effort in the industrial and manufacturing line. For that purpose gentlemen in whom I had full confidence, who I knew could, because of their past activities and success, well advise the government and the several war departments, establish relations with industrialists in the province and look after the interests of the province, were invited to Ottawa. They were placed in the Department of Munitions and Supply and were given positions in which they could in the discharge of their duties look after the interests of the industrialists of the province. I shall name them, because they are men of outstanding reputation, and the mention of their names will not detract at all from their good reputation.

We have Lieutenant-Colonel W. A. Harrison, who is executive assistant to the minister, Department of Munitions and Supply. Colonel Harrison was a retired gentleman who could well afford to spend his days in leisure. In the month of January he was summoned by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) from Florida. In four days he was in Ottawa and since then has been here working without remuneration. Doctor J. R. Petrie, director, displaced industries division, Department of Munitions and Supply, was a professor in the university of New Brunswick, a New Brunswick boy who has been brought here to look after the interests of that province. Mr. W. F. Knoll, in charge of wires and nails, office of the steel controller, was, I understand, manager of an industrial plant in Saint John and has been invited to serve in the office of the steel controller in the capacity in which he could best exercise his talents. I would also mention Mr. B. W. Kelley, chief engineer, maritimes subcontract division, Department of Munitions and Supply, and Mr. Frank M. Ross, director general, naval armament and equipment, Department of Munitions and Supply.

What has happened? Let us take a Cook's tour round the province of New Brunswick and see what industries we have which were invited to contribute and have contributed to the war effort. Travelling eastward from Ottawa we enter the province at the gateway at Campbellton. There we have the McLennan Foundry and Machine Works Limited, and J. and D. A. Harquail Company Limited; at Dalhousie there is the New Brunswick International Paper Company; at Bathurst, the Northern Machine Works and Canada Iron Foundries; at Buctouche there is J. D. Irving Limited; at Moncton, Clark Ruse Aircraft Limited and Humphrey Woollen Mills; at Port Elgin, the Copp Woollen Mills; at Sackville, Enamel and Heating Products, Limited and Enterprise Foundry Company, Limited; at Petitcodiac, the Lawson Machine Works; at Sussex, the Wallace Manufacturing Company; and at Saint John, T. S. Simms and Company Limited, Murray and Gregory, Provincial Wood Products Company Limited, Saint John Iron Works, E. S. Stephenson and Company, J. Fred Williamson, Courtenay Iron and Brass Foundry, Saint John Machine Shop Company, Wilson Boxes, Toronto Shipbuilding Company and Saint John Dry Docks and Shipbuilding Company. At Fredericton, there are Horsnell Machine and Iron Works, Hartt Boot and Shoe Company, John Palmer Company and Palmer-McLellan Shoepack Company. At Devon there is Creighton and Smith Limited. At Upper Gagetown, McMulkin and Sons; at St. Andrews, the Vaughan Shipbuilding Company, and at Bristol, John Mead and Sons; at Hartland, the New Brunswick Potato Products Limited, potato dehydrating plant, and at Grand Falls, Pirie Potato Products Limited, potato dehydrating plant.

That makes thirty-four industrial plants in New Brunswick which have received war contracts directly from the Department of Munitions and Supply, and some of which have received capital assistance when it was needed. Not all have received capital assistance, because all did not need it.

We have eleven other industrial firms which have neither received capital assistance nor demanded any and which have not received war contracts directly from the government but whose industrial plants have been working efficiently and continuously to their maximum capacity for the war effort. These companies are: at Campbellton, W. H. Miller Company and Restigouche Company Limited; at Bathurst, the Bathurst Pulp and Paper Company Limited; at Nelson, Geo. Burchill and Sons; South Nelson Lumber Company Limited; L. J. O'Brien; at Moncton, LeBlanc and Lockhart, woodworking factories; at Fredericton, Fraser Companies Limited; at Edmundston, Fraser Companies Limited; L. H. Morneault woodworking plant. Naturally there are more woodworking plants and lumber mills than tank and gun factories, because New Brunswick is a lumbering province; lumber is the main industry. These eleven firms never received government advances of any kind, nor have they received direct government contracts, as far as I know. They are, however, using the natural resources of the provinces to their maximum capacity, in the war effort.

Let me now give the miltiary establishments. New Brunswick has not been overlooked, disregarded or discriminated against in this particular. For a small province we have quite a number of establishments, as follows:

Army
Saint John, military district headquarters.
Sussex, training centre.
Tracadie, rifle range.
Utopia, advanced training centre.
Fredericton, training centre No. 70.
Edmundston, training centre No. 71.

Air
Chatham, Salisbury, Moncton, Saint John, Scoudouc, Pennfield.

Navy
Saint John.

Now what about the amount of actual money expended in that province since the beginning of the war? The total is $78,712,178.12, made up as follows:

Department of Munitions and Supply
Dollar value of contracts	$37,832,903 00
Capital expenditures	21,463,065 58
Department of National Defence (army)	7,674,531 53
Department of National Defence (navy)	2,127,489 31
Department of Transport
Airports	2,577,190 23
Seamen's branch	75,000 00
National Harbours Board	857,302 31
Canadian National Railways	4,646,375 00
Department of Public Works	1,458,321 16
Grand total	$78,712,178 12

I could give the details for each of these departments, to indicate where the money has been spent. It has been claimed by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) that the city of Saint John did not receive its share. Well, some may claim that the war expenditures of the government should have been distributed according to population, but to me that is a ridiculous claim, because expenditures are governed by the exigencies of war, by the requirements in connection with our defences, by the nature of the places where it is expedient that something along this line be done in the best interests of the defence of Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: Like Deep Brook.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, Deep Brook is a place where it was found necessary and expedient to make some expenditures. Just to show how difficult it is to make a distribution according to population, even in the little province of New Brunswick, despite all our efforts it has been impossible to spread the "chicken-feed" evenly across the province, though we have tried not to allow two or three old hens to get it all. We have not always been successful, notwithstanding all the efforts we made, to apportion the money as between Saint John and the rest of the province. Saint John constitutes about 11 per cent of the population of New Brunswick, but the war expenditures in Saint John constitute about 14 per cent of the grand total spent in that province. These expenditures were made up as follows:

War Expenditures in Saint John (capital)

Department of National Defence (Army)	$ 2,448,274 82
Department of National Defence (Navy)	500,000 00
Department of Transport
Seamen's branch	75,000 00
National harbours board	857,302 31
Department of Public Works	1,458,321 16
Department of Munitions and Supply
Capital expenditures	5,999,600 37
Grand total	$11,338,498 66

Therefore I think neither the city of Saint John nor the province of New Brunswick has reason to complain of discrimination or that, to use the expression used the other day by someone from that city, the federal government has not pumped enough money into Saint John. I do not think that statement can be justified. If large war industries, or more war industries, have not been located in New Brunswick, whose fault is it? Is it the fault of the government, or is it the fault of the capitalists, the industrialists and the swivel-chair critics who had an opportunity to offer their services, their capital, their manufacturing and managerial talents, and their skilled labour? Not one of those who could guarantee production and delivery was turned down, irrespective of politics or creed; all were given a chance to produce and deliver. I defy anyone to contradict that statement.

If we had established some large industrial plants in New Brunswick, we would have had to build mushroom towns for them; we would have had to impose very difficult problems upon local municipal authorities. The first problem would have been that of housing; the second would have been that of municipal services. That would have necessitated, on the part of municipal governments, the incurring of large capital expenditures, and the consequent development of large capital debts. Had we followed the policy of establishing three or four large plants in the province, we would have developed local jealousies and would have hurt local pride. Instead of throwing the "chicken-feed" to a few old hens, we distributed the feed throughout the province, with the result that there is not one local plant which has not had a chance to contribute its full 100 per cent capacity to the war effort. I am satisfied this was the best policy which could have been followed in that province. In that respect I took the trouble to consult many public-spirited citizens, men of long experience in municipal and provincial public affairs, men experienced in financial and industrial ventures, and they all agreed that we must avoid a post-war problem. After the war, at least in some centres, in respect of some industries, there will be industrial demobilization; this is bound to happen. Had we encouraged a mushroom overgrowth in some municipalities in the province, we would have developed a condition which would be bound to have its reactions, and we would be left holding the bag.

Whatever may happen, I am sure the government will not have to assume responsibility for having caused annoyances in respect of special local problems. I am sure the people of New Brunswick will be able to revert to normal, without any commotion, without disturbance, and without having to labour under heavy municipal debts incurred during the war for the purpose of carrying on services and helping war industries which could not be maintained to 100 per cent producing capacity after the war.

Those who are not satisfied, those who criticize the government are the ones who have not lifted a finger to try to promote, foster or encourage any special industry in New Brunswick. There are those who sit back in these years and clip their coupons. They will criticize, but they will not risk their dollars in war industries, or ventures of that kind. Now that there is no possible chance, according to the hon. member for York-Sunbury, for Mr. Bracken to try to seek election in New Brunswick, I hope the provincial opposition will revert to its duty of minding its provincial affairs and attending to its own business, without devoting its time in the legislature to federal matters.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) who spoke in the house on Friday last evidently realized that the most important subject before the country to-day is that of man-power. I wish to congratulate him upon his able and courageous speech, in which he appealed for unrestricted conscription, coupled with scientific allotment of civilian workers to essential occupations. He gently chided the members of the Progressive Conservative party for having "now become a bit cloudy on the man-power issue". I intended to deal with this suggestion, but it is not now necessary for me to do so, because the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) pointed out that compulsory selective service was one of the important planks in the platform adopted at Winnipeg.

May I recall the fact that on June 13, 1941, I called upon the government to introduce unrestricted compulsory national selective service. Hon. members will therefore realize how delighted I was when, about a year later, on June 16 last, the hon. member for Lambton West gave such logical and convincing reasons why this was the only way to bring about equality of sacrifice—and incidentally preserve national unity—in an all-out war effort, and urged the immediate introduction of unrestricted compulsory selective service. I admire the courage he showed in taking that position in opposition to the leader of his party. But he had the satisfaction of knowing that he had the support of a vast majority of his constituents.

My advocacy of unrestricted compulsory selective service two years ago was not popular in many parts of the house, and in particular with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who warned me of the danger of fomenting national disunity. However, he eluded the fact that those seeds of disunity had already been sown in Quebec since the last war, by the Prime Minister and the supporters of the present government. Surely within the last few months we have had abundant evidence of the truth of this assertion from the government's own followers in the house.

In February last I stated unequivocally that the man-power muddle was due to the government's failure to put compulsory selective service into effect—and when I use this term I mean not only compulsory service for our armed services anywhere, but also compulsion in putting men into the jobs for which they are best fitted, in the factories, on the farms, or in the mines. Surely this is what is meant by selective service—a service which must be compulsory when the nation's life is at stake. This is something which cannot be left to the caprice or voluntary choice of the individual. In no other way can we have equality of service and sacrifice.

It is unnecessary for me to repeat the arguments in favour of compulsory selective service made so effectively by the hon. member for Lambton West, which should be put into effect even at this late day, because that is the only way to solve our present man-power crisis. This crisis has been brought about by encouraging voluntary enlistments from the farms until they are now largely depleted of men, and in many instances there is not enough labour to carry on. Many farmers have had to sell their stock and abandon their farms, and discontinue their operations, thus interfering materially with the production of foodstuffs. Because we are calling for men to go on the farms does not mean that we were wrong in asking for compulsory selective service for our armed forces; for if there had been no restrictions placed in the National Resources Mobilization Act in 1940 we would not be in our present unhappy position in respect of labour, and the present man-power crisis would have been averted. A sufficient number of men would have been left on the farms to ensure the maximum production of food for both ourselves and our allies.

It was because of the acute situation on the farm that I asked a couple of weeks ago for the return to the farms of Canada's home defenders, soldiers who have not been ordered to go overseas and who at present are mostly fulfilling no useful purpose. I am glad to learn that some action has already been taken in this regard. May I just add, Mr. Speaker, that this home defence army is a luxury which Canada could very well do without.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me? Does he not know that it was demanded last year that there be more defence for our coasts? Is my hon. friend's memory so short as that?

Mr. BRUCE: I will concede that those who are serving on the two coasts are needed. But those who are serving within the other provinces are not needed, I think, at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will find that what he calls the home defence army are mostly serving on the two coasts, except those who are in training centres, and they are relieving service personnel who are going overseas.

Mr. BRUCE: I have been under the impression that a very large number of the men in our home defence army are serving in other than coastal provinces. If that is not correct, I accept the minister's word, of course.

I understand that this home defence army costs in the neighbourhood of $32,000,000 a year in pay alone. I am sure that this amount could be better used by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for some other purpose at the present time.

I again urge upon the government, even at this, the eleventh hour, that they put through immediately the necessary order in council to make effective the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 passed at the last session; for in no other way will this man-power crisis be solved. Have we not the testimony of the government's own appointee, Mr. Elliott Little, a man of great executive ability, who after many months of futile effort to solve the problem of getting men to work where they are most needed, threw up the sponge and resigned because he was hamstrung by the government's policy and could get nowhere?

To what extremities have the government been driven when it is now suggested in some quarters that natives from Jamaica be brought here and that we use prisoners of war, as well as Japanese internees, to augment our man-power. Apparently the government are willing to adopt any subterfuge if they can only thereby escape their obvious duty of bringing in compulsory selective service.

It was interesting to hear the reaction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to the six-hour debate on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) on Tuesday evening. The disclosures made of the critical fuel shortage and the hardships suffered by Canadians as a consequence gave further evidence of the government's muddling of the man-power policy. The minister dismissed it lightly by saying that it had been a worth-while debate if it succeeded in bringing to the attention of the people of this country the seriousness of the present fuel shortage. I wonder if it would not more likely bring to the attention of the people the fact that their suffering had been needlessly caused by the evasive policy of the government in respect to man-power.

I want to refer for a moment to another subject, that of establishing an industrial court. We are witnessing to-day so many industrial disputes which are seriously interfering with our war-time effort that it seems desirable to find some solution of this ever-recurring problem. I believe a solution would be found in the establishment of an industrial court whose jurisdiction would be entirely confined to industrial and labour disputes and relations. The court should consist of three judges whose appointment and term of office would be identical with that of judges of the Ontario supreme court; the court's decision to be final and enforceable with the exception that on points of law there would be the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. If this procedure were followed it would permanently take industrial disputes out of politics and they would be promptly and equitably disposed of by such a court. There is a precedent in the United States in the Sherman Act and in Canada in the Combines Investigation Act. This industrial court would not make law. It would administer law. The laws would go through the regular sources of legislation. The court would have the advantage of handling only one class of cases, namely, matters pertaining to industry and labour. It would be in a position to give speedy decisions after the employers or employees had presented their cases in the same manner as cases are presented to other courts. The industrial court would have authority to see that its judgments were executed. If such a court were functioning, it would, in the opinion of many people, put an end to strikes.

There are one or two matters I should like to take up before discussing the budget as a whole. First, I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance the unfairness of the discrimination he has created in imposing taxes upon officers of the armed forces serving in Canada, whereas those serving overseas are exempt. I will illustrate my point by referring to the case of a medical officer who served for four years in the last war and who returned to find that his practice had disappeared and he had to begin all over again, with impaired health, although not sufficient to warrant a pension. Since the last war this officer helped by hard work to keep the militia alive during the misguided days when pacifist elements were forcing reduction of militia grants and abolishing the cadet corps. The men in the different regiments were so poor that many of them had to be provided with carfare, otherwise they would not have been able to attend parades. The officers supplied this money, usually out of their own pockets. Thanks to all this sacrifice, these officers maintained a nucleus of trained men to form skeleton regiments which were available to train raw recruits at the outbreak of the present war. The officer to whom I am referring enlisted again in 1939 and is doing essential work in the army in Canada. He finds himself, however, in this position: he is paying off the principal of a mortgage on his home, for which he receives some consideration by way of income tax ruling, but he is also paying off a bank loan obtained for the initial payment on his home, which he undertook to repay in monthly instalments but for which he receives no consideration from the income tax officers. I wish also to direct the minister's attention to a further injustice he is doing in treating as income, as is done in this case, the money that this officer is paying on a debt to the bank. He now finds himself in the position of being unable to pay off the loan to the bank if, at the same time, he has to make income tax payments. It seems to me very unfair to tax a man on money which is earmarked even before he gets it.

Another apparent unfairness is that of taxing officers of the armed forces on subsistence allowance. If they are living in barracks they do not receive subsistence allowance, but they are taxed on what it would be if they did receive it. These older officers should be given more consideration, particularly the ones who have served in both wars; for they have now almost eight years of war service to their credit. Surely it would seem only right and equitable that they be relieved of this tax, so that they may have the privilege of putting aside something for their old age or to enable them to meet commitments that they made before entering this war. I again ask the minister to give thoughtful and sympathetic consideration to these suggestions.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to another anomaly in his tax which should be speedily corrected. Officers and crews of tankers carrying oil from Canada to the United States and south American ports have to pay income tax. Although doing valuable service to Canada, they are not exempt because they are "employed by private business."

Mr. MARTIN: Nor are members of the merchant marine generally.

Mr. BRUCE: That makes it all the worse. The Department of Finance evidently does not believe that the risks run by officers and men of the merchant service in our submarine infested seas entitle them to the tax exemptions enjoyed by soldiers, sailors and airmen on service overseas. Merchant seamen are placed in the position of civilians not enlisted for the duration but merely invited by selective service to stay on the war job they are now doing until the war is over. I hope the minister will take into consideration doing justice to these members of the merchant marine.

We are hearing much these days about social security, and yet only $400,000 has been set aside to reestablish in civilian life in Canada the 80,000 men who have already been discharged from active service. This works out at $5 per head per annum. What a ridiculous sum! And yet an amount of 6½ million dollars is provided in the estimates for civilian air-raid precautions, which means that civilians who are really running no risk are being protected to this extent.

I am pleased that the Minister of Finance has accepted the principle of taking income tax on a pay-as-you-earn basis, but I am sorry that, having accepted the principle, he did not proceed courageously and equitably to forget all about the unpaid taxes of 1942. I say equitably advisedly, because it is not equitable. When the basis is changed from a past year to a tax on current earnings, it is neither just nor fair to add to present rates a so-called debt from the other year. There should have been a clean cut-away from the old basis to the new.

I know that an effort has been made to create the idea that such a procedure would have helped the wealthy man, and would be of no particular benefit to the poor man. What really happens is that it hits the classes of earners who have had little or no increase in income during the war, or who actually have suffered decreases because of the war. Those who go scot-free because their incomes have increased as much as or more than the income tax are not embarrassed by this additional impost or "hangover" from a discarded and faulty way of levying income tax. But the others I mention, who have really suffered financially by the old method of income tax, are now given an extra burden from 1942.

Those who have capital to dip into may do so cheerfully in many cases, because they think it is helping to win the war, but the others—and they are many—see in the finance minister's claim that there has been no increase in the rate of taxation nothing but mockery. They know they pay more, just as most consumers realize that they pay more than what passes over the counter for the items going into the cost of living. They know that the taxes they pay include a large amount for subsidies. Perhaps the extra $135,000,000 which the minister gets in this way from income tax may have been made necessary by the subsidy policy. The subsidy policy may have been a necessary accompaniment to the price ceilings policy, once it was adopted. War has always been accompanied by inflation, but the government seems to think that if it can disguise the inflation then it does not exist. What has happened is that the government placed those earning incomes from $2,500 to $7,500 in a special category. They should perhaps be flattered because they bear the heaviest burdens by far. They do not object to the fact that they will pay increased taxes by reason of the cessation of the deductions for national defence tax paid last year. It will be very hard for them, but they see that similar increases, according to ability to pay, will occur all along the line. To change to a 1943 basis and still charge any taxes for 1942 would seem to be adding insult to injury. They know it is only a way of getting extra taxes, but they think it should have been obtained by increased rates applied to those who have in 1943 an income that can be further squeezed.

After all, a man's ability to pay cannot be assessed by the actual size of his income. I am referring to the number of a married man's dependents, for which the income tax authorities make inadequate concession. Many earners had pledged a great deal of their income to saving for the future for old age and their dependents. But the imposts cut their income so far that they find themselves now living in larger houses than they can afford. Men who have sold such houses are regarded as being lucky because they can reduce their expenses. Others find that the smaller houses and apartments have increased rentals or sales prices to a point where savings cannot be made in this way; or the smaller houses and apartments are unavailable and it is to the public interest that those who occupy the larger houses should remain in them so as to leave more room for others. Many of them have regretfully had to reduce insurance and to drop enterprises in which they had already put considerable money. They are patriotic and willing and they do not deserve this impost on top of the larger taxes they will now have to pay. These people, glad as they are that the pay-as-you-earn basis is to apply from now on, with the exceptions noted, would have been better off for this year under the old system. It will be hard for scores of thousands to pay during the current year part of last year's taxes, as well as this year's. Possibly some help would be given if the extra payments were not so large, but there should be no hold-over from the 1942 basis at all. May I remind the minister that justice is always worth while.

I must congratulate the finance minister, and the Canadian people, upon his ability to collect and their ability to pay and lend the enormous sums he has asked and is going to ask from them. If he would only bring up his excellent lecture on inflation and collect in taxes and loans from the people who have increased incomes and who are spending them, and be just enough not to impose it in such a manner that it falls more heavily on some groups than on others, there would be even more reason for congratulations.

I have referred to the immense sums of money which the finance minister gets for spending in the departments. We are all behind him and them, so far as value and winning the war is concerned. But there is another service he should render, a service only second to the great one of collecting the taxes on as fair a basis as possible. He should see that the spending of the money is not wasteful. It is not fair for the government to ask sacrifices from the people without giving them the best possible example by reorganizing every department which can be run more efficiently for less money. I am informed by men familiar with the civil service that there is not a department which would not be better for a double process of reorganization and the pruning knife. Men thus made available would be paid for working for the national war effort with the money saved in such reorganization. I am aware that the finance minister has told his colleagues to cut down and that some changes have been made, but I am informed also, and I think the ministers know it themselves, that the changes made are small compared with what could be done if the job were courageously and intelligently tackled.

That part of the contemplated war expenditure which covers the sending of munitions to Britain, to Russia and to China is welcomed by us all. Brave fighters against the common enemy give full value by their fighting for all that we send. Canadians feel that it is a privilege to help them. We have a very special interest in our own fighting forces and we want to see them adequately equipped and supported. I am sure that these huge amounts which the minister collects will do far more damage to the enemy when we have a balanced and effective man-power policy and when the burdens are more evenly placed. Until that happens, we do not know how far we can go.

In conclusion, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance to remedy those parts of the income tax which tax capital as though it were income. The fact that a man can take his savings and buy a pension for his wife with them is taken advantage of by the income tax branch, which says that by that act he has changed the capital into income. If he had left it in the bank for her, she could have taken it out in the same yearly proportion without a tax. It is ridiculous and unjust to apply a tax in such a way as to stop such a praiseworthy provision for dependents, a type of provision which is very much in the interest of the nation.

[Mr. Bruce.]

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings): Mr. Speaker, since my time is limited I shall not attempt to debate the matters referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) in the speech which he has just read. There has been so much talk in this house recently about the shortage of wood for fuel that I was beginning to think Charlie McCarthy must be getting uneasy.

As those hon. members who have spoken already on the budget are anxious to have it concluded, I shall make my remarks brief and confine myself to matters pertaining to my own province of Prince Edward Island, the smallest and greatest province in Canada. If any member of this house doubts that assertion, let him remember that in proportion to its population Prince Edward Island has contributed a larger number of men to the three armed services than any other province in Canada; that Prince Edward Island has been the first to go over the top in providing money for the Red Cross, and that Prince Edward Island has been the first to exceed its quota by way of war savings certificates and bonds. We are not the richest province in Canada, but we are united. Like all other provinces, we are loyal. We have plenty of good fellowship. We have a good Liberal government, and a good Conservative opposition. We have no Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and no strikes. We have no social credit and no inflation.

Before taking up matters concerning my own province I should like to extend my heartiest congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the budget and upon his wonderful qualities of endurance. I would be the last to add to his burden, but I do agree with the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) when he says that the postage on third-class mail should have been increased instead of the postage on letters. The postage on letters has been three cents an ounce or fraction thereof; the postage on circulars has been one cent for two ounces or fraction thereof. Anyone who has ever handled material of this kind knows that circulars are much more difficult to handle than letters. They are uneven in size; they cannot be put up in packages like letters; yet they go through the mails at the rate of one cent for two ounces, and that rate has not been increased. The Minister of Finance would do well to increase the postage on circulars from one cent for two ounces to two cents for one ounce. It might eliminate a good deal of that class of mail matter, but we could afford to have it eliminated, besides receiving a higher revenue.

I wish to refer to the need for a second car ferry on the Cape Tormentine-Borden route between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. This matter has been agitating the minds of the people for the last year. A year ago the new car ferry, which cost this country over $2,000,000, was lost. Since then they have been trying to carry on the service there with a car ferry which is thirty years old—over the age limit. I have received petitions and resolutions passed by all the boards of trade of Prince Edward Island regarding this matter; and according to the newspapers, both the Patriot and the Guardian, the legislative assembly of that province has passed a resolution asking for the immediate construction of a new car ferry. I shall read the resolution:

Whereas the citizens of Prince Edward Island through their several organizations have requested the legislative assembly in session assembled to insist that the dominion government build a new car ferry at once to replace the ss. Charlottetown,

And whereas all the members of the legislative assembly fully recognize the dire situation in which the province finds itself as regards transportation facilities with the mainland;

And whereas the dominion government is emphasizing the increased production of food products for 1943;

And whereas almost the entire exports of the province are food products essential to war requirements, and the total outward movement of freight cars for the year 1942 amounted to 17,500;

And whereas the very existence of the citizens of the province depends upon continuous transportation facilities because almost all the essential fuel, fertilizers and large quantities of mill feeds and concentrates for the production of butter, cheese and meat products must be imported;

And whereas the essential requirements of the various services of the armed forces in the province greatly increased the tax on transportation facilities and greatly decreased the carrying capacity of the car ferry for other purposes;

And whereas the present car ferry is being worked to the utmost limit of its capacity and has proved inadequate to cope with our freight situation, because the ss. Prince Edward Island has only two-thirds of the freight carrying capacity of the ss. Charlottetown;

And whereas the volume of traffic is increasing enormously and in addition much of the freight formerly moved by steamer must now be ferried;

And whereas in the opinion of this legislature it is totally unsafe to rely upon one aged ferry, over thirty years old and which has already met with two serious accidents this winter, to maintain the essential services already set forth;

Therefore resolved that the legislative assembly of the province of Prince Edward Island petition the government of Canada to take steps to build a new car ferry, as a war measure to be ready for the 1943 fall trade.

I have several other resolutions here from different boards of trade in the province asking that a new car ferry be constructed in time for the 1943 trade, but I shall not take time to read them. I should like, however, to read a report by Mr. J. W. Boulton, secretary of the potato growers' association of Prince Edward Island, who is one of our best authorities. He is reported in the press as saying:

We export annually approximately 3,000,000 pounds of butter, 1,000,000 pounds of cheese, 4,000,000 bushels of potatoes, 1,000,000 bushels of turnips, over 3,000,000 dozens of eggs, 1,268 carloads of live stock, 223 carloads of dressed meat, 700,000 pounds of canned meats, 313 cars of fish and canned fish products. This is the equivalent of at least 8,400 minimum cars of food supplies.

This all has to be ferried across by an old car ferry which is over thirty years of age.

Now for imports. In the production of our crops we must import at least 900 carloads of fertilizers, and if the ground limestone is added it brings the figure to well over 1,000 cars. We are unable to estimate the volume of space required on the ferry to bring in the necessary supplies for the air training centres, the army and the navy. This is entirely apart from all the additional materials which must be imported if we are to exist.

One item for instance is fuel. This province is dependent almost entirely on coal and oil all of which must be brought into the province. We are obliged to import a tremendous quantity of mill feeds and concentrates for the production of butter, cheese, eggs and meat products without which we could not produce the quantities now marketed.

The newspapers of Prince Edward Island are teeming with reports of numerous meetings, at which speeches have been made concerning this matter. In fact, a gentleman who was defeated at the last election—naturally he was a Conservative—suggested at a meeting in Charlottetown that an indignation meeting should be held in connection with this car ferry matter. The mayor of Charlottetown, also a Conservative, who holds one of the highest and most responsible positions in the province with the Department of Pensions and National Health, suggested, too, that an indignation meeting be held in Charlottetown. That is the condition existing at present in Prince Edward Island. The people are determined to have a new car ferry built at once, and we do not want any more procrastination.

I have asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to have his officials look into the possibility of constructing a frost-proof potato shed at Sackville, New Brunswick, for the purpose of storing Prince Edward Island potatoes during the winter, and I feel sure he will do his best in the matter. If we had such a shed, potatoes, after being graded, could be brought over in the fall and stored at that point; then the shippers would be in a position to send them to any part of Canada or the United States during the winter when markets would be at their highest. I believe that last year the loss to the farmers of Prince Edward Island through potatoes being frozen as a result of poor storage have been more than enough to meet the cost of such a frost-proof potato shed.

Within my memory there have been five ice-breakers built by the dominion government to maintain winter service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The average cost of these ice-breakers has been about $1,000,000. The Charlottetown, which was lost, cost the government over $2,000,000, and now we are to have another one built at a cost of $3,000,000. If we add the $3,000,000 to what it cost to build the other five, we get the figure of $8,000,000. Then, according to the figures given in this house the other day by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Michaud), in the last ten years the deficits from the operation of that car ferry have totalled $4,000,000. The deficits by years were as follows:

1933	$ 288,144 18
1934	383,942 00
1935	360,334 36
1936	303,439 89
1937	333,287 34
1938	387,643 58
1939	426,854 05
1940	460,773 48
1941	423,650 75
1942	591,095 36
Total	$3,959,164 99

If we add this $4,000,000 to the figure I have already mentioned, we have a total of $12,000,000, and all that money is gone. Undoubtedly the repairs to these ferry boats for the last fifty years would bring that total to at least $20,000,000. The point I wish to make is that for the last fifty years or more our people have advocated the construction of a tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. If this tunnel had been built fifty years ago it would not have cost over $20,000,000, which is the amount we have spent since that time in providing service by car ferries, and now we have nothing to show for it except one car ferry which is thirty years old. We are now building a new car ferry at a cost of $3,000,000, but in another year we shall still have only one boat, because the old Prince Edward Island will probably be obsolete by that time. Then we shall have to spend another $3,000,000 for another car ferry, because we cannot get along with one boat.

The public recognize that a tunnel would be the best solution from a practical point of view, because the cost of a tunnel has been spent since the government began to make an honest attempt to give us daily winter communication with the mainland. It would be the right solution from an economic point of view. It would also be the right solution from an employment point of view, in the interest of our returned soldiers. We can talk as much as we like about what we intend to do for the returned soldiers. It seems that we are to create a utopia to offer them when they come back, but we might as well stop talking about that. The social security plan being prepared by the Department of Pensions and National Health and the plan for the rehabilitation of returned soldiers are all to the good, and I am glad they are under way, but the first thing we must do when the soldiers come back is to see to it that they have employment until they are settled on the land or established in their respective callings, and I think the construction of a tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland would provide an immense amount of employment. I believe this tunnel should be commenced as soon as this war is over. This is the only means of fulfilling the terms of confederation, which were that we would have daily communication between the island and the mainland. The Prime Minister and his grandfather, William Lyon Mackenzie, before him have been exponents of responsible government. It would be a grand climax in his life if he were to be the man to fulfil the terms of confederation by having this tunnel constructed between Prince Edward Island and the mainland and I hope this work will be started during the premiership of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I may ask my hon. friend a question, what have been the interruptions in the ferry service during the last year? I know there have been several, and I was wondering if my hon. friend could tell the house about them.

Mr. GRANT: In one case the propeller broke, and we were lucky to get it repaired and replaced in less than a week, because they were able to have it repaired in Charlottetown. Then there was another interruption, but at the moment I cannot remember the reason. There were two interruptions this winter, and in addition, as most people know, we came close to losing the car ferry not so long ago.

Mr. GRAYDON: Once in a while the island becomes almost isolated, I understand.

Mr. GRANT: Yes. I wish to thank the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) because he has reminded me of something we are advocating at the present time. We should have on Prince Edward Island a slip of sufficient capacity to take this car ferry when it needs repairs, instead of having to send it to Saint John, in dangerous waters, or up the St. Lawrence river. I believe the government are considering the construction of such a slip in Prince Edward Island, which is not considered to be in dangerous waters.

Mr. GRAYDON: You certainly need some help in regard to transportation between the mainland and the island.

Mr. GRANT: Yes. The hon. gentleman has been so kind that I should like to congratulate him upon his appointment as house leader of his party. As hon. members know, at the Winnipeg convention is was rather amusing when the Conservative party again changed its name. People across Canada were smiling, but I wish to congratulate the Progressive Conservative party, because they could not have chosen a better man to laugh it off.

I am sorry that the ex-leader of the exit Conservative party is not in his seat at the moment, because he has been in the habit of flying over to my province and trying to deposit poisonous spawn, if not on the leaves of our potatoes, then in the minds of our people. He has been telling them that they have no representatives in the house who will rise in their places and speak, although at the same time he knew very well that the same would apply to every province, because we overflow our benches. Not only do we fill the Liberal side of the house, but we require at least a third of the space on the opposition side. That is why hon. members on this side of the house who wish to get down to business, and get home some time within twelve months, do not speak so often. When we do speak we perhaps show a lack of practice.

The ex-leader of the exit Conservative party has said that New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have the best potatoes in the world. I wish to correct that statement. Prince Edward Island has the best potatoes in the world; Ireland has the next best, and perhaps New Brunswick would come third.

It is my honest opinion that we have too many political parties. The constitution should be changed so that there would be only two parties, the government and the opposition and if men like the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation wish to enter politics, let them enter one or other party, and try to improve it. That is democracy. When I referred to entering one or other party I was not referring to every hon. member who sits opposite, but had particular reference to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

For some time the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has been a great exponent of the Japanese cause.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member should clarify what he means when he says I have been an exponent of the Japanese cause. He should state of what particular Japanese cause I have been the exponent.

Mr. GRANT: I did not have reference to the war. I am referring to before the war —and since the war, too.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Japanese I have been concerned about are not Japanese; they are Canadians. Possibly my hon. friend does not know that?

Mr. GRANT: Some have said that the hon. member for Vancouver East must be part Japanese himself, but, Mr. Speaker, I assure you that is not so. He was born in my constituency in Prince Edward Island, of good, honest and decent parents. They were old Scotch people right from Scotland, and there were certainly no Japanese in that part of the country. There were a few Chinese around there—but no Japs.

We have heard too much talk about national security, post-war problems and social security. Let us take the advice of Mr. Churchill, Mr. Roosevelt and our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and leave most of these matters for the consideration of the younger generation, after the war is over. It would be too sudden a change altogether if after the war we had everything we would like to have. We must go into these things gradually. What we have done is all very well; but we cannot have it all arranged before the war is over. In this connection I believe I could not do better than quote Pope's famous couplet:

> Be not the first by whom the new are tried,
> Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at six p.m.

Monday, March 22, 1943

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GAS AND COKE—LOW TEMPERATURE CARBONIZATION PROCESS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. What study has the government made of the possibility of using a low temperature carbonization process to provide gas and coke from Canadian coal?

2. Has the government investigated the claims made public in the Globe and Mail on March 5 by the patentee of the Caunt retort?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1 and 2. Studies of the more promising low temperature carbonization processes in operation in Europe and the United States were made by the mines branch of the Department of Mines during the period 1920 to 1930 when low temperature carbonization was a subject of particularly wide interest. Most Canadian coals were tested on a laboratory scale at the fuel research laboratories and the results of these tests were published in departmental reports. Subsequently arrangements were made to test Nova Scotia coal by one of the most promising processes developed up to that time and operating in South Wales. This test is reported in mines branch report No. 721, investigations of fuels and fuel testing 1929. The report concludes with the following statement: "In conclusion, it might be stated that it appears to the writers that in the case of the Sydney coal field there is an exceedingly good chance of converting bituminous coal into a domestic product, coomparable to the existing fuels used for heating in central Canada, economically."

The hoped for development in Nova Scootia did not materialize and the anticipated expansion in low temperature carbonization generally did not take place.

Regarding the claims published in the Globe and Mail of March 5, 1943, to the effect that excellent coke and other valuable products can be recovered from inferior coals, it may be observed that these are the general claims made by most promoters of low temperature carbonization processes and they have not shown them to be commercially practicable in Canada. Although engineers of the mines branch have kept fully informed of the development of the so called Caunt low temperature process since its inception in 1927, they have no knowledge of it being developed on a scale to enable the claims made for it to be established.

TAXING OF WHEAT POOL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What decision has been reached by the government with reference to taxing the wheat pool organizations of western Canada?

2. Will this taxation be retroactive and, if so, to what date?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. It is not the intention of the government to have any change made in the provisions of the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act which exempt the income of cooperative companies and associations from taxation thereunder; but, in view of opinions given by the Department of Justice, after an investigation of the facts, that certain corporations, referred to in the question as the wheat pool organizations of western Canada, do not qualify for tax exemption under such provisions, it is felt desirable that the questions of facts and of law pertinent to the liability of such corporations for tax be brought before the courts for investigation and final determination.

The Department of Justice has advised that the most practical method of getting these matters before the courts in a manner that will provide opportunity for a full investigation of all pertinent questions will be to assess such corporations, so that they may appeal from such assessments in the usual way if they continue to dispute liability.

It is the intention of the government to make such assessments and, if appeals are made by the taxpayers, the government will be prepared to discuss with the representatives of these corporations such arrangements as may be necessary to provide that the costs of such appeals to the corporations will not be greater than would be occasioned to them by a reference to the courts by the government itself.

2. This question cannot be answered at this time.

MOBILIZATION ACT—STUDENTS WHO FAIL IN EXAMINATIONS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. In carrying out the enforcement of the mobilization act, has the government taken any steps to allow students to finish their education before being called to the armed forces?

2. Under existing regulations of the mobilization act, is a student failing in his examinations forced to give up his studies?

3. Will the government allow a student who fails in examinations to try again or grant him a postponement?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes. See section 12 of national selective service mobilization regulations with amendments up to January 28, 1943.

2. Subject to certain conditions, including those in section 12 of said regulations a "student" may lose his right to postponement if he fails to pass any term or yearly academic examination within the meaning of paragraph (c) of subsection 3 in section 12. It is for the university, college or school authorities in question to decide whether or not such a student may continue his studies.

3. Yes, if in the opinion of the university, college or school authorities and the district officer commanding such failure is due to circumstances beyond the control of such student and he should be permitted to continue his course of studies.

FRENCH BATTLESHIP "RICHELIEU"—ENLISTMENT OF CREW MEMBERS IN FIGHTING FRENCH FORCES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Were any members of the crew of the french battleship Richelieu, undergoing repairs in New York, sent on to Canada to enlist in the fighting french forces for transfer to Britain?

2. If so, when and how many?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under arrangements made some time ago with the United Kingdom and fighting french authorities recruits for the fighting french forces are granted transit privileges through Canadian ports en route to the United Kingdom. The Canadian authorities do not normally enquire into the antecedents of bona fide members of allied forces passing through Canada. It is understood, however, that among the recruits for the fighting french forces who have reached Halifax during the last few weeks there have been some who had previously served on the Richelieu and on other french naval vessels moved to the United States from north Africa. Concerning the number, the government have no detailed information.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—LIABILITY TO CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What is the amount of the present liability of the Canadian wheat board to the chartered banks?

2. What is the interest rate that is being paid on this loan?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The liability of the Canadian wheat board to the chartered banks as at February 16, 1943, was stated in the appendix to the budget speech (page 42) to be as follows:—

Wheat, $91,880,239; flaxseed, $7,444,191; oats and barley, $227,257; soybeans, $1,032.

2. 3 per cent.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF 1942 WHEAT CROP

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What arrangements are being made to permit the farmers of western Canada to deliver the allotted quotas of 14 bushels per acre?

2. What steps are being taken to accept delivery of the balance of the 1942 crop?

3. Is there any possibility that the farmer will be allowed to deliver his 1942 crop in western Canada this year?

4. What arrangements are being made to assist the farmer in case he cannot deliver his crop?

5. What is the estimated quantity of, (a) wheat, (b) coarse grains, still in storage on the farms of each of the three prairie provinces?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. By increasing delivery quotas as rapidly as transportation and storage permit. On March 13, 1943, 1,040 out of 2,108 delivery points in the west (49 per cent) were on a 14 bus. delivery quota basis; 340 delivery points (16 per cent) were on a 12 bus. delivery quota basis; 684 delivery points (33 per cent) were on a 10 bus. delivery quota basis; and 44 delivery points (2 per cent) were on an 8 bus. delivery quota basis.

2. Total marketing from the 1942 western wheat crop during the crop year 1942-43 are restricted to 280,000,000 bus. This quantity of 1942 wheat will be taken as storage and transportation permit. After August 1, 1943, and up to July 31, 1944, either 1942 or 1943 wheat may be delivered up to 14 bus. per authorized acre.

3. See No. 2.

4. Given adequate transportation, the government's 1942-1943 programme will be implemented. If available transportation proves inadequate the government will take steps to deal with such problems as may arise therefrom.

5. Official statistics of farm stocks as at March 31, 1943, will be published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on April 15, 1943.

CONSTRUCTION CONTROL

Mr. BENCE:

1. Who is the controller of construction?

2. Whom did he succeed?

3. Where is the office of such controller?

4. Was the office of the controller of construction moved from Ottawa to Toronto?

5. If so, on what date?

6. Was such office moved back from Toronto to Ottawa?

7. If so, on what date?

8. How many persons are employed in the office of the controller of construction?

9. Did any persons employed in this office resign from their positions after the decision to move this office back to Ottawa had been made?

10. If so, what was the number of such persons?
11. What was the cost of moving the office back from Toronto to Ottawa?
12. Why was it so moved?

Mr. HOWE:

1. John Schofield.
2. C. Blake Jackson.
3. Ottawa.
4. Yes.
5. April 25, 1942.
6. Yes.
7. February 8, 1943.
8. In Ottawa, 36 including the controller; in Montreal, 3; in Vancouver, 3.
9. Yes.
10. Seven.
11. No accounts have been rendered to date covering the moving of the office of the controller of construction from Toronto to Ottawa.
12. The office of the controller of construction was moved back to Ottawa because of recent developments in the United States priority system. This made it imperative to have closer coordination with certain other control offices now in Ottawa with a view to simplification of procedure for the general public in applications for licences, materials required in such construction, and for priority assistance required in connection therewith.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—BRITISH COLUMBIA—CHARLES S. HENLEY

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. What living expenses have been paid to Charles S. Henley, special representative for British Columbia on the staff of the director of national selective service for each calendar month since his appointment?
2. Has he, in addition, been paid any travelling expenses?
3. If so, in what amounts for each of the calendar months since his appointment?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1, 2 and 3.

	Travelling expenses	Living expenses
April, 1942	301 76
May, 1942	174 10	48 44
June, 1942	88 60	191 01

February, 1943 ...	46 20	102 15
Totals	$1,255 93	$1,036 65

[Mr. Bence.]

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—PURCHASES FROM ZEPHYR LOOMS AND TEXTILES LIMITED

Mr. HAZEN:

What was the value of the goods purchased by the Department of Munitions and Supply from Zephyr Looms and Textiles Ltd., in 1940, 1941 and 1942?

Mr. HOWE:

1940, $4,274,095; 1941, $1,231,505; 1942, $4,894,439. Total $10,400,039—for Canadian account.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—M. & C. AVIATION COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How much money, if any, has been advanced to the M. & C. Aviation Company, Limited, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, by way of capital assistance?
2. What amounts have been paid by the Department of Munitions and Supply to the said company for services rendered or materials supplied, during the years 1940 to 1942 inclusive, by years; and what amount, if any, still remains unpaid?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The Department of Munitions and Supply has granted capital assistance of $199,875 to the M. & C. Aviation Company Limited of which $111,638 has been paid as of December 30, 1942.
2. None, except as stated in question 1. Payments for services rendered or materials supplied have been made by the Department of National Defence for Air.

COMPENSATION TO DISTILLERIES FOR DISCONTINUING PRODUCTION OF SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Was any compensation paid or promised to any of the Canadian distilleries upon the discontinuance of the production of spirituous liquors by them?
2. If so, how much, and to whom?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

MANUFACTURE OF INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL FROM WHEAT

Mr. BENCE:

1. How much industrial alcohol was manufactured in Canada in 1942?
2. How much of such industrial alcohol was manufactured from wheat?
3. What quantity of wheat was used in such manufacture?
4. Is industrial alcohol being manufactured from wheat at the present time?
5. If so, where is it being so manufactured?

6. What is the anticipated amount of wheat to be used in the manufacture of industrial alcohol in 1943?

7. What is the anticipated amount of industrial alcohol which is to be manufactured from wheat in 1943?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Approximately 5,450,000 gallons sold.
2. Approximately 1,400,000 gallons.
3. Approximately 700,000 bushels.
4. Yes.
5. Amherst Distilleries Limited, Amherstburg, Ontario; British Columbia Distillery Company Limited, New Westminster, B.C.; Canadian Industrial Alcohol Company Limited, Corbyville, Ontario; Commercial Alcohols Limited, Montreal, P.Q.; Distillers Corporation Limited, Montreal, P.Q.; W. & A. Gilbey Limited, New Toronto, Ontario; Gooderham & Worts Limited, Toronto, Ontario; Melcher's Distilleries Limited, Berthierville, P.Q.; Montreal Products Company Limited, Montreal, P.Q.; Quebec Distillers Limited, Valleyfield, P.Q.; Joseph Seagram & Sons, Waterloo, Ontario; United Distillers Limited, Vancouver, B.C.; Hiram Walker & Sons Limited, Walkerville, Ontario.
6. Approximately 7,000,000 bushels.
7. Approximately 14,000,000 gallons.

IMPORTS OF WOOLLEN GOODS, 1939-42

Mr. DUROCHER:

What was the value of woollen goods imported into Canada under tariff items 554, 554A, 554B, 554C, 554F, and 555, during the years 1939 to 1942, both inclusive?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Canadian imports— Tariff	1939	1940	1941	1942
	$	$	$	$
554	596,056	695,160	1,154,493	918,990

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COAL AND IRON ORE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

1. Has the Department of Mines and Resources made any investigations, extensive or otherwise, as to the quantities of coal and iron ore in the province of British Columbia?
2. If so, what amounts of coking coal are estimated by the department in existence or in reserve in the various coal areas in British Columbia including that of Comox area?
3. What amounts of iron ore are estimated by the department to be available or in existence in British Columbia?
4. What districts are the various iron ore deposits located with, (a) the amounts of iron ore estimated in each district, and (b) the analysis of the various iron ore?
5. In regard to estimates made by the department as to the quantities of coking coal and iron ore in the province of British Columbia how do these estimates compare with that of estimates put out by both the provincial government of British Columbia and that of private interests?
6. On what dates were the various investigations made by officials of the Department of Mines and Resources regarding iron ore deposits and coking coal in the province of British Columbia?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Return tabled.

FARNHAM, QUE., INTERNMENT CAMP—VEGETABLES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. How many tons of turnips were grown at the internment camp, Farnham, Quebec?
2. Were any other vegetables grown at that camp?
3. If so, what kind of vegetables and what quantity of each were grown?
4. To whom were these turnips and other vegetables sold?
5. At what price were they sold?
6. Did the government receive the proceeds from the sale of these vegetables?
7. If not, who did receive the proceeds?

CONTROLLERS

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What are the names of all the controllers appointed by the federal government since the beginning of this war?
2. Where is the head office of each controller and what production or consumption does he control and where are the branch offices of each controller located throughout Canada?

PACIFIC COAST WHALING STATIONS

Mr. STIRLING:

1. How many whaling stations operated on the Pacific coast in 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942, and where are they located?
2. How many ships were operated in connection with those whaling stations in each of those years?

3. How many whales were killed resulting from those operations in each of those years?
4. How many men were employed, (a) at the whaling stations, (b) on the ships, in each of those years?
5. Is the government considering means for expanding the whaling industry because of the value of the meat, fat, oil and bone derived therefrom?

Mr. McLARTY: Order for return.

Mr. STIRLING: Is not all that information in the records of the Department of Fisheries, and would it not be quite easy to answer it as a question?

Mr. McLARTY: The information which was given to me and confirmed by the department was that it concerns the Departments of Fisheries, Trade and Commerce and Munitions and Supply, and the wartime prices and trade board.

TASHME JAPANESE CAMP

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. What rent is paid for the Tashme Japanese camp?
2. What is the assessed value of the property?
3. What is the amount of the taxes?
4. Who pays the taxes?
5. How much money has been expended in alterations or additions to the permanent buildings?
6. How much money has been expended on the water works?
7. Were any furnace radiators installed, if so, for what purpose, at what cost?
8. What amount has been expended for fuel, (a) coal, (b) wood?
9. What agreement is there as to disposition of improvements of permanent buildings and water system at end of the lease?

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CAPITAL ASSISTANCE TO PRIVATE INDUSTRY AND GOVERNMENT CORPORATIONS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. In each province what is the total amount of capital assistance given by the Department of Munitions and Supply to, (a) private industry, (b) wholly owned government corporations, since war was declared?
2. What is the total volume of all orders given by the Department of Munitions and Supply to all Canadian industry?
3. What is the amount of all war orders given to private industry in each province?

BONUS OR SUBSIDY ON BEEF

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Have any payments been made or promised to the packers by way of bonus or subsidy on beef since December, 1942? If so, what are the particulars?
2. What price does the army pay packers for beef per pound at Vancouver, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal?

[Mr. Stirling.]

PARLIAMENT HILL—CLEARING OF ROADS AND SIDEWALKS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What authority is given for the clearing of roads and sidewalks in winter around the houses of parliament and approaches thereto?
2. Who is in charge of this work and what does it cost?
3. Who is responsible for the dangerous condition of same?
4. Does the government or crown accept responsibility for damages to the public who are injured or may be injured as a result?

CURTAILMENT OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. What steps are being taken by departments of government to curtail the issue of non-essential and essential government publications in Canada?
2. What publications were completely discontinued in the year 1942?

PLEBISCITE, 1942—COSTS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. What is the detailed account of legal service performed by Messrs. Pender and West under treasury board minute T.202571 B., February 5, 1943, and total amount paid for these services?
2. Were any legal advisers appointed by the government to assist the chief plebiscite officer in the dominion plebiscite taken in 1942?
3. If so, what were their names and their salaries or other emoluments?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

PAYMENTS TO CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. MARSHALL:

What amounts other than salaries and car allowances were paid to cabinet ministers during the year ended December 31, 1942, and what services were performed covered by these payments?

REPRESENTATIVES OF FARMERS ON WAR BOARDS

Mr. FAIR:

1. Since the commencement of the war, how many boards have been set up that directly affect the farmers of Canada?
2. What are the names of those boards and who are the members thereof?
3. What are the names of the practical farmers on each of those boards?
4. What are the names of the members of those boards who have been recommended by organized agriculture?
5. By whom were the remaining members recommended and what are their qualifications?

BONUS TO FIREWOOD DEALERS IN YUKON

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Will dealers in firewood in Yukon be paid a bonus per cord on wood?
2. If so, what bonus, and on wood cut until what time?

3. Will the government charge stumpage on wood so bonused and if so, what stumpage per cord?

4. What proof is required of the quantities of wood on which bonus will be paid?

5. Through what agencies will such bonus be paid, and when?

ORANGES, ETC.—IMPORTS AND SUBSIDIES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

What quantities have been imported and what subsidies have been paid or remain to be paid on importations, up to March 1, 1943, on the following commodities, (a) oranges, (b) orange juice, (c) other orange products, (d) grapefruit, (e) grapefruit juice, (f) prunes, (g) any other dried fruits?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WESTERN DEBT CONFERENCE

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of all memoranda, submissions and other documents presented to the dominion government by the western debt conference, since June 30, 1942?

PURCHASE OR RENTAL OF BUILDINGS AND OTHER SPACE SINCE SEPTEMBER 1939

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. For a list of all the buildings purchased by the government, or its agencies, in the city of Ottawa and within a radius of 20 miles, since the commencement of the war, together with the following information in each case, (a) the name of the vendor, (b) the selling price, (c) complete description of the property acquired, (d) the purpose for which the property was used immediately prior to purchase, (e) the assessed value placed thereon by the city of Ottawa, (f) the purpose for which each building is used.

2. A list of all the buildings and other space presently rented by the government, or its agencies, in the city of Ottawa, and within a radius of 20 miles, with the following information, (a) the name of the landlord, (b) the purpose for which each building and other space is used, (c) the date of the first leasing by the government, or its agencies, (d) the yearly rental, (e) complete description of the property, (f) the assessed value thereof, (g) the length of the lease and whether there is a termination clause.

GOVERNMENT LIQUOR REGULATIONS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between E. P. Taylor of Canadian Breweries Limited, H. W. Molson of Molson's Breweries Limited, Norman Dawes of National Breweries Limited, and the Prime Minister, since December 16, 1942, regarding government liquor regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Return tabled.

BUILDING OF ATLANTIC COAST FISHING BOATS

Mr. ISNOR:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the government dated from January 1, 1941, to the present time relating to the building of fishing boats to be operated on the Atlantic coast under the dominion government, fishing boat subsidy or any other plan.

BUILDING OF PACIFIC COAST FISHING BOATS

Mr. ISNOR:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents in the possession of the government dated from January 1, 1941, to the present time relating to the building of fishing boats to be operated on the Pacific coast under the dominion government, fishing boat subsidy or any other plan.

USE OF FARM PRODUCTS IN PRODUCTION OF POWER ALCOHOL OR SYNTHETIC RUBBER

Mr. PERLEY:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, reports and other documents passing between Mr. M. M. Rosten and the Minister of Agriculture or any officials in the Department of Agriculture, or any officials in the Department of Munitions and Supply, with respect to the use of wheat and other farm products in the production of power alcohol, or synthetic rubber or in and towards the production of any article afterwards used to produce rubber.

ENGINE WORKS AND TRADING COMPANY, MONTREAL

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, memoranda, reports and other documents received from any commissioner, investigator, or any person exercising similar function, who investigated the operations of Engine Works and Trading Company of Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, the documents referred to are confidential. An investigator was appointed to make a confidential report to determine whether or not a prosecution was warranted in this case. It was found that a prosecution was warranted; the confidential report was turned over to the Department of Justice, and a prosecution ensued. I must insist that the confidential report to myself is a privileged document.

Motion dropped.

ALUMINUM PLANTS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all contracts, agreements and other documents in the possession of the government, dated from September 1, 1939, to the present, relating to undertakings concerning the erection of any new aluminum plants, or additions to plants, in Canada, together with any orders in council, contracts, agreements or understandings, regarding depreciation or rebates to be allowed by the government from amounts otherwise payable under excess profits tax or other tax legislation; also a copy of any agreements regarding financial aid or undertakings by the government of Canada in the erection of such plants, or any similar agreement, of which the government has knowledge, made by the company with any other government.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRESS REPORT AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF QUEBEC PROVINCE WORKERS IN MAINE SUGAR BUSH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. It is reported that an arrangement has been concluded between the minister and the government of Quebec which will enable some three hundred men from the southern counties of that province to go to the state of Maine to work in the sugar bushes there. Has such an arrangement been concluded, and if so, on what terms and conditions will these men be allowed to leave Canada? In view of the serious shortage of farm labour, will the minister tell the house what reasons actuated him and the selective service administration in agreeing to issue the necessary permits to these three hundred men?

Mr. SPEAKER: I rather think this is a question which should be placed on the order paper. The latter part of it asks for a declaration of policy on the part of the government.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I think Your Honour might readily allow this question to be answered. It is a matter of considerable urgency. If the question were to be placed first in Votes and Proceedings and afterwards on the order paper, by the time it was answered these men might have completed their work in the sugar bush and returned to Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: The first part of the question might be answered, but the latter part, asking for a declaration of policy, should surely not be answered on the orders of the day.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of the question. I find upon inquiry that representations have been made to the department with respect to this matter, but as yet no decision has been made.

OIL

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO CLOSING DOWN OF ALBERTA WELL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Has the government been informed that in at least one case in Alberta an oil well which produced 576 barrels daily of clean, frothy, pipeline oil, was cemented over and has been left closed to this present day?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The hon. member gave me notice of his question. I have made inquiries in my department and find that we have no such information.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had some doubt about whether I should make a speech in this debate. I had that doubt partly because I am anxious that the debate close at the earliest possible moment so that we may address ourselves to the budget resolutions, some of which are extremely important, and the passage of which at an early date is equally important. I have been concerned, however, by some speeches that have been made in the house, not only in the debate on the budget but also in the debate on the address, particularly as to the effect they may have in the house and in the country on our measures of price control and generally on our fight against inflation.

So far as my recollection goes, no member of the Progressive Conservative party opposition, with the exception of one, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) to whom I am very grateful, has said he was in favour of our measures designed to prevent the growing and eventually the prevailing of the menace of inflation in this country. On the other hand I think it is fair to say that they have not expressed their disapproval of those measures. But they have done something which is the equivalent; they have attacked piecemeal the preservation of the price ceiling and the wage ceiling. This applies equally to the other opposition parties and also to the utterances of some hon. members supporting the government. This being so I think it is my duty at this stage in the debate to present once more to the house the reasons for our anti-inflationary policies and the great importance of administering and enforcing those policies in an effective manner.

In the budget speech I outlined the growing force of inflationary tendencies in this country. I said that the forces making for inflation are present on a large scale, and that their pressure is held in check only by the rigour of our existing taxation, by the willingness of Canadians to save on an unprecedented scale, and by our price control and wage control.

There has not been in this debate much attack upon, much objection taken to, our taxation programme—remarkably little; perhaps that will come later, on the resolutions. There has not been a serious or widespread attack on our borrowing policies. There has been some, but it has not been very great. But there has been a disconcerting tendency on the part of a fairly large number of hon. members, mostly in the various oppositions, to urge that we weaken our price and wage controls.

My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) the other night, speaking in the fuel debate, put the matter in better language than I could when he said, as reported at page 1316 of Hansard:

> We have had various suggestions offered to-day for a solution of the problem. I think the one most often given was to increase the ceiling price. That is an easy solution for a great many problems, but it must be obvious to every member that if we were to adopt the practice of increasing the ceiling price to meet every problem that comes along, we should soon have no price ceiling and no price control at all, and thus be well on the road to inflation. Five hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party offered that solution. I urge them to avoid suggestions of that kind if they believe that price control is a sound policy in times such as this, because that policy can be maintained only by rigidly observing existing price ceilings. One break-through for a particular commodity invites a break-through for a number of other commodities. To maintain a price ceiling policy with frequent exceptions is an impossibility.

These attacks in individual cases have been accompanied more or less by attacks on the wartime prices and trade board and on the chairman and officials of that board, and, in some cases, on boards generally, officials connected with boards generally, and on the system which we have set up, a system which demands a certain amount of extra-parliamentary activity.

I think that in order to deal with this matter in a fundamental way I shall have to start there and explain why it is that we do have this system; first, why it is that parliament has to delegate so many of its powers to the governor in council, and, secondly, why it is that the government has to delegate so many of its powers to boards and controllers. Why is it that we do not bring this great mass of activity into the House of Commons for discussion before it is undertaken? Why is it that we do not bring these measures before the house and deal with them by way of legislation? Hon. members must know that the reason is that in time of war the other course is essential to get action. In the last session of this parliament we sat here for six months. We dealt with a substantial number of very important measures; we could not have dealt with many more. I assume that it is not the wish of the house or the country that parliament sit here for twelve months in the year. Certainly if parliament were to deal with all the things that have to be dealt with, there would not be enough time in the year for parliament to get through the business. So far this session we have sat here thirty-seven days, and hon. members can just think over for themselves what our record of legislation achievement has been.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that not an argument for change of the rules?

Mr. ILSLEY: No change of the rules could possibly overcome that. It is because in war time the necessity for action is so great, the necessity for so much action, that there must be measures such as the War Measures Act under which there is a broad delegation of authority to the governor in council.

It may be asked: if that is so, why does not the governor in council assume its responsibility and discharge its duties? Why does it in turn delegate so much to boards and officials? The answer is just the same as the first answer I have given. That is in turn essential if we are to get action. During the twelve months which ended December 31, 1942, there were 11,597 orders in council passed, that is, about one thousand a month. Recommendations submitted but not passed numbered 117; treasury board reports passed numbered 88, and the treasury board dealt with 5,653 matters the record of which is found in 5,653 minutes of treasury board. The total number of recommendations to council was 11,802, or as I said, about one thousand a month.

Council does the best it can by internal organization to handle this great mass of business. Much of it is delegated to treasury board; much of it is delegated to the war committee of the cabinet. A large part of it is delegated to the wheat committee, a great deal to the routine business committee of the cabinet, and from time to time a great deal is delegated to special committees of the cabinet. We do our best by internal organization to meet this great mass of work, but we cannot overtake it. Therefore we have to pass orders in council which delegate to others in the employ of the government, in whom we have confidence, the power to deal with these matters. This is democracy functioning in time of war. It does not mean that the business of the country is being placed in the hands of irresponsible officials. All these officials have ministers to whom they are responsible. The ministers are part of a government which is responsible to parliament. Parliament has an overriding control upon the government, the ministers and the officials, and so far as I have ever been able to learn, there is no other way we can do it.

I say that by way of introduction, because I hear from the odd member of this house charges that parliament has abdicated its functions, that the government has delegated its responsibilities, that we are in the hands of bureaucrats and irresponsible officials, and that the democracy for which we are fighting does not exist in any real sense. I deny that entirely.

I come now to the other matter I mentioned, that is the attack or the sporadic attacks upon one particular board for which as Minister of Finance I am responsible. To hear a good many speeches in this house one would think that the wartime prices and trade board has through its chairman, Mr. Donald Gordon, framed its own policies and is administering those policies in an arbitrary and bureaucratic way without regard to the wishes of parliament or of the government. I want to say a word about that. Nothing could be further from the truth than this statement. To begin with, Mr. Gordon and the other officials of the wartime prices and trade board are continually in consultation with myself, almost every day and for many hours on some days. I am kept closely in touch with all important decisions of policy made by the board; I take full responsibility for those decisions, and am prepared to take full responsibility in this house. I do not say that mistakes have not been made, but where they have been made and when they have been made I am prepared to take responsibility for them. The attacks that are made here should not be made upon the board or upon Mr. Gordon; they should be made upon myself and upon the government, and I will undertake to defend what has been done to the extent of my ability. I think a pretty effective defence can be offered, in the main, in regard to the record and achievements of the wartime prices and trade board.

One would think, to listen to some of the speeches in this house, that Mr. Donald Gordon is some sort of big banker pushing around the primary producers and the small retailers just because he is a big banker. What nonsense! Mr. Donald Gordon came to this country when he was thirteen years of age, an immigrant from Scotland, without any money. At fifteen years of age he went into the Bank of Nova Scotia, and by sheer ability and force of character attained a high executive position in that bank by the time he was in his early thirties. He was so prominent, so eminent and so promising that he was brought to Ottawa when he was thirty-four years of age and made secretary of the Bank of Canada. In 1938, at the age of thirty-seven, he was made deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, and it was while he was holding that position, in the fall of 1941, that we approached him to undertake this worst of all jobs, this job of administering and enforcing our price ceiling policy.

I want to point out that not since 1934 has Mr. Gordon had any connection whatever with the private banking system of this country. Since that time he has been a servant of the state; he has been an official of the bank which for two or three years was controlled by the government of Canada, and which since that time has been owned entirely by the government of Canada, not a private institution but a nationalized institution, a people's central bank. I want to make that very clear, because one would think in listening to some references to Mr. Gordon that such was not the case. He was largely responsible for the organization of the foreign exchange control board, and anyone who knows anything about that organization knows that he did a magnificent job. We went to him in the fall of 1941 and requested him, almost pleaded with him to take on the most difficult of all jobs, the most thankless of all jobs, one of the most if not the most important of all jobs, the administration and enforcement of our price ceiling policy. He could have declined it. He was no job seeker. He was no suppliant for government favours. He had an assured position, of which he was making an outstanding success, but to my immeasurable relief and to the relief of my colleagues he accepted the assignment. And he accepted it as a war duty, knowing that he might fail; knowing that he might break down his health; knowing that he could not faithfully discharge his duties without incurring considerable unpopularity and resentment. He took on the job; and if ever a man, in the killing seventeen months since, has discharged his duty, it has been he. I have had my differences with him. Some of his officials have had their differences with him. Some members of the public have had their differences with him; but I want to say now that I have never met a man with greater honesty or integrity, with greater moral courage, with greater capacity for straight, clear thinking, with greater capacity for hard, nerve-wracking work, with greater capacity for decision or with more unselfish devotion to duty. He may not be giving everyone who comes to him everything he wants, but I am profoundly thankful, as I think the members of this house should be profoundly thankful, that we have him.

Now, what about his administration of the policy we have told him to administer? Just a word about this policy, which in its very essence must be more concerned with the main objective, the general result, than with fine questions of equity. So that I may not be misunderstood I want to read something which will put the matter in clearer words than I could. This is a quotation from the minister responsible for price control in New Zealand. Our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are great admirers of New Zealand, its government and principles of that government, and I do not say they are wrong at all. Last November the responsible minister there, Mr. Sullivan, speaking about their price and wage control system, the principle of which as I understand the matter was adopted from ours, said:

> We are now at the point when, in bringing in an all-round policy of stabilization which, I repeat, is absolutely vital to-day, the stabilization of income cannot be balked by demands for concessions from any classes of the community. To peg everybody's income where it is might crystallize certain inequalities for the time being, but I would point out that if inflation were left to develop and run riot the inequalities which would be created would be far more serious and far more unjust in their incidence upon the community. Thus, if stabilization brings about the fixing of wages or farm prices at their present levels, some sections of the community may feel that they are being made to contribute more towards stabilization than others. It may be only rough justice but it will be far preferable to the complete injustice which inflation run amuck would bring about.

This expresses the thought I have in mind. The more important inequalities are ironed out, of course, by subsidies and some minor adjustments of prices; but the sort of adjustments which many members of this house in their speeches have indicated they want made, would wreck the policy entirely.

A few days ago Mr. Prentiss Brown, head of the office of price administration in the United States, referred to the insidious way in which inflation may creep upon us—by little concessions here and there; by granting this wage demand or that price increase. Declaring that if the increased wages demanded for coal miners were granted, the fight of his country against inflation would be lost. He said:

> If that wage increase takes place there is nothing for the more conservative-minded labour leaders, men like Philip Murray, who has supported the present programme, and William Green who has also stood by it, to do but follow the lead and attempt to get increases for their people.
> Inflation will come, not by big leaps in costs, but inch by inch, a little bit at a time, in steps that seem so difficult to stop.

He might have said "in steps that seem so easy to take," because some plausible reason or excuse can be given for nearly all concessions that are demanded. Each pressure group believes, probably sincerely, that it has a right to get what it is asking for, and says: Surely this little bit will not cause inflation; that is only a bogey you are conjuring up to scare the people. But the trouble is, as Mr. Brown shows so clearly, that one little concession leads inevitably to a series of others. That is the way the inflationary spiral begins, and once it gets started its momentum increases. Soon there is no way to stop it, until the inevitable collapse comes.

The future of Canada is going to depend in a large degree upon whether our pressure groups have sufficient intelligence and foresight to restrain the exercise of their special bargaining power in a war-time emergency. If they do not, they may gain a temporary selfish advantage, but they will do so to the sacrifice of their long-run best interest, and to the jeopardy of the nation and the war effort.

I do not wish to quote unduly, but I should like to place on record something from the New Republic, which, as we know, is a left wing periodical. This is what it says, in a recent issue:

> The farm bloc wants higher prices for food because wages have gone up. Labour wants higher wages because the cost of food has gone up. It must be clear even to a simpleton that simultaneous granting of both demands would lead only to their repetition. That is the perfect formula for blowing up the balloon of prices until it bursts with a loud bang in the faces of all concerned. And while prices were rising, the farmers would not get any more industrial products for their increased money, nor would labour get any more food.
> This is really a dispute concerning the division of an amount of goods available for civilian consumption which cannot be increased, and may decrease. Neither party to the dispute can win so long as both enforce their present formulas, and both will lose in the end. The rest of the consumers lose as long as the dispute goes on.

Now, what have been the results of price control, which has been an essential part of our fight against inflation in the last seventeen months? Well, cost-of-living index figures speak for themselves. An average of the four years 1935-39 was taken as 100. The index figure at August 1, 1939, just prior to the outbreak of the war, was 100·8. The index figure at October 1, 1941, the base period for the price ceiling was 115·5, which amounts to an increase of 14·6 per cent over the latest pre-war figure. The index figure at July 2, 1942, the date at which the cost-of-living bonus was last adjusted, was 117·9, which is 17 per cent above the pre-war figure, and 2·4 points above the figure for October 1, 1941, the base period for the price ceiling. The index figure for February 1, 1943, the latest figure available, is 116·9. This amounts to an increase of 16 per cent over the pre-war figure. This latest figure is one point below that for July 2 of last year, and only 1·4 above the figure for October 1, 1941, the base period of the price ceiling.

We have kept prices very successfully in check, especially when we consider the experiences of the last war, and when we compare our experiences with those of other countries.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister explain the higher agricultural prices in the United States over those in Canada as being due to a greater degree of inflation in the United States than in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. The cost of living has increased very much more rapidly in the United States during the last year than it has in Canada. So much so that, as the hon. member knows, it is leading to demands for increased wages on the part of labour, so that they will be able to pay the increased prices, which will, in turn, lead to the demand for increased prices for farm products, because of the increased costs of goods into which labour entered.

Someone might say: You have a cost-of-living index which you are holding up before us; but is your cost-of-living index a true index? That matter has been most carefully investigated. A pamphlet entitled "Is the Cost of Living Index Phony" has been issued by the wartime prices and trade board, and in that pamphlet they have shown that upon the most careful investigation it is a true index of prices. It is a much truer index of prices than would be indicated if we had a different system which allowed prices to go up all round the articles in the index. But by our ceiling policy we keep prices down over the whole field, and we have a true cost-of-living index.

To date our policy has been remarkably successful. Whether it can continue to succeed depends in my judgment upon three factors, and upon whether three conditions are complied with. In the first place it depends upon whether the hon. members of this house—I do not think anything has been said in the other house one way or the other—and those whose views they represent, will cease their piecemeal attacks upon this measure, and will give our efforts their cooperation. I think I am entitled to ask that that cooperation be given.

You will say at once: Do you not want us to criticize? Certainly I want criticism; but I want criticism based upon some consistent and defensible principles. And, if I may say so, I think that the one piece of criticism which I have heard from the opposition which might be termed consistent and defensible criticism, was that which came from the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), when he attacked the five-cent increase on the price of meals. He attacked us for yielding. Everyone else has attacked us for standing firm. Everyone has attacked Gordon because he has not given way. The hon. member attacked him because in this matter he did give way. There is a defence for what was done. Naturally, with the great increase in the prices of beef, something which I am sure the hon. member for Battle River, among others, demanded—although I did not hear him in the house—the restaurants found themselves in an impossible position.

Mr. FAIR: I am coming back to that, and I shall have more to say about it later on. I am able to justify my stand, if the minister can justify his.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid the hon. member can not justify his interruption, though, according to the rules of the house.

But the point I am making is that the wartime prices and trade board, including the chairman of that board, have been given a job to do. It is not their policy; it is the policy of the government of this country. Therefore it seems to me that criticism, if it is to be of the highest type, should be for the way they have fallen down in the discharge of their duties—which, I may say, has been very seldom.

In the instances in which they have made minor adjustments in prices there have been abundant reasons for those adjustments. The case of the restaurants, for instance, was studied at least for six months before it was found necessary to make some adjustment. The only alternative would have been subsidies, to prevent many restaurants from going out of business at a time when restaurants must stay in business if the needs of this war population are to be served.

The second condition is that the wage stabilization policy succeed, and the national war labour board be strengthened, not weakened by utterances of members of parliament and by labour leaders; for certainly if any group has everything to lose and nothing to gain by a break-down of our anti-inflation policy, it is labour.

The third condition is that our fiscal policies and our policy of taxation and the encouraging of saving shall receive the support that they deserve.

We believe that our financial policies are sound. We believe that the policy of heavy taxation and the encouragement of saving and borrowing from the people as large a proportion of their earnings as we can possibly persuade them to save is sound. It is not a particularly original policy. It has been followed by Great Britain and the United States and by the other British dominions, but we believe in the policy. There are some members of this house who do not believe in it, but I do not think we should ever forget that we are in the throes of a mighty conflict. If we are right, we certainly should be supported. If by chance we and the other governments of the United Nations are wrong about this, is this the time to try to upset the policy? It is working reasonably well and will continue to work reasonably well. I think I am justified in making an appeal to members of this house not to say anything—some things have been said in speeches here—which will prejudice the success of our great loan campaigns, especially the fourth victory loan campaign. I invite the cooperation of members of the house. I must say that I have received cooperation consistently from the beginning from the great majority of the members of this house, I think from all members of the Progressive Conservative party and from most of the members of the house generally.

Those are the three conditions for the success of our fight against inflation. I hope that those conditions will be complied with. We have a tremendous task to raise such huge sums of money, to bring in these billions and to pay out these billions, but while the task is hard it is not as hard as keeping the money good, keeping the money so that it will buy as much in the future as it has in the past. If that once begins to slip, our task of financing will be immeasurably more difficult, our war effort will be greatly impeded, and the misery among the people will be very great.

I have said nothing about the terms of the amendment or the subamendment. Nothing turns upon the details of these amendments and there will be abundant opportunity later to deal with them on the resolutions or when the proper items are being discussed. They constitute the usual want of confidence motion in the government brought forward when the vote on any budget takes place. Personally while I am not hurrying, and will not undertake to hurry the house, I should like to see the house get to the stage of effective action as soon as possible, the kind of action that this nation expects from parliament in time of war.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have expressed myself in favour of the principle of price ceilings. Can the minister tell us why parity remuneration for the agricultural producer who is producing foodstuffs and who composes one-third of our population has not been placed on the same basis as that of industry and organized labour?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot answer that question until the hon. gentleman defines "parity". If he will do that I think I can answer his question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You set a base period for industry and organized labour, but you neglected agriculture.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to try to follow the minister other than to refer to one or two of his statements. He told us that the house has been in session thirty-seven days. I want to tell the minister that I, just as much as he, believe that I am wasting my time getting up to speak. I know that anything I can say will not alter anything that will be done in this house. We on this side of the house feel that our efforts are futile. What can we do? We have offered all that we have to the government, but has anyone on this side of the house been asked to do a thing? I have not been asked to do anything, although when war broke out I offered all I had. Is that the way to treat all this side of the house, not only the official opposition but the members of the other opposition groups? Collectively we represent a large number of people in this country. I have no suggestions to make as to what should be done. It is up to the government to tell us what should be done. We are all ready to do what we can.

I think I can speak for everyone else on this side of the house when I say that we have not been asked to do a thing. The minister has scolded the whole opposition, but I am not going to reply to that. We are in a great war and there is no time to enter into that class of argument. I do not deserve any scolding under the circumstances. I have offered all I have to the government, and so has everyone else on this side of the house. I feel I am just wasting my time here. What can I do?

I feel that I have accomplished a little through this house and the Ontario legislature. A few years ago I strongly recommended that this government should assist the Ontario government in starting production of iron at the Helen mine in Algoma. This government turned a deaf ear to the proposal. However, I have received some recompense for opening up the matter, because the Ontario government listened to the argument that was put up here. Their action followed the speech I made in this house, but I do not say they acted because of my speech. I am happy to be able to say to-day that the Algoma Steel Corporation are producing approximately 400,000 tons of pig-iron a year from native low-grade iron ores. They deserve great credit for doing that. I feel it is a slight accomplishment on my part.

I am not sure whether my suggestion of a year ago that we should produce more oil in this country is going to bring results. I have made two trips into the great north country and I have been told by letters, and through rumours I have heard, that something is going to be done. I hope that before long Canada will be increasing her oil production. If this should come about through action by this government—that is the only way it can come about—then I shall feel that I have played a small part in this development too.

I believe I assisted somewhat in bringing about the unemployment insurance measures. I made exhaustive inquiries into this matter years ago. I hope that what I said on national health insurance will have some effect. But outside of these items, and a few others, I feel that I have wasted the thirteen years I have been in this house.

When I was on the government side I received the same treatment as any other member sitting over there behind the treasury benches. Our opinions were not sought and we had little or no weight. I find that hon. gentlemen who are sitting where I sat for five years have little weight to-day. I have none over here with the government. It is up to the government to tell each one of us just what we can do. Every member of this house wants to aid the government. The government has many able men among its ranks. There are a lot of men in this house who have had considerable experience in business, and after all, in my judgment business is everything. It comes ahead of everything else by a long way. That is all I am going to say about what the minister said.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

I am not going to deal directly with the budget proposals, unless what I say has something to do with broadening the bases of taxation upon which the finance minister will erect his taxation structure. If what I say has something to do with that, I shall feel that my remarks have some relation to the budget proposals.

For the remainder of my time I intend to refer to certain matters affecting three sections of the country, and then I shall continue from where I left off on February 10 in my proposals for improvement in the western economy. For I am convinced even more strongly than I was when I spoke previously, having received a multitude of letters and resolutions from boards of trade and other organizations and people in all parts of the west, that I am on the right course. I hope that in due time not only the three western ministers but every hon. member from the west, of whom I believe there are fifty-four will support a programme for western rehabilitation. In trying to do something for their country an easterner from the city of Toronto ought to have their support—not because it is I who propose it, but because it is for the good of their country.

I have travelled many times to the east, and perhaps more frequently into that beautiful little province in the gulf, Prince Edward Island, which is one of the richest agricultural areas in the world. There in that little island they are doing a great job, about the only job they can do, and it is what the government has specifically asked them to do, namely, to produce farm products. I am told that last year they shipped out of that small province some 17,500 cars of farm produce. But think of the jeopardy they are in to-day, with only one comparatively small ship plying between Tormentine and Borden, connecting them with the mainland. They had a larger ship, the Charlottetown, but it was destroyed. What has the government done to replace it? About a week ago the Prince Edward Island legislature passed a strong resolution asking the government to do something for the transportation service, because they realize that if anything happens to the one ship which is left, all shipments will cease until another boat is made available. I beg on their behalf that the government use every effort to provide Prince Edward Island as speedily as possible with a better transportation system than it has to-day. They were promised proper treatment in this respect when they came into confederation, but we have failed to carry out our bargain.

I pass to Nova Scotia, to make brief reference to a matter which affects our financial structure. In 1913 Ontario and Quebec were buying about two million tons of coal from Nova Scotia. I myself am a user of Nova
