UNDER THE STUMP.

OR SAMSON KEPPER'S COURTSHIP.

Any shrewd observer of men and manners would have immortalized his name in Grassboro, by explaining clearly and satisfactorily why Mr. Sampson Kepper remained a bachelor at the age of two score.

The facts of the case are as follows we think:—

Samson Kepper, Esq., at five and twenty, was looked upon as a prize by all the marriageable young ladies of Grassboro—possessed of good looks, an excellent farm, agreeable manners, and a large comfortable house, a pair of whiskers, and two yoke of oxen, Samson could have taken his pick among the maidens of Grassboro—any one of whom would have been delighted with his preference. He was a kind hearted man, was Samson; and I have often heard him described as having distinguished fondness for gooseberry pies, nice children, fine horses and ladies in general.

At that very delightful age—five and twenty—he actually betrayed an inclination for conjugal happiness.

He commenced paying his distresses to the amiable Miss Lucretia Lane; a worthy and pretty lady; who it was said by every body—except a multitude of rival beauties, would make him a most excellent and amiable wife.

Now Sampson waited on Lucretia—and courted her, as the Grassboro gossips termed it for five years; and it was well known to Samson's friends that more than fifty times he was on the point of offering her his hand.

But Samson did not make such an offer for reasons which Grassboro would have been glad to know.

The lanes lost patience with the heir of the house of Kepper. Lucretia, they said was at his disposal; but they could see no sense in requiring years to make up his mind to marry.

They threw out certain hints, which offended Samson, and distressed his faithful mistress; hints designed to hasten the approach of lazy-paced hymen, but which had the effect of a chilling shower bath on the ardour of Mr. Kepper. He avoided her sight for a month. At the end of that time convinced of the impossibility of living without her, he called upon her one Sunday night, as in former days. To his astonishment he found her occupying the little parlour in company with Mr. Brooks a wealthy widower of thirty five.

Mr. Brooks and Lucretia sat together in the chimney corner, and Samson in a seat opposite.

Fine evening, said Samson in an awful voice.

'Nay,' said Lucretia changing color rapidly and then casting a glance at the back log.

It was snowing and blowing at a great rate.

The widower settled down his chin in his neck cloth; with a pompous air, and tried to look unconcerned.

'Lucretia changed colour, coughed and moved about in her chair, as if she had eaten something which had distressed her while Mr. Kepper glanced meekly from his lips to the door, and back; twirled his thumbs, picked his teeth, pulled up his shirt collar, wriggled around on his chair as though he had sat down on a kettle of hot soap, and dare not rise,—and acted like any timid young man, who intended to go to an oyster supper, should find himself snugly seated in the centre of a quaker meeting.'

'Hem,' thought I'd call in, and see how you were, observed Samson, after a long pause, turning in his chair and crossing his legs.

'Thank you—hope you will—come often said Lucretia.

Not another word was spoken for half-an-hour.

At length Samson, after a series of Preliminary 'Hems' and 'Awwws' glancing at his watch, managed to summon courage to say—

'Guess I'll be going,' and a move for the door.

As he moved to the door, he uttered a feeble voice.

Nothing particular—guess that I had—had much better be going. Good evening.

Good night.

Stumbling over a chair in his endeavors to appear unconcerned, and buttoning on the right hand lapel of his startant to the left hand tassel of his dress coat; an error he did not discover till he reached his own door,—he took his departure leaving Lucretia with the widower in a regular courting attitude.

No sooner was our hero gone, than Miss Lane, who kept gradually hitching her seat from the widower, made an errand to the fire, an excuse for taking a back

'Nice young man,—Mr. Kepper,' observed the widower, glancing at Lucretia, and laying his arm upon the back of her seat.

'Nay,' said she placing a stick on the fire.

Mr. Brooks then happened to perceive that the glow of the fire made her cheeks red.

'Used to be pretty neighbourly, I understand!'

'Lucretia was crimson.

'Only a friend I suppose.'

'Oh, no.'

'Hem! and if I should—that is, if any one else should wish to marry—'

'If any one else should wish to marry you why, I suppose that he would be in the way eh?'

'I don't know why he should,' faltered Lucretia.

The widowers arm slipped from the top of the chair, and fell, somehow, around her waist; and the widower being an absent minded man, neglected to put it back again.

Would anything else be in the way, my dear?'

'That's according—'

'Oh how the fire did glow into Lucretia's face.

'According to who the person is, and, and—'

The clasp of the arm around her tightened.

'Ah hem.'

'A poke at the fire.'

'If it was me.'
