STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

WELFARE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in my home town of Hamilton, Ontario, the unemployment rate in October stood at 10.3 per cent. That is up dramatically from 6.8 per cent recorded in October of last year.

The welfare caseload in the regional municipality of Hamilton—Wentworth is swelling. There has been a steady growth in those families and individuals who must rely on welfare since as far back as 1989. The welfare caseload is up by 56 per cent from last year. There are presently 14,000 people on welfare in the region.

The government's economic mismanagement has created an overlap problem involving regional welfare payments and UI benefits. Waiting an average of eight weeks for their unemployment cheque, applicants are eligible to collect welfare, and when they get their retroactive UI benefits they are supposed to repay the welfare. Alas, few do, and that is costing the region more than $2 million a year. The region wants the moneys owed for welfare deducted at the source from the UI cheque—a reasonable request to make the system fair.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I see once again that fake Christmas trees are adorning the halls of Parliament. What a shame. What a disgrace. What a terrible environmental example. So much for the greening of the Hill. Real Christmas trees are environmentally friendly, they are beautiful, they are a renewable resource, they are Canadian, they even smell nice.

I think it is time Parliament set the example, threw out the fake Christmas trees and replaced them with beautiful and real Christmas trees.

Mr. Speaker, if Parliament does not have the sense to do so, I would at least urge all Canadians who celebrate Christmas to have the good sense and the patriotism to treat themselves by supporting a valuable Canadian resource industry by having a real Canadian Christmas tree this year. In case you did not know, the best Christmas trees come from the Christmas tree capital of Canada, the South Shore of Nova Scotia.

COMMEMORATIVE MARKERS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in September I tabled a private member's motion calling on the federal government to honour the contribution made to Canada by our late former Prime Ministers by placing a commemorative marker near their burial sites.

As we grapple with our national unity and identity as Canadians, one obvious problem that I have observed is that many Canadians do not have an appreciation of our history. We often lack an appreciation for the great benefits that living in Canada has brought to us.

It is my hope that by commemorating the efforts of those who have dedicated their lives to building our nation, Canadians may better recognize our generation's obligation to continue to build and preserve a united Canada. By appreciating the accomplishments of the past, it helps us to better prepare ourselves for the future.

I thank the many members from all sides of the House who have indicated to me their personal support for this initiative and I ask the government, whether or not my motion is selected—

Mr. Speaker: The member's time has expired.

CROSS-CANADA REFERENDUM

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, I received a telephone call from the member for Longueuil, asking me to sign a petition from his leader in favour of Quebec sovereignty.

This missive, commonly called "Lucien's letter", was intended to prevent consulting all the people of Canada on the federal constitutional proposals.

Faced with my refusal, he insisted, claiming that 15 members from Quebec had already signed this petition, including the members for Laprairie and Châteauguay.

A check revealed that no Conservative member had signed this petition that would prevent Canadians from expressing their opinion on this important issue.

Mr. Speaker, that is intellectual harassment, cheap politicking and undemocratic!

I ask all hon. members of this House to refuse to go along with it, because if we want to respect Canadians and Quebecers, we must let them express themselves freely.

That shows how the Bloc Québécois acts in its attempt to break the harmony that exists in this wonderful country of ours.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, it is time this government stopped using GATT as an excuse for inaction at home.

GATT is as far away today as it was yesterday, and the government's attempt to shift the focus to these talks has failed. It is time it got on with the task at hand.

What is clearly needed is a set of policies and programs, many of them promised but not delivered by this government, that will keep our family farms on the land and preserve some stability in the agricultural community while we wait for sanity to return to the international marketplace.

This government cannot have it both ways. It is time to get the job done.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I was encouraged to learn that Jim Taylor, a truck driver from Toronto, has taken the initiative as a private citizen to speak out for a united Canada.

Mr. Taylor ordered 200 bumper stickers that read: "My country includes Quebec", and slapped one on his van. People stopped him to ask how to get one, so within four weeks they were gone.

Out of the response of 300 letters, only one was negative. Encouraged with the response, Jim bought billboard space from Mediacom and now there are 15 billboards in 11 cities across Canada with the message in both English and French.

Jim Taylor is exceedingly optimistic about the future of Canada. He knows that there are problems ahead, but he also reminds us that each one of us has the resources to find inventive ways to promote Canadian unity.

Jim Taylor should know. He has taken his step as an ordinary Canadian, and has proven that positive attitudes can be courageous and contagious.

UKRAINE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the people of Ukraine have long waited for the day they can once again raise their own flag, elect their own leaders and guide their own destiny, fully recognized by the international community.

This December 1, they will be that much closer to this goal. They will vote in a referendum to confirm the act of the Declaration of Independence of Ukraine, passed last August 24. I am heartened Ukraine supports nuclear disarmament and minority rights.

Ukrainians have a right to make this decision, and I am proud to be one of three members of Parliament who will leave for Kiev tomorrow to observe the electoral process.

Ukrainian Canadians, 1 million strong, 100 years in Canada, will be casting a vote in spirit with those in their ancestral home.

I make no secret of my support for the cause of Ukrainian independence in my letters to the Prime Minister and in my previous statements in this House. The will of the people to be united, to join together, is the essence of democratic culture.

I urge Canada to support Ukraine in the outcome of this referendum.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to believe a new political party in Canada has a dictator at its helm.

It is the "gospel truth according to Preston". The Calgary Sun has reported a secret Reform Party memo saying that Preston Manning must control and correct party members' input and policy.

To all those who have joined this party, you have been duped by a political evangelist into believing the Reform Party agenda is grass roots driven.

Manning's theory is simple: "My way or the highway". As one Reformer put it: "This puts a lie to everything the Party espouses".

To members of the Reform Party, you will be welcome back to the Conservative Party, your views will not be screened by this Prime Minister or any other Party authority. Your ideas and your input will not be censored.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, first the Liberals flip-flopped on the gulf war.

Then, they did a backward reverse on the U.S. Canada free trade deal followed by a belly flop on the GST. As one senior Liberal said: "If we knew what we wanted to do, it would be a lot easier to communicate it to everybody".

Last weekend, Liberals found out that their unclear policies are fine because other than embracing the Tory principles of unbridled trade and competitiveness through poverty, there is nothing they would do if elected.

The Leader of the Opposition thinks that globalization is a fact of life.

Mr. Speaker, unlike the Liberals and Conservatives, New Democrats believe that poverty, unemployment and pollution do not have to be facts of life, that we do not have to sell out to the multinationals.

To the majority of Canadians who agree and who do not have to choose between tweedledum and tweedledee, I say: "Welcome to the NDP".

SYLVIE LAVOIE

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to tell you about a young judo expert who lives in my riding. Seventeen-year-old Sylvie Lavoie was chosen by Judo Canada to represent Quebec and Canada at the Pan-American Junior Judo Championships in Medellin, Colombia.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out and mention the courage and perseverance of this young Canadian sportswoman, who as we speak is striving for a place of honour and a gold medal. I believe it is important to support our youth who hold an important place in our community and our country. I conclude by saying to them, "Work very hard, spare no effort, be determined and you will become a symbol of national pride." We need young people who are strong, disciplined, eager and above all determined, Mr. Speaker.

CAPE BRETON ECONOMY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday a parade of concern in Sydney, Nova Scotia, drew thousands of people to the streets.

Cape Bretoners are tired of being blamed for government failures. We are tired of having decisions made in the offices of bureaucrats without consulting the very people these decisions affect.

We have seen phoney companies with phoney job applications arriving like vultures, ready to feed off people's misfortunes. The president of Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency said in Sydney, and I quote: "It is illiteracy and rotten weather that keeps companies out of Cape Breton".

How dare this man, a senior public servant, insult the very people his agency was created to assist. The president of Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has little to be proud of, given ACOA's record of handing out money to losing ventures.

The President of ACOA blames bad weather for Cape Breton's falling economy. The economic cloud that hangs over the island has more to do with all his agency's failures than it does with our region's level of rainfall.

I think it is time that this particular senior public servant resign and, if not resign, the minister responsible for ACOA should fire him and fire him—

SENATOR CLAUDE CASTONGUAY

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the special joint committee on a renewed Canada, I would like to offer my sincere thanks to Senator Claude Castonguay for his role as co-chair during the first few months of the committee's mandate.

Senator Castonguay is a valuable representative of Quebec and is widely respected not only in his home province but throughout Canada. He has been a key member of the constitutional committee and his positive contributions will be greatly missed.

I join with other members of Parliament and of the Senate in wishing him a quick recovery.

DRIFT-NETTING

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the news that Japan has agreed to comply by the end of 1992 with a United Nations moratorium on the use of huge fishing nets known as drift-nets. This is an abhorrent practice which ravages the oceans. These vast nets are known as walls of death because they trap and kill in vast numbers, dolphins, whales, turtles, birds and other marine life.

Drift-netting continues still to be practised by South Korea. We urge the Government of Canada to make special representations to our embassy in Seoul, urging South Korea to comply with the moratorium and behave in an environmentally responsible manner.

NAGORNO-KARABAKH

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, last evening Soviet television announced that the Parliament of Azerbaijan today decided to abolish the autonomous status of Nagorno-Karabakh and also change the name of the regional centre.

Tass News Agency reported that the Azeri deputies backed this measure unanimously. Nearly 1,000 people have been killed and hundreds of thousands forced from their homes in almost four years of guerrilla fighting. The move to abolish Nagorno-Karabakh is sure to ignite further violence and bloodshed.

I call upon my government and the United Nations to condemn this latest decision by the Parliament of Azerbaijan aggressively.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

This morning every newspaper in the country reports that bowing to internal and external pressures the government has decided that it will not bring forward legislation on a national referendum.

• (1420)

Can the minister explain why it is okay to consult Quebecers on their constitutional future, but it is not okay to consult the Canadian population on its?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne the government very clearly made a commitment, and I quote the Governor General:

You will be asked to approve enabling legislation to provide for greater participation of Canadian men and women in constitutional change.

That is an undertaking which we intend to honour.

The question here has to do with the word "referendum". The hon. member knows that in these circumstances at this time in the province of Quebec, in particular, that is a loaded word. He knows for us to use that loaded word now would be to drive away from Canada people whom we want to draw into Canada. We are interested in keeping the focus of attention upon proposals to renew this Confederation. I hope he would be too.

I certainly do not intend to use words that will drive potential supporters of Canada away from Canada. I ask the hon. member: Is he going to insist on using words which will drive potential supporters of Canada in Quebec away from Canada?

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that Liberals are not cowards and we are not afraid of words. The word "referendum" means what it means.

In Quebec there was a referendum and there could be another one next year that will allow Quebecers to say yes or no to Canada.

Why are the minister and his colleagues afraid to allow Canadians to say in a national referendum yes to Canada and also yes to Quebec?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know where the hon. member is coming from on this issue. I know the history of referendum campaigns and I know the connotation the word has.

I repeat the commitment of this government. We intend to honour the undertaking in the Speech from the Throne to find a way for Quebecers and other Canadians to be involved in the decisions with respect to constitutional change. We intend to do that.

I would think that it would be the height of folly for a national government, at a time when we are trying to focus attention upon particular proposals for constitutional change, at a time when we need to draw to the support of a renewed Canada all of those Quebecers who want a renewed Canada, to use a word that we know is a loaded word and would drive some of those people away today. That would be a serious mistake for Canada.

That may be the strategy of the Liberal Party. That is not the way we intend to conduct this trial because we are seeking to find ways in which we can cause Quebecers and other Canadians to come together behind a renewed federal system.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I must say I have a lot of sympathy for the minister because I know where he is coming from, but I have some doubts about some of his colleagues because I know where they are coming from too.

I would like the minister to assure us that all his colleagues including those from Quebec are supporting the minister's initiatives. Can he assure this House that all of his colleagues in Quebec are going to explain to Quebecers the government's proposals and are going to speak for Canada in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and the Liberal Party that the members of my government and our supporters here will continue to work towards constructive change in our Canadian federation.

We have put specific proposals on the table and have asked for suggestions for improving those proposals. We do not want to be distracted from this goal through the use of words that may give more weight to the separatist option.

We are here to rebuild Canada. We are not here to help separatists in Quebec or anywhere else.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

My caucus met with farm and political leaders today who described the state of agriculture in Canada with phrases like "decay of a nation" and "watching a culture die".

The hard facts are that bankruptcies in farm and related industries were up 77 per cent in October over September, but in Saskatchewan they are up 250 per cent. Some farmers will not last until Christmas. Yet this government insists on waiting months to distribute all its emergency aid cash to farmers.

In the name of mercy, why not now?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, in the name of accuracy, money is being distributed now. We have about 10 per cent of the total amount of NISA cheques in the mail. We have application forms that are going to be in the mail by the end of this week for the $400 million of special assistance. There is GRIP money that is starting to flow.

Farmers have cash advances available to them. The government, through the supporting of credit to the Soviet Union, to name one, is shipping and moving grain at a record clip.

We do know, and I say this as a farmer, that we very much appreciated the farmers being here this week. I had a chance to meet with them this morning and spent an hour with them at our caucus. We met with them yesterday, with the Deputy Prime Minister. Our Prime Minister met with the premier of Saskatchewan. They have made their case with a lot of class and I think in the process have impressed upon people very much the desperateness of their situation. I think that does them a lot of credit, especially when they are suffering such very low prices.

Having said that, the money that we have put on the table is in the process of being distributed. I think the hon. member should realize that there is going to be something like $2.8 billion net in the farmers' hands from government programs by the end of June next year. That is a lot of money.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again for the Prime Minister who indicated yesterday that he would be meeting with the finance minister to talk about possibly some new money for farmers. But if he takes as long to make up his mind as he did the last time, hundreds of farmers could lose their farms.

I ask the Prime Minister: Can he give Canadian farmers assurances that any new announcement will be made quickly before hundreds more farmers go under?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, with respect, the programs that are in place are being put in place as a result of consultations with farm groups and with the provinces. I would suggest that the money that is going out is going out at a pretty good clip based on the process that we have to use.

With some of the money that we put out in the past, in fact the member has been up on his feet in the past couple of years yelling because some of the money did not go until later on toward spring seeding. Some of this money is in the process of going out now. I just told him that application forms are going to be in the mail this week for the new money that is there. If in fact farmers want to send back their applications as quick as they get them, some of that money will be available before Christmas.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a very serious question for the Prime Minister of Canada.

Most of us in this House had an opportunity in the last couple of days to meet with farmers from across the prairies. We know the frustration, the despair, the human tragedy that those farmers talked about. We have a crisis now that is worse than any time in this country since the 1930s in terms of bankruptcy, incomes that are well below the poverty level, all kinds of social problems, economic problems, school depopulation, rural depopulation.

In light of that, can the Prime Minister tell the farmers of this country, particularly the prairies, whether or not he is willing now to consider their request for an extra emergency amount of money worth $500 million and have that money sent out soon to the farmers across the prairies.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had a very good meeting yesterday with the premier of Saskatchewan precisely on this point. I think that the premier acknowledged that the amounts under GRIP and NISA and the special deficiency payment of $800 million was probably unprecedented by the Government of Canada in favour of Canadian farmers.

He pointed out again, as I know, the particularly vulnerable situation in which farmers find themselves because of depressed grain prices, which is why the Minister of Agriculture and the minister of trade are in Geneva at this point in time. We have an historic opportunity to try to break the pattern of the suicidal European versus American trade distorting subsidies which deprive Canadian farmers of their share of the market, and also depress commodity prices here at home.

Even though we have provided, as I think the premier acknowledged, an unprecedented amount in favour of producers, Canadian prices still remain just about at levels of 1962. The farmers' costs have gone up and the prices remain depressed. While we came up with I think some very good programs and a large amount of money, I indicated to the premier that when the Minister of Finance returned I would meet with him and the Minister of Agriculture to see if perhaps some programs could be structured in a way that would be of greater benefit to the farmers.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday I met with a gentleman from Gull Lake, Saskatchewan, who told me that the average age of farmers in these rural municipalities is now 61 years old and that 56 per cent of the farmers in that municipality are facing foreclosure. I think what we have here, Mr. Speaker, is a national emergency, a national crisis.

I wonder if the Prime Minister can now do the right and proper thing and signal to the farmers that there is some hope, that he will make sure when he talks to his Minister of Finance very shortly that there will be an emergency extra $500 million for the farmers of prairie Canada. Please do that, Sir.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, no matter how much money the government puts out in this situation, somebody is going to say it is not enough. We know it is not enough. There are people who are having difficulty meeting household expenses off their farm income and that is not a pleasant situation for anybody.

Let me again point out that there is a record amount of money going to be available to all farmers across the country in the grain and oilseeds business by June of next year and it is not all gloom and doom. There are some positive signs that prices are increasing. We just raised initial payments for malt and barley this week.

There are some positive signs in the wheat market. With a record crop and the program that we have in place to assist the Canadian Wheat Board as well as other agencies in the country to sell grain, we are in a good position to move the record crop and as prices increase it is going to mean more cash for farmers. There are some signs out there that there are some positive things happening.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister's indication yesterday and again today that the government would look for more funds to assist farmers just a ploy to send the coalition farmers home with a glimmer of hope or is he actually serious about recognizing the farmers' needs for more money now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I happen to be Prime Minister of a government that has increased assistance to western farmers by 650 per cent and has provided more aid to western farmers than any other government in the history of Canada. We have always stood by the Canadian farmer. We will continue to do so.

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I am a Canadian outside Quebec and, like so many Canadians, I want to have a chance to say yes to Quebec. There are thousands of Canadians outside Quebec who want a chance to restore Quebec's confidence in our country. Will the Prime Minister give Canadians outside Quebec who still believe in a renewed country a chance to say yes to Quebec in a national referendum?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, we all had a chance to say yes to Quebec with the Meech Lake Accord.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: And the hon. member for Hamilton East is to be commended for supporting the accord. Unfortunately, others refused to do so, and now we have a situation where we have to rebuild bridges between Quebec and Canada. That is why the government is committed, as the minister has just mentioned, to asking Parliament to pass legislation in May 1991 that will give Canadians a greater say in constitutional reform. We intend to respect that commitment.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am more inclined to trust the democratic process than the Prime Minister is because I am confident that, if we give Canadians outside Quebec a chance, they will vote massively in favour of Quebec in a referendum.

I have a second question for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

[English]

Unlike the Prime Minister, I am not afraid of democracy, and I believe that the Canadian people should have a right to have their say. I want to give Canadians a chance to say yes to Quebec, and there are thousands and thousands of them who are prepared to do that. What are you afraid of, Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. The hon. member was out of order.

Ms. Copps: What is so hard?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

An hon. member: Don't get up, Mark. Don't get up.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, a very important coalition of farmers and farm organizations are still in Ottawa outlining a major economic and social problem facing farmers and rural Canadians. They have indicated that they have fulfilled their financial commitments but the federal government, which promised an adequate third line of defence package, has not yet lived up to that end of the commitment. When the federal government forced the provinces to contribute more than they had available to GRIP and NISA programs, does the minister not agree that it is time for the government to meet its responsibilities and deliver an adequate acceptable third line of defence payout equal to $1.3 billion called for by the farmer coalition?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, if the member is talking about adequate responsibilities, this government has provided a record amount of assistance to farmers. I have said that no matter how much it is, it is never going to be enough. Surely there is a responsibility of the provinces in this.

Part of the $640 million that went out last spring was for the so-called second line of defence that we could have held back and used on third line of defence.

Let me give the percentages. In the last fiscal year of the direct support paid by all governments to the producers in Saskatchewan, the federal government paid 83.2 per cent in Saskatchewan.

I hope that member makes the same case to his new premier to live up to his expectations.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. It is an urgent matter that requires urgent and immediate attention by the federal government at this time. Producers expect their government to be with them in times of trouble.

Since the ministers have found $800 million that they said they did not have before and that has been termed inadequate by the farm representatives here today, is it not time this emergency was addressed adequately in the terms the farmers coalition has brought to the minister's attention so that the farm community can farm with confidence and not with fear.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, this kind of debate does not help farmers. It is a problem that all of us have to do our very best to address. That includes municipalities, provincial governments and the federal government.

The hon. member should know that the province of Alberta just recently kicked in an extra $110 million and he should know that the province he comes from, when the new government formed office, cancelled its harmonization with the GST. I understand that cost it over $200 million.

If it was really serious about supporting farmers, it should have kept harmonization and it would have had an additional $200 million to spend on its farms.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture.

After four years of working with various participants on GATT article XI, the Canadian government claimed it could count on the support of several countries. Nevertheless, the Dunkel report reveals an alignment with the American position, with the consent of European governments, which will put an end to all quota systems in Canada's farm programs.

What does the government intend to do about this threat to our agricultural system?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, just a few minutes ago, I was talking to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture. Earlier today, the minister and the Minister for International Trade had a meeting with Mr. Dunkel.

There was also a meeting with the Cairns Group and the Quad group, to which Canada belongs, to discuss certain issues in the presence and with the co-operation of Canadian farm leaders now in Geneva.

In fact, Canadian farm leaders still fully support the Canadian position and have not challenged it in any way. Mr. Speaker, we prepared this position—the Canadian position—with our farm producers. We prepared it together, during extensive consultations, before going to GATT. We are still defending this position with all the energy we can muster. We built this position with them, and we will continue to involve them in these negotiations.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the minister's remarks are surprising, to say the least, when we consider that the constitutional proposals tabled last September suggested that getting rid of marketing boards would remove a barrier to the mobility of goods.

On many occasions, the government was obliged to call negotiators in Geneva to order for statements that more or less said the same thing.

Mr. Minister, how can you expect farmers to have any confidence when they see such flagrant contradictions in our agricultural system? In other words, what is your agricultural position for Canada?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised to see the hon. member take the same position the Bloc Quebecois critic took yesterday in the House of Commons. Provincial ministers Picotte and Ciaccia said once again yesterday that they still supported the Canadian position, Mr. Speaker.

As part of that position, we still support maintaining a reinforced and clarified article XI, Mr. Speaker.

This was again stated very clearly to the Director General of GATT today and to all our agricultural partners in Europe, Mr. Speaker.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today Statistics Canada figures are grim. Bankruptcies are up 45 per cent. So far this year 63,000 individuals and businesses have been forced into bankruptcy because of this government's economic incompetence.

Last week the Minister of Finance admitted that his claims of economic recovery were grossly exaggerated. So I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is he prepared today to do the same thing? Will he finally admit that there is no recovery, that the recession continues, and that it is his own government's economic policies that are causing such devastation in the Canadian economy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the government will agree with that because it is not the case.

It is a fact that the number of bankruptcies is at a disturbing level. We realize that. I would say that private bankruptcy is higher but business bankruptcy is only marginally higher.

However, these numbers stem from high rates of interest and we have been acting precisely on that. Since September interest rates have gone down by 100 basis points and have created a condition where we are hopeful that the recovery will be there. It is still fragile, but if we did not have so much gloom and doom from the Liberals maybe it would be more helpful.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

A Gallup poll to be released tomorrow says that 90 per cent of Canadians believe that the recession is not over. Eighty-four per cent say that the government's economic policies are inappropriate and unacceptable.

I want to ask the minister: If the recession is over, as he claims, why is it that nine out of ten Canadians do not know about it?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, since the poll is secret I will have to wait until tomorrow to look at it.

I do not disagree that the rate of bankruptcy is very disturbing, but that is one more reason for us to have the right policies. If the hon. member thinks that by doing it the Liberal way—borrow money that we do not have, raise taxes, scoop the capital so that businesses cannot organize themselves and create employment—is the answer, I think he is wrong.

We remember where we were during the Liberal recession with the rate of bankruptcies being double the number it is today.

AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last week when told in this House that the deal between McDonnell Douglas and Taiwan would cost Canada 3,500 aerospace jobs, the Minister for Science said that this was mere "speculation".

At the same time the president of McDonnell Douglas said: "As existing orders run out, McDonnell Douglas will be out of business".

Why does this government not believe the president of McDonnell Douglas who said these jobs would be lost, or is it just waiting for the workers to get their walking papers before it will act?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we will do everything we can to support McDonnell Douglas, particularly with respect to the MD-12.

In terms of the agreement, there has been no firm agreement signed between McDonnell Douglas and Taiwan. There has been no government to government agreement and the member knows that has to happen before any firm commitment can be made.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, that is absolute nonsense because the president of McDonnell Douglas Canada has said those jobs are on the line. This is just one more example of this government's economic incompetence and mismanagement.

Let me give another example. Last week the Minister for Science told this House that the government knew nothing about the McDonnell Douglas—Taiwan deal.

This deal was signed last July. Why did the government not know about it? How can this government manage our economy when it does not even know what is happening in one of our major aerospace manufacturers?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, what was signed previously was a letter of intent to try to reach an agreement. That agreement has not yet been reached and neither the Government of Taiwan nor the Government of the United States has an agreement that it can act upon.

In terms of the MD-12 assembly, we are prepared to stand by McDonnell Douglas and help in any way we can for it to obtain that contract.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister and this government suggest that these bankruptcy figures today are disturbing. In fact they are at record levels. They have never been higher in this country. The minister suggests that in fact there has not been much increase with respect to business bankruptcies. They are up 22 per cent.

If this minister is concerned to see credit get to people across this country being hit by bankruptcy, will he listen to the pleas of his Superintendent of Financial Institutions who today came out and said that the banks in this country were not lending money when they should be? Will he in fact stand up and say there has to be action on the part of the banks and the government to get this economy going again?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree at all with the numbers just given by the hon. member. Of course the situation is disturbing and that is why we must act to correct it by creating the proper conditions.

Let me give him the number, for example, of business establishments we have had this year. It is close to 2 million businesses as compared to less than 1 million in 1982 with a rate of bankruptcy of 1.28, and the present rate of bankruptcy is of 0.78. This of course is not a satisfactory situation, but one must not dramatize.

We are going through a transition period. The government must do everything it can to create the conditions for the recovery. It is not by borrowing money that we do not have, causing the capital to flow to government coffers and not to the business community which needs it badly. That will solve the problem.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): But the point, Mr. Speaker, is that the government's own Superintendent of Financial Institutions is saying that the banking system in this country is not delivering that money to the businesses that need it. Despite lower interest rates the government's policy is not working.

I want to ask the minister about a confidential memo from the International Monetary Fund which indicates that it is the IMF that has urged governments to take this policy.

I want to ask the minister if he will admit that the reason that he has not helped people here in Canada suffering from recession is because he has instead listened to the IMF in Washington.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to give the assurance to the member that this is not the case. Had we followed the Liberal policy for the 15 years preceding ours, our deficit would be at $100 billion and then we would be taking instruction from the IMF.

But we are not. We made these decisions before. What the IMF says is that some of the measures we have taken it would recommend because they are good, valid measures.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. On June 5, I asked the minister when he would produce environmental studies of government policies. He answered that they did not yet have the methods to do so. Yesterday in the House, I asked the same question and unfortunately, I had the same reply. No progress in six months. However, in a study that I have here and which the minister knows well, a very reputable institute, Resources Future International, long ago developed the methods that the minister is supposedly seeking.

Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to submit immediately to the Auditor General for approval the methods contained in this report in order to apply them in reviewing the next budget?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let us be clear on the meaning of what we said yesterday. I told the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard that the government had to create the methodology to do the environmental assessment as policies move through the Cabinet system. That does not mean that there is no method at all, Mr. Speaker; on the contrary, it means that every case is unique. When an issue is presented, the government must adjust accordingly and put in place the processes, mechanisms and evaluations that will enable us to produce an environmental assssessment. That is what I meant in my answer and that is what we will continue to do in the years to come.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we have been waiting eight months for the environmental evaluation of the budget. We have been waiting almost a year for the environmental evaluation of energy policy. We have been waiting the same length of time for the environmental evaluation of agricultural policy.

The fact is that this minister's constant fudging on a very firm commitment to the green plan speaks miles about why there is such public cynicism about the political process.

Therefore, will the minister release his working papers on this issue, if indeed he has some, and will he ask his officials to meet within the week with a designated group of environmental organizations, with members on both sides of this House and with the Auditor General so that jointly we can come up with a method to keep to the promise which this member's colleagues are so desperate to keep?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is no fudging whatsoever on this issue.

Evidence of that, if the member absolutely needs an example to illustrate what is going on, is the NAFTA negotiations, the negotiations between Canada, the United States and Mexico, to consider whether we want to enter into a trade agreement with them. The member knows that in that case there is an environmental assessment going on. If he needs a precise example, there is a precise example.

It is for the government within the framework of our own system to work out the methodology. We are doing that now as different dossiers come forth.

If the member absolutely wants to pursue this question, I suggest to him that I would be very happy to go before the Standing Committee on the Environment and offer testimony. Since I have been minister I went before committees four times up until now. I would be happy to go back once a week, if that is what the hon. member wants and if that is what the committee wants.

That is why we have a committee system in the House of Commons.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the ministers of fisheries and employment, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will recall that on October 22 the minister of fisheries said in the House that the federal government had provided more than adequate funding to look after all fishermen and all plant workers who met the criteria of the Fisheries Atlantic Emergency Assistance Program.

Is the Prime Minister aware that today federal officials are telling Atlantic Canada that there is no more funding available to provide for plant workers who meet the program criteria and who should have started work this past Monday?

What is the Prime Minister going to do to ensure that the federal government's commitment to the people of Atlantic Canada is kept at this time?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the minister of fisheries has been in constant contact with the Atlantic fisheries people and with the Atlantic fisheries minister. He was there last week and met with them. He is well aware of what some of the people are saying, and it is being looked at now.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, when I and other Liberal MPs raised this matter several weeks ago, the minister of fisheries said: "Anyone who can show a reasonable connection to the fishery or to being a plant worker is going to be assisted, or my name is not John Carnell Crosbie".

What is the Prime Minister going to do to restore the name and the credibility in the current circumstances of his no name minister of fisheries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me repeat for the record. My name is not John Carnell Crosbie.

• (1500)

Mr. Mulroney: I had an opportunity just before I left to meet with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and we had approved, I think, a $39 million program in favour of that—

An hon. member: Only for Newfoundland.

Mr. Mulroney: My friend from Nova Scotia says "only for Newfoundland." What is wrong with that? This is a program to help Newfoundlanders. Are the Liberals opposed to us helping Newfoundlanders? Here we are trying to help Newfoundlanders with $39 million and the member from Nova Scotia says "only for Newfoundlanders". I say that is not enough for Newfoundlanders. We are trying to do more, and we are also doing a lot for Nova Scotia.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. During the past number of weeks, many members of Parliament have held town hall meetings and round table discussions in their ridings to hear the views of their constituents on the country's future, more specifically, to hear views of their constituents on the government's constitutional proposals. My question is this.

What mechanism can be used or will be considered to allow individual members of Parliament to report their views, the views they receive from their constituents, to the committee and to Parliament?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate members from all sides of the House who are conducting those kinds of discussions in their own constituencies. It is another means to help us consult the public of Canada and also to improve the proposals that are on the table.

I think the hon. members makes an excellent suggestion, that we should seek to find a means—and I will undertake to meet with the members of the special joint committee to do that—by which the summary reports of some of those consultations can be made available to the special joint committee so that they will have the benefit of the advice of interested Canadians as they make recommendations as to how to improve the proposals we have put before Parliament.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. There is no development need in the maritime provinces quite so important for long-term success, both for prosperity and service to citizens, than is reconstruction of the Trans-Canada Highway, particularly through the corridor province of New Brunswick.

It is obvious that fulfilment of this goal involving more than $2 billion can never be attained without major participation by the Government of Canada.

Will the minister please advise us about the state of negotiations and planning with respect to the Trans-Canada Highway. Is it the top priority in the national highway policy and will progress on its construction be seen in the foreseeable future?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because we recognize how important these highways are that my department has been consulting with our provincial and territorial colleagues in order to plan a new national highway policy.

The hon. member certainly knows that since 1978, Transport Canada has contributed nearly $207 million toward highways in New Brunswick and there are more under way. New Brunswick has decided to spend most of that money on the northeastern region. We are still consulting with our provincial counterparts to arrive at a national highway policy.

PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If during the 1980s the foreign controlled companies in Canada's petroleum industry had reinvested their cash flows at the same rate as Canadian-controlled companies, another $8 billion in new investment could have resulted. That could have saved many of the 60,000 jobs, more than 40 per cent of the total, that were lost from Alberta's oil patch since 1985. But they did not. They sent $23 billion out of the country.

Instead of trying to remove the last vestiges of control on foreign investment, will the minister turn his attention to seeking new sources of Canadian investment money for the petroleum industry, thereby ensuring the benefits of that new investment remain in Canada.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have read with interest the hon. member's press release, plus the figures he received from my department. Regrettably, he does not tell the whole story.

If he looks at the decade that he uses his statistics for, it is true that there was a lot of investment for Canadian companies. It was done through the taxpayer. It was called PIPS. They received benefits through the tax system greater than the amount of money they invested. There were also such companies known as Dome, and the member knows what happened in terms of the Government of Canada. He also knows what happened in terms of the acquisitions on Petro-Canada.

I simply point out to the member, if you take a look at foreign investment today, you can show the Caroline project for Shell or the Hibernia project where the majors are non-Canadian, or we could take a look at even Hibernia with Husky. I could go on. But I say to the hon. member that—

Mr. Speaker: I think we do have to go on. The hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, a short question.

CANADA POST

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post. He knows that strikes cause great harm to seniors, to charities, to small businesses. I recently put forward a private members' bill that would effectively ban all future strikes with Canada Post. I want to ask the minister responsible if he would adopt a similar initiative by this government that would declare all services essential and bar any future strikes?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question that Canadians are fed up with the kinds of strikes we have had from irresponsible union leadership who are pursuing political agendas, such as the leadership of CUPW, and I must say the leadership of PSAC has not distinguished itself recently as well.

I am definitely looking at changes that we can make to ensure that Canadians get the service they are paying for and deserve and we are no longer held to ransom by irresponsible union leaders.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the Chair could assist members on this side of the House in indicating to us the Standing Order which was violated between the exchange between the deputy leader of our party and the Prime Minister. Perhaps the Chair could advise as to whether or not it was Standing Order 37, subsection (1), Standing Order 18, or indeed under Beauchesne paragraph 359, subsection (6).

I say to the Chair with great respect that we would like to know the Standing Order which has been breached. We would like also to ask if the Chair would reflect in terms of the intervention which was made by the Chair, if in fact it was under the circumstances and in view of the urgency of the question which was asked somewhat hostile.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it is proper, first of all, on rising on a point of order to the Chair, and asking the Chair for some clarification which I will try to give, and I do not think it helps to make the suggestion that the intervention on the part of the Chair is hostile. I hope that no hon. member in this place would believe that I would intentionally make an intervention in a hostile way.

I say to the hon. member for Hamilton East that I know she was upset at the intervention. I wonder if hon. members could give me a moment until we see the transcript. I may have been in error. If I am I will be the first to say so. But I would like to see exactly what the transcript shows.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to hon. members. I would like to take a moment. I was concentrating a few minutes ago on a point of order and in doing so I neglected to do something which I know hon. members would want me to do and that is draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of Dr. Dimitrji Rupel, Minister of Foreign Affairs for Slovenia.

BILL C-35

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, since you have now taken the Chair, as you are fully aware on Friday of last week I had raised a procedural argument with regard to bill C-35. Of course there were several hours remaining on Friday. We had the weekend. We have had Monday, Tuesday and it is now 3.10 on Wednesday afternoon.

I am wondering if the Chair would now be in a position to give information to members of Parliament as to when that procedural argument will be taken back into the Chamber and a decision made so we may proceed with the business of the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I understand the opposition House leader's interest and also his impatience, if I may say so, but I can only repeat what I said yesterday, as I have received no further indications since that time. Once again, the Chair will certainly consider the hon. member's interest in this matter and will provide the requisite clarification with respect to the questions raised by the opposition House leader as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair for the intervention. I do not think it would be too onerous on the Chair if perhaps some indication could be given as to when the ruling may be forthcoming.

We are presently debating subject matter before the House which has a direct reference to the items contained in Bill C-35 and in particular, Part III. I realize that the Table, the Chair and members are preoccupied with bigger and more important issues.

I would like to have some idea from the Chair and/or Table as to when we might expect a decision on that procedural argument on Bill C-35. Perhaps the Chair could indicate that it will be done in the quickness of time before the end of this week. Will it be done before the end of next week? Will it be done before the House recesses for Christmas?

I do not wish to ask the Chair to give me a specific time. Surely the Chair, understanding the frustrations that members have to contend with, could give us some approximation as to when the decision will be forthcoming with the arguments one way or the other on my procedural case on Bill C-35.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I can assure the hon. member that the Chair will not remain unmoved by the persistence of the House Leader for the Official Opposition.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to echo some of the requests made by my hon. colleague, the House leader for the Official Opposition.

I simply wanted to say that last Friday when this procedural irregularity occurred there was an incredible amount of goodwill on all sides of the House to find a solution that would allow us to proceed with the remainder of the day in anticipation of a relatively early response.

I appreciate your comments, Mr. Speaker, that you are awaiting further information, but I think it is important, particularly in light of the fact that it resulted from co-operation in the House, that after a number of days such a straightforward procedural decision ought to be forthcoming.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have nothing further to add except that the Chair has taken note of the questions raised by the opposition and NDP House leaders.

The committee recommends that the Solicitor General of Canada table in Parliament by March 1, 1992 comprehensive legislation reforming the Criminal Records Act.

FINANCE—FOURTH, FIFTH AND SIXTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Finance.

In accordance with its order of reference on Wednesday, October 2, 1991, your committee has considered Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, and agreed to report it with amendments.

It is a report that we were able to agree on and hopefully the government will find it helpful in coming forward with the official bill.

PETITIONS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present to Parliament a signed petition from my constituency of Winnipeg North and in fact beyond, up to Quebec. It contains some 55 signatures at least.

The petition refers to the declaration of Ukrainian independence on August 24, 1991 and that one million Canadians of Ukrainian descent have sustained their ideals of freedom and support for this cause in their ancestral home.

Since Ukraine is a founding member of the United Nations they pray that Parliament urges as the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of the Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence and establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and people of the Ukraine immediately following a positive confirmation vote in Ukraine's referendum on December 1, 1991.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of residents of Darfield, Heffley Creek, McClure, Barrière and Lewis Creek, British Columbia.

They point out their very serious concern regarding the intention of a particular company to dam the North Thompson River at Vavenby, British Columbia, in an effort to divert water to sell in California.

• (1520)

They point out that this is one of the many United States proposals to divert Canadian rivers into the United States and northern Mexico. They ask that the Canadian government simply indicate clearly to the United States that Canada's rivers are not for sale.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker, primarily from the residents of Kamloops.

The petitioners point out that the RCMP is being severely restricted in terms of its budgeting from all levels of government. They are concerned about the increasing perception that the RCMP is unable to fulfil its mandate as we would expect.

They are asking, particularly in this case, that the federal government restore adequate funding to the RCMP to enable it to fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for many communities across British Columbia.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 26, consideration of Bill C–28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, as reported with amendments by the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to the Speaker's ruling made yesterday we will debate Motion No. A.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

Motion No. A

That Bill C–28 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 2 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"business under section 362, as applied by subsection 656(1), or subsection 656(3);"

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical amendment to clause 2 of the bill because of changes made in the committee. It just happens to be one of those things that was missed at the finance committee when we were straightening this bill up when we had the bill before us. It is a technical matter and ought to be moved ahead without debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. A. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. A agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motions Nos. B and 3B, standing in the name of the minister, have been grouped for debate.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

Motion No. B.

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 36 on page 6 and substituting the following:

B"236, and that is not converted into a company with common shares under this Act".

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 237 by striking out lines 20 and 21 on page 130 and substituting the following:

"(d) generally, respecting the conversion of a mutual company into a company with common shares."

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, as a result of consultations in the other place with the Canadian Bar Association, technical wording was changed with reference to what is set out in Motion No. B. This is a technical amendment that more properly describes a demutualization process.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. B. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. B agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 3B. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3B agreed to.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

Motion No. C.

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 13 by striking out line 34 on page 18 and substituting the following:

"254 to 259 and Parts X, XII and XV to XVII".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate, the hon. member for Mississauga South.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical amendment. It adds the words "Part X" to a description of societies in the definition section, section 13.(2). It should be approved without debate.

Some hon. members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. C, standing in the name of Mr. Loiselle. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. C agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion Nos. 1, 6 and 7, standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, have been grouped for debate.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 23 by striking out lines 29 to 33 at page 21.

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 407 by adding immediately after line 18 at page 215 the following:

"(2) The Minister may approve only the following acquisitions:

(a) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 100 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is less than ten billion dollars;

(b) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 75 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than ten billion dollars and not more than twenty billion dollars;

(c) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 50 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than twenty billion dollars and not more than thirty billion dollars;

(d) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 25 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value is not less than thirty billion dollars and not more than forty billion dollars; or

(e) the acquisition by a person, or entity controlled by a person, of up to 10 per cent of the shares of a company or an entity that holds any share of a company where the company or entity to be acquired holds assets whose total value exceeds forty billion dollars."

(a) by striking out lines 30 to 34 on page 219 and substituting the following therefor:

"411. (1) Every company acquired in accordance with subsection 407(2) shall, from and after the day determined pursuant to this section in respect of that company, have and continue to have, voting shares that carry

(a) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 407(2)(b), 25 per cent,

(b) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 407(2)(c), 50 per cent,

(c) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 407(2)(d), 75 per cent,

(d) in the case of a company referred to in paragraph 407(2)(e), 90 per cent, of the voting rights attached";

(b) by striking out lines 1 to 29 on page 220 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) For a company described in subsection (1) that is or is not a former-Act company, the day referred to in that subsection is the day that is five years after the day this Part comes into force."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is once again maintaining consistency with the opinions expressed by this party in this corner of the Chamber with respect to the Bank Act and the Trust and Loans Act. I am dealing with the first motion, Motion No. 1.

This motion would allow the Crown to establish a Crown corporation for the purposes of insurance. The same arguments that we have made previously are the arguments that we want to reinforce again.

Why would the federal government close out its options and the options of provincial governments to establish an insurance company if in its own wisdom it sees fit to do so?

I have expressed the view previously in discussing this matter on the other bills that it portrays a medieval view of government, that in fact before it even has a chance to exercise an option it forbids itself from exercising the option or even considering the option. The arguments that have been used were that somehow or other we cannot allow provincial governments to establish a Crown corporation which might come under federal jurisdiction.

They do it all the time in other sectors of the economy. Provincial governments establish Crown corporations for transportation and they have to be governed by a National Transportation Act. There are other examples.

Yet here in the financial sector it seems that this government, given its mentality and its corporate agenda, wants to prevent the people of the country if in the wisdom of the government it sees that it should establish an insurance company, from doing so.

We find that unacceptable. That is why we have opposed it in the Bank Act. We opposed it in the Trust and Loans Act, Bill C-4 and Bill C-19, and we are opposing it here on Bill C-28, the Insurance Companies Act.

Our other motions deal with the ownership. Again it is a consistent argument that we have made on Bill C-4 and Bill C-19. Given the new changes that are encompassed in these bills and given the new climate that will be present when these bills finally become law, insurance companies are going to be able to do practically all the things that banks do by virtue of the fact that they can closely hold trust and loan companies.

It seems to me you have all of the potential there for a meltdown. We have said the best guarantee for the shareholders, for the policyholders and for the people of Canada is to be widely held.

We quoted yesterday in debate a commentary in The Economist that calls on the Government of Canada to recognize the need to maintain the wide ownership rules.

When this legislation goes into effect, there will be no small insurance companies. There will be no small financial institutions. There will not be that little insurance company that you knew in your little town on a street. These are going to be huge conglomerates. These are going to be large.

In fact these bills will force them to grow large like a cancer. There is no advantage for them to stay small. There is every encouragement, every reason for them to become bigger, bigger and bigger.

This is madness. We have said this. We said yesterday in debate that bigness is not necessarily better. Bigness is not necessarily better. We have adopted the sliding scale of ownership because we felt that the study in 1985 of the green paper was appropriate.

We believe that is the most effective way to prevent the concentration of ownership. We believe that one of the big problems with the failures that we have seen in financial institutions, particularly the trust sector, has been because of the close ownership. It is because of the mixing of financial owned by non-financial.

All the commentary that we have been reading recently says we have to make sure we separate the commercial from the financial. Why does a mining company own a trust company? It seems to me that is a recipe for disaster as was the case with Standard Trust.

Can you imagine a Campeau bank, a Campeau trust company or a Lavelin trust company? Can you imagine an Algoma bank or an Algoma loan and trust company? That is the danger. We have to keep those two operations separate. We cannot mix the commercial and the financial.

That was the rationale behind the green paper that the finance committee tabled. The whole question of close ownership is one of the greatest threats to the health of the financial institutions of this country.

We have built in Canada a banking system second to none in the world. I am prepared to say that. We are second to none in the world.

We are dealing with the Bank Act, and we have to look at the situation as it is presented to us. The banks of this country are the most secure in the world. They were built through a system of regulation, a pillar system. It is a system of wide ownership.

It seems to me that we are now saying the system that built the banking structures in this country are not good enough now for building some new huge structures. So we throw out all of the things that we have proved to be successful. We are saying now it is open season. You can have mutual companies, and this bill envisages mutual companies being demutualized. You are not going to have a nice little insurance company where all the policy holders hold it, where we are all holding hands and we are feeling each other and it feels good and you have hot milk or something and you are feeling good. All that is gone. They will demutualize, and then once they demutualize they will have to sort of merge, they will have to find partners. You will have this growth and only the mighty will survive. It is back to the jungle in this legislation. It is survival of the fittest.

I do not think that serves the best interests of Canadians.

We have argued in these Motions No. 6 and 7 for wide ownership. We believe that is the way to go. It is the best guarantee. In the long run when these institutions fail, it is the taxpayers who pick up the pieces through the CDIC. It is the taxpayers who bail out the depositors.

I say to the House, this is the last chance, you have a last chance. This can be a deathbed repentance. Accept now, brothers and sisters on the other side, accept now and you shall be saved. Accept this amendment now. Repent now before the hour is too late. I see you are standing so my hour has come.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Debate, the hon. member for Malpeque.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Motion No. 1 on the Insurance Act, Bill C-28.

This is a similar amendment to the one we discussed in the last couple of days concerning the Bank Act and the Insurance Act.

At that time I indicated in the House that we in the Liberal Party were opposed to the motion. Last night we voted against similar motions pertaining to the banks and the trust companies.

We have been studying this legislation for over a year in the financial institutions. We have heard over 100 witnesses, but never did we have a provincial government come to the committee and request this power. Never did we have an individual or a consumer group come forward and ask that a provincial government be able to incorporate an insurance company under the federal law.

As I stated before, if a provincial government wants to enter the financial services sector, certainly there is nothing to stop it from setting up a provincial trust company, as has been done in Ontario and Alberta.

I also have a concern that if a provincial government could own a federal financial institution, how that might affect federal–provincial relations.

To be consistent, as we are on this side of the House, we will vote against this motion for the same reasons I put forth in the last couple of days to similar amendments that were made to the trust and the Bank Act.

At this time, I have nothing further to add to debate on this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, these are highly technical amendments that were considered by the Canadian Bar Association in the pre-clearing hearings by the Senate. The government has accepted them as amendments that will clarify descriptions in the statute.

To a large extent they deal with the voting arrangements for participating policy holders. For example, a participating policy holder is entitled to attend a meeting and is entitled to a vote. One vote per policy holder is the arrangement and that type of thing is carried on through all of these amendments.

I think the amendments should pass without debate.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have no problem with these amendments. As the hon. member for Mississauga South has said it just clears up language.

I want to flag a concern I expressed in committee and I even tried a motion and it was defeated. That was the question of notification of participating policy holders. I was not satisfied with putting the onus on the policy holders to inform the company officials that they wanted to receive notice of annual meetings. It seemed to me that the onus should be on the company to inform the policy holders of the annual meetings.

I want to express my reservations about the way in which these amendments have been proceeded with. I do not have anything against the technicalities they are trying to establish but I want to express the concern.

I hope by the end of the afternoon, by the time we wrap up Bill C-28, we will have resolved that concern I have about notification of participating policyholders.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, we have reviewed the amendments. I agree with the hon. member for Mississauga that they are technical amendments and we will be voting for them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2F agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois)): The next question is on Motion No. 2A. A vote on Motion No. 2A will apply to Motion No. 2C.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2A agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next question is on Motion No. 2B. A vote on Motion No. 2B will apply to Motion No. 2D.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion No. 2B agreed to.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 168 by striking out line 4 on page 97 and substituting the following:

"the members of which are primarily".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is another technical amendment that disqualifies certain persons. It deals with mutual companies. It is a highly technical amendment. It replaces the word "exclusively" with "primarily". As we were talking about simple or plain language the other day, my friend from Malpeque will appreciate the problems we have with this kind of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 2G agreed to.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 208 by adding immediately after line 40 at page 116 the following:

"(3) The directors of a company shall place before the shareholders for approval, at every annual meeting, a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the company who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the company in the next financial year of the company, together with the amount of such salaries.

(4) Notwithstanding any Act of Parliament, the salaries referred to in subsection (3) may be paid only to the extent that they have been approved by special resolution.

(5) Forthwith after each anual meeting of shareholders, the company shall send to the Superintendent, a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the company who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the company in the ensuing financial year of the company together with the amount of such salaries.

(6) For the purposes of this section, "salary" means any form of remuneration payable by a company for work performed by a director, officer or employee of the company and includes

(a) commissions, vacation pay and bonuses;

(b) reasonable value for rent and housing;

(c) payments in kind; and

(d) any other advantage received directly or indirectly from the company;

but does not include

(e) any amount paid as a consequence of the termination of the employment of any director, officer or employee."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the member for Mississauga South, in his whole approach to bank service charges, wants disclosure. He believes that these things should be out on the table so choices can be made. We argued consistently that the wages of the highest paid officials of financial institutions ought to be approved by the shareholders of the institution.

The people are the shareholders of Canada and the government, cabinet and members of Parliament are the officials of this country. Everyone knows the salaries of members of Parliament, cabinet ministers, the Prime Minister, the chief executive officer. Public servants know. There is a process for voting on those raises, on those salaries.

Yet the shareholders of a financial institution, which is a microcosm of the macrocosm, cannot vote on the salaries of the big boys. The shareholders are allowed to vote on the salaries of the directors of the corporation but not on those of the guys on the inside, the ones with the private restaurants attached to their offices, the ones who really make the decisions. We do not know what their stock options are, we do not know what their bonuses are, we do not know what their salaries are, we do not know what their golden parachutes, or their platinum parachutes as the case may be, are.

The important point is that the shareholders do not get to set those salaries. They do not get to approve them. In the end, those salaries come out of the dividends that would be going to those shareholders. It is their money. They are the ones who have taken the risk. They put their money into the corporation and have a right to decide what the salaries of the top dogs in the operation should be.

However, this government has said that it would remain secret. If an institution sets up a branch in the United States and its stock is traded there the information has to be revealed. As a result, we have a situation in which in this country we do not require that information to be available to shareholders but in our major trading partner it is required.

Canadians who want this information have to go down to the United States and seek access to its process to get that information.

It seems to me that this is very important, particularly in the case of financial institutions. It is extremely important in light of what these bills are going to be doing, and I am referring to Bill C-4, Bill C-19, Bill C-28.

We are going to see one of the greatest feeding frenzies ever seen in the next couple of years. It is going to be like dropping a piece of meat into a tank of piranhas. It will be a feeding frenzy where they will eat up each other.

In such a situation it is very important that the shareholders know what kinds of compensation the chief operating officers of that financial institution are getting. It is very important. I do not have to tell you about the situation at Standard Trust, even now. It is something I have to put on the record. I have been after the appropriate committee of this House, the Standing Committee on Finance, to continue the post-mortem on Standard Trust. I have sent letter after letter to the chairman of the committee asking that we continue the examination of Standard Trust.

Nothing has happened. We had one meeting. Michael Mackenzie appeared before the committee and we just touched the tip of the iceberg to try to determine what happened.

I am not a suspicious person by nature but I wondered: "Why is it that we did not do the post-mortem on Standard Trust?" Why do you think we did not do it?

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. Rodriguez: I will explain why. It is because at the same time that Standard Trust was sinking below the seas we were unlatching the cages of the financial institutions.

Now you start to see a pattern. We might have discovered some things about the way in which our regulatory system for financial institutions works that might call into question what we are doing in these bills.

Then the public may have twigged to that and said: "If you could not control a small little trust company like Standard Trust, how are you going to control a Hulk Hogan? How are you going to do it?"

Now we have the scenario. The Ontario Securities Commission started an investigation into Standard Trust. I want to ask you: "Is it going anywhere?" Oh, no, it is not going anywhere because Mr. Michael Mackenzie says: "I cannot tell you certain things. I cannot produce certain documents. My lips are sealed. My hands are tied". What is happening? The OSC is going to court to see if it can force the information out of the regulator.

I always thought that the legislators ought to be able to examine these things when they fail. We ought to be able to examine and sift the bones and entrails to see if we can build a better beast.

That seems logical, but we cannot do that. However some things have leaked out that have direct connection to the revelation of these salaries and emoluments for directors and head honchos.

For example, we found out that these Standard Trust bigwigs were paying themselves $1 million in pension payments. Who paid for that? Not the shareholders but the taxpayers through the CDIC. When it went down the tubes $250 million came right out of the pockets of every person watching now to pay the depositors.

Whose money is it? It is the people's money. That is the kind of important information that has to be made public because it will inform certain decisions by the shareholders. It will set certain bells ringing.

The member for Mississauga South said: "Oh well, Mr. Mackenzie gets that information". Mr. Mackenzie got that information from Standard Trust, I assume—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time is over.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this is a similar motion to what we debated in the last couple of days concerning the Trust and the Bank Act.

This is an issue which was never studied in the finance committee over the year that we have been looking at financial institutions. I am aware that there are good arguments on both sides. People arguing in favour of it say that it is important that shareholders have this information so that they are able to assess the salaries that chief executive officers are receiving from financial institutions.

They will also be able to assess CEO's salaries compared to the job they are doing to see whether they really deserve these high salaries. There are also arguments to be made against this, certainly the concern about privacy, personal risk and the increased competition that it causes, as has been experienced in the United States where this legislation is in effect. One thing it has done is drive up the salaries of chief executive officers.

I agree with the principle of disclosure. There is no question about that. I think there are a lot of good arguments for this amendment, but I do not agree with singling out financial institutions and disclosing the top five salaries of the chief executive officers in financial institutions and not other major corporations. If we are going to do this, if we are going to consider it, then my suggestion would be that we study it first, that we find out the pros and cons. Then we look at it, and if we are going to do it then let us be fair about it. Let us do it not only to financial institutions, but also to other corporations.

Again, I agree with the principle of disclosure, but I do not agree with singling out financial institutions. Therefore, we will be voting against this amendment.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to just briefly take note of this amendment because I think it is an eminently supportable motion. I have read a number of articles and have seen a very good television piece on, I think it was 60 Minutes, which looked at this kind of a problem, which seems to have kind of escaped everyone's notice. Perhaps it would be logical and sensible to begin now in this bill to address this particular problem. It does seem that there are some people who are placed in the corporate structure in such a way that they kind of escape the scrutiny of everyone.

I suppose many of us in our caucus would not show a great deal of sympathy if in the private sector, in a bank or a lending institution for example, someone was overpaid. That is not the problem though. The problem really is when taxpayers, directly or indirectly, are expected to subsidize that kind of overpayment. That clearly is wrong.

The problem at the moment seems to be access to the information, that in many cases not even those who you would normally consider to have access to this. Shareholders in a company, for example, often do not have access to that information.

In a time of great restraint, such as supposedly the period we are now in in Canada, we have said to many people who are employed by the federal government that there is absolutely no money available for an increase in salaries this year. We have said that to members of the Senate and members of the House and to a great many other people who work for the Government of Canada. It is a concept that is spreading rather rapidly, that there is not any money available for salary increases.

I do not quite agree with that concept but I do certainly acknowledge that it is around.

There should be access to information which at least allows us to compare what is happening in the private sector. At any point in time when we the public are expected to subsidize, in whatever direct or indirect way that we might be asked to do that, then certainly we have an obligation to get that information out on the public record.

The amendment that is before us at the moment seems to me to be a very straightforward amendment. It basically says that people who are shareholders in a company will have access, not to everybody or to everything, but certainly to the top five people who would be in their corporation. You could argue of course that maybe that is an invasion of their privacy. Sure it is, but so is the publication of my salary, and there are almost 300 people in this Chamber who have the same thing happen to them. It is an invasion of our privacy, to be sure.

An hon. member: Would you publish your staff's salaries?

Mr. Breaugh: Yes, I would be quite happy to do that. I do not see a problem with that. I do not understand what would be wrong with saying that. Since we know the salary ranges for every civil servant in Canada, since that is known public information—

An hon. member: How about the bonuses?

Mr. Breaugh: —how then could that be such a gross invasion of privacy? I think the problem we are trying to get at here is that we have certain people who are excluded from having any information put forward about what the salaries are. There may have been at one time a good argument for saying: "There is no need to know", but I believe the argument has shifted somewhat. Now there is a need to know. Now there is a need to have access to that information if we are expected to, for example in this case, look at banks and lending institutions and say: "Well now we need to rewrite that legislation". Do we and do we ever need to subsidize them? Do we ever need to invest public tax money directly or indirectly into what they do?

I hear a constant flow of arguments on different occasions now that says basically that the private sector is the private sector and should be left alone unless it needs public money. When it needs public money then, of course, it is everybody's obligation to jump right in here. All of those people are fierce proponents of the marketplace until such time as it is inconvenient for their purposes to make that argument. They then say: "But we need some government intervention. We need some government help. We need some government money. We need some funding into the private sector". I am prepared to consider that, but when we do that we should do that as conscientious investors. That is to say, we know what is going on there.

All this amendment does is provide us with an access point to some information about the financial arrangements that are made to compensate the top five people in a corporation. I think that is reasonable. I understand the argument that it is an invasion of privacy, but so is the publication of my salary. If I can live with it they can live with it.

I suspect that most of these people are making two, three and four times what I am making so maybe it is a somewhat larger invasion of their privacy. I suspect that if that is a known condition of employment, if the salary is $400,000 a year and you know that it is going to be made public, I will bet you would still take the job. I will bet that the fact that it is an invasion of your privacy could be somehow set aside for a moment on the way to the bank or the trust company to cash your pay cheque.

I think this is a sacrifice, but a small one and a necessary one if we are to continue with the current process that is widespread in Canada of the private sector turning to government, directly or indirectly at some point in time, and asking for assistance. While we should do that in many instances, we would be stupid shareholders if we did not know the information that is pertinent to the situation.

This simple amendment simply says that the top five people in that chain of command should put their salary requests before all of the shareholders.

I tried to turn this around and see what the argument would be on the other side and it is a short argument indeed. I want to hear some member stand up in this Chamber today and tell me why you cannot disclose the salaries of the top five people in a corporation to the shareholders in that corporation. If it is only an invasion of their privacy then perhaps we should put on the record another little subamendment that says: "Well, if you want the money you have to publish what your salary is, and if you do not want to publish what your salary is don't take the money".

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I had not actually intended to get involved in this issue, but after listening to the member for Oshawa and the member for Nickel Belt there are a few things that I think those who are watching this debate may find themselves a little bit confused about. I engage in it only for those reasons.

One thing that I picked up from the member for Nickel Belt was that somehow the Standard Trust inquiry by the finance committee was somehow suppressed in a conspiratorial way while this legislation was being pushed through. He made many inflammatory I would say statements in the course of his comments that suggested the existence of this conspiracy first of all, and also suggested that for some reason the level of executive compensation in Standard Trust was the cause of that company's failure. What I would like to say to him and through you, Mr. Speaker, to the House is that I am not satisfied that we are finiihed with the inquiry into Standard Trust. The committee has been involved with quite a few other things, including looking at the failure of the Bank of Credit and Commerce.

The evidence that we had when we looked at Standard Trust—and the member for Nickel Belt was there and had an opportunity to ask many questions—did indicate some problems with how Standard Trust was conducting its affairs even in relation to the rules that exist. It certainly did not point to the company failing because of executive compensation, nor did it indicate that had executive compensation been disclosed, somehow that would have saved the company.

The second thing that I found very confusing about his statements in particular were that he seemed to be suggesting that his amendment would allow shareholders to decide the level of executive compensation. Of course what they provide for is merely disclosure. They do not provide that the shareholders would somehow vote on executive compensation.

I think it is important to understand what is happening here. He will know if he remembers during the discussions that we had that I was one who in principle favoured disclosure. There are some concerns that I have about it however.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the hon. member has not read the amendment. It says that "the directors of a company shall place before the shareholders for approval at every annual meeting, a list containing the names of the five directors, officers or employees of the company who are to receive the highest salaries to be paid by the company in the next financial year of the company, together with the amount of such salaries".

Therefore, there is approval by the shareholders, brother, and that is what I was saying in my debate.

Mr. Manley: Thank you, brother Nickel Belt. The way it reads to me is that there is the usual requirement for approval of the shareholders. There is nothing in that amendment that requires that the shareholders approve the compensation. It asks for approval of the list of directors. If his intention was to have them perhaps he should rewrite it.

The point I am seeking to make in addition to that is that the concept of fairness surely has to prevail even among chief executive officers. I would think the NDP would agree with that.

I would suggest to the member, if he wishes to do something like this that he bring in a Private Member's Bill related to executive compensation of firms that are governed at the federal level. It would require disclosure of executive salaries, not just for executives of financial institutions, but executives of all corporations that are regulated by the federal government. That would be more fair.

It would still fall a long way short of fairness because —and there is nothing we can do about this without the co-operation of the provincial governments—it would continue to leave out of that system compensation for employees of corporations who are regulated in the provincial sector, all those incorporated for example in Ontario or elsewhere that were not carrying on federal activities.

He would be creating quite a disincentive for top executives for example to move from the manufacturing sector into the financial services sector. Until that system is the same for everybody, I think he is on the wrong path.

I think the final point that I would like to address is this idea that somehow disclosure of salaries is related to the failure of these institutions. That came particularly out of the comments by the member for Oshawa. He suggested that somehow when financial institutions fail, they go on to the public dole. Therefore because these executives' salaries are somehow related to institutions for which guess deposit insurance applies, that in one way or another there is a need for disclosure because public money was involved.

I must say I find that a complete red herring. I think we really need to focus on the issue of whether or not disclosure of executive compensation, either for the information of potential investors and shareholders or for the broader community, should be in place.

If so, we should encourage it at all levels. As the member for Malpeque pointed out, the evidence is that in the United States, CEOs receive a higher ratio of compensation to other individuals in their corporations than is the case in Canada.

There are statistics that prove that. If the object of this exercise is to hold down executive compensation—which I suspect is really what he is getting at, although he has not come out and said it, and since I guess it is part of the philosophy that everybody should be paid the same—the evidence is that it does not work. In fact the evidence is that when you disclose everybody's salary, then you have a kind of bidding war for the best CEO.

I am not sure, but it seems to me that there should be a little more study of this aspect of the proposal before we go down that road.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 234 by striking out line 23 on page 129 and substituting the following:

"accordance with Division X, which applies in respect of that acquisition with such modifications as the circumstances require, as if each reference in that Division to

(i) the "offeree company" or the "offeror" were a reference to the "company",

(ii) a "dissenting offeree" were a reference to a holder of a share of the company who has not offered to sell his or her share under the terms of the mutualization proposal,

(iii) an "offeree who accepted the take-over bid" were a reference to a holder of a share of the company who has offered to sell his or her share under the terms of the mutualization proposal, and

(iv) the "date of the take-over bid" or the "date of termination of the take-over bid" were a reference to the date on which the Superintendent approves the purchase or other acquisition of the shares of the company pursuant to a mutualization proposal."

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical amendment dealing with mutualization not demutualization. From time to time a privately owned corporation in the insurance business wants to become a mutual company. This particular amendment that was formulated in our hearings in the Senate is a technical amendment to clarify how mutualization takes place under division 10 in the bill.

I think the amendment should carry without further debate.

Motions Nos. 3G and 11C standing in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt are grouped for debate.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 337 by striking out line 40 at page 185 and substituting the following therefore:

"meeting, appoint two auditors, who shall be independent of each other, to hold office".

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 633 by striking out line 31 at page 339 and substituting the following therefor:

"two auditors, who shall be independent of each other, for its insurance business in".

He said: Mr. Speaker, these two amendments would require two auditors for these new creatures that are being created with this legislation.

One of the things we have said consistently about these bills C-4, C-19 and C-28, is that they will result in a different kind of financial institution. Since the pillars are being collapsed in effect, insurance companies are going to own trust and loan companies.

There are expanded powers for insurance companies. They will be able to take certain types of deposits. They want to grow. They want to become bigger. They want to become global competitors.

As this happens we need to build in fail safe protection for depositors, investors and the people of Canada. I could not imagine why the government and the Liberal opposition would agree to reduce the number of auditors for a bank to one when they had two. I could not understand it.

I have heard the arguments from the member for Mississauga South and from the Liberal side. Having two auditors in the case of the Northland Bank and so on did not prevent the collapse of the bank. Because somebody broke into your house does not mean that you do not keep locks on the doors. That is the same argument.

Because people can break into your house, somehow or other you should make it easy for them and unlock the door. Leave it unlocked. We have argued that two auditors are essential. This is a check on what one auditor does. This is a protection for those who invest in the company and depositors.

I was amazed that the government members and the Liberal opposition in committee would actually vote to remove the dual auditor system. Yet they are prepared to put in the actuary and an auditor. It seems to me that the two auditors to check and double check on a financial institution is absolutely essential to the integrity of the institution.

We had evidence when Michael Mackenzie came before the committee on Standard Trust. If you read the evidence he gave—I read some of it into the record the other day—in the minutes of the finance committee meeting, he consistently pointed out how much OSFI depended on the auditor's report.

It consistently pointed out that OSFI does not have the wherewithal to do the audit of all the financial institutions that come under federal jurisdiction. He pointed out very clearly his reliance on the auditor's reports.

Now for a whole new creature that is being created in this legislation, we are going to tell him that he will have to do with one auditor's report.

Even in the world of medicine they recognize that a second opinion is also very important for a patient. You go to the doctor, he examines you and says: "Well, it is your liver. If you want a second opinion, it is your kidney."

People have availability to second opinions. I see the member for Mississauga South shaking his head. The dual audit system for the banks has served Canadians well. What we are creating here is the potential for very large and complex financial institutions. Yet we are suggesting and saying to them that you only need one auditor.

We cannot accept that. We believe that if you are giving them all of these new powers, you do not lessen the controls. You do not lessen the hurdles. You do not lessen the safeguards which are needed with respect to the regulatory system. I was accused when I arBgued this on C-4 and C-19 that I wanted to make work for accountants. I want to tell you that given the need to employ, given the fact that we have over 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, I would encourage young people to seek a career in accounting.

I know that the Accountants Association would really appreciate the pitch. If this is the way to go, it is a great opportunity.

I want to say that accounting is one of the professions and if you like it, what a wonderful opportunity. Guaranteed employment.

We do two things. We put a safeguard on the financial institutions of the country. It was interesting that when the banks came before the committee they said they wanted the two accountants and the two auditors. They want the dual audit system. They were not in favour of reducing the audit system to one. They wanted two. They argued that if all these other institutions are going to become more like banks, then the same rule ought to apply to the two audit system. This indicates to the public that there is a system in place, a safeguard system of auditing of financial institutions.

It is not just New Democrats in this corner of the Chamber who argued for the two audit system for financial institutions. There was one Conservative member on the committee who agreed with the requirement for two auditors. The member for Markham voted yesterday with this party to have the two audit system.

My colleague from Cambridge pointed out yesterday in a point of order, because I had erroneously lumped him in with other Conservative members who were for eliminating the two audit system, that other countries of the world with a one audit system are now looking at establishing a two audit system.

An hon. member: Do you mean we are going backward while they are going forward?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. They are coming from a one audit system and want to put a two audit system on their financial institutions. While they are going forward, we are taking a step backward.

Again I appeal. I know that the*in loco ministerio* who is sitting over there from Mississauga South loves this position. If you cannot be a Minister of State for Finance you can at least been in loco ministerio. I know that he could run into the back rooms and consult with the officials because this again is his last chance to do something for the depositors the investors and the people of Canada. He could run back now, even as you wait to take the vote. He could go quickly and come back and say: "We will put the two audit system in place".

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, just to clarify, I think he has misled his colleague from Oshawa. The banks had a two auditor system and yesterday, against my wishes, the banks now have an option of going to one auditor. However, the insurance companies currently have only one auditor. Now the member for Nickel Belt wants to bring in two, so it is quite different.

The other thing I would point out is when we were in committee not a single word of debate was raised on this particular point.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this again is a motion which is similar to the motions we discussed on the floor of this House in the last couple of days regarding the Bank Act and the Trust Companies Act.

This whole issue was raised in the finance committee and it was felt that there was no need for two auditors. As well, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, who is a very knowledgeable person in this whole area of financial institutions, has indicated that there is no obvious reason to have two auditors.

It may sound like a great idea but if it is not necessary, as the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has indicated, then why should we inflict this added expense on the insurance company? In the long run, it will be passed on to the people who use the services of the insurance company in increased premiums and other ways.

This party believes it is an unnecessary expenditure and if it is unnecessary, then we certainly are not prepared to go along with this.

So we on this side of the House will be voting against this amendment.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cambridge suggested that the member was going too far in asking for two auditors in this case since there is only one auditing firm required now. What he did not hear perhaps was the argument from my hon. colleague to the effect that the new legislation, the whole package of legislation that has been put together, is going to allow the insurance companies to become very much larger institutions than they currently are and they will be able to do everything, including what the banks are doing.

We are looking at a totally different situation. There is an argument going on, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Cambridge says they will not be able to take deposits and the hon. member for Nickel Belt says they will be able to take certain deposits. I do not know which ones and I do not think it matters. Certainly one of the reasons that this legislation is being considered by this House is that certain people with the right influence in the right places who want insurance companies to become much larger and much more important in the financial affairs of Canada are urging that this legislation be passed. Indeed, it is working its way through the process.

In any case they are going to become larger, there is no question about that. If there is to be an argument made for two auditors, it should apply to those institutions as well.

Yesterday the hon. member for Malpeque said why load them with all this extra cost, and the hon. member for Mississauga South used that same argument as well. They made it sound as though having two auditors is twice as expensive as having one. I argued against that yesterday and suggested that what they are really saying is that two individual audit firms are going to go in as totally separate entities. One is going to do the same work as the other, follow along in the footsteps of the preceding one or take turns leading. They certainly do not have much faith in audit firms if they think that they are going to go in and double the work just for the fun of doing it. If that were to actually happen, it is one reason the government would want to have two audit firms. That would at least beef up the GST revenues, and goodness knows they need a lot more of that these days.

However it would not happen. There might be a nominal increase in the fee having two firms, but there is another argument they used. Something might be missed if there were two firms on the job, since one might assume that the other had covered it. Again, I dealt with that argument yesterday and said that two audit firms would sit down and plan their work. With two of them looking it over, they are more likely to cover everything. Neither member who raised concern about this matter raised the argument that I made. They did not deal with it. They did not deal with the cost. I said that the cost might be a little more, but only because there were two looking over it to make sure it was a complete audit. Neither was that argument dealt with.

It seems to me that I have dealt with the only arguments the member for Mississauga South and the member for Malpeque raised with respect to the tremendous increase in cost of having two and the likelihood of missing something if there are two people looking. There has been no response from either one of those members on those two arguments. It would seem to me their case in favour of reducing it to one auditor has been destroyed and they have not tried to revive it. I just wonder if either one of them would like to comment on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on the Motion No. 3G. The vote on Motion No. 3G will apply to Motion 11C.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 4, 5, 11 and 12 are grouped for debate.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 347 by adding immediately after line 38 at page 191 the following:

"(3) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom."

(a) by striking out line 4 at page 198 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsection (1) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom."

(a) by striking out line 9 at page 338 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsection (1) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom."

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 642 B (a) by striking out line 39 at page 343 and substituting the following therefor:

"642. (1) On the request of the auditor of a";

"(2) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsection (1) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom."

She said: Mr. Speaker, this motion has to do with the flow of information to auditors and actuaries. I am pleased to move this motion today because I feel it is very important that there is a free flow of information to the auditors so that they can conduct a thorough audit.

This amendment actually prevents a lawsuit against anyone who gives information to the auditor or to the actuary of financial institutions. We feel that this protection is required. We feel it is important because questionable accounting practices have been blamed in part for the failures that we had in the western banks in 1985 and then of course last year too with the Ontario based Standard Trust. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions told the committee last November that improved accounting practices might have made a difference in Standard Trust.

To take an example, if an employee of an insurance company has information that he knows the auditor needs in order to perform a proper audit or a thorough audit in which the company would rather not disclose or will not disclose, that person might be reluctant to go forward and give that information. However, if he knows there is no way he can be sued by the company then I am sure that he is more liable to go forward and give the information to the auditor which could very well result in better financial statements and seeing problems that may be small problems now but could develop into major ones.

Certainly we have heard no evidence to suggest problems in the way actuaries calculate the risks in returns in insurance company policies. However we feel that establishing the same sort of protection would increase the flow of information even further. We are not only proposing this amendment for auditors but also for actuaries as well.

I would urge the House to support this amendment for insurance companies and remind all members of the House that we agreed in the last two days to accept this amendment for banks and insurance companies.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the government would be very prepared to support the amendments if they could be amended in accordance with amendments that I circulated to the opposition.

The amendments are all the same for each of the motions amended. The amendment would read:

"(3) a person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising from having made the communication.

In other words, it ties down the relief against the communication and only the communication. I suspect my friend from Malpeque would be delighted to accept these alterations. If that is the case, and with the unanimous consent of the House, may I make those now.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that when this was first proposed as a motion by the Liberals on Bill C-4, we argued for it because we thought it was a good idea, it was a good amendment, and we supported it. In fact I would hazard a guess that it was the vigorous debate and insistence of the group of this side of the floor which persuaded the government that it ought to accept this amendment.

We have no problems with extending it to the Insurance Companies Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the amendment tabled by the hon. member for Mississauga South. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to table the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) agreed to.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to put on record some of the arguments in favour of the motion that has been introduced by the Liberals.

As mentioned before, if the government succeeds in its legislation—and it appears it most probably will—we will find sort of the collapse of the pillars. We will have trusts being able to sell insurance, vice versa and so forth. The possibility of conflict of interest, of tied selling, of undue influence on people who are taking their mortgages out, for example with some sort of unwritten requirement that would force them to take a certain life insurance or a certain mortgage insurance policy out, and the temptation for doing things that are not legal are going to be much greater. Therefore of course the need for regulation is going to be much greater.

It is impossible to regulate every instance, every situation. I drew the attention of the House to the hypothetical possibility where in the Royal Bank in southeast Saskatchewan on one desk is the person that deals with the mortgages and on the other desk is the person who sells insurance. It is impossible to police or to prevent the two people from talking to each other, to prevent the person who is selling the mortgages from saying to the person who is selling the insurance: "Joe Smith has just got a mortgage. Why don't you go after it?" That type of activity is not legitimate and should not be legal.

There is a tremendous need for some form of self-regulation. It is the lowly clerk in there who will see abuses occurring and illegal activity occurring. This amendment makes it a little easier for the clerk to step forward and to say: "There is something illegal happening here. There is something wrong with what is happening here". Of course it frightens the clerk to take on a big institution.

After the legislation is passed conceivably we are going to have some very giant institutions. For a little clerk or teller to take on the institution is quite a daunting task. The clerk of course is concerned that the financial institution will bring some legal action against that person. The little clerk just feels totally intimidated. He can barely meet all of the expenses during the month, and the thought of being forced to go into court, to go out and hire a lawyer, and to face the legal department of a trust, one of our banks or one of our large insurance companies is just impossible. It is one-sided and unfair.

With this amendment we are offering that clerk, that low paid person, some form of protection. I think it is an excellent amendment. I am glad to see that the government through the persuasive powers of opposition members has accepted the essence of the amendment. I hope it will do what we all hope it will do, that is provide protection for the small people working in big institutions.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 4, as amended. A vote on Motion No. 4, as amended, will apply to Motions Nos. 5, 11 and 12, as amended.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 4, as amended, agreed to.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 351 by striking out line 41 on page 193 and substituting the following:

"(b) in the case of a life company, loans owing to the company by any".

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical amendment. It ties the particular amendment down to life insurance companies. One of our problems is that we are now putting life insurance companies, property and casualty insurance companies and friendly societies all in one bill.

This particular amendment specifies that the change is to life insurance companies. It is really an amendment for clarification and should carry without any problem.

Motion No. 4A agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motions Nos. 5C and 11B.1 are grouped for debate.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

(a) by striking out line 12 on page 199 and substituting the following:

"370. (1) Any oral or written statement or";

(b) by adding immediately after line 15 on page 199, the following subsection:

"(2) The actuary or former actuary of a company who in good faith makes an oral or written statement or report under section 363 or 369 shall not be liable in any civil action seeking indemnification for damages attributable to the actuary or former actuary having made the statement or report."

(a) by striking out line 26 on page 339 and substituting the following:

"632. (1) Any oral or written statement or";

(b) by adding, immediately after line 29 on page 339, the following subsection:

"(2) The actuary or a former actuary of a foreign company who in good faith makes an oral or written statement under subsection 627(1) or section 631 shall not be liable in any civil action seeking indemnification for damages attributable to the actuary or former actuary having made the statement or report."

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, in the course of a great deal of consideration in the Senate committee it became apparent that something ought to be done specifically to protect actuaries and former actuaries from lawsuit if they were only fulfilling the actual requirements set out in the statute to report to the superintendent with respect to the actuarial status of a particular company.

Since most of these actuaries are employees and the effect of making a bad actuarial report may well lead to the dismissal of the actuary in one form or another, it is felt that we ought to protect the actuary from this kind of action by the amendments set out in Motions Nos. 5C and 11B.1.

I think this is in line with the other four amendments we just passed dealing with other employees including the amendment concerning auditors. Therefore I suggest that it pass in the same fashion.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I notice that this motion came to us from the Senate. I recall, when I was looking up the testimony in the minutes of the finance committee when we studied this bill, that of Mr. Paul MacCrossan, president of the actuaries union. It is a very strong union. I guess that is because there are so few of them in the country. He made this pitch to the finance committee when we were studying the bill. The government did not buy it at all. Mr. LePan from the department did not buy it and the members of the finance committee did not buy it. There was a lot of debate around the idea.

We are providing freedom from liability for civil action not for an employee, as was the case put forward by the member for Malpeque. This is not the same type of thing. We are exonerating a whole class of actuaries. We are identifying a group and saying it is exempt. We are protecting them if they make a good faith statement, written or oral. Where does competency come in? Are they free from liability for civil action if they were incompetent but said: "I made it in good faith"? Where is the line? What is good faith? Are we prepared to deny people who may have the possibility of a good civil action against an actuary by protecting the actuaries with this?

I raise the question though I know the member for Mississauga South cannot speak again on this. I would hope he could, on a point of order, rise and give us a bit of enlightenment on why what was not good enough for the finance committee was good enough for the boys over in the Senate. Why did they buy that argument? Why have the government and the minister changed their minds? This intrigues me and I would appreciate if the member could get up on a point of order to explain why.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is only fair that the House have some explanation.

These motions were never placed in the finance committee. They were discussed but no one was prepared to move them at the time. As a consequence they were never moved.

In the Senate a pre-study hearing indicated that there was more reason to do it than had been explained to the finance committee at the time.

One of the advantages of having the other place is that in it there are some people who have been involved with these companies in a senior management position. It is useful for the government to have their advice. We talk about the other place being useless and tired and so on. However, may I suggest to my friend from Nickel Belt that it may be that some senators are also very expert in the area of how institutions like insurance companies operate.

That is why there are a number of amendments coming from the hearings in the Senate that we think are exceptionally useful. This is one of them. We are prepared to accept the kind of release that we were prepared to accept with other officers and employees.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this amendment, which we support because it will protect an insurance company actuary from being sued if he or she blows the whistle on the company.

Actuaries are the people who calculate the risk of insuring an individual and they come up with an appropriate premium for that person to pay. Therefore, they have a great deal of information about a company. They are in a position to know if a company is either breaking the law or is in troubled waters.

This is why the actuarial profession is seeking protection for an actuary who blows the whistle. For example, an actuary may tell the Superintendent of Financial Institutions that a company is not being run properly or is not being run according to statute or the law.

Unlike auditors, who work only temporarily for a company and then move on to another company to do another audit, actuaries are generally employees of the insurance company. They become identified with the company. An actuary who blows the whistle on his company therefore would probably lose his job, put his reputation at stake and has a great deal to lose.

We on this side of the House support the amendment. I want to also mention that Monday and Tuesday we suggested another whistle blowing amendment to the trust and the bank acts. It protects the individuals who give information to the auditor in good faith, information that would allow the auditor to prepare a more thorough audit and be more accurate.

We will be supporting this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 5C. A vote on Motion No. 5C applies to Motion No. 11B.1.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 5C agreed to.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That bill C-28 be amended in clause 408 by striking out line 48 on page 216 and substituting the following:

"Common shares, had total assets in an amount".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 6A agreed to.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in clause 441 of Bill C-28 be amended

"(d) provide information processing services in Canada that the company has developed for its own use and that are an integral part of the company's operations to entities in which the company has a substantial investment that do not provide information processing services to other entities,";

(b) by relettering the subsequent paragraphs and any cross-references thereto accordingly

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 441 by striking out lines 44 to 46 on page 239 and substituting the following:

"and services respecting risk management and claims adjustment, operate rehabilitation and training".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, both of these amendments have resulted from very extensive work in the Senate on this particular bill. They are amendments that improve the technical workings of the bill.

The first amendment allows a company to do its data processing for its subsidiary companies, from one company to the other, without a problem. That is the type of thing we have allowed in other bills. This particular matter was not corrected and caught at the time.

The other one operates in connection with risk management. It is a redefinition of very technical matters that I think are important.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question.

An hon. member: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motions Nos. 7A and 7B.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motions?

Motions Nos. 7A and 7B agreed to.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

"amount to an account from which a payment can be made to its shareholders, if";

(b) by striking out line 29 on page 246 and substituting the following:

"the transfer to the account from which a payment can be made to the shareholders".

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 463 by striking out lines 23 to 26 on page 247 and substituting the following:

"A is 10 per cent of the aggregate unappropriated earned surplus of the participating accounts".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Again, both of these are technical amendments. One amendment will allow a company to transfer money from one account to another in order to make payments to shareholders and the other one removes a $2 million cap on transfers but retains the cap calculated in accordance with their provisions of the section.

These are technical amendments that were organized in our review in the Senate. I would appreciate if they could pass without any further debate.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise my concerns about 7D. I presume it originated in the Senate. Clause 461 in the bill says: "or transfer an amount to the stated capital account". I presume, if this is an insurance company, that it may have shareholders and will have policyholders. The guys who are the policyholders ought to get their fair share of any money in the participating account.

We did not discuss that in the finance committee. I noticed the amendment in 7D changes it to an account from which a payment can be made to its shareholders. I just want to raise that issue.

Again, if the member for Mississauga South can stand up and explain this I would appreciate it. Does that mean there is a possibility that policy holders could get less money than the people who are the shareholders, especially if you have demutualized an insurance company? This is a real concern. We are setting up a capital account. The mutual companies wanted to have this legislation because they argued for the ability to be able to increase their capitalization. We said this was a good idea. Now it has turned out that it is a different kind of an account. It is an account from which moneys can be paid to shareholders. I have a real problem with that because the policy holders in a mutual company are the ones who put the money in and are the real owners. That was one of the things we were concerned about when we discussed it in committee.

Lo and behold, when it went over to the boys in the other place they came up with this little thing where you take out the capital account and you make an account where you put money in to pay shareholders as opposed to policy holders.

Mr. Blenkarn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My friend is getting carried away with himself. If he takes a look at 461, the statute will read: "A company that has share capital may, from a participating account maintained pursuant to section 456, make a payment to its shareholders ", and then the new section will say: "or transfer an amount to an account from which a payment can be made to its shareholders". In other words, it could pay the money to the shareholders or it could transfer that money to an account from which it could pay its shareholders. There is no effort to deceive here, this is just a question of wording. The current wording that was there was to transfer an amount to the stated capital account. This is an amount that can still be transferred to shareholders because it is money that was from shareholders for shareholders only. It is being transferred in this fashion and goes into an account, but then it can be further paid out to shareholders at a later day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does that satisfy the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the point of order?

Mr. Rodriguez: No, Mr. Speaker. We had a concern in the Insurance Act about one of the arguments made by witnesses before the committee. They wanted the process for demutualization.

Mr. Blenkarn: This has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Rodriguez: Well if they demutualize they are going to have shareholders and they are going to have policy holders. That is the way it is going to work.

Mr. Blenkarn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My friend will remember that an insurance company with common shareholders as the owners of the company, also issues participating policies. The participating policy holders are entitled to what we, in common parlance, call dividends. This is essentially a dividend rest account. Certain other provisions in the bill are set out as to how that money is to be handled and under what circumstances it can be paid out. In other words, it is not a free pay-out because there are certain requirements to keep money on account on behalf of the participating policy holders, to act as a backing for those policies.

This is a very technical matter and I would be delighted to have one of our senior people explain it better than I can because I do not profess to be the expert on everything.

I want to say that this is just a technical change in this particular provision that came from our hearings in the Senate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Nickel Belt has a few more words he would like to respond on.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I just have one more suggestion. I think we should bring in the minister and have him explain it.

An hon. member: Good idea. It sounds fair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House now ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motions Nos. 7D and 7E agreed to

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended by adding immediately after line 14 at page 256 the following new clause:

"489. (1) A company must use plain language in all contracts related to financial services, applications for financial services and related documents which it provides to its customers who are natural persons.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to words or forms of documents that are prescribed by law.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply to contracts, applications for financial services and related documents where the price of the financial service or the total liability assumed or to be assumed by the customer exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

(4) Proof that reasonable efforts have been made by the company to comply and maintain compliance with subsection (1) is a complete defence (a) in a prosecution under subsection (1), or (b) in a dispute about whether subsection (1) has been complied with.

(5) The failure of a company to comply with subsection (1) does not affect the enforceability of any document referred to therein and may not be asserted by a customer or a company as a defence in an action or proceeding based on a document referred to in subsection (1).

(6) As used in this section "customer" includes a natural person who is a guarantor or provides security to a company.

(7) Subsections (1), (2), (3), (4), (5) and (6) shall come into force on the day which is two years after the coming into force of section 1 of this Act."

She said: Mr. Speaker, this is a motion called plain language. What it actually does is require an insurance company to put various documents that must be signed by a customer in plain language. If that customer is getting an insurance policy, or any other document from an insurance company that they have to sign, they can actually pick up the document and read it.

I am sure that most of us in this House have received documents from an insurance company that were very, very difficult to read, had very small print and long sentences in legal language. In other words, it was not in day-to-day language that the average person could understand.

This amendment would require insurance companies to put these documents in everyday words, short sentences, so that a document can be read by a customer and the customer can understand what they are signing.

I know the industry is proceeding along this line. I know that there is a trend to make simpler documents. I certainly want to commend the companies in various financial institutions that are doing this. Yesterday the hon. member from Mississauga said that it is too difficult to do. But it has been done. In the United States at least 10 states have passed this legislation. New York was the first in 1978, and reports by experts from New York say that the results are really remarkable. We have also had this legislation passed in one province of Canada, Alberta in 1990.

I can agree that it would probably be difficult. But the fact is that it has been done, so there is no reason why it cannot be done here in Canada.

I think it is a reasonable amendment. It is giving insurance companies two years to get their documents translated into simple everyday language. It is also only for customers who borrow less than $250,000.

It is certainly something that is can be done. As I said, it has been done in at least 10 states in the United States with good results and it has been passed in the province of Alberta. I think this legislation would go a long way in providing a better service to the customers of financial institutions.

One of the main objectives of the Liberal Party during this whole study of financial institutions was to come in with legislation that would better serve the Canadian public. I would encourage all members of this House to support this plain language amendment.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to this matter yesterday on two occasions. I just want to say that I appreciate very much the spirit with which the amendment is made. Unfortunately it is pretty difficult for us to judge what language is "plain".

When I talk to the Minister of National Revenue he boasts about how plain the language is and how easy his forms are to fill in. The other day I was given the privilege by my daughter of helping her do her income tax. She is a single parent and I had to wade through the form.

The book that the minister produces in his plain language has various paragraphs underlined in yellow and so on. I waded through the form and was getting a bit frustrated. It was written, as we will all appreciate and as the minister says, in plain language. It was simple. It was easy. Anybody could do it.

That is why I am not the chairman of the finance committee. I was having a hell of a time. When we get to these plain language matters, I think we all appreciate things being simpler. I had difficulty on the minister's plain language income tax form.

If we were to put this in, we would just be encouraging one lawsuit after another with people claiming that the language of the document was not plain enough for them. I do not know whether Shakespeare wrote in plain language, but I suppose it was plain enough for the time.

Some of us had difficulty when we were at school doing English that involved Shakespearian plays. I guess they were not plain to us. If the member could tell us what is plain and what is not plain, what is complicated, what is difficult and what is easy, I suppose that is all in the eye of the beholder. It would be very, very difficult to ever define plain language.

One of these days, when we as drafters of legislation and legislators get our act in order, when we draw legislation that is in plain language, then we can expect the citizen to do the same. Until we can do it, I suspect it would be too much to ask the citizens to do better.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Malpeque for this amendment.

I cannot think of anything more sensible than having a document written in plain language. I have certainly had a lot of people come into my office. I have had personal experiences when I have had a terrible time reading the documents. People are suffering, and they make mistakes in judgment because they cannot understand the document.

I am surprised at my colleague across the floor who says he does not understand what plain language is. It was used in 10 states in the United States and it has been successfully used since the 1970s in New York. Why can he not pick up the phone or get his staff people to pick up the phone and find out what plain language is, if he cannot understand what plain language is as he just suggested.

This motion is so sensible that it is most certainly not going to be accepted by the Conservative Party because it just seems so easy and logical. I imagine that it will not be accepted by the hon. members across the floor.

Again, I congratulate the member. I hope my hon. colleague and all members support the amendment.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I think the concept of plain language for legislation is laudable.

I am a little confused, sitting back in the corner this afternoon. I listened to the member for Mississauga South indicate clearly that he liked the idea of plain language amendments and accepted it in some circumstances. But I think if I am right, he is not going to accept plain language here.

In other words, having made the argument that it is a good idea is not good enough. That perhaps speaks to what happens inside this Chamber.

The second thing is I think the concept is laudable. We had better get it into the record what this amendment says this afternoon. It is laudable that a company must use plain language in all contracts related to financial services, applications for financial services and related documents which it provides to its customers who are natural persons.

That is great. I like that. What I do not like are the weasel words which come after, that subclause (1) does not apply to words or forms of documents that are prescribed by law. What is the use of writing something in plain language if you do not have to, if it is in a form prescribed by law? It seems to me that kind of mitigates the original idea.

Subclause (3) says that subclause (1) does not apply to contracts, applications for financial services and related documents where the price of the financial service or the total liability assumed or to be assumed by the customer exceeds $250,000. I do not enter into a whole lot of those kind of things but it sBeems to me that for $250,000 I ought to be able to understand what I am signing.

In subclause (4) it says:

> Proof that reasonable efforts have been made by the company to comply and maintain compliance with subsection (1) is a complete defence—

Holy mackerel, if they try, that is a complete defence. "In a prosecution under subsection (1)—or in a dispute about whether subsection (1) has been complied with", I am losing the plain language part of this amendment real quick.

If you turn the page to subclause (5), the plain language amendment, it says:

> The failure of a company to comply with subsection (1) does not affect the enforceability of any document referred to therein and may not be asserted by a customer or a company as a defence in an action or proceeding based on a document referred to in subsection (1).

Are you with me, people all across Canada? It is a plain language amendment we are talking about. I think the lawyers are starting to froth at the mouth already.

In subclause (6) of the plain language amendment, it says: "As used in this section "customer"—get ready for this one—"includes a natural person". Wait a minute, there are other kinds of persons around. It is "a natural person who is a guarantor or provides security to a company". There has to be something wrong with that one.

However, if you were worried so far go to subclause (7) of the plain language amendment. This is the one you should read carefully. It says: "Subsections (1), (2), (3), (4), (5) and (6)"—

An hon. member: No (7).

Mr. Breaugh: Six of them, "shall come into force on the day which is two years after the coming into force of section 1 of this act". Wow, that is tough legislation.

Where I come from plain language means that at the end of a discussion both parties understand what was said. I do not think it quite meets that criteria.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might add some comments to this discussion on the very important concept of plain language. I think that the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Malpeque has some very important ideas in it.

I can understand why some of the colleagues in this House would not want to accept it, and as part of the government I would say that it is not an amendment we want to accept. I think that there has been some confusion in the debate. I would like to address the point raised in the amendment because she addresses a very important area of public policy.

When the amendment says that the requirements would not apply to a form prescribed by government it is simply to make it clear that there are certain kinds of forms which financial institutions must use which are prescribed by government. It is simply to save them harm from complying with the law.

The question about plain language is a very interesting one. It is one that the legal profession has been wrestling with very seriously in a variety of areas of commercial law. There is no question that the need for plain language exists. The debate within the legal profession or in the area of the law is between plain language and the concern about giving up the use of what are called "terms of art". Those are legal terms around for which there is an established jurisprudence so that everybody knows what they mean. We are gradually, slowly transferring ourselves from some of those arcane "terms of art" to plain language. The motivation behind the hon. member's amendment is very admirable and is very consistent with the concern lawyers themselves have about the accessibility of the law, legal terminology and contractual language to ordinary people and of not making these things purely the purview of people who are legally trained.

The question is whether it should be required in statute. I think my colleague, the hon. member from Mississauga East, makes a very good point in asking: "How do you define it for the purposes of the statute?" I know that one of the hon. member's colleagues asked what they are doing in the United States. I would like to find out whether there is a statutory definition of what "plain language" is or whether there are regulations.

What usually happens is that new forms are devised, an insurance policy or of a loan document or a mortgage document, which are then agreed upon. Many then become forms prescribed by government. The problem with the hon. member's amendment is that it creates an obligation without making it clear how someone meets that particular obligation. However, I think there is no question that there is a growing acceptance of the need for plain language. It may be—I would like to see the examples—that in Alberta what has been done is that certain forms have been prescribed and certain language has been prescribed.

What the hon. member raises in her amendment is certainly an important issue of public policy. In the Department of Justice one of the areas that we fund is research on the issue of plain language in the law to try to make it more accessible.

I would be concerned to have it in the statute now, without knowing how this was going to be defined. However, I would certainly be willing to undertake on behalf of my government to work with my colleague, the minister responsible for financial institutions, to explore this issue further if this amendment fails. I have no criticism of the policy underlying it, but I have more reservations about whether this wording should go into the statute now.

As with the hon. member who just spoke I have no difficulty with the use of the term "natural person". It is one of those nice terms of art in the law. We all know what it means, but maybe in itself it is an argument for finding a more plain language explanation for it.

The what he calls the weasel words but what I would call the qualifications of the hon. member's colleagues reflect the fact that we are still perhaps not quite ready to entrench this principle in the statute. However, I want to compliment the member for Malpeque because I think she has put her finger on a very important issue of public policy that all of us who deal with legislation should be conscious of. I want to indicate to her that I am quite prepared to take the meaning of the amendment on advisement and work with my colleague to see whether we cannot as a matter of policy push for the use of more accessible language in the documents that are so important to Canadian people.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in supporting this amendment. Frankly I am rather puzzled at the minister's response because basically she says she supports the spirit of the amendment but she will not move it forward by way of legislation. The fact is that plain language as a premise should be entrenched in the law. Frankly I do not think it should be the purview of only lawyers to sit down and determine what is plain language.

We are legislators who are charged with the responsibility of developing laws. My colleague, the member for Malpeque, has enshrined a very important principle, which is to advise by statute that when forms are provided by financial institutions they be in language that everybody can understand. That is simple. That is plain language. That is clear thinking and clear speaking. If the minister supports the principle she should be prepared to support the amendment and allow it to move forward. Once it has moved forward presumably the specifics of how it will be regulated can be dealt with at the regulatory stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended by adding immediately after line 49 at page 272 the following new clause:

502. Notwithstanding anything in sections 495 to 501, no company may acquire or increase a substantial investment in

(a) a bank;

(b) a body corporate to which the Loan Companies Act or the Trust Companies Act applies; or

(c) a body corporate incorporated under the laws of a province if the activities of the body corporate are substantially similar to those of a body corporate described in paragraph (b).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the last opportunity to appeal to members regarding the concerns we are trying to express in this motion.

The concern we have is about the concentration of activity. In previous amendments on Bill C-4, Bill C-19 and Bill C-28, we raised our concerns about the concentration of ownership. We said that these bills, once they are enacted and are in force, will allow one of the greatest concentrations of financial activities that we have ever seen in the history of this country.

Therefore, we went back to the green paper and picked out a sliding scale of ownership that would to a large extent produce wide ownership for large financial institutions, including banks.

This motion arose from our concerns about the concentration of activity. Therefore, we put into this motion an amendment that will prevent insurance companies from owning substantial parts of banks. It will prevent them from owning trust companies. Our view is very straightforward. We believe that when this country set up the pillar structure for financial institutions, it was a wise decision. We had banks doing things that were related to banking, and we put them under a bank act. We had trust and loans under a separate pillar, insurance companies under a separate pillar, co-operatives under a separate pillar and investment brokers under one. Of course, we lost that last pillar in 1987. That pillar has come down and with predictable accuracy. Anyone standing in this Chamber in 1987 could have predicted very accurately that these investment brokers would have ended up in the stables of financial institutions. That is exactly what has happened. They have ended up in those institutions.

Of course, to give the facade of separating the investment brokerage business from the banking business they put up what are called fire walls which, as Gerald Corrigan in the United States said, often become walls of fire.

Here we are in 1991. We have learned nothing whatsoever from the experience of the United States. We are collapsing the remaining pillars. We will still have a Bank Act, we will still have an Insurance Act, but that is all for show. All the synergies that can go on across the pillars will go on and eventually melt them down. I think that is the expression I have been using. You will see one of the greatest meltdowns in financial institutions in this Canada.

If insurance companies think they can survive as a small insurance company, they are sadly mistaken. When these bills are enacted this will be a game where only the large and powerful will survive, where it will be very difficult to regulate the large and the powerful. It will be a new horizon. It will be a new day for financial institutions.

We constantly heard from witnesses appearing before the Standing Committee on Finance about globalization. They said they wanted to be able to compete globally. When 60 per cent and 70 per cent of the profits of these large, global financial institutions start coming from outside Canada what will then be the encouragement for them to pay attention to what goes on at home? When all of their efforts to accrue their profits remain beyond the borders of Canada how well will they serve the consumers of Canada?

If you recall, I described the banks as lions. I described the insurance companies as mongooses. I described the trust and loan companies as cobras. I have said in this scenario that the mongoose will eat the cobras and then the lions will end up eating the mongoose. It is not insignificant that the Royal Bank of Canada has a lion as its symbol and it is holding the globe to its chest. That is exactly what is going to happen. One morning consumers will wake up and find that they do not have the competition in this country that brings about, we are told, lower prices for their products. We will find that there will be a concentration of power and there will be a concentration of activity.

In fact The Economist recently appealed very vividly in an article to the law makers in Ottawa to return to the wide ownership concept. I call on members to support this amendment. Let us get on with making sure these animals are back in the cage and that we get back to the pillar system of regulation.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this amendment, Motion No. 10, put forth by the New Democratic Party would not allow an insurance company to own a trust company or a bank.

If we look at the present situation in Canada today, at least 20 insurance companies now either own a trust company or they are part of a conglomerate that owns a trust company. That is the present situation: at least 20 insurance companies now own a trust company or are part of a conglomerate that owns a trust company. Also, banks and trust companies can buy insurance companies. It is only fair that insurance companies should be able to own trusts or banks.

I think that is a very logical argument. It is straightforward. We will be voting against this amendment.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to put on record some comments and they will be short.

The amendment that we are proposing today is similar to the amendments that we had when dealing with the banks and when we were dealing with the trust companies as well.

Basically we feel uncomfortable in that we have seen the erosion of the pillars and now the total collapsing of the pillars. I have been involved in this exercise on and off since the early eighties. The fundamental question I come back to is that it is our job as parliamentarians to be concerned about the public interest. We have to demand of the government introducing this resolution to show us that this is in the public interest.

It might be in the interest of the banks. It might be in the interest of the insurance companies. It might be in the interest of the trusts or whoever. In the end it is our job here to determine whether it is in the public interest. After all, when everything is said and done members of this House, this body, are the ones who have that responsibility. We are the only ones who have that responsibility.

Are we exercising that responsibility? There has been a lack of explanation in the House on the part of the minister. He has never indicated that he was introducing this legislation or this amendment and so forth because the public will benefit from it. He has never indicated how it is in the public interest. We have never had an explanation in terms of the public interest. We have had explanations in the following terms: they are doing it over here and that is why we have to do it this way as well. We have heard all those types of arguments but never the most fundamental one, that is: Is it in the public interest?

When I started out on the question of the reform of the financial institutions in the early eighties, I tried to come to an understanding of that in my own mind. I could see some of the arguments and reasons for collapsing the pillars and the conveniences at times, et cetera.

Still, I really wonder whether it is in the public interest to have the institutions that can conceivably grow out of this legislation be so strong and whether in the end the public, especially the Canadian public that has invested in these institutions, that have used these institutions and that have allowed these institutions to grow to the size they are now, will be best served with the passage of this legislation.

The government has failed to convince me and I suspect the government has failed to convince the Canadian public as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 10. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Hon. Kim Campbell (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

(a) by adding, immediately after line 26 on page 297, the following:

"(d) issuing annuities to its members and their spouses and children;

(e) if the society is permitted to insure risks falling within the class of life insurance, issuing policies to its members and their spouses and children, or accepting or retaining on the direction of a policyholder or beneficiary policy dividends or bonuses, or policy proceeds that are payable on the surrender or maturity of the policy or on the death of the person whose life is insured, where the liabilities of the society in respect of the policies or the amounts accepted or retained vary in amount depending on the market value of a fund consisting of a specified group of assets;";

"(6) A society that issues policies described in paragraph (1)(e) or accepts or retains amounts so described shall, in respect of those amounts, (a) maintain separate accounts; and (b) establish and maintain one or more funds consisting of assets that are segregated from the other assets of the society and that are specified as the assets on the market value of which the liabilities of the society in respect of those policies or amounts depend.

(7) For the purpose of establishing or maintaining a segregated fund required to be maintained by subsection (6), a society may, subject to the regulations, transfer an amount to the separate account maintained in respect of the segregated fund.

(8) A society may, with the approval of the Superintendent, return the current value of an amount transferred pursuant to subsection (7) to the account from which the amount was transferred.

(9) A claim against a segregated fund maintained pursuant to subsection (6) under a policy or for an amount in respect of which the fund is maintained has priority over any other claim against the assets of that fund, including the claims referred to in section 161 of the Winding-up Act.

(10) The liability of a society under a policy or for an amount in respect of which a segregated fund is maintained pursuant to subsection (6) (a) does not, except to the extent that the assets of the fund are insufficient to satisfy a claim for any minimum amount that the society agrees to pay under the policy or in respect of the amount, give rise to a claim against any assets of the society, other than the assets of that fund; but (b) to the extent that the assets of the fund are insufficient to satisfy such a claim, gives rise to a claim against the assets of the society, other than the assets of that fund, that has the priority referred to in subsection 161(2) of the Winding-up Act.

(11) In addition to the powers that a society may exercise pursuant to subsection (1), a society may hold and otherwise deal with real property.

(12) A society may".

(a) by adding, immediately after line 10 on page 303, the following:

"(a) a company or other entity that is engaged in the insurance business;";

(c) by striking out line 29 on page 303 and substituting the following:

"pursuant to subsection (1) unless (a) in any case, the society";

"Superintendent; and (b) in the case of a body corporate that is a company or other entity that is engaged in the insurance business, the society controls the company or entity or would thereby acquire control of the company or entity.

(3) Notwithstanding paragraph (2)(b), a society need not control an entity incorporated or formed elsewhere than in Canada in which it has a substantial investment and which it would otherwise be required to control pursuant to that paragraph where the laws or customary business practices of the country under the laws of which the entity was incorporated or formed do not permit the society to control the entity.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (2), "control" means "control within the meaning of section 3, determined without regard to paragraph 3(1)(d)"."

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, these are technical amendments in a sense but they are rather long. They deal with friendly societies, giving the friendly societies the powers that we believe they ought to have. They are really the powers they had under the existing legislation.

Members of the finance committee will remember when we were putting this bill through that the friendly societies were not too organized in terms of their representation. After considerable discussion in the hearings before the Senate, it was felt that the bill had to be altered slightly to handle the business powers of friendly societies including their investments.

That is the reason for Motions Nos. 10A and 10C. I think they should pass without further debate.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 10A. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 10A agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 10C. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 10C agreed to.

Hon. Kim Campbell (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 660 by striking out lines 27 to 30 on page 350 and substituting the following:

"(a) appoint the actuary of the provincial company forthwith after the Superintendent makes an order for the provincial company under section 657;

(b) appoint the auditor of the provincial company for the purposes of this Act forthwith after the Superintendent makes an order for the provincial company under section 657; and".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is a technical amendment with respect to the appointment of actuaries and an actuary conduct review committee. It is also really a technical amendment to clarify transitional provisions.

I would suggest that this motion pass through without any debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 13. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

That Bill C-28 be amended in Clause 749 by striking out line 12 on page 406 and substituting the following:

"section 451, 542 or 593 of the Insurance Compa-".

Motion No. 21.

That Bill C-28 be amended:

(a) by adding, immediately after line 12 on page 413, the following:

"Amendment to this Act if Bill C-34 is assented to

760. If, during the third session of the thirty-fourth Parliament, Bill C-34, entitled An Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters is assented to, then, on the later of the coming into force of section 490 of this Act and section 1 of that Act, paragraph (e) of the definition "service corporation" in subsection 490(1) of this Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(e) any other Canadian financial institution incorporated or formed by or under an Act of Parliament, or any central cooperative credit society to which the Superintendent has, by order under subsection 473(1) of the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, applied Part XVI of that Act, that has a substantial investment in the body corporate,";

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 14. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 14 agreed to.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If you inquired I think you might find unanimous consent to move the following motion. I move:

That Clause 529 of Bill C-28 be amended by striking out lines 1 and 2 on page 291 and substituting the following:

"twice the annual salary of the related party and $100,000".

This motion is an amendment that makes this bill the same as the other two bills. Therefore I think you will receive unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rodriguez: I have just one comment to make, Mr. Speaker. Fulfilling the commitment we have made to all parties in the committee, we would do this for the trust and loan companies as well and all other groups.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt has another matter to put before the House.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I think if you seek the unanimous consent of the House you will find that there is consent for the introduction of the following motion:

That Clause 143 of Bill C-28 be amended by striking out lines 11 to 23 on page 81 and substituting the following:

Publication in newspaper.

(3) In addition to the notice required under subsection (1),

(a) where any class of shares of a company is publicly traded on a recognized stock exchange in Canada, notice of the time and place of the meeting of shareholders shall be published once a week for at least four consecutive weeks before the date of the meeting in a newspaper in the place where the head office of the company is situated and in each place in Canada where the company has a transfer agent or where a transfer of the company's shares may be recorded; or

b) where the company is a mutual company, notice of the time and place of the meeting of policyholders of the company, together with information on the means by which any policyholder can receive the notice referred to in that subsection, shall be published once a week for at least four consecutive weeks before the date of the meeting in a newspaper in the place where the head office of the company is situated and in each region of Canada in which more than 1 per cent of the total number of policyholders entitled to vote at the meeting reside.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I deal with the motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, I am going to deal with the motion moved by the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Is there unanimous consent for the member to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Blenkarn) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member for Nickel Belt to move his motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Rodriguez) agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on the report stage of the bill now before the House.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions all day long among the three parties. I think you might find unanimous consent to suspend the ringing of the bells at this point to move on to Bill C-34, I believe it is. Upon the conclusion of Bill C-34, and if the point comes where we need to vote, there would be a 15-minute bell and we would then vote on all of the necessary motions related to Bill C-28 as well as on any that might arise in terms of Bill C-34 at report stage.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, we have no problem with that at all. I think now that we are on a roll we might as well see it through.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are six report stage motions set out on the Notice Paper for report stage on Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters.

Motions Nos. 1 and 3 in the name of the hon. Minister of State for Finance are in order and will be grouped for debate. The vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motion No. 3.

Motions Nos. 2 and 5 in the name of the hon. Minister of State for Finance are technical in nature. They will be grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 2 will apply to Motion No. 5.

Motions Nos. 4 and 6 in the name of the hon. member for Malpeque and the hon. Minister of State for Finance are in order and will be debated and voted on separately.

I will now propose Motions Nos. 1 and 3 to the House.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 292 by striking out line 35 on page 144 and substituting the following:

"accounting principles, the primary source of which is the Handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants."

That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 307 by striking out line 47 on page 151 and substituting the following:

"auditing standards, the primary source of which is the Handbook of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants."

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the first two amendments involve the clarification of the standard of care required in the CICA Handbook. It is similar to amendments we have moved before and accepted without debate.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of State for (Finance)) moved:

Bill C-34 be amended in the French version of Clause 299 by striking out lines 39 and 40 on page 147 and substituting the following:

"des actions de l'association, d'une centrale membre de celle-ci ou d'une filiale de l'association,".

That Bill C-34 be amended in the French version of Clause 474 by striking out lines 19 and 20 on page 241 and substituting the following:

"(2)a)(v) et, pour l'application de ce dernier sousalinéa, du paragraphe 444(3). A ces fins et".

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, these are technical amendments involving the French version only. They are designed to make sure that the bill reads the same in French and English and should pass without debate.

• (1800)

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If it is agreed on Motion No. 2, it is also agreed on Motion No. 5.

Motion No. 2 agreed to.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque) moved:

That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 308 by adding immediately after line 29 at page 152 the following:

"(3) A person who in good faith makes an oral or written communication under subsections (1) or (2) shall not be liable in any civil action arising therefrom."

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move this amendment today. It is one that is similar to the one I moved on the Bank Act, the Trust and Loan Companies Act and the Insurance Act. I am pleased that it has been accepted by the House on those three bills so I am hopeful that members will agree to it for the co-operatives.

I feel it is important because it will provide for a free flow of information to auditors so they can conduct a thorough audit.

What it does is prevent a lawsuit against anyone who gives information to an auditor or an actuary. I think it will make for better statements and auditors can do a more thorough review because there will be all kinds of information coming forth that will be very helpful in this regard. It will also point out problems that may be small problems right now but could become very large problems and eventually cause bankruptcy.

Because of those reasons and the ones that I put on the record for the Bank Act, the Trust and Loan Companies Act and the Insurance Act, I have moved this amendment and I am hopeful that the House will accept it.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the government is prepared to accept the amendment with one exception of amending wording.

I would like therefore to file an amendment to the motion. I believe the amendment will be accepted by my friend from Malpeque as it has in every other bill we passed with the same amendment. It only ties down in more precise language the exemption from liability. I expect it will be accepted unanimously.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we accept the amendment. We accepted it as it applied to the other bills as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Mississauga South. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 4, as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 4, as amended, agreed to.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 475 by striking out lines 16 and 17 on page 242 and substituting the following:

(a) an association of which the central is a member; or

(b) a deposit protection agency, or the government of the province in which the central is incorporated, if the agency or government is designated by the Minister."

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment that will assist provincial centrals by allowing them to create certain security arrangements subject to the approval of the minister. It makes the operation of a deposit protection agency that is usually a provincially incorporated deposit protection agency able to take security as well. It is the kind of thing that we think is necessary to make this bill work effectively.

I think the amendment ought to pass without any further discussion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 6. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 6 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions.

Call in the members.

• (1820)

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before the Chair takes the votes on Bill C-28, the Chair got so excited because there was such co-operation it forgot to put the concurrence motion.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of State (Finance)) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find there is unanimous consent for applying the result of the vote that was just taken to Motions Nos. 6, 3, 36 and 10.

Regarding Motion No. 9, if there is unanimous consent, the same vote could be applied, except that the Liberal caucus would vote in favour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the House give its unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast, on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: There is no unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member might want to reconsider if his name can be recorded in the appropriate fashion for the particular motions that he wishes to vote differently on, rather than have us all go through the process time after time so that we can get on with our business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member give unanimous consent?

Mr. Kindy: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 6. A vote on Motion No. 6 also applies to Motion No. 7.

The House divided on Motion No. 6, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare Motion No. 6 lost. Therefore Motion No. 7 is lost.

Before the taking of any more votes, I would like to say that members should not be walking in and out of the Chamber. If anyone wants to leave now before the next vote is taken, then he or she should leave the Chamber. Otherwise it is very difficult for the officers at the table to take a proper vote.

The next question is on Motion No. 3.

• (1840)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could try once again to see if there is unanimous consent to apply the votes as outlined by the Whip of the Official Opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House divided on Motion No. 3, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must have been asleep at the switch. Had I stood when I should have on behalf of my caucus, we would have voted in favour of the amendment. However, I blew it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We all get caught that way once occasionally.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to special order made Tuesday, November 26, the House will now proceed to the consideration of third reading of Bill C–4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, together with Bills C–19, C–28 and C–34 respecting financial institutions.

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the third time and passed.

BANK ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking, be read the third time and passed.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, be read the third time and passed.

CO–OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co–operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some discussions. I was under the impression that what we would do this evening is we would allow the minister to complete his remarks at third reading and then call it a day. He was not standing because I was rising on a point of order.

I just wonder if we could put that to the House. I understand the minister's remarks are around 15 minutes, and perhaps we could agree not to see the clock at 7 p.m. to allow him to just go over a couple of minutes if it is necessary to complete his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Then I will recognize the hon. Minister of State for Finance.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on what I consider to be an important occasion. Today marks the end of a long and sometimes tortuous journey that began some six years ago. That journey has led us to the legislation that is before us today. This legislation marks a major work of reform, the reform of the legislation governing Canada's financial institutions.

• (1850)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Minister of State for Finance is making some very important statements. I would appreciate it if those who do not want to listen to the debate in the Chamber would go behind the curtain, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that I am very much aware of the contribution made by former ministers and the finance committee, both in this House and in the other place, and I am very grateful to them. In particular, I want to thank the other House for its pre–study of the legislation. I also want to pay tribute to the efforts of very many individuals and groups, from both the industries concerned and the public at large.

[English]

This final stage of financial institutions reform includes four bills. The first of these is Bill C–4 which applies the principles of reform to the federally chartered trust and loans company. The other three bills are Bill C–19 which applies these principles to chartered banks, Bill C–28 which applies them to federally chartered insurance companies, and Bill C–34 which applies them to federally regulated co–operative credit societies.

In each case, the basic approach taken in the bill is the same. There are differences between the bills, however, because each applies the underlying principles of the reform to a different type of institution.

Bill C–4, the Trust and Loan Companies Act, or Bill C–83 as it was known during the previous session of Parliament, is particularly important because it serves in many respects as a model for the other new statutes.

Bill C–19 which applies to the chartered banks will, in conjunction with Bill C–4, ensure that banks and trust and loan companies will be restricted from retailing most insurance products in their branches. This ensures that insurance will continue to be sold by qualified licensed insurance brokers and agents working independently of any deposit taking institutions.

Our general approach to the question of ownership of financial institutions has been to allow for a mixed ownership regime. We have maintained the principle of wide ownership for Schedule I banks including the six largest Canadian banks. This ensures that no one person or group of associated persons can own more than 10 per cent of any class of Schedule I bank shares.

Narrow ownership is permitted for trust, loan and stock insurance companies, although large companies will be required to ensure that at least 35 per cent of their shares are widely held and publicly traded within five years.

Bill C–28 affects insurance companies. Some of the reform is intended specifically to meet the needs of this type of institution. Insurance companies will be given broader powers so that they can make consumer and business loans.

Furthermore, this bill recognizes the important place held by mutual companies in the financial system. They will be given new powers to obtain capital by issuing debt instruments and preferred shares.

[English]

Finally the legislation recognizes the position of participating policyholders and establishes new rules for communicating with them and seeking their approval for decisions taken at company meetings.

Bill C–34 applies the general principles to a fourth part of the sector, the federally regulated co–operative credit associations. To an even greater extent than the other parts of the sector, some of these institutions operate under shared jurisdiction with the provinces. Currently one federal association is governed by the act, while six registered centrals are governed by both the federal act and legislation of their province. Local credit unions, however, continue to be incorporated provincially and are governed solely by provincial legislation.

This legislation grants associations the power to provide a range of services to their members that is comparable to that which may be provided under the other bills.

The new legislation also permits associations to provide services in the fulfilment of the trade association function which they serve with respect to other co–operative institutions.

In adapting the investment rules set out in Bill C–4 to federally regulated co–operative financial institutions, this legislation takes into account the import liquidity function served by these associations.

Finally, this bill will increase the access of federal associations to capital by permitting them to issue preferred shares to non–members. These shares will be restricted from carrying full voting rights, however, to ensure that control of associations remain within the co–operative system.

All the pieces of legislation I have mentioned have benefited from the open, intelligent and co–operative committee forces they have gone through, both in this House and in the other place.

I believe, and hope all will agree, that the government has been receptive to the suggestions made and the concerns raised. The record can speak for itself. A total of 172 amendments to C–83, the precursor of C–4, were made in the previous session of Parliament.

Bill C–19 was improved by 70 amendments, Bill C–28 by 141 and Bill C–34 by 62 amendments at committee stage. Further changes have been introduced to reflect the findings of the prestudy in the other place. In fact, 11 of the government's amendments introduced at report stage were the result of prestudy in the other place.

I am greatly pleased by this evidence of how well the system can work when people with positive and constructive attitudes buckle down and make it work. Yet, despite all these changes the basic policy thrust and principles behind the reforms have remained unchanged. They remain unchanged because of the overwhelming support they received from participants in the committee process.

The goals of the reform are clear and accessible: to better protect depositors and buyers of insurance; to benefit consumers by increasing competition and widening the array of services provided by financial institutions; to increase the capacity of our financial institutions to compete at home and abroad; to enter into discussions with the provinces concerning harmonization since powers related to financial institutions are shared. These goals are important, Mr. Speaker, and I am glad that we have been able to express them in the legislations and regulations.

[English]

I know that members of the House are familiar with the general outline of the proposals. We have already dealt with them in our earlier debates. Nevertheless, I do want to speak specifically about certain issues.

The first is the issue of self-dealing. Tougher rules will be implemented. The self-policing role of directors and auditors will be made more effective through mandated roles and responsibilities. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions will have increased powers to require information that will enable problems to be anticipated. The superintendent is, therefore, being given new access to needed information which has not previously been available.

Second, consumers will find shopping for financial services more convenient and will benefit from a wider choice of financial products since banks, trusts and loan companies and insurance companies will be allowed to compete more directly with each other. By opening new avenues of growth for our financial institutions, the new provisions will strengthen the ability of these institutions to meet the new challenges that have evolved in the global marketplace.

[Translation]

Financial institutions will be able to diversify by owning institutions whose operations are concentrated in other sectors of the industry. Banks, for instance, will be able to acquire trust and loan companies and insurance companies will be able to own other financial institutions. Because of their wide ownership, mutual insurance associations will be able to own chartered banks. Important changes in the ownership structure of financial institutions will be submitted to the approval of the minister of Finance, who will determine if these changes best serve the interests of the Canadian financial system.

[English]

Together these proposals set out a framework for fair competition that will allow all institutions to have good opportunities for participation in a broad range of financial sector activities.

• (1900)

These bills and their regulations cover a very wide spectrum of changes because of the size and importance of the financial sector and the wide range of institutions in the situation which have to be covered.

After all, looking at the sector as a whole, there are more than 3,000 Canadian financial institutions with assets of some $900 million. Of the 25 largest institutions with total assets of $760 billion, 23 are chartered and regulated federally. It is not just the sheer size of the sector which is of importance. We must not forget that the health of these institutions is a key to the vitality and strength of our economy as well as our security as savers and investors.

The activities of these institutions affect our mortgages and our purchases of goods and services. The financial sector shelters and invests savings, and makes available investments needed for new and expanding industries.

I believe that these institutions will operate more effectively and competitively, and will meet the needs of Canadians more efficiently as a result of the reforms we have put forward.

We have recognized the importance of financial institutions in developing a legitimate and regulatory approach that protects the public while encouraging and not inhibiting innovation and competition. We have done this while also recognizing the competing interests within the financial community itself.

While we have sought as wide an agreement as possible, not all interests could be completely reconciled. In such cases, we have looked to find a reasonable balance.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my comments by saying once more that the thrust of our proposals is to strike a fair balance which meets individual, federal, provincial and commercial criteria as well as being a measure of prudence.

Those proposals reflect also the public interest. They reinforce and give the financial institutions the opportunity to progress and thrive while contributing to the strength of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank members of Parliament who worked with the government to allow the speedy passage of those bills which constitute this important legislative agenda.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 7 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk) moved that Bill C-250, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today I would like to bring the attention of the House to an inherent part of rural Canadian infrastructure, namely, the mail delivery by rural route carriers.

The purpose of my bill before the House today is to make clear the injustices that presently persist against rural route carriers. As a private member, I have done all that I can in a legislative sense for these workers.

Therefore, it is my hope that the minister responsible for Canada Post will take the concerns of rural mail carriers of Canada seriously, act quickly to end the injustices that this House will discuss this evening in the Canada Post Act, and help these workers who are now facing these injustices.

As you know, I am from a rural part of the country. There are a number of rural members in this House today. I would call on these rural members after this debate is over to have a talk with their rural carriers to let them know where they stood on this issue in the House.

As the spokesperson for rural Canada within my party, a person in charge of a rural caucus, I want to say that in discussing with my colleagues here on this side of the House and looking at this issue, we have felt very strongly that mail rural carriers in rural Canada are not treated fairly.

Rural carriers provide service to 1.2 million rural and many times isolated households in Canada. Like their city counterparts, the rural route carrier sorts and delivers mail. The difference between the two is that the city mail carrier, an employee of Canada Post, enjoys employee benefits.

The rural carrier is denied the most basic rights of any worker in Canada. Benefits such as sick leave, unemployment insurance, maternity leave and even bereavement leave are denied.

They are denied the protection of the Canada Labour Code. So many Canadians have the opportunity to have protection under this code while the workers of rural Canada, mail delivery workers, are denied this basic right. They are denied workers' compensation. They are denied the opportunity to fall under the Employment Safety Standards Act and they are denied unemployment insurance.

In 1985 a group was formed. It called itself "rural route mail carriers of Canada". It attempted to obtain working conditions for these letter carriers. More importantly, it was organized to develop lines of communication with Canada Post. As we have seen in recent Canada Post labour disputes they are sometimes difficult to open up. I assure you that an attempt was made by these rural carriers to open up lines of communication so that Canada Post could find out for itself the situation these letter carriers were in.

Then and now, no one in authority was willing to meet with the letter carriers in order to resolve these numerous day to day problems. Canada Post has proved to be very frustrating for rural carriers who as a result have become bitter and yet they are determined to win the rights and benefits they so much deserve.

The unwillingness on the part of Canada Post Corporation to meet in any meaningful way with the rural carriers of Canada motivated these carriers to initiate action that would see fundamental changes to existing statutes.

This has been tried by way of labour board hearings and legislation. It is important to note that the employee status of rural carriers has been considered on four different occasions.

In 1987 the Canada Labour Board ruled that these letter carriers were employees of Canada Post. The board found that rural route carriers were fully integrated into the overall operation of the corporation and performed similar functions to those letter carriers in the cities. In other words, the board concluded that an employer-employee relationship existed. However Canada Post, in an attempt to get around this situation, appealed this decision to the Federal Court.

As aB result, the decision was squashed by the Federal Court after careful consideration. The court based this decision entirely on section 13.5 of the Canada Post Corporation Act and that is why we are here today.

Obviously the only course of action that can be taken now is to introduce legislation that recognizes the employee's status of these hard-working and dedicated public servants. Make no mistake, these men and women are public servants. They do serve the public exactly in the same way as letter carriers do in urban centres. Without a doubt, the delivery of mail is still considered a public service in this country. It certainly makes no differentiation between unionized mail carriers and the rural mail carrier. Unfortunately there are some fundamental differences.

For example the contract awarded to a rural carrier averages $16,000 a year. This figure is rarely negotiable. In many cases the rural carrier receives no extra payment for routes that have become amalgamated. Moreover, the rural mail carrier receives no pay increase for increased households, CODs, registered mail, parcels, special deliveries or electronic mail.

Finally, increases that we all face in Canada today such as gas price increases, insurance premium increases, the hiring of labour to deal with extra workloads, have lowered the real income of rural carriers. Canada Post does not recognize that rural route carriers are essentially going through the same difficulties that all Canadians are going through. That is the cost of putting together a business and trying to run a business in a business-like manner.

To understand Canada Post's attitude about the problems faced by the rural carrier is to understand the corporation's fiscally responsible manner of operation that it seems to have come to. I know that the minister has spoken in the House about this on numerous occasions claiming that Canada Post is becoming fiscally responsible. It is becoming a money-maker and as a result, as we pointed out on this side of the House, it has lost in many areas in terms of service to Canadians.

Canada Post, to be fair to the corporation and to outline for the Canadian public its position, takes the position that in order to "organize and manage its service requirements in a cost-effective and business-like manner, a formal tender evaluation process best ensures both fair competition among suppliers, and the best value for the corporation and its customers".

Thus, according to Canada Post, and I will quote again, "in every competition all technical, commercial and financial elements of the tenders are taken into consideration. The final decision on a tender is based on the ability to obtain maximum value for each purchasing dollar". In other words money, money and more money is the bottom line. The result is that we in rural Canada, who so depend on that mail lifeline and that service, are being adversely affected by this attitude of Canada Post.

Ideally the formal tender process takes more into account than the bottom line of a dollar. In the end the winning bid reflects expertise. Expertise combined with commercial and financial elements, I believe, should all be involved in the decision on who delivers the mail. However rural route carriers have found that within Canada Post Corporation the process can be less than ideal. The many letters that I have received from rural carriers across this country portray a public corporation that puts money before people and is ultimately exploitive.

I would like to take this opportunity now to read from some of these letters. I believe it is the best way really to reflect the injustices that are out there within our rural communities.

One woman from southwestern Ontario writes, and I quote:

> I am still a rural route contractor for route 1 and have been so for nearly 16 years. I have just renewed my contract for another five years in May of 1981. However one year after receiving this contract, our postmaster retired and we have just become another one of the corporation's rural postal outlets.

We have all experienced this problem throughout Canada, the injustices of the closing down of these rural post offices.

She goes on to say:

> When we were first notified of the 'structural change-over' (as they like to refer to it), every letter said that the rural route would not be affected in any way. Then less than five days before I was to start, I received a letter from Canada Post Rural Services informing me that my route would emanate 16 kilometres from my home. I was told that I would be responsible for servicing the rural post office, prime sorting all of the other town's mail as well as my route, carry all parcels, flyers, registered items, Priority Post items, of both routes. Canada Post's offer for performing this service is based on 30 minutes to separate the town mail from my rural mail plus a few cents mileage for the additional kilometres driven. The length of my route is 34.6 kilometres. I service 85 rural customers and deliver no less than 15 different kinds of flyers weekly. However since I have been moved to the rural outlets in another town to sort the mail, the number of kilometres travelled per day is 67.8. I am carrying mail now for 153 townspeople plus my own 85.
> Needless to say, the volume of flyers alone for this many customers fills my car on Mondays and Tuesdays, and I am afraid to think of what will happen when the Christmas mail gets into full swing.

This is something they just threw on to this lady. You do understand the seriousness of this.

> When I phoned Canada Post to try to get their co-operation to explain to them that the job of sorting the mail takes at least two hours, and that some days I have to make extra trips to town as my car will not hold the town's mail plus my rural mail, I was told that I could hand in my notice of 60 days if I was not satisfied.

This really shows the exploitive nature of this corporation and how it is now running with this new mandate set out by the government. She says:

> I have answered their offer in writing with a counter-offer for additional payment and I am still waiting for a reply. I cannot quit as this is my only source of income. My husband's employment was terminated so we are forced to accept Canada Post's abuse and extra workload without fair payment.
> I apologize for rambling on so long and I am sure there are others in worse circumstances. But I am becoming so weary and so depressed that I wanted you to be aware of what Canada Post is capable of doing.

That really says it all. If Canada Post was fair, if it really wanted to provide the service to Canadians in rural Canada as they do in urban Canada—and make no mistake, this should be a basic right of all Canadians, to have the proper mail service—they would address injustices such as this.

I want to go on to another letter, which is equally disturbing.

> I am the only contractor out of our post office. I am up to about 268 mail boxes and 57 kilometres. I have been doing the mail for about 13 years, but as soon as my contract is up I am packing it in. Unfortunately, that is not more than three more years. I deliver an average of 13 flyers per week, and as you know without compensation. My friend who is a letter carrier gets paid per flyer when he delivers them. Canada Post can make me deliver as many as they want and I cannot do anything about it. A contractor in the next village to us is quitting in June when her contract is up. We have all had enough. The only reason I don't quit now is because Canada Post is hanging on to about $2,000 of my money. I had to give them that instead of a letter of credit because my bank wouldn't do a letter of credit for such a small amount. I had to give Canada Post 10 per cent of a year's contract price or they would not let me have my contract renewed, which I had to tender for after all these years of service. That is gratitude for you.

What these examples illustrate is that in many of the economically depressed rural areas across Canada, people desperate for jobs enter into unfair and exploitive contracts with Canada Post in an attempt to secure some kind of livelihood.

You know the problem is out there. In effect, many rural carriers are exploited by Canada Post's formal tender evaluation process. In an attempt to win a contract, the experienced courier is forced to submit a bid that does not reflect the work, expenses and costs involved in the job. In most instances, the contract is awarded to the lowest bidder and the carrier with the experience, who wants only to make a fair living, loses. He is not the only one to lose. All rural Canadians lose when these letter carriers do. What is more problematic is that many of the problems faced by rural carriers are due to the vulnerability of living in rural Canada.

To a greater extent the rural carrier must contend with a persisting attitude on the part of Canada Post that it is dealing with a rural, unsophisticated, pseudo-entrepreneur. Obviously I find this very disturbing, mainly because the nature of the job dictates that people and service rather than money must be a priority.

I believe that rural route carriers face discrimination and injustice because of their contractual relationship with Canada Post. This is compounded by subsection 13(5) of the Canada Post Act, which says:

> Notwithstanding any provision of Part I of the Canada Labour Code, for the purposes of the application of that part to the Corporation and to the officers and employees of the Corporation, a mail contractor is deemed not to be a dependent contractor or an employee within the meaning of those terms in subsection 3(1) of that act.

Therefore, I urge the minister responsible for Canada Post to introduce legislation that would repeal this discriminatory subsection. I urge him to do so on a priority basis. The importance of the repeal of this subsection is two-fold. First, as it now reads it has implications with respect to section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in that it prevents a rural route carrier from receiving equal pay for work of equal value. Certainly the hon. members can see the hypocrisy of a Crown corporation whose legislation contradicts our charter. Second, an amendment to the Canada Post Act would ensure that Part I of the Canada Labour Code would apply to rural couriers in the same way that it applies to all employees of the corporation and most Canadian workers.

I see I only have one minute left. Canada Post, in its desire to act like a private corporation, has put money before people. I call on all members of this House to support me in this motion and I call on the minister to take action immediately to rectify this situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I like both the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona and the hon. member for Crowfoot. However, I had the hon. member for Crowfoot down first, so I must recognize him.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I thought you were going to recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona first. I probably should tell him that I am not ready yet, or something like that.

I thought that today might be a refreshing day and that something very unique and different would happen. I was hoping that I would hear a Liberal member of Parliament come to this House and put forward a Private Members' Bill that would talk about cutting the expenditures of money. That would have been an unique idea, very rare and never before experienced. That is really the case. Never before have I seen a Private Members' Bill from the opposition side that advocated the cutting of money.

He talks about an injustice and an unfairness. Quite frankly my first criticism is the lack of evidence to establish that fact. I begin with some prepared comments that I would like to make today, I think that can be established and established clearly, as is also the case with numerous court hearings on this matter. They came to the same conclusion that the allegations of injustice simply are not justified.

I express some sympathy for the individual who signed the letter he read into the record. For a person who is earning $16,000 as their sole income it is obviously a significant hardship. It is not the intent of a rural postal contractor to serve as a person's sole job.

Most of these positions are part-time. They are coupled with people's other occupations. There may be extreme cases where this is some people's only job. That is not the intent of the work at all.

In many parts of Canada we examined the whole question of rural routes. At least in certain parts the activity is redundant. It is redundant with a community lifestyle in which people go to town for repairs or to purchase food. They visit their small villages, hamlets, or towns so frequently that a more legitimate question for Canadian society to ask is why if they are visiting a place where the post office is do we have a rural post office service and rural delivery in the first place.

I come from a very large rural constituency whose north section could be described as a farming area, some of it receiving rural delivery. The southern half could be described as a ranching area. My constituency is about the size of the province of New Brunswick.

I say to the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk that in many ways I could build a case to say that Canada Post has its criteria wrong in terms of how it establishes rural routes. If we look at the tax base of the ranching industry and the tax base of the oil and gas industry that co-exists with that ranching area we will find that there are enough tax dollars there so that instead of using the frequency of the number of persons per mile to justify a rural route probably a long and hard look should be taken at the opposite perspective.

I have constituents who travel 60 miles one way to get their mail. In other words, a return trip of 120 miles. In the farming areas most of those people are in town on a very regular basis, or members of their families. The very long hauls are where a postal service is more needed.

I am rising on the matter raised by my hon. friend for Haldimand—Norfolk. He asks to repeal section 13(5) of the Canada Post Act and seeks to change the status of Canada's rural route carriers and make them full-time employees of Canada Post Corporation.

Bill C–250 is a piece of legislation that runs contrary to anything that can be considered reasonable or appropriate for rural contractors and rural Canadians. Rural Canadians want to get their mail in a timely and efficient fashion. The passage of Bill C–250 would jeopardize that standard by changing the mutually beneficial relationship between Canada Post and its contractors.

Furthermore, this relationship has been scrutinized and has come through with flying colours. It has been repeatedly verified and supported by the courts, and it is on firm legal ground. Indeed, one decision by the court ruled the challenge to section 13(5) as frivolous. The truth is that Canada Post has been, is and will continue to be a major player in rural Canada.

So will its rural contractors. It is a beneficial relationship that has developed over time and they have provided a vital link in Canada Post's growing services. The Crown corporation operates in a fiscally responsible manner when selecting suppliers and contractors for many of its products and services.

A formal tender and evaluation process ensures an adequate and fair competition and allows the corporation to consider the most cost effective and market sensitive package submitted. Quality service and delivery are the key factors in Canada Post decision making.

This process gives all Canadians a chance to do business with Canada Post and everyone wins.

• (1930)

Members will no doubt realize that since becoming a Crown corporation in 1981 Canada Post has made major strides in becoming a profitable business answering to the myriads of calls in its giant client base.

As a corporation Canada Post serves some 6,000 communities across Canada. Many of its customers live in rural areas and depend on timely, effective and efficient postal service to deliver their products, send their bills and receive payments and social assistance cheques.

Canada Post's 100–year relationship with its rural contractors ensures that this vital connecting service continues. Still, since becoming a Crown corporation in 1981 Canada Post has striven to reduce costs and improve the efficiency of its personnel, equipment and service. It has done so.

In the last decade Canada Post has deliberately invested in high–tech equipment to get mail moving faster, cheaper and more efficiently. It is succeeding where its predecessor had failed.

The latest Ernst and Young performance results indicated that 98 per cent of letter–mail is being delivered on time in the major cities cross Canada. In achieving this Canada Post has also improved its performance in rural Canada because much of the mail going through major urban centres is processed faster and more efficiently.

That is the kind of performance all Canadians, rural and city dwellers, have come to expect and to rely upon. By repealing section 13(5) of the Canada Post Corporation Act and making rural contractor employees of a Crown corporation my hon. friend seeks to change, without just cause or legal precedence, the nature of this positive relationship which is so critical to the answering of the business and personnel needs in rural Canada.

My hon. friend wants to turn back the clock on profitability and efficiency, two of Canada Post's most prized and hard won accomplishments. When Canada Post hired its rural contractors, its intent was clear: "Deliver the mail and do it on time". The contractors readily accepted the terms. They wanted to deal with Canada Post on an individual and not on a collective basis.

No one forced them to do it. They did it out of their own free will and business sense. Now someone else wants to change the rules. Is the federal government in the business of changing job descriptions, of rewriting contracts to make jobs? Do we expect our Crown corporations to do the same?

Where is the bottom line? Who do you think is going to pay for all of this?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. He is a little over, and I regret that I will have to cut him off.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate. I was looking forward to hearing the other half of that speech prepared by Canada Post.

I do not have the other half because I am not here to represent Canada Post, but instead the people who Canada Post allegedly serves and who have concerns. Some of those concerns could be addressed by the legislation that we have before us if it were to be passed.

I am speaking about Bill C-280. The purpose of this legislation, although I am sure the mover of the bill referred to it, is to ensure that rural route carriers would be guaranteed the right to organize and become a full member of a union under the labour code and the Canada Post Corporation Act.

At present, rural route carriers hired on contract are not permitted to be members of any union. Rural route carriers, who are very familiar with postal service in rural communities, do not have any way to formally appeal any decision that adversely affects rural services.

This is something that the hon. member who just spoke perhaps should have taken into account unless, as is probably the case, he has seen his way through to defending the emasculation of rural post offices and rural postal service that has taken place during the rule of this government. If these rural postal workers had the status of people who were unionized, they could resist changes in rural postal service, not just on their own behalf, but on behalf of the communities in which they work. They are not able to do that now, they are simply terminated. Their contract comes to an end and if they do not like what is going on they have absolutely no recourse and their communities have no recourse through them.

One of the things that would happen if this bill is passed is that the corporation's extensive cuts to rural postal services might be slowed down in time for there to be something left of rural Canada by the time a new government is elected in the next election.

As I understand it, the Canada Post corporate plan calls for the closing down of every rural post office in Canada by the year 1996. This bill would get in the way of that plan and I think that recommends it to the House or at least to those who are concerned about that corporate plan.

Another strong point of this legislation is the fact that many rural route carriers have put in years of quality service to their communities and to Canada Post. At present, they have no access to seniority privileges or pension plans. We think that these employees deserve an opportunity, which this bill would provide them, to negotiate benefits.

An example which was provided to me by our post office critic is that of Joe and Blaine Young who served Rural Route 2 in Westport, Ontario for 25 years. At that time, they had missed only one day of delivery due to weather. They recently lost their bid to service Rural Route 2 to another bid that was only nominally lower in price. So you can see the kind of injustice which can be done to people who have served their communities well, who have the kind of seniority that along with merit would protect them in any other situation. Yet for a few cents, Canada Post can decide that couple, who served their community well, literally through rain, sleet, snow and hail, all these 25 years, one-quarter of a century, can simply, bingo, be gone and some entirely new person, new to the community, et cetera, or whatever can be brought in.

This is the kind of thing that we would like to see prevented and that we understand the hon. member's bill would prevent. It is the position of the NDP, even though it is a private members' bill, and I can assure the hon. mover of the motion that I speak on behalf of all my colleagues here, that Canada Post should encourage efficient and long-term service to rural routes by recognizing seniority and long-term quality service. Neither long-term nor efficient service will be encouraged when bids from contractors with proven track records are passed over in favour of bids that are nominally lower in cost.

I had some experience of this myself. I do not have any rural routes to speak of in the new riding of Winnipeg Transcona, but when I represented Winnipeg—Bird's Hill, I had rural postal routes. Whenever, in the name of this sort of seeking the bottom line, there were changes to the various contracts, there were always problems that came to my attention. The people who the community knew were reliable and who had done the job and knew what to do were sometimes replaced by absolutely new people. I do not see that postal service is the kind of thing that people should be trying to cut each other's throat for in terms of getting these contracts. People who do a good job should be paid well to do it and should have a measure of job security that is not now available.

If the hon. member for Crowfoot wants to say that this has worked for a long, long, time, yes, it worked for a long, long time when we did not have a government and a Canada Post that were dedicated to the kind of bottom line philosophy that we have now.

• (1940)

As long as you did not have that kind of Canada Post and that kind of government, this system may have worked. However, now you have a situation where these people are vulnerable to the new climate of competition. It is really another word for dog eat dog, survival of the fittest, let's have a nasty, brutish society, instead of the one we have managed to build up over the years.

What we are talking about here is, as it is with so many other things, when we get into what might seem to be simply a rural issue or a postal issue, we find that at the heart of it is a philosophical debate going on in this country between those who would sacrifice the Canadian way of life to this greater god of competitiveness. Sooner or later we will all be running around working eight days a week, 24 hours a day, to keep up with whatever country is psychotic enough to want to be even more competitive than their neighbour. Leisure and justice and all the other things we thought we were building toward will be completely eliminated from our way of life. This bill, in its own small way, will go some way toward putting the brakes on that sort of thing, at least as far as rural Canada is concerned.

It is clear from what has happened to the post office over the last few years that in this greater world of competitiveness, rural Canada is dispensable. It is not unrelated to what we saw here today when we had the farm coalition here asking for the kind of aid that would help them to get through a very difficult time. Hopefully, by the time some solution is found at GATT and prices go up a bit, or whatever the long-term solution might be, there will still be some farmers around to benefit from the solution.

One suspects that the farmers of Canada are a bit like the rural post offices. The government has decided they are dispensable. In the big rationalization, in the name of global competitiveness, many Canadians—whether they work in rural post offices or farm the land or work in other traditional areas—have been targeted for elimination in the name of this great new world order. I think we will find when it finally comes to fruition, that it is a very nasty world indeed.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-250, tabled by my Liberal colleague across the way.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I am totally opposed to the principle of the hon. member's bill. I am opposed to it because I believe that the Canada Post Corporation is not in the business of creating jobs but should concentrate on making itself a going concern and ensuring that Canadians across this country receive their mail within a reasonable timeframe and receive the kind of service they have come to expect.

When the Progressive Conservative government came to power in 1984—the occasional history lesson is useful—hon. members will recall that the Canada Post Corporation had a deficit of close to $600 million. Those $600 million were paid by all Canadian taxpayers, despite the fact that we were just coming out of a recession, at a time when Canadian families had lost their jobs and at a time when taxpayers were telling us: Listen, Mr. Prime Minister, we are sick and tired of seeing Crown corporations that are running a deficit. We are sick and tired of seeing departments spending more than the government receives in revenue. We are sick and tired of agencies and even governments—at the time it was a Liberal government—that are poor managers and are mortgaging the future of our young people and the future of Canada

At the time, the Progressive Conservative government told all its departments, through the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, and told all its Crown corporations: You will have to pay your own way as much as possible.

The Canada Post Corporation is no exception to this rule. Starting with a deficit of around $600 million, as I just said, it has made profits totaling nearly $200 million in the last three years. That is efficiency. It proves that with the right decisions and good managment, a deficit can be changed into a surplus.

It also shows, Mr. Speaker, that any Crown corporation, whatever services it provides, can make money for all Canadians. It also shows, Mr. Speaker, that a Crown corporation like Canada Post, even though it does not always make the right decisions, can provide more services at lower cost, creating profits that will enable the government or even the corporation to improve the services that it will provide to the public and to be more competitive.

That is what Canadians asked us to do, Mr. Speaker. That is the mandate for which we were elected. The mandate of the Minister responsible for Canada Post was to make that corporation profitable and that is what Canada Post set out to do. We must say that we are proud of its successes and we hope that it will continue that way.

We are at a time when revenue is extremely important and I think that Canada Post has done a great deal in that regard, at least for now.

The reason I am against the Liberal member's bill is that I consider it unfair to give special advantages to some people. Let me explain.

In most rural areas and small villages, the rural postal contracts awarded by Canada Post are often one of the few ways that people who want to bid can obtain federal government contracts and get back some of the money they pay in tax every year.

Mr. Speaker, when I took office as my government came to power in 1984, dozens of people came to see us. Dozens of people from my riding said, "Mr. Champagne, it makes no sense that for decades, rural postal contracts have gone from father to son and we have never had a chance as taxpayers to bid. Although we are Canadians who pay our taxes, we have never had the chance to serve the country with a Canada Post contract, not with such a profitable contract that everyone would envy us, but a contract on which we could have bid, a contract where we could be more efficient and offer good service."

People came to my office, saying: "When will the government change this attitude? When will the government change this way of doing business? We wrote to the minister who was then responsible for Canada Post. He had discussions with officials of that corporation and they came to the conclusion that we should indeed go with public tenders in each community and each area covered, so that all Canadians interested in that type of contract could get involved."

Today, Mr. Speaker, we see new faces providing services for Canada Post in all our communities. We also notice that more people are interested in the activities of that corporation, because when they see how we proceed, when they see that they can bid on that type of contract, they look carefully at what that corporation is doing, and not in a negative way, Mr. Speaker. It is not negative, because even today people call to ask if we know when the contract for such and such a rural route will expire. Of course, we refer them to Canada Post, since it manages those routes. But you can see the interest generated by the Corporation's decision to call for tenders and to give each taxpayer a chance.

If we restricted rural routes to big contractors, as the member wants and as they originally were Canadians, my constituents and taxpayers, would never have a chance to bid on those contracts.

I believe that Canada Post did not want to favour a particular segment of the population, but rather to give each and every one of us the opportunity to bid. The member should understand that. Mr. Speaker, is the Liberal member saying that we should only protect the contractors and forget the others, that it wouldn't hurt them to pay taxes like everybody else, that it doesn't matter if they want to have the same chances as any other Canadian to be able to bid on tenders? It doesn't matter, Mr. Speaker, that the people who got the contracts first can take advantage of all the services and benefits offered by the Canada Post Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I am against this bill because we are in a country where free enterprise exists, and I am against this bill because we are in a country where every Canadian has a right to make an honest living. Setting criteria and imposing restrictions that prevent other people from being able to bid and making a company like Canada Post Corporation a going concern is certainly not going to help us build a prosperous country with less unemployment and less injustice.

Canada Post made the right decision. It is only normal for Conservative members to object to this kind of bill, because to us, every Canadian is important and every Canadian has the right to earn a living in a democracy, in a society that supports free enterprise. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the hon. member's bill.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have two points really.

One is with regard to your ruling of yesterday regarding Question Period. I am wondering if the Chair has had time to reflect and perhaps inform the House so that we can prepare our questioners appropriately within the bounds of the Standing Orders.

Second, on Friday of last week Bill C-35 was before the House. A procedural argument was raised by me. I should notify the Chair that there had been a lot of co-operation between the three political parties in trying to facilitate this legislation.

Friday has elapsed, Monday has elapsed, Tuesday has elapsed, Wednesday has gone by and we do not have a ruling from the Chair with regard to the procedural argument that I intervened with at that time.

I have asked on two previous occasions when one might receive word from the Chair in terms of a ruling that has not been forthcoming. I seek its assistance and guidance in terms of both points of order as to how we are to proceed under both.

Mr. Speaker: I will deal with the first point first. I was going to call the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and have a discussion but there is perhaps no need to do that. I think if you look at the "blues" you will see clearly the question that was put directly to the Prime Minister by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond was put in the terms of the word "you" which is clearly contrary to our conventions. At that point I stood up.

Further, if one considers the Prime Minister was not prepared to answer the question in any event, I moved on.

It is a judgment call. I would ask hon. members to be very careful not to personalize the questions but to put the questions through the Chair and then perhaps neither they, in the midst of some important matter, nor the Chair might be put in an awkward position vis-à-vis each other. I am sure none of us would want that to happen.

On the second question raised by the hon. member, I think we are in a position to respond at 3 p.m. today. I am sorry for the delay.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Under this portion of the Standing Orders are the Routine Proceedings. We have heard some rather extraordinary developments in terms of the constitutional issue in the last few hours.

My question is directed to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. I know the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs is unable to be here. I understand he is at meetings at the moment. Would he be making a statement perhaps later in the day on the most recent developments? Is there any plan to do that?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would have to take that as a representation from the hon. member and I will bring it to the minister's attention.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–44, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (geographic certification).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed to be adopted.

Mr. Danis moves that the bill be now read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed to be adopted.

Bill read first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a question regarding the bill that has just been tabled. My question is to my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. Does he feel any sense of urgency regarding this legislation? Second, is the Senate, or the other place, in a position to deal with this in the remaining part of this week? Is he able to respond to those two questions? If not, perhaps we could have some discussions later in the day.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can say to my hon. friend that there appears to be some urgency for the legislation. I understand that it would help bring to an end a strike that has been going on for several months now. In that sense, yes, there is some urgency.

Second, in terms of the Senate, I cannot answer for it although normally on this type of legislation it has had a tendency to be very co–operative. If in the next day or two we were able to complete this legislation, that would certainly help. Getting it to the Senate early tomorrow may allow for speedy passage.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. Once the Senate rises today when does it sit again? Is it not Tuesday?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I must confess not having been a member of that august institution I am not familiar with its sitting hours. However, I would be happy to check and if we can do anything to encourage it to help facilitate the House in the passage of this legislation, rest assured that if this House could come to an agreement on it I would be more than happy to make representations to the hon. senators down the hall.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal party would want to co–operate in every way possible in terms of facilitating the legislation on the floor of the House. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could obtain answers to the questions which have been put forward by my hon. friend, the House leader for the New Democratic Party. Then a discussion might take place with House leaders later this day to see whether we can facilitate the minister's particular objective here.

Just to underline, we are more than willing to co–operate with the government providing that we do have some reasonable discussions later this day.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have just been passed a note indicating that the Senate does not sit tomorrow. Perhaps what we can do as House leaders is get together and have a quick discussion and perhaps we can come to a reasonable agreement that will accommodate all the parties' concerns.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I appreciated the comments by my hon. colleague, the House leader for the Official Opposition. I think the suggestion is a very good one and we should meet as House leaders or appropriate designates and see if we can deal with this in an appropriate way without hindering progress on the legislation.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to present this petition on behalf of a number of constituents from central and northern British Columbia who have been informed of the intention of a certain company in western Canada, in association with a California company, to dam the North Thompson River at Vavenby, British Columbia, in an effort to divert the water into the Columbia Valley trench and through a series of canals and pipelines into San Diego, California. Not surprising, this would cause a lot of concern for people who are concerned with diverting water and upsetting the ecosystem to that extent.

They are simply calling upon the Government of Canada to state categorically that this would not be allowed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I have another petition on behalf of a number of people, primarily from Kamloops and a number of other surrounding communities, who are asking the federal government to ensure that proper funding is provided to our Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enable it to fulfill its mandate.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, as reported (without amendment) by Legislative Committee B.

SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Speaker: It is now my duty to give a ruling with respect to a number of amendments that came in late yesterday afternoon to Bill C-39. I want to say first of all that the staff worked until midnight trying to deal with them all and we have not had time—and I hope hon. members will appreciate this—to discuss with members the amendments that have been filed. It just has not been possible and I have not had very much time to look at them myself except early this morning.

I am going to do the very best I can with this but I am conscious of not being able to follow our usual practice which is to try to have discussions with members before I give the ruling.

[Translation]

There are 33 notices of motions in amendment to Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, at report stage.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond) moved:

Motion No. 4A.

That Bill C-39 be amended in Clause 6 by adding immediately after line 22 at page 4 the following:

"(2) For the purposes of this section

(a) "marriage" includes a conjugal relationship between two persons of the opposite sex living together;

(b) "divorce" includes the termination of a conjugal relationship between two persons living together."

That Bill C-39 be amended in Clause 12 by adding immediately after line 13 at page 13 the following:

"(10) Where there are one or more persons who are former spouses of a contributor, the Minister shall, subject to the terms of any spousal agreement, apportion the survivor's pension between the surviving spouse and the former spouses in proportion to the time that the marriage or conjugal relationship subsisted during the period the contributor contributed."

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the intention of these amendments is to recognize that a marriage, whether common law or traditional, is truly an equal partnership between the spouses.

The idea emanates from the excellent report of the National Council of Welfare entitled Pension Reform released in February 1990.

What these amendments intend to do, Madam Speaker, is to provide for credit splitting on the breakdown, unhappy as it may be, of a marriage, legal or common law, that lasted for at least a year.

What has happened to date is that the Parliament of Canada said that splitting could be over-ridden by provincial family law. In fact, Saskatchewan decided to over-ride the federal law and allow spouses to waive the right to credit splitting.

Allowing pension credits to be traded off in a separation or divorce can work to the particular detriment of women. That is the assessment of the National Council of Welfare. In fact in this report, a young woman might waive her right, for example, as given in this report to $10,000 worth of pension credits for an extra $10,000 of equity in the family home.

That may be appealing in the initial stage of the breakdown, but only in the short term. It would leave the woman in financial difficulty when she gets to retirement age.

The other point I would like to make is that since the option for credit splitting became available in 1978, as of September 1989 there had been only some 21,000 applications for splitting under the CPP approved.

Yet the statistics indicate, Madam Speaker, that over those intervening years, approximately half a million divorces had happened. You can appreciate that not many had availed themselves of this particular privilege, likely due to lack of knowledge and awareness of the particular privilege.

What is intended is to make this a routine sort of privilege given to the spouses who decide to separate their marriage legally.

That is the intent of this amendment. Indeed, it will truly be a step forward in the sense that it will recognize that spouses during their relationship in a common law, legal marriage have contributed equally to the assets that they have had up until that point.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I really want to applaud my hon. friend for this most thoughtful and appropriate amendment.

We are cognizant of the fact that unfortunately on an increasing basis marriages both legal and common law do break up. This particular proviso would recognize that after one year of marriage the credit splitting would occur.

My hon. colleague expressed it extremely well when he remarked that at the point of the marriage breakup the tensions and the difficult times that exist for the people directly often result in some short-term decisions being taken. In many cases one of the partners might take a short-term gain in the desperation of the moment and the frustration and anxiety that surrounds that particular period of their lives. But in the long term if they were to give up part of the credit splitting it would be certainly detrimental for the rest of their lives.

We have seen, as he has indicated, provincial jurisdictions that have taken initiatives that actually override these provisos. In this case we are probably dealing on balance with more women than men. More women are finding themselves in extremely difficult circumstances as a result of a marriage breakup and the loss of credit splitting.

In terms of this particular legislation I want to say very clearly on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we will support this suggestion most enthusiastically.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on the amendments at report stage today put forth by my colleague from Winnipeg North. He has raised a question that needs a bit further attention.

When divorce or separation occurs, there are a lot of tensions and difficulties and we realize that. It is an unfortunate time in the lives of many people.

I would like to draw to your attention that the hon. member was part of the legislative committee that was reviewing Bill C-39. Indeed the bill had been in our hands for some time before second reading. I really wonder why it was not raised at the legislative committee. We spent a great deal of time with regard to disabilities and we all learned a great deal.

With regard to these amendments which were put forth very late yesterday, I would like to draw your attention there are more ramifications than have been brought to the floor today.

When the CPP legislation came in and was enacted in 1966, we the federal government had agreements with our provincial counterparts. Prior to making changes this agreement says that we would discuss the proposals and come to an agreement in principle prior to making an amendment or any amendments to the Canada Pension Plan legislation.

I am very sympathetic to the recommendations and amendments that my colleague has put forward and indeed a lot more work has to be done in this particular area. But at this particular point in time I am afraid I cannot accept them for two reasons. The first is that they have not been carefully studied. The second is that the federal government through the Minister of National Health and Welfare has not had the opportunity to discuss these particular issues with his counterparts in the province. I will certainly take this notice and make sure the minister is well aware of it.

I thank the hon. member once again for bringing this to our attention. I just wish he had done it at the legislative committee. We certainly would have discussed it.

• (1040)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have a comment with regard to the amendment which my colleague and I have put before the House. I listened to the member opposite in terms of the fact that these particular issues were not raised at the committee.

As the Chair knows, members have the opportunity either at committee or indeed report stage to put forward amendments. Knowing the hon. member as I do I am certain that she has not questioned the motives of my colleague in terms of why we have presented these amendments at this time.

I guess what I am hearing from the hon. member opposite is that there is some acceptability to the amendments but because of their consequential effects the hon. member does not wish to proceed with the formalization of accepting those amendments. I can understand that.

Perhaps what we might want to do is to give the parliamentary secretary or the Minister of National Health and Welfare an opportunity to check with department officials to see whether or not the consequential effects that they deem are so bad that it would preclude passage of the amendment.

We would argue on the other side that the amendment is fairly straightforward and its consequences in terms of other legislation or on the treasury are not what the hon. member is alluding to. Therefore I would ask the parliamentary secretary to reflect on the amendment. I make this partly as a submission and really partly as a question. It is very straightforward.

In view of reality and what takes place in this country, the amendment and the definitions of marriage and divorce have been accepted in all jurisdictions pretty well across the board in each of the provinces. I would think that the Government of Canada would want to support that kind of an amendment.

I do not want to give a history in terms of what the courts have adjudicated with regard to these terms. It is unequivocally clear that the definitions as referred to in Motion No. 4A will not provide undue difficulties for the Crown, nor will it have any disastrous consequential effects or minor consequential effects.

I take the parliamentary secretary at her word. I know the hon. member and she is a very distinguished and a very reputable colleague in this House. I would hope that some reflection by the parliamentary secretary and the government could be given to the amendment as I believe other members will want to speak to it because it does reflect the Canadian reality. It is reflected in our courts. It is reflected in the administration of justice throughout the land and all the provinces.

Again, I ask with great respect if my hon. friend opposite would reflect on my interventions as well as the interventions of other members who wish to speak to this amendment.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I too would like to respond to the member for Calgary South. I take a great deal of exception to the remarks made to our House leader with regard to these amendments. The Liberal members also know the frustration that we had when we were in committee and dealing with it and not only when we saw the witnesses. We know the concerns with regard to the Canada Pension Act and Bill C–39 and the issues that were raised. I want to tell the member for Calgary South that I did raise these issues as the member for the New Democratic Party with regard to our concern about the bill. The fact remains it was evident right from the very beginning that we were dealing with Bill C–39 and the proposals the government had put forward.

The frustration we had in committee as witnesses came forward was that we should have actually been dealing with the Canada Pension Act. I support the amendments the Liberals have put forward. But the fact remains, how are we going to enact them and get them put in there?

Anyone who has been involved in this committee knows that the procedure of dealing with the Canada Pension Act is to get the act before the committee so that we can deal with it in all the areas of concern we have. There are some very serious concerns in there. We are going to support these amendments. What should have been done is that the Canada Pension Act should have been brought forward and not Bill C–39 and some little segment of it. There are concerns with that bill and changes need to be made.

I take a great deal of exception to the remarks made to my House leader that we should have raised it in committee. I had frustration in that committee with regard to seeing witnesses come and present their concerns firsthand. Every one of us knew those concerns were there and knew the deficiencies there are in the act. Then the member for Calgary South states that we should have raised those issues in committee. I want to say with a great deal of respect that we identified those concerns. It was a matter of how we could deal with them.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, this is to the parliamentary secretary. I noticed in the amendments that the sources for these amendments basically came from fellow colleagues here in the House of Commons, our constituents, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, disabled groups and the National Council on Welfare.

I wonder if we are truly sincere about having these various stages of debate. It was only two weeks ago that we had the previous round on debating this bill. I do not think it is unreasonable during the period that we would hear from people who would make contributions or minor corrections to this very important piece of national legislation.

I say to the parliamentary secretary with respect that if we ignore these amendments or recommendations from people who have a pretty close experience with the issues related to this bill, what kind of credibility does that give us as national legislators? It is a bit of an insult and a waste of their time and their input.

Like my colleague from Cape Breton I would appeal to you to reflect because these amendments are good common sense amendments that will in no way, shape or form affect the physical framework of this nation. They will only make a national piece of legislation that much better for people in our society who right now need that little bit of extra care.

While I am on my feet I would like to appeal to the parliamentary secretary to discuss this with her colleagues.

We talk about all of these amendments in these bills so often and it occurred to me this morning that very few people in the country know when we make these good amendments to a good piece of legislation. You can bet your bottom dollar that the Press Gallery will not cover this. There are some amendments to the Canada Pension Plan, but no real detailed description that will go to every region of this country.

I would appeal to her to consider communicating these amendments to the act in a broad way, maybe through newspapers or some other forum where everyone in Canada can know that these constructive changes have been made.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I find myself in an interesting quandary today. I think the amendments as proposed are good. I have two situations in my own riding where women have been adversely affected by divorce proceedings where they have been the spouse of a man for a long period of time, the marriage has broken down and they have been left without protection under this particular act.

At the same time, there are a lot of other good things in this bill. I guess my concern this morning is that by moving these amendments and talking about consultation with provinces, what is going to be required and how long is it going to be before we can bring all these things about? If we do not accept these amendments today, when could they possibly be incorporated into the act? I feel they are good amendments. They improve the act and certainly protect Canadians. As we know, these are the ones who are least able to care for themselves as they grow older and that is an important part of the legislation.

I guess I would like the parliamentary secretary to inform me just what the procedure would be in the future. When can we revisit the bill if it is not passed at this time? What would the delay be in consultation with the provinces which appears to be necessary?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see two different people rising both of whom have already spoken on those motions. I am quite prepared to recognize both people, but I do need unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary may want to hear what the other person has and then she could answer. The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I would just like to re-echo the sentiment of my House leader, the member for Cape Breton. As a procedure, of course, it is our privilege that we present this motion at report stage.

Again, to echo the sentiment of the NDP at that legislative committee, it was a fact that we were given a timetable. It was almost humanly impossible to consider all these amendments and allow for reasonable and rational debate on the many amendments that we proposed.

What we indicated is a theme on the concerns indicating that we have given notice to this government that we would propose amendments at the report stage.

I would like to thank my colleague from Delta for his support of this amendment as well as other members who spoke earlier, including the parliamentary secretary. I have noted the quandary of my colleague from Delta. I was asking myself, before I stood, why the quandary? Perhaps it is because he belongs to the government side. If that were so, I think today I should congratulate him for the courage to indicate in a very non-partisan fashion a commitment to an amendment that in fact is votable as has been proposed. Truly, I must not claim the full credit. I only allowed the process to bring the thought of the National Council of Welfare to this Chamber.

On that note, I would really beseech the parliamentary secretary to reconsider and ask her government to support this motion.

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, I do share these concerns with respect to divorces and splitting of benefits. I want to thank my colleague from Delta for expressing his concerns. This, of course, is not the first time the hon. member has brought forth the concerns of his constituents. Indeed, this is something that will be put on the agenda at the next minister's meeting with his counterparts in the provinces.

However, what we are talking about here today is the division of powers, the powers between the provinces and the federal government. I guess we are already on notice of appeals and if we have to face reality, a lot of this has to do with provincial authority as well.

I will take the member's concerns and, indeed, these amendments that he has put forward, as well as those of the member for Broadview—Greenwood about communicating the criteria to the public right across Canada on the system and the amendments that are made to the Canada Pension Plan.

The problem as the member for Delta knows is that we have a bill before us today that is going to increase the benefits to dependent youngsters of disabled and deceased contributors and that, of course, we want to go through and be applicable January 1, 1992.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare met with his counterparts some months ago and came to an agreement in principle. Therefore, we have this agreement in principle on the amendments. They are in Bill C-39 at the present time.

Therefore, I can certainly give you, Madam Speaker, and my colleagues my guarantee and promise that I will take these concerns forward to ensure that the minister in his discussions next year with the provinces brings forth the credit splitting and the benefits with regard to marriages, be they common law and/or traditional that break up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 4A. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen;

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The question is on Motion 7A. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We will now move on to Motions Nos. 5A, 9A, 13A and 14A. They will be grouped for debate. I will remind hon. members that a vote on Motion No. 5A will apply to Motions Nos. 9A, 13A, and 14A, that Motion No. 8 will be voted upon separately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House is giving consent for the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, there is a—Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Crosby: No, I'm just giving my consent.

Mr. Dingwall: Oh. I want to thank the hon. member for his great gesture of generosity on a Thursday, November 28.

Madam Speaker, my colleague from Dartmouth, one of the more distinguished and hard-working members of Parliament and of this House will fully appreciate what I am going to say with regard to these amendments. I hope the parliamentary secretary likewise will appreciate the fact that the department for which she is responsible in this House probably has some of the finest public servants in this country.

I want to make special reference, if I may, to those individuals who administer the Canada Pension Plan, who administer the Canada Pension disability applications which come forward, and to all those individuals who have been involved with family allowance and the Old Age Security.

I have had the pleasure over the years to meet, to discuss, to interface, to write, and to seek their assistance on behalf of constituents.

They can only do so much. They cannot pull rabbits out of a hat, although sometimes members of Parliament I would think would want them to do so. They are not able to expedite decisions because of the law.

I am not presupposing that the parliamentary secretary would say no to the amendment which is being put forward. I am hoping the parliamentary secretary will concur with the substance of the amendment, which is to expedite and to facilitate the process both for the claimant as well as for the public servants who have to administer those claims.

It is utterly shameful, and I say this with great sincerity to the parliamentary secretary, for a claimant to have to wait for an inordinate amount of time before an adjudication is reached by the department.

I am not saying, as I indicated at the outset, that this is the fault of some public servant who is not doing his or her job. I have a great respect for and I admire them. They have a tremendous workload. They have a phenomenal work ethic, but they need the assistance of this Chamber in order to direct a sufficient amount of resources which are necessary. Obviously that will be part and parcel of the bill in any event because the premiums have gone up and it is going to require some additional administration expenditures. There is no question about that.

But 30 days is a long time in a woman's life when she makes application for a benefit and the Government of Canada, some would say through wanton neglect, is not responding to that claim. The law is wrong. We should change the law.

I have hundreds and hundreds of constituents who have made application for Canada pension disability under the Canada pension fund. They have to wait not days, not a week, but they have had to wait months. Life does not stop. They still have to put groceries on the table. They still have to feed their children. They still have to clothe them. They still have to pay energy costs and transportation costs for their children.

The law is wrong. It does not give a clear directive to officials, able officials I might add in the Department of National Health and Welfare, to see to it that these benefits which if they are approved are done so quickly and expeditiously. If they are not approved the decision should be made as well and given to the claimant expeditiously.

I have constituents who come to my office who have waited for months and months and months. I have colleagues in this House who are aptly aware that some have had to put off expenditures for their children going back to school in September. Some have been denied that bit of extra income for the purchase of Christmas gifts.

I know hon. members opposite will say: "Oh, he is being melodramatic again". I am not. That is a reality. That is a fact.

If a woman has two kids, one in university and one in high school, they eat like horses. She has to dress them. She has to feed them. She has to provide them with some entertainment, unless we believe in the catholicism of some members in this House that somehow if she is on welfare or on a fixed income, those children, that woman or that man are not supposed to have a television. They are not supposed to have any entertainment. They are not supposed to have a social life. They are not supposed to have the necessities of life. The law is wrong. This amendment, I suggest to the parliamentary secretary, will not cause any undue burden to the Crown. It will expedite decisions of the Department of Health and Welfare. It will assist those able men and women within the Department of Health and Welfare to expedite those decisions on those various claimants. That is what the amendment is intended to do in Motion 5A, as is referred to in the other amendments I have drawn to the attention of this House.

I say to the parliamentary secretary that in the sense of urgency and in the sense of fairness 30 days in the life of a woman, a man or a child to receive a benefit from the Government of Canada is a long time. But, 90 days, six months of twelve months is beyond comprehension or reason.

We are not standing up for the president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank. I am not standing here pleading for somebody like the president of Alcan. I am not pleading to the parliamentary secretary for the fat cat labour leaders or the fat cat politicians. I am talking about average individual Canadians who have legitimate claims. In all goodness and fairness and with good intentions, I ask the parliamentary secretary to reflect on the reality in Canadian society today.

The men and women in the Department of Health and Welfare, as I said at the outset and as I am sure my colleague from Dartmouth would want to say, are first-class people. I tell my constituents all the time that in the office in my constituency in Sydney and Glace Bay there are superb people but the law is wrong. We have to change the law. If we do not change the law those people will continue to hurt.

Do you know what it is like to see a woman sitting in your office and crying because she cannot get a decision on the benefits to which she believes she is entitled? Do you know what it is like for a man to come to your constituency office and say: "I have four kids. I cannot get a decision?" That is pretty humiliating.

I am not asking the Government of Canada to write us a blank cheque. I am not asking for $250 million as it is allegedly going to give in Montreal for economic development. I am not asking for $800 million as we are giving to the farmers. They need more and rightly so. I am not asking for a blank cheque. I am asking the parliamentary secretary and the government opposite for a little bit of fairness and a whole lot of social justice.

Madam Speaker, you have been kind in this debate. You have allowed me to participate and to say the things I fervently believe. I conclude with these remarks. If we fail in giving those individuals some sense of decency and dignity, I have to ask myself: What are we doing in this Chamber? This Chamber is a great institution. A positive decision will give some confidence, some credibility to the Chamber and to the members in the Chamber, but a negative decision may lose my amendment. My colleague will have lost the amendment too.

The people who will lose are those Canadians who have very few people standing up for them anywhere in this country. Through you, Madam Speaker, I ask an hon. friend, a respectful and distinguished colleague in this House, to give careful, prudent and kind consideration to this amendment.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I would like to join in the debate on this amendment.

I do not know what kinds of games the Liberal Party is trying to play in this House today. If the House leader of the Liberal Party had been to the committee—we had a member who represented the Liberal Party in the committee—he would know that the chief actuary came to the committee and explained the procedures very carefully.

I want to refer to the actuary's report that was presented to the House prior to the committee sitting. There are some rules that must be followed. The reality is that we have to abide by those rules. A chief actuary is appointed and I want to quote from his document that was presented because he had to present to the House. I had to question him with regard to that.

Ten minutes before we sat down in committee the actuary's report as to how we are supposed to deal with these things was being presented to the House. Very briefly, and this is from the chief actuary who does the studies when amendments are made, "in accordance with a request from the Minister of Finance the chief actuary shall, whenever any bill is introduced in or presented to the House to amend this act in a manner that would in the opinion of the chief actuary materially affect any of the estimates contained in the most recent report under this section made by the chief actuary, prepare, using the same actuarial assumptions and bases as were used in that report, a report setting forth the extent to which such bill would, if enacted by Parliament, materially affect any of the estimates contained in that report".

It is quite obvious. We are dealing with Bill C-39 that was going to affect the estimates of the Canada pension bill. The actuary, according to law, is supposed to find out what kind of costs are going to be involved in these kinds of changes. There is were the dilemma was in the bill, the bill that was presented to us.

I do not want to leave the impression like the Liberals are trying to leave that we can amend this bill and bring forward these amendments. Yes, we have some serious problems with the Canada Pension Act. We all know that. However, amendments are being brought forward and people are being given hope that we are going to amend this bill and change it, when we know in this House that two-thirds of the provinces will have to agree to it. The Canada Pension Act is not going to come before the House until 1994. Here is the last one that was done. I blame both the Liberals and the Conservatives for not dealing with these problems when they were in power. The Conservatives are in power and we should not be dealing with amendments to Bill C-39. We should be dealing with amendments to the Canada Pension Act.

The concerns and amendments that have been put forward are nothing but a farce because they are not going anywhere. They cannot be implemented. How are they going to be implemented? The chief actuary and the provinces are involved. The Canada Pension Act is what we need before this House, not Bill C-39.

We are going to support the amendments, but I do not want to leave the impression with the people of Canada that we are making any changes, because we are not making any changes.

We are not making any changes until such time as we can come forward and the governments have the will to bring forward the Canada Pension Plan. It is much outdated. We have been told by the actuary that the private sector is way ahead of the government, the public sector. The private sector has better programs in place than the Canada Pension Plan. Shame. The Government of Canada and the people of Canada should be leading the private sector. We have been told by the actuaries that that is not happening.

With a great deal of respect I say to the Liberal Party that it has placed these amendments knowing full well that there are procedures which have to be followed here, knowing full well that there is no way that they are going to be implemented. We are going to support them or we are going to put them there, but my party and I do not want to leave the impression out there that we have made any significant changes here today. We have not.

I supported the member for Don Valley East and supported his motion, an excellent motion, and got the consent of all of the House. The reality is that it passed, it went through all of those readings. What is going to happen to that bill? It was passed unanimously in this House of Commons and stated that if people qualify they would be able to get their compensation regardless of the period of time.

It was passed. What is the procedure of that bill? I will tell you what the procedure is, as I understand it. It was passed unanimously by the House of Commons. The minister will take that to the provinces. He will discuss it with the provinces and if two-thirds of the provinces agree and accept it, then it will sit for another two years in limbo until such time as the Canada Pension Act is opened up. Then it will be implemented into the Canada Pension Plan and then it will become law.

Regarding your amendments, although they are all very good amendments and there are many more that I could also present, the fact of the matter is that until we open up the Canada Pension Act and we get into that act and make those changes we are not going to have any meaningful changes.

I will get into the bill itself a little bit later. The fact remains with regard to the $35 that we are talking about for disabled orphans, everyone wants to make sure that we pass this bill and get it through, and the reality is that we are going to pass it, it is going to become a part of the government's agenda, it is going to meet with the provinces, and if it is agreed upon and I am sure the provinces will agree because they are—

An hon. member: What is the problem?

Mr. Parker: The problem is that the provinces if they wished could deduct dollar for dollar. If you get a $35 increase and the provinces decide that minimum is coming there, they could deduct dollar for dollar and therefore in some cases the increase will be nil. That is the problem.

We have to do something. I am suggesting that we call upon the government. Let us sit down in a meaningful way with the Government of Canada and the provinces and address the real problem, the Canada Pension Act. 1966 was when this act was invoked and it is time for this government, and it was time for your government when you were in power, to do the right thing and to redo the act.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I cannot help but rise because the hon. member from the NDP indicated and referred to the actuarial report. I think he has to give credit to whom credit is due. I do not like to claim credit personally but certainly it is on record that it was I, as the Official Opposition critic for National Health and Welfare, who recommended to the legislative committee examining this bill that we invite an actuarial expert to speak on the actuarial report.

Following that submission, the government tabled that report in the House a few hours ago so that the same report can be discussed at the legislative committee. I am glad that my hon. colleague brought this to the attention of the House. It was the initiative of the Liberal Party that brought to light that report at the legislative committee.

In terms of the procedure that we should wait because the report sort of provides a barrier preventing us hearing from the NDP, I do not think so. The Chair has ruled that this motion is in order and therefore within the purview of Parliament to pass it if it wills it.

Let us not sort of blame someone. Actually, I am at a loss as to why the NDP would blame the Liberal Party and at the same time admit that amendment we have proposed is an excellent one. That is paradoxical. No average Canadian citizen will see the reason for that kind of debate. Either it is good or it is not good. If it is excellent as he has indicated it is, then it must be supported. He has indicated he will support it. Why then blame someone who has proposed a motion that is excellent?

In all modesty, the Liberal Party, the Liberal caucus, has taken the lead on pension reform. The Liberal Party is about genuine reform.

In terms of the comment of the hon. member that he would support the bill, I would certainly thank him as well and I would like the parliamentary secretary to equally support this amendment on behalf of government.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to react to the New Democratic Party member's comments earlier.

Like my colleague from Winnipeg, I wondered why the member would say these are great amendments and then call the action a farce at the same time. It seems to me that this is the highest court in the land for pension reform in this country. If I understand the process correctly, and if we have almost unanimous consent for most of these amendments, it would seem rather strange to me that all of those provinces would ignore all of these recommendations. It is up to us to take the initiative here.

The member for Don Valley East who this week put forward a fabulous motion which we all agreed to and all supported, every member in the House, is certainly not worried today whether the province of Ontario is going to say no to that amendment because I could not imagine the province of Ontario, on such a fundamental issue, going against the unanimous consent of this House.

I know we tend to be a little intimidated by the provinces in this House because we have given them so much power in the last seven or eight years, but I think we have to start realizing that this is the national chamber for Canada. I think it is time, when we all get together on some fundamental issues and we all agree on them, we then say to the provinces: "Listen, we have got the political will here and we want you all to follow suit".

That is where I come from on the relationship with the provinces, especially when we all seem to be in accord.

I want to go back to my colleague from Cape Breton Island's remarks earlier. He is so right on the money. I have heard in the last three months of a case in which a man has been waiting for almost three years to get his disability pension processed.

• (1130)

I went to his home and visited him. The man has some 37 different breaks in his body. He is on two canes. He is obviously disabled and it seems to me that there has to be a situation created in this bill in which timeliness is really respected.

One of the greatest problems we have in this town is what I call the "mad " treatment, which we get so often from public officials. "Mad" for me means maximum administrative delay.

I must tell you that in an issue like this in which families are depending on that cheque for their groceries, never mind their Christmas presents, and to keep their heat on or to keep their rent going, it is very tough to understand why public officials give these disabled applications what I call the "mad" treatment, maximum administrative delay.

Somehow, as we are crafting this legislation, this amendment has to be worked into the bill so that public servants who administer this law understand that while they may be pushing paper there is deep pain at the other end.

My colleague from Cape Breton said this so well earlier. I would not call it dramatic when he is talking about fact, when he is talking about the numerous cases in which the paper just sits and sits and sits. It is one month then two, and then it is one year, then three. Somehow we have to get the system moving more quickly.

I would urge the parliamentary secretary to please consider this amendment seriously.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to add my words of support to the amendment that was introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, and to which he so eloquently spoke a few minutes ago.

My colleague is right and he was not over-dramatizing the suffering that occurs with people who are disabled and who are waiting and waiting for some answer from the government concerning whether they are going to get their disability benefits.

Let us look at it from the point of view of so many people who come to my constituency office, to his constituency office and to the constituency offices of virtually every member in this House to find out what is happening with their claims, with their applications, for disability benefits.

Many people who are disabled do not come unless they sincerely believe that they are disabled because for them, very often, it is a real source of shame to have to admit that they are disabled and that they have to go for help.

These people have all kinds of time to think about their condition and to wait for the answer. The torture of their condition is augmented each day they wait and do not hear an answer. They have to go and find out by calling their local MP or by making the long trip to a Canada pension office to find out what is happening with their claim or their appeal.

For people in rural areas that is a long trip. That is a great deal of inconvenience for them.

This causes great suffering and great stress in addition to the stress that the disability—or the knowledge that one is potentially not quite disabled enough to satisfy the law—has on the problems that these people face.

My colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond is not exaggerating. The suffering caused by these delays is real. The human costs are incalculable. It behoves a government concerned about its people and those who are least able to take care of themselves to be concerned with providing service. It behoves the government concerned with that to do all it can to ensure that these delays are minimized to the maximum extent possible.

I think that this amendment is a very useful way of disciplining the government and disciplining the bureaucracy which does its best. They are dedicated civil servants who work hard and who have the concerns of those people that come before them in the form of an application or an appeal. They have those concerns at heart.

They have piles of other work to do. If there is no discipline such as that which a deadline always imposes, it is very easy for these delays to perpetuate. It is a natural part of the bureaucratic process that if it is not the most important thing on your agenda that particular day then it will wait. The person at the other end of the file, the claimant, the unwed mother, or the senior citizen, or the disabled person who is home waiting to hear from the government is there without an answer.

I think the discipline which Motion No. 5A provides to the government and to the bureaucracy is very healthy. It also signals a priority. It tells the people of Canada that this government is concerned and has their welfare first and foremost in the administration of the services that it provides. The most crucial service is a basic source of income for people who are in one way or another unable to work or provide that income for themselves.

I would hope that the government would support this amendment and would impose this discipline on itself. I would ask the government and all the members opposite to consider if there is any doubt about whether or not it will support these amendments. It should ask itself what is the signal that it will send to Canadians if it refuses to impose this very modest discipline of a 30-day turnaround on itself.

What the signal will be is that there are other priorities more important than providing prompt and efficient service to those Canadians who need that service. When they come forward with a claim for disability benefits or pension benefits of that kind that ought to be the government's first and foremost priority. If the government does not accept this amendment I would suggest that the signal that the government is sending to millions of Canadians who are in this situation every day is that something else is more important than their welfare. I think that would be a tragic signal for any government to send to its citizens.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I want to first off say that I commend our House leader, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. We go back a long way. His interest in Canada pension and the process is well founded.

Back in 1980 he was just a rookie and I was just a pup. I actually worked in his office. I can tell this House the reason that this amendment is being brought forward. The coal fields of Cape Breton are a dangerous place to work. There are a lot of individuals who see their useful working lives shortened because of the extreme difficulties that they find themselves in because of the health problems that came from working bent over two miles underneath the ocean when old No. 26 was together and still operating.

Those individuals came from working class backgrounds. They did not have money in the bank. They did not have rich relatives that could come and look after them if they became disabled. They did not have wealthy annuities that they had put aside for dark days or for rainy days. They were plain, simple, hard-working individuals.

I do not think I was in the office of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond longer than a day back in 1980 when the first case came in and that first case dealt with Canada Pension Plan disability. I did not know very much about the system then but did I ever learn quickly. There were a lot of individuals there who had paid into the Canada Pension Plan and unfortunately had to avail themselves of those particular provisions for disability payments.

It is very easy for all of us to be smug up here in our ivory towers in Ottawa while we debate other issues that are equally important. It depends on who is speaking to the issue. As for these types of amendments—particularly the amendment that has been proposed by the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—it is fine for us to say: "The government didn't think of it so we are not going to really do it right now". Besides it does not really affect a lot of people.

I am going to tell you, Madam Speaker, it affects an awful lot of people. You should see an individual that has been stripped of dignity, who has to sit in front of a member of Parliament or assistant to a member of Parliament, or any official and literally beg: "Please, can you make the one phone call and see what is happening here. I have no food for my children. I have nowhere to live. I cannot pay my modest mortgage payments anymore. Please, please see what you can do".

It is fine for us to sit here. The way that this place works is a little sickening at times. We have tried our very best. It is a little sickening at times because sometimes we get a little too partisan in here. Sometimes members of the opposition such as our House leader put forward amendments which are reasoned, appropriate, practical and which fix problems with bills and makes better legislation. Then government members opposite sit there and say: "It may be a good idea and I know it will benefit my constituents and I know it is not going to have an undue draw on the treasury of the country, and I know it will make a better bill but I cannot support it because it did not come from my side of the House".

We have talked a lot in the last little while about decorum in this place and we have talked a lot about what it is that we do here and why we do not have the respect of Canadians. It is because what we do here is not always in the best interests of Canadians.

What this amendment seeks to do in a very small way in that respect is to change the opinion that Canadians have of what we do here. It sees a flaw and it sees an easy way to fix it by amending this particular piece of legislation that is before us.

Every member here has had the same experience as I have had as a member of Parliament or as an assistant to a member of Parliament. Every one of us here has seen those people who are down on their luck who come into our offices and strip themselves of their dignity and cry at our desk because they do not have money. They are eligible for a program but because the bureaucracy is not allowed to move as quickly as it could and wants to, you have to tell them they have to wait another 45 days before anything can be processed on their application. You tell them they have to go and stand in that ever-increasing line-up at the welfare office. What is happening in welfare offices in places like Dartmouth and Glace Bay and Toronto and Montreal is that the municipalities do not have the money any more. Two million people have been forced on to municipal welfare in this country.

First the individual feels bad because they cannot contribute because they are ill or because they cannot work. They do not feel they can contribute. They make an application for a benefit they deserve, that they paid into and that most likely they will qualify for. In the interim they might as well be on Mars. They become a part of that faceless, hopeless group of Canadians who are pushed away from the table when they fall on hard times.

The amendment that is put forward here will seek a redress and relatively quickly. It will demand that the application process be speeded up. It will allow those individuals to maintain their dignity, those who find themselves for whatever reason unable to pursue gainful occupation and making an application to Canada pension.

I look across at the parliamentary secretary over there and I know she is listening and I am sure she has the same concerns. We all deal with people. We are here to work for the people. We are here to ensure that we have legislation that is responsive to the needs of the people. There are people out there who face a bleak winter. There are people out there who face bleak springs, summers and falls.

This amendment is a minor thing. It is not going to break the bank. This minor amendment would significantly shorten the period of response and would allow those individuals who need the help the most to be processed in an expeditious manner. The decision can be handed down and they can get on with their lives.

I hope this amendment is not dismissed out of hand. I hope everybody out there watching understands what we are talking about. We are talking about instilling a little bit of fairness into a piece of legislation. This is not a partisan thing. Fairness should know no political boundaries in this House.

What the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has simply sought to do is to instil a little bit of sanity into how we do our business. He has pointed out an obvious problem with the Canada pension legislation. He has put forward a very doable situation. This is a fundamental issue of human dignity which we are addressing with this amendment. As we vote on this later I hope when we look around this House that we will see our responsibilities to our own constituents and to every Canadian, most particularly those Canadians who need this legislation. I hope we will not fall into our old partisan jackets, suits and dresses and defeat this amendment which will improve this bill and make us all feel that we have served our constituents a little better.

First, I really want to commend by colleague from Kootenay East with regard to his contributions at the committee level. Madam Speaker, what you said a few minutes ago about voting these four or five amendments as a group was an explanation of the procedure. There are a lot of us who do have common concerns and would like to see the changes. In order to have those go through the system it does take time.

I share your concerns that we give hopes and prayers for people out there when the system takes longer than we all want it to take.

The hon. House leader for the Official Opposition made some very kind comments about the public servants in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I will certainly see that those remarks are forwarded.

We have all been talking abut the time it takes for decisions to come out of Health and Welfare on CPP. It is an extremely important issue.

While it is a very important issue it works both ways. If there is a decision that should be made very quickly, perhaps fairness and in-depth consideration have not been given. If indeed it takes too long then we do have people suffering, as many of my colleagues have mentioned today.

The one thing we have to remember is that the people opposite who have been speaking assume that a 30-day decision on disability cases will come out in favour of the client or the applicant. Indeed what I want—and I think most of us want it—to see is that we do everything possible through the administration to prevent any unfairness, any lack of qualifications. We seek the greatest possible way to make sure that the maximum benefit is applicable to the person applying.

While I am concerned about these amendments today I cannot support them. However, I will certainly give the House my word that we will do everything possible to speed up the decisions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 5A and this vote will apply to Motions Nos. 9A, 13A and 14A. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

After the ringing of the bells:

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, there was an amendment, Motion No. 8, which was standing in my name. Unfortunately, I was in the transport committee and did not get here in time to speak to it.

I am wondering if I could have unanimous consent of the House to permit Motion No. 8 to be voted on. I believe it was part of a package of motions which had been found to be in order and would have the effect of opening up the rules somewhat for disabled Canadians who would receive a disability pension but for the passage of time, because of their failure to apply in time. It would open things up somewhat for them.

I would appreciate the indulgence of the House if that amendment might be included in the package to be voted on.

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, I recognize my colleague for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia was not in the House this morning. He made a full presentation to the legislative committee and this information will go on to the minister.

I am sorry, at this time we cannot accept his request.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have listened to the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia. It is a fact that his Motion, No. 8 was to be debated and voted upon separately. Unfortunately the hon. member was not in the House and the motion was not put to the House. The hon. parliamentary secretary has refused unanimous consent for this motion to be put to the House.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Some hon. members: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 4A.

The House divided on Motion No. 4A (Mr. Dingwall) which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

I therefore declare Motions Nos. 9A, 13A and 14A lost.

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I believe that you will find consent for the House to call it one o'clock and that we would then pick up third reading of this bill immediately following Question Period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion as presented by the parliamentary secretary. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 12.40 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

MEMBERS' EXPENSES

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, last week, acting on behalf of the Board of Internal Economy, you tabled the report of the Auditor General on the audit of the House of Commons administration.

On the whole, the report is quite positive about the administration of the House. However, the Auditor General had several comments on members' expenses. For instance, an allowance of 64 travel points is not much of an incentive for restraint. Telecommunications are another major area where there is very little incentive to cut down.

Every year the House publishes in the Public Accounts a statement of the indemnities, allowances and travel expenses of members of the House of Commons, but this represents only 37 per cent of members' expenditures. According to the report, there should be greater public disclosure of members' expenditures.

Today I am the only member in the country to disclose my privileged and budgetary spending. My constituents are very proud of my decision, and there is no reason why hon. members should not opt for voluntary disclosure.

TAXATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue says that there are $8 billion in unpaid taxes. If he is so sure, why has he been so negligent in their collection? After seven years of tolerating this delinquency he will now leave no stone unturned to get what is owing.

What has he been doing all of this time? Why is he establishing a target of only $160 million for collection? Perhaps he is not giving the real picture.

Last year the government was able to make good its claim on only 47 per cent of taxes under appeal. Delinquency was not a factor in those claims. Thirty-eight per cent of all claims adjudicated went completely against the department.

What the minister really wants is money up front for claims in dispute, knowing full well that most of that money will have to be returned to the taxpayer.

Let him instead go after the non-filers and freeloaders his negligence has created. While he is at it he should also make his department more responsive to small manufacturing retailers like St. Germain Framing that has been waiting for six months for a GST rebate application on its inventory. In its case the department's sluggishness is causing a double taxation and a restriction of cash flow.

Perhaps the minister should stop talking and start doing.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton there has been a great deal of interest generated over the federal government's constitutional proposals: Shaping Canada's Future Together.

For example, I have expressed my support for a constituent assembly spearheaded by local constituents and involving participation from various segments of our community.

All members of the House will be pleased to know that the Sarnia—Lambton constituent assembly is now up and running and will be holding a number of group discussions in ensuing weeks. As well it will be holding information booth sessions in the malls throughout our area. It will give citizens in Sarnia—Lambton a chance to offer suggestions and solutions to our constitutional challenges.

I plan on making the constituent assembly's report known to the constitutional committee and hopefully to all of Parliament. I feel it is incumbent upon all members of Parliament to encourage this kind of group discussion in their ridings.

This is an opportunity for Canadians to participate. This opportunity must be promoted and supported by all members of Parliament.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, in line with my colleague who just spoke, last week I had not only the privilege but the duty of hosting several constitutional forums in my riding of Nipissing.

The forums were held to solicit the opinions of my constituents on a wide range of constitutional issues and to seek possible solutions to the difficulties confronting our country.

There were several points that emerged from these hearings. Canadians are very patriotic and optimistic people who believe that we can solve our problems together. They want a united country with a strong, federal presence and they are growing increasingly cynical of political machinery that spends millions of dollars travelling the country only to intimidate the people we most need to hear from, the average citizen.

In organizing and hosting these forums my role was to facilitate dialogue in a cost effective way. I was not there to argue or debate the views of my constituents. I was there to listen. For our system of democracy to function as effectively as it can we must know the wishes of the people we represent before we can speak on their behalf.

It is up to us as politicians to restore the confidence of Canadians in our institutions and to do this, we must make representative democracy what it was truly meant to be. At this crucial juncture in our history I would encourage all parliamentarians to do one thing, and that is listen to the people.

CANADA POST

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have recently received several letters of concern regarding the closure of rural post offices. Many of my constituents are worried about the fate of local postmasters and the future accessibility of postal services. They are also concerned about the future identify of their communities.

Rural post offices have added a great deal to the life and growth of rural communities in Canada. They have often become the hub or the focal point of small towns.

I ask that the government carefully consider the unique realities of rural communities in Canada before utilizing the rural conversion program and closing the traditional post offices.

WOLVERINE COPPER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, another Canadian branch plant bites the dust.

Wolverine Copper, western Canada's only tubing manufacturer, has thumbed its nose at the Canadian government, shut down and shipped out to greener pastures. Despite repeated appeals from the workers, this government sat on its hands and allowed 175 British Columbian jobs to go down the tube.

The Alabama based company will now service the western Canadian market from its U.S. operations. It is tragic that this government refused to use its legislative powers to force the sale of the B.C. plant. It refused to assist in a financial restructuring to help preserve B.C. jobs.

But when unemployment goes up in Quebec, this same government coughs up a much needed $160 million financial aid package. While B.C. workers and prairie farmers go home empty handed Quebec's needs are met. Is this fair? It is no wonder western Canadians have become so cynical toward this government.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval–Ouest): Mr. Speaker, on the weekend, in its search for new ideas, the Liberal Party of Canada met in Aylmer to listen to what Canadians had to say about economic recovery. A number of clear messages came out of this meeting and were well received by the federal leader, who wants to make them part of his election platform; education, economic development, competitiveness, reducing the deficit, reform of political institutions, consistent policies, and so forth.

It is too bad it took the Liberals seven years to recognize the fact that the Progressive Conservative Party's policies are sound. Hon. members will recall that as soon as he came to power in 1984, the Prime Minister announced those same policies, for the greater benefit of Canadians. At the time, his ideas were not revolutionary but realistic, reflecting his great vision. The Liberals finally got the message. There are still a few dissidents, but I hope their leader will be able to convert them.

FIGURE SKATING

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, for the third time since the first championships in 1976, Canada is hosting the World Junior Figure Skating Championships. This week, 118 of the world's best young skaters from 26 different countries, including our own Canadian champions, Netty Kim and Jeffrey Langdon, will compete at the Robert Guertin arena in Hull, Quebec.

• (1410)

[English]

Last night Caroline Haddad and Jean–Sebastien Fecteau of Montreal captured the silver medal in the pairs free skating program. This was the first time since 1981 that a Canadian duo won a world junior medal in the pairs competition.

[Translation]

The Canadian Figure Skating Association, with the support of 300 volunteers from the national capital area, has been working very hard to make the latest championships a success.

I am sure hon. members will join me in thanking the organizers and sponsors of this event, and wish our young Canadian skaters good luck and extend a cordial welcome to all participants.

CROSS-CANADA REFERENDUM

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the government has decided not to hold a referendum. This decision is part of the constitutional debate saga. This retreat can be explained by the almost unanimous opposition from Quebec to such an initiative. However, vigilance is still in order because this government is not known for keeping its word.

Some Conservative members, including a woman minister, and the only NDP member from Quebec understood that Quebecers would never allow the future of Quebec to be decided anywhere but in Quebec.

Among the Liberals, only John Turner opposed this plan. It is not surprising that Jean Chrétien ranks behind Robert Libman in terms of the confidence he inspires in Quebecers.

Bloc Québécois members will always defend Quebec's right to self-determination, thus echoing the opposition of the Quebec National Assembly, which recognizes that Quebecers alone have the right to decide Quebec's future.

If this government wants to consult Quebecers and Canadians, let it call an election. Quebecers will then be able to choose real representatives rather than flip-flop artists like Chrétien and Mulroney.

CANADIAN FOUNDATION FOR ILEITIS AND COLITIS

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I want to inform the House that November is officially Ileitis and Colitis Month. More than 200,000 Canadians suffer from this condition which affects the intestinal tract.

I would like to take this opportunity to emphasize the important work being done by the Canadian Foundation for Ileitis and Colitis and thank them for their dedication.

The foundation is a non-profit organization, committed to medical research and to educating patients, health professionals and the public in general. The foundation has over 9,000 members spread over a number of chapters across the country.

Health and Welfare Canada is pleased to be able to contribute to the goals of the foundation through its operating grants program for volunteer organizations. The funds received by the foundation are used to develop and improve a host of public awareness and education programs organized by local chapters.

The executive, support staff and the many volunteers of the foundation are to be commended for their excellent work and dedication.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, l'Association des parents francophones, l'Association canadienne d'éducation de langue française, la Fédération des enseignants et enseignantes du Canada, la Fédération des jeunes Canadiens français, and la Fédération nationale des commissaires scolaires de langue française have just sent a telegram to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, asking the minister to accede to their request for a constitutional committee or conference on the future of official language communities.

At this critical moment in our history, it is high time the federal government took concrete action to recognize the importance of Canada's linguistic duality and acceded to this entirely legitimate request as soon as possible.

DARYL BEAN

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is reported that Daryl Bean wrote to three ladies, members of PSAC, calling them scabs. Then he went on to say: "After God had finished the rattlesnake, the toad and the vampire, he had some awful stuff left with which he made a scab. A scab is a two-legged animal with a corkscrew soul, a water-logged brain, and a backbone of jelly and glue. Where others have hearts, he carries a tumour of rotten principles. No man has a right to scab as long as there is a pool of water to drown his carcass in or a rope long enough to hang his body with".

When it suits them members of the New Democrat Party take a stand on issues affecting women. What stand do New Democrats take on their vice-president's letter?

FUR INDUSTRY

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today to inform the House and all Canadians that November is fur month.

The fur industry is pivotal to both the aboriginal and northern economy and in preserving a traditional way of life.

Of the 105,000 Canadians employed in the fur industry, over 70,000 are aboriginal. The hunters and trappers of Canada continue to practise true sustainable development in keeping with the intrinsic belief that we are an intricate part of our ecosystem.

Thanks to humane trapping, research and careful management, fur bearing animals are as plentiful in Canada as they have ever been. Considering the importance of the fur trade in the history and future of Canada, it is critical that all members support this environmentally friendly industry.

I call upon all Canadians to recognize the importance to both the economy and lifestyle of the north and support our fur industry. Practise conservation and wear fur.

DARYL BEAN

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want to know where the members of the NDP stand. Do they stand for the intimidation of union members by union leaders? Do they believe that workers should be threatened by their union leaders? Do they believe that workers should be threatened by their union leaders if they want to go to work? Do they believe in freedom of speech and action within labour unions? Do they believe in the degradation of grandmothers by union leaders? Do they believe that union leaders should keep their word once they have entered into an agreement?

These are the actions of the vice-president of the New Democratic Party of Canada, Mr. Daryl Bean, as he tries to justify the senseless strike he inflicted upon his members to their financial loss and on the Canadian public to their inconvenience.

I call upon the leader of the NDP to say where her party stands and to repudiate the actions of Mr. Bean.

CULTURE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, given this government's track record in negotiating trade deals, it is not surprising that most Canadians express concern for their culture.

While we watch Canadian cultural property losing ground at the negotiating table, it is being given away under another table. That table is called the Cultural Property Export and Import Act. It exists to preserve in Canada significant examples of our nation's heritage and movable cultural property, a praiseworthy principle.

However, upon investigation one finds that over 95 per cent of all applications to remove distinctly Canadian works of art are approved. That means 95 per cent of these works of art leave Canada.

One example, Algonquin October, a painting by Tom Thomson, probably hangs in an American living room. The art gallery of Algoma lost this valuable piece under the guidelines of this act.

Thousands of Canadians have lost the opportunity of enjoying a truly Canadian work of art.

A new bill, C-18, clearly requires dramatic changes if Canadians are to experience and preserve the fruits of their own rich culture.

DARYL BEAN

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the vice-president of the New Democratic Party, Daryl Bean, who happens to be president of PSAC union had some news for female federal government workers who served the nation during the recent PSAC strike. He would rather drown you or hang you than allow you to go to work. He said so on his own letterhead to three individual government workers.

Advocating violence against women is unbecoming of all Canadians. It is a shameful and a despicable act of cowardice. Intimidation of this nature belongs in the gutter with the filth and the mire.

Had the vice-president of the Liberal or Progressive Conservative parties made such remarks their resignation would have been demanded by party members and leaders alike.

How dare any NDP member of Parliament ask any question in this House on women's issues as long as Mr. Bean co-leads their party. The New Democratic members opposite must demand Mr. Bean resign.

CANADA POST

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak of the impending closure of Postal Station A in Saanich, British Columbia.

Economically this station is completely viable. There is a two-year waiting list for postal boxes and revenues are up by 17 per cent this year, despite having over eight contracted out private operations within a three kilometre radius. Customers have experimented with going to private retail outlets, but have returned to Station A because of the superior knowledge of the unionized staff.

Clearly individuals and small businesses in my riding prefer to deal with a real post office.

In Saanich, the effectiveness of a postal station versus privately run outlets has been proven. Canada Post is now proposing to close this revenue generating post office, possibly the most successful in greater Victoria.

I have a suggestion for Canada Post, as well as this government. Rather than fly top executives across the country for the Grey Cup, or lease executive boxes in the SkyDome, take a good hard look at providing top quality service to the customer, the taxpaying citizens of my riding.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. This week in Montreal, at a meeting with the Conseil du patronat the minister announced that the government was willing to amend its proposals on the economic union. I think everyone agrees it would be useful to revise section 21 of the Constitution, to try and establish a real common market in this country. However, the government is certainly not taking the right approach.

Which of its three proposals—14, 15 or 16—does it intend to change? And does the government intend to inform the House of Commons or the senators and members of the House of Commons sitting on the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which is considering the constitutional proposals? I want to make quite clear to the minister that we do not intend to waste our time considering proposals the government has already rejected.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the hon. member's information is once again not quite correct. After a very useful conversation with the Conseil du patronat, I told them that I understood their interest in having a situation where the provinces and the federal government, acting as partners, would be able to take initiatives to accelerate Canada's economic union. That was always what we had in mind. I told them that if there seemed to be a difference between what we intended and how it was expressed, we were of course prepared to change the wording. I added that the parliamentary committee was the place where such changes should be considered. The federal government has made certain proposals, and these proposals can be improved. I intend, and I think this is quite normal, to be involved with others in conversations on any potential improvements. The Conseil du patronat understands, and I hope the House of Commons does now, that improvements must be made through the Joint Committee.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate and am grateful for the minister's explanation. I would now like to ask about a second meeting he had this week, this time with native people, when he more or less promised them a new federal-provincial meeting that would include provincial premiers and native people. The minister will recall that the last time this was tried, Quebec did not attend the conference. Before making this promise to native people, did the minister consult the premier of Quebec to ensure he would be present? If he did not, why is he taking that risk?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this must be a record, because once again, the hon. member's information is incorrect. Twice in one day.

What I told the native people during a very frank conversation, and despite media reports, the meeting was a constructive one. What I said was that our preference was for a federal-provincial conference. I said that because it is important for the native people to know that if a federal-provincial conference is held, it is essential that they attend. I also said, and these were my words: "that is our preference". However, it would be impossible without a firm and genuine commitment to making changes in several areas. It is an indication of the complexity of the situation, and a commitment to native people to fully involve them in the constitutional process.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, this was a long answer to avoid telling us whether or not he consulted Premier Bourassa.

[English]

As a supplementary question I would like to refer to a statement that the minister made last night on national television. I refer to the part of his interview where he said, talking about First Ministers' Conferences: "We would prefer to have one because we know how to make one of those work".

An hon. member: Behind closed doors.

Mr. Ouellet: He surely does, especially the last one.

I want to know from the minister why he is ready to say yes to a process that involves 11 men behind closed doors and not to say yes instead to a process through a national referendum where all the people of Canada will be participating in this constitutional process.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is really quite extraordinary. If I well understand the position that is being put forward by the spokesman on constitutional matters of the Official Opposition, he appears to be suggesting that an agreement on a Constitution should not include the elected governments of Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Well, he said it should not include the elected representatives in Canada, but should be decided by a national referendum.

Is that the position of the Liberal Party? He might well want to take a look at the language that he used in the question he put. It is the clear implication that I took from it.

We believe it is necessary for there to be some mechanism by which there can be participation by the people of the country in these decisions. We also believe that at some point in time it is going to be necessary for governments to come together and to formally agree with some of the changes that we are discussing here. It is not possible now for any of us to say how that might occur and what exact form that might take.

Certainly it would not be the position of this government to suggest that the role of provinces could be put aside and their place taken by a national referendum.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs as well.

The minister will know that the provincial governments of Quebec and British Columbia, to name just two, are committed to having referenda in their respective jurisdictions on constitutional proposals.

Will the minister now honour his promise on legislation for a national referendum and allow Canadians from all regions of this country to participate in this most important process of nation building?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): My promise, Mr. Speaker, was that there would be a meeting this week of House leaders to discuss the timetable that the government might have in mind for legislation to give effect to our undertaking in the Speech from the Throne. Of course, we will respect that undertaking.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister will know that at 11 a.m. on Tuesday, November 19, in a meeting with the Leader of the Opposition, in the leader's office, the minister's chief of staff, Jim Judd, the minister agreed to introduce enabling legislation for a national referendum. Among other things, the minister specifically agreed that House leaders would meet this week to agree on a timetable for the passage of enabling legislation for a referendum as soon as possible.

I ask the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs why he and the government House leader are denying that undertaking.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rarely quote Christopher Young, but let me just quote a portion of his column of today when he says: Committee members "should remind themselves every morning that time wasted on party plots is time filched from the problems of hard-pressed farmers, industrial workers, fishermen and other decent citizens who elected them. Everywhere in Canada now the cry is heard that the constitutional issue must be settled and put behind us. Those who let temptations of partisan advantage stand in the way of that objective can expect to be harshly judged at election time".

• (1430)

I hope the hon. member will remember that.

GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

He will recall that for many, many months we have advocated from our party that the government take action to launch an initiative to support the hard-pressed people in Montreal and other parts of Quebec. We are pleased to hear the government's announcement today that through a package of $160 million it is going to ease some of the recessionary pain in that part of Canada.

Yesterday the government turned away farmers by saying there was no more money for them. Two days before Atlantic fishermen were told there was no more money for them. Last week the finance minister said there was no more money to assist children living in poverty in Canada.

What process does the government use when it determines where it sends out initiative packages to assist hard-pressed Canadians?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. friend from Kamloops that of the $300 million package announced by two of my federal colleagues this morning, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of State for Agriculture, and other Quebec ministers, $160 million is federal funds coming from the reserves of the department in question. There will be no new taxes for this.

That is what we are trying to do to help the province of Quebec.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my follow-up question is for the minister responsible for western diversification.

The minister is aware that the Core Area Initiative in Manitoba is expiring, that the ACCESS program which provides educational opportunities for native people has expired and that all programs under the northern development agreement which provide infrastructure, employment and training in the part of Canada which has 23 per cent unemployment, the highest of any province of Canada, have expired.

Will the government act in Manitoba as it did in Quebec and provide funding and programs for that region?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, we have acted and will continue to act not only in Manitoba but right across the country, because we happen to be a national government. Where there is a need we attempt to address it.

This kind of questioning, to try to drive a wedge between parts of the country and suggest that one part is getting more than the other, does not do this party any good when it is trying to be a national party.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mayer: Part of it is going to go to Quebec. With regard to the core area, we are presently in negotiation with the province and the city to see what we can do to address the need there. With regard to education in the north, we have also had discussions with the province. If I remember correctly, the province has agreed to pick up part of the money it needs to continue with that program this year. It involves one of the native training programs at the University of Brandon. It has had a very good track record.

We will do our very best, through not only my department but the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, to support this very worth-while initiative.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question involves another hard-pressed region of Canada, the Atlantic provinces, and is directed to the Minister of State for Transport.

The Minister of Transport, in answering a question yesterday, demonstrated just how unconcerned the government is with respect to critical regional economic development issues in Atlantic Canada. All the Atlantic premiers support improvements to the Trans-Canada Highway through New Brunswick. The leading economic think-tank in that region supports and has been pushing for it since 1988.

Why does the government continue to stall in providing direct financial assistance to this critical regional economic expansion development project?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it might be useful at this point to give some numbers on the major transfers that are made to the provinces and the rate of growth of these transfers to the various provinces. This is very enlightening.

Newfoundland increased from 1984-85 to 1990-91, 7 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 6.9 per cent; Nova Scotia, 6.2 per cent; New Brunswick, 7 per cent; Quebec, 3.7 per cent; Ontario, 7.3 per cent; Manitoba, 7.7 per cent; Saskatchewan, 10.3 per cent; Alberta—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could pass those figures across to the opposition.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, of course we in the Liberal Party applaud any initiative that would help the economy of all regions of this country, but we also have a question for the Acting Minister of Agriculture, because the minister is no doubt aware that today, 40,000 farmers across Canada depend on our quota system, a system that is threatened by action currently being taken by the Americans at GATT. Can we expect a commitment from the minister that the interests of Canadian farmers will be supported at the GATT talks and that the Government of Canada will not abandon Canadian farmers to the mercies of the Americans?

[English]

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, this question keeps coming up day after day after day. To the extent that it gets raised it causes uncertainty for farmers that they do not need.

The government's position is very clear. We have two ministers in Geneva this week making our case on behalf of marketing boards. About 70 per cent of the supply management industry in Canada is located in Ontario and Quebec and they are rightfully concerned.

We had with the two ministers in Geneva yesterday representatives of the supply management agencies. They are totally aware of our position. It has not changed. It was developed in total concert with those industries, with some of the producers who were there with us yesterday in Geneva, and it will not be changed unless they ask us to change it. They are telling us they do not want to change it. It will not be changed. It has been the same for a year as when it was put together and it will continue to be that way until the GATT negotiations are complete.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we will continue to ask questions because there are 40,000 Canadian farmers who are depending upon this Parliament and this government to defend their interests at the GATT.

I want to ask the minister: Why it is, when his Prime Minister on two separate occasions intervened directly to his good friend, the President of the United States, that it is the Americans now who are trying to torpedo our marketing boards at the GATT? Why?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): The Americans are in favour of tariffication. We know that and they have said so publicly. Our position is consistent and there are other countries that are supporting us in this. The Japanese, for instance, are supporting us and many of the European countries are supporting us in maintaining article XI.

Our position, to say it again, has not changed. We have allies in this position. We have no intention of changing it. We are making our case as strongly as we possibly can, and I believe that at the end of the day, whatever GATT solution is found to the problems in agriculture, it will include a measure that will protect Canadian marketing boards.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. It is on the same issue as that of my colleague.

The reason the uncertainty is there is because farmers want to know where they stand and where they are going to stand. The Prime Minister has assured Canadians time and time again that through personal and written contact he has softened the determination of the President of the United States to destroy Canadian marketing boards at GATT.

Today United States negotiators have told us that a deal has been cut between the European Community and the United States. It is not signed but it is cut.

Can the minister guarantee to the 40,000 Canadian dairy, egg and poultry producers that this deal includes a strengthened and clarified article XI?

• (1440)

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): First of all, Mr. Speaker, let me assure the member, everybody in the House and all the people who are connected with supply management across the country that no deal has been cut. We have absolutely no intention of signing a deal if it does not benefit Canadian industry.

I can assure the member that no deal has been cut. He should also know that until everything is agreed to, we will not sign any kind of an arrangement. It is a package deal and no deal has been made. Therefore there has been no deal cut on marketing boards, export subsidies or anything else.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister.

After weakening our position on supply management of our farm products during the free trade talks, the government gave farmers the assurance that GATT article XI would be reinforced.

Considering the minister's answers here in the House, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask him this: Do you think farmers will believe your story after you abandoned them during the free trade talks and now we can expect a devastating decision at GATT?

[English]

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, with respect, the member is dead wrong when he talks about the free trade agreement. Marketing boards are fully protected in the free trade agreement.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mayer: They laugh, but they should also know—

An hon. member: You had better read the agreement.

Mr. Mayer: Somebody says that I should read the agreement. We read the agreement and, as a result of reading the agreement, we established another marketing board for broiler chicken hatching eggs after we signed the free trade agreement. If you want to talk about the free trade agreement with the Americans it is fully protected in our dealings with the United States, Canadian Marketing Boards.

To get back to the other question about strengthening and clarifying article XI, we established that position with producers in the country that depend on article XI. That is our negotiating position and it will remain there unless the people connected with that part of the industry tell us to change it. To date they have not and our position remains the same.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Northern Ontario certainly feels like a voice in the wilderness, a forgotten region of Canada. Unemployment statistics are at record levels, welfare case loads are up 50 per cent in Sault Ste. Marie, and this year there have been 81 business bankruptcies and hundreds of personal bankruptcies in my community alone.

The Sault experience is not alone. Dozens of communities across northern Ontario are facing similar circumstances.

Northern Ontario deserves to be heard. I ask the minister: What economic package will come forward to address northern Ontario's problem of getting out of a recession that this government created?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a New Democratic Party member of this Parliament.

The New Democratic Party government of the province of Ontario, together with myself and the Minister of Forestry, announced a program just four weeks ago of $95 million for restoring the economic health and diversifying the base of the economy of northern Ontario, an agreement that was celebrated by the NDP Government of Ontario as well as this Parliament.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, 75 per cent of all jobs lost in this recession have been lost in Ontario, chiefly southern Ontario.

Windsor is typical. It has the highest unemployment rate in the country, 13 per cent. Like the rest of southern Ontario its welfare case load has increased by 24 per cent. Because of the deindustrialization of southern Ontario and because of cross-border shopping, our retail sector is in a terrible state of affairs.

My question to the minister is: Are there funds in the reserve fund or some action this government plans to take to correct the situation in Windsor, Chatham, Sarnia, Brantford, Kitchener, Waterloo, Hamilton and the rest of the cities in southwestern Ontario that are hurting?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we know what the hon. member is trying to do. He is trying to imply that to do something for Quebec and Montreal in particular is somehow wrong. That is really what he is trying to say.

Let us now take a look at southwestern Ontario. We have lower unemployment in southwestern Ontario than we have in other parts of Canada, but also southwestern Ontario has benefited in large measure from a number of federal programs: duty remissions on automobiles. We have just had an opening of a third line at Chrysler in Windsor. Duty remissions on manufacturing equipment, defence spending, this is largely concentrated in southern Ontario. Southern Ontario has been well treated by Parliament for many decades and continues to be.

GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my good friend the Minister of Fisheries.

As he knows, the farmers got $800 million and they deserve that and more. Quebec today gets $160 million and deserves it. He also knows that Atlantic fishermen and plant workers are getting $39 million only.

I ask the minister how he can justify this unfairness, this pittance, this almost sick joke, in his type of language and will he now agree to go back to the well one more time, to go to bat for those fishermen and plant workers and get them the kind of dollars they deserve?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, there is no element of unfairness at all. Never in Atlantic history has so much assistance for fishermen been arranged and given to them as in this present year. The amount is $57 million; $18 million in ice compensation, that has never occurred before and $39 million more to assist those who are suffering from a catch failure.

The hon. gentleman should get to his feet, be honest for a change and congratulate the government for what it has done to assist fishermen.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask hon. members to refrain from making comments that put the Speaker in a position of having to perhaps judge them as unparliamentary.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that no amount of double-talk can hide the truth, which is that he lost the battle in cabinet—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am trying to do the best I can with both the hon. member and the minister. I am going to need a little help from both of them. The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Simmons: Why will the minister not admit that he lost the battle in cabinet on this one? He and his colleagues from Atlantic Canada were snowballed.

Now that the Prime Minister has had a change of heart and admitted yesterday that those fishermen and plant workers need a bit more attention, will he get together with the Prime Minister. More specifically, is he now prepared to go back to cabinet with a proposal for increased funding to those people who are in real need down there, including his own riding, so that they will get the kind of dollars they deserve to see them through this winter.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. gentleman—by the way, I want to help the Speaker all I can. With the group that the hon. Speaker is dealing with, he needs all the help he can get.

I hope the hon. gentleman opposite will be supporting my new proposals for reform in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans so we can get rid of the minutia of giving out licences and making allocations and deciding whether John Brown should have a licence or John Smith should have a licence and help us to spend all our time devising schemes for getting more money out of the rest of the government.

Oral Questions

UKRAINE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last August in Edmonton the Prime Minister said and I quote:

> Canada pledges to respect the free and democratically expressed wishes of the Ukrainian people, whatever that decision might be.

We now have the secretary of state saying something quite different and attaching a series of conditions to Canada's recognition of Ukraine.

I want to ask the minister why the government is now reneging on the commitment made by the Prime Minister last August?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question of reneging on any commitment that was made.

First of all, we have an historic referendum coming up this weekend that I think Canadians from all backgrounds will welcome.

Second, the Prime Minister made a commitment that we would respect the democratic process. That remains the commitment of the government and that is exactly what we will do.

What we have said is that there are obligations of all nations to sign on to certain principles, including nuclear disarmament through the treaties that have been signed, including conventional forces Europe. The Prime Minister has said that in interviews and so have I. The democratic process will be respected and we are looking forward to seeing the results of what will be a very important day on Sunday.

• (1450)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, this morning in front of the external affairs committee, the Minister of Foreign Affairs for the Russia Federation said that there have been communiqués and agreements already signed between the President of the Russian Federation and Mr. Kravchuk from Ukraine, which explicitly set out that there will be joint control of nuclear weapons, and Ukraine will control all the arms control agreements.

What is the concern? What is the hold-up? What is the back-tracking on that commitment? Why do the minister and the government not live up to what they said on August 30?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very amused because the referendum has not even happened yet. Nobody can renege on anything at this point.

What we are looking forward to is the event on Sunday. We have been totally consistent from the beginning. I too have discussed this with the foreign minister of Russia and with many other people, including our NATO allies and some of our other allies.

There is nothing to renege on until it is over. I think the hon. member is jumping to the conclusion that there will be something reneged on, when there is absolutely no reason to believe that.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Once again the Canadian Union of Public Employees is in hot water, this time in its aviation division. The minister is no doubt aware of the lock-out of flight attendants at Nationair since November 19 this year, and I am referring to flight attendants based in Montreal and Toronto. The lock-out is due to the fact that the union, after receiving the company's firm offer on November 12, refused to submit these terms to its members at a general meeting, so members can vote on the offer.

Considering the lack of professionalism and lack of good faith shown by union leaders, is the minister considering legislation that would oblige it to submit the offer so that members will have the option of voting a genuine option, I hope to return to work?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we are now revising Part I of the Canada Labour Code, a process that will probably result in a number of reforms, including one concerning pregnant women working on video display terminals.

As for the hon. member's question, I must say that I was watching very carefully what happened in Toronto, when Premier Bob Rae used a clause similar to the one my colleague would like to see in the Canada Labour Code. For the time being, we are looking into the matter, and I hope to be able to submit a recommendation to cabinet within a few months.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

Today the Vancouver Port Corporation, grain companies, employers' organizations and affected workers all condemned the federal government for creating economic uncertainty in the grain export industry with the shipment of grain out of the port of Seattle.

Will the minister clear up this uncertainty and help the industry by indicating exactly under what circumstances grain will be allowed to move through American ports?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should understand two or three things.

First of all, the Wheat Board assures me that the grain that is moving through Seattle is additional capacity to what would otherwise be moved.

I assume the NDP supports the Wheat Board, so I am taking the Wheat Board's numbers. It means additional sales for Canadian farmers who were yesterday in the gallery. If the hon. member is against that, he is against farmers.

Second, the Wheat Board has also said that this could result in additional work for Canadians because if we can satisfy a customer now when we are booked up to capacity and develop a business relationship with that customer, it means that country may come back again and make additional work for people in Vancouver.

What we are trying to do is what is in the best interest of Canadian farmers. In the process down the road, potentially we will have more work for the kind of people he is concerned about.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is not what the release said today.

The Canadian Wheat Board has stated it had to use Seattle because there was no room in Vancouver. It also said that it would be cheaper for farmers if the grain was moved through Seattle. Today's press release states that neither of these statements are in fact correct.

Will the minister advise the Canadian Wheat Board to correct these inaccuracies? Will he direct the Canadian Wheat Board at least to make public the final costs of this cargo diversion.

The Canadian farmer has a right to know, the grain industry has a right to know and the taxpayer has a right to know.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Just to say again, Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board has advised me that this is additional tonnage that would not be moved if we did not take it through Seattle.

The other thing the hon. member should know, if he is concerned about doing business with the Americans, so far this year we have trans-shipped through transfer houses along the St. Lawrence over a million tonnes of U.S. grain. We regularly do business with the Americans, which creates jobs for Canadians by moving American product. I do not think there is a lot wrong with using U.S. facilities if it helps Canadian farmers now with the potential to make more work for Canadians tomorrow.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for national health and welfare. The government of Manitoba has recently converted the manner in which the provincial tax credits will be paid to welfare recipients. Instead of receiving a lump tax credit as all other Manitobans receive, welfare recipients will now have a portion of the credit included in each monthly social assistance cheque.

My question is simply this. Is this discriminatory practice allowed by the federal-provincial arrangements under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting twist and I appreciate my colleague from Portage—Interlake bringing this to our attention.

It is my understanding that the department received some brief information this morning on this particular proposal. As it is quite complex dealing with the Canada Assistance Plan it is going to take some time to directly assess whether proposed supplementary benefits will indeed be replacing the tax credit.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, as well as all my colleagues that the Canada Assistance Plan is very important to each and every one of us. It supports many Canadians and I thank the hon. member for his question.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works or his replacement here today.

I want to go back to the termination of the contract for the construction of the veterans affairs building in Kirkland Lake. Since termination will result in the loss of more than $800,000 to firms across northern Ontario and since the original developer has now demonstrated his ability to meet Public Works criteria, why does the minister and his department continue to refuse to reconsider and reactivate the original contract?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the developer who was low bidder on that contract was given the contract in good faith. He indicated to the Department of Public Works that he had financial difficulties.

After two extensions he was not able to produce the bid bond that was required and so the contract was terminated. The discussions were then undertaken with the second bidder and those discussions are continuing in good faith.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

I want to know the real reason behind this nonsense. Is it because the owner of the second site and the member for Timiskaming just happen to be brothers-in-law?

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am terribly disappointed because that same member in discussions earlier with me indicated that she knew that that was not a factor in these bids.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Worthy: I can say, Mr. Speaker, that the brother-in-law is not involved in the development. He is a minor shareholder in a piece of property that may be involved, but I would like to remind the member that this does not do her or her party any benefit by bringing it up this way.

An hon. member: It sure helped the brother-in-law.

Ms. Copps: All in the family.

TRADE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. As he will know, Sydney Steel Corporation is suffering because of the countervail imposed by the United States in the amount of 105 per cent against the importation of head hardened rails by Sysco into the United States even though the only other producer in North America is back ordered for 18 months.

France and Japan are now supplying these rails to the United States even though they do not have a free trade agreement with the United States yet Canada cannot.

I want to know what the government is doing to get rid of this countervail so that the Sydney Steel Corporation can compete on an even footing in this United States market.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons we have the free trade agreement is so we can object to the countervails as they are launched against us and that is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the United States needs to import these rails and Sydney Steel needs the market.

Why does the government not take some action to get rid of this countervail and do for Atlantic Canada, and particularly Cape Breton, what it said the free trade agreement would do?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we are taking action against the countervail. We are doing exactly what you have asked us to do.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for grains. In the last few hours, we were able to observe his colleagues, who had gone to Geneva to meet Mr. Dunkel, leave the meeting on their knees. Indeed, the Minister for International Trade told us that he did not get a lot of support, while the Minister of Agriculture himself said that Canada seemed unable to obtain the support needed to strengthen article XI. He then wonders why farmers are worried.

Since the senior ministers of this government admitted that they were powerless yesterday in Geneva, is the Prime Minister prepared to go himself to ensure that article XI is maintained and strengthened, as they promised in the debate on free trade?

[English]

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anybody came out on their knees, if that is what he is suggesting. I read the transcript of the press conference that both ministers had over there from start to finish. They did have a chance to make their case very explicitly and very directly to the Director General of GATT, Mr. Dunkel, so that they understood Canada's position clearly. I think that is what the member and the people he represents would expect us to do as a government; to represent our people's views as strongly and forcefully as we can.

Our position, as I said, has been developed with the industry and it will continue to be exactly the same as it is until or unless the industry asks to change. If he is saying that we should not go to Geneva and that we should not when we go to Geneva take producers with us because we are not going to get our way all the time, that is not the way you conduct negotiations and that is not the way we have been successful on behalf of Canadian farmers in the past.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. One of your partners, the president of the Quebec farmers' union, recommended that you reject outright the Dunkel report, as France and Ireland did. Can the minister tell me why he considers the Dunkel report to be a basis for discussion, when it means the end of Quebec agriculture?

[English]

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, again the member is dead wrong. I read both papers that Mr. Dunkel put out, one I think about November 8 and one last week which was some 30 pages. If you read it carefully, there is no prejudicing of anybody's negotiating position in that paper.

It clearly lays out the parameters under which discussions can take place, but there are also exemptions in there. There are provisions for snap-back. There are all kinds of things to protect marketing boards.

Again, I think it is fair to say that is what the country would expect of us; to make our position just as strongly and as clearly as we can to the appropriate people. That is what we are going and will continue to do.

PRESIDENT OF PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. The President of the Public Service Alliance made a statement that shocked many people and which the National Citizens Coalition considered to be violent against women. I would like to know whether the minister intends to ask for his resignation and if not, what does she intend to do to correct Mr. Bean?

Mr. Speaker: The question, while very interesting and perhaps important, does not involve the administration of the government.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw members' attention to the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Andrei Kozyrev, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a business question to the government House leader, I would like to—

Mr. Speaker: Excuse me for a moment. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is seeking the floor for the usual Thursday question. The hon. member for Kamloops I think may have been indicating a part of that on a point of order. I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a short point of order.

During the statement period today, my hon. friend from Portage—Interlake made some statements regarding the president of PSAC, indicating some points that were factually incorrect.

I want to remind the member of Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 493 which states:

> (4) The Speaker has cautioned Members to exercise great care in making statements about persons who are outside the House and unable to reply.

There are a number of other areas that mean about the same thing.

Many of the statements of my hon. friend were factually incorrect, such as: "Mr. Bean is an officer of the New Democratic Party". This is not the case, so would he be the gentleman that he is and withdraw his comments?

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I rise on that same point of order. I listened to what my colleague from the opposite side said with respect to my statement. I found it to be very much in order from what I read. Anyone who condones sexism and violence as a person should be condemned by him and his own party.

Mr. Speaker: I will consider the comments of the hon. member for Kamloops and I will review what has been said. There has been a general sense in this place of course that if it was unfair to attack someone who cannot answer for themselves and someone who is outside the Chamber that certain restraint should be exercised. I will look carefully at the matter that is raised.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader what the business of the House will be for the remaining part of today and Friday as well as on Monday and Tuesday.

While the government House leader is on his feet he might also be able to respond as to when the government will be introducing the legislation to allow for a national referendum to take place.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we momentarily intend to commence the debate on third reading of Bill C–39 and we are hoping for completion.

There have been discussions among the parties with respect to Bill C–44 which is amendments to the Canada Labour Code. These are non–controversial and would help bring about the end to a labour dispute. I hope those can carry on and we can find some opportunity to pass that bill as soon as possible.

The outcome of tomorrow depends on the outcome of today. If C–39 has completed third reading, which I hope it will, it would be my intention to call third reading on the financial institution package.

• (1510)

On Monday and Tuesday it would be my intention to call Bill C–20, the Budget Implementation Act, 1991. There are certain provisions in there that need to be passed prior to January 1, therefore we have to get it passed through this House so the other place can consider it prior to the Christmas adjournment.

Later that week I will be engaged in the usual discussions with members opposite to see what business can be appropriately dealt with.

In terms of the plebiscite legislation, we discussed at our House leader's meeting on Tuesday the practicalities of what that bill would contain, such as who would be allowed to advertise and what groups would participate because as hon. members know our existing Elections Act may be in violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in terms of limitation on participation. We are awaiting the report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform, the Lortie commission, to see what recommendations can be made in respect of advertising limits, enumeration, broadcasting, availability of free time, allocation of broadcasting time, all of those practical things which are in our Election Act but which cannot be transferred over automatically to plebiscite legislation.

Those kinds of things, as I indicated in the meeting we had on Tuesday, are things we are wrestling with. I do not expect to have an answer to that prior to Christmas. As the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs indicated to the leader of his party, we were unable to bring in any such legislation prior to Christmas.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, a point of order on House business.

I am most interested in House business. I have several points. I could not get the eye of the Speaker today and I have a whole point on that.

I really want to find out if there is any sense in getting off your seat if you are not on the list in the House. If you are not, then let us face facts. It is now Thursday and usually someone else is in the chair. I will pay my dues and get up for the first or second day. By the time Friday comes there is a new Speaker and that Speaker thinks you are just doing your first baptism. I am a good Baptist but I am getting tired of getting dumped all the time.

On House business, I wonder if the House leader, in the afterglow of Remembrance Day, knowing that there is a unanimous report from the defence committee and in view of the fact that the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka asked a similar question last Friday, I think, to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, could find some way to implement those recommendations for the merchant mariners who are a dying breed rather than procedurally waiting for the 150 days to respond to that unanimous report which is finally addressing one of the last groups that helped defend this country and fought so valiantly and had the highest rate of casualties of any group in the armed services.

Let us do something good and nice and make Canadians feel good. Since we have missed the Remembrance Day period, let us think about the Christmas period and the New Year for those dying merchant marines. There are different figures that one or two die every week because of their age group. The government should respond in a positive way.

Quite frankly we are finding money to do different things. There is a moral element, as the chairman of the defence committee said, about paying for it. Surely the House leader who is a very compassionate person outside the House could appreciate the morality of doing something before this breed becomes extinct. In other words, do not procedurally wait for the 150 days.

I could not get a question to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and frankly I had several, so could the House leader please tell this member what the difference in a loaded word is between "referendum" and "distinct society", and where the government is going to change and flip-flop because of the implications of one and that it is still proceeding gung-ho on the other. Is there any sense in continuing the whole thing anyway?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, on the question of giving veteran status to members of Canada's merchant marine, I know the Minister of Veterans Affairs has said on a number of occasions that he views this as very important. He is working on it.

There is no desire to work to 150 days, but the hon. member will appreciate that these times are different than they were in the early days when we were both here. He was here before me when the question of new spending was a trivial matter because the money was rolling in and our credit rating was still good.

Unfortunately, we are not in that position any more. Where he says that we can find new money, I wish that were true.

The hon. member has a suggestion for some minor savings, but saving a dollar and committing to 10 is not exactly what is going to help. Nevertheless, I will pass on his representation to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

There was a matter of debate as to loaded words and so on. I noticed some snickers earlier when I used the word "plebiscite". I did that because I am an engineer and engineers are very precise in their language.

I happened to look in the Oxford dictionary and "referendum" is a binding decision taken by vote and "plebiscite" is a seeking of opinion.

As you know, there is no ability under our constitution to change it by way of a binding, direct vote because of the amending formula that exists. At best, what you can do is have a plebiscite to seek opinion but cannot be binding. Therefore, it is a plebiscite and not a referendum according to The Concise Oxford Dictionary.

Mr. Speaker: I am impressed. It is wonderful to hear from an engineer, especially when you come from a legal background. Calling upon The Concise Oxford Dictionary is of great guidance to the Speaker.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the government House leader on being an engineer and on the fact that they are precise in language.

Many Canadians are probably wondering if they are very precise with regard to cost estimates.

My question relates to the Canada Labour Code legislation which he indicated might be brought back. I think he recognizes that members of this House will have a problem if it is not brought back soon.

There is no use in the House of Commons rushing this legislation through all stages if there have not been arrangements made with the Senate to deal with the legislation this afternoon.

It does not appear to me, and I have asked the government House leader, that it would be valuable for this House to pass the legislation in all stages unless we have a guarantee that the Senate will be available to do the same later on today, and not next Tuesday.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am giving second-hand information here, so please do not hold me to it if it turns out to be wrong, but the latest information I have is that the Senate was prepared to work up until later this afternoon.

If we were prepared to deal with the legislation now, we could get it over there in time for it to pass it this day. It would take four days off a four-month strike.

If the strike goes on for four months and four days, I guess only those who are inconvenienced and out of pocket by the strike will have to complain. I do not think I should comment more about the Senate's attendance or I am liable to make more enemies than I already have over there.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, this is just for clarification for the public.

We are not dealing with back-to-work legislation. By the minister's referral to a strike, he ignores the gist of the legislation which is basically to enforce the employers to negotiate under the Canada Labour Code.

I think for the benefit of the public it is not a matter of ordering people back to work. This is legislation which is clarifying the Canada Labour Code to make sure that the employers are able to negotiate as one body.

PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Speaker: I am pleased to table the report of the Auditor General of Canada concerning the operations and administration of the Library of Parliament.

This audit was originally requested by the Parliamentary Librarian and was endorsed by the Speakers of the Senate and the House of Commons.

[English]

I should point out that the Auditor General's first observation in this report is that:

> The Library of Parliament received strong endorsement from parliamentarians regarding the extent to which it meets their needs.

I would like to say on behalf of the House of Commons our thanks to the Auditor General and his staff for a constructive review of the Library of Parliament and I understand that his suggestions will be taken into consideration, studied and acted upon by members of the staff of the Library of Parliament.

Again, I want to extend to our librarian, Mr. Spicer, and his staff our well-deserved thanks for their ongoing commitment and dedication to serving the information requirements of parliamentarians and making it easier for members to do their work on behalf of our country.

I now have the ruling that I referred to earlier today in an exchange with the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and I hope that the ruling will help all hon. members to understand certain procedures that are taking place with some legislation.

I wonder if hon. members could perhaps take their conversation behind the curtain because I think it is being picked up by the microphones. I would ask hon. members to take their conversation perhaps just a little bit farther away. Thank you.

BILL C-35—PROCEDURAL ARGUMENTS—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Friday, November 22, 1991, as the House was about to begin the third reading debate on Bill C-35, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond rose on a point of order related to that bill.

The hon. member sought guidance from the Chair concerning Part III of the bill entitled "Bills introduced but not yet assented to" which puts forward amendments in relation to six bills that are at various stages in the legislative process.

Specifically it proposes to amend under certain conditions Bill C-3, which received third reading in the House on Friday last, Bill C-4 which is on the Order Paper at third reading, Bill C-18 which is now before the Standing Committee on Finance, Bill C-19 which is on the Order Paper at third reading, Bill C-22 which is now before the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations and Bill C-26 which awaits second reading in the House.

The Chair wishes to thank the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, the hon. member for Kamloops and the parliamentary secretary and hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin for their interventions last Friday and for their cooperation in permitting debate to commence, pending the Chair's decision on this matter. I am now ready to render a decision.

This is not the first time that members have raised concerns about a bill before the House appearing to be dependent on other bills still under consideration. On June 8, 1988, the Chair reviewed precedents on the subject, notably the decisions of Speaker Lamoureux of April 20, 1970 and February 24, 1971 as well as Deputy Speaker McCleave's ruling of February 5, 1973.

[English]

Speaker Lamoureux had found nothing procedurally wrong in having before the House at the same time concurrent or related bills which might be in contradiction with one another either because of the terms of the proposed legislation itself or in relation to proposed amendments. Accordingly, he ruled that second reading motions could proceed as the House was not giving final approval to the bills in question.

Today, however, the House is faced with giving its final approval to Bill C-35 and the Chair must determine whether third reading of Bill C-35 can proceed when Part III of that bill amends six bills now at various stages of the legislative process.

In its careful review of the terms of Part III of Bill C-35, the Chair has examined testimony presented before the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General on November 19, 1991, when members sought clarification on the intent of Part III from the officials of the Department of Justice.

Let me first say that I was dismayed to find in that exchange that a ruling of June 8, 1988, has been misconstrued as carte blanche for an interdependent approach to drafting complex legislation with the committee being told: "the Speaker ruled in 1988 that the inclusion of these clauses was perfectly proper".

A close reading of the June 1988 ruling reveals rather that the Chair permitted second reading of Bill C-130 to proceed despite objections raised to conditional references to Bill C-60 and Bill C-110. As it happens, events overtook those bills. No objections were raised at third reading of Bill C-130 and on dissolution Bills C-60 and C-110 had been assented to while the free trade bill died on the Order Paper.

I want to make it very clear that the situation before us where objections of this sort have been raised at third reading is according to our research unprecedented.

[Translation]

In the ruling of June 8, 1988, the Chair declared "the practice of one bill amending another bill still before the House or not yet given Royal Assent is an acceptable one". However, in keeping with the earlier warnings of Speaker Lamoureux, the Chair went on to caution that "if at third reading, circumstances exist whereby the bill is amending another bill still before the House, then I would be disposed to abide by Speaker Lamoureux's decision and hear further argument at that time".

[English]

This is precisely the situation before us today.

Having carefully examined the terms of Part III of Bill C-35, the Chair has grave concerns about this manner of proceeding since taken to the extreme it puts the House in the invidious situation of legislating in the subjunctive. For example, clause 157 of Bill C-35 proposes an amendment to Bill C-3 which is intended to deal with an anticipated anachronism. It amends the definition of department in Bill C-3 which rests currently on a reference to provisions in the Financial Administration Act which provisions are being amended by Bill C-35.

If the definition now in Bill C-3 remains and Bill C-35 is assented to without clause 157, Bill C-3 would even on being assented to contain an anachronistic reference to the Financial Administration Act.

That being said, the Chair has some sympathy for the dilemma facing those drafting proposals for the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act. Testimony before the committee reveals that this is an ongoing and painstaking process and that the very length of the process militates in some measure against its success as a comprehensive exercise. At the time such a bill is enacted, other legislation being considered concurrently by Parliament may require consequential amendments of the kinds included in Part III of Bill C-35. In the case of Bill C-35, and this is a key consideration for the Chair, the House is considering the traditional omnibus bill for corrections to certain anomalies and inconsistencies.

The drafters of Bill C-35 have in their zeal placed before the House not only corrective measures for such matters identified in existing statutes but in Part III they propose corrective measures for matters which will in all likelihood come into existence in this parliamentary session. Do these proposals offend the procedures of the House of Commons?

It is the duty of the Chair to safeguard the right of members and the House to make fully informed decisions on the matters before it and in the final analysis the Chair must be guided by what Deputy Speaker McCleave described in 1973 as a matter of how best to achieve logical progression of companion or interdependent bills through the House.

The legislative process affords ample opportunity for amending proposed legislation during the detailed clause by clause study in committee and again at the report stage in the House.

In the case of Part III of Bill C-35, members could have voted against or moved to delete any or all of the six clauses in question. Now at third reading the House has a final opportunity, should it so choose, to recommit Bill C-35 to committee for reconsideration.

Alternatively, the House could decide not to proceed with third reading of Bill C-35 until the six bills touched on in Part III have completed the legislative process.

All of these avenues offer members full remedy to this conditional approach to legislating should they object to it. That decision rests with the House.

After careful reflection on the technical nature of the amendments and their effects and on the opportunities there have been and continue to be for the House to reject Part III of Bill C-35, the Chair is not inclined to intervene on procedural grounds in this instance. Accordingly the Chair rules that Part III of Bill C-35 is properly before the House and third reading of Bill C-35 can proceed.

I want to add to these comments of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that the point that has been raised is not an easy one. I hope that this is of some assistance to the House. It is a complicated matter and as I mentioned in the judgment, this approach is not altogether satisfactory and I have had to the best I can with a very difficult situation. I thank the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond for bringing the matter to the attention of the Chair.

Mr. Dingwall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for a detailed decision but I am wondering if the Chair could perhaps elaborate considering the Chair's distinguished legal background and appreciation for parliamentary procedure.

In the ruling I take it that Part III is now in order. You did suggest, and correct me if I am wrong, that there is a remedy before the government. If it decided not to proceed with third reading of Bill C-35 until such time as the previous acts in question have been assented to, that would certainly make it appropriate. Am I reading the Chair correctly in that assessment?

An hon. member: Be careful.

Mr. Speaker: I heard somebody say: "Be careful". I think it was said to the Chair and I accept it as assistance.

There is a great temptation sometimes for the Chair to put on another hat. I am going to refrain from that and resist the temptation for the moment. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has summed up pretty carefully and accurately the remarks of the Chair.

I ruled that the matter is procedurally before us. It is procedurally acceptable.

If members feel that it might be appropriate to delay or as I said to defeat it, then that of course is for the House to do.

That of course is something which is entirely for the House to do and it is not something for the Speaker to suggest or favour or to reject.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker I want to thank the Chair and I want to thank the Table for the preparation of the decision.

I had asked on several occasions to have this decision completed expeditiously. I hope that my interventions were not interpreted by the Chair nor by the able representatives at the Table as trying to be a nuisance to them and to the Chair. I did believe then as I do believe now that this is a very substantive point with regard to the procedural aspects of the House of Commons. I wish to thank the Chair. I will not reflect on the decision in the House but I do want to thank the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I will say to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond first of all as I indicated it is a complicated and difficult issue. It was most properly raised. I can only say that I am sorry that we were not able to come with a ruling a day or so earlier. I appreciate what the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has said in appreciating how much work went in this decision. The officers of the Table have been of great assistance to me in coming down with a decision which gave me some trouble indeed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do not want this opportunity to pass without adding my thanks to the Table and to the Speaker for making such a difficult ruling and spending to much time and effort on it. We are pleased to find that this particular process is procedurally within the bounds of the House of Commons.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, may I pose a question to my distinguished colleague the parliamentary secretary and friend to the government House leader. Note the word "distinguished".

Mr. Speaker: I just want to remind the hon. member from Cape Breton—East Richmond that I use the term generously.

Mr. Dingwall Mr. Speaker, it was used on me one time but the person that was giving the remark called it "extinguished". I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary in view of the decision which has been rendered by the Chair if he would give serious consideration to withdrawing Part III of Bill C-35?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to my hon. friend in view of the Speaker's ruling there are obviously a number of options available to the government and to the House and I would not want at this point to preclude any of them.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Debate.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak on Bill C-39 at third reading. I wish to convey to this House the regrets of the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the unavoidable absence here today. He is most regretful.

Members from all sides of the House do know that there is an urgency to this particular bill and really have shown truly excellent co-operation ensuring that it could move forward to the other place and then on to have provincial approval and come into effect January 1992.

First, I wish to thank the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve who chaired the legislative committee. I also want to thank the hon. members for Winnipeg North and Kootenay East.

I would like to extend my appreciation to all those who brought forward their concerns, especially those with respect to the disabled. In this regard, note should be taken of the contributions of the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia and also of the hon. member for Don Valley East, whose proposed amendment to the disability provision of the CPP is contained in Bill C-280, which received third reading here on Tuesday evening.

I would also like to note the particular concerns raised in the committee by members regarding the CPP, the definition of "disability", the time limits on applying for a disability pension, and the protection for persons who stay at home to care for disabled persons.

I would also like to express my sincere gratitude to all the witnesses representing the disabled community who appeared before the committee. A brief on Bill C-39 was presented by the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped, the Canadian Disability Rights Council and the Advocacy Resource Centre for the Handicapped. They raised many important issues and they revealed the serious concerns many persons have about the disability provisions under the CPP.

It was also noted that some Canadians simply lacked the information or the knowledge about the plan's provisions. Because of this an application for disability benefits may be delayed too long and unfortunately this may result in the loss of eligibility for the benefits.

I might add that the Department of National Health and Welfare has undertaken a stronger communications effort in this particular area. However it really is clear to me and to all of those who sat on the legislative committee that more has to be done. I really welcome all suggestions from the members here in the House and all members of Parliament as to how we might better inform Canadians about the CPP plan and its provisions.

Certain amendments designed to improve the disability provisions under the CPP had been made through Bill C-116, which took effect in 1987. The changes enhance the flat rate disability benefit as well as ease the eligibility rules by including a new recency provision. Bill C-39 also includes important provisions for the disabled. Greater benefits will be paid to the children of disabled contributors, and the benefit eligibility of CPP contributors who were unable to apply in time because of incapacity is going to be protected through one of our amendments.

It is clear that hon. members want more. Bill C-280, which I have mentioned, is a private member's bill and it was sponsored by the hon. member for Don Valley East. The bill was passed in this House Tuesday and now is in the other place for discussion.

This bill would further ease the contributory requirements for a disability pension. Under the provisions of the CPP, the terms of that bill will require notice to, and approval by, the provinces.

I also wish to indicate my appreciation to the witnesses from the Canadian Institute of Actuaries who appeared before the legislative committee. Their testimony confirmed that CPP is funded on the basis of sound actuarial principles and that this legislation here before us today is solidly based on those principles.

I would like to now briefly summarize the major and the important minor provisions contained in this bill.

As members know, the bill contains two major amendments. It amends the current 25-year schedule of CPP contribution rates and extends the schedule by an additional five years.

The bill increases benefits for the children of disabled and deceased CPP contributors by $35 a month.

The bill contains a number of minor amendments which are really insignificant in cost, but the minor amendments would provide for the conversion from a CPP disability contributor's child benefit to a CPP orphan's benefit without the need for application. It would provide CPP children's benefits to a child who comes under the care and custody of a CPP contributor after the contributor becomes disabled.

These minor amendments allow for the protection of benefit eligibility of CPP contributors who are unable to apply in time because of incapacity and for the reimbursement of CPP disability benefits to the administrator of a disability income plan under approved conditions at the beneficiary's request.

Another minor amendment concerns the sharing of information among the Old Age Security, the Canada Pension Plan and the family allowance programs. This will provide improved service for all our clients. Another minor amendment concerns information sharing between these three programs and provincial administrators in limited circumstances which would allow for the faster provision of provincial benefits in services for dual clients. A number of other minor administrative and technical changes are incorporated within the bill.

In closing, I thank all members in the House and members on the committee for their very constructive and their truly co-operative efforts in dealing with the legislation. This package of amendments is a fine example of federal and provincial co-operation and negotiation.

The amendments will, among other things, ensure that the plan remains soundly financed well into the future. The children's benefit increase for dependent children of the deceased and disabled CPP contributors is truly a significant benefit improvement for a particularly vulnerable group.

As members know the legislative timeframe we are working under is very tight. The target date for implementation of the proposed changes is January 1, 1992. After Parliament has approved the bill, the approval of two-thirds of the provinces with two-thirds of the population is required to implement the legislative changes. I know the provinces have already put their machinery into motion so that they can be ready to act immediately once the federal parliamentary process has been completed.

Once again I want to underscore the minister's support and appreciation for the committee members' work, the witnesses' testimony and the suggestions put forward by all members of this House on how to improve the Canada Pension Plan.

The minister has asked that I inform the House today that he will write to his provincial counterparts and request immediate discussion on the proposed suggestions which will allow for a better and a fairer disability coverage. Certainly we hope that the provinces will agree and in turn support further amendments to the CPP legislation. Indeed it is unfortunate that these proposals did not get included in Bill C-39.

The minister will also provide to the appropriate Standing Committee on Health and Welfare copies of these letters.

This is one thing that I promised at the legislative committee and indeed here this morning in the House. Concerns were raised by both my colleagues on this side of the House and the other side of the House with regard to the CPP legislation, how we can assist the disabled, and indeed credit splitting due to an fortunate divorce or separation within a family. These concerns will be addressed by the minister to the provinces with a copy of his letter to the appropriate committee.

I know that we can do more, that we should be doing more and that we will want to be able to count on the co-operation of all parties like we have had in future efforts to protect and improve the social insurance of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much and look forward to this debate at third reading.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to participate in this debate on third reading of Bill C-39.

The parliamentary secretary has outlined the position of the Government of Canada with regard to this particular piece of legislation. I wish to reiterate what my colleague from Winnipeg has said with regard to Bill C-39. We will be supporting Bill C-39 on third reading. That is not to say that we are completely pleased with all the contents of the bill or the lack of certain provisions in the bill.

I wish to state for the record we are aware, as debated previously, that Bill C-39 will result in an increase in Canada pension contribution rates both for employees and for employers. This plan is supported from coast to coast. The arrangements are somewhat different in the province of Quebec, but it is indeed a national program to which Canadians have contributed voluntarily—it is now mandated by law—and have done so for a good number of years.

We have taken notice of the government's assertion. An increase in the appropriate premiums of various individuals who are gainfully employed and who are not employed for this particular plan is important in order to make certain that the Canada pension fund itself is solvent and that we do not go bankrupt, thereby leaving a large number of Canadians without the appropriate compensation they thought they were going to receive.

The bill goes on to deal with the benefit levels for dependent children of disabled and deceased contributors to the plan. Federal–provincial agreement to such increases was reached I believe in January 1991, and we in this House are now cementing, consummating that agreement in its totality.

I want to say for the record that the increases which are tied in Bill C–39 are not whopping increases but are nevertheless increases. I think members ought to be cognizant of that increase and fully appreciate that those individuals who will be the recipients of these financial increases will certainly bear some benefit as a result.

I had hoped during report stage of this bill that amendments would have been allowed. Amendments were allowed by the Chair in terms of procedural grounds but certainly the substance of those amendments were not accepted by the government. That is a decision that every government duly elected by the people of Canada has a right to make. I think in this particular instance it has made this decision without sound substantive rationale.

I know the hon. member for Halifax West would want to participate in this debate. Perhaps we can hear from him later on. I do want to say there are some very perplexing situations that must be brought to the attention of the Chair, indeed the people of Canada, in terms of Bill C–39 and what it could have done. I have a number of cases in my own constituency where I make the comment that there are very sound and solid arguments for provisions of the Charter for discrimination both on sex and on age.

Bill C–39 could have incorporated some of those changes in order to rectify the problem.

I have a constituent who is a woman of 43 years of age who was receiving Canada pension benefits of $215 per month after the death of her husband. One day her benefits were reduced to $170 without any warning whatsoever. She found out that since health and welfare had not received confirmation that her son was still enrolled in school, she lost the benefits because he was no longer ruled as a dependent. I note that benefits cease for survivors when they reach the age of 18 and leave school or when they turn 25 if they remain in school.

This lady did not get her original benefits back even though the $215 per month was reduced to begin with. This was simply because she was a woman under the age of 45 years. This is the point. That is in the legislation. That is unfair to Canadians who have to put up with that kind of difficulty.

Here is another situation. A woman became a widow in 1985. She applied twice for Canada pension benefits. That was in 1985 and 1988. She was refused both times because she was under the age of 35 and had no dependants. The case went before the Human Rights Commission. I say to the those in the Chamber and to those who are viewing our proceeding across the country that our Canadian Human Rights Commission said it would not interfere because it involved pension plans. Health and welfare on the other hand told this lady she would get her benefits when she reached 65.

The Chair has had a tremendous career. It is one known for reasonableness, fairness and at times firmness which is quite appropriate. I would have to ask the Chair and members through the Chair to explain to me and others where the fairness is. Surely this must be wrong. Surely there is something inherently wrong with the law.

In Bill C–39 we had an opportunity to correct that very grievous error but we did not. Members opposite voted us down and as a result it could not go forward.

Think of it. Let me personalize it just a little bit. You are 22 or 23 years of age and working and you make a decision to get married. You live together as man and wife and you make a conscious decision not to have any children until you pay your student loans.

• (1600)

To inform those who are in the Chamber, student loans can vary. If one goes on to professional school or pursues a doctorate or a masters thesis domestically or internationally, the bill is rather large.

What happens if two people are married and both have student loans and say: "We are not going to have children right away. We are going to wait a number of years because we want to pay off our debt in terms of student loans. We do not want to give our money in terms of rent to a landlord. We would rather have some equity. Therefore we will take a few years save some of our money make a down payment on a home and try to make our mortgage payments so that we are not going to be in a situation which some Canadians have determined to be 'house poor."

That is you do not want your mortgage to be of such an extent that you have very little income left for anything else. The couple gets married. They pay off their debts or attempt to pay off their debts such as student loans. They save money for a down payment on a mortgage. The mortgage rates just recently just came down. In some areas of the country they have been very, very high as my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood will attest to later on.

Then all of a sudden tragedy hits whether by accident or by disease. One of the couple is deceased. You have paid your benefits into the Canada Pension Plan and you are a survivor. But because that lady has no children she is denied the benefits of a program which she quite justifiably placed monthly payments in each and every month and each and every year.

I suggest that that situation is not fair. The law as I said earlier this morning is wrong and ought to be changed.

What about the widow who is 43 years of age who does not have a bankroll of cash. She does not have a situation whereby someone from afar could send cheques in large amounts of money but who does everything she can to raise her family and provide them with the necessities of life that many of us have taken for granted so often in this Chamber.

She has a couple of children. She assists them in going on to pursuing their education but because of an oversight her benefits are dropped substantially. Members might say: "Well, $215 down to $170, come on, that is $45, not a lot of money".

Let me tell you about $45 and what it can pay in terms of the family income which is basically limited.

It might help to pay for the telephone which is a monthly expense. Notwithstanding the interventions made by Bell Canada and all of the telephone companies, the telephone rates have not come down. They have not come down. That is one expense.

It can be used to buy bread. You can buy bread with that $45 a month. You can buy milk with that $45 a month. You can also buy such things as snowsuits for your child who may wish to go to school and participate with other children in various activities both on the school grounds and off the school grounds when the weather is cold.

It may also pay for swimming lessons. It could be used as a transportation subsidy for a child under the age of ten who after school may have to travel a distance to get home or because of some special arrangements there might be sickness in the family or one might have to go to a dentist.

But the Government of Canada in this law, the Canada Pension Act, has denied that individual of that amount of money.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you with great respect that that is unfair. The law is wrong. Bill C–39 could have rectified that situation. It has not done that.

We are not talking here about a substantive sum of money but we are talking about a substantive sum of money for the recipients of the program. I have used the figure of $45. Well, $45 is almost $600 a year. It is well over $500. I think I am correcting my addition here. Let us forget about bread and milk, snowsuits, transportation subsidies. Let us talk about other things.

Do you know that there are numerous Canadians across this country who have to pay each and every month for something which many of us never think of. It is called a power bill or a utility bill. You may live in the regions of the country where sometimes the weather can be quite erratic. That is not to suggest that the weather is neither cold or erratic here in the nation's capital. But I just bring it to the Speaker's attention. Many individuals are on a plan whereby they spend each and every month a set sum. If the weather is extremely cold they still pay that sum of money which is that $45. If the weather is very warm they still pay the $45. It provides the home with heat. It provides the family with light. People do their homework under the light and some people wish they did not do their homework under the light. But it provides a necessity. We have not rectified this error in this particular bill.

I say to you, Sir, and to members opposite and to my colleagues that that is wrong. We ought to change it. I hope the parliamentary secretary will be true to her word. I have every reason to believe she will. I hope this matter will be brought to the attention of ministers of health across this country for subsequent change and amendment and to rectify the situation.

I make reference to these particular cases because I think it important that members of Parliament and those in the viewing audience realize that sometimes we deal with a lot of technical stuff. Sometimes we deal with miscellaneous statutes where you have different bills that are affected and affect other bills.

My colleague from the New Democratic Party was so right today when he stood in his place. He did not necessarily agree with me, but he was right in terms of pension reform. He was right. I do not think anyone doubts that. Surely there is an obligation on all of us not to just push through with a quick hand a statute like Bill C-35, which has 90 different federal statutes and umpteen different amendments and various consequential amendments. It is very important for us when dealing with Bill C-39 to make substantive changes which affect the lives of Canadians.

A number of organizations have applauded the government in terms of the increases that will occur as a result of premiums both on the employer and employee sides in order to make the fund solvent. We on this side hope that these changes, which were made to rectify an error, and were done certainly with good faith on our part and hopefully on the part of the government, will be consummated again on the passage of third reading of this bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am hoping you will allow my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, to continue on in the debate in the time that remains. However, I do want to say through you to the parliamentary secretary, who said some very kind words earlier this day, that she will be true to her undertaking and the suggestions we have made she will bring them to the attention again of the minister and to the ministers of health to see whether some political will can be gathered across this country to make those kinds of substantive changes which we believe to be important both in terms of assisting the recipients of this particular piece of legislation, and also be able to facilitate the implementation of changes that we are recommending.

I would hope that the parliamentary secretary would share with me the letter that she will be forwarding to first ministers. I just want to see the body of the letter. I do not have to see the salutation of "My dearest colleague" or whatever it says, and I certainly do not want to see the signature with all the *x*s and *o*s that will go to the various provincial ministers across the country. I hope the parliamentary secretary will be kind enough to send members on this side of the House a copy of that letter.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will take the remaining moments from my colleague's time. As he said earlier, we salute the government for putting this bill on the floor of the House and putting the fiscal framework of the Canada Pension Plan back in order. It is something that the senior citizens of this country would appreciate. I know that in my own riding, 22,000 seniors count on this national plan to be properly managed. When they hear that we are putting the time and effort into making sure that the solvency of this fund will always be maintained, I am sure this will be good news to those constituents, not only in my riding but right across the country.

I want to talk about another aspect of this particular piece of legislation. It has to do with pensions for the disabled. I have talked about this—I guess it was second reading and I brought it up earlier today.

I am going to repeat myself because when you are a new MP there are days when you can stand in this House and feel good about what you are doing.

There are other days when you wonder what you are doing here: "What a waste of time. I think I could get a lot more done if I were not an MP".

At this moment with the case that I hold in my hands I feel that I am spinning my wheels. It is a case that I personally have been working on since August 8. It is a case that was brought to my attention by one of my constituents. It involves a man in my riding who volunteered his services to a fellow neighbour in rebuilding a roof on his home. My friend, Mr. Baxevanis, is a craftsman and he was on the roof of this home. He fell and broke his hip, his legs and his arms. He was lucky. I think the only thing he did not break was his neck. He had over 30 different major operations and has not been able to work for just under three years.

This is a man who has contributed to the economy of this country throughout his entire life. This is a man who is married and has three beautiful children. It is tough for somebody who has had that kind of experience. All of his life he has been active and then all of a sudden he is disabled.

It is at a time like this when you count on your national government and a program like disabled pensions to come into play.

The first letter I received on this was May 23, 1990, from a city councillor, Chris Korwin-Kuczynski, who talked about this case. My first letter on this case was August 7. I produced all the paperwork necessary. I have written subsequent letters. I have tried to get information and I think we finally have it now from Revenue Canada, which I must tell you is just a painstaking exercise.

Ms. Sparrow: Did he file late?

Mr. Mills: No, he did not file late. He went through the normal process and there were difficulties in getting paperwork out of Revenue Canada. I wrote to the minister and I had difficulty. One day my colleague in my office basically lost it. I have never raised this in Question Period before. Here I am and it is almost Christmas Eve and I still do not have this case concluded.

Here is a man whom anybody with any common sense can see is physically disabled. He will never be able to work as a craftsman for the rest of his life. Thank goodness for the community that came to his assistance and his family's assistance and helped them maintain their home and made sure the children had the necessary food and clothing so that they could continue on their normal existence.

I bring this case to the floor of the House of Commons for one reason. I do not believe there is any intention by department officials to give this kind of a case the "mad" treatment, the maximum administrative delay treatment. I would never impute ill will to a public servant.

• (1620)

We are sloppy and inefficient. If this happened in business, if we treated a customer like this, we would soon be out of business. No wonder there are times when our constituents, the people of Canada, wonder what we do here. I say humbly that this case makes me feel useless. It makes me feel useless that I cannot move a department on an issue that is substantive and addresses fundamental social policy in this country. This is not a man who is looking to have some kind of quick grab of the treasury of this country. This is a legitimate case.

I fear that there may be many other cases like this from coast to coast to coast in which the spirit of public service or the spirit of the bill is not being addressed.

As I said earlier to the parliamentary secretary for the government, I have enormous respect for her. She is a very hard working, efficient person, I would appeal to her and plead with her to somehow communicate to officials, the Public Service, not to find reasons why a case like this should be delayed and not processed, but to try and find ways to make the spirit of the law work for cases like the Baxevanis family.

Governance is not for people who are advantaged. It is to help people who are disadvantaged. One of the reasons I felt good about addressing this bill today on pension reform is because by and large we are talking about a piece of legislation that really looks after a lot of people in our community who from time to time are disadvantaged. I would implore the government to try and figure out a way to make the Public Service of Canada more efficient in delivering the act we are about to pass.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand and speak on Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Last Monday evening I represented my party on the legislative committee examining Bill C-39. I must say that it was an uplifting experience. Why do I say uplifting? I use that word because members from all parties sat and listened to witnesses from the disabled community and I think all committee members were moved by the testimony.

We were not only moved emotionally, we were all moved to action. In four and a half hours we had reached agreement that existing disability provisions within the CPP were not adequate.

I guess we could ask ourselves: what does this bill really do?

What it does is provide a $35 per month increase in benefits paid to children of CPP contributors who die or who are disabled. All recipients would receive the increase on January 1992, after the regular cost of living adjustments is made to current payments of $113 per month.

Thus, on January 1992 the benefit would be $154.54. We are talking about an increase to these children of disabled people of $35 a month. Does it really provide $35 a month?

I guess I will put these questions to the House. Can we expect the provinces, private insurance or other players to decrease benefits by $35 a month as of January 1992? If this is the case, where is the real benefit for Canadians with disabilities? What can be done to ensure that Bill C-39 benefits disabled Canadians and is not merely a subsidy for private insurance companies or the provinces?

I was correct. I was told by the actuary and by the officials from the department that if the provinces decided to counteract, they could decrease it by that amount. Regarding the private insurance company that has this person insured, if the clause is in there, it could.

Here we are with a bill that may be subsidizing other sources. Really, it is a bit deceiving. The department estimates 170,000 children will be eligible to receive this higher benefit. Every one of them will receive the benefits. We know that, if the provinces agree to it.

It may be offset, and the people should be aware that it may be offset. I know I will be watching my province of British Columbia to ensure that it does not. I am sure it will not.

I want to go a little bit deeper into the bill if I may. I would like to refer to The Regency and Retroactive Rules Affecting Disability Benefits, a report to the Minister of National Health and Welfare by the Canada Pension Plan Advisory, May 1990.

As we sat in that committee, we had the people from the disabled group there. One of the gentlemen was a man in a wheelchair. He had two children. He receives $785 a month to pay his rent or run his home and for his children. He told me at that committee his children cannot go to hockey games. He cannot afford to supply them with the equipment to play hockey.

He cannot go out and retrain himself to be able to carry on an active life. He cannot go out and take a part-time job because if he did Canada Pension would disqualify him from disability. What kind of legislation have we got in Canada that would allow someone to be designated as disabled for the rest of his life and not give him the incentive to go back out to try to train himself or re-educate himself?

I am told in committee that there is provision in some provinces where there are some pilot projects going on, one in British Columbia and one in Ontario, which allows for experimenting in these areas.

I want to refer to a case that I was first initiated into, the Canada pension disabilities. There was a young boy who played hockey with my son. I knew the boy. He got married and had two children. At the age of 28 he found himself in an accident in which logs fell from a truck and crushed him to the extent that he was literally immobilized.

When they shipped him off to Vancouver, they had to ship him on a passenger train, take the window out and put him on in a stretcher. His wife and children had nowhere else to go and so they came to me. They were looking for a disability pension. He was denied. He was allowed to go to the appeal board. I went to the appeal board and sat in on the appeal procedures. During that procedure the government appoints someone, in this case someone from a federal department. The claimant has someone appointed to represent him on his behalf and then an independent judge sits to chair it and then they make their report.

He won his case and has improved immeasurably since that time. If he were to try to retrain or find some mechanism of trying to find some part-time work to be able to put himself back into the work force, he would lose his disability pension.

Surely to goodness, in this day and age, with the new technologies we should not and we must now allow legislation to give that kind of a disincentive to people who could find themselves retrained and try to put them back into the workplace.

I want to talk for a moment, as I said, about this report from the ministry of health. It has recorded, it has done some studying and it appoints various people. In August, the chairperson of the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Board received a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare expressing concern regarding the provisions governing eligibility for disability benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. In particular, the minister requested that the board examine current provisions regarding regency and retroactivity with a view to determining whether any changes were necessary.

After some consultation by the board on retroactivity: "The plan also provides that no person shall be deemed to have become disabled earlier than 15 months before the month in which the application for disability is received. Departmental officials suggested that it would be very difficult, in many cases, to establish the onset of disability fairly if the retroactive period was extended beyond 15 months".

We have got case after case. Its figures show that as much as 5 per cent or 6 per cent of the applicants who have paid into the Canada pension scheme are disqualified because they did not apply at the proper time. They paid into a pension scheme and because they thought they were going to get better or possibly because they were getting money from unemployment insurance or possibly from some other source, they did not apply. All of a sudden someone informs them that there is a disability pension under the Canada pension. Finally, they come to make their application and are told: "Oh, I am sorry but you are disqualified now". If someone is disabled and has the credits, surely to goodness if he has not applied in time all the ministry has done is save itself a bunch of money, and the longer it takes for him to apply the more money the ministry does not have to pay.

There are provisions that would safeguard the plan because the retroactivity only goes back for one year. If someone is disabled in 1980, comes forward in 1990, has paid into the plan and can prove that they were disabled, surely to goodness the plan should be laid out in such a way that they could say: "Yes, you are entitled to it because you have paid into it, but you will only get it retroactive for one year".

That is not how the plan works. Many people out there are finding themselves in a situation in which they did not know because many of them do not have their trade unions to tell them that these provisions are there.

Canada pension has not really given out the kind of information with regard to disability pensions because we questioned the officials on that. Clearly we have got a situation in which the bill, the Canada Pension Plan Act, must be changed. Bill C-39 addresses one very little area and we are going to support it. We definitely will be supporting it because it is an improvement.

However, I do not want to leave the impression that we have done our job. There is a big job to be done there.

I heard the Liberals speaking with regard to the problems with the disabled and so on. I want to ask the Liberals: where were you between 1966 and 1984? Those same things that are going on right now were going on during that period of time and you could have gone into this legislation and tried to redraft it, but you did not.

I would hope the kind of atmosphere that went on in that legislative committee and in the hearing, and the kind of compassion that was coming from all sides of the House, will prevail and we will sit down as a committee and start to look at revising the whole Canada Pension Plan Act and not just these small portions of it.

There are other areas of horrendous problems within the Canada Pension Plan. I can recall several people who had received their disability pension and received a back cheque for somewhere in the neighbourhood of $17,000, $18,000, $20,000 and were not told that it was taxable. They were not advised that it was taxable. Goodness knows if you are disabled and you have got these problems and it takes so long to get your cheque, and it is a retroactive cheque, you need the money and you spend the money. Then in April they are told that they have income tax to pay on that and they must pay it. Again, there is another area.

I have been advised by people in the department that there are some changes coming with regard to the income tax, it will be deducted at source and I am pleased to hear that. I was very pleased to hear that kind of co-operation coming from that department and from the department heads. They realize the seriousness of the bill and the inequities.

I want to refer also to the point about the late applications. That is the area in which many people are suffering and not getting the kind of help they should be getting. Statistics on the number of late applications are not available. However, departmental officials have indicated that approximately 5.5 to 6 per cent of applicants are denied because the individual is not eligible for benefits because of lack of earnings. It is not only because of lack of earnings. It is because of the late application and the late filing. That is what I am finding in many cases. The individual did not know that they were entitled to Canada Pension and they did not apply. When they do apply they are told: "I am sorry, you're too late, so you can't get it".

Whether the government chooses to amend the definition of disability or expand educational or retraining programs into the CPP disability system, I believe that progress must be made. I hope the minister carefully reviews the minutes of the committee to see the level of support for these proposals from all sides of the House. I cannot over emphasize that point.

As the witnesses indicated, they do not want to be sitting at home in their rooms and not be given the opportunity to try to lift themselves up and to retrain or try to find even the very simplest of work. If they do that they are going to lose their pensions.

There is another area which is probably of deeper concern to every individual out there paying into the Canada pension. That is the funding of Canada pension.

The actuary came before our committee and ten minutes before he introduced his memo to the government House leader so that he could come and speak on his concerns.

There are some very serious problems on the graphs he is showing. The funding of the Canada pension as he has indicated needs to be very seriously looked at. Not only the funding of the Canada pension, but also the funding of our medicare system, our social assistance programs and our Old Age Security program need to be looked at, because it is all relevant; the age of our people, the changes of the age limits in the work force, the changes in the work force and the amount of money going into the Canada pension. By the year 2021 our young people could be faced with some very, very serious decisions to be made.

We have about 20 years to get this thing done. I would urge the parliamentary secretary to the minister of health and welfare to try to convene the committee and let us start starting. I am not talking immediately, but I am talking about reconvening the committee to have a look at the Canada Pension Act from one end to the other, and spend our time doing something constructive as a committee.

We all know those problems are there. We know there are certain procedures we have to follow, but we should start immediately to go through the Canada Pension Plan, really look at those areas as a committee, start to do something in advance and start to talk to the provinces. Then coming back in a meaningful way at the proper time we could bring about the kind of required changes that are going to be needed for the whole Canada Pension Plan. Let us get on with the new technologies, let us go on with the provisions of some retraining, let us go on with the provisions of allowing disabled workers to get back into the workplace in some meaningful way.

I enjoyed that committee very, very much. I think the witnesses, the people, the actuary and the information we received were excellent. I still say let us not leave it there now, let us continue on in a meaningful way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? Debate? Before I recognize the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek–Assiniboia, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38——to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Racism; the hon. member for South West Nova—National Defence; the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre—Agriculture; the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina—Immigration; the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas—Cross-border Shopping.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak again on the subject matter of this bill. It is now at the third reading stage, and I want to say that I am in support of Bill C–39 over all. I think it is an improvement over what we have had. It improves the child benefits, it improves the funding arrangements to maintain the solvency of the Canada Pension Plan, some pretty fundamental and important changes.

What I have to express again though is my disappointment with some things that perhaps ought to have been in this bill and are not. I guess I do so simply to flag them for the future. My pet peeve in this thing is the situation of those Canadians who have contributed over the years through their wages or employment into the Canada Pension Plan, who develop a disability and as a result of the disability have to leave their employment, and who wind up applying late because they did not know of the existence of the Canada Pension Plan disability pension.

By the time they learn of the availability and make their application, lo and behold their eligibility time has run out. At the present time they had to have contributed for two of the past three years or five of the past ten years.

I want to refer again to the really classic case of Mrs. Donna Sinclair of my community of Swift Current, Saskatchewan. This lady contributed to the Canada Pension Plan through her wages from the inception of the CPP in 1966 until 1978. She contributed for 11 of those 13 years. She did not know about the existence of the disability pension. She became disabled and had to leave her employment and it was not until 1987 that she applied. At the time of the application and looking back, it was discovered that she did not meet the required number of years in the contributor period, despite having contributed for 11 out of 13 years when she was working and up until the time of her disability. I believe it is an unfortunate injustice.

That may be partially remedied as a result of the passage earlier this week of Bill C–280, a private members' initiative that was put forward by my hon. colleague from Don Valley East. The gist of that bill would be to change the eligibility criteria to people having contributed in at least one third of the years in the contribution period.

If that bill does receive the approval of a sufficient number of the provinces with a sufficient amount of the population, then it may be that people like Mrs. Sinclair will qualify. We will have to wait and see.

I am disappointed with what I believe to have been undertakings in this place in 1988 and 1989 that this particular problem would be reviewed and it would be discussed the next time there were federal-provincial discussions about amendments to the Canada Pension Plan legislation.

Unfortunately, despite those commitments it is apparent it never did occur. I note again that those kinds of commitments have been given. However, I do believe that this time something will come of it. The hon. parliamentary secretary has indicated that the minister is sending letters to his provincial counterparts concerning this particular problem and that copies will be made available to the House and to the appropriate committee. One can only hope that the next time this comes around the subject matter will be addressed.

I want to at least congratulate the parliamentary secretary and the minister for taking hold of this initiative at this time. I think it is very regrettable and I think a number of disabled Canadians will find it regrettable that this action was not undertaken sooner.

I simply want to go on record again as being in favour of the improvements to the Canada Pension Plan regime that are contained within Bill C–39, but would certainly want to see further improvements. I do hope the provinces will see fit to approve the measures contained in Bill C–280, which was passed in this place earlier this week. I do look forward to some fine tuning of the act in the future as it relates to the plight of those disabled Canadians who apply late for their benefits and who are accordingly excluded because their qualifying period has expired.

I want to conclude my remarks at this point. I would be happy to answer questions any member may have.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, as I rise today to take part in this debate, listening to all the great debaters who have spoken on this issue before me today, I wonder as we look down the road at this great Canada Pension Plan what kind of a program we are going to have at the end of the day.

• (1650)

I ask myself and this House, are we going to have a better program for the people who are out there or are we going to have a program which fails them as the years unfold?

It is said in order to avoid passing on current debts to future generations of Canadians we must increase payments today. The failure to provide funding today, keeping in mind that today refers to a day, this day, still in recession, means that a lot of jobs are still being lost. It means retraining those workers who are now out of the work force. Today also reminds us of those people being laid off at ages 50 and 55.

Let us be honest here. These people cannot go back and be retrained. They are not going to be able to contribute to this Canada Pension Plan any further. As we look at the acts that have been talked about and dealt with, Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, we can see that these are three very important pieces of legislation which have been at the centre of our social safety net for years.

As tough times come in their days, we promised to always look after our younger people, our older people and our disabled people. I want to, as I did some time here before, quote a statement made by the late great Senator Hubert H. Humphrey: "The moral test of government is how it treats those who are in the dawn of their life, the children, those who are in the twilight of their life, the aged, and those who are in the shadows of life, the sick, the needy and the handicapped".

I think this is what we need to look at today as we prepare to make amendments to this bill. Are we adequately preparing ourselves as members of Parliament and contributors? Are we as the custodians of this pension fund looking after the interests of the men and women of our society or are we looking for another way, a cheap way, to take another tax grab from the public? If this is another tax grab, then it is wrong.

I believe fully and wholeheartedly and have supported unconditionally anything that will increase the pensions and the benefits of Canadians. I believe that this Canada Pension Plan is one of the greatest pieces of legislation ever introduced in this country. I wonder if we are doing the right thing. Are we sincere? Are we really going to make this a better plan? Are we committed to it in this House?

It is a contributory plan, contributed to by the employer, the employee, by self-employed people and by the interest that it earns itself over the years. I believe as we look at the pension plan this is the only pension plan that a lot of Canadians have or will ever have. They are not fortunate enough to work at a company or be in government where they can contribute to another private plan or government run plan. They must look in their later years to have this and hopefully still have the old age pension plan to go along with it.

I really wonder as I take part in this debate and listen to all of the debates across the floor here today and yesterday if we are doing all we can as legislators. Are we making sure that this pension plan is going to be there for the people growing up, for the people who have not yet entered the work force?

I believe we owe it to Canadians to make this a plan that is the envy of the world. I would hate to be one who would take part in making it lesser than that.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague from Prince Edward Island on a very excellent presentation.

As we discuss Bill C-39 today, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowance Act and the Old Age Security Act, my colleague spoke fairly eloquently about certain aspects of the bill. However, I would like to ask him if he could elaborate a little on some of the cases in his riding and some of the difficulties people in his riding might have had in trying to get their pensions and trying to make ends meet.

According to some of the reports such as the one prepared by the National Council on Welfare, it seems that a senior citizen, for example, who is to receive the maximum CPP and the maximum Old Age Security pension as well as the Guaranteed Income Supplement, according to 1989 statistics, would end up receiving approximately $12,217 which, for a city such as ours here in Ottawa, is at most about $200 above the poverty line. In a city such as mine, Ottawa, the maximum a senior is receiving is just about at the edge of the poverty line.

I wonder if my colleague can share with us what is happening in Prince Edward Island and what kinds of problems are being faced by the its seniors.

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for the comments and the question he has posed.

I am concerned, as are most people in this place, about the adequacy of these pension plans. Many seniors have worked all their lives and are in a position in which they have not been able to pay into another private pension plan and are now looking to this pension plan and the Old Age Security as the only pensions with which they can pay their rent, groceries and other living expenses.

I find this very unfortunate. I believe that we, as members of Parliament, always have to be on the lookout to make sure that when we amend legislation such as this, we are doing it with the full interests of all Canadians at heart. I hope to see some day everybody in Canada, the younger people coming up, having the opportunity to pay into pension plans and that this pension plan is one that is adequate to look after people when they reach an age when they can no longer work or do not want to work any longer, when they want to retire with some dignity.

There are many organizations in this country, along with government, that have that responsibility. It is unfortunate that many of our senior citizens today find themselves in that category. I know people in my riding who retired from companies. A lot of them were Crown corporations. They retired back in the 1970s on an amount of money, let us say $500 a month, and today it is still $500 a month. That is not very much money to live on.

I believe there has to be over-all pension reform to ensure that this never, ever happens to the younger people of our society.

Regarding the hon. member's other question of people coming into my office asking about the Canada Pension Plan, and I am sure I have the same type of people coming into my office as you have, one of the big problems is the eligibility for receiving disability benefits from the Canada Pension Plan. Hopefully these amendments will speed up the process. It seems that everybody I have dealt with who has this problem of not being able to work and has no money coming in applies for Canada Pension and is automatically turned down. There must be some way of changing that situation, making the disability benefits more accessible to these people. I do not think that somebody should get it and I am sure nobody applies for it that is not eligible for it. But this seems to be the norm, that everyone who I deal with who applies for it is turned down in the first instance. They go through an appeal and are probably turned down in the second instance and eventually they are eligible for it.

I heard many speakers say here today when they were talking about speeding up this process that the people who are doing it have to work within the laws. I think we as the legislators have to be able to change the laws to give that person who is applying the benefit of the doubt. We have to give them the opportunity that they are going to be able to get that and that they know they are not going to lose their house or apartment by not being able to pay their rent. These are areas that we have to make sure are taken care of.

I again go back to the questions asked about the amount of money people are getting. Certainly there is not enough money and there is never going to be enough money. I am a great advocate of pension plans and I believe that everybody should have the ability to pay into a pension plan. As legislators we should make this Canada Pension Plan a much more lucrative plan. I believe that Canadians would be willing to contribute more money to have a better pension down the road.

It is a hard sell to young people who have a pension plan in their company. I saw this happen two or three years ago where the company said: "Okay, you have two choices this year. You can lower the eligibility age or you can put in money to index the pension". Of course a lot of the young people said: "Well, we want to lower the age that we can go on pension". Those are things you pay for in years to come. There are people now who would like to have had that indexing in there and it is not there and that is unfortunate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I go into Private Members' Business, I have received written notice from the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, Mr. Taylor, that he is unable to move his motion during Private Members' Hour on Friday, November 29, 1991. It has now been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a).

Accordingly I am directing the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence. Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b) Private Members' Hour will thus be suspended and the House will continue with the business before it prior to Private Members' Hour.

It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved that Bill C-283, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (election expenses), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to introduce this bill into the House of Commons. It is the first time I have introduced this specific legislation, although I have dealt with similar legislation in the past.

The purpose of this legislation is to clarify the definition of election expenses as it relates to the costs incurred by individual candidates and political parties during an election.

Members of the House who were here prior to the 1988 election will remember a committee of the House of Commons looked into the affairs of Marcel Masse, the cabinet minister, and his election expenses in the 1984 campaign. We were all shocked to find out that Elections Canada had deemed that a lot of expenses that were conducted by that campaign were not to be included in the election expenses. They were called by a new definition "campaign expenses" and did not come under the limitations that the legislation which was passed in the early 1970s called for. In other words by spending money in certain areas that candidate in his campaign was able to spend a lot of money and basically ignore the limitations that the legislation had called for.

As a result of that loophole we found out that that category had expanded in 1988 and that a number of campaigns had spent money in those areas. We do not believe that is fair.

The legislation passed by this House of Commons almost 20 years ago has been the law of this land for that length of time. It specifically calls for a limit on the amount that a campaign can spend at the riding level and a limit at what can be spent at the federal level.

I realize that there is a royal commission at the present time and that the royal commission has also been asked to look at this particular issue. I am concerned knowing that royal commissions of the past have tended not to report by the time that was specified. It does not look like the commission itself will report until January.

Even with the best of wills in this House of Commons and even a very non-partisan approach from the royal commission to the legislation that will come does not guarantee that any draft legislation or any follow-up legislation to the royal commission will be in place in time for the next federal election.

We know that traditionally we do not invoke parts of the election act until one year after it has been passed by the House of Commons. We know that in 1974 we had an election using old election legislation even though the House of Commons and the Senate had passed new election legislation.

The reason that occurred is that the election legislation that passed prior to the 1974 campaign was not passed soon enough to allow the mechanisms to be put in place and acted upon. I am very concerned that even if the royal commission comes down with a very firm definition on election expenses among the other things that it has to deal with in its mandate there is every chance that this House of Commons will not have passed new legislation in time for it to be in effect for the next federal election.

I basically tried to take a non-partisan approach to this legislation. The original wording came from the Ontario legislation obviously passed prior to the election of Bob Rae. It therefore obviously was not put together by the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Milliken: It may have helped. I am sure it was all—

Mr. Murphy: To make the hon. member from the Liberal Party feel good, yes, the legislation in Ontario which has been in place for some time now had been passed with the acceptance of all parties.

What I had done is basically taken that legislation, change it to reflect the federal situation and add a few categories where I believe we need some clarification.

The approach is basically this. We are saying that all amounts spent, all expenses and liabilities, including those related to opinion polls incurred for the purpose of promoting or opposing directly or indirectly during an election, "a particular registered party for the election of a particular candidate other than" must be included.

I have listed eight exceptions which I am sure all members of this House would agree on had they read the legislation prior to speaking in the House.

Here are some of the exemptions. First, things like the fees of auditors and accountants. We all agree that those should not be included in an election expense because they are basically fees that are required as a result of the election act to make sure that our books are in order.

Next, expenses incurred in holding a fund raising function. Next, expenses incurred for parties or advertising taking place after the close of an election. Most often those are thank you notes. Next, offices and equipment rentals for the purpose following the close of polls. Finally, the deposit of a candidate for nomination. These are certain things which should not be included in the definition of election expenses.

To be fair to all parties and all candidates, everything else should be included as an election expense. Then it is up to each of the parties and to each of the candidates to decide how they want to spend their money. So one does not create artificial areas where one spends money because it somehow is exempt under the election legislation. What we are saying is: "Let us treat everybody equally". If I decide to spend more money on canvassing and less money on radio, that is fair, that is a decision made by myself and my campaign. And we should include those amounts in the election expenses.

Some people who have been around in this House will recognize that the inclusion of polling is something new. Right now it is not included as an election expense despite the fact that hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent by each of the political parties on polling during an election campaign.

I think a definition which excludes one of the major components of all parties' campaigns is obviously a definition which is not accurate and which does not reflect the political reality of today. I think we could all guarantee that if there was not an election going on, this money would not have been spent. You can bet that Decima for the Conservatives or the other political polling units for the other parties would not be engaged in polling on a night by night basis if it was not for the fact that an election was going on.

We do know unfortunately that parties have changed their messages, their targeting of advertising and the communities that the leader visits on the basis of polling results. Unfortunately for some parties they basically changed their policies as a result of polling results.

For us to exclude polling and say that is not an election expense is to ignore the reality of today.

I would be the first to say that this legislation may not be perfect. But I remind the members of this House that this is private members' hour. I would ask them to look at the legislation and then allow it to go to a legislative committee because this was not one of the bills that was chosen for an automatic vote. That will not happen unless all members of this House agree. But we are not saying that this legislation must be passed. We are not saying that this legislation cannot be amended. And we are not saying that this legislation must come back to the House for third reading.

But what we are asking, and what I am asking specifically, is that the members of the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party and the other blocs and independents who are not here right now let it go forward. We ask to let it be examined and let us be in a position that regardless of what happens with the royal commission, we have the ability to examine one of the most fundamental parts of our election legislation.

I say that not only because we need to clean up our elections act but because of the attitude that is out there in the public at the present time. We know the kerfuffle that has existed with regard to conflict of interest legislation. We know that with regard to the Parliament of Canada Act, there is a perception that we do not pass legislation which enacts against the interests of members of Parliament. I see members in this House who sat on that committee. That is the perception. And I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, that the publicity that came out of the committee that looked into the Marcel Masse affair created that same type of atmosphere.

Here is an opportunity regarding conflict of interest which one of the members in the House—a Conservative member to be fair—raised in statements today. The disclosure of our expenses is an area where members of Parliament can help to clean up the reputation of Parliament. I would hope that members from all sides would take that approach.

I am not saying that this legislation is perfect. I said that earlier. But I think it is a step in the right direction. I know that members in this House who have sat on committees looking at the Elections Act and others who have appeared, including my colleague from the Liberal Party, before the royal commission know that this is an area that we have to act upon. To be fair to the Liberal representative, I believe that he has introduced similar legislation in the House of Commons and that the Liberal Party in a well thought out section of its brief to the commission basically plagiarized my private member's bill. At least I admit that.

I want to say that obviously this is not a partisan approach. I and representatives of other parties have gone before the royal commission to say this is what we need. I do not believe that it would be in the public interest or in the interest of Parliament or in the interest of any of us to go into another federal election with the definition of election expenses that does not hold any water.

It would be quite ironic if a member for Trinity—Spadina living well within the limits of the present election expenses spent $50,000 and was below the limit of that particular riding but at the same time was in a position to spend $40,000, $50,000, $80,000 or $100,000 beyond that on items that are not considered to be election expenses.

If my constituency or any other one spends $150,000 in an election campaign, that should be declared. That is the only fair way of dealing with it. Perhaps there are some items that should be excluded. Perhaps it could be money for the disabled. Perhaps it could be money for child care. Perhaps in large ridings like my own there should be an exemption for some of the candidates' travel costs. They should be included in terms of expenditures, but we understand that they are also costs which we may decide that in fairness should be excluded. These exclusions could be for the handicapped or for child care for women who might be going into politics. We do believe that the vast majority of items which are used in the regular ongoing activity of an election must be declared and must be subject to the legislation which was passed in the early 1970s.

To do otherwise just creates the suspicion that we really do not care, that we have passed legislation and made sure that such legislation has existed to benefit only us, and that we want legislation which is so loose that parties can spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on polling and not have to declare it, so that we can spend money.

One of the ironic situations in the legislation as it is now drafted and has been interpreted is we can basically hire every voter in our riding to work for us for $10 on election day. As long as that is less than the minimum wage it is not an election expense.

Some people might find that suspicious. Under the interpretation, if we give an honorarium to someone to work election day and it is less than two-thirds of the minimum wage of that province times that number of hours of work, it is considered to be just kind of covering the expenses of a volunteer worker. It is a wonderful formula.

We have some very large loopholes in our elections act. Rather than encouraging people to use their imagination to abuse the system, let us pass legislation which shows that we in the House of Commons are concerned that elections be clean and fair and that the rules under which we conduct elections are honest and easily understood. Let us make it so that ordinary Canadians know exactly what the rules are and whether or not we are playing by those rules. To do otherwise I think works in the worst interests of all of us.

I would hope and ask for the co-operation of all members in the House this evening to pass this legislation.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to Bill C-283, introduced by the hon. member for Churchill. In his speech, the hon. member said that his bill would clarify the current definition of election expenses contained in the Canada Elections Act.

Perhaps I may start with a short summary of the current definition of election expenses. Under the act, the term "election expenses" means: (a) amounts paid, (b) liabilities incurred, (c) the commercial value of goods and services donated or provided, other than volunteer labour, and (d) differences between amounts paid and liabilities incurred for goods and services, other than volunteer labour, and the commercial value thereof where they are provided at less than their commercial value. All of which are for the purpose of promoting or opposing, directly and during an election, a particular registered party, or the election of a particular candidate. The act goes on to provide examples of such election expenses, including the cost of acquiring the right to the use of time on the facilities of any broadcasting undertaking or the cost of acquiring the services of any person, and so forth.

The hon. member tabled Bill C-283, which, according to the explanatory note, provides a broader definition of the expression. The definition we are considering today provides that "election expenses" means all expenses and liabilities, including those related to opinion polls, incurred for the purpose of promoting or opposing, directly or indirectly during an election, the particular registered party or the election of a particular candidate, other than certain expenses, fees, deposits and transfers of money, such as office rental expenses, fees of accountants, and so forth.

The hon. member pointed out that the Canada Elections Act needs a thorough review. I think we all agree that the current legislation should promote and reflect our democratic system, in other words, a fair and democratic electoral system that constitutes the basis of any democracy. Some countries are still struggling to establish their democratic system. Canada is one of those countries that has a well-established tradition of respect for rights and democracy. The Canada Elections Act has been amended several times, always with a concern for having the best possible electoral system.

Our electoral system must work in such a way that candidates are able to express their ideas, and voters are able to participate as informed and enlightened citizens in the electoral process. Rules and control mechanisms are necessary to regulate this process.

I think we all agree that a review of the Canada Elections Act was necessary, which is why the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing was created in November 1989. The Canada Elections Act has not been subject to a thorough review since the middle of the seventies. The mandate of the commission is to investigate and report on the principles, procedures and rules regulating the election of members of the House of Commons as well as the financing of political parties and candidates during election campaigns.

The commission heard a lot of evidence relating to public financing, the financing of parties and controls, the organization and financing of riding associations, political party regulations, ceiling and posting of election expenses. The commission also dealt with the following issues: Should the expenses of local candidates continue to be restricted during federal election campaigns? If so, what should this ceiling be? Should the definition of "election expenses" be relaxed? If so, what expenses incurred by candidates and parties should be excluded? Should pre-election expenses incurred by parties or local candidates be controlled or not? To what extent should volunteer labour during a campaign be considered as a donation or an electoral expense?

I understand that the commission heard the testimonies of 30 some people who considered the definition of election expenses and ceiling. It seems that most of them were in favour of a more flexible and more precise definition than the existing one.

The Ontario Commission on Election Financing recommended that the federal law use Ontario's definition of "election expenses" and consider all expenses made by or on behalf of a candidate to be election expenses, unless specifically excluded.

Some groups and individuals recommended that limits no longer be set for some expenses, in particular administrative expenses, office rental and volunteers' expenses.

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform should publish its report very soon. I think that we would be well advised to wait for the commission's results before taking a position on the question before us today.

Before I conclude, I would like to tell you that there is some question as to whether persons loaned by a company or a union at election time should be considered volunteers or full-time staff. The present law is ambiguous on it. This point was raised with the commission and many Canadians have questions about it. I think that on this score, I will wait for the commission's recommendations to clarify the situation. If he did the same, my colleague from Churchill might avoid remarks from some members of this House that he does not appreciate but which reflect reality.

One may wonder whether someone who takes a position as a volunteer but is officially paid or could be considered to be paid should be counted. I think that the commission should answer all those questions.

In conclusion, I come back to what I said at the beginning. I think it is somewhat premature and may show disrespect for the royal commission, which was created in 1989 and is to report on its work shortly, if we try to set up another parliamentary committee to study exactly the same issue as the royal commission.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I heard the hon. member for Portneuf and I regret that he finds it impossible to support the bill introduced by my friend, the hon. member for Churchill. The reason given by the hon. member is the same one we heard earlier today from the government House leader. We asked the government to introduce the enabling legislation for referenda and the government House leader said that he and his government were waiting for the report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform.

I regret that the government House leader should have a problem on this. The government had promised to do it and now it might be withdrawing that undertaking. I believe it is a problem for everybody, but the fact that a commission is studying the matter is no reason to stay idle when faced with the difficult questions raised by the bill in the name of the hon. member for Churchill.

[English]

The bill is one that I want to support whole-heartedly. The principle of disclosure of campaign expenses is a sound principle that we have supported before the royal commission in presentations that the president of the Liberal Party of Canada made, that the acting leader of our party at the time made and that I made as critic for election reform matters of this party.

The hon. member for Churchill in introducing this bill is advancing the cause. In his speech he referred to the fact that in our presentation to the royal commission we plagiarized his former bill on this subject as a definition of election expenses.

The term "plagiarize" is an unfortunate one that I know he did not intend. It suggests that somewhat what we did was improper. He ought to have said that we imitated his bill because after all imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. We agreed with the hon. member in his definition. We thought it was a reasonable one and we adopted it and in our presentation we said it was his. We acknowledged that it came from that source. We were not seeking, in any way, to claim credit of authorship. We simply adopted what clearly had been worked on by the hon. member as a good definition and said we supported it.

We believe that the election law of Canada ought to be developed in a non-partisan way. We believe that it should be developed in this House primarily by all parties acting in concert in trying to achieve very significant and substantial agreement on what the law should be.

It is clear, in our view, that if there is no such agreement, if one of the parties in the House has a majority at the time runs roughshod over the others or, indeed, if two parties gang up on the third party and run roughshod over its rights in forming the electoral law, then we will undermine credibility in our electoral system which, of course, is not in the interests of anyone in this country.

Canada is perceived as having a pretty fair and balanced electoral system with problems here and there, but by and large our system has been the envy of many. We must do everything we can, as parliamentarians, to uphold the integrity of that system. That is why I think the bill introduced by the hon. member is an important one, because it advances the principle of disclosure of public information about the way elections are run and the way they are financed.

The whole thrust of our electoral law for the last 25 years has been to further this cause of disclosure and to set a limit on election expenses. The imposition of the limit has been vital to the success we have had in controlling election expenses in Canada. The limit that is placed on the constituency associations and candidates in the constituency during an election campaign is very important and the amount we spend is significantly less than is spent by candidates in the United States where there is no such limit on expenditure.

The fact that there are so many expenditures that are excluded from the current definition is a cause of concern because those expenses can career out of control. The fear is that the poll will be used as a means of campaigning in future. I think the hon. member, in advancing his bill, perhaps did not stress that aspect of polling very strongly. It is one of which we are keenly aware. Certainly it is clear from the American experience, from what I was able to learn as result of the work with the royal commission, that pollsters take advantage of the fact that they are polling to pass on a partisan message in support of the candidate for whom the poll is being conducted. In other words, the poll may be there to elicit certain information, but it may also be conducted in order to convey support for or information about a particular candidate and thereby assist in the election of the candidate, not merely solicit information.

If that kind of poll is allowed to go on and the cost of the poll is not included as an election expense, then clearly we are putting coach and horses through the election expenses law that we now have in place. The hon. member's bill accordingly seeks to correct that anomaly. I think it is a fair and a proper correction. I hope that we could advance this.

I see no reason to wait for the report of the royal commission. I know the government is very keen to wait for that report, but when the commission was initially set up we were told the report would be forthcoming in September of this year. It will be December next week and we know that the commission report is not coming down this month. It is late. The next election is expected next fall. If the government follows normal constitutional practice and gets out of office at the end of four years, as it should do, then we will have an election next autumn.

There is not time for Parliament to deal with a major change in the electoral law between now and next autumn and have the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada in a position to administer that new law for an election next September, October or November.

I know the hon. member for Halifax West is reluctant to go to the people that soon. He is aware that if he does he will get thrown out. That is too bad but that is the price you pay for running a bad administration. The hon. member should be enthusiastic about going to the people and giving them an opportunity to express their views on his government's record, the government that he supported. If he thinks the record is so good, then I know he will be confident in going to the people because he knows he will win.

If he recognizes, as we do, that it has been very bad, he will be reluctant. I can see the reluctance is there. I suspect he knows the truth. Perhaps that will keep him quiet for a few minutes.

It is important that we look at the question of dealing with this legislation immediately. In my view, there is a lot of legislation, a lot of bills on the Order Paper dealing with elections, including my own. The hon. member referred to a substantial item which, unfortunately, I cannot get drawn. I notice there was another draw today and I have missed again. If I could win a draw on a bill, I assure the hon. member I would bring this forward in a serious way to try to deal with this issue. I am afraid that by the time the report of the royal commission gets here, and by the time the government decides what it is going to do with the report, it will be too late for us to put in place the changes in the electoral law that we ought to have in place in order to run the next campaign.

That is why I have had this bill sitting on the Order Paper for over a year and why I have sought to advance it. Unfortunately, because of the luck of the draw, I have simply not been able to do so.

This is a significant but small move as part of what I believe should be a larger package of reform. I am happy to support the hon. member in his efforts. I wish the government would give its unanimous consent today to allow this bill to proceed to committee where we could study it in some detail. As I say, it represents a substantial improvement in the law and we are happy to support it. I hope the government will do so in order that we can get on with this important matter.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I too am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-283 submitted by the member for Churchill.

This bill would involve an amendment to section 2 of the Canada Elections Act. Specifically, it proposes changing the definition of an election expense.

I am not going to imitate the opinion of the member for Kingston and the Islands but I must agree that the definition of "election expenses for candidates and political parties" is vague and can be subject to widely differing interpretations. At times the application of the definition can seem to be quite arbitrary and this has led in many cases to confusion and the possibility for both intentional and unintentional abuse.

This is my first term in this place and the election of 1988 was my first. I was lucky to have an official agent who was a stickler for detail. He insisted that we follow his very strict definition of what an election expense was. We did, but there are still many, I do not want to call them debates, but we had a lot of active discussions about what was and what was not an official election expense.

I have talked to more experienced members in this place and know that the concern about interpretation is not limited to new members. The problem has been recognized and it is already being addressed outside the context of this bill. The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing was set up by the government in November 1989 to do a comprehensive review of electoral legislation.

I am advised that the commission has heard and read many submissions which address the definition of election expenses. The sponsor of this bill and all of us who have been through the electoral process understand why these submissions have been made. The very fact that this topic was considered to be an issue by so many people should tell us that it is time to consider a clear and comprehensive definition of election expenses.

Many of the submissions to the royal commission contained recommendations on how to change the legislation with respect to election financing. Most of the recommendations contained proposals to change the definition of an election expense. This is a recognition of the pivotal role played by the definition of election expenses in the application of the election financing laws. Proposing a new definition for election expenses is no doubt a challenge. However, there are so many related issues to examine and questions to consider.

The Canada Elections Act contains many complex rules with respect to accounting for election expenses. Therefore, the definition of an expense must be very carefully laid out.

Decisions involving finances have to be made quickly and candidates and their parties have to be aware of their rights and obligations. I do not agree with the haste put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I do not think there is a great hurry because we have about two years before the present mandate expires. We have two years before the next federal election is required.

There are many important initiatives that have to be completed before this mandate does expire and I look forward to seeing them completed. However, at the same time, even two years goes quickly. Time seems to compress itself.

I do think it is important that we proceed fairly quickly because in order for the electoral process to work properly in the next election and in subsequent elections, candidates and their official agents must be able to judge whether their particular expense will qualify as an election expense or not. This is one of the fundamentals. It seems that the process could be improved through a revision to the definition of election expenses.

The member for Churchill has made an attempt to improve the electoral process by introducing Bill C-283. We, and many members of this House, can applaud him for his efforts although we do not necessarily agree with all the results.

There is a place in this House for private members' initiatives, a very important place. Private members' business should have more priority than it does, but I am concerned that this issue is more complex and the impact more far reaching and is far too involved for us to resolve within the context of a private member's bill.

The proposed definition in this bill is more all inclusive than the current definition. It says that election expenses mean all expenses and liabilities and then lists specific exclusions. The current definition simply lists those items included. The definition contained in this bill is seen as broader than the current definition of an election expense.

Before we examine this definition any further, it should be pointed out that the definition of election expenses is central to the regime set up in the elections act for the control of election activities.

It is therefore impossible to agree to the contents of this bill without considering how it affects other provisions in the act and the way electoral campaigns will be run. Any change in the definition of election expenses will have far reaching consequences.

One of the significant consequences of changing the definition of election expenses is its impact on spending limits. As we all know, the act imposes a limit on spending of election expenses for a candidate during an election. The limit is based on a formula related to the number of names on a preliminary list of electors and the candidate's electoral district.

Those of us in this House will know by experience, but for the sake of those reading or anyone watching this debate, we should mention that the base amount begins with a dollar for each of the first 10,000 names. It is 50 cents for each of the next 10,000 and 25 cents for each name over 25,000.

As I understand it, the limit is then adjusted if the number of names on the preliminary list is less than the average for all electoral districts or if the number of electors per square kilometres is less than 10. The spending limit is also raised annually in relation to the consumer price index.

Since the expenses definition in this bill is more inclusive and broader than at present, this will almost certainly mean that candidates will reach their election expenses limit faster since more items will be included. In other words, the inclusion of many more activities and expenses within the definition would increase the total expended.

This would mean that unless the limits are increased, the definition may create hardship for parties and for candidates. I have to indicate my strong, personal objection to increasing those limits. It is time for politicians of all parties to start setting an example of fiscal responsibility and respect for taxpayers' dollars.

It is time to lead by example, and it is not the time to increase the amount of money we can spend on elections or any other thing. I sincerely hope we are all aware of the importance of spending limits and financial controls for the electoral process. They are there to provide some assurance that one particular candidate cannot because of access to more funds have an unfair advantage over the other candidates in the campaign.

We talk a lot in this House about a level playing field. This is the level playing field which allows all candidates to present themselves fairly to the electorate.

I cannot over-emphasize how critical this concept of spending limits and the related concept of election expenses are to our democratic system. Not only does the definition of an election expense affect spending limits, it will have far reaching implications with respect to other provisions in the act.

It is one thing to suggest a new definition for a single concept in a piece of legislation, it is quite another to consider all of the implications the new definition may have on the piece of legislation as a whole. That is what this bill is missing, it is missing the over-all comprehensive assessment of the election expenses scheme and that is why I cannot support it.

As I mentioned earlier, the royal commission has been receiving both oral and written submissions on the issue for two years. Included in the submissions I understand that some 30 interveners have commented on issues related to the definition of spending limits on local campaigns.

Most of the interveners favour the development of comprehensive definitions of election expenses, a comprehensive definition which is much clearer than the definition which now exists. The royal commission will be reporting to us in the near future. It has been working on this issue for over two years. I believe it is our obligation to hear what the commission has to say on the topic of election expenses before we take legislative action in this House. To do otherwise would indicate that we have no respect for the judgment of the commission or those who provided input.

We have all had the opportunity to sit on committees of this House. Most of us have presented reports and several of us have been irritated when those reports seemed not to have been listened to. Let us not jeopardize the future recommendations of this commission by making a premature decision.

The commission will have taken into consideration the full implications of changing the present definition of election expenses. That was a key part of its mandate. It will have looked at the issue in depth, and I am sure we can benefit from its efforts.

As I said, the commission's report is expected very soon. We should provide it the opportunity to fulfil its mandate and, when it does so, we can look at its recommendations as a package. it is my view that changing the definition of election expenses could have such vast consequences for the Election Act as a whole that we have no choice but to look at this in the context of a package of reforms.

There is little doubt that if we amend the provision in the act containing the definition of election expenses we will need to amend other sections in the legislation as well. An integrated set of reforms is what is needed.

The definition of election expenses is not the only imperfection in the election laws. There are many other issues before the commission and these too will be addressed in its report.

My position is that we should wait until the royal commission delivers its report and we have had the opportunity to review its findings before proceeding with any amendment such as that presented today in Bill C–283.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, let me begin my remarks on Bill C–283 by underlining those made by the member for Red Deer when he said that the obligation of this House of Commons is to await the report of the royal commission on electoral reform.

To do anything else by way of tinkering or tampering with the provisions of the Canada Elections Act would be to fly in the face of the efforts being made by that royal commission which really represents not only the Government of Canada but the people of Canada in the process of electoral reform. It has given an opportunity to all Canadians to appear before the commission and air their views on changes in the Canada Elections Act.

This is especially true of the matter of election expenses which lies at the heart of the whole electoral control system. We could talk about election expenses on the one hand and the definition of election expenses, but that extends over into the limits on election spending and a number of other areas that are really at the heart of the control of elections across Canada.

I do not think there is any doubt that the proper course for the House of Commons is to examine this bill and take an interest in any recommendations for change in the elections law, but when it comes actually to changing the provisions of the Canada Elections Act we should only do so on the basis of recommendations made by the royal commission on electoral reform.

I want to make some remarks about the whole process of election expenses. I have a very personal interest in the matter because I happened to be involved in the first elections that took place in Canada under the new provisions governing election expenses. These were the by–elections that were held in 1978. Since then I have faced the application of the Canada Elections Act in four subsequent elections. It is amazing how the attitude toward the provisions has changed over those five elections.

At the outset there was a fairly flexible interpretation of the rules. Over that decade the interpretations have become more fixed and more definite. The election officials are always reaching out for clear definitions.

If I may, I will at least support the member for Churchill to the extent of saying that we all recognize the need and desirability of having a very carefully crafted definition of election expenses, but I question whether this House of Commons and members of the House are at this stage of development prepared to decide in exact terms what that definition should be. I question whether we have the ability to make that determination at this point.

There are a number of myths that I would like to explore connected with elections and election expenses.

The first is that there is a correlation between the amount one spends and success in an election. I do not have to look any further than my own constituency and the last federal election to disprove that point.

In the last federal election expenditures in Halifax West, my own constituency, by the New Democratic Party candidate exceeded the expenditures made on my behalf in the election campaign by a considerable amount. I think it well may be that New Democrats saw the possibility of victory in their own defective way and that caused them to spend the amount of $44,434 on the election. Whereas in my own case the amount was $36,535. It was a very modest amount considering the limitation applicable to Halifax West, but here is the point that I want to make.

In 1988 the number of votes acquired by the New Democratic Party in Halifax West dropped to 9,011 from 11,626 in the 1984 election. That drop represented a decrease from 20.8 per cent of the entire vote to 16.3 per cent.

I can understand in a way why members of the New Democratic Party are concerned about election expenses. It is because they proved, at least in the case of the federal constituency of Halifax West, that the greater effort in terms of expenditure of funds did not produce the electoral result they presumably wanted to achieve. Their vote dropped in terms of numbers and percentage and their election expenditure went up very dramatically.

We ought to recognize that there are a number of aspects and factors involved in expending money on an election campaign. If I had my own desire, the amount that one could spend would be dramatically limited. Some items could even be excluded such as signs on lamp posts and other public places that are an annoyance in some cases to the public and contribute very little to the electoral process.

I think we should be considering some of those items. What is an appropriate object of an electoral expense? This can be done by a group like the royal commission on a non-partisan, objective basis. That would result in a better election law for all candidates and in turn for all Canadians.

If we review the current definition of electoral expenses which we all agree is inadequate and causes amazing difficulties, I do not think anybody would support continuation of the exact provisions of the current definition of electoral expenses. But whether the provisions proposed by the hon. member for Churchill in his Bill C-283 are an appropriate change and reform is another question.

Let me give one example. The member for Churchill mentioned that under the current definition one could expend money on election day to provide financial assistance to workers. Provided it was below a percentage of the minimum wage it would not be considered an election expense. I think that determination is fraught with error. I hasten to point out, in case anybody is interested, that my largest election expense included in that very modest amount of $36,535 was $14,000 for that exact service, to defray the cost of those who worked on election day knowing that they had to pay for child care, knowing that they had to incur expenses for meals, knowing that they had to provide transportation. In the case of each poll we provided a modest amount of money to defray those kinds of expenses. The total of all that expenditure was $14,000 and was over a third of the total expenditure.

When the member says that amount does not have to be included in election expenses, I wonder what other members did with respect to the reporting of their election expenses. The point I am trying to draw from that is that there is a definite lack of uniformity in accounting for election expenses.

When we look at the division and the classification of election expenses as we go over the report of the Chief Electoral Officer respecting election expenses, we are left in the dark in terms of what exactly was expended and for what exact purpose.

As I have clearly indicated, an item that was a major item in my election expenditure is not even considered an election expenditure by some other candidates because it involves a modest amount paid to party workers to defray their expenses.

What all this leads to is the conclusion that while change is necessary and desirable and while reform is required, the appropriate body and authority to carry out those reforms is the royal commission on electoral reform. It was appointed on November 15, 1989 and involved five members of acknowledged abilities and expertise. They have held, as I said, public hearings. I think their conclusions will provide a basis for the changes that will enhance the elections law of Canada and improve the Canada Elections Act.

We all know that not only members of the House of Commons have commented unfavourably on the current provisions, but the Chief Electoral Officer in 1986 suggested the need for changes in the definition of elections expenses. That was repeated after the last federal election in 1988. I think we can all agree that change is necessary and required, but we cannot agree on this very day on what is the process by which those changes are made and the ultimate result of that process which would be the new provisions to be placed in the elections act defining election expenses.

Other members of the House in their presentations pointed out the correlation of election expenses to limits on election expenditures. If we are going to give a broad definition of election expenses we have to consider the impact of that definition on the total limitation of election expenses. I think that everyone involved in election campaigning will tend to agree that the better course is a lower limit on election expenses. It is the higher limits that can lead to poor practices in the course of campaigning.

In the case of my own constituency of Halifax West in the province of Nova Scotia, it encompasses five or more provincial constituencies. Each one of those provincial constituencies permits electoral expenses greater than the whole of the federal constituency of Halifax West.

In 1988 when a federal election took place in November—it was called after a provincial election took place in September 1988—I was faced with party workers who had acted under electoral expense rules five times as generous, if generosity is the right choice of word, as the federal limit. We had to tell people constantly that we could not provide elaborate signs and that we could not provide the written material, the printed matter that was available in provincial elections.

My clear conclusion from that experience is that the provincial election limits in Nova Scotia—and I cannot speak for any other part of the country—are far too high. That in turn involves large-scale collections in the course of a campaign. It involves too many people contributing too much money to an election campaign. That is what gives rise to public concern for mischief in the political systems.

We would do ourselves a service and we would do the people of Canada a service if we carefully reviewed the recommendations of the royal commission on electoral reform that I am sure will relate to the matter of election expenses, the definition of those election expenses, what ought to be encompassed in the definition, and what limits ought to be placed on election expenses.

If we follow that careful process, we will benefit not only the electoral process of the House of Commons but the whole Canadian electoral system.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure for me to rise and speak in this debate concerning Bill C-283, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, as has been put by my hon. friend from Churchill.

In speaking to it I would very much want to associate myself with the remarks made by my colleague from Halifax who just spoke. I noted the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I believe he indicated that he viewed this bill as a small step toward a needed larger package of electoral reforms. I feel that, given the proximity of the report of the royal commission which is busy studying electoral reform, this House would be well advised to wait until that report has been received.

The issues raised by the hon. member's bill are being considered by the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, which was established in mid-November of 1989. Five commissioners were appointed under the Inquiries Act to inquire into and report on the appropriate principles and process that should govern the election of members of the House of Commons and the financing of political parties and of candidates' campaigns.

Over the past couple of years the commission has held cross-country hearings and has received hundreds of submissions, some of which deal with accounting issues. The commission was given a very broad mandate by the government and was asked to do a comprehensive review of the electoral legislation. I am advised that the commission is expected to make its report in January of 1992 and one would fully expect that commission, after over two years of work, would address the issue of election expenses and make appropriate recommendations for this House to consider.

The amendment proposed in this bill may well be worth while. I am not disputing that. I cannot find myself supporting it at this time because, as the member for Kingston and the Islands indicated, we need a larger package of reforms and I think we should be looking at the larger context of electoral reform before we proceed with any one single amendment. There may well be other provisions in the Canada Elections Act which would need to be amended as a consequence of this.

In conclusion I just want to say that I think members would be well advised to wait for the report of the royal commission which will be received shortly.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

RACISM

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, on September 19, I asked the Prime Minister if he would implement stronger measures to combat increased racism in Canada, but unfortunately I did not get a very satisfactory answer at that time. I have referred the matter to the adjournment debate tonight.

I pointed out on that occasion that during the past summer there were several serious racist incidents in Canada, particularly in Halifax, in Montreal, and in other Canadian cities as well.

A major story was printed in the Montreal Gazette of July 31, 1991, following the killing of Marcellus Francois, a young black person by a Montreal policeman. The Montreal Gazette reported it and the headline was as follows: "Race Relations; Official Silence is Deafening. Politicians have to speak out to ease tensions and to soothe tempers".

Not enough action and not enough leadership have been shown by political leaders at all levels, and that is why I was asking our government to take more effective action.

I realize that the responsibility for these incidents is not just the responsibility of the federal government. It is important that leadership be shown. I think there are many things we could do at the federal government level that would show examples to the other levels of government, the provincial governments and the municipal governments. We could implement more affirmative action, especially in the justice system, with our police forces, in our courts, in our prosecution and in our parole.

Unfortunately we do not see many black faces in our justice system. Consequently, when the matter of law enforcement is necessary, it is very often whites against blacks in certain situations.

In Montreal over the last few years, three young blacks have been killed by the police, two without cause in the cases of Anthony Griffin and Presley Leslie. There is the recent case of Marcellus François, and that case is still under investigation.

There seems to be an attitude at times that if you are black or if you are an Indian, then you must be guilty, and our justice system reacts accordingly.

In Halifax, on September 12 of this year a special committee said that sweeping changes were needed in Nova Scotia to deal with increased racism. That committee was set up after the riots which took place in the month of July. That committee made 94 recommendations, some of which applied to the federal government and in particular to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. All the recommendations of the royal commission with respect to Donald Marshall have not yet been implemented.

In any case, there are certain things that the federal government can do. Right now the employment equity legislation is up for review after five years. As we know, racism is linked to high unemployment, to poverty, to the lack of education and to the lack of training. I would suggest that there are many things that could be done to strengthen the employment equity legislation in order to give a better break to the visible minorities in this country which make up one of the target groups under the legislation.

Right now in that legislation there are no effective sanctions. Although the law says that companies under federal jurisdiction must have affirmative action programs for visible minorities, there is no sanction if they do not do it. In addition, the law only applies to companies with 100 persons or more and it does not apply to the federal government.

In conclusion, I would urge the government to take more effective action to combat racism in this country, to show more leadership and stop this cancer before it takes hold.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, since the coming into force in 1985 of section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms concerning equality rights, Canada has made great strides.

The federal government is committed to playing a leadership role in the fight against racism and racial discrimination. That is why, last summer, following the events in Halifax and Montreal that gave rise to racial tensions, the hon. Gerry Weiner created in Nova Scotia the Interracial Relations Advisory Group.

The advisory group, which is composed of representatives from the three levels of government and from the black community, has the mandate of developing a plan of action and of presenting recommendations toward the fight against racism. Thus, in 30 days, the advisory group has succeeded in preparing a report which it submitted to Mr. Weiner. This is an excellent example of what can be accomplished by working together.

Canada continues to uphold the basic principles enshrined in the Canada Multiculturalism Act.

Among the initiatives taken in this field, there is the creation of the Canadian Police Centre on Interracial Relations. This centre, whose head office is in Ottawa, functions as an independent organization. Its aim is to improve relations between police and the different cultural groups in Canada.

Other initiatives have been taken in order to implement a global strategy in this field such as the financing of conferences on visible minorities and the police in the Atlantic provinces and the giving of a grant to the Canadian Association of School Boards which is developing policies and strategies for eliminating barriers to equality in the schools.

Together, Madam Speaker, we can make Canada a genuine land of hope, a country where Canadians of all origins will be represented in our institutions, a country where the dignity and the diversity of citizens are protected and promoted.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): On September 24 I asked the Minister of National Defence why a naval reserve facility would still be built when he had just set up a committee to study the excess infrastructure in the Canadian Armed Forces.

• (1810)

The minister said that it did not refer to that particular naval facility. It seems to me to be unfair that this new facility will cost millions of dollars in light of other closures that will be happening with the defence policy announced by the minister.

I want to tell the minister, through the parliamentary secretary, what the cutbacks mean to a base like Cornwallis which has a long history in the military and a long history in the navy and to now see a new naval facility being built when we are cutting back in an area which represents approximately 20,000 people who gain the benefits from that.

The Department of National Defence earlier on this year announced that the recruit levels at Cornwallis will drop by 60 per cent. Cornwallis graduated 4,100 recruits in 1989–90 and it will graduate under 2,000 from this coming year until 1996. When you think that we had a white paper in 1986 which was going to increase our defence forces and now we have one that is going decrease our defence forces, it does not seem right to the Canadian people that you can change policies like this and affect the livelihood of people.

Last week the base commander, Captain Jones, met with the people in the area to explain what this drop in recruits would mean. It means that the military staff at the recruit school would be reduced. It means that the amount of money spent in the area would be reduced. It is stated that it will drop from the anticipated $26 million that would have been spent in the area if the base were continuing in the operation mode it has been under an aggressive Armed Forces.

It is a question of fairness. Why is the minister closing bases when he is giving money to other facilities that resemble ours and that have the capacity to take on that new role? I repeat to you, Cornwallis started as a naval base.

I have tried, as an experienced member of Parliament representing an area that is very dependent on this base, to ask for other things on behalf of my constituents. One of the programs is the YTEP program which would bring in youth and encourage youth from across Canada who are unemployed to join the Armed Forces for a period of 15 months and receive training. This would keep Cornwallis going while we see, in the future, new recruits.

We have had a program and a proposal submitted to the Prime Minister on a peacekeeping training centre for Cornwallis. We have asked for more reserves and more militia to be sent to Cornwallis now that the militia and the reserves will be increased.

The minister is asking me about my time. I started at seven minutes after, Madam Speaker, and it is only ten after. I think if you check with the table you will see that there is still time left.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There might be 30 seconds left.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I do not like to see someone standing and someone else looking at me as if I have to stop before the time has expired.

This is important and I cannot help it if the House is in such a hurry to give me an answer when my constituents, the 20,000 people who are dependent on CFB Cornwallis, are seeing policies that are not helping the nation, that have not really helped the defence policy, zig-zagging back and forth. We have produced constructive proposals to help the area and yet we are seeing the layoffs, we are seeing the reduction in the base and the recruits.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Out of the six minutes there might be 30 seconds left for the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, in Question Period on September 24, the Hon. Marcel Masse clearly indicated that the mandate of the advisory group on defence infrastructure was to draw up a list of criteria for restructuring the Canadian Forces and that this mandate did not extend to existing programs.

The planned naval reserve for Pointe-à-Carcy, Quebec is one of these existing programs. In fact, the plan to develop a fleet school for the Canadian Forces in Quebec City was initiated in 1982, when the project for a naval presence in Quebec was announced. The Canadian Forces fleet school project in Pointe-à-Carcy is already in phase III of the commitment made in 1982. Facilities for training the naval reserve that will operate the new fleet of ships dedicated to coastal defence have been built.

Quebec City was chosen for these facilities on the basis of cost and efficiency. Most reservists live in central Canada. The Pointe-à-Carcy site saves the reservists travel time and expense. Moreover, it will reduce the total cost by bringing together in one and the same complex various organizations located in different places in Quebec City. These organizations are the Naval Reserve Headquarters, the Naval Reserve Division and two cadet corps.

The naval reserve must have the resources it needs to carry out its many tasks and to acquire the skills needed for coastal defence and for the control of commercial shipping in our ports and waters.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, the Department of National Defence maintains the decision made in 1982 to establish a naval presence in Quebec City.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, a few weeks ago, I rose in the House with a question for the Minister of Agriculture and received a reply from the Minister of State (Agriculture). My question was about the GATT talks in Geneva, which are extremely important in connection with Quebec's supply management programs.

At the time, the government was very confident that its negotiators would be able to get the other countries on side and that our supply management system, which has worked very successfully for our farmers, would be maintained. Our defence was that it was extremely important to us, and we had plenty of evidence to prove it. In fact, we were not alone, since Japan and Ireland were also involved in these talks. However, as the weeks went by, we realized that any hopes we had in Geneva had been dashed.

I would like to raise a point which I think is very disturbing. I have here the minutes of meetings that took place with the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec, when in 1987, the Minister of State for Agriculture and the Minister of Agriculture had managed to convince farmers—or so they thought—that the free trade agreement was not a problem for them. They knew perfectly well the Americans never liked our supply management system.

During the free trade talks, the pressure was on, and we were finally faced with a fait accompli, once the free trade agreement had been signed and adopted by a vote in this House. Despite the fact that marketing boards had not been excluded from the free trade agreement, farmers still thought they could get the support of GATT and that article XI—a household word by now—could be used to protect our farm product quota system.

However, there were some doubts, because in 1987, the Union des producteurs agricoles and the Official Opposition said that one item that could turn out to be very important had been dropped and that we had to bear this in mind. At the time, I was sitting in the National Assembly, and the Minister of Agriculture felt there was a risk. He was right, and we are now faced with a situation that is extremely disturbing for farmers across the country.

What we have here is a fait accompli, and in the next few days it will be too late to do anything about a decision that may have enormous consequences for our farmers.

I hope, for the sake of the Department of Agriculture and all those people who managed to convince farmers in the past, that our farmers will have nothing to fear and that they will be well protected. Since all farmers will be affected, I hope that the Department of Agriculture will find a way to provide genuine protection for all our farmers.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, it is absolutely clear that our position in the multilateral trade negotiations has not changed. Our negotiators are still determined to reach the MTN objectives arrived at after consultation with the agricultural industry and the provinces. These objectives are: significant reduction of trade distorting subsidies and in particular export subsidies; better access to export markets; clarification and amendment of GATT's rules, especially article XI, to make them fairer and more effective; establishment of rules to prevent improper use of health and safety regulations to hinder trade.

Canada is still determined to have its proposition to clarify and strengthen article XI accepted by GATT. The government is still committed to protecting our supply management systems. Article XI allows countries to restrict imports in support of supply management efficiency. However, some conditions are not very clear and almost impossible to meet, and are the subject of controversy. We must agree on an interpretation of article XI in order to strengthen it and clarify its meaning. To that end, all parties must agree to negotiate.

Canada introduced a proposal to clarify article XI. Our negotiators have worked very hard to find support for this proposal. Our ministers have also done their part, explaining our position to all parties involved. In September, Mr. Blais went to Geneva, and Mr. Wilson and Mr. McKnight were there this week. They all reaffirmed Canada's determination to have this proposal regarding article XI approved. Canada will continue to follow the same objectives—clarification of article XI in particular—throughout the Uruguay Round.

To conclude, I will say that one of the main objectives of Canada in the Uruguay Round is to improve GATT's trade rules. Our proposal on article XI brings us closer to our objective as it clarifies it and makes it fairer and more effective.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, on October 9, 1991 I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration to increase the number of refugee women brought into Canada annually under this government's program called Women at Risk of which this government likes to boast.

The minister did not answer my question but instead boasted about other parts of Canada's refugee program. In fact, Canada has done very poorly on this program of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees that Canada undertook four years ago.

Women at Risk are those who the UNHCR has found to be real refugees. It also has found that they are especially at risk. I quote from the immigration manual of this government, section IS 3.13 as follows:

> All Women at Risk applicants selected will be Convention refugees or members of the designated classes.
> a) Women at Risk will be in precarious situations where the local authorities cannot ensure their safety. This includes women who are experiencing significant difficulties in refugee camps, such as harassment by local authorities or by members of their own communities. Urgent protection cases, such as women in physical danger, or in danger of refoulement are to be accorded first priority.
> b) Women at Risk may also be applicants who are not in immediate peril, but who are existing in permanently unstable circumstances which allow for no other remedy. Because of a low level of skills, or because they are accompanied by small children, or other factors, these may be women who have been passed over by Canada or by other resettlement countries in the past.

That is this government's regulation. Yet in 1991 out of 540 convention refugees identified by the UNHCR as Women at Risk, Canada brought only 29. We brought only 29 of 540.

In the past four years Canada brought only 127. Why is this? Was there no more room in Canada's immigration plans? That is definitely not so. This government set a target of 13,000 refugees to be sponsored by the government from overseas in 1991. Yet it brought less than 8,000. Why the shortfall of more than 5,000? This government says it could not find enough refugees suitable for resettlement. It said the UNHCR did not provide them.

Yet the UNHCR had a list of 540 women at risk of which this government took only 29. For shame. What a hard heart toward the most vulnerable of refugees and what dishonesty for this government to claim it could not find them when the UNHCR had a list.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to provide additional information concerning the questions raised by the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina in this House on October 9.

Canada was the first country to set up a special program to help refugee women. This program was well received. Moreover, it has been very successful, even though it is still very limited in scope.

There is no limit as to the number of applicants that can be selected each year under the Women at Risk program. In fact, as of September 20, 1991, more than 100 women had been admitted to Canada under that program.

The names of candidates likely to meet the requirements can be submitted to local offices by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, a Canadian visa office or a non-governmental organization.

If the hon. member knows a refugee woman who could avail herself of that program, Employment and Immigration Canada officials will examine the circumstances of her case and determine if she meets the requirements for admission under that program.

The member's comment that the government granted landing rights to only 32 women under that program is inaccurate. Here are the statistics on the number of women admitted so far: in 1988, 40 cases, 97 women in total; in 1989, 30 cases, 88 women in total; in 1990, 28 cases, 67 women in total; and in 1991, as of September 20, 46 cases, 102 women in total.

I believe this is a very commendable effort that contradicts the data provided by the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, in my question to the Minister of National Revenue on September 18 I tried to inform the minister about the impact cross-border shopping is having on Canadian border communities and on Canada's over-all economy.

The number of Canadians who shop in the U.S. is staggering. In the first nine months of this year 45.4 million same day trips were made to the U.S. This represents a 15 per cent increase over the same period last year.

While statistics for the month of September indicated a reduction in these trips, most observers attribute the decline to slowdowns at border points brought about by the Public Service strike. Nonetheless the numbers are high and so is the economic damage.

Cross-border shopping has reached a state where billions of dollars are being lost and Canada's over-all economy is feeling the impact.

Local businesses and municipal governments in border communities across Canada have taken a number of initiatives to reduce cross-border shopping. As an example, in my riding of Stormont—Dundas a retailer in the village of Winchester asks his customers to retain their sales receipts so that they can obtain discounts on future purchases. In the city of Cornwall a local grocery store offers very competitive prices on milk and bread. These two items are used as drawing cards by neighbouring U.S. grocery stores to attract Canadian food shoppers.

The Cornwall Chamber of Commerce business council has also created a customer service excellence awards campaign and a fair exchange program. The customer service award focuses on improving the calibre of service to customers. The fair exchange program assures U.S. customers that they will receive a fair currency exchange rate when they shop in Cornwall.

The council has also conducted a survey to examine consumer purchasing patterns. It looks at the perceptions Canadian consumers have on shopping in Canadian stores, the prices being charged and the reasons why they shop in the U.S.

Local governments, in conjunction with business, labour and consumer groups are not giving in to cross-border shopping. They are trying to do something about the problem and I commend them on their efforts.

However I believe the federal government must assume its responsibility to do its share. The government should implement effective programs to curb the consumer migration south. I believe the government should undertake an immediate public education campaign to inform Canadians of the damage cross-border shopping is having on our country.

The government must take full advantage of its membership on the national task force on cross-border shopping to work with border communities, business, labour and consumer groups to devise a comprehensive strategy that will achieve results. The groups and individuals I have mentioned cannot do it all by themselves. The federal government must show leadership and take the necessary measures needed to combat cross-border shopping.

Some view cross-border shopping as a form of tax revolt by Canadians fed up with the goods and services tax. As well, in border communities the lure of cheaper gas due to lower U.S. taxes on gasoline brings Canadians across the border.

In my riding there is also the compounded problem of considerably cheaper gasoline being available on the New York side of the Akwesasne Indian reserve. I might add that we are speaking about $1 U.S. per U.S. gallon.

My colleague, the member for Sarnia—Lambton, has put forward a proposal suggesting a border community gasoline tax benefit. I urge the government to give this proposal serious consideration.

In conclusion, I hope the government will soon take action on the serious threat cross-border shopping poses to Canada's economy and to the continued economic viability of our border communities.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to answer with more details the question asked by the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas concerning the effects of the goods and services tax on cross-border shopping.

As the hon. member knows, a recent issue of the Canadian economic observer stated that the goods and services tax does not seem to have increased cross-border shopping. That conclusion was based on a trend analysis of movements at the border, before and after the goods and services tax was implemented.

The goods and services tax is not to blame for cross-border shopping. Indeed, this shopping already existed before the tax came into force. As Statistics Canada clearly showed, cross-border shopping is a long-standing problem and it is simplistic to argue that the shift from the old tax, the manufacturers' sales tax, to the goods and services tax, caused cross-border shopping.

Revenue Canada (Customs and Excise) spent a lot of time and effort to devise more efficient and effective ways to fulfill its mandate as given by this House. Officials from the department dealt with the issue of cross-border shopping and I can assure the hon. member that the department continues to do all it can to improve the processing methods.

In addition to improving on customs operations, the department has actively helped other concerned parties reach an agreement on the complexity of cross-border shopping through meetings at all levels and in all regions of the country. The response to that action has been positive and the support for the department's projects is encouraging.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I would like to mention that by associating the goods and services tax with the cross-border shopping we are not doing any good to those who have tried hard to work out a solution to this extremely complex problem of cross-border shopping.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR TIMISKAMING

Mr. Speaker: I wish to bring to the attention of the House that I have an application on privilege from the hon. member for Timiskaming. Another member who is involved in the application is not available at the moment.

I will be following our usual practice of bringing the matter back to the Chamber when our colleague from Timiskaming can contact the other member so that all members directly involved will be in the House when it is heard.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, we have informed the member from Sudbury that we would be raising a point of privilege.

This question is not only of myself, integrity and honesty, but that of my riding. I would like to have this discussed as early as possible because accusations that have been made affect me personally, my family and the people I represent.

Mr. Speaker: I think the House understands the hon. member's position. I hope arrangements can be made to bring it into the House at the very earliest opportunity.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C–44, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (geographic certification) be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee A.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Debate. The hon. member for Trois–Rivières.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I believe I heard you say legislative committee. I think you would find that there would be consent of the House to do this in Committee of the Whole, because there is a desire on the part of the members to complete all stages of this bill today.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, there were no specific discussions with the Official Opposition and the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader with regard to going to Committee of the Whole. However, I have heard interventions from the hon. member opposite and we would be prepared to pursue Committee of the Whole.

However, perhaps in the future the parliamentary secretary might want to inform us beforehand.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, it was certainly our understanding that this would be dealt with in Committee of the Whole today. I am glad that the parliamentary secretary is aware of that and woke up and raised the issue at the appropriate time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): As you may well imagine, Madam Speaker, it is a truly exceptional occasion when the member for Trois-Rivières is given this opportunity to ensure that one of the laws of Canada is amended to deal with a problem that relates specifically to the riding of Trois-Rivières.

I would like to start by thanking the Minister of Labour and his officials, who did an excellent job. I would also like to mention the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the New Democratic Party and their labour critics, all of whom were instrumental in making it possible for us to proceed as soon as the bill was ready and on relatively short notice, to deal with an unpardonable situation, both in our legislation and in the lives of the longshoremen of Trois-Rivières.

Perhaps I may also give a short summary of this case which I have been working on for more two months, a case that is truly incredible, Madam Speaker, and I am sure you will agree.

Section 34, which the House is being asked to amend this morning, was adopted in 1973. The collective agreement of the longshoremen of Trois-Rivières expired at the end of 1985. Since that time, Madam Speaker, the longshoremen of Trois-Rivières have been without a collective agreement, which means they have had no wage increases and no increases in terms of their pension fund. They have had nothing since 1985, and they have been very patient. They managed to get geographic certification so that people working in Trois-Rivières, both in the port of Trois-Rivières and the port of Bécancour, could at last officially negotiate as one unit with the Maritime Employers Association.

The employees, or should I say longshoremen, who work in Trois-Rivières and those who work in Bécancour are both covered by the same certification.

The spirit of clause 34 was that, whether in Trois-Rivières harbour, in Bécancourt harbour or elsewhere, a marine employer was required to appoint a representative to bargain with the legitimate local union. For some years now, Madam Speaker, there has been strife between marine employers in Trois-Rivières and Bécancourt harbours resulting in proceedings after proceedings. They went to the Superior Court, the Federal Court, to all of them. They asked for injunctions and everything else. Meanwhile, the employees, the dockers in Trois-Rivières and Bécancourt, have no one to talk to across the bargaining table to reach a collective agreement. This is not about the employer and the employees disagreeing on the terms of the agreement, but about employees not even having a management representative to discuss their working conditions with. That is what this is about. The intent of clause 34, Madam Speaker, is not to allow employers to fight among themselves and not to settle with the employees across the table.

This explains the significance of this bill and why it is important that it be passed quickly. The dockers have run out of patience and are now on strike. They have been in a legal strike position for a year I think, but they only went on strike a couple of months ago, and rightly so. This is the only pressure tactic left to them to make their employers understand that they have to stop fighting among themselves and sit down and talk. You realize that once the legislation is passed forcing the employers to appoint a representative to bargain with the dockers, this will provide, to the employers at least, a way to solve the problem between these two harbours.

With your permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to read into the record of the House of Commons, the legal text to stress the importance of the Code and the spirit that had motivated those who drafted it originally, spirit which, unfortunately, as we can see today, was lost.

The proposed amendments provide that, when the Canadian Labour Relations Board certifies a local trade union, it may appoint an employer representative of its own choosing if the employer does not do it himself within the time frame specified by the Board. The representative thus named is deemed to be the employer of all the employees in the bargaining unit for the purposes of Part I of the Code and he is invested by law with all the powers needed to perform the duties and obligations of an employer, including—and most important—the power to conclude a collective agreement.

The amendments being considered will give the Canada Labour Relations Board the authority, once geographic certification is granted, to hear and decide any question arising from the application of section 34 and in particular concerning the selection and designation of a management representative.

Under the bill, the management representative is required to represent fairly the employers on whose behalf he acts. This obligation is similar to the one that unions have under section 37 towards employees in the bargaining unit.

If an employer believes that the management representative acted in an arbitrary or discriminatory way or in bad faith in the performance of his duties and responsibilities, he can complain to the CLRB. In case of improper representation, the CLRB can order the management representative to perform his duties properly or make any order that it sees fit to correct the infraction.

This provision imposing a duty of fair representation on the management representative protects the interests of individual employers operating in the ports covered by the geographic certification and at the same time respects the integrity of a regime that has contributed greatly to stable labour relations in the docking industry since it was introduced in 1973.

Under the transitional provisions, the agents appointed pursuant to the provisions of the present section 34 will be deemed to be the designated management representatives in accordance with the provisions of this bill as of the date that it takes effect.

You will understand, Madam Speaker, that these transitional provisions ensure the continuity of geographic certification in ports across the country and will, I hope, enable the parties in the ports of Trois-Rivières and Bécancour to settle the conflict that has gone on, as I said, for six years because no collective agreement has been signed.

The purpose of the law is simply to correct the defective wording identified by the courts, by clarifying the scope of section 34, as I pointed out, which had been considered by Parliament when it passed the law in 1973. The proposed changes will fully implement the geographic certification regime.

I will conclude, Madam Speaker, by asking the opposition parties to continue the excellent co-operation that they have given us for the past two days so that the employees, the dockers in the ports of Trois-Rivières and Bécancour, will have what any employee is entitled to, namely an employer with whom to negotiate a proper collective agreement.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am pleased this morning to participate in this debate and I would like to indicate to my colleague opposite, the parliamentary secretary, that we will be happy to co-operate with the government to avoid any unnecessary delays in the passage of this legislation.

The purpose of this bill is to correct certain flaws in the wording of section 34 of the Canada Labour Code. These flaws were identified by the courts with the result that the present act is, to all intents and purposes, at least in the case with which we are concerned this morning, inapplicable. The fact of the matter is that an injunction was handed down by the courts against the appointment of an agent. The injunction bars the agent from reaching a collective agreement for the ports in question.

[English]

I would like to indicate to the House that we on our side, along with my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River and others, feel that it is high time that the government came forward with this legislation. We recognize that it does require time to analyse what the court has said, determine how to react and how to ensure that the proposed piece of legislation will then stand up in the courts in the future.

I want to remind the House that the employees in question have been without a collective agreement for somewhere between six and seven years.

Working without a collective agreement, particularly in that kind of work, is not an easy thing to live with.

Employees in any sector, whose collective agreement has been terminated, are not afforded the protections they would want and cannot get redress for some of those grievances they have. It is not an easy situation.

First, employees are many times denied the benefits that they should be getting. Second, it tends to sour relations between the employer and the employee, even when nothing is wrong, simply because there is that kind of a vacuum, and that is most unfortunate.

Heaven knows, there are always plenty of things wrong, particularly when we deal with an operation the size of the one that we are referring to. As a matter of fact, I would venture to say that it is amazing there has not been a strike well before this.

Mr. Vincent: There are good people in Trois-Rivières.

Mr. Boudria: I am sure that is so. They are almost as nice as the people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, might I add in my usual non-parochial way.

Perhaps we should be looking at the large number of employees within the association in question. This is something that we would be talking about some other time, I am sure. We contend that it is virtually impossible for 60 to 70 companies to choose one person to represent them all. If it is not impossible it is certainly very difficult. Having a representative appointed for you by the board is not necessarily the best situation either.

I would like to conclude by reiterating to the parliamentary secretary—I know that he is very concerned about this issue—that we are talking about his constituents, to a great extent. We want to ensure that the legislation receives passage as quickly as possible.

Again, I want to commend my colleague from Kenora for his good work in that area and for his indication of support to aid this piece of legislation go ahead as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, we in the New Democratic Party indicated earlier that we would support this legislation.

It is important for those people who might be listening to understand that this is not back-to-work legislation. We are dealing with legislation which basically puts in place a mechanism to ensure that employers get together and, through their employer's association, actually negotiate with the employees affected.

Under the present provisions of the Canada Labour Code there is a procedure for the employers to get together and do just this. However, in this case this legislation deals with a situation in which one of the employer groups has gone through the court system and received an injunction which prevents the employer's association from signing a collective agreement with its workers.

We believe that this particular legislation will be an improvement, and therefore we will support it. I would like to concur with the last two speakers that it has been very hard on the employees, their families and the communities involved to have such a long-standing disagreement. Six or seven years without a collective agreement is almost unheard of in this day and age.

I am glad that the government has moved on this matter, but I am concerned by the procedures that we used. This is not a new situation. The government had an opportunity to act earlier. The government had an opportunity to get the co-operation of the opposition parties.

We had been told in a House leaders' meeting about one or two weeks ago that something would be coming down on this issue. We tried to find out what the contents of the legislation were. We were not given this until Wednesday during Question Period and were asked to pass it in all stages Thursday. That gave us almost no time to peruse the wording to ensure that we were not getting caught in some sort of a trap or mistake regarding the wording.

Thursday morning we came into this House and found out that the Senate had not even been approached to pass the legislation before it adjourned. It was the New Democratic Party, myself and my House leader from Kamloops, who got up at eleven o'clock and asked: "Do we have assurance that the Senate will deal with this?"

We know that the Senate tends to adjourn Thursday and not gather again until sometime Tuesday. We found out that not only had there not been co-operation and information-sharing within this House, but actually the necessary mechanisms had not been put into place to ensure that the Senate would deal with this legislation.

Obviously as evidenced by the debate that has taken place here in this House, there is co-operation among the parties. Had proper notice been given I am sure this legislation would have been passed by this House and by the Senate yesterday and would be law today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Chairman, it is not my purpose to ask a number of questions on this particular legislation. However I would like the member answering for the government to indicate when the employer requested this injunction and when he received the injunction.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Chairman, if my memory is good a temporary one was given in 1989, and a permanent one in 1990. We are talking about TPQ. It was two years ago.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, in the same vein I would ask the member why it took the government two years to introduce this legislation. Obviously it has been an outstanding problem for a number of years because the injunction was received one and two years ago respectively. The fact that the government failed to act probably was the cause of the strike, which has only been going on for the last two months.

Mr. Vincent: Madam Chairman, I have followed the events for several years and every day for the last two years, and there was always the chance and the hope that the employers would come to an agreement. And after each ruling, the employees and the longshoremen would come to me and say: "Well, you win one, you lose one, but things will finally be settled and we will be able to sit at the table." I think that is one of the reasons.

The other reason, without wishing to divulge what is coming in the future, is that these amendments were included in legislation which will soon be submitted to the House to amend various sections of the Canada Labour Code. Following the latest representations by the longshoremen at the end of the summer, I urged the Minister of Labour, the Hon. Marcel Danis, to take these amendments out of his bill amending the Canada Labour Code so that we might pass just those amendments without delay, thus avoiding a debate on other items with which the two opposition parties might not agree as rapidly as with this one.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Chairman, I apologize for being late this morning. I was running from Indian Affairs to Labour.

I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to explain to me the portion of the bill which suggests that the board will now have the power to choose a representative on behalf of the employers if the representatives themselves cannot choose.

One of the things I was interested to know is that there is no suggestion of a time frame here. There is just a suggestion of an appropriate opportunity for the association to deal with that.

I would like to know how the government proposes to deal with that in a collective bargaining sense if the employers have difficulties coming up with a representative to deal with the collective bargaining agency which in this case is CUPE. Could you help me understand that?

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague who was very co-operative on this issue, as I said before. Since the hon. member was not here, I would like to repeat what I said because in my opinion, Madam Speaker, this bill demonstrates—even if I cannot say that I fully agree with my colleague from the NDP—that when the three parties want to make things happen for the benefit of a part of the country, things do happen. I want to emphasize this for my colleagues from the two parties.

To answer the question of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, the board will determine the time limit that it deems appropriate after hearing the arguments of both sides. Employers who do not agree among themselves, have the right to make representations to the board. Based on those representations, the board will rule on the appointment and the time limit. I believe that the board has an in-depth knowledge of the matter, since it has followed the process on the employees' side, as well as among the different employers that have gone to the board several times already.

So I do not foresee any problem on that issue. The decision is still up to the board, once it has heard the parties involved.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chairman, my question relates to the same issue of timing. I would like to use this opportunity especially since the officials are here to say that I am also concerned that there would be a situation where the board would take a long time to act and that could provoke a strike or a lockout or a refusal to negotiate. I know that this House acted quickly about a month ago to pass legislation calling upon the Minister of Labour to appoint arbitrators in the case of those postal employees who were fired or disciplined during that disturbance. It relates to the time at which the Canada Labour Relations Board acted.

I wonder if the member could tell us through the advice he might get from his officials if an arbitrator or arbitrators have been appointed to deal with those people. Some of them have lost their jobs and are obviously unemployed at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, you will understand my interest in the Department of Finance, but I am not as knowledgeable about the Department of Labour. I am very pleased to be involved in this issue, but unfortunately, I do not have the competence to answer my hon. colleague.

However, I am taking note of his question and will transmit it to the minister responsible who I am sure will answer him at the earliest opportunity.

[English]

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Churchill would understand that as chairperson for this committee I was in a bit of a quandary as to the relevancy of his question. I allowed the hon. member to answer. I think you will be happy to know that the question has been taken as notice and an answer will come to him.

• (1040)

Mr. Murphy: Madam Chair, I recognize that the member who is answering for the government is the parliamentary secretary of finance. Usually when we have legislation of this nature which we deal with in the Committee of the Whole we actually do have the responsible minister available.

We agreed to proceed with this legislation knowing the minister would not be here. After we have rushed through legislation—and in both cases it is legislation under the auspices of the Minister of Labour—we are being asked to pass this legislation quickly. We were asked to pass the back-to-work legislation for the postal workers quickly. We are therefore quite curious to see how long it takes government and government bodies to act afterward.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, with respect to this legislation, I can assure my colleague that if the government does not act as swiftly as I think it should, I will be very pleased to inform the hon. member accordingly and to ask for his help again in order to make the government move quickly.

[English]

Mr. Nault: Madam Chairman, I would like to ask the officials specifically if they could give us this kind of information. Was this situation in another particular sector of labour management relations ever used in order to get the particular group of employers or employees for that matter to the bargaining table? Or is this the first situation on record?

I would like to clarify where I am coming from. Would it not be more appropriate for speed purposes in order to get a situation like this rectified to give the Minister of Labour the particular powers necessary to appoint on behalf of the employers either a representative to deal with the employees or to appoint an arbitrator from the outset when the employers are in a situation where there is no agreement?

There is a reason why I throw that out to the department officials. When we arbitrarily have to make decisions of the magnitude that we are proposing to make with the Canada Labour Relations Board having the necessity to choose a representative for the employers, it could cause not only a delay but also some long term labour-management relations problems. I am wondering whether the department officials could give us some explanation as to just how common or uncommon this is. Or is this is a brand new approach to a very difficult issue?

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: I thank my colleague for his question. He should understand that we are trying to set up a system that we believe Parliament had already set up in 1973. Because of the interpretation given to section 34 over the years, we can see today that the spirit of the legislation passed in 1973 is not being followed by the courts. These amendments have the effect of clearly reaffirming what Parliament intended in 1973. I must admit to my colleague that the riding of Trois-Rivières has made history in this, since it is the first time that such a situation has occured in Canada, with a legal tangle where the employers are fighting each other while the employees wait patiently.

I believe that the problem will be solved with this amendment to the Canada Labour Code. Concerning a provision that would allow the minister to appoint someone in advance, I think that is the board's job. The board is there precisely to hear the parties and make those decisions.

I would be reluctant to have the minister interpret law which has been the subject of various court decisions.

[English]

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I understand where the department is coming from. However there is a big concern here.

Let us use the scenario that is before us that there are 60 or 70 employers. They have the right to go before the board to present their cases. When you talk about 60 or 70 employers we could be literally months before the board would have the ability to make a decision on the appropriateness of a particular representative to deal with the dispute.

At the same time we are dealing with the employees who may be on the picket line for a long period of time or without a collective agreement or who could be on strike. In that scenario we could in essence be making matters even worse for the particular employees.

I would ask the department whether it would not be appropriate for us to put a particular time frame for the board to make a ruling. For example within 30 days after a particular period of time has elapsed for the employers to suggest a representative, there would be a decision made as to who would be the representative for the employers.

The reason why I throw this out is if it has never been tried before and if the employers cannot make up their minds as it is and if they decide they want to play games with this whole process, they could tie up the board for months on end and then we would still be right where we started. In other words, the employees are left without a contract and the whole industry is basically in a state of flux.

I just want the department to explain to me whether it senses that is not a legitimate concern. Will the board have the power to move very quickly because of the individual circumstances of the particular process?

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I emphasize that we are dealing specifically with the marine sector. As we speak, the four marine employers in the port of Trois-Rivières get along well and the one in the port of Bécancour does not get along with the other four. Thanks to the employer in Bécancour, the only one there, we are bringing in this legislation. So my colleague will see that his example does not reflect the situation in the port of Trois-Rivières, the port of Bécancour, and even the ports of Montreal or Quebec City. I continue to believe that previous governments set up the board precisely so that it would have total freedom in making its decisions, as it should, based on its knowledge of the issues that applicants raise with it. Consequently, I think it would be rather dangerous to put in a time limit, but rest assured, that as far as the situation in Trois-Rivières and Bécancour is concerned, the employers, at least those in Trois-Rivières, are hoping that the matter can be resolved as quickly as possible, because they do not enjoy that strike either. With that in mind, these amendments are proposed for the best interests of the two parties, the economy of Canada and especially the economy of the riding of Trois-Rivières.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: I would like to follow up on the question that I started off with and that the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River continued with.

I have not been the labour critic for our caucus for a number of years now. But the last time I was actively involved I know that there was a backlog and that it did take a fair amount of time for cases to be heard in front of the Canada Labour Relations Board and it obviously took even longer for decisions to be made.

• (1050)

I am wondering if the member, or to be more precise the the officials through the member, could indicate the average length of time it takes to have a case heard and again on average how long it takes for a decision to be rendered after the case has been heard.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Chairman, I can see that I am going to practise labour law today. I studied it at Laval University, quite a few years back. I would like to point out to my colleague—I regret that I cannot be really specific—but I would like to outline two points to him. I know that in case of a strike, legal or illegal, the board moves up the file to the top of the heap, which means a very short time frame. I also know that, depending on the nature of the case, the board may receive written submissions which, again, means a very short time frame for a decision to be rendered for the good of both parties.

Madam Chairman, I also take his question as notice and, with the help of the officials, we will report to the minister, Mr. Danis, who will certainly be glad to answer him in a specific way.

[English]

Mr. Nault: Madam Chairman, under powers of the board on the first page in the clauses it suggests that by order it will be able to appoint an employer representative of its own choosing. In the briefing documents that we received from the officials on the reasoning for this change it says that it provides for the appointment of an employer representative by the CLRB should the employers affected by geographic certification order fail to do so within the time limits set by the board.

There is no time limit set by the board and that is one of the things that worries me. I am wondering whether the department would see fit to make a small amendment which would suggest in the last paragraph that by order appoints an employer's representative of its own choosing within 30 days, or within 60 days, whatever is an acceptable time frame in an industry of this particular nature.

I suggest that mainly because of the difficulties, and the reasons we are here in the first place, because the employers themselves cannot come to an agreement as to who they would want to choose and if they decide to could tie up that board for a fairly lengthy period of time.

This process would put on record, for the understanding of all the actors in this issue, that they only have 30 days, for example, to deal with the issue. It would also put on the record that there is going to be a collective bargaining process implemented as quickly as possible as a result of the effects of not having a collective process and collective bargaining agent to deal with, as far as the workers are concerned.

I wonder whether the department, through the member, could tell us whether that would not be a significant improvement or it is necessary to maintain the flexibility of the board.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Chairman, I would like to point out to my colleague that section 1(3) states, and I quote:

> Where the Board, pursuant to subsection (1), certifies a trade union as the bargaining unit, the Board shall, by order,
> (a) require the employers of the employees in the bargaining unit (i) to jointly chose a representative, and (ii) to inform the Board of their choice within the time period specified by the Board;

So it is up to the board to specify a time frame to the employers. Finally, Madam Chairman, I can tell you as a lawyer that I cannot see legislation imposing a time frame for a decision to be rendered by a judicial or quasi-judicial tribunal. I cannot see how a government could possibly impose a time frame to a tribunal. I think that once a judicial or quasi-judicial tribunal is involved, it has, by virtue of the statutes, the common law, its own rules, its own customs, but also its own integrity. We must therefore respect this quasi-judicial tribunal.

To conclude, Madam Chaiman, I would like to answer the hon. member from the New Democratic Party. I just receive a message from the minister which says:

[English]

—the minister would appoint an arbitrator only if the parties could not agree themselves as to who the arbitrator to deal with the cases of those employees who were fired or suspended should be.

At this point the parties have not requested the minister to appoint someone to deal with these particular cases.

[Translation]

I think, Madam Chairman, that this answers the question from the hon. member regarding the postal strike.

[English]

Mr. Nault: Madam Chairman, I would like to switch emphasis for a minute and ask a question relating to the geographic area that we are dealing with. I wonder whether the reason we are here today is because the geographic region we are talking about is so large that it has created a process that cannot work for the employers. Has the department taken a look at that particular issue in its entirety and could it suggest to us whether it would be necessary to make recommendations to make the geographic area smaller or split it in half or something of that nature?

Maybe it is reasonable to suggest that the reason why the employers cannot agree is because they are coming at it from different directions and have different concerns on different issues that they are trying to deal with. The only way to rectify that is to change the geographic area we are dealing with.

Could the member enlighten us as to whether we are giving the board the work load of having to make the decision on who the representative of the employer is going to be on every occasion, as a result of the fact that these employers will never be able to agree on a representative because of the unworkability of the geographic zone?

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, perhaps I should invite the hon. member for a visit to my riding.

The port of Trois-Rivières and the port of Bécancour are about a quarter of a mile apart, on either side of the St. Lawrence River. The employees' union certification allows them to work in the port of Trois-Rivières and the port of Bécancour. My position is that since the employees are prepared to work in both ports, to switch and travel to and fro—there is a bridge, so there is no problem—normally the employers should be prepared to do the same.

If the employers are willing—and this is in fact common practice—to hire longshoremen who work at the port of Trois-Rivières and send them to Bécancour, and hire those in Bécancour and send them to Trois-Rivières—so far the employers have had the best part of the deal. They have their employees, there has been no collective agreement for six years, and everything is fine. This legislation is important because it will force the employers, either directly or indirectly, to jointly choose a representative, and otherwise the board will choose one.

In a nutshell, the problem is this: For six years, the employees who are covered by a collective agreement have had no one on the other side of the table to negotiate with because the employers, at least some of them, cannot agree among themselves. Our legislation will oblige the employers to appoint a representative so that the employees, our longshoremen, will have someone with whom they can negotiate.

The geographic area as such is not a problem because only a short distance is involved, and the employees can work without any hardship.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, must Canadians continue with the deadly game of beggar thy neighbour? Must Canada be torn apart by wistful gazing in a neighbour's backyard? Must Canadians continue to use the me too syndrome to drag positive announcements into the political quagmire?

Legitimate government assistance for economic and other development is not a ping-pong game. Nor can we enter into a game of cheque book confederacy.

I could stand here today and reiterate and regurgitate millions upon millions of dollars of economic aid that my province has received courtesy of the federal government over the past six months. I will not do so.

I stand today secure in the knowledge that I reflect the views of my constituents and indeed of Manitobans when I say that what is good for one region is good for the nation and that we are beyond the petty politics of regionalism.

MENTAL HEALTH CARE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, mental illness affects more Canadians than any other illness including heart disease and cancer. However, the government currently spends a maximum of 15 per cent of health care funds on mental health care.

Despite the federal government's commitment of November 1989 to redress this imbalance, transfer payments to hospitals were frozen in February of this year.

According to the Canadian Mental Health Association, a rebalancing of funding could be arranged through the Canada Assistance Plan with guidelines for community health programs.

While the government has been moving toward a community based mental health care system, it has done so without providing the funding needed to maintain mental health care in this manner.

Canadians do not need another report to tell them how to solve these problems. Canadians want action now. I urge this government to put its money where its mouth is and strike a balance between mental health care needs and health care spending.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, the youth of Canada have more at stake in our constitutional discussions than any one of us and they are prepared to contribute.

In response to my invitation, last weekend representatives of six high schools gave up a Saturday to discuss and debate the proposals for a renewed Canada. These young Canadians, three from each school, shared an intelligent, mature approach to the issues and passed 24 resolutions which I have forwarded to the minister of constitutional affairs.

The ideas we hear from youth and our more mature constituents deserve to be shared in a more open fashion. I would call on the government House leader to find a way for us as MPs to present publicly the position and the ideas that we are hearing in our constituencies.

I would suggest that we dedicate a significant block of time in this House to let each of us express our views and those of our constituents on the public record.

There will never be a more important issue for us to discuss and there is no more fitting place for that than on the floor of the House of Commons.

DELMAR CHEMICALS

M. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, yesterday Delmar Chemicals, a Canadian company located in LaSalle, in my riding, permanently laid off half of its employees. Delmar used to supply pharmaceutical chemical products. The federal government granted an increased protection to pharmaceutical multinational companies in order to allow them to be more competitive and to invest more in Canada. Unfortunately, it did not give the required attention to Canadian companies. It did not establish any particular development plan which would have reinforced companies such as Delmar.

The conclusion is clear, Madam Speaker: if the government does not take the necessary measures to stimulate the growth of Canadian-owned pharmaceutical industries, more jobs will be lost. The time to act is now.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I have recently received a letter from a businessman from Vancouver. In it he states, and I quote:

> Illegal aliens are causing enormous difficulties for local business people and landed immigrants who are attempting to make a fresh start in our area as recent arrests and deportations will attest.
> Additionally the prostitution and drug elements these people have brought into the east-end, compound the initial problem of illegal immigration; as a significant number of people conducting these illicit activities are aliens.

These sentiments are confirmed by the large number of illegal immigrants and refugees that were arrested in Vancouver's large drug roundup this week. Many of these already had multiple arrests while in Canada.

These criminals must be dealt with quickly and severely. We cannot let them use our generous immigration policies to destroy the fabric of Canadian society by making a mockery of our justice system.

DAVID MILGAARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic caucus I would like to commend the Minister of Justice for today ordering a judiciary review of the David Milgaard case.

This long awaited decision has been in large part due to the extraordinary efforts of David's mother, Joyce Milgaard, and a loyal and energetic group of supporters.

Mrs. Milgaard's incredible courage and stamina over these many years is not only an example of a mother's love for her son but also a relentless desire to see justice done.

The Donald Marshall inquiry recommended that an independent body be established to review cases where a miscarriage of justice may have taken place. Certainly the excruciatingly painful experience and expense that both David Milgaard and his family have been forced to endure highlight the need for this recommendation to be given real and serious consideration. The present system obviously is inadequate.

I congratulate David Milgaard and his family on this success. I believe that once the Supreme Court has had a chance to review the case, the court will come to the conclusion that a tragic and unfortunate miscarriage of justice occurred in Saskatoon in 1969.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, December 1 is World AIDS Day. Its theme "Sharing the Challenge", is meant to recognize the individuals and the many groups, including governments and non-governmental organizations, that are already partners in the fight against AIDS. It is also meant to involve individuals and groups that have not yet joined the battle.

The participation of front-line workers in this field has proved essential. Community groups involved in the fight against AIDS, persons infected with the HIV virus or suffering from AIDS, and health professionals are the key players. They help us understand how AIDS affects our communities and how we can tackle the complexities of this problem effectively.

The present government is committed to supporting the groups, persons infected with the HIV virus or suffering from AIDS and their caregivers and to forming partnerships. By having them participate in the definition of goals and in the initiatives of the National AIDS Strategy, we recognize their invaluable contribution as allies in our relentless efforts to eradicate this disease in Canada.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, the business people of Saint-Laurent now have access to a new service which will save them time and money, a one-stop information centre on made-to-measure manpower training.

[English]

Partners in Training enables businesses in Saint-Laurent to access various governmental and academic institutions by simply calling a single number.

• (1110)

The one-stop information centre was initiated by the city of Saint-Laurent, our CEGEPs and adult training in order to provide better services to our community.

[Translation]

I want to congratulate the city of Saint-Laurent for this initiative. The one-stop information center will be a major asset for the business community in Saint-Laurent in terms of manpower training.

CANADIAN SCHOLARS PROGRAM

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, this fall the Minister for Science launched the Canadian Scholars Program for the current academic year at Dalhousie University in Halifax. The program provides financial support and encouragement to 3,200 new Canadian scholars who will join over 4,000 young Canadians now pursuing studies in engineering and science at Canadian universities.

The Canadian Scholars Program recognizes the need to promote excellence in engineering and science in order to advance our society in this new age of technology.

I am sure all members will record their congratulations to the new and continuing Canadian scholars whose dedication to excellence will allow Canada to develop and prosper now and in the next century.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, the Reform Party is out of touch with northern and rural Canadians. On Wednesday Reform Party Leader Preston Manning said that he would eliminate the northern tax benefit.

Anyone who is familiar with the north will know that residents of this region of Canada fought long and hard to receive a tax benefit that would recognize the increased costs and hardships of living in Canada's north. The northern tax benefit is not only necessary, it is fair.

The Reform Party talks about listening to the grass roots. If Preston Manning knew he would realize that hundreds of northern communities presented petitions, went to meetings to explain why they needed a northern tax benefit. The Reform Party is not listening to Canadians. It is going to throw rural Canadians to the wolves. It is going to throw northern Canadians out to the high cost of living with no recognition by this government.

While it panders large corporations and the wealthy, the Reform Party through promising to support freer trade and less domestic subsidization in agriculture ignores the needs of Canadians.

The Reform Party is trying hard to pass itself off as a party—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Ross Reid (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to the members' attention the famous World AIDS Day, Sunday, December 1. It is «Sharing the Challenge.»

In using this theme to draw attention to the common threat as well as the common need for partnership, the World Health Organization is not simply making a plea for compassion. It is appealing for people from all over the world to recognize the dangers attendant upon the prejudice that often surrounds HIV and AIDS.

It is appealing for people to get involved in actively putting an end to discrimination against people living with HIV and AIDS. Discrimination has a negative effect on the quality of people's lives. It denies the reality that AIDS threatens us all. People living with AIDS are sons, daughters, brothers, sisters, our colleagues and our friends.

In this country HIV and AIDS, like any other medical condition is a disability, and disability is one of the grounds of discrimination prohibited under the Canadian Human Rights Act.

During this World AIDS Day let us all on both sides of the House make a commitment—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

NATIONAL RAIL TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, Nova Scotians are very concerned about losing access to national rail transportation at the hands of this government. We have not forgotten the insensitive decision to end passenger rail service from Truro to Sydney two years ago. We are fearful that the current attempts by CN to privatize the rail portion of this line is but a thinly veiled attempt to abandon this vital rail link.

We are very interested in the recent cabinet decision to reverse a national transportation agency ruling that would have allowed the 90-kilometre line from Chandler to Gaspe in Quebec to close. We are told that this line has been losing money for years. Yet this train is regarded as an essential mode of transportation to the economically depressed area of the Gaspe peninsula south coast, especially in winter and especially for the elderly who cannot drive or spend long hours in a bus.

True, but what about the elderly in Nova Scotia who live along the discontinued Truro to Sydney line? What about the thousands of jobs that depend upon maintaining rail transportation from Truro to Sydney? Will the government now act to save these lines—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, yesterday an agreement for regional development in the province of Quebec was announced. The agreement involves a contribution of $160 million by the Government of Canada and $140 million from the province of Quebec.

I would like to point out that the government has made very significant contributions to regional development not only in Quebec but in my region, Atlantic Canada, and in the west.

In the budget of 1989 this government announced a regional development allotment for each of the major regions of Canada. The $160 million federal share of yesterday's agreement is from a previously non-allocated portion of Quebec's allotment. In the Atlantic provinces this five-year regional development allotment has a value of $2.125 billion. That is an average of $425 million a year for each year within the current funding framework to be spent on developing the economy of Atlantic Canada.

Developing the economies of all parts of Canada is a priority of this government. It is most unfortunate that some members of the opposition feel compelled to whine and complain every time support is given to a region other than their own, especially when it is—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry the time has expired.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, several of my constituents who are employees of Health and Welfare Canada believe that they are being discriminated against because they belong to visible minorities.

These people feel that they are being denied managerial positions when they feel they are more qualified than others who are appointed and who happen to be Caucasians.

If it is true that the department so discriminates by disregarding the merit principle and give promotions to less qualified employees, the health of Canadians is in jeopardy.

On Tuesday, November 19, the President of the Treasury Board stated that the government will not tolerate racial harassment within the civil service. Yet I have not seen the government take any measures to ensure fair treatment for these employees.

[English]

An impartial agency should undertake a substantive investigation that will look into these allegations and offer recommendations to resolve this issue at Health and Welfare Canada.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, Sunday, December 1 is World AIDS Day and I want to reflect on Canada's role in fighting this deadly disease.

The World Health Organization estimates that up to 10 million people are already infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, and estimates that the figure will sky-rocket to 40 million by the year 2000. In Canada alone over 3,000 people have already died from AIDS.

The most tragic thing about AIDS is that it is preventable. We know exactly how HIV is spread and how it can be stopped. With education we have an excellent chance of saving millions of lives from being ravaged by HIV.

Canada has and must continue to take a leading role in fighting AIDS by maintaining both a strong commitment to international development and by funding AIDS research and education here in Canada. Many developing countries are helpless in fighting AIDS and Canada has the ability to empower them to help themselves.

Too often causes are acknowledged by politicians only once a year on days set aside to mark them. AIDS cannot be fought once a year. It must remain on the political agenda at all times or we risk losing the fight. Canada must do more.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday a Gallup poll confirmed that for 90 per cent of Canadians the recession is not yet over. Today we know why. Today Statistics Canada has reported that the economy actually slowed in the third quarter. It shrank in August, it shrank again in September.

I ask the minister: How much more evidence does he need that his Conservative government's policies are simply not working? Why can he not create policies that bring sustained economic growth and more jobs and not continue with policies that lead to economic stagnation and add more and more people to the already too long welfare lines in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is wrong when he says that growth was negative or slowed in the third quarter. There was positive growth in the third quarter by .9 per cent, certainly weaker than we would have liked to have seen it, but that comes on the heels of a very strong second quarter.

I remind the hon. member that the annualized figures for the second quarter were a 4.9 per cent rate of growth. They have been adjusted upward to 5.7 per cent. We see some other promising signals on the horizon. The level of housing starts in October was 202,000. There was a net of 108,000 new full-time jobs that were created during the period of September and October. The residential demand is increasing. Corporate profits in this quarter are up by about 15 per cent on an annualized basis. Those are the kinds of things that will ultimately be translated into investment and job creation opportunities.

I know the hon. member takes great pleasure in telling gloom and doom stories. I wish the growth rate figures were better, but we are doing everything we can in getting the fundamentals right so they will be better.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, if I am wrong so is Statistics Canada which reported today: "Gross Domestic Product slipped .1 in September following a .3 decline in August". The minister better read his own numbers. Unemployment is going up, not down, bankruptcies are going up, not down and the trade deficit is going up, not down. Why is he saying that Canadians are out of the woods when so many of the government's own numbers are going the wrong way and dragging Canadian workers and their communities along with them? Why does he not wake up and not take pleasure in avoiding the real issue? His policies are dragging this economy backward, not pulling it forward.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will not only re-read the information provided, I will read it to the hon. member: "The national account's data indicates that real output increased by .9 per cent at an annual rate". That is not down, that is up in the third quarter, following a revised gain of 5.7 per cent in the second quarter. That has been revised upward, not downward. "Inventory investment contributed strongly to the growth in the third quarter. Excluding inventories, GDP would have fallen by 1.7 per cent. Purchases of goods and services by Canadians increased at a slightly stronger pace of 1.6 per cent led by continued robust growth in residential investment and government expenditures".

That is the briefing note that I read and I would be glad to table it as well.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, why does the minister not go out and talk to the 90 per cent of Canadians who say that for them the recession is not over?

[Translation]

Only a Conservative government, Madam Speaker, would have the gall to tell us that things are going better when the unemployment rate is going up, the bankruptcy rate is at a record high and exports are dropping.

I ask the minister this: When will he, at long last, give a glimmer of hope to Canadian families? When will he introduce new policies to create employment in Canada instead of destroying it?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am talking to Canadians. I have commenced the pre-budget consultations wherein I have been talking to business people, to consumer groups, to the retail sector, to anti-poverty groups and to people involved and the disabled.

One thing is very clear. None of them are recommending or suggesting that we try to borrow our way out of this difficulty. None of them are suggesting that we try to spend our way out of this difficulty and therefore drive up the deficit.

The hon. member would like us to throw money at the problem and walk away from it. That is not the consensus of Canadians and it certainly is not the consensus of this government.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I want to raise a question with the Deputy Prime Minister.

I have here a whole raft of letters from dairy producers, turkey and chicken producers in places like Killarney, Gretna, Morden, Rosenfeld, Manitoba, a whole series of communities.

These farmers know that their very livelihood is now threatened because of serious government mistakes. Under the free trade agreement, the government gave away the right to impose import tariffs on agricultural products and processed foods which totally undermine the marketing system. The government is now losing the battle of article XI at the GATT.

What is the government going to do to protect these farmers? Because of the real threat to these farmers, because of the erosion of article XI, will the government renegotiate with the United States the agreement so that we can restore the sovereign right of Canada to set its own tariffs on processed foods and agricultural products?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): First of all, Madam Speaker, the hon. member is not factual when he says that the ability to maintain the supply managed system in Canada was eroded by the free trade agreement.

What the hon. member must recall is the only action since the signing of the free trade agreement that has brought any concern to the producers is action taken under GATT.

The hon. member talks about the erosion of article XI. What the position of the government is and what the position of the producers happens to be, and the position of the provinces involved, is a clarification and strengthening of article XI. The hon. member has to be aware when he looks at the free trade agreement that agricultural exports in Canada have increased—have increased, Madam Speaker—since the signing of the free trade agreement. Canada has exported more to the United States of America under the free trade agreement than it had in the past.

An hon. member: That is news to me.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, this minister is once again trying to cover up the fact that under the free trade agreement, section 401, his government took away the right of Canada to set its own tariffs on processed foods. If you cannot set your tariffs on processed foods, your marketing supply sector cannot supply the processors.

If the Minister of Agriculture cannot understand that, then he should quit his job.

Considering that the dairy, turkey and chicken producers are now under threat, the grain economy is collapsing, that every Canadian in every region is being touched by this crisis, will the minister undertake to approach the Prime Minister and tell him that we need a national conference bringing together the heads of government of all the provinces and of this government, to develop a national response, a national strategy, before the entire food industry in this country collapses.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member may not be aware, but the policy that has been put together by this government over the last two years regarding agriculture was a policy that was developed by the producers, the stakeholders, the further processors, the provinces and the Government of Canada.

The hon. member asks why they are demonstrating on the Hill. There is hurt out there. This government has recognized that hurt. The hon. member asked a question, Madam Speaker, and he keeps muttering while I try to reply.

I appreciate the hon. member's new-found concern about agriculture. This government has put forward—

An hon. member: You did not go to the rallies.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, the hon. member says I did not go to the rallies. He should check. I did.

An hon. member: I didn't see you there.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Today we have seen for the first time in some period two straight months of decline in the Gross Domestic Product. We have seen as far as the quarterly figures are concerned a massive drop in the rate of growth between the last quarter and this quarter. And yet the minister gets up and starts talking not about the problems that we have, but instead about the promising signals in this economy.

I want to ask this minister this. Are the promising signals things like the fact that there are 1.5 million Canadians out of work, or that there are one million Canadian children living in poverty, that our investment is down, that we have a trade deficit in this country, that we have record bankruptcies, that farms are in a crisis situation? Are these the hopeful signs that the minister sees in these statistics?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is a fair person, and I ask him in a manner of fairness to consider the fact that the growth in the second quarter was 5.7 per cent on an annualized basis. It has been adjusted upward from a 4.9 per cent figure, and I think he knows, as we all knew, that that sort of record of growth was not going to be sustained.

As a matter of fact, in our projections in the February budget of 1991, we indicated that there would not be growth in the first half. The strong growth in the second quarter was perhaps a situation where there was pent up demand and some of it may have been borrowed from the third quarter. To suggest for one minute that the sustainability of that kind of rate of growth of 5.7 per cent carried through the second half of 1991 was achievable was certainly not in the cards.

I simply indicate to the hon. member that while we would have liked to have seen stronger growth, there are some signals in the area of housing, in the area of corporate profits, in the area of job creation that would indicate that the modest to moderate recovery that we have projected and predicted is still there.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the minister is living in a dream world. What exists out there across this country among farmers, workers, the unemployed, the poor, is a very tough situation. The minister seems to be in a dream world instead.

I ask the minister why he is not prepared to stand up and recognize that we have had two successive months of decline and this government has to take decisive action to change its policies and get Canadians back to work.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not in a dream world. We have had two consecutive quarters of growth. That is the fact. The hon. member says do something. The hon. member is suggesting to spend, borrow more money, spend it, kick-start the economy.

As I indicated earlier, I am engaged in my pre-budget consultations. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, there is no consensus for that course of action. The course of action that is recommended is the one that we are on, getting the fundamentals right, getting interest rates down, getting inflation down, getting the inflationary pressures down, bringing our fiscal house into some order. Those are the recommendations I am receiving from Canadians and I believe very sincerely that that is the right approach for the future of a strong, robust Canadian economy.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, what I hear from Canadians, business, labour, everybody, is first that we have to get rid of the GST and, second, we have to get a lower dollar in this country. That will put us back on the road to recovery.

[Translation]

My supplementary, Madam Speaker, is the following: Does the government realize how much hardship there is in Canada and in Quebec? Its policies have widened the gap between rich and poor and aggravated divisions within the country. When will the government act and provide assistance to Canadian people?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says to get rid of the GST. What would he replace it with? Is the hon. member suggesting that we drive up the deficit a further $16 billion? How irresponsible, Madam Speaker. He says get rid of the GST. That would drive up the deficit an additional $16 billion. That is the kind of nonsensical suggestions we get from the hon. member opposite.

He is now pleading the case to help Quebecers. I understand that yesterday in the House they were very critical of the very legitimate regional development program that was put in place to help Quebecers. He cannot have it both ways. You cannot stand up one day and attack the government for helping in the regional development problems in Quebec and then turn around the next day and plead mercy for them.

HEALTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or the minister answering for him.

The chairperson of the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technology, Dr. Patricia Baird, has stated that the commission will not report until October 1992. Many of the people in the medical field are very concerned about the research that is being funded by this commission, specifically the type of research that is being funded.

My question is how much of the commission's $26 million budget has been spent? What are the estimated costs of the commission, and when will the commission release a detailed list of the research projects that it has or is going to fund?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I understand that the commission has asked for some research projects to be done. I am not in a position today to give the details that have been sought by my hon. colleague with respect to the commission's request which, of course, is an arm's length royal commission. But I will be pleased to forward the requests of my hon. colleague to the chair of the commission, and I am sure that she will address those directly.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Before the free trade agreement in 1987, the Minister of Agriculture made a formal commitment to farmers to protect the marketing system. Given the events in Geneva in recent months and weeks, does the Minister of Agriculture intend to ask the Prime Minister to intervene personally in this issue, which is a matter of life and death for farmers in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, we have just had discussions with the Director General of GATT, Mr. Dunkel, the Minister for International Trade and myself with the Cairns group, with the Quad. After we had concluded those discussions, putting forward Canada's position on the strengthening and clarification of article XI, a position which was developed by the producers and by the provinces and put forward throughout the negotiations by the Government of Canada, I had an opportunity with my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, to meet with the leadership of the supply managed products in Canada. We went over the discussions we had all had in Geneva and the contacts that we had made and the position we have continued to put forward. The outcome of the discussions, as we concluded yesterday between the farm leaders and the Minister for International Trade and myself, was that we would continue to put forward the position for strengthening and clarification of article XI under GATT as had been developed by the stakeholders and put forward by the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, that is not very reassuring. I would like to ask the same minister a supplementary question. On July 23, 1988, the hon. member for St. John's West, who was then Minister for International Trade, told us that Canada would refuse to conclude any negotiations with GATT that would endager our milk producers.

Can the minister still tell us today, can he even assure us, as his colleague did in the past, that Canada will refuse to sign a GATT agreement that would endanger article XI? Yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member has to recall what article XI is about. Article XI as it exists today is not sufficient in the minds of the producers of supply managed products, those industries, to give them the protection that they believe is important and the government believes is important, to allow them to continue the type of supply managed system that we have in Canada today.

In answer to another colleague from the Liberal Party, I had put forward that the discussions that are taking place are discussions between 108 nations. Canada has put forward its position on article XI for strengthening and clarification. We will continue to do that. The hon. member is speaking as if there has been a conclusion of GATT and those discussions. There has not been a conclusion of those discussions. There are 108 countries presently putting forward proposals to strengthen the economic activity in the world. Agriculture is one very, very important part of those discussions that are under way today.

DAVID MILGAARD

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Finally, after having spent 22 years in prison, David Milgaard is having his case referred by the government to the Supreme Court of Canada for a review. The fact remains, Madam Speaker, that David Milgaard is still in custody.

After what the Milgaard family, and David Milgaard in particular, have been through because of delays in this matter, I think it is time to show some humanity. I want to know why the government will not provide that David Milgaard be released on bail so that the Milgaard family have a merry Christmas finally after 23 years.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as my hon. colleague has indicated, the Minister of Justice did announce her decision today to refer the case to the Supreme Court.

I understand that with respect to the specific question of my hon. colleague that the minister has indicated that it would be up to Mr. Milgaard's attorneys to make such a request to the appropriate court.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, if the government follows the procedure that was set forth in the Donald Marshall case, David Milgaard could be out on bail by Christmas and Mrs. Milgaard, who is truly a remarkable woman, would have her son home for the holidays.

I want to have assurance from the government and will the government give me the assurance that it will provide in its reference to the Supreme Court of Canada that the Supreme Court entertain a motion for bail from Mr. Milgaard and his lawyers and that they will deal with it expeditiously.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, again as I have indicated, the Minister of Justice in answer to a similar question this morning indicated that the attorneys of Mr. Milgaard should make the appropriate request.

I understand that on another matter Mr. Milgaard has already benefited from escorted releases in the past and I understand that he obviously will be eligible for such temporary releases in the future, unless the court gives him bail as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

As he knows, over the past 20 years, marketing boards for milk, turkey, chicken and eggs have been extremely important to farmers in this country, especially to milk producers in Quebec, who account for nearly 50 per cent of Canada's milk production.

As a point of clarification, Madam Speaker, since it is so important for farmers, could I have assurance from this minister now that in the GATT negotiations, the Canadian government will protect these marketing boards which are essential to the survival of agriculture in this country? Can I have categorical assurance from this Minister of Agriculture?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks a question that is important, not only to the province of Quebec and those producers, but to producers throughout Canada.

There is a large percentage of production in Quebec in the dairy industry, as he referred to. I can only say to the hon. member that the position that has been developed and put forward by the Government of Canada, that of strengthening and clarification of article XI as it now exists under the GATT, is a position that was developed with the producers. As late as yesterday in discussions with the farm leadership, that position will be maintained.

The hon. member is suggesting that Canada, being one of 108, has the ability to control the outcome of GATT. What we have the ability to do, as everyone else has the ability to do, is to put forward a position that is in the best interests of our producers and we will continue to do that.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I will put a direct question that I think is very important.

If article XI is not strengthened and in view of the importance of these marketing boards for the producers for a stable income and consumers for a stable supply of food products in these areas, can the Minister of Agriculture assure us that if the marketing board system is weakened in any way that he would recommend that his government not sign a new GATT agreement that would deprive us as Canadians of the right to protect our own farmers in this country. Yes or no to that very specific question.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member suggests something that I do not think he has thought through, whether Canada would be able to exist outside the world trading community, whether it be in dairy, eggs and poultry or whether it be in the industrial manufacturing area or the export of products throughout the world.

The hon. member is suggesting that Canada could exist independently. What I have said to the hon. member and continued to say as late as yesterday in discussions with the farm leaders, and the farm leaders in the supply managed areas agree, is we have a position that was developed jointly, a position we believe is in the best interests of consumers and producers in Canada and we will continue to pursue that position.

ETHANOL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister should know that the Canadian Renewable Fuels Association estimates that if all gasolines in Canada contained 10 per cent ethanol it would require between 8 million and 10 million bushels of Canadian grain, which is almost one-fifth of our total annual production in Canada. Ethanol blended gasolines are already labelled environmentally friendly.

Why is this government dragging its feet in creating this huge new domestic market for Canadian grain that would also serve to clean up our environment?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member may be aware—and from his question he may not be aware—this government has been involved in developing ethanol production to be used in gasoline.

I can take the hon. member to two examples in the province of Saskatchewan that this federal government has been involved in. One happens to be Kerrobert with North West Food and Fuels where grains are used to produce alcohol.

The other happens to be in Langham, Saskatchewan in conjunction with the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, where the Department of Western Economic Diversification, the provincial government and Sask Pool are again involved in the production of ethanol to be used in gasoline and the by-products being used in a cattle feedlot operation.

This government has supported the production of ethanol from grains and will continue. There are provinces that are supporting the production, along with the federal government. We believe it is an important source. It is important for the environment. We look forward to continued co-operation and growth in this area.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I am very much aware of the new plant at Langham, Saskatchewan, and one at Minnedosa, Manitoba and I am aware of some other smaller ones being built. But they will only serve a small fraction of our needs in Canada.

A 10 per cent ethanol blended gasoline would replace the octane enhancer methylcyclopentadienyl manganese tricarbonyl currently used in Canada. This substance attacks the nervous system of the human body and was banned in the United States in 1978. Evidence is mounting that the health of Canadians is being affected by these gasoline additives.

Will the minister act now to ban MMT in Canada and protect the lives of the Canadian people, particularly our children who are most vulnerable? When will this government get behind the Canadian Renewable Fuels Association, give it full support and stop supporting a product that has been banned in other countries?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is putting forward an outrageous hypothesis I do not agree with. There is no scientific evidence that would allow him to substantiate the accusations that he has made.

This government is interested in ethanol production. Ethanol production is important from two points: the environmental point and the ability to use a renewable resource.

We have been involved in ongoing discussions with that industry as the hon. member knows. We have given support as the hon. member knows. We will continue to give that support.

LEAD AND MERCURY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Earlier this week the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said in the House that the use of lead in paint had been eliminated by voluntary compliance by the industry. But a report from his own department contradicts this statement and says clearly that lead and mercury in paint continue to be a health hazard to children even before they are born.

Why is the government refusing to say no to lead and mercury in paint? Why is it refusing to co-operate with the industry which wants a ban and has asked the government for a ban to protect our children?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I will take that representation on behalf of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but my recollection is that yes, there are lots of houses that still have paint which was put on at a time when the danger of lead was not recognized, high lead content paint in renovations and so on. This represents a hazard. That is all the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said. There is a hazard out there.

In terms of outlawing paint in any and every application, I am sure the hon. member would recognize that that makes sense when there is any chance of human contact but may not make sense when there is no chance of human contact.

• (1150)

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, the minister said clearly that co-operation with the industry had eliminated the addition of lead in paints. That is simply not the case.

A spokesperson on product safety said on radio months ago that regulations were being prepared. The paint industry asked in September 1990 that the government ban the addition of lead and mercury in all new paints. The government has not acted.

To be very blunt about it, how many more children have to be poisoned before the government does what the industry and everybody else wants and bans lead and mercury additions in paint? It is that simple.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I do not think there is any argument. No one in this House is arguing that lead and mercury are not poisons and they should be eliminated to the extent possible so that there is no human contact.

It certainly does not do her case any good to stand up here and claim that children are dying in this country right this very moment because of lack of action. That is simply false. She knows it, and I wonder why she has to resort to scare tactics like that rather than just pursue in a logical reasonable fashion the appropriate and reasonable representation that lead and mercury be limited.

It is not necessary to go around scaring people and saying that kids are dying because of this situation.

CANADA—UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Previously I heard the minister indicate to this House that there had been a profound increase in the export of Canadian agricultural products as a result of the free trade agreement with the United States.

How extensive was the increase of trade with the United States? Was there any negative impact to the marketing boards that presently exist in Canada as a result of the free trade agreement?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is right to draw to the attention of the House the increase in trade that took place after the free trade agreement between Canada and the U.S. took effect.

The increase in agricultural trade since January 1, 1989 was some 25 per cent. Agriculture increased some 25 per cent from that time period. That is very important when we look at the percentage of agricultural imports. The imports into Canada only increased by 16 per cent. There was a net benefit by Canada in signing the agreement between the United States in the area of agriculture.

The hon. member also is aware, as my colleague pointed out yesterday, that there was a marketing agency created under the supply management system since the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement came into effect. The Broiler Hatchery Agency was created in that atmosphere and added to the ability to export more agricultural products to the United States than we had before.

REFUGEES

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I address my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

As the government knows, the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Refugees which Canada signed forbids Canada to cause a refugee to be forcibly returned directly or indirectly to a country where he would face persecution.

Will the minister confirm that Canada is seeking an agreement with the European Community that would enable Canada to remove refugee claimants without having examined their claims to European Community countries through which they pass en route to Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we as a government recognize our responsibility to respect the various conventions that have been signed. If the hon. member is referring to the Dublin convention, we may remind the House that we support the development of international strategies and that, as a government, we will always respect the international conventions we have signed.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

Since some countries of the European Community do not have nearly such high standards of definition and treatment of refugees as does Canada, will the minister assure this House that Canada will not remove any refugee claimant unless his or her refugee claim has been examined and judged ungrounded?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is familiar with our procedures. Every claim is examined individually, and our approach is humanitarian. And, of course, all the eventualities to which he referred will be dealt with according to the procedures established under our Immigration Act.

AIRPORT SCREENINGS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the tendering process for the pre-board screening contract at the Moncton airport and at other airports in Atlantic Canada.

The previous Minister of Transport stated: "When tendering contracts for airport screening services, the airlines will include a specification to protect current employees' wages and fringe benefits at the levels of the existing contract".

The employees providing this service are to be fired and new ones hired at substantially lower wages because a new company has been awarded the contract. What is the government prepared to do to protect these employees?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware that the awarding of contracts and the resulting changes of screening personnel is strictly a negotiating matter between the carrier and the security guard agency.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. That response is nonsense.

This contract is renewed every three years and the government has a moral obligation to protect those employees so that they are not victimized by having new contractors undermine any improvements in salary, or worse that they lose their jobs.

When will this government take a stand for fairness?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is also aware, because the question has been previously answered in the House, that in 1988 the former Minister of Transport came to an agreement with the airline industry regarding the protection of current employees' wages and fringe benefits for rehired employees.

Transport officials are currently looking at the awarding of the new contract to ensure that the previous commitments are respected.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. When granting student loans for post-secondary education, the government still uses data that were collected in 1984, in other words, data that are already seven years old. This practice or policy, if you prefer, is preventing thousand of students from receiving millions of dollars in financial assistance. Why is the government still using this obsolete information? Why does it continue to give students this kind of insensitive treatment which prevents them from pursuing an education that will prepare them for good jobs later on?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Madam Speaker, the government could not agree more that a thorough review of the student loans system is necessary. I have said so many times in the House, and I have said so to the hon. member. The program was started 27 years ago and has not been changed since then. However, I can inform the hon. member today that we are very close to tabling a completely revised version of the student loans system that will meet the primary objective of the program, which is to help students in need to finish their education and become full-fledged Canadian citizens.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The minister will know that the Assembly of First Nations met in Ottawa this week and it has completed a report entitled Tradition and Education: Towards a Vision of Our Future which includes a declaration of First Nations jurisdiction over education.

As well, in 1990, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development contracted with Mr. Jim McPherson, Dean of Osgoode Hall, to research jurisdictional issues in native education.

Is the minister aware of the contents of the first report, and is the minister prepared to tell this House when he will table this second report, this study which he has had since September of this year?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the content of the report or the recommendations that might result therefrom. When my officials have completed the analysis of the report I will be happy to review it and bring it forward at the appropriate time.

I should say that the federal government is fully committed to devolving education responsibility to First Nations. In fact, we have an impressive track record of turning over to First Nations leadership both at the primary and secondary levels, as well as at the post-secondary level the responsibility for education administration.

I signed an agreement with the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs on an innovative five-year program of education research. We now have a situation where 87 per cent of the post-secondary funding available to aboriginal students is administered by Indian administrative organizations. Most schools are Indian administered and the priorities are set by native leadership.

MANITOBA ECONOMY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister is aware that the Manitoba economic indicators are all negative. They are all in decline. For example, in investment, Manitoba ranks eight out of ten; in retail trade it ranks eight out of ten; in housing starts Manitoba ranks ten out of ten; in building permits Manitoba ranks eight out of ten; and in manufacturing shipments Manitoba ranks ten out of ten.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister what specific agreement the federal government is negotiating with the province of Manitoba to try to turn around this very dismal economic performance?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the western diversification initiative has funded well in excess of $1 billion toward endeavours in western Canada. It has been very much a part of strengthening and broadening the economic base in western Canada.

In addition, there are the ongoing programs that are negotiated on a partnership arrangement under the auspices of the co-operation agreements wherein the province itself identifies the priorities that it wishes to identify and support. We work out agreements on that basis.

I should say to the hon. member, because I am sure he would be interested, that in terms of regional development funding as outlined in the budget of February 1991, out of the total package of $1.1 billion western Canada is getting about $363 million in terms of the western regional development funds which are in addition to some of the established programs.

I guess the short answer is that there are a number of co-operation agreements in place. We are providing heavy support to the agricultural sector. Of course we are always interested in sitting down with the provinces and helping them work toward developing any new industries or expanding any sectors that they wish to identify.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, on a short supplemental, I would also indicate that since the Western Diversification Program came into effect that is when we started to have these dismal figures in the province of Manitoba.

Again referring to the government's own figures, my question is this: The region of Canada within our provinces that has the highest unemployment is northern Manitoba with 23.3 per cent unemployed. Why has this government not negotiated a new northern development agreement to make sure there is infrastructure and training in that region.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member bad-mouths the western diversification initiative. There are something in the order of 400 specific projects that have been funded or assisted through the Western Diversification Program.

An hon. member: In Manitoba?

Mr. Mazankowski: In Manitoba alone. In total there have been 2,700 initiatives funded in western Canada.

Is the hon. member suggesting that we should cancel the western diversification initiative, that we should cancel the 300 or 400 projects that have been funded in Manitoba? Is that what he is suggesting? When he says that everything has gone to hell in a hand basket since the western diversification initiative came in, it means that he is not supportive of the 300 or 400 projects that have been funded.

HEALTH

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday I met with Barbara Hood Hall, president of the Northwest Territories Mental Health Association. Mental illness affects more Canadians than any other disease. The northern territories lead the nation in illness and poor health. The north experiences higher death and disease rates and higher birth and infant mortality rates than the rest of the country. Cancer is four times greater. It has the highest rate of suicide in the country.

Knowing this, how can the minister withhold moneys much needed for this desperate situation from the Government of the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, since the most recent agreement on formula financing, which I believe was signed in December 1989, the Government of the Northwest Territories has been accepting more and more responsibility for the administration of programs in the general health area. We have had a number of discussions with the Government of the Northwest Territories about the responsibility it has accepted to administer these programs.

I recently spoke with the new premier of the Northwest Territories, Nellie Cournoyea. Of course there are matters that will continue to be under discussion. I might remind members that the formula financing initiative led to an increase in per capita funding into the Northwest Territories in the past year as compared to previous years. This is a very generous and appropriate means of ensuring adequate fiscal support and fiscal arrangements with the Government of the Northwest Territories.

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour, duty and privilege to present to this House a series of petitions according to Standing Order 36, certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions.

These petitions contain the signatures of Canadians living in my home town of Hamilton, as well as Stoney Creek, Caledonia, Beamsville, Dundas, and Burlington. They join the thousands of other Canadians who have signed petitions which have been presented in this august Chamber.

All the petitioners are in support of the parents of Nina De Villiers. They request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. They call upon us to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

CFB CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I too rise under Standing Order 36. I have the honour to present another petition signed by people in the Middleton, Nictaux, Paradise and Greenwood areas of Nova Scotia.

They want to remind the government that CFB Cornwallis has first-rate facilities that could easily accommodate any new duties, in addition to recruit training, that the Department of National Defence might require.

With that in mind, they humbly call upon this Parliament to urge the Department of National Defence to add to its present operations a recruit training school at CFB Cornwallis.

CHILD CARE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure pursuant to Standing Order 36 to rise and present a petition from constituents of mine who reside in Moncton, Dieppe, Salisbury, and Riverview asking the government to amend the Income Tax Act, so that the child related benefits and deductions for child care are fair and equitable to all family structures based on financial need and irrespective of child care choices.

M. Weiner (for the minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-44, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (geographic certification), be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would like to spend a few minutes speaking on third reading so that we can emphasize that what we are doing today, namely an amendment to section 34 of the bill, is a first in Canada. Likewise, the issue that we have to deal with by way of that amendment to section 34 is almost a first in Canada as well. I believe that it is appropriate to stress that fact.

Back in 1973, and it is still true, the object of section 34 was to ensure that marine employers would appoint a representative that would be under a strict obligation to negotiate with the longshoremen. The problems that arose, particularly in the riding of Trois-Rivières, at the Trois-Rivière and Bécancour harbours, have to do with the fact that in the last six years, the longshoremen in Trois-Rivières have not had the opportunity, and I insist on the word opportunity, to negotiate a collective agreement because the employers kept passing the buck to each other through injunctions, temporary, permanent and others, so that there would not be anybody at the table that had the authority or the mandate to negotiate with the employees. I believe it is important to emphasize this while at the same time ensuring that once this bill is passed in this House, the other place, as we like to call it, will give its approval quickly. And, Madam Speaker, I rely on the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River to send the appropriate message to his colleagues in the other House, so that this bill can be passed quickly. I can tell the hon. member that I will also inform the senators that they must act diligently as regards Bill C-44, which is essential to solve the dispute in Trois-Rivières, and to make sure that the longshoremen, who have been on strike for two months now, can go back to work with a formal collective agreement, which is something they need and have been without for six years.

Madam Speaker, allow me to stress the fact that I am honoured to sponsor this bill which is a concrete achievement by an hon. member for his riding. This is a good example of an issue that had reached gigantic proportions in judicial terms and which, I believe, will be solved with this bill. I also want to emphasize the work of the hon. members for Churchill and Kenora—Rainy River, who co-operated so that we could proceed quickly.

Of course, as you know, Madam Speaker, the House leaders are always involved, and I would like to thank my own House leader and the two others as well, who were very co-operative and agreed to let this bill go through the House a little faster than usual, for economic reasons—the port of Trois-Rivières is strike-bound—and for humanitarian reasons as well. As you know, Madam Speaker, when employees have not had a wage increase for six years and have been on strike for two months, there is a major problem. However, with the support of the House and that of the other place, I hope the federal government will be able to do its share to help them deal with their problems.

Perhaps I may also mention the patience and hard work of Mr. Bernard Paquet, the union rep, and members of the Trois-Rivières longshoremen's unions executive, Wilfrid Martel, Stanley St-Louis, Jean-Guy Lafrenière, Léo Dumont, and all the others, including Robert Lemay, and so forth. I won't name them all because I am sure I will forget a few, but I just want to say how patient they have been throughout this whole process. They are dedicated to their cause, and they are dedicated to helping their fellow longshoremen. I think that has to be said.

Madam Speaker, this bill will, I hope, be passed today, and in concluding, I would like hon. members to realize that if the bill is adopted today, we will soon be able to say to our people in Trois-Rivières: mission accomplished.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I too would like to enter the debate at third reading and make a few comments. I think it is imperative that we understand the importance of this legislation, Bill C-44, and the changes to section 34 of the Canada Labour Code.

Before I commence with talking in particular about this piece of legislation, I must say that it is very frustrating to hear and to try to put together some sort of focus in one's mind as to why it has taken almost seven years for this government to bring this piece of legislation forward. It has complete knowledge of the fact that the employees in this case have not been able to get an increase in wage and have been dealing basically in a vacuum without a collective agreement.

Having had the experience in the labour movement and being involved in collective bargaining processes myself, I know very well just how difficult that whole scenario would be to an individual who would have to go to work every day not having the collective agreement in place that would give them the incentive to want to be the best employee possible.

I would say to the government opposite that it basically is high time that we put this piece of legislation and this change to the Canada Labour Code in place. I question the wisdom as to why it was even brought in at this late stage this week because of the fact that the Senate is not here. One of the problems that we are going to have now is that we will probably have to wait until next week at the earliest to get this legislation right through the final process in order that the collective bargaining rights of the workers can be maintained through the process of collective bargaining by forcing the employers to go to the bargaining table.

One of the things people who are listening to us today have to understand is that what this amendment basically does is allow the CLRB to simply enact the changes necessary to force the employers to put someone into place and if they do not do it within a reasonable time then the CLRB will do it for them.

One of the things we talked about in committee this morning was that it is a possibility even with these changes that we will still be delayed for many more months simply because we will have to wait for the CLRB to have interviews with the different employers and ask them why it is that they have difficulty coming to an agreement. Furthermore, it will have to wait for interventions of all the employers, if necessary, before it can make a ruling on who it will choose if that becomes necessary.

I would suggest to the government opposite in its letter to the CLRB that when the necessity and issue at hand is explained to them that it also make it very clear that this has to be dealt with very expeditiously and if there are other issues that are before them that they be put aside in order that this can be dealt with first hand.

The reason for that is because the employees, as we know, whom we are dealing with now are on strike at this moment. Christmas is coming. It is quickly drawing near. I think it is high time that they get back to the bargaining table and deal with the issue in its entirety.

I also question the wisdom of whether we are resolving the issue. I ask if it is going to improve the collective bargaining process in that particular geographic zone. We have been going through a process in the last six or seven years of these employers not having the ability to get their act together and agree on a particular representative to go forward and get involved in the collective bargaining process as is their right to do. It is also their moral obligation as it relates to their employees.

I suggested in Committee of the Whole that they undertake a complete review of the geographic certification of that area and look at it in its entirety to see if there is the possibility or the necessity to change it somewhat to reflect the realities of the situation. When we take a look at how long this has been in place, which is since 1973, there can be and there probably are some significant changes that have taken place since then.

I want to suggest to the government opposite that we on this side approve of this particular piece of legislation in its entirety. We have some reservations and concerns as to just whether it will be as effective as it could be. We hope that we can resolve this issue for the men and women who are involved in the dispute.

We would ask that the House pass this quickly and that the the other place do the same. We will certainly do as the member has indicated. We will send the message to the Senate that we on this side of the House feel that there is no reason to delay the legislation. It should be passed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I will start my very short remarks by sharing a concern that I think the Liberals and the government representatives alluded to and it is that we are asked in this House to rush the legislation because there is a perception of a need. At the same time we know that the Senate is not sitting today. We know that the Senate will not be sitting over the weekend. It will not be sitting Monday and the earliest that this legislation will be dealt with is on Tuesday.

I question how the government can get up and state that there is a need to pass this legislation quickly and at the same time not make any arrangements to have the Senate deal with the legislation.

I also find it ironic that where there is a situation such as a strike or a lock-out, this government normally will move very quickly in the perceived national need.

As was pointed out by the previous speaker, this problem has existed for a number of years. The employees have been without a collective agreement for seven years. The company that has refused to accept the Maritime Employers Association as the bargaining unit for the employees has had injunctions in place over the last two years.

The strike itself has existed for 60 days. There did not appear to be any concern by the government on this issue until the last possible moment. In addition to that, when we were asking for government legislation last week this particular legislation was not even indicated as something that the government intended to deal with on Thursday or Friday of this week.

For that matter the discussions between House leaders earlier this week did not have this legislation down. You have to wonder where the government's priorities are and where the government's commitments are.

I congratulate the member for getting the legislation into the House but I think it could have been done better. I think that there is still going to be a sense among employees across this land that if it is legislation that works against their interests, this government moves quickly, but where there is legislation that works in the interests of the employees, this government does not move quickly. It moves very slowly.

Obviously the regular apparatus of the government through its House leader does not work in their best interests.

I would also like to raise the issue that was dealt with in Committee of the Whole. The fact is that there is nothing preventing the employer group that sought the injunction from trying to create further trouble in this particular instance.

There is nothing preventing that employer from seeking an injunction while it appeals its case before the Canada Labour Relations Board. Again as was mentioned in Committee of the Whole there is nothing saying that we will get a quick decision from the Canada Labour Relations Board. It may be put as a priority. It may not be. We do not know that.

There is an indication by the government member who spoke. He was the very member who has been pushing this bill. He hoped that this issue would be dealt with quickly but he did not believe that timetables should be put in place for a quasi-judicial board.

We put timetables in for all sorts of agencies and all sorts of individuals. People who do not like an unemployment insurance ruling have 30 days to appeal, which is not very much time for an individual to collect the information that he or she may need before appearing before a quasi-judicial board. Labour legislation often has a timetable or a deadline in it for an arbitrator to rule.

Consider the length of time that has been involved. It has been seven years that we referred to without a collective agreement and two years since the company sought its first injunction to try to get around the Canada Labour Code. There is also the fact that these people have been on strike for 60 days now because their employer is legally prohibited from negotiating.

I think in this particular case it would have been reasonable and sensible to have a clause in this legislation that said in this specific case that should there be any appeals that the board would hear the case and rule within the next 60 days. I think that would have been a very good clause to make sure that the legislation was ironclad and that the workers were not going to be facing the potential of another long drawn out mess.

With those comments, Madam Speaker, we will not delay the legislation. I sincerely regret that the Senate cannot be ordered back to work itself to deal with this legislation later today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, November 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) that Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, let me start by congratulating the Minister of National Health and Welfare on his bill. Certainly it is never too late. One would suggest we should have seen the problem with our pension plans that we are trying to deal with in the bill today. We should have seen that a while back. Unfortunately through a miscalculation it was not the case.

The bill in fact was introduced in order to ensure the future viability of the Canada Pension Plan. I think in my view that is the thrust of the bill. Along with that there are a number of accessories that come with it such as the proposal to increase the Canada Pension Plan benefit for dependant children of disabled and deceased contributors by approximately 30 per cent. This means that if you want to look at it in terms of dollars and cents that will increase the benefit from about $113 to approximately $148 a month.

As a result of that there are close to 170,000 children across Canada who would receive those benefits at an approximate cost of $75 million to the government.

There are also some other changes that were introduced as a part of the bill. In a way there were some minor amendments such as amending the legislation to protect the benefit eligibility of Canada Pension Plan benefit contributors who are unable to apply in time because of incapacity. Also it extends benefits to children who come under the custody or control of an individual who is already receiving disability benefits.

This is more or less the main structure of what we are dealing with today. Under the new legislation, in order to adjust the misfortune, what we are going to see is the combined employee-employer contribution rate increasing gradually in steps starting in 1991. It will go from 4.6 per cent and will move up until the year 2011 where we will see approximately a 9.1 per cent increase. Compare that to what we have presently. If we were not increasing those contributions, then by the year 2011 an employee and an employer would only contribute about 7.6 per cent.

This is as a result of the fact that department officials or those who were involved with the calculation made the assumption that the birth rate in Canada in the 1970s was going to be at a certain level. Unfortunately those forecasts and figures were not accurate. At that time it was estimated there would be six workers that would be available to provide benefits for each retired worker in the future. But because of the decline in the birth rate we are seeing now that there are only three workers in the work force who would be paying benefits for a retired individual.

As a result of that there is a tremendous shortfall in terms of the pension plan. In the year 2011 or 2016 we are going to see quite a bit of difficulty.

Before I move on I want to congratulate our critic for National Health and Welfare, the member for Winnipeg North. He made an excellent presentation yesterday and attempted to introduce some amendments to the legislation. Unfortunately most of those amendments were not accepted by the government. It is too bad because most of those amendments were excellent ones. I would suggest that the government should look at them again and see if it could change its view and its mind. It could hopefully approach the Senate in order to reintroduce them and deal with them.

When we talk about pensions the first thing that comes to my mind is those who receive the pension benefit and those who are no longer in the work force, our senior citizen population.

As you know by the year 2031 the proportion of the population aged 65 years and over will increase approximately four times. If you recall in 1971 we had approximately 8 per cent of population at age 65 years of age and over. According to Statistics Canada, in the year 2031 we will have in excess of eight million Canadians who will be eligible to collect pensions and who are senior citizens. That will be out of a total population of about 32 million people.

In the short term the proportion of seniors is expected to rise about 15.7 per cent by the year 2011. That will translate to approximately five million senior citizens. So it can be seen why the government is moving with its proposal now in order to avoid difficulties at a later date.

Not only are we faced with an aging population in the year 2011 and beyond, but we are also faced with a shrinkage in terms of the tax base. We will not have enough people in the work force in order to support all the existing programs or all the possible programs we might be thinking of in the future unless something drastic is to take place.

That is why I have been speaking over the past two and a half years about the importance of putting a lot more emphasis on education, investing in research and development, combating illiteracy and training and retraining our work force. It seems like every time I look at a piece of legislation or a bill before this House, if there is a deficiency or a better way to do it, the answer always seems to be that it may be through education and investment in the future of Canadians.

You will be interested to know that our population is not only aging but thanks to the technical talents of people in the industry they are even living longer. For instance in the period from 1966 to 1986, the number of men over the age of 90 has doubled while the number of women over the age of 90 has tripled.

It is also startling that as people get older they are moving away from their families. For example in 1986 about 86 per cent of men between the ages of 55 and 64 lived in a family home. For men over 75 the percentage was approximately 66 per cent. For women the decline was even greater. Almost 80 per cent of women between the age of 55 to 64 live in a family household and by the age of 75 less than 35 per cent are still in the home. You can see that we have people who might be living at home but a good portion of them are not living at home and as a result of that they are in need of a support system such as the Canada Pension Plan.

While they might or might not be living at home, I do not want anyone to get the impression that after they reach the age of 65 they sit idle. You will be very happy to know that about 25 per cent of women over the age of 65 and over 20 per cent of men over the age of 55 do a tremendous amount of volunteer work in our communities for a variety of charitable and non-profit organizations. We are seeing an incredible trend in people who are retired from the work force. It seems that they are catching on fairly quickly in acknowledging the need for education. As a matter of fact presently there is in excess of 5,300 seniors enrolled in Canadian universities. Most of these seniors are enrolled in part time courses and they take advantage of programs that many universities have been offering senior citizens free of tuition, which is something they are to be commended for.

Also, full-time enrolment has increased by almost 70 per cent for undergraduate study and by over 40 per cent for graduate levels.

Not only is it a challenge we are going to face to ensure that we have enough funds in our budget to deal with issues such as pensions, we also have to be geared toward introducing programs that cater to the senior citizen population in the year 2011.

As a result of that, it requires an overhaul of all our existing systems to ensure that those systems are meeting the needs of our seniors, and not only our seniors of today but also the seniors of tomorrow.

The ideal plan would be one that you can use and apply without any difficulties and without any worry. Unfortunately the existing Canada Pension Plan, when it was introduced in 1966, was built around the limit of the 25 per cent figure in the hope that employees would have other plans, such as the occupational pension plans, the registered retirement plans, and some other revenues that seniors could bank on.

Unfortunately this expectation was not realistic because many of the people who are now receiving benefits did not rely on registered savings plans. The reason is that the registered savings plan is used by people who earn quite a bit of money, in excess of $35,000 or $40,000.

As a result of that the benefit of that particular plan was not available. While we invest in excess of about $7 billion a year in retirement benefits by over two million seniors, the simple fact is that many of those seniors have to go to other sources to guarantee that ends meet at the end of the month.

Let us look at some examples. If we are to look at the different programs and see what the maximum a senior citizen or a retired individual can collect from all of the possible pensions, we will find that a single person is relying on Canada Pension Plan benefits of around $6,800, old age pension of about $4,000, the guaranteed annual income in some cases of about $1,400 or $1,500, for a total income of about $12,200.

In an urban centre the poverty line is approximately $12,000 a year. Therefore, the system, even if it is used to the limit, barely deals with the problem.

To that extent, our pension plans, even though they are very fine plans, are still not really meeting the objective as one would like to see them doing.

For example, in 1989, 57 per cent of single people between the ages of 65 and 69 had an income below $15,000 a year, and 68 per cent of the people over the age of 70 had an income below $15,000. Those figures are only the tip of the iceberg. In the same year close to 40 per cent of all single senior citizens lived below the poverty line, as established by Statistics Canada. Approximately four out of every 10 senior citizens live below the poverty line.

Of single elderly people living below the poverty line, about 80 per cent of those people are women. About 41 per cent of all single females who live below the poverty line and 26.9 per cent of all males who live below the poverty line are asking for help or seeking assistance. This is a situation that needs to be addressed. However, if we are to just introduce a plan and not look at the cost of living or the different types of difficulties our seniors are faced with, in the very near future we will see a greater number of our seniors living below the poverty line. That will be a catastrophe.

While I indicated that there are a lot of good things in the proposed bill, there seem to be some difficulties. My colleague from Winnipeg North has stated his views on those issues. For instance, the current Pension Plan Act defines conditions necessary for receiving disability benefits as being severe and prolonged. This language, as it has been stated, is quite ambiguous. Our suggestion, made by my colleague, is that the definition of "severe" should be a person who is unable to do his or her usual type of work without mental or physical pain, preventing the person from fully discharging duties of that job as determined by a licensed medical doctor.

Unfortunately in my constituency office we are faced with a situation in which somebody who had a heart attack and applied for his pension had great difficulties trying to receive benefits. We also wanted to see "prolonged" defined as three months or more of continued disabilities.

There are other amendments that my colleague tried to put before the House. Unfortunately many of those amendments were not adopted. However I would like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that in the area of the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowance and the Old Age Security Act there is a need for a close look at not only the over-all management of it but the services we are providing to the community.

You will be surprised to learn that in some cases for an applicant to receive benefits that applicant would have to wait in excess of about four months. There is a tremendous backlog of applicants, in excess of 50,000 across Canada. It takes about three months to get a slight change in address of an applicant or an existing potential beneficiary.

Those are issues the government should look at. In closing, I would like to say that I wish the government would look at our amendments as presented by my colleague from Winnipeg North and try to deal with them in an appropriate fashion.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. colleague from Ottawa Centre is aware that currently in the Canada Pension Plan Disability Benefits section, these benefits may be severed if the beneficiary tries to retrain for re-entry into the work force.

As critic for the disabled, I was working with the task force across Canada this past spring and summer. One of the comments that almost everybody who appeared before this task force mentioned was that these people are trapped because they are getting this disability pension. If they should try to stop being completely supported by the government and get retraining or get a minimum wage job they would immediately have all of these benefits cut off.

That means they have to try to get back on to these disability pensions, or they just do not make the move at all because they have no means of support. Without this disability pension they cannot pay for their equipment or the medicine that they need regularly and that they must pay for.

I just wondered if he agrees with me that it is too bad the government did not accept the amendment suggested by our colleague that would allow disabled Canada Pension Plan beneficiaries to take training or education courses in a recognized institution and prepare for alternate work without forfeiting the benefits they were getting. This would be a very reasonable thing to have included in this bill.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Hamilton Mountain for a question very well put.

I know she has been involved with the task force that travelled across the country to listen to the concerns of the disabled. She has done a magnificent job in this area. I am looking forward, as well as my colleagues and I am sure all members of this House, to receiving a copy of her final report so we can exchange some information in this area.

Certainly the member raised a very good question. Any system, any type of benefit or any type of program should never penalize the recipient if he or she is taking any type of training courses or achieving any type of education to further their knowledge or make them better citizens.

There is no question in my mind that when you look at the system that we have in place, whether the benefit that my colleague is talking about or any type of benefit, you can see that it does discriminate against people who want to become better citizens in our society.

For that reason, the government has a moral obligation to look at all of our social welfare and social assistance programs to ensure that those programs are not only meeting the needs and objectives they were created to meet, but also that they could be used as an incentive to encourage and help those recipients who decide to receive an education or go back to training institutions.

As my colleague indicated, right now it is the opposite. The system is in fact discriminating against those who want to improve their qualifications and become better citizens.

That takes me to another point. We seem all the time to be dealing with the problem rather than trying to anticipate problems or putting plans in place that would prevent problems from taking place.

It is my hope that we will shift away from the short-term proposals to long-term proposals that will change our society as a whole. I think the act is a good one. I think there is a lot of merit in it. However, examples like the one my colleague spoke of, which the government should look at very seriously, shows there is no need why they cannot amend or change it.

There is no reason why. I do not see why they do not look at those amendments and implement them. Someone might say: "It is a little too late". However, it is never too late. The bill has gone for third reading, and after the bill will be on its way to the Senate. Maybe the minister will meet with the officials of the Senate and try to introduce those amendments.

I want to close by congratulating my colleague on her great work in the area. It is a very well put question. I totally agree with her.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, one of the problems we have had with the federal-provincial assistance plans over the years has been that every time someone on provincial assistance programs receives the Canada Pension Plan, their provincial moneys are reduced by the same amount as their Canada Pension Plan. Therefore, they are really no better off than they were before. They may indeed have a very serious medical problem.

I would just like to have the hon. member comment on this. In my offices we have settled case after case for Canada pension recipients. I must say that the Canada Pension Plan personnel have been very good to deal with as far as this member is concerned. I give them full marks because they do have a tremendous burden of work.

I would like the hon. member to comment on this process, because it seems to me that it does not solve a major problem for the individual when he starts receiving a cheque from the federal hand and ceases to get the same amount from the province. That really does not solve his or her problem. Would he comment on that, please?

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, that is a very well put question. This is another example that helps to make the case that what we have before us, while it does deal with part of the problem, does not seem to be able to deal with the problem as a whole.

To that extent, I hoped that the federal government would have had a chance to study our amendment and our suggestions so that loopholes in the system, such as the one my colleague has mentioned, could have been dealt with in a very equitable and forceful way.

There is no doubt in my mind that our seniors and people who are retiring should not be running around trying to go to this agency or that agency. They would not have to do all that if the system in place was fine-tuned and it was properly organized so that it was a one-stop shopping arrangement.

A senior citizen or retired person should not have to be fighting with this agency and that agency, this level of government and that level of government, and going from this account to that account. It is really quite frustrating and I can understand why the hon. member is raising this point.

I do not know when the government is going to sit down and have a look at the way we do things when it comes to providing services for our seniors. As I indicated a little earlier, the time has come for us to address the whole question of a society that has an aging population and a shrinking tax base, a society with a lot more to offer and a lot to lose unless we focus on issues of long-term planning for both our seniors and our youth.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, as I see you in the chair today doing your usual fine job of chairing this House it reminds me that it was also a woman who initially introduced the Canada Pension Plan to this House.

The Canada Pension Plan was introduced in this House by the Hon. Judy LaMarsh and became effective on January 1, 1966. Prior to that the Hon. Edgar Benson, who was then Minister of National Revenue, did the spade work with the provinces, going from province to province meeting with the ministers of health in order to put the plan together. Then the Hon. Judy LaMarsh introduced it and piloted the legislation through this House.

In her memory I think it is very important to state today that this legislation, which she piloted through the House back in the early 1960s, has been a tremendous service to tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Canadians. We will salute her today.

The Canada Pension Plan is one of the great support blocks, the cornerstone in many ways, of our social net in this country. Many people come to my office who have been turned down when they applied for Canada pension, and we take up their case for them.

The first thing that I always insist on when talking to them is that they bring in the doctor's report. Sometimes doctors give them a report saying they are capable of doing light work. That is the worst thing that can happen to them because it does not say they are disabled. Of course in the particular area that I represent—and I know that many other members in this House are in the same position—there really is not that much light work for people to do. You are limiting them in their terms of employment. Also, they are not really well enough to go to work. They will take work if they can get it, and they suffer while at work, but when they apply for Canada pension the bottom line is that they need a clear-cut statement from their doctor that they are in fact in need of Canada pension and are disabled in medical terms.

I want to commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare today for bringing in this bill. Naturally there are other things that I would have liked to have seen in it, such as those amendments brought forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, one of my colleagues who has done a very good job in playing the role of opposition critic for Health and Welfare Canada.

The minister has brought this bill forward in a manner that is going to help the Canada pension fund to continue. As a former chairman of the public accounts committee of this House, I am very pleased to note in the bill that the funds in the Canada Pension Plan will be scrutinized by the Auditor General of Canada to ensure that the fund is sound. Of course this bill today goes a long way toward making that fund sound.

The $42 billion in it today will pay for the demands on the fund for the next two years. That is a massive payroll going out there in two years' time. However, if the increased contributions that will be requested of Canadians and employers are not included and not put into the fund at this time, there will only be six months of necessary funds left in the over-all fund of the Canada Pension Plan.

This plan is of great benefit to Canadians. It really is a safety net for many people. In my view this plan and medicare are two things that really have to be scrutinized and kept in good financial shape so that Canadians today and in the future can look forward to medical plans.

In the United States in a recent election someone campaigned on having a medicare program and turned around a 45 per cent public opinion vote deficit into a big plus and was elected in a landslide. One can understand that, because Americans do not have the fine programs that we have, such as the Canada Pension Plan and medicare.

I think there is a good rapport in this House of Commons for working toward this.

By bringing in this bill today which will increase the contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, it will mean that for years to come those people who are working today will pay into it, that the fund will be there 20 years from now for them. If those rates had not been increased and if the plan were not kept in good financial condition, they would not be able to gain those funds. This is really an insurance plan for Canadians. Hopefully everyone benefits from it at one stage or another.

The extended benefits to families is a very important part of the Canada Pension Plan. As we look at the plan there is a need to increase the payments for widows or widowers left with small children today.

For example, people under 35 years of age who loses a spouse can get benefits if they have dependants. In today's world with the one-parent family having to pay additional costs for bringing up those children in a good and responsible way, people need this additional assistance. It is very important that this bill addresses that fact and that more money be placed in the hands of people when they are going through a traumatic part of their life, when they have lost their life partner and when they have children to raise strictly on their own. It is not an easy thing to face. However, it does give such individuals some hope and some encouragement when they realize that the Canada Pension Plan is there to help them out.

It is very important that this Parliament follow through on that great work introduced in this House by the Hon. Judy LaMarsh, since deceased, a great contribution to Canadian politics.

Under the current contributions the amount would diminish to six months by the year 2001. I think I stated a while ago "in two years' time". If I did that is wrong. It should be that there would only be six months' benefits in the fund to pay out by the year 2001 instead of the present two years of $42 billion which are in there to pay for benefits.

It is very important that any of these funds be kept constant and in good shape. We hear a lot today about the non-viability of pension funds. We know that these funds are looked at by financial experts. If these plans are not viable then the contributions have to be increased. If we want these kinds of benefits to continue in Canada, which I am sure everyone does, then we will have to pay for them.

It does not come at an easy time because of the economy and because of people having lost their jobs. The only hope that we have is at least these people are paying into something that they or their families will benefit from eventually.

For the provision of increased benefits for the 170,000 children of deceased plan participants, benefit amounts will rise as of January 1992 to $148 per month from $113. Those are some of the trends about which I spoke that are very necessary.

Other people have gone into the details of this. I will not repeat them because it would only be repetition.

However, I do want to say that my colleague from Winnipeg North brought in some very good amendments to this legislation. I think that when he tackled the reasons for receiving disability benefits as being if a person was in severe physical condition or had a prolonged medical condition, the words "severe" and "prolonged" are pretty nebulous terms. How do we define them when it comes to deciding whether or not a person gets a pension?

We know that in the committee stage those two words were changed to "significant medical condition" or to "an extended medical handicap". Those two are sort of generalized terms and do not mean very much when we are trying to make a decision. He brought in an amendment of course to define that much better, along with several other amendments. I compliment him on that.

I want to say to the government that this bill is certainly due. I thank the government for bringing it in at this time. It is not very often in this House these days that we can get some legislation that really fits the Canadian mould and that we can come to a good sense of agreement on. While we in the Official Opposition had some amendments to make and they were not adopted, I do not compliment the minister on that. I think the bottom line of this legislation is such that it makes the Canada Pension Plan viable today and right on into the future. That certainly should be the aim of every member in this House.

In conclusion, I want to say that a lot of people over the years have contributed very good ideas to the Canada Pension Plan. A lot of them have come from John Q public out there, people who come into our offices and make suggestions. I suppose they sometimes feel those ideas never get passed on or they are just talking to their member. I think it is important to note that in the committee stage some of those ideas did come out.

I know that I have certainly talked from time to time to various ministers about ideas that have been put forward. I think that is very basic to any legislation in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your patience. I hope after this legislation is in place that we will not stop there, that we will be looking forward to more timely amendments along the way. Perhaps some of the amendments that we proposed during the course of this debate will eventually get adopted.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a few brief comments with respect to this piece of legislation.

The Canada Pension Plan is one of the most important pieces of legislation that we have in our statutes today. It is certainly a piece of legislation that is there as a result of the long-standing efforts of the New Democratic Party which has always been in the forefront of social welfare for Canadians, of pensions, and of looking after the average Canadian.

The amendments that have been brought in with respect to this bill are important amendments. They are certainly amendments that this caucus can support and that I can support. There are other aspects of this legislation that need some attention soon.

In my riding I have a number of constituents who have come to my office concerned about the permanent disability aspect of the Canada Pension Plan. The definition of permanent disability is an extremely rigid definition. It is unfortunate that many Canadians who I think all of us would agree deserve to receive such a pension are simply not receiving one because the nature of it requires it to be permanent and longstanding.

I know there has been some discussion in this House about taking this matter back to committee to look at the ins and outs of this bill. I know there is a feeling on the part of a number of the members that the definition of the permanent disability aspect should be looked at to widen it and to include not only those who are permanently disabled but people who are disabled for a period of time and who may not be able to work for a period time and who are in a situation where they cannot work or are very limited in the work they can do.

As it stands now anyone who can do any type of work is prohibited from receiving a disability pension. That is an area that the New Democratic Party would like to see the minister and the health committee look at more closely.

The other aspect of the permanent disability part of the Canada Pension Plan has to do with time limits. To be eligible a person has to have worked two of the last three years or five of the last ten years.

Again I have situations in my own riding where people were injured ten years ago and only now do they realize they are permanently disabled and have made application. But because of the fact that they have not worked five years out of the last ten years, they are barred. That is unfair. There are situations where people who are disabled and unable to work have been trying to rehabilitate themselves and retrain themselves and have simply found that after an extended period of time and putting the effort into trying to make themselves gainfully employed again that it is simply impossible. They finally then turn to the Canada Pension Plan as a last resort only to find that the pension plan is no longer available to them.

That is unfair and that needs to be changed. It is unfortunate that was not addressed here.

I think the advantage of having the review of this bill and having this legislation before the House at this time is the fact that it has allowed members to highlight those points. I know there was a recommendation made by our health critic who indicated that he hoped there would be an extensive review of the Canada Pension Plan in committee so more recommendations would come forth. I hope that happens because people in my riding would appreciate a review of this legislation and would appreciate a more humanitarian approach to this legislation.

It is hoped that the Canada Pension Plan will stay in place as it is now and have the funds to afford to pay people who become deserving of the pension plan under all categories. Certainly the future of the fund and the contributions to the fund should be and need to be looked at very closely. Although there have been some changes there is still concern that in the future the Canada Pension Plan is going to be in some difficulty.

In closing, I would like to say that although this is a move in the right direction and is something we in the New Democratic caucus can support there is room for improvement, need for improvement and need for further discussion. Our caucus will be pushing very hard to have some of these items reviewed with the hope, the view and the desire that there will be further legislation introduced in this House to make the Canada Pension Plan a fairer and a more just plan for all Canadians.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member who has just addressed this particular bill.

I understand that there were a number of organizations that came forward to the committee and expressed concerns with the bill in specific areas that they had concerns with. A couple of them that I would be interested in are specifically the concerns they had about the definition of disability. Even more important are the conditions of receiving benefits, specifically the retraining or education courses which have been disallowed. I think this should be a consideration of just about any bill that comes forward to us in this House.

I wonder if the hon. member could address these particular areas of concern.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's question. Certainly he is aware that with respect to definition of permanent disability there has been a lot of concern and there is a need to revisit that definition to look at widening the definition of a permanent disability.

As it stands now, there are many people in this country who become injured and disabled who do not fit into this very rigid definition, yet we would all morally feel they would be entitled to some pension under the Canada Pension Plan.

As the member knows, if a doctor says the person is available for light work, which is a fairly broad term, then that person is unable to receive a disability pension. Many times we have a situation where we have people who are struggling to maintain themselves and struggling through taking jobs which they had never been trained for and had never participated in in their entire life. They are forced to attempt to painfully employ themselves in some occupation simply to maintain themselves when we would all agree that the person should not be working and certainly should be under the Canada Pension Plan.

I know we all have cases like that. One of the things that is important has been mentioned by many groups and by my hon. friend and members of his caucus and our caucus. It is that we have to revisit the definition of permanent disability to widen it and make it fairer and more just.

As far as retraining goes, that is another area that should be looked at in the sense that there are a number of people who become disabled and may not be able to engage in their occupation but who still want to contribute to society. We have a duty I would suggest as legislators to do what we can to ensure that those people can be retrained for positions that are going to allow them to contribute and to feel good about themselves and to offer something to this country. That is another area that needs to be looked at very closely and needs to be revisited and revised.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure this afternoon to enter into the debate on Bill C-39.

First of all I want to come at this from a somewhat different perspective. I want to deal with two major items in the time that I have. Before I do that, I want to just maybe outline to my constituents and to people who are watching what we are talking about here today, and that concerns the proposed changes to the Canada Pension Plan and its effect on our constituents.

It is well known to those of us in this place that the purpose of the changes to the Canada Pension Plan in essence is the intent to keep the plan on a sound financial footing. It is also to increase benefits for children. Then there are some minor amendments.

The major amendment is that the bill proposes an increase of $35 in benefits for dependent children of disabled and deceased contributors. This is a very admirable proposition. Obviously the main purpose—and it is well-known for those of us who are in committee dealing with C-39—is that in order for the position of this particular plan to be in a solvent situation, there have to be some increases in the premiums to Canadians simply because there was a miscalculation of just how many people would be paying into the plan. There was also a miscalculation of how many children, in the long term, in the 25 years of the program people would be having. Therefore, when they miscalculated, they had to revisit it every five years in order to put themselves back on a proper financial footing and back on track.

I say that just so people are aware that is the main reason why we are here today. Something else which is of importance to us all is there has to be some confirmation by the provinces that they approve of the amendments and the changes. That has also been done. The provinces unanimously have said that they approve of the changes to the plan and therefore everything is in place. After this bill has passed in this place, goes to the Senate, is approved and given Royal Assent the changes should be put in place by January 1, 1992.

One of the things in the committee that we dealt with was the difficulty that we are having with the plan as it is now. The issue of accessibility to CPP disability pensions was discussed at length. I want to tell you as a member of Parliament who deals with a lot of these issues on a day to day basis in my constituency it is a very frustrating issue to deal with in the sense that the definitions of the CPP have got to the point now where it does not reflect the realities of a modern Canada and of a modern world.

Because of those changes that are necessary to make this plan more accessible and make this plan more effective for all Canadians, we had hoped that during this process of the normal mandatory five-year review that they would also look at making those significant changes, for example in the definition of what is considered to be an appropriate definition of who is disabled and who is not.

The reason why I bring that to your attention today, Madam Speaker, is because we have on numerous occasions had difficulties in our constituencies with individuals who basically in a plan on the provincial side or in a private plan have had the ability to collect disability insurance. But on the Canadian side, which is the Canada disability plan, they do not meet the criteria in some instances. Therefore, it is not consistent with plans across the land.

It is very important for members of Parliament and very important for provincial members of provincial parliaments to try and put into place programs and planning that meet and go in the same direction. One of those areas is the fact that we do have the ability in the province of Ontario through workers' compensation to allow someone to collect a disability while at the same time go into rehabilitation or to indeed go into training while they are collecting. In our federal plan on the Canadian side of things, we do not have those abilities. So we are at loggerheads as to what our intent is and what our approach is and how we are trying to get some sort of training over a long period of time for the people that we consider to be disabled in this instance. They may have to go to a post-secondary institution and start all over again and take a four-year course. But during that process, they do not qualify to collect CPP because of the definition.

The definition of "disability" was discussed and mentioned at committee. I think it is important for us to read the definition. One of the first areas is what they classify as the two main tests under the CPP definition. One is "severe" and the other is "prolonged". Each test is taken separately based on the particular individual applicant.

A severe disability under CPP is defined as a disability which makes the person incapable regularly of pursuing any substantially gainful occupation. In essence that simply means in our plan in Canada that if someone wants to work somewhat part time, one day a week, sitting and watching as maybe a security guard at a department store, a very easy job as long as you do not have to chase the odd criminal, you could maybe do that as a disabled person or as someone who is incapacitated in a lot of other ways. That is something we should encourage.

We have to say to ourselves that we realize the amount of dollars we pay to disabled individuals are nowhere near enough to look after themselves in what is considered to be an appropriate manner. I think we should encourage people to go out and try to find part-time employment, even if it is one or two days a month, to get out and be active in the community and make a few dollars at the same time. I think we should encourage that. This definition severely restricts that.

The other part we thought we would discuss is prolonged. This means it is likely to be of long, continued and often indefinite duration or likely to result in death. Prolonged for me means any more than three or four months, six months or a year. That to me is prolonged in the sense of not being able to work. Because, as you well know, if you are not collecting any other forms of insurance you certainly cannot expect an individual to survive on no benefits at all for more than two or three months.

I think we should take a good look at that seriously to make sure we are not severely restricting those individuals who, as far as they are concerned at the moment they make their application, are incapable of doing the particular job they were doing and that somewhere down the line they will be able to improve on that. If we were serious about helping those who cannot help themselves in this land, we would make improvements to the definition as was mentioned by my colleague, the critic from our party, who has put in an amendment.

The first amendment basically suggests that we change the definition of severe and prolonged to significant and extended. Those substantial changes would give people the opportunity to make application in order that they can have some sort of income, because they are in essence disabled, and give them the opportunity to improve themselves somewhere down the line.

That brings me to the other issue that I think we missed the boat on in these amendments, and this is the opportunity under Bill C-39 to change the Canada Pension Plan. Bill C-39 should have dealt with something that we have been talking about in this House for many months. We are trying to focus the abilities of Canadians on retraining themselves. Under unemployment insurance we are now focusing more on UI, taking UI funds and putting them into training components in order for people to train themselves and to get accustomed to the fact that in a more global society it should be accepted that they will have to be retrained two and three and four times in their lifetime.

On the one hand we are focusing on that regard with our training dollars under the Unemployment Insurance Act, but on the other hand we are suggesting to the disabled that if they have some sort of commitment in their own mind and do not want to continue to be on disability for the rest of their lives, they will not be able to take the opportunity and avail themselves of some sort of other education, some other training that will make them able to go back into the work force at a later date. That is completely contrary to what we talk about in this House.

In essence what we are suggesting to people is that once you get CPP then you better stay on it because the moment that you have any ambitions of trying to get off it and improve yourself, you will be removed from your benefits under this particular act. That is obviously the wrong message for the government to be sending.

In my constituency, as I said before, we deal with a lot of cases which are very frustrating in that applicants were not aware of the program, were not aware that they met the criteria of the program and were not aware that if they applied they would be eligible for CPP.

My colleague from Winnipeg North has put forward an amendment which would focus the government's attention on the fact that all Canadians should be aware of these kinds of programs. Simply because of the necessity of the credits that are involved in the CPP program, the longer they wait the more chance there is that they will not qualify. Therefore they will be left in a lot of cases, the senior population in this country, without any kind of benefits at all, without any kind of disability insurance.

I would think that the government and the communications networks in this country today could easily rectify that situation. That could be done very quickly. I would suggest to them that this is a good opportunity to send out the message to Canadians that we are open, above board and prepared to tell them exactly what these programs are, what the benefits are that they can receive. By doing so we would not run into the cases, as members of Parliament like myself and others are running into, of those who come into our offices and find out that they have missed the deadline, that they no longer qualify because the period for application has lapsed. It is a tragedy when someone comes into our office. We know they qualify. They were not made aware of the program but there is nothing, absolutely nothing that can be done. I would suggest to members opposite that small change would go a long way to improving this particular program.

There is another change that some members in this place have considered to be of a positive nature. I am not quite sure that is the case at all. For example, they are suggesting that the one-year appeal process at the first stage of the appeal be reduced from one year to three months.

In most cases that I have dealt with in my constituency these individuals are not even aware because of the lack of documentation of whether they will be able to appeal. They are still in the process in most instances of trying to get rehabilitation under the Workers' Compensation Board. They are still in the process of dealing with the belief in their own minds that they can still work, that they can still be productive individuals. They want to continue to make the kind of living they were accustomed to before the difficulties which caused them to come to their members of Parliament to apply for CPP.

There is one positive aspect of changing the one year to the three months. At the same time it was suggested under the act and with the changes the government is proposing that they could write to the minister and the department and ask for an extension. What will take place now because of this change from one year to three months is that we will as a normal course as members of Parliament ask for an extension the moment the person walks in the door. It is an indefinite period as far as the act is concerned, with these changes. Now the individuals will be protected as they go through the process of trying to find whether they can be rehabilitated under WBC or whether they can be retrained to do something else under a training program from the province of Ontario.

In the meantime they will ask their members to focus on making sure they still have the ability to appeal the whole process down the line if so necessary.

I do not know if people consider changing the one year to 90 days as an improvement. The government has said in its documents and communiques that this will speed up the process. However, I doubt that very much. When people do know about the program, if they are fortunate enough to know, the only reason they do not apply right off the bat is because they are not sure they are disabled yet and are still waiting to go through the whole process with their doctors, their employers and with the WCB. Once they are sure that they have complied with all those requirements then they will apply.

There was a legitimate reason for the previous government to have the one year figure in there. As far as I am concerned, it made a lot of good sense.

I want to wrap up my remarks by saying to my constituents that in essence the $35 that we are giving in benefits to the dependent children of disabled and deceased contributors moves the cost up when all is said and done, with the increases that are to be forthcoming because of inflation, to roughly $144 to $150 a month. Not a lot of money but I think it is an improvement.

I want to say to the government that I am very pleased to see that it has recognized the importance of giving more dollars toward looking after our children. I am also very much in favour of putting this particular plan in its entirety on a good, strong, financial footing. I want to suggest to my constituents that we are quickly coming to the realization that there will be three workers paying for one disabled person in the years to come. That is going to necessitate a continual increase in the premiums Canadians will have to pay to keep this particular program running as smoothly as we believe it should, because of its necessity to those who cannot look after themselves.

The disabled and all those other Canadians who do not have their own pensions necessitates some sort of social security system. In order for us as parliamentarians and taxpayers to pay for these programs, we have to make some sense of how they work.

As I have suggested in this place before, when provincial programs reduce the amount they contribute to an individual, the moment the federal House increases the amounts of dollars we are putting toward the individual's pension, it really resolves nothing.

We are asking in another amendment that has been put forward by my colleague from Winnipeg North that there be some sort of negotiated settlement between the provinces and the federal government to ensure that when, for example, we increase the $35 to dependent children the government of Ontario does not turn around and cut back a particular social program it has for those same children. That in essence leaves them getting exactly the same money before we stood up in this place and started debating this whole issue.

That is the sort of situation that frustrates many people and causes cynicism in this land with regard to politicians because it makes no sense at all.

I want to assure you that my constituents will be very well informed of this change, as I am accustomed to doing with all pieces of legislation that directly affect my constituents. I will let them know of the changes so that they will be able to make the appropriate changes in their own lives and will be able to better understand what all this means to them beginning January 1, 1992.

Be assured that we on this side are going to continue to look at the difficulties this plan has caused our constituents. It is because of them that we are standing here debating these changes. If we continue to get the kind of dialogue and openness that we have had from our constituents about the severe difficulties that are encountered when they try to deal with CPP, we will eventually come up with a program that will not leave people in the lurch, not leave people on the food bank lines. We will make sure that we look after our senior citizens and the disabled in this country in the way that we expected that we should look after them.

I appreciate the opportunity to make these comments today.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak this afternoon on this very important topic, the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan.

The Canada Pension Plan for me as a rural member of Parliament is probably, apart from unemployment insurance, the greater part of the workload of my constituency office. I would not say the more frustrating part of the workload because no one can possibly match the mess caused by the immigration department, but that is a matter which we will discuss at some other time.

The Canada Pension Plan is something that does cause an enormous amount of activity in many constituency offices of members of Parliament, and more particularly in mine.

One of the most frustrating things that we deal with, as members, is the delays, particularly with Canada Pension Plan disability benefits. I think this is as good a time as any to put that on the record and to ensure that the ministers across the way, the large number of them listening to this important debate, will take note of it, as well as their parliamentary secretaries and other MPs who are listening.

For my part, I find it unacceptable that a constituent who would apply for Canada Pension Plan disability benefits must wait for months and months and months. Finally some eight or nine months later they will get a form letter informing him or her that the Canada Pension Plan benefits have been disallowed because the particular affliction is not severe and prolonged.

It is a form signed by some sort of a computer graphic affair that no one has seen and it takes the better part of a year to receive that refusal. Then the constituent appeals. They often visit the MP's office and we go through their initial application with them, when they have the initial application. This is another matter, as doctors fill those forms out and do not give a copy to their patients. If any doctors are out there listening, the biggest favour they can do for their patients is provide them with a copy of the application. Otherwise it has to be reconstructed in absentia.

In any case, several months later we try to discover where the application went wrong, many times of course without the benefit of the original application and without knowing what the doctor put in the bloody thing. How can one challenge what was said when one does not know what was said? Obviously one cannot do it very well.

Members ask the patient if they know what their doctor said and so on, refer them either back to the same doctor or to another doctor and say: "Get an updated medical opinion. Perhaps your situation has worsened since then" and so on. We get the second opinion, accompany it with a letter and send it off on behalf of the constituent. Then we wait. We wait six months, a year. Finally 18 months later the constituent gets a hearing. Of course the hearing is always months after that too. Then they go through this second exercise and sometimes they fail again, sometimes they succeed. I see the minister sitting across the way listening to this speech. He was Minister of National Health and Welfare for a good period of time. I remember writing to him on numerous occasions about constituents who had waited for long periods of time and never were able to get benefits from the Canada Pension Plan system.

There are also those cases of people who fall between the cracks. I asked my staff to send me a few examples of such cases. Of course I am not going to name the individuals because I did not seek their permission ahead of time. However, I do have an individual whose case I appealed for her and eventually lost. This particular case involved a woman whose husband had become severely handicapped to such a point that the husband could no longer live at home.

To make a long story short, this particular gentleman eventually passed away. When his wife tried to collect the survivor's benefits from Canada Pension Plan, she was refused. The refusal was on the basis that they were not married. That should not have made any difference. They were living together common law, had two children who were teenagers, and she was the only spouse of that particular person. In other words, there was not a competing claim on behalf of anyone else or anything like that.

The good people at Canada Pension Plan said: "At the time of the death you were not living together". That might have been true but that was because they were not in a condition to live together. One person had become severely handicapped and could no longer live at home. They said: "Well we are sorry, but if you were not married and you were not living together at the time of the death, you therefore do not qualify for benefits". That is a silly argument.

I fought this case and I lost. I lost even though in this particular case the name of the husband and wife was on cheques coming from the same department for child benefits. The baby bonus cheques had the name of both partners. In other words, Health and Welfare Canada said with the right hand: "Yes, you are the parents of these children. Yes, we recognize both of you as being spouses for the purpose of administering the family unit insofar as the child benefits are concerned". However on the other hand: "No, when the husband dies you are not spouses in terms of receiving Canada Pension Plan benefits".

How does that make sense? The rationale given to us when we lost the case was simply that the wording was different, the definition of spouse under one act is not necessarily the same definition of spouse under the other act.

Madam Speaker, I do not know about you, but when I go home at night my wife does not seek to determine under which particular act we are spouses and under which we are not. We usually consider ourselves to be the same regardless of which legislation we happen to be discussing.

That is one problem with this legislation that perhaps has not been discussed extensively. There needs to be a clarification of a lot of the language, particularly as it involves the administration of various programs under the same government department, not only under the same government but under the same government department.

I have another case which I would like to bring to the attention of the House. This particular person is a gentleman who was self-employed for many years and eventually became disabled and could no longer be employed in any way, shape or form. Canada Pension Plan examined his case and said: "Yes, you are disabled. Yes, your disability is severe. Yes, your disability is prolonged. No, you are not going to get a pension". When asked why he was not going to get a pension, the gentleman said: "Canada Pension Plan said I have not contributed five of the last ten years". We looked at the situation. We looked at the income tax returns of the gentleman and he had contributed in all those years.

But, do you know what happened, Madam Speaker? The last year that he worked he only worked about two weeks in that year. Because the contributions he made, and he did make them, to the Canada Pension Plan were less than a particular amount the income tax department had refunded them to him. It was totally beyond his control. He had contributed the requisite number of years. He was disabled, severe, prolonged and all that good stuff, and was still unable to collect the benefits even though he had qualified and made all the right contributions.

Why? It was because Revenue Canada has given him his contributions back. Did he ask Revenue Canada to give those contributions back? No. Did he know he got the contributions back 11 years prior? Obviously not, but he had and he was disqualified.

That is another case of a person falling between the cracks. I know. I lost that one as well and I defended him personally. Those are only a few cases of how people fall between the cracks of a system like that, a very complicated bureaucracy.

I say this to the government across the way.

[Translation]

I am very glad that it has finally increased the benefits under the plan, but we should not pretend that raising these benefits solves all the problems, Madam Speaker, as our colleague from Winnipeg pointed out to us in several amendments he proposed. We should amend the bill some more. This does not mean that we in the Liberal Party are against the amendments presented by the government, but there must be more. I do not have to give a whole list; my colleague from Winnipeg has already done so. We would have liked the government to adopt many of the amendments we proposed. Unfortunately they did not, Madam Speaker, but I must still admit that the bill goes in the right direction.

[English]

I have a final concern about how the Canada Pension Plan works in its entirety. It is a worry I have and have had for some time as a former member of a legislative assembly of one of the provinces of this country, namely the province of Ontario. I cannot help but think that there is something not quite right when provinces can borrow money from the contributions of taxpayers for less than what the money is actually worth. In other words, they are borrowing that money at reduced interest rates to fund their provincial operations.

I see my colleague from Oshawa over here. He will remember our years in the legislature when we used to raise the issue there as well about how Canadians were contributing toward that plan. The provincial government would go into the plan, raid the coffers of it and borrow the money at subsidized rates and then never pay it back. There is a tremendous concern there. I would hope that members do raise that; perhaps not only in the context of this bill but otherwise. It is, as I say, something that all of us in Parliament should think about very seriously.

If it was to be done over again, and I know this plan has been in existence for many years now, I wonder whether the wise thing to do would not have been to do something totally different. You could take those pools of funds within regions. You could not put this in one massive fund. There would be just too much money in it. It would be an amount that would be too large to be manageable. Within regions, perhaps provinces or even smaller units, we could have these pools of capital that could be invested in various businesses or other areas in order to yield a profit. That profit could be pooled together with the funds and then we could pay contributions to the people when of course they qualified to get them. I suppose that is water under the bridge. The system has been with us for some 25 years or so.

I come back to the concerns that I have expressed earlier. I want to indicate to the government that in addition to the amendments it has brought forward it should as well include either in this law or subsequent legislation amendments such at those that have been proposed by my colleague from Winnipeg. It also needs to co-ordinate the procedures within the department in order to shorten those delays which are totally unreasonable at the present moment.

We are talking in this bill about shortening the period of time that an individual has before he or she can launch an appeal. There is nothing in the bill that says that the government must respond within a certain number of days and if it does not there is a deemed benefit on the part of the individual. If the onus is applied to the individual taxpayer maybe the government should also be subject to it as well. That would light a fire under the chairs of whoever is responsible for some of these delays.

We need to ensure that we take all those pieces of legislation that have definitions or are outright silly or even different in the way that I have described with this one case about this woman who was the spouse of an individual. She had raised the family of this individual who had been ill for most of the life of the children they had had together. But because he was living in an institution at the time of death they could not draw benefits because they were not living together and they were unmarried at the time that he died. These kinds of rules, particularly when the rules are different within the same department, have to be wrong. I could even say asinine. That is probably more the expression that comes to mind.

[Translation]

So, Madam Speaker, I too was pleased to take part in this debate this afternoon. With my colleagues, I again tell the government that it should have listened to the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who of course wanted to offer many amendments to improve this modification that the government has before us today.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to rise in the House today to speak to Bill C-39, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

I come from a part of the country where the impact on every member of our community, on every family member, is very pervasive. It hits everyone in the community and in the family. This particular legislation is very important and touches the lives of many people.

It is most unfortunate that the amendments sought were defeated and were disallowed. This would have enhanced the legislation significantly and would have accommodated many of the concerns raised by witnesses who appeared before committees of the House of Commons. These witnesses came forward and put a human face to the problems that are experienced because legislation is regressive and perhaps not as helpful as it would be had these particular amendments gone forward. Motion No. 2 was disallowed. It asked that Bill C-39 be amended to strike down the deadline for the filing of applications irrespective of the mental capacity of the patient. It would have enhanced the lot of many individuals who have major concerns across this country.

We have to commend the members from Winnipeg North and Hamilton Mountain for their work on this legislation, as well as the government for this important bill. I want to address the bill from a slightly different direction, in my case as it affects seniors in the north, as it affects women in the north and the benefits to which they are entitled, as it affects the whole issue of poverty in the north and as it affects those northerners who are disabled.

The three most serious issues facing seniors in the Northwest Territories have to do with adequate housing, with the low fixed incomes and basically perhaps the abuse of elders. This is not by all individuals but it is a specific problem which I think needs attention and which is being expressed by that particular constituency.

The north faces many challenges today. One of the most serious is how we can ensure that our seniors in the north are taken care of at a time when the federal government is withdrawing financial commitments to its share of social and health programs. It is a fact that over the last week there has been publicity in the north that the government is withholding $50 million in transfer payments from the territorial government that would go toward health care programs. This has a direct impact on the elders, the people who are most vulnerable and need this assistance, and the people who would benefit greatly from the particular resources that are being withheld.

I have to say that I had the opportunity in the past to work with many of our senior citizens. In working with the senior citizens and with a group of other people at the grass roots level, I had an opportunity a number of years ago to work with 38 senior citizens and numerous others to help assist in putting down their stories about their lives. It is a real tribute to have worked with a couple of people, one by the name of Margaret Thom and another by the name of Tessa MacIntosh, on elders in the north in a book called Nahecho Keh which we produced. It expresses all of the concerns that the elders have in terms of their lives and the struggles that they endure. We produced that book because we believed that our elders reflect through their infinite wisdom what values and principles are important for our survival in modern day society.

Housing is the number one issue facing seniors in the Northwest Territories. How does any kind of legislation relate to housing when you are on a fixed income and when you have a lot of encumbrances in terms of trying to achieve any gains you would make through getting your pension and you have all of these obstacles in front of you? One of the problems you would find difficulty with is if you do not have money for housing on fixed incomes. It is very expensive in the north. It should be noted that housing is also the number one health priority, a basic right taken for granted by most Canadians.

I am especially pleased to be talking about the issues related to health because it happens that people responsible for mental health are meeting in Ottawa to discuss this serious issue over the past week. Yesterday I met with our representative, Barbara Hood Hall, about the serious mental health problems in the north. Mental health is our number one health problem. As I mentioned earlier one of the causes of this illness like other illnesses in the north is poor housing. It is not unusual to have as many as 16 people living in a poorly ventilated, substandard home. The chronic housing shortage is a major obstacle to combating infectious diseases which plague many of our elders, particularly tuberculosis and respiratory infections.

A priority for the seniors in the north is the requirement for facilities in the communities with individual accommodations. There are some senior citizens homes in the north in communities like Fort McPherson, Aklavik, Inuvik, in the Mackenzie Delta region particularly, in Fort Rae, Fort Providence and Yellowknife.

There are 23 other communities where these facilities are still required, so housing and accommodation is definitely a problem for these senior citizens. Many seniors are living in public housing and are required to pay at least $150 rent, not including utilities.

The problem with this situation is that 85 per cent of the seniors in the north are on fixed incomes. The average fixed income for seniors in the north with old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and territorial supplement is only $850 a month. This monthly income is for residents living in communities where the cost of living is 30 to 60 per cent higher than the cost of living in southern centres such as Edmonton, for instance. This means that the majority of senior citizens in Canada's north live below the poverty line.

For the most part, disabled people in the north who are affected by this bill, like the senior citizens in the north, face a greater risk of poverty than others because of unequal opportunities, discrimination, lack of recognition for the work they do, higher living costs and inadequate income support.

Many senior citizens are solely dependent on their pension plans and the money they get from their pensions through work because many of them share their moneys with the people who live in their family as a result of the extended family situation. They share their incomes with their sons and daughters, their grandchildren and other relatives. This is not an income to support one individual or two but, in a situation where there is high unemployment, to supplement the whole family's well-being.

The whole issue of poverty is another one that is felt because of the impact of this legislation not being so amended. The anti-poverty organization has identified one in four Canadians over 65 years of age as living below the poverty line. The risk of poverty is greater for women over 65 years who live alone or with non-relatives. Over 50 per cent of these women live in poverty, compared to 23.9 per cent of men. People who have contributed to the building of this country, who have put most of their life's work into building communities and sustaining families for the betterment of our community deserve much better than this. No one should have to live below the poverty line, but that is not the reality of our country.

I would also like to add that census figures show that while two out of five Canadians who had incomes in 1985 received less than $10,000 the percentage is much higher for northern Canadians, for disabled people, for aboriginal people including Métis and on-reserve Indians—almost 55 per cent.

Northerners, and particularly seniors, can testify that income is shared very unequally in Canada. In the 1990s our elders, our senior citizens, do not choose poverty. It is imposed on them. Similar to that of Canadian children who live in poverty, I personally believe that it is the most horrendous issue in Canada today. The homeless and the hungry are a legacy of this country that we cannot afford when we have a reputation in the world of being one of the best countries to live in. The elders and the children of the poor are the most helpless victims in existence, and for me it is a national shame.

Not only are our elders victims of poverty but increasingly there is another problem. It is very difficult, controversial, and provocative to speak of it but more senior citizens are victims of abuse. I am talking about physical abuse, neglect, financial exploitation and psychological abuse. Our elders, our senior citizens, are being abused because they are vulnerable, primarily through their age. Elder abuse has probably taken place all through history but finally it is getting public attention. Like people who are disabled, seniors are abused because they have to depend on others to provide them with care. They are not only being abused by members of their family but they are susceptible to violence by neighbours, care givers, strangers and relatives. It is indeed a difficult subject to speak of. It is one that we would not believe but it is a fact that it exists. Statistics suggest that family violence, including that against elders, is more prevalent in aboriginal communities than in other communities. It is not a statistic that I, as an aboriginal person, like to quote but it is indeed a fact.

Knowing the issues facing seniors, disabled people and aboriginal Canadians, it is our utmost responsibility to provide the financial support for the programs and services that will benefit these important but vulnerable members of our society.

I want to conclude by paying tribute to all those care givers in the north, the employees or family members who are providing essential care for our senior citizens.

I would like to tell the members of the House that there are two seniors from Yellowknife who have given their entire life to look after others: those who are homeless, those who are poor and needed to get out of the cold. It is not desirable to be out and homeless in the north at 40 below. It is indeed a sad thing.

Ruth and Gordon Bailey opened their home in Yellowknife for years to strangers and friends who needed care. Now Mrs. Bailey is suffering from poor health and they have moved to another community, but they are still active in the church and community programs. If we were all as committed to enhancing the quality of life as the Baileys have been, we would have a nicer and safer country.

It is incumbent upon us, as lawmakers, to ensure in whatever way we can that we create the best legislation for the people that need our help the most.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C–39. I think it is a very important bill.

As we study and look at this bill we realize the significance of this bill, particularly that of the Canada Pension Plan and the other benefits we have in this country.

This is an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, primarily with concern to increasing the contributions so that the fund will be sufficient. I think that we may lose sight of some of the things that really need to be done.

I want to thank my colleagues, the members for Hamilton Mountain and Winnipeg North, who have done a great deal of work on this. Not only have they done a lot of work but they are very compassionate people. Therefore, the work they have done has been very relevant. It reflects what we in this party want to get across with respect to the importance of this legislation and the importance that the people in this country are placing on this legislation.

Certainly the most important aspect today, as far as I am concerned, is the Canada Pension Plan disability. It is the one that Canadians seem to know the least about, mainly because if we are talking about the Canada Pension Plan it is generally well known that you receive it when you are 65, or if you qualify you can receive it at 60 with a reduced amount, there are also survivor's benefits and various other aspects of it. People are also familiar with the very important old age security and also with the augmentation and with the capital cost allowance.

I would say that the one that people know the least about is the Canada Pension Disability Program. That is because most Canadians have been blessed with good health. They have been able to carry out their employment without the necessity of having to worry about the future, without the feeling that at some point soon they are going to have to cease work.

Of course, this does not take into consideration the ones that lose employment because they are laid off, because there are plant closures or because they are in areas of this country which are economically depressed. I am talking about the ones that have jobs they think will continue but because of health problems they are unable to continue their employment. This is a very tragic situation because I do not think, regardless of what anyone says, that a person wants to give up his or her employment. It is a very important part of not only their income and their every day schedule but of their dignity.

To be able to work and have gainful employment is a major factor in the profile and attitude of Canadians. When one has to give up this job, it is a very traumatic time.

I know because in my area the unemployment rate is approximately 35 per cent. The employment basically is heavy industrial. It is mainly coal mining and steel making. There are a lot of industrial accidents in which people are injured, sometimes at a very young age, and unable to carry on their employment.

Had this Canada Pension Disability Program not existed there would not be an income for them and their families. I do not know how my area would survive even to the extent it has at the present time.

I want to ask the government to try to imagine the ramifications of this program and the good that it does, to try to imagine the people who benefit from it and the regions of this country that are benefiting from it.

As well, I want to say to those that look at public servants as people who are uncaring and who disregard the needs of others that frankly the experience I have had with the public servants in the Pension Benefits Section, and particularly Canada Pension Disability, has been excellent. I found them to be a very caring, very efficient group of people.

When they are here in Ottawa, with jobs and good health, one would expect that there may be a tendency to forget those that are having health problems and are unable to work, that there would be a tendency to say: "Well, this person is not that badly hurt" or "That person is not that sick, I think they are really elaborating on the health difficulties that they have".

Although you may get some of that, most of their concerns are of a very caring nature. They are to be commended for the work they have done.

That being the case, what they are doing with this program is the best they can with the program as it now exists. There are problems with this program that frankly should be addressed. The member for Winnipeg North has mentioned a few of them. In fact, he and the member for Hamilton Mountain proposed certain amendments at report stage which were defeated.

That is unfortunate because I think those amendments were very worth-while amendments and could have added a lot to this program.

In one he mentions that in most cases, the standard procedure in turning down somebody for Canada pension disability is to say that their injury or sickness is not severe and prolonged. That is a very nebulous statement. As the members for Hamilton Mountain and Winnipeg North have asked: "How do you determine what is severe and what is prolonged?" It is extremely difficult to do because it is a subjective test determined by those that are judging the person.

If the person is in my riding, they are on Cape Breton Island and the people doing the judging are here in Ottawa and have not seen the person. Certainly, if the applicant is turned down in appeals and is turned down a second time, then on the third time around the applicant is examined by the doctor of the government, in which case the people here in Ottawa have a common denominator.

The problem then is that probably over a year has gone by and the applicant has no income with which to support himself or herself or his or her family. It really depends on this objective test. In that case I feel that the public servants here in Ottawa have been basically fair. I know that it is not entirely their determination because we do not have a definition of what is severe and prolonged. The problem now is that the tendency to say "severe" and "prolonged" is something that is going to actually be an incapacitation for an ever longer period of time, and that "severe" is a sickness or an injury which can be in some cases that the person is not able to move.

Along with the statement that the injury must be severe and prolonged one gets in one's rejection letter from the federal government the statement that this person is capable of doing light work. That is awfully difficult to take for some person who has a back problem who cannot even sit down and they cannot stand for long periods of time. To say that light work is going to be able to help or that they would be able to do light work is really not being fair to the applicant. I think this approach has got to be changed considerably.

Furthermore, in areas of high unemployment, where are you going to find any kind of work, let alone light work? As you know, Madam Speaker, in companies where there are jobs that are perhaps not too onerous, there are a lot of older workers who perhaps have a minor disability or a minor health problem who are given some of these jobs. For those who really have a major disability or a major health problem, there are no jobs. They cannot after they are 35 today go and apply for another job because they are considered to be too old. There are no jobs for them in other industries, that is if there are jobs that exist which in many parts of this country there are not.

I think that attitude about having to look at the person as being able to carry on light work is something which is very unfair. It puts the applicant in a position of feeling that the government feels that they are trying to put one over on them. I think that is unfair. It only adds to the mental problem that a person has when they come to grips with the fact that they have to apply for Canada pension disability.

Our party has defined what is severe as stating it is a person unable to do his or her usual type of job without mental or physical strain and preventing the person from fully discharging duties of that job as determined by a licensed medical doctor. We define "prolonged" as being three months or more of continued disability. I think these would be major improvements if they would be adopted by the government.

It would also downplay this belief that they could do a type of light work which in most cases they cannot, even if they could get the employment.

Suppose a person receives the Canada Pension Plan disability benefit. It may be after a year, it may be after two years if they have to go through two appeals and are examined by the doctor of the federal government. It may take two years. In this case they receive a cheque which goes back four months from the time they first applied. In the meantime they may not have had any income at all unless they were obtaining assistance from welfare. That being the case, they are in a very difficult financial position.

I think there has to be some way of making it easier for the applicants to have some funding. I think this should be discussed with the provinces to allow for community services to perhaps be a little more lenient with these applicants while they are waiting.

It is not a risk to the federal government because if the person is successful in getting Canada pension disability, the province has a claim on the amount that they have paid in community benefits while the person was waiting. The province is reimbursed and the federal government does not have to pay any more. It does allow the applicant to have something in the meantime. This could be a long period of time without significant funding.

The other thing is that when the applicant is successful and is paid, of course the province is always there to make sure it gets its money back. If the federal government decides it wants to increase the amount it is going to pay the Canada pension disability recipients then the provinces decide that they are going to reduce what they are paying.

Consider the person who is on disability, is married, has children and the Canada pension disability is not going to be satisfactory to look after his needs. He is getting some assistance from the province but as the amount the federal government pays is increased, the province in turn reduces its assistance by the same amount. Therefore, the person cannot get ahead.

I would ask the federal government and the provinces to get together on this question so that when an increase is given the applicant gets the benefit of this increase.

I would also like to say that we must not forget families. Quite often when the applicant is on disability there are family members who are affected as well. Usually they are wives and children who must try to make do with the smaller amount the family will be receiving after the Canada pension disability locks in.

In the meantime there are the aspirations of the young people who want to attend university and to improve themselves. I do not think we can say that is not an important aspect. If we want our young people to be well trained and if the government is sincere about a higher degree of education and preparedness for jobs in this country, then we have to look toward the sons and daughters of these recipients of Canada pension disability. We must make sure that these sons and daughters are not punished by the fact that their father or mother or sometimes even both through their diligent work and strong work ethic have become injured on the job. They find that their children are not able to receive sufficient education after that has occurred. I think there has to be some attention paid to that.

The plan says one has got to be able to do light work and that one can do light work. But it is not ready to allow the recipient to take further training or education to be able to upgrade himself or herself should the occasion allow it. This may happen even if it is an area in which they get this training and they can do this work without having to take Canada pension disability. If that is the case then the government is just defeating not only the purpose of the program and it is actually costing it more money, but it is taking away the opportunity of the individual.

I would hope that the government would look more favourably upon the recommendation of the members for Winnipeg North and Hamilton Mountain when they say that the applicant should be allowed to take training and to receive Canada pension disability until that training is finished and for a reasonable period thereafter to allow the recipient to be able to obtain employment. I think that is very reasonable and it would be helpful to all involved.

Canada pension disability may be the sole means of support for a family. Quite often when economic conditions become difficult it causes a great deal of stress on the marriage. Quite often there will be a marriage breakup, which is always very unfortunate. But wives do not know that they have rights and that they can be looked after. More and more women are realizing that they do not have to just be left penniless and that they can have some financial assistance. Unfortunately, under the Canada Pension Disability Program, their rights do not extend very far.

I would like to support what has already been recommended by this party in that the spouses on marriage breakup be able to be the beneficiaries of automatic splitting of the Canada pension disability benefits. That is if two people are separated or divorced, the wife has an automatic right to a certain percentage of that Canada pension disability.

Quite often the wife does not know that she has that right and many months and perhaps even years may go by before she realizes that the right exists. I think it should be retroactive and there should be a conscious program to make sure these women have the right to the automatic splitting of the benefits and that they are made aware of the rights they do have.

If we are going to do that and we are going to be fair then this is something we should work toward.

I think we have to look at this as a program that is going to become more and more important. We have an unacceptably high unemployment rate today. We have a lot of people who have worked very hard all their lives in jobs that have been very stressful and injurious to their health and who have received very serious injuries. We have young people who are looking for jobs who cannot get employment. I think that we have to take a very realistic approach to those who have suffered injuries. Instead of having them go through hoops to prove they do have a disability which warrants this kind of assistance from the program, we should be more receptive to giving them assistance. If they are on the program and a job is made available, then that job is made available for a younger person who is maybe just recently married and has a family and a mortgage and needs a job very, very badly.

I think we have to look very compassionately at this program and what it can do for Canadians. I would hope that the government will not try to squeeze this program because this program is one of the few sources of income that low income Canadians have. It is one of the few means with which low income Canadians can maintain themselves and their dignity in these times of decreasing employment opportunities, cutbacks in spending on housing and reduced unemployment insurance pay periods. We have got to maintain the dignity of Canadians and the opportunity for Canadians to have an income.

This is a very important program. When a person goes through this kind of stress of losing their employment through injury or mental distress then that in itself is a problem. We should not at the same time ask them to bend and to try to move heaven and earth to get the assistance under this program. I would hope that the government would be cognizant of what is going on out there and would be sympathetic and realize that this program is becoming, if it is not already, one of the most important social benefit programs that exists in our country.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys and found his remarks to be rather appropriate indeed.

However, I wonder if I could make a few comments and then at the conclusion put a question to my colleague.

The member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys has served his constituency with great distinction for I think almost 13 years now. He is probably as well aware as those of us who represent constituencies in the various parts of this country. I am sure in that timeframe he has been made aware of numerous cases of individuals who have made application for Canada pension disability benefits and/or for Canada pension generally and that the timeframe which government has taken to process those claims has been inordinate. I am wondering if he has encountered the same kinds of cases that I have encountered. My constituency is geographically next to the hon. member's constituency. I find in my own riding that a number of applicants who are making these claims of the Government of Canada are having to wait in some instances three, six, nine, twelve, fifteen and eighteen months before there is a final adjudication as to whether or not there are any benefits which will be flowing the applicants. Thereafter the claimant has the appeal process, and that again will add another minimum of six months on his or her claim. I am wondering if the hon. member could respond to that question, whether or not he finds an inordinate amount of time in the processing of claimants.

• (1440)

Second, I am wondering, since the hon. member is the justice critic for the Liberal Party and a very able one at that, if he could perhaps give some consideration to whether or not due process is in fact being served when Canadians have to wait for such an inordinate amount of time to get a decision, presumably and preferably a positive decision as opposed to a negative decision.

I am thinking, for instance, of the principles of natural justice. How in the name of God can the Government of Canada make an adjudication on a claimant from Hamilton, Ontario when the claimant is not before the officials in Ottawa who are making that particular claim? I am wondering if perhaps the hon. member could give some thought to that.

Finally, my comment and question, which will be my third question, is about a concern I have when the Government of Canada increases benefits, and we will say a disability claimant. Let us say they reside in his constituency of Cape Breton—The Sydneys or mine of Cape Breton—East Richmond. It has been the practice under the government of the former premier, Mr. Buchanan, and certainly under the practice and under the leadership of Don Cameron, the Premier of Nova Scotia, that when benefits are given from Ottawa they taketh away in Nova Scotia.

We in the Parliament of Canada provide a benefit to the recipient only to find at the end of the day when the cheque is mailed to the recipient the provincial government comes in with a big claw and takes it. The benefit which is bestowed upon the recipient is a mere fraction of a cent, thereby precluding the individual of that benefit.

As the hon. member will want to attest to, we are not talking here about large sums of money, but the money which is going to the recipient is indeed large. I gave an example yesterday—and I am sure the Chair has read Hansard and has followed the debate very carefully—of the $45 a month or the $36 a month which works out to in excess of $400 a year which can pay the fuel bill, which can pay for clothes for children, for milk and bread, the necessities of life.

I find it unbelievable and unreasonable that the Government of Canada is not making certain that provincial governments are allowing that benefit to go forward, thereby not precluding the recipients of the benefit in its totality. Second, they are not expediting those claims which everyone knows are taking an inordinate amount of time.

With your permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to hear some responses from the hon. member who has served in this Chamber, is a very distinguished justice critic for the Liberal Party of Canada, and has great experience as it relates to Canada pension and the various claimants who have made claims under that particular piece of legislation.

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, I would also like to thank my colleague, the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, for the questions that he has brought forward. They are very important questions indeed, questions with which he has been confronted in his role as member of Parliament in that constituency, which like my own is unfortunately a constituency with a higher rate of unemployment than either one of us would like.

I want to address again the third point he made, that is that the province takes away the increase which the federal government puts on Canada pension disability from any assistance it gives. The federal government has said that it is going to look into this and it has said in the past that it would look into it. Still the process continues. It is very deflating for families with Canada pension disability and the assistance from the province not to see that increase when prices have been going up and costs have been going up. How are they supposed to be able to make ends meet? We have been asking that for a considerable period of time, but it seems that the governments will not come together and deal with it. I think the federal government has to try harder to get the provinces to agree on allowing that augmentation of the benefits to go through.

Also as my colleague has said, and rightly so, this is an infringement on the rights of natural justice and the rights of an individual to be able to support his or her family in this day and age. What we are seeing, frankly, is a terrible tendency that government is accepting that it is right to have two levels of Canadians. If you are healthy and you have a job, great, you are going to be all right. You work and you pay taxes. If you are unemployed, if you are disabled and cannot work, then that is tough. You drew the short straw. We will make sure the roof does not fall in on your head or we will keep you in bare essentials, but that is all we are prepared to do.

I do not think that is right. None of these people asked to become disabled. None of these people asked to have these health problems. In most cases they have been soldiering on in the job for a good period of time with this discomfort and this disability, just absolutely reluctant to the nth degree to go on this kind of assistance because they feel that it is embarrassing for them. They feel that they are just not the same person if they cannot have a job. Of course they look upon the funding they are going to get which in practically all cases would be well below what they would make when they were employed.

I want to go particularly to the first point the hon. member made respecting the process. I do not put a lot of blame on the public servants per se. I think it is the government that is really shortchanging the process in that if you apply for Canada pension disability it will tell you: "Don't expect to receive any word for four months". That is the starting point now. Four months is the time it takes for your file to get to the top. It evidently is a result of the fact that there are more people needed in dealing with this.

If you are unsuccessful you are told that perhaps your injuries are not prolonged or severe enough in nature, which is very subjective to say the least, and that you should try for light work that just does not exist in the hon. member's riding and in my riding. Then you go into an appeal process which will take probably another six months and, as my hon. friend said, it could take up to two years if you are turned down that second time before you go to the second appeal which would be the third level. At that point you are then told that you have to be examined by a doctor who would be a representative of the federal government.

In our area of Cape Breton the doctors that the people there have to visit are mostly in Halifax.

• (1450)

They have to get on a bus or a plane or get a drive and go to Halifax to be examined, at great inconvenience. They cannot go by train any more. That is gone. Perhaps in two years they are told whether their final request has been successful or not.

It is just not as good as it should be. The program is an excellent one, but the delivery is not efficient to the extent it should be. It is not in keeping with the dignity and the needs of Canadians.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, one of the advantages—and there are many of course—of coming near the end of a long parliamentary debate is that you have an opportunity to listen to the words of your colleagues. We are often told that Parliament is becoming irrelevant to the governing of Canada. I would argue strenuously with that assertion, having had the opportunity over the last several days to listen to the comments made by members of both sides of the House as they dealt with a very fundamental issue that everybody across this country regardless of what region you live in understands, and that is the need to have some sense of security as one gets into an older age and when one faces the sudden prospect of disability.

It has been for me a real learning experience listening to the experiences of constituents of Cape Breton, the constituents of the member from Saskatchewan. They were all talking about their kinds of difficulties and citing the problems faced by people in their own areas.

I only hope that this debate will be listened to. I only hope that we will understand this bill, which is what I call a fix-it bill, necessary to fix some clear problems that were appearing, particularly in the underfinancing of the Canada Pension Plan, has really through the dynamics of this debate generated a quite different perception and quite different understanding of what is going on.

If there is anything that should be taken from this debate, it is not so much the details of the particular bill or piece of legislation. It is that it has given an opportunity to open a window on the much broader range of anxieties and concerns about the level of the Canada Pension Plan.

It goes back to one fundamental issue. When the CPP was brought in there was a premise made, an assumption made, that there would be a much broader private coverage than in fact has occurred and that the CPP would almost be a supplementary benefit to the extensive network of private coverage. In fact the opposite has happened. We have not had the evolution of a broad based private pension plan system. There are pension plans there, but of course many of them are being eroded. As we go through this extended recession it happens even more frequently that pension benefits are being cut back and companies are moving.

I had a case in my riding just a few weeks ago. A gentleman lost his pension benefits because the company picked up its bags, moved south, and there was no obligation for it to continue paying benefits.

There is serious undermining going on in the private pension field, which puts even more serious responsibilities on the public sponsored pension system.

I simply want to use this opportunity to draw the attention of members and hopefully of the government or a future government to the fact that the reform of the pension plan system has to go beyond just tinkering, fixing some immediate problems. We may have to come to grips with a level of pension benefits that will be available as each generation of Canadians reaches retirement age.

I have between 18,000 and 20,000 constituents who make less than $25,000 a year. If we use today's calculations by the National Advisory Council on Welfare, their pension benefits plus their old age and the old age supplement would still put them below the poverty line. There is not sufficient build-up of a pension benefit to the CPP and the old age security to ensure that they can look forward to their retirement with some sense of security. That is particularly a problem in the larger cities like Winnipeg or Toronto or Vancouver where costs are so much higher.

I would suggest that the problem is that we should be projecting the profile of what our Canadian population will look like 10, 15, 20 years down the road and designing our CPP to meet that problem so that future legislators will not have to scramble to face a much broader problem of large scale insecurity because we at the present time did not exercise our responsibility of stewardship to make sure that there would be enough of a benefit base to satisfy those needs.

Similarly I find it also of concern that the number of real problems that have been identified in the implementation and administration of the Canada Pension Plan are not being fully addressed in this bill.

The member from Cape Breton who just spoke detailed very clearly problems of delay, problems of adjudication, problems of getting proper processing of pension benefits and in many cases being caught with all kinds of inconsistencies.

I will give an example from my own riding, if members will bear with me. I had a very strong and I think eloquent statement by Mr. Gerald Kelly. He pointed out that for reasons totally beyond his responsibility he had to take early retirement on a government employment pension. He had a tax liability of $8,000 at the time of his retirement. No effort of his, of mine or anyone else's was able to get the government minister to move on it.

We are finding the situation where people are let go at their employment for reasons of cutbacks, stringencies and the belt tightening that is going on. They expect to get their benefits, but because of the nature of their pay-out they now must assume a lump sum payment. In the case of Mr. Kelly it was almost $8,000. It is an enormous penalty to have to pay, because of someone else's decision that you are no longer a useful member of the work force.

That is not fair. It is something that could have been fixed as part of this over-all pension area or maybe it could be included when we look at the question of Public Service pensions. The fact of the matter is there are people hurting out there as a result of the regulations and the administrative procedures that have been set up that penalize people like Mr. Kelly.

Let me give another case history of Mr. Carleton from Kenniston Boulevard who has been a member of the armed forces for many years. He discovered on remarriage after the death of his first spouse that survivor benefits were no longer made eligible for him. Once again a citizen who has been paying into the CPP honestly over the years finds out that his family no longer has the protection it has the right to expect. Again there were all kinds of representations, all kinds of pleas, all kinds of adjudication, and once again a stone wall with no ability to make any changes in that kind of case.

By the way, I received probably one of the longest letters on record from the President of the Treasury Board trying to explain his way out. What I find hard to accept is that we will go to so much effort to find a tortuous answer as opposed to solving the problem of that individual.

I found it interesting to listen to the comments of our House leader in this debate yesterday when he spoke at the beginning of third reading. He talked about the fact that many of these things are easy to fix, if there was a certain flexibility of mind, if we were prepared to take the administrative problems and just face up to them as opposed to defending them. As he said, it is no wonder people get discouraged about government sometimes when they get caught in this kind of administrative sea wall and no one is prepared to give them a helping hand.

Another interesting case has just come to my attention. It concerns a gentleman who wants to make contributions to a United Kingdom retirement plan so he can draw on it when he is retired at the age of 65. However, he is not allowed to take any tax deductibility for it. As he properly points out, he will get the full benefit and will not be a burden to Canadian society if he is allowed to make those extra payments for the next 10 years or so. Again the Minister of Finance says: "There is nothing I can do about it". Of course there are things he can do about it. To use that as an excuse is simply not acceptable. There are many things he could do about it if he wanted to.

I have a file full of cases but I will just use three or four examples to point out that there is a real need, and the debate has shown this clearly, for a much broader pension reform in this country, to deal with the broad issue of the sufficiency of the pension benefit itself as our population becomes older. It is necessary to take a hard and clear look to tackle that problem in an effective way. At the same time but on a different level, it is equally as important to deal with all these twists and turns in which people get caught in dealing with their fundamental problems of security.

Therefore, we have to use this debate as the opportunity to make that case. I can think of perhaps no greater contribution this Parliament can make to the people of Canada than to give them a degree of assurance about their security.

A few nights ago I had dinner with an old acquaintance who is a senior ad executive. I was asking him questions about how his own business was being affected by the recession and by what is going on. He gave what I thought was an interesting answer and it is pertinent to this debate. He said: "The problem is that people are so insecure that they are not going to purchase, that they are not going to be making a commitment to the future when they know that in some capricious way they are going to be laid off, lose their job, be on the cut-off roll, find themselves with a benefit cut away".

I do not think members opposite realize what the cumulative effect of their eight year attack upon the social contracts of this country has really been. I do not think they fully comprehend the way in which it has changed people's perception of themselves and their role in society. We have spent a lot of years trying to build up a certain safety net, a social contract in which the fundamental psychology of security could be there so that people could become entrepreneurs, could become innovative, could take chances, could take risks, could invest, could feel that they have a real stake in this society. However, every time there is a claw-back, every time there is a cut-back, every time you niggle away at one or another of these benefits—transfer payments, children's benefits, family allowances—every time you attack it you are creating one more erosion in that sense of security, another sense of not knowing what the next day will bring.

That leads to a perception that makes people draw inward because they feel they have to protect themselves. That means that their best efforts and best energies are not used in an energetic contribution to Canada. That undermining of the Canadian sense that they are going to be looked after—not in a paternalistic sense, but that they have made a fair contribution and now they have a right to expect some benefit—has been, to my mind, one of the most damaging and eroding aspects of the last eight years. It is most always our seniors, who in many ways feel fundamentally betrayed.

It also demonstrates perhaps the most glaring problem that members on this side of the House have tried to bring to parliamentary and public attention over the last couple of months, and that is the condition of children. I listened in debate to the parliamentary secretary who talked in quite glowing terms about how this bill will add $35 a month to a dependent of someone on disability. She said how important that was but never recognized when she spoke that what she was really saying was what about all those other children in society who are not getting an extra $35 a month, who cannot get the $178 a month benefit, whose only support is the approximately $35 family allowance.

What struck me when the parliamentary secretary spoke on third reading and talked about this benefit for the dependants of those with disabilities was that she might have understood that she was talking about a problem that reaches out in a much broader way. One of the elements of security we have to begin to provide in this country is security for the family to provide a real foundation, a real anchor so that families can feel they are part of it, that every time they reach a crisis, whether an accident, a marriage breakdown, a sickness, an illness, or a problem, they are not going to fall between the cracks and end up homeless, at the food bank, or without the kind of support they need. It happens every single day. They are not being supported any more.

I hope that changes in terms of dependants of those who can get disability benefits will be of some help. I still feel anguish for many of those who have not had the same kind of attention paid to their problems in any piece of legislation in this House.

As we end this third reading and this legislation goes on the books and we pass on to something else, I hope that we will not forget the lesson, that we will not forget how members of this House of all three parties who count stood up and talked about the problems and anxieties facing their own constituencies: seniors without proper pension benefits, people with disabilities, spouses who go through marriage breakdown and do not get a fair share of the credits.

We also recognize that those problems must be looked at through a prism and the light must shine on a much broader spectrum of Canadians. That is what this is all about. Security is not welfare. Security is not a handout. Security is not paternalism. It is the bedrock upon which we build our economy. It is the bedrock upon which we build a society that feels confident about itself and feels that it cares for one another. That is the way in which we are going to become a new productive society.

The government is out consulting with its new paper on competition and productivity. I have read those papers carefully. Unfortunately it does not mention what perhaps may be the most important ingredient in becoming a productive competitive society, and that is a society that feels secure about itself, that knows how to take care of those who are less fortunate and uses the full talents of all its people.

You will never become competitive and productive as long as you keep treating people, to use the words of my colleague, as second class citizens.

I support this bill because it moves to fix pension plan problems and toward those with disabilities. I hope to God that we will take this bill and realize that we have an awful lot more work to do.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, every time I hear that my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre is participating in debate I try to get to the Chamber because if there is one individual in the House who has demonstrated an ability and a capacity to represent his constituents with vigour, enthusiasm and intelligence it has been the hon. member for Winnipeg South entre.

Not only has he been a very distinguished member of this House but he has served in other capacities as well in government and he has distinguished himself there.

He knows what he is talking about when he makes reference to some of the pitfalls of the Canada Pension Plan and when he draws to the attention of members of this House the inequities that are still within the system. I think he would concur with some of the very bright, articulate and enthusiastic members of the Public Service, but because of the restrictions of the law they lack the ability to rectify the errors.

• (1510)

The hon. member has made reference to the fact of flexibility in terms of resolving the difficulties. I think all members ought to concur with that. Flexibility is needed but what also is needed is some sense of discipline at the top when moneys are made available to worthy recipients as it will be in this particular case. In fact survivors will get an increase of roughly $35 for a total of about $420 a year. But we need flexibility in the Canada pension and we need discipline at the top.

You cannot ask a claimant to wait 12 months or two years or 18 months or 6 months before they get some sort of an answer. That is not flexibility. I am sure that the hon. member opposite who is a parliamentary secretary in his own right would want to stand and agree with me that that is gross negligence. It is not done by the public servants but by us, the lawmakers in Parliament.

I ask the hon. member if he senses any political will within the government to try to change these kinds of mistakes and errors. Has he sensed that? I have a tendency to believe whatever the response of the hon. member will be because of his distinguished track record in this House and because of the way he was represented his constituents both in government as well as in opposition.

While the hon. member is on his feet I am wondering if he could respond to another question as it relates to Bill C-39 and the consequential effects of Bill C-39 in terms of pension reform. I will conclude with this question. I know there probably would be a disposition within the House for me to continue but I will conclude with this question.

The hon. member knows very well that this is a time of great crisis and the recession has not let go. Canadians from coast to coast, in Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan and the great province of Quebec, western Canada, Atlantic Canada and Ontario are feeling the crunch. Is it fair for governments to waver, sit on its hands and do very little if anything to assist claimants who are waiting in excess of 18 months in order to have their claims processed. I ask the hon. member: Is that fairness?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me first say to my distinguished colleague about his very complimentary opening remarks that if he does not go to heaven for the virtue of generosity he may end up in hell for the sin of exaggeration.

I would say to him that I feel inadequate to answer his question because I think we all recognize that there is no one in the House more knowledgeable about pension reform than our hon. House leader. In his previous capacity he was critic for national health and welfare. I hope the hon. member recognizes and that all members recognize what a contribution the House leader of the Liberal Party has made. He not only contributed to this debate but also to the whole momentum toward changing pension reform. He is still on the barricade demanding that we fight against the real problems that exist.

What I tried to say in my remarks is that the inadequacy of the legislation does not just stem from the broad brush strokes of policy. It also stems from, as he properly said, an attitude of mind at the ministerial level. Recognizing the urgency and imperative of the times we live in, there is nothing to prevent any minister from organizing special procedures for processing applications, for streamlining applications or for ensuring that there is quick deliberation. It is simply a matter of will.

It is simply a matter of saying how we are going to do it and using the best resources in the Public Service to provide a case in point. I can recall when I was responsible for immigration and we had the problem of illegals. We set up a special system of adjudication. Various kinds of applicants and groups could come in and we would process thousands within a period of six months. It was a good committee.

It seems to me that the same kind of answer could be found today. I concur. In this case I think a little bit of joshing is necessary. I find the same problem. When it comes to dealing with pension problems, people see it as some kind of Gordian knot that has to be untied. They see it as some kind of crystal palace where people have to walk through the maze to kind of get an answer and never really find their way out.

It is the most tortuous thing to have a file of correspondence this thick on one pension case. I think every member in the House knows it is the same problem, that we burn up more paper and more time and more energy on one case as opposed to having some minister saying: "Look, part of my job, never mind being a partisan advocate or a member of the cabinet, is to sit down on some Friday afternoon with my top officials and say that we have a problem and let's clean it up. Let's fix the mess and get the administration streamlined". That is all we have to do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. O'Kurley): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe you will find in this magical place called Parliament that we could call it four o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If there is unanimous consent for me to see four o'clock, four o'clock it is.

The House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 3.16 p.m.

INTEREST ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved that Bill C-237, an act to amend the Interest Act (calculation of credit card interest), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee E.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the Interest Act. The calculation of interest and how it is to be calculated is a matter of federal jurisdiction which we have not dealt with sufficiently. The bill deals with the calculation and the terms of calculation of interest rates on credit cards. It does not limit the interest rate or control interest rates, it merely determines how interest is to be calculated and it does that for the following reasons.

First, it is a bill designed to make the calculation of interest possible and provable. Second, it is a bill to standardize the calculation of interest so that consumers can compare the interest rates they are charged on credit cards. Third, it is a bill designed to prevent unconscionable double dipping by some credit card companies charging interest on money for which they have already received a payment or a fee for lending in the first place.

We are all in love today with our plastic. There is not a Canadian who does not go around with plastic in all cases. We have on average something like two and a half credit cards per individual. We all love our plastic.

Before plastic it was necessary for us to pay our bills in cash. If you did not have the cash you could not pay or you paid your bills with a cheque. If the merchant would not take your cheque then you could not buy. If you had a good arrangement with your merchant he might give you credit but you would pay the merchant off at the end of the month or whenever.

The incidence of plastic now makes it possible for people to buy goods and services anywhere in the world where your plastic is good.

As an aside I suppose we would all be better off in some senses if we did not have plastic because we would not run up some of the debts we run up but our world moves because we are able to move money quickly from one person to another. The plastic makes that possible.

Those who issue credit cards get their emolument or get paid for their service in three fashions. First they charge what is called a merchant fee. A merchant fee is really a method whereby the merchant factors his account receivable, because he has not been paid in cash, to a bank or a credit card company. The bank or credit card company pays him for the receivable. The bank or credit card company then bills its customer who is the holder of the card for the good or service at the time of payment. The bank takes a discount on the amount of the cost of the good as a merchant fee.

If you buy something for $100 and the merchant fee is $3 the merchant gets $97. The bank or credit card company collects when it collects its fee of $100 at the appropriate time and therefore makes $3 for supplying the credit or looking after the credit.

The second method of payment or emolument to the credit card company is a user fee. Those fees vary all over the place. Some credit card companies charge an annual fee. American Express for example charges $75 on their green card. Some companies charge a monthly fee. Some charge $1 a month, $12 a year or 50 cents a transaction. These are user fees and they vary all over the place. It depends on the merchandising of the card and how the company wants to handle it.

All companies charge interest in one form or another and calculate it in a different way on the amount outstanding on their cards. Some companies like the Bank of Montreal on its MasterCard do not charge any user fees. It charges merchant fees and interest on the card.

The American Express or Amex green card charges a very substantial up front user fee and a merchant fee but only charges interest when the account is in default and then it collects interest on the money and usually at the same time terminates the credit because it takes the position on the green card part of its business that it is not in the business of lending money. It is in the business of facilitating purchases. Interest is on default only. On default the card becomes a cancelled card. They sue to collect their money and at that point demand interest.

I wish to explain this bill and how it will work. At the present time interest is charged by people in a different and peculiar fashion. To understand interest and how it is charged one must understand merchant fees and why they occur.

Merchant fees can be anywhere between 1.5 per cent and 5 per cent of the sale price, depending on the contract the merchant has with the person who allows him to use the card. It can be the bank or whoever.

Say for example I deal with a merchant who is a jeweller and I decide to buy a $100 bauble for my wife. Suppose the merchant has a fee of 3 per cent. I sign my Visa card and agree to pay $100 for the bauble. I take the bauble and the merchant takes my Visa slip and he immediately deposits it in his bank account. The bank credits him not with $100 but $97. He has $97 immediately in his bank account. He does not have to worry about my credit. He does not have to worry about a cheque that might bounce. He is able to make a sale because I did not have $100 in my pocket. I could not have bought the bauble so he has made a sale that otherwise he would not have made.

The merchant is happy because he has $97 in cash and I suppose he has calculated the cost of supplying that credit in the purchase price of the bauble.

When the bank collects it obviously collects the $100. The merchant fee profit on the transaction to the bank is $3. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that merchant fee represents interest on the advance of money to the merchant. That is what it is. It is a pre-calculated interest charge for the use of credit and the merchant has paid for that credit because the credit has been to his benefit.

Suppose I made that purchase from the jeweller on November 15. At that time the merchant got his $97 and the bank paid out $97. If it was a Visa account that I have they may bill everything up to the end of November. On December 2 they will send out a bill to me dated December 2 which says that if I pay by December 21 I can just pay $100 and that will be the end of it.

In most cases that is the end of it. At least half of the people who buy on credit cards pay their cards off within the credit period. In this particular example the credit period runs to December 21. I have that period of time to pay the bill. If I pay it on time that is all there is to it.

Suppose I do not have $100. I only have $50 and I pay $50 on the account which leaves $50 still outstanding. One would think in decency that the bank has received $3 interest on the money to December 21 and and if they get $50 in that period then they would only charge interest on that $50 from December 21 to the next payment date. That is what you would think would be decent. That would be the ordinary calculation of interest on what ordinarily ought to happen.

But oh, no, they play a different game.

This is the fault that must be corrected. This is what this bill is about. Instead of treating $50 as something they have, they proceed to say that they have not been paid in full, and therefore are entitled to charge interest on $100.

Even though they have interest on $100, they charge interest on $100 at their rate, we will say at 18 per cent per annum, not from December 21, not from December 2, but from November 15. Interest on $100 from November 15 until December 21 works out to about $1.80. Right off the bat, they add $1.80 to the account and then they get $50 and are still owed $50.

They say it is plus $1.80 for interest, but they want even more than that because when they send their bill out on January 2, they calculate interest on $50 from December 21 until January 21 and that comes to another 75 cents or 76 cents or so. On January 2, they send a bill for $52.86, giving them another calculation of interest.

The bill is designed to stop that fault. The bill says: "Interest on a credit card account shall be calculated monthly as it accrues and where unpaid when due, such interest shall be compounded monthly from the date that payment was due". In this case, payment is due on December 21 and interest should be calculated from the date payment is due.

When they send out their bill on January 2, they should send out a bill for interest from December 21 to January 21 representing a cost of approximately 76 cents or a bill for $50.76. That is really the compensation they are entitled to on the amount of that advance.

What has been happening, and happening with increasing frequency, is that card companies have been doubly dipping the consumer. First of all, they dip the consumer, indirectly I admit, when they get a merchant fee to cover the cost of carrying the credit to the end of the credit period.

Then they come back if they are not paid in full and want interest all over again on the same money. This bill is designed to prevent that happening. It is designed to make it possible for people to calculate the interest outstanding.

Right now, while my example only had me buying one article in the month, I might have bought a series of articles on November 2, 14, 15, 27 and so on. In each case, the bank would have calculated back to the date of purchase. I could not conceivably determine the amount of that bank calculation.

When the bill arrives with interest, I just have to assume that it is correct under the current system. Under the system proposed in this bill, I will know when I pay $50 on account, what is the balance owing on my account. I will be able, with straight long form arithmetic if necessary, to calculate the interest that should be due when my bill comes again to be paid in January, to be paid by January 21.

For the first time consumers, if this bill should pass, will have the opportunity to determine what interest they are paying for the advance made on their plastic by the issuer of the plastic card.

• (1130)

I commend this bill to the House. I think this matter has to be dealt with. Institutions have tried to avoid dealing with it. I suspect today that the government in its usual fashion will put up one speaker after another to say that it somehow interferes with business.

Well, it is about time we allowed business to operate sensibly and fairly. It is about time that the calculation of interest was controlled in the same manner for everyone and this bill attempts to do that.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is good to see you so chipper so early in the morning at the beginning of a week. You are setting the tone for the entire week and it is good to see that.

I rise today to support Bill C-237 put forward by my hon. colleague. He has put a lot of work into this bill. Over the last few months I have had to read—and I have to say it has not been painful—a lot of his past press releases as well as testimony in committee when he was chair of the finance committee. The committee brought in a report, I believe it was in 1988, dealing with credit cards generally. In 1989 the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs revisited this entire issue. Since the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs Committee is now dealing with the issue again, this bill is a topical issue.

At the outset I want to indicate to the hon. member that the issues he raises are serious and affect almost every single consumer in Canada. A lot of times private members' bills put forward in this place have a very limited application and there are not a lot of people out there who are affected. I dare say there is probably not a member of Parliament and there are very few adults in Canada that do not have credit cards. The startling statistics are that there are about 27 million bank cards out there and only about 18 million adults in Canada. In addition to that, there is probably another 30 or 40 million department store cards.

If you really want to look at a bill that has broad implications for every consumer in Canada, this certainly is one of them. The member also brings with him a tremendous degree of credibility when he deals with financial issues. He is not one of these Johnny-come-latelys to the vast and dark tunnel of financial institutions. He has been dealing with them in this and previous Parliaments for a long time. I want to commend him for his perseverance at this point in his career, in continuing to dog this particular issue because he knows that fundamental change is needed.

I want to underline this point. The hon. member indicated that the current way credit card issuers calculate interest is pretty bizarre. It is fine to say that consumers should understand what is the effective rate of interest being charged. I will bet you that if you pulled aside any dozen individuals in this Chamber and asked them how the credit card companies calculate interest, unless they have been involved either in the finance committee deliberations of 1988 or involved in the consumer and corporate affairs committee deliberations in 1989, they would not know. They would not have any idea. It is almost like life insurance policies. How many people out there actually know what all the small print means on their life insurance policies? I do not think even most life insurance salesmen know.

It is the same thing when you come to credit card interest rates. My hon. colleague is quite correct. What happens is clear. The credit card issuer states that there will be a a grace period and if the balance is paid off during that grace period there will be no interest charged. That is basically it. We heard from the Royal Bank and the Bank of Montreal just two weeks ago that one-half of all the banks cards, Visa, MasterCards in circulation have an average unpaid balance of an of $1,000 every month. So we are not dealing with a little bit of money, we are dealing with about 15 million cards with an average balance of $1,000 every month.

I want to read a letter that I just received in my office on November 27 addressed to the Hon. Pierre Blais. I am not going to indicate the author of this letter because it deals with some financial information that he may not wish to have disclosed.

I want to read this letter because it certainly puts bank interest charges in perspective. It says that his October 1991 Visa account had an outstanding charge of $2,101.72. It was his intention to pay off his account in full, as he always did. He was a good consumer who paid his balance off every month. Isn't he lucky that he has the money to do that. However, through an error, he issued a cheque for $2,001.72 and he enclosed a copy of the cheque. That left a carryover amount of $100.

He thought he had paid the $2,101.72 off, but he left a balance of $100 in the way he wrote the cheque. He is one of those guys who are lucky enough to have the money to pay off that bloody card at the end of every month.

On his November 1991 account, of which I have a copy, he now finds an interest charge of $50.57 on a carryover amount of $100. He has paid over 50 per cent interest on his balance. You do not get interest relief at all unless you pay every cent off, every penny of the money that you have charged. If you do not pay it all off within the grace period you are going to get nailed for the interest on money that you have already paid off. The full amount. Nothing could more clearly illustrate the point that my hon. colleague has made.

In 1988 my hon. colleague put forward Bill C-238. The bill sought to do the same thing this one is doing. It is trying to put some sanity into the marketplace when dealing with financial institutions, and regarding large credit card issuers, it is trying to standardize the method of interest calculation so that consumers will be able to know. It is pretty difficult. It is like going into a dark corner where there are 12 hissing snakes and trying to pick out the one that is not poisonous. It is the same thing right now with consumers who are trying to deal with the different rates of interest calculated by various card issuers.

My colleague has put forward a bill to which the government could easily assent. The financial institutions may not like it, but they usually do not like it when they have regulations that in effect make them more accountable, not just to Parliament but to the consumers out there.

As one of my colleagues said a little earlier, credit cards derive their money from three different areas: the transaction fee they charge the retailer, the interest rates and user fees.

If anybody out there is about to start crying in their cups for the major credit card issuers in this country, I just want to let them all know that the consumer and corporate affairs committee, in some of its deliberations a few weeks ago, was questioning two of the major banks in Canada. We wanted to find out why the banks had to keep primary interest rates a full 12 percentage points above the treasury bill rate. What the banks had indicated is that it was because of their loan losses. The country is in a recession, 40,000 consumers have gone bankrupt across the country in the last 10 months, a horrendous figures, and it was because of loan losses on Visa and MasterCard accounts.

I was very particular and I said: "Does that mean you are losing money?" They said: "No, it is just that our losses are high". I said: "So what you are telling me is that on one of the three components where you make your money, you have to charge 12 per cent more because you have not made enough money?" Is that what you are trying to tell us?' They did not nod yes, but by their silence and by their stoic look, the answer had to be yes, it could not be anything else but yes.

When the banks come out, as they would if this bill were adopted, and say this is unfair and unduly restricts the marketplace and there should be an allowance through which we can deal with these complex financial calculations outside of the realm of Parliament and regulation, I just want to indicate that we have just gone through one of the worst recessions on record, a very difficult recession. The Royal Bank is a very good bank and I do not get any letters from Royal Bank managers. It is a very good financial institution. It serves its shareholders well. It makes a lot of money for them and banks are in the business of making money. The Royal Bank last year made about $923 million in net income. The Royal Bank this year is probably going to make either a little below that or, if the next month is better, it may even hit a billion dollars. That is a lot of money.

The Bank of Montreal, a very aggressive bank, has gone out there, dropped rates and it is a very competitive institution. I credit the management of that institution for shaking up all of our financial institutions in Canada by its aggressive behaviour. The Bank of Montreal, in the middle of a recession, has posted record profits. When we start dealing with—

An hon. member: What have they all paid in taxes?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): My hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood asks what they have paid in taxes.

An hon. member: On whose backs?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): On whose backs have they done it.

• (1140)

If we look at this bill in perspective, it seeks to give the consumer some relief. It puts into the marketplace a regime which is standardized so that the consumer knows once and for all exactly how his interest is going to be calculated.

It also says to the large financial institutions that issue these cards that we are going to keep an eye on them. We do not want to make them unprofitable, but we do not want to leave them out there so highly unregulated that the consumer is going to suffer.

We in the Liberal Party believe this is the type of measure that will look after both interests and you can look after both interests.

Canada needs strong financial institutions. As well, we need strong consumer protection from undue gouging and from some practices some might consider to be a bit of collusion.

In conclusion, I want to commend my hon. colleague. He has tremendous tenacity. He is like a dog with a bone and he is not going to let this one go. I want to let him know that some on this side of the House treat his perseverance with a great deal of respect. We on this side of the House think that this bill goes a very significant way in ensuring that in the complex area of financial institutions, the setting of credit card interest rates through all three of the areas we talked about before are open to more public scrutiny and are more accountable to those 22 million credit card holders across Canada.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I guess the hon. member for Don Valley is going to hit a home run today. This close to Christmas perhaps he merits it because I too would like to speak on his bill in support of it.

As a consumer advocate for close to 23 years I too have seen consumers gouged by excessive credit card rates and unfair credit card practices. When we look at the establishment of interest rates, it is no wonder that we, the members of the consumer affairs committee, along with my colleague from Cape Breton, would like to see a serious approach taken to bringing down these interest rates. Whether it is a floating cap or other measures, there have to be some serious measures taken right now in order to prevent consumers in this country from getting gouged.

When we are talking about gouging through credit card interest rates as well as practices, you have to look at the two differently. With respect to interest rates, my party and other parties I think have been in favour of having a floating cap. This is not spoken to in the hon. member's bill. It is unfortunate because the consumers affairs committee twice, in 1989 and prior, recommended that there be a floating cap. That was an all party committee, Conservatives, Liberals and NDP. It was just common sense, gros bon sens.

I am sure the hon. member probably agrees with the government. It did not wish to see a floating cap on interest rates. That is unfortunate because it is a very serious problem, I think even more serious than this double dipping problem relating to the approach it takes to calculating the interest rate.

If we take a look at the interest rate structure right now, the card companies are going to say: "We need every opportunity in order to cut down on these fraudulent claims or on these people who are delinquent in paying".

I am going to stop for a minute because of the noise from the other side. It is very difficult for me to even hear what I am saying.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. If you wish to carry on a conversation, would you carry it on behind the curtain. It is very difficult to hear the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, it is especially because credit card issuers explain high interest rates by the large number of unpaid accounts and the many false claims. But this is not the consumers' problem—it is the credit card issuers'. They choose their card holders in a rather strange way. People who were $250,000 in debt and went bankrupt were solicited to become card holders the next day. They are approached by credit card issuers like the banks and, in one specific case, American Express, as reported by journalist Pierre Berton. So these people are always being solicited, whether they were bankrupt or not. Of course, this may be a way to get more customers, but it forces people like you and me and many other Canadians who pay every month to pay more on account of those who do not pay. I find that is neither right nor fair.

The interest rates are unacceptable. As my hon. colleague said, they vary from 19 to 20 per cent in some cases, with the banks, to 25 per cent for department stores and other companies and even 30 per cent for American Express. Yes, 30 per cent. We should find out whether the companies are really doing so badly that a bill like the one presented by the hon. member could bankrupt them. Would they suffer large losses as a result? I do not believe so. I simply believe that it would be fair to require these companies to act responsibly towards their customers by setting acceptable interest rates. A difference of 12 points between the bank rate and the current interest rate is really enormous. If it were cut in half, to 4, 4.5 or 5 per cent, it would at least mean that the customer could obtain justice. I call that simple justice.

It is true that the credit card issuers today make huge profits except, perhaps, interestingly enough, American Express with the Optima card, which was a big fiasco. In the United States, some people like hotel and restaurant owners are really unhappy with the Optima Card. American Express probably needs a 30 per cent interest rate today because it lost so much in the past. But I find rates of 25 per cent and 20 per cent for the banks, department stores and other companies really unacceptable, especially in view of the profits of financial institutions, particularly banks, recently.

So as for interest rates, I find that my hon. colleague should show some courage, independence and even tenacity and really demand that interest rates be capped at a certain level and that banks and other companies be required to respect that ceiling.

When I spoke with the bank representatives who appeared before the Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, the representatives of the Royal Bank and the Bank of Montreal said, or rather admitted, because they did not want to say so at first, that in the past, in the 1960s, interest rates were capped, although perhaps the hon. member for Don Valley may not have been aware of that. And I asked the bank representatives whether they had any particular difficulty with the interest rate ceiling. They told me that they did not, as you can check. It was not a problem then. Maybe today, 30 years later, there might be a problem, I don't know. But in the past, when interest rates were capped, they did not have that problem.

So I would be inclined to think that the banks and other institutions would not have very great problems if interest rates were capped.

A second point that I would like to raise, besides the need for a limit on interest rates, is the present method used to calculate interest on the balance due, as my hon. colleague just mentioned. Unfortunately, the current method is unfair and I think that the hon. member's bill is excellent in its approach to these issues in that credit card holders should pay interest on the balance due and not on the initial amount. I do not know whether the hon. member is aware of it; he talks about "double dipping". I can tell him about "triple dipping".

I personally met a restaurateur who accepts the American Express card. He told me that American Express does not pay restaurateurs immediately—a well-established procedure. My hon. colleague is mistaken if he thinks that everyone is compensated or paid right away when someone pays with a credit card. It can sometimes take 10 days, sometimes 21 days.

To conclude, I would like to mention that restaurateurs who accept the American Express card asked their customers to leave those cards at home. They did not exactly boycott them, but they would prefer their customers not to use them. So there is a serious problem of triple dipping.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I support the position taken by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I entirely agree with his careful analysis of the matter before the House today—the interest rates charged by issuers of credit cards on balances due—and with his approach to dealing with this matter.

I am also aware of the concerns of the hon. member who introduced this private member's bill, and I fully support his goal, which is to help consumers who take advantage of the credit terms available to credit card users.

However, after considerable reflection, I must conclude that the proposal before us today is not very sensible and should not be adopted, in the circumstances.

I do not think we should make a decision without first giving full consideration to the needs of consumers and the consequences of measures that might be adopted by this House. We should pursue the ongoing process of regulatory reform launched by this government and not let ourselves be sidetracked by adopting special measures. The goal of our reforms is to ensure the stability of the financial sector and increase competition among the players in this industry, always in the interests of the consumer.

Both goals are necessary. If we undermine the stability of the financial sector, all sectors of our economy will suffer and automatically the consumer will be the loser.

Conversely, it is not in our interests to protect our financial institutions by reducing competition. Such a policy, were the government so rash as to implement it, would not only penalize the consumer but also hurt and weaken the competitive position of our financial industry—an industry that today is among the most advanced and most competitive in the world.

After these generalities about regulatory reform in the financial sector I would like to go on to the subject of credit card interest rates. There are several points I would like to make.

First of all, credit card interest rates and rates charged for the various types of credit available today are set by the market, which allows consumers to shop around for the best rate.

I may also point out that consumers with unpaid balances on their credit cards are usually in the higher income bracket and have a level of education that is higher than average. I would expect these people to have access to other, less costly forms of credit, such as a line of credit or a consumer loan, but we can only speculate on their reasons for deciding to use a more expensive form of credit.

One reason may be that they are not familiar with the various types of credits available. It is the role of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make them aware of those possibilities. Another reason might be that some people prefer to make full use of the credit offered by these cards because it is so practical. In the final instance, it is up to every individual to weigh the pros and cons of this commodity.

Second, I would like to say a few words about the cost of the credit extended by the issuers of credit cards. Of the three components of the cost of credit, only one, the cost of borrowing money, has gone down in recent months. If I may digress slightly, I would like to remind the House that it played an important role, together with the present government and the Bank of Canada, in fighting inflation so that this drop in interest rates could occur. I think the hon. member who tabled the bill will agree.

The other components of credit costs—administration costs for credit card services and the cost of establishing reserves to cover bad debts—do not necessarily go down when interest rates go down. Although its purpose is not to cap interest rates, the bill before us this morning proposes to legislate the way interest is calculated on unpaid credit card balances. Consequently, it should be assessed according to the same criteria as any other rate setting measure.

Well intentioned though this measure may be, it asks Parliament to take unilateral action. So far, the various parties concerned by this matter have not been able to agree. I would therefore ask hon. members to analyse this question and discuss it at length before taking such concrete action.

In concluding, I believe that the best way to give consumers a chance to get the cheapest type of credit possible is to let the market decide. The financial sector legislation tabled by the government will expand the range of options offered to consumers. Thanks to such measures, which are the result of well prepared consultations and discussions with the various parties in our financial sectors, we will be better able to respond to the whole range of consumer needs.

I must therefore vote against this bill, and I recommend that we look for other ways to ensure that the financial sector's operations are sound and also fair to the consumer. Consequently I would also ask hon. members to vote against this proposal.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have just listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance because, quite frankly, I think that the government had a rare chance to do something here today that, contrary to what he would suggest, will not in any way, shape, or form upset the fiscal framework of the financial institutions in this country.

What the member for Mississauga South is doing in presenting this private member's bill is pleading for fairness and is pleading on behalf of all of the consumers in Canada. We know there are close to 50 million credit cards in circulation right now.

• (1200)

In an economy that is as depressed as our economy is at this moment in time and when our financial institutions are showing record breaking profit margins, it would seem to me that it would not only spur on some of the activity that we need so badly, but it would be a concrete action that this government could support. It would be an action that it really does believe in some kind of fairness in the economic system.

I can only say to the member, because it looks like the government is going to talk out this private member's bill, regretfully, as another member from a downtown Toronto market like the member for Mississauga South, we on this side are totally behind your bill. Maybe, in the not too distant future, the government will finally see the light on amending this legislation.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. member for Mississauga South on the the bill he has put before the House this morning, Bill C-237.

It is a bill which seeks to provide fairness to people using credit cards. The instance that comes to mind is a constituent who actually is a solicitor in my riding who acts on behalf of one of the chartered banks. He describes a couple of months ago when his bill for his credit card purchases over the month was something like $1,700.

He could not make out one of the charges, who it was from. It was charged to a numbered company. It was not the corporate name. He inquired. He paid the rest of the bill. I believe it was something like $1,650, but he did not pay the charge of $50. It turned out to be a restaurant charge, but instead of the name of the restaurant, it was a numbered company.

He sent in the bill for $1,650. He did not pay for the one charge of $50, and lo and behold the next month, he was charged interest on the entire $1,700 for the month. Needless to say, he was absolutely furious.

I do not know how the parliamentary secretary can stand up in the House today and make statements like: "You should not penalize the consumer". Surely the existing credit card interest rate law is penalizing the consumer. The banks' interest rates are too high anyway, but surely they should not be charging interest for payments that have been made as an extraordinary penalty.

The parliamentary secretary says that we should analyse the issue and then choose. The House has analysed the issue here this morning and has chosen to go with the member for Mississauga South.

The parliamentary secretary says that we should debate the issue. We have debated the issue. The parliamentary secretary really lost the debate. He did not put up good arguments.

I would hope that at some time, whether it is today or very near in the future, by unanimous consent and realistic thinking by the Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary, this bill could be brought back by unanimous consent and passed. It is the only fair way to treat consumers of this country.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Langdon Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for unanimous consent to place before the House for consideration amendments which I prepared and which were presented slightly too late on Friday to meet the two o'clock deadline.

I understand there have been some discussions about this. I hope it will be possible for the House to give its unanimous consent so that we can talk about some of the disparate elements within this piece of legislation.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that there have been these discussions. There is only one thing I would want very clear. As the hon. member knows, there have been various discussions among the party leaders regarding the calendar between now and Christmas. We would just want an assurance that by proceeding with these amendments we would not end up in a situation that would in any way affect that calendar.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I gather that the Chair has not had a chance to rule on the technical admissibility, never mind the timing, of those amendments. As I understand them they would all probably be ruled out of order.

I would suggest, if we do grant this, that we get a commitment to discuss them all at once and not each amendment separately. I understand there is a large number. In fact what most of the amendments do is wipe out the bill so I think they would be ruled out of order.

I would ask that they be considered all at once.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to get unanimous consent first. Is there unanimous consent to allow the motions?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): These six motions are to delete clauses in the bill. There are six motions in amendment to Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, at report stage.

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motion No. 2.

Motion No. 3 will be voted on separately and a vote on Motion No. 4 will apply to Motions Nos. 5 and 6.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 2.

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

• (1210)

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 8.

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 9.

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 20.

He said: Mr. Speaker, what we have in front of us is the heart of the government cutbacks, commitments and expenditures which formed part of the budget put before this House back in the late winter. We have discussed this bill in committee and many groups came to testify before us. We are talking about a large number of groups, some of which appeared, some of which submitted briefs. There were approximately 25 to 30 groups. Every single one of them spoke out against this legislation.

These amendments attempt to pinpoint the specific areas of the legislation to which groups across this country and people across this country have objected most strongly.

The first two amendments would deal with the extension of the freeze on transfers to the provinces for health care and for post-secondary education. I find it absolutely remarkable that a government can be proclaiming that it is working for greater prosperity, greater competitiveness in this country, a better education system, and at the same time putting before us clauses such as these two which will would cut back the amount of support available for post-secondary education.

I also have to say that the groups we heard from, with respect to health, represented an impressive array right across the entire dimensions of the health community in this country. I have in front of me the brief which was presented by the Canadian Medical Association. The Canadian Medical Association is not a radical organization, it is not an organization which has any commitment except to see to it that there is a good health care system in this country. Its recommendation to us was that Bill C-20 be deferred until the results of the review of the tax collection agreements and the federal transfer discussions including the fiscal equalization program are known.

It also suggested to us that there should be legislation introduced to mandate federal support for health programs. It suggested that there has to be a serious look at how we are spending money in the health care field. It has to be done with urgency and it cannot be done if we have the kinds of cutbacks in this bill.

One of the most shocking pieces of evidence came out in the discussions with the Canadian Medical Association.

Here is an initiative from the federal government which will seriously impact the health system of this country. I can tell Canadians across this country this proposal was not even discussed with the medical doctors in this country. It was not discussed with nurses, it was not discussed with the various support staffs which make up our hospitals. It is especially scandalous that it was not even discussed with the medical association in this country.

We also suggest that section 7 dealing with the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act should be struck because this too freezes the amount of money which can be transferred to the provinces. The federal government is trying to offload on to the provinces the economic mess which it has made in terms of the deficit over the past seven and a half years.

Section 8 should also be deleted. It is the section which increases premiums for the Unemployment Insurance Act.

We feel that to put this extra tax into effect in the middle of a recession in this country is not just foolish economics, it is tragic for the people who are faced with increased payments at a time when they are already stretched to the limit. We hope that clause will be struck from this legislation.

We suggest that section 9 be struck, which also deals with the question of premiums under the UI act.

It has been a remarkable experience to listen to groups from across this country such as the B.C. Association of Community Care, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Canadian Co-Operative Association, the Canadian Federation of Labour, the Canadian Federation of Students, the Canadian Health Coalition, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Nurses Association, the Canadian Public Health Association, and one can continue through the list of the health care advocates of British Columbia.

Group after group came before us saying that something needed to be done about health care expenditure and that to tighten the noose around our health care system at this point is a serious threat to the future of medicare in this country.

Medicare is one of those things, perhaps the most important, which tie our country together and give our people a sense of pride and a sense of commitment to Canada. For us to even be thinking about these cutbacks, which will make it more difficult and some groups said impossible to improve our medical care system in Canada and make it work for the future, is a very sad step to take.

I hope this House will not take it. I hope these amendments will be accepted.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on these particular amendments.

I would like to take the opportunity to point out to the House that this is one of the most deceptive strategies I have seen used by the NDP in the promotion of health care. That is what it has chosen to do. If you look at the amendments, you will say to yourself: "What is left?" What is left is section 4, which is a Draconian attack on other social programs and education programs in this country. If you looked at the legislation and accepted their strategy, the only thing is that the federal government would do would be able to take money from other programs to protect health care. That sounds like a social good, we all want to protect health care, but this is where the Conservatives and the NDP agree. Instead of providing funds, instead of developing a fair tax strategy and instead of financing this government properly, what it will do is take from every other program in order to support medicare. This is very much reminiscent of the strategies being tried by other parties, such as the British Labour Party, to focus people in on one program to scare them and, at the same time, make other groups feel very, very vulnerable.

• (1220)

For example, if you followed the NDP strategy on this one, people could lose money from equalization payments affecting post-secondary education. If you look at the brief, which was very carefully omitted in the review by the member for Essex—Windsor, there is a note from the Canadian Federation of Students who were absolutely astounded by the impact that this legislation was going to have on education. If you followed this strategy and these amendments as structured, these students would be made even more vulnerable because it says that the only thing left for the federal government to do to improve health care is to take money from students and from faculty.

This also was raised by the Canadian Association of University Teachers. It found this most Draconian. It can take away equalization payments which are estimated to be $8.4 billion; the financing of the Northwest Territories estimated to be $1.41 billion; grants in lieu of taxes from the municipalities estimated to be $344 million; public utilities income tax transfers estimated at $280 million; statutory subsidies estimated to be $36 million; the cost of income maintenance and social services under the Canada Assistance Plan, $6.4 billion; crop insurance contributions estimated to be $207 million; formula under official languages estimated at $243 million; miscellaneous health and welfare, $170 million; young offenders services, $158 million; justice transfers, $77 million; transportation transfers, $69 million.

This particular strategy, if you follow these amendments, is to side step the most difficult question which is how do you properly finance the health care system?

This government was honest in its strategy. It said: "We are going to cut back to the provinces and we are going to take money from other programs to protect health care". That is an honest strategy. The second strategy is: "Let us ignore what is really going on and let us show people that we are trying to protect medicare. Let us forget about the fact that we are going to take money from other programs. Let them find out after". A good example of this is the strategy being followed by the NDP Government of Ontario where it is taking money from the health care system and closing hospitals. It knows the reality. It has to face this reality. It is not living in a dream world which is reflected in these clauses.

A more direct strategy would be to deal with the legislation in its entirety, to understand that the whole concept is wrong and to vote against the entire bill. To pick and choose a clause such as this is perpetrating, I would dare say, a fraud upon the Canadian public because members will be able to pick out these little speeches and say: "We are really fighting for medicare". In fact, they are destroying medicare and it should be stopped right here.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about the amendments.

One thing that is becoming very, very clear is that our national medicare program as we now know it in Canada is under attack. It has been under attack for a good number of years, starting in 1977 when the Liberals abandoned the concept of partnership with the federal government and the provinces and the 50/50 sharing of a national health care program.

They finally, in 1982–83, abandoned it further with the 6 and 5 program, when they curtailed the transfer payments to the provinces under EPF. They showed the Tories how they could attack the transfer payments on a systematic basis. Of course, the Tories learned very quickly.

One of things we have to look at is what is the implication for a national health care program. At this point in time in Canadian history, when there is a need and strong reasons for people wanting a national federal government, this government seems to be determined to ensure that in Canada, the national institution that people value most, which is our national medicare, is sacrificed.

It is the one thing that Canadians identify themselves with. When you ask a Canadian why they want to belong to Canada, one of the first things they will mention is our national medicare program.

What has this government done? It has started to erode the ability of the provinces to meet the five criteria set out in the Canada Health Act. The cutbacks that are now taking place that started in 1986, then went on to Bill C–69 and are now envisioned in this bill, will amount to $62.4 billion by the year 2000.

People should clearly understand that these cutbacks are not based on an escalating cost. The federal government is not obligated to match the cost. It was based on the concept of the increase in the Gross Domestic Product.

In other words, the increase would only be there as the economy increased. Yet, it has said in order to meet our responsibilities for national health care, it is not willing to have this increase continue in spite of the fact there will be a growth in the economy. It simply said it will be zeroed, regardless of the expansion of the economy. This means that there is a $62.4 billion loss to the provinces.

In the final year, it will equal $10.9 billion in that year alone. My home province of British Columbia will have lost over $5 billion by the year 2000, nearly one–half billion dollars in this year alone.

The impact on the weaker provinces has already been devastating. Newfoundland had to lay off 10 percent of its nursing staff. Other provinces have had to cut–out pharmacare programs, dental health programs for children and have had to curtail preventive health majors.

The government will also be in a position with these cuts that it will no longer be in a position to enforce the Canada Health Act because there will be no transfer payments of cash to the provinces, for some provinces as early as 1997 and for all provinces by the year 2004. That means the federal government will no longer be able to enforce their standards.

It has brought in what it thinks is a solution and that is to attach moneys to other programs. We did not even bother to make an amendment to delete it. That section is so odious we even are assured that the Tory backbenchers will rise up and defeat that section. There is no need to make an amendment to delete it. There is not even a Tory in this country who will stand up in this House and say: "In order to enforce accessibility to health care, we are going to take money from starving children under the Canada Assistance Plan".

An hon. member: The Liberals thought of it.

Mr. Karpoff: Yes, the Liberals thought of it. Not even the Tories will have the nerve to stand up in this House and support that they are going to take money from child abuse, investigation and protection of children in child abuse situations, to enforce a standard of accessibility. We do not feel this amendment is necessary as we are quite confident even the Tories will not have the nerve to stand in this House and pass section 4 of this act.

• (1230)

There is no way in this political climate in Canada that the question of federal spending powers is paramount and the ability to direct social programs on a national basis, or that the federal government is going to be allowed to either attach Canada Assistance Plan payments or equalization payments to enforce federal legislation into which it is no longer putting money.

There have been many legal opinions that simply say that section is unconstitutional, do not worry about it, it will never stand a constitutional test. Those constitutional tests are being readied.

With regard to this piece of legislation, I, like my colleague, sat in on many of the committee hearings. Group after group, as diverse as professional groups to community advocacy groups, appeared before that committee and every single one of them condemned this legislation. They condemned it because it is a betrayal of our national institution of medicare. They condemned it because the federal government's only solution to mismanaging the economy and the debt is to off-load that debt on to the provinces and to the provincial health care systems.

It has not saved any money by doing that. In fact, it has jeopardized the provinces' ability to take some innovative approaches to containing health care costs. The innovative approaches are there at the provincial level. All you have to do is look at the reports that have been done by a number of provinces, including the Seaton report done in British Columbia.

The provinces know that there must be certain areas of change within their health care administration. They are willing to make them, to put more emphasis on non-institutional care; to put more emphasis on prevention; to put more emphasis on support. However, they can only do so if they have dollars. This bill is designed to strangle the very foundation of our national medicare system and regrettably I think with it to strangle Canada as we now know it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe my ears this morning, that the New Democratic Party, rather than facing this debate head on is trying to set up a diversion. The member talked about all the various people that came to the finance committee to oppose Bill C-20. I found it interesting this morning and I stand to be corrected if he did mention this group, but I did not hear him mention earlier Dr. Michael Rachlis. He made his presentation to the Standing Committee on Finance, opposing Bill C-20 and the fact that it was probably not constitutional. The member failed to mention that, and Dr. Rachlis quite prominently declares that he is a member of the New Democratic Party. He also happens to be a constituent of mine. He has written a book, Second Opinion: What's Wrong with Canada's Health Care System, where he talks about the difficulties with the health care system in Canada. He wrote this book with Ms. Carol Kushner.

What I do not understand from the New Democratic Party is that it does not talk about the thrust of Rachlis where he says that there are some solutions if we would face this problem head on. Instead, the New Democratic Party wants to set up this diversion system where we start toying with taking funding from other programs. I do not think Canadians want us to rob Peter to pay Paul. If we are going to talk in this House about national standards of education, training and retraining, why set up a series of amendments where in order to look after the medical system of this country we are going to take away from the educational system. I think my colleague for Winnipeg North Centre was correct in saying that we are going to oppose these amendments. Hopefully we will have a solid, constructive and creative debate today opposing the government's Bill C-20. I hope in the process of debate we can come up with some ideas of where we can preserve and maintain the standards of our national health care system without bringing in all kinds of diversions.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take a brief part in this debate. After listening to the two speakers from the Official Opposition I was hard put not to break into tears or throw up.

I am reminded of a famous time in the British Parliament in 1945 when Mr. Churchill brought in legislation to extend rationing of coal and fish. Aneurin Bevan, who is one of my political heroes and a famous democratic socialist from Wales by the way, stood up and said: "Mr. Speaker, England is an island of coal surrounded by a sea of fish and only the organizational genius of the right hon. gentleman could see to it that we had a shortage of both".

Canada is a nation that has the resources, the talents and the gifted people to raise the money and finance fully these various programs affected by this legislation. But only the organizational genius of this Tory government could see to it that they are reduced and undermined. We are trying to stop that.

The first speaker from the Official Opposition criticized us because there is one clause that my colleague, our spokesman on this bill, did not move to delete. That is the one to provide penalties to the provinces if they do not abide by the five principles of medicare. We happen to think that when a province tries to undermine any one or more of those five principles, it should be penalized. It should be penalized because there goes universality and there goes comprehensive coverage.

I find it appalling to see any Liberal or any Tory get up and talk about how much they support and are in favour of medicare. The gall and the nerve of them.

I was in Saskatchewan in 1962 when the Liberals and the Tories organized the opposition to the implementation of medicare in that province. They brought out thousands of people in front of the legislative buildings to oppose it. The doctors supported them and the opposing of the implementation of medicare in that province. They wanted to govern according to who could get the largest mob out even though the governmeBnt of the day was elected with a majority and the number one program was the instituting of medical care. I get sick to my stomach when I have to put up with listening to Grits and Tories who have made great talk about how they support medicare.

• (1240)

It was the Liberals in 1975 under the then Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who started it. They have the gall to get up and talk about how they are going to fight this bill and oppose it. They never have believed in it. They never have worked for it or supported it.

The same thing applies to the Conservative government. They are the same breed of cats. There is not any difference. The only difference is one is in and one is out. We have had nothing but the same nonsense.

Liberals tell me how they brought in national medicare in 1966. Do you know why, Mr. Speaker? In 1963 and 1965 there were minority Parliaments. It was people like Tommy Douglas and Stanley Knowles who said to the government: "You bring this in or we'll defeat you". They had to be dragged kicking and screaming into the 20th century.

They have convenient memories. They do not like to remember or be reminded. It does not matter which one is in. You have to force them into doing what is decent and civilized and yes even Christian.

I do not understand why any government would have the gall to bring in the cutbacks that are occurring. The Established Programs Financing Act in itself is governed by the fact that the provinces do not get an increase unless their population increases. Under the organizational genius of federal and provincial Tory governments in my province we have had a net outflow of people. Saskatchewan does not need this part of the bill because we are already going to get a reduction because we have had a reduction in population.

I was going to talk about have not provinces but nowadays all the provinces are have not. Ones that were looked upon as wealthy and which contributed the most money to equalization programs are in real trouble. The whole country is in the same boat.

The solution this government has is equivalent to R. B. Bennett of 1935 and then Mackenzie King right up until the declaration of war which is cut back and reduce. One Minister of Finance said to T. C. Douglas the then member for Weyburn: "The hon. member must think that money grows on gooseberry bushes". Within a week after the declaration of war the Liberal government of that day found the bush. There was lots of money. All of a sudden we were rolling in it to do anything and everything that needed to be done to prosecute a war. If any war was ever justified that one was.

If you were to take the national debt at the end of the Second World War and translate it into 1991 dollars it would be greater than the one we have now. If you took the deficit at the last fiscal year during the Second World War and translated it into 1991 dollars it would be equal to if not greater than the present one.

An hon. member: But we paid it off.

Mr. Benjamin: You're damn right we paid it off. Following the war we had to rebuild our entire economy. Our manufacturing plants and our municipal infrastructure all had to be rebuilt. All had gone through the dirty thirties and the wartime and little could had been put into them. We had full employment. When you have full employment people pay taxes. Within 10 years all those debts were paid off. Without a full employment policy no party or government can really do anything about our annual deficit and our debt.

There is so much that has to be done and needs to be done in this country. It hits you in the face every time you go back to your own constituency and your own province. There are scores of cities and large towns in this country that have a waiting list as long your arm for chronic care beds, senior citizen housing, low income co-op housing, sewer and water systems that are worn out and raw sewage that runs into our lakes and rivers. It all needs to be fixed. It means hundreds of thousands of jobs. A quarter of a million people could be put to work over the next 10 years just to clean up our air and our water.

The governments we have had since 1867 do not know what to do or how to do it. They have neither the courage nor the interest to do it because it is not in the interests of the corporations who support and finance them. I invite my hon. friends to read a little book called The Unnecessary Evil, not written by an NDPer but by Professor Rubin Ballen of the University of Manitoba. I invite members to read it. He throws into a cocked hat all the nonsense we have been getting ad nauseam about debt and deficits.

The cutting back that is going on now and that started with the Liberals in 1975 has been self-defeating because unemployment got worse and the debt got worse. He showed that up for the kind of nonsense it is.

I want to compliment my colleague for his amendments. They do what we think needs to be done with this legislation unless the government has the courage of its convictions and withdraws the whole damned thing.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make some comments about the amendments that have been put forward. I take particular umbrage at my colleague for Regina—Lumsden who many times debates strongly in this House and did so just a few weeks ago dealing with the merchant mariners. It was an action I supported.

I cannot sit here and allow the NDP version of history to go into Hansard unchallenged. There are times in this House where you either sit back and laugh or you stand up and put your position clearly on the record. It galls me a little bit too much whenever I hear the self-righteous group to my left over here—they are truly to my left—getting up and trying to rewrite history. My goodness if we listened to the member for Regina—Lumsden, they were responsible for the sun shining in this place since the New Democratic Party was formed and prior to that CCF.

I have a great deal of respect for the CCF part and their traditions. I have a great deal of respect for some of the statesmen that party has produced like Tommy Douglas and Stanley Knowles who sits at this table as an honorary officer. But I take a great deal of umbrage at the hon. member trying to take credit for every single good measure that was put in by people like Lester B. Pearson, a Liberal Prime Minister and the protections that were given to health care in this country by the ministers and the government of Pierre-Elliott Trudeau.

An hon. member: When were they in office?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): One of my colleagues asks: "When were they in office?" They have not been in office. I am not illiterate. I read as much as I can about the history of this place and the history of the various political philosophies and how they unfold. If you listen to the New Democratic Party this Parliament must have been shuddering.

• (1250)

It must have been just shaking in its boots during that period when health care, medicare, came in here. It must have been waiting for the New Democratic Party over here to the left to come in and bang the desk and say: "Let's do this or otherwise you are going to be out of this place". Absolute nonsense.

It is absolute nonsense to take away the contribution of people like Pierre-Elliott Trudeau, Lester B. Pearson or Allan J. MacEachen who were the social conscience of this place and who were responsible for more socially progressive legislation than almost anybody who sat in this place. Monique Bégin stood against the provinces that were coming forward with user fees. The hon. member was here during that period.

If the member wants to get up and speak on the amendments and on the regressive nature of this bill, so be it. He has a responsibility and a right to do it. I also have a right to get up and put the record straight.

Anybody who reads the history of this place knows what I am saying is correct. It appears that it is fine for the hon. member to get up on his hind feet and to bay at the moon whenever a bill comes in here. Those members want to take credit for anything that was done by the Liberal Party.

He also has to understand that there have been certain actions taken by colleagues who wear his own cloth, his New Democratic colleagues, particularly in the province of Ontario, like Mr. Bob Rae, "Mr. Cut-cut". He comes in with a promise that everything is going to be fine in la-la land. He was going to pave every street and there were going to be two chickens in every pot. The New Democrats can do that.

What do they do? They come into the province of Ontario in a fluke. It was an absolute fluke that the people of Ontario elected a majority of New Democrats to the government. It was 37 per cent or 38 per cent who came forward and voted for the New Democrats. By luck they got in and it has been nothing but downhill since in Ontario.

I come from a part of Canada that has been a have not part of Canada for a long time. I am going to tell you right now, I think I would rather live in Nova Scotia than in Ontario led by Bob Rae and the New Democrats. There is a hospital a day closing. They are merging them, they are shutting beds down, they are denying help to those who need help the most in the province of Ontario.

Yet the New Democratic Party gets up here and wants to say: "Look, what we are going to have to do is to set the record straight. If medicare is good, we will take the credit for it. If UIC is good, we will take the credit for it".

Parliament must be changed because I am in this place and I certainly feel that I can get up and articulate my position on any issue I want. I look across here and we are always trying to advise the government about better ways to come forward with legislative programs. Sometimes it listens but most times it does not. It must have been a different place back in 1966 when medicare came in. We must have all had an NDP guardian angel sitting on our shoulder who used to whisper sweet nothings in our ears the night before. Then we would come in, do all that was right and just and the NDP would take the credit for it.

My hon. colleague, the minister opposite, said he was here at that point. He assures me that the New Democrats were not angels. I will leave it to my hon. colleague to explain what they were at that point.

Let us set the record straight. These particular amendments do not address the substance or the intent of the bill. It is fine to say take this away or do that. We are in favour of preserving medicare, and that is a very noble endeavour.

We fought for that since we introduced it and passed it in this place as Liberals in 1966. We will continue to fight for that.

To talk about making the poor poorer and giving the government the ability to walk in and start tampering with some other transfers for social programs which are equally as important to those individuals who have to rely on those transfers is irresponsible in my view.

It is fine for the member opposite from the New Democratic Party to come in here and to rewrite history in the 20 brief minutes he had. I would hope that anybody who is watching this debate will look at the substance of the bill. The bill is bad. The amendments put forward by the New Democratic Party are equally as bad because they ring hollow when put up to public scrutiny.

As for the explanations given by my hon. colleague who has delivered some masterful speeches on the right issues in this House and who has had my support on those occasions, even his fancy rhetoric cannot give depth and body to the shallow amendments that have been put forward by his colleague.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it has been an interesting history lesson for the last 20 minutes from a variety of perspectives. I would like to comment on the speech of my colleague from Regina—Lumsden who has put it into the proper perspective.

I remember being a very young person at the time when medicare came in to Saskatchewan and if it had not been for the political courage of people like Tommy Douglas, this country would still not have a medicare program, and that is a fact.

The member for Dartmouth has just gone on about people baying at the moon. I think he should look in the mirror to get a good example of what baying at the moon is all about.

Medicare in Canada is something that all Canadians treasure. They see it as being uniquely Canadian, something they have worked and struggled for over a long period of time. During the depression many people were without medical care. My mother-in-law, who was a young girl in Saskatchewan then, had appendicitis and her family could not afford a doctor. If it had not been for her older brother picking her up and saying to her mother and father "she's got to get to the hospital", she would not be alive today because the appendix had broken. The situation for ordinary people at that time was that you simply could not go to a doctor because it was a choice between feeding your family or finding medical care. They left it too long. It was not a situation of not caring, it was a situation of not being able.

That has changed in Canada today. People can go to hospitals and can attend doctors, and we cannot see that eroded by the successive Liberal and Conservative governments.

We see delegations coming up to Canada from the United States over and over again to examine our medicare system. There is a bigger movement in the United States now asking for a medical system in the United States similar to the situation in Canada. What those delegations have discovered and what Canadians have discovered through those delegations is that our system of a national medicare program is far more cost effective than the system of private medical care in the United States. Not only is it fairer and not only do people have access to medical care, but it is more cost effective than the system in the United States. It saves money, it does not cost more money.

What have we seen in the last several years? In 1977, first of all, it was the Liberals who changed the cost sharing mechanism for medicare and EPF. They changed it from the 50:50 financing between the federal government and the provincial governments. That was the first step at eroding national medical care, and we can thank the Liberals for that.

After that Mulroney came to power in 1984 and what did he promise? He promised then to maintain transfer payments. He talked about a sacred trust for Canadians on social programs. In 1986 this government, the Conservative government, started its attack on EPF funding and medicare and post-secondary education.

In 1990 the Conservatives brought in Bill C-69 which froze the entitlements at the EPF levels of 1989 until 1992. Now we have Bill C-20 which extends that until 1994 or 1995.

These EPF cuts endanger our health care system and they endanger our post-secondary education system.

The impact on the country is huge. A freeze to the EPF, this bill, means a loss of over $97 billion by the year 2000. These are not little bits of money we are talking about, these are massive cuts in programs that Canadians have come to treasure.

What do the messages in this bill bring to Canadians who are waiting for hospital beds? In my province of British Columbia we have long waiting lists for hospital beds. We have a situation in which people who are waiting for heart operations are forced to go down to Seattle because there is not enough operating room time to take care of our own people.

These cuts, combined with the other Draconian policies of the Conservative government, mean a loss of over $5 billion to British Columbia by the year 2000. We are already in a critical health care situation. We already have people lined up. I get more letters from constituents who are concerned and angry because one of their family members cannot get into a hospital to get the required surgery with these waits and these line-ups. This is only going to get worse with the cutbacks and freezing of transfer payments.

This bill is actually a direct threat to the national standards as they are set out under the Canada Health Act. The people who are most affected by the cuts of the Conservative government, and this bill is just another example of that ongoing mania of cut, cut, cut, are women and children.

A subcommittee of the House of Commons is having hearings on the increased incidence of breast cancer for Canadian women and women in North America, the whole issue of reproductive health care for women, the whole issue of health care for children, and on Canada with over a million children living in poverty. These cuts are a further erosion of the services that women and children need from our society. This is opening the door for over-billing, for fee for services, for cutting services, for transferring insurance to private insurance, for creating in our country a two-tiered health system.

Women and children are always the hardest hit when health care becomes inaccessible. Single mothers and children make up the majority of lower income families. This government goes on with its tax giveaways to big business while all the time turning its back on people who need help most. It is turning its back on children who are living in poverty and children who are lining up at food banks for a basket of groceries with their mothers. The low income citizens and the middle class are always the ones who bear the brunt of Conservative policies.

This bill also attacks our post-secondary education system at a time when under-funding is already crippling Canadian universities. How can this government talk ad nauseam about economic growth, competition, competing in the world market on one hand while continuing to weaken the very institutions which can provide the training and technology that the people of Canada need in order to compete in the world markets? How can it continue to talk about equality for women while it reduces women's access to quality education?

Education will give women the opportunity they need to get into higher paying jobs and help to break the cycle of poverty for women. Women in this country still earn only 66 per cent of what men do for full-time, full-year work. This government is again slamming the door on women and slamming the door on young people, Canadians who will not be able to afford a university education.

My colleague from Regina said earlier that in the late 1930s when money was needed it was found to fight a war. The same thing happened in this House a year ago. Now we hear that there are no funds for child care, we hear that there are no funds for health care, none for social services. Money was found to fight the gulf war.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to join in this debate today because as we were planning it we thought it was significant that there be a major discussion about what will be, without question, a turning point in the history of this country.

The turning point is simply that the federal government is dramatically altering the role it plays in a variety of programs it shares with the provinces such as education, health care, housing and social programming. New ideas are just beginning to get developed around care for children and around issues that perhaps were not talked about a decade ago such as child abuse and the abuse of women.

Now we are just beginning to identify the problem and starting to put in place some programs that will rectify that. We all admit that they are the last programs in and so they will struggle for funding under normal times. This bill puts a beach head in place which says we should not count on the federal government to carry its fair share any more. It has abandoned that.

As I watched the debate, the first thing that struck me as being odd is why there are no Conservative members standing up to defend the cause. Then the answer became apparent. They did not need to. Their traditional allies are standing up defending their cause.

At one time it used to be said that Liberals were Tories in a hurry. These days, that is wrong. These days Tories are Liberals in a hurry. Where Pierre-Elliott Trudeau only wanted a six and five mandatory wage restraint program across the country, the Tories are not satisfied with that kind of peanuts, they want zero, absolutely nothing.

I recall being a health critic for the provincial party in the late seventies. The person with whom I argued at that time was a Liberal, Monique Bégin, a very fine person, but she put in place the Established Programs Financing system, block funding and a number of other variations to the traditional means whereby the federal government shared its costs with the provinces.

At that time in each of the provinces there was not an outcry but a warning that this would make it easy for the federal government to begin to retreat from its obligations. I recall at the time she said: "No, we would never do that" and then promptly proceeded to do just exactly that.

I recall at the time people were saying: "This is going to make it very difficult to get new programs in place because while we struggle with a restraint package from Ottawa, we have to kind of work with an existing system".

There has been a lot of discussion here today about the health care system in Canada. It is perhaps one of the foremost in the world. It is far from being a perfect system however. It struggles to adjust to new conditions, not just new funding, but new technology, new ideas and new concepts. That is understandable because people who are dominating the health care system in this country are trained in very traditional ways and have probably worked a long time to establish the kind of programs for health care that they know about and are familiar with.

When someone comes along and suggests to them that perhaps traditional care in a hospital bed is not the only way to provide care, they listen to those arguments with great caution. They are not terribly receptive to them. I would say it is reasonable to judge their performance as being cautiously accepting that as true, that perhaps there are community health centres that could do it in a more cost efficient way, but they are very cautious people.

To get them to change from one type of provision of care to another is going to take a little while, a little pushing and shoving and a little convincing. I think that process is under way.

The tragedy though is simply this: to accept what is in this bill, to accept what the Liberals and the Tories are so valiantly supporting this morning, is to accept that no new ideas will ever make their way to the forefront. It means wrecking one system to try to put in place another without providing any kind of transition.

That I think goes across the board no matter what kind of care you are trying to provide. If you are trying to provide some different kind of care for people who run afoul of the law and you do not like the prisons, which none of us do, and you do not like the traditional punishment approach, which none of us do, and you want to try something else, how do you get the something else in place? How do you provide the new model for providing care and counselling and treatment in place?

The truth is in all of our ridings. These things are happening but they are struggling. While many of us were happy to see an old prison system virtually taken apart, I think all of us would be equally unhappy at the moment that we do not have the reasonable financing in place to provide some alternative to that. We are stuck between the two.

Many of us are advocates of a great many things that have to do with the needs of women in a modern day society, providing child care, providing proper housing, providing some kind of counselling, providing some kind of retraining. All of us will be familiar that in our communities these ideas are just getting started.

I would not be thrilled with a government that said it is putting on the brakes to everything it has ever done in terms of traditionally providing health care for the very young or the very old. I would not be happy if it said it was stopping dead in the water on that and it was going to channel some money into new ideas. I do not think it can work that way. I believe that what we need is a sensible, rational and logical transition from one type of providing care to people to something that might look quite different.

In the end the different type of care might be more cost effective. In my view that is not the argument. The argument ought to be whether it is better care. It will be incidental that it will be done with fewer tax dollars.

The final argument that I want to make this morning is one of perception. I admit that right off the bat. Maybe it has not much to do with the reality of how you divide up the tax dollar. But it is incredibly frustrating for Canadian citizens in their own homes to read about a government preaching restraint that paid $104,000 to transport one person from Senegal back to Ottawa.

It is real tough for people in my riding who will not get an increase in whatever their benefits are this year and who struggle for the kind of programs that they desperately need to know that the Minister of National Revenue spent $10,000 to go and talk to the Rotary Club in Hamilton.

We think it is fine that he goes and talks to them. We think it is fine to provide adequate transportation for the minister to go back to Saskatchewan at $35,000 a crack. What we are struggling with is simply the notion of how in the world we can talk of spending that kind of money in one breath and talk about restraint for everybody else with the next.

If we saw you on the trains we would say it was great but that you probably should not be riding the trains all the time because you are tired. If we provide you with money to take commercial aircraft we would probably say it was all right. We understand you work hard and are tired and you need a break. Travel is a difficult part of political life.

What people do not understand and cannot fathom is how you can blithely go on spending money like that and preach restraint to them at the same time. In my riding this happens every single day. Someone walks in with an example of how government spends its money and then says that you have to be restrained in how you are provided with services.

That is what is wrong with this country. That is what these amendments attempt to propose. The debate has been interesting to say the least.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks about this bill. I would like to start by saying that I have experienced over the last couple of years my own husband being in and out of hospitals suffering from cancer. I cannot say too strongly how very important, valuable and cherished our Canadian health system is. This is despite the fact that this government and the previous Liberal government incidentally have continuously eroded the cost of federal funding. This in turn has caused provinces to cut back and take measures such as user fees and so on which are contrary to the Canada Health Act.

From personal experience it is wonderful to know that when you are under stress that you do have a secure health system and that there are not going to be a lot of bureaucratic hassles and worry about paying bills and cuts in services that are absolutely essential.

On the other hand I can also say from personal experience that it is deplorable to know that at this time certainly in British Columbia, and I am quite sure it is the same throughout Canada, there are wards of beds that are empty because hospitals cannot afford to finance adequate services to use the facilities to capacity. There are wonderful health care workers, including nurses and others, who continue to provide highly professional caring and services. I certainly commend them.

On the other hand they are overworked. There is no question about that. There is not enough staff. There is the whole question of para-professionals which in our provinces have been cut back. They have a significant impact on the extent and nature of the services.

As my colleague from New Westminster said, there are long waits for operations and for specialized services that are needed. In British Columbia we are also very concerned about the new commission appointed by the previous government. Interestingly enough, it recently came out with a report advocating some very positive reforms in health care services such as the kind of delivery services where we should be giving much greater emphasis to community based services and to prevention. It also advocates home care support so that institutional services which are often not as personalized and that are certainly more expensive will not be used to the same degree.

There are many reforms needed but we must have the finances to maintain and replace services that have been cut and to consider new kinds of community support services.

What is this government doing? There is no question that this government, which has cut back I believe four times in health care financing, has taken over $42 billion from Canada's health care services. This includes the cuts that will be forthcoming if this bill passes. Forty-two billion dollars will be taken from Canadian health care services.

I wonder how that will impact on the services for your family and mine and for Canadians across the country. It will have a devastating impact. I notice in some of the notes I have here also that we asked for the comments of the present minister of health. I will quote from a comment that was made on May 28, 1991 when he was being questioned about user fees as far as medicare is concerned. This was in relation to Quebec's plan to introduce a user fee for emergency ward services. He responded at that time as follows:

> If you charge a user fee I fear that poor people will not go for the service because they will fear having to pay money. I will never accept two health systems; one for the poor and one for the rich.

That is a risk that is happening and he is absolutely right. The Minister of National Health and Welfare goes on to say: "If there is anything against the law I will act".

I would think this minister then should be acting very strongly to oppose this present bill which will cut the EPF funding for health care services and also for post-secondary education which is another very serious concern.

He should be the first one up on his feet saying that he does not support this bill. It is a very sneaky way of cutting back on funding because it means that health care services are eroded over a five-year period so that in effect EPF funding is removed altogether.

A brief from the Canadian Nurses Association to the Standing Committee on Finance stated that Bill C-20 represents the fourth successive attempt by the government to limit the federal role in medicare. It says that the cumulative effect of these changes is set out in a table which it provided and which shows that $42 billion will be taken from health care services by 1992 by the Conservative government.

We know also that the previous Liberal government said today how strongly they support medicare. I have a great deal of respect for the previous minister Monique Bégin. But even Monique Bégin when she was minister allowed block funding and the bills that established EPF funding to go through. Of course she found later that she had to defend very strongly the federal position and put some limits on provincial funding until they would adhere to the terms of the Canada Health Act.

I would like to remind people that the Canada Health Act which Canadians are so proud of is a goal that many Americans would love to see for their country. It established five principles for health care and they have worked well in this country. We have one of the best health care services in the world. We also have one of the most economically feasible health care systems.

Those five principles were universality, accessibility, comprehensiveness, public administration and portability so that we would not have a different kind of health service in different provinces as a person moves from one province to another. These are very sound principles that have been put to the test over the years since the Health Care Act was first introduced.

It is a tragedy and I hope that Canadians will realize that Bill C-20 and the kind of bills that were passed last year which eroded health care funding are eroding the basic Canada Health Act. It will be literally impossible for provincial governments to maintain universality, accessibility, portability, comprehensiveness and public administration in the way that it was intended under this act if they do not have the financing from the federal government to assist in doing this.

We have seen provincial governments bringing in user fees and using other means to cut back on access to health care partly because they do not have adequate funding.

I would like to mention some of the points that were raised at the finance committee by the health care advocates of British Columbia and I commend them for the brief to that committee. It is an excellent review of the evolution and the devolution of health care services in Canada. They point out that the principles of Canadian medicare as set out in the Canada Health Act must be preserved.

The Conservative government has deepened these cuts to the point where federal cash transfers for medicare and post-secondary education will end in a few years. These are not just cutbacks. It likes the public to think it is just cutbacks because of the deficit situation. Of course the Conservative love to blame social programs for that deficit.

The public needs to know that it is not just cutbacks. It is the actual demise of medicare and of post-secondary education funding as we know it over the next five years.

The health care advocates of British Columbia go on to say that the federal government passed the Medicare Act in 1966 under which it had agreed to fund half the cost of the provincial medicare insurance plans. Within six years every province had set up a plan that met these national standards. It is so important to maintain the national standards under our constitutional reforms that they are being debated as well. We must make sure these are maintained in our future programs.

Medicare has not only been one of the most important social programs in Canada, it is a point of pride and it is what makes us different as Canadians. It makes us proud to be Canadians and it brings unity to this country, a unity that is being eroded by this very bill. I know Canadians do not want that.

We are proud that our health care is the best in the world. In contrast the United States has more than 30 million people who lack health care. In Canada we have health insurance coverage for everyone. Some people will say it is too expensive. On the other hand if we look at the facts 9 per cent of Canada's gross domestic product is accounted for by health care whereas nearly 12 percent of the GDP in the United States is taken up by health care.

It is economically very fair. We must vote down this bill. My colleague had presented amendments in order to try alleviate the impact of this bill. It is a deplorable situation. I wish I had time to elaborate on the post-secondary education.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to enter into the debate today even for a short time on this very important legislation.

The government is slowly chipping away at the health and post-secondary education system that we set up in this country. It is chipping away at it and it is doing it, as my colleague from Vancouver East said, in a very sneaky way.

Do you know why? Let us take a look at what six pages of legislation are going to do. They are six pages in a bill called C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991. Unfortunately these six pages sum up what this government is doing to health and post-secondary education in Canada. It should be ashamed of itself for bringing this kind of legislation into the House.

I appreciate that members of the New Democratic Party are here today debating this bill and defending one of the cornerstones of what makes Canada what it is. One of the pillars which make Canada such an important and wonderful place to live is the health care system we have developed here.

To members on the opposite side who are critical of medicare and what it means, I suggest they go down to the United States and tear up their medicare card. I dare them to do that. They know that they will not do that. We have to defend medicare against this government and other parties that are doing their best to destroy the health care system.

There are a couple of other points that are important about what this government has done and what it is carrying on with. Under the Liberals in 1977 the system was changed from a system which basically tagged and identified the transfer of funds from the federal government to the provinces in the areas of post-secondary education and health to what is referred to as block funding. Provinces can basically spend the money on whatever priorities they see fit.

Allegations have been made that a number of provinces use federal health and post-secondary funding to pave highways and what have you. It is alleged that the previous government in British Columbia, the cousins of the government members here, used some of those funds at that time to finance boondoggles like the Coquihalla and other aspects like that.

To try and clarify that I asked the Secretary of State during a debate in the House if he could tell this House and give assurances to Canadians that when the federal government did transfer the federal funds for health and education, those funds were spent on health and education. The Secretary of State of the day said that we would have trust him that that was the case.

If the Canadian public, the taxpayers, knew that the Government of Canada transfers to the provinces some billions of dollars, and yet the minister responsible for that could not tell this House for sure that the money was being spent on health and education, I think taxpayers of this country would demand accountability from this Parliament. They would demand that we be able to tell them what we are going to do.

That changed from 1977 under the Liberals when they brought in block funding. I suggest that the Parliament of Canada should return to a system of a 50/50 funding basis, equal partners in the delivery of health and post-secondary education in Canada.

I think there is an obligation on the part of the Government of Canada to explain and to account to Canadian taxpayers for where that money is going. Usually, the argument we have from the federal government is: "Well, we do not get enough publicity out of it. We do not get to put our four by eight signs up".

I say that it is its own fault if the government cannot get enough publicity out of the money it spends on post-secondary education and health in the provinces. If you look at the statistics from my own province where transfer payments are going down and in which the former government was leading a fight against this government, you can see the impact that the federal role has. I accuse this government of not having the brains to try and explain to Canadians just what kind of federal involvement there can be. What we are seeing is the reverse. This government is making every effort it can to see that our health care system and post-secondary education system do not get the assistance and help they need.

We all have personal experiences concerning our contact with the health care system. I have had it this year and have gained some understanding of what it means when a member of your family has to use our health care system. In one particular case in my family the system reached the point at which this member has to go to Seattle now for health care. It is incredible that my father would have to go to Seattle to get cancer treatment because there is not room or enough facilities for him in Canada.

The members opposite sit here and heckle and talk about how they are not destroying health care. I dare you to say that to my father in Seattle today. I dare you to say that, because that is what is happening under right wing governments like this Conservative administration and like the Socred administration. Hopefully the new governments that have been elected across this country provincially, and especially in British Columbia, will result in a revolution in health care in which we can develop health care standards that are necessary to ensure that Canadian citizens continue to receive the medical treatment they need.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on this bill. A lot has been said about the health care and the post-secondary education clauses in this bill, but not a lot has been said about clauses 8, 9 and 10 in the section of this bill that addresses the increase in the UI premiums. I know a lot of people think this is a fait accompli, that no more discussion should be undertaken and nothing should be said about it.

I notice a lot of government members are throwing remarks across the floor. They are not obscene remarks, they are taken in good nature, but I do not see any of the members rising to make any public statements on any of these clauses or on any of our arguments. Why do they not get up and say something if they have something to say? They just sit there and would rather just ramble on.

The increase in unemployment insurance rates is something that is severely affecting all of the country. We see the number of lay-offs, the number of bankruptcies, the number of people who are just being put out of work and the number of companies and grocery stores that are closing because they just cannot take any more taxation. We see increases with the GST and now with this 7.1 per cent increase in UI premiums it means that more people are going to be laid off.

What is the effect? There are so many people out of work now that the unemployment insurance system cannot keep up. Last year in June we saw an increase of 24 per cent in UI premiums. The then Minister of Finance said that the government would meet any shortfall the system may have, but not six months later we saw a 24 per cent increase. Now we see another increase of 7.1 per cent which is going to take effect this year.

The original Unemployment Insurance Act, section 48.1 reads: "Notwithstanding section 48 the rate of premiums that persons employed in insurable employment are required to pay on each of 1990, 1991 and 1992 is 2.25 per cent of insurable earnings in that year".

We heard, as I mentioned, the Minister of Finance say that the government would make up any shortfalls that may occur. Then we saw a few months later a 24 per cent increase. That was in June.

Now it is December and we see an increase. Why are there these continuous increases? It is because more and more people are being put out of work, so more and more people are collecting UI benefits. Fewer and fewer people are paying into it.

It is a vicious circle. We are never going to catch up unless we come up with a plan, a program, that is going to create employment. That is the answer: full employment. Then the UI system will not have to be subsidized by anyone.

The way we are going now, we see more and more people being laid off. We see more and more people collecting UI. It is never going to end.

The amendment which is being proposed by my colleague from Essex—Windsor is one that will rectify a wrong. It will force the government to abide by the statement that was made by the finance minister that day when he said the government would make up any shortfalls.

We cannot allow this to continue. Regarding the government's economic policies and its fiscal restraint policies, it is telling everyone else that they have to cut back and it does not. The government wants to pull back any funding that it puts into any program and it wants to wash its hands of everything and it wants the taxpayers to take up the slack that its failure is causing.

We need fiscal responsibility and it has to start on that side of the House. We need a government that is going to show some confidence in this country because there is no more confidence in this country. The morale in Canada is so low that everyone wants to move away. Where are they going to go? Where are they going to go to work? There is a grocery chain in Timmins, a local company which has been there for 30 years, which just announced last week that it is closing. It is closing right down completely.

The food banks are growing. There is something wrong. People do not have the money to spend on groceries because they are not working. Mines weekly announce they are closing, they are laying off personnel. If something is not done soon, there will be no more mining industry.

It is time that Canadians realized that something has to change and that message has to be relayed to the government. This bill, Bill C-20, which allows the government to withdraw all funding from just about all programs is not acceptable.

I hope that when we get to vote on clauses 8, 9 and 10 of this bill, we all rise and support these amendments put forward by my colleague from Essex—Windsor. It is clear to me that employers and employees cannot afford any more taxation of any kind if we are going to survive. If we are really sincere about creating jobs I think this government has to start spending some money in the right places.

There is no doubt in any Canadian's mind that we have to pay taxes in this country. We are willing to pay those taxes. How the money is spent is what we do not like. If the money is spent in the right place, we will not need subsidization. We will not need the government to bail us out all the time because we will have a system in which money will be regenerated and turned back into the organizations creating this money.

In conclusion, I hope that when we get to the amendments of clauses 8, 9 and 10 of Bill C-20, we all rise and support them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 4. A vote on Motion No. 4 will also apply to Motions Nos. 5 and 6.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of deferred divisions on Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief government Whip to defer the division until a later time, three o'clock this afternoon. Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(8), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until three o'clock p.m. later this day at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have been some consultations and I think you will find a predisposition in the Chamber to suspend until 1.59 this day, which means we will come back in time for Statements Pursuant to S. O. 31 and Question Period. Then we will have the vote and then proceed with the next item on Government Orders.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed to suspend the sitting?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is so agreed.

The sitting of the House is suspended until 1.59 p.m.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 1.42 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, this week marks the first annual white ribbon campaign. The campaign has been organized to help end violence against women and to heighten the awareness of men to this ever-growing problem.

Violence against women takes many forms, including physical and sexual assault, psychological and emotional abuse. It also threatens women of all ages, culture and backgrounds. When we look at the recent rash of violent acts committed by men against women it would seem that the word "civilized" is not part of our vocabulary.

Women are being gunned down, knifed, and beaten in record numbers but this is not a new phenomenon. It has been going on for quite some time.

I would encourage my male colleagues in this House, and all men across Canada for that matter, to take a leadership role in stopping this madness. It is up to us to give victims some hope. We must challenge conventional attitudes and behaviour. We must instil in our youth a new way of looking at humanity. We cannot stay silent any longer because, as with other atrocities, we become as guilty as the offender.

This week has been designated to raise awareness of the issue, but we cannot forget about the remaining 51 weeks in the year. I hope all men will wear a white ribbon to indicate their support for this cause. The country may not be covered with white snow, but we can cover it with white ribbons.

ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH ON THE RED

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to congratulate the efforts of the congregation of St. Andrew's Church on the Red.

The people of this church under the leadership of Father Stephen Sharman and with the help of the Government of Canada are about to begin the restoration of the oldest stone church in western Canada.

At a time when we are all concerned about where we are going, it is important to know where we have been. The efforts of the people of St. Andrew's on the Red will assure us of this very important part of our history.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it has now been two years since the tragedy at the Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal. Since that time the war against women has continued. Men continue to abuse, neglect, harass, assault, and murder women. We as men must take on the work of educating ourselves in order to understand sexism and speak out and challenge sexism in our daily lives.

We must work to pressure governments to increase funding for rape crisis centres, for shelters for battered women, and for comprehensive educational programs for men in positions of authority such as the judiciary, police departments and, indeed, in this House.

Men must take responsibility for the violence they have perpetrated in our homes and in our streets. This week is a time to commit ourselves to change, to speaking out, to helping out through donations and action. This week hundreds of men have worked to initiate the white ribbon campaign. Men across Canada are urged to hang a white ribbon from their house, their car, or at their work place, and to wear a white ribbon.

The white ribbon symbolizes a call for all men to lay down their arms in the war against our sisters. We must heed that call.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my two hon. friends from across the way on the same topic.

I do not think any caring Canadian men can condone violence against women. What is difficult for many of us is to accept the premise that all men, including those who would never lift a finger against anyone, are partially responsible for this violence. This is the rationale behind the white ribbon campaign which runs from today until this Friday, the second anniversary of the tragic and troubling Montreal massacre.

I rise today as one man in Canadian society to say that I fully accept my responsibility to try and be a part of the solution to this problem. The best result of this campaign will be an increased awareness among all of us that sexism in any form, from jokes to harassment to violence itself, is unacceptable.

It is time that the least we can do is say that we are all very sorry.

HOSTAGES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we in this House are very happy that the American hostage in Lebanon, Joseph Cicippio, has been released today. He was freed hours after Israel released 25 Arab prisoners.

There are only a few western hostages left in captivity and we have hopes that their ordeals will end in the coming weeks, if not days.

Besides the increasing good will developing in the Middle East, the key to their release has been constant pressure and relentless efforts by the international community.

Unfortunately, our joy is not complete. A Canadian woman, Mrs. Henriette Haddad, has been held hostage in Lebanon for more than six years. To this point, despite meetings with the family, the minister responsible for external affairs has refused to even put Mrs. Haddad's name on the list of hostages.

As the family told my colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre this week, the Canadian government does not even acknowledge that Mrs. Haddad is a hostage.

Our government has a duty to stand up for our citizens, as we have seen the American and other governments do over the hostage takings in Lebanon. We want Mrs. Haddad to be freed and we want the Canadian government to demand international pressure for her release as soon as possible.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDANCE

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian community of my riding welcomed the results of the independence referendum in their home country with great pride, joy and hope. This democratic exercise gave the Ukrainian people an opportunity to clearly express their sovereign will after 350 years of injustice and forced union.

Of course, President Gorbachev made threats. "Without Ukraine, there is no union, and without union, there will be neither social peace nor market economy and the country will sink into ethnic strife and anarchy", he said.

Instead, we see a new democratic country being born, one that is open, tolerant toward its minorities and ready to associate on a normal basis of mutual interest rather than in a dominant/dominated relationship.

I hope that Ukrainian independence will be recognized immediately by Canada and all countries in the world.

I also wish to deplore our government's decision not to include the hon. member for Calgary Northeast, who is of Ukrainian origin, in the Canadian parliamentary delegation to supervise the referendum, even though he was officially invited and he is a knowledgeable observer of Ukraine's democratic evolution.

NATIONAL WILDLIFE STRATEGY

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, another step toward Canada's green future was taken last Friday with the launching of the National Wildlife Strategy. The strategy, part of Canada's green plan, will protect wildlife diversity, conserve wildlife habitat and safeguard healthy ecosystems.

Efforts to recover populations of endangered species will be stepped up. Plans are in the works to identify habitat to protect national wildlife areas and migratory bird sanctuaries. Significant wetlands will be protected.

Research schedules on wildlife diseases, ecology and toxicology will be accelerated. The new National Wildlife Strategy goes hand in hand with new legislation before the House. The Wild Animal and Plant Protection Act is designed to protect wildlife, particularly endangered species from illegal trading and poaching. Several partnerships are emerging to save wildlife and wild places.

Governments, community groups and individuals are all working toward that common goal. The federal government is proud to be part of such a widespread commitment to wildlife.

I urge all members of the House and all Canadians to support these and other green plan projects contributing to a healthy environment.

GOAL 100

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, Goal 100 is a pilot project in employment partnership developed under the Industry Education Council in Hamilton. This project is geared to improving the success and cost effectiveness of employment related services for people with disabilities.

Small businesses under the leadership of Don Fell of Fell Fab Products in Hamilton have a remarkable commitment to this initiative. Twenty of these business champions aim to find 100 jobs for people with disabilities by the end of 1991.

• (1410)

The employment consortium evolved around this project is unique in Canada. Six sectors—employment, labour, service, consumer, education and resources—are identifying problems and opportunities, and co-ordinating existing federal, provincial and regional programs.

There are approximately 25,000 disabled job seekers in the Hamilton—Wentworth area. With the help of companies involved in Goal 100, many of these people will be able to leave the welfare ranks and join the employment ranks.

Congratulations to Hamilton business persons for their efforts in enabling disadvantaged individuals to become productive workers in today's and tomorrow's labour market.

Let them stand as examples to other employers—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Premier Bourassa deplores the accusations of favouring Quebec that circulated last week in the Commons following the announcement of an industrial development agreement between Quebec and Ottawa. He says that such charges are completely unjustified. From this September to next June, $2.9 billion will be given in agricultural assistance for the grains sector, mainly to the western provinces. Mr. Bourassa pointed out that this will bring the total for this kind of aid since 1985 to $20 billion. "No paltry sum", said he.

For several months, the Conservative members from Quebec together with the Minister of National Health and Welfare have shown the Cabinet that Quebec is entitled to its share for economic recovery in that province.

The statements made last week by NDP members, a Liberal member from Newfoundland and the Reform Party in Ottawa are a lot of nonsense.

UKRAINE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, December 1, approximately 80 per cent of Ukrainians voted yes in a referendum which affirmed the Ukrainian Parliament's August 24 declaration of independence.

Over 6,000 Canadians of Ukrainian descent who live in my constituency of Parkdale—High Park call on the Canadian government to recognize Ukrainian independence today, and to begin establishing full diplomatic relations.

Mr. Kravchuk, on his recent visit to Canada, assured us that nuclear weapons in Ukraine will remain under the control of a collective interdependent defence alliance until they are fully dismantled. He said that his independent Ukraine will guarantee equal rights to Russians, Jews and other minority groups.

I recommend that the government bring in a resolution to this Chamber today recognizing Ukraine as the world's newest independent nation, representing 52 million people and Europe's fourth largest geographical area

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, there are many unsung heroes working diligently to promote the unity of Canada.

One of them is Jim Taylor of Toronto in his billboard campaign, now travelling through Atlantic Canada. He gained great support in my riding last Friday for his declaration: "My Canada includes Quebec".

Another is a group of singing and dancing students from Fredericton called "Characters Incorporated". Over the past several months, they have toured large parts of our country to inspire pride in Canada through their outstanding performances.

Along the way, they have collected an impressive tribute of signed commitments to Canada from many corner of the country. In due course, they will be presenting that tribute to Parliament through the Prime Minister.

These kinds of initiatives represent the power of public opinion. People do care about Canada, and purposes like these should be encouraged and supported at every stage in the constitutional cause. May every Canadian follow these examples.

UKRAINE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, over the weekend, the people of Ukraine made a historic decision. My colleague, the member for Edmonton East, who was in Ukraine as part of a Canadian delegation to observe the elections, confirmed this morning that the people of Ukraine have overwhelmingly chosen to chart their own destiny.

This decision is being celebrated not only in Ukraine but also by hundreds of thousands of sons and daughters of Ukraine who live here in Canada.

I urge the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make sure Canada is among the first countries to give official recognition to this most recent addition to the world community of independent nations.

Now is the ideal time for the cultural and economic links between our nations to be strengthened. I can think of no better way to celebrate the 100 years of Ukrainian settlement in Canada than by reaffirming the historic links between our countries today.

Today is a pivotal day for the people of Ukraine. Let us make sure that Canada is there to assist them in the challenges ahead.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, last week on a tour of the Peace country, Preston Manning, leader of the Reform Party of Canada announced his party would abolish northern tax benefits.

For many years, many of his strongest supporters made themselves rich by taking the profits from our oil and gas fields home with them. Northern benefits have let the hard working people of the north keep just a few of those dollars at home.

I call on Preston Manning to stop listening to the guys with the bucks and help those without. The northern benefits puts money in the jeans of the men and women who toil in Canada's northern communities.

I will be contacting reeves, mayors, MLAs, MPs and other northern community leaders. Getting the northern tax benefit was only half the battle. Now the fight is to keep it.

EASTERN ONTARIO'S ECONOMY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Maurice Lamoureux egg candling centre of St. Isidore closed its doors, with the loss of 34 jobs in my riding. It is the second time in a month that St. Isidore de Prescott, with a population of 500, has been hit in that way. This shutdown is in addition to several others in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

I take the opportunity today to repeat the request I made many times in this House. Eastern Ontario needs a regional development program to fight chronic unemployment in our area. My constituents and I are still waiting. They are waiting for a favorable response from this government.

CHRISTMAS SEALS

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce details of the Canadian Lung Association's annual Christmas seal campaign.

The Lung Association, Canada's oldest national voluntary health organization, was formed in 1900. Although its early focus was with the prevention of tuberculosis, there are now other serious lung diseases that demand its attention. Deaths due to asthma have increased 163 per cent among people of the ages 15 to 34 since the early 1970s.

The Lung Association aims to improve these serious health conditions in Canada through research, education, patient services and the promotion of healthy living. The country-wide annual Christmas seal campaign represents the major financial support for the work of the association.

In London—Middlesex the Lung Association has helped 25,900 people: asthmatics, chronic lung disease, students smoking cessation program, a resource library, et cetera, with 180 volunteers. They would like to have more. Dedicated professionals such as Dr. Neville Lefcoe and others at Victoria Hospital are certainly working actively in this field.

The Lung Association of Canada has initiated the appreciation program for tobacco free pharmacies.

LEADER OF OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition made some statements about referendums. He suggested that a referendum be held on the same day that Quebec holds its referendum. He added that if English Canada said no in that referendum, the status quo would prevail. "We will have the Constitution that we have", he said.

A referendum is not a game. The Leader of the Opposition should stop annoying Quebecers unnecessarily. A referendum law is a way to break a deadlock, to use "in case". It is not to provoke Quebecers, much less to force them into something.

Furthermore, the Leader of the Opposition must understand one thing: You cannot hold a national referendum and if it fails pretend that nothing happened. There will be no third chance.

STANLEY KNOWLES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on November 30, 1942, the residents of Winnipeg North Centre sent Stanley Knowles to the House of Commons. He is still here and he deserves our congratulations and our appreciation.

As a young person growing up on the outskirts of Winnipeg, I knew very little of party politics, but I heard many people talking about Stanley: Stanley for decent pensions; Stanley for working people; Stanley for poor women; Stanley for the unemployed, dispossessed, the forgotten of our society. Stanley Knowles was a symbol then. He is an institution now. He represented and still represents a philosophy of service, of dedication and of sacrifice to others. Stanley Knowles was defeated just once, but even during that break he continued to work for the cause of social justice. Now, as he starts his 50th year in Ottawa, we, along with many other Canadians, express our best wishes to Stanley Knowles, a true person of the people.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

Today, the premiers of New Brunswick, Ontario and Manitoba, who represent all three national political parties in Canada, came together to urge the federal government to stop ignoring the economy and to convene an immediate First Ministers' Conference on the economy.

• (1420)

Will the Prime Minister immediately convene a First Ministers' Conference on the economy as requested by these three First Ministers.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will be meeting with provincial finance ministers on December 12 and 13 for two days of intensive consultation precisely in regard to economic matters.

I have been holding bilateral meetings with first ministers, Premier Bourassa, Premier Rae. I will meet with Premier Romanow, Premier Harcourt, Premier Getty, and Premier Wells next week and will be making sure that during this cycle that we meet with all of the first ministers.

I will certainly be guided by their advice and be guided as well by the advice of the Minister of Finance after he meets with his provincial colleagues for two days of meetings and gives us a recommendation in regard to the usefulness and the effectiveness of such a meeting.

Therefore, I will be happy to report back to my hon. friend just as soon as these meetings are concluded. We will obviously do what is the best for Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Today, Mr. Speaker, 650,000 men and women must count on food banks for their daily bread. These people cannot wait any longer. Last week, the Prime Minister had a meeting with the premier of Ontario, and after that meeting, the premier of Ontario asked for a conference. Doesn't the Prime Minister think it would be time to show that he is very concerned that in a country like Canada, these people have to go to food banks? Is it not time to give them some hope and get all the Premiers together to find a way out of the recession?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I want to give them hope, but not false hopes. Today interest rates in Canada are dropping. The inflation rate is going down. The IMF and the OECD have indicated that next year, Canada will rank first among all major industrialized countries in terms of economic growth. These are encouraging signs, despite our current problems. I would say that a lot depends on expenditure control and borrowing at the provincial level.

Even if we do have a meeting, I intend to examine very carefully, with the premiers and in public, the growth rate of their expenditures and loans and compare it with the federal government's record. I think you will see that the federal government has shown strong leadership in this area, and if we can persuade the provinces to follow our example, the economic recovery already under way will be stronger and more durable.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the problem we have had with this government is that for the past two years it has told us that it was to be a very short-term recession. Now we are in the second year, virtually a complete second year. Some 145,000 people had to go to food banks in Toronto alone last month and almost half of them were children.

When will this government stop fighting inflation and look at the other side of the coin. People in Canada need jobs in order to stop going to food banks. When will this government stop fighting inflation and concentrate on finding jobs for people?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that 108,000 new jobs were created in the months of September and October. We have today the composite index from Statistics Canada which records the sixth consecutive increase in the outlook. That is a broad measurement of the economy. It takes into consideration some 10 different components, all the way from the stock market to furniture.

The other thing that should be noted is the fact that in the third quarter, while the growth was not as strong as we would have liked to have seen it, in the goods producing sector, there was a 5.2 per cent growth. I think that should be signs for encouragement, a 17.2 per cent increase in residential investment, the increase in jobs, the continuing reduction in interest rates, the continuing decline in inflation which will provide the lower income groups and the people on fixed incomes with that kind of security.

So it is not all gloom and doom. I think we are poised for a good rate of growth in 1992 as reflected by the projection of the IMF, the OECD, the Conference Board of Canada and others.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. October was yet another milestone for this government.

[Translation]

We now have a record number of bankruptcies and people who are obliged to use food banks. Among those who do, one out of five lost his or her job last year and has exhausted his or her unemployment insurance benefits.

Will the minister admit that his government's cuts in unemployment insurance have caused a transfer of this social burden to charitable organizations?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously any bankruptcy is disturbing. We are, of course, concerned by the level of bankruptcies. The fact of the matter is with interest rates declining, the fact that it seems to have bottomed out, there are indications that we have seen the worst in terms of bankruptcies and we continue to look at some positive trends. The most positive trend is the continuing decline in interest rates.

I might say that this recession compared to 1981-82 in so far as bankruptcies makes this look very mild by comparison.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. When the Minister of Finance told the country to expect little improvement in the jobless rate for yet another year, thousands of Canadians were left to calculate how long they could hold out before declaring personal bankruptcy and join the crowd at their local food bank.

I ask the minister to announce that his government will no longer disown the unemployed and the poor and will now try to rescue the casualties of the Tory fiscal plague.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, 108,000 new jobs were created during the months of September and October. It is expected that over 300,000 new jobs will be generated in 1992. The combination of that without the increase in the labour force, the expansion of the labour force, would result in a 2 per cent decline in the unemployment rate.

However, because of the large participation rate that the Canadian work force is involved in, it becomes a much more difficult challenge. I remind the hon. member that in terms of participation, Canada has the highest participation rate in the labour force of any country in the industrialized world and so our challenges are therefore greater.

I repeat, we must get the fundamentals right if we are going to have sustainable growth with price stability. That means long term growth and secure jobs for the future.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Today Statistics Canada reports that in fact we do have a slowdown in the economy from last month. This simply confirms what millions of Canadians know, millions of Canadians for whom the recession is very far from over.

Often the finance minister has pointed to increases in corporate profits as an indication that the recession is over. I would ask the finance minister and the Prime Minister to look at the number of lay-offs this week alone, 139 jobs lost by Norsk Hydro; 2,000 lost jobs at IBM; 1,300 jobs at Town & Country Stores across the country; and CN bracing for more losses.

When will the Prime Minister begin to take into account the real victims of the recession, those who are without jobs and need to have some hope in the future, and put forth a plan to provide jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, the only way to secure long-term growth, prosperity and permanent jobs is to get at the fundamentals, the fundamentals of bringing down interest rates, bringing down inflation. Consolidating and managing the fiscal challenge is really the only way that we can hope to ever achieve the kind of long term growth and stability that the hon. member refers to.

• (1430)

I remind her that this government has helped in creating a climate that generated 1.6 million new jobs, the highest record of job creation of any country in the industrialized world. We have gone through a period of adjustment and retrenchment; we are going through that. As a matter of fact the Governor of the Bank of Canada today indicated in his speech the main point, and I quote: "What I wish to convey from this monetary policy perspective is that Canada is now much better placed to enjoy good economic"—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

When this government is optimistic, it predicts that one Canadian out of ten will be unemployed next year. The government has no economic recovery plan for the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed and the 2 million who are on welfare. An economic policy that ensures that the banks make billions of dollars of profits while children go hungry is a policy that does not work.

I would like to ask the minister when this government will help the real victims of the recession, the unemployed.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party can help in this area as well. If we look at the September growth figures there was a decline of .1 per cent. I think everyone shares the view that if it had not been for the disruptive strikes that occurred we probably would have had positive growth in September.

The former premier of British Columbia should know that because of the strikes we lost a lot of grain deliveries. That certainly affected our export position and that affected our merchandise trade balance.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will not convince one Canadian that the poor management of this government is any excuse. Employee relations by this government are so bad that it was not even able to deal with its own employees. I want to say that is not the cause of the recession. The cause of the recession is government's policies. I want to say to the Minister of Finance that a recovery which does not put people back to work is not a recovery.

The Minister of Finance told us last week that in his budget consultations he was hearing that he was on the right track. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance to whom was he speaking? Was he just speaking to the bankers who made all those profits? How about speaking to those three million people who are out of work and on social assistance and asking for answers from that group of people? Has he spoken to them?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to answer that question.

I have heard it from anti-poverty groups, from the Paraplegic Association and from NAC, the National Action Committee. I have heard it from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I have heard it from the retailers. I have heard it from the farmers. I have heard it literally from a cross-section.

An hon. member: What are you doing about it?

Mr. Mazankowski: What are we doing about it? The fact of the matter is that everyone knows we have a fiscal deficit problem we inherited from the previous administration that must be dealt with.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

UKRAINE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

We are pleased to recognize that the Prime Minister took the step this morning of recognizing the independence of Ukraine.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I would like to ask the Prime Minister some questions to clarify the statement released by his office which says: "Canada will only open negotiations and will have to satisfy itself with respect to Ukraine's stated intentions on ensuring that nuclear weapons will remain under secure control that there will be compliance with existing arms control agreements" and so forth.

It is our understanding that those assurances have already been given by the President of Ukraine, Mr. Kravchuk, in a letter to the Prime Minister this week. I want to ask the Prime Minister: What further conditions, what further assurances is the Prime Minister requiring before full embassy status is given to Kiev and the full diplomatic power of immigration and other negotiations are transferred to that post in Kiev?

Could the Prime Minister indicate what more it is that Canada is now looking for under these negotiations?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when we saw the results of the vote in Ukraine, the government decided to recognize Ukraine as an independent state. That we have done and we have announced.

It is not unusual, pursuant to such a decision, for a country to open negotiations with regard to the establishment of diplomatic relations. In this case which is quite unusual Canada will wish to be satisfied with respect, for example, to the question of nuclear weapons that will remain under secure control until they are disposed of.

Overnight a country has become a nuclear power with nuclear weapons on its territory. Obviously, in the interests of effective bilateral relationships and in the interests of security, we are going to want to assure ourselves of the security of those weapons. We want them destroyed and/or removed and placed under secure control. This is an entirely normal process which we are informed the leadership of the Ukraine welcomes.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I think it still begs the question as to whether this is an unqualified or qualified recognition. We would like to know what further assurances in addition to Mr. Kravchuk's letter the Prime Minister is looking for.

Furthermore, I think we all recognize that a newly independent country needs more than just recognition. It needs assistance for its economic security. It needs assurances on its own security, and particularly in the case of Ukraine this question of dismantling its nuclear weapons is very crucial.

We should all take account of the UN report released this morning saying that there could be major unrest in eastern Europe if there is not another Marshall Plan.

In addition to these negotiations about nuclear weapons, is Canada prepared to offer to Ukraine substantial new economic assistance and in particular respond to the request we made this morning that Canada help in the conversion of its nuclear warheads to peaceful purposes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): We do not want the nuclear warheads converted. We want them done away with. That is what we want.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend asks two questions. On the first one the answer is contained in the first line of the statement: "Prime Minister Brian Mulroney today announced that Canada had decided to recognize Ukraine as an independent state". The recognition issue is resolved.

With regard to the second question raised in regard to future economic assistance and so on, in my meetings with President Kravchuk prior to to the election when he visited with me in Ottawa, I conveyed to him the view that after the election, and assuming certain results if that were the case, we would be dispatching senior public officials of the Government of Canada to meet with the officials of the newly elected government to deal precisely with the questions raised by my hon. friend.

The last line of the release deals precisely with that: "The Prime Minister confirmed that senior officials will be going to Kiev in the coming days to convey Canada's position and to begin the process of negotiations", which takes in as well the matters raise by my hon. friend.

ENERGY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Eighteen months ago, the government promised to do environmental assessments of all its policies. The green plan reinforced this promise.

So far, however, no comprehensive environmental assessment has been made of policies at the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister simply refuses to co-operate. Why?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the minister of energy is not in a position where he does not co-operate. He is co-operating.

On any issue that comes before cabinet through the regular documentation we have to satisfy and I as minister of energy I have to satisfy the environmental conditions. That is a condition of cabinet decision making. I am doing it.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Energy policy is a critical indicator of a government's commitment to sustainable development. The minister's refusal, his cabinet's refusal to allow an environmental assessment of the government's energy policy, demonstrates not only a lack of concern for the environment but is poor economic policy as well.

• (1440)

The question is very clear. When will the government produce the environmental evaluation of his department's energy choices, an evaluation that was promised clearly and unequivocally 18 months ago?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if there is any change in the policy position and if cabinet makes that decision, part of that decision-making process will be the environmental considerations. As we have said before that remains and no change has taken place.

INFORMANT PROGRAMS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister.

Most Canadians readily understand the need to compensate some individuals for the risks they take in providing information on drug smuggling, murder or conspiracy to the RCMP or the Security Intelligence Service. What is less clear is why Fisheries and Oceans, Environment Canada, and Revenue Canada are developing paid confidential informant programs.

My question for the Minister of Finance is: Would he explain why there are departments that are allowed to operate such programs without placing the costs in the estimates before Parliament, something the Minister of Finance is directly responsible for?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of fisheries I can tell the House that I will be pleased to take my hon. friend's representations into account and report back to him as soon as possible.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister of fisheries is here, so the Solicitor General's response was not all that helpful.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Maybe we are going to have to start over. The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister of fisheries has obviously had a very close shave.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance, because this is an important auditing function that he handles. There are now at least five ministries on that side of the House involved in informant programs.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether or not he would agree that rather than operating the bounty hunter programs which are now being operated by Fisheries, Revenue, and soon by Environment Canada, with secret bank accounts and secret telephone numbers, does he not think it would be better to set up some hot-lines where Canadians can advise the departments of illegal activities that they are aware of?

Will the minister assure this House that by the end of today he will table all the budgets of all the ministries on that side of the House that have informant programs?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member referred to the Main Estimates maybe I can be of some assistance.

I would like to tell him that the payments that are made to individuals under the enforcement programs of various departments are considered to be operating expenses.

There is no separate line item in the estimates for that particular purpose, but the amounts are available as the hon. member knows very well because he was provided with the answers when he asked the question.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

As we prepare to mark the second anniversary of the tragedy at Ecole Polytechnique, the incidence of violence against women on Canadian campuses is on the increase. In particular the statistics on date rape are very frightening.

Will the Prime Minister convene a meeting of university presidents nation-wide to develop with them a concrete plan including education and enforcement policies to stop violence against women on Canadian campuses?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but the Minister responsible for the Status of Women is away on government business today. I will certainly bring the matter to her attention on her return.

One knows and understands how hard she has worked to make all of us much more aware of the very debilitating effect of violence and harassment of women and how much we have to do.

In this particular week, as we come up to the commemoration of the second anniversary of the event, all of us will be thinking of the young women whose lives were snuffed out before their future even unfolded.

I am sure the minister responsible will be addressing herself to this subject on her return to the House.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer, but I posed my question then and I pose it again to the Prime Minister of Canada with this supplementary.

[Translation]

Is the Prime Minister prepared to promise financial support for Canadian universities so that they can develop policies to fight date rape?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Halifax must know that recently in Edmonton, I announced the funding of three university chairs to research violence against women. I do not think she meant what she said; I think that she is talking about co-operation between training centres, particularly at the university level. This was extremely well received by women's groups when I made the announcement in Edmonton because I think that it is a policy that will help determine—and I agree fully with the hon. member—exactly what must be done in Canadian society to find ways to fight violence against women. The same goes for all forms of violence against women and children; we have policies involving hundreds of millions of dollars as an expression of our commitment.

Again, I repeat that we have made commitments to women's groups. I personally announced the funding next year of three university chairs for violence against women. I think that shows the government's intention to do something in that area.

JUSTICE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last night and tonight millions of Canadians are viewing an electrifying television documentary on the brutal slaying of Manitoba native Helen Betty Osborne.

Her death became the focus of the aboriginal justice inquiry of Manitoba which released its report last summer. This report made several recommendations for the federal government.

Why is the government delaying its response and ignoring the many ways through many departments that it can make justice a reality for Canada's aboriginal community?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the government is quite aware of the report to which my hon. friend refers.

In fact I met as well with the minister of justice of Manitoba to discuss the federal report. At the present time the recommendations in the report are being studied by the RCMP. I can assure my hon. friend that this is not a matter where we are delaying in any way.

We want to provide a thoughtful and thorough response to this very important inquiry.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister, the Solicitor General.

It is hard to believe that after three months and 150 recommendations on one of the most serious criminal issues and one of the most serious social issues in this country the minister cannot find one recommendation to start with.

When will this government begin to deal with these very serious problems?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think the various efforts by the government to deal with this very serious problem have been alluded to today in previous answers.

I can assure my friend that the 150 recommendations are to be taken seriously. We are not in a mood to delay on this important issue. They are being taken seriously. The government will provide a response when the matter is brought forward.

We can only respond to the recommendations that are ours. It is a report made in the purview of the minister of justice of the province of Manitoba. Naturally we want to take instruction from that report and react to as many recommendations as we can.

MEDICARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of health.

The federal government's response on Thursday to the recommendations of the report of the standing committee on health has been disappointing, particularly at a time when Canadians are looking for strong reasons to remain as part of a federal Canada.

• (1450)

Could the minister tell the House why his government supports the recommendations of the Liberal and Conservative committee members for the wholesale renegotiation of medicare at a time when Canadians are saying very clearly that they want national medicare with national standards and they do not want Bill C–20 and the continued federal cutbacks to financing of medicare?

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: I listened to the whole question because I did not want to intervene too quickly, but I think that question goes right into the workings of the committee and I think it is out of order.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

Back since September in my community we have had a group of volunteers, 20–odd people who have been meeting, discussing and holding public forums on constitutional proposals.

In the last while the work plan of the joint House and Senate parliamentary committee has changed and there has been a creation of constitutional conferences.

I am wondering if the minister could tell the House the status of these constitutional conferences and what reflection it will have on the small community based committees.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to indicate today that there will be five constitutional conferences on consecutive weekends in cities across Canada starting on January 17 in Halifax, sponsored by a number of independent institutes in the country: the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, the Canada West Foundation, the C. D. Howe Institute, the Institute for Research into Public Policy and the Niagara Institute.

Those conferences will call together experts plus, through a process worked out with the institutes, an effective representation of the general public. That will allow us to continue the process of building consensus on improvements for the proposals brought forward and tabled by the Prime Minister in September.

The fifth conference will be a concluding conference organized jointly by the Government of Canada and the five sponsoring institutes.

There had been talk, as the House will know, about a conference on aboriginal matters. I have had meetings with leaders of the four national aboriginal organizations. At the moment it is not their preference to proceed with a discussion on aboriginal issues, although that question is being discussed.

NATURAL GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The California Public Utilities Commission recently announced a decision which has the effect of abrogating long-term private contracts between Canadian natural gas producers on one hand and California consumers on the other. This would be very serious for our natural gas industry.

When will this minister respond to the strong and frequent representations from Alberta P.C. members of this House and take action to defend the interests of Canadian natural gas producers?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

This is a very serious issue. I would hope that all members of the House would join with the government in the actions that we plan to unveil tomorrow in Calgary. It is an issue that relates to the sanctity of contracts.

Natural gas has been provided to the California market. Since 1961 various administrations in this place have supported that type of export.

Tomorrow we will be joined by the province of Alberta, by the industry, and I hope by members on both sides of this House so that the sanctity of contracts remains and that the actions we propose tomorrow will be endorsed by this House.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, in the House last week the parliamentary secretary to the minister of fisheries stated that his minister was aware of what the fishermen and plant workers were saying regarding the inadequacy of the Atlantic Fisheries Catch Failure Program in which people who have been involved in the fisheries all their lives have not been able to qualify, or if they qualify there is no funding for the program.

If the minister is aware of this, I would like to ask him what he is going to do about it and when.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it is my information that everyone in the areas affected who has a relationship to the fishery in accordance with the rules that were laid down is being looked after in this program. If there are any who have been missed, they can be included once they provide the information that shows they have a reasonable attachment to the fishery.

There is no problem with respect to money. The difficulty is that there are a fairly sizeable number of people without any reasonable attachment to the fishery who also have not qualified for unemployment insurance or who in the next month or two are coming off the unemployment insurance program and will then be looking for assistance. That is where the difficulty comes from.

Those with a reasonable attachment to the fishery, I believe have been looked after.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, last week at the same time in response to a question the Prime Minister said that the $39 million, he claimed, provided for Newfoundland was not enough. In fact the $39 million was for three provinces. So Newfoundland and Labrador got considerably less than that.

Anyway the Prime Minister said: "That is not enough for Newfoundlanders". The Prime Minister knows that there are some inadequacies in the program and the minister knows there are some inadequacies in the program despite what he just said.

Could I call on the Prime Minister to order his minister of fisheries to come to the aid of Newfoundland plant workers and fishermen who need more money, to provide programs for them that they badly need and rightly deserve?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this program, this program has provided funds to assist fishermen affected by catch failure wherever they were in Atlantic Canada, including Nova Scotia. The lion's share, if we might call it that, of the assistance has gone to Newfoundland and Labrador because this was the main area of catch failure.

For example, in connection with funding provided for 14,000 additional tonnes of herring to be purchased to give more work to fishermen and fish plant workers, 10,000 tonnes of that was allocated to Newfoundland and 4,000 to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. We are trying to be as fair as we can be.

The Prime Minister of course is heavily in favour of assistance to anyone living anywhere in Canada where there is a demonstrated need, as the actions of the government have shown.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. For 50 years the Lubicon Lake Indian band has been trying to settle its land claims. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has said he is committed to resolving this claim.

Why then have there been no negotiations with the Lubicon Cree since 1989, and can the Prime Minister explain why the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development created and funded last year a new band in the area claimed by the Lubicon band?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's ongoing concern on this particular issue, just as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development also has a concern.

We have been working with the bands to try to reach an agreement on this.

Mr. Kilgour: Baloney.

Mrs. Martin: We are ready to sit down with them when they are ready to come back to the table and we will follow up on this.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast would apologize to the hon. minister for shouting out comments in the middle of her answer.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the minister, but I do not think her answer was very candid.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that that is any apology at all. This is the very thing where we are getting into difficulty. I have asked the hon. member to withdraw unequivocally.

Mr. Kilgour: I am not going to go beyond that. I have apologized.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member rise to his feet and let me know what he is saying? I cannot hear him otherwise.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the Lubicon file too and I think that the question was fair. I do not think the answer was a fair response.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's intervention is completely improper.

Mr. Kilgour: I agree it was a bit strong.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to make it quite clear, at least to the Chair, that the intervention was improper and that it is withdrawn.

Mr. Kilgour: Out of my great respect for you, Mr. Speaker, I will agree that my comment was a bit strong. If it offended you then I apologize.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Withdraw.

• (1500)

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

An order to create another new band, the Loon Lake band in the northern part of the land claimed by the Lubicon band, is apparently in the office of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development awaiting his signature.

In order to demonstrate this government's commitment to a fair settlement with the Lubicon band, will the Prime Minister today order the minister not to sign this order and to resume negotiations with the Lubicon people immediately?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I rise again, I hope uninterrupted this time, to say that this government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has intervened. I would ask the hon. minister to put as clear an answer as is possible without getting into undue argument.

Mrs. Martin: As I mentioned earlier, I know the member's very true concern about the particular issue. I will take his last question back to the minister of Indian affairs if he returns tomorrow and discuss it with him.

AIDS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and concerns funding for the national AIDS strategy. As the minister knows we have been celebrating World AIDS Day and attempting to deal with this issue in a more constructive way.

The minister will know of the excellent work of AIDS support groups across Canada and will know that funding for these groups under ACAP was cut from was cut from $7 million to $6.4 million for 1991.

I wonder if the minister can confirm today that this $600,000 will be reinstated forthwith so that these AIDS support groups can continue with their critically important work.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I share the views of the member about the World AIDS Day yesterday. I believe that all Canadians have to be concerned about this terrible disease.

Concerning ACAP, I said to the committee when I appeared on October 30 that I was looking at the possibility of reallocating money already devoted to that file and that if there was a possibility of doing that for 1991 I would, for this year. However, I can confirm that for 1992–1993 the budget will be $7 million.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, also as the minister knows, across Canada there are considerable inconsistencies in the treatment of AIDS and its availability and the cost of prescription drugs.

I wonder if the minister can indicate what steps he is taking to eliminate these inconsistencies so that those persons living with AIDS in Canada can receive the same accessibility to medical treatment no matter where they live.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we are trying to work with the provinces on that kind of file. The member knows very well that prescription drugs are determined by the provinces. They make those decisions.

The health care system is made in a way that we can provide as much as we can. As I was told in Europe recently, we have the best health care system in the world. For that reason we are trying to provide the same service all across the country, but of course there are problems in the kind of treatment and the kind of prescription drugs. For example, the problem is not the same in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal as it is in any other province. That is why once again we are working with the provinces.

I believe the question is well put. It should be dealt with in that way by those provinces.

CROATIA

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, continued bloodshed in Croatia is unacceptable to my constituents and my question regarding this is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could she please tell this House the status of efforts to put a UN peacekeeping force into Yugoslavia to control the Serbian army, and will Canada commit troops to help protect Croatia?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has been in the forefront of this issue from the beginning, particularly in urging the Security Council and the United Nations to become engaged in stopping the violence.

We will indeed put peacekeeping troops into the area. Mr. Vance, representing the Secretary-General, is in Belgrade now and his assistant is in Zagreb. We are in constant touch with the United Nations and with Mr. Vance. I spoke to him just before he left and told him at that point that Canada would be part of a peacekeeping effort, as the Prime Minister had said publicly and as we had urged the Security Council to take on. There will have to be another resolution at the Security Council I understand when Mr. Vance returns. We are in touch with our people at the UN as well as through our posts in all the Security Council countries to urge them to establish this so that we can get started.

Mr. Speaker: The time for Question Period has expired.

REQUEST FOR DOCUMENTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period a supplementary answer was given by the President of the Treasury Board. I would certainly hope he will now table those figures. He indicated that I had the figures for informant programs run by at least five government ministries. I do not have those figures and they are not publicly available.

I would hope that the President of the Treasury Board will either correct the record or will in fact table those figures today.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of clarification.

During Question Period the hon. member for Skeena alluded to such a program being in place. In his wording he could have left the impression that such a program was now in place in Environment Canada.

Just for the record I want to make it clear that no such program is now in place in Environment Canada.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment on a point of order arising out of Question Period. It has to do with the question of the hon. member for Surrey being ruled out of order.

The member was asking a question about the government's response to a committee report tabled in this House. This report therefore is no longer the property of the committee but is something of which the House has been seized. He was asking the government a question about its particular response to that particular report. In the course of it he referred to Bill C-20 which is being debated in the House today. But the main point of the question had to do with the government's response to a committee report.

With respect, Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand why it was out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I could be incorrect but as I heard the question it seemed to me that it was going into the committee and in any event it seemed to be anticipating the Orders of the Day.

While there may be differences of opinion on it, that was my call. If I was in error then I can only express to the hon. member my regret. Perhaps the matter could be raised in another way at another time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare Motion No. 1 lost. Therefore, Motion No. 2 is negatived.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find there is unanimous consent for applying the results of the vote that was just taken to Motion No. 3 and the vote on Motion No. 4 to Motions Nos. 5 and 6.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: The list we have would indicate it is Motions Nos. 3 and 4. They are not on the Order Paper because they were done by unanimous consent earlier this day. I just want to make sure that these are the last two votes, at any rate, in terms of amendments to this bill.

Mr. Nowlan: On the same point of order, I do not want to impede but I did not vote either for or against because I did not have the amendment before me and I really was not sure what the devil I was voting on. If it is to implement the budget in a general way, then perhaps I would be able to take a position. I would like to agree to the other amendments if I knew what they were. I did not vote the first time because I did not have the amendment and I did not know what I would be voting on. If you could tell me what the vote is, what the amendments are, then I will go along with a vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion No. 3 of the member for Essex—Windsor moved that Bill C-20 be amended by deleting clause 7. Motion No. 4 of the member for Essex—Windsor moved that Bill C-20 be amended by deleting clause 8.

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be concurred in as amended.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? At the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I believe that should have been "by leave now" we would proceed with third reading of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you could assist me. Is it in order for members to argue against a motion when it is being debated and then to vote for it?

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Corbeil moved that the bill be read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table a petition from residents of my riding and other areas of metropolitan Toronto urging the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of persons who have been determined to be convention refugees and allow these families to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

If this were done, we would limit tragic situations such as the four Gunajothy children between the ages of 5 and 12 who have been waiting for three years in a hotel room in Colombo in terror, without a permanent care giver, while their parents achieved refugee status and were landed last June.

It is six months now that they have been sponsored and they have not even received medical instructions. These children will be Canadian citizens and they will remember their years of fear, loneliness and waiting.

ARTICLE IX OF GATT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of Sydenham, South Mountain, Joyceville and Plantagenet.

[English]

These petitioners oppose the government's possible change in article XI of the GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. They call upon the government to hold the Canadian system up as an example to the world and to protect it in its entirety from any change as a result of the current negotiations and urge the government to show some backbone for a change and support Canadian farmers in those negotiations.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR TIMISKAMING

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice to the Speaker's office on Thursday and I rose in the House on Friday on a point of privilege and informed the member for Sudbury who in Hansard on page 5508, November 28, made allegations against myself, my family, and my riding.

I would like today, and unfortunately the member for Sudbury is not here, to refer to you in a statement—

Mr. Dingwall: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member opposite is indeed quite correct that he did stand in his place on Friday and give notice to the Speaker that he intended to raise a point of privilege which he believes has affected him in his responsibilities as a member of Parliament.

Through the Chair perhaps I may say to the hon. member that the member he is referring to can and will be made available tomorrow morning. Perhaps at that time the hon. member would want to raise his substantive point at that time. I think there has been some difficulty with respect to transportation to and from the constituency. If the hon. member would care to wait, the hon. member could be here tomorrow and I am sure the matter could be argued in its complete context.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to wait but I would like to comment that it has been a very difficult four days for myself and my family and for my constituents when allegations like this are made.

An hon. member: Well, go ahead.

Mr. MacDougall: I would like to ensure that the member is here so that she can really deal first hand with what she has said and the difficulty it has caused for me and my family.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I believe we can give the undertaking that the hon. member will be here tomorrow to debate and add her particular intervention to the suggestion made by the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has noted the comments made by hon. members and appreciates the courtesy shown by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the third time and passed.

He said: I rise today to speak on third reading of Bill C–20. As everyone knows, this bill implements the measures announced in the February 1991 budget by the then minister of finance.

Bill C–20 implements several spending restraint and deficit control measures. It affects the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangement Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Before I discuss the details of the bill let me, at the outset thank all those who participated on the committee for their work, their suggestions and their useful comments.

I listened this morning very carefully to the comments of my colleagues from both opposition parties. The legislation should be understood in the broad context of the government's over–all economic agenda. Measures proposed in the February budget set out in the plan for economic recovery are essential to restore strong, continuing growth that leads to the renewed prosperity that Canadians want.

The key to recovery is lower interest rates. It requires reduction in expectations and in inflation. Part of this comes from putting government finances firmly on course to a balanced budget and by restraining the operations of government. The budget plans for economic recovery support these goals through further tough discipline and government spending, deficit reduction and control of the government's operating costs.

The Minister of Finance today in Question Period mentioned that he is in the process of having pre–budget consultations with the broadest cross section of people in our country from all walks of life. I shared those pre–budget consultations with him last week in Toronto and they were represented by many groups.

All of those groups are experiencing in most instances financial problems at this period of time as they come through a recession. They sent one message loud and clear from those consultations and that was to stick to what we are doing, we are on the right track and we will be proven right. Interest rates are coming down and inflation is down at an annualized rate now that is beyond the goals that were set by the Government of Canada.

They said that we are on the right track. For heaven's sake do not backtrack. That came loud and clear. There were other suggestions from many of the groups which made representations on how we can improve the situation economically. There were suggestions for the upcoming 1992 spring budget, but generally that was the theme that came through loud and clear.

This bill talks to those policies we are implementing to ensure that we stay on the right track and to ensure that the young people coming behind us are not going to be paying all our bills. We will start making a dent in that huge debt that has been built up over a number years.

The measures before us today have important implications for federal–provincial fiscal arrangements and in particular the major transfers to two provinces.

I listened today to some figures that were thrown out by the opposition parties. I am not sure where they got the figures or what inflation rate they were basing their figures on. We heard a wide range of figures thrown around today all of which are hypothetical and all of which are added or subtracted. They are primarily added or embellished on by the opposition. We are not sure where the accuracy of them can be found.

Today the federal government provides about $37 billion in financial support to provincial governments. There are three major transfer programs. The Established Programs Financing or EPF, equalization and the Canada Assistance Plan referred to as CAP. They account for over 90 per cent of all federal transfers to provinces or more than $34 billion for 1991–92.

That is a lot of money. That is about 20 or 25 per cent of the program spending that goes to the provinces. Bill C–20 which we are debating in third reading helps to bring the growth of federal–provincial transfers into line. I emphasize that it is the growth, not reductions, of these transfers that is being brought into line with the current fiscal realities by introducing limits to the growth of payments under the EPF. I think it is very important to understand that they continue to grow, maybe not at the rate the New Democratic Party or the Liberal Party or even the Conservative Party would like to see. It is especially not at the rate the provinces would like to see but within the fiscal realities that we are dealing with we believe they are realistic.

It is important to note that the government has not touched equalization. Transfers under this program to the less wealthy provinces have been exempted from the budget expenditure controls. Even with the measures proposed in the budget, growth in federal transfers is expected to run at 3.7 per cent annually between 1991–92 and 1995–96. That will be more than the rate of inflation during that period of time if our goals are reached and we believe they will be reached. This is in contrast to three per cent for all federal programs over the same period.

Bill C–20 brings the growth of federal–provincial transfers into line with these current fiscal realities which are much different than they were in the 1960s and the 1970s when our major transfer programs took their present form. Times change. The economy changes and situations change. The federal government has already announced and has started consultations with the provinces and Canadians generally on the reform of the major transfer system. The provinces have requested this. They want to assure funding as well. They are concerned about the system and we want to take a major look at that system. It has been guided by the principles that the new transfer system must be affordable.

It must protect provinces with lesser financial means. It must maintain the vital national public services expected by Canadians while providing accountability to the public.

The fearmongering that has been going on this morning by the New Democratic Party I think is totally unfair and unfounded. There has been screaming and moaning and groaning about our medicare system and how those nasty Tories want to do away with it. What utter nonsense. What poppycock. What socialist baloney. That is absolute nonsense. We have as much concern about the medicare system as anyone does.

An hon. member: We want to bring it into the 21st century.

Mr. McDermid: That is exactly what we want to do. We want to assure that services are provided and that they are affordable. That is what it is all about.

For the New Democratic Party to say that this government is not concerned about medicare is totally false. It is absolutely totally false.

An hon. member: Why are you destroying it?

Mr. McDermid: They were standing up not too long ago blaming the provinces for not spending the money on medicare that they get from the federal government.

That says to me that the federal government is giving the money and the provinces are not spending it on medicare. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot say that we are destroying the medicare system when the provinces are not spending the money they get for medicare on medicare. You cannot have it both ways over there. You just cannot do it. I will not buy the nonsense which is handed out to the Canadian public because it is just not true and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During Question Period today the Speaker took a member of the Liberal Party severely to task for suggesting that something the minister had said was baloney.

This minister has just used precisely the same phrase with reference to comments which my hon. friend from Vancouver has stated. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the minister to withdraw the comment in consistency with the normal parliamentary language which the Speaker has laid out during Question Period today.

Mr. McDermid: I am going to continue with my speech. I was talking about socialist baloney. I did not accuse any individual member of it. I talked about socialist baloney. There is nothing wrong with it.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I am quite prepared to have a vigorous debate with the minister about the values of this particular piece of legislation.

I have asked you for a ruling on it. It does seem to me that if a word is inadmissible according to the Speaker when it comes from the opposition surely that same word when it comes from the government is also inadmissible.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I believe that when the Speaker intervened earlier during today's sitting, it was to remind a member who apparently had interrupted several times. It was because of his behaviour, not because of the term he used, that the Speaker called the House to order. That is why I would prefer to let the debate proceed and again recognize the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization.

• (1600)

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to limit debate in this House and that, of course, is what we are doing. Is that not right?

My hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands is sitting there agreeing with me most vociferously, and I appreciate that very much.

In carrying on I want to talk about the bill which is before us which amends the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act to extend the February 1990 budget's per capita freeze on EPF transfers for a further three years to 1994-95.

However, it has no effect on transfers in the current fiscal year or the next. EPF transfers will continue to grow with population increases in each province. This is the largest single transfer program that the federal government has. It transfers $20 billion in 1991-92 to the provinces. It is provided to all provinces on an equal per capita basis and increases annually with each province's population.

Historically these transfers were made to help the provinces in the area of health care and post-secondary education. However, provinces are able to use these transfers according to their own priorities. That was a decision that was made, as hon. members pointed out today back, I believe, in 1977.

There are a great number of university presidents. There are a great number of those in the health care system who accuse the provinces of not in fact applying the money to those areas for which they were intended. If we go back to that type of thing, I am sure that will be one of the things that will be studied between the provinces and the federal government.

There, of course, has to be an accounting system, a check, and so on and so forth on that type of thing. I believe that when it was changed in 1977 it was done for a very good reason. Because they are examining the transfers, the methods of transfers, tax points versus cash, et cetera, that will be one of the things that will be looked at.

To the critics of the extension of the EPF freeze I want to say this, Mr. Speaker. For decades the Government of Canada has provided large and growing financial support to the provinces. As a matter of fact, while deficits were going up federally some of the provincial governments were balancing out their budgets on what they received from the federal government. I think that is fair to say.

Almost $37 billion in federal transfers are now simply too large to exempt from our expenditure restraint program. If 25 per cent or 30 per cent of your budget is going to the provinces in the form of these transfer payments then they are part of the expense problem of the federal government.

If in fact they are part of the problem, then they have to be part of the solution. I think that goes without saying.

In working to get down our deficit, we have to control these transfers to the provinces in a realistic way. So the transfers are affected. I think many people would agree with that.

I listened to my colleagues from the NDP again today complaining that medicare money was going to fix roads, and for uses by provincial governments other than for what they were intended. That was the claim made today. I have heard that many times from people across this country who are concerned about transfers to the provinces.

If that is the case and if the federal government has to rein in its expenditures, if the Canadian people, the constituents in Brampton, the constituents in Don Mills, the constituents that I meet everywhere, are saying that we have to cut back on expenditures and 30 per cent of expenditures are transfers to the provinces, then they must participate.

At the same time the provinces should cut back on their expenditures as well. They have many areas where they can cut back which would not detrimentally affect medicare or would not detrimentally affect post-secondary education.

They too have a responsibility for trimming the fat from their operations. To give provinces credit, I believe that in the last couple of years most of the provincial governments have realized that and have done that. They have made some tough decisions as well and have started to cut back.

I am concerned about my province of Ontario. I am very concerned about the way it is increasing deficit spending and the problem it is in today. I am very concerned about that. While other provinces are toeing the line, it is giving huge pay increases. At a time when everybody else is toeing the line it is spending money in areas that are questionable. It could trim a lot of fat out of its government as well.

When all other provincial governments are going in one direction, the government of Ontario seems to be going in the opposite direction. I believe it is working at cross purposes for what is trying to be attempted right across this country. We are concerned about that.

Mr. Milliken: You should be.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you. My friend from Kingston and the Islands says we should be concerned about it because they are as well. I understand that.

When meeting with the finance ministers from across Canada, they realize that the deficit is a national problem. They understand that fully. It is not just a federal problem, it is a national problem and all governments must participate in a solution.

We had a meeting the other day with the minister of finance for the province of Ontario and even he is now looking for areas to cut back on. He is privatizing too, which is interesting. An NDP government, a socialist government, is privatizing as well, looking for areas it could sell. I understood it sold the dome the other day.

An hon. member: It gave it away.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): What would you do?

Mr. McDermid: We have the NDP arguing with the Liberals now on this. Maybe I should just sit back and let them go at one another over there. It is wonderful.

As I pointed out, major transfers to the provinces, including both cash and tax transfers will grow on an average of 3.7 per cent per year from 1991–1992 to 1995–1996 and all federal programs will grow by 3.4 per cent.

Let me just point out that these figures have to get on the record because all we hear about are cuts and cutbacks and so on. I want these figures on the record. The equalization payments in 1984–1985 were $14,568,000,000. In 1992–1993, the fiscal year we are coming into, they will be $20,620,000,000, that is from $14.5 billion to $20.6 billion.

In equalization payments it has gone from $5.5 billion to somewhat over $9 billion in that period. The Canada Assistance Plan has gone from $4 billion to $6.6 billion. Other transfers have gone from $2.1 billion to $3 billion. Total transfers have grown from $25.6 to $38.1, that is $38,100,000,000 in 1992–1993. That does not sound like cuts or cutbacks. That sounds like increases and it has been increases. We are limiting those increases to ensure there is a discipline both at the federal and provincial government levels to budget and spend wisely. That is what the people have been telling us in no uncertain terms we should be doing.

I want to talk about provincial health standards for a minute if I can. We heard a lot about that this morning.

Bill C–20 amends the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act with respect to the Canada Health Act.

• (1610)

Currently the federal government can withhold equalization payments from any province which does not comply with national health care standards set out in the Canada Health Act regarding comprehensiveness, accessibility, universality, portability and public administration.

Some have raised a concern that as the growth of the transfers under the EPF is limited, the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing the act might come into question.

Bill C–20 ensures that provinces continue to comply with the Canada Health Act by allowing the federal government for purposes of enforcement to withhold funding, other than EPF cash transfers, to provinces. This action will strengthen the government's ability to uphold the conditions and criteria which govern the national medicare system.

Allow me to comment on the alleged vulnerability of this provision to a court challenge. The government has received legal advice indicating that the federal spending power is upheld by the Supreme Court recently in the CAP reference decision and it allows the government to attach conditions to the moneys it transfers to the provinces. These conditions can touch on areas in which the government would not otherwise be able to legislate.

My hon. friend from Timmins commented today that Bill C–20 amends the Unemployment Insurance Act, provides for increases in UI premiums to ensure the health and stability of the unemployment insurance program. This action will avoid the need for much higher increases later to bring the UI account back into balance. It will also prevent debt problems from building up in the UI fund.

Premium rates were set in 1989 for a three year period beginning in 1980 on the basis of economic conditions expected at that time. Economic and labour market conditions have, however, deteriorated greatly, we all know that. Under the old rate of contributions, the unemployment insurance fund would move from a surplus at the end of 1990 to a deficit of $6 billion by the end of 1992 because of higher than expected benefit payments.

This would seriously jeopardize the financial integrity of this self–financed program and damage the federal government's fiscal position. An accumulation of debt in the UI account has the same effects as the build up of other federal debts. We have seen the consequences of borrowing today and imposing a burden on the future. God knows we are dealing with that now and it is difficult to do.

Responsible stewardship requires that we take the necessary steps to ensure the UI fund remains self–financing. I know we are all getting representations on the UI payments and how difficult they are but it reminds me of the old commercial we saw on television not too long ago: "You can pay me now or you can pay me later." The trouble with paying later is that debt grows larger and larger and you pay more and more.

People have told us all along that we should pay as we go. Some people are suggesting legislation forcing a government to have a balanced budget every three years. That would be an interesting piece of legislation and more interesting to try and make it work, especially in this period when we have such a huge debt, but that is what we are heading toward. We are heading toward a budget in which by 1995 we will no longer be borrowing from the public and will be able to start paying back some of the debt that this government and other governments have accumulated over the last number of years.

Another act that is amended by Bill C–20 is the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. This act provides for the transfer to the provinces of 95 per cent of the federal income tax collected from privately owned electric and gas utilities. These were frozen in the 1990 budget, and given the current economic circumstances, the government cannot afford to resume increasing payments under this program and so this freeze is being extended a further four years.

In times of economic difficulty, Canadians expect the government and its officials to bear their share of restraint and in particular politicians must demonstrate leadership and resolve in helping the country through this difficult period.

Bill C–20 originally sought to restrain the salaries of members of Parliament and senators as promised in the February budget. However, these measures were implemented by Bill C–29 and the clauses dealing with the issue have been deleted in committee. Members of Parliament, senators, members of cabinet and the Prime Minister have an absolute freeze on their salaries for a year and then will follow along with the civil service increases up to 3 per cent depending on the conditions.

None of these measures compromise or will compromise our consistent standards for health and social programs. Rather these measures ensure that we have a strong economy and will be able to afford these programs in the future.

I listened to an individual today from the Liberal Party, I think from Mississauga East, stand up and say: "Let us forget about the fight against inflation. Do not worry about inflation. Let us go back and help those most in need".

I am going to tell you inflation hurts the poor and the people on fixed incomes and those people going to food banks more than than it hurts anyone else in society. Getting inflation down and keeping it down is so important to those people. Despite her suggestion that we give up the fight, we are not going to. We must continue to fight inflation and to reach the realistic goals that have been set by the Government of Canada. I believe that we have a balanced and prudent way to ensure that the deficit this year does not increase over last year. It is tough in the economic period we are going through with the recession and coming out of it, albeit slowly. We do see light at the end of the tunnel.

These measures combined with the economic recovery and the lower interest rates will push our deficit down sharply. In 1992 we are forecasting that the deficit will be in the $25 billion range. That is the lowest it has been in 10 years. By 1995 we will have eliminated the need, as I say, for any new government borrowing on financial markets. That is the first time that has happened in this country in 25 years.

During the recession of 1981–82 the government of the day chose a different path. It allowed the deficit to balloon in that two year period by $23 billion to a total of about $38.5 billion. This burden of debt that all Canadians have inherited—we all have to pay for it and those who are unborn will have to pay for part of it as well—has made the legislation before us today so necessary.

The federal deficit as I said earlier and the debt load are national problems. As they are national problems, they require national solutions. Provinces have benefited greatly by this federal support in the past and by contributing to restraint I believe that they will also reap the benefits by lower inflation, lower interest rates and economic recovery.

Restraint measures in Bill C–20 are an integral part of the government's plan for economic recovery. That plan is designed to restore strong continuing economic growth to create the conditions for renewed prosperity and in the interest of all Canadians I urge members of this House to support Bill C–20 on third reading.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could seek the unanimous consent of the House to ask the minister a short question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York West—Airports; the hon. member for Skeena—Fisheries; the hon. member for Halifax—Port of Halifax; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Manufacturing industry; and the hon. member for St. Boniface—Education.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for addressing the House and explaining why the government is presenting Bill C–20.

• (1620)

When I was listening to him I was reminded of a book I recently started to read by a professor in the United States, Albert Hirschman. It is called The Rhetoric of Reaction, and the subtitle is perversity, futility and jeopardy.

He begins his book with an interesting question: "How does a person get to be that way?" Then he says: "It struck me that this question is at the heart of our times, about the massive, stubborn, exasperating troubles people have in a democratic society".

I would like to just share with the House a short few sentences from this book because I think it sets the tone for what is happening between the government and the people of Canada:

"The unsettling experience of being shut off, not just from the opinions but from the entire life experience of large numbers of one's contemporaries, is actually typical of modern democratic societies."

"In these days of universal celebration of the democratic model, it may be childish to dwell on deficiencies in the functioning of western democracy. It is precisely the spectacular and the exhilarating crumbling of certain walls that calls attention to those that remain intact or to risks that deepen."

"Among them, there is one that can frequently be found in the more advanced democracies: The systematic lack of communication between groups of citizens".

I think the story of Bill C–20 is a parable of a government that has become removed from its citizens, a government that is unable to listen and unable to change its opinion. Our government started out in denial with Bill C–69 and it is in continual denial through each budget until we are faced with this legislation which is one more nail in the coffin of Canada's beloved social health and education programs.

This is not the first time this has been raised with the government. This is not the first time questions have been asked. To go back to the debates of June 4, 1991 in Question Period when the same minister was asked about the impact of cutbacks as pointed out by the National Council on Welfare, he denied that there would be any trouble.

He said: "I guess the first thing we can do to help the poor of this country is to get the deficit down". What did we hear today? On the same question, the Prime Minister was asked: "What about the indications that Quebec will get no transfer cash in five years?"

The Prime Minister, instead of acknowledging that it will be one of the major problems facing Canadian Confederation in the next while, stood up and said: "That statement is inaccurate and my hon. friend will see the numbers mentioned today are not at all justified by government projections".

We are seeing just the opposite. We are seeing one battle after another in which the same issues are raised with the government and the same denials are given. In the meantime, the country waivers in its confidence, loses its direction, loses the ability to finance its programs, loses its commitment among friends and is gradually becoming unravelled.

Each and every one of us in this House has the responsibility not to pull it apart, but to pull this government together.

Bill C-20 is the continuation of the strategy of using the stick. It takes advantage of the regulations, along with Bill C-32 and takes advantage of the Supreme Court decision to further the capping of the Canada Assistance Program, the EPF, and as well it extends federal authority to many other jurisdictions in order to ensure that if the federal government does not have the cash, it still has a say in the furthering of the health program.

I was listening very closely to the debate this morning. I share with most members of this House a concern for the future of medicare. Medicare will be the litmus test of this whole country in the 1990s. Whether we were able to finance it properly, reform it and keep it going, these will be the measures that people will use with their politicians.

In furthering the goal of protecting medicare, we cannot walk away from the other people in the system who have become dependent, and rightly so, on the federal presence. There are a number of programs which I will return to in a minute which should not be put in jeopardy because the government refuses to finance medicare properly.

If, as the minister seemed to be insinuating in his comments, the provinces are not spending the money wisely, that is an issue that this government has had seven years to raise with the provinces. To feel that the only way to teach the provinces a lesson is to use a stick against them is a failure of communication, a failure of political will and a failure to develop a tax system which people contribute to willingly because they see an objective at the end.

For these reasons I think the government's strategy has been incorrect and it is one that we oppose very strenuously.

Another part of the denial of the government is whether our system has deteriorated since 1984. If the minister had the opportunity during his busy schedule to listen to the groups that made presentations to the committee on finance, he would have seen just how many groups are unanimous in their feeling that conditions have deteriorated.

One of the more influential reports on health and social programs was just released last week and is entitled Unequal Futures: The Legacies of Child Poverty in Canada. The authors represent some very important groups, particularly in the Toronto region, such as the Child Poverty Action group, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, and also from institutions such as Ryerson and York University which have a long tradition of working in the area of social policy.

This document is a series of condemnations of this government. It points out the limits of promoting equal opportunities through education, which is now part of our system as a result of cutbacks. It says also that it is widely believed in Canada "that education offers poor children the chance to overcome the limitations of their family background, having been born in poverty third gender, having been born female and their race belonging to a minority group".

Education is seen as the most important equalizer of life chances. I challenge the government to show us in this debate one indication that Bill C-20 contributes positively to the education system in our country, either at the post-secondary level or other at levels that require commitments to English as a second language and to other indicators.

It goes on to talk about the erosion of social policies which support Canadian families. Fighting inflation "with high interest rates is driving more people into unemployment and companies into bankruptcy. Unemployment is a major cause of child and family poverty in Canada. It hits families harder than inflation".

In other words, the strategy is focused on the wrong objectives. The strategy should not be focused on inflation. The strategy should be focused on full employment. Every group in the country agrees except this government which pursues the strategy which is so distinct from the needs and the desires of Canadians that it is totally rejected by every indicator known in the country.

Whether we want to talk about the easy indicator of polls or whether we want to talk about the more serious ones of people marching in the streets, no one wants to deal with this government any longer.

"The abandonment of a public policy commitment to full employment and adequate minimum wage protection has been accompanied in recent years with this concerted attack on social programs and more seriously on fundamental principles which have reflected the underlying social solidarity among Canadians for decades".

Take minimum wage. Right now federal jurisdiction has the lowest minimum wage in the country. In response to a question from this side of the House, the Minister of Labour responded several months ago that it was a concern, he was looking into it and he would be right back to us. Those people are working under the government's jurisdiction and the government thinks that $5 an hour is a good sum of money. They are still waiting for word.

Probably another year will pass before we have an adequate minimum wage under federal jurisdiction because this government still wants to deny its responsibility for helping families. Forget about the people who for whatever reason are on welfare. Let us talk about people who are working. They are working for $5 an hour and this government does not have one minute for them. It cannot find the wherewithal after several years of governing to recognize what it is to work 40 hours a week for $200. It is not right to have a government say: "We are thinking about changing your wage, maybe we will move it up a dime or fifteen cents". Under what circumstances are Canadians to take government seriously concerning their welfare? Under no circumstances.

This report also points out the degree to which this government has shifted the burden of taxation to lower and middle income individuals and families. "In Canada, the overhaul effect of the tax system is regressive because of the shift from corporate to personal income taxes and the excessive use of consumption taxes which hit lower income families the hardest".

You can imagine that as more of an indictment of a government which talked tax reform when it came in, which has produced a series of budgets and at no time has it addressed the fundamental shift of tax burden to the middle income families. Then we heard there were rumblings from the Tories backbenchers. They want to have a tax cutback.

Welcome to the real world. Where were you when your ministers were forming the budgets for the last six years? Why did you not raise then that people were getting overtaxed? Now that we have a crisis and we have poor who need help, the very people we depend upon for their good will and their tax dollars are saying: "We are fed up". They are fed up because you guys blew it and the whole country is paying the price for it.

It is in this context that we came to deal with Bill C-20 in the finance committee. I must, before I leave the overview of the Canadian economy, just spend one more moment talking about the impact of present government legislation on the health care system in this country.

I know this has been talked about but I want to talk about a specific angle. One of the many food banks in this country is Winnipeg Harvest, which has been active for several years and is having such difficulty from time to time in Winnipeg that it is running out of food. We all know the statistics about food banks. It is raised in Question Period regularly, to no avail. We know that in the research presented to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance by Professor Moscovitch of Carleton University of the 900,000 people on welfare in Ontario, the so-called gem, the cornerstone of our economy, over 400,000 of those are young people. You have to stop and think about what that means and how many of our cities are desperately trying to deal with thousands of people trying to get fed.

Concerning nutrition, 6 per cent of the babies in Canada have low birth weights, which is a major contributor to developmental disabilities. Low birth rate is inversely related to income status. A 10-year study on the effects of improving the diets of poor women examined the effects of supplementary food on a large group of pregnant women. On average their diet was supplemented by only 530 calories, including 32 grams of protein. The babies born to these women have the same current prenatal and premature death rate as babies born to richer families, and were significantly more healthy than other babies born in public clinics and previous babies born to the same mothers. In other words, it is nickels and dimes as the world goes to save these babies and to give them a good start in life.

The child mortality rate is twice as high among poor families as among families at the highest income levels.

I could go on and give a number of statistics this way, but all it does is demoralize me and I am sure it demoralizes the many members of the House who are interested in this issue. What we are trying to do is create a new climate in this country in which people can debate with us and can talk with us because they know that we understand their insecurities and their uncertainties.

Certainly all the time I was growing up, and I am sure I speak for other members of the House, Canadians never thought they would see the day when people in other countries would talk about children dying in this country because of malnutrition. Any of us who are familiar with the reserve life in this country would know that that it is a daily reality. Those of us who see inner city hospitals such as the ones in downtown Winnipeg know just how tenuous life is for many young children. These conditions, for which they are not responsible, unless we step in they will never be able to change.

It is interesting when you go to projects in the inner city. I was at one on Saturday and it reminded me of just how little we know about the country. Here were people so pleased to be able to play a hockey game and have a place to change their skates and to have a hot dog. It is not fancy. What we are doing here is forgetting some of the basics as to what people need to have a good life. We have to get back to recognizing that unless people have those basics, their lives will crumble around them.

One of the more influential studies that came out on health care this summer, in June, was a study done by a Professor Thompson for HEAL, the health action lobby, entitled Federal Support for Health Care: a background paper. I thought this was one of the major studies that should be presented to Parliament because of the number of ways in which the federal government has undermined the program. I quote from Dr. Thompson's report:

> It is clear that the recent federal measures have made it more difficult for the provinces to maintain current levels of insured and non-insured health services, let alone to develop new programs in the areas of disease prevention and health promotion.

Given the minister's remarks of a few minutes ago that he thought the provinces were not spending money appropriately, he may be interested in taking a look at how Professor Thompson came to these conclusions.

The information provided by Professor Thompson on the amount of money being withdrawn from the system is some of the most impressive data I have seen. The estimates concerning the EPF are supported by the HEAL group. If you start with the budget year of 1986-87 and go through to the budget year of 1995-96, the federal budget will have pulled $42 billion out of our social, health and education areas. Think about it, $42 billion being pulled from the system. That is having a devastating effect across the country. On the health side that includes $30 billion and on the post-secondary education side, $12 billion. We wonder why tuition fees are going up. We wonder why universities are not being removed. We wonder why our system is falling apart. We do not talk about the fact that we have just pulled $12 billion out of the system.

On the government side, there is a former university president. If the University of Guelph lost as much money when he was president as it is losing now, I wonder what his comments would have been. I think he would have been pretty upset with the fact that his system—and he is now a minister responsible for it—had made a decision to pull $12 billion out of post-secondary education.

If you look at it by province just in the current year, for example, Newfoundland loses $71 million in health, $29 million in education. Prince Edward Island loses $16 million in health and $7 million in education. Nova Scotia loses $111 million in health and $45 million in education. New Brunswick loses $90 million in health and $37 million in education. Quebec loses $843 million in health and $340 million in education. Ontario—and this is the crisis the Ontario government is going through—loses $1.2 billion in health and $489 million in education. Manitoba loses $136 million in health and $55 million in education. Saskatchewan loses $125 million in health and $50 million in education. Alberta loses $308 million in health and $124 million in education. British Columbia loses $390 million in health and $158 million in education. The Northwest Territories loses—even it does not escape—$6 million in health and $3 million in education. Yukon loses $3 million in health and $1 million in education. That is a total of $4.6 billion being taken out of the system.

Sooner or later this is all going to catch up to us. It is up to us as parliamentarians to begin an earnest debate in which we recognize that the time is coming very rapidly toward the end of the system and that we have to fight back now and begin to reform and finance it properly.

The conclusions of this report are worth our consideration:

> The recent reductions in federal support for provincial health and health care programs are a matter of grave concern. These reductions are large and growing, to borrow a phrase from the former Minister of Finance. The $3.3 billion shortfall in respect to health programs in the current year will grow to $4.2 billion next year and to $6.6 billion in 1995-96.
> This problem is compounded by the fact that cash payments in respect of insured health services will begin to disappear in the second half of the decade. The federal government has recognized it will then no longer be able to enforce the program criteria and conditions in the Canada Health Act, and accordingly has indicated that legislation will be introduced to permit withholding of an amount otherwise payable under the programs.

That is the nub of the problem that we are coming to today.

There were several groups that showed up to meet with the Standing Committee on Finance. It should have been a health matter, but it was sent to the Standing Committee on Finance. Each of these groups had a common theme. We do not expect you to open up your cheque book in an unlimited fashion. We know there is no money in the system. We know we have to reform, but quit using the stick. Every time we hear a budget, you are saying less and less. Quit refusing to recognize that we are trying to change things. There are new groups, such as the HEAL group, which is an extension of several important groups in the health area that want to work together. You cannot work together unless the people who are funding the process understand the dilemma and understand that this is not the 1960s, as the minister says, it is not the 1970s. Everybody knows that. That is a cliché.

• (1640)

It does not mean that you have to be mean and miserable to get the results you want. These groups came forward time and time again to say: "Quit doing this to us because we would like very much to participate and to reform this system. We know there is not going to be more money, but if you give us less and less then you are going to miss this opportunity in this window for reform".

The Canadian Federation of Students noted in its brief that it wished Bill C-20 withdrawn so that it could begin meaningful discussions on the future of post-secondary education in Canada. "Enough is enough", it wrote. What could be a clearer message for the government.

The Canadian Federation of Labour wrote: "The continuing freeze in transfer payments will have serious implications for the future of medicare. Medicare is a national program which Canadians hold in the highest esteem. For many Canadians medicare has become much more than a social program, it is a good part to what defines Canada. The erosion of medicare will not only have serious health and financial implications for many Canadians, it will further damage our national identity". This is a clear message to the government.

The Canadian Hospital Association joined in. The Canadian Public Health Association made the same notes when it said that Bill C–20, as a result of the budget, an act to amend the funding of health care, will not be sufficient to prevent the erosion of these principles over time.

The city of Toronto's Department of Public Health stated: "As one of the largest public health departments in Canada, we are responsible for preventing disease and promoting health for approximately 623,000 Toronto residents". It as well argued that Bill C–20 would seriously undermine its ability to deliver health care.

The Concerned Friends of Ontario, citizens in care facilities had the same opinion. End Legislative Poverty had the same opinion against the legislation. Home Support is made up of people who are very much innovative in the process. It stated: "We believe that the freeze in transfer payments in place since 1990 seriously affect the ability of many provincial governments to adequately finance health care services. We also feel that the ongoing reduction in cash transfer payments will undermine the federal government's authority and ability to enforce the standards of the Canada Health Act". Is anybody listening to groups like that?

The Hospital Council of Metropolitan Toronto had a strong statement. The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation said: "The continuing freeze in transfer payments will have serious implications for the future of medicare. Medicare is a national program which Canadians hold in the highest esteem. It will further damage our national identity to end this program".

The Occupational Health Centre in Winnipeg had the same strong viewpoint.

The Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care said: "We believe the potential implications of Bill C–20 to be far more far–reaching than any single piece of legislation to date. All Canadians should have the opportunity to make their voices heard on such an important issue".

The St. Boniface General Hospital wrote in for an opportunity to speak with the same reasons. The Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs also had something to say.

These are not your cry babies, these are not people you would expect to have out at your local neighbourhood meetings when you know you are only going to get social policy groups, these are mainstream organizations which are realizing that the fundamentals of this country are being undermined.

"Canada has a future in which she will be required to be more and more competitive in the world marketplace. Without a work force properly trained in the skills and technology necessary to meet this challenge, we doom our businesses and citizens to an ever increasing downward spiral with ever lower standards of living. As women we are particularly conscious of this fact. The majority of people living below the poverty line in Canada are women and children. Without the necessary funds to ensure that schooling programs are available to continue to teach and upgrade skills and to ensure that financial assistance is available to assist women in benefiting from post–secondary training, we will never be able to break the poverty cycle". Again, this is a clear message to the government.

I would like to use the major part of my speech to address what I consider to be the fundamental flaw in this legislation. This was raised with the government when it tabled its budget in February and raised again subsequently in the debate in the House and in committee and that is the constitutionality of clause 4.

Clause 4 is an effort by the federal government to extend its authority in health care legislation to ensure that the health care system is protected. Nobody in their right mind would say they wanted to undermine the health care system. Since the federal government is conceding that there will be less cash transfers in the system, therefore less leverage it will have with the provincial governments due to cash, it has recognized that it has two choices; either to abandon the field or to extend its authority over the provinces through the back door.

The implication of Bill C–20 is to open up this back door. We object to this back door approach because it makes other groups very vulnerable to the vicissitudes of a government which without cash wants to protect its political base. This government knows that if it is caught in any way, shape or form appearing to undermine medicare that it is "done like dinner". It is one in which it will be totally undermined and in fact will lose its political base in the country.

The government very quietly introduced a piece of legislation which I guess superficially is a good idea. We do not have cash in the health care system, scoop the cash out of other programs and force the provinces to behave just the way you think they should.

Which programs can they scoop out? Let us take a look at this: equalization payments, a total of about $8.4 billion is available to them; territorial financing, about $1 billion is available to them; grants in lieu of taxes, $344 billion is available to them; the public utilities income tax transfer, another $280 million; statutory subsidies, $36 million; the Canada Assistance Plan, that is available to them now, $6.4 billion; crop insurance, $270 million; the formula payments under the official languages and education, $243 million; miscellaneous health and welfare transfers, $170 million; the young offenders services, $158 million; justice transfers, $77 million; transportation transfers to provinces and municipalities, $69 million. All these are now made vulnerable because of this particular strategy of the federal government.

Many groups came to us with the firm belief that this was not only mean spirited but in fact was unconstitutional. We were presented at committee with the legal opinion by a Toronto law firm, Goodman & Carr, that Bill C–20 was vulnerable to constitutional challenge. For one of the few times in the history of the House of Commons, and I would have to ask the Table when they had seen it before, this legal opinion has been appended to the report of the committee to the House so that the minister fully understands that committee members were concerned about the constitutionality of clause 4 and the strategy of taking transfer payments from other programs to protect health care.

The reason for the seriousness with which we approach this is as follows. The law firm points out that Parliament has a capacity to unilaterally alter the terms of a range of existing federal–provincial fiscal arrangements, but the question is can these changes be imposed for the express purpose of supplementing the federal government's dwindling cash contribution to provide health insurance plans and preserving its ability to enforce national standards and health care through the Canada Health Act.

The opinion of the law firm is that as a matter of strict legal principles, they cannot, that Bill C–20 is vulnerable to a constitutional challenge on grounds discussed within its opinion. The question of Bill C–20's vulnerability to constitutional challenge must be answered with reference to the organizing principles of the Canadian state. Canada is a federal state, as they point out. This means that the totality of legislative power theoretically available to the government of any state is shared by two levels of government and that one cannot move into another area without a history of legislation and discussions and laws.

By contrast, it may be argued that to enact legislation such as the Canada Health Act which in addition to providing for the mechanics of the transfer requires provinces to make specified policy choices, that is health insurance plans would be publicly administered on a non–profit basis, is to find indirectly what the federal government cannot do directly due to its lack of legislative competence.

It goes on in this particular decision to point out that there has been a shift in position by the federal government which is very important. This shift is away from voluntarism, which is an argument that a province could choose to pursue different policy objectives from those established by the federal government in the Canada Health Act by simply choosing to forgo the federal cash contribution to its health insurance program.

The national standards established by the act appear very different in the light of Bill C–20, however, compulsory rather than voluntary. In this case if a province chose to exercise its legislative competence and enact legislation which conflicted with the Canada Health Act, the federal government would be entitled to penalize the province by withholding an amount that reflected the gravity of the breach of standards from any moneys owed to the province by the federal government.

Of necessity any sanction imposed under Bill C-20 would exceed the federal government's cash contribution to the province's health insurance program.

In order to relieve itself of the obligation to maintain the national standard established by the Canada Health Act, therefore a province would have to withdraw from every federal-provincial fiscal arrangement involving the transfer of funds from the federal government to the province, an impossible and unrealistic task and practice.

In the view of this law firm the effect of Bill C-20 is to alter the character of a sanction under the Canada Health Act from the withdrawal of a privilege, i.e. access to federal funds to supplement the provincial health care budget to the imposition of fines, i.e. the refusal to transfer federal funds designated for programs other than health care and to which the province is otherwise entitled.

The implication here is that in order to get what they want done and to avoid putting in more cash, to avoid the issues of tax reform, of properly funding Canada's social programs, the cabinet is going to look around to see who is vulnerable, who does not have a political constituency. Is it the poor receiving money on welfare through CAP? Is it the students who need loans? Is it the faculty who need new libraries and proper facilities? Who is vulnerable? Is it the city of Ottawa? Is it the city of Winnipeg? Is it the core area initiative? What is it? What is vulnerable?

Let us show the provinces that we are boss and let us take money from these because we know the provinces will not risk health care to protect these little programs. When the provinces have to choose between maintaining a health program and maintaining a core area initiative, a child care program in some small community, we know what choice they will make because we know where all the fuss is and we are all politicians and we know what people are concerned about. But it is a mean and miserable attitude that has to be drawn to the attention of the Canadian public and we have to form a coalition to stop it.

Our party has a fundamental disagreement with the NDP on this issue and this came out in the committee and in today's debate and the way in which they wish to have the act revised. They avoided discussion on clause 4 today because in committee they acceded that it was better to have clause 4 than not to have it at all.

My argument is that one has to be very careful in acceding to any government, particularly this government with a very right wing agenda, the total authority to arbitrarily choose who is going to be vulnerable and who is going to pay the price for a good health care system.

The payment for a Canadian health care system is both a national and a provincial responsibility. We all benefit from it and as taxpayers, we all contribute to it. As such, it must be maintained in the context of Canada's taxation system in Canadian priorities and health and social legislation as one of our highest priorities.

In answering the health needs of Canadians, we cannot walk away from other needs. It is not as nice to be talking about the needs of poor people and the needs of aboriginal people and nobody really wants to dirty their hands by saying they really need a lot of money, they need a lot of resources. Everyone wants to walk from that.

Our party wants it to be known that we are not going to walk away from this. We are not going to accede to legislation which allows the government to pick and choose who it is going to help and who it is going to hurt in order to maintain a health care system. It is the responsibility of the federal government to organize its house so Canadians feel secure that their health system is protected and at the same time that other groups are not going to be abandoned. Our party is willing to oppose this legislation at every step of the way. In conclusion, I would just like to touch briefly upon another point that I am sure many other members of the House will raise and discuss in more detail, and that is that this bill is the introduction of several what appear to be minor changes to see to the implementation of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Subsequent to the introduction of this legislation, this government has seen the economy tumble even more dramatically than it has tumbled before. In the spring we are going to be faced with perhaps hundreds of thousands of Canadians, without exaggeration, whose UI benefits are running out and who are going to be forced for the first time in their lives to go to welfare.

It does not matter whether we are talking about communities such as Windsor or my own in Winnipeg, or some other communities represented on the other side of the House, Toronto, Prince Edward Island, there will be people who are running out of UI. This government today, in continuing to press for the conclusion of this legislation and seeing it through the House, has again refused to recognize the devastating effects that UI changes are having on Canadians.

Again taxes are being increased through the back door without providing any benefits to the people who are desperately in need. Furthermore, changes to the training component has completely undermined the organization of training among social groups in this country. It is a total abrogation of responsibility for which Canadians are going to hold this government accountable.

In conclusion, I would like to introduce an amendment:

I move:

That the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be not now read a third time, but that the said bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Finance for reconsideration of Clauses 2, 3, 4 and 8.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Speaker will check to see if the motion is in order.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let me first say that the speeches which have been contributed to this debate by both the minister at the start of the debate and by the health critic from the Liberal Party, the member for Winnipeg, are good statements of their political positions. I congratulate both of them for putting those positions well and for putting them with a sense of sincerity and a clearly strong belief they both feel within those positions.

I just want to mention briefly, before moving into my speech, the point made by the health critic from the Liberal Party. I think it is very important for us to deal in the real world in this House. Part of dealing in the real world is to recognize that sometimes provinces will seek to escape obligations which exist under the Canada Health Act. There must be some clear commitment on the part, not of this government which is temporarily in office now, but on the part of Parliament which will adopt or reject this legislation. There must be a clear commitment, a clear signal to all provinces that the Canada Health Act is central to what constitutes our vision of Canada. The accessibility to that system, the portability, the fairness with which that system operates is so crucial that there must be a strong commitment to financial penalties if a province chooses to reject commitments to the Canada Health Act.

• (1700)

The representative from the Liberal Party has suggested that section 4 provides some such penalties. Our view as a party is not necessarily that these are the best protections or that these are the best kinds of penalties to establish.

Within the Canada Health Act as it presently stands there is the capacity to impose certain penalties. It is an act incidentally which was passed by the Liberal Party.

I want to quote to the House from the Canadian Public Health Association which to my mind gave one of the strongest briefs to the finance committee looking at Bill C-20. They said very clearly:

We support clause 4 which reinforces the federal government's role in maintaining fiscal and legislative mechanisms to achieve compliance with national health care standards.

That is what is at the heart of our concern with this entire piece of legislation which is in front of us. We have here something which is fundamentally an attack on the future of the medical care system in this country. It is a system which Canadians across this country are proud of, believe in and want to see survive.

It is an attack as well on the security of funding for the post-secondary education system in this country. It is an attack on small business and on workers in the extra fees imposed for unemployment insurance which are put into place.

Over all it represents not a serious effort to deal with the deficit problem in this country. Instead it is a mechanism by which the deficit problem is transferred to the provinces. It is a mechanism by which the provinces are faced with having to pay the bills which federal governments, both Liberal and Conservative, have failed to pay for the past 15 years in Canada. For that reason our party strongly opposes this piece of legislation.

I want to start out if I could with the prepared points that I wanted to make on some quotations from a previous speaker of the opposition. They were very strong quotations and very powerful positions which were put.

Let me quote from one previous occasion in which there were cutbacks of the sort that were made in this piece of legislation. A Leader of the Opposition at that point said:

> The problem with the medicare system resulting from those cuts arose because the federal government reneged on the commitments it made to the provinces and cut back very drastically on the dollars it sent to the provinces who are charged with administering and paying for medicare.

This same Leader of the Opposition went on to say that his party was: "in favour of quality medicare, universal medicare delivered to our citizens". "The problem," he said, "has arisen because of a unilateral and arbitrary cutback by the federal government to the provinces who are charged with footing the bill". That is the problem. That same Leader of the Opposition went on to say that his government, if it was elected, would restore the original 50/50 split in medicare costs between the federal and provincial governments if elected to office.

Members here in the House may wonder who this opposition leader was. Was it the member for Vancouver Quadra attacking previous Conservative budgets? Was it perhaps the Leader of the Opposition who presently sits in the House as Leader of the Liberal Party? Was it perhaps my colleague from the city of Windsor at the time that he was Leader of the Opposition for the Liberal Party?

No, those commitments and those criticisms came from the Leader of the Opposition who is now Prime Minister of this country. The Prime Minister before he was elected said the problem was: "the unilateral and arbitrary attacks by the federal government on the provinces". He promised to restore the 50/50 split in medicare costs. That particular quote comes from The Ottawa Citizen of August 24, 1983. The previous quote was from the Vancouver Sun of August 8, 1983. This was during the course of a campaign across the country on the medicare issue.

Yet what do we see from this government? We have seen four straight attacks of exactly the same kind that this Prime Minister criticized in opposition. These were attacks which arbitrarily and unilaterally cut back the transfers to the provinces and laid that deficit load on the backs of those provinces.

The judgment has come in to the finance committee from dozens of groups across this country as to the effects of this approach. Some of the presentations have been quoted by the previous speaker for the Liberal Party. Let me quote a few more.

We can quote from the Canadian Federation of Students that stresses:

> The effects of Bill C–20 and its predecessors must be considered in the context of a long list of government initiatives which are affecting students. Two years ago the government began privatization of Canada's student loans program. This year there is a 3 per cent tax on student loans, an application of the goods and services tax to students' books and closure of the Canada Employment Centres on campuses across the country.

Students in post–secondary education have been hit extremely hard.

The Public Health Association has indicated and provided its judgment to the committee. It is one of the most respected groups across this country. It said:

> The position of the Canadian Public Health Association is that unilateral funding cutbacks to medicare are not the only, nor even the most effective way for the federal government to address financial restraint issues.

Let me quote what the the Hospital Employees Union said to the committee:

> For many Canadians medicare has become much more than a social program. It is a good part of what defines Canada. The erosion of medicare will not only have serious health and financial implications for many Canadians it will further damage our national identity".

Let me quote from the Canadian Medical Association which is perhaps the most critical of all. Here is a group that you would have thought the federal government would have at least consulted before going at the gutting of our medicare program. It did not even consult them. No discussions took place whatsoever with that group of people charged with perhaps the highest responsibility in the medical care system. What is the judgment of the doctors of this country of this government and what it is doing to medicare? What is clear to the CMA and the health community at large is the changes in EPF transfers including this proposed extension of the freeze have destabilized the system and its capacity to continue to provide high quality health care services to all Canadians.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if we as a House can accept an approach which even flies in the face of the strongest possible recommendations of the doctors on whom we depend to run our medical care system. We could talk about nurses as well. They said in their brief to the committee that Bill C–20 represents the fourth successive attempt by the government to limit the federal role in medicare. The effect of these changes is set out in tables that they gave to the committee which indicate that the government since 1985, when it took its first step against these transfers to the provinces, has saved over $42 billion. The great bulk of that was $30 billion in savings in the health area.

That tells us in graphic detail the way in which this government has transferred its obligations, its responsibilities and its promises to the backs of the provinces. Consequently there have been provinces across this country that have been terribly hard hit. Some have been able to keep the medical care system basically going. But others have essentially had to break their commitments under the medical care system in this country.

British Columbia for instance raised its premiums. Annual family coverage in British Columbia costs $840. Manitoba significantly reduced its dental and hearing coverage for children and has introduced a $50 user fee for northern residents who travel south for elective surgery. Nova Scotia has reduced its dental coverage for children and its drug coverage for seniors and the poor. Saskatchewan has made its seniors pay 25 per cent of prescription drug costs and made nursing home residents pay for their medication. It has also raised home care fees by 15 per cent. Newfoundland under the Liberals has closed 360 acute care beds and laid off 1,500 health care workers. Quebec has proposed a $5 user charge for the "frivolous" use of hospital emergency wards. Alberta has closed two community health centres, raised medicare premiums by 13 per cent and forced seniors to pay 25 per cent of the cost of canes, wheelchairs, walkers and other medically related items. That is what has happened as a consequence of what was $42 billion in savings. It has not just somehow disappeared. It has gone into provincial deficits. It has been passed on in terms of increased expenditures which people have had to put across to get basic medical care coverage in this country.

The answer is not to be complacent about the medical care system. We have to be concerned about the cost of medicare. In fact we had presented to us from the Canadian Co–Operative Association a whole set of recommendations and ways in which to move toward reform of medicare: less institutionalization of older Canadians, less ordering of unnecessary tests, more use of community clinics, more careful prescribing of drugs. A great many things can take place. There has to be that reform.

We heard from every group that spoke to the finance committee that to deal with the escalation of health costs, to make these reforms, these changes which will make the health care system even more efficient than it is at the moment, we have to provide some latitude. We cannot squeeze and squeeze and squeeze. We cannot bankrupt the health care system in this country by the freeze being extended for a further three years on EPF transfers.

The same thing will be discussed by some of my colleagues with respect to the UI changes that hurt small business and workers and the post–secondary education problems created by this bill. But the biggest threat this legislation represents is the threat to something all Canadians hold dear, and that is the threat to medicare. We are going to fight as hard as we can in the House and outside the House to prevent this threat to medicare from being carried through.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am ready to rule that the motion tabled by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is in order.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care and considerable interest to the remarks made by my colleague from Essex. It is manifestly clear to us in the New Democratic Party that Bill C–20 and the extension of the freeze on the EPF envelope is just further evidence that the government wants health care programs and education at the post–secondary level to fall more and more within the purview of the corporate agenda or the marketplace and less and less as a component of social policy in this country.

As the minister knows or should know, one of the great characteristics of our country in contrast to the United States, for example, is that we did have a social policy in this country that set us apart, that made us a kinder and more gentle society and a more caring society. This bill certainly takes away from that social approach established in this country some 40 years ago and which, I am very proud to say, my party has had a considerable impact on and influence over.

I have a question for my colleague from Essex. I would like to ask him, having listened to his remarks with respect to Bill C-20 and its impact on Canada as a whole and on the national economy in general, how this bill and its provisions will impact on his constituency and on the region he represents.

• (1720)

I am speaking now of the Windsor region and the rural area as well around Windsor. It is an area very similar to my own, the federal riding of Brant that has been very, very devastated by this recession as it was in the early 1980s. Certainly this time the impact has gone even further and deeper.

I would like to ask my friend and colleague how this bill affects his constituency and the region of Windsor where he comes from?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Brant for the comments and for the question.

One thing it is important to say with respect to some of the comments my friend made is that we perhaps do not understand in this country just how much better our medical care system is than that in the United States.

I wanted to add to the record a quotation which I was not able to include in my speech from the National Federation of Nurses Unions which was reporting with respect to this question. It indicated in the following in its brief: "A recent study comparing Massachusetts and Manitoba found that in nine of eleven surgical procedures Manitoba residents had lower mortalities than patients in the Massachusetts hospitals. In comparison to the United States, Canadian mortality and life expectancy rates also confirmed that Canadians had superior health status". We are talking about a system that really has a fine record, but a system which is under terrible strain.

I certainly can see it in my constituency. The strain is very much there with respect to the hospitals in my community. It is seen not just in problems of beds having to be shut down because of cost pressures. It is seen in the queuing which is having to take place. It is seen in people in fact having to go across the border to the United States in order to have heart problems looked after, for instance. This is something which certainly should not be taking place in our country. We have tremendously skilled medical practitioners. Oftentimes we have the facilities, but the facilities are not operative because of the cost squeeze imposed upon them by these $30 billion worth of cuts since 1985 that the federal government has put into effect. These cuts will get worse.

In my community people look to their health care system as something which is a tremendous advantage that they share compared to their counterparts in the United States just across the river, but they also see the strain starting to grow. I hope for the sake of them, their health and for all of us in our country, that people in Canada will realize this legislation is just one more step in threatening the medical care system of this country.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have one final comment and question. It seems to me that the more we damage the medicare system in this country with cutbacks or freezes, the greater the negative impact that will have on those forces in the United States looking to us and to our medicare system as a solution to their privately funded medical system.

I have talked to American congressmen recently who said: "We are looking to you to show the way". These are Liberal Democrats, of course, and some of them are actually Republicans as well who usually represent constituencies within large cities where there is a lot of poverty.

I would like to ask my colleague from Essex whether or not he sees this damaging of our medicare in Canada because of these negative funding techniques the federal government is putting into place as setting back the progressive forces in the United States trying to bring on stream a government sponsored medicare system in that country.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very good point.

The finance committee recently made a trip to Washington to look at the question of how to deal with the deficit. Interestingly we were told by many of the government people whom we met there that in the United States it is being recognized increasingly that to deal with the problems they face, the ballooning costs of their system which are far, far greater than our system and escalating far faster, they are going to have to move to some kind of public medicare system.

It is being strongly opposed by some special interest groups, especially some of the private hospitals. I think if we in this country do not safeguard the system we have in Canada, such a superb system that it is but feeling the strains as I say, we make it much more difficult for those in the debate in the United States.

Their opponents will be able to look to Canada and see the problems in Canada. They will see the strains in Canada in our medicare system and say: "This is something that just comes with the public health care system as opposed to what it really is: something which comes with irresponsible funding provisions from a federal government to that public system".

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak in opposition to Bill C-20 put forward by the government.

I must begin by saying that I listened to the previous speech of the member from Essex—Windsor. I agreed with nearly everything that New Democratic Party member said. I hope the member can take his words today and pass them on to his friends at Queen's Park in the province of Ontario where I come from, because I like him share the view that the Canada Health Act is central to our vision of Canada. Any effort to dismantle or cut back in the maintenance and preservation of our health care system is really weakening the basic value system of this country.

I realize that the province of Ontario is in a very difficult position here. From the beginning of this Health Act, this has been a national government initiative. It has always been the national government that has taken the lead in terms of our national health care system.

Quite frankly, during the last election in my particular community one of the reasons that I was concerned about the Meech Lake Accord was the fact that the national standards of national institutions were in jeopardy.

• (1730)

A lot of us could see and sense that this approach of the current government of pushing things off on to the provinces was going to break these national services down.

Those of us who had concerns and who wanted amendments to Meech Lake were not anti-Quebec, but we could see in this document areas that were vulnerable. I believe this is a prime example where the national government is risking something that is core, something that is fundamental to the value system of this country. The value system I am referring to is one of Canada being a nation that is caring and compassionate. We have always exemplified that through the maintenance of our national health care system, with national standards that ensured every region of this country and every citizen of this country had access to universal medicare.

I listened earlier this evening to the minister responsible for privatization. He said that last week they listened to some experts when they were doing some pre-budget consultations in Toronto. These experts were telling the government that it was right on track, just keep going the way it was going, it was right on track. I have to say that I would like to know who these experts are and what track they are on.

I see the member here today from Don Valley East who I know is concerned about this issue because in his riding, and I share with him the responsibility, is the East General Hospital. The East General Hospital, which is one of the largest hospitals in downtown Toronto, is currently suffering from low morale. It is incredibly difficult for the professionals there to maintain the quality service that has built their reputation. It is primarily driven because of the lack of budget, the lack of resources to give the kind of professional service that has always been a standard in this country and which has always made us so unique.

As some members said earlier, people come from all over the world to study our medicare system. Right at the time when other countries want to convert to our system, we seem to be tampering with a process that is leading to it being undermined, which ultimately could lead to a second-class, second-rate system.

Therefore, I think it is very important that we focus on this issue. Our medicare system is something that has galvanized us as a country. It is something that has always given us great pride. It seems to me that whenever this government is faced with the arguments of fiscal responsibility, its immediate action is just to automatically cut, cut, cut.

I do not think the people of Canada will ever forget this government's use of that approach with our national medicare system. I do not think those of us who are in this House today would be forgiven if we allowed this legislation to go through without challenging it.

It is not as if there is a void of ideas as to how we can maybe improve the process of handling our medicare system.

I met a gentleman just three weeks ago, Dr. Michael Rachlis. I did not meet his co-author, Carol Kushner. They wrote a book called Second Opinion. I recommend it to anyone that is involved in the health care system in this country. It speaks about what is wrong with Canada's health care system and how to fix it. He details not just what some of the problems are with our health care system, but he is also providing all kinds of constructive ideas and solutions where we may be able to improve our medicare system without tampering or cutting back on the universal access and service.

He is talking about numbers where we could save anywhere from $8 billion to $16 billion if a proper review and a proper redistribution of the health care system was looked at. I am not saying that I agree with every aspect of all of his recommendations.

There are professionals who have devoted their lives to the medicare system in this country and it is incumbent on us before we take this approach of slashing and cutting back to pick their brains and to use their ideas and try some of these things.

The morale in the health care system today is very low. We are capping doctors. We are turning them into bureaucrats. We are not respecting their entrepreneurial skills. Some of these doctors want to work harder and work longer. They understand that this is a profession that is almost a vocation and yet at the same time, we are stifling them. We are bureaucratizing them in the name of fiscal responsibility.

It is time that we used the creative process in looking at this medicare system because the people of Canada are looking for us to come up with some answers in this House other than cut, cut, cut. The morale of this country, because of this word cut, has never been as low. There are alternatives.

The very last institution in this country that we should be tampering with is our health care system. As a New Democratic Party member said earlier today, it is central to the vision that we have all had and want to continue to have in this country and any attempt to alter or change that is a regressive step that is not going to fare well.

I plead with government members opposite and other members to stand up and oppose this government on this bill. Let us send this legislation back and cut off this thinking that we can tamper with our health care system, which is only going to lead to a further deterioration of the already low morale that exists in this country.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my hon. friend on a forthright and to the point good presentation.

Mr. Milliken: As usual.

Mr. Mifflin: As usual. I know of his genuine concern for our national health care system and the difficult position that our doctors and our nurses and our health care system are getting into, reducing the number of hospital beds and all that sort of thing. It is being faced by all of us. I am sure it is not much different in Toronto from what it is in my riding and indeed all of Newfoundland and Labrador where people are now feeling the pinch. The money is not there, the doctors are worried , the health care boards are worried, hospitals are actually being closed and the number of beds have been reduced.

There is another aspect I am sure the hon member would like to comment on. Unemployment is pretty bad in Toronto right now. It used to be that people from my riding, where traditionally unemployment has been high, would leave for Toronto and indeed the hon. member's riding. Indeed, in the hon. member's riding I think he has a considerable number of people from Newfoundland and Labrador and indeed from my riding. I met a few of them when I was up there a few years ago. It was a real pleasure to meet them. They cannot leave Newfoundland and go to Toronto any more because there is no work in Toronto.

• (1740)

I am sure that the hon. member has discussed this with his constituents. It is a major concern of those of us on this side of the House. I am referring to the way that the government has treated unemployment insurance. Every single promise it made on this particular sensitive issue has been broken.

Just two weeks ago we spoke in the House, the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur and others, on ways that we could be more sensitive, or at least the government could be more sensitive, in recognizing those people who had to serve on juries to have their claims honoured. I still do not understand why the government will not go along with that.

I am concerned about a very sensitive issue in the sense of promises that have been made by the Minister of Finance who, when he introduced his budget, said they would look after any further deficits in the unemployment insurance fund.

In the relatively short time that the hon. member and I have been in politics, the employee cost has gone from $1.95 to $3. That is a 60 per cent increase. It does not sound like very much when you say it, $1.95 to $3, but that is for every $100 of earnings.

For the employer who pays roughly 40 per cent more, it has gone from $2.73 to $4.20. The government is not paying anything. It used to pay 31 per cent. It does not pay that any more.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he is getting any flack in his riding on this broken promise of not to increase the fees and not to change it—indeed before the last election nothing would change in unemployment insurance—how it is affecting his constituents and what he is telling them that the government might want to do next.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. This government through its crazy tax designs has basically broken the morale of entrepreneurship in this country. In the process of doing that it has basically caused an unemployment rate that is scary in this country today.

What we have is a situation right now where those who are unemployed do not see any hope and even those who are employed are nervous that tomorrow or next week their jobs could be in jeopardy.

What is doubly crippling about this whole phenomenon is that the government continues through a litany of small taxes like this unemployment insurance tax to load up the few businesses that are left fighting to stay alive, fighting to get through the worst recession probably in the history of this country.

I just cannot understand where the government is coming from. I have said it in this House before. I would rather have an extra two, three or four billion dollars on the deficit and have those 1.5 million people working than have a $30-odd billion deficit and have almost 2 million people not working, not paying tax, who have to be supported by the few that are working.

I think this government's system and attitude toward the UI fund, the UI premiums is once against short-sighted. It says it listens to the experts who are telling it they are on track. I come from the same area as the minister of privatization and I cannot find any of these experts who say the government is on track. I cannot find any experts even from Midland, or Penetang, who are saying that this government is on track.

I think this is just another example where the government has basically thrown this line out that it maybe met someone in some sort of casual meeting and maybe somebody casually said it was on track. It is not listening to a majority of Canadians.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the colleague who has just spoken, the member for Broadview—Greenwood, mentioned unemployment in the context of the debt and the deficit. I wonder if he has given any consideration and might have any comments on the extent to which reducing unemployment, in fact investing in getting people back to work, would actually assist with reduction of the debt and deficit.

It seems to me that with the large number of people not working, not earning income, therefore, not paying taxes and in fact receiving either unemployment insurance, welfare payments or other assistance they need to get through this, in fact every person in Canada who is not working is contributing directly to the debt or the deficit, that one of the quickest ways to get rid of the deficit is to have that 10 per cent of Canadians out there working, earning income, creating jobs for other Canadians with the goods and services they are purchasing and paying taxes rather than being in the unenviable position of relying on others for support.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa West is so accurate when she focuses on the fact that full unemployment is obviously going to make a massive difference in the UI draw on this government Treasury. The forecast this year is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $16 billion, $17 billion or $18 billion.

I personally cannot understand why the government would not prefer to take a little bit of a leap of faith and put some program money, some capital expenditure money, on the table and have that force working where it obviously is going to move off the unemployment insurance draw and into a position where they are going to become active taxpayers.

This dismantling program, this cut, cut, cut and drive inflation right under the table, I cannot believe that the Bank of Canada is using a contemporary model for calculating inflation. I cannot find inflation anywhere in Toronto.

We met some farmers from western Canada last week and there is no inflation in western Canada. When are we going to stop playing this sort of gymnastic game on inflation and start realizing that there is a little bit of slack left and let us try to put people back to work.

Let us put people back to work. Let us make them taxpayers again and that will address the government's deficit problem a lot more quickly than this cut, cut, cut, demoralize the country program.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for again giving me an opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C-20, a Conservative measure aimed at inflicting hardship on this unfortunate country of ours.

Considering the scope and consequences of this bill, I have no choice but to express my apprehension. This legislation will undermine our education programs, medicare and social programs which have become the hallmark of this country. And the government has the impertinence to do this on the sly, with a bill that seems so harmless and technical, it could go almost unnoticed.

Unfortunately, by introducing such regressive legislation, the government contributes to the erosion of the social fabric of our country. One would think the Conservatives had signed an unconditional surrender and were abandoning Canada to its fate.

• (1750)

As far as federal-provincial relations are concerned, this bill gives notice that the government refuses to be actively involved in developing measures that would help rally people from all regions behind the Canadian flag.

How can a national government be so ruthlessly intent on reducing Canada to an empty shell? Instead of running this country in a responsible way and considering the needs of all citizens, the government is intent on balancing its budget, reducing spending in terms of our national debt and reducing the deficit at the expense of Canadian citizens. The government is using the deficit as an excuse. It has chosen to ignore the cost of the social deficit. It has abdicated its responsibilities.

Therefore, it does nothing to build the country, bring people together and ensure that all Canadians feel that they can benefit from belonging to our country. Since 1977, the federal government has contributed to health and higher education with tax transfers and cash payments.

Federal support for health and post-secondary education was to keep up with total economic growth every year. Unfortunately, since 1986, this support has been reduced, as a result of a series of decisions made by the Conservative government on the pretext of reducing the deficit. According to the report released by the National Council of Welfare last spring, if this trend continues, federal cash payments for health and higher education under the 1977 fiscal arrangements will completely disappear in a few years.

Furthermore, if federal support declines any more, as I said when this measure was debated last spring, Canada will have 12 different provincial and territorial plans, instead of the health insurance plan that we know, which varies little across the country.

If the system breaks up, we will very likely see several regions again allowing extra billing and charging hospital user fees, which the 1984 Canada Health Act almost completely eliminated.

Bill C-20 could have an effect on health care, child care, welfare benefits, income tax, grants in lieu of taxes for municipalities, grants to native people, and so on.

Farmers will be affected because crop insurance might be reduced. Graduate students will be particularly affected. These transfers may be cut, which would have an impact on services to young offenders. Legal aid programs could also be affected, as well as transportation grants to the provinces and municipalities. That especially concerns me because funding for airport operations may be particularly affected.

Charlo airport in my riding always needs funds and it cannot afford cuts.

The provisions of Bill C-20 concerning unemployment insurance clearly contradict the government's commitment to help fund this program in difficult times.

[English]

The bill we are examining today, this evening and probably tomorrow is a very complex one and a very technical one but it does have some very devastating impacts on all of Canada especially the regions of Canada.

Bill C-20 was introduced to implement four initiatives outlined in the February 1991 federal budget. I need not say here what Canadians think of that budget. One of the most important changes would provide amendments to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. It would extend the cap on Established Programs Financing, or the EPF, transfers to the provinces.

Another proposed amendment would dramatically increase unemployment insurance payments for both employees and employers. The other two components would provide for the capping of sessional allowances. There is no problem with that. There would also be a continued freeze on tax grants for the provinces collected from public utilities.

I believe sincerely that we need a strong federal presence in our health care system. I believe that to have that strong federal presence we need a strong financial commitment from the government. This Bill C-20 does not do that. It puts the provinces in a very difficult situation. It gives them two choices. First, it can raise taxes. I can assure you right now that taxes are at their maximum limit federally and provincially so that gives them the second option of cutting services and programs. To me that is just not acceptable.

This bill is an attack on the health care system. It is also an attack on post-secondary education. So it goes far beyond withholding just EPF entitlements as a means of deterring the Canada Health Act.

It does affect education. I want to spend a few minutes if I may on the area of education. The government record on education has been mostly small talk. It has been playing public relations games by announcing nice programs and using nice choice words that sound great out there. If we look at their record we can see that the student loan program needs a complete review right across Canada. There has been no increased sums of money put into those programs since 1984. The government has turned around and levied a 3 per cent administrative tax on student loans. That is a complete shame. It is taxing people who just cannot afford it.

There is another thing I should mention as my critic's responsibility in the area of communications and culture. It is the first time that we have seen a government in the history of Canada tax learning. The Prime Minister has said in this House that we want to develop a learning culture. The government's policies speak against that by placing a GST tax on books and magazines. That is contrary to what the Prime Minister really wants. I would suspect that the Prime Minister should be reviewing some of his policies in that regard.

I want to also mention something I spoke of earlier regarding transportation. How does transportation—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): One moment, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I appeal to everyone's co-operation. I have difficulty hearing the speaker, and I would imagine that others have the same problem. Therefore, I ask all members to co-operate. The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

[English]

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to those who are listening from both sides of the House that I did mention a little bit about transportation. You may wonder what this has to do with health care and post-secondary education. There is a part of the bill that needs to be brought down to a common denominator and that is this. The federal government is hoping to use other mechanisms to force provinces to maintain certain health standards across Canada. In other words, we are going to have national health standards. In the past since the federal government was contributing a fair amount of money to those programs it could use the power of the purse so to speak as leverage with the the provinces to make sure national health standards would be met.

With this reduction in funds going to the medicare system by the federal government we see it may turn out that there will be no money at all going to these provinces for medicare. As such there would be no commitment from the province or no leverage by the federal government to ask these provinces to continue their national standards. As such they have decided to introduce in this bill other mechanisms. They would like to take from other programs. They would say: "Listen, if you do not maintain your national standards then we are going to cut your funding somewhere else". That is why I want to speak to you this evening, Mr. Speaker, and through you to all the members of the House.

Transportation in my riding is a necessity. I want to mention two important points here. One point concerns the only airport that we have in our riding which is situated in Charlo. A number of years ago under the first Conservative regime it closed the weather station at that airport. It also has been trying to reduce the flight service station. They have cut back one ship.

I would like to point out two things with regard to those two cuts. One is that there has never been a major fatal accident at those airports before the removal of the weather station. But since the weather station has been removed there have been two flight accidents that have resulted in a loss of life. I cannot say that it can be blamed directly on the removal of the weather station but both were in inclement weather in the wintertime.

I must also say that with regard to the FSS it is the only flight service station that is fully operational in a bilingual capacity from the station to the pilot in Atlantic Canada. We are seeing a removal or a cutdown of that FSS in terms of a reduction in hours. I must say that this Charlo airport also serves the Gaspe peninsula. It is very important that we maintain services at Charlo airport and maintain the funding so there is no reduction in funding.

The other point that I want to make with regard to transportation is that we have two major ports in the riding. They are the port of Dalhousie and the port of Belledune. These are very well known internationally yet there have been no real federal initiatives. There has been money put into both ports by the federal government to improve the facilities from time to time. Both ports were developed under Liberal governments but there is something missing. There is no clear-cut strategy. With a region suffering from 18.5 per cent unemployment I would suggest that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour tonight to raise and to discuss briefly a question which I asked the minister on October 28.

[English]

It concerned the question of the limousine and taxi industry servicing Pearson International Airport.

As the transport critic I repeatedly met with the taxi and limousine association. A major area of concern is the incredible rate of increase charged by the federal Ministry of Transport in the annual licence fees that cab and limo operators have to pay. The increase as of April was on average 500 per cent for taxis. That went up from $1,000 to $4,200 per year. For limos it went from $1,100 to $6,000. That is only the licence. Consider the cost of the upkeep of the car, the gasoline costs, the insurance costs and paying any additional driver that may drive that limo or cab for the remainder of that portion of the day. That is the expense of the person behind the wheel.

In very short order we have an industry that is simply becoming uncompetitive and the additional costs of running that cab and that limo is subsequently passed on to the users who are the people who land and take off at the airports.

They are having to pay incredible rates from Pearson either to downtown metropolitan Toronto or anywhere else in the metro Toronto and area region.

Therefore, what the association has been asking for is a rollback. It is willing to accept some moderate increase in terms of its licence fees which have not been touched in the last number of years. It admits that, but there has been an increase overnight of some 500 per cent in the passenger volume, according to the manager of the airport. That is down some 5 to 7 per cent for the first time since 1982.

We have had additional permits granted because of Terminal 3 which does not generate any new traffic. It just splits the traffic three ways rather than two ways. We have drivers going out of business, losing the opportunity of continuing their livelihood and having the inability to put food on their tables. There is a great turnover in that business.

The same thing to a lesser degree is happening at the Montreal and Vancouver airports. Therefore, on October 28, I asked the minister if he would agree to have a rollback. He suggested in the body of his answer that had already been done. That is false.

He wrote me a letter several days after confirming that the rollback had not taken place. All the government froze is a further increase on top of the 500 per cent.

We are saying that we are in the middle of a recession. Airport numbers are down. We have passengers paying incredible rates to get from point a to point b. We have a limousine industry which is a monopoly and which needs to be looked into.

Therefore I ask the parliamentary secretary to right an incredible wrong.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the concerns of the taxi and limousine industry regarding the increases mentioned have been considered. Everything possible has been done to accommodate these concerns.

With respect to permits to date, 323 taxi and 236 limousine permits have been issued to operators for providing service at Pearson International Airport. In 1989 six additional limousine permits were issued for accessible vehicles but no fees were charged.

With respect to fees after years of discussion with the airport's taxi and limousine industry and the municipal representatives, a fee increase proposal was approved for April 1, 1991.

This was the first time since 1976, that is the first time in 15 years, that there had been any significant change in fees. The new fees reflect the business opportunity available to airport limousine and taxi operators.

With the opening of terminal 3 at Pearson airport, airport officials had proposed the issuance of an additional 50 taxi and 100 limousine permits. The additional permits were intended to continue the high level of service provided at terminals 1 and 2.

The airport taxi and limousine permit holders objected despite the years of consultation. Following the further meeting with representatives of the airport taxi and limousine operators which was also attended by the mayor of the city of Mississauga, additional permits and fee increases were reconsidered.

In September 1991 the Minister of Transport addressed both concerns by agreeing that there would be no further fee increases until April 1993. Further increases in fees will be based on the percentage increase in flat rate taxi and limousine tariffs established by the city of Mississauga.

There can be no rollback of the April 1991 fees, however, as the department must still recognize its fiscal responsibility and this point has also been made by the Auditor General.

With respect to new permits, it was decided that none would be issued until July 1992. The issuance of new permits will be based on a needs formula recommended in a Touche Ross report, presently being refined by airport officials.

Further discussions are planned with the airport taxi and limousine industry. Airport officials have committed to conducting a study of the airport ground transportation industry before any further adjustments are considered.

FISHERIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to return to the September 16 debate.

I look forward this evening to hearing from the government just exactly what it plans to do to remedy the illegal boardings, seizures, kidnappings and cargo thefts that took place in relation to seven Canadian fishing vessels in Dixon Entrance during this past summer.

• (1810)

In 1989, when the Fonzie and the Viscount, two Canadian fishing vessels, ran into similar kinds of illegal boardings and illegal arrests and illegal removals from Canada, the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the present Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, and then Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, did provide legal assistance in advance of any trial proceedings in the United States in relation to these vessels, something that has yet to take place from the two new ministers, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The question that I asked was a very clear and straightforward one. I quote from Hansard, page 2157:

> Would the minister explain to Canadians why the government has refused to lay charges against those members of the United States military who illegally seized Canadian vessels and forcibly removed Canadian citizens from Canada to the United States?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> We protested publicly and strongly and we beefed up our own surveillance on the other coast—

That does not get to the bottom of it. Increasing surveillance off of Atlantic Canada does not assist fishermen on the Pacific coast. The U.S. Coast Guard continued to come inside Canada illegally. I raised an emergency debate in relation to the U.S. Coast Guard vessel Liberty and the Eliza Joye. That vessel was detained a mile inside Canada. When the Canadian fisheries vessel Lewis Reef officers attempted to come on board the Canadian vessel a mile inside Canada, the military crew of the Coast Guard Liberty told Canadian enforcement offices they could not come on board a Canadian fishing vessel inside Canada, contrary to Canadian law, contrary to international law.

What did the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans have to say to the city of Prince Rupert? He sent it a letter dated November 21. It arrived November 26 in Prince Rupert and it says:

> The U.S. Coast Guard should not have made their arrests in Canada's internal waters south of the A–B line. The Canadian government reacted quickly to the arrests and made clear to the U.S. authorities—both orally and in writing—that American arrests of Canadian fishing vessels in these waters were unacceptable. This action was taken to protect Canada's sovereignty and is not, of course, intended to provide an escape route for Canadian vessels if the U.S. authorities claim they have violated U.S. law in undisputed U.S. waters.

This is a clear case of the enforcement authorities of Canada not proceeding to lay charges under the Criminal Code of Canada as is required in every other situation. There should be charges of theft, forcible confinement, kidnapping, illegal boarding, illegal seizure.

These are extremely serious indictable offences. I call upon the government to get with it. There are still many months and in some cases many years left on the time clock to lay charges, but charges should always be laid as freshly and as competently as they possibly can.

My constituents I think share the view I have expressed in this Chamber before that there is some kind of grisly tyranny of deception, misinformation and treason taking place when the U.S. military can come inside of Canada, can illegally board Canadian vessels, can illegally seize the captain and the crew, can steal the cargo and leave without any charges being laid.

I call upon the government to lay those charges against the U.S. military and to prosecute to the absolute limit of the law.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Although I have only two minutes, Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer all those questions. It will not be easy, but I will conclude within the time allotted to me.

It is Canada's long-standing position that the waters of Dixon Entrance are internal waters of Canada. The United States disputes this, claiming a portion of these waters is subject to their jurisdiction.

This summer four Canadian fishing vessels were arrested by the U.S. Coast Guard in the Dixon Entrance south of the so-called A-B line, which Canada maintains is the international maritime and land boundary. The United States has alleged that these vessels were fishing in undisputed U.S. waters, north of the A-B line.

We made strong diplomatic representations to the United States in each one of these cases, protesting actions which we regard as contrary to international law and unacceptable to Canada. As a result of these protests, all of the vessels were promptly released and in the case of one of the vessels, the Eliza Joye, no charges were laid. Fines were levied by the United States in the other three cases.

We have impressed upon the United States the need to avoid these types of incidents in the future. If U.S. authorities have evidence that Canadian vessels are fishing north of the A-B line, we believe that a warning should be issued.

We have a long history of working to manage our fisheries relations with the United States along all of our borders, including Dixon Entrance. Our approach has been to protest these breaches of Canadian sovereignty and to ensure the safest possible conditions for our fisherman. There is no doubt that the United States has received this message loud and clear.

The hon. member also raised the question of U.S. submarine traffic, but my time has run out. In closing, once again I assure my hon. colleague that Canada continues as always to maintain that Dixon Entrance is part of its internal waters.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when will the government realize that if it wishes to speak the language of competitiveness it must learn the language of transportation, and that if it talks of transportation then it must talk about the port of Halifax?

Many times this fall I have asked this government to take some action to help save the major source of the Atlantic economy which is the port of Halifax. The government has answered with apathy, rising repeatedly to pass off the problem as one of overcapacity or to tell me that it would get back to me.

I am here to tell this government that Atlantic Canadians have had seven years of "we will get back to you" from this government, and we have had enough.

How many studies will land on the desk of the minister before he figures out that it is his policies and those of his colleagues that have put our port at a serious disadvantage in relation to its competitors?

The latest study which a damning indictment of the government's apathy initiative is from Ports Canada, and I quote from its key conclusion:

> To restore the Canadian railway industry's competitiveness vis-à-vis the U.S., government should adjust their fiscal and regulatory policies, including reduced fuel and property taxes, increased rates of capital cost allowance and allow for more abandonment of uneconomic rail infrastructure.

I want this government to announce immediately that it is moving to amend the National Transportation Act in order to conform to the recommendations of its own study.

Lower the tax burden that puts our American competitors at a nearly five to one advantage. Call in the head of CN Rail and ask why that Crown corporation is not doing more for the taxpayers of the region to bring the lines back.

Why does it not actively promote Halifax in foreign ports? Why is there no action for an entire decade of the 1980s when it was clear that Americans were going deeply into double stack service?

Further, I want the government to initiate an immediate consultation process that will bring decision makers from the municipal, provincial and federal fields together with industry leaders to formulate a recovery strategy. Too much time has already been wasted. If we work together we can ensure that what we will have to do is not done too little too late.

Why does the government have to apply its wrong-headed cost recovery strategy to shipping when it is so clear that neither other sectors of the industry nor our competitors will be doing the same thing? Cost recovery is a laudable theory, as long as everyone is playing by the same rules on the same level playing field. Let us finally get our act together.

It will require political will on the part of the government, a new and improved attitude that will encourage the fact that we in Halifax have the world's finest natural harbour. That plus some legislative draftsmanship is what we are asking for from this government. After that just let the people who work in the port of Halifax do what we have done best for 250 years.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the difficulties presently facing the port of Halifax are a manifestation of the highly competitive global trading environment within which all our major ports are operating. While it is true that some lines have announced a reduction or termination of service at their ports, other lines have indicated a new or renewed commitment to the port based on increase tonnage.

In January, NOL and NYK lines are expected to begin calling at the port. In addition, some of the lines that have remained at the port will increase frequency of services. Meanwhile it is the duty of all levels of government to do that which they can reasonably do to ensure and enhance our national and international linkages of which the ports are an integral part.

I have spoken on this issue before. I do not think the member wants me to list again all of the efforts of the local port, of Canada Ports Corporation, of the municipal government and of the railway, all in co-operation with the federal and provincial governments. She has heard it all before and she continues to be negative and to focus on the negative while others are working to promote the port. We are working together. I wish the hon. member for Halifax would get on board.

One thing the hon. member has not given me the opportunity to mention was the province's announcement of setting up a task force under the Hon. Gerald Regan to inquire into ways to assist the competitiveness of the port of Halifax. The task force has now announced its membership drawn heavily from the Halifax community who will, I am sure, well represent the concerns of the region.

I would also like to point out that the province of Nova Scotia has consistently assisted the movement of rail cargo through the province and that it remains the only province which assesses no excise tax on locomotive fuel, an element which has been consistently identified with contributing to the cost burden of the railways.

The Halifax situation has served to focus the Department of Transport on the entire question of intermodalism in Canada and the importance of container competitiveness to not just the major ports but to the nation as a whole.

The department is carefully monitoring the situation, examining ways in which the present intermodal links in the Canadian distribution chain can be made more effective and competitive. That is why Canada Ports Corporation as a federal agency is trying to facilitate a longer term co-operation between container ports and the railways to enhance the attractiveness of Canadian container routings in general and with the port of Halifax in particular.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, one afternoon during the 1988 election campaign I knocked on the door of the Hession family who live on Ellswick Road in the Parkview Hills neighbourhood of East York in metropolitan Toronto.

Michael Hession answered the door and he told me that he worked for the Colgate-Palmolive Canada Incorporated company. He was very much concerned about what Colgate-Palmolive would do if the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement came into effect. He was concerned that the plant might close, that is the plant where he worked on Colgate Avenue in Toronto, and that the operations might be moved to the United States as a result of that free trade agreement. Of course, if that happened, he would lose his job and so would the many others who worked at that plant.

Mr. Speaker, I know you would understand those concerns and I understood those concerns as well. Prior to election day November 21, 1988, just over three years ago now, I made some in-depth inquiries of our own officials with the Department of International Trade and the Minister for International Trade at the time. I was assured at that time that Colgate-Palmolive had absolutely no intention of closing its doors and moving to the United States. Whether or not we had a free trade agreement with United States was immaterial, I was told; absolutely not, Colgate-Palmolive assured us that it had no intention of making that move.

I told Mr. Hession that and as you can imagine, Mr. Speaker, he was somewhat skeptical. However, he told me that he had faith and he had confidence in me regardless of what might happen and that he was going to support me.

From time to time after the election I continued to make inquiries because that conversation that afternoon with Mr. Hession haunted me. I continued to make those inquiries of our own department. I continued to make those inquiries of Colgate–Palmolive, and on each and every occasion I was assured that Colgate–Palmolive had absolutely no intention of leaving this country. It was here to stay. It was going to stay in that plant on Colgate Avenue in Toronto; no question about it.

Just about three months ago now, at the beginning of September of this year, Colgate–Palmolive announced that it would be closing its plant on Colgate Avenue in Toronto, moving 250 jobs to the United States. As you can imagine, Mr. Speaker, one of the first things I thought of when I got that call was Mr. Hession. I called him up and he told me that American management had come in and cavalierly announced that it was closing down the plant, moving it to the United States, moving those jobs to the United States. Of course what a horrendous shot that was to Mr. Hession and all the others who worked at that plant.

I contacted Colgate–Palmolive myself and was told it was too bad, that it was not just a Canada–U.S. decision. It involved world–wide operations. It was a decision based on global efficiency. Costly plants had to be updated. There was extra capacity in the United States, so it was being closed down and their operation was being moved to the United States.

Not much consolation for Mr. Hession or his family or those 249 other families involved.

That is just one example of many cases of a similar nature that has Canada and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize but your time is over.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond to the hon. member for whom I have a great deal of respect. In 1984, the Agenda for Economic Renewal set out this government's strategy to put in place the policies and programs designed for Canada's long–term benefit.

Measures such as tax reform and expanded trade opportunities have enabled our manufacturing sector to compete on a more level playing field free from unnecessary and unproductive intervention by government.

First, the removal of the former federal sales tax has been important for Canadian business. The old federal sales tax offered a clear competitive advantage to foreign manufacturing concerns and was a silent killer of jobs.

And, second the Free Trade Agreement with the United States has afforded the Canadian manufacturing industry an unparalleled and historic opportunity for open and equal access to a market of 250 million people. Canadians are already seeing the positive results of this agreement. The value of all Canadian exports to the U.S. has increased by nearly $8 billion since 1988, to a total of $110.3 billion in 1990. This means greater output for our manufacturing sector and more jobs for Canadians.

It should be pointed out that the Canadian manufacturers have endorsed the actions of the Government of Canada in these areas. They recognized that the removal of the former federal sales tax and the implementation of the free trade agreement have improved their prospects for future growth. Despite these achievements there is more work to be done. This government will soon launch and initiative to invite all Canadians to fashion a new agenda for our future growth and prosperity.

All Canadians, including business, labour, educators and social action groups, will be encouraged to participate in a dialogue leading.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I hope that my friend who will be answering my grievance will cast his notes aside and speak from the bottom of his heart.

In September I asked: How can you cut funding to education, close employment centres on campus and continue to talk about competitiveness, productivity and the fostering of a climate conducive to a learning culture? When you look at the facts, here is what you see.

[English]

If you look at the cumulative decisions that the government has made from 1986 to 1995, you will find there are 9 billion to 10 billion fewer dollars—not million, billion—for education, that there is less for training and retraining, in spite of the fact that we have gone through a Canada–U.S. trade agreement that has demanded all kinds of adjustments, in spite of the fact there are almost 4.5 million people who are unemployed as we speak tonight, 2 million people are on social welfare, and 1.8 million people who will be fed by food banks this year.

What has happened to training and retraining? They promised to double the investment. We used to be at 1.40 gross domestic productivity, half of what our major competitors are. Now we are down to 1.20 and we have cut science and technology and the government has imposed a 3 per cent tax on student aid.

I cannot believe the insensitivity of it. They have cut student centres on campus at a period when student employment was around 20 per cent. Student debt has risen and gone right out of sight. We are talking about people with debts of $25,000 to $50,000 increasingly frequently.

I was talking to a student just last week who was very close to being $50,000 in debt. Why? What has been the impact?

Tuition fees have sky-rocketed in the last decade. It is a 120 per cent increase, most of which has happened since 1986. We do not talk a lot about incidental fees. Another important component to students is these little fees that they have to pay for various services, and what have you at university.

Accommodation costs for food and lodging are right out of sight and those are a large proportion of a student's budget. What has happened? It is because of these cuts and reductions, and the increases that the government has off-loaded on to the provinces to the universities and to the students.

What offends me most is that it boasts of controlling expenditures.

[Translation]

It is as if I passed all my debts on to my wife, my children and my neighbour and then said: "Look, I reduced my debt". Is that good? No, it is not, it borders on dishonesty.

I am going to submit to you another point.

[English]

The government talks about how much it spent. Look at what it does. It looks at the cash transfers. When it talks about how much it invests in education, it looks at cash transfers and tax point transfers.

There is the double standard. I would simply like to complete my remarks by saying that I hope my colleague is going to speak from the bottom of his heart to answer honestly my question which is: How can you cut funding and still talk at length about the things you want to achieve in education? There is an obvious contradiction there.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I understand how my hon. colleague feels. I want to talk to him from the heart. Indeed I have already discussed this with him and I talked to him from the heart.

Unfortunately we will not be able to make great declarations in just two minutes. But the part that comes from the heart has to do with the fact that I also have a child that is presently attending the University of Montreal. I can assure you that since loans were not repaid in the past, because of the negligence of the banks—the government guarantees these loans so the banks do not make any efforts in that sense—we are lucky that there are still loans for students today.

I would like to remind my hon. colleague that the 3 per cent cost may represent some $80 over $2,700 for 200,000 students. This may be the assurance that this Canadian program for the students will continue to provide efficiently the small amount that these 200,000 students benefit from each year.

I will now give a few statistics to my hon. colleague. This program guarantees financial institutions that the loans they grant to post-secondary students will be repaid to them, and I add this which is not in my notes but which comes from the heart: the banks do not have to make any effort since the government guarantees those loans.

In 1990–91 no less than $632 million were granted in loans to Canadian students. In concrete terms, the guarantee means that the government must pay back the loan if the student does not do so. In fact the banks do not make any efforts to go after the students, because the loans are guaranteed by someone else. That also means that the recovery expenses are charged to the government.

Our government must deal with the fact that the costs related to the guarantee given on those loans and to interests, payments have increased by $435 million. To this more than substantial increase you have to add the $879 million represented by all the loans receivable by the government.

I believe that everyone will agree that the government cannot indefinitely face these constant increases without increasing its own revenue. Therefore, the 3 per cent is aimed at making up for a part of the program cost increase and perhaps at ensuring the continuation of the program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed to have been adopted. Therefore, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I rise on a short point of order, Mr. Speaker. Basically I want to seek some direction. In this House I think we all appreciate that certain immunities exist regarding the interventions made by members of Parliament in order to ensure that freedom of speech is a reality in this Chamber.

This is the first chance I have had to raise this. I do want to refer once again to something that happened on Thursday of last week regarding some of the comments made by my friend from Portage—Interlake regarding the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada when he called on two occasions, first suggesting that the president was participating in a despicable act of cowardice and went on to say that he as an individual would rather drown or hang people and so on.

I guess what I am saying is that I really need some ruling or some direction from the Chair. I noticed in reading Hansard of yesterday—unfortunately I was travelling—that an intervention was made by the Chair during Question Period when it was felt that an hon. member from the Liberal Party referred to the comments of a minister as baloney. You felt it was appropriate to intervene at that point and ask the member to retract that statement. He did this. Mr. Speaker, I support this initiative from the Chair.

I saw that one day and on another day a member called someone who is not in this House a coward, despicable and someone who encourages people to drown others and so on. Consequently the person does not have an opportunity to respond to these accusations. It seems to me that we just cannot let this go on and not have some response by yourself, Mr. Speaker.

When the intervention was first made I asked the member to withdraw the remarks. But in a sense if you looked at his comments he seemed to just add to them. Mr. Speaker, you said that you would review the situation and make the appropriate comment. I appreciate that. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, since I was travelling yesterday and not in the House you were intending to do just that. But I wanted to encourage you particularly in light of the intervention you made yesterday which I thought was appropriate. You said that at the earliest convenience you would give some direction as to how we can maintain the appropriate measure of comment.

We have privileges that encourage free speech. Our comments are not actionable which means we cannot launch a libel suit or defamation suit as a result of comments made here. It is up to us as members of Parliament and particularly, Mr. Speaker, through you to set some sort of measurement of appropriateness. We ask you as the Chair to enforce those measures.

I raise this matter in that most positive way seeking direction from yourself.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make two quick comments on this intervention. The first one is that in principle I very much support what the hon. member is suggesting.

I think the House leader of the New Democratic Party has raised an issue that has been of growing concern to this House. We need to be very careful in our assertions about the reputations of people who are not in this institution and cannot defend themselves. I thought I would want to signal to the Chair my complete support for the Chair being very firm and aggressive when that sort of action takes place. I think we need to do that. I think the Canadian public want us to do that and I am very supportive of the hon. member's assertion on that point.

Point of Order

However, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal for a moment with the specific case he raises. I believe this is the statement made by the hon. member for Portage—Interlake at pages 5498 and 5499 of Hansard. I want to read just one paragraph into the record. It is what I think the hon. member is referring to. It says:

> Advocating violence against women is unbecoming of all Canadians. It is a shameful and a despicable act of cowardice. Intimidation of this nature belongs in the gutter with the filth and the mire.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is that is an assertion which deals with an advocation of violence against women. I do not think it is an assertion that is aimed at the president of the PSAC although there is the connection made in the statement where the hon. member for Portage—Interlake very much objects to the letter that was sent out by the president of the PSAC. But he does not call the head of the PSAC a coward and he does not accuse him of being despicable. What he says is that if what Mr. Bean has done is advocate violence against women then it is the advocation of violence against women that is shameful and despicable and demonstrates cowardice.

So, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a statement directed personally so much at Mr. Bean as it is at the whole issue of violence against women.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague and friend the House leader of the New Democratic Party has raised a very substantive issue concerning the standards that are to be adhered to on the floor of the House of Commons and thereafter the implementation of that particular standard as it applies to the opposition parties and that of the government.

I am happy to hear that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader subscribes to the principle that my friend and colleague has enunciated here this morning. Yesterday I spoke to you in private about my colleague and where he has used the word "baloney". Then in the midst of Question Period you took it upon yourself to intervene. That ate up some of our time for Question Period by not doing it at the usual time. I would have thought the right time for drawing the attention of the House to the comments that you believed to be somewhat offensive would have been three o'clock. But at the same time, Mr. Speaker, I seek guidance of the Chair. One has to raise the question how during statements under Standing Order 31 and indeed in other interventions how government members will be policed on the floor of the House of Commons.

We understand, Mr. Speaker, that we are in an opposition party. We understand that certain rules and Standing Orders do indeed apply to us. But we would hope that in the future they would apply to all members of the House. I seek the guidance of the Chair as to how it intends to police some of these aspects. On first appearances, Mr. Speaker, some members have contemplated out loud that maybe the standard that we are all hopefully trying to live by is not in some circumstances being implemented fairly or accordingly to all members of Parliament.

The parliamentary secretary is shaking his head. If he wishes to participate in debate then he should participate in the debate. He should not use body language to try to intimidate those of us who are trying to seek guidance from the Chair on a very important matter. If the parliamentary secretary does not believe that what we are raising is sufficiently important enough let him say so. We seek the guidance of the Chair concerning the standards that the Chair is trying to utilize on the floor of the House of Commons for all members, not just opposition members.

• (1020)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. My concern is that I think the House leader of the Liberal Party is very close to an assertion against the Chair. I am sure he did not intend it.

I think it is very clear that all members of the House would support the Chair in coming down on members for inappropriate behaviour no matter which side of the aisle they sit on.

I want to say very clearly, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure that is not what the hon. member intended in his remarks. I am sure what he said is that he wanted to see it applied fairly. All of us would certainly support that.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a very short comment and refer to the fact that the points raised by my hon. friend are technically correct.

I think being fair is something that we would like to always work toward as an appropriate goal. If people had read carefully what the president of PSAC was doing we would know full well that he was not personally advocating violence against women.

I do not know who determines the government's speaking list but I notice that this issue was raised three times on that day. There were two statements during Question Period where they incorrectly referred to Mr. Bean as being vice-president of the New Democratic Party. Of course he is not.

To take a letter and probably unconsciously and certainly inadvertently distort its intent is incorrect. It is not that this never happens but when we raise issues about one of us in this House it is done knowing full well that that individual will have an opportunity to stand up and defend himself or herself.

I think it is an unfortunate initiative to attack someone in such a vicious way who is outside this House. This is with the knowledge that as long as those comments are made here they are not actionable and if they were made outside the door you would probably end up in a court of law.

I suspect we all share this. I appreciate the comments made by my colleague the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader who says that he even now supports the general thrust of the argument.

It is for that reason that I think we would like to call on you to give us some guidance as to the appropriate way to proceed in the future.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate very much the tone of the intervention of the hon. member for Kamloops. I appreciate the other interventions that have been made today.

This matter arose several days ago. To be very frank with the House I am still looking at it.

There is an issue here which is not quite as easy to resolve as might at first seem. First, a particular incident took place outside the Chamber. The Chair is not in any particular position to know what exactly took place outside the Chamber except what I may have heard.

Second, moving away completely from the incident to which we have been referring, we have matters that get into the public domain outside the Chamber. It is sometimes difficult to find the line between what is inappropriate to mention or comment with respect to them and what is appropriate.

I think that the point that was made in general terms that we ought to constrain ourselves considerably in making comments about someone outside this Chamber which would in fact be defamatory under the laws of our country if made outside the Chamber is something which we should consider.

I will try to find a way of expressing this which will give us some guidance. I have been concerned that the use of highly suggestive language or innuendo sometimes on both sides of the House with respect to people or their associations with people can be very demeaning indeed.

This certainly moves the House to a response of irritation or anger which of course leads us to disorder.

I accept the interventions of hon. members that this is a matter which does require some careful thought. I will try to respond in a way that is helpful.

I hope that yesterday's incident is not taken as any indication that there is one standard for one side of the House and another standard for the other, or even one standard for those members who are close enough to the Chair that I can hear when they say something that is not appropriate, as opposed to those members at the very far end of the Chamber. Quite frankly, I cannot hear these comments most of the time.

I think the hon. member who was corrected by me and withdrew and apologized, was hurling words directly at a minister while the minister was responding. I felt that under the circumstances it was appropriate to stop it.

I just want to make it very clear that if I hear comments thrown by government members at hon. members opposite who are putting questions in the same manner, as long as I can hear them, I will certainly rule them out as far as being proper. I want to assure you the Chair is trying to make sure the law falls equally on both sides of the Chamber.

I am frankly heartened by members' comments this morning on this matter, and I think that it indicates a general sense in the Chamber that we do have to make an extra effort to make sure that the decorum of this place is acceptable, not just to each other, but also to the public.

In this regard I want to make it very clear that one can either extol or deplore television, but it is here. One thing it has done is give a lot of Canadians a chance to see what we do in the Chamber. While this may have helped some of them see what we are doing in terms of policy and substance, it has also given a lot of people a chance to see things that we do that they do not appreciate. I think that we are bound to take that into account. Certainly this morning's discussion is helpful to me and I hope that I will be able to respond in a way that is helpful to the Chamber.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR TIMISKAMING

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I gave notice in regard to what I believe is a point of privilege.

It is probably the most important statement that I have made in my nine years as a parliamentary member for the riding of Timiskaming. I refer to Hansard, page 5508, of November 28 and the comments made by the member from Sudbury.

The question is in regard to my honesty and integrity. I want to stand before the House today as someone who has represented a riding and has been here for three elections.

The allegations have caused damage to myself, my family and the riding of Timiskaming which I have represented for nine years.

I would like to take a moment to review and set the record straight. I believe that when accusations and allegations are made in this House and transmitted back to your ridings, it is very difficult to be able to stand up and defend them, putting matters straight once and for all.

A year ago, tenders were called for a building in Kirkland Lake. The first round of tenders were all too high. The second round of tenders, numbered project 2000 were disqualified. The second tender was from a company named Cohole construction of Kirkland Lake.

I just want to read a couple of paragraphs in a letter that was sent to Mr. Young Hong, President of Cohole Development Corporation on November 27, 1991.

> I wish to re-confirm the advice given you by my staff October 16, 1991 and reiterated in my November 15, 1991 letter to you that Public Works Canada has terminated its contract with Cohole Development Corporation to provide the necessary space. It should be clearly understood that our decision to terminate the contract is based on two factors.

• (1030)

First, as a result of a loss of financing for this project by Cohole Development, your contractor stopped work in September, 1991 thereby placing the project at serious risk. You were unable to secure alternative financing, even after several extensions granted by us to October 16, 1991 and therefore we terminated the contract as we had no guarantee that Cohole Development would be able to complete the project.

You may also recall that at a meeting in your office February 21, 1991, officers of this department and a DVA official discussed the requirements of the project with you and you were advised at that time that a $2 million bond would be required as part of the contract.

The purpose of the bond is to protect the Crown in the event you were unable to complete the project, thereby minimizing our risk by providing funds to offset the costs of leasing interim space.

You may also recall that officials on my staff advised you again on June 21, 1991, at the time the contract was awarded to you, of the requirement for a $2 million bond.

Public Works then went to the third tender, a company called Anthony Kemp Architects Inc. A reference on page 5508 of Hansard, states my brother-in-law was called in as being part of the ownership of this.

I place before you today a letter from Anthony Kemp which states that "as a point of information the sole shareholder of 926260 Ontario Limited is Anthony Kemp. Should this company be successful in this endeavour, the ownership of the said company will be widened to include the following individuals: Anthony Kemp, Garry Fairhurst, Warren Beamish, Norman Seymour, Robert Chafee and Peter Balan. Mr. Gary Watkins does not have and will not have any pecuniary or other interests in 926260 Ontario Limited."

I also lay before you the different bids: Project No. 926260 of $9,630,000 and Cohole Construction of $9,570,000.

It was also accused that my brother-in-law is a shareholder in the land. I would like to quote from a letter from chartered accountants, Cook Hawley Marks:

> We have reviewed the shareholder records as presented in the attached chart, and confirm that Mr. Gary Watkins, through 510177 Ontario Limited and the First Watkins Family Trust, have a minority interest of 28.69% in Nelson Bros. Construction Limited.

This is the property I have been accused of having an interest in.

I would like to end by saying that the value of the property in question at DVA bid was $500,000. In addition, we would have paid relocation costs for the Nelson Bros. operation which would be deducted from the $500,000.

In December 1988, long before DVA, we had an appraisal done on the property. It was valued at $558,600. We also have the option on the value of the land at $810,000. On that basis it can be concluded that Gary Watkins is not getting any type of benefit from our involvement in the DVA project.

I feel very sorry for the individuals who were involved with Cohole construction. That development was strictly between Cohole and Public Works. The unfortunate part about it is individuals started to do work believing that Cohole had the financing in place.

If you have been in business for 18 years, you check to see whether your creditors have the funds or not. This was not done. I must say, Mr. Speaker, it has been a very difficult time for me and my family to hear allegations like this made against me, my family and the people that I have represented for nine years.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in fairness, allegations have been made in this House, and we should once and for all be able to clear such allegations and not allow them to happen.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the first thing I want to say is that the hon. member said yesterday, I gather, that I had made allegations with regard to him or his involvement in the termination of the contract for the DVA building in Kirkland Lake.

This inference is totally unwarrant. I asked a question of the Minister of Public Works and I will quote it: "I want to know the real reason behind this nonsense", and it is in Hansard, as you saw, "is it because the owner of the second site and the member for Timiskaming just happen to be brothers-in-law?" It is a true statement. The owner of the site being considered is Nelson Brothers Construction. The hon. member for Timiskaming's brother-in-law happens to be a shareholder and the vice-president of that company. I do not for one minute infer any wrongdoings on the part of the hon. member, absolutely none. On the other hand, the brother-in-law is involved. I will tell you that no one believes that one can be responsible or be one's brother-in-law's keeper, especially not me. I have eight brothers-in-law and I will tell you right away that I do not pretend to have any say in what they do with their lives.

The whole question of this contract has very different sides to it. I will tell you the version that I have been told. Yes, there was one tender and it was turned down. I was told that it was turned down because the zoning was not in place when the people put in their bids. There was a second tender and on June 21, Cohole Development received a letter saying: "We have accepted your tender. Please proceed to construct the site."

On July 16 construction began. On July 18 there was a sod-turning ceremony. Let me remind the hon. members that there was no mention and no amount of a callable bond in the contract. The amount was just specified as an amount deemed to be reasonable in some way, shape or form and that is fine. Construction began on July 16 and continued until some time after September 23 at which time Cohole Development received a letter stating that Public Works Canada wanted a $2 million callable bond.

Now if you come from northern Ontario, you know how difficult it is to deal with bankers. I will tell you that yes, Cohole Development had some difficulty in obtaining the $2 million bond. There was no extension granted and no letters sent. There was a meeting held in October in Toronto at which time another alternative was put forward. The gentleman involved waited for an answer from Public Works and received no answer until November 15 when he was advised that the contract was terminated, period.

Since then, Cohole Development has come up with the $2 million bond. I have made repeated attempts to question the Minister of Public Works to make sure that he treated this whole thing as fairly as possible, because there is a great deal of money invested in that site. A lot of the construction work has been done. There are contractors in all areas of northern municipalities who stand to lose a great deal of money. That is how I became involved in this question, because some of the contractors are in my riding and they contacted me. They said: "What is happening? Why are we being treated this way?"

The government keeps saying that it is going to this new contractor. The tender from the new contractor is no longer active so they have to get new prices from him. The story goes on.

Meanwhile, I am told today that the owner of Cohole Development is delivering a $2 million callable bond to the people in Toronto. I am asking that they continue to look at this matter, to stop the massive losses, not only of those contractors but of the government itself. It has invested many dollars in this project.

When the foundations are in, the site has been cleared, the steel has been done and the architectural work has been done, it is a serious business to suddenly change the site completely. They are going from one end of town to a completely new site owned by Nelson Brothers Construction, there is no doubt in my mind.

I will tell you that I hope the hon. member for Timiskaming will lead the way in making sure that the government treats absolutely everyone as fairly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Timiskaming in a moment, but I may be able to assist the House.

I have listened very carefully to both sides because the issue is complicated, but the issue that I have to resolve is simply this: in the way the question was put, is the hon. member for Sudbury out of order or has there been a breach of privilege with respect to the position of the hon. member for Timiskaming.

• (1040)

I remind hon. members who may want to say something about this that this is the quote: "I want to know the real reason behind this nonsense. Is it because the owner of the second sight and the member for Timiskaming just happen to be brothers-in-law?"

That was then denied by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works. Someone then shouted out: "It sure helped the brother-in-law", and another hon. member said: "all in the family".

I have to take the mood that was created by the question somewhat into account. That is basically where the Speaker has to decide whether those words were appropriate under the circumstances, whether they were something that was a breach of order in the House or whether they go further.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, your words are exactly all that I want to be concerned about.

It is strictly a business agreement between Public Works and the tenderers. My concern is to clear my name and my family name.

Mr. Speaker: I think in keeping with the other matter which we discussed a little earlier this morning, I am going to look at this carefully and consider it.

I do point out that however I decide, I think hon. members can see how when an imputation is made by way of a question or by a response by a minister, it becomes very personal and can be hurtful. There is difficulty that it creates in the Chamber and with each other.

I am going to look at it and see if I can come down with a procedural response which is appropriate. I thank the hon. member for Sudbury. I know she had some difficulty being here yesterday. I received that message very early in the morning and I appreciate the fact. I hope that the hon. member would pass on to her staff our appreciation. That message was brought.

I appreciate the tone set by the hon. member for Timiskaming in bringing what certainly is to him a painful matter to the House.

ANNUAL REPORT: EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT, 1991

TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr.

Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table in both official languages the report entitled Annual Report: Employment Equity Act, 1991.

PETITIONS

MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the province of Ontario and various small communities, most of them farming communities.

These petitioners are concerned that the government is about to trade away the opportunity for them to operate marketing boards under the GATT round of negotiations which are currently under way.

The petitioners call upon the government to hold the Canadian system up as an example to all the world, to stiffen its resolve and ensure that article XI and the rights that accrue to Canada thereunder are not traded away by this government which seems bent on such an idea.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present seven petitions, containing approximately 300 signatures.

The citizens are from Burlington, Stoney Creek, Hamilton, Beamsville, Brantford, Ancaster, Kitchener, Grimsby, St. Catharines, Caledonia, Hannon, Dunnville and Binbrook. These citizens are petitioning the Government of Canada in support of the parents of Nina DeVilliers who was murdered on August 9, 1991. The petitioners call upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society and ask that the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act be amended accordingly.

UKRAINE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting three petitions today. The first I would have liked to have been able to present yesterday, but it was not possible to do so. It is in respect of constituents of mine of Ukrainian heritage who have asked the federal government to recognize the independence of Ukraine, subject of course to the referendum indicating that desire for independence.

I rejoice with them as do many, many Canadians throughout the land with respect to the referendum and the recognition that the government has given to Ukraine.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): The second petition is in respect of the goods and services tax on reading materials; magazines, books and newspapers.

The petitioners point out that there has been no such tax since the beginning of Confederation. They also indicate that it is counterproductive, it goes against the whole notion of a democratic society that is supposed to be well informed and a society, of course, that strives for excellence through education. Of course, these vehicles are important ones to the development of our citizenry.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My final petition is in respect of education. It is a criticism of a government that talks about competitiveness, productivity, establishing a learning culture, when it has indeed this year cut a half billion dollars in transfer payments to the provinces, as well as placing a 3 per cent administrative fee on student loans.

The petitioners ask that the government rescind these regressive measures so that we can send our young people to college and university in order that they can find the jobs that will contribute fully to Canada.

100TH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I rise to present a couple of petitions you would be interested in, Mr. Speaker, being that it is the 100th anniversary of the Ukrainian Canadians coming to our country.

These petitions come from the towns of Canora, Rama and the city of Yorkton. They present a petition that I wanted to table yesterday but it is still just as relevant today.

The undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence in establishing full diplomatic relations with the people of Ukraine immediately following their referendum, which took place on Tuesday.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, it has been signed by many people, like Metri Dutchak in Canora, and you can go through the list and find people like Olga Rusnak in Yorkton and many, many others who have made a great contribution to this country who were celebrating the referendum results on Sunday along with a lot of others of us.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me this morning to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens from Kamloops, British Columbia, who are concerned about the ability of the RCMP to fulfil its mandate.

In conversations they have commented on the increasing numbers of break and enters, minor petty crimes, and so on, just as a result of what they perceive to be the inability of the RCMP to do its job. They are calling upon the Government of Canada to ensure that proper funding for the RCMP exists to enable it to fulfil its mandate.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another issue, Mr. Speaker, a very important issue, the petitioners are from a variety of communities in British Columbia. They have heard the news that a Vancouver-based firm with contacts in California has announced its intention to proceed with a plan to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount, British Columbia, in an effort to divert water into the San Diego, California area.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that this is part of the North American Water and Power Alliance Plan to divert Canadian rivers into the United States, either in whole or in part, and they call upon the Government of Canada to announce categorically that Canadian river water is not for sale.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 161 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 161—Mr. Stupich:

For the election of November 21, 1988, in the constituency of Nanaimo—Cowichan, (a) how many voters whose names did not appear on the voter list actually voted under the provisions which allow rural voters to be sworn in on election day (b) is this number included in the total number of eligible voters listed in the report of the Chief Electoral Officer?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (President to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): (a) The information sought by the first part of this question is within the purview of subsection 196 (1) of the Canada Elections Act, which instructs the Chief Electoral Officer to retain election documents for at least one year if an election is not contested. As there was no contestation, the election documents requested were not kept. In consequence, it is not possible to reply accurately to the question.

(b) The report prepared by the Chief Electoral Officer pursuant to section 193 of the act contains the total number of electors and total votes cast. The number of electors who voted by being vouched for is included in the column Total votes but not in the column Electors on the list.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Question No. 161 has been answered.

Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 109 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 109 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Question No. 109—Mr. Riis:

For each fiscal year since 1985, did the government retain the services of private law firms in Kamloops, British Columbia, and, if so, in each case, what was the name of the firm and the amount received?

Return tabled.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the third time and passed; and on the amendment of Mr. Walker (p. 5662)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When we ended debate, the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur had five minutes remaining in his debate, plus 10 minutes questions or comments.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say from the outset that this is probably my longest speech since I started last evening at about 5.45 and here I am a day later still going. I can assure my constituents that I did not speak throughout the entire night. I am not that long-winded.

I must say, as I mentioned last evening, that this is a very complex and technical bill. I want to continue where I left off when I was speaking last evening about transportation in my riding as it applies to the bill and as it may be affected. I mentioned the Charlo airport in my riding and how important it is to the riding and how we have lost the weather station at that airport, although another weather station was located at another airport. I want to say from the outset that I am not against improvements in other areas, other communities, but I do not believe we should rob Peter to pay Paul. I believe when there is a new item to be taken and new programs coming out, everyone should have an equal opportunity, but where there are existing facilities in place they should remain and not move at the expense of that community.

I mentioned about the ports of Dalhousie and Belledune and also about our high unemployment, saying that the federal government has not played a major role in the promotion and development of those two ports. It should because they are federal facilities. There is no on-site manager as such at those two facilities and I think that is a necessity if we are going to promote those two ports and develop some type of strategy for them.

I would like to also mention this morning the changes as they may impact on UIC. I want to go back to the 1989 budget in which the then finance minister pledged that, and I quote: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build up in the unemployment insurance account".

I guess no one has to preach it to the world that that is another one of the broken promises of this government. Bill C-21, the budget, everything has indicated to us that there will be increased premiums. As far as I am concerned and my constituents are telling me, especially those who operate small businesses, this is another form of tax, it is an attack on small business and it is an attack on employees because they have to match those increased premiums as well.

Therefore, it is certainly a negative impact on small business in my area and on employees.

[Translation]

Bill C-20 is a deliberate attack on Canada's rural population and on Canadians in general. It is certainly not acceptable to the vast majority of Canadians. This legislation will actually force provinces like New Brunswick, my own province, to make some very difficult decisions. The people of New Brunswick realize their government must resort to such decisions because Ottawa is cutting back on its fiscal arrangements program.

At this critical time in Canada's history, the federal government should take steps to promote national unity and reduce regional disparity. However, if the federal government keeps reducing cash payments, it will intensify regional disparity. Residents of the poorer provinces will have to accept a lower standard of health care and post-secondary education than that enjoyed by Canadians in the richer provinces.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague from New Brunswick. He has always made the views of his constituents well known in this Chamber. This morning he talked to us about the importance of federal presence in his riding. There are many ridings across Canada right now that count on that federal presence to hold us together. In many regions of the country the federal presence is the glue that holds the community together with the national government.

My question to the member must relate specifically to the economy. He represents a rural riding. I represent an urban, downtown riding. I am hearing day in and day out that we as national members of Parliament do not seem to be spending enough time focusing on the economy of the country. We do not seem to be spending enough time figuring out ways to put people back to work.

Yes, they are very concerned that medicare, the health system of this country, is being tampered with as we see in this bill today. They appreciate the fact that we are addressing that issue. Throughout the day I am constantly going to ask other members their views on the dismantling of our health care system.

Right now I would like to hear from the member to see if the views of his constituents in rural Canada square with the views of urban Canada that we as national members are not spending enough time debating the economy of this country. What are they saying to him as to some of the things we should be doing?

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, my colleague and my friend, for the question and his interest. I would like to say from the outset that the hon. member has followed this debate from the beginning and has made many interventions. Basically he has the best interest of the medicare system at heart and is out to protect it.

In regard to the economy, if I can go back a little and quote the right hon. Prime Minister, he promised Canadians that he would give them jobs, jobs and jobs. I guess that is going to be a major quote for historians.

What we have is unemployment. We have unemployment and we have more unemployment. The unemployment rate in my riding is 18.5 per cent. My constituents are telling me that we have to get moving on the economy. We have to put our people back to work. We have to.

I just attended a conference on the weekend. I must congratulate the people from my riding on their initiative. There are two groups working because we have two distinct areas in my riding. They have just put together an economic conference. They are developing a strategy, an economic strategy for their region. In the other region in my riding we are having a meeting this Saturday to implement or set up the committee that is going to implement an economic conference for that part of the riding. As such they are going to identify sectoral areas where they will put forth priorities. Then they are going to develop strategies and approach governments for that.

To get back to the federal presence, I still feel that is the key. If the federal government does not show confidence in an area, why should the entrepreneur? For instance, in my area we were a major centre for CN over the years. We had roughly 1,500 jobs with CN going back 10 or 15 years. Now we have fewer than 200. What does that tell the entrepreneur if the federal government is removing jobs from that area? What type of confidence does it give?

• (1100)

It was the same thing with VIA Rail. The forestry industry is in a complete disarray. We have layoffs. We have down time in many of our mills. We even had a mill, a major employer of the region, Atholville Pulp Inc., close permanently, supposedly. We are trying to get it reopened. We are looking for a buyer. We are looking to diversify. We are working on that aspect. If we look at the Dalhousie Mill, not 10 or 15 years ago it had somewhere around 1,500 employees in it woodlands operation and mill operations. There are fewer than 1,000 now and going lower.

Obviously there is a problem with the economy. We need help. It is up to the federal government to help. I am not asking for hand-outs. I am not asking to take the wallet out and start giving out money here and there. People want to work. They want their pride and their dignity.

What I am asking is: Why not? When it comes time to look at new centres where there could be employment opportunities, why not put them in a little area like Restigouche–Chaleur, especially in this day and age with the type of telecommunications that we have? We a are forestry based area. Why not have a forestry centre down there that employs 50 people with good paying jobs. That sends a message out there. It sends a message that the government is confident that this area is going to survive.

Turning to the port of Belledune in Dalhousie, what is wrong with having an on-site manager or a strategy developed? I guess when we talk about industrial strategy, we do not have one in Canada let alone for each of the provinces, although I should use this opportunity to congratulate the province of Quebec for releasing the first industrial strategy of any province yesterday. Let us hope it works. That is a model for us and maybe we should be using it more.

The federal government seems intent on cutting and cutting and cutting during hard times. That is when it should be doing the opposite: stimulating and stimulating. It should be investing.

I give another example of the poor village of Dorchester that has a reputation and background for serving the justice system. When new facilities came online for a women's detention centre that should have been the number one spot. Where did it go in Atlantic Canada? I sort of wonder why those decisions are made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has two and a half minutes for a question or a comment. If he expects an answer, I expect him to give the hon. member a little time.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to compliment my colleague for his remarks on this piece of legislation. Near the end of his remarks he spoke about the increase in the unemployment insurance premiums and the fact that they have been further increased by this government right in the middle of one of the most serious recessions we have had in Canada.

I want to ask a question of my colleague who comes from a riding in which the forestry sector is a very important part of his local economy. As he knows, the forestry sector is going through a very rough time in Canada at the moment. Some say it is the worst time it has experienced since or even more serious than the Depression.

I have a company in my constituency, Stora Forest Industries. It is a very good company. It has been a very loyal employer and is the economic heart of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. It has been experiencing the same downturn that other forestry companies have been experiencing across Canada. One of the last blows it has received has been these increases in unemployment insurance premiums, on top of the increases which are scheduled for this bill. These increases are very inappropriate, particularly because they come at a time when the government should be using the unemployment insurance program to stimulate the economy, not to dampen the economy.

I want to ask my colleague if he has had the same experience in his riding, with the forestry sector that he knows so well, in northern New Brunswick.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the question. I can assure him that I have met with the stakeholders in the forestry industry in my riding. Again, they assure me that there are tough times out there. In fact they are comparing the times to the great depression years.

Some of those factors we talk about maybe are the industry's own doing, but there are others they have no control over which we do have control over and the government has control over: for instance, fiscal policy, UIC premiums and tax designs, no doubt.

What the hon. member has asked me is exactly what the problem is. The government is not stimulating during hard times. When hard times are out there in the economy, rather than trying to help out the government is as bad as the next person. It cuts, cuts, cuts.

Where is the end of it? Stop cutting and start stimulating the economy. Why increase UI premiums? It is another form of tax. Small business cannot handle it. Big business cannot handle it. Not only that, the employees have to pay their share as well. They have not kept up with the pace of inflation over the years. They have less money in their pockets when they get home. As such, it is a vicious circle and the government has not broken that vicious circle. It has never even tried to break that vicious circle. It has continued to add to the problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to adopt certain measures to implement the budget tabled on February 26 this year, measures that clearly reflect part of the government's strategy for reducing the deficit. However, if we are to understand the strategy as a whole, we should also consider the approaches to controlling inflation that were agreed on with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Briefly, the measures contained in this bill are being taken at a time when we are experiencing the first made-in-Canada recession, a recession deliberately brought about to control inflation.

During the pre-recession period, we had very high interest rates which had a very negative impact on the federal government's deficit. The cost of servicing the debt, already very high, increased by 28 per cent over two years, before the present budget.

But consider what happens during the recession. During the recession, unemployment and unemployment insurance payments go up. There is also an increase in welfare payments, which during the last recession in 1981-82 went up by 32 per cent. We all know that health care costs, which normally increase by 2 or 3 per cent plus inflation, because of our aging population increase even faster during a recession. And we know that post-secondary education costs also increase faster during a recession, because students tend to stay in college and university.

During the recession, we also see a drop in inflation and interest rates. So what is the impact of all these measures on budgets? Apparently, the federal government is transferring all the costs of the recession to employees and employers by incredibly increasing unemployment insurance contributions by 24.5 per cent in the last budget and another 7 per cent not long ago. The remaining costs of the recession are being transferred to the provinces.

The measures before the House today contain all the tools the federal government needs to avoid recession-induced costs in the areas of health care, social assistance and post-secondary education. The provinces will have to shoulder all these costs, which are, and will be, very substantial.

At the same time, interest rates are going down—for instance, the government predicted that interest rates would be around 9 per cent, while they are now down to 7 per cent—and as a result, the federal deficit will become more manageable. Of course, the government kept the benefits of declining rates and transferred to businesses, individuals and the provinces the costs of rising rates in a recession.

If that keeps up, in a few more weeks, the federal government will brag that it can control its deficit, when in fact it passed it on to the provinces and businesses.

Yesterday I heard the Prime Minister say that he was reluctant to call an economic conference, as requested by the provinces, and I understand that very well. He even dared to say that would force the provinces to control their budgets. What will the provinces do to control their budgets? They will raise taxes or do what Quebec did: pass the costs on to the municipalities. Transferring costs to the municipalities will also result in tax increases. Higher university tuition fees have become the main cause of inflation.

We are at a point where we are in danger of not reaching our inflation objectives, precisely because the federal government is passing costs on to the provinces, municipalities and universities.

For the first time, in this morning's Globe & Mail, a group of 17 economists consulted in forecasting institutions told us that Canada's economic growth is likely to be less than predicted, that Canada's current account deficit will increase considerably and that inflation will be higher.

I thought that was impossible after such drastic measures had been taken. Inflation is likely to be higher because the only way that local and provincial governments can get out of the situation in which the federal government has put them is to raise taxes considerably and thus add to inflation.

Therefore, I think that some balance must quickly be restored. You know that in the 1980s, the federal government spent like mad and ran up huge deficits. For a while, I think we were right to believe that the deficit had gone out of control. Of course, our debt is unacceptably high. We must reduce the deficit; we must also try to keep lower inflation rates. But with such drastic measures as we have taken, we risk not only keeping the economy in a deep recession but also fuelling inflation.

A change of course is in order. For an example of the federal government's past spending habits, refer to the latest report of the Economic Council of Canada. Of course, the federal government's fiscal capacity is mortgaged for several more years, until 1994–95, but we are told that after 1995–96, there may be some room to manoeuvre. Room to do what? It is purely theoretical, because the expenses that are harder to control have been transferred to the provinces and we realize increasingly that they will be unable to assume them fully.

For the first time Ontario's deficit will reach $10 billion. The Minister of Finance of course was prompt to blame the Ontario governement for everything. It is a fact that it did increase its spending by $800 million, but had they not injected these new funds in an effort to boost the economy, Ontario's deficit would still have been close to $9 billion and would have gone on forever.

With the new distribution put in place as a result of Bill C–20, we can be sure that the provinces, all of them, will have increasing deficits and I would not be surprised that, within a few months, they saw their credit rating drop drastically in terms of their borrowing capacity.

As we know, in general the cost of borrowing is higher for the provinces than for the federal government. Analysts in growing numbers anticipate that the gap will widen even further. So, by transferring its deficit over to the provinces, of course the federal government pressures provinces and municipalities to cut their spending. By so doing, it is also creating inflation and as a result the cost of financing such deficits will skyrocket. The rate of borrowing for provinces and municipalities is always at least 75 percentage points higher than for the federal government and is likely to go up another full point or even to 1.25 points in the next few months, which means additional costs for no reason.

And that is not all. Let us keep in mind that, even if we could find a way out of this one and if somehow the federal government still had room to manoeuvre, there is no guarantee that these spending choices would suit the Canadian people. Let me give you some figures. We are told that provinces are still receiving payments and that is true, to a point, but the amounts are cut drastically and much more so than federal spending is curtailed.

Provincial transfers amount to 22 percent of the federal budget. Yet, they account for 34 percent of the cuts operated by the federal government. Obviously, we are cutting much more in areas considered essential by the Canadian people—health, post-secondary education—than in the defence budget, the financing of a variety of constitutional initiatives by the federal government, etc.

I think there is cause for alarm, because a system in which the federal government has the power to spend and then to unilaterally decide to transfer its debts to the provinces leaves us with basically no way out. Not only provincial governments, which control their expenditures fairly well, cannot be sure of their budgets because federal transfers are constantly being reduced, but they also know full well— Remember what happened in the 1988 election. This government, which must have been aware of its financial situation, promised $2.5 billion for child care. Well, Mr. Speaker, the day after the election, we had to forget about that promise because the Minister of Finance suddenly discovered that the government was faced with a huge deficit and had to cut everywhere.

Will the 1993 election bring us the same kind of promises? Of course, Mr. Speaker. It would be even worse if those promises were kept, because we would likely see further cuts in transfer payments to provinces. It is absolutely unbearable. In Quebec, though, the situation leads us to believe that we may be able to solve our problem sooner. But in a Canadian perspective, it is imperative that provinces have some control over federal spending. The present situation does not make any sense.

Any initiative taken by a federal government with the slightest amount of leeway could make the situation a lot worse.

• (1120)

The traditional role of the federal government in the economic recovery, is presently limited to issuing, with a lot of publicity, documents as meaningless as the one on Canada's prosperity. No solution is proposed. Citizens are asked to call in and give their opinions, to offer solutions to the government. It is incredible. Of course, nobody talks about it any more; we do not know if many people called in. There must have been just a few since no new solution has been announced. More and more, we feel that action is being taken on a local level and that this government is unable to obtain the consensus that would be necessary to ensure long-term growth.

Even though we agree that the deficit needs to be controlled, even though we agree that certain measures need to be taken, some elements are acceptable. I am referring particularly to the limited growth of expenditures for richer provinces. Those elements are acceptable, but they are put in a context that makes them virtually impossible to manage, because not only are provinces limited in their spending, but the whole cost of the recession is passed on to them. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have to oppose most of the elements contained in this bill.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Rosemont. He gave a very accurate picture of the present economic situation. However, I have a problem with his speech. I think that the confidence of investors in the Canadian economy is very shaky right now. There are many reasons for that of course, but I think that the problems we are having in the constitutional debate is one of them. I think that the things the separatists have said are not helping the economy at this time. Does the hon. member believe that what they said is good for the Canadian economy?

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the growth of business investments in Canada was excellent during the 80s, perhaps too optimistic, because the same people have decided to stir up the Constitution crisis. And now we are scowled at as if we were responsible for the crisis. We are not, Mr. Speaker. A process was in place, which was challenged perhaps by short-sighted people. That being said, there is no doubt that the present situation regarding investments has much more to do with uncertainty about the possibility of restoring confidence among heavily indebted consumers and transferring to the provinces a very heavy tax burden. We know that they have very little room to boost the economy and that consumers' borrowing capacity is limited. As for the American economic recovery, we must realize that, for the first time, we have created a recession made in Canada before the U.S. got into a recession. Historically, Canada had always followed in the footsteps of the U.S. But this time, in order to fight inflation, we have brought about a made-in-Canada recession before the American recession, with the hope perhaps of getting out of it first. That was not allowing for the fact that the American economic recovery is— That showed a total disregard for the fact that the American economic recovery is essential to our own recovery, given the levels of our exports.

Because the American growth is slow, our exports are growing slowly and Canada has had a trade deficit for the first time in 15 years. I think that we are paying for the lack of responsibility displayed by the federal government since the early 80s. Mind you, I am quite happy with the efforts that were made to control the deficit. The problem is though, basically, not so much the necessity for controlling the deficit as the way it is controlled. Transferring the deficit to the provinces and municipalities leads to much higher taxes. For example, in Quebec, inflation due to the private sector is nearly zero, but the total inflation figure is 7 per cent. Why? Because the Quebec government decided to limit its deficit, to raise taxes considerably, to pass the costs on to municipalities, which in turn increase their taxes, and to double tuition fees.

So in the end, the federal government creates inflation by transferring its responsibilities to the provinces. As for medium-term investment in Quebec, I would tell you that we are very optimistic, especially if Quebec attains sovereignty.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member told us that if this bill passes, Quebec would no longer receive money for health and education, for established programs. He also said that he does not agree with the way the government is fighting the deficit, and we agree with him on that. We in the Liberal Party have said many times in the House that we did not agree with the government's strategy of passing its deficit on to the provinces and municipalities. We agree on that point, but he wants to make Quebec a sovereign state, so it would no longer receive federal transfers. Taxes in Quebec are already among the highest in Canada. Does he think that in a competitive economic situation, Quebec, which already has trouble accepting the reduced transfers that will result from this bill, will not be further disadvantaged if it accepts no more transfers, in addition to having to make up for much of its accumulated share of the federal deficit should it become independent?

I ask the hon. member how he can reconcile his comments of today with a sovereign Quebec which would have even higher taxes than now and would get even less support from other parts of Canada.

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my dear colleague forgets one thing, namely the taxes collected by the federal government in Quebec. I would have no objection to the transfers provided for in Bill C–20 if at the same time the government transferred the appropriate taxing authority to the provinces. I can see that my colleague has a different point of view, since he comes from the Maritimes, which depend on federal transfers for up to 40 or 50 per cent or their provincial budgets. That is not at all the case in Quebec.

• (1130)

If the government wants to transfer funds, if it wants to transfer the costs of health care, transfer the authority to raise taxes for it. The present government is transferring the accounts payable but keeping the revenue. Of course, federalism is less and less profitable for Quebec under these conditions. We understand the objective of reducing the federal deficit and I repeat that I have no objection to that, but keep things in proportion. The transfers of costs are now such that they may well be counterproductive.

I think of my colleague who is worried about the investment climate. I would advise him and his party, as well as the Prime Minister and others, to read again report by the Economic Council of Canada, which say that if Quebec becomes sovereign, all parties should talk about maintaining the economic union. Of course, speeches such as the one made by the Prime Minister last Sunday are likely to scare a few people, but not serious investors.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–20 which I think is a significant piece of legislation not only in terms of fiscal management but in terms of social policy in Canada.

I had an interesting experience in the last couple of weeks, talking with a number of young people in my riding, people who are the same age as my son and daughter, in their mid–twenties. We got to talking about the present threat to our national health care program. Much to my surprise I found out that people in that age group simply took our national health care system for granted.

They assumed that when you went to the hospital you would not have to pay, that you would receive a high level of care and that you would not be required on admittance to prove that you were financially able to afford the care. They took for granted that if you needed to go to a doctor you simply went to a doctor, you did not first of all consider your financial position and determine whether you were financially able to go to seek medical care.

I think it is important when we start talking about this bill that we remember very clearly that that has not always been the case in Canada.

I remember very clearly while growing up that I had an older brother who developed a major illness. At that time we were living in a small prairie town in southern Alberta very near the American border. He spent periods of time in hospital in Lethbridge.

The financial resources of my family were strained to the point that they could no longer afford to provide him with the necessary medical care. It was finally arranged that this youngster who was then in his early teens would have to go to seek medical care at a mission hospital north of Edmonton, hundreds of miles away from his home and his family, simply because the mission hospital was funded by the United Church and was prepared to give the necessary medical treatment without immediate payment by my parents. Canadians of my children's age simply do not believe that. They find it totally incomprehensible that that kind of thing could have taken place in Canada.

I had another experience just before I was elected to this House when I was travelling in New Zealand. My mother who is getting on in years joined us for a period of time. She fell and broke her ankle. We thought nothing of immediately seeking out the best medical care available. Much to our surprise we found out that in New Zealand through an accident insurance scheme much like our Workers' Compensation Board the medical expenses of all accident victims were paid for. This includes even foreign residents.

We got to know a number of other people in the hospital. One of them was a woman from the United States who also had the misfortune of falling and breaking her leg which was compounded in a number of places and had difficult breaks. It resulted in her being in hospital in New Zealand for a number of months before she could be transported back to the United States.

I ended up driving her back to the airport and she told me that she and her husband had just retired. He had to go back to the United States because he could not stay in New Zealand. They were not wealthy but they were comfortable and had been planning an active life in retirement. She said that if she had fallen in the United States they would have been financially ruined even with the fact that they had some medical coverage. They would have been absolutely financially decimated to the point that they probably would have had to file for bankruptcy. Certainly they would not have been looking forward to their retirement years with any assets or comforts.

I think Canadians should start remembering that by taking our health care system for granted we are in danger of losing it. This legislation is part of a consistent process of erosion of our national health care system.

Our health care system did not come about easily in this country. It was gained through foresight and struggle after having been introduced by Tommy Douglas in Saskatchewan. It is important to remember that is where the initial and decisive fight for the establishment of medicare took place. The people who were opposed to it were very powerful people. They were the Liberal opposition and doctors. Other special interest groups staged a strike and fought desperately to try to preserve their rights and their privileges and prevent a universal health insurance system.

That battle was won and finally the federal government was forced into bringing in national medicare on a federal level.

• (1140)

This program has been successful in ensuring that all Canadians have access to a high standard of health care.

We have now had a series of attacks on this by the present Tory government. I will not go into the history of the initial 50:50 program and how that program was eroded when the block funding came in. It is important for this House and the Canadian public to understand that the present Established Programs Financing which was put in place in the late 1970s was based on the federal government transferring to the provinces money for post-secondary education and health care. It was not based on the amount of money spent by the provinces but on the growth in population and the growth in GNP.

The federal government tried to make much of the fact that the health care costs of the provinces have gone up dramatically and they have. The federal government has tried to make much of the fact that the provinces have to contain the cost of health care and they do. The formula that has existed for transferring of moneys had nothing to do with those things. It had only to do with the increase in the GNP. If there was no increase in the GNP the federal government did not increase its contribution to the provinces other than for the increase in the population.

This government has decided to unilaterally change that formula. Being from British Columbia I figure that the government must have somehow taken lessons from the previous Socred administration in that province. Maybe it was when the hon. Minister of Justice switched from being a Socred provincially and became a Tory federally. She came down from British Columbia to Ottawa and brought the Socred way of handling their fiscal incompetence. Now it is called offloading.

The government does not bother to control its own expenditures on advertising. It does not even bother to try to control its own expenditures on the growth of government or in areas where it has direct responsibility. It simply offloaded the problems on to municipalities, school boards and hospitals by cutting their funding.

It simply said: "We know we cannot fiscally control our expenditures but what we can do is simply freeze the moneys we will transfer to other levels".

This is what the government has now adopted. The Socred approach to fiscal management is simply: "Let us offload our deficit and debt on somebody else. Let us offload on the provinces. We will simply decide that we are not going to continue with the formula for transferring of payments. We will cut back". When it got away with cutting back to 2 per cent or 3 per cent less GNP it decided to zero it. This bill now extends that zeroing for five years. It simply says: "Let us wash our hands of any responsibility and offload all of those problems on to the provinces".

What does that mean in terms of our national health care? It means a number of things. First and foremost it means that the provincial governments have dramatically less money to spend on national health care. The cumulative effect of these cuts on health care have been estimated as being $62.4 billion. I am not talking about post-secondary education. In the final years it will amount to around $10 billion a year in lost revenue. I make it clear again that this is lost revenue based on the increase in GNP. It is not based on costs or anything else. This is money that the provincial governments had anticipated. They thought they were in a fiscal arrangement they could count on to build their health care systems around.

It has been devastating already. Some of the weaker provinces, particularly the Atlantic provinces, have had to make dramatic cutbacks to their health care system. Newfoundland in one fell swoop had to lay off 10 per cent of its nursing staff. That is just year one. Wait till the cumulative effects of year three, four and five take place. Even wealthy provinces are feeling the economic pinch. British Columbia will have lost over $5 billion by the year 2000. This year alone it is losing about $500 million.

This has tremendous impact on local communities' ability to deliver health care. What happens is the province is then forced to offload their loss of revenue on to local communities and local hospitals.

My community of Surrey North is one of the fastest growing communities in Canada. We simply have been unable to get the funds to keep up with the necessary health care services that are needed. We only have 1.1 acute hospital beds per 1,000 population. The provincial average is 3.3. In Surrey 40 per cent of the people have to leave to get basic health care. We are 34 public health nurses short. We are 27 health inspectors short of meeting the needs of that community. I think it is important to note that those last two figures are probably more critical than the loss of acute care beds. We all know that one of the things we have to do is change our health care system from a treatment of chronic or acute illness to a health prevention system. But it is often those soft health prevention programs that suffer when there are arbitrary and unnecessary cuts in payments.

There is another thing that is happening concerning the loss of transfer payments and that is the federal government's ability to maintain a national health care system with national standards. The federal government will no longer be transferring cash to Ontario and Quebec by 1995, 1996 and 1997 because of the cutbacks under this bill. That means it will have no ability to enforce national standards. It will be transferring no cash to any of the provinces by the year 2004. This means that of course the ability to enforce national standards under the Canada Health Act will be non-existent.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that I have one minute. I do not believe—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member started at 11.28 a.m. and he finished at 11.48 a.m.

Mr. Karpoff: Thank you very much.

• (1150)

I acknowledge that the Speaker is right. I am just surprised that my time has gone so quickly. I want to make just one or two points then, very quickly.

The federal government thought that it could bring in a new section under Bill C-20 that says that once it is transferring no cash payments under block funding to the provinces, it can then attach other moneys to enforce the Canada Health Act.

That is spurious. It is unworkable, and it is not going to take place. There have already been a number of legal opinions that simply say that it is unconstitutional, that there is no way under the federal spending powers and division of powers between the provinces, if the federal government is not putting money into health care, it can then withhold other moneys in order to enforce its national standards in health care.

Second, what moneys is it going to attach? Is it going to attach moneys from the Canada Assistance Plan? Does this government really think that it is going to take moneys from hungry children in order to insist that the province meet its standards on a national health care program? Is it going to take money from child abuse, because that is what the Canada Assistance Plan does?

It covers moneys to guarantee minimum income to children. It provides moneys for people to investigate child abuse. Does it really think that it is going to do that? In the context of the climate in Canada where we are having to look for a new federalism, does the federal government really think that it can bow, financially, out of any obligation for health care, and at the same time insist that it is going to decide what are the national standards and enforce them by withholding other payments?

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the member for Surrey North.

I wish that he were a member in my province this morning because everything that he said he could help me transmit that to the New Democratic premier of Ontario.

I received a letter from a Dr. Philip G. Klotz, as a matter of fact yesterday. He happened to overhear part of the debate. Believe me, the medical profession in this country shares many of the member's views and concerns about where we are going in health care in this country.

Dr. Klotz talked about the control of costs by government attempting to deny funds to hospitals and medical schools. He made some notes here: "Hospitals are forced to close beds, close operating rooms, use antiquated facilities and fire personnel. Medical schools are pinched for funds, cannot hire superior people and must fire personnel. Superior doctors are leaving for the U.S.A. Staff at teaching hospitals cannot be replaced. There is control of cost by limiting fees to doctors and threatening them with lower salaries, global budgets and income ceilings. There are no restraints placed on the public to restrain utilization except by limiting access to facilities".

He went on and on. He talked about the morale of the medical profession being at an all time low. It is full of uncertainty. Doctors are resentful of being blamed for problems in health care. Many of our best professionals now are being accused of being "interested only in money".

There is a serious problem here with our health care system, our medicare system in this country. This is a tough issue. It is tough for the government which is faced with a fiscal dilemma, although I do not share its approach. I think the more it is cut, the more it suppresses morale. The lower your morale, the tougher it is to produce and work together.

That is where I think it has created this sort of vicious circle. I think it really has to go back and re-examine its approach. I have a question for the New Democratic Party member from Surrey North. What can he say to me to help me make sure that the New Democratic premier of Ontario does not give up on the national health care standards that we have worked so hard to maintain in this country over so many years, knowing full well that the national government, through Bill C-20, is cutting back.

I am not trying to put all that on the shoulders of the NDP government in Ontario, but I need to know what we can do or say to make sure, despite the pressure from the national government, that the premier of Ontario does not cause an implosion of the health care system in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I think that the New Democratic Party in all three of the areas where it has formed the government in the last year, is facing a fiscal crisis left by the previous governments and compounded by this government.

The cuts in transfer payments to Ontario this year alone will amount to about $2.5 billion. It is facing a rising deficit within its own province, but a particularly large chunk of that deficit is because the federal government has simply offloaded its responsibility on to the province. Ontario has been forced to make up about $2.5 billion which previously it received in transfer payments.

All provinces in Canada are looking at ways of making our health care system more efficient. One member seemed to imply that he favoured the doctors being able to ultimately raise their fees to whatever they wanted, that he did not favour any limits to the medical fees.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Karpoff: He says that is right, so he thinks doctors should be able to charge anything they want. Is that Liberal policy? Is that the way they are going to solve the health care crisis? Does that also mean that he is in favour of extra billing or user fees?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Karpoff: The doctor simply is going to bill whatever he wants and the provincial government is going to pay.

One of the things that is happening in this country is that the provinces are looking at a number of ways to rationalize and maximize their health care systems.

There have been reports in nearly every province that set out a number of things that provinces must do. There is the Seaton report in British Columbia. One of the things that we must come to grips with is the whole question of the numbers and distribution of physicians. There is a consensus and every report says we are probably training 500 more doctors a year in this country than we need. In the metropolitan areas there are far too many doctors for the population and in the rural areas we do not have enough. The provinces are going to have to come to grips with this in conjunction with the federal government to determine how we can provide an equal distribution of physician services throughout the country.

That is one of the things the provincial governments are going to have to do. They are certainly going to have to develop more community based programs as an alternative to institutional care. Every report says that.

One of the problems when the federal government cuts back on money, is that it is the very money that could be used by the provinces for new programs, innovative health care, evaluation of health care and it is lost. Therefore, it weakens the provincial government's ability to do those kinds of economic efficiency developments that are going to be necessary if we are going to continue with a health care system. There are areas in our national health care system that we must face and rationalize, but it must be done within the partnership that has been established between the federal and provincial governments. I believe that is what is so terrible about this legislation. It destroys the partnership that now exists between the federal and provincial governments.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I had not intended to speak on this bill this morning but after hearing what has been said since this sitting began, I feel compelled to rise and try to explain to Canadians listening what the purpose of Bill C-20 is, as well as the Canadian reality.

Unfortunately, my colleagues across the floor of the House do not mention the Canadian reality in their comments. What we are hearing has more to do with past dreams or future dreams, than with reality.

What is the Canadian reality? On the one hand there is the federal government which gives annually certain sums of money to the provinces. It does that in two ways, through two entirely different programs. The first is the Established Programs Financing, which gives all provinces the same per capita amount. Then there is the other program, called equalization, whereby the less well-off provinces receive supplementary sums of money from the federal government. These are the two main transfers of funds from the federal government to the provinces.

This morning we heard about health, hospitals and so on, and we heard that health care and hospital care in the provinces would suffer because of the amount of money given by the federal government. Nothing is further from the truth. No figures were given this morning or, rather, the figures given were not related to what we should be looking at.

In 1984-85, the federal government gave to the provinces $14.5 billion under the Established Programs Financing. In 1990-91, it gave a little over $20 billion, I think it was $20.1 billion. In 1991-92, it will be $20.4 billion and in 1992-93, $20.6 billion, under the Established Programs Financing or EPF only. As I said, this is paid equally throughout Canada on a per capita basis.

I now come to equalization payments. In 1984-85, they amounted to $5.4 billion, in 1990-91, $8.1 billion, in 1991-92, $8.465 billion, or almost $8.5 billion and in 1992-93, $9 billion. As I said, equalization payments are for poorer provinces to allow them to continue providing their residents with the things that we want all Canadians to have.

We can see that from 1984-85 to 1991-92, there was a considerable increase in both major programs. If we look, for example, at the Canada Assistance Plan, which applies to all provinces, except Quebec, in 1984-85, equalization payments were $4 billion, in 1990-91, $6 billion, in 1991-92, $6.3 billion and in 1992-93, $6.6 billion.

Again, we see a normal and reasonable growth in the federal government transfers to the provinces. I think we have to explain that, because we hear from the Opposition that there were cuts in the funds given by the federal government to the provinces. There have been no cuts and there will be no cuts. What there has been and will be is a reduction in the growth of federal transfers to the provinces.

In my riding of Trois-Rivières, people understand that. When you say to someone that his pay raise is reduced, he understands that he has got a raise.

Mr. Langlois: Yes.

Mr. Vincent: In Trois-Rivières and in the riding of Manicouagan—

Mr. Langlois: They understand that.

Mr. Vincent: —they understand that, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced that in your riding too, they understand that.

But here, the Opposition on the other side of the House does not understand that. They do not understand that there has been and there will be, under Bill C-20, a reduction in the growth of federal transfers to the provinces. Yet, I just gave them the figures. If they do not understand the wording of the bill, they could understand the figures. Those figures go up.

In my riding of Trois-Rivières, when the figures go up, everyone is happy. I think that here too, everyone should be happy when figures go up. But unfortunately, that is not the case.

We could ask: Why is the increase reduced? There is only one answer to that question: There is a national debt, not a federal debt, but an enormous national debt that must be controlled and reduced. Some say that we have been talking about that for a long time and that they have had enough. We are also sick and tired of talking about it but it is a fact we must learn to live with and that will determine the shape of Canada's future. We must reduce the national debt and bring it under control. I underline "national", Mr. Speaker, to show clearly that the debt is not that of the federal government. It's the responsibility of the country as a whole. Which is why all levels of government in Canada must do their share in the control and reduction of that debt.

It is not the sole responsibility of the federal government. The provinces, municipalities and each and every Canadian have a share in it. The provinces may argue that they did not create that debt, that it was the doing of the previous federal governments. Rightly so but still, they benefited from the money the federal government borrowed so it could give them funds. That's why they must help us solve our debt crisis.

The present government did what it had to do since coming to power. The average annual increase in federal spending has been around 3.5 per cent since 1984. Looking at the provincial spending increases since 1984, from 1984-85 to 1990-91, I see that the average increase is 7.6 per 100 in Newfoundland; 8.4 per 100 in Prince Edward Island; 6.1 per 100 in Nova Scotia; 6.9 per 100 in New Brunswick; 5.5 per 100 in Quebec; 10.2 per 100 in Ontario; 6.2 per 100 in Manitoba; 6.1 per 100 in Saskatchewan; 4.7 per 100 in Alberta; 7.6 per 100 in British Columbia; 11.8 per 100 in Yukon and 11.7 per 100 in Northwest Territories, which makes up a general average of 7.4 per 100 for all provinces. Now, federal spending increases average 3.7 per 100 for the period from 1984 to 1991. One has to wonder whether provinces are not increasing their spending thanks to the money they get from Ottawa whereas we here have to tighten our belt in order to control and take in hand our national debt. Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I do the debt figures for each one of the provinces. They are a lot less indebted than the federal government, and I commend them for it.

I think those figures speak for themselves as they reflect the Canadian reality, the problems this government has to deal with so that our country enjoys a good economic situation in an immediate future. An individual or a company or a public administration which owes too much money is no more in control of its decisions. And from the moment an administration or an individual is no more in control of its decisions, the situation can go anywhere. Canada is in control of its decisions, but it has an enormous debt. If we want to continue to be in control of our decisions, we have to take the necessary steps to reduce the debt and, in turn, manage our finances properly.

Looking at the figures I quoted, we realize that what we heard this morning from the other side of the House does not reflect reality. Let us take for example my own province, the beautiful province of Quebec. In 1984–85, the fiscal year in which we were elected, Quebec was getting $8.1 billion from the federal government, that is $1,256 per capita. In 1991–92, this fiscal year, the government of Quebec will receive $10,599,000,000, that is almost $10.6 billion, or $1,541 per capita. The federal government will give Quebec $1,541 per capita, through only two programs, the Established Programs Financing and the equalization program. According to my calculations, between 1984–85 and 1991–92, there was an increase of $300 per capita in Quebec. I heard some of my colleagues say that the federal government was offloading its deficit on the provinces. In Trois-Rivières, when that happens, there is no increase of $300 after seven years. That is what we have here. That is what we must realize.

It is all a matter of figures. Figures show that, between 1984–85 and 1991–92, every resident of Quebec, through his or her government, will have received from the federal government $300, thanks to two specific programs. So, you see, Mr. Speaker, there was no offloading. There was just good management from Ottawa. Bill C–20 is another example of good management. Of course, Mr. Speaker, as the federal government, we would like to give more to the provinces and to everyone, that is for sure. Being politicians, we like to give because it makes people happy; if we take something from them, that makes them unhappy and they do not have kind words to say about us.

When we were elected, we were also given major responsibilities, and I am not talking only about the government, but also about the Opposition. They are duly elected to administer this country, and that requires decisions that are not necessarily easy and that do not necessarily make people happy. Sometimes, you have to say no in order to secure the well-being of this country. And the well-being of this country, at least in my riding of Trois-Rivières, is a matter of bread and butter. When people are happy in a buoyant economy, all the rest seems to fall pretty well into place. But when the economy is not in good shape, there is discontent.

We are saddled with an enormous debt and we have to pay huge interest costs on that debt. We have to make decisions in order to reduce that debt and pay those costs. Bill C–20 should be seen in that context. We are not taking anything away from the provinces. I mentioned figures to show that they will receive each year an increasing amount compared to what they were getting when we came to power, although it is true that they will get less than what they could have expected. That will be part of their effort to help this government and the Canadian Parliament make our economy stronger. One way of making it stronger is to control our national debt as opposed to the federal debt.

I see that my time is up, and I would like to thank you, Mr. Speaker. I urge the opposition parties to come to terms with the situation we are in and to remember the mandate they were given by their constituents. And the mandate they got is not strictly to oppose, but to run and manage the country called Canada.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I listened closely to what my hon. colleague opposite has just said. As an opposition member, I too would very much like this country to be managed reasonably, in such a way that we could give people the kinds of programs and the kinds of things they want. But, you know, it is very hard for opposition members to do their job, to do the things for which they were elected, when we are continually faced with a government that orders us around and tells us: "We know it all; you know absolutely nothing."

We too sometimes have good ideas that are worth listening to. I would like to see the day when we could sit together and discuss in a positive way instead of being called a bunch of fools, instead of being told that we know absolutely nothing, that the people we represent don't know what they are talking about, that the government knows it all, that it have all the answers.

• (1220)

We ask if you are willing to help us. Some day, gentlemen, if you are lucky enough to be here still, you will be in opposition and you will know how frustrating it is to submit a good idea and to be continually put down for it. This does not help the country. You see where that has gotten us today.

If you are so lucky as to be here the next time—and I doubt it—will you be willing, I ask you, to help us if we find ourselves in your situation? As far as I am concerned, and I know many of my colleagues are of the same opinion, we will be willing to work with the opposition parties instead of telling them all the time that what they say does not make any sense.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, allow me first to tell my hon. colleague that she has a very nice dress, and the colour of it is fantastic. I just wanted to tell her how nice the colour is. I hope that she will wear that dress regularly.

This being said, I do not agree with my colleague when she argues that we never listen to the opposition members and their suggestions. Take for example Bill C–44, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code. Just last Friday, I conducted the debate in this House on C–44, which deals with a problem that relates specifically to the riding of Trois–Rivières. I worked in co–operation with her party's critic for labour matters and with her party's leader in the House, and on Friday, we succeded, thanks to the NDPs for their help, in agreeing to this very important legislation both for my region and for Canada.

Cooperation is possible but, again, on one condition, provided that numbers are also understood. I am willing to help my honorable colleague, and she knows it, but she must avoid asking for money whenever she submits an idea. Her ideas must not be always accompanied by a request for money, because then we have a problem: there is no money. But if you want to address ideas, I think that all members on this side of the House are always willing to cooperate, and committees are there to demonstrate it.

In conclusion, allow me Mr. Speaker to encourage my honorable colleague to tell her liberal colleagues of the other place that if they can agree to bill C–44 today, the people in my riding of Trois–Rivières will be quite pleased with it. If she can carry this message, I will gladly do the same for her on another occasion.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the parliamentary secretary.

He said during his speech that this is an issue of figures. Well, I do not agree with the parliamentary secretary. This is not just an issue of figures. There is obviously something wrong when in spite of the transfers to the provinces, our health care system has never been in such disarray. That applies to every region of the country.

Either we are putting more stress on the health care system through added usage, or if we are not doing that, then obviously there is a problem with the efficiency of the health care system.

This is where my feelings on the role of the national government may be a little different from his. The national government is the major partner, the leader in universal health care in this country. If the system is breaking down in spite of the tremendous transfers to the provinces, does he not think that maybe it should be investigated to make sure that our portion of the partnership is being managed properly? I think it is fair ball for you to say that we should deal with reality. The reality is that the health care system in this country is not functioning right now. Just cutting it and treating it with numbers alone I do not believe is the only answer. Monique Bégin had to intervene in the mid–1980s because the provinces were bringing in user fees. The national government took the lead under Pierre Trudeau and said there will be no user fees. We had a tough time but we took the lead and we said that we were major partners in health care in this country and we did not like what the provinces were doing with it.

As a constructive opposition we have a suggestion for the government and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. If you are representing to the Canadian taxpayers to the tune of close to $40 billion in transfers and we know it is not working maybe you should get beyond the figures and see how the system is being managed.

I would like to have his response to that.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. I said it was a question of figures, considering that in most of the debate on this bill, the federal government has been accused of cutting payments, which is not the case. If we are talking about another problem, our national health care program, I think he is right when he says that this program seems to be going nowhere fast. However, I have a problem. I have a problem because it has always been my understanding that health care was strictly a provincial matter. It has always been my understanding that the federal government gave money to the provinces to ensure that Canadians across the country would have the same access to a good health care system. However, if the provinces are responsible for this particular area, I don't see why I, as a federal member, or my government, should come and look at what is going on in the hospitals in the riding of Trois-Rivières and try to deal with problems that are strictly the business of the provinces.

To my knowledge, our national standard of health care seems a valid one and is the same everywhere in this country. The way health care is administered, and the kind of service patients get, do not appear to be the same everywhere, and I agree with the hon. member on that score. However, it depends on the way each province administers the health care program. I would certainly be the last person to want to interfere in matters that are strictly under provincial jurisdiction. I don't interfere with the hospitals in my riding, and our MNA does not interfere in federal matters. I agree that we do give a lot of money. However, the provincial governments were duly elected, and they were elected by the same people who elected the hon. member and who elected me. I assume they are sufficiently qualified to make good use of the money they are sent annually by the federal government to ensure that Canadians across the country receive quality health care.

I repeat, and the hon. member is shaking his head that health care is a provincial matter, I do not think we should interfere in provincial matters. This is a very sensitive issue, especially today, and there are those who are particularly thin skinned. Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has expired.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity to respond to the parliamentary secretary who has asked this House to face reality.

I will begin by asking him to face one reality which was in the headlines of every newspaper today. His own government now stands at 16 per cent in the polls in every region of Canada and no longer enjoys the trust or the confidence of Canadians. They have ceased to have any respect for its ability to govern.

The reason was amply demonstrated in the words we just heard from the parliamentary secretary this morning when he described his reality versus the reality that Canadians face. He lives in another world. He lives in a world that has been concocted by the Department of Finance to describe Canada. He does not describe the reality of my riding where there are now months upon months of waiting for the most basic surgery in the hospitals in my riding.

The University of Manitoba has had to increase its tuition fees by 20 per cent and cut staff by 125 positions because it no longer has enough money to offer a proper educational system even though the enrolment has increased by 7,000 over the last three or four years. The kids cannot get jobs so they go to university. That is the harsh reality of Canada.

The harsh reality is that Canadians believe that their health care system is what makes them Canadians for the large part. It is what makes us different. It is what has demonstrated a sense of values about mutual caring that has been the essence of this country for decades. They see a government that is dismantling it piece by piece with a callous indifference that the parliamentary secretary has already shown.

The irrationality of it is that here is a government with another $25 million for another consultation about how we become more competitive and more productive while at the very same time it is responsible for cutting back the very investments in health and education that will make us more competitive and productive. Talk about putting logic on its head.

I am going to stop right now. I hear a member of the Conservative Party saying: "What about the deficit?". I am glad he asked the question.

[Translation]

Careful, my friend! Just wait a minute.

[English]

Statistics Canada is the government's own agency. It is not a Liberal research tank or some kind of left wing think tank. The government's own statistical agency produced a report in The Economic Observer this spring.

What did it say? What is the cause of the present deficit? The cause is not an increase in social spending which has maintained a stable level of percentage of the Gross National Product for the last 15 years.

The responsibility for the deficit according to Statistics Canada is from two things. The first is that this federal government has given up revenue and handed over large amounts of revenue to corporations and others. The second is the high interest rates which this government defends as being the basis for economic health and stability. That, sir, is the cause of the deficit. Yet by attempting to create a mythology or a false argument it keeps saying: "The only way to solve the economic problems of Canada is to deal with cutting back social programs and health care and education". It is a great act and a verbal trapeze. It is a double backward somersault in logic.

One thing we can be thankful for is that Canadians do not buy it and they do not accept it. That is one reason why this government is totally bankrupt in support, authority and confidence. That is the harsh reality.

We will only solve the problems of this country when this government goes. It no longer has the ability or the confidence or the integrity to govern any longer. I wish that every Canadian could tune in to this debate over the next couple of days because Bill C-20 epitomizes just how strange and perverse the Conservatives have become.

The parliamentary secretary tried his utmost to manipulate the figures to say they have been increasing a certain amount per year. He did not say that inflation increases a certain amount per year as well. And if you actually get down to the per capita figures in 1994-1995 there will be less per capita going for health care in this country than there was in 1977-1978 when the EPF came in.

If you subtract, which I think you have to do to be fair, and use constant dollars instead of inflated dollars then this federal government would be giving less in 1994-1995 than was given in 1977-1978, almost 20 years later.

That is the contribution to our health and educational system which we are going to substantially slice. We cannot even say after 20 years of growth that we are going to be giving less. He says that is a great example of government management and administration. What kind of Tory logic, Conservative mathematics or Mulroney mathematics is it, Mr. Speaker, that tries to say that it is good management?

[Translation]

And for the province of Quebec, that great province represented by the parliamentary secretary, there will be no money left by 1996-97, because in 1996-97, there will be no more cash transfers to the province of Quebec for health care.

[English]

So even in their own province unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Please. There will be an opportunity for questions and comments after the hon. member finishes his speech. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, I will welcome those questions.

I want to point out one thing very clearly. What Bill C-20 does is eliminate year by year the federal government's cash transfers to the provinces. It begins with the province of Quebec in the mid-1990s and will end in Newfoundland around the year 2003. At that point there will be no federal cash involvement in the support of our health or our higher education. As a result we will lose the ability as a national government to have any role in the management of those affairs.

Even the present minister for trade when he was Minister of Finance and just before he escaped that sinking ship admitted that it was true that that would happen. But he said he would bring in another piece of legislation to make sure that the provinces live up to the requirements of the health care system. Except, Mr. Speaker, there is one problem with that. It will not stand up in the courts. It is not even constitutional according to legal opinion.

Here we have a situation in which the Minister of Finance in his last budget froze the total entitlements for the next three years. The cash transfers for health and education will disappear. He admits it. He says that will pose a problem for medicare. So he says: "I have a solution. I will bring in a new bill". Except, Mr. Speaker, the bill will be illegal, unconstitutional and it will not work.

What will happen? What will be the consequence? We will then have the fragmentation of our health care system. There will be a two-tier system, one for the rich and one for the poor. The medicare system which has been one of the great hallmarks, one of the great achievements of this country will cease to exist in its present form. That will be the end result of Bill C-20.

This will be a defining moment for this country in the sense of losing one of the things that has given a sense of common purpose. It gave a sense of unity in its own way. Members opposite say we must defend unity but in the meantime they dismantle and tear apart those things that have made this country unified. They have taken apart those things that have brought Canadians together. They have turned it into a country that has region against region. Why? Because there is nothing left held in common.

We sell off this Crown corporation. We destroy the post office. We rip apart medicare. There is not much of a nation left. After eight years of Tory rule they are destroying this country and Bill C-20 is the prime example of it. Exhibit A, Mr. Speaker.

• (1240)

An hon. member: Remember the deficit.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre)): Here we go about the deficit again.

Their problem is that they do not listen very well. I say, let us deal with the deficit, but let us ask the President of the Treasury Board to deal with the problem identified by his own research and by his own government agency. It is: You had better recapture some revenue and you better get your interest rates down, because it has nothing to do with social spending.

I know they have trouble reading. I know the former minister of trade and industry, Mr. Crosbie, never read the free trade act. That is why we got into that horrible mess. Now we have the President of the Treasury Board saying that he does not read his own economic analysis from his own agency called Statistics Canada, which described for him what the problem in the deficit was.

I suggest, in all charity and kindness, that the best solution for Canada in the few months remaining for this government would be to give its members a remedial reading course so they can begin to read their own documents and understand what is going on here.

Most of all, it might enable them to read Bill C-20. It sets out in black and white that beginning in the middle part of this decade and ending in the year 2003, the federal government will no longer be directly involved in the support of health care and higher education.

As a result, our ability to maintain the five principles of accessibility, portability, comprehensibility and public administration will disappear because we will no longer have any leverage to exercise on the provinces.

If a province wants to introduce user fees, it can introduce user fees. In fact, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, my co-parliamentarian from Manitoba, the member for Provencher says maybe we should have user fees. His other colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, at the health meeting in Winnipeg in September agreed. He is prepared to accept asymmetrical programming in health care. That is, if some province wants user fees and another one does not, he will buy that. He does not care about that.

I would submit to you that as soon as we begin to surrender on that front, as soon as we begin to say that there will be a health care system graduated for your ability to pay and those with the most money get the best care, that will be really the end of this country as we have known it.

It will be the end not just in terms of health care itself in what we provide, not just in terms of money, but also in terms of values, of what we believe in, one to the other. That is why this bill is so important and that is why members opposite should understand why people here feel strongly about it.

We have heard from our constituents. We understand their reality. The reality is that they see their country being destroyed. They see their country being taken apart piece by piece. They see programs that were essential to their identification and to their security as Canadians being undermined. That is the hard reality.

The reason why people are discontented, why there is such anxiety and insecurity is because the props are being taken out. The kind of social contract that we have spent decades trying to build in this country, upon which the market system and the private enterprise system of Canada has been based; the idea that there can be a fundamental framework of security and the government will act as the anchor weight to that is being thrown away. It is being put on the scrap heap by this government.

As soon as you begin to unravel that social contract, as soon as you begin to take that apart, everything else begins to dissolve with it. That is labour fighting management, in hard, conflictual terms. That is when you have region against region and community against community.

An hon. member: —put people back to work.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is the difference.

It strikes me as exceedingly strange. It is almost immoral that a member of this cabinet can sit in his seat and take great pride in an economy where 1.5 million people are out of work. That really is a great economic accomplishment.

That is something to really take great pride in, is it not? Is that not an example of a government that cares? Is that not an example of a government that really knows how to organize an economy, that it will tolerate 1.5 million Canadians unemployed? That is 1.5 million Canadians who no longer make wages, who no longer contribute taxes, who no longer can provide for their families and who must go to food banks. Rather than saying that in regret and sorrow, rather than saying that as a matter of public concern, the minister opposite takes pride in that. He thinks that is an accomplishment.

I say to you that is one reason why the headlines in every newspaper today report that the Conservative government stands at the lowest level in the polls of any government in the last half century and has lost the confidence of all Canadians.

Mr. Corbeil: That's why we have taken reasonable steps to correct the situation.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Oh. Now we are taking steps to correct the situation. Is it not interesting. Let us look at the steps they have taken. They signed a free trade agreement, so what do we have? The first trade imbalance in 15 years. There is a great important step forward. This was going to be the open sesame to great trade bounty and we have the first trade deficit in 15 years.

We have the dollar at a level which is exterminating our export industries. We have a situation where 600,000 Canadians go to food banks. When you translate that into hard economic terms, those are human beings who no longer can produce for themselves or their community. As a result they cannot buy things. They cannot buy a fridge, or clothing for their kids at Christmas time. As a result, the retail stores are shutting down. They are firing their employees who will go on reduced unemployment insurance and eventually come off.

What is happening is that the economy is shrinking. Confidence is waning. Demand no longer is there. This government has no answers other than to say that the right steps are being taken. Remarkable. The right steps are being taken.

Around them, the foundations are crumbling, but this brave minister and this brave government march on to their own tune. Unfortunately, nobody in this country is following any longer. Sooner or later their parade is going to come to an end and we are going to get this country back on the tracks again.

The first thing we are going to do is rip up this Bill C–20. That is one of the first things that goes because we are going to have to get back into the business in Canada of investing in proper health care and education. We will never be a strong, productive, competitive nation with a higher education system that is deteriorating and becoming mediocre; that cannot do research or train its students; that is firing professors and cannot buy new books for the library. We will never be a competitive, productive nation if our country begins to destroy its health care system, which gives its own people security.

It is fascinating that the United States, the great paragon of free enterprise, is now debating whether to have a Canadian style medicare system. Why? So that it can become more competitive and productive and have a nation–wide program to bring its own costs into some kind of stability. It is finding that it is paying an awful lot more through its private health insurance plans and therefore reducing its own competitive ability.

While they are beginning to look at our plan, we have a government that is destroying it. Once again, this is one of the greatest acts of illogical perversity that has ever been put upon the people of this country.

I do not suppose that anything we say is going to change their minds. I will tell you one thing it is going to do. It is going to hasten the change of a government in this country. It is going to hasten the change back to doing things in a real Canadian way on behalf of all Canadians.

It is going to mean that we are going to get back to deciding what is the priority and I will tell you what the priority is. It is not the illusion that the parliamentary secretary talked about. If this government really wanted to deal with the deficit, then we might have a finance minister brave enough to start recapturing those revenues that they gave away to their big business friends in the last eight years, because that is what Stats Canada said.

Capital gains, write-offs, grants; you name it, you got it. I will tell you the day will come—the day will not come for them because they will not be here any longer—when we will be able to restore some sense of reality to governing in this country. It will be a day to decide who are the winners and the losers. It really is going to come down to a basic battle between a kind of elitist corporate view of the world which is contained in the cabinet rooms of this government, and a democratic view of this world which means that you represent all people and you try to provide the programming, the finances and the economics that represent their concerns.

That is why Bill C-20 is of crucial concern to all of us. It really represents, perhaps as no other piece of legislation has, that difference of view. It represents, perhaps as no other legislation that this government has brought in, the clear demarcation of philosophy and approach as to how to govern this country. It basically points out whose side you are on, and where your interests really lie.

That is why this party is opposed to it and clearly committed to restoring proper federal participation in the support of good education and good health care for this country. That is how we believe we will build a good Canada.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, instead of speaking to the bill before the House today, has decided to make a very political speech that is full of inaccuracies, false truths and false statements, and I feel it is time to set the record straight.

There are two particular points I wish to address.

[English]

The member for Winnipeg South Centre mentioned in his speech that transfer payments to the provinces in the health care program have been reduced. I would like to point out that this is not true. The reality is quite different. The reality is that the increase in transfer payments has grown more slowly in recent years than in the past. This is due to the fact that when this government took power in 1984, the government of which the member for Winnipeg South Centre was a member and a cabinet minister, left it with a deficit of $200 billion. This deficit today is in the area of $400 billion, but the increase is the result of compounded interest of close to $200 billion that has grown on the debt itself. This government has not contributed a black penny to the deficit.

To reimburse the interest on $400 billion you have to pay in the area of $40 billion in interest a year. That is why we had to reduce the growth of the transfer payments. These are the hard facts.

[Translation]

He also said that in 1995-96, the province of Quebec would no longer receive or benefit from federal transfer payments. There again he distorted the facts, because my hon. colleague knows very well that the Government of Quebec decided to take tax points instead of transfer payments. By taking more tax points, as Quebec negotiated with the federal government, it receives less in cash transfer payments. I would like to ask my hon. colleague: When Quebec was asking for more tax points instead of transfer payments and he was a cabinet minister in the government of the day, if he is opposed to that principle today, why did he not express his opposition then and make the case against it that he has in the House today?

I say that he should have done so then. It is too late today. Quebec made that choice and the federal government respects it. The federal government will also try to respect it in future, of course, because that is what the province wants.

My hon. colleague from Winnipeg South Centre should tell the House and Quebecers where he was when those discussions were going on.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has taken the occasion to challenge some of the facts. The fact is that Quebec did not opt out of only taking tax transfer points, it still receives cash outlays.

I stand by my record, which is included in the government's own figures, that by the year 1996–97, no longer will there be cash transfers.

I would refer the hon. member to the statements made by his own ministers of health at the meeting in Winnipeg in September where all the health ministers began to say that is the problem.

What he avoids is this question. Perhaps to him it is not an important question, but to many of us it is certainly important. Once the cash transfers disappear, as they will in Quebec in 1996–97, how will the federal government exercise it's responsibility to ensure universality and accessibility of the Canada medicare system? How will it do it? Its answer is: "We will bring in legislation that will give us the right to do it legally". We now know that legally and constitutionally it will be thrown out by the courts. It has been challenged.

Therefore, the federal government's withdrawal from that system will mean that we will end up in a system of different health programs, province by province, region to region. The ones who will pay the most will be the poor provinces which do not have the cash base.

It was not my interpretation. I regret deeply that members opposite are so illiterate. If they had bothered to read the legal opinion that was tabled in front of the committee studying Bill C–20, they would know where the opinion came from. Unfortunately, they have not bothered to do it.

Let us go back to this "deficit issue". This an interesting little debate because Tories love to talk about it. Once again, I will repeat myself because apparently the first or second time they do not quite understand.

Statistics Canada, your agency, run by the Government of Canada, produced a report this spring that said: "What caused the deficit?" It said it was not spending on programs. They have remained the same. What caused it was a loss of revenue because a government reduced and gave away all kinds of revenue it otherwise had by about 20 per cent and high interest rates. What has been the dominant economic policy of the Mulroney government since it has come into power? High interest rates. High dollar, high interest rates, and he said: "We inherited this deficit and it jumped from $125 billion to $400 billion, but we are not responsible. Mea culpa, not me. It could not be us. It went from $125 to $400, but the fact that we have been government for close to eight years is totally irrelevant".

The first four years we had a growth economy. We were averaging 5 per cent, 6 per cent growth a year. It went to 32 separate tax increases at that time. Where did the revenue go? Who did it give the money to? Did it use that revenue of high growth and 32 tax increases to reduce the deficit? Hardly. It is still at $31 billion a year.

What it did in terms of its own brilliant economic analysis, it forced the interest rates up so that what happened is that of course the deficit quadrupled and multiplied in geometric terms. It was a direct consequence of a policy decision taken by this government over the past eight years. That is the reason why that deficit has increased. Therefore—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments have now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I notice it is four minutes to one. Shall I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table the report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1991.

I remind hon. members that pursuant to Standing Order 108(3)(e), this document is deemed to have been permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, this week marks the first annual white ribbon campaign, a campaign to help end violence against women through heightening of men's awareness to a problem which takes many forms.

Let the facts speak for themselves. Men make up only 48 per cent of our population, yet are responsible for 90 per cent of the violence. Over 90 per cent of sexual assaults involve female victims. One in four young women under the age of 18 will be abused.

These facts are very real. Women live in fear that the majority of them can expect some form of harassment or sexual violence at some point in their lives. Violence against women is a symptom of deep problems in our society which relate to underlying sexism and stereotyping. Violence against women is not a social problem, it's a crime, as we saw so clearly at Humber College in Etobicoke this last weekend. Only through education can we hope to end such violence. It is time to confront the issue and for all Canadians, female and male, to speak out. As we approach the anniversary of the École Polytechnique, let us remember all victims of violence and their families.

QUEBEC INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's new industrial strategy was announced in Montreal yesterday by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, Mr. Gérald Tremblay, in the presence of Premier Robert Bourassa, the leaders of the Conseil du Patronat du Québec and the Manufacturers' Association, Ghislain Dufour and Richard Le Hir, as well as the presidents of the FTQ and the CNTU, Fernand Daoust and Gérald Larose.

The purpose of the Quebec industrial strategy is to create 200,000 new jobs by the year 2000, thereby bringing the rate of unemployment down to 8 percent. That is a first in North America. Businesses from a given industry will be called upon to join forces or interact to promote job creation and facilitate the emergence of local subcontracting firms. According to Mr. Tremblay, all Quebecers will be invited to contribute to this concerted effort and the success of all is now dependent upon a rapid transition to a value-added economy. The public must take part in the strategy by questioning the generosity of the system and demanding quality products.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, last night people in Ottawa were treated to a great show, the lighting of the Christmas lights on Parliament Hill.

I do not want the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance to be blinded by these lights. I want to shed more light on unemployed Canadians because it seems that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister do not see what this government's economic policies are doing to Canadians.

The following lay-offs over the last year have resulted in an unemployment rate of 15.2 per cent in my riding of Timmins-Chapleau: Renabie Mines, 190 workers; Dome Mines, 277 workers; Canamax Mines, 99 workers; Palmour Mines, 62 workers.

Two more lay-offs announced recently will drive the current figures even higher: Abitibi Price, 161 workers; Mike's Supermarkets, 191 workers.

During this holiday season, the only worthy response to this government's handling of the unemployment crisis is: Bah, humbug.]

CYPRUS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the Montreal daily La Presse published a series of articles about Cyprus. I found Mr. Toupin's work to be truly enlightening.

[Translation

So far, the numerous UN resolutions aimed at putting an end to Turkish occupation have not been implemented. Recent UN efforts to reconcile differences, supported by many U.S. government initiatives, seem to be going nowhere.

Canadians are proud to join their voices with those of all the people who speak up for international justice and order. The Canadian military presence in Cyprus as peacemakers make us even more credible. Our position is not inconsistent with the UN resolutions which incidentally have our support.

Allow me to quote Cyprus' President Vassiliou who says that:

CANADIAN BREWING INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, our brewing industry was supposed to be protected under the free trade agreement, but what we have witnessed after three years of this agreement is that the United States says one thing and does another.

U.S. trade representative Carla Hills has laid down an ultimatum, even before the full GATT council meeting in February, that all discrimination against U.S. beer must end by December 29 or face U.S. duties on all Canadian beer entering the United States. A lot of Canadian brewery jobs are at stake at Labatt's, Molson's and Moose Head and over $190 million a year in exports to the United States is at stake.

I ask of the government: Will the Canadian government do what it promised under the FTA and support our Canadian brewing industry? Will the Canadian government fight the discriminatory practices of American states against Canadian beer sales in the United States?

Let us tell Carla Hills to snap a cool one of Canada's finest and take a hike.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, in mid-October, the Minister of Agriculture spoke about fuel ethanol opportunities to an audience of western farmers and business people.

He indicated that grain or biomass-derived fuel ethanol can be one of Canada's transportation fuel options in the 1990s.

In a few short weeks it will be 1992. Why is it that the United States can take advantage of these market opportunities quickly while Canadian policy is strangled by bureaucratic red tape? The minister should breathe life into a Canadian policy for ethanol production thereby helping farmers, industry and the environment.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, the recession is not over in southwestern Ontario.

In Chatham and Kent County, a 400 per cent increase in welfare rates since 1981 and a 30 per cent unemployment rate in the automotive sector alone are signs that the Mulroney-made recession is still here.

Millions of people west of Toronto have been left drowning in a sea of despair, with no regional development program of their own.

I am encouraged by the recent signing of the Canada-Ontario Labour Force Agreement. Chatham, Ontario, and area are prime candidates to receive funding. Skills training is absolutely vital.

The Kent Industrial Training Advisory Committee works with St. Clair College and Wallaceburg's High School was the first in all Ontario to establish a permanent training facility, helping students and the unemployed from basic education to high-tech. I urge the government to put its money where its mouth is and expand support for these and other training facilities to help even more people in this time of economic adjustment.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the House to join my voice with those of my colleagues who spoke yesterday and today in protest of male violence against women.

Recent events have called on men everywhere to examine their attitudes toward women.

[Translation]

The tragedy at the Ecole Polytechnique took place two years ago. It is a case of terrible violence against women but it is only the most horrible and brutal example. It is time for us to take a more active role and to take on our responsibilities. This white ribbon campaign is an ideal way to make our fellow citizens aware of the need to end violence against women both inside and outside the family.

[English]

The white ribbon campaign is rapidly gaining support across Canada. I urge this government to stimulate even greater public awareness by the introduction of education programs.

Through these and other means we will be able to secure a future for Canadian women that is free of violence.

I urge my fellow colleagues to endorse the white ribbon campaign and to take action to decrease the senseless violence against women and I call especially on all aboriginal leaders to do likewise.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Commission on Reproductive Technology is facing serious allegations of irregularity. Four of the nine commissioners are planning to launch a lawsuit against the commission and the federal government.

The government interfered with the commission last year when it altered the order in council and appointed two new commissioners. It stripped the commissioners of all responsibility and involvement in the decision-making process in order to vest authority exclusively in the chair.

There are deep concerns that the government is going to disband the commission to avoid the embarrassment of a court case.

New reproductive technologies are advancing ahead of our abilities to understand them and they have deep implications for our society. They are commercializing life and creating the notion of designer babies.

Will the Prime Minister give us his assurance that this commission will not be disbanded simply to avoid embarrassing disclosures?

DARYL BEAN

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, union leader Daryl Bean is a vice-president of the New Democratic Party. The NDP leader stood with him during the recent Public Service Alliance strike.

The NDP has been a strident supporter of efforts to eliminate all traces of violence against women. Many NDP members today in the House are wearing white ribbons such as mine as a demonstration of that commitment.

I ask them and their leader this question:

Do you condone the threats of Daryl Bean made against three—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Some hon. members and perhaps the hon. member for Halton—Peel are not aware that that very matter is presently seized by the Chair and I am going to have to make a ruling on it.

SPRUCE FALLS POWER & PAPER COMPANY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, today, December 3, 1991, is of great historical significance to the northern Ontario towns of Opasatika, Val Rita-Harty, Kapuskasing, Moonbeam and Fauquier. The employees and residents of these towns officially become the majority owners of the Spruce Falls Power & Paper Company, along with Tembec as a minority shareholder.

During the last year, residents of the area have demonstrated tremendous strength and willpower as they were determined to retain 5,000 regional jobs. The loss of these jobs would have been disastrous for the entire region.

Today local investors will start to control their own destiny as the profits will be reinvested in the mill in order to remain competitive in global markets. The $15 million investment by the local people indicates a vote of confidence in the workers' expertise and talent.

I am very proud today to express my sincere gratitude to the men and women who were instrumental in achieving this success by ensuring the future viability of the Spruce Falls Power & Paper Company.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, supply and services has awarded $400,000 in research contracts to American universities. One is for planning a model for energy technology, another is on atmospheric oxidizers, another on the validity of lie detectors, and another on interactive teaching technology.

No Canadian universities it is said were capable of doing this work, some of which is of obvious strategic importance.

The question here is not whether contracts should be issued to American universities.

The real question is whether we shall see more and more of this as Canadian universities, deprived of labs and researchers, and increasingly deprived of research and operational funding become increasingly incapable of responding to Canada's competitive needs.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, an article in The Gazette last week referred to our constitutional discussions under the heading "All the bickering is among politicians".

It went on to say that relations among the people are surprisingly harmonious. The Gazette does not get much coverage in Alberta, but the theme of its article is just as true there as it is in Montreal.

Thinking Canadians want to keep this country united, but they want other Canadians to understand them and their aspirations. It is no time for us to chase partisan, political points. It is time to listen and to share the opinions expressed by our constituents.

Albertans have shared some very strong feelings with me. They want others to understand us, just as we need to understand them. As MPs, we need to put political considerations aside. Each of us must listen to our constituents in a calm, constructive way. Then we must show them that this House can work, that we can truly represent the views of our constituents and build consensus on it.

The people demand it. The people deserve it. The country is more than worth it.

SUMMERSIDE AEROSPACE CENTRE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, Thursday, December 5, will mark the official opening of Bendix Avelex Inc. Atlantic Support Division and Atlantic Turbines Inc.

Both facilities are part of the new Summerside Aerospace Centre located in St. Eleanors, P.E.I., the former site of CFB Summerside.

These companies are the major tenants of the new centre, a high-tech operation designed to bring economic development to the Summerside area and off-set some of the job losses causes by the base closure.

Atlantic Turbines is a repair and overhaul facility which has about 30 employees and plans to continue expanding and hiring in the new year.

Bendix Avelex is a world class supplier of aerospace and defence equipment. Its Support Services Division provides support of aircraft equipment and accessories for government, commercial and business aircraft. The company is the largest support contractor of its type in Canada. It employs over 20 people and has tremendous growth potential.

Attracting two companies of this calibre to Summerside is a major accomplishment. It is a beginning, and it is a tribute to the hard work of the Slemon Park Corporation, the P.E.I. Department of Industry and ACOA. I offer my congratulations to all parties and to the two companies involved.

CHRISTMAS TREE INDUSTRY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for South Shore criticized the House of Commons for displaying fake Christmas trees. I could not agree more.

I do however disagree with the hon. member that the best Christmas trees, that is real trees, come from Cumberland County, Nova Scotia.

The best trees, superior trees come from New Brunswick and more specifically, the riding of Carleton—Charlotte.

This was recognized yesterday, Mr. Speaker, when the mayor of Nackawic, New Brunswick, Stephen Hawkes and myself presented His Excellency the Governor General with a real New Brunswick Christmas tree.

Unlike the House of Commons with its phoney trees, Rideau Hall will have the real thing, courtesy of the citizens of Nackawic, New Brunswick, the forestry capital of Canada for 1991.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this country, now more than ever, needs men and women to come forward with solutions to today's environmental problems.

Thanks to another element of Canada's green plan, people with innovative ideas will be better able to participate in making our environment healthy.

The government has unveiled the Environment Innovation Program, designed to fund original research and development proposals on the environment.

The program will tap the tremendous inventive spirit of Canadians. Twenty million dollars is available to universities, environmental groups, industry, native groups and individuals to bring their good ideas to the production and marketing stages.

Environmental innovation is not particularly new to Canadians. Indeed, our green plan supports leaders in the environment. Our green plan supports that through further research and development, and industrial competitiveness in the environment technology sector.

It is my belief that the green plan's support of environmental innovation will help lead Canada into a greener and more prosperous future.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we received the report of the Auditor General of Canada today.

[English]

I would like to put my question to the Minister of Finance, but in his absence, I will put it to whoever on that side answers, I guess the acting minister.

The Auditor General's report states that a substantial portion of the annual budgetary deficit is financed by borrowing from pension accounts. Eighteen per cent of the over-all debt, $71 billion, was borrowed in the last years at interest rates below market rates. The government has failed to examine the long-term implications of this practice. I want to ask the government why a study has not been made of this practice.

• (1420)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, a great number of factors come into play when one adjusts the management of these funds from the pension funds. The hon. member knows very well that the way it is managed now stems from legislation that came from this House. He knows also that we are reviewing the Public Service pension legislation, at which time we will look into that.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the government borrowed $71 billion from federal employee pension accounts to finance its deficit. The rates of return on these loans are lower than rates available on the open market. Some people claim that the pension accounts are at risk. Can the minister give the House the assurance that Public Service pension accounts are not at risk and that the government will review this practice, which is not allowed in the private sector? One cannot be sponsor, administrator and trustee. It is against the law. Will the government review this practice?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will realize that the funds are quite safe, that there is a big difference between a government that cannot go out of business and the private sector, unless of course, that government happens to be the Liberal government which almost did this to Canada. However, in the case of pension fund management, the Auditor General did indicate that there was a difference between the rate of return on those funds and the rate that might have been obtained on the open market. That being said, there are many other factors, including joint management of the funds by the employees and the employer. These are all questions that are being reviewed at this time, as part of our public pension reform.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we do not know the long-term implications of borrowing from pension funds to service the budgetary deficit. There is nothing on the books that we can find to give us some solace at this point.

It is clear from the Auditor General's report that the rate of return of this investment is 1.5 to 2 per cent below market rates, that is the rates the private sector would get in terms of its borrowing. Will the minister assure us that the management of the debt will be improved, that this government will stop raiding public pension funds to finance its own mismanagement?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I can assure the House that the government is not raiding the public pension fund. It is managing it as it has according to legislation passed by this House.

As I have said and will say again, this is going to be revisited as all other issues of management of the Public Service pension funds over the coming months.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's old crony, Peter Lesaux, the president of ACOA, said, and I quote: "Illiteracy and rotten weather, that is what is keeping companies out of Cape Breton".

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not the rotten weather in Cape Breton that is keeping companies out. The Auditor General's report confirms in spades the incompetence of its president and ACOA's mismanagement.

What changes has the minister put in place to adequately monitor and control the action program contribution agreement so that companies like World Communications Network, based in California, will not be able to rip off the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we all realize that this is just a generality that the hon. gentleman has put forward. There is no specificity, if I might use that word, to it. The totality of his specificities leaves much to be desired.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosbie: With respect to ACOA, less than 5 per cent of the projects financed through the action program have been failures. ACOA is there to take risks, to take greater risks let us say than the ordinary commercial banks.

If what the hon. gentleman is proposing is that we apply the same standards and be just as careful as the ordinary commercial banks, we will make no loans in Atlantic Canada whatsoever.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows quite well that the report of the Auditor General seriously indicts ACOA for not adequately evaluating the economic benefit of a project before ACOA makes a financial contribution. That is there very clear for all to see.

What measures will the minister responsible for ACOA put in place to curb abuses like World Communications Network, thereby protecting the Canadian treasury and ensuring that moneys for regional economic development are spent efficiently and used in those areas where they are absolutely needed? What assurances will the minister give the House?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman wanted to query me about some specific suggestion by the Auditor General, I could deal with it. I am sure there are some occasions mentioned in his audit where proper procedures were not followed or technical procedures were not followed. Of course, in the future we are going to see that they are followed insofar as human abilities permit. There is a slip up occasionally.

With respect to the firm the hon. gentleman is mentioning, I think that firm was located in Cape Breton. We all know that last year we had a study undertaken with reference to the Cape Breton situation and we are following the recommendations of that report of Mr. Braith. In Cape Breton, in particular, we are concentrating more on initiatives put forward by local people and we are much more careful with respect to those who come from outside suggesting that they have some miracle cures to offer for the economic progress of Cape Breton.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. The Auditor General says that the government's plans for cleaning up abandoned toxic waste dumps were doomed to fail. The report says Environment Canada is not up to the task. They have neither the resources nor the staff to identify the sites and clean them up. Why does this important program lack funding? Why is this government putting the health and lives of Canadians at risk?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that what the Auditor General of Canada is saying is that the government intended to spend approximately $150 million on cleaning up abandoned sites, and the Auditor General challenges the accuracy of the information we have at this time and feels we have underestimated the work involved. I do not think the Auditor General is challenging the federal government's intentions to act on its responsibility in this area, a responsibility which it shares, I may add, with the provinces.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Clearly what the Auditor General was saying was that there may be the will, but there is certainly not enough money. If there is not the personnel, it just cannot be done and the minister must recognize that.

Today the Auditor General also stated that Revenue Canada Customs is not enforcing the Hazardous Products Act which is supposed to regulate the importation of toxic substances into this country, a very serious issue.

When the Auditor General was asked if this was law breaking, he said this morning: "You could draw that conclusion".

Could the minister explain the ongoing violation of the law concerning importation of toxic substances and could he explain why the health of Canadians is being put at risk every day by importing these unknown substances.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party probably knows, there is no evidence whatsoever that one bit of illegal or uncontrolled hazardous material has entered Canada in the last decade or so.

The hon. member also knows that since May 1989, we have enhanced fuel inspection and inspection of other toxic wastes and materials coming into Canada at the borders with random sampling, blitzes, increased inspection tests, fuel contamination examinations and the list goes on, with no evidence whatsoever that any dangerous hazardous material has entered Canada illegally.

On top of that, because of our concern we have gone ahead and signed a memorandum of understanding with the Department of the Environment where we work hand in hand in making sure that operations improve, not only on a yearly basis, but on a daily basis. We have put in new systems, new technology and new people. I am satisfied that we are protecting Canada to the best of our abilities.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister may be satisfied, but the Auditor General is not satisfied.

The Auditor General says that there is no evidence of Customs actions in enforcing the Hazardous Products Act and in fact a memorandum was sent out which instructs Customs inspectors to release shipments found to contain prohibited or restricted commodities subject to advising Consumer and Corporate Affairs, even though the importation of these products is clearly prohibited.

I would ask the minister to address that issue, because clearly the Auditor General does not agree there is no evidence that these substances are being imported, but quite the opposite.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can again confirm to this House and to Canadians that after random samplings, blitzes and some 1,400 tests which have been taken at the border there is absolutely no evidence that a bit of toxic hazardous illegal material has entered Canada.

Mr. Fulton: You are not checking for it, Otto. No wonder you are not going to find it.

Mr. Jelinek: The hon. member is saying we are not checking for it. I pointed out that in one element only, toxic fuel and toxic waste, there were 1,400 checks. I would like to know from the New Democratic Party what other steps it would want us to take. We have increased the number of staff at the border. We have brought in new systems. We have brought in new technology.

Mr. Fulton: He says you are breaking the law.

Mr. Jelinek: We have a memorandum of understanding that has increased our opportunities to protect Canadians from dangerous waste coming into Canada. In the meantime we are continuing our efforts to improve wherever we can on this matter.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for DRIE. The minister said he wants specifics with respect to the Auditor General's report and I offer him one, a case singled out by the Auditor General from his own constituency.

The Auditor General reported today that just prior to the last election a door and window manufacturer in St. John's, Newfoundland received a $5.2 million non-repayable grant from ACOA just 30 days after its application was filed with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. The grant in question was made within a 30-day period, notwithstanding the fact that DRIE had raised serious questions about the company's operations and about the new company's effect on existing window manufacturers in St. John's.

My question to the minister responsible for ACOA is the following: Why were all the normal rules scuttled, during a pre-election period, in the minister's own backyard?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, on the one hand we have the member opposite suggesting ACOA is inefficient. On the other hand, we have another member getting up and suggesting there is tremendous efficiency in ACOA. Which is it?

As a matter of fact I was not the minister responsible for ACOA at the time of the last election.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: Apparently it took ACOA 210 days to review and approve this particular application, 210 days. If I had known about it, it would have been done one heck of a lot quicker than that, supposing that it met the criteria.

In addition, it was recommended for approval by the project review committee. There is a project review committee. That company is operating successfully with 50 full-time employees. The hon. member should be congratulating ACOA on the support it gave in this particular instance.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister's attempt at humour will not disguise the fact that during an election campaign after only 30 days a $5.2 million non-repayable gift-grant was given to a company in the minister's own backyard. It was given at a time when the rules provided for a grant of up to $20 million under a so-called fast program when today the rule allows only for a loan of up to $500,000. Why the giveaways during an election and today only loans?

How is the minister of ACOA going to investigate the irregularities pointed out in the Auditor General's report in his own constituency? Where is the conflict of interests here and how can Canadians get an honest accounting for their tax dollars?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we always very much enjoy the hon. gentleman's performances. I am sure we do on this occasion, but he is dealing with a company that has been successful and where the criticism of the Auditor General is technical in nature.

There was a change of ownership in connection with the application. A considerable period went by between the original application and the later application that was approved. There had been a change of ownership in the meantime which our officials thought strengthened the company. That was not brought to the minister's attention. This is the nature of the criticism of the Auditor General.

As I said earlier, it took ACOA 210 days to review and approve it. There was no rushing of this approval through. It has been a success and 50 persons in Newfoundland are now working who might not otherwise have been working. Why the criticism by the hon. gentleman opposite?

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle–Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In his report last year, the Auditor General asked the government to develop ways for reporting to Parliament on how it was meeting its environmental responsibilities. A year later the result, to quote from the Auditor General's report tabled today, is:

> (–) No such clarification has yet been made.

In short, the minister has done nothing in a year. My question is: Why this disdain, this contempt for the Parliament of Canada?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard likes to get excited about such questions. I think that if he took a little time to analyse Canada's green plan, he would see that the government made a commitment in that plan to various environmental measuring and reporting mechanisms. We will indeed report to the Parliament of Canada in 1992. If he took the time to read the whole Auditor General's report, I am not sure, but I think that the Auditor General also admits that we will report to Parliament using that mechanism.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has specifically condemned this minister as a do-nothing minister. The previous Minister of the Environment promised achievement dates for the green plan. This minister backed off. The previous Minister of the Environment promised environmental assessment policy. This minister backed off.

Under this minister the department has been found guilty of blocking the legitimate requests of Canadians under the Access to Information Act, and now the Auditor General has said that under this minister the government is shirking its responsibility to Parliament.

My question is: Where does this minister get off with blocking the public's right to know?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think that once Canadians get beyond the rhetoric and all the showmanship of the hon. member from Lasalle—Émard they will find that this government committed itself to a $3 billion green plan over six years. We proceeded to implement that green plan with due diligence.

We announced $100 million, for example, for the Fraser River initiative. We announced $100 million for an Arctic environment strategy under the green plan. We announced $100 million under forestry for development of sustainable forests. We announced $250 million for an initiative for sewage for native people. We announced $25 million for an initiative in drinking water for people. We announced $50 million for more research in the area of—

Some hon. members: More, more.

Mr. Charest: We announced $100 million for commercialization.

NATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the government's new native agenda promised to improve socio-economic conditions for aboriginal peoples in this country.

My question is therefore to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Today the Auditor General's report shows that his department knew that it had a backlog of over 10,000 housing units. It knew that 72 per cent of the housing stock did not even come up to code, and yet it still did nothing about it.

When is the minister of Indian affairs going to face up to the crisis in native housing in this country and do something positive about it?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague should recognize that this government has made a very determined commitment, with a very specific agenda, to improving the condition of native communities.

We are developing a housing policy in consultation with native groups. My hon. colleague should admit that we develop those policies in close cooperation with the communities in order to improve the programs and make them more effective.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Today's report of the Auditor General shows that reinstatements under Bill C-31 have been 50 per cent higher than the Department of Indian Affairs predicted in 1985. Aboriginal groups are saying: "We told you so".

Despite the assurance that no band would suffer from this sudden influx of native women and children, the department made no plans to house them properly. My question is very simple: Why not? Why have proper plans not been made to house these people?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. colleague should recognize that annual investments of $120 million to $140 million do constitute real and specific commitments to providing housing assistance to native communities.

We are aware of the fact that more is required under Bill C-31. As a matter of fact, the policy is being reviewed. I must say that at present, funds made available to native people allow 3,000 new houses to be built each year, and the renovation of another 3,000 to 4,000 houses every year on top of that. I think those are very concrete and specific commitments.

As regards the problem with sewers and sanitary conditions these communities are faced with, very specific commitments were made on that too. As my colleague the Minister of the Environment mentioned earlier, we will be spending $250 million over the next six years on sewers and another 25 million on drinking water.

Mr. Speaker, these are firm commitments.

HALIFAX INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Auditor General today indicates that the Department of Transport, the Minister of Transport and indeed the entire cabinet approved a 42-year lease for the construction of a hotel at Halifax International Airport without any evidence that the rooms were needed or that the developer had the financing in place to complete this project.

I ask the minister: if the money was not in place and the rooms were not needed, what exactly were the criteria used by the minister to advise his cabinet to approve this project?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and all members of this House that most of the risk has been borne by the lessee. My department did rely on the financial industry's risk assessment because it was this group, not the department, that invested the risk capital in the development.

I think at the time of the examination of this proposal that all matters were in good standing and we approved it because we thought it was a good investment for the region.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

As a result of this government's bungling we now have a half-finished concrete bunker attached to Halifax International Airport.

My question to the minister is this: Is it now the government's intention to fund the completion of this hotel, or will it dip further into taxpayers' pockets to tear down this latest monument to the minister's cabinet's and his colleagues' incompetence?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the matter is now being examined first of all by the trustee and other financial interests.

We want this hotel to be completed, and as we get through the present proceedings we will make sure that this hotel is completed to the satisfaction of the customers in the area because we think that it is a good addition economically speaking for the region.

GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of industry.

Farmers and fishermen are asking for money and the government always says that it has no money. Can the minister give us an explanation of why his department gave $26 million out of the DIPP fund to companies that did not even ask for the money?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. minister who has been a minister of industry knows that there is a very vigorous requirement for companies to go through in getting access to those funds.

That program is a good program. It provides very good support for science and technology and for research and development, particularly in high-tech sectors that need this sort of financing. He knows perfectly well that there is a very rigorous set of approvals required in order to get access to those moneys.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is this: In his report published today, the Auditor General said that at the end of the year, the minister's department gave $28 million to firms which had not even asked for funding. Why is there money for the government's friends, when there is none for the farmers and fishermen of this country?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me be quite clear to the hon. Leader of the Opposition. There are situations wherein the department discusses with the industry whether or not there should be an access to funds in one year or another in order to meet the requirements that both the industry and the government agree are to be met.

It is under those circumstances that this type of agreement is entered into.

TRADE

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday, the U.S. government announced that the preferential rate offered by Hydro-Québec to Norsk-Hydro constitutes an unfair subsidy. A countervailing duty of 33 per cent will be imposed on magnesium exports to the United States. My question is this: Is this government finally prepared to admit its free trade agreement gives us no protection against the protectionist policies of the United States? And does this government intend to forget about Quebec's interests, as it is now doing at GATT?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me be very clear to the hon. member.

Under the free trade agreement either side can challenge the other side if they feel that there is a subsidy, as we have done on a number of occasions with the Americans and as they have done here.

We disagree that there is a subsidy in this. We are working with the province and with the industry to make sure that we put the strongest possible case forward. We also have challenged the American companies as to whether they have standing, whether they have a right to put the case forward as has been done, and we are challenging this under the GATT.

Finally let me say that under the rules of the free trade agreement—and let me remind my hon. friend that this is a preliminary determination—if the ultimate decision is something that we disagree with we have the right under the free trade agreement to take the matter to a bi-national panel dispute settlement mechanism in order to challenge that. That was not the case prior to the free trade agreement.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, obviously we are not getting the answer that the government knows is the real answer, that the free trade agreement is not working in Canada's interest. It has not worked in British Columbia with softwood lumber. It has not worked in Quebec. It is not working at all.

I would like the minister to respond exactly and definitely. What is he going to do? What is he going to tell the companies? We are not just talking about one company here but other companies, aluminium companies that can be faced with the same problem. Quebec and its development can be seriously handicapped.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me say to my friend that his bluster does not add anything to the understanding of people about that particular issue.

I have indicated very clearly that we are going to take the strongest possible position in working with the province and with the industry to make sure that our interests are upheld in this particular case. We are also challenging the matter under the GATT, whether the company has the legitimacy to put this case forward.

• (1450)

Finally, as I said, we have the right under the free trade agreement which we have not had before and which is not effective under the GATT, to take a matter to a dispute settlement mechanism panel to ensure that our rights are upheld.

ACOA

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

The original ACOA mandate was for $1 billion, subsequently extended over seven years, to help achieve regional development in Atlantic Canada that would not otherwise occur without federal assistance.

I am led to understand that portions of these annual budgets are subject to lapsing of funds which are not expended by the end of the fiscal year, thus leading in some cases to unused ACOA money or, perhaps more often and more seriously, to excessive efforts at finding ways to spend the money before it lapses. Either way the concept of lapsing funds would seem to distort ACOA's purposes within artificial budget boundaries.

My question is this: Can a mechanism not be found to ensure that ACOA's funds do not lapse at budget year-end but rather are allowed to accumulate in the subsequent year for application to justifiable projects as they are created?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we are going to have some lapsing members opposite when the next election comes.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre)): Call the election right now.

Mr. Crosbie: Don't tempt me. With reference to the question of lapsing funds, ACOA's track record is actually quite good with respect to that. Every department has the problem of lapsing funds if they do not spend the moneys voted to them during the year. Of course they cannot always tell how much they will be spending. It depends upon the demand in the action program for loans and the like.

Of the $277 million allocated last year for grants and contributions, we cash managed those funds within less than $5 million. Only $5 million lapsed, which was less than 2 per cent. The hon. gentleman does not need to worry about ACOA. If we lapse any funds we will see that they are spent in Atlantic Canada in any event the following year.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

A gross miscarriage of justice has occurred in Brazil and two Canadians are involved. On appeal, Christine Lamont and David Spencer have had their sentences increased to 28 years each for their alleged participation in a highly publicized Brazilian kidnapping, though much of the evidence points to their innocence.

The minister has refused to help these Canadians. This sentence is harsher than a murder sentence in Canada and the sentence is absolutely preposterous. When will the minister recognize the injustice of this case and take immediate steps to request their expulsion from Brazil?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have pointed out before, the department and our consular services have been very active in assisting this couple in any way that they can. They have also monitored the whole legal process that has been used.

In my view the sentence is excessive and I am going to explore the ruling from the Court of Appeal in Brazil. When I have done that I will be happy to review whether there is anything further that can be done.

Having said that, let me remind the member that I have personally reviewed this case on two occasions. We are dealing with two mature adult Canadians. She is 31. He is 29. They have been found guilty of kidnapping, conspiracy and resisting arrest. Both entered Brazil on fraudulent Canadian passports. All the co-defendants received the same sentence, and they have not been tortured as some reports have alleged.

I have asked my officials to review the circumstances surrounding the sentencing, but those are the facts.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

The minister has been making a lot of speeches about defending human rights abroad. I want to ask her: Is it not time to start defending the human rights of Canadians, of our own citizens?

Clearly under Brazilian law a foreign national does not have the same right as a Brazilian national to ask for an appeal or to ask for parole. Is that not a denial of the rights of Miss Lamont and Mr. Spencer?

I want to ask the minister: When is she going to take her fundamental responsibility to represent the interests of Canadians abroad and ask the Brazilian government for the right of expulsion, which is what the Brazilian judge said the minister should do?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that the hon. member takes to shouting when he knows he does not have a substantive case.

I have responded to the first question by saying that I think the sentence is a severe one and I intend to review the appeal. Surely that is my responsibility. That is what I plan to do, but that does not alter the fundamental facts of the case which include the fact that the other co-conspirators were given the same sentence.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Employment and Immigration). Mr. Petar Zilic, a resident of Saint-Léonard who is originally from Croatia, was informed that his parents had been tortured and killed in the village of their birth, which has now been destroyed. Fearing for their lives, the rest of his family has fled, leaving behind important documents such as their passports and other identification. Could the minister introduce some exceptional measures to help Mr. Zilic, and others like him, bring their families who are living in terror to this country?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to remind hon. members that our immigration procedures provide for certain extraordinary measures, and that we respect people on an individual basis, with a constant focus on a humanitarian approach.

As for the specific case that was just described, I will submit your request to the responsible minister, and we will report back at the appropriate time.

[English]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, in a telephone call to the office of the minister of immigration and yesterday afternoon to the Minister of State for Immigration, my office was told that without identification there would be little chance for Mr. Zilic to get his family to join him in Canada. This was also echoed to friends of his family by the Canadian embassy in Zagreb.

I ask again: Will the minister intervene and use his ministerial powers in order to help Mr. Zilic and others like him who are willing to sponsor their relatives to come to Canada to save their lives?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repeating myself, every case is dealt with individually under Canada's Immigration Act and we will do what is necessary to comply with our law.

CROATIA

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the foreign minister told this House that Canada would commit troops to peacekeeping duties in Croatia. My constituents of Croatian descent very much appreciate that, but they also want Canada to recognize Croatian independence, just as we granted it this week to Ukraine.

My question is this: What criteria does Croatia have to meet in order to gain Canada's blessing as a sovereign state?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's ongoing interest in this matter. As I said before, there are a great many differences between the situation in Ukraine and the situation in Croatia.

The first thing we are looking for in Croatia and in other parts of Yugoslavia is an end to the violence within the context of a negotiated comprehensive settlement. This is the only way we see that this obscene violence can be brought to an end.

Second is the protection of minorities. Third is agreed borders. We will not recognize borders that are taken by force. Fourth is respect for human rights and other CSCE principles.

I should point out that when the referendums were taken in Croatia and Slovenia under the Brioni agreement, both republics agreed to a three month moratorium before asking for independence.

We are now in a situation where the key to independence is to ending the violence and to have all the parties negotiate in good faith. We have been urging them to do that for some months through every forum that is available to us.

ACOA

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for ACOA.

The Auditor General's report identifies significant instances where ACOA officials failed to inform the minister of changes to proposals, changes to recommendations not to proceed with a project and advanced millions of dollars to companies that did not meet funding guidelines.

This is an incredible situation. I am asking the minister: Will he now admit that the agency is out of control and without direction? Will he indicate to the House what steps he intends to take to fix these obvious problems with ACOA?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not do this House or the country any service by such ridiculous general statements and accusations.

ACOA is not out of control. ACOA is dealing with hundreds and thousands of applications every year. In a few instances certain technical points have been missed by a project officer or whatever, none the cause of any serious losses to ACOA. So I can only say the hon. gentleman is grossly exaggerating and doing a disservice.

• (1500)

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister should read the Auditor General's report to see the extent of these problems.

These examples are cited by the Auditor General and they are the most recent in a long list of similar indications of criminal investigations by the RCMP and so on.

I want to ask the minister: How many more investigations and reports will it take before he acts to ensure that money goes to create jobs in Atlantic Canada other than jobs for the RCMP commercial crime squad or trustees in bankruptcy?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's party has never created one job in Atlantic Canada. It has never had the opportunity to, thank God, and it never will.

With respect to the question of criminal investigations, there have been criminal investigations in connection with several projects in Cape Breton that the House is familiar with. As a result of these events they had the whole situation in Cape Breton looked into by Anthony Braite.

An hon. member: Blame it on Cape Bretoners.

Mr. Crosbie: No, I am not going to blame it on Cape Bretoners because I think those—

Mr. Dingwall: Blame it on the president of ACOA.

Mr. Crosbie: No, no. I am not going to blame it on the president of ACOA, just because the hon. gentleman has some kind of a vendetta against a loyal enthusiastic and able public servant. I am certainly not.

DARYL BEAN

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question through you goes to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

The reported threats and written assaults on government employees by Daryl Bean exceed what I consider to be limits of acceptable decency. No one appears to be doing anything. Even though the reported attacks were against female employees, women's groups have been silent and the New Democratic Party has been silent.

I want to know if the Minister responsible for the Status of Women is also going to be silent and, if not, what is she going to do to protect these employees from the disgusting tactics by the president of PSAC?

Mr. Speaker: I am going to advise the hon. member that the whole subject of what was or was not said by the person in question was the subject of extensive debate this morning. The Chair is seized with it. I have already said in answer to a question some days ago that this may not even lie in the realm of the administration of government. I think we should leave it until I can deal with it.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

It has been a week now since the hon. minister met the government Quebec caucus and then the government apparently in terms of the public domain changed its mind on the question of a referendum.

In view of some conflicting remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on Friday in Quebec City and by the Prime Minister over the weekend in a couple of speeches about a referendum, can the minister state clearly and unequivocally today in the House that the question or the issue of a referendum is still one of the options of the federal Government of Canada? If so, when can this House see the introduction of that legislation?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I sometimes think I have fewer disagreements in my caucus than the hon. member has in his.

I can certainly assure him that that option remains one of the means by which the government could carry out its obligation in the throne speech to provide a mechanism of consultation with Canadians. We have decided that no bill will be introduced into the House before Christmas.

We have not yet decided upon a timetable for the introduction of such legislation as we might propose.

What we are looking for is a means that will give Canadians that opportunity in a way that will be entirely constructive in achieving consensus in the country on constitutional change.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the third time and passed; and on the amendment of Mr. Walker (p. 5662).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to stand in the House and address the whole question of Bill C–20.

I will attempt to show that it is a brutal and insensitive piece of legislation. It is divisive.

[Translation]

I would go even further. It is tearing the country apart. It is misleading. It is inadequate legislation. It simply will not work. It will never ever be accepted.

[English]

Before I get into those particular details to prove those particular points, I just want to summarize very quickly the contents of the bill to remind viewers and my colleagues that it deals with the capping and the freezing of transfers to provinces in health, education, social assistance in terms of three provinces and increases to the unemployment insurance premiums as well as to the freezing of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. Those revenues would normally go to the provinces.

I also want to make the next point which I think is very important. We are talking about $36 billion in transfers if one looks at cash and tax points. That is a great deal of money. It is an amount of money that our provinces and our territories really need in order to carry on everyday life in terms of government and in order to ensure that Canadian citizens, wherever they happen to live, get the kinds of programs to which they are entitled.

They are talking about $24 billion in cash, $12 billion in tax transfer points and we are talking with respect to Established Programs Financing, that is funding for health and education in the neighbourhood of $20 billion. With respect to equalization, it is approximately $8 billion and with regard to Canada Assistance, it is about $6 billion, that is the social assistance programs. Of course, there are other categories that may amount to close to $3 billion. As I indicated previously, it is a lot of money.

I started by saying that this was not appropriate legislation at this particular point in time. One would expect that from a member of the opposition, but let me share with you some statements that have been made by others.

There is a press release from the Government of Canada, the National Council of Welfare, entitled "Cash payments for medicare and higher education in jeopardy". I did not say that. The National Council of Welfare and the Government of Canada said that.

I have another communique. This time, it is from the Canada Council on Social Development. What does it say? "Federal budget may destroy Canada's social system". This was said by the Canada Council on Social Development.

Here is yet another in a Citizen article, a recent one: "Group's fear of breakdown of national programs". There is a journalist who is looking at it after having talked to people, after having studied this situation, and that is the judgment that is rendered.

I will refer, finally, to one more article from The Globe and Mail dated November 28, 1991. It is entitled Plan to preserve medicare risky under law MPs are told. What has happened here? Basically, the government has noticed that it will no longer be transferring dollars, that is cash, to provinces for health and education, particularly for health.

What it has done is within that particular bill it has a section that intends to withhold other kinds of payments in the event that the provinces do not respond to the standards that are expected of the federal government.

What kinds of hold-outs could there be? What kinds of demands might there be? The federal government might attack the equalization payments which are in the neighbourhood of $8.4 billion. It might go to territorial financing which is in excess of $1 billion. It might attack grants in lieu of taxes to provincial and municipal governments by the federal government. These amount to $344 million. They could in fact if they chose go to public utilities, income tax, transfer payments, and that represents $260 million, or statutory subsidies to the oldest kind of transfer payment in the neighbourhood of $36 million. The government could in fact attack the Canada Assistance Plan, over $6 billion, or the crop insurance program, $297 million. I think it is $207 million in the current year.

These are the kinds of programs that the government could hold back payments on and here are some others. The government could in fact go to the official languages and education program where there was $243 million that was given to provinces last year, or miscellaneous health and welfare which amounted to $170 million, or the young offenders' services for $158 million, or justice transfers for $77 million, and finally transfers in the domain of transportation for $69 million.

This is what this bill could in fact lead the government to do. That is if the provinces were not to use the funds that they get, the tax transfer points that they get, in the way the federal government wanted them to do so.

Therefore we have students, young offenders, farmers, business people, women, and many many others who could in fact be penalized as a result of a provincial government's inability or unwillingness to respond to the criteria and the standards that are set by the federal government with regard to the utilization of health care funds.

I started off by saying that I considered this particular bill, C-20, to be brutal and insensitive. Why did I say that? I think it ignores the realities of today. I have spoken before as have many of my colleagues about the poor in this nation, over 5 million at this very moment who are living at or below the level of poverty, most of whom are women, and many of whom are senior citizens, and over 1 million of whom are children. I talked about the people receiving social assistance, 2 million as we speak right now, about the people who would be fed par des banques alimentaires, 1.8 million people this year in Canada, almost 1.5 million people who in fact are receiving unemployment insurance. The list goes on and on and on.

Why brutal and insensitive? Because which of those particular people in those groups will be receiving any particular assistance from this kind of legislation? Not one single one.

What else will happen? The contributing provinces, provinces such as Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta, which contribute funds to the rest of Canada in order to even out the unevenness in terms of wealth so that other Canadians can receive basic services and health, education, social assistance, and what have you so that the quality of life is more or less the same, are suffering too. They are suffering too. Yet they have been capped with respect to social assistance expenditures.

How does that make them feel? On the one hand they have paid off huge sums of money. On the other hand they are being capped additionally. The resentment is growing not only in these provinces but it is creating two classes of people, that class which contributes, the class which receives, and there is growing tension and conflict. As well it is leading to the small and those who are weaker economically becoming even weaker, that is they are not able to offer the essentials of the quality of life.

There will be additional suffering.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, this bill does absolutely nothing for these people, whether we are talking about the poor, people who get their food from food banks, the unemployed or people on welfare.

[English]

I also said that this particular bill was divisive. Yes, it is. It is increasingly so because some of our wealthier provinces are able to spend more in spite of the fact that they are having difficult times, for example in their hospitals or their post-secondary educational institutions, so we are establishing different classes of colleges and universities. How would you feel, Mr. Speaker, how would we all feel if our particular universities and colleges in our provinces could not offer the same kinds of quality programs that are offered elsewhere.

There is province against province, university against university, college against college, region against region, and I have already indicated that Ontario, B.C., and Alberta sometimes feel as if they are against the rest of Canada.

[Translation]

I think it is too bad we are seeing region against region, that some institutions are being neglected by the federal government in terms of funding and are no longer able to provide the services they want to provide, such as health care, education and social assistance. We are creating one class of people who are more or less well off and another class of people who are definitely not well off, and I think the gap between the two is growing at an alarming rate.

[English]

I also said initially that this particular bill was misleading. Why did I say it was misleading? There is a very strong suggestion on the part of government that it is being done to control the deficit and the debt. We heard it again today. We know that the deficit is in the neighbourhood of $30 billion. No one is happy about that. We know that the debt is in excess of $400 billion. Certainly we are saddened by that. What is really extremely offensive is that the government suggests that it is at that particular height size, call it what you will, level, because of the deficit and the debt that it inherited from the previous administration.

I am sorry, that is not true. I have a signed letter from the former Minister of Finance, the Minister for International Trade, indicating that the debt in the year in which the government took over power was less than $168 billion. Factor in the interest rates since then and there is no way that it built up to $400 billion. I have done it, I have had others do it. I guess it is a kind of misleading statement, that effort to try to lay the blame on others rather than to say: "Look, we have made some mistakes, here are some of them, here is what we are trying to do in order to correct them".

It is misleading because what will this particular bill do? What have previous cuts done to reduce the deficit and the debt? Canadians see no evidence of it. They have had well over 30 tax increases, including the hated goods and services tax. They are paying more than ever before. The middle class is being bludgeoned, the poor are even poorer, and those at the top of the salary scale are getting away with more and more. People out there are saying: When is it going to stop?

They would not be nearly as offended if they could see progress being made, if they could see the deficit being lowered, the debt being lowered, if they could see their jobs being secure, their future in terms of pensions being realized—now they worry as to whether or not they will ever be able to get them—see their sons and daughters with opportunities for a good education, for a meaningful job where they will be able to develop their total talent and contribute fully to this country, indeed the whole world. Then they would be less alarmed, then they would be less offended.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, this bill does too little. It gives every indication that it will do something to reduce the deficit and the debt but, unfortunately, that is not the case. There is no evidence to support that claim. If we look at all the increases we have had since 1984—and I believe it was 34—we have not made any headway. We have slipped back. Take, for instance, the debt as a percentage of the Gross National Product. This ratio has changed drastically since 1984. There has been negative growth, which does nothing for us, for Parliament, for government or the country.

[English]

My final point when I first introduced the bill in order to address it was it will not work. Why will it not work? Already we know it is being contested, and that is a very poor start for any piece of legislation. We know that it will create further animosity. I pointed out that the provinces are being capped, they are not happy because they are suffering. Look at the province of Ontario, the number of bankruptcies, the number of unemployed, the number of people on social assistance, and somehow this capping suggests to Ontario, to B.C. or to Alberta that they have it good.

They do not have it good. They are having serious difficulties, as is the rest of Canada. What will happen? There will be additional intolerance, animosity and anger that will be generated as a result of this particular treatment. What will our young people say when they know full well that there will be no more dollars for health as their parents get older or for themselves as they reach the age when they need more medical care? As they want to go on to college and university, they see that the opportunities are slipping for an education or jobs or for a meaningful future. How will they respond? How could they possibly contribute fully?

• (1520)

Surely we all sense the great disappointment not only in this piece of legislation but in many other decisions that have been taken which limit the quality of life for our citizens throughout Canada whether we speak of health care, education, social assistance or a number of other areas.

[Translation]

As I said when I started my speech, I wish I were wrong. I wish I were wrong about my predictions that this bill will not work, will not produce the results it was intended to produce, at least the ones the government said it was intended to produce, in other words, reduce the deficit and the debt and try and establish a much sounder system than the one we have today, in order to put our economy on a sound footing, so that we can establish those social programs that respond to the needs of Canadians. Unfortunately, that is not the case.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to repeat that I think it is too bad that this bill does not address the real problems of Canadians today. I find this bill harsh and insensitive, even improper; it will foster more division. It offers too little and it will not work at all. It tries to give the impression that cuts will improve Canadians' economic situation, although that is not so.

I will complete my speech with one remark. We heard it in the House of Commons yesterday, and in the Citizen today, there is an article which says:

[English]

"Tighten Belts, MP Tells Premiers". I suppose that one of the more offensive things that the government has done is to suggest that it has been controlling the expenditures of the federal government when we all know that it has been putting them off on the backs of the provinces and the territories and every single man and woman who is paying taxes.

I said it before and I want to say it again. It is very easy to control one's expenses when you give them to someone else. I have debts and if I were able to walk around and share them with my colleagues here in the House I would walk out of the House debt free. I expect I would get some resistance by the way. But that is what has happened.

The government says it has controlled the expenditures in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent. That is no wonder. It has given all of its expenses to the provincial governments and then on to the hospitals, the universities, the colleges and then to the students and the patients and what have you.

I see this kind of statement: "Tighten Belts, MP Tells Premiers" as misleading. That is the kindest word that comes to mind and I could think of others that are much less kind. It does not tell the whole truth. I think it is part of the malaise that exists in our country today and that is why the citizen out there is less than confident about political parties and politicians. That is why the citizen out there really wants a fundamental change, a change which will lead to fierce debate about the ideas and the issues. I am sure Canadians throughout the nation welcome that. They also want accurate information so that they can make the judgments as to who is right and who is wrong.

I rest my case. I say that Bill C–20 is regressive. It will not fulfil the objectives that the government stated or left unstated. It will not curb the deficit or the debt. It will disappoint a lot of people: the poor, the unemployed, the people who have to go to food banks, those who are on social assistance, and all of those other Canadians who are dependent or will be dependent upon medical treatment. It will also disappoint those who will want an education, a better job and a retirement with some dignity.

[Translation]

I would be so pleased if the government would consider the points made by my colleagues and me with a view to changing some aspects of the bill and maybe government policy as well.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate my colleague for St. Boniface on an excellent presentation. I would like to build on what my colleague was discussing.

The reason why Bill C–20 was introduced was to allow the government to deal with its budget of February 26, 1991. I would like to talk about one segment of that particular budget. It deals with the transfer payments to the provinces in the area of post–secondary education.

If the government follows its plan there will be no transfer payments to the provinces in both health care and post–secondary education by the year 2004.

This is very alarming. In a way it is in contradiction with what the government is presently talking about in its constitutional proposals, in particular the proposals that deal with learning and our ability to compete internationally.

It is unfair for the federal government on one hand to talk about the importance of education and on the other hand cut transfer payments. The provinces on their own as well as the municipalities and the school boards cannot carry on with the existing workload without some federal government support.

There has been a cut of $485 million from the 1991 educational budget. When you look at the federal government training and educational contributions it has dropped by 4.6 per cent. Compare that with the amount of increase in government spending which is in the amount of 4.3 per cent. On one hand you have the spending in certain areas having been increased while on the other hand when it comes to education and spending on learning and training, it has decreased.

Between 1984 and 1986 the federal government slashed approximately $9.5 billion in transfer payments to the provinces. As we move forward there seems to be less and less commitment by the federal government toward education and the provinces.

While there has been a decrease in funding for education, we see the student costs have been on the rise. Looking at post–secondary education, Statistic Canada reports that in the province of Ontario alone the tuition fees have increased by approximately 53.5 per cent between 1983–84 and 1990–91. Where there has been an increase in tuition fees and costs of education there has been a decrease in federal contributions toward post–secondary education.

Consider the cost of student accommodation across Canada. In my riding alone the cost of residence fees has increased between 40.6 and 176 per cent since 1984–85. For example, six years ago a room in residence at one of the two universities used to rent for somewhere between $1,127 and $1,326 a year. Now they are rented at a cost of approximately $1,600 to $3,600. My colleague from Newfoundland says "incredible".

On top of the cost of living increases, the federal government has introduced a 3 per cent tax on student loans and applied the GST to books. This has added at least a few hundred dollars to many students' financial burden and has hit hardest those of middle or low income.

The government has decreased its funding to education, and that is extremely clear in Bill C–20 with its implications. You must look at the area of research and development, for example, and what the government said in 1984 and what has happened since then. In 1984 the government made a commitment to double the percentage of the gross domestic product spent on research and development. But what has happened, in fact, is the amount of money spent on research and development has decreased from 1.42 per cent in 1985 to 1.36 per cent in 1990.

So that tells us as we move into the 20th century that the federal government is investing less and less in the area of research and development and education.

We are going to be faced with an alarming situation over the next few years. By the year 2030, one in every four Canadians will be a senior citizen, compared to one in every ten now. By the end of the century, senior citizens will represent approximately 13 per cent of the population and youth will represent about 9.4 per cent. The reason why I say this is because I want you to know that our tax base is shrinking as a result of the fact that we have a lot less people now who are paying taxes than we used to have in the past and we will have even less in the future than we have right now.

Because of this shrinkage in the tax base, we are going to see more pressure on the infrastructures such as our health care system and our social welfare system. Those seniors will need more care and assistance. As a result of that the government will have to look at ways to generate more revenue.

In my view, one way is to invest in the areas of education and research and development, rather than cutting down. I will elaborate on that by mentioning only the question of productivity in Canada.

If we look at the productivity of Canada's work force, we find that it has lagged behind the other economically advanced countries. A high percentage of our work force, as you know, is illiterate to some degree and unable to cope with new technology. The problem is especially serious in light of the current shift in world trade. Resource commodities, which are Canada's economic mainstay, are being replaced by information and knowledge-intensive goods.

Speaking again about productivity in terms of our work force, we compare Canada's productivity growth with that of the G-7 countries. We score very miserably in key sector of international competitiveness. For example, in 1990 Canada ranked well below the middle among 23 countries surveyed by the World Economic Forum. The forum looked at factors such as international orientation, managerial initiative and the quantity of skilled labour.

International comparisons in general have shown that we are investing enough to remain competitive as long as the skills our students learn are relevant. Obviously, that investment is not giving us the return that we are expecting from it.

The reason I say that is because nearly 40 per cent of the Canadian population has difficulty reading, writing and doing basic math tasks. In comparison, Japan's rate of illiteracy has been estimated to be less than 1 per cent, in West Germany it is less than 4 per cent and in the United Kingdom it is less than 6 per cent.

Obviously we have a situation where national attention is required if we are to really deal with the questions of productivity, reducing the deficit and competing internationally.

That supports the fact that the federal government should not be making cuts in the areas of research and development, training and education; it should be investing in them.

A 1990 study released by the Conference Board of Canada has found that illiteracy hinders companies from bringing in new technology, such as computer or high-tech equipment. That study found—and my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood is carefully listening to this as the critic for small business—that almost one-third of the 626 companies surveyed said that illiteracy had significantly slowed down work or caused quality control problems because workers could not understand instructions.

Also, the Canadian Business Task Force on Illiteracy estimates that the cost to our Canadian society is approximately $10 billion a year and the cost to business itself is approximately $4 billion a year. The government is really barking up the wrong tree.

We are cutting back in areas which in my view we should be investing in more. We are cutting back in those areas thinking that we will reduce and control the deficit. That is similar to someone who might, as I said many times before, sell the furniture in order to pay the rent. The other way should be true. The government should set up a fairly aggressive strategy in terms of investing and call it investment. Do not call it expenditure because it is not an expenditure. Call it an investment and move on.

There are other areas where the government is not investing. Those areas are adult training and education, as I mentioned before, but also I want to just mention the question of training. The government seems to be talking about it quite a bit lately.

There is an alarming situation where the average Canadian worker participated in 6.7 hours of formal training in 1988. By contrast an Australian worker received 17 hours, a Swede received 170 hours, and a Japanese 200 hours annually in terms of training. We should compare ourselves to other countries around the world in the area of investment in training. This is a shocking figure where the government is not investing in the training of the work force.

That very same work force is going to move us into the next century and help us to be competitive internationally. It is going to provide the taxes and the revenues that our government will need in order to support our needy population.

Also, it is really interesting that only one-third of Canadian companies provide any training to employees at all. Of course they cannot provide enough training to employees because there is not enough investment on the part of the government. There are not enough incentives on the part of the government. There is not enough involvement on the part of the government in the area of training. Yes, there are certain programs out there, but those programs are not doing enough. Those programs are not doing the job.

• (1540)

In the Conference Board survey, 75 per cent of companies reported basic problems with literacy. The government will invest some money in the area of literacy over the next five years and some of my colleagues mentioned that the amount of money that is spent literally comes to a few dollars per illiterate. That certainly is not enough investment in the area of illiteracy.

What we have to do is invest more in the area of education and not less. Look for instance at what we spend on adult training or teaching. We spend approximately $5 billion and that is roughly about one-eighth of the amount invested in formal education. But when we are facing other countries, we see that they are increasing their investment on an annual basis, not reducing it.

For example, Germany has increased its expenditures on training by 45 per cent in the last three years. Germany has acknowledged that to move into the 21st century, it has to do something really drastic. It has acknowledged that the international barriers to world trade have been removed. It has acknowledged that the number one country in the world will be the one that deals with the question of education aggressively, that treats education as a priority, and treats training as a priority, so it is investing more.

Japan for example is also increasing its spending on an annual basis at an incredible rate. I do not have the figures, but I presume they are doing more there than we are here in Canada.

Look at this and compare it to what our experts in our government are telling us. I want to look at just the Department of Employment and Immigration that rightly predicts that many of the low-skill jobs in the next century will simply disappear. We will not have any more jobs that an unskilled individual can do. The reasons for that are automation, globalization of trade, and the growing importance of the service sector, which is just beginning. There is a shift and we are losing a lot of our industry that used to use primitive technology. They are simply disappearing off the map and are replaced with industry that is using high-tech equipment. But when you use high-tech equipment you need more or less high-tech employees to be able to work on that equipment and read the instructions.

Obviously, with the quality of workers that we have now they cannot do it on their own. They need the support of the government. They need investment on the part of the government so they can catch up and move on into the next century, fully equipped with the knowledge that they need.

The reason I brought those figures to your attention is to tell you that Bill C-20 in a way does put a cap on and gives the wrong signal, not to the provinces or the universities or the municipalities, but to society as a whole. We are telling society that we have a difficult situation here. We do not have the money and we are not going to do anything about it.

In my view, that is the wrong approach.

Even if we have to mortgage the House of Commons, the government should do it in order to invest in areas such as education, training and combating illiteracy. That mortgage will be removed fairly soon and we will have not only a House of Commons mortgage-free, but also a society that is fully equipped to move into the 21st century and compete not only in North America but all around the world. We could move Canada from where we are right now into the leading edge.

I want to leave with one single statement, said by Lewis Perleman of the Hudson Institute. He wrote in the December 1990 edition of Business Week, and I quote: "Because knowledge is the steel of the post industrial economy, this—".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time is over.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my hon. friend for Ottawa Centre for a very wide ranging speech in the areas of health and education, particularly in education. It was an exposé of some of the things that this Bill C-20 will do. I think the essence of his message is that it is very short-sighted when we on the one hand are doing this and on the other hand are producing reports that say we are not competitive because we are not educating people properly, particularly when we are dealing with countries like Japan and Germany. If there is any message that has been a resounding, repetitive and reinforced message, and I have listened to the most of the presentations in this House, it is really along those lines.

Not to be lost in the seriousness of what the hon. member for Ottawa Centre brings out, I just want to bring to the attention of the House that there are 14 or 15 payments that are going to be cut out of provinces. It is the payment for medicare as well as post-secondary education that concerns me as a member for Newfoundland. It is horrible to read a report called Funding Health and Higher Education, Danger Looming. I have part of this report here. It says that within a few years, unless new fiscal arrangements are made, the provinces and the territories will run out of money for health and education.

That is frightening. I will give some idea of what is involved here. When this government started to cut the EPF back in 1986 it was fairly modest. It was $100 million for that year. If we follow the trend that is now taking place, it will reach $16 billion by the end of the century. The cumulative loss to the provinces at that time will be almost $100 billion.

Let me tell you what the report says. The figures are startling. I see the minister of health will be listening to this as well.

They project that the federal cash payments to Quebec will be gone by 1996. That is only a few years from now. Cash payments to Ontario will end by fiscal year 2002. The last federal cash payment to any province or territory, having stopped with Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and all the other provinces, will take place to the Yukon territories in fiscal year 2008 and 2009.

I think that is unacceptable. I see a lot of members on both sides of the House shaking their heads. They cannot believe it. People who are watching these presentations go back to when this budget was introduced in February and are saying: "Is this coming back to haunt us?" This is the bill that will make that budget law. I think many of us, if not most of us on this side of the House are going to oppose it and we are giving our signals right now to that extent.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, not only do I agree with my colleague's intervention 100 per cent, but I would just like to bring to the attention of the House that the national health care act is one of the finest initiatives that we have embarked on in the past 20 or 30 years.

When the national health care act was introduced it was well thought out. It is still one of the finest acts to be found anywhere in the world. Even in the United States they are looking at our model for health care and they are trying to adopt it.

It is really amazing when we see that there are people in our society now who are trying to move away from it.

An hon. member: They are trying to destroy it.

Mr. Harb: They are trying to destroy it, thinking that by abandoning the existing health care system we are doing someone a favour. In reality, by abandoning the infrastructure we put into place 20 years ago we are not serving the best interest of Canadians. We have to maintain our health care system. We have to build on the strengths of the health care system and not detract from it and obviously the government budget does just that.

• (1550)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the member for Ottawa Centre has made a very important point today on productivity.

There is absolutely no way we can create a labour force in this country which will ultimately produce the wealth that is going to be required to meet the future deficit and debt challenges that face this country.

I think the hon. member for Ottawa Centre has made the point quite clearly that the government is not reflecting and analysing this issue closely enough. If we create a motivated, productive, skilled labour force then we will have the capacity to face the deficit and debt that face this nation.

Time after time when the hon. member for Ottawa Centre stands in this House he repeats the point on illiteracy that must be challenged in this country and that more money has to be put into education and training. My question to my colleague is: What are we going to do in order to communicate or to rattle the thought process of this government to consider other options or other approaches than the one it is currently on which is obviously not working?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his excellent intervention.

As our leader mentioned at the Aylmer conference, the answer to that is to set up a national education standard. That is one way to deal with the problem, and in my view it is the only way we can deal with the problem.

My colleague mentioned the question of training. Obviously his question was well thought out. I am at a loss. We are at the point where we have a deficiency when it comes to our work force. Why is the federal government in its constitutional proposal talking about passing on the question of training to the provinces without any sort of a standard for training, without entertaining the possibility of a standard for training all across the country. It would remove any kind of a disparity. If somebody is receiving training in Newfoundland or if somebody is receiving training in another part of the country, they will both receive the same type of training without the difficulties they might be faced with in the different parts of the country.

In answer to the question, I too am at a loss in terms of the government's rationale when it comes to dealing with the question of training, with the question of reducing the deficit, and with the question of improving productivity.

I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, the small business critic who always raises the same question over and over again, that we have to set up a strategy. I think I would like to join with him in saying that maybe it is time for the government to start listening.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–20 is not the first time that this government has participated in further cutbacks to the provinces for health and post–secondary funding, but in dealing with this bill we see clearly the philosophical gap between this government and most Canadians. We see a gap which most Canadians would urge the government to close. We see a situation that indicates that the government is clearly not in step with the wishes, desires and aspirations of other Canadians.

In Canada we have something which separates us from many other countries. It particularly separates us from the United States. We have joint federal and provincial fundings and commitments to health care, to post–secondary education, to our social safety net, and to our unemployment insurance program among others.

In other words we have a sort of social contract across Canada. Canadians expect and anticipate that their governments, provincial or federal, will participate in health care, will participate in post–secondary education and will participate in the social safety net. They will not only participate in those programs, but they will work to enhance them and improve them, not work to undermine them.

What we have seen across this country are provincial Liberal and Conservative governments that have undermined those programs, that have cut funding to health care, education and social assistance. We have seen a federal government which has consistently since 1984 undermined those very programs which are so important to most Canadians.

These programs, the federal and provincial support programs for health care, post–secondary education and for our social safety net, are important to Canadians because they make important statements about what sort of country Canada is and about who we are as Canadians.

They say that Canada as a country cares about its citizens when times are tough. It cares about its citizens when they are sick. It encourages and helps its citizens to obtain the highest level of education possible so that they can go on to make a valuable contribution to society.

The programs that Bill C–20 undermines are programs which are very important to Canadians.

In addition to cutting funding to the provinces for health care and education, this bill also increases the costs to employees and employers of the unemployment insurance fund, a fund which is designed to protect Canadians when they lose their jobs through no fault of their own and need some assistance in order to survive through the period before they get their next job, hopefully. It would provide them with the assistance to feed their families and keep their homes together.

The undermining of the commitment by the federal government to the unemployment insurance fund, cutting back on its funding, making it more difficult for Canadians to obtain unemployment insurance and forcing Canadians to have that protection for a shorter period of time, all those things are as a result of reductions in the federal government's commitment to unemployment insurance and have hurt ordinary Canadians severely.

When Bill C-20 was in committee, all the witnesses who came before the committee told the committee that this was a bill that would hurt ordinary Canadians. It would hurt our health care system. It would hurt our post-secondary education system and it would hurt Canadians who would be in need of unemployment insurance from time to time. Every group pointed out that this could be another nail in the coffin of medicare in this country. The freezing of contributions to the provinces for yet more years, the underfunding which has already taken place, the deterioration of our health care system which is already clear across the country to anyone who wants to go and see it, and the longer line-ups for surgery for health care, all these things will be made worse as a result of Bill C-20. All the witnesses who came before the committee advised the committee of that.

Those groups that came as witnesses were those who were closest to the issues, those who worked in the health care system or those who worked in the education system. They were those who worked on a daily basis with Canadians in sickness and in circumstances of poverty and unemployment. These groups understand those problems and understand how hard it is for so many Canadians to feed their families and to make ends meet. They who knew advised the committee to scrap Bill C-20, advised the government to scrap Bill C-20, and called upon the government to enhance its commitment to these very important social programs which separate Canada from our neighbour to the south.

• (1600)

Why did these groups point out the problems of these further cuts? It is not just because they do not understand the deficit. They clearly do understand the deficit. We all understand the extent to which the financial resources of the country are strained. But the critics of Bill C-20, those who want to keep our health care system as good as it possibly can be and to enhance our post-secondary education system, want the system to be as good as it can be because they see it as the only way to have the country go forward.

In these days when the government is continuing to tell us how important it is to be productive and how important it is to be competitive in a world economy, we cannot in the same breath cut funding to post-secondary education. It makes no sense on the one hand to argue for us to be competitive and on the other hand to take away the tools which will enable us to be competitive.

Cutting funding to the provinces for post-secondary education is cutting back on our ability to compete in the future, cutting back on our ability to survive in the future and cutting back on the opportunity for Canadians to participate in the economy in as effective a way as they possibly can. By cutting back on funding to post-secondary education we undermine the very tool which can enable us to pay off the deficit, to pay off the debt, to get the country moving again.

The better educated Canadians are, the more likely they are to be working. By cutting back on post-secondary education we ensure that many more will be unemployed. It is a backward way of trying to deal with this particular problem.

What about health care? It comes back to health care. Canadians know that if they are sick they do not lose everything. They have security. Their health care will be looked after no matter how serious the problem is. They will not suffer some financial catastrophe as a result of becoming sick.

By speeding up the time at which cash from the federal government to the provincial governments will be cut back, will be ended, by speeding up the process of the ending of cash transfers to the provinces, this government takes away from itself an opportunity to ensure that the health care system can be as good as it can be. It takes away the opportunity to punish the provinces if they do not provide a comprehensive, universally available, portable and publicly administered health care system.

It will undermine the ability to maintain the quality and accessibility of our health care system the more the government cuts back on funding. Bill C–20 has important implications. Extending the ceiling on contributions from the federal government to the provinces for health care has important implications to the equality and accessibility of our health care system.

In addition, as I mentioned we have in this particular bill added costs to employees and employers as a result of changes to the unemployment insurance program. We have already seen the program being more difficult to enter. Those Canadians who are out of work are finding it more difficult to claim unemployment insurance. They cannot claim it for as long. Now we are seeing in this bill that they are going to have to pay more for the privilege; not only workers but businesses too. The implication for businesses are serious in this time of deep recession. It is not a time to add to the costs of running a small business in Canada by forcing those businesses to pay more for the unemployment insurance program.

We have all these program cuts which will in the end, as we have seen already because the program cuts have been in place for some time and we have seen the implications of those programs, continue to make it more difficult for Canada to pull out of the economic mess it is in. One of the arguments the government uses is that the provincial governments are in a better financial situation than the federal government and so they should share the burden of the federal deficit. In the five years leading up to 1994–95, Saskatchewan will as a result of this bill lose $348 million.

In Saskatchewan, as you know, the change of government took place a month ago and the new NDP government has been investigating the finances of the former Conservative government, a government which followed the same economic policies as this federal government has been pursuing. The debt in Saskatchewan—and of course they are still adding it up because it is not always so easy to find— is now in excess of $13 billion in a province of less than one million people because of the mismanagement and the misguided policies of the previous Conservative government. We have record farm, business and personal bankruptcies; 80,000 people, almost 10 per cent of the population of the province, left Saskatchewan since 1982; and yet on top of all of these problems, on top of all of these record difficulties, the federal government is deciding to cut back further on funding to Saskatchewan, to cut back $348 million over the next five years for health care and post–secondary education alone. What is the point of attacking Saskatchewan citizens, Saskatchewan people who may become sick, Saskatchewan students? What is the point in attacking them further when already, as I said, they are suffering from record farm, business and personal bankruptcies and people are leaving the province at record rates?

All this will do is make the situation worse, make the situation harder for those Canadians who live in Saskatchewan. Of course, Saskatchewan is merely a reflection of the other provinces. They are all being made to suffer. The residents of the provinces are being made to suffer as a result of this government's commitment to pay off the deficit on the backs of ordinary Canadians.

Of course, we should not let the record before this government go unnoticed. We have heard and we will continue to hear many speeches from the Official Opposition about how severe these cuts are, how they undermine the ability of the country to function and to pull out of this recession. But just a few short years ago, the last decade, Liberal governments did exactly the same thing, from 1975 when a ceiling was put on federal contributions to medicare with the introduction of block funding and the end of the 50/50 cost sharing in 1977, to the removal of the revenue guarantee in 1982. All those things made an important contribution to the reduction in quality and accessibility of our health care system.

In government, the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party, began this process which the new government took on itself with a great deal of vigour. This sequence of events followed one after the other, the Liberal cuts followed by the Conservative cuts. All the time, of course, ordinary Canadians were made to suffer.

The time has come to invest in the future, to invest in Canada, to invest in Canadians. There are other approaches than this ratcheting down of the economy that this government is pursuing. There are other approaches than cutting back on social services, cutting back on health care, at a time when people need them most, cutting back on post–secondary education when that is the one way that we will be able to get out of our economic difficulties.

There are other ways. There are other ways being followed by other countries which have been successful in dealing with the problems we are facing. Look at either the Japanese example or at a country like Austria, which has followed a full employment policy, which has ensured very low levels of unemployment, which has controlled inflation, which has controlled its currency value to a desirable level, which has dealt with foreign ownership in an effective way, which has addressed the investment problems and research problems and so on of its economy, a country like that took the creation of unemployment as its main goal in economic policy and it built everything else around that.

There was not an ignoring of inflation, an ignoring of the currency, and so on, ignoring of other economic indicators. There was a clear recognition that the way to fix the economy was to make sure that people were working, to follow a full employment policy. Neither the Liberal federal government nor the Conservative government has ever pursued a full employment policy and neither have the provinces. None of them have put unemployment as the first order of business.

We see inflation as a problem. What do we see Liberal and Conservative governments doing across the country? They create unemployment to reduce inflation. Ordinary Canadians pay the price for government policies which have not worked.

The way to deal with all of these issues in those countries which have followed full employment policies is, of course, to deal with these matters in a co-operative way with business, government and labour sitting down together to deal with the critical economic issues of the day. That works in Scandinavian countries and, as I say, in Austria. It provides people with security, it provides people with jobs and it provides people with a participation in the decision-making process.

The last point I want to make is that if we have those full employment policies, if we have Canadians working, they can provide for their families. They can buy the food they need. They can provide the housing they need. They do not need to have them provided by a social safety net.

They will of course at times need the social safety net. They might be unemployed at different times in their lives and they will need the security, the cushion of an unemployment insurance program. By working, they will be able to provide for the services, provide for the things they need.

The only way to ensure that Canadians have what they need in terms of food, shelter and so on for their families is to provide them with a job. It is time that this government dispensed with these economic policies that are not working. They are not working anywhere in the world, as we can so clearly see. It is time we dispensed with those policies and took on policies which put people first, not large corporations first, and developed and put forward strongly a full employment policy so that people can work in Canada and people can provide the services they need.

It is not the solution to crank down on social services, to crank down on education, to crank down on health care funding to the provinces. It is quite clear the provinces cannot sustain those programs at the level of quality that is required in Canada.

It is time for this government to put Canadians first, to invest in the future, to invest in Canada and to invest in Canadians.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say again, as I do on every occasion, how privileged I am to rise in this House on debate, specifically on this important Bill C-20.

Bill C-20 has rung many alarm bells across this country because of its implications for that most venerable of our social policies, medicare. It also has implications of course for post-secondary education and it is tied into the effort the Conservative government has been trying to make toward eradicating illiteracy.

These two areas of responsibility are of course under provincial jurisdiction, but the federal government is able to direct the policies because it pays the bills. We pay the bills. The legislation before us moves the federal government away from its monetary commitments in these areas. The implications for the continuation of these programs remains grim to say the least under this government.

We have to ask ourselves: If there is less money coming from the federal government to the provinces to support these programs of which I speak, is the federal government still able to direct national standards? The message from Canadians, from my constituents in Hamilton West, I believe is that they do not want the federal government to abandon its traditional role in supporting these programs and enforcing national standards. The government must continue to support in fiscal and policy areas full national standards.

The main purpose of this bill is to put into effect the provision to extend the freeze on Established Programs Financing or transfers, as we like to call them, to the provinces until the year 1995. It is the former Minister of Finance's legacy to this country.

It is medicare that would be most effective under this scheme because of the way it is treated under the governing statute of medicare, the Canada Health Act.

My concern and that of my constituents to whom I have spoken as recently as today is the impact this bill, Bill C-20, will have on our treasured and highly respected social and health and education programs. Bill C-20 is the government's big-stick approach, a deliberate attack on, among other things, the very future of the medicare system in our country.

Canadians are proud of their social systems, especially medicare. We are familiar with the difference between our health care system and the health care system we witness in the United States. People need to have huge amounts of insurance coverage because health care as we all know is so very expensive there. In Canada we take it for granted.

I do not mean that in a negative way. What I mean is that there is a medicare system there for us to rely on wherever and whenever we need it. Of course this makes it universal in scope.

It is that very universality that is under attack in this particular piece of legislation, Bill C-20. Health care is a provincial responsibility, but the federal government calls the shots on how it is to be organized because it has the money. The less money that the federal government has at its disposal to expend, the less clout it is going to have enforcing provisions of the Canada Health Care Act.

Let us imagine for just a moment the worst case scenario in a breakdown of this system we are speaking about. This would be where in one less affluent province health care resources would be extremely strained. In another more affluent province, health care would have greater resources. What is the end result? It would create a system that would no longer be universal from coast to coast to coast, but a patchwork quilt where good health care depended upon what part of the country you lived in.

The concerns that are coming out of my constituency are very real. The health care act, our public medicare system of course is one of the cornerstones, one of the building blocks of this great nation. As I mentioned earlier, I had a chance to speak with some of the hospital administrators in my riding.

In Hamilton we are proud, we boast, that we have the Hamilton Civic Hospitals, that is Henderson Hospital and the General. We boast that we have St. Joseph's Hospital in the downtown core. We have, of course, the Chedoke McMaster Hospital. Many a member in this Chamber I am sure is familiar with the McMaster University Medical Centre.

What are they are saying? If you want a direct quote from one of them I will give it to you. "Because of the financial situation we are in this year, we are survivable". Survivable. "Next year it is going to be a bitch".

Why? Probably because they foresee in their budgets a deficit that will be created next year and probably stay with us for three years, they say. A deficit of $5 million to $9 million is the possible in 1992. That is on a budget of just over $220 million.

What do they need at these hospitals in Hamilton to sustain the services and the programs they have initiated for next year? They say they need between 6 per cent and 7 per cent. That would maintain the current services and programs where they are today.

• (1620)

Because of cutbacks in transfer payments, reassessments, et cetera, they are guessing that they are going to get an increase, not of 6 and 7 per cent, but of only 2 per cent. What is that going to result in? The answer is obvious. It is going to impact on our programs and our services. It will mean cutbacks.

We heard from other members from the Toronto area where those cutbacks are going to happen. They have already begun. Wards have closed. People are being laid off.

What about Hamilton? In the great city of Hamilton we have cancer research programs, cardiovascular and neuroscience programs. We have the burns unit and the trauma program which are second to none in the world.

What are they facing next year? Deficits. What are they facing? Two per cent increases.

This government is tampering dangerously with a medicare system that is second to none. If anything else, it is feeling the insecurity. These hospitals in the Hamilton area, in Burlington, in Halton—Peel and in other areas across this country are feeling the insecurity of the pending budget crisis they may face by the end of their fiscal year, March 31 of next year. They are on pins and needles.

They ask themselves if there are going to be savings. The government hopes that with this bill and other parts of its strategy to save X amount of money.

The hospital administrators tell me the government is going to try to save X amount of money and in order to save that money at that particular hospital, it will have to close a service. Let us take maternity service, for example. At this hospital in Hamilton it will have to close the door to the maternity service to save money. It is only going to have half the amount intended. Why is that? The demands by the public for the services of the hospital and for the maternity services of that particular hospital are only going to shift to another hospital. As a result, what is the saving? Now we have an increased demand at another hospital within as little as 10 or 15 miles of the other.

Do Canadians want that kind of a system? I say no. This bill does not create that kind of gap, but I believe this bill and the continued administration of medicare under this government put the system on a slippery slope toward an uncertain future for medicare in this country.

As testimony to the notion that under Bill C–20 medicare is threatened, the former Minister of Finance stated in the House of Commons on February 26 of last year: "I recognize that limiting the growth of transfers under the Established Programs Financing raises concern about the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing national medicare principles under the Canada Health Act", and that "legislation would be introduced to ensure that the federal government continues to have the means to enforce these medicare principles".

In other words, behind the smoke and mirrors this government is saying: "Even though we are paying less and less of the bill, we will still call the shots". The government is so sure that it has abandoned its role that it has included a section in this bill which tries to reinforce the federal presence in medicare, but it is only on paper. The problem is, without the financial commitment, without the financial backbone from this government, the provinces will not have to listen to the federal government, without whose support national standards will be extremely difficult to pursue, even unconstitutional, as some have said it would be.

Canadians do not buy this attempt by the government to sweep medicare under the rug. We on this side of the House do not buy the bill of goods this government is trying to sell us. Either you are in or you are out, you cannot have it both ways.

This government is driving Canadians to the unemployment lines and is neglecting the programs that are so fundamental to the lives of Canadians.

We need full employment in this country. We need to save our national programs and their national standards before it is too late.

We ask the government to listen to the people. They are speaking out.

In today's Quorum I could not help but read the results of a most recent survey of 1,505 adults. Angus Reid said:

"This is a government without the legitimacy of public support in any region. It is a beneficiary of an unprecedented level of public anger and anxiety, anxiety that it is not addressing the things that worry Canadians like the economy; anger in the sense that the country is being run by a dictatorship."

There is clear evidence; 1,505 adults who picked up the phone and answered the questions of the pollster said they feel helpless.

Unemployment lines are growing, food banks are running out, more people are going to food banks and more children are in poverty in this country. There are one million children in poverty in Canada. It is outrageous.

Now we have before us Bill C–20. What kind of strategy is this?

I challenge the government to show me, show my constituents and show Canadians how this bill contributes in some kind of a positive way to our health care system, in some kind of a positive way to our post–secondary education, especially literacy. If it does it will get my unqualified support.

In its present form Bill C–20 illustrates a government on the take, caring very little for those in need, especially in today's economic climate and the tragic fallout of that economic climate. It illustrates this government's economic mismanagement over the duration of its three–year term which stretches back even prior to a three–year term, right back for almost eight years. For eight years we have had a problem in this country and during those eight years we had a time to sock some away.

An hon. member: Eleven years starting with—

Mr. Keyes: If the hon. NDP member wants to get up and speak he will have his opportunity.

We have the opportunity here to do something about it and we have Bill C–20. This bill in its present form is leaving our cherished principles exposed and vulnerable. The party that I am proud to be a member of will have no part of it.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my hon. friend a question about medicare.

With the transfer of payments not going ahead as planned to keep a good system in place in this country, and with the federal government backing away from the provinces and making them pay more money or alternatively reducing the services, what does the hon. member really think is coming eventually down the road, in very short order, as a result of this federal government backing away from its national responsibility to maintain reasonable standards and reasonable taxation levels at lower levels of government in this country with regard to medicare for all the people of Canada?

• (1630)

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for the question.

A little earlier I gave the example of Hamilton having many exemplary hospitals. We have the Hamilton Civic Hospital, St. Joseph's Hospital, McMaster University Medical Centre and Chedoke Hospital. We have a system renowned around the world. It is admired to the point where even the United States is attempting to emulate our system.

This government is trying to hackney it down into the ground on economic terms, on strategy completely foreign to Canadian interests. I gave the example of trying to save money by eliminating a maternity program at one hospital and taking the people who were going to use that service and transferring their requests and demands to another hospital. What are you saving?

In answer to my hon. friend, look at it on a national scope. What a great province Ontario is. Ontario is the machine that drives this country. We are a have province but there are other provinces across this country that are not as fortunate as Ontario. They are provinces in which conditions of weather prevent them from being as strong as Ontario.

We have to help out these regions. These regions may not be as fortunate as Hamilton or Toronto with all their hospitals and all their availabilities. These regions and the people within must travel miles in order to get a vaccination shot for their child so their child does not catch the flu or a cold this winter.

They make their sacrifices in the outlying regions. The very least we can do as a government is ensure that the availability and the services provided for in the have provinces are made equally available in those have not regions of the country. We are, after all, a country called Canada from coast to coast to coast.

We are not the country of Canada, Ontario; or Canada, Ontario, Quebec; or Ontario, Quebec, B.C. How fortunate we are. Those who have must share with those who have not. You just have to travel from coast to coast and examine province by province.

In the current year, for example, the cuts start east in Newfoundland, which loses $71 million in health and $29 million in education. Prince Edward Island loses $16 million in health and $7 million in education. Nova Scotia loses $111 million in health and $45 million in education. New Brunswick loses $90 million in health and $37 million in education.

La belle province, Quebec, loses $843 million in health and $340 million in education. Ontario loses $1.2 billion in health and $489 million in education.

Continuing westward, Manitoba loses $136 million in health and $55 million in education. Saskatchewan loses $125 million in health and $15 million in education. Alberta loses $308 million in health and $124 million in education. British Columbia loses $390 million in health and $158 million in education.

Even the Northwest Territories loses: $6 million in health and $3 million in education. The Yukon loses $3 million in health and $1 million in education. The total loss is $4.6 billion that is being taken out of the system. How can that not have any kind of an impact on post-secondary education? How can that have no impact on our medicare system, the very cornerstone of the most admired system in the world?

Yes, we have to pay for it. We must rely on a government that will come forward with the economic and fiscal policies that will drive the engine again of this country. When you put people back to work, when people are earning their daily bread, 40 hours a week and collecting their pay cheque, they are more than happy to share that opportunity in the have provinces with the have not provinces. They are willing to do that.

When you have job creation and when you have people at work, and your economic policies are solid, then you have the ability to pay out to the provinces the money they need to keep this country on solid footing with the policies and the programs that are around the world as Canadian.

They do not say: "They have a great medicare system there, they have a great education system there". They say: "That is a great Canadian system". That is a pride we have and it is being devastated by the combination of economic mismanagement and the stripping of money when in this country we need it most today in this harsh economic climate caused by this government.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to speak on Bill C-20, another bill by this government to cut back on the programs that Canadian people worked to pay for, worked to claim from their governments for many decades, cutting back on the equalization programs, the health programs, the education programs, the social assistance programs, the public utilities programs and while I was going to say cutting back on unemployment insurance, it is not quite that way. It is worse. The government of course pays zero now to unemployment insurance.

There is only one other industrialized country in the world that refuses to contribute to unemployment insurance and that is the United States. That is where this government wants to drag us.

These cutbacks are disastrous for our country. They are a continuation of policies that were begun about 18 years ago under the then Liberal government and continued into the eighties but accelerated very seriously by this present Conservative government.

It is the outcome of almost 18 years of tax policies that gave hand-outs to the rich, to the corporations and to the rich owners of corporation shares, and also it is a continuation or an outcome of the free trade agreement which speeded up the hand-over of Canadian industries, particularly Canada's manufacturing industries, to the United States.

It is also the outcome of privatization of some of the services that the Canadian taxpayers built with their tax money and their labour and which have been handed over to the pals of this government for a song, services such as transportation and the post office and an increasing number of government services worth more than $5 billion a year now in contracts, contracts to private profit industries of work that should be done by public servants so that the bill for this contract pork barrel is more than $5 billion and therefore greater than the whole bill for public service and much less accountable than the bill for public service. The irony is that the government is crying poor. It never mentions that $4 million per hour every hour of the day, every day of the year, leaves Canada for the United States in investment income payments—$4 million per hour. That is roughly, at an estimate, $34 billion per year. This has been accelerating because of the government's policy in making it easy for the United States to take over more and more Canadian industries, either diverting the profits to the United States or diverting the the best paid jobs to the United States, or sometimes simply closing the operation, as they did with Inglis washing machine in Trinity Spadina and throwing 700 or 800 people out on the street in order to sell from the United States what used to be produced by Canadian workers.

By crying poor, after giving all that money to rich Canadians and allowing more and more of the wealth of Canada to flow out to the United States at the rate of many billions of dollars per year, the government now wants to chop about $4.5 billion out of the programs that serve the basic needs of Canadian people. It wants to limit, through this bill, the annual increase of provinces through the major transfer programs to $1 billion per year until 1995. At the same time it has half a billion dollars more for war, though we have never been in such a peace situation as we are now, it gives $30 million more for secret police, the CSIS, without of course any opportunity for Canadians to find out what is being done with that budget because it is secret, and therefore less for health, less for education, less for social assistance and, as I said, zero from the government for unemployment insurance, except a law that will increase the fees at a time when workers have less to pay with.

I want to speak for a few minutes about our health system. Previous speakers have referred to it. I think it bears not only emphasizing the points they made, but adding to them. In Canada we developed a national health care system that had five important principles. One was comprehensive. It does not cover every imaginable health cost, but it covers nearly all of them, prevents people going into bankruptcy with health problems and enables people to have their health care paid for when they are flat on their back in bed and unable to earn the money, which is the most important of all.

It is universal. Everybody is entitled. The poor are not left out because they are poor.

It is portable. You talk about unity in our country, unity between the provinces. When the government cuts back its central share of the funding for the health programs, provinces will be under pressure to say, as occasionally they say now, but only occasionally: "No, you cannot come into our hospital because you live in another province. You may be a Canadian but you cannot come into our province for health care because we do not want to pay for the health care needs of somebody from another province". The whole principle of portability was meant to ensure that a Canadian could get the health care he or she needs anywhere in Canada regardless of provincial jurisdiction. It should be accessible, and there has been a good expansion of health care systems into even the outlying parts of our country. It has not gone as far as it is needed but it is going that way, and it is administered publicly. Therefore, it was efficient by comparison with the chaotic, that is to say market system of health in our neighbour to the south. I will be coming back to that later.

The federal government has the responsibility for ensuring these five principles by the original deal of 50/50 funding, matching the provinces dollar for dollar. That was eroded under the Liberals and it is being downgraded further and will eventually disappear or become quite insignificant under the present Tory government.

This is a program that began in Saskatchewan under the CCF and the New Democratic Party and was so evidently a good program that other provinces insisted on having it and the federal government, in the sixties particularly, established it. It is if not the best in the world, certainly one of the very best, and it is recognized that way especially by our neighbour to the south, or at least by the people of our neighbour to the south, not necessarily by the government.

The NDP believes that we must direct more resources toward health rather than less in order to keep pace with the new health threats in our country, such as the threats from environmental degradation. There is a health need now to provide preventive health care and remedying of the poisonous elements that we put into our environment, which would in the long run save a good deal of money in acute health care.

I want to make several points about the Canadian health system. In the United States, they spend about $600 billion a year on health care, but 40 million Americans have no health insurance protection whatsoever. The United States is the only country in the world, other than South Africa, without some form of public health care system.

Second, universal availability is the basis of a system that gives priority to efficiency over competition. The chaotic market competitive system to the south of us spends far more money per person on health care than Canada does and it gets poorer results, less health, less lives saved for more money because they do not have a universal availability and a public administration. For example, in the United States they spend about $2,268 per capita for their health coverage, while Canadians spend $1,580, less than two-thirds of what they spend in the United States. It costs $360 per day on average to stay in an American hospital compared to $210 in Canada—that is $360 Canadian.

Further, most western countries have stabilized their medicare budgets, but not the United States—the United States, the land where the market reigns, where if you cannot pay you can be turned away from the hospital no matter how sick and needy you are. In 1987 the U.S. health care costs rose to more than 11 per cent of the Gross National Product, compared to 8.5 per cent of the Gross National Product in Canada. In some European countries they are even lower with roughly the same sort of health care system that Canada has, and they spend an average of 7.5 per cent of their Gross National Product.

The Canadian system is more efficient. Canadians are hospitalized for 11.4 days on average and the Americans for 6.4 days because of the more intensive use of technology. Utilization rates are higher in Canada. In 1989, 37.2 per cent of American doctors were sued for accusations of malpractice. That means that some of them are avoiding certain medical procedures because they are too risky. In other words, our system is working better.

• (1650)

The rate of production of physicians in Canada and the United States has been about equal, but the main difference between Canada and the States is that in the United States, physician fees have been rising far faster than the inflation rate.

In Canada they were dropping in the 1970s. They have now risen slightly but they are still a little bit behind the inflation rate.

The result is that in Canada the average life expectancy at birth is 72.9 years for men, 79.8 years for women, whereas in the United States it is only 71 years for men and 78.3 years for women. So men and women in Canada live longer than in the United States because of our health system.

Canada's infant mortality rate in 1985 was 7.9 deaths per 100,000 live births. In the United States it was 25 per cent more at 10.6 deaths per 100,000. The United States is down at twentieth on the international list for infant mortality. Canada is fifth to the lowest.

Canadians are allowed greater freedom of choice of their doctors. I hear from my son who is presently living in San Francisco that there is a debate going on in the media there about the Canadian health system. People say that there is a problem with it. Then somebody writes a letter to the paper saying that there is not and they were there. One person claimed that you could not choose your doctor and another person who was from Canada said you can choose your doctor.

In New York they have a state legislature bill. The New York members of the National Congress have a bill in Congress as well to bring in a health care system modelled on the Canadian one. The American labour movement is pushing strongly to establish a health care system modelled on the Canadian one. In fact, they have invited members of the NDP to go to the United States to tell them about the health system. Yet in this country, the government wants to undermine it and push it into privatization,.

Canadians are fairly well satisfied with their health care system and one of the reasons for the satisfaction is that a doctor has little financial reason to refuse a patient. This happens too often in the United States when a person goes to a hospital or a doctor, is asked to pay in advance and may not be able to and is turned away.

It is disastrous for this government to undermine our health system with the kind of cuts it is making with Bill C-20. It is also disastrous to be cutting the money for post-secondary education. Students are dropping out of their studies for financial reasons. Sometimes it is simply too much to be working at a job and studying as well. They cannot stop eating, so they have to stop studying. Some students are coming out with intolerable debts that they cannot pay while they are unemployed for a year, two and three years or when they are under-employed.

The universities are in effect becoming mortgaged to private industry for funds. That is to say, they have to do the research that private industry thinks will benefit this or that particular segment of industry, instead of doing the basic research that would make our country much stronger, not only technically, but intellectually in the broader sense and worldly, instead of giving a broad education.

It is ironic. There are few other white headed people in this House of Commons who can remember 1945 when we came out of the armed forces and were offered the veterans affairs programs. The Department of Veterans Affairs said it would help us set up a business, build a home, get into farming or go to university. I got $60 a month and tuition paid. With a very small amount of work, usually in the summertime, I was able to manage on that. It was raised later to $80 and, two or three years later, to $100. They gave us a monthly allowance as long as we were studying and our grades on the exams passed a reasonable level. The attitude surely was that study is work and useful to Canada. Canada paid us to study.

Tens of thousands of Canadians went to university on DVA who would never have gone otherwise. I was not one of those because I was fortunate enough that because of my parents' circumstances, I would have gone anyway. Some of those people became brilliant in science, industry and finance. Some of them are still members of this House. And yet the government wants to cut off that possibility in Canada.

There is also the matter of public assistance in which Canada has a worse record than Britain or West Germany. We have 14 per cent of people in poverty and are cutting back on public assistance. Germany has only 7 per cent, Britain has 9 per cent and Norway and Sweden have 5 per cent living in poverty. And of course, there is the UI cutback.

What we have is not an attempt to balance a budget or pay a deficit, because the deficit was created by gifts to the rich. It is a class attack. It is an attack by the class of owners of industries, by the corporations and their major shareholders, on the people who must earn their living by working. It cuts their pay and humiliates them. It is building up massive anger and a massive demand for a change in the power system in Canada.

I wish this government would ease off because the change may be more chaotic and even more violent, considering what we see in the newspapers, than any of us could wish. We should be negotiating between the government and the people of Canada for a decent opportunity to work, a decent opportunity to live and a sense that people belong to each other rather than just competitive dog-eat-dog philosophy in the service of American-based corporations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Algoma—Agriculture; the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway—Soviet Union; the hon. member for Surrey North—Health; the hon. member for Cochrane—Superior—Trade; the hon. member for Scarborough West—Immigration.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke). I would remind the hon. member that the five hours of debate have now expired.

[Translation]

The five-hour period is now over. We move on to ten-minute speeches, without questions or comments.

The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I was concerned when I got up before that I was not recognized. It was my understanding that we had one NDP and then two Liberals. We had only one Liberal and then you reverted to the New Democratic Party.

In view of that, I wonder if I could request 20 minutes instead of 10.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give 20 minutes to the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Hopkins: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and members in the House for that courtesy.

This bill before us today gives the government the hope that it will be able to extend the freeze on Established Programs Financing transfers for an additional three years. That means that the freeze will be on federal transfer funds to the provinces. That in itself is a very serious financial move. Every businessman knows, every person who brings home a pay cheque knows that if you do not even get the amount of money extra that inflation is costing you then of course you are getting a lower and lower salary as each year goes by.

• (1700)

The federal government is giving the provinces of Canada less and less each year according to the rate of inflation. That is not being made up for them.

That places the provinces of Canada in the position of either reducing services or bringing in some high taxes at the provincial level. Someone has to pay the piper. If they do not want to raise the taxes, then services will have to be reduced. The other alternative is that they too go deeper and deeper into debt.

On this bill, we have very serious implications in the field of medicare for Canadians. In post-secondary education, there are very serious moves and of course just last week we had a very serious debate in this House on the Young Offenders Act.

If the provinces are going to have to allocate more money to post-secondary education and medicare, as the federal government backs away from its commitment, then it means that they are not going to have the extra money to go into the services that are needed to look after the administration of the Young Offenders Act that was passed in this House just last week. That is serious business.

What is the sense of any government in Canada passing legislation in this House if it is not going to pay the bill for the administration? That is what is happening to our education—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being five o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

HEALTH

COMMUNITY HEALTH CENTRES

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River) moved:

> That this House calls on the government to support the foundation of consumer-run Community Health Centres, which have preventive health care as a principle of operation, and which engage medical professionals to provide services in salaried or contractual positions, as opposed to the traditional billing arrangements.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to be able to put this motion before the House today because it is something that I consider to be a very important subject.

It is somewhat ironic that we are discussing this private member's motion on the very same day that we have heard a number of speeches in this House with respect to Bills C-20 and C-69, which deal with the cutbacks that have been happening in the medicare system and the threat which our medicare system is being put under as a result of these cuts.

It is ironic to me that we are spending all this time discussing the negative aspects of what is happening to our national health care system while at the same time we devote so little time talking about positive alternatives. In that respect I guess I am sorry that this is not a votable motion because I think this would offer members an opportunity to say something positive about health care rather than continuing this endless round of cuts and more cuts.

I think Canadians are acutely aware of the funding crisis in the medicare system. At the same time they still hold the medicare system intensely dear.

They are very much committed to the basic notions of medicare. Medicare has become a fundamental part of the fabric of this country.

The Spicer commission reported that across this country, in every province and in every community, medicare is seen as the primary vehicle or the primary institution that holds this country together.

It is perhaps interesting to note that in the constitutional debate people are finding it somewhat difficult to put a handle on the notion of what a social charter might mean and also what the political implications of a referendum might be. I would suggest that if we put to Canadians the notion that medicare should be entrenched in the Constitution of Canada, we would have virtually unanimous support for that idea from coast to coast.

I think we have seen other evidence that health care is still a resonant issue not only in Canada but in North America. The election of Senator Wofford in the recent Pennsylvania senatorial race is a good example. That senator ran on the slogan of "why should criminals be entitled to a lawyer when you are not entitled to a doctor?"

That sounded a real chord with the people of Pennsylvania and with the American public. They are debating medicare actively, and Canadians are looking for an active and positive debate on the future of medicare as well.

I would also, at the beginning of this speech, like to mention that much of my interest in the subject of community health centres comes from my own community of Prince Albert. The people of Prince Albert, when confronted with the crisis of the doctors' strike in 1962, did something about it. They organized a community health centre around the work of a physician by the name of Orville Hjertaas.

It was one of the most dramatic moments in the history of medicare in this country and I think it deserves special attention in the annals of medicare.

In Prince Albert we have demonstrated all the things that I am going to speak about later in the speech. The community health model is cheaper, it is more cost effective, it is better at doing preventive care and it involves people in the community.

Community health centres start from a fundamentally different premise than our regular model of health care. That is because they are based in community experience, and are organized and founded within the community by local people. From development on, they are inherently community based.

They are all run by volunteer boards elected by the community, whether they are organized on a co-operative basis or on some other type of non-profit organization basis.

There have been lots of studies done about the community health centres in this country. I want to mention that there are some very successful models in this country, apart from the one in Prince Albert.

There are community clinics in Winnipeg, in Montreal, in Vancouver, in rural Prince Edward Island and in northern Ontario. All of these provide very positive models not only in their own communities, but to us nationally.

For example, in a paper by Douglas Angus and Pran Manga sponsored by the Canadian Co-operative Association and with help from the co-op secretariat of the federal government entitled Co-op Consumer Sponsored Health Care Delivery Effectiveness, they concluded that the community health centres are efficient and effective.

A 1982 government of Saskatchewan study compared 15,297 community clinic users and 15,297 private practice patients matched for all socioeconomic variables.

It is interesting to note that the former government of Saskatchewan refused to release this report which was commissioned in 1982 and completed in about 1984 or 1985. It did not release it until 1989 because I think it did not like the implications of it, which say that we need a wholesale change in the way we look at health care.

The findings of these studies were that over-all health service costs were 13 per cent to 17 per cent lower for community clinic patients than for private practice patients, 13 per cent to 17 per cent lower.

I would like to quote from the authors: "The principle reason for cost effectiveness is the significantly lower hospital utilization by clinic clientele compared to those of fee for service practitioners". They continue to say that this lower utilization of hospital facilities is the most significant and incontrovertible finding of numerous empirical studies they have reviewed.

Non-fee for service systems generate rates of hospital utilization from 10 to 40 per cent below fee for service physicians.

• (1710)

These findings are corroborated by those in larger population studies in U.S. community clinics.

Twenty per cent savings in hospital costs and patient days lead to a saving in over-all costs of about 5 per cent to 8 per cent in just this one aspect alone, hospitalization. That is the fastest growing component in health care costs.

The clinics have also been found to have a better record in providing childhood immunizations, cancer screening, cancer prevention services, preventive health maintenance for women, for seniors, for expectant mothers. All of these things mean healthier patients, lower drug costs, and lower costs to the community in general.

MDs and community clinics prescribe fewer prescription drugs which have cost and health advantages. Provision of out-patient services and support services like X-rays, labs, and physiotherapy can cost substantially less than the same services in hospitals.

Preventive measures like well-baby clinics, geriatric dietary care and awareness education about violence against women and children can all be incorporated in the community health model which then makes not only for lower costs but for a much healthier population and a much healthier community.

I might also add that we are living in a day and age when people are demanding more say in their over-all lives. They are demanding that they have some control over the institutions that give them services and surely community health services give people an opportunity to get directly involved in providing their own health care. We also have seen that health care is something that people are individually very interested about in this country and it is something they would get involved in.

Another advantage of clinics is to respond to the wide diversity of needs in this country. There are clinics specializing in services to new Canadians, to urban aboriginal Canadians, to rural aboriginal Canadians and to farm communities. The variety is infinite when it comes to the types of models which can be adapted to reflect particular local circumstances.

Community health centres are also cost effective because they are administered by professional health administrators. Very few private practices have that kind of management training.

As well, budgeting and cost control for primary health care are easier for provincial governments to control because budgets are negotiated on a global basis which makes them predictable from year to year and makes it possible to do the kind of evaluations which show whether money is being well spent.

I think what rings the loudest in the context of the debate here in Parliament today is the cost saving of 13 per cent to 17 per cent. Let us put that in some kind of a context. In 1990 total health care expenditures in Canada are estimated to be $60 billion. That is 9 per cent of our Gross National Product or $2,266 per person. These costs are rising at about 12 per cent per year. We know that.

Imagine that with this basic change to how we view the delivery of health here, we could save from 13 per cent to 17 per cent of the $60 billion cost. Even at 10 per cent we are talking about $6 billion worth of savings and that is not something that this country can ignore in its present fiscal situation. The federal government cannot ignore that kind of possible saving, nor can provincial governments.

What is the federal government's role in this? I think that is a legitimate question to ask because the federal government seems to be seeking a smaller and smaller role in the whole health care area. In keeping with its cutback in funding it also seems to be withdrawing from what it formerly saw as a leadership role in the delivery of health care to Canadians and especially the establishment of medicare.

Certainly those two aspects, the establishment of medicare and the establishment of national standards, remain federal government responsibilities.

The government has also talked in the past about more active participation in health care. Certainly this government has. In November 1966 the Hon. Jake Epp, the then minister of health, now the minister of energy, released a blueprint for direction of health care delivery in Canada entitled Achieving Health for All: A Framework for Health Promotion. It outlined a system of health care wholly consistent with that promoted by the co-operative and community based health centre concept.

There are three strategies outlined in that report.

It called for the encouragement of greater public participation; the strengthening of community services and the co-ordination of public policy. All three of those fit exactly into the framework of community health centres and co-operative clinics. What kind of action have we had from of the government?

When researching this speech I saw a pretty dismal picture. In the Department of National Health and Welfare there is exactly one person working full time on community based, consumer oriented health care—one person working on clinics in community based health care. That is in a year in which the Department of National Health and Welfare is listed as having a total of 8,500 people working in it. Having one person out of 8,500 working on this delivery system, which could save us 13 per cent to 17 per cent of our health care costs, is just plain stupid.

We have seen this kind of lip-service from the government, but we have not seen much action. We have also seen supporting evidence from the provincial level. The Seaton report, recently released in B.C., strongly endorses the community health care model. In Ontario, a discussion paper called New Beginnings, released by the Ontario Ministry of Health, concluded that community sponsored organizations were better at achieving objectives of broad-based service provisions and cost containment than non-community sponsored forms of care. In Saskatchewan the new government campaigned with preventive community based care as one of its central campaign planks.

Provincial governments across the country are reaching the same conclusion: this is the direction to go in. Somebody has to take some leadership in this. With the cutbacks coming from the federal government, certainly the latitude that it has to be spending money in this area is drastically curtailed. The leadership that was promised from the federal level, first in the Jake Epp report and then later by the ministers of co-operation, is simply not there.

A few years ago we had a federal-provincial co-operatives ministers meeting, I believe in the spring of 1989, which identified as one of its four principal priorities the encouragement and establishment of community health based models across this country—a co-operative health based model. That was identified as one of the four major priorities with the full endorsement of the federal government. There were all kinds of speeches made and press releases about the leadership government was going to take. Where is that leadership? It is not there.

There are other areas in which the government could get involved in promoting the community health concept. There is a lot of work done in the areas of poverty, nutrition and health. These areas could best be addressed through the community clinics. Family violence initiatives could be delivered through community clinics. Community health could become a part of housing initiatives.

Certainly the whole area of native health lends itself very well to the integration of a community health system because it offers a primary way in which the traditional healing methods and the community support structures which are inherent in the native community could be melded with the scientific health model in a way which is appropriate to those communities. We do not see that kind of initiative from the federal government, although it has a clear mandate in the area of native health.

The federal government also has to resolve jurisdictional disputes in many areas. We also have the questions of women's health needs, and support to women and children in crisis, which are also areas in which community clinics can offer a primary support mechanism. We have the unmet health needs of Canada's poor. We have drug abuse problems in many of our communities.

The government could play a key role in being a catalyst in all these areas. It could put together a national co-ordination strategy involving the provinces, involving the co-operative sector, involving existing community health models in establishing this new framework for a Canadian health strategy. Certainly there is a lot of activity under way. In Ontario the government is going full speed ahead with the best resources it has available. Forty-one clinics are already in existence, another 25 to 30 are in process.

These community health centres need money for feasibility studies and planning. They need help to get organized, they need help for a national organization. We are not talking about big sums of money, we are talking about very minute sums of money, seed money, which would result in a saving of 13 per cent to 17 per cent in the system over-all.

I would like to conclude my speech by saying that I think a case has been very well made by many people that community sponsored health centres, health centres where the professionals who are working there are there on salaries and not on a fee for service basis, offer not only the most cost effective but the most community sensitive and the most efficient in terms of preventive health models of any model of health care in the country.

I might say there is another reason why I would like to address this question, because many of us are wondering if our health system is so wonderful and if the Americans are wanting to copy it, how come our health system is in so much trouble? There is a good reason for that. It is because only half of medicare has ever been implemented.

I remember very well in 1962 when medicare was introduced in Saskatchewan. My family was one of only two or three families in our community that supported the establishment of medicare, and it was a very bitter time in those communities. I remember being harassed in the school yard along with the children of other people who supported the establishment of medicare, and many other people in Saskatchewan had similar experiences.

The doctors went on strike, backed by not only the Canadian Medical Association but the American Medical Association. The Conservative Party and the Liberal Party of the day backed the doctors in that strike. It was a tremendous struggle. Therefore the system that Tommy Douglas introduced was based on insuring existing health care. But Tommy Douglas said at the time: "This is only the first step. This step is certainly needed in order that everybody have access to health care, a universal system but a second step is needed". A second step is needed to provide medical care on a cost effective community based system that actually meets the needs of everyone. Tommy Douglas was right from the start about the need to establish a co-operative and community health centre based system of medicare. If we are going to be true to the founders of medicare, if we are going to bail ourselves out of the crisis we are in, this is the route to go.

I would like to urge all members of this House and particularly the members on the government side to take this motion very seriously and to act on it because I think in many ways the future of our country and what it stands for is at stake.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River knows that the delivery and organization of health services is under provincial jurisdiction.

In spite of that, our government is keenly concerned about the efficient and effective delivery of health services and, together with the provinces, it is exploring new ways to provide for the greater welfare of all Canadians.

We are aware that many provincial studies in the last five or six years show the need to rethink the way services are provided and health professionals are paid for their medical services.

The recently published report of the British Columbia Royal Commission of Inquiry on Health shows as well as anything the serious thinking now going on throughout the country on this subject. The authors recognize that moving from a simple health care system to a health promotion system requires us to explore many different avenues. An approach cannot be considered without taking into account possible repercussions on other areas for any change made to the system.

The British Columbia report contains over 400 recommendations, which shows how complex this issue is. Therefore it would be utopian to claim that one particular approach would solve all the problems of our health care system. That would be too simple. It would also dismiss the considerable efforts made by health professionals and Canadian health care institutions to improve Canadians' health from coast to coast.

It is true that our health systems tended to favour an approach to health based on institutional services and to use payment methods that emphasized treatment itself instead of an integrated approach. After reflection, the provinces moved toward a more balanced system that takes into account a wide range of possible approaches for dealing with various situations. Health centres could be one of those avenues and they could be patterned on the model suggested by the hon. member.

We must not forget that these issues are in provincial jurisdiction, but the government can, and does, help the provinces compile the information needed to consider them in greater depth. The federal-provincial-territorial conference of deputy ministers of health endorsed the recent Barer—Stoddart report on integrated policies for medical staff in Canada. The authors of that report make a number of recommendations concerning the remuneration of doctors. At their meeting in September 1991, the provincial and territorial health ministers agreed that in future discussions based on this report could be undertaken with all interested parties.

The government also helps the provinces to develop their own policy using the national data base on doctors which provides information on payments made to doctors under the fee for service system. Attempts are being made to expand this data base to include other forms of payment. It is impossible to make good decisions without this type of data and thanks to the partnership between the government and the provinces, a picture of the payment situation across the country will emerge.

I am pleased to see that the hon. member displays such interest in users' involvement in health issues. I believe that he takes "user" to mean anyone who benefits from the health care system in Canada. The government encourages Canadians to take part in improving their own health. In 1986, the Minister of National Health and Welfare published a report entitled: Achieving Health for All: A Framework for Health promotion. The authors of that document proposed three key strategies to reduce inequalities and increase prevention. They especially emphasized the importance of promoting public participation and strengthening community health services.

All federal prevention campaigns, such as the national drug strategy, the national AIDS strategy and the national tobacco strategy emphasize user participation. People want to participate and they bring all their knowledge and experience to bear in supporting these programs in their communities.

Active public participation is beneficial in more than one way. When people care about community problems and work together to solve them, three things happen: first, they become more aware of the various parts of the problem and they learn more about prevention; second, they help raise their community's awareness and they become real agents of change; third, the services and programs developed with the community are usually more responsive to local needs and more effective because they have public support.

The federal government's funding programs directly support public participation in all health-related issues. The Department of National Health and Welfare financially supports more than 70 voluntary national health and social service organizations. Some particular programs also receive financial assistance through various programs like New Horizons, the Seniors Independence Program, the Family Violence Initiative and the Health Promotion Fund. The government is proud to act as a partner and to contribute to the success of projects set up across the country in all communities, large and small. This partnership is very beneficial and helps achieve results that we could not achieve alone.

Some of these results are tangible, others less so. I already said that by working together, we can increase public awareness and make programs more effective. But those who are active in their community gain considerable benefits: they acquire more self-confidence and are better able to make enlightened decisions about their own health and the health of those close to them. Some will say that we gave them the power and the required resources. I think that they simply realized their own strength.

This partnership is also good financially. For every dollar that the government gives national volunteer organizations in the health field, they obtain $80 million which they spend on education, prevention and research.

It is definitely in our interest to encourage the health care recipients to participate. However, this participation will only be beneficial if they have the required skills and resources to examine problem areas or potential solutions, to come up with valid approaches and work out the many details that are often overlooked but nevertheless essential to the success of a project.

The government intends to give users easier access to the planning tools they need to set up good programs. For this purpose, the department has created a community action information kit. It contains usual information as well as tools to promote setting up community action programs. This kit was put together in consultation with the provinces as well as many community groups and organizations across the country.

This goes to show, the government's concern for the problem raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River and that we work closely with the provinces in dealing with this issue. The creation of consumer-run community health centers is strictly a matter of provincial jurisdiction. However, our government intends to continue supporting the efforts of the provinces that are trying to identify areas of priority thus making for a fairer system better suited to promote health in Canada.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise to speak on this private members' motion put forward by my colleague from Prince Albert—Churchill River.

The motion reads:

> That this House calls on the government to support the foundation of consumer run Community Health Centres, which have preventive health care as a principle of operation, and which engage medical professionals to provide services in salaried or contractual positions, as opposed to the traditional billing arrangements.

I am pleased to speak to this motion. I believe the operation of health centres in the Western Arctic may be a model for consumer run health centres. I will give more detail on our system later.

It is appropriate that we are dealing with this motion on the day that the House is debating Bill C-20, a bill that should clearly be scrapped and replaced by a commitment from government to support our vital and universal health care system.

I want to say at the outset that a universal medicare program is essential to Liberal policy and philosophy and basically to Canadian philosophy. The Liberal Party is opposed to the abuse of the medicare system and to extra billing. I do not want to take the time to debate the accepted principles of medicare, those of universality, accessibility, portability, comprehensiveness and public administration. Instead, I will focus on delivery of health services and the supply responsibilities and enumeration of health care professionals.

I support the idea that Canadians need to look at alternatives to ensure that health care services meet the needs of women, aboriginal people, the elderly and minorities. I support the concept that the federal government should complement the existing system of universal health care by permitting non-government facilities to provide much-needed services as long as those facilities use approved procedures, comply with government standards and charge rates that do not exceed amounts set by provincial-territorial health insurance plans.

Certainly the standing committee on health, which spent two years in developing its reports, made recommendations that received all-party support, intended to assist local control and more accessibility as well as a more diverse service than the traditional hospital and dispensary system. The first part of this motion deals with consumer-run community house centres. I have to assume that the intent of the motion abides by the philosophy of non-profit and with the principles of the Canada Health Act.

In my riding we call this concept community-based health services. Community health centres traditionally called nursing stations and traditional hospitals are managed by regional health boards. In Western Arctic these regional health boards include one, the Mackenzie Health Services; two, the Fort Smith Health Board; three, Hay River H.W. Williams Memorial; four, Inuvik Health Board; and the fifth one is the Stanton Hospital Board in Yellowknife.

The theory that guides these boards is one of devolving control of health services to the community levels. These boards are representative of communities where they are responsible for health care centres. They also include some efforts by various departments in the government of the Northwest Territories that intervene in a positive way.

Just recently I was visiting Arctic College, in fact yesterday, in the town of Fort Smith where a group of students are now engaging in what is called an aboriginal medical terminology interpreter corps training which is very innovative and which would not have resulted without accessibility by people to the health care system. It is absolutely integral when you have a patient who is unilingual who cannot communicate their illnesses and their concerns to the medical professionals.

The local input and control of resources not only recognizes but acts on these very real concerns that individuals have at the local level. The government of the Northwest Territories took control over health programs from the federal government in 1988, so the establishment of these regional boards has taken place smoothly and successfully. There are always growing pains with such initiatives but it has been getting some fairly positive reviews in the Medical Post dated November 19, 1991. The headlines read that the Northwest Territories is glad to be in control of health care services since 1988.

There are comments that are made by people like the Inuvik Regional Nursing Officer, Sharon Conley, who feels that the Inuvik Health board for instance is working. "Since transfer", she says, "there has been a lot more local interest in health care. We can get things done a lot quicker because we do not have decisions made in Ottawa through Yellowknife" she said.

These are the upsides of having local control over health services and having consumer-run health programs.

In the same article it states: "Officials of the Northwest Territories NWT Medical Association feel the transfers to the GNWT government has had positive results. It is stated that people who are in control are closer to the scene and they are more responsive to the needs of the territories. For instance the Inuvik Board consists of 17 members and consists of people from all the communities in the Inuvik region as well as governments and the aboriginal organizations".

It is a healthy, if I might, no pun intended, cross section of people to be sitting on a health board, a regional board that expresses the concerns and recognizes the concerns of the people who live in that particular area. The board's responsibilities include budgets, policies, the hiring of doctors and specialists. The boards ensure local involvement, particularly in the small and aboriginal communities.

The other area that is of particular concern is preventive health. This motion deals with preventive health care. The first cause of poor health in the north is inadequate substandard housing. The second cause is the environment within the house. This is a major reason why the northern territories lead the nation in illness and poor health.

As I stated in this House on November 29, the north experiences higher death and disease rates and higher birth and infant mortality rates than the rest of Canada. Cancer is four times greater and suicide is the highest in Canada. Many of the causes of these statistics are the poor housing situation and the general poor quality of life.

In the north we are starting with these basic requirements for infrastructure, for proper housing, water and sewage facilities. These are the things that are recognized by people that are in local control that feel the effects on their families and the people in our communities, people that they have to deal with on a daily basis, not just names and numbers that have no association to them. I am committed to preventive medicine. I believe the government should strengthen its commitments to participation, to drug abuse prevention and AIDS education. I believe also that nursing stations and their personnel play a very key role along with the community health representatives who are trained. These facilities and the twinning with these other community health representatives are integral to the health and well-being of all citizens in the communities that do not have hospitals.

These nursing stations act as a centre of comfort for many who have to go there, where ambulances are not available, who rely on medical rescue missions in the middle of the night or in very inclement weather, under very adverse and harsh environmental realities. This is when the personnel who are situated in the communities are there with the approval, the consent and with the support of the regional health boards that put them there. They ensure we get the quality people we need. The training is very specific and is also very much one that is geared to the community. Most of the community health representatives speak the aboriginal languages of the communities they are in and they serve a very key role.

I want to commend my colleague, the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, for coming forward with this very important private members' bill. I support it wholeheartedly. I believe that in the Northwest Territories we are a testimony to what can be done if we put control and resources into the hands of the people who understand their communities and can represent their people as well as anyone else in this country.

I believe that we have quality care and we have priorities set out that express what people need in terms of preventive medicine as well as other concerns that prevail over the territories.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River for giving us with this opportunity to discuss one of the most interesting areas of development for health systems in Canada. When dealing with health issues, we look at quality of life which concerns every Canadian man and woman.

Although the provision of health services is a provincial jurisdiction, the federal government has been looking into innovative ways to enhance the efficiency of our health systems for quite some time now. The work of Health and Welfare Canada is but an illustration of the government's commitment to support prevention and community oriented approaches to health. The department and its staff with training and experience in the areas of health, social services, community and volunteer work, education, research as well as program and policy development, supports programs that are useful to the operation of community health centres and works toward developing new programs in that area.

Our guiding principle in this endeavour is community participation because communities are capable of taking their health in their own hands and should take part in defining their needs and finding means of responding to these needs.

To help the growing number of community health centres across Canada, Health and Welfare Canada has published a health centre directory so that each centre knows what the others are doing in any given area. The department also produced an information package for community groups and workers. That package, which provides useful tools for action, has already been tested with community groups and health centres across the country. This is an excellent example of the co-operation shown by our government with the provinces and the volunteer groups to support their efforts to reinforce the role and the responsibility of individuals and the community in the field of health and health services.

The notion of consumer involvement in the health sector is relatively new. Numerous possibilities must be explored, including the use of community development approaches.

The department sponsored research initiatives in that field through the National Health Research and Development Program. It has also financed, through a contribution program to health promotion, new community projects that use these approaches. Together we learn that the work undertaken has resulted in an exercise of co-operation between a number of provincial representatives, health centres, managers and of community health researchers.

These people made a concerted effort to determine how the community development approaches could be used efficiently in providing health services. This type of conceptual research and development can be very useful to define the role that community health centres managed by consumers can play in a balanced health care system.

We insist on the consumer participation in the hon. member's motion because we believe that the method used to set up health services is vital to their effectiveness. Many of the existing studies on the subject indicate that the most efficient methods are those based on an upward movement as well as community participation in the analysis of their health needs and the development of appropriate means to meet those needs.

Based on that community health development perspective, it seems that the community health centres managed by consumers have played a pioneer role. Indeed, we only have to look at one of the first initiatives, the local community service centres, commonly called CLSC in Quebec. As early as the beginning of the 1970s, the position of community organizer was created in the first few centres.

Another example are the community health centres in Ontario, where teams of workers were under the direction of community action co-ordinators and community development agents. These teams were mainly involved in prevention and community health promotion.

The hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River is certainly aware of the fact that community clinics of Saskatchewan set up as co-ops some 30 years ago were the first consumer-run health centres in Canada. As a matter of fact, these clinics were among the first to undergo exhaustive and serious studies which have revealed that a parallel system of community health centers saves a lot of money in health costs.

I am convinced that the hon. member is aware of the community health study the government of Saskatchewan carried out in 1983 which contains these findings. The Hastings report is another milestone document dealing with this issue. This report which was commissioned following a deputy ministers of health conference stressed the need for community health centres as tools for managing health costs and supported the creation of many more such organizations.

Of course, this concept was not embraced everywhere overnight. If you look at provincial reports and studies published over the past few years, however, you can see that interest is growing. For instance, the New Brunswick Premier's Council on Health is in the process of evaluating how to apply the community health model in the province, while Quebec has reaffirmed its confidence in local community service centres.

Other provinces are examining the possibility of adopting similar models. Despite this growing interest throughout the country in consumer–run community health centres, we must admit that all provinces do not support this kind of centre in the same way.

• (1750)

Some provinces do not officially recognize these organizations as parallel models for health care delivery, while others have legislation in place and permanent funding mechanisms to give them a solid base.

In June 1991 representatives of co–operative or consumer–run community health centres from various regions met to consider the possibility of creating a national network. They felt that such a national organization would help guide discussion and facilitate information exchange.

The Canadian government will continue to follow with great interest the discussions on consumer–run community health centres. There are no miracle solutions to the problems facing our health care systems today. We believe that with good communication and serious consideration of the issues involved, Canadians will find an apt combination of approaches to meet their health care needs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, while there is a natural interruption here between speakers, I think you will find consent for the following motion:

Second, that in relation to its consideration of credit and charge cards under Standing Order 108(2), eight members, one researcher and the Clerk of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C. February 4 and 5, 1992;

Third, that the subcommittee on arms exports of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade be authorized to travel to Winnipeg and Victoria from Monday, February 10, to Friday, February 14, 1992; and to Montreal and Halifax from Monday, February 24 to Friday 28, 1992, in order to hold hearings and visit companies and bases in relation to the subcommittee study on arms production and export; and

That the necessary staff accompany the subcommittee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH

COMMUNITY HEALTH CENTRES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Funk (p. 5741).

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are several aspects to this member's bill which we have been discussing here this evening which go beyond the responsibility of the federal government.

I think most of us know that health care delivery is primarily a provincial responsibility under the Constitution. The Canada Health Act, which came into force April 1, 1984, and embodies the basic principles that form the cornerstones of the Canadian health care system, only requires of a province that there be reasonable compensation to physicians and dentists for all insured health care services rendered.

It does not require specific organizational structures and/or particular modes of payment. I should point out that the Canada Health Act did pass this House with unanimous approval by all parties.

However, I would like you all to be aware that while the federal government does not want to tinker with the mechanism of provincial health care systems as perhaps the hon. member is suggesting, we do have an excellent record in providing support and encouragement to prevention in ways that do not interfere with the constitutional prerogatives of the provinces to manage their own health care systems.

The National Health Research and Development Program provides support for research projects, for studies, for demonstrations and evaluation projects and for the delivery of health care. There are other relevant categories of research, including health promotion and illness prevention, risk assessment, health of native peoples, rehabilitation and dissemination of health services research. These are all addressed by this national program.

I would now like to turn to the area of prevention, in which Canada is recognized as one of the world leaders. That is the integration of preventive services into primary care.

Interest in this topic was triggered well over a decade ago with the growing concern about the decreasing marginal benefits of the curative medical technologies in the context of the spiralling health care costs. In order to address this pressing problem in a truly rational manner and to help preserve the health care system of which Canadians are so justifiably proud, the conference of deputy ministers of health in 1976 established the Canadian task force on a periodic health examination. The task force was provided with a mandate to formulate recommendations that would help to integrate preventive activities into the practices of clinicians. The task force had to examine the appropriateness of a wide variety of preventive manoeuvres. This called for a massive review of the appropriate scientific literature that was out in the public domain, which was a very difficult task. If this was to have any meaning, it could not really be done in a haphazard manner.

Accordingly, the task force developed a rigorous evaluation process involving parameters such as the current burden of suffering related to the condition of being prevented; as well as safety, simplicity, cost, and acceptability to the individual of course.

The group developed rules of evidence based upon rigorous criteria on how to rate the scientific literature support for preventive interventions. These rules of evidence led to a related classification of recommendations that advised physicians whether or not there was good, fair or poor evidence to do or not to do a preventive action.

As a result of their pioneering work in 1979, the Canadian task force on periodic health examination released a monograph addressing 78 selected conditions, accompanied by clinical practice recommendations that were tailored to patient age, gender and risk status.

In the field of clinical prevention, this was a report that was heard all around the world. Without any legislative base, the task force's recommendation was that annual check-ups for ostensibly healthy adults be abandoned and that primary care prevention be provided by lifetime programs based on age and sex-specific health protection packages.

This has had a major impact on the norms of preventive practice in several western countries. For example, in 1984 the United States Department of Health and Human Services established a preventive services task force which actually cloned the Canadian model. Interest in the task force methods has been and continues to be expressed by health departments and/or national health organizations in many other countries around the world.

Since its famous 1979 report, the Canadian task force on the periodic health examination has published several updates. These are presented in the Canadian Medical Association Journal for anglophone physicians and in l'Union médicale du Canada for the francophone medical practitioners. The Department of National Health and Welfare purchases reprints and distributes them to interested persons and institutions. In all, the task force methodology has been applied to some 200 different assessments both here and outside our borders.

In addition to supporting the development of world class standards in prevention, the federal government has been proactive in taking steps toward the implementation of prevention services. In 1987 the U.S. and Canadian health departments, along with some private sector support, funded an international symposium implementing preventive services. It was held at l'Estérel, Québec. Not only was this a colloquium of exemplary display by national co-operation, it really showed how, as I say, national co-operation was so important. It attracted many experts in prevention, experts from the United Kingdom, Europe and Australia.

The symposium at l'Estérel made several recommendations about implementing prevented services. These included dissemination of recommendations of the Canadian task force on the periodic health examination; continuation of the task force's work; developing an implementation and infrastructure; educating health care professionals in a way that places more emphasis on prevention and working as part of a team; legislation such as immunization laws, helmet and seatbelt laws, and the non-smoking ordinances, an area in which our current federal government has provided superb leadership.

The federal government is moving forward in the field of clinical prevention. It continues to fund the activities of the Canadian task force on this periodic health examination, and also through the task force we are liaisoning—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting the hon. member.

The time provided for the the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on September 30 a major rally occurred in Rosetown, Saskatchewan, when over 4,000 farmers rallied to protest the lack of action by the Government of Canada because of the tremendous financial crisis which is gripping many parts of Canada, including farm areas in Ontario and on the prairies. That was one of many rallies which occurred this fall.

On that day in the House of Commons, I asked the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, the former Minister of Agriculture, the following question:

> This afternoon in Rosetown, Saskatchewan, thousands of farmers are gathering to protest the lack of action by the government because they face the worst financial crisis in a generation for Canadian farmers.
> Last winter, the government committed itself to providing a third line of defence financial assistance to these producers. When is the government going to provide this assistance?

The Minister of Finance and the Deputy Prime Minister responded, saying that in fact the Minister of Agriculture was going to attend that Rosetown rally and he would be putting forward a litany of programs and support the government has provided to the agricultural industry. In fact, what happened is the Minister of Agriculture attended the meeting, he sort of slid in the side door and out the back door. Practically nobody in the audience saw him and nobody heard him speak because he did not utter a word at the meeting. He came forth from the meeting and gave an interview to the media saying that he had no intention of providing further financial assistance to Canada's hard-pressed farmers.

Last week, several weeks after that event, more rallies occurred. There was a major one in Weyburn a few weeks after this one with some 3,000 farmers. A little later over 7,000 farmers rallied in Regina. Finally the government announced belatedly that it was going to provide some $700 million worth of assistance to Canadian grain and oilseed producers. It did not say when or how it would pay for that. After several more weeks the government announced that it would pay about half of it some time around the first of next year and the rest of it some time in the new fiscal year after April 1.

The government's response to the financial crisis is simply not adequate. The financial crisis is caused by two factors. One is that the government sharply reduced its support programs last year by some $1.3 billion. That combined with the reduction in world prices for grains and oilseeds has caused a major crisis for Canadian farmers. A year later the government is still nickeling and diming farmers: "Are we going to provide support January 1 and the other half in April?"

As a result we had another delegation last week in Ottawa. The new premier of Saskatchewan, ministers of agriculture from Alberta and Manitoba, leaders of the opposition, Lynda Haverstock from Saskatchewan, former leader from Alberta Nick Taylor and the leader from Manitoba Sharon Carstairs were all here to make further representations. It is time the government stopped fooling around and made these payments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think we are out of order on this agenda. The member for Scarborough West was first off the mark but obviously he did not make it to the House. The Parliamentary Secretary for Agriculture is on his way over. I would ask for the indulgence of my friend opposite. Perhaps he would wait a few minutes for the answer. Indeed I could give an answer off the top of my head, but I think I would prefer the minister to do it.

SOVIET UNION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, some two months ago I asked a question in this House of the Minister of Finance concerning the very dangerous situation economically and socially facing the people of the Soviet Union as they approached the coming winter.

I pointed out that Alexander Yakovlev, former Soviet ambassador to Canada, a very respected citizen and one of the advisers to the new government, had said that empty pans are more dangerous than tanks. I urged the Minister of Finance to recognize that Canada should be showing leadership within the G-7 by supporting the urgent request of leaders of the Soviet Union and the various republics for aid as they approach the winter.

Here we are two months later and the situation is in fact desperate. We know, for example, that when the official in the Russian Federation, Mr. Yuri Luzhkov who is responsible for foreign economic affairs, met with the Minister for International Trade he mentioned the need for grain, fodder, meat, dairy products, sugar, vegetable oil, tea, cocoa and packing materials. He said that there is a desperate need now for food.

We know as well of the shortage of power, energy, and the fact that the minister of energy, Mr. Evgeny Petrayev, said: "We have never been so unprepared for winter". At least 40 cities would suffer serious shortages of power and heat during the winter. We know the shortages of basic medicines and disposable syringes and the looming disaster of AIDS which faces the people of the Soviet Union, of the independent nations, the Baltic nations and the independent nation of Ukraine. I might take this opportunity a couple of days after the people of Ukraine spoke out overwhelmingly in a free and democratic referendum—over 90 per cent spoke out in favour of independence, in favour of freedom, in favour of a free nation of Ukraine—to congratulate the people of Ukraine on that very historic decision.

I know that many of my constituents are of Ukrainian origin. Over a million Canadians celebrated this historic decision. I know as well that on this 100th anniversary of Ukrainian immigration to Canada we want to pay tribute to the tremendous role that Ukrainian Canadians have played in our society.

But much works remains to be done. The disaster of Chernobyl continues to cast a dark cloud over the children of Ukraine and of Byelorussia in particular. In my question I asked for our government to respond to the plea at the United Nations General Assembly for some $646 million in emergency aid to eliminate radioactivity from the food chain and to resettle the homeless victims of the Chernobyl disaster. Well, there still has been no response to that plea.

In the short time that remains I want again to say that the most effective response that we as Canadians can make to celebrate the independence of Ukraine, to celebrate the independence of the Baltic nations and to respond to the desperate plea of the other Soviet republics including particularly Russia, is to recognize that there must be direct aid now for food, medicine, energy, and of course to assist in averting environmental disaster. That is a plea we cannot ignore.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by saying that for its part Canada is responding quickly to Soviet needs by using both the existing grain credit facilities and a newly created $150 million facility for a broad range of foodstuffs. All of us recognize, however, that more must be done than simply delivering food.

The U.S.S.R. must upgrade its infrastructure. Therefore in addition to our food assistance we established a $25 million fund for technical assistance. It should also be remembered that we have announced $80 million in credit lines for Ukraine and the three independent Baltic republics.

I am sure that the hon. member will agree that it is in the interest of the Soviet people that we continue our ongoing efforts to ensure that the assistance or the aid that Canada and indeed other western governments give to the U.S.S.R. gets to the areas where it is most needed. To this end we are co-ordinating efforts closely with our G-7 partners.

Concerning Chernobyl, we have pledged a million dollars for relief projects. Of this amount $500,000 has been given to fund the construction and operation of a clinic for children suffering from radiation illnesses, and $500,000 has been dedicated through UNESCO to funding research into the effects of radioactivity on humans.

The Government of Canada will remain committed to supporting the Soviet people along with their difficult path to a fully democratic society. I want to say that while we have done a fair amount it certainly was brought to the attention of the G-7 through the Prime Minister and we will continue to support the U.S.S.R.

TRADE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight to discuss in the short time allotted to me a question which I asked the Deputy Prime Minister on October 3, 1991. It concerned Canada's announcement of its intention to terminate the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber exports to the United States effective October 4, 1991. I asked what contingency plan the government had to counter the inevitable American retaliatory action.

We all know that the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber was never meant to be a permanent measure, yet it appears that the Americans do not know.

During the free trade debate this government told Canadians time and time again that we would get secure access to U.S. markets, and this is just one further example of how false this promise has been.

Now that the softwood lumber exports from Canada are under siege again, I can only assume that the Canadian government did not do its homework. Canada should win this decade-long dispute easily. Yet before the U.S. International Trade Commission in late November, Canada managed to take a good case and render it merely mediocre.

It has been reported that our representatives rambled on during the first round of the ITC meetings, getting everyone confused by giving a detailed description of the various species of wood and their uses. It fell on deaf ears.

Canada's case is simple and conclusive. Canada's lumber industry's share of the United States market has declined considerably from 33 per cent in 1985-86 to less than 26 per cent this year, reaching its lowest level in 13 years.

Between 1987, the year the memorandum of understanding came into effect, and 1991 the Canadian dollar has appreciated by 21 per cent, escalating from 72 cents in 1986 to roughly 88 cents today. The cumulative effect of our over-valued dollar and the 15 per cent export surtax have resulted in a total surcharge of about 36 per cent, thus driving down lumber profits and making Canadian lumber much less competitive in the U.S. markets.

The American interim bond posting measure will have the same impact as a self-imposed 15 per cent export surtax, not to say a self-inflicted wound which has yet to heal.

It is the recession, not the price of Canadian timber that is responsible for job losses in the U.S. lumber industry. B.C., Quebec, Ontario and other Canadian lumber producing provinces are not making any money in today's market, even with the allegation that our industry is being subsidized. Some 29,000 Canadian lumber industry workers have been laid off across the country since the inception of this MOU.

Since I was elected I have continuously pressured the government to seek a ruling from GATT. It has waited until November of this year to do so. Why a delay of three years? In the meantime the industry has lost its markets and it will be difficult to recoup them.

Therefore to conclude, I call upon this government to polish its presentation to the ITC and to insist that the Americans respect the spirit of the free trade agreement. The viability of this most important industry is at stake.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am answering this question concerning the measures taken by the government following the United States' decision to launch an investigation on the imposition of countervailing duties on softwood lumber and to require an interim bond for softwood lumber imported from Canada. From the beginning, we urged the United States Department of Commerce to exclude the Atlantic provinces from the investigation on countervailing duties. I am glad that it agreed.

We asked it to exclude Manitoba, Saskatchewan, the Nortwest Territories and the Yukon as well. Finally, the Commerce Department has restricted its investigation to the procedures for setting provincial stumpage rights, while in 1986, it examined 60 federal, federal-provincial and provincial programs and practices related to lumber.

In this case, our government's priority is to develop the best possible defence, in close co-operation with the provinces and the industry, to prove that U.S. allegations about subsidies are unfounded.

We have retained the services of a lawyer in Washington. The main provinces involved and the industry have retained an American lawyer to defend their interests.

Counsel for the government has maintained constant liaison with counsel for the provinces and the industry, ever since the United States started its investigation with a view to applying countervailing duties. So far, co-operation has been excellent.

We shall of course exercise all the rights we have under the free trade agreement. If necessary, we will appeal all unfavourable decisions to the binational dispute settlement mechanism provided under the agreement, an option that was not available in 1986.

Our government has also asked GATT to protect the interests of Canada. We have asked for the appointment of a special task force to determine whether stumpage rights imposed by a government constitute a subsidy that could be subject to countervail and whether the interim bond posting demanded by the United States conforms to the obligations the U.S. has under GATT.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, we are determined to defend our case to the very end, and we are confident that normal conditions for the lumber trade between Canada and the United States will be restored.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, as you will recall after the first interjection the parliamentary secretary for agriculture was not here. He is now here. Perhaps he could read his response.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I give the floor to the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do apologize for the slight mix-up that we have had. I understood that this question was going to be about number four or five. I do apologize for not being here.

The government recognizes that the commodity prices are at a near record low and that many farmers are experiencing real difficulties. I want to say that our Prime Minister, our Minister of Agriculture, our Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and our Minister of State for Agriculture are all very concerned, as are this caucus and this party very concerned about the state of agriculture. I think it would be fair to say that all members of this House of Commons equally share the concern that we and our producers are facing across this country.

The government certainly knows the importance of agriculture to our economy. That is why we have listened to farmers' concerns and why we have acted.

On November 21 this government announced details of the distribution of $800 million in special assistance to Canadian farmers. This money is in addition to the $640 million announced in April through the farm support and adjustment measures. The second round of the FSAM program will put some much needed cash into the hands of Canadian farmers before spring seeding.

Together, FSAM I and II will make available $1.4 billion in federal transitional assistance until the GRIP and NISA programs fully kick in.

The bulk of the recently announced money will go to grains and oilseeds producers. They will receive $700 million, paid out in two instalments with the first going out within a month or so. The remaining $100 million will be shared by the horticulture producers, the maple syrup industry, mink and fox fur ranchers and honey producers.

The government continues to support Canadian farmers as it has in the past. Since 1983, and we have said this many times, government spending on agriculture has increased by 650 per cent. In 1986 this government provided farmers with $1 billion under the special grains program. In 1987 another $1.1 billion was made available under the same program and there was another $850 million under the drought assistance program and $500 million under the special income assistance program for 1990.

The Government of Canada has demonstrated by both word and deed that it is prepared to stand by farmers during this difficult time. We understand their situation and we are responding.

We could go on and talk at length about this, but we are committed to the future of agriculture in this country. We have stood by farmers in the most difficult times. We will be there when they need us and we will be there for the future.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in the minister's response to my oral question of October 31, 1991, he made reference to refugee camps and internment, planting the innuendo that either I or my party advocate what his junior minister, the member for Rimouski—Témiscouata, has characterized as concentration camps.

This innuendo arose out of an article which appeared in The Ottawa Citizen on October 24, 1991. The story later appeared in one form or another in many newspapers in the Southam chain.

The story referred to a proposal for refugee work camps which were stated to be a part of an immigration discussion paper which I had written.

The impression is false, because the minister relied not on the facts but on the article. It has thereby cast aspersions on me and my party. Because others across the country have jumped to false conclusions based on a distorted article, I want to set the record straight.

The leader of my party requested that I prepare a paper on immigration. Its purpose was to generate discussion about all aspects of immigration in order for us in the Liberal Party to work toward a just and compassionate immigration policy for the nineties and beyond.

I did as I was requested. My preliminary paper is 71 pages long and contains over 30 recommendations for discussion. I submitted my paper to the appropriate caucus committee in accordance with established party procedure. Thus out of 81 of my colleagues I gave the paper to only 9. To this date I have not given a copy to any other person in my caucus. Why? Because as immigration critic I am voluntarily bound by the rules and procedures Liberals have adopted for the examination and debate of discussion papers. My paper is still at the preliminary discussion stage at the appropriate committee level.

My paper was leaked by a person or persons as yet unknown to The Ottawa Citizen. It was then again leaked later to both the Toronto Star and Maclean's magazine. The reported stories grossly distort the few recommendations talked about and use inflammatory words not found anywhere in my paper.

However, I have steadfastly refused to discuss publicly the contents of my paper until it passes through the procedures set up by my caucus and until all 72 of my Liberal colleagues who have not yet even seen the paper have the chance to read it. However, the reporters who have possession of my paper are under no such self-imposed restrictions. Even though the media is not prepared to print my own words unedited so that Canadians can draw their own conclusions, surely the journalists are prepared to provide Canadians with a copy of my paper if they call and ask. I will now provide the minister and Canadians with the names and telephone numbers of the journalists who have personally told me that they have a copy of my paper. If they send it to you, you can read it yourself and make up your own minds. While you are talking to them, ask them the name of the person or persons who gave them the paper.

The names and telephone numbers are: Iain Hunter, The Ottawa Citizen, 613–232–4885; Paul Watson, Toronto Star, 416–869–4424; and Cecily Ross, Maclean's magazine, 416–596–6061.

Please, my fellow Canadians, never assume that what is reported is accurate. Find out the true facts for yourselves. You now know how. It is up to you.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend for Scarborough West had asked a question on October 31 and is on the late show because of that question.

He did address something entirely different. I would like to say that I empathize with him. I know how unfortunate it can be when you are misquoted or remarks that you make are taken out of context. They then take on a life of their own.

I have worked in committee with my friend for Scarborough West. I have found him to be the type of individual I would be proud to serve on any committee with, particularly on the employment and immigration standing committee. I find that he has real empathy for people and a real empathy for the kinds of problems that we face with our immigration policy. He gives very constructive ideas and criticism where is it warranted and praise where that is also warranted.

I just want to say that I am sure with his remarks tonight we now can put that little rumour, the police cap, to bed. I want to assure my hon. friend that we will take this completely as he stated in the House. It is something that all of us understand.

We all at times do get into problems like this. We want him to know we empathize. It will blow over and we certainly will not hold him accountable for what the press has said.

AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I am rising today to implore the federal government to implement at least one of the recommendations of Canada's Auditor General. The government should immediately start giving taxpayers a score card on how we are doing in working to eliminate the deficit. Telling Canadians what our financial position is just once a year in a budget is not good enough. People paying high income taxes, business taxes, sales taxes, user fees, payroll taxes and surtaxes deserve a monthly or at least quarterly accounting. The government has to give us some hope that there is light at the end of the tunnel, that the deficit will be reduced to zero in so many months.

The Auditor General is right on this one and the Minister of Finance would do well to listen and then to take action.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, unemployment keeps rising in Quebec. In the riding of Chambly, Aliments Terra has closed its doors, resulting in 200 lay-offs. On January 3, Angus will close down in east Montreal, which means another 3,000 jobs lost. Joint action by governments is urgently needed to breathe new life into the economy of Montreal.

Last week's announcement, a pitiful $32 million per year for five years, is nowhere near being the kind of serious joint program we need to help the economy in Quebec.

The government must realize it has a duty to get involved in the recovery of Quebec's economy. I would ask all members of this House to do their homework before they get involved in this kind of discussion so they can make a constructive contribution to the debate. This is not patronage. It is a matter of elementary justice and common sense.

FORESTRY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak today about Canada's most important industry, northwestern Ontario's most important industry and Thunder Bay's most important industry.

Forestry is this country's single largest industry. It generates over $40 billion a year in sales. It accounts for about $20 billion yearly in export sales, all in U.S. funds. More than 800,000 Canadians are employed directly by this industry and 8,000 large and small businesses are directly involved in the forestry industry.

This industry is in serious difficulty today and government intervention is needed badly. What we need is a de-inking and recycling of facilities throughout this country. The future of Canada's industry and northwestern Ontario depends on being able to supply recycled products to all of our customers.

This government must act now before Canada's major industry is all but shut down.

SISTERS OF THE ASSUMPTION

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Recently the Sisters of the Assumption celebrated 100 years of dedicated service to the people of the Four Nations of Hobbema in my constituency and also in western Canada.

I quote in part from a poem of thanks by Linda Cutknife:

—these Sisters have watched the community of Hobbema grow
From rags to riches
They have shared our happiness and our pain.
They were with us when we buried our people in tragic times,
They offered us prayer and goodness
when we thought the world had gone insane. . .
We will never forget these Sisters
Who were sometimes our mothers, our friends, our teachers or whatever we wanted them to be.
They taught us how to pray to God,
How to talk to Jesus as a friend,
And they told us the story of how Jesus died
so that we could be free—

In the spirit of national unity, I ask this House to join me and all my constituents in thanking the Sisters of the Assumption for all they have done to build a great nation.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am appalled to hear reports that the federal Department of Transport is considering the withdrawal of air traffic controllers from Charlottetown and 12 other airports across the county.

The reports suggest that the controllers may be withdrawn as early as February of next year.

• (1410)

Some 30,000 flights a year use the Charlottetown airport, and those people are entitled to the same level of service as enjoyed in the rest of the country.

The continual erosion of services in the outlying areas of this country shows us that this government is trying to fight its deficit problems on the backs of the poorest people and in the poorest regions of the country.

I call on the Minister of Transport to reject this recommendation and to assure Canadians in smaller centres that the level of service will remain the same for them as for other Canadians.

CANADIAN HORSE

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of importance to a number of constituents in the Cambridge area.

The Canadian horse is a national breed and is now endangered. There are approximately 1,100 in existence and of these 700 are 100 per cent pure. The Canadian horse is part of our heritage and was proclaimed the national breed by Parliament on March 17, 1909.

To promote the Canadian breed, to commemorate its place in our history and to remind Canadians of our natural heritage, the constituents of Cambridge would like to see a stamp series produced to honour the breed of horse known as the Canadian.

I ask that serious consideration be given to having the Canadian horse breed honoured by a stamp.

CROATIA

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, "The Situation in Croatia", a report prepared by 11 of the 12 monitoring delegations, has overwhelmingly substantiated the charges that have been levelled against the Yugoslav army: targeting the sick, killing children, bulldozing villages.

Innocent civilians are clearly being confronted by an army run amok. How much longer is the international community going to stand aside? Where is the new world order that was supposed to be dawning but a short time ago?

The question is: Are we doomed forever to replay history? The answer must be no. The United Nations must take action. There must be a military interposition between the Yugoslav army and those who are being brutalized.

There must be a massive transfer of humanitarian assistance. The international community must rise to the challenge before it and Canada, if we are to be true to ourselves, must take the lead.

SYRIAN JEWRY

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Canadian Parliamentary Friendship Group for Syrian Jewry was formed. Our group has Conservative, Liberal and New Democrat representatives who are deeply concerned about the plight of Jews in Syria.

Today I want to bring this grave situation to the attention of my colleagues in the House and all Canadians.

There are 4,500 Jews in Syria who are being denied the right to leave oppressive Syrian rule.

[Translation]

Jews living in Syria have been deprived of their basic rights. They cannot emigrate. They cannot travel freely and they cannot vote. They are jailed and tortured. Their correspondence and telephone conversations are censored, and their activities are watched very closely.

[English]

We must work together to ensure for all Syrian Jews that fundamental human rights are guaranteed, including their safe departure from Syrian oppression to freedom.

FISHERIES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, fish plants in Glace Bay and Louisbourg are vital to our local economy.

The federal government should explain why it decided to increase cod quotas around Cape Breton Island for the French metropolitan fleet from St. Malo, France, in the past year and to cut cod quotas for Canadians.

The federal government should also withdraw a commitment given to France that it can catch 60 per cent of its entire year's cod quota around Cape Breton Island in the first three months of 1992.

Not only have the cod quotas been increased for France around Cape Breton Island, but foreign nations like Bulgaria and Poland have been given so-called experimental licences to catch mackerel, with 30 per cent by-catch of capelin in the Sydney Bight in the past year.

The federal government has systematically destroyed the cod fishery around Cape Breton Island and in the gulf by issuing licences to Cuba to catch squid along the Nova Scotia coast and the U.S.S.R. to catch capelin. Both species are the food supply of the gulf cod stock.

Not one tonne of fish should be taken from Canadian quotas while Canada gives one ounce of quota to foreign nations around our coast.

CROATIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, in a special report signed by 11 out of 12 European community members monitoring delegations, the Yugoslavian army is accused of deliberately targeting civilians, hospitals and schools in Croatia.

The report states these acts are brutal and have proven effective in terrorizing the people of Croatia. The report of last week entitled "The Situation in Croatia" condemns the Serb dominated Yugoslav force as a "cowardly army fighting no recognizable principle, but largely, instinctively for its own status and survival".

The report recommends that the 12-nation European community intervene militarily and punish the Yugoslav federal army. I believe we should go one step further. We must announce to these self-serving Communist officers of the Yugoslav army that a war tribunal will be set up to try the officers of either army who have committed war crimes.

The barbaric attacks and bloodshed against Croatians must end.

CROATIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, last night I joined the Ukrainian Canadian community on the steps of Parliament in celebrating the independence of Ukraine. Today on those same steps over 2,000 Croatian Canadians were asking their government why Canada and the world continue to refuse to recognize the independence of Croatia after 94 per cent of the people of Croatia and Slovenia voted for freedom and nationhood earlier this year.

A European community report just released accuses the Yugoslav army of targeting civilians, hospitals, and schools in Croatia in an effort to terrorize the population.

While Croatia must of course fully respect the rights of the Serbian minority, it is those of the Croatian majority who are being brutally denied. Canada must urge the United Nations to immediately intervene to stop the bloodshed. Canada must provide desperately needed humanitarian aid directly to the people of Croatia, and Canada must end its silence and ensure that the will of the people of Croatia and Slovenia for freedom, democracy and independence is realized at last.

UKRAINE

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, on December 1 the world watched a remarkable event unfold in Ukraine: the decision by a freedom loving people through a democratic process to join the world community as an independent nation.

Our Prime Minister realized the importance of this moment immediately and recognized the birth of the new republic of Ukraine.

The London Ukrainian community joins the chorus of millions around the world congratulating the Prime Minister and Canada. Congratulations, Prime Minister, for again demonstrating the kind of leadership Canada is renowned for throughout the world.

Will the Prime Minister exercise his bold leadership once again and now recognize the republic of Croatia?

QUEBEC'S ECONOMY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, last week the federal government announced it would give Quebec $160 million over a period of five years. This means $32 million per year, or $5 per person per year in Quebec. It is not enough, considering the damage done to Quebec's economy by federal policies.

Furthermore, the critical comments of the New Democrats and Liberals were biased and inappropriate. Did Quebecers criticize the fact that the government sent $800 million to Western Canada? No, Mr. Speaker. Quebec merely wants its fair share of the taxes it pays to Ottawa. It does not want handouts and it only wishes it could keep all its tax money and spend it according to its own priorities.

ORGANIZATION OF ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the House today of developments this week at a meeting of the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development, the OECD, in Paris.

The Minister of State for the Environment, led the Canadian delegation, was vice-chair of the meeting. The theme of this important meeting of environment and development ministers of the 24 member countries of the OECD was a partnership for sustainable development.

On Monday the Minister urged her colleagues from the OECD countries to work to develop new global partnerships to achieve sustainable development.

Canada is well positioned to lead in partnerships with private sector organizations, business, industry, labour, educators and institutions.

The central position and prominence of the OECD as an institution and of its member countries will cast it in a number of key roles leading up to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development and beyond. Canada will continue to be active and committed to these initiatives.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could have the attention of the House for a moment.

As some hon. members know, for many weeks now on Wednesdays I have been coming in early so that prayers could be taken in time to begin Statements by Members exactly on the hour.

I cannot go ahead unless we have a quorum. I have sent messages. I am asking all hon. members to ensure that there is a quorum a few minutes in advance so that no hon. member is deprived of his or her wish to make a statement during the 15 minutes of statements and I really do need the co-operation of all hon. members.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister met the premier of British Columbia who became the fifth provincial premier to call for a first ministers' conference on the economy. We also heard that Premier Bourassa of Quebec said he would be willing to attend such a conference, if it were likely to produce positive results.

As we see now that provincial premiers representing the three main political parties in Canada are ready right now to meet the Prime Minister to discuss economic problems, why does the government refuse to hold such a conference which might find a way to get out of this unending recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will not refuse a meeting with the premiers. He already met with some premiers last week and other meetings are scheduled for the coming days. A meeting with the premiers to consider the economy is possible.

[English]

The Prime Minister said yesterday that he would be reflecting on the advice of the finance minister who will be meeting with the provincial finance ministers on December 11 and 12. He will be reflecting on the views that have been expressed to him by the premiers with whom he has been meeting.

The Minister of Finance said in the scrum yesterday: "If he thinks a meeting would be beneficial, I would be happy to call it".

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister again. Yesterday the Prime Minister made a speech in Vancouver and he said, among other things, that "Canadians are going to have to fish or cut bait" about the future of Canada.

I agree entirely with the Prime Minister. But if the Prime Minister really believes, as I do, that all Canadians must have the chance to say yes to Quebec and to say yes to Canada, why has he pulled the plug on the proposal that I made in good faith to have a national referendum where all the people of Canada can vote on the future of this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, according to Canadian Press, the Prime Minister said in Vancouver yesterday that the Speech from the Throne promised consultation with Canadians. The Speech from the Throne does not say what form that consultation will take. We are still looking at the various options. We have not ruled any out. But we are honouring that promise made in the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition missed the response yesterday by my colleague, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, to the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, but he made it abundantly clear, as has the Prime Minister, that all options remain open.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister who is replacing the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Would the government not be prepared right now to clarify the situation and to make people understand that what we want is a double majority referendum, where every region of Canada—the Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario and the west—could say yes to Quebec and yes to Canada at the same time? Why does the government not propose such a solution immediately since no one knows exactly what the government wants to do, which is creating confusion, and since it is high time to find a positive solution to save this country?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition points out, he and his party have locked themselves into the position that there must be a referendum on a particular formula. What the Prime Minister and the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs have indicated is that we favour the broadest possible constructive consultation with Canadians. I put the emphasis upon constructive, in that any action that we take must be one that helps to unite Canadians and not to divide them or to polarize them.

It is incumbent on all of us on all sides of this House to do what we can to bring Canadians into the process, to solicit their participation and to do what we can to unite Canadians, not to put barriers between them.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The minister will know that Canada Post employees in London, Ontario are routinely asked to use someone else's name and social insurance number to do contract work for the post office after working hours.

Given that this action by Canada Post contravenes the Canada Labour Code, the collective agreement, the Income Tax Act and probably many other statutes of Canada, when did the minister find out about this practice and what has he done to stop it?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that Revenue Canada, through its matching programs, will identify any such potential problems or inequities that exist. We found out about those in recent days. We are currently investigating the matter to the best of our ability.

Upon the conclusion of the investigation, appropriate action will be taken. Every step to protect the individual is being taken at this present time.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the culprit here is not the employees in question. They were counselled by Canada Post and Canada Post has admitted to this publicly.

I have in hand here a cheque which was given to Mr. Mike Bellemy and the cheque is made to his mother, Audrey Bellemy, a senior citizen.

[Translation]

I want to ask the minister opposite what action the government will take not to punish employees but to reassure Canadians that Canada Post obeys the law?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first of all, if the hon. member or any other member has any additional evidence to give to us, we would be happy to receive it and include it in the ongoing investigation.

I repeat to the hon. member and to Canadians who are affected by this situation that a matching program after the fact does take place and appropriate action will be taken. In any event, if the hon. member has any additional information I would be very happy to look at it.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The Leader of the Opposition continues to talk about a referendum on the Constitution and the Prime Minister speaks of public consultation. But the country's future is not just the Constitution. You need only listen to people. The real problems are finding work and the economy.

This government's economic record is a complete failure. When will this government hold the only national referendum that really counts; when will the government call an election?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in due course.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The previous minister spoke about the broadest possible consultation. There is one form of broad consultation and every indication says that this government has failed in every part of this country and especially on the economy. When the government stood up in the past and said it was on the right track, we have to ask who it is speaking for: the banks that had a billion dollar profit or the $27 billion in corporate taxes that were not paid?

Who is the minister listening to because he is certainly not speaking for those Canadians who want full participation through an election? When will the government call an election for that full participation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this type of political game does not amuse Canadians. What Canadians are looking for is consultation about the economy and that is precisely what we are engaged in with the prosperity initiative that is having meetings in communities.

I had a meeting in my hon. friend's community and I would say to her that it was a very successful meeting. People came out to that meeting, gave their views on how we should deal with international markets, how we should deal with training, how we should deal with technology and how we get investment to produce jobs in communities such as hers. It is that type of dialogue among Canadians that is going to generate the change of attitude that is necessary within the country.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

What Canadians want is action. Canadians are not getting action on the economy and they are not finding jobs. Today Statistics Canada reported that the number of jobs available has not changed from last month and in the last year the number of jobs available across this country has gone down from 12 per cent to 26 per cent. It means fewer jobs are available for Canadians.

The kind of action Canadians want is action on the economy and they want this government to do something. Every indication is that this government will not take—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would put her question, please.

Ms. McLaughlin: The government will take the action and so I say to the minister responsible: Will the government call an election and stand up and ask the people for their real opinion?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the fact that interest rates have come down over 6 percentage points since May of last year indicates action on the part of the government.

My hon. friend talks about the need to create jobs. There have been 101,000 jobs created since February of this year. So jobs are being created.

My hon. friend talks about what is happening in the economy. Housing starts have been above 150,000 now for six or seven months. They reached 200,000 one month during the summer. So things are changing.

Mr. Speaker: I think we are going to have to move on.

CROATIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise two very compelling international matters with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

First, the European community monitoring group has reported that violence against Croatians persists and that measures taken to stop the random terrorism of the Yugoslav army have failed.

I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on behalf of Canada: Will she call for an immediate emergency meeting of the security council to ensure the UN force will be sent right away to protect the lives of Croatian civilians?

Second, will she personally meet with foreign ministers of the European community to discuss the intention and the timing of their recognition of Croatia and Slovenia?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all it is very important that we all recognize the horror of what is going on in Croatia and in other parts of Yugoslavia.

I have been in touch with our ambassador at the United Nations. I was in touch with him this morning. There is a security council meeting to receive a report from Cyrus Vance on his return from Yugoslavia. He is expected to be in New York tomorrow. He is spending another day in the region in a further attempt to ensure that the cease-fire holds. He and his number two man are in Croatia, in Zagreb.

I have also spoken to our own ambassador in Yugoslavia and instructed him to seek permission from the Croatian authorities to visit Croatia himself and report directly back to me. I should say that no foreign ambassador located in Belgrade has visited Croatia, partly at the request of the Croatian authorities. Therefore, I have made this a personal message from myself to the Croatian authorities via the ambassador and I want a report back from him directly.

HENRIETTE HADDAD

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister should consider sending a special delegation to Croatia to examine the situation.

I also want to ask this question. On both sides of this House and throughout the country we all welcome the release of western hostages with one exception. A Canadian, Mrs. Henriette Haddad, is still being held hostage after six years of detention without much hope of being released.

I want to ask the minister why she personally has kept silent on this issue. Why has the Canadian government not had Mrs. Haddad put on the list of UN hostages that are being negotiated? Will she take action immediately, while there is still time, to have Mrs. Haddad become part of a deal involving western hostages who are to be freed this week?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have discussed Mrs. Haddad with the United Nations. My chief of staff has met with Mrs. Haddad's family. I should say that Mrs. Haddad's son visited a member of Parliament in 1985 about his mother's disappearance and then again in 1987. He was not in touch with us again until this year, even though we had searched for Mrs. Haddad through all our known connections, including terrorist organizations.

No organization in Syria or in Lebanon or in any other part of the region has come forward and said that it is holding Mrs. Haddad despite our efforts to locate her and to discuss—

Ms. Copps: Put her on the list.

Mrs. McDougall: I sometimes wonder if the hon. member really does care about this.

We have followed this up with the United Nations. We have followed this up with all of our contacts through Syria and Lebanon and indeed through the groups that are known to hold hostages. There is absolutely no trace of Mrs. Haddad that we can find and we are continuing to pursue it.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the absence of the minister.

The Auditor General's report states that this government has never increased funding for aboriginal housing despite an increase in the aboriginal population three times the national average.

Will the ministers quit avoiding and neglecting their responsibilities and will they act by providing now the funding so desperately needed for aboriginal housing?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I was asked a similar question yesterday by a member of the NDP, and it will of course be a pleasure to give the hon. member the requisite information. We realize that aboriginal communities have tremendous needs in terms of housing. Our investment in this area has already been very substantial, and yesterday I quoted some rather impressive figures which reflect this government's commitment to helping improve aboriginal housing. The government has spent between $120 and $140 million annually, and so far 3,000 new houses have been built. Funds have also been made available for the renovation of another 3,000 to 4,000 houses.

That being said, we realize that we are scarcely meeting the demand. As the hon. member probably knows, we are involved in discussions. A report was produced by the department, and aboriginal communities are now examining the report. We are developing a new policy with these communities so as to respond more effectively to their very urgent needs.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, before I continue with my supplementary I should say that whatever way we cut it, there is a 10,000 housing shortfall for the aboriginal people and that is from Auditor General, not me.

My supplementary question is for the associate minister of Indian and northern affairs. Education, as she well knows, is fundamental to the future of aboriginal Canadians. The federal government is obligated to meet the educational needs of all aboriginal students.

How can the minister justify capping the funding on post-secondary education to aboriginal people and how can the government refuse 5,000 students by creating a waiting list of those 5,000 students who have made it through high school, despite great adversity and through a very high drop-out list? How can the government justify this capping of funds?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I believe this government has recognized how important education is to aboriginal communities. Although the hon. member may not be aware of the fact, I am pleased to say that we have tripled the amounts provided since 1984-85, and we have almost tripled the number of students who now reach post-secondary level. We have increased our funding, and this year the budget for this category is $190 million and will increase to $242 million in 1995-96. We are also reviewing the problem that although all class I and class II spaces have been filled we realize that some students may have been left out. We will try to deal with this problem as soon as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

Media reports in Winnipeg suggest that the government's own CN has a plan to ship grain and potash, bypassing Thunder Bay and the seaway, through Fort Frances and Windsor through U.S. rail links. This plan, if adopted and allowed to go ahead, will mean the beginning of the end of the port at Thunder Bay, the seaway and a number of ports in the province of Quebec.

I want to ask the Minister of State for Transport: Will she instruct CN to cease and desist?

• (1440)

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I share my hon. friend's concern about this, but I want to reassure him that there is no plan to ship grain through the U.S.

As he says, it was speculation. It is not true that there is no shipping of grain through those ports. It will continue to flow through Thunder Bay.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I have a supplementary question for the same minister, Mr. Speaker. I know that CN denies the existence of this plan, but it has denied the existence of other plans that have come true in the past.

As the holder of the shares in this Crown corporation the Government of Canada has the right to instruct CN not to develop any plans to bypass any Canadian ports in the movement of grain, potash or any other commodities. Is the minister prepared to take the responsibility on behalf of the people of Canada?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I take my responsibility to the people of Canada very sincerely. CN has already advised the port officials at Thunder Bay that it has no plans to do this so there is no need for me to order it.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State, but in his absence I would like to direct it to the responsible minister. The Auditor General of Canada was very critical of the process of contracting out translation in his department. It seems that 42 per cent of current translation requests are contracted out, and that by 1994 this percentage could be as high as 50 per cent.

The quality of translation is also criticized by the Auditor General, who says that the ability of the Department of the Secretary of State to manage its human resources is poor. My question is very straightforward. Does the government intend to take action as soon as possible to deal with the problems raised by the Auditor General? Will it set clear and precise management objectives for the practice of contracting out translation? Or, is it about to dismantle the Translation Bureau and sacrifice it on the altar of privatization? That is my question.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): No, Mr. Speaker. We intend to keep this essential service, and it is an excellent one. Yes, we have started to take action, and I can say quite frankly that the department has accepted the recommendations and is quite pleased with them. It has already set up a task force that is to start on a complete and comprehensive review of the operations of the Translation Bureau. I am told that by next spring there will be a new plan on the basis of which a comprehensive strategy will be implemented for this service.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The Auditor General has said that the contracting of translation services are badly managed. That is a serious accusation. He says that the government has lost a lot of talented employees, that the work climate is not good, that the morale is very low, and that there is a drop in the over-all quality of translations.

Canada with two official languages must have quality translation. As the percentage of translation done by the private sector is expected to rise to 50 per cent by 1994, what measures will the Secretary of State undertake to solve these problems of subcontracting translation services to people outside the Public Service of Canada?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister who is away on government business today, I indicated that the department agrees with the recommendations of the Auditor General. I also indicated that it has already undertaken a number of very positive measures that will definitely propose new ways of delivering the service.

As far as the morale, I think it is a group that has performed brilliantly. It has given excellent service. It does translation service in perhaps 60 languages, from what I remember in my stay with that ministry.

I think this new little team that has been doing its analysis and work has been very well seen by those members. We certainly will do everything we can to protect the service that has been in place for 57 years.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Six and a half years ago the Minister of Transport stated in this House: "This government has no intention of downgrading the role of Winnipeg as a transportation centre and as an important part of the CNR".

Since that commitment was made—I use the word "commitment" loosely in this case—Manitobans have lost approximately 2,000 jobs, most of which were lost at the Transcona shops in Symington Yards.

With further reports that there could be as many as 1,300 other jobs cut throughout Canada, many which will be in Manitoba, when will CN management and this government stop bludgeoning the Manitoba rail worker?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, CN does have a mandate to act fiscally responsible and build a railroad that will continue to serve the people across this country. It has to make certain decisions in putting its fiscal plan together.

The article in the Winnipeg newspaper at this time is speculative and I do not think we should comment on it any further at this time.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Four years ago the government made another commitment, this time to maintain Winnipeg as a rail transportation hub. No wonder people are nervous: all these commitments.

Since then we have seen approximately 250 rail jobs that have been lost, quite apart from the 2,000 CN jobs that I just mentioned. Some 1,000 of those jobs were lost during the last three years.

What is the whole agenda here? Why the secrecy? Why a little bit at a time? When will we know the total plan? When will the rail workers know where they stand?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be a bit careful when he talks about Winnipeg as a rail hub, because it is.

Manitoba has the largest number of CN employees outside Quebec of any other region of the country, which is where CN is headquartered. Manitoba originates 8 per cent of the rail traffic and has 44 per cent of the employees.

In criticizing CN, they had better be careful that they do not leave the impression that CN is not welcome in Manitoba, because it is a very important part of Manitoba. It has the largest switching yard, the Transcona shops, and the train locomotives at Gimli. It is and will continue to be a very important employment generator for Manitoba.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the minister responsible for native affairs or whoever is representing him today.

In 1991 various departments spent an estimated $4 billion on basic services to the native community. According to the recent Auditor General's report, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development does not have assurances that these moneys are used for the purpose intended or managed with maximum efficiency. The same is true in the Department of Agriculture.

What course of action is this government pursuing in order to ensure that aboriginal people, farmers of Canada, are receiving the highest quality and most cost efficient services available?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the Auditor General's report which put forward some questions about the expenditures, over $11 billion expended by the government on behalf of taxpayers to assist farmers.

I say to her that I know the policy of the party she represents: that farmers will have to do with less, that farmers will have to be part of the 15 per cent of the over-all reduction in government expenditures that her leader is putting forward, and that her leader has put forward a statement that the Government of Canada should trade off the interest of western grain exporters against the interests of those who operate supply managed industries in central Canada, Ontario and Quebec.

I say to her that this government represents all of agriculture. If the member really wants to know whether the expenditures that have been made have been efficient, she should ask the producers who received them.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about dollars and cents here. We are talking about the efficiency of programs that are in place and what long-term goals in terms of accountability this government has.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): I turn to another subject now and ask the transport minister a question.

It has come to my attention that the Minister of Transport will be announcing a $2.7 million to $3.5 million grant to the trucking industry before this Friday.

• (1450)

I have been informed that many decisions involving this grant have been made without consultation from important members of the trucking community.

We are talking about handing out grants to the trucking industry when so many, the Alberta Construction Trucking Association for example, state that these moneys would be better served to pay down the debt.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I really did not hear a question at the end of that statement, but I can tell the hon. member that we have been working with all representatives of the trucking industry for over a year now to come to plans that will indeed strengthen the industry and make it more competitive in the future, and we are continuing to work on those plans.

TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

Yesterday the Auditor General criticized the government for the way that it used public sector pension funds to finance the deficit. He estimated in fact that the loss to public sector pension funds was a billion dollars per year.

I want to ask the minister if he will guarantee in the legislation he is talking about bringing forward that public servants will not be asked to make higher contributions or accept lower benefits as a result of the billions that the government has taken from their pension assets over the last 30 years.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member has been sleeping all these years but the integration of this fund with Treasury has been there since 1954. He wakes up because the Auditor General said that if we had invested the money on the market we probably would have got a little more money. But we would have to borrow the equivalent amount outside thereby increasing the interest and costing Canadian taxpayers more money.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister answering for the Royal Canadian Mint where public service workers have been on strike for almost seven weeks now.

In the past the Minister of Labour has been asked in this House to appoint a mediator and he said that he could not do that without a request. The fact is that under the law he can appoint a mediator, and I am asking the government now to make the commitment that the Minister of Labour will appoint a mediator so that the people can get back to the bargaining table in this dispute and the strike in Winnipeg can come to an end.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it was unfortunate that last year the workers of the PSAC union turned down a 5.5 per cent offer. This year with times changed they have not accepted any of the offers and they have been going on a very slow strike, a few going out at a time.

At the present time there is no reason for the Minister of Labour to appoint a mediator unless at least one of the sides indicates it has an interest in that.

COMPETITION POLICY

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Recently the Quebec provincial government announced an action plan to revitalize its current economic situation by setting targets toward economic renewal. There were no public consultations.

This minister and the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced a prosperity initiative with consultants fanning out across the country, visiting towns and asking local groups to sponsor these community discussions.

Recently Michael Porter released a report, Canada at the Crossroads, and told Canadians what to do.

Why is this minister continuing with this exercise? What does he expect to hear that he has not heard before? Why does this minister not just introduce his new policy platform on competitiveness?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think one thing that Canadians have told us very clearly is that it is important for us to consult on these issues in order to seek out their views on the range of matters that affect our competitive position.

What we are seeking here is not just a list of things for government to do or all governments to do, but a list of proposals for all stakeholders, all participants in the Canadian economy, whether it is government, management, labour, educators or scientists.

What we are hoping to do through these consultations is generate a broader understanding of the issues involved here, and through that broader understanding seek a change in attitude that will be supportive of the broad range of measures that will be needed in order to support science and technology, training, retraining, investment, how we do in domestic markets, and how we succeed in penetrating international markets.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary, if there is such a thing in this House. There certainly should be a supplementary to a government question.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the feisty minister of employment. I am sure he will want to acknowledge that the Atlantic fisheries aid package is being run in a very unfair way. For example, people who because of the disastrous fishing season were obliged to reactivate their old UI claims are being excluded from the aid package even though their claims are now running out.

I wonder if the minister would indicate what steps he is prepared to take, in the interests of fairness, to correct this very unfair situation?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister of fisheries indicated earlier this week that the program which was announced was being administered according to the rules that were laid down. He also indicated that there were some problems with some people with a long attachment to the fishery who were not qualifying.

The question of the hon. member does not allow me to know exactly what he is talking about. If he is talking about the plight of fishermen, it is difficult. That is why we have come up with this $57 million support program for fishermen. If the hon. member would care to be more specific, maybe I could help him.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had been very specific with the minister. People who are on claims which are now running out are being prevented on a technicality from qualifying under the program. I ask if he will take that under advisement to see if something can be done.

I have a supplementary question. Many people who have demonstrated a clear connection over the long term to the fishery are also being denied access to the program despite the utterances of his colleague, the minister of fisheries. They are being denied because they do not happen in this year to have sufficient insurable weeks.

Will he undertake to review the program's guidelines so that the people who really need this assistance this winter get it while there is still time?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can indicate to the hon. member that I will be pleased to look at the question of those claims he mentioned. I will look at it personally.

As for the other issue, whether to revisit the guidelines, I am surely capable of doing that but I do not want to raise false expectations in Newfoundland. I will do as the hon. member asks.

ETHANOL

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Farmers in Ontario have repeatedly asked for clarification of the federal policy and for market entry support for grain based ethanol. They have been waiting for years.

Can the minister assure me and the Canadian farmers that the wait is over?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's ongoing interest in this important issue is to be recognized.

I answered a question of a colleague in the House last week talking about ethanol and the reasons why Canada supported ethanol and the production of that product. It helps us in the environment. It also helps us use a renewable comment in the grains and oilseeds sector.

As the hon. member is aware, there is one commercial ethanol production plant in Ontario at this time. Some provinces have put forward initiatives which would help the establishment of plants to produce ethanol. I hope that we are able to work co-operatively as we have in the past federally and provincially to continue with this important project.

COMPETITION POLICY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to the very penetrating question from the member for Cambridge and is to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

I quite agree that consultations with representative and responsible people are very interesting. Can the minister please explain to this House and the Canadian people how this public consultation of 150 consultations in communities across the country— the first was a trial experiment in my riding when the two questions were "Your wish" and "How to"— is going to contribute to international competitiveness after two and a half hours of dialogue on those interesting two general questions?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his not quite so penetrating question.

I know that my hon. friend supports the approach that we are taking to consult with Canadians. I think the meeting in his riding was a good meeting.

What we are trying to achieve here is, as I said in previous answers, to get Canadians talking about this range of issues that are out in the consultation papers that my hon. friend, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and I have put out on behalf of the government.

If the member had attended the workshops that were a part of that meeting, he we would have seen that there was good dialogue—

Mr. Speaker: I think we will have to move on.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

Today a very serious conflict exists in the lobster fishery in southern Nova Scotia. One of the concerns of the lobster fishermen is that they feel they are not getting fair access to air cargo space for transport to the lucrative Christmas European lobster market.

I ask the minister if she will immediately look into this matter to make sure that air cargo space is available on the east coast for all the lobsters to go to the European market that can be shipped.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries.

A report in one of the newspapers in southwestern Nova Scotia is that the quotas for 1992 in the Scotia-Fundy region in the groundfishery will be increased.

As the fishermen in the area need to know immediately before they are forced to transfer more quotas to companies, will the parliamentary secretary look into whether or not these quotas will be increased and tell the people in the Scotia-Fundy area if they will be?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member opposite, yes, we will look at that immediately.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I was starting to get worried. My question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Canadians have waited patiently through four years of federal delay for comprehensive national standards to clean up Canada's biggest polluter, the pulp and paper industry, and today learned that the Minister of the Environment has offered the industry exactly what it wanted: a six-year toxic dumping holiday in all cases until December 1995 for special cases and no target or timetable for phase-out of organo-chlorines despite the support of his own department for such action.

Will the minister at least admit to Canadians that the over-all level of toxic organo-chlorines will continue to rise in our environment, in our water, in our fish and in our ecology as a result of the minister's decision to not decrease?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, that is false. Let me start with the member's assertion that we have offered some sort of a toxic holiday for a period of six years. I do not know where he takes those numbers from. In fact, we are bringing forward regulations under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act for dioxins and furans that will come into effect for mills constructed before 1990 in January of 1994 and for mills constructed after 1990 immediately.

Those regulations will have the effect of reducing the amount of organo-chlorides to below two kilograms per tonne, a net reduction of 600,000 tonnes of organo-chlorides at 1980 levels for the year 1993. That is a result of our regulation which, by the way, compares very, very well to any similar regulations that the hon. member will find anywhere around the world.

Mr. Speaker: A very, very, short supplemental.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My supplementary, Mr. Speaker, is for the same minister.

Yesterday the Auditor General identified misleading information and overstatement of penalties as being serious problems in environmental protection reports from the minister's department.

Will the minister at least give Canadians today, now, an absolute assurance that there will be total compliance and enforcement even with the weak-kneed regulations he and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced today? At least give us that.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the Auditor General's report of yesterday. What the Auditor General said in fact is that some information that had been given through three different instruments, including part III of the estimates, could be. He did not say it was—he said, it could be. In recognition of that he was referring in fact, I may point out, to estimates that went back to 1990-91, the previous year for which there were corrections.

The second thing that he singled out in terms of a report was a report that was published in 1988 and for which there was also corrections and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act for which there was also corrections.

I may also add, and that concerns the second part of the member's question, that the government announced today under the authority of the green plan a $55 million initiative for enforcement of our environmental regulations, in reaction to our new regulations and the Auditor General's report.

Mr. Speaker: This will be the last question. I know the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau wishes to be heard, but I will not have time. Perhaps tomorrow. The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications.

In the maze of financial restraints being experienced by the CBC, one redeeming recommendation from its president is the call for more predictable and flexible financial management capabilities.

For example, it is difficult to imagine how any $1 billion corporation could be run in today's uncertain world without some reasonable ability to borrow money for short-term operational needs or for amortized investment capital facilities.

Would the minister be willing to consider introducing amendments to the appropriate legislation so as to provide the CBC with a limited borrowing authority to more efficiently conduct its affairs on a business basis?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the hon. member's suggestion. Obviously, when you are looking at the running of the $1.3 billion corporation, it is important to be able to have flexibility and the capacity to run your business on a business-like basis.

The government is currently looking at the whole issue of the long-term financing of the CBC. I will certainly take the hon. member's suggestion into consideration at the same time.

PRIVILEGE

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege based on an apparent infringement of the freedom of speech of the House of Commons as it applies to witnesses before parliamentary committees.

This fall the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development has held hearings on the Industrial Research Assistance Program of the National Research Council. During these hearings members of the private sector IRAP advisory board gave testimony which was critical of the National Research Council and its president.

In an apparent reprisal I have learned that the National Research Council has disbanded the IRAP advisory board and effectively has terminated the members of this board who appeared before our committee.

I wish to table in the House today copies of letters sent to members of the board informing them of the NRC's decision. Mr. Speaker, if you wish I can send you material detailing the disagreement between the IRAP advisory board and the president of the National Research Council.

I believe however,—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I have been listening carefully to the member and I will let him continue, but I am having some difficulty seeing how a decision made at the National Research Council is a breach of privilege of the hon. member or of this House. Perhaps the hon. member can assist me.

Mr. Berger: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will address that point immediately.

It is essential that parliamentary committees hear witnesses who are free to give honest testimony without fear of reprisal. This apparent message, the disbanding of this committee and the message that the NRC sends, possibly acting with the approval of the government, cannot be allowed to stand.

Potential future witnesses cannot—

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, please. Perhaps the hon. member would take his seat for a moment. I may ask him to help me further. The hon. member is accusing somebody of having forbidden them or made it impossible for the committee to hear them. That might indeed be a very important matter. But unless I am not fully au fait as to exactly what the hon. member is getting at, I wish he would come to the exact point.

Just because the National Research Council may or may not decide on what it does or does not do with a group within it, that in itself is not privilege. On the other hand, if there was a deliberate design to stop members that a committee had invited from appearing in front of that committee, and if that design was carried out in a completely improper way, then maybe we have a point. It might very well have to be resolved by the committee first.

But I want to get the facts.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, you refer to a deliberate design to stop witnesses from appearing. Witnesses appeared before our committee. They were members of a private sector advisory board who undertook their responsibilities on a voluntary basis. Their board has effectively been disbanded.

The point I wanted to make to you, Mr. Speaker, was that this affects freedom of speech, not only in the sense that future witnesses appearing before committees may be left in a position where they can be intimidated, but there is a further potential breach.

[Translation]

This is not only about freedom of speech being limited by the threat of retaliatory action but about public confidence in our parliamentary institutions. Witnesses simply will not come if Parliament does not defend their right to speak out.

Mr. Speaker: I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. member.

[English]

At the moment I see no privilege. At the moment I would ask the hon. member to take this representation back to the committee, and it may well be that as a consequence of that there may be a question of privilege to bring before the Chair. But at the moment it is not there.

I am going to carry on. I thank the hon. member for his courtesy.

CANADIAN ABORIGINAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to table a document which highlights the glowing record of achievement by Canada's aboriginal peoples in restoring their very real tradition of economic self-sufficiency.

This document is an 18-month status report on the progress under the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, which constitutes a partnership for economic development between the government and aboriginal Canadians.

On behalf of my colleagues, the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, whose department also delivered this strategy, I am pleased to report on the progress made to date and reaffirm the government's commitment to continued efforts at developing aboriginal economic self-sufficiency.

FINANCE

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Finance, in both official languages.

In accordance with its order of reference of Tuesday, October 8, 1991, your committee has considered Bill C-18, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Act, the Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Board of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act, and certain related acts, and has agreed to report the bill as amended.

BILL C-38

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE E

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of Legislative Committee E on Bill C-38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada, with amendments, in both official languages.

This is my first report as a committee chairman and I would like particularly to thank all members of the committee who made it possible for us to deal with this matter in a very appropriate fashion.

Routine Proceedings

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-325, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act (mobile home).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the goods and services tax definition of mobile home to remove the size specifications which are set out in the definition. The effect of the amendment would be to ensure that a unit which is occupied as a home should be exempt from the goods and services tax no matter what size it is.

Of course this would be an interim step until the GST is ultimately abolished by a New Democrat government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Robinson moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-326, an act to amend the Access to Information Act (corporations).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that the Canadian Council on Animal Care should be subject to the requirements of the Access to Information Act. This would provide for a greater degree of openness concerning the care and the use of animals in research.

Although most animal using institutions are public, using public funds for public benefit, the system is not accountable to the public. Therefore, this bill would ensure that these scientific research establishments using animals in research in fact drop the veil of secrecy and are open and accountable to the public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Robinson moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PRIVATE BILLS

MOTION TO CONSIDER RECEIPT OF LATE PETITION RECEIVED

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, after the usual discussions with hon. members, I would ask the unanimous consent of the House for tabling a motion that a late petition be deemed to have been received.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to table the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, the motion reads as follows:

> That, notwithstanding Standing Order 132, the petition for private bill from the Metropolitan Insurance Company received Tuesday, November 26, 1991, and reported upon by the Clerk of Petitions on November 27, 1991, be deemed to have been received within the required timeframe.

PETITIONS

MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure today to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Ontario, particularly from Seeleys Bay, Sydenham, Harrowsmith, Kingston, Mississauga, Merrickville, Norwood, Peterborough, Tweed, Foxboro and other communities in this province.

These persons are concerned about the government sellout of Canadian interests in the GATT negotiations and particularly the possible sellout on article XI. Were there a significant change, there could be destruction of Canada's system of marketing for farm products.

These people are concerned that the government, having shown so little backbone in the past, will sell out Canada again in these talks. They call upon the government to hold our Canadian system up as an example to the world and protect it in those negotiations.

UKRAINE

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition calling upon Canada to officially recognize Ukraine's independence and to immediately establish full diplomatic relations with the government and people of Ukraine.

I have received a number of these petitions prior to the Prime Minister's announcement yesterday recognizing Ukraine as an independent state. Unfortunately only this one was certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to present a petition signed by 100 Canadians from the greater Toronto area.

The petitioners are also from Hamilton, Beamsville, St. Catharines, Grimsby, Sarnia, Oshawa, and a great many are from Bradford, Ontario.

They are petitioning Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence and establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and people of Ukraine immediately following a positive confirmation vote in Ukraine's referendum on December 1, 1991.

I know that all these petitioners, as well as you and I, Mr. Speaker, were most pleased that the Prime Minister announced on Monday, December 2 that Canada had officially recognized Ukraine as an independent state.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition.

The petitioners in this particular case are from throughout the Okanagan Valley. They advise that a company has announced its intention to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount to divert water to sell to San Diego, California.

The petitioners point out that the federal government does not prohibit the diversion of Canadian rivers into the United States of America.

They are petitioning Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States of America and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

UKRAINE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I regard it an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the riding of Elk Island who support the initiative of the Government of Canada to officially recognize the independence of Ukraine.

The petitioners also urge the government to continue its efforts to establish full diplomatic relations with Ukraine.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present on behalf of a number of citizens of my constituency a petition which calls upon the government to recognize Ukraine officially, to do what it can to establish relations quickly and to help Ukraine to immediately become a functioning nation.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting a number of petitions today with about 400 signatures from people who live throughout the Okanagan—Shuswap area.

The petitioners are quite concerned that Multinational Resources has an intention to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount and divert the water into the U.S. market.

The petitioners are concerned that under the provisions of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, the export of bulk water from Canada to the U.S. would in fact enshrine Canada's obligation to maintain such exports even in the event of domestic water shortages.

They are petitioning and urging the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit fresh water diversions into the U.S. and to state categorically that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, I also have a number of petitions from British Columbia residents with respect to the funding of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

These petitioners are urging the government to consider the restoration of full and proper funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the heartbeat of Canada. They are asking the government's priorities in terms of decreased funding for Canadian institutions be reconsidered.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, on this White Ribbon Day, I have a petition on behalf of the parents of Nina de Villiers who want to draw to the attention of this House and this Parliament the fact that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society and the need to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

These parents are now in the other place talking about the gun control bill. They wish the attention of the House to be brought to these petitions.

UKRAINE

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, on August 24, 1991 the Ukrainian Parliament declared Ukrainian independence and the creation of an independent and democratic state of Ukraine. On December 2, they reaffirmed that declaration.

Over one million Canadians of Ukrainian descent have for a century sustained their ideals in freedom and democracy for an independent homeland.

Tthe Governments of Canada and Ukraine signed an historic declaration on relations between Canada and Ukraine on September 22, 1991 to develop and strengthen contact in the spheres of politics, the economy, science, technology, education, sports and other areas.

Therefore, the Ukrainian Canadian community calls on the government to not only officially establish relations with Ukraine but also to help Ukraine at the United Nations gain full recognition.

On that, congratulations have to go to the Ukrainian Information Bureau for its excellent work on this issue.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if, perhaps, the question has already been answered. I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could give us an update with regard to Question No. 138. He has been asked on several occasions to provide the House with an update.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say to the hon. member that I have not made quite as much progress as I had made the last time I talked to him about this question. We are now down to four departments or agencies that are outstanding. I hope we can clear that up very quickly and get that answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, perhaps, since the parliamentary secretary has been so co–operative in trying to expedite this particular matter, he could give an undertaking to the House that he will attempt to obtain the answer to the question before the week is out.

If there should be some substantive reason as to why that answer cannot be forthcoming, such as an act of God or whatever that may be, perhaps he would be so kind as to give us an undertaking that the information he does have at his disposal could be made available to the member who has asked the question and thereafter the four remaining departments which obviously would submit the information to the parliamentary secretary could then submit the information to the House and to the hon. member. I think that would be in the spirit of generosity, and since we are approaching Christmas, I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary could give us that undertaking.

• (1530)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, my friend makes a very interesting suggestion. I have to admit that there is a reluctance on this side of the House to partially answer questions. We like as much as possible to give a complete and thorough answer.

I can assure the hon. member that I will indeed try to find out what the problem is in these four outstanding departments or agencies. I will indeed try to have an answer for him by the end of the week.

I would certainly hope that we would be able to answer it at the very least before the House rises December 13.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the third time and passed; and the amendment of Mr. Walker (p. 5662).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind hon. members that there is a 10-minute maximum on speeches, without questions or comments.

[English]

Yesterday the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke got the unanimous consent of the House to have the floor for 20 minutes. The hon. member has 16 minutes left.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-20 is an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in this House on February 26, 1991. Bill C-20 was introduced to implement four particular or special initiatives outlined in the February 1991 federal budget.

One of the most important changes would provide amendments to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act and extend the cap on Established Programs Financing transfers to the provinces. What that actually means is that transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces will not increase, not even to pay the rate of inflation or the additional costs of those programs to the provinces.

The provinces are going to have to come up with the additional money to cover inflationary increases and the other increased costs related to post-secondary education and health care. That has some very serious consequences for Canadians. It also says that the federal government is walking away from its responsibility.

Another proposed amendment would dramatically increase unemployment insurance payments for both employees and employers.

The other two amendments would provide for the capping of sessional allowances and a continued freeze on tax transfers to the provinces collected from public utilities. So there is another capping by the federal government on those programs.

With Bill C-20 the government hopes to extend the freeze on those Established Programs Financing transfers for an additional three years. Imagine, for another three years, not just this year. Established Programs Financing transfer payments are made to the provinces, as I said, to support health and higher education.

It specifically means that in those two areas the provinces are going to have to come up with greater sums of money to cover the natural increases that they have to pay in administering post-secondary education and medicare even to the extent of covering the inflation rate itself. We can see where the government is going here.

How can the provinces cope? As I said yesterday, they can either cope by increasing taxation or simply cutting back on the services. The government is saying: "If you cut back on services, provinces, we are going to punish you". I will get around in a moment to how that is going to take place.

We know what effect this is going to have on John Q. Public in Canada. As I said, to ensure the adherence to the standards of the Canada Health Act, the government has included a provision in this bill whereby it could withhold, reduce or deduct either money from the cash portion of the transfers or from any other transfer payments made to the provinces, not just for post-secondary education and health services. Any other services to the provinces can be deducted if the province does not maintain national standards in medicare.

The federal government is saying to the provinces: "We are not going to pay to maintain the services of medicare nationally across this country. We are going to make you, the provinces, pay for it". We know that some provinces will not be able to afford to do this.

The constitutionality of this clause, providing for the withholding of other transfers, is being challenged in the courts. A law firm reviewing the bill has suggested the bill would exceed the federal government's authority to intervene in health policy.

Going on, I just want to lay some groundwork. The former Minister of Finance gave notice in his February 19, 1991 budget that the freeze on these program entitlements announced in the 1990 budget for 1990-91 and 1991-92 would be extended to 1994-95, that is the next three years. At that time the finance minister said—and listen to this very carefully; this has been said before, but it bears repeating and repeating—"I recognize that limiting the growth of transfers under Established Programs Financing raises concerns about the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing national medicare principles under the Canada Health Act". He said that on February 26 at page 18 of his budget speech.

However, he went on to assure Canadians that "the principles of the Canada Health Act will not be compromised". Further to this pledge, the former Minister of Finance stated: "Legislation will be introduced to ensure that the federal government continues to have the means to enforce these national medicare principles". That too was said in the budget speech.

The question has to be asked here: If the federal government does not pay enough money into the national medicare scheme to pull its own weight, how does it have the right to call the tune? That is precisely what is being challenged in the courts.

The Minister of Finance spoke again in February of this year. What he said is contained in clause 23(2) of Bill C-20. The beginning of that particular clause of the bill states, and I will not read all of it because to many people it will be a bunch of gobbledegook, including to myself:

> In this section, "federal payment", in respect of a province, means a payment by Canada to the province under this or any other Act of Parliament or any fiscal arrangement or agreement between Canada and the province, whether enacted or entered into before or after the coming into force of this section.

That is a blanket coverage.

This legislation goes far beyond withholding any transfer fund entitlements as a means of deterring the Canada Health Act violations. Provinces within Bill C-20 have the potential to undermine the full range of federal transfer programs. In order to punish a province that does not comply to the standards laid down by the federal government, which itself is not willing to pay its own way, innocent individuals will suffer. Provincial health care practices will now have a direct bearing on child care, welfare, municipalities, aboriginal people, farmers, students and numerous other individuals and groups that stand to be denied programming that is cost shared by the federal and provincial governments. I included municipalities.

• (1540)

The municipalities across this country are going to be hard hit because of the lack of transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces. The provinces will have to tighten up their expenditures and will probably give less money to the municipalities to help them with their shared cost programs. The whole thing will fall at the feet of John Q. Taxpayer at the local level.

Some people will say: "Well, it is going to rest on his shoulders anyway". However, the fact remains that we have a federal government that should show leadership but it does not want to show that leadership. It is passing the burden on to the provinces and on to the municipalities across this country.

What repercussions on other items could this reduction have? It means that, in accordance with the provisions of Bill C-20, the federal government can penalize provinces that do not maintain its standard of medicare by interfering with a whole host of programs. It can take not only from transfer payments but from other payments going to the provinces.

First, equalization payments alone are estimated to provide $8.4 billion in 1991–92 to provinces without sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation. The federal government could deduct from that if national standards of medicare are not met in individual provinces.

Territorial financing is estimated to provide $1.41 billion for 1991–92 to the territorial governments to enable them to provide the range of public services in the north provided by provincial governments. Can you imagine those programs to the territories being cut? What base of taxation do they have to make up the difference? It is an horrendous piece of legislation that penalizes the regions of Canada, particularly those that are in greatest need.

Grants in lieu of taxes are paid to provincial and municipal governments by the federal government instead of paying taxes on federal and diplomatic property. These grants are estimated at $344 million in 1991–92. They could be deducted.

Public utilities income tax transfer payments represent 95 per cent of the federal income tax collected from certain privately owned public utilities transferred by the federal government to the provinces. This transfer is estimated at $280 million in 1991–92.

Statutory subsidies are the oldest transfer payments and are paid to each province under the terms of Confederation. These subsidies are estimated at $36 million for 1991–92.

The federal government shares the cost of each province's income maintenance and social services programs on a 50/50 basis under the Canada Assistance Act. That is important. The federal contribution for 1991–92 is estimated at $6.4 billion. In this time of recession we can imagine what it means to individual provinces and municipalities if the federal government backs off from paying its full contribution to social welfare at the local level in this country at a time when social welfare is increasing for the municipalities across this country.

The reeve of one municipality informed me that his welfare budget has increased by 2,000 per cent compared to what it is normally.

How can small municipalities cope with the federal government cutting its share of payments to the provinces and the provinces therefore not having enough money? At the same time the provinces have to increase taxes in order to cover post-secondary education and health costs.

What about the crop insurance contribution? In this day when the farmers of this country are going through the most horrendous times they have faced since the early thirties, or possibly in the history of Canada, can you imagine the crop insurance contributions, estimated at $207 million for 1991, possibly being cut because a province is not going to pay the federal share to keep up the cost of post-secondary education and hospital care?

There is also the Young Offenders Act, which I mentioned yesterday. There is a whole host of others but a bill went through third reading in this House last week covering the amendments to the Young Offenders Act in this country.

Under that legislation young offenders while in prison will have to receive medical treatment to assess when it is safe for them to be back out on the street. The big question in the minds of Canadians today is: Why are people who then cause other problems released prematurely? We need the medical services in those prisons to assess when it is safe for an individual to go out on the street.

The federal government is passing legislation that says to Canadians that it is going to make their streets safe and at the same time it is not providing the money to administer the program itself. That is passing the buck and it shows the lack of a responsible attitude by the national government of this country.

We know that the government is increasing the Unemployment Insurance Act by 24.4 per cent.

You are giving me the high sign, Mr. Speaker. I will abide by your ruling with one minute to go.

As I have said before in this House, the federal Government of Canada was given the responsibility for the unemployed in this nation in 1940 as an amendment to the BNA Act. That was a result of the Rowell-Sirois commission report of 1937, which was the most in-depth study into poverty, economic conditions, and taxation jurisdictions between the federal and provincial governments ever made in Canadian history.

Today this government is increasing unemployment insurance rates by 24.4 per cent but it is not paying for it. It is placing the responsibility of paying for the entire program on the employer and the employee. That is not just passing the buck. That is neglecting your constitutional responsibility as the Government of Canada.

It was introduced to help those municipalities, to help those poor areas of Canada. Now this federal government is passing the buck to them and making them pay. Before this is over we must have another in-depth investigation into the tax sharing policies of this nation because the provinces and the municipalities are being put to the wall and they cannot afford it. It is up to the national government in Ottawa to show leadership on this and ensure that the transfer of taxes is carried on so that these programs are funded. Otherwise we should not have the audacity to pass the legislation in this House of Commons.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I understand that I only have 10 minutes at this point in time in the debate.

This particular bill has numerous difficulties for the constituents I represent in this Chamber. I want to outline some of those concerns.

The bill which was laid before the House some time ago is a result of trying to implement the February 1991 budget. There are a number of things this bill intends to do.

The first intention is to make amendments to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, the Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, and to extend the cap on the Established Programs Financing transfers to the provinces.

Post-secondary education is of fundamental importance to a society which wishes and hopes to be internationally competitive. Many of our young people from coast to coast wish to pursue their post-secondary studies not only so that they will be qualified and their skills be enhanced but also to give them an opportunity to make a meaningful contribution to Canadian society.

The unfortunate part of this particular bill is that the transfer payment cutbacks and the capping on various payments to certain provinces have provided some very serious hardships for our students across this country. So much so that in my own constituency, in my own university, the University College of Cape Breton, students have been told by this government that any student loan they receive has 3 per cent on the front end taken from that loan.

I think I have indicated before that this amount of money to the casual observer does not look like an extensive amount of money. However, if you are taking 3 per cent of $3,000 it is rather sizeable in terms of what students can purchase with that money, whether it is supplies for their particular class, transportation to and from the university or transportation from the university to their own homes if they should happen to live outside that particular province or that particular area. It is a tax on young people who are trying to acquire a post-secondary education.

It is somewhat hypocritical of the government to say that on the one hand it wants to have meaningful consultations concerning competitiveness, as it said in the prosperity document tabled by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Students really are—and I do not wish to flatter their egos unduly but the fact remains—our best hope. Young people are our best hope for the future in terms of what they can do to improve Canadian society. I think that Bill C-20 acts to impede the progress of students and of young people, particularly as it relates to post-secondary education.

The government will say, and say quite rightly: "Well, we are still giving an increase in the amount of money going to universities". However, what if you were anticipating a certain level of increase and guaranteed that particular increase and then someone came along and said: "I am sorry, it is going to have to be x minus y, that is what you're going to get"? That throws budgets of provincial governments off and certainly has a negative effect on the administration of universities, whether in terms of providing research moneys for professors, providing facilities to needy students, or the actual fact that some individuals will have to lose their jobs as a result. There is only so much money in the pot.

Education is one thing and post-secondary education is very, very important. However, Bill C-20 goes on to talk about health in the respective provinces. There is a certain pot of money made available to provincial governments in have not provinces such as Nova Scotia to carry on and implement the principles of the Canada Health Act. Any time money is taken out of that pot, it directly affects the prospects of the health care system.

What do I mean? I mean that there will probably be less money for research. However, if there is not to be less money for research and health care they will steal it somewhere else. Sometimes it is felt not by the medical doctors but by people such as the janitor who works in the hospital. I know many janitors who work in hospitals, whether in Glace Bay, New Waterford in my constituency, Sydney or Sydney River. They are the ones who will feel the effects because lay-offs will have to occur and overtime will be curbed. They are the ones on the health care scale who will, in effect, be cheated as a result of Bill C-20. I do not think any of us in this Chamber can overlook the fact that these cutbacks, as announced by the government through Bill C-20 and its February budget of 1991, will have traumatic effects on what Canadians believe is the most important social program ever put in place.

I have tremendous difficulty with the attempt of members opposite to erode the fundamentals of medicare. I know government members will say they are not doing that. They say there is no way they are not eroding the fundamentals of medicare. But remember the pie and all the services in the pie. When you shrink the pie, something has to happen to research or the maintenance provided in the various hospitals. That is what happens.

Bill C-20 also goes on about unemployment insurance premiums. In the few minutes I have left, I want to tell the Chair that I have never seen such hypocrisy by a government, as demonstrated in Bill C-20, as it affects the UIC premiums.

Let us not forget that the hon. member for St. John's West, in the last federal election, stated on national television that there would be no changes to the unemployment insurance program in this country. Now, under the auspices of Bill C-20, we have an increase in UIC premiums of 24.4 per cent.

Some commitment, some promise by members opposite. It will affect the average working Canadian and the average employer in the various small businesses across this country. Some of them do not have huge profits like General Motors or some of the major corporations in this country to pay this additional tax. Some of them are operating from week to week, from month to month. It is the individual who runs the dry cleaning store, the pizza shop or drug store who is going to feel the negative effects of the increase in the UIC premiums. It is so unfair. It is hypocrisy at its worst. The Minister of Finance, when I questioned him, would not be candid enough to indicate there would be no increases in 1992. Now we are going to have more of an increase, not just 24 per cent but more than that.

In conclusion, I thank you for the opportunity to make this intervention. I hope hon. members opposite will see their way to vote down the provisions of Bill C-20, which is a Draconian piece of legislation. I am sure the hon. minister would want to agree with me, only for the provisions of cabinet solidarity.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time I have for my remarks today, I would first of all like to refer to Bill C-20 and what it means to the provinces of Canada, the people within the province of British Columbia, my home province, and my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Bill C-20 is a continuation of Bill C-69 which was so drastic in its cutbacks to post-secondary education and health care delivery to Canada and the provinces, but in particular to the province of British Columbia.

• (1600)

This particular bill continues until fiscal year 1994-95 the cutbacks to the Established Programs Financing, those transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education and health care within those provinces.

Over that period of time, as I understand it, the cuts amount to almost $9.5 billion. They will cost the province of British Columbia over that period of time almost $1.2 billion.

That money has to come from somewhere. We either cut back on our programs, or we have to increase taxes within our separate provinces or municipalities.

I have heard through letters from my constituents and discussions with other members from all sides of the House that this particular bill, the continuation of Bill C-69 and Bill C-20, is the commencement of the death of medicare as we know it.

Certainly members on the other side of the House may say that we are being alarmist and are trying to scare people. I think it is about time the people of Canada realized they have to wake up and ensure that this government is not elected again.

It has continued on the path it has taken over the last years since it was first elected in 1984. Now we see the erosion of our education programs, our health care system and life as we know it in Canada. I think we have to become somewhat alarmed. We have to start speaking out.

In the last poll I saw, only 16 per cent of the people of Canada believe this government is doing a good job and would vote for it again. I predict that will carry over into the next election, whether it be in 1992 or 1993, and this government will get its come-uppance.

The people of Canada will not stand for the continued erosion and attack on these programs. My parents and their parents fought for them over the years and the young people of Canada take them for granted as part of what makes up Canada.

The riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has triple the percentage of senior's population as does the rest of Canada. Almost 33 per cent of the residents of Okanagan—Similkameen, certain areas in the Okanagan Valley and to some extent the boundary country and Similkameen Valley, are over 65 years of age.

If you look at the retirement population, that figure jumps to almost 50 per cent of the population.

How does this bill, the cutbacks in the transfer payments and Established Programs Financing in the area of health care alone, affect my area? It is devastating. This bill in its substance is looked on by the people of my riding and myself as a Draconian measure. It can only continue to hurt those who need to be assisted the most such as those with lower and middle incomes, and those on fixed incomes such as the seniors in my area.

I am alarmed. I am very upset at the prospect that the people in my riding, in British Columbia and across Canada are going to be so devastated by the terms and direction this bill is taking Canada and our health care system.

I have heard many problems from people coming to me over the last six months to a year. In one case a woman in Oliver, British Columbia said her husband has been on a medical waiting list to have a necessary knee operation, but he cannot get into the hospital because of the cutbacks in the care. He is not a priority and yet this gentleman is crippled. He is unable to work. They have an orchard, and his wife must do the orchard work. They are not a young couple, yet they are being penalized by the terms and conditions set out by this government with the cutbacks in the health care systems.

I would also like to talk about the cutbacks in post-secondary education. In my riding there are three colleges: Selkirk College, of which I am an alumnus; Okanagan College, which is central to the Okanagan Valley; and Caribou College which goes into the Merritt region.

Those areas are directly affected. As the cost of post-secondary education increases, it becomes increasingly more difficult for the average Canadian, the average wage earner, to assist their children, daughters and sons, to go on to university. Universities and colleges are forced to increase fees substantially. The costs of books, room and board and transportation continue to rise under the policies of this government.

We try to encourage our young people to get their education in our region where it is slightly cheaper. Yet by doing this, we are forcing those young people out of post-secondary education and into the job market.

Unfortunately, because of the policies of this government, there have also been cutbacks in the Canada Assistance Plan and cutbacks are probable in the area of welfare.

In order to get unemployment insurance, the students have to work longer periods of time. Because their qualification period is longer, their benefit period has been shortened. It is difficult to get jobs in areas like the Okanagan, where the rate of unemployment is substantially higher than the national average. In Merritt, for instance, in the last couple of years the rate of unemployment has increased to something like 34 per cent. I just heard this week that one of the major employers in the city of Merritt, one of the major sawmills, has laid off a number of employees. They could be laid off from one month to four months or perhaps longer.

They lay the blame on the fiscal and monetary policies of this government—the GST and the problems that it has caused. They lay the blame on the differences in the extra taxation through unemployment insurance premiums. They blame this government for the fiscal policies of the high dollar rate and the high interest rates. It was predicted two years ago in GST pre-hearings that we would be in a major recession now and there would be cause for concern because of the implementation of the GST, particularly in January 1991.

Unfortunately those predictions are coming true. If we predict further, through the implementation of this bill, we will have more of our young people on the unemployment and welfare rolls. We will have fewer and fewer of our regular, ordinary Canadians able to educate and improve themselves. We will have less and less money for research and development. There will be fewer opportunities for these young people to get reasonable jobs in their future.

Am I being an alarmist? Yes, I am, because I think the people of this House of Commons, the people on the other side of the House, have to wake up to the fact that we can no longer continue with these monetary and fiscal policies as set out by this government. We have to create jobs. We have to ensure that our older people have the proper health care into their golden years and our young people have the opportunity to go to university. Then they will have adequate jobs and money to ensure they can bring up families in an environment that is conducive to happy and healthy living.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, before this Bill C-20 gets rammed through by a Tory majority that must have its head in the sand, there are a few things that need to be said. I see the gentleman for Fraser Valley East is at least sputtering. He will probably get some sand in his mouth as he does it but as least he is conscious. He is with us and that is to his credit and our surprise.

Let us understand what all the fine words mean here on paper, what this bill is going to do. Let us take the words of some other people rather than me because I see the minister of multiculturalism looking at me with a jaundiced eye and he suspects I am about to say some partisan things.

I will indulge him today and instead talk to him on behalf of organizations that have been set up to advise the government. He will have heard, for example, of the National Council of Welfare, one of the bodies whose function it is to advise the government in these matters. Here is what it has to say about the import, the substance of this bill. I see the minister nodding as though he knows what the National Council of Welfare has said. Oh, that he would have heeded what it had said because it is a federal advisory board and he should sometimes take advice of people in the know.

It said that Canada's medicare system will die and federal cash for post-secondary education will dry up by the end of the century unless Ottawa stops its pattern of slashing transfer funds to provinces for health and universities.

The same organization goes on to say, and this is the fear of the National Council of Welfare, that national standards will disappear because the poorer provinces will be unable to provide adequate health services.

There is only one unfortunate turn of phrase in that entire quotation. They talk about poorer provinces. With pride, I happen to represent people from the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. We have never subscribed to the notion that we are a poorer province. We are a province with less cash flow than some of the other provinces but do not ever characterize us as a poorer province in terms of the resources that we contribute, not only in terms of our contribution to the Gross Domestic Product but in terms of our people resources.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that there are more native born Newfoundlanders living outside Newfoundland than there are living in Newfoundland. So we are enriching the country all over from Fort McMurray, I say to my friend from Cochrane—Superior who must have the good fortune to have some Newfoundlanders up in his own riding. He nods yes.

All over this country, there are people from Newfoundland in Haldimand—Norfolk and in the riding of my good friend from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. All over this great country there are people who have come from Newfoundland and Labrador to make those other parts of Canada richer. I just wanted to get that off my chest, Mr. Speaker, but I know the National Council of Welfare meant no offence when it used the term "poorer provinces". I understand, and you understand what it meant.

Its meaning here is that national standards will disappear because provinces are less able on their own to finance the cost of medicare or post-secondary education. In the case of those provinces—and I guess that is what it meant by the term "poorer"—the national standards will disappear because of the inability of provinces such as Newfoundland and Labrador and other provinces, not poorer but not as flush in cash as some provinces like Ontario or British Columbia and Alberta.

If the minister is not thoroughly convinced to our point of view, maybe he would like to hear from one other reputable national organization, the Canadian Council on Social Development which maintains that these measures and this bill will effectively—here are the organization's words—strip the country of its social infrastructure at a time it is most needed for both constitutional and economic reasons.

These are two reputable national organizations which monitor these matters, which are far more informed in these matters than you and I are because they make it their business to be on top of what the impact of this bill will be.

I take their advice. I take their concerns seriously. If the National Council of Welfare or the Canadian Council on Social Development did not exist, I will tell you what does exist at all times, and you could think of parallels in your own riding. I will tell you whether or not these councils exist or are there to tell us the pitfalls of this bill. There are the people in Grand Beach. Yes, I have a Grand Bank, but I also have a community called Grand Beach. The people there are the best advisory council I have in terms of what this bill will do to transfer payments, post-secondary education, access to medicare and the unemployment insurance system, which I will come to in a moment.

The people in Grand Beach, Monkstown, Cape Anguille, Petits, Sheaves Cove, Codroy, Burgeo, Fortune, and the other communities which make up the 158 communities in the riding, know first-hand how it limits the access of their young men and women to get a university education. They know how it limits their grandmothers, aunts and in-laws when it comes to elective surgery because of the cutbacks in medicare being triggered by this bill and its predecessor bills.

Yes, its predecessor bills, because as you are aware, this is not the first time the Minister of Finance and his successor, the former Minister of Finance the now minister of trade, with the blessing of the gentleman from Baie Comeau, the Prime Minister, have put the axe to social programs. It is not the first time they have reneged on commitments in terms of maintaining our infrastructure, our social net, our medicare and our post-secondary education. They started it in 1985.

I cannot quote the figures for all of the country. For my own province alone, in those 11 fiscal years from 1985 through to 1995-96 which this bill covers, it will cost the treasury of Newfoundland an aggregate total of $845 million on Established Programs Financing alone for health services and post-secondary education. Newfoundland is a small province of just 580,000 souls and that is $845 million that it will not have to spend on post-secondary education or health services.

I see my time is nearing an end. I thank you for the signal. Let me just say a word in conclusion on the matter of unemployment insurance premiums.

If the crowd over there ever has the guts, as we say back home, to face the electorate one more time, I suspect they will all want to run and find alternate forms of work. I am sure that is what the gentleman from Fraser Valley East will do. He does not look to be suicidal and probably will not even run but if the government members ever have the gumption to face the electorate one more time, the electorate's litmus test for this crowd will be: Have they put their money where their mouth is?

When the government wanted to ram through changes on Bill C-21, it undertook not to tamper with the basic unemployment insurance program and not to increase premiums in rough economic times. Is there anybody over there who has not heard about the rough economic times? Do you know that this bill would increase premiums by 25 per cent, and this is only the first kick. The government has already indicated it is going to go for another 7.5 per cent as soon as it gets this one rammed through.

The public of Canada is absolutely fed up with this crowd talking all the time out of both sides of its mouth. It says with one mouth what it is going to do, what it promises to do, and then proceeds to do the exact opposite.

I do not expect my friend from Fraser Valley to be excited about this, although he seems to be. I do not expect him to agree with it. I ask him if he will be honest and get up—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has expired.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend from Burin—St. George's. He launched into the stern end of his speech, as we would say, on a subject that I had not planned to speak on. Since he was cut off, and rightly so of course, I want to elaborate on his emotion and his concern with the unemployment insurance aspect of what this bill stands for. Just to refresh our minds, one of the things Bill C-20 will do is increase unemployment insurance payments for both the employers and the employees.

• (1620)

We have to go back and check the history of unemployment insurance. I do not want to go back to 1940 when the Liberals introduced this as a safety net for Canadians who would be out of work. I want to go back four years. At that time unemployment insurance worked this way: the government paid 26 per cent, the employee paid 31 per cent and the employer paid 40 per cent more than the employee and that worked out to 43 per cent.

A few weeks before the election was called I recall that the Prime Minister and hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, in response to concern that the UIC business would be changed because of the level playing field and the free trade agreement, categorically denied that it would be changed, leaving no room for concern, leaving no room for doubt.

People were telling me: "Look, did you hear what these people say? Don't go around being a fear-monger and creating doubt in people's minds". I had some doubt myself on this occasion, but six months later the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration introduced measures that eventually led to Bill C-21. Then all my doubts were certainly removed that the level playing field was about to be launched.

One week before the general election—and this is factual—the government cut UI payments by 17 per cent and raised benefits by 7 per cent, denying that the timing of this had anything to do with the impending federal vote. Weekly earnings dropped from $2.35 for each $100 of insurable earnings down to $1.95 the week before the election. Six months after the election Bill C-21 was introduced which took the government entirely out of the unemployment insurance business.

In other words, it has contributed 26 per cent to look after the administration of the fund and to make sure that the money was always there to pay and that people would not have to have their premiums raised. It got out of the whole business. The government does not now contribute.

What has happened? As a result the 1989 budget, not long after the election, increased the employee premiums back to where they were, by about a 10-cent difference back to $2.25 for the employee for $100 of insurable earnings. I will just stick with the employee because the employer went up accordingly. Consistent with the provision of the labour force development strategy which later became Bill C-21, the budget iterated—this is the budget of 1989—that the government would now not contribute to the plan.

In the next budget that concerned unemployment insurance, the budget we are discussing here today, Bill C-20, The Budget Papers—and I just read them—stated in part: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums".

If the times have been harder economically to the people I represent—and I know a lot of people are represented on this side of the House—I do not know when they could be any worse. The government is going back on its word. It has raised them from $2.25 to $2.80. Now they are going to be raised again.

Even before the budget is approved and formal approval is given for something that happened on July 1 that is raising the UIC rates by 24 per cent, and even as we debate it in the House today, on January 1 it is going to be raised another 7.1 per cent.

I am not sure how we could look at that as any kind of a promise that was kept. In fact I think it is the reverse. It is a promise that has been broken on three separate occasions. It is broken by the trust that if times are rough you will not have to pay the premium. That is exactly what it said.

What does this mean? The latest one, which we are not discussing today and which we will have to discuss some other time, means a tax increase of $204 a year for somebody earning $40,000. For the average person in my riding it is going to cost them between $60 and $95 a year. Mr. Speaker, you may say that is not very much. It is a lot when you do not have the money.

I do not know where we are heading with this, quite frankly. I have spoken on the dreadful effect, not that it is going to have but that it already has on health care. I have a lot of seniors in my riding. They have enough to worry about. This is a concern that has gone through every one of the almost 70 seniors homes in my riding. In the last year I have visited them all.

Turning to post-secondary education, most of us have spoken to students in schools. We see them on a regular basis. I write to them and get a lot of letters from them. They are concerned about the apparent lack of financing that is going to take place when this bill is passed.

I do not live in a dream world. I hope that very few of us do in this House. I know that money does not grow on trees. I know that the country is in trouble. We are broke. The Conservatives have been trying to pull us out of this deficit. I am not going to mention with substance that they blame it on the Liberals, but they do and that is unfortunate. After seven years in power I think it is going to be very difficult to blame another government in power seven years ago.

It is like taking over a ship and after a year you have been captain running it aground and you blame it on the previous skipper because he did not have the engine set up properly. Nobody would believe that and nobody believes the Tories when they say that we are responsible for the debt doubling by two and a half times, at least.

Those three concerns are the ones that concern me the most. The money can be found in other places. There is enough flexibility. We know how the government finances its expenditures. It can be found in some other discretionary funding. Perhaps they will have to nickel and dime it. I am not a nickel and dime person, quite frankly. I do not like doing it because it is symptomatic of other problems. Time does not permit me to get into that.

It is these three areas. Unemployment insurance has increased 54 per cent since this government came to power in 1988. That is double. There is the eventual removal of our medicare system. We have just started the first chip at the block. It is going to be chipped away. I pointed out to the House yesterday that if things keep going the way they are by the year 2000 there will not be any money left for medicare. The third one is cutting off our nose to spite our face by reducing the funding to the provinces for post-secondary education. It may in the short term save us money, but in the long term it is going to make us less competitive and put us in a position where it is going to be more difficult to prevent us from sleep walking into extinction.

I believe that is what is happening right now. I do not like it. I am concerned about it. I hope the expressions of my concern are not seen as just a partisan belief or a chance at government bashing. If I have established any reputation I think it is one for not so doing.

I do not like what is happening in this bill. I know my colleagues do not like it. I hope that there will still be some chance for a reprieve. We are through report stage. I appreciate that, but certainly when this bill comes up for passage in the near future I can assure you that it will not get my vote. I do not think we are doing the proper things to keep the country on an even keel and to look after the poorer people, the common man and the common woman. We are giving them another tax on top of the GST and 30 other taxes. I believe there has to be an alternative.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is kind of routine to rise in this House and say something to the effect that it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C-20. However it is not. I am tired of having to speak to bills like Bills C-96, C-69 and now C-20. It is really quite bizarre, if not hypocritical, that I left a meeting of the committee on industry, science and technology where the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology is defending the government's prosperity through competitiveness agenda which focuses, as I think you know, on the importance of science and technology and education and training in Canada's economic survival.

• (1630)

After seven years in which this government has continually cut back on training, on education and R and D, suddenly the government has awakened to the fact and wants to awaken the people to the fact that the priorities for future economic development in R and D and education and so on must be seen by them to be a priority in spite of the failure of this government itself to recognize these as priorities.

I really want to focus on the issue of post-secondary education, but let us look at what the government members say in this prosperity agenda. They say that they want to eliminate illiteracy in the country. They want to quadruple the number of trainees produced in industry, but most significantly in the context of this debate they say they want to double the number of scientists, engineers and mathematicians that our university system produces.

Yet this is a government that has followed in the trail of the Liberals in producing legislation that has been subject to debate in this House, covered in Bill C-96 and Bill C-69 and now Bill C-20, which will lead to an accumulated cut of $9 billion to the post-secondary education system.

As I said they were not pioneers in the field. We will recall the changes made by the Liberal governments between 1977 and 1984 which themselves led to a bleeding from the post-secondary education system of $5.7 billion.

As we are now trying to address the whole question of how Canada's international competitiveness can be improved, we are left with the legacy of the previous government and the actions of this government continued in Bill C-20. The effect already has been catastrophic. Yet they have nerve enough to go round this country talking to people, trying to convince people that they should understand the significance of training and education, when this government utterly failed to act in respect to education in spite of its great importance.

The impact has been tremendously severe. It has affected accessibility. It has affected quality. It has affected costs as these costs have had to be picked up by students and faculty in the various provincial post-secondary educational systems.

Let us look at the example of Newfoundland where its single university, Memorial University, has had to cut its budget as a result of this government's actions by $10 million. It has increased tuition by 5 per cent and it has cut 100 employees.

Along with what this government has done with the challenge program and the student loans program, we have a situation at the University of Alberta where the tuition for the last two years has increased by 35 per cent. They now have there food banks for graduate students. This is because of the failure of this government to recognize that even in the context of a deficit there are spending choices that can and must be made. One of the priorities that should have been recognized by this government was expenditure in order to improve the capacity of our people to bring their knowledge, their training and their skills to the economy to make Canada more prosperous, because its people were more capable of exercising their talents.

The deficit has been used as the excuse when in fact the deficit is a function and a reflection of the deteriorating economy of this country and the failure of this government and previous governments to recognize what must be done to ensure that we have products we could sell to other nations and to our own people in competition with what is imported into our country.

Bill C-20 is another example of failure. It is an example of hypocrisy. Even now as we are moving to cut financing of post-secondary education, we have the minister down the hall saying that Canadians must recognize the priorities that this government and people must have if we are to become competitive. It will cut $9 billion from post-secondary education.

What the minister said and what this government has been doing for the last seven years is unparalled in the history of Canada. I do not know whether it is unparalled in the strict sense. It is unparalled in its failure to have actions match words. It is unparalled in the destruction that has already been brought to bear on this country's capacity to survive economically and indeed politically.

Bill C-20 is another sign that this government does not know what it is doing. It will never learn and should be cast out of office.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity today to discuss the effect Bill C-20 has on one aspect only. That is the health care system of Canada.

Much of what I intend to say I have borrowed from very succinct and very well researched articles by Carol Goar of The Toronto Star. I certainly recommend this series of articles to my friends across the aisle. particularly to the minister of health. They are well research and very informative articles.

I have listened to the debates on the issue carefully and must confess that I am dismayed at what I have been hearing. I am particularly upset with this government for being so short-sighted in its approach in failing to provide the leadership to ensure that we retain an effective public health care system for all Canadians.

It seems to equate effective public health with dollars. What we have heard is if this government loosened the purse strings or gave the provinces what they wanted, our health care system would be automatically fixed. We all know that this is simply not correct.

Even if all financial constraints were lifted today, our health care system in Canada would still be in some difficulty.

We have just celebrated the 30th birthday of Canada's health care system. It is one of the best in the world. Canadians do not have to face the prospects of financial ruin should they get sick. Being poor in Canada does not deny you from being treated by a doctor or being admitted to any hospital. We can all be proud of the rigid standard of care to which most health professionals are committed.

In the last 30 years, provincially and federally, with a constantly expanding economy, governments mostly did not question the growth of the cost of the medical care system. Today we find this experience of the last 30 years can no longer continue. This government and every province are faced with increasing deficits. The deficit of this government continues to be in the neighbourhood of $30 billion. Our national debt now far exceeds $400 billion.

Thirty-seven cents of every tax dollar collected in Canada today does not pay for one doctor's visit, does not pay for one medical procedure; 37 cents does not pay for one drug administered, does not pay for one hour of nursing care or does not pay for the use of one hospital bed. Out of every dollar collected, 37 cents goes to pay the interest on the national debt. That means we have 63 cents remaining to administer to the affairs of this total country. Health care, as we all know, takes a substantial amount of the balance.

What I am trying to get at is what we have to do and what this government must do to try and find a new way. That is where this government has failed. We must begin to restructure our health care system and this again is where this government has failed. We must develop a comprehensive national strategy and again this government has failed to do that.

A government cannot unilaterally cut health care costs in this country, as it is trying to do with the legislation that is before this House today. A federal government must take the lead with its counterparts in the provinces and the municipalities to bring into line and to bring into focus the competing bureaucracies, federally, provincially and municipally, all that are involved in the health care system.

A good federal government must take the lead to define what a health care system truly is. Remove those social programs that have become a financial albatross around the necks of the health delivery system and we should take health related matters right out of the health budget so that we can truly define what it is.

A good federal government must take the lead to be rigorous in assessment, to prove the value of new technologies, to prove the value of expensive drugs and other costly health procedures.

A federal government must take the lead to monitor carefully treatments that may be done in homes of Canadians or clinics rather than the use of expensive hospital beds.

A federal government must take the lead to establish systems that monitor Canadians who have preventable diseases so that they can find out what these diseases are. They can no longer be ignored until they reach the expensive crisis stage for treatment.

A federal government must take the lead to monitor national services in each community so that there are no longer any expensive duplications in the delivery of health services. Long-term joint planning is an absolute necessity.

A good federal government must take the lead to make the moral and ethical decisions as to what will be allowed by way of delivery of health care to all of our citizens.

A federal government must take the lead to advise all Canadians that user fees will not be tolerated anywhere in Canada. In this way, assure all Canadians, especially seniors and the poor, those less fortunate, that they should never have to worry about the extra costs associated with ill health.

A federal government must take the lead to renew the health system from within, using those invaluable human resources we already have within our health care system.

A federal government must lead the way in all these important areas, working in close co-operation with the provinces and the municipalities, all which are already involved in the very important health care field. We need a government that is willing to make difficult decisions necessary to bring discipline to the system of the delivery of health care in Canada. Only then, only once we have made those strong and bold decisions, can we retain our health care system. We can then not only retain our health care system but strengthen it and make it stronger than it is today for ourselves and for all future Canadians.

A Liberal government is committed to the principles I have set out in this short essay. The cutting of transfer payments is not the way to do it and this government should be embarrassed for thinking that it is.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to engage in debate at this stage of this bill. My hon. colleague opposite has spoken quite eloquently in consideration of the provisions that are put forward.

We in the Liberal Party are extremely concerned about the erosion of federal transfers to the provinces in this country. We are extremely concerned that the government is seriously affecting the ability of provinces right across this nation to be able to provide services of national standard no matter what the wealth position of the particular province is on a given day, or a given month, or a given year. We are very concerned that the government through its actions and through some of it own fiscal mismanagement has transferred the burden of its debt down to the poorest of the poor.

The problem that we have is that at some point freezes, cuts, and holdbacks from programs always have the effect of hurting the people that least can afford to bear the burden of that hurt. One of the big concerns we do have is the effect of the cuts to Established Programs Financing. The cuts to Established Programs Financing in this country have been absolutely awesome over the last few years.

The government has initiated a freeze on transfers to the provinces under EPF. The government at the same point in time will indicate that it is fulfilling its commitment under the Constitution Act to provide for equalization payments and to ensure that equalization payments are sufficient to allow every single province in this country to be able to deliver programs of national standards.

The effects on the freezes on EPFs that this government has undertaken have been absolutely dramatic. When we were studying another bill at pre-study, Bill C-22, the Bankruptcy Act, we had a submission put to us by the Canadian Hospital Association. The Canadian Hospital Association presented us with a brief and I indicated to them at that time that the particular brief may not be that appropriate for the bill we were studying at pre-study, Bill C-22, but I certainly knew that it had a great deal of relevancy and that it would be debated and that I wanted to quote it in this particular place.

The erosion of health care, the erosion of the ability of every province to have universities of national standards, the ability of each and every province to be able to deliver health care of national standards has been severely threatened by this government.

If you look at the effect of EPF savings over what was anticipated with the regular growth of EPFs, the dollar amounts are startling. Between 1986 and 1996 the federal government will have saved $29.998 billion. Nearly $30 billion it has cut from the anticipated transfers to the provinces for health care.

That is shameful, Mr. Speaker. This is at the same time, if you look at it, that provinces like Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, or for goodness' sakes provinces like Saskatchewan, have not seen their lot in Confederation get any better. In actual fact, in relative terms, their disparity against the national average economically is getting worse.

Instead of recognizing that the federal government has a responsibility to ensure that transfers to the provinces are sufficient to meet that objective in our Constitution Act, that equalization payments shall occur to ensure the programs of national standards are able to be maintained, what does it do during this period of decline in the poorest of the poor provinces? It cuts back.

It is not as easy as the government would have us believe, that it can walk forward and can say easily: "Well, Nova Scotia, we have cut back on what you expected us to transfer for health care. You will have to make it up somewhere else". "Newfoundland, look we are sorry about this but we cannot give you as much, but you are still supposed to be able to deliver the same standard of health care to your people as was provided by the Government of Ontario, or the Government of Quebec, or the Government of Alberta". Thirty billion dollars cut because of freezes on EPFs.

• (1650)

The health care system in Canada is in peril. Provincial governments who want to ensure that universality of health care is maintained in their jurisdictions have been put against the wall. What are they to do?

In a period of 10 short years the federal government has deprived the provinces of Canada of $30 billion that was to go toward the delivery of health care services. Just a few weeks ago the Conservatives got up on their hind feet, bayed at the moon and said: "We are going to talk about prosperity. We are going to inflict prosperity on the country with new initiatives". Their new boondoggle was to go around and consult Canadians about prosperity.

Anybody who has an ounce of sense in their head knows that the prosperity and competitiveness of any nation is directly linked to the quality and level of education provided to its citizens. When a country decides that it does not have the money to invest in education for its young then five or ten years down the road you will see a decline in the competitiveness of that nation, a decline in the per capita output, and a decline in the quality of life in that country.

The government likes to talk a good deal about inflicting prosperity. That is its latest buzzword. The facts are that the cutbacks this government has undertaken between 1986 and 1996 will see $12.109 billion cut in the transfers to the provinces that allow every province across this country to have affordable post-secondary education of national standard.

This government's 1986 to 1996 program of cutbacks has ensured that education and the dream of a post-secondary education has become a dream that only the wealthy in this country can afford. That is what this government has done.

Nova Scotia is not a rich province but we have a heck of a lot of resolve down there. We have some of the finest universities in Canada, and they have been there for a long time. My colleague from Saskatoon who taught at one of those universities knows that is the case. I think he taught at Saint Mary's University. In the good old days at Saint Mary's University, the students could come and get a small student loan and know they could get a quality education. The tuitions have had to go through the roof.

At Dalhousie University, just down the road from Saint Mary's in Halifax, the students basically had to barge in and occupy the senate building while the administration of the university was trying to figure out how to grapple with rising costs because it is not getting the money from the federal government.

As much as I am concerned about health care, I know that this government will use every single opportunity it can get its hands on to cut those essential transfers to provinces, the lifeblood of many of these provinces, allowing them to maintain programs of national standard.

The government says: "We are concerned about medicare". If it is so concerned about medicare and about whether or not there are going to be user fees in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick it should not come in with punitive legislation that will allow the government to walk in and withhold funds in other areas in which it has already cut back. If the government is truly interested it should not be introducing Draconian legislation like we currently have before us and are debating. If the government is truly concerned about the erosion of health care in Canada it should not seek to penalize those provinces it has driven to the brink as a result of its cutbacks.

The Conservatives should recognize that they are the authors of Canada's misfortune in our health care field, not the provinces. They should remove the freeze on EPF funding that they themselves have imposed. It is that freeze, not the provinces, that has jeopardized the universal medicare program a Liberal government introduced and which has served this country so well.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to say that it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate because it is not.

I feel obligated because what we are discussing here today is yet another characteristic of the present Conservative government and its determination to further erode the fiscal arrangements between the federal Government of Canada and the various provinces.

Bill C-20 is really a bill to transfer debt, not payments, from the federal government to the provincial governments in this country. Then the provincial governments are forced to pass on that debt and that debt burden to the municipalities.

Now, instead of the federal Government of Canada assuming its debt responsibilities here in Ottawa, the buck stops at the council chamber of the various cities, towns and villages across this country.

It is manifestly unfair and dangerous that we should be engaged in this kind of buck passing from the federal level to the provincial and the municipal levels. The people at the municipal level may not be able to understand or conceive of billions of dollars but can certainly understand, conceive of and appreciate cutbacks in the realm of hundreds of thousands of dollars as seen at their level.

First, I would like to point out that we are not curing any of our economic ills, problems and challenges in this country by passing debt from the federal government to the provincial governments, and they in turn to the municipal governments.

Second, it is absolutely disgraceful that a federal government should continue to cut back on the amounts of money it passes on to the provinces for the specific purpose of post-secondary education.

It is a well-known fact that the best universities in our country today are suffering badly from a lack of funding. It is a well-known fact that our libraries, research facilities, teaching capabilities and our learning environments across this country are suffering from a lack of proper funding.

That means that not only are our universities not living up to world-class status but various faculties and departments within universities are losing their world-class status. I am referring to such eminent universities as the University of Toronto, McGill University, Queen's and so on.

This is not a criticism of the academic capability of the teachers and students in those institutions. However, it is a fact that all institutions of higher learning in our country are suffering as a result of a very unwise policy on the part of this federal Conservative government to cut back in that area which we should be pumping more funds into, namely the research and development that industry and commerce will need in this country if we are to survive in this increasingly competitive world.

We have to make certain that more money is pumped into research, not only research and development but in skills, training and basic educational upgrading.

I represent a constituency that has been severely hurt by this recession. Yet when I look at the number of persons drawing unemployment insurance I see that the proportion of those on UI today simply drawing unemployment insurance and not in training or retraining programs is exactly the same as in 1981-82.

It has not changed one iota. We have not improved the retraining and upgrading of skills during this recession compared to 10 years ago in the 1981-82 recession. In other words, this government has not learned anything.

It talks about competitiveness and it talks about globalization, yet it is not prepared to make a concerted effort to improve the funding for research and development on the corporate side or improve the amount of funding going into job skills, job training and basic elementary educational upgrading on the worker side, the so-called adjustment side. This comes at a time when we are suffering not only from a severe recession but from all the strains and stresses brought upon us by the free trade agreement with the United States, which will be made worse if that trade agreement is expanded to include Mexico. That also is an area in which this government has been most unwise and injudicious in its spending practices virtually since 1984, but certainly the last couple of years.

Finally, the issue of medicare has been raised by speaker after speaker on this side. Nobody is getting up on the other side to defend the government's position on cutbacks to the provinces that will adversely affect medicare in this country, but certainly speakers on this side of the House have mentioned it time and time again, today and in previous days during this debate.

The Canadian medicare system is undergoing stress and is having problems, not all of which are financially based but a great proportion is financially based. We fail to understand the vision that brought in medicare, not just the dollars and cents, but the vision behind medicare. Medicare was originally conceived as not just a humanitarian approach to helping the ill and curing the sick but as a concerted, philosophical effort on the part of previous governments to make certain that all Canadian citizens, regardless of income or social position, regardless of what assets they might possess, had equal access to the very best medical treatment this country had to offer.

That is a basic moral and philosophical commitment this government has forgotten. This government is looking at medicare through the eyes of an accountant and an accountant only, not through the eyes of those of us who look upon medicare as one of the foundations of social policy in this country.

When you lose sight of the moral and philosophical aspect of medicare it is very easy to sit back with an accountant's pen and, over a very short period of time, maybe three, four or five years, see medicare disappear as a social medical program. Before we know it we are going to have user fees. We are going to have all kinds of added costs to our medicare system that will eventually return us to the system I recall from the 1950s when if you had money you had the operation but if you did not have the money or asset you could not have the operation.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): I am being accused of spreading scare tactics. That is not the point. The point is that already medicare is beginning to fail. American critics of our public medicare system are using those arguments to fight the more progressive liberal forces in the United States that want a publicly funded medicare system in their country.

When Conservatives across the way accuse us of scare tactics all they have to do is look to the arguments being used in the United States by their fellow conservatives in that country against the medicare system. Their arguments are based on facts that are evolving out of this government's eroding of proper funding for our medicare system.

It is totally unacceptable, and the people of Canada know it, that this government should continue to erode medicare. We are a country that is aging. As the population gets older it is going to become more insecure if people know that they have in power here in Ottawa a government that is no longer morally committed to public medicare in this country.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak again on this bill now that it has been through committee and is back in the House. This is a bill that demonstrates the fundamental approach being taken by the current government to this country which is contrary to our whole history, contrary to the sense of sharing and creating equal opportunities for all Canadians which has been our tradition since its founding.

I want to speak briefly about some of the programs that are going to be seriously damaged by this bill. I want to start with the fundamental principle that I think should apply when we look at programs like education, medicare, unemployment insurance, young offenders services, the general sharing of revenues between the federal and provincial governments and down to the municipal and community life of this country.

The fundamental principle which this government likes to tout and talk about, but seems to have a great deal of trouble actually respecting when it comes to implementing legislation, is the simple statement that our most important resource as a nation is our people. I have heard that often from the government benches.

Every time I see legislation, it is legislation that ignores that principle entirely. Let me touch on some of the principles of this bill that I think do that.

Fundamentally, if we believe that people should have an opportunity to develop the best of their talents and make a contribution to Canada and if we believe in a society where every citizen should have the capacity to develop to the best they can be, we believe in education.

If we believe that we are facing an increasingly global competitive situation that Canada must be part of internationally, then surely we believe in education at the post-secondary level for any citizen who is capable of achieving the standard to achieve a higher education.

What does this bill do? It says that the federal Government of Canada, the government with the responsibility for the ability of this country to compete internationally in a new world where knowledge is going to become at least as and probably more important than resources, is going to cap its contribution to post-secondary education in Canada. That means we are going to continue four more years the cap on the ability to develop and use the talents of all young Canadian people. It means a cap on the ability of people in mid-career who find they have to shift the direction of their career and training. It means stopping their ability to return to university, to be able to adapt to the changing economy and the changing world environment the government is so fond of preaching about.

If we need one concrete example, I need only refer to a statement from the Siemens Corporation, which is hoping to create 3,000 new jobs in Canada in the next short while. The main reason it may decide not to do that is because it is not sure it can get the qualified people. However, this government wants to cap its spending on education.

It wants to put a cap on social services. We have all heard numerous times in this House the statistics about poverty and what poverty ends up costing us if we do not deal with the poverty of children. We know that children living in poverty are four times as likely as the general population to drop out of high school, to never complete high school and therefore never to have the same employment opportunities, the same opportunities to contribute to the Canadian economy, as children who do complete high school and perhaps go on to university.

With this bill the government is ensuring that the ability of Canadian provinces and Canadian communities to deal with the issue of the poverty of one million children in this country is capped. It is capping our ability to deal with the poverty of children who are more likely to be seriously injured, more likely to die, more likely to commit suicide because of poverty.

It is not good for the health of this country that children and families live in poverty. Yet this government is saying: "We are not prepared to share the resources of this nation to solve the problems of poverty and to let young children grow up into adults who can participate and make a full contribution to Canadian society".

At a time when small businesses are experiencing bankruptcies at a highly elevated rate, and I remind the government that small businesses create 80 per cent of the new employment in this country, 80 per cent; at a time when we need employment and we need small businesses to create those jobs, this government is increasing by 24 per cent the unemployment insurance premiums, having said less than two years ago that the unemployment insurance premiums were fixed and would not change for three years.

I hope we will remember that it was only two short years ago that there was a substantial and damaging increase in unemployment insurance premiums. Only two years ago, at the same time that the GST was going to be hitting small businesses, they were also hit with an increase in unemployment insurance premiums, not to mention employees and workers in this country who are paying higher premiums for less coverage. What other provider of services in Canada could get away with that, pay us more but get less?

My final and major concern is about medicare in this country. We have a medicare system that provides health care at 25 per cent less than the cost it is provided in the United States, where it is a private health care system; 25 per cent less. We have a population that is healthier, a population that has more access to affordable health care for 25 per cent more than the cost to the United States, just to the south.

Yet this government wants to cut its transfer payments to support medicare to the point where the federal government will transfer no money to support a national health care system that has given us a strong and healthy population. Not only that, but it introduces a blackmail clause saying that when we are no longer paying out money for medicare to the provinces, we will take back money from services to young offenders, and from official language education at a time when national unity is a major concern. What a ridiculous thing to be even contemplating.

The blackmail clause on medicare is especially insidious, quite likely unconstitutional, and yet this government persists in saying "we will undermine the medicare system for the sake of short-term goals" that are more motivated I believe by politics than by good policy.

A great deal more time would be necessary to speak to all the failures of this bill and all the weaknesses but a diminution of looking after our primary resource, our people, is not a productive and helpful thing to do when our economy is already faltering, when we are far from out of a recession and when what we need to be is more capable, more productive, better educated and healthier.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is not a happy moment for me to have to get up and speak on Bill C-20. This piece of legislation, I feel, is a pretentious omen of things to come from this government.

It is a bad piece of legislation. It has extremely harmful ramifications for Canada's social programs, extremely harmful ramifications for the future of our educational systems in Canada.

It is through the bill the government is signalling its determination to destroy Canadian institutions and essentially a Canadian way of life. The bill is essentially a signal of the beginning of the end for Canada's universal medicare system as we know it today and a slow but inevitable erosion of the federal commitment to our post-secondary education programs across this country.

Health care, post-secondary education, the unemployment insurance program, to name a few, are the victims in this bill, the victims of a Tory corporate agenda, a continued and unrelenting attack on our basic social structure in Canada and a harmonization of a style of government that becomes more and more familiar to us as a pale copy of a market driven system that is present in our neighbour to the south.

The capping of the federal contribution to education through the legislation, capping the Established Programs Financing funding to education, is essentially a betrayal of our young people in Canada, a betrayal of their future. It is forcing students to mortgage their own futures in order to obtain their futures.

At the same time this government continually speaks of the need for international competitiveness, of a trained labour force, and at the same time it is doing that it is chipping away at the very foundation whereupon that competitiveness can be built. Unless we have a highly skilled and highly educated work force, Canada can never hope to be competitive in this global economy. At the same time that it talks about this need for global competitiveness, it erodes the very foundation of our post-secondary education system in Canada. It is getting more and more and more expensive for a student to obtain a post-secondary education in Canada today. It is becoming essentially an opportunity for those who are better off in Canada, but certainly not an opportunity for students who maybe through their own recourse do not have the financial capability of obtaining their education.

The government has claimed that it has to cut back on these programs, on the delivery of health care services to the provinces, on the delivery of funding for post-secondary education. It has to withdraw or cancel its funding from the unemployment insurance program because it claims that the cupboard is bare. That is the message that has been repeated time and time again: "The cupboard is bare". Yet, by the government's own admission, it has suddenly found over $8 billion in unpaid corporate taxes in this country in tax deferments. We see $53 million that the government has squandered on a high-tech on-line communications service through the Ministry of External Affairs to the embassies throughout the world, a service that is redundant before it has even been brought on line, a service that is still not working. There was $53 million squandered on that particular program.

We see a government that has found funding, and legitimate funding I might add, for employment opportunities in Quebec, and yet at the same time sits on its hands when jobs are lost in my home province of British Columbia, completely ignoring the plight of the forestry industry in British Columbia and ignoring the plight of our fishermen on the west coast and in the Atlantic fishery. People wonder about the equity and the fairness when the government claims the cupboard is bare and yet finds these funds and finds the $8 billion that it has simply ignored and refused to collect from corporate Canada which has not paid its fair share of taxes. At the same time it withdraws its support of the unemployment insurance program and forcing the small business community in Canada and workers of Canada to pay a larger and larger share in order to finance the unemployment insurance program. It has been a terrible burden on our small business community in Canada.

I have talked with small business people in my constituency in the Okanagan—Shuswap. Many of those businesses are finding a pretty tough time during the current economic situation. Those extra costs of having to bear that burden of UI, of having to administer the GST are placing many of those businesses in a very, very untenable situation indeed. I want to focus for a few moments on the federal cutbacks to the health care program. The transfer payments to the provinces and the territories through this legislation, the transfer payments which have been frozen over the last few years, are going to be extended for another three years up to 1995 through this Bill C-20.

These preliminary calculations show that this total freeze of some five years on these transfer payments for the established programs is going to result in the loss of some $13 billion to the provinces. Somebody is going to have to pay it or else there is going to be a significant erosion of those programs. It places more of a burden on the provinces and ultimately on the taxpayers in those provinces to fund programs that historically and legitimately should be paid for by this federal government. This breaks down over the five years to a loss of some $9.5 billion for health care services. I would submit that there is no way that the provinces can make up that loss without a significant erosion in the standard of health care.

In British Columbia alone that will amount to a loss of some $1.14 billion to health care in British Columbia. This is a significant loss in funding for a province whose health care systems are already taxed to their fullest, and I would submit right across this country.

This is the consequence of this legislation: the erosion of health care, the erosion of post-secondary education, the erosion of institutions in Canada that have become very much a part of the fabric of this Canadian nationhood. This bill is the signal of the end for those programs. It is a bad piece of legislation and it is a sad day for Canada.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to make some comments on Bill C-20, a bill that has been introduced to implement some of the initiatives of the February 1991 budget.

We have to look at Bill C-20 for what it really is. It is a bill that puts into place the working ability of the government to eliminate federal transfer payments to the provinces. By doing so it will allow the federal government step by step over the years to lose control of our great medicare system for one.

This bill, by the withdrawal of funding in a slow and painful way, undermines the Canada Assistance Plan. It undermines the principle of equalization payments to the different programs. It undermines our medicare system and begins to undermine post-secondary education funding and therefore the system.

This bill, and I think correctly, has been called social policy by stealth because it puts into force a strategy by which the federal government is able to reduce significantly its financial obligations to its own programs, as well as transfers to the provinces, while simultaneously creating a mechanism through which it will be able to maintain influence over provincial medicare programs by means not provided under the Canada Health Act.

The government is saying one thing out of one side of its mouth and doing something else out of the other. It says it supports them and then at the next breath it starts to withdraw from the funding and does it in a very devious manner.

Canada Health Act entitlements, through Established Programs Financing, may be withheld by the federal government as a means of deterring a province from violating the act's requirements for national standards. Therefore the established program funding transfers are gradually reduced and the federal government loses its leverage for enforcing the medicare principles. This is what the Minister of Finance was talking about in the 1991 budget when it was tabled and the freeze on the EPF transfers was extended through to 1994 and 1995.

The Minister of Finance said: "I recognize that limiting the growth of transfers under the Established Programs Financing raises concerns about the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing national medicare principles under the Canada Health Act". I beg to ask this House and Canadians: If that is a sincere concern, why did he go ahead and do it anyway?

What has been done? In short, Bill C-20 will allow the federal government to deduct Canada Health Act penalties from cash payments owing to the provinces under any federal transfer program. This legislation goes way beyond withholding EPF entitlements. Provisions within Bill C-20 have the potential to undermine the full range of federal transfer payments. The government can now turn an individual or a business or a city against a province which has violated the Canada Health Act.

The federal government will be enforcing its policies by punishing innocent people for violations of others. I repeat: social policy by stealth.

What are some of the areas that can be affected? Under Bill C-20 the health care practices of a province will now have a direct impact on any group relying on funding for cost shared programs. The list is long. I will just give you, Mr. Speaker, some of the letters that have already come from my constituents and organizations. This is already coming down through the provinces.

I have a letter from Cathy Mates of the Quinte Literary Council which reads: "I recently received a letter from the Fellow Family Literacy Workers and was greatly disturbed to discover the education, community and social services ministry are considering discontinuing social assistance recipients funding for our programs". She goes on to say that it is because the funding is being cut back by the province.

I have another letter from the executive director of the Quinte Regional Credit Counselling Service, Mr. Richard Bower: "Ontario Ministry of Community and Social Services has chosen to cut completely credit counselling services. I was visited in my office last week by the executive director of the Canadian Mental Health Association, Hastings and Prince Edward branch. The enclosed material will give you a brief outline on how we feel the federal government might play a part in minimizing some of the suffering your constituents are experiencing due to cutbacks in funding". Those discussions went on to say what was happening and that the funding was being withheld from the federal government to the province.

One program can be played off against the other. If a province does not live up to the standards that the federal government sets but does not wish to fund, it can withhold crop insurance funding to farmers. It can withhold funding to programs that deal with disabled persons. It can withhold funds that would find their way into legal aid and compensation programs for victims of crime. The list goes on.

Another impact of this bill is the impact on post-secondary education funding. This very same bill repeals a number of sections and implements a low growth strategy in transfer payments to the provinces.

We all know it is quite conceivable that very soon the tuition fees at universities will probably hit $3,000 a year. The government is forcing higher education out of reach of the average Canadian. It is the average Canadian that we need to educate in this country if this country is to have any hope at all of being competitive on the world market in the next century.

Bill C-20 also announces a 30 per cent premium increase in UI premiums. The government said with the implementation of Bill C-21, the UI bill two years ago, it was withdrawing from the financial obligations to the unemployment insurance fund and that it was implementing a plan which would make the fund self-financing. It assured us that the government would make up any unforeseen shortfalls in especially hard times. That assurance has now been translated into two raises in UI premiums.

An hon. member: It was false.

Mr. Vanclief: Certainly it was false. It did not follow through on its assurances to Canadians and to employers or employees at all. Since that we have had two raises: one at 24 per cent and one at 7 per cent. That is what the employee pays and, as we know, the employer pays 1.4 times that.

In closing I would like to offer some solutions for the government to consider.

• (1730)

The federal government should first continue to play a significant financial role in both health care and post-secondary education. When I say a substantial role, I do not mean to say just talk about it and give it lip service but to follow up; in other words, put its money where its mouth is.

Second, any changes in the financing of health care and higher and higher education should result from federal-provincial negotiations rather than being imposed by Ottawa.

Third, any new arrangement negotiated for financing health care and higher education should focus on federal cash payments and who has the cash to pay for these programs once they are agreed upon.

Fourth, federal funding for health care should be distinct from funding for post-secondary education.

Federal legislation should stipulate that the cash received by a province for health and higher education is spent as intended.

Just in closing, Bill C-20 is a strategy which focuses on the negative aspects of addressing deficit reduction. It is a negative approach to solving a problem. I might suggest that Canadians have enough negative things to think about at the present time.

It is time for us to use the legislation to generate some creative solutions to our problems. Let us look at creating something good and useful in terms of our program development, tax reform and deficit reduction efforts rather than simply shifting burdens over to someone else.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate today in the debate on Bill C-20 at third reading because this bill is a particularly pernicious piece of legislation. I can see that the parliamentary secretary is nervous at the thought. He should be up on his feet opposing this legislation too, and indeed his constituents I am sure urge him to do that. I refer to the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

As my hon. and very capable colleague the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings has just indicated in his speech, there is more than one piece of legislation affected by this bill. In fact, there are two principal areas that I would like to speak on and to criticize the government's proposal as contained in Bill C-20.

The first and most important aspect of the bill is its limitation of transfers to the provinces. This particular set of provisions has been a disaster. We have had massive cuts in the transfers to provinces since this government took office. I suggest that it is frankly a national disgrace. It is causing continual cutbacks in the ability of the provincial governments to deliver programs, particularly health, education and welfare programs for their people. Those are the three that have really been cut.

An hon. member: What about the deficit?

Mr. Milliken: My hon. friend says: "What are we going to do about the deficit?" I will deal with that in a few moments if he will just keep his shirt on.

I say that what we are concerned about are these cuts because provinces are unable to deliver on these programs, particularly the less well-to-do provinces. Ontario is becoming a have not province with the New Democratic Party government. It is running up record deficits that are going to cripple the ability of that government to operate in future when another government is restored to office in that province that is capable of managing the economy as the previous one was.

An hon. member: Liberal.

Mr. Milliken: The previous Liberal government was an extremely good government. I am glad my hon. colleague in the New Democratic Party agrees. The fact is that—

An hon. member: A $2 billion deficit.

Mr. Milliken: Yes. As my hon. colleague says, it was a $2 billion deficit under the Liberal administration in Ontario and, within a year, it grew to $10 billion under the maladministration we are now suffering in that province.

The hon. member I note is from Quebec. I can understand why he is citing these figures, because his colleagues from Ontario in his party do not dare refer to such figures in their comments in this House. They are ashamed and embarrassed by the conduct of the government in Toronto.

However, to go on with what I was saying, the problem with these cuts is that they are crippling the ability of our provincial governments to deliver these important programs which, after all, were set up in large measure by federal government urging and federal government legislation.

The national medicare system, as every member in this House knows, was introduced by a previous federal government and the provinces went along with it. Some of them went kicking and screaming along with it, but now they are all glad to be in it except that the federal government is backing out of its obligations to fund the medical programs being delivered in those provinces. The same thing is true of education. The same thing is true of welfare.

Indeed, the National Council of Welfare has predicted that by the year 2000, as a result of the changes introduced by this government, the federal savings as a result of these cuts in provincial transfers will amount to some $16 billion a year.

That is a staggering sum of money. Clearly the provinces are going to be in very difficult straits by that time unless there is some change in the financial arrangements that are to be worked out between them.

The second is the unemployment insurance provisions. I want to quote from the former Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, who made in his 1989 budget speech a statement that has turned out to be completely false.

He said: "The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program"—the unemployment insurance program—"in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build up in the unemployment insurance account". These are difficult economic times.

The Minister of Finance, after months of prodding, finally admitted that we were into a recession last year. It is obvious to every Canadian except the minister that it is not over yet. These are difficult times. Canadian businesses are going bankrupt at record rates. Canadians are going out of the country to shop in record numbers.

I was just reading in the Kingston paper today how there were substantial line-ups at the border. They were people trying to get out of Canada to buy goods in the United States. Maybe it was the Ottawa paper. It was a Cornwall border crossing.

This kind of problem is a serious one for Canadian retailers. Canadian businesses are suffering because of this government's botched economic policies. Yet the government says that apparently these are not difficult times. It has raised unemployment insurance premiums twice, as my hon. colleague indicated, once was in July by 25 per cent which was a staggering increase, and now on January 1 they are to go up by another 7 per cent.

This is economic mismanagement on an impressive scale. To suggest that these are not difficult times and that the unemployment insurance fund ought to be bolstered by contributions from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of this country is preposterous. Yet that is exactly what the government has proposed by this bill.

My friend from Edmonton Strathcona wanted to hear about the deficit. Part of the reason we are in this financial mess is because of this government's inability to control its expenditures.

The hon. member was not running in the election of 1984, and neither was I, but I was campaigning and I suspect he may have been too. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East says he was. He must remember the promises his leader made throughout the election campaign, that when the Conservative Party took office it was going to look after the deficit right away. The top priority was to get the deficit to zero.

An hon. member: Where are you going to cut?

Mr. Milliken: We did not make that promise. He made the promise. He took office and look what he and his party have done.

Their idea of deficit reduction is to increase the deficit on an annual basis. That is what has been going on. This government has no more idea of what constitutes deficit reduction than the man on the moon.

Day after day I have stood here and said that these figures have gone up. In the last three years the deficit has increased in Canada. Every time we raise the issue and ask when it is going to fulfil the promise made in 1984 and lower the deficit, government members start hooting and hollering that they inherited this big debt and the interest payments are simply too much for them to manage because of some Liberal government before 1984.

If the deficit was so big, why did they promise to eliminate it in the election campaign in 1984? Were they telling lies to the people of Canada? Is that what was going on?

An hon. member: I have no idea.

Mr. Milliken: I have a very good idea. I knew what the deficit and the national debt were in 1984. I knew what the government was promising. I did not believe its promise.

The Canadian people were hoodwinked by the Prime Minister and his cronies who ran around the country promising to eliminate the deficit. The hon. minister is part of this group that is running this country so badly that it is running it into the ground.

It is because the government is unable to keep the promises that it made. That is the problem. If it kept its promise and eliminated the deficit, if it cut the programs it said it was going to cut, we would not be facing this kind of legislation today. We would not be facing the recession that we are facing in Canada today which, after all, was created because of its disastrous economic policies.

An hon. member: What is your alternative?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member asks what is my alternative. I will tell him what I would have done. If I had made the mistake of signing the free trade agreement, which of course we did not and I opposed, we would have lowered interest rates and lowered the Canadian dollar so that business would boom in this country instead of going into a state of collapse. That is what we would have done. By lowering the interest rate and by lowering the value of the dollar, we would also have lowered the interest payments on the public debt by billions of dollars and the deficit would be lower today instead of higher. That is a fact.

Instead of listening to our very reasonable suggestions on this score, the Minister of Finance and his friend the Governor of the Bank of Canada say that they are going to pound inflation into the ground. They are going to eliminate inflation in Canada if it kills this country. And that is exactly what they are doing. They are killing business in this country. They purport to be the great party of business, the great champion of business in this country. You and I know they are destroying business in Canada. Record bankruptcies and cross-border shopping at an unparalleled rate are adding up to a disaster for this country, brought about by disastrous policies introduced by this government.

It is time for a change. The parliamentary secretary is grinning. He knows it is time for a change. He and the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona should get up and vote against this bill, bring the government down, force an election and give us a chance to bring in some reasonable administration that can do something about the problems of this country instead of making them worse.

I am sorry my time has expired.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to see that we are getting into the Christmas spirit here. It is not even December 25 but we are really getting into "the night before Christmas".

I am surprised because every time we get into a debate like this I wish we could stop pointing fingers and laying blame. The situation right now is that we are stuck with a very serious problem. Hold on now. There are two sides to this coin. I think both sides are right and both sides are wrong, in a certain sense. I will tell you how they are.

It is true that the Conservative government inherited a terrible deficit. It is true that a great deal of the problems we have today are due to free spending by the federal Liberal government at the time. Money was just being thrown out the window. I believed that and I was not running in any election. I was just an observer. I was a Canadian taxpayer and I was upset. I was even more upset to see that orgy of patronage. I do not know if you remember the dying days of that Liberal government, but it was an orgy of patronage where everybody in the know was getting a job and the money was just going out the window.

Since that time we have had a Conservative government and I think that the Conservative government has made an honest attempt to cut costs in some areas. But in cutting costs it has attempted to push the problem over to the provinces and on to the backs of the people who are least able to accept these cuts.

Mr. Thorkelson: Where should we cut?

Mr. Edmonston: The next question would be: How could we have done it? I am quite surprised that the Conservative government would ask someone in opposition because it should know what to do. Unfortunately they do not know. There are a lot of things that can be done. The NDP has had a policy dealing with what cuts could be made without actually hurting the people who are least able to accept these cuts.

We have said in the past that there is a minimum corporate tax that could be levied. We said that over and over. When I look at the United States and I look at the minimum tax that it has levied, I do not see that has had a specific negative effect upon business. Look at the corporate tax loopholes and the reports from Statistics Canada saying it is not necessarily these programs that are causing this deficit. Statistics Canada, not too long ago, said the problem we have with the deficit today is because of the huge deficit left by the Liberals to the Conservatives when the government changed.

That is a result of the fact that the government has had a huge carrying cost on that debt and has been unable to cut government expenses.

If this government really wants to know how to cut expenses, 24 hours ago a brilliant document was released showing ways to cut expenses. It is called the Auditor General's report.

It talks about billions of dollars being unaccounted for and millions of dollars that could be saved. Yet when we as parliamentarians come before this House and say "look, government, we are not in favour of cutting grants to the provinces for education and for health", this government gets into partisanship to the extent that it says: "Well, where do you want us to cut?" It is as if the Auditor General did not even exist, as if there was no independent, non-partisan basis from which it could seek a kind of Rand-McNally map on sound fiscal management. We have that. We have the Auditor General.

I would mention to the government side that some people have proposed fiscal reform even in the Liberal Party. There is a parliamentarian by the name of the member for Broadview-Greenwood. He wrote a very interesting report on a single tax. There are some parts in his report which show that we could have fiscal reform, generally balance our books, and at the same time not attack those people in our society who are the least able to afford these tax increases.

That is where we are today. We are at a philosophical crossroads. Do we continue to tax people who are least able to afford these tax increases while Canada is being run into the ground? Whether you are Liberal, Conservative or NDP you must admit that when you go to your constituencies people are telling you: "Stay out of our lives, federal government. We are tired. Every time you are active in Parliament our wallets get thinner".

This is what is happening with people from across our country. We are all hurting. When I say we are at a crossroads I am saying that people do not want to see education and health care cut as Bill C-20 proposes.

That is wrong. There are other alternatives. We have given you some. The Auditor General has given you some. I just hope that when you hear these proposals coming from the NDP, the Liberals and the independent Auditor General, you will wake up. The closer you get to the next general election the better chance that you will wake up. I hope you will not wait that long because generally what happens before an election is that the government in power starts to give out goodies across the country to win votes. I hope it is a thing of the past because it is no way to build a Canada.

We do not have what is called "cheque book federalism". I hope the only reason we will vote for a political party and the only reason we will stay federalists or Canadians is not because you have given our particular province more money than another one or because you have bought us off. Canadians cannot be bought but they can be angered. There is an angry mood in the country right now.

The mood is so angry that people in different provinces are getting together and forming tax advocacy groups for their own protection. It has happened in my own province of Quebec and I think they are doing the right thing. We are on the verge of a tax revolution. People are saying: "We are paying more and more taxes and getting less and less services". Bill C-20, which seeks to cut the transfers to the provinces particularly in the area of health and post-secondary education, is an example of the government cutting in the wrong place.

Let me tell you about the feelings of the average middle-class Canadian today, seeing what we as parliamentarians have done as far as taxation and the failure to cut expenses.

• (1750)

In the field of secondary education, in Quebec we have a taux de décrochage or a dropout rate of approximately 38 per cent. Thirty-eight per cent of students drop out of school. The students are our future. They are our future in Canada and right now we are pushing off to the side 38 per cent. That is a terrible number. It is terrible. There is no way that should be allowed in any country. Rather than adding to the financing of post-secondary education we are taking away.

Look at health care. From the province of Quebec's angle, when we look at health care we desperately do want to keep respecting national standards. However, how in the name of Jehovah can you ask us to respect national standards in Quebec when you keep paying us less, when you keep saying: "We want you to run a marathon, but we are going to give you Reeboks made of lead"? You just cannot do it. You cannot carry out the services. The average middle-class taxpayer who wants these services, wants national standards, and wants fair taxation is angry. We are on the verge of a revolution. We are on the verge of this anger being channelled into some very serious demands for reform.

In conclusion, I and my party are against this bill. The reason we are against this bill is because the government has not woken up. It is not cutting in the right place. Unfortunately we will not be able to do much about it except talk until the next election so I wish the government would call an election as soon as possible.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak to Bill C-20 this evening. This particular bill is one that tries to turn down the tap of government spending. It does not turn off government spending but it attempts to turn it down a little bit. There are a lot of Canadians out there who are starting to become concerned about what the aftermath will be when the government moneys slow down a little bit, particularly in the context of a recession. Keynesian economics shows us very clearly that this is the exact wrong time to cut down on government spending.

In any event, how did we get here? How did we get into this situation where we have to radically alter the way we fund transfer payments to the provinces, the way we fund government programs? Are all of the services provided by the federal government, by the provincial governments, by the municipalities that are funded by these EPF transfers and the other funding mechanisms referred to in this bill continued? The needs are there in education, health, unemployment insurance and others. In the recession these service needs are actually growing. They are not slowing down. Even in the recession they are growing.

Why are we in this position now? There are several reasons and I know we will debate them in this House for many years to come. It is my view that following the 1982-1983 recession, when there was a sequence of large deficits totalling about $167 billion, there was a period of good years, roughly from 1984 to 1990. We cannot necessarily fault a government for a recession. These things happen cyclically over history. We have recorded them and watched them all through this century. However they do occur. They may be a necessary evil. However in this particular case, in this recession we are in now, there was real evidence that the government permitted or induced the recession with its monetary policy through the Bank of Canada.

That was a government policy decision. It is not going to walk away from it. To keep interest rates high was a decision of this government. The result has perhaps been a double-dip recession, not just a single scoop.

In any event, it is my view that between the two recessions, the one in 1982-1983 and the one we are going through now, the government failed to properly address the deficit position the government was in then and it failed to properly manage the economy. It was mismanagement to fail to take account of the growth in the EPF funding structures, to fail to take account of the potentials for government surplus. In the good years it actually mismanaged our economy.

The result is that we have to deal with this recession not from a position of strength but from a position of weakness. Canadians are disappointed in that. They are disappointed in the last five or six years. That is how we got here.

What are the result and the impact on Canadians? I want to mention two things. First, and there are numerous ways to look at this piece of legislation, is the erosion of the government's commitment to the unemployment insurance fund. Other colleagues of mine from the New Democratic Party and possibly even from the government side have mentioned that it was clear at the time of the 1989 budget that it was the government's intention to buttress the unemployment insurance fund so that premiums did not have to be unduly raised.

I know it has been mentioned before. However, I just want to mention again the words of the member for Etobicoke Centre himself who stated that the government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build in the UI account. That was confirmed in other debate in this House and in the the other place.

This particular bill authorizes, and we do not want to support that authority, an increase of 24.4 per cent in the UI fund. Having put that in place, if this bill passes we have a follow-up increase of another substantial increase.

Things are now so bad in the fiscal management of this country that the government has had to renege on that promise and on others. Yes, we are disappointed and we are angry. Fiscal mismanagement during the good years has made this breach of promises and lack of preparation for the bad times come to pass now. We have to deal with this as a country.

Second, all of the money that moves from our government to other governments goes to services. A lot of it is delivered through provincial programs. We see it going to post-secondary education. We see it in the hands of welfare recipients. We are talking about the real needy, the real hungry, and the real poor. That is where this money that we are talking about today was supposed to go and now will not.

The government's response is to change the funding mechanisms as if the process is simply a piece of machinery. This government is not bold enough to go to the needy and the poor and say the cupboard is bare.

It is just going to change the mechanisms. It is in fact subcontracting that job to the provinces, the municipalities, the social workers, or the teachers. It is subcontracting the dirty work caused by the fiscal mismanagement of the last half dozen years.

That is what we are disappointed at. That is what makes us angry. That is what embarrasses us a little around here.

To the extent that this government is subcontracting the dirty work, it is doing the job blind because it does not stop to measure the impact on the real poor, the real needy and the hungry. It does not have the opportunity to see what is happening because it will not do the job itself. It does it indirectly by fine tuning, by changing the funding mechanisms.

It is very difficult to be constructive in addressing legislation like this when all you have to work with, all you see on the table, is a knife that cuts. It is very difficult to be constructive and so I cannot be. I can be critical though. I can be critical of how we got here and I can be critical of the impact on Canadians who need this type of support from government. It is a legacy of the 1982-83 recession. It is a legacy of the mismanagement of the good years, but it is still mismanagement. I wish we could repeat history and do it all over again, but we cannot.

• (1800)

We oppose this bill.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to participate in third reading this evening of Bill C-20, an act which will cut back on the government's commitment to education and health, as well as other areas.

During second reading of this legislation, I had the opportunity to also speak on this bill. At that time I spoke about the damage this legislation would do to our health care system, our education system, and how it was affecting the ability of the provinces to manage their budgets.

I also talked about the policies the government is inflicting on small businesses. We can see what is happening there. We have bankruptcy rates such as we have never had before in this country.

Today I want to talk about some of those things, but I also want to discuss in detail the government's claim that it must cut back on education to reduce the deficit and make this country competitive.

This government, as we know, has doubled the debt in only six years. It is planning to cut back on spending on education and health care. According to the government it must do this to reduce the deficit and to make Canada more competitive.

I think it is wrong on both counts. First, the government's recent paper on prosperity indicates that the educational attainment of the work force as a whole is way below the levels that will be required in the future. In fact, it has been indicated and forecast that between 1989 and the year 2000, which is only nine years away, 62.9 per cent of all jobs will require at least grade 12 and 40 per cent are going to require 16 years of training. That is what is going to be required in the future.

Presently we have a work force that as a whole is below the levels that will be required. A couple of statistics regarding the present situation show that 40 per cent of adults have problems with everyday math and reading demands. In our high schools, three out of ten drop out of high school before graduating.

The future competitiveness of the economy depends directly on the skills, training and abilities of our domestic work force. It stands to reason that if a company cannot find the skills it requires to be competitive on a world scale, if the training we are providing to young people is not of a high enough standard to supply our economy with a competitive work force, then how does this government expect Canada to compete in an increasingly competitive international economy?

Certainly there are education cutbacks proposed in this bill. As you know, we have also had cutbacks in research. In fact, the federal contribution to university research and development dropped from 36 per cent in 1984 of the total university research money to 32 per cent.

You would think, in view of all that, that this government would be wanting to improve education. Certainly by its actions and by legislation that it is bringing in, it is doing the exact opposite.

As I said earlier, cutting back on education may contribute to the short-term deficit reduction goals. In the long term it will cost us our ability to compete internationally. It will cost us our opportunity to be truly prosperous in the future. It will cost us jobs, technology and tax revenue, and it certainly will become a hindrance to any comprehensive, long-term deficit reduction plan.

My riding is in Prince Edward Island. I can tell you that there, where we have a total budget for the province of not much over $700 million, these reductions and funding commitments have a major impact. They have a major impact on a province the size of Prince Edward Island.

Since 1988 my province has lost $100 million due to caps by this government that it has placed on transfer payments. Forty-five million dollars of that is in equalization payments and $54 million is in the Established Programs Financing. It is the money that we received to go to secondary education.

What the government has actually done is not reduce the over-all burden of the country. It is simply passing on the debt to the provincial governments. As I said earlier, a lower deficit would assist in making Canada a healthier economic country. Reducing the deficit by decreasing our commitment to education can do irreparable damage to our future ability to compete and it will harm, not help, our economy in the long term.

In addition to the problems that are created by the cutbacks in education and health, many of our provinces are experiencing very difficult economic times.

There are a number of issues that I could speak on at length which this legislation that we are discussing here this evening will affect. It will have a negative effect on my province of Prince Edward Island, but I want to sum up by calling on the government to really do three things.

I call on the government to re-examine its misguided economic policies which have caused the problems that this government is inadequately trying to address in this legislation. I call on the government to put forth legislation that will stimulate the economy, not stifle it.

Third, I call on this government to withdraw this legislation and replace it with a new economic plan that would make measures such as we are talking about under Bill C-20 unnecessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Walker. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed amendment stands deferred until Monday, December 9, 1991, at six o'clock p.m.

Mr. Cooper: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think you would probably find there would also be consent to call the main question at this time so that we could put both questions on Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to proceed to Private Members' Business?

[Translation]

After consultation, I must remind you that the main motion cannot be put to a vote until the House has disposed of the amendment.

The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do want to put it on the record that there is the consent of the House for us to have completed the debate and on Monday what we will do is put both motions at that time.

I also want to indicate to the House that I think you will find consent to call it seven o'clock and we could then immediately proceed to Private Members' Business.

Mr. Prud'homme: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. Of course we cannot preclude anything.

Yes, we do seem to agree but we cannot preclude and, Mr. Speaker, you were very right to let us know that we cannot go that fast. We will proceed orderly.

There is an entente but anything can happen and no one knows better than our friend that anything can happen. So we cannot be on record as having given consent too often today. We would proceed as your order has so rightly indicated we should.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to call it seven o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

THE ECONOMY

CANADIAN STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should establish a national task force to deal with the growing crisis in the Canadian steel industry and the complaints of steelworkers and steel manufacturers, which include a high dollar, high interest rates, and the free trade agreement.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a real privilege to proceed with this motion. After three years I finally had a motion drawn and I do appreciate the opportunity to speak to the steel industry in this country. I think everyone agrees, all three parties, as well as the unions, the workers and the steel producers of this country, that the steel industry is in crisis. I suggested a task force for several specific reasons. First of all, I wanted to find out what constitutes a task force. I did not want to be so presumptuous as to suggest a royal commission.

A task force is something that emphasizes public hearings. It has a shorter time period than a royal commission. Less staffing and funding are required, and it is much more flexible and less formal than a public and stately royal commission. It is good for quick responses in trouble shooting situations. May I suggest this fits the bill. We are in a trouble shooting situation and the timeframe to address this problem is indeed very short.

I think the task force would remove some of the sensitivities that we met when the member for Selkirk—Red River suggested that an all-party committee address this issue under the auspices of a subcommittee under industry, science and technology. That met an unfortunate demise. I suggest this would be more sensitive to the differences and would bring together all parties in the necessary timeframe, which is indeed very brief.

The precedents are many and there have been task forces on issues of less import. The precedents have been set and some of them are: the task force on human resource development; the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas in Canada and task forces on electricity. The mandate of task forces has been microscopic and probably macroscopic.

Why is it necessary now? All industries, not only Algoma Steel, are in crisis, and most of the industry is losing money in the tens of millions if not hundreds of millions of dollars. May I suggest that only Ipsco in Saskatchewan seems to be doing reasonably well.

The steel industry is the very cornerstone of any country's manufacturing industry. It could be decimated unless some dramatic changes take place. I believe that all players must participate before those changes will take place.

A task force would raise the profile of the industry and indicate just how serious it is. I am sure other people may point out that there are other studies going on. Industry, science and technology is conducting a very thorough investigation of the steel industry, the results of which I believe will come in late spring.

There is a labour force study, a joint study by labour and government, which is very narrow in its perspective on the steel industry. I am not suggesting that we reinvent the wheel and start the investigations all over again. In fact, some of the steel producers have indicated to me that they have all those things in place. That may very well be, but may I suggest it may take something like this to collate all those things and bring them together in one unified package with government approval so we can proceed.

What is in place now lacks any political component. There are no other bodies that can really deal with this issue as appropriately as a task force.

What are the problems with the industry? I think the free trade agreement has worked against us. To prove that fact, the American industry is now exporting into Canada to the tune of 17 per cent. Import penetration is now 25 per cent. Mr. Telmer from Stelco suggests that the Americans are eating our lunch. I suggest they are not only eating our lunch, but breakfast and supper as well. May I suggest to those who tout the dispute panel mechanism that we have lost those rulings. Algoma was put together with Sysco even though I do not think we were guilty of dumping rails into the United States market. Nevertheless we were cumulatively put in with Sysco, and we know the problems with Sysco.

I think the member from that region has pointed out that we cannot sell rails in the United States even though the demand for rails is back ordered for 18 months.

We are selling a lot of steel offshore at little or no profit. We are precluded from the United States and the domestic demand is down. When we have a megaproject like Hibernia and anticipate getting some domestic orders, the first steel order that comes out goes to Belgium. Whether it is dumping or not, it causes the steel industry in this country a real problem.

I suggest that the member from Burlington has been an advocate of the steel industry and we have a steel caucus. It has not been formalized, therefore we are having difficulty getting anybody to listen to us, especially when we go to Washington. I think if that cannot be formalized and we cannot have a committee, once again we come to a task force.

Another problem is that the Canadian steel producers have an organization but times are so tough that one of the major members has had to drop out. What consolidated voice do they have?

Even though it is one industry, we must compete against one another. We have to do that, but I hope a task force would unify the group. We could speak as one and take a look at the problems as one.

For instance, I have had an opportunity very recently to go to the Middle East and China. I learned over there that one of our main competitors, British Steel for instance, has had an office in the Middle East for 20 years. We occasionally send a sales person over there to test the market. It is not surprising it is very difficult for us to sell over there.

In China we have American marketers. They are our representatives in China. Even the Chinese have suggested that we deal with them directly. Do we have to have an American middleman? I think these kinds of things could be studied by a task force.

With the status of the industry, they just cannot afford to put any money into research and development. Unfortunately in the good times it did not spend as much as it should have. I am told if sanctions had come into South Africa, as most of us endorsed, it could have crippled the steel industry. Some of the natural resources that we require are not available from anyone else in the world.

It has been suggested to me that perhaps they have been working on a synthetic product to replace those resources from South Africa. Once again, the industry is not in it together so I do not think that is proceeding any further.

It is difficult for the Canadian industry to compete. I think we all accept that. We are competing with offshore producers that do not pay nearly what we pay our people. We are competing with mini-mills in the United States that are extremely competitive. It is becoming more and more difficult for us to compete. But we cannot give up. Surely there must be answers for the Canadian steel industry.

The steel industry world-wide has restructured. The Canadian industry has restructured. Algoma had 12,000 workers in 1980. Now it has 4,000, 5,000 or 6,000 depending on the time. I think the workers are prepared to sacrifice and get involved in a solution to the problem. They are going to require some assistance and I think the government has to play some kind of role in this situation. With the results we would be able to collate the work of this small group of people. We have to get them involved. Again, one of the members suggested 14 weeks of a subcommittee of the industry, science and technology committee. Fourteen weeks is too long. He suggested travel. There was some resentment by committee members. They did not think this was the appropriate way to handle it, that it was going to be costly and just too time consuming.

I could see a task force bringing forth results in a matter of four or five weeks and bringing forth specific recommendations. Study after study after study that has gone on in the past and some are presently being brought forward, but there has been no consolidation of what has been done. I think a task force could collate the material and make some specific recommendations that we could address. Once again, the shorter the list of recommendations that we would have, the better it would be for the steel industry.

We have to become, if I could digress for a moment, a little more aggressive on the trade scene, in particular with our American neighbours to exempt us from VRAs, voluntary restraints, in exporting our Canadian steel into their market. I have already told you the statistics about import-export difference. By the way, our share of their market has been cut in half in the past three years. When I asked the minister about applying the same attitudes and aggressiveness to the American market, the minister suggested: "Well, it is a double-edged sword". I suggest it is a double-edged sword. I suggested at that time that the sword cuts us both ways.

We simply have to become more aggressive. We need more industry aggressiveness, more government support and government aggressiveness. I will never forget my first visit to Washington with the steel caucus group. Basically the Americans suggested: "Keep out of our market. You have your share. You will get no more". Those words were indeed true because their actions since then have borne that out. American protectionism is alive and well, and our response thus far is a very passive approach to our American neighbours.

Some of our own trade officials at briefings suggested: "I do not understand why the Americans do that to us because we are fair traders". I suggest we are probably more than fair traders, but we are not getting what we should be getting.

Another problem, and very specific to Algoma, is because of the amount of imports that could probably be applied to all of the steel industry in this country, we are convinced that all sorts of tubular products are coming in from all over the world and they are coming through at our border crossings. It is a very complex, difficult situation for an inspector to get on and see these loads and determine from where that tubular product has come. To the credit of ISTC and Revenue Canada—and it is good to see the minister here—Revenue Canada has seen fit to instruct the inspectors, to give them specific, instruction as to how to determine which may and may not be imported pipe or improperly stamped. Having given that credit, the problem is we do not have enough inspectors to do the appropriate inspections. A simple recommendation like that could be addressed. It has not been addressed previously but could be addressed by a task force along with a lot of other aspects of the steel industry.

• (1830)

What we have to put together is an over-all strategy. Algoma cannot operate in isolation. Dofasco cannot operate in isolation. Stelco cannot operate in isolation. The parent-child relationship between Algoma and Dofasco we all thought would be a great relationship and a great marriage. Well, Dofasco eventually said: "We are cutting all of our ties with Algoma". That is an indication, perhaps, of how the industry is unto itself. It would be much better if we got in this together, at least on the task force level.

We cannot fight it alone. We need to have government assistance. We have to react now. We cannot wait for any further studies from anybody. Let us collate those studies.

To end this, I understand that the subcommittee on Private Members' Business had deemed this to be a votable item, but when it hit the whole committee it did not go; it is not votable. I am very anxious to hear members of the government and perhaps the Official Opposition to see what their response to the task force would be. It is not deemed votable, but certainly I would hope that members from both other parties would give at least a vocal, moral support. I know a couple of the members in here, by their actions, are indeed interested and supportive of the steel industry in this country. I think they agree that the crisis is now and the crisis must be addressed now. I think a way of addressing it right now is through a task force.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I think the comment I am about to make I would not have made a week and a half ago, but I am going to stand up and speak against this particular motion.

With the efforts that the member from Sault-Ste-Marie put forward in describing the necessity for a task force and the make-up of the task force and also the commentary about the fact that at one time the standing committee—and he acknowledged my part in working quite hard in trying to create a standing committee—with the 14 or 16 week study has done a true in-depth study of the steel industry.

I am kind of suspect now about the fact that when we got to the point we did in the discussion about the subcommittee that the hon. member decided it was not quite as necessary then as his task force is now. I feel uncomfortable in the fact that maybe if we knew there was some discussion about the fact that a task force should have been formed, we could have talked about it.

Mr. Speaker, I think you know that we had the opportunity of discussing the creation of the subcommittee among the members of the standing committee, and also with the industry. We took a look at the fact that there should be input from the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, that there should be input from organized labour, and that there should be input from the management side.

I am somewhat suspect in that for some reason everybody seemed to want to pull the plug on this. That could be for any one of a number of reasons. Hopefully it was not so that we would create a task force. Hopefully they had other reasons. A task force or a subcommittee of the standing committee probably would have accomplished the same results. There was some concern about whether or not the length of time was too long. As the hon. member obviously knows, the concerns that seemed to be out there—and I say seemed to be out there because we obviously will not have a chance now to have a look at them as part of the standing committee— to my mind probably go a lot further. The reluctance of both industry and departmental officials to carry on has me somewhat suspect.

In talking with the executive director of the Canadian Steel Producers Association, along with an official of the Department of ISTC who is very involved with the steel industry, there seemed to be some concern about a parallel study.

Whether or not the parallel study comes via the standing committee, which has the resources and the abilities to study the industry, or whether it comes from a task force, I would think the results would be the same.

I wonder if the industry would have the same response to a task force as it does from a subcommittee of the standing committee. For whatever reason it has decided not to do it, I am suspect. I am wondering if, because there is at present the study going on jointly by management, labour and the Department of ISTC into the solution, management and labour have taken control of the study and are driving the study.

I am also just as pessimistic on the other side that I am somewhat concerned about the fact that maybe the department is somewhat reluctant to have somebody take a look at the study just in case they do not come up with the same results.

In any event, because of the fact that neither management nor departmental officials were interested in carrying on this study, I do not think we could go and force our way into doors and get a proper job done. What I would like to signal at this time is that when the report does come out from the industry departmental study, I personally will make quite a close scrutiny of that report and at that time make my recommendations to the standing committee of how that report should be dealt with.

The member for Sault Ste. Marie talks about a number of things regarding the steel industry. He talked about the fact that there is not enough money spent on R and D. There is no doubt that industry does not spend enough money on R and D.

We are all aware of the fact that the Government of Canada provides the most generous tax relief to R and D in the world. For whatever reason, industry has decided not to utilize those benefits. We talk about the history of the steel industry and the member made a comment about the fact that there was not a lot of input into R and D or capital cost. There is no doubt about that.

The relationship between the steel industry and what we found in the study of the auto parts industry is exactly the same. I wonder about the protection created because of the low dollar back in the late 1970s and early 1980s. There was an auto pact to protect the steel industry, whether it be the automotive parts industry or the steel industry itself, and the National Energy Program was in place. There was an artificial cost or the manufacturers were paying an artificial price for their energy, and when it came time to enter the real world they could not compete.

A lot of these things keep rising to the top. I am just wondering if maybe the concerns that the industry flagged when it came before the standing committee are just superficial. I am wondering if all the industry wants to do is stand up and sling mud at government policy but is not really prepared to sit down and talk about meat and potatoes and how we resolve some of the problems in the steel industry.

The member for Sault Ste. Marie made quite a significant commentary about the fact that Canada cannot compete on the labour side. I have to reflect the cost of labour in my own community. We do have a mini-mill that is doing its best to be competitive not only on the R and D side but is changing its manufacturing process on a regular basis. It has quite an upgrading department to upgrade its employees. It is doing everything it possibly can.

What it is doing is paying a rate. I am flexible on this because I do not know the exact dollar, but in comparison it is paying roughly $18 an hour for its labour. Its competition which is down in the southern United States is paying the equivalent of about $8 an hour, so there is a very significant difference in the cost of labour.

There is $8 and there is $18. Like I say, these are rough numbers. The difference is that the $18 in Manitoba is a fixed rate. That is the average rate in the plant. There is no flexibility. At the end of the day or the end of the week you get your paycheque and off you go.

• (1840)

Their American competition, a mill of equal capability and equal age, at $8 an hour is paying a bonus on production. The people in the American mini-mill who are making $8 an hour at the end of the day are probably making close to $20 an hour in comparable funds. Along with that is the fact that we do have some problems with R and D. We do have some problems with the fact that the capital projects have not gone through the way they possibly should have. We do have a significant problem with labour. They are not working together. We have to change that concept and show that there has to be a balance. There has to be a fundamental change in how labour and management work together for the success of the company and the community.

I do not really know how to resolve this right now. When I started out earlier I was somewhat suspect about the fact that quite a significant effort to work a subcommittee out of the standing committee of industry, science and technology failed, and within a week we were standing in the House debating a task force that is expected to do the same thing. I feel uncomfortable about that.

As I said earlier, when the report from the industry and the department is made public, I as a member of the standing committee on ISTC will make quite an effort to study that report. At the end of the day we will be working hard as a government to do what we can to maintain a viable steel industry here in Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words on the motion before the House by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie because it gives us a chance to look at the steel industry in Canada today.

The importance of this industry of course cannot be underestimated for any modern industrial state. Certainly for Canada and for those communities in Canada like Sault Ste. Marie, Burlington, Hamilton, Cape Breton and at least 13 other communities across the country, this is a major industry, a major employer and a major indicator of the importance of the Canadian economy. Certainly this industry is important.

It is an industry in very deep trouble. It is an industry which over the last five years has lost some 9,000 employees. That cannot be easily shunted aside, and of course the difficulties facing it in the years ahead are even greater.

When we had the recession in 1982 we thought the industry went through a very difficult time then. Clearly it did, but a recent presentation to the Liberal deindustrialization task force by a representative of Stelco described the 1982 recession as a cakewalk compared to the 1990–1991 and what probably will be 1992 recession. That is apparent.

It is certainly apparent to those of us from the Algoma district and from the city of Sault Ste. Marie. We are hovering on the brink of whether or not we will be able to maintain the integrity of the Algoma Steel Corporation which back in 1982 employed some 10,000 employees. It now has some 6,000 employees and the best case scenario seems to be to hope to maintain some 4,200 employees out of that figure. It was almost two and a half times that amount 10 years ago.

As we look at the industry across the country, we see an industry going through many of the tragic and difficult times that the United States industry did during the 1980s. We are told that in the United States various levels of government programs pumped some $35 billion into that industry during the 1980s. In fact, it lost several hundreds of thousands of jobs. I believe it went from some 480,000 to 180,000 during the course of the decade. We are belatedly going through that. When we went into that recession in the early 1980s we were far advanced from its situation.

Why the crunch now? The crunch now comes from a number of factors, but clearly the extremely high dollar value and the high interest rates over the past several years since the free trade deal was signed have been very important factors. The Canadian Steel Producers Association believes that the high dollar has reduced demand by some 20 per cent. It points out that the high interest rates since 1988, since the free trade deal was passed, have made it extremely difficult for the industry to modernize and put in place new equipment.

It is those things combined with a number of other factors. It seems tragic to me that our Canadian producers have to be so extremely careful of ever getting government support in terms of restructuring. Let us face it. Most steel industries around the world get government support one way or another.

I had an opportunity to visit China Steel in Taiwan earlier this year. The whole industry was owned by the government. I believe there is some private participation now, but most steel industries around the world have received government support. If we in Canada provide any significant support that can be identified, we are immediately subjected to countervail by the United States, yet during the past decade it has received benefits in the order of $30 billion to $35 billion. We have very great difficulties.

When the free trade debate was on in 1988, during that period every steel industry in Canada lined up. This was a solution: nobody could find a solution to the countervail anti-dumping challenges by the United States industry like the free trade deal. Of course that has not worked out. There has been countervail actions and anti-dumping duties imposed on Sysco and Algoma, on the tube division, on the rail division and so on, by the United States.

I guess one kind of starts to wonder: Was this just some minor oversight by the government in negotiating the free trade deal? It does not seem so. In the free trade deal we agreed that we would put to work a committee to establish a subsidy code of support programs that would not be subject to countervail.

Since 1989, in those three years since, absolutely no progress has been made on that. In fact I am told that the Canadian negotiators did not want even to broach the subject, to get into serious negotiations, because they would rather negotiate it under the multilateral trade negotiations at the GATT.

One just wonders if they are afraid to negotiate a subsidy code so that Algoma, Sysco or any other steel company that might need government restructuring assistance would know whether a particular support program of the government is subject to countervail. No action has been taken there. We hope that something will come out of the GATT negotiations in Geneva, which will be concluded in the next few weeks. That would be helpful because clearly the United States industry has received massive government support. Our industry cannot receive support without inviting countervail and anti-dumping duties.

Those are a number of the problems that face the industry today. I am told that the loss to Canadian producers from January 1990 to July 1991 totalled 527,000 tonnes, two-thirds of it to the United States because of its ability, its lower cost of production in some sectors such as mini-mills and so on, the value of the dollar, as well as a very suicidal kind of pricing.

For example, I am told that the United States mills lost $738 million in the first quarter of 1991 to drive down the prices.

We need to study the problem. I believe it should be done through the standing committee. It is all organized to do it. It has already started.

We need more than that. We need government action. We need government action on macro-economics. We need government action in the case of Algoma. We need assistance in the restructuring of the Program for Older Workers Adjustment. We need a commitment on that. We need a commitment on a national training centre which would assist many of those workers and assist the industry generally.

We need government assistance by way of tax incentives for the proposed employee buy-out because we are entering a new phase where we have to be competitive and we have to be productive. I believe that the employee buy-out approach can maximize that benefit.

There are so many things that need to be done. It is important and useful for parliamentary committees and groups to study these matters and make recommendations to the government. However it is important that the government act on the specific assistance that is needed for companies like Algoma, but also act on those macro-economic levers and trade issues so important to the steel industry.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to speak on this motion but there is some time left so I will say a few words and try to clear up some of the mysteries that have been thrown on the floor.

First, the basic problem with the steel industry in Canada and around the world is overproduction. There are 100,000 tonnes of steel produced in the world with no place to go. That steel ends up in many cases in North America because North America represents the last two free markets in the world.

I just hope that everybody understands that is one of the basic problems in the industry. Another basic problem aside from that is the fact that the industry cannot sustain a price rise. You cannot make profits. You cannot build new factories, plants, processes and so forth.

I noticed recently that a couple of American mills have raised their prices slightly and we hope that it will stay. If it does, it will bode well for the Canadian steel industry.

Let me move on just briefly to the free trade issue. There was no tariff on carbon steel. That should be well known to everyone. Steel was really not part of the free trade agreement.

What was applauded by the industry was that the steel industry would be able to take advantage of the dispute settling mechanism. There have not been any really serious cases before the dispute settling mechanism board.

The Algoma case that is referred to on steel rails and the Sysco case were before the International Trade Commission because they were dumping actions.

On the Canadian and American sides the dumping laws are still in force. We may at some time down the road meld those laws together so that they are relatively simple and stop this nonsense. We have some regulatory problems on the shipping of steel across the border. It is not something that cannot be solved to the advantage of all concerned. It is just that there are a lot of Customs regulations in place in the United States that we have not been able to find a path through, but we will. We are working on it.

As far as the dispute settling mechanism is concerned, we gave ourselves five years under the FTA to determine the definition of a subsidy. We said that if it was not done in five years we would extend it for another two years. There is a seven-year period to define what we mean by subsidy.

At the same time we have these multilateral discussions going on at GATT. Subsidy is being discussed there as well. I have talked to my colleagues in the U.S. Congress and they seemed to say: "We think in the final analysis that we will probably accept the GATT definition of subsidy and that will sort the matter out as far as we are concerned". I suspect that down the road that is what is going to happen.

The advantage of the dispute settling mechanism is this. A panel is chosen, five members from each side, five Americans and five Canadians. Then the combined group is given a list of individuals, both Canadian and American. From that list they choose a chairman. To me that is a much better arrangement than going before the International Trade Commission where we appear as a supplicant before the court. Using the dispute settling mechanism will in time be the best thing we ever did for the steel industry, and many others as well.

Statistics are strange animals. People can twist them to mean anything they want. However, the fact is that whether you look at it on a tonnage or a dollar point of view we are shipping more steel into the United States than it is shipping into Canada. Our largest steel customer is the United States. We are its largest steel customer, but we still have a step up on them because we are exporting more steel into the United States than it is into Canada.

What happened to the balances recently was that there was a steel strike. It came at a time when General Motors was placing its fall orders for steel for its new run of automobiles. The result was that the mill it had been buying from was not able to supply. The other mill it could have bought from had a full order book. Consequently it bought the bulk of that steel in the United States and Germany. That is what happened. That is why the statistics are distorted.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kempling: The hon. member does not seem to want to believe that. I think if he really delved into it he would find that is the case.

There is some light at the end of the tunnel for some of our mills in this country. Many mills are a fact of life. They are going to be here for a long while. There are more being established all over the world and the only thing we have to worry about is where they are going to get their feedstock. Most of them use car hulks. Maybe if we wanted to help the steel industry we would find some way to get more car hulks into the industry rather than importing them from the United States as we do.

The problem the steel industry is having right now is the debt to equity ratio. It has gone out of the country where money is cheaper, in Japan and in some cases Germany. It has borrowed sums of money, bought technology and put new mechanisms in place. Dofasco will be opening one down in the Windsor area. It has combined with NKK and National Steel to form a production facility that will produce steel that is coated on one side with zinc. Stelco has just opened its z line. Those plants and that production are designated for the automobile industry. It has spent sizeable sums of money. It has borrowed money offshore. It has a debt to equity ratio that it has to watch very carefully, but I am convinced that it has the machinery, the equipment and the market there to deal with this.

Turning to the market for steel production in Canada, I might say that 85 per cent of it is consumed in Canada. Only 15 per cent of it is exported. We should not get all exercised. We would like to export more steel than we do right now, and I believe we will. Under the free trade agreement there are no quotas. There are no quotas. There is no 3 per cent of the market. We can export steel into the United States and we are doing it every day. We are doing quite well with it.

I know my friend from the Sault is upset about Algoma. I am upset about it as well, as are others. However the fact is that it acquired more debt than it could handle and it has some serious problems. We hope Algoma survives, but I do not know whether there are many people who are really convinced it will. We hope it does.

As far as the government putting money into the industry is concerned, I think that would not be a good move on our part. If you are going to offend your largest market for your product, why do it? I mean perhaps you just want to fight, you want to holler and get up in the House of Commons and make speeches about how bad the Americans are. I know that is the great line of the NDP, that the Americans are bad. But the fact is that they are our largest customer. If we put money into the steel industry we are going to be looked upon as subsidizing that industry. I do not think we can do that at this particular time.

With those few comments I will conclude. I just might say as far as this task force is concerned that I think the wise thing to do would be to wait for the report from industry, science and technology and then strike a subcommittee on trade and commerce to study that report. Then, having studied that report, you have some knowledge and you can go on to do what you please from there.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 10 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I have a very lengthy petition here.

The petition is signed by citizens of Canada from Huntsville, Barrys Bay, Ontario, Pembroke, Renfrew, Combermere, Whitney, Highland Grove and many other places throughout Ontario.

This petition is to draw to the attention of the House that mace and tear gas canisters are illegal in Canada because they infringe on the rights of the perpetrator. These canisters can be lifesavers to our female population when rape and murder of these people is on a dramatic increase.

Therefore, your petitioners call upon Parliament to legalize mace and tear gas canisters in Canada for self-protection.

RURAL POST OFFICES

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by about 150 people from southern Saskatchewan, including the communities of Assiniboia and Gravelbourg.

These people have observed what is happening to the rural way of life and have said enough is enough especially when it comes to the closure of rural post offices.

Therefore, the petitioners are calling on Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life, to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services and to reject this government's agenda of cutbacks and closures.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia.

The petitioners are concerned about the potential of cutbacks in the RCMP. They are asking that the government ensure that proper funding for the RCMP is maintained to enable it to fulfil its mandate and role as the only police force for communities across British Columbia. It is a viable symbol of Canadian unity at this critical time.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another matter, the petitioners who again reside primarily in communities throughout British Columbia point out their concern about an intention to divert one of the British Columbia rivers to service the California area in the United States.

The petitioners are asking that the government not allow this river to be dammed or diverted into the United States.

CANADIAN FORCES BASE CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I too have the honour to present another petition certified as to form and content by the Clerk. It has been signed by a couple of hundred people in the Middleton, Annapolis and Digby area.

The petitioners show a concern with the direction the Department of National Defence has taken in terms of its defence policy particularly as it relates to Canadian Forces Base Cornwallis. They want to continue the recruit training but want to see additional jobs kept there in terms of where the policy for national defence is going.

They would like to see a new direction by national defence to increase the use at CFB Cornwallis and particularly perhaps even put a peacekeeping training centre at CFB Cornwallis.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–18, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada–Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada–Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Do I understand that there is unanimous consent to proceed with report stage of this bill today?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? With leave of the House, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Danis (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I will not take a great deal of the time of the House today for debate on third reading of Bill C–18.

I might point out that my colleague from the New Democratic Party was intending to ask for unanimous consent to introduce an amendment which I can tell the House we would have opposed. This was not because of the amendment but because of its late arrival and not having had the opportunity to examine it.

However I have given him a commitment on behalf of the Minister of Finance that we will look at his proposal very carefully and give it consideration in the next technical bill that comes from finance at a later date.

Before I get into covering the items in the bill I want to thank the finance committee and all those who participated in the consideration of this bill and others.

Madam Speaker, in this fall session those involved in the finance committee, as well as legislative committees dealing with finance matters, have done a great deal of work in committee. There has been good discussion and great co-operation among the parties. I think that unfortunately the public from time to time bases its views on the proceedings here in the House of Commons during Question Period. That may not be the best place for people to understand what goes on in this place and in the other place as well. I appeared before the Senate last night. The work that goes on in committee and in debates in this House, other than Question Period, is most productive under most circumstances.

• (1020)

The work that has been done this fall with the finance and legislative committees dealing with financial matters has been tremendous. That is my area of concern as you know, Madam Speaker, so I can only comment on that. I know other work has gone on but the work has been tremendous and I just want to at this time publicly thank all those who have been associated with it.

A fair and efficient tax system plays a very vital role in creating the stability that we require for growth and prosperity. The goals of equity and efficiency are at the heart of the various measures of tax reform the government has introduced as part of the agenda for economic renewal that we set out back in 1984.

Bill C-18 will help to improve the fairness and efficiency of our tax system to the advantage of Canadians in a number of important areas. The scope of the bill alone I believe testifies to that.

This bill includes Bmeasures that were announced in both the 1990 and 1991 budgets and incorporates a number of initiatives that were announced separately from these budgets. It embodies a number of amendments, mainly technical in nature, that are directed to improving administrative fairness of the tax system.

I should also acknowledge the useful guidance we have received on the technical aspects of the bill through consultations with taxpayers and their advisers. Since the measures were announced the Department of Finance has conducted extensive consultations on them and they were improved as a result of this process.

As I have suggested, Bill C-18 encompasses measures to improve the fairness of the tax system in a number of important areas. I would like to go over them quickly if I may just for a few minutes.

The Canadian tax system has long recognized an obligation to promote equality in its treatment of Canadians with physical and mental disabilities and those who are not disabled. Bill C-18 gives effect to a number of measures to improve and to broaden tax assistance for disabled Canadians. These measures were announced in the February 1991 budget by my colleague the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade. He was then the Minister of Finance. I will not go into all of them today but I would like to highlight just a couple.

The disability tax credit will be increased in 1991 by $125 to $700. The criteria for eligibility for this tax credit will be clarified to ensure greater fairness and uniformity in its application. This will increase federal assistance to disabled Canadians by $35 million a year.

The medical tax credit will be broadened for the disabled. The list of medical expenses that are eligible for the credit is expanded and non-working Canadians with disabilities will receive a credit for part-time attendant care.

The owners of buildings who undertake renovations to improve access to the disabled will be able to deduct the cost of such renovations immediately rather than over a number of years. Of course we see these renovations going on. There is more to be done. And we would encourage people whose facilities have not been converted to accommodate the disabled to do so. We believe this tax measure will go a long way in helping that to come about.

Taken together with the other changes, Madam Speaker, these measures represent a significant advance in the way the tax system promotes equal opportunities for Canadians with disabilities. The Minister of Finance and I have been conducting pre-budget consultations across the country. We met just last week in Toronto with members of the Canadian Paraplegic Association who were very quick to draw to our attention that there are further things the federal government can do to improve the lot of the disabled. We accepted their representations. They were articulately presented. Of course we are taking a look on an ongoing basis at these representations to see where we can in fact improve the fairness of the system for those with disabilities.

Bill C–18 also includes measures from the 1990 and 1991 budgets which are designed to strengthen Canadian culture. A very, very important part of being a Canadian is our Canadian culture.

This is something the government for a very long time has looked into, to see how we can improve the situation of artists and artisans in our country to assure they are properly recognized and treated fairly within our tax system.

The Income Tax Act encourages gifts of cultural property to certain Canadian institutions or public authorities by providing special tax treatment for such donations. Some artists donate their works and we want to assure that Bill C–18 covers the streamlining of the rules of governing cultural donations by enhancing the role of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board in assessing the value of such property.

There are also measures in this bill that will benefit artists directly. Artists who are employed will now be allowed to claim a deduction for expenses incurred in the exercise of their artistic employment. A self–employed artist who donates certified works to designated institutions or public authorities will be allowed to claim a charitable tax credit without having the value of those works included in income. These all come from representations made over the past number of years by artists in Canada and a commitment by the Prime Minister to assure that changes are made so that our artists are recognized. I do not believe any sector of our economy has played a more important role.

I want to now return to the sector of small business. I think there is no sector in our economy that has played a more vital role in creating growth and new jobs than the small business sector. Bill C–18 includes two measures reflecting the government's commitment to encouraging investment in small business enterprises.

The first is an improvement in the tax treatment of small business share holdings. The reason for it is because a taxpayer who realizes a capital gain on the disposition of shares of a qualifying small business corporation is eligible for an enhanced capital gains exemption of $500,000. When a successful private corporation wants to expand by having its shares listed on a Canadian stock exchange, it ceases to be a qualifying small business corporation. The result is that the enhanced capital gains exemption will no longer be available to the original shareholders even in respect of gains that accrued while the corporation did qualify for the exemption. The situation penalizes successful businesses.

Bill C–18 remedies this anomaly by allowing a small business to go public without sacrificing its shareholders' enhanced exemption. That makes abundant sense.

A second initiative that will be helpful to small business concerns is new rules relating to national labour sponsored venture capital corporations. These will encourage investment in small and developing businesses. If we have heard anything in the pre–budget representations of a common theme coming from all the associations and groups that we are meeting, it is the problem of venture capital in this country.

Our pre–budget consultations are being done a little differently this year in that we are doing it with groups altogether rather than one on one. We are meeting with groups together and they are talking to one another, which is wonderful. The National Action Committee sat in on meetings with the Canadian Bankers Association and the Retail Council of Canada and the agricultural community. They started talking to one another and understood that they had mutual problems and concerns.

When we got talking about the issue of venture capital, the theme was that we need venture capital in this country, but the solutions of how to handle the venture capital, encourage venture capital, came from three different groups, all with different ideas, all opposing the other person's idea because it would not work for this reason or for that reason.

What transpired out of this meeting was that these groups decided to get together to try and come up with a consistent presentation that they feel would work in this country to encourage venture capital. We believe that these meetings are being successful. They are being well attended, we are getting very good comments on them afterward, and the participation has been phenomenal. I just spoke to the Minister of Finance who is out west now. He had one just the last day in Winnipeg.

• (1030)

He said it was a great success. There was great conversation, groups were talking to one another and realizing we are all in this together. We all have common interests and we should all work together for the common good.

I am quite excited about the concept. After sitting in on the first two, being a doubting Thomas at the beginning of the process, I have been converted. It has been a great consultative process and one that will bring benefits to our country.

The key element to the government's approach is to ensure that all income in Canada is fairly taxed. A number of initiatives brought together in Bill C–18 are directed toward that goal, including measures relating to taxation of non–residents, life insurers and registered education savings plans. I will touch very briefly on each of these.

In the 1990 budget there were measures announced to ensure that non–residents who deal in Canadian real estate or who create mutual funds to invest in Canadian real estate are taxed appropriately. This bill also extends the tax on financial institutions introduced as part of tax reform to large life insurance companies.

There is also a refinement in rules related to registered educations savings plans. It will limit the total amount that may be contributed in respect to each beneficiary and will allow the payment of benefits to a beneficiary under a new plan only if he or she is a full–time student. These amendments with other related changes will improve control over the plans.

Other important amendments revise the system of tax benefits for residents of Canada's northern and isolated regions, simplify the computation of the investment income tax paid by life insurance companies, and implement what are known as the available for–use rules for the timing of certain expenses and credits.

This bill also touches on pension funds. This measure recognizes the advantages of investment diversification of pension funds. Before 1990 pension funds were subject to a special tax if more than 10 per cent of the assets consisted of foreign property. Bill C–18 includes the proposal announced in the 1990 budget to allow pension funds to invest up to 20 per cent of the assets in foreign property by 1994.

From an administrative point of view, from the perspective of the individual taxpayer, Bill C–18 represents a step forward by improving the administrative fairness and responsiveness of the tax system. It gives the Minister of National Revenue a discretion to this end in a number of areas.

For example, if a taxpayer discovers after the normal reassessment period has expired that he or she has inadvertently failed to claim a deduction, the Minister of National Revenue will be able to adjust the amount of tax paid for and refund any overpayment. The minister will also have the discretion to waive penalties in interest where an individual has failed to comply with the law due to extraordinary circumstances such as a natural disaster or a serious illness.

This is another area I run into all the time, especially with small businesses in which the person runs the business, does the books, et cetera. They may have missed a payment to Revenue Canada for a very legitimate reason. Automatically they get a late payment penalty, interest charges and so on. There have been extenuating circumstances to waive those. We believe this is very important especially for small businesses. The large businesses have their systems in place, it is not a problem for them. It is usually the little guy who has those problems. This will help him.

I am not encouraging people not to make their payments on time. There have to be legitimate reasons for it and there are.

Finally, this bill contains a number of technical amendments that provide relief for taxpayers in other unanticipated situations in which the existing law would operate inappropriately. Others are intended to ensure the internal consistency of the tax system or clarify ambiguous provisions.

All of these measures reflect the government's continuing concern that the Canadian tax system should be as fair and as efficient as any in the world.

For that reason Bill C–18 deserves the support of this House. Again I want to thank colleagues from all sides of the House for their work on this bill and for their co–operation.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, the bill before us today is a complex piece of legislation in line with the complexity of the subject itself.

One only need lift the bill to see the weight of the proposals in it. It numbers some 2,000 pages and it deals, as the minister has just said in his introductory statement for third reading, with a variety of measures.

We in the Official Opposition support most of these measures without reservation. They correct anomalies and unintended results in the tax system.

Certainly the measures benefiting artists, the establishment of tax regulation of international shipping corporations with their headquarters in Canada, the penalty for large corporations and the replacement property rule are areas which we had the opportunity to discuss at some considerable length in committee.

The final results are satisfactory to us. I want to say, however, that when the minister speaks of this bill in some way reflecting tax reform, I find that a rather large claim to make for what is essentially a technical bill.

As my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood will no doubt expand on in a few minutes, this bill does not deal with tax fairness. To claim that this is in some broad sense a measure of the government's commitment to tax fairness is to miss the point altogether.

My colleague from Ottawa South in the House on October 7 had the opportunity to deal at some length with the questions of tax fairness, an issue which has increased among Canadians as they recognize the growing impact of the Tories' tax policies on them and on the corporations of Canada with regard to their international competitiveness.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has brought forward a number of suggestions with regard to tax simplification which are worthy of serious consideration. I am sure he will want to develop some of those ideas in his intervention, and so I will not spend time on that question at the moment.

I do however want to say that the member for Ottawa South in his very able intervention of more than a month ago pointed out the fact that tax reform is obviously a very complex matter. It raises questions of fairness.

The government set a goal when it came to office back in 1984 to establish a greater degree of fairness in the tax system. The result is nothing of the sort. We do not have a fairer tax system in Canada.

We still have a situation in which higher income individuals and profitable corporations are not carrying by any means what would be regarded as a fair proportion of the total tax load.

The fact the tax load is grossly inflated, that is to say far too high, is another question which I will deal with in a moment. In terms of tax fairness, one would wonder about the equity of the system introduced by the Conservative government when the progress of the tax system has been reduced. The resort to sales taxes as opposed to income taxes has inevitably reduced that progressivity in our tax system and imposed yet a higher burden on the individual Canadian.

• (1040)

Let me say in that context too that the tax treatment of families in our society has to be a matter of real concern to all Canadians, and indeed I think to members of this House when they address questions on the tax system.

I would suggest that certainly nothing in this bill and indeed nothing in the government's agenda would indicate fundamental reform of the tax system so as to provide for a more equitable treatment of families, which seems to me an essential element in any reformed tax system. I regret the government did not take this opportunity or any other opportunity—I hope it might in the forthcoming budget but we will see about that—to address itself to the question of the equitable treatment of families in our society with regard to taxation.

I have touched in a few questions with regard to fairness and equity in our tax system, but I would leave it for some of my other colleagues to develop some of those ideas at greater length in response to the minister's statement that this bill introduces a greater measure of fairness into the tax system. Any Canadian would wonder very much about fairness in the tax system when they have experienced constant increases in the levels of taxation in Canada since this government first came to office.

At the root of our economic difficulties and in a sense behind this bill today is the fact that Canadians have consistently consumed more over the past decades than they have invested or even produced. Much of this consumption has been fuelled by the federal government which consistently has failed to follow a counter cyclical fiscal policy.

The minister who just introduced the bill will know very well that when this government came to office in 1984 and in the years following when it benefited from the growing prosperity of our economy as the result of measures introduced by the previous government in 1982–1983, it did not take that occasion to act as it had promised the Canadian people, to restrict government spending, to ensure that government spending was targeted to those it was intended to benefit. Instead it continued throughout a period of unparalleled prosperity in Canada to spend and spend freely, contributing thereby to a constantly growing deficit and a constantly growing debt.

The fact is that after seven years in office this government will leave the Canadian people with a legacy of a yet higher debt and a yet higher deficit. All of us know every well that this year we will see the government has been unable to live up to its forecasts. It will not be able to meet its planned restrictions on deficit spending, and what will the result be?

The fact is that the deficit spending of the government has drained much needed private savings from our economy. There is a sort of crowding out effect. The government is borrowing on the capital markets and seeking the capital which would have otherwise been utilized by private investment, thereby improving productivity in Canada and our international competitiveness instead of being used to finance public overconsumption. One result of this has been that private investors and provincial governments, for that matter, have had to seek capital offshore, thereby driving up through their foreign borrowing, Canada's foreign indebtedness.

At the same time the government, having failed and failed completely—let us not fool ourselves about that—to deal with the question of the deficit and debt, has too engaged in offshore borrowing. Canada's foreign indebtedness now stands at record heights. The fact is that Canadians are building up a problem they will have to deal with in years ahead but deal with in a way that will be painful and difficult.

I would draw attention to what happens when the government seeks to finance its excessive spending through foreign borrowing. One thing we get is higher interest rates. Higher interest rates do not result only from foreign borrowing but they certainly contribute to foreign borrowing. We drive up interest rates for the purpose of attracting foreign capital. The result is that the Canadian dollar follows along in most instances and the Canadian dollar is then placed at a substantially greater level than its real value and certainly above a level optimal for Canada's exports. As a result Canada is haemorrhaging capital at the same time that our exports are being priced out of world markets

I said a moment ago that the federal government has been living beyond its mean. To be fair, I think one would have to say that Canadians have been living beyond their means. However, instead of making things better, this government has continuously pursued the wrong mix of economic policies. It has unbalanced our economy even further and compounded both our domestic and international debt problems.

The combination of a tight monetary policy, a deliberate overvaluation of the Canadian dollar, the large government deficits which this government has not tackled in any effective manner, and the lack of any industrial strategy, have created the economic mess that Canada is in today.

When I speak of an economic strategy I have no intention of suggesting that this government should have pursued a winner's and loser's policy of attempting massive intervention in the economy to attempt to control every last detail of our economy, but rather that it should pursue those elements of public policy that can contribute to our international competitiveness.

I say that for two reasons. One reason is that Canada in the short run is going to be able to pay off its growing and worrisome foreign indebtedness which this government has incurred by exporting. There is no other way to do it. We must export to pay off our foreign debts. How is this government going to engage in exports? It is only going to be able to do so by helping to render Canadians more competitive.

Underneath that there is yet another issue. The fact is that this government knows very well that international competitiveness for Canada, for Canadians, has become the only way in which we can match and counter the effects of globalization in investment and trade. Globalization is a problem confronting every country. Some of course are dealing with the question effectively. Others such as Canada have faltered and been hesitant about how to deal with this growing phenomenon of the mobility of labour, capital and goods across the world. I say "labour" in the sense of being able to manufacture in any jurisdiction.

What has this government done? What we have seen in the past month or so is a proposal for 12 more months of consultation. Twelve months to decide what? After seven years of do-nothing policies, this government has suddenly decided the thing it must do is take another year to ask Canadian people whether they think our education system is adequate.

Is there anyone in Canada who thinks our education system is adequate? Is there any doubt in anyone's mind? Come to my constituency or that of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the people will tell you that they are dissatisfied with their education system. They know they are taxed heavily to pay for it. They know, as does my colleague from High Park who is a teacher and a distinguished school principal, that the system of education in this country is seen not only as lacking substance in itself, but rendering Canadians incapable of competing effectively in the global economy, which I described just a moment ago.

Not only has the government decided to postpone any of the decisions that might contribute in a sense on a micro-economic level to helping Canadians compete and thereby win that higher standard of living which we all see, but on the macro-economic side this government has failed as well. On the macro-economic side we see the government having become preoccupied, to put it kindly, with a monetary policy that uses interest rates as the single weapon in the government's armoury against inflation.

This is a gross distortion of government policy. The government has more tools at its disposal than merely high interest rates. The result is that we get, in the name of fighting inflation, an economy which is incapable of competing effectively abroad. We suffer from very high tax rates. We suffer from the lack of government involvement in rendering the economy more efficient, in creating a framework for Canadians to help themselves and the result is that we have what I called an economic mess earlier, an unbalanced economy, the wrong mix of economic policies.

If this government had pursued a balanced economic policy, that is one that used fiscal tools, restrained its own spending, as well as a moderate policy of monetary intervention, I think we would be in a much better economic position. Those who are unemployed, those who are at the food banks of Canada and those who see little future for their children would not suffer from the very real concerns that inflict them today.

With that comment on the bill and on the thinking behind the bill, I shall conclude simply by saying that although we intend to support this bill, I want it to be placed on record that the economic policies which this government has followed in part created the circumstances where this bill was necessary. They have been the wrong policies and misguided policies. This government must change them or certainly the next government will.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I will begin by saying that it is always interesting to listen to the hon. member from Etobicoke because he has a history of speaking on behalf of the real Liberal Party as opposed to the Liberal Party that we see represented in the rhetoric of Question Period when the various cuts that the government has made in government spending have been criticized vociferously by the Liberal opposition. The member then gets up and says that one of the things that the government has not done enough of is to cut government spending and be fiscally responsible. It has always been a great mystery to me, and I am sure to a great many other Canadians, just who speaks for the Liberal Party. Perhaps I will have time to deal with that in greater detail later on.

First of all, having to do with what the minister said at the beginning of his remarks, there was an amendment suggested to clause 91 of this bill by the Canadian Association for Community Living, which would have addressed a flaw in Bill C-18 having to do with the mentally handicapped vis-à-vis the disability tax credit.

The hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine will, I think, have more to say about that when he rises to participate in this debate, but I want to thank the minister for his commitment to consider this amendment.

This problem was brought to the attention of the committee and to the attention of the House by Mr. Paul Badertscher who appeared before the committee in this respect. He had suggested an amendment which in turn prompted the Canadian Association for Community Living to suggest its own amendment, an amendment for which we had hoped might receive unanimous consent to be put before the House here at report stage, but the government indicated that it did not feel it had had sufficient time to study the amendment. We hope that in the next round of technical amendments, as the minister said, that this problem will be dealt with.

This bill is an omnibus bill and omnibus bills always present problems for the opposition because invariably there are things in the bill that you support. In this case there are a great many things, technical amendments, housekeeping amendments, changes of language for instance to eliminate exclusive language and to use inclusive language, et cetera. A lot of these things are to some extent value-neutral, although many of the housekeeping amendments so-called are housekeeping amendments to tax measures which we have criticized in the past. Then, of course, there are things in the bill to which we take offence. So we will not be able to give our support to the bill in that context.

For instance, just to return to the question of disabled Canadians, the disability tax credit has increased from $575 to $700 per year, which obviously is a welcome change to the tax system. But the claw-back formula indexed to inflation only above 3 per cent per year is being placed on it. Surely the needs of the disabled do not increase by only the amount of inflation above 3 per cent. So we find, even in a good measure, the ambiguity of including a measure which we oppose across the board, whether we find it applied to family allowances or the disability tax credit or any other place where the government seeks to limit its responsibility to make sure that the social policy commitments that it has made in the past keep their value and continue to do so for these targeted groups of Canadians, whether they be families, the disabled or other groups, what the original policy decision intended.

Instead, we have built into a number of these social policy commitments a recipe for eventual irrelevance, in terms of monetary significance, if this formula having to do with the claw-back continues to be built in to the government's social policy commitments.

Another thing which interested us in this bill was the whole question of northern tax benefits. I think the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley will be addressing that on behalf of the NDP caucus.

Over all, this bill does not address, as the member before said, tax fairness. Surely anybody who has bothered to read the bill realizes that there is nothing in this bill which so substantially transforms the Canadian income tax system that it could be called an attempt at tax fairness or anything like it. The fact is that those elements of the Canadian income tax system which are unfair have not been addressed in this particular bill. In fact, over the life of this government the tax system in this country has become increasingly unfair.

It was not an absolutely perfect system that the government inherited in 1984 when it took over. Let us not kid ourselves. There were many inequities built into it, many tax shelters, loopholes, et cetera, tax expenditures that had been put in there by the previous Liberal government, a great many of them in the 1970s. Some of these have been eliminated but in our judgment some of the big ones have yet to be touched by this government, while at the same time it has increased the burden on middle class Canadians.

I think the icing on the cake is of course the GST which has been harder on middle class Canadians than on anyone else. I think that what we are seeing in this country is a growing sense of tax aversion, that people are feeling taxed to death. This leads to all kinds of regrettable political and ideological consequences in the sense that people are being conditioned through an increased tax load to accept the notion that some of the social programs that we have in this country need to be scaled down, diminished or cut back in some way, when in fact if we bothered to look at it in an analytical way, we find for instance a study that was done through Statistics Canada which shows that it is not social programs that are causing the deficit. It is tax expenditures, the interest rate being paid on the debt. These kinds of things are—

Mr. Milliken: What is Bob Rae doing about it? Tell us about Bob Rae and his silk stockings.

Mr. Blaikie: I am not sure what the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is saying. I cannot hear him. Is he disagreeing? I take it the Liberals are disagreeing with my claim that it is not social programs that are the cause of the deficit.

Mr. Milliken: Everything is causing the deficit.

Mr. Blaikie: He says everything is the cause of the deficit. To simply say everything is the cause of the deficit is not to be too discriminating in nature. Perhaps that is the line that the Liberals would like to take now after their thinkers' conference. It is almost a contradiction to think about a Liberal thinkers' conference.

Nevertheless, they had a conference at which they came out and finally revealed their true colours, the colours revealed by the hon. member from Etobicoke here when he spoke on behalf of the real Liberal Party: i.e. globalization is something that we have to accept and accommodate ourselves to, protectionism is passé, the Liberal argument against the free trade agreement is now proving to have been as phoney as we thought it was in 1988. They have accepted the North American free trade agreement idea. Just the other day a Liberal member of the legislature in Manitoba proposed a motion having to do with the North American free trade agreement which basically accepted the reality of those negotiations and simply asked that something be done about labour and environmental standards.

We see here the true face of the Liberal Party which is committed to the same corporate world view, to the same corporate agenda as the Conservative Party. Why should we be surprised about that? We know that the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party are funded by the same people. The same piper calls the tune. The Liberal Party is permitted to sound progressive at election time, if that means that somehow progressive Canadians can be tricked into voting Liberal.

When it comes to the tax system, let us remember that most of the unfairness built into the tax system, particularly through tax expenditures, was built into the tax system in the 1970s by Liberal governments. We still do not hear the Liberal Party collectively calling for the elimination of those tax loopholes. There might be the odd individual, like the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, who wants to replace the whole system with a flat tax, or single tax. Fair enough. I do not agree with him but at least he has an idea about what to do with the tax system.

But I very carefully said I have never heard the Liberal Party collectively, because the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is not the tax critic for his party, as much as he might like to be. The hon. member for Ottawa South is the tax critic for his party and he has not, on behalf of the Liberal Party, called for the elimination of these loopholes.

The tax system cannot solve the deficit problem by itself without changes in monetary and fiscal policy like lower interest rates. But much could be done if there was the political will to eliminate significant tax expenditures.

For example, the present tax system allows business people to deduct 80 per cent of the cost of all their business meals and entertainment, including GST. This cost the federal government over $1 billion in tax revenue, exactly the amount that was withdrawn from federal support for medicare in the 1991 budget.

When asked about this bias in favour of lunches over nurses, the finance minister talks about competitiveness with the United States. This is the famous level playing field we were promised. We level our health care system down—some would say level it completely—and are unable to make the tough-minded tax choices that we should be making in the current situation. If Canadian business depends on this tax expenditure for its very survival, we are indeed in sorry shape.

While Canadians are lining up at food banks, taxpayers should not be financing and encouraging the over-consumption of entertainment at the expense of productive investment through this particular business tax deduction.

The manufacturing and processing tax credit was introduced in the early 1970s to combat a subsidy that the U.S. provided for American exporters. In 1986 the American government repealed the tax subsidy but Canada did not repeal the manufacturing and tax processing credit. This tax credit's continued existence was justified as a way of off-setting the despised manufacturers' sales tax.

The MST has now been replaced by the GST, but this $1 billion annual tax expenditure survived the budget and in the House of Commons on February 27, the then Minister of Finance, the Minister for International Trade, defended it as if no changes had occurred in Canada or the United States.

The lifetime capital gains exemption when it was established at $500,000 in the 1985 budget brought the entire Tory caucus to its feet in one of the longest and most ecstatic standing ovations ever seen in the middle of a budget speech. I was there, Madam Speaker, and I remember it well.

In 1987 this cheering was no doubt echoed by the wealthiest 10 per cent of Canadians who received over 80 per cent of this non-taxed form of income. This provision has since been moderated. It continues to cost the Treasury about $1.7 billion a year, revenue forgone that must be replaced by sacrifices on the part of lower and middle income Canadians.

The dividend tax credit cost the government about $1 billion each year. The original justification for this measure was to avoid double taxation by compensating shareholders for part of the corporate tax paid and to encourage Canadians to invest in Canadian shares.

Given the number of corporations that manage to pay no taxes at all, this attempt to prevent double taxation often amounts to a guarantee of no taxation. At the same time there is scant evidence that the other economic goals of this tax expenditure are being realized at all.

Other tax expenditures like the subsidies given to real estate developers by which they claim depreciation on property that is actually increasing in value, the subsidy given to the corporate world through deductions for advocacy advertising, the endless deferral of corporate taxes by exaggerated depreciation of capital assets, the abuse of the interest deductibility rule for purposes other than stimulating small businesses, all add up to a truly astounding amount of money that can be called nothing other than a hidden form of government spending.

The billions of dollars spent through tax expenditures is the hidden reality behind the big lie that it is social spending. That is the cause of the deficit. It is interest on the debt, aggravated by a self-inflicted policy of high interest rates, in combination with the cumulative effect of the tax expenditure spending by successive governments that is the cause of the deficit.

The removal of the tax expenditures in question, complemented by a more progressive income tax system, particularly at the top end where now no distinction exists between the marginal rates for people earning $60,000 and those who make $600,000, and some form of wealth tax would provide billions for the Canadian government to reduce the deficit and spend on the things that would make a country truly competitive.

We are constantly being presented by the Tories with the false dilemma of having to choose between social justice and being competitive. The truth is that taxes are only one factor among many that make a country attractive as a place to invest as well as to live.

The Conservatives are making the fatal mistake of choosing what might be called negative competitiveness, sacrificing social harmony, important infrastructure, research and development and Canada's human and ecological capital, when a truly wise government would collect taxes in a fair and equitable way and invest the revenue in the things that would count for positive competitiveness in the 21st century.

Those who leave such a Canada, who would carry through on their threat to go elsewhere if we were to introduce this kind of fair tax system because they object to fair taxes spent wisely and justly will come back as so many doctors did in the 1970s from the U.S. where they discovered that a high income is not all there is to practising good medicine. Or, are we better off without them? At a time when Canadians are to be united about anything, it should be by a common quest for social justice.

Madam Speaker, if I have any time left, I would like to expand on this notion of positive competitiveness because there is more than one way to be competitive.

The problem with the free trade agreement and with the North American free trade agreement, if that it comes through, is that it will be a beggar thy neighbour kind of competitiveness: who can get down to the lowest wages, the weakest environmental regulations, the most despicable labour standards or whatever the case may be.

Now states like Georgia, et cetera are advertising: "Come down and invest here. We do not have any of those horrible kinds of regulations they have up there in Canada where you have to pay people a decent wage and respect the environment". It is not that we respect it all that much up here, Madam Speaker, but perhaps we respect it more than they do in Georgia. It will get even worse under an agreement with Mexico.

The other way to compete, Madam Speaker, is to compete the way that some other countries in the world do it like Germany, Japan, Sweden and many other countries where you say: "We are going to have the kind of research and development, we are going to have the kind of transportation and telecommunications infrastructure, we are going to have the kind of trained work force, et cetera that is going to make this a good place to invest regardless of the fact that we may have higher taxes and expensive social programs".

That is not the way this government is going. It is not the way North America is going. I regret it. It is a kind of vicious cycle that we get into instead of what economist Robert Reich, for instance, has suggested is the kind of virtuous cycle that we should get into, building upon our strengths, building to be competitive rather than dismantling to be competitive which is exactly the kind of competitive atmosphere that we have ourselves into now.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, first, before I ask my hon. friend from Winnipeg Transcona a question, I would like to clear up some of his assertions.

He made a comment concerning my colleague, the member for Etobicoke North. The hon. member is accurately reflecting the spirit that exists within the Liberal Party right now, that is, one where we are debating all sides of these very complex issues.

We are not too concerned about the fact that he is debating complex issues from time to time. It is natural that we seem to have in the spirit of honest debate slight differences of opinion. I want to clarify his point about the Aylmer Liberal think-tank conference.

The hon. member should know that this was not a Liberal think-tank conference. It was organized through the initiative of a couple of keen Liberals but in fact we had people there speaking to some members of our caucus and other members of our party at large.

The speakers were in fact mostly non-Liberal. We opened our party up to the views of New Democrats who were present there, to Conservatives and to people from all over the world because we were trying to clarify some of the complex issues that we as national politicians are facing today.

The thing that disturbed me a little bit were the member's assertions about our history as Liberals in contributing to the complexity of the tax system. I think we as Liberals have toB accept some of that fault and I believe most would. However, he is being rather unfair because he is forgetting that his New Democratic friend Premier Rae during the last election ran on a campaign of fair taxation in the province of Ontario. I thought he did the right thing by making that a central issue in his campaign.

However, since he has come to power, like the Conservatives, he basically has only set up a fair taxation commission. In the process of his attempt to try and do something constructive, he has so frightened the investment community in regard to his approach that the flight of capital, specifically in the province of Ontario, has been reduced in the last year by almost 50 per cent.

My question to the hon. member is quite simple. Does he not realize that attracting foreign capital to this country is essential for job creation? It is absolutely essential for job creation, in my opinion. Does he not realize that attracting foreign capital must be done through the tax system? I would just like to have his remarks on that.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, perhaps the member himself or somebody on behalf of the Liberals could say what they mean by attracting foreign capital through the tax systems. If this means making Canada some kind of tax haven where people can come here and make money and not contribute to the country, then I am not interested in that kind of capital attraction policy.

You mentioned the Government of Ontario. Again, with respect, you are trying to have it both ways. It is ludicrous to compare the policies of the Ontario NDP government with the policies of this government. This government has gone to great pains to say how much it is different from and opposed to and against the policies of the Ontario government. The Ontario government is constantly being vilified by this government for following an entirely different economic policy with respect to the deficit, et cetera.

With respect to taxes the member has said that it has established this fair tax commission. Nothing has happened, because the commission has not reported yet. The member is saying: "How come we have not acted", and at the same time is saying: "The very fact that they even established the notion of fair taxes is driving capital out of the province of Ontario". Which is it? Are you saying that it should have established a fair tax system earlier and, according to your analysis, driven more capital out of Ontario?

The problem is, as the hon. member knows or maybe did not have time to say or is not willing to admit, that the problem in Ontario is not related so much to the NDP government or to anything happening with respect to domestic policy. It is related to the free trade agreement.

It is the awful misfortune of the NDP government to be elected just at the time when the effects of the FTA are kicking in, in Ontario. If the Liberals are telling me that they do not think it is the FTA that is wrecking the Ontario economy, I wish they would get up and say so. If that is an analysis they reject, I would like to know it and I would like to see it on the record. The fact is that it is the FTA.

When I hear members of the provincial Government of Ontario talking about the recession, I say it is not just the recession. It is not like any other recession. It is the North American continental economy kicking in, in a way that Ontario will never recover from regardless of whatever policies any provincial government ever has, unless we find a way to extricate ourselves from the free trade agreement and from the upcoming North American free trade agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I have a few questions for the hon. member of the New Democratic Party.

It is said that capital is leaving Canada, that business people are moving to the United States and that there is a brain drain toward the United States. It is said that about 50 per cent of our university graduates and qualified technicians are moving to the United States. This means we are training them for the benefit of the U.S. The main reason is, of course, that in the United States they pay 25 per cent less income tax than we pay here in Canada.

Unfortunately people move to the United States because they will have 25 per cent more disposable income. Some people say the socialist system is efficient and satisfactory, but I think we are going bankrupt with all this, and the statistics are there to prove it. Two weeks ago the statistics were right there in the media to prove it.

So the reason is clear. A study prepared by a consulting firm in Montreal said that in the United States a person who earns $100,000 and pays for exactly the same services we get in Canada or Quebec—and especially in Quebec, because the study was made for Quebec—whether we are talking about medical care or anything else, that person has $25,000 more left in disposable income. That is how the system works, and if the government is asked to control practically everything, you have a socialist system, a system I do not favour because it always costs the government two or three times as much to run something people could run themselves.

It means that if the private sector is given a chance to offer those services, they are likely to be cheaper. We have the proof right here: it costs 25 per cent more in Canada than in the United States.

My question is this: If individuals and companies move to the United States because taxes are too high in this country, isn't it obvious that these services are costing us too much in terms of the way we are taxed in this country?

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I am shocked to hear that comment by the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois. I hope Quebecers come to know about this view that the health care system in Canada is a form of socialism which the hon. member rejects.

If you take the analysis that the hon. member has offered, that someone making $100,000 a year is able to get the same kind of health care in the United States and still have 25 per cent more disposable income I do not know whether that is true but let us say for the sake of argument that it is. The fact of the matter is that one of the reasons Canadians who are making $100,000 a year have less disposable income in this country is because they are kicking in to a health care system through the tax system that provides health care for all Canadians in such a way that the person making $100,000 in the United States is not contributing to a health care system that would look after the 35 million Americans who do not have any health care insurance whatsoever.

From the perspective of somebody who makes $100,000 a year, the United States looks pretty good. That is to look at things only through the eyes of individuals and not to look at the common good or any notion of social justice or any notion of a country or anything else. It is this kind of small l liberal, individualistic analysis of reality that is getting us into all this trouble. I cannot get it through my thick head, as some would say, why people would decide to move to the United States simply because they could have a little more money. If that is all being a Canadian means to them, then good riddance.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence and I have agreed to switch.

Before I came in this morning to speak on this bill, I had the occasion to talk to one of my friends on the Hill about a couple of mutual friends, Colin Sparling, a horse trainer from Sydney, Nova Scotia and Peter Berringer, a horse trainer from Aurora. We were talking about the lives of horse trainers in this country, people who get up every morning at five o'clock and have to muck out stalls and work in the cold. What relevance does this bill today have to the kind of life these people lead?

When one sees a document like this of nearly 2,000 pages one wonders how one begins to judge whether fairness exists. Before even judging fairness, one has to have the ability to understand. Like most people in this country, I cannot begin to ascertain truly whether this bill is fair.

We end up having blind faith in the bureaucrats who designed the words in this paper and hope that it achieves its end. That is why for the last two years I have been fighting hard in this House. We are getting more and more members realizing this. This week the Auditor General in his report said that the tax system, the tax designs and the tax forms of this country are not serving the clients.

We have to get back to simplicity because from simplicity we are going to begin the process of participation in a judgmental way as to what is happening in our tax system. Ultimately that is going to make all of us more accountable as politicians in this country for the taxes that we impose on our constituents from coast to coast to coast. I continue to flag that as a concern.

I want to go back to a remark made by the member for Winnipeg Transcona earlier today in answer to my question, when I asked him about the importance of using the tax system of this country to attract foreign capital. I happen to believe one of the most central problems we have in this country today is the flight of capital. The number of people fleeing this country with their capital because of the tax designs, whether individuals or corporations, is becoming a serious problem.

The New Democratic Party member for Winnipeg Transcona treated this issue rather lightly. I think he was being a little bit too defensive about the actions taken by the New Democratic government in the province of Ontario. I do not think it is linking the importance of capital to job creation.

The member said he did not want to make Canada a tax haven. I never said we should make Canada a tax haven, but I would not mind having international investors, local businessmen or local individuals who have accumulated wealth feeling this was a tax haven. I would not mind if every wealthy person in the world wanted to park their money in financial institutions in this country. I would much rather have the money here in financial institutions than in the islands or in Switzerland or in California where we have over one million Canadians right now. Many of them will say they are there because of our current tax act.

• (1130)

What is the importance of attracting that foreign capital to this country? Financial institutions only make money when they rent capital out. That is how our financial institutions make their money. When we have our financial institutions loaded with capital they compete with one another. The only way they can compete is through lower interest rates. That is what ultimately leads to job creation. When entrepreneurs can borrow money at 4 and 5 per cent and when banks have so much capital that they want to push money out, that is when the entrepreneurial spirit of this country gets revitalized.

When the 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country have access to capital so that their creativity and their productivity can be exploited to the fullest, it creates jobs. That is how we lower the draw on our unemployment insurance fund. That is how we lower the draw on our welfare fund and that is how we attack the deficit and debt of this country.

I cannot understand why the government cannot see this issue. I cannot understand why it is not altering the tax designs of this country to attract foreign capital. The current tax designs are a disincentive to entrepreneurship. They are disincentives to productivity. I hear this from my constituents. I hear this from Canadians day in and day out. When is the Government of Canada going to do something to radically reform the tax system of this country so that it is fair? In order to get fairness, in order to judge fairness, you need simplicity and ultimately it will lead to efficiency.

Once again we have some minor amendments to the tax act of this country by Bill C-18. These minor amendments are close to 2,000 pages. As my colleague for Ottawa South and my colleague for Etobicoke North and many other colleagues in the Liberal Party are going to say throughout this debate, we must start giving Canadians some hope that we are going to finally change the tax act so that it is more simple and that it is more fair.

I want to go back to the capital flows that are so important in this country. For the last two to three weeks the Minister of Finance has been standing up and saying: "Interest rates have come down 5 to 6 per cent in the last eight months. Look at the way we are operating this economy".

Ask any entrepreneur in this country right now if it is easy to get capital to either maintain a business or to expand a business. Ask him if he can go to a bank and find out how it is treating its lines of credit. Ask how the banks in this country are treating new starters. Madam Speaker, if you can find more than 10 serious projects then I take my words back. I only hear from entrepreneurs. Whether they are people employing five or five thousand people, they say there is a serious shortage of credit in this country right now even though we have interest rates that are the lowest they have been in 10 to 12 years. The reason why we have that problem is because we have a shortage of capital in this country. We have to do things to attract capital. We have to do things to stop the capital outflow from this country.

Someone could be making a million dollars a year. Someone could be an actor who makes $10 million a year. Why do we not change that tax design to keep that capital here so that capital can be used and rented out by financial institutions to entrepreneurs to do anything and everything from restaurants to auto parts, to service industries, to tourism, to whatever?

Why can we not do that? We can do that, Madam Speaker, if the government would just have the political will and listen to the people. The minister of trade just four weeks ago talked about consultation, consultation and consultation for competitiveness. If this government were serious about competitiveness—and I cannot believe it is not serious—it would listen to the person who is working on the shop floor and the person who is working in the office. They will tell you. They are not just telling me. I know other colleagues—even members of the government—are hearing people asking for some fairness in the tax designs of this country. That is the single most dramatic way to increase the productivity in this country. Productivity is ultimately what investors look for. That will attract foreign capital.

There has been a lack of political will to come up with a comprehensive approach to tax reform. I can remember the member for Welland—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe heading up a task force on tax reform when he was in opposition. It was a good task force that went coast to coast listening to Canadians. And the government did say when it came in: "Phase I is tax reform". Madam Speaker, the government did not get into it deeply enough. It was amendments on top of amendments.

What Canadians are saying is to stop running the economy of Canada through the Department of Finance or through the tax system. There are so many rules, regulations, exceptions and exceptions to exceptions that we no longer understand how this tax act works. Use the tax instrument to collect revenue. When you want to do things in terms of social policy or in terms of aiding a specific sector, do it through direct program delivery through department by department. Do it in a way that the people's money in this country can be accounted for rather than burying it in a 15,000-page tax act.

Madam Speaker, I believe that we are at a critical point in this country's future. The will of this country is fragile right now.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the wish of the House to suspend the sitting for a few minutes to the call of the Chair?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 11.37 a.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 11.46 p.m.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. members for their understanding of the situation. I know it must be difficult for the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. There are five minutes remaining in his intervention.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, we all wish our friend a speedy recovery.

As I was saying earlier I am trying to make this tax amendment, Bill C-18, relevant to my friends Colin Sparling and Peter Berringer.

I know and believe that if this government were to address comprehensive tax reform, if it were to send out a signal not only to the people of Canada but also to people around the world that we were going to come up with a tax design that met the test of efficiency and simplicity and fairness, just sending out that signal could change the spirit that exists within this economy. It could change that spirit almost overnight. It could just say it was going to do it in the February—March budget. If it just announced that now, I believe the recovery would begin.

This government must do something concrete to motivate Canadians, to turn on Canadians who at this time are in a state of almost chronic depression. They do not look to the provinces to do this. They look to their national government. They look to their national politicians.

When we have an opportunity like today in the House of Commons where we are talking about amendments to the tax act of this country, I think it is incumbent upon all of us to ask how this relates to the people in this country who are not tax lawyers and tax accountants and senior officials in the Department of Finance or the Department of National Revenue. How does the action we are taking today relate to the men and women of this country who are on the shop floor, who are in the back stretch, who are working in the restaurants, who are working in the hour-by-hour jobs? What will this act do to make their tax life more fair, more simple, more efficient?

This does not pass that test. Yes, there are some elements of modification in this bill that will improve fairness. However, it is tinkering; it is tampering. I was part of a government that did this as well. I am not exempting our track record on this, but it is time now for all of us to say that comprehensive tax reform is needed. The people of Canada are crying out for it, and we beg this Minister of Finance and this government to have the political will to do something by the next budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I have a few questions for the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. He says he was appalled at how much capital was leaving the country. He also said that we needed a better tax system or a complete overhaul of our tax structure. But I have yet to hear him say how he intends to improve our present tax system. My point is that Canada has a cumulative debt of $430 billion. That is not exactly peanuts. We have a cumulative debt of $430 million, with a population of not quite 27 million. The big problem facing us is that there are 11 political powers in Canada which are contradicting each other day after day. We have a striking example of what is going on now and driving up the debt.

We have a socialist government in Ontario now, in that province which accounts for 42 per cent of Canada's Gross Domestic Product, and its policies are completely opposite to those of the federal government. This inconsistency between these 11 governments leads to inefficiency, which is bankrupting us. Let us not try to find formulas. I think that the only formula that will help us understand, the only intelligent formula, is power to the provinces. Most provinces should have almost all the powers, as Quebec is asking for.

Madam Speaker, it is quite important because we are talking about the future of a country which is going broke. We must talk about it a little. The problem is that Quebec is rightly asking for at least 22 or 23 powers to be able to develop. On the other hand, the federal government wants to have all the powers. How much longer will this confrontation go on? Ten years, fifteen years, twenty years? This problem must be solved damn soon. Even if we came up with the best tax system in the world, we are still going broke day by day. For the past 20 years we have not been able to get the annual deficit below $30 billion. Something is not working there. The solution is a very high level of decentralization. We go even further than that, because English Canada does not understand. We say that we want Quebec to be a sovereign state. Maybe after that they will understand that we are right. Ontario will become sovereign, so will the west and the east, and then they may associate in some way. But the problem lies there.

Mr. Boudria: Sovereignty for Longueuil.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): No, no. That is the problem, Madam Speaker, and that is what I want to say to the hon. member. There are 11 governments in this country and that is why it does not work. You must understand that once and for all. That is reality.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Longueuil asked a good question. I will comment on the flat tax system a little later.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I want to say to the member from the Bloc Quebecois that his course, in my humble opinion, is doing more harm to fracture the economy of this country than any measure the Government of Canada is taking. If you support my view that we must attract foreign capital here in order to create jobs, I say with care and respect that when foreign investors hear that in the nation's boardroom—and this is the nation's boardroom—there are members here who want to split this country up, they will say: "How and why should I invest in a country where there is such talk?" Therefore I hope that in time we can convince him and his party that his thought process is not the right way to go. I believe the member is right that we have too many layers of government. But to throw the whole thing up and say that we should just throw this country away would be like me saying that I wanted to create my own country in Broadview—Greenwood.

• (1200)

I say to the hon. member that is a little bit too impractical for me to declare my own country in Broadview—Greenwood and then to have a country in Eglinton North.

I want to go back, seriously, to the hon. member because he has care and compassion for his constituents the same way that I have for mine.

I believe that if your constituents were fully employed, competitive, fully respected, with dignity, the idea of wanting to leave this country would probably be the last thing on their minds. I see the President of the Treasury Board sitting in this House today, one of the smartest members on that side of the House in the cabinet. He must use his influence to tell his friends in the province of Quebec that we are going to reform the tax system, we are going to put everybody in this country back to work including his own section, so that the ideas of the Bloc Quebecois can be squelched.

It is incumbent upon those members from the province of Quebec who are on the government side, as well as on our side, to say that we are going to reconstruct some ideas here that are related to creating wealth and quality of life and not just with the emotional frustration that always has existed and from time to time will always exist because of our cultural differences.

For years we have always been able to get over those cultural differences. They exist. I do not deny that. That is fine. But, if we really want to galvanize the will of the country, the quickest way is to make sure that the economy of this country is working correctly, and that ultimately will defeat the arguments of the Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment first of all my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for raising some extremely good points. One that is of great importance to all of us is to finally define for all Canadians and for members of this House the relevancy of some of the legislation that is passed.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood refers to some constituents who said: "Dennis, what in heaven's name is in this document that is an inch and a half thick? What will it do for each one of us on a day-to-day basis? How is it going to impact on the way that we pay taxes? How is it going to impact on the way that those taxes are redistributed? In fact, is there fairness in the way the taxes are imposed? And finally, how is that going to help to ensure that my own enterprise, my job, what I work for for my family, is going to be able to translate into something tangible, something material, something toward which we can work, and something which can act as a lighthouse when we come to define the objectives of this country?"

I am afraid that when I looked at the bill I could not answer his question. I am going to address some seven points to illustrate the problems that I think are inherent in something like Bill C-18 and the activities that lead up to its implementation. I could not say it any better than a constituent, Mr. Gabriel Petricca of Claudia Avenue in Woodbridge, who sent me a copy of a letter addressed to the Prime Minister. It is a three-page letter. I am not going to impose it on the House, but there are a few paragraphs that are worthy of being read simply because they illustrate the kinds of temperament, the psychological environment in which we find ourselves, a psychological environment that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood has so lucidly put forward.

We cannot be in an environment in which we are debating for the sake of filling up air time and talking about esoteric legislation that is of absolutely no relevance to the constituents of this nation.

I quote: "I'm fed up with the empty promises and committees reviewing these promises. We are in serious trouble and help is expected now. The next election is too late".

"It is totally ridiculous to have members of Parliament sit in their daily routine of so-called debates while 26 million Canadians wait for what always seems to be the result of less than juvenile decisions and totally unacceptable solutions". As an aside, perhaps we are talking about Bill C-18. "We need jobs. We need foreign investment, greater export of our products, more professional and skilled people, et cetera. I am not telling you anything you do not already know. When will some positive solutions be initiated?"

This is a direct quote from a letter to the Prime Minister, and I continue:

"Why are we selling government assets? Why are corporations relocating to the United States? Why were interest rates increased which in turn provoked a chain reaction to a downward economy? Why did we negotiate a free trade agreement without benefiting the majority of our enterprises? Why is it becoming more attractive to stay home and collect money from UIC, from welfare, from WCB, et cetera? I could go on forever, but will it make a difference?"

I am going to refer to that letter once again. We can see, just from those few lines, that there is an air of despair among many in our community of Canada. What are we doing to address that despair? If anything, all members of Parliament and all politicians should be dealers in hope. We should be offering ideas that suggest there is an opportunity to move forward.

The gentleman who wrote this letter was born, raised and educated in Canada. He engaged in an entrepreneurial environment for the longest time with some success. He was responsible for 15 people working directly as a result of his initiative and responsible for an additional 100 to 150 other jobs which indirectly flowed from his activity. He is virtually bankrupt. I guess when he looks at Bill C-18 he will say: "So is this Parliament".

We would take a look at it and we would ask: "What is the scope of this legislation?" The minister says: "It is designed to introduce fairness in the system". My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood says: "Okay, let us talk fairness, but let us talk results as well".

If we introduce a sense of fairness, is it going to produce more jobs? Is it going to change the psychological environment which reconstructs the Canadian desire to invent, to engage in commerce, trade and manufacturing? Are we addressing what this country needs desperately today? It needs a revitalization of the economy, a revitalization of the kind of commerce in and among provinces that will give each and every Canadian a stake in this country.

Bill C-18 professes to address a fairness package in which the revenue minister, for example, would allow all Canadians to go back five years instead of three to claim additional tax refunds and credits and in which the minister would waive interest charges and penalties in meritorious cases. This is another example of the kind of tinkering that suggests a lack of scope and a lack of vision. We do not see the larger picture. We are looking at the trees without seeing the forest.

The government has been saying that it wants to be fair to taxpayers for an enormous length of time and yet just the other day in the Auditor General's report we find that 37 per cent of all adult Canadians, 6.5 million Canadians, cannot read the income tax form because it is too complicated. Fairness comes with simplicity. Twenty per cent of all people who called Revenue Canada for assistance with their income tax got no response or were misinformed, which is worse, on the implications of their tax on their tax form. Sixty-eight per cent of all people who phoned for tax information kept getting busy signals. That has to tell us that if we want to introduce some fairness in the system we must simplify the system in terms of imposition of tax, tax forms, that we make access to the appropriate departments readily available.

Forty-two per cent of taxpayers in 1987 needed help to fill out their income tax forms. We cannot speak about fairness in an esoteric term, throw out another document this size and say: "We've solved the problem of unfairness in the tax system". That is just garbage. There is nothing in here that is going to decrease the kinds of statistics that I have just given.

I know my colleague from Longueuil was talking about sovereignty in all provinces of the country. I have not heard so much hogwash in all of my life. There is no one where I come from who does not think of himself or herself as an integral component of Canadian society and regards everybody else, all other 27 million who live in this country, as being one and the same in terms of equality, in terms of the way they are to be treated and in terms of accessibility to their government; the government which resides presumably in this House.

Eighty per cent of the people in a York University study indicated that the tax system is grossly unfair. I know my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood would identify with that. He has proposed a system that would make it much more fair, a single tax system. It is worthy of study. Eighty per cent of Canadians would agree with him.

The people who have sought tax reassessment are not given any explanations under current legislation as to why the department changes its original assessment. There is too much, if you will, discretion on the part of the department.

That is just one of the components. I want to refer back to what we were talking about earlier. One component is fairness in tax; another one is what we do with a tax and why we implement tax.

Before I go on to that second point, I think it is worth reflecting on finance department statistics. They are dated October 25. The fact that we got them only last week in our offices—and they refer to statistics of August 1991—suggests that information is slow. I have to assume that there is a conspiracy about it all that works against members being current on all information.

Here is some of that information. For this year personal income taxes so far have gone up. We are in the midst of a recession. Somebody in this House and others throughout this country suggest we are in a double dip. This is a recession on top of a recession. Personal income taxes went up in the first eight months of this year.

For the first eight months of this year, while we are in a recession, personal income taxes go up. Unemployment went up. Where is the government getting this additional revenue? It certainly is not getting it from people who are working because we have more and more unemployed. It has to be through squeezing the tax system because obviously people are paying more in personal income taxes. It is a ridiculous situation.

Second, the bill proposes to exempt Canadian based shipping companies from paying taxes on international earnings because it says this might create an additional 1,000 jobs per annum over the course of the next 10 years. Members on both sides of this House and in particular in the opposition have been more than gracious, more than patient, more than civil in giving the government the benefit of the doubt on most of its projections.

The projections for the free trade agreement said it was supposed to create jobs. We are faced with a 13 per cent decline in the manufacturing sector. We are faced with 226,000 jobs lost in Ontario alone over the course of this last year thanks to, in large measure, the free trade agreement. We are faced with a severe problem among older workers because of a lack of adjustment training programs for them and the piddling little amount that the government threw out in its last package of $15 million.

When you work out how many people are going to be relying on that, it is less than a piddling amount, it is an absolute insult. It does not all have to do with money, but it reflects the government's lack of conscience in having prepared its citizens for a tremendous change, a structural change, economically and socially. Fifteen million dollars is about the same amount as Judas Iscariot got about 2,000 years ago.

I remind the House that while we are talking about producing little trinkets and little adjustments to the act in order to promote international trade, for the first time since 1976 we have a deficit in foreign trade. This is a country that makes its living from trade. This is a government whose livelihood depends on foreign trade. Regarding all of the government's estimates and all the government's projections and all the government's initiatives, as my constituent said, we do not know where they are going. Where are they taking us?

Let us stop fooling around and tinkering with legislation and let us do as my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood says. Let us be definitive. Let us say we are going to turn this country around and engage in a significant initiative, instead of setting up another commission to find out whether we are going to be competitive. We can darned well be competitive, but let us see what the government is going to do.

The third item under this legislation is going to extend capital taxed insurance companies. This tax has been applied since 1988 to trust companies and banks that have assets in excess of $200 million. The capital tax is intended to be an alternative income tax in lieu of appropriate income tax. Again this is further tinkering.

It will be instructive for the appropriate minister to understand that the finance committee chairman has already noted that between 1988 and 1990: "The life insurance industry was making a billion dollars a year in profits and was paying essentially nothing in income tax". Can you believe that? It is no wonder that Canadians get disheartened when a government, which wants its citizenry to make sacrifices left, right and centre, is not addressing some of the basic inequities of our system.

Corporate taxes as a proportion of over-all tax revenues have decreased from 15 per cent of the total in 1984, when this government came into power, to a mere 8.7 per cent in 1990. The proportion of personal income tax has increased from 49 per cent of total revenues in 1984 to 56 per cent last year. Again I refer to finance department statistics of this year. Revenues from corporate taxes dropped in the month of August by more than 50 per cent. They are down year over year, from last year until this year in August, by a full 26 per cent. A large measure of that is due to the fact that the economy is on the skids thanks again to our own government. A good deal of that is due to a lot of bankruptcies as a result of government initiatives. At the same time, personal income taxes have increased.

If this bill is going to address some of the inequities—and remember the government says it is going to be a fairness package—I would like to point to a fifth item, and this is one that really grates on everybody's sense of justice. Changes are going to be made to the disability tax credit of $575 to $700 annually, an increase that is supposed to result in about $35 million to a total of $200 million and extend a medical expenses tax credit of $5,000 to non-working disabled.

My colleague who sat on the committee on the disabled with me is going to be absolutely upset when he gets up to speak. This is crazy. It is just absolutely shocking.

• (1220)

It is another pittance thrown in the direction of the people who need it most. These people are Canadians who have been working for Canada for all of their lives and want an opportunity to access entrepreneurialism and their government in a way that everybody else does. What do we do? We come across with a gift, just a little something to keep them quiet. It does not even meet the level of inflation.

What else is this bill going to do? The bill will allow shareholders in small businesses to go public with their shares and to still benefit from the $500,000 capital gains tax exemption.

My colleague says: "This is good". It is good. Do you know why it is good? Because if anything is required for small businesses today it is cash flow. What all businesses need is access to money. My colleague for Broadview—Greenwood indicated that there is no money. You cannot get any. It does not matter if the interest rates are low, you will not get any money. Part of the reason is because a lot of the equity is being devalued and you cannot raise money on equity that is not there. This is just a small part of the government's high tax policy, high dollar policy and high interest rate policy of the last year and a half. It is almost like Paul's conversion on the way to Damascus. Finally we see the light. We are going to do something. Let us tinker instead of changing the whole bloody system.

How much longer are we going to wait and for how long are we going to tinker as the economy collapses around us? That makes me an interventionist. I would rather be accused of intervening on behalf of all Canadians than sit here twiddling my thumbs saying: I cannot do this, I cannot do that. When I look at this item of legislation I see that if I change a comma, a semi-colon or a word, that could have severe implications. Give us a break.

If this government is going to be serious then let us put Canadians back to work. Let us give Canadians an opportunity to look forward to a life that is at least as good as the one they enjoyed a few years ago and one that they can promise to their own children and to their own families.

Bill C-18 is not doing that. In fact when I speak about families, one of the things this bill addresses is the registered education saving plan limits. It wants to ensure that people do not avoid too much taxation. Are we ready for this? This is after I pointed out that the government already says that taxation of personal income has increased. In a year of recession the limit is set at $1,500 annually per child. When I think of someone who has four children I find this offensive.

Since 1986-87 federal spending on education and training has increased by a mere 6.5 per cent. Inflation over the same period has gone up 25.5 per cent. That means there has been a negative contribution by the federal government on education. This is the same government that is talking about increasing R and D and doing something else in order to establish our competitiveness. How are you going to establish competitiveness if you do not have any faith in your own population?

This kind of contribution is the lowest since 1983. This is pouring salt on the wound. The government then imposes a 3 per cent tax on university student loans attacking those who are obviously most in need and those who are most in a position to do something about our competitiveness. It does not mention the GST on textbooks at all.

There are so many inherent contradictions that one boils into a rage when thinking about this kind of legislation. I would like to read more of that letter from a constituent. The letter is more apropos the kind of discussion we have in this House than virtually anything that any member can say here in defence of government policy or initiatives on a partisan basis. I will defer to your request to stop and answer any questions that might come up. But I thank you for listening.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his intervention. As a former educator I know how interested he is in making sure that students who have the ability and want to complete their education will be allowed to do so.

This year my daughter began her studies at Carleton University. Some of her friends from the secondary school she came from could not attend university because one of the spouses lost a job or the family income was just too low to allow them to go to university. Students with even higher abilities than my daughter and students who could complete post-secondary education did not go. They had to go to work because they could not afford to go to university.

This week my daughter tells me that already at Carleton the professors and the administrators are announcing that the tuition fees for next year will go up by 20 or 30 per cent. What impact will this have on the secondary school students who want to go on to university next year?

Mr. Volpe: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. As I mentioned a moment ago I am also a parent so I am not talking as a politician. We are accused today of speaking only in our own self-interests and out of partisanship.

Any parent has to be worried about what is happening in our system. My own case is much like that of my colleagues. I am going to be faced with trying to budget for my children. Do I want to give them the same opportunity that my parents gave me? Of course I do. So does everybody else. But will I be able to afford it?

My colleague has given a rhetorical answer to a rhetorical question. No, we will not be able to afford it without enormous sacrifices. If we are looking at a 25 to 30 per cent increase in tuition costs alone, assuming that a student lives at home, then obviously he or she will not be able to go elsewhere because the costs will increase for education. First, they are going to be tied to home. Second, because of those cost increases in tuition, books and other appended costs—

An hon. member: With GST on top of that.

Mr. Volpe: With GST on top of that. My colleague is absolutely right.

We are going to have a body of our citizenry which is currently able to improve itself intellectually and able to improve by extrapolation the pool of intellectual resources for this country that is best able to adapt to the needs of the post-technological era.

In Canada we are already in that era. Our population is not meeting the challenges. How many times have we heard in this House that we have the highest illiteracy rate among adults in the western world? We have the highest high school dropout rate in the western world.

My colleague asks in a very sincere fashion: "What is going to happen to our population in the high schools when they see that tuition rates are going to increase as a result of this government's initiatives?" I can only suggest that the government is either being mischievous in building in disincentives or Canadians are going to respond to the market initiatives the government has created. The market initiatives say: "Kids, do not go to school. Try to get a dead end job because you cannot go to school". This is no way to develop a competitive society. It is no way to meet the challenges of a post-technological period. It is no way to build a future for our families. It is not the way my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood and I would like to see it happen for our families and all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, two Liberal members spoke earlier and they particularly mentioned capital flight to the United States and tax reform. But at the same time the hon. member for Winnipeg North tells us that businesses are not taxed enough. I do not see the logic in all that. Our businesses are leaving because they are overtaxed. You can always tax business more, but if you do that you are likely to raise prices. And who is the consumer? The wage earners. It is always the consumer who pays in the end. Let us try to be honest and speak frankly and say that it is always the consumer who pays.

Obviously there must be a good balance in a tax system. We can arouse interest here and there with what we believe are better approaches. The big problem is not so much the tax system but debt reduction. That is the big problem. How do we achieve that? As I said earlier, we must decentralize. That is the big problem. I have been dealing with it since I got here seven years ago. For six years now I have been travelling across Canada with committees on the economy, and all the top specialists say the same thing: We have to be able to get together, unions, management, research centres and universities, on manpower training and other things. Unfortunately that co-ordinated effort is not possible when 11 governments in this country contradict each other, leading to inconsistency. That is where the problem lies. Therefore, if we want to pay off the debt we must decentralize. Unfortunately jurisdictions other than Quebec want the opposite; they want an economic union so strong and so centralized that they are even willing to legislate that. English Canada wants to centralize.

Well, it does not work. That will lead to bankruptcy. Even with the best tax system in the world, if we do not improve our efficiency, if we do not create wealth, how can we share it? We must first create it; we must decentralize. But since you do not want to decentralize, we want sovereignty for Quebec. And perhaps you will understand that we are right. Otherwise, we are going to sink in the same boat with you. Since we do not want to sink in the same boat, we have decided to look after our own business. That is what we are doing, since you do not want to understand that decentralization will save Canada. But you do not understand that. Yet, that is what all the experts say. Madam Speaker, that is why I say you can talk about taxation as much as you want, but first create wealth. And to do that you must decentralize economic activity.

Mr. Volpe: Madam Speaker, I believe that all members of this House are just as confused as I am. Here is a member from Quebec, from the Bloc Quebecois, who talks like a Conservative, like a member of the government that he deserted. He deserted the government. He deserted the principles, programs and policies of the Conservative government, but he still uses the same words, the same vocabulary, and he displays, once again, the same mentality that was shown to be unfair and does not reflect today's reality.

[English]

If we are going to listen to a member such as this who says that there is a basic incoherency, Madam Speaker, I submit that the incoherency of the philosophy and program to create wealth for our country and give new hope to the citizens of Canada, Quebec, Ontario and all the other regions in the country is scary. I would suggest to my friend that the problem lies in the programs of the government of which he was a member, which proposed a very high interest rate, the highest level for the last eight years.

[English]

It is 14.75 per cent over the course of the last year, a differential between us, the United States and the world market that is in excess of what this economy can support. The kinds of taxation policies that he would have proposed are not going to be solved by decentralization. It is going to increase it.

The hon. member should be honest.

[Translation]

The hon. member should have the honesty to admit to Quebecers and to all Canadians that decentralizing economic programs in a global world, on a global market, makes no sense at all.

[English]

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to speak too long on Bill C–18 since I spoke about the area I am immediately concerned with at some length at second reading. Also, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, the critic for our party, has addressed the more general concerns that we have about this piece of legislation.

At the beginning of the debate today, the Minister of State for Finance referred to the fact that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, had spoken to him about the possibility of receiving unanimous consent from the House to introduce a few very important amendments. By the time a number of individuals had managed to work out the technical language for the amendments last night, it was too late to submit them before the 6 p.m. deadline of yesterday for introduction to the House today.

Those amendments, which I consider to be very important, would come under clause 91 of this rather thick, weighty piece of legislation that we have before us. The amendments originated primarily from the Canadian Association for Community Living which on November 8 had faxed a copy of its concerns, which are spelled out in some detail, to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance for consideration by that committee.

It would appear that that fax was either inadvertently misplaced or was not received by the chair because that particular fax was not circulated to members of the committee who, it would be reasonable to assume, therefore were not aware of these concerns. If they had been aware of those concerns, of course we might have been facing a different type of debate today than we are.

Even as late as yesterday the Canadian Association for Community Living faxed another letter, this time to the Minister of Finance, asking that consideration be given to these concerns even at this late date. If I have your approval, Madam Speaker, I will read this letter into the record because I think it is very important. It is from Dr. Raffath Sayeed, an executive member of the Canadian Association for Community Living. The pertinent points, Madam Speaker, which I think you will find of interest begin with:

On November 8, 1991, you should have received a fax of the CACL brief on Bill C-18 submitted to the Finance Committee sent to you by Dulcie McCallum of the CACL office. We understand this Bill is before the House of Commons tomorrow with the vote deferred until Monday next. A second copy of the brief is attached to this letter and faxed for your convenience.

It is critical that the amendments to the Income Tax Act be inclusive of people with mental disabilities without showing any disrespect in the process. Our submission to the committee could have guided a possible amendment to the definition section. This does not appear to have happened. This may simply be due to the fact that our brief appears to have been inadvertently misplaced or not received by the office of the chair. It has not yet been circulated to the committee.

It is important that, at the very least, at this stage, the definition of daily living be amended. This definition defines which persons with disabilities will qualify for the tax benefit.

Attached for your immediate consideration is a proposed amendment to section 91 of the Bill. We invite you to move this amendment.

• (1240)

They were asking the government even at that late hour yesterday to give consideration to these concerns which, through no fault of their own, were misplaced rather than discussed and considered by the finance committee when it had this legislation before it.

For the record, I think the House deserves to hear these concerns. Since the finance committee did not have an opportunity for one reason or another to consider these, I am going to take this opportunity while I am on my feet to read these concerns into the record.

These concerns are with respect to the definition of severe and prolonged impairment as it can be and probably will be interpreted under this act to the detriment of many thousands of people in this country who have a developmental handicap.

This is what the Canadian Association for Community Living said in that fax sent through the chair of that committee by Dulcie McCallum:

We understand that the purpose behind the change in definition of "severe and prolonged impairment" is to reduce the number of potential claimants of the disability tax credit and other disability related expenses. We respect the legislative intent of ensuring that claimants are indeed bona fide recipients of the benefits granted by the credit. We believe, however, that this proposed change will not accomplish that goal, nor will it ensure that all those who ought to receive the benefit of the credit, will.

2. The primary change is to give functional expression in the legislation to what presumably has been the criteria applied by physicians in certifying that a person is "markedly restricted to his activities of daily living". The amendment seems to restrict what was apparently a broad interpretation being given to those words by physicians. We applaud the move away from a model that bases a finding of disability within the discretion of professional medical experts. Unfortunately, very little that is listed makes sense in the context of people with mental handicaps. There appears to be an emphasis placed on physical disability and a fundamental misunderstanding of what it means to have a mental handicap. There is considerable work being done at the present time in a number of jurisdictions (B.C., Yukon, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick) on the question of how you properly determine when an individual with a mental disability requires support in making decisions. The traditional form of assessment has been called into question throughout these reviews. We question whether or not the definition as is proposed will not force people to rely on traditional medical assessments which in the case of people with mental handicaps is wholly inappropriate.

3. It is unlikely that most people with mental handicaps would consider themselves as being "markedly restricted" in "perceiving, thinking, and remembering" and yet little else in the "basic activity of daily living" shopping lists relates to their situation. What it means to have a mental handicap, for the purpose of your definition, must be distinguished from having a mental illness. People with a mental handicap historically referred to as "retarded", perceive, think, and remember in the same manner as all of us. The only difference may be in how quickly they are able to think and make decisions. The negative consequences of the proposed amendment is that people with mental handicaps will, in order to receive the benefit of the disability tax credit, be forced into conceding that their ability to perceive, think, or remember is markedly restricted which in the great majority of cases is not true.

4. The result is that a significant number of individuals with mental handicaps who, by an appropriate test, ought to qualify but who are not prepared to concede that their ability to perceive, think or remember is markedly restricted will be excluded. Further, since any restriction on the ability to perceive, think and remember can only be measured in a purely contextual and individual way, it is essentially meaningless. On this basis, this definition ought not to go forward.

5. The fact that the definition includes a subsection designed for "greater certainty", which excludes all other activities causes us considerable concern about how the bill protects the interests of people with mental handicaps. Because of the nature of the mental handicap, some people may only require support in employment and house management. The intent of the legislation could not have been to disentitle a taxpayer from the disability tax credit when that person has a mental handicap and is working and living semi-independently with support. That, however, is our reading of the legislation for the individual who can perform the basic activities of daily living listed in section 118.4(1)(c) of the bill.

On another matter, attendant care, I quote:

> One cautionary note regarding attendant care. As an association dedicated to promoting communities where families and friends provide natural supports to people with mental handicaps, we respect the principle that families ought not to be paid for doing what is considered to be their duty. However, as we have seen in the case of parents who have chosen to remain in their home to care for their children, their work is often devalued because it is unpaid. We continue to seek means by which the tax and other systems can acknowledge the value of that work. Similarly, for spouses of people who require attendant care, their work needs to be valued. We must focus on the reality of such situations. Is it not preferable to financially support a couple to stay together and permit the required attendant care to be provided by a loved one, rather than forcing the spouse to seek work outside the home in order to avoid financial peril? I would propose that this be considered and resolved in your deliberations.

It goes on to urge the government to take that into consideration even at this late date.

As I pointed out at second reading of this bill, I am extremely disappointed, to say the least, that for the last 10 or 11 years or so this House has had a standing committee with a mandate to increase awareness around issues affecting Canada's disabled population. That committee has tabled countless reports in this House which have been agreed to by members on all sides of the House. These reports have not only been agreed to, but agreed to with great enthusiasm as it were, and yet we are faced with this kind of legislation that is totally contrary, if not offensive, to a huge chunk of Canada's population who happen to be developmentally disabled.

If the bureaucrats are not prepared to listen to what committees have to say, I have to wonder whether the politicians are even listening to what these people have to say. We are their political masters. This kind of language which is, as I said earlier, offensive, is going to deprive a whole number of Canadians who are presently in receipt of a benefit under our tax laws for very good reasons. They will in the future be denied that tax benefit.

We are in a situation where rather than going forward, as we should be going, we are taking steps backward. I have to say again: Why is that happening?

I also want to say that it is not too late simply because the committee did not receive the brief that it should have received. It did not have an opportunity to consider not only the concerns, but the very good arguments that were presented by the Canadian Association for Community Living.

• (1250)

Since the House cannot receive these amendments based on purely technical reasons, even though our critic, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona attempted to get the minister's agreement for unanimous consent to proceed with it in the House today, what could happen if the minister were open to this suggestion is that in the instructional bulletins that interpret this act which will come after the bill is passed, the minister could, if he had the political will, make sure that the interpretations being given to this act by people within the income tax department follow the principles included in that letter to the Minister of Finance.

It is not too late to do something about it. I would simply urge the Minister of Finance to do just that.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the member who continues to show his caring and compassion for the disabled community of this country.

He has articulated well the problem of having a complex tax design. One of the reasons we should take the disabled factor out of the tax design is because there is so much variation from disabled person to disabled person.

We have over two million disabled in this country. I think rather than to try to lump people into a complicated section of the tax design, it would be better to deal with disabled people through direct program funding in which every case could be treated with individual design.

I was just wondering if the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine would care to elaborate on program funding. It does cost the taxpayer in a direct way but very few Canadians realize that even in the form of a tax credit it is still a cost to the Treasury. We do not seem to be able to deal with the individuality of every case this way. If we did it in a direct way, I think it would be much more fair.

I would like to have the hon. member's comments on that.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood for his question. There are a number of approaches taken, not only in this jurisdiction but in other jurisdictions, which would allow disabled persons to participate fully in the mainstream of society.

Some people I have talked to over the years say: "It is okay for you guys to talk about ending discrimination against someone who happens to be disabled, but you never want to talk about the amount of money that may cost". There are two arguments against that approach. The first I think is beneficial not only to the individual who is disabled but beneficial to society as a whole, and that is to have people who happened to be disabled in one capacity or another live a full life within society. I also think there is a cost benefit in that.

Finally about a year or so ago the United States introduced and passed with support from all segments of society legislation called "The Americans with Disabilities Act". One of the big motivators in having legislators in the United States bring forward that legislation, which is fairly progressive in terms of American society, is the huge cost to the American economy of not integrating the disabled into society.

I forget what the exact figure was but our committee went to Washington to talk to some people about that. It was estimated that the cost to society of not integrating the disabled into the community ran in the billions and billions of dollars.

The hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence was with me at the time, and he can attest to that. It is not only what may be a cost to the taxpayer through the tax system that allows someone to live within a Canadian society. It is the cost if it was not done.

I think the Income Tax Act is a tool that can be used under some circumstances. It does not come near the point of addressing the problems that the disabled individual has in living in Canadian society. They will only be addressed once we have finally recognized that a disabled person has the right to a job, the right to transportation, the right to recreation, the right to every right that an able-bodied Canadian has.

Unless we are prepared to face that and make some decisions in a very clear way, the concerns that Canada's disabled population has will never be addressed. You cannot tinker with the Income Tax Act to address that. It is a part of the tinkering. It is certainly not the solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Madam Speaker, on a point of order I would like to know whether there is unanimous consent for continuing the debate during lunch time.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, our party has been consulted. We agree to that, providing there will be no quorum call or any other such motion utilized during that period.

We also only agree for the duration of this bill, and not to start any new legislation. Providing that is the case, we agree.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, we also have been consulted and would agree to the request made by the hon. member with the conditions outlined by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[Translation]

Mr. Champagne: That is exactly what we had in mind, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, I agree because I think this is a very important matter, especially for the future of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief.

I am not in any way in any disagreement with the remarks made by the hon. member about disabled persons and the method of taxation that may be applied to them.

I just want to make a general comment about the whole taxation system in Canada. Throughout this debate members have been calling for a simpler taxation system for the kinds of reforms that would make the taxation system more understandable and they are giving the impression that this can be done.

The fact of the matter is that we have a simple taxation system in Canada. We simply take a percentage of a person's income. There are three levels of percentages taken from income. The approximately 300 pages of this act on top of all the other pages of taxation legislation are related to the interpretation of what constitutes a person's income.

We have a simple system. What we have grafted on to the simple system is a whole lot of rules. At this very moment the member is asking for yet another variation on the system which is the method by which we tax disabled persons.

It will mean more rules and more ramifications in the tax system and I do not deny that is a necessary and desirable goal. The point is that it will add more and more to the system.

I would just ask members, when they are talking about our tax system and the tax legislation before the House, to recognize and remember that the system itself is simple.

Mr. Mills: Oh.

• (1300)

Mr. Crosby: That is exactly my point. The remark of the member for Broadview—Greenwood is exactly my complaint. He wants to pretend that there can be a simple system in which you take a percentage of a person's income. That is what this system does. We take a percentage of income.

We get into all kinds of arguments and discussions and ramifications about what constitutes a person's income for the purpose of that percentage. Perhaps he knows a way around it and knows a way to tax disabled persons that would be fair to them, that would allow them to fill out their income tax and say: "That's fair, that's what I should be paying and I'll go along with that".

There is not a Canadian, I believe, who is ever going to fill out their income tax form and at the end of it say: "That's fair; I don't mind paying that tax. That will help support government services and it is my contribution". No matter what tax Canadians pay, they are going to consider it an unfair tax. There is no such thing as a fair tax, and members who try to pretend there is, in speeches in the House and elsewhere, are just trying to delude the public.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Very briefly, Madam Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not correct because the minister as he addressed the House this morning indicated that he saw some merit in the argument I just presented, and he will ask his officials to consider these arguments when they next review these regulations.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. colleague across the way as he spoke about fair taxes and the tax system. I can well remember many, many times in this House when he sat over on this side of the House in the opposition. We heard cries every day of "simplify the tax forms", "why do you make them so complicated", "it is all part of the tax system". Today we are in the same debate and tax forms are not simple today either. Nor is the scheme of taxation.

We look at this bill this morning, some 400 pages of legal language presented in this House covering subjects like an an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada–Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada–Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related acts. You have all that in this one bill.

I can remember debates in this House when people used to go into tirades because there were so many things in one bill. We see here today that the very people who used to go into those tirades are presenting this 400–page bill to the House of Commons dealing with all those taxation items. It also deals with the Canada Pension Plan, unemployment insurance program and regional development programs. They are all in one bill.

I did that to show how complicated things can really get in this place. When people start talking about simplification, I wonder. I wonder how many hidden intricacies there are in this bill that have not been identified. We have seen legislation introduced in this House in the past in which after the legislation was put into practice it was found that it was quite different than some people thought it was going to be in the first instance.

My point is that on the important issue of taxation, which is a very complicated subject, legislative members in this House are at a great disadvantage to know everything in a bill like this. To read it from cover to cover would be a nightmare because of the legal jargon in which it is written.

It has been stated in this House many times before that it is time that we modernized Parliament by producing something in layman's language to accompany the bills. Then members would not have to stay up all night or read for a half a day or a day before they could get up and talk on a complicated subject. There must be some method of simplification.

People talk about complicated tax bills and complicated tax forms. In this House we have not corrected our problem of knowing precisely what the language of these bills means.

For example, this morning the minister talked about many things in what was one of his more informative speeches. I compliment him on the many things he discussed. He talked about such things as venture capital. He discussed some other technicalities of the bill. Tax bills and customs act bills and the rest of them are written in such legal, technical language that things get by without people noticing.

For example, there is a point in the free trade act that would relate to a customs and tax issue. Eddy Match Limited of Canada took two truck loads of matches to the Buffalo Customs Port about 10 days ago. They were stopped at the border. Why? Because the statement "Made in Canada" was not in the right place on each little package of matches. That is a non-tariff barrier.

Imagine, if the company had wanted to take those matches across the border for sale it was actually required to put "Made in Canada" right under the name of the restaurant or hotel to which those matches were to go. "Made in Canada" had to be printed in the same sized lettering as the name of the hotel immediately above it. If there was a chain of restaurants or hotels mentioned on that package of matches "Made in Canada" had to be put after each one, even though the chain may exist in Phoenix, Arizona, Tacoma, Washington, or Boston, Massachusetts, et cetera. The statement "Made in Canada" had to accompany each one in each different place in the United States.

This was just an excuse to put in place a non-tariff barrier to prevent that Canadian product from getting into the United States. Why? Because there is a match company in Texas in serious financial straits. Therefore, you use non-tariff barriers on what is supposed to be a free trade border to help out your own industry in the United States despite the fact that you have a free trade agreement with Canada.

That shows a lack of credibility with that act. What concerns me greatly about a bill this size is that I am told that our officials raised this issue during the free trade talks and the Americans raised the issue. Neither one of them could come to any agreement on it, so they walked away from it and left it as it was. As a result, Canada is being penalized today because we do not have the same tax laws or customs laws with regard to the Americans bringing the same product into Canada. All they have to do is put "Made in the United States" in one line on it and it is across the border. That is on all their products.

However, U.S. customs wants "Made in Canada", and even if there are five hotels named on the package of matches "Made in Canada" must be on that package of matches five times. That demonstrates a total lack of sincerity in any free trade agreement. It is absolutely ludicrous. The Eddy Match company is now on what is called the "watch item" by the American customs and packaging regulation people. That is just one example.

• (1310)

This morning the minister mentioned something that is very dear to my heart and certainly very dear to small business in this country. That is venture capital. If there is any sector in which we are failing today, it is our inability to date to provide a proper source of the venture capital required for small business to operate. Until we get that problem solved we are not going to be helping small businesses to develop and expand in the way they should. Most of them are not looking for handouts. All they want is a fair deal. Give them the money and they will make money to pay it back.

An hon. member: And create jobs.

Mr. Hopkins: And create jobs, as my hon. friend says. Not only that, but solving this problem would help us to retain our natural resources in this country.

I will give you an example of what I mean by that. There is a company in the Ottawa Valley called Two Island Marble. It is a huge deposit and is one of the best quality marbles in the world. The family who has the property and is trying to develop it is looking for venture capital. The company can increase its business. It has all kinds of orders for material from other companies but it needs that venture capital.

What will happen if this Canada does not provide our small business people, our entrepreneurs, with a source of venture capital? I will tell you. Italy wants to buy this marble deposit. Italian business people will come in, buy it up and operate in Canada. We are sitting here with the resource on our doorstep. There are people who want to develop the company and help it to grow, who are willing to work long hours to make it go. However, while we are revamping our tax system—and these 400 pages are just a small portion of it—we cannot come up with a system of financial venture capital to help out this very important company.

An hon. member: We are tinkering.

Mr. Hopkins: We are tinkering, as my hon. friend says.

The minister mentioned that the government had three very cogent presentations about how it should handle venture capital, where it should get it, where it should source it and so on. He said that all three presented different views and one sometimes counteracted the other.

When that situation arises surely it is up to the Government of Canada to take a lead. That is why the Conservatives were elected to office. They were the ones who were going to help business. What is happening today? It is tough being a small business person out there today because there is going to be another 24.4 per cent increase in unemployment insurance levies. It has to be paid. It is there. The government is not going to pay its share. The government is not going to pay one cent toward the need for increasing the amount of money in the UI fund or help to overcome the $6 billion deficit in the fund itself. It is going to leave it up to the workers of today and the business people to pay. That is an added burden.

In addition to that, small businesses have been inundated with other plans ranging from the office work of handling medical plans, filling out endless taxation forms, filling out endless forms for StatsCanada and everything else under the sun.

They are actually running a small office for governments, whether it be Ontario, the federal government or any province in Canada and the federal government combined. Then they have their dealings with the municipality in which they exist.

They spend so much of their time and energy on paperwork that it lessens their ability to develop and enlarge their businesses, which would allow them to employ people.

We have a real challenge before us today with regard to the regional development program, the unemployment insurance plan and the Canada Assistance Plan. CAP is a tremendous plan and we have to ensure that it is in place for years to come. We have to ensure that medicare is in place for years to come and it will be much cheaper if we pay for it through taxation than through private medical plans. The Americans found that out. They pay about $350 to $400 a month for medicare coverage for their families under the private enterprise system.

Here in Canada we are very fortunate but we have to protect it. That is one area for which we should never really complain about paying taxes because the alternative is many times worse than the taxes to support medicare and the Canada pension system in this country.

I am not going to go into the details of the Canada Pension Plan requirements in this legislation. I do want to say that I note the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act. We had a Canada-Nova Scotia offshore resources agreement. I tabled that legislation in the House back in 1984.

Under this regional development plan I had occasion as chairman of the public accounts committee in the House of Commons to have the Auditor General's report before us. He was highly critical of the way money was spent under that plan.

No matter how you look at it, the more money you spend, the more tax money you have to raise. The old theory that a penny saved is a penny earned is not recognized very much today. However, it certainly is as valid today as it was 100 years ago. Do you know what that money was used for? It was used for the promotion of offshore development resources under Premier Buchanan, who is now over in the other place. They put up street lights, built streets, built bridges and all kinds of little things that were just fantastic. They built a harbour that was not used very much. All this money went into this infrastructure and very little materialized out of it.

We can never neglect the idea that regional development policies on the part of the federal government are very important to the regions of this country. At the same time, as a federal government we have an obligation to ensure that the money we hand over to somebody else is going to be spent on the things it was meant for.

How are we going to be able to say that the money that is collected should go to the Canada Pension Plan? We have a special fund for that. It is allocated there. Much of the money goes into the general taxation fund which provides a lot of flexibility in how the money is spent. Also, if an agreement is drawn up very loosely it allows the recipients of that money to be very flexible.

• (1320)

I remember Premier Buchanan of Nova Scotia blasting forth at me in The Halifax Chronicle Herald because I did not know what I was doing and so on.

If I did not know what I was doing then neither did the Auditor General of Canada. I would suggest that the Auditor General of Canada and the chairman of the public accounts committee knew more about what was going on than Premier Buchanan wanted to admit. This debate went on.

The point I want to make is this. If we are going to collect tax money in Canada to the extent that we are today, let us first make sure that the money is properly labelled and let us have some review to make sure that that money is being spent for the purpose for which it was meant in the first place. Only if we are very careful in the spending of tax dollars in all areas of government will we be able to have a firm, solid, valid and a long-term medicare plan in Canada and a Canada Pension Plan.

My hon. friend to my left who spoke on the Canada Pension Plan and some of the technicalities of it a while ago brought out some of the very specific needs in that plan. My bottom line is simply this. We have an obligation to make sure that those tax dollars are used properly and specifically. If there is any adverse spending or anyone getting great ideas that they are going to do something else with it then they should be reprimanded and brought to task for it.

I want to say to my colleague on my left here, the hon. member for Vanier, that I hope as the new chairman of the public accounts committee he will be very much on the job to see to it that the Auditor General's report is followed up on and that any inequities or any bad spending practices are looked at by that committee and recommendations are made to this House.

One good thing about the public accounts committee is that it can make some very strong reports and recommendations to this House of Commons. The government must respond to them within a certain number of days or within a certain number of months. The committee puts the deadline on that.

It is very important that we have these programs in place. Let us be good tax spenders. This is in addition to being good tax collectors as this government is certainly proving to be. Over the years it has been far beyond our means.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, as I was listening to my colleague from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke I began to think how much more productive these debates can be. Sometimes they are even better than Question Period.

We can deal with issues in a more substantive way. Here today he described well a condition that exists for a major employer in his community, Eddy Match, which through the legalese of a particular act has been frustrated in executing his job.

The member has been in this House for over 26 years. He has seen thousands of different bills come and go. I would like to ask the member if he thinks that maybe the spirit of these laws is dwindling away and the letter of the law or the bureaucracy of the law is taking precedence over the fact that these bills are basically there and ultimately there to provide a public good.

I do not say that public servants do this with ill will but sometimes I think they may lose a sense or a focus of what the Public Service is really supposed to be.

Rather than provide maximum administrative delay on a particular issue they are there to facilitate. They should be looking more at the spirit of the law rather than the letter.

Mr. Hopkins: Madam Speaker, the hon. member raises some very good points. He talked about the spirit of the laws. I would say that the spirit of the free trade law, for example, goes down the drain when you have such non-tariff barriers entering in to prevent a Canadian product from crossing the American border. Imagine this vast open market that we were promised. You go up to the border and you are stopped. You cannot take your product across the border to sell into that great open market that we debated for so long in this House of Commons.

The hon. member probably brought out a point indirectly that he did not realize. We must remember that the person who negotiated that deal and walked away from it was a long-term bureaucrat in governments in Canada. He should be ashamed of himself for having just thrown up his arms and walked away, not having looked after that part of the task.

The letter of the law. I think the letter of the law is important. I spoke about the way we should handle our finances and be very strict about that. I do not think the letter of the law should bypass common sense. I think what the hon. member was suggesting was that the bureaucracy of the law should not be a hindrance to the Canadian citizen in his or her efforts to be a successful business person or to move ahead in a venture in this country.

The hon. member talked about getting back to the basics. I think that is extremely important. I would just like to wind up my answers to him by saying that the spirit of the law has been a long-time tradition of this House. I think when you go back to try and nit-pick over the letter of the law, you are destroying the very spirit of Parliament itself. That is serious.

The hon. member talks about the bureaucracy producing a 400-page bill here dealing with about seven or eight different acts all in the same package. That really does destroy the spirit of Parliament itself. Members are sent here by their constituents to be legislators. You need to have layman's language as a guideline for a bill like this or any other legislation in this House. I am serious about this. I think there is nothing greater that could happen to the spirit of Parliament itself than to have bills written out in layman's language. They should not be allowed to be tabled in the House until that accompaniment of layman's language is with the bill.

If you do not do that then many people in this House will be voting on bills without fully knowing what is in them. With our strict parliamentary discipline system here, members get up and vote the party line. I think we are going to have to loosen that up a bit in the years to come. There is no question in my mind about that, Madam Speaker. There are going to have to be rules brought in whereby governments can only be defeated under certain conditions and the members released to vote for the regions of this country. That is a very important unity question in my mind.

If members are not well informed about legislation that is going through the House, what you really end up with is executive type government in Canada. An executive type government means that cabinet governs. It lays down the regulations. It brings in the legislation. It gets the troops out to make sure they are here to pass that legislation, and the Canadian people are saddled with the work that we do within that legislation and the carrying out of the rules that go out accompanying it. My big concern is that as society gets more and more complicated and as tax systems get more and more complicated, then we are simply going to have a lot of members in this House who do not have the privilege of having a layman's statement at hand to read the bill and know what is in it. They could then get up and give a very intelligent speech.

I think there would be better speeches in this House of Commons if that type of work was going on. It is very important that people understand. It is very important that the legislators fully understand what is going on so that cabinet does not become the executive of the country by bringing in their legislation and bringing in the troops to pass it. The Canadian public is saddled with that legislation and members of this House are not really informed about what is happening right here in this House.

If there is anything we can do for the spirit of Parliament and the spirit of real democracy in this country, that is one thing that will produce it.

I want to thank my hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood for that question.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to enter into the debate on one particular section of this large piece of legislation. It has been referred to by other members in the House today as a large piece—some 400 pages—of legislation.

I am particularly interested in just putting some comments on the record as they relate to questions around the northern tax allowance which is referred to in this bill. Essentially sections of this bill are implementing measures introduced by the government on the northern tax allowance in response primarily to a great deal of public debate throughout northern Canada and northern British Columbia in my area. This is basically in response to a report prepared for the then Minister of Finance in October 1989. There was a resulting announcement by the government in February of this year in regard to amendments to the legislation on northern benefits.

The end result of all of that is in Bill C-18 which we are debating today. Other members have talked about different aspects of the legislation. My colleague who is the member for Beaches—Woodbine spoke about the disabled. As I mentioned, I would like to enter some comments on the record about the northern tax allowance and what this bill is doing. It is such an important program as it relates to taxation for those people who reside in the northern parts of British Columbia and northern Canada.

Why is such a program so important? First, one must get a sense of how many of us live in northern and remote areas such as in my home town of Prince George and in my riding. Parts of it are remote and isolated. Of course there are may other communities in the country that are a great deal more northern and remote.

Generally speaking, what kind of services do we not have that people in large urban centres have come to take for granted? Some communities in my riding such as Grand Isle have a real problem getting adequate medical service provided. A community like Valemount has to advertise in international publications to try and get doctors to locate in that community to provide health care. Could you imagine people in a community like Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver or Regina not being able to have adequate medical care? Could you imagine simple things like banking services that do not exist in a number of those areas?

Education, for example. We are very pleased in northern B.C. now that we will be getting the University of Northern British Columbia, but sometimes it makes you feel that when you live in some of the remote areas that you have to crawl across crushed glass to convince governments of your needs. It is not that we are asking for a lot. In fact, in many cases I think the people in many northern communities are likely more patient than they really should be with their governments, regardless of which party is in office.

I think we have a great deal to do both from a federal perspective and obviously from a provincial perspective to provide that kind of balance and that level playing field, if you like, for people who live in these communities.

In British Columbia, if you can sell a case a beer for the same price in Vancouver as you can sell it elsewhere in the province then I think governments have an obligation to take a look at providing the kind of services that are needed throughout northern communities.

What we are doing through this bill that is being presented today for us is implementing a number of the follow-ups, as I mentioned, from the government in terms of administering the northern tax allowance. I want to focus on what I think is one particularly important approach to take on this tax, an approach unfortunately not taken by this report and certainly not being followed by the government.

In looking at the report which was conducted with a number of hearings in communities just prior, if I am not mistaken, to the last federal election, the government knew it was in some trouble on this issue. It was an attempt to try and really assuage a great deal of discontent in many northern ridings over this issue and so off we go with a study to take a look at the issue.

The study into the Northern Tax Allowance Program heard from Canadians and people throughout northern communities and talked about how you implement a northern tax allowance. They provided some interesting information as to why you need a northern tax allowance to provide that fairness in the tax system that we are always talking about.

For people who have a copy of the report, I refer them to page 12 where it basically gives a scenario of a community in the north and a community in the south, taking into account that often wages are higher in northern communities, often but not always, and it takes into account the cost of living and other costs.

Madam Speaker, you would be interested to know that as a result of this particular study that was done, it showed that people living in northern communities end up in fact with less purchasing power than people living in a southern community. I think this lends to my argument that the government was taking a look at this problem in its rejection of a community-by-community approach. That is in fact a mechanism and a program that we should try to follow.

The report talked about how there were many problems related to the community-by-community administration of the northern tax allowance. Indeed, every member of Parliament who has probably dealt with this issue has had some examples to give and that we have pursued with Revenue Canada and others on this program that have just been absolutely ridiculous. In my riding alone the department confused McBride Lake, which is a lake south of Houston in the western end of my riding, with McBride, B.C. which is in the eastern part of my riding. So there was a great deal of confusion over the program. There were also problems with this program in terms of its administration on simple things like on one side of the road you were eligible, on the other side of the road you were not. This report goes into some of the concerns and problems with that administration. They are acknowledged.

I think it is pretty clear that many of the problems that were identified in fact can be rectified and can be corrected with diligence by the department and with the provision of adequate information from the various agencies and ministries often that have to provide that information.

Perhaps in the rejection of that community-by-community approach by the task force and by the government, the government will eventually set up basically a unilateral line of latitude rejecting most communities that had really legitimately looked at having the northern tax allowance. I suspect they went into that with that in mind to really come up with the report that right off the top rejected the community-by-community approach in determining the northern tax allowance.

In my travels in my riding and meeting with constituents on this particular issue, I had an opportunity to meet with an accountant friend in Burns Lake who has handled for his clients a large number of the appeals that people were making on this program and he made a very interesting observation.

About a year or so ago, or longer than that, he acknowledged that there were many problems in the administration of the then existing community-by-community approach taken by Revenue Canada, but he said that they were solving the problems and that they were being handled because the department was starting to understand how to administer that program.

I thought that was an interesting observation. I followed it up with the minister and there seemed to be some indication that the number of appeals or difficulties with the program had been reduced.

In the Auditor General's report that was just released, while there are ample pages here to criticize this government for its flagrant abuse of public funds, it is interesting to see the response from the Department of National Revenue on a question that the Auditor General put essentially on determining whether in fact people were eligible for this program or not.

Of course the perspective of the Auditor General is, and of course a very important one, that the department, if you like, is not improperly assessing these claims so that we are providing providing a benefit where none should be provided.

I guess it is not very often you find people congratulating the Department of National Revenue for its work, but if we were to take its word in the report of the Auditor General and my interpretation of its response to the Auditor General, in fact a computer check by the department of 1988 and 1989 returns of people using or applying for this northern tax allowance in fact indicated and I quote "a reduced risk of non-compliance", i.e. you are cheating, in this area in 1989. As a result enforcement resources were deployed to other activities.

I think that gives some weight and some evidence to the comments from my constituents, in particular the accountant I referred to, that in fact the department was getting a handle on how to deal with this community-by-community approach. That shows clearly in my mind the commitment I have to developing this community-by-community approach, and that in fact it can work. I think that is a more logical and more consistent way to administer a program like this as opposed to the very arbitrary line of latitude that the government has in the end adopted.

In fact, I am doing my homework and work on this and have asked for a report to be written on developing a proper community-by-community approach that can be dealt with under this program so that communities such as Valemount, Vanderhoof, Fort St. James, Houston and other communities can in fact fit into this system. I think there is a good reason for that, and the good reason is this: If it is the government's goal, federal or provincial, to provide a degree of services to all of its citizens that we have come to expect—and in many cases I think we should demand—then how is it that we discipline ourselves and our own governments to see that that is in fact done? I think there is reason to develop a grading system, depending on the remoteness of a community. If it does not have a lot of the services, then develop a scale. If the government takes the initiative and ends up providing that school or that hospital or that medicare or an entrepreneur or a bank comes in and provides another service, fair enough, drop down the scale. Then we have a way to measure the quality of services that I think all of us deserve whether we live in Vancouver, Regina, Vanderhoof, Penny, Burns Lake or Fraser Lake. That is the kind of system I see being developed here. Unfortunately this government in this legislation is taking a step backward in providing that. Eventually I think we will see basically the complete elimination of this program. That would be bad news obviously for many of the residents of northern Canada.

It is going to take some additional work for those communities that have been successful in the boundaries provided by the government. We also have a new opponent on this, the Reform Party, which is now opposed completely to any kind of northern tax allowance. I think that will come as quite a surprise to many of the former Conservatives mostly who are taking a look at the Reform Party. I think they will be quite surprised by this backward step, which of course we have come to expect from the Reform Party, that is being taken by that party. It is my view, of course, that in the rush to really be Conservatives in drag, if you like, or their concern that the Conservative Party, and even this party, has not been right wing enough in its application of its economic policies, they are trying to outdo even the Conservative Party, and in some cases obviously they have been doing very well. So, the Reform Party and the Conservative Party are united on this. It is another opponent that people who live in northern and remote communities will have in order to try and guarantee the kind of services that we need and I think deserve to have in this country.

It is an important part of a very substantial piece of legislation that I think residents of northern communities should be aware of. I will certainly be informing my constituents in those areas about this legislation, about the changes that are being brought in. I am certainly open if members opposite or in the House are interested in seeing some alternative proposals that my research eventually comes up with. I would of course be pleased to pass it on to them because I think all members of this House who represent rural and northern communities know how important that program is. We have got to fight to keep what little we have left now and we have got to do more work where possible to expand that to include those communities that do need it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

The House took recess at 1:47 p.m.

CANADA–ARMENIA PARLIAMENTARY FRIENDSHIP GROUP

Mr. Jean–Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, earlier today the Canada–Armenia Parliamentary Friendship Group's founding organizational committee meeting was held. This is an historic day in the relations between Canada and the newly independent Armenia.

On September 21, 1991 a referendum on independence was held in Armenia. Over 99 per cent of Armenians voted for independence.

On November 15, 1991 the newly elected President of Armenia, Levon Ter–Petrosian, visited Canada. He met with a group of MPs and with our Prime Minister.

With a free and independent Armenia, parliamentarians from Canada and Armenia will be working together to build a truly democratic and financially strong Armenia.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, today we wish to pay tribute to the people of Armenia and its representatives and assure them of our support.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION FUND

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the 1991 Auditor General's report criticizes the government for mishandling its employee pension funds because it uses the money from these funds to finance government projects. Eighteen per cent of today's public debt is money owing to the Public Service Superannuation Fund.

Had these moneys been invested in the Canadian securities market rather than used for the government's own borrowing needs, an extra 2 per cent could have been added to the rate of return. This would translate into an extra $1.5 billion for the employee pension fund.

A healthier fund would help eliminate an increase in the public debt which Canadians would have to make up through higher taxes.

[Translation]

It is high time the government stopped taking undue advantage of employee pension funds. The government should develop a better investment strategy to ensure the best possible return for its employees and for Canadian taxpayers.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, two years ago tomorrow 14 bright, young and innocent women were murdered because of their gender by a misogynist named Marc Lepine.

December 6 has been set aside to mark the widespread problem of violence against women and remember the horror that took place two years ago.

We must mark the day that will forever remind us of the women who were murdered. Yet the reality that the pervasive evil of violence against women leaves few Canadians untouched horrifies me.

Tomorrow at a candle–light vigil in Markham I will be lighting a candle for the 14 women who were murdered. I will also be honouring their sisters throughout the world who continue to be abused each day of the year.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my colleague, the member for Winnipeg Transcona, asked the government why it has not intervened in the almost seven–week old strike at the Mint in Winnipeg.

The response from the government side was:

> —there is no reason for the Minister of Labour to appoint a mediator unless at least one of the sides indicates it has an interest in that.

This was the response despite the fact that section 105 of the labour code provides for the minister to act on his own initiative.

Today in Ottawa 350 Mint workers joined the strike. I have met with these workers and their demands are not unreasonable.

A decent wage for these workers is not out of the question given the profitable situation the Mint enjoys. An increase that reflects the cost of living is not unreasonable, given the bonuses paid to senior management.

The Mint has already spent on this strike alone more than a just wage settlement would have cost. I call on the Minister of Labour to take immediate steps to see a quick and fair settlement to this dispute. He has the authority to act and he should do so without delay.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak again to the distress being felt by Canadian manufacturers in my riding of Northumberland and across Canada.

The GST, increased employer contributions to the Canada pension and Unemployment Insurance Programs, other burdensome government regulations, and the high cost of the Canadian dollar make sales in Canada and abroad next to impossible. What is more, the government is now suggesting a new payroll tax to finance wage protection for employees of bankrupt companies.

The Hudson's Bay Company chief executive officer is quoted as telling U.S. manufacturers that right now tariffs and value added taxes in Canada drive the cost of doing business in Canada 30 per cent higher than the U.S. rates.

Vagden Industries of Trenton, Ontario, a manufacturer of fine hosiery and a client of The Bay writes:

> How in the world are we going to compete?

Does the government not understand the difficulties of this and thousands of other Canadian manufacturers? No new taxes, fairer taxes and recession time assistance programs are vital to the survival of Canadian business. The government must act now.

MIDDLE EAST PEACE CONFERENCE

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members will join me in wishing success to the peace conference on the Middle East which convened in Washington, D. C. yesterday.

After years of turmoil and much suffering there is hope for peace in the region and we commend the parties which are actively participating to achieve this.

• (1410)

Having recently visited the area, I can assure the House there is considerable optimism and hope that the problems of the region can be resolved through dialogue and that a number of issues can be resolved, including a homeland for the Palestinians.

In this regard one recognizes the patient and persistent efforts of U. S. President George Bush and Secretary of State James Baker to initiate and ensure the success of the peace process.

At this season when we reflect on the message of peace on earth, there is no better example than the Washington conference. We welcome the chance for diminishing tensions and confrontations.

RURAL DIGNITY

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, December 14 is an important anniversary in Canada. Rural Canadians from coast to coast to coast will recognize the determined efforts of the organization Rural Dignity, which has now been alive and fighting for five years.

Rural Dignity is a network of committed people who have rallied around issues such as the closure of rural post offices, cutbacks to VIA Rail and the struggle to maintain viable rural communities.

In the face of tough odds, a government determined to decimate the infrastructure of rural Canada, benign neglect by the big city media and the challenges of isolation, Rural Dignity has won some big victories. These victories are symbolized by the fact that while Canada Post has managed to close 1,200 rural post offices, there are also 1,200 rural post offices still open which Canada Post had planned to close by now.

Rural Dignity is a prime example of the vitality and spirit of grass roots Canada. I am sure all members would want to join me in congratulating the people in Rural Dignity and in wishing them total victory in their fight to revitalize rural Canada.

DARYL BEAN

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, democratic elected leaders around the world and Canada must set examples of dignity, honesty and civility.

You Canadians who are associated with national women's organizations such as YWCA, National Action Committee on the Status of Women, Elizabeth Fry Society, Disabled Women's Network, National Organization of Immigrant and Visible Minority Women, REAL Women and countless other women's organizations including specifically such women as Shirley Carr and women who lead New Democratic Parties should all demand Daryl Bean's resignation for his despicable leadership.

SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, it appears Canada's supply management system may be in danger of being used as a bargaining chip at the ongoing GATT negotiations.

The replacement of supply management with a system of tariffication would create unfair competition for producers because of the lack of a level playing field.

It would certainly force many dairy, poultry and egg farmers out of business and inflict much hardship in an already struggling Prince Edward Island economy.

Prince Edward Island's agricultural sector accounts for the largest percentage of Gross Provincial Product out of all other provinces except Saskatchewan.

The economic health of Prince Edward Island will be severely threatened should the Government of Canada fail to protect, clarify and strengthen article XI.

I urge the federal government to take every reasonable measure to ensure that supply management in Canada is maintained and enhanced.

CROATIA

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canadians of Croatian descent demonstrated on Parliament Hill seeking Canada's recognition of Croatia as an independent country.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated four principles must be met before Canada can recognize Croatia. First, the violence must end. Second, minorities must be protected. Third, borders must be established. The fourth point is respect for human rights.

Croatia has passed legislation that will entrench human and minority rights in the Constitution and criminal law. Croatian borders were established before the violence began.

Finally, Croatia is not the aggressor in this situation. I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to work with the United Nations in establishing an end to the violence so that Canada can recognize Croatia's independence.

GATT

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the importance of food security to a nation puts agricultural policy in a much different position than any other topic now under discussion at GATT.

That explains the Japanese government's staunch defence of its highly protective rice market regime which it considers essential to its national food security system.

Those negotiating for maintenance of our Canadian marketing boards at GATT need to appreciate fully that a nation's food supply is not just another commodity. They should not be swayed by the American attitude toward marketing boards, an attitude which even the Americans themselves admit is their defence against domestic problems and pressures at home.

Without the marketing board system many Canadian farmers will be driven out of business by competition from the giant U.S. agribusiness, thus putting the one area of the agricultural industry in this country at risk.

We have had some stability in that area of farming and we will put that area of farming in a position not unlike that of our grain farmers in western Canada.

ATTIRE OF MEMBERS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, it must have been a slow news day at The Globe and Mail yesterday. It seems that the powers that be found it newsworthy to report that the Minister of Justice and the Associate Minister of National Defence attended an event in Vancouver wearing the same outfits, distinguishable only by slight variations, mercifully salvaging the ministers from the fashion faux pas.

I find it remarkable that this would be commented on at all when male members of Parliament present themselves in monotonous uniformity on a daily basis, and on special occasions they appear somewhat like a bunch of penguins, black tie and all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to the hon. member that I am one of the offenders of the monotonously same set of clothes.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, for months I and other opposition colleagues have been pointing out the correlation between the GST and the increase in cross-border shopping.

The government has pooh-poohed everything including the view that this would result in decreased government revenues. All the while the minister was tinkering with customs procedures in order to dispel protests.

Here is what the Auditor General said to the Minister of National Revenue regarding his efforts. First, no analysis was done to assess the effect of express lanes on cross-border shopping and revenue collection. Second, contrary to government claims data for 1990-91 showed an upward trend in cross-border shopping. Third, the congestion at crossing points would increase the risk of compromising enforcement efforts, including revenue collection. Fourth, inadequate border facilities undermine facilitation and enforcement efforts, including revenue collection.

Yet the minister continues to claim that cutbacks in government services and resources will not affect its revenue generation abilities.

I am asking the minister now: Will he admit the error of his assumptions and take appropriate steps to safeguard Canadian revenues and the integrity of the Canadian Customs system?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise today out of disgust at what CBC Newsworld thinks is newsworthy.

We have an absolutely desperate situation in Croatia. We have a new Auditor General's report. We have numerous good news events occurring across Canada. We even have a great choir singing in the rotunda of our Parliament Buildings.

But what does CBC Newsworld choose for its program content? The rape trial currently under way in Florida. Rape under any circumstance is despicable. The CBC does not need to sensationalize it. The National News Service of the CBC should be admonished and told to find some good Canadian news on which to concentrate its efforts.

WHITE RIBBON CAMPAIGN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. Many men across Canada, including members of Parliament, have chosen to show their concern and solidarity with women and their desire to end violence against women by wearing a white ribbon this week.

However, military personnel are not allowed to wear a white ribbon on their uniforms. There are many examples of other national days for which accessories are permitted. If the military can wear a leek on St. David's Day and a thistle on St. Andrew's Day, why not a white ribbon this week?

I ask the minister to exercise her good sense and rectify this ludicrous situation today.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Calgary the Prime Minister announced, and I was glad to hear it, that he intended to consult Canadians on this country's constitutional future, something we have wanted for a long time. He dismissed the election option, but obviously the other option is a referendum, an option we support. We would like to know from the Acting Prime Minister whether the entire cabinet agrees with the Prime Minister's new position that we should consult Canadians, presumably through some kind of referendum.

Does my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare agree? Does my friend the President of the Treasury Board agree? Does my friend the Minister of National Defence agree with the Prime Minister on the subject of a Canadian referendum?

• (1420)

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government has been quite clear. It was expressed both by the Prime Minister and by my colleague responsible for constitutional affairs.

The government leaves its options open. We are determined to ensure that Canadians are plugged into the process because we recognize that the Constitution belongs to them. We want to do so in a way that is constructive for Canadians, that does not polarize Canadians and pit one region of Canada against another. All options are open in doing that.

The Liberal Party has shut the door. It has said that the only option that is acceptable to it is a referendum. Our goal is to ensure, in consulting with Canadians and ensuring that Canadians feel as if they have had the chance to participate in the remaking of their Constitution, that we do so in ways that are constructive, healing and unifying in Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased with the answer of the minister when he said that the Constitution belongs to the people of Canada. There is only one way to have the consent of the people of Canada from all parts of Canada. We want an end to confusion.

Two weeks ago the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs was for a referendum. Last week when six Pequistes who are members of the Tory caucus objected, he was against it; he was afraid of it. The Prime Minister was not afraid of it yesterday in Calgary.

We want to know from the Acting Prime Minister when the confusion will stop in this government and when the people of Canada will clearly know that they will be consulted on the future of this country.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, what a very interesting concept. The Leader of the Opposition says that the only way in which Canadians can express themselves, in which they can be consulted, is through a referendum on the Constitution. That is his present position.

I was a member in 1982 of the special committee on the Constitution. The hon. gentleman was responsible in 1981 for the government's position. If the only way in which we can have legitimacy for constitutional reform is a referendum, why didn't he do it?

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

Yesterday, speaking in Calgary, the Prime Minister ruled out the possibility of a general election on the Constitution. He said that the government is considering at least four options.

I want to ask the minister: If one of the four options currently under consideration is a national referendum, why will the government not introduce legislation that would make that possible? Why does it want to hide its intentions from members of Parliament and from the people of Canada?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, far from hiding our intentions from the people of Canada and from Parliament, the government has been abundantly clear in indicating that all options are open.

We have one goal, and that is a united Canada with a renewed Constitution. What we want to do in terms of choosing a methodology to get there is to choose methods of plugging the people in and having them involved which are unifying and which bring Canadians together.

All options are open in doing that. The difference between us and the members of the Liberal Party is that the members of the Liberal Party have only one option.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Either a national referendum is one of the four options of the government or it is not. If it is, I would like to ask the minister: Why is the government stalling on introducing legislation to allow for a referendum? If it is not stalling, I want to know why the government is repudiating the promise of the constitutional affairs minister who said that the government would introduce legislation for a national referendum?

I ask the minister to explain what is obviously a real discrepancy.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, if a discrepancy exists it is in the hon. gentleman's mind.

The government has been abundantly clear and I repeat again: all options are open. What we want to do in all of our efforts on the Constitution is to bring in measures which include Canadians and bind them together instead of pitting region against region, group against group.

If a referendum on the Constitution will be helpful in terms of unifying Canada, we are certainly prepared to consider that. But members of Parliament on all sides of the House have a responsibility to put partisan considerations to one side and put the unity of Canada first.

GATT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is speaking for the government on trade today.

With the GATT negotiations approaching a panic situation like we saw prior to the acceptance of the Canada–U.S. trade agreement, Canadian consumers, taxpayers and workers in Canada's generic drug industry and in the provincial drug plans are fearful that our negotiators are accepting the U.S. proposals covering intellectual property rights without reservation.

Is the government negotiating for a continuation of our right to produce generic drugs by Canadian companies, or will it be accepting the U.S. proposition that will destroy the generic industry and substantially increase the already $8.5 billion now spent on drugs in Canada each year?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Of course we are not doing that, Mr. Speaker. It would be absolutely ridiculous to do so when we take a look at the reality. Since the government legislated some four years ago patent protection for pharmaceutical companies, that industry has responded with unprecedented R and D activities in Canada into the millions of dollars.

Price rises have also been kept below the Consumer Price Index. The government continues to make it clear that it is committed to making sure that prices are reasonable for consumers. The government continues to take into account the concerns of the brand name and generic drug producers as well as those of consumers. Why would we change such an effective policy?

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister should review the statistics. Prices have gone up 36 per cent in the last four years, a higher rate of increase than occurred before.

With regard to article XI, has the government submitted to American pressure to move everything to tariffication as reports indicate and as our negotiators report back? Will they give up on supply management farmers that are producing poultry and dairy products now, supplying Canadian consumers with extremely efficient low cost products? Why are negotiators taking an American position at the GATT? Why is tariffication being considered by our negotiating team?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if I can answer on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture, the tariffication proposals are of course before the MTN, but the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for International Trade last week in Geneva made very clear our position on article XI and our position on supply management. We continue to stand by that.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty clear to observers that our fallback position needs to go to tariffication.

Since the final negotiations are likely to conclude after this Parliament recesses and perhaps before Christmas, will there be any recourse to Parliament on behalf of the government once an agreement or proposal is forthcoming from the GATT? Will Parliament be consulted? Will the provinces be consulted? Or, will anything signed at Geneva be a done deal which will simply come back to a majority House for approval?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is clear the hon. member and his party are now unhappy with the GATT. They seem to be unhappy with the MTN. It will be very interesting to see what his party says when a new GATT agreement is brought before the House. Of course Parliament will be consulted. Parliament has always been consulted on multinational questions of trade, tariffs, supply management and will continue to be.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, just five weeks ago the cost of this government's prosperity exercise was set at $15 million plus $4.5 million for so-called ads.

Yesterday the industry minister said that the cost was now up over $21 million, plus an amount that he could not even estimate for advertising.

Will the government table today a detailed budget showing all moneys to be spent out of public funds for this prosperity exercise including the full cost of his "let's feel happy" Tory propaganda?

• (1430)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend likes to read the headlines in the newspaper and stop right there. If he would read the Canadian Press story further, he would have got the answer to the very question that he asked.

I will be very happy to give him the answer. First of all, it is not $21 million for advertising. The expenditures for communication activities which include printing and distribution of discussion papers and other reports, public opinion research and media analysis will be $5.1 million, not $21 million.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Where are this government's priorities? It says there is no money for university or industrial research or for export development. Aren't these priorities? Could the minister explain to Canadians how he managed to find an extra $5 million for government propaganda, when he can't even find the money to help Canadians invest in research and develop their export markets?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had attended any of the community consultations under the prosperity consultations, he would have seen that there was an unprecedented desire for information across Canada on how we can become more competitive and how we can become more prosperous. That is what this exercise is about and that is why there has to be a limited amount of communications in order to encourage people to get involved in the process.

It is working and it is working very well. When Canadians work together we can take on the world and win. That is our message. We want to involve Canadians in that process, and that is what this program does.

NATURAL GAS INDUSTRY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the energy minister.

Western Canada's natural gas producers rely on exports to markets in the United States in a very large measure. The California Public Utilities Commission has ordered the largest utility in northern California to dump its long-term contracts with western Canadian gas producers, clearly violating article 905 of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

The Independent Petroleum Association of Canada has asked our National Energy Board to convene a hearing on this matter as quickly as possible. Will the minister today give a clear undertaking of support for IPAC in this initiative?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member that there was a joint press conference in Calgary two days ago with the minister of energy for Alberta. We also had very close consultations with the minister of energy for the province of British Columbia.

We came forward with a three-part plan, strongly co-ordinated. I am pleased that unlike many experiences of the past the producers, the Government of Canada and the producing provinces are all in agreement on this energy policy. I think that is very important. We have sent a very strong message.

In respect to the National Energy Board the member asked me a very direct question. He would recognize that the CPA has made a second application to the NEB. I as minister am cognizant of my responsibilities, namely that the NEB remain independent. Obviously there are discussions taking place within the NEB on that issue and I will leave it at that point.

I will just make my last point, that the energy consultative mechanism, which is a meeting that takes place twice a year, once in Ottawa and once in Washington, is meeting today and tomorrow here in Ottawa. We have invited California, Alberta and B.C. to that meeting. That meeting is going on right now.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not giving an undertaking. He will know that the reaction to the press conference yesterday in Alberta was very negative.

The situation affects not only exports but also pipeline development, transportation upgrading, exploration activities and indeed the future of a vital western Canadian industry.

Will the minister undertake in this House today to initiate as quickly as can be done an appeal to the Canada-U.S. free trade tribunal on this extremely important issue?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and I have been in this House for some period of time. I understand partisan shots.

Seriously, the hon. member should take a look at what the response from the industry has been to the press conference. It has been positive, in fact as recently as eleven o'clock last night in Calgary when I spoke to them personally.

I mean I don't know where the guy is, except that he just wants to make a point in the House. The point of the matter is—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology or the minister of science and technology or whoever speaks for either of them.

Given the continuing reports of intimidation and retaliation against employees and former employees at NRC who have dared to question the decisions of management, given the retaliation against Chandler Grover for having made a racial discrimination complaint which is under investigation by the RCMP, and given retaliation against the IRAP board for its members having appeared before a committee of this House, is this government not now a bit concerned about the vindictively feudal style of management at NRC and what action does it plan to take?

An hon. member: Daryl Bean will answer that one.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): As my hon. colleague says, Daryl Bean can answer that one, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member characterizes a board of an arm's length agency as feudal. Therefore he would interfere with an arm's length agency. Arm's length agencies in this country are allowed to run their own affairs. In this particular case the board made its decision about how to handle that program. We respect its right to make that decision.

We would also like to remind my hon. friend that the whole IRAP program and the relationship to it by the NRC will be looked at in the new year. They are putting their house in order so that they can look at it objectively. We as a government stand behind the very effective program which the IRAP program has been over the years.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you noticed, as most of Canada will notice, that Daryl Bean is not on the board of the NRC.

Mr. Speaker, you will have noticed that the council of NRC does not fire employees. It is not the council of NRC against which there is a complaint of racial discrimination. It is not the council of NRC that is under investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for retaliation.

Again I ask this government: Is it not concerned about the actions of the president that it chose at NRC, and is it not time for it to do something about it?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the NDP approach to any arm's length agency is to interfere in every little piece of minutia. That is the NDP view.

We have an IRAP program that we are very proud of. We want to see it strengthened. We want to see it improved. And the NRC is undertaking to make sure that happens.

ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Last year and again this year the Auditor General identified, and I quote: "serious deficiencies in the way federal departments account for their efforts to protect the environment".

Three departments alone spent $120 million on water, energy, paper and then on garbage disposal. Why does the government still refuse to live up to its green plan commitment to be accountable for the environment?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, we are moving out of the first year of the green plan, a $3 billion commitment over six years to clean up Canada's environment. We have now completed one year.

I think Canadians can be truly proud of what we have been able to accomplish as citizens of Canada to clean up the water, the air and our soil. In terms of the initiatives, some 35 initiatives have been announced of over $1 billion of Canadian taxpayers' money, money well spent.

• (1440)

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister or the deputy if he would care to answer.

The Auditor General has criticized the minister's department for mishandling the clean-up of the Great Lakes, including Hamilton harbour. Specifically he said that the absence of plans and goals constituted: "a lack of due regard in managing Canada's contribution to the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement".

When will the minister develop specific goals and a timeframe to clean up the Great Lakes?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the five lakes that constitute the Great Lakes are probably one of the most magnificent resources Canada has. I think all of us understand the problems we have had over many years with the amount of chemicals that have been put into the Great Lakes.

Some $125 million have been set aside for the Great Lakes clean-up. We have 17 hot spots on the Canadian side, and we are now working on the remedial action plans that have been set up of consultation with the communities in order that the communities can identify the problems and the solutions.

We are very pleased with how some of those RAPs have been constituted and moved ahead. Some of them definitely need further work and we look forward to completing those RAPs.

ACOA

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for ACOA, I will put my question to the minister of employment.

Yesterday a spokesman for ACOA said that they were reviewing their procedures in light of the Auditor General's report. Would the minister of employment tell this House today what his government is doing to ensure that these procedures, perhaps for the first time in this government's history, start acting to the benefit of Atlantic Canadians?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member is suggesting that the expenditures of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is not serving Atlantic Canada. If that is her position, let her tell that to the thousands of business people in Atlantic Canada who see ACOA as an important tool of economic development.

Of course we are living in a very imperfect world. I think ACOA officials acknowledged yesterday that the system had to be improved as per the recommendations of the Auditor General, and they will do so accordingly.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, yes, it is a very imperfect world. It is pretty imperfect in Atlantic Canada where the region is not getting the advantages under regional development programs that it so richly deserves.

Consequently I ask this minister whether his government will order ACOA officials to meet as soon as possible with officials in the city of Halifax and the county of Halifax where social assistance rates are going through the ceiling to put together some form of economic recovery plan so that the people of Halifax can see some future, some light at the end of the tunnel.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the experience of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has always been to consult and work with the people of Atlantic Canada. The people of Halifax have not been treated any differently.

Ms. Clancy: No, we have all been treated badly.

Mr. Valcourt: Of course the political position of the hon. member is important to her. I think that Atlantic Canadians know that the programs of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency are serving Atlantic Canada well.

INDONESIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Three weeks ago, following the massacre of over 100 innocent civilians mourning at a funeral in East Timor, the minister promised to review Canada's policy on aid to Indonesia.

Will the minister now advise the House when this government will not only suspend government to government non-humanitarian aid to Indonesia but will also impose a total embargo on the sale of arms to the repressive Indonesian government?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our review of aid to Indonesia is just about complete. I have had a preliminary report on it and I will be reporting publicly, probably next week.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister about an arms embargo as well and I trust she will deal with that in her response to my supplementary question to the same minister.

December 7 marks the 16th anniversary of the Indonesian invasion of East Timor and in those 16 genocidal years over 200,000 people have died.

Will the minister now drop her insistence that Indonesian sovereignty over East Timor is a fait accompli. Instead, will this minister clearly support UN Security Council resolutions 384 and 389 condemning the invasion and unequivocally reaffirming the self-determination of the people of East Timor? Will she act on behalf of the people of East Timor?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have acted on behalf of the people of East Timor first of all because I raised this personally within hours with the Indonesian foreign minister. We are reviewing our aid program. Our ambassador in Jakarta has been very active herself in investigating the situation in East Timor. I am looking at reports from her in my aid review.

We will do everything we can to bring an end to the violence..

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Recent events and today's reports in the media have proved beyond a doubt that the Canadian Security Information Service was right to fear the increasing influence of the Warriors, who don't want the RCMP or the QPP around so they can go about their illegal business and smuggle goods without further ado.

Could the minister confirm that he had a meeting last Sunday with his provincial counterpart, Mr. Ryan, and could he tell the House what they intend to do about the current explosive situation in this region?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleague has an interest in this matter and is doing her best to represent her constituents. I can assure her and the House that the government places a very high priority on trying to find a peaceful solution.

Last Sunday I met with Mr. Ryan and we discussed the matter. I was on the phone with him this morning. I believe that we are making progress. We believe that continued discussions and negotiations are the only way to do it. I would hope that we can report something in the very near future.

ROUGE VALLEY PARK

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for the Environment.

It has been over two years since this government promised $10 million to help in the establishment of an urban park in the Rouge Valley which is on the east of metro.

I would like to ask the minister: Why the delay? Why the hold-up? Who is dragging their feet? This is a very important project on a national basis. I would like the minister's comments. Can we get this solved?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the interest, the commitment and the work by the hon. member and other members in the House are really to be commended on this magnificent Rouge area to be saved as a park.

The advisory committee that was established and constituted by the province of Ontario—and the federal government is a member—has put forth a management plan. The first report I have in hand here today. This is a comprehensive and an envisionary document. The first public meeting on this is scheduled for tonight.

I would like to say the final report is expected in the spring of 1992. The Federal Historic Sites and Momuments Board is also looking at the archaeological aspects of the Rouge, and indeed the $10 million federal commitment stands ready to be set forth as soon as this park is established as the largest urban park in North America.

TAXATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this government has a healthy appetite for our tax money. It has levied a total of 33 tax increases since it was elected. It has added a tax on unemployment, on pension funds, a proposed tax on bankruptcies, and now another tax on cable. Enough is enough. When will the government take its hands out of our pockets, and when will the minister say no to a tax levy on cable?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend may have missed the news, but several weeks ago the government announced that it was providing direct funding to the CBC without looking to a levy on cable in order to raise the funds for that.

It is a very interesting proposition that the hon. member raises. She is absolutely right that Canadians do feel as if they are paying too many taxes. That is why it is incumbent on members on all sides of the House, when they make suggestions for new spending, to explain precisely where the money would come from.

• (1450)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers have had quite enough of your mismanagement, thank you very much.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Finestone: Telecommunications and broadcasting ought to be players in this government's prosperity agenda. Landmark telecommunications decisions and key broadcast hearings are being delayed by this government's ongoing poor management. Business opportunities are being missed because this government has left over half the seats or almost half the seats at the CRTC empty.

Could the minister please tell us what is holding up these nominations while the work plans of these major institutions of this country are being put on hold?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government is continuing to make nominations to all government boards and commissions, certainly to the CRTC and other bodies as well.

When the hon. member raises the importance of for example the broadcasting industry in Canada, she should be aware of the fact that on Monday and Tuesday of next week in Montreal I will be convening the first ever summit on television broadcasting in Canada. I will be working together with representatives of all sides of the industry, with the CRTC, with the public broadcasters and others in order to do what we can to ensure the health of the Canadian broadcasting industry.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Canada Post is saying that in spite of the announced investigation of the Minister of National Revenue yesterday it will continue its policy to encourage employees to work overtime using someone else's name and social insurance number against the laws of Canada.

I ask the minister: When the government will put its foot down and tell Canada Post to obey the law like everyone else?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into this thing in detail. The investigation, as the hon. member knows, continues both by Revenue Canada and Canada Post in co-ordination and co-operation.

However, I would like to take this opportunity to correct the hon. member's alleged misinformation on this matter because Canada Post—

An hon. member: Alleged misinformation?

Mr. Jelinek: English is not my mother tongue, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: Canada Post policy is to contract out only to contractors or owner-drivers and not their employees. That is the policy of Canada Post. Therefore when there are statements by Canada Post officials saying that there will be no change in policy, it is because the policy does not condone the type of things that the hon. member is representing in the House today.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the minister has missed the whole point. Canada Post officials have been instructing their employees to do this.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, will the minister take action today, under section 49 of the Financial Administration Act or before the courts, to obtain an injunction and force the Canada Post Corporation to obey the law? At this very moment, Canada Post employees are being told to use someone else's social insurance number, and that is illegal.

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is exaggerating. After having talked to Don Lander this morning, I can assure this House and Canadians that Canada Post is not advising its employees in the way the hon. member is suggesting, not at all.

It does not condone that practice. It is co-operating. He is pointing to The Toronto Star, Mr. Speaker. I am not quite sure what that means. I am telling him the facts. The facts as presented by the hon. member on this floor today are wrong, wrong, wrong.

I have every confidence in Canada Post, that it is doing everything according to its policy in a legal and proper fashion.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, this week there is a positive awareness campaign concerning violence against women, yet at the same time CBC Newsworld carries live coverage of a rape trial in Florida.

My question is for the Minister of Communications. In light of the fact that we have an excellent constitution committee meeting going on right now, today in Ottawa, would he instruct the CBC to carry that program rather than the rape trial in Florida?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there are times when all of us in the House of Commons would like to write the scripts for CBC or to suggest what it might cover and what it might not cover. The government complies with the principle of an arm's length relationship between the corporation and the government.

I know members of the CBC watch with Question Period fascination each day and will be aware of the hon. member's concerns.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

Yesterday in the House, in response to a question I put regarding a CN plan to reroute traffic through the U.S., the minister said:

> CN has already advised the port officials at Thunder Bay that it has no plans to do this so there is no need for me to order it.

Today we find out that CN has a new subsidiary headquartered in Detroit, Michigan called CN North America with full intentions of maximizing the use of the three railways it owns in the United States.

Has the minister used the authority she has under section 89(1) of the Financial Administration Act to order CN not to use this set-up to move Canadian goods from one part of Canada to another part of Canada via the United States? Has she done that?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the question raised yesterday was about the shipping of grain through the U.S. rather than through Canada. That was what the port manager had been advised that CN was not going to do.

As far as the new company that CN has formed, CN is a corporation that has a mandate to provide service to shippers in Canada, that is to enable them to ship goods into the U.S. as we have a much larger market there than we ever had before under the free trade agreement.

That is what they are going to be doing with shipping by Canadians into the U.S.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I want to remind the minister that my question yesterday dealt with grain, potash and other commodities. We see today in the Thunder Bay Times News the minister is quoted as saying: "CN has to look to the future and plan to be a viable rail link in this country. If some of that happens to go through the U.S. that might be one of the decisions that they make".

I want to go back to the minister. Will she use her powers to make sure that CN does not divert any traffic or any repair work into or through the United States? Will she use her power to protect Canadian jobs, Canadian communities and the seaway?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, if we are going to serve the market in the U.S. we are going to have to ship into the U.S. I prefer that done by a Canadian carrier rather than an American carrier.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the acting minister of trade.

My question arises out of a panel discussion this morning on the consequences of North American free trade between representatives of the three countries that are involved.

Will the minister assure this House that Canadian jobs will not be lost or put into jeopardy under the agreement because either of the other two countries, that is to say Mexico or the United States, do not enforce environmental standards that are as high as ours?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, of course the American situation differs from region to region. I would suggest that the hon. member look at that carefully and also look at the plans that Mexico has put in place.

In terms of his general suggestion about the panel conference this morning, the truth is that we are going to negotiate an arrangement with the United States and Mexico which will protect our industries and will help to remove our Mexican tariffs against Canada which right now are much higher than our tariffs against theirs.

It is also very important for us on the environmental front to have Mexico in a NAFTA context in which we can have further influence on environmental standards.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the minister is a little mixed up. It was a Liberal panel conference.

Let me ask a supplementary question. Let it be noted that the minister did not respond to the question and that he did not say Canadian jobs would not be lost.

Will the minister assure us that under the agreement the Canadian ability to protect the Canadian environment will not be jeopardized in any way, shape or form? Quite specifically, will the minister assure this House that attempts to protect the environment will not be deemed a restraint in trade?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, not only is the answer yes to his request but, what is more, we are going to open a context for selling Canadian environmental technologies into Mexico.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport.

Here we have a government that just finished undermining passenger rail by gutting VIA Rail. Now it is prepared to undermine the whole industry of cargo trade via the rails.

How can this minister permit a Crown corporation to short-haul east or west through the United States rail lines? Will the minister do the honourable thing, put a stop to it, use Canadian lines and urge the issuance of Canadian jobs rather than help her friends in America all the time?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, this government made a very conscious decision as far as VIA Rail is concerned to ensure that taxpayers' money was used properly.

When it comes to the shipping of goods, the new company that CN has formed is to go after new business, not to change existing business, within the U.S. in order to ship Canadians goods into the U.S. market.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I return again to the minister who seems to be condoning the creation of jobs in the United States, the multiplier in the United States, and supporting American rail lines at the detriment of Canadian lines, Canadian jobs and Canadian workers.

On behalf of Canadians I ask minister and her government to put Canada first, to put our priority first. Will she put an end to this? It is not hauling south, but it is a short haul east and west via the United States of America.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, this government is putting Canada first by making sure that we have a strong national railway that can compete on the North American continent, not just on the Canadian part of the continent. A strong Canadian railway will mean future jobs in Canada.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Transport.

The questions have been about the transportation of Canadian goods to Canadian destinations along American lines, not about Canadian goods into American markets.

I ask the minister: At what point would the government refuse to accept a complete marginalization of the Canadian transportation system, particularly as it exists through Manitoba and Ontario?

Is there no point at which the public interest or the national interest would prevail over the marketplace?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the public and national interests are both best served by a strong national Canadian railway.

POINTS OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, as a result of a question from the member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, I would like to table a document that I referred to.

This document is called Rouge Valley Park Planning Project: Phase I Report, Background, Principles and Options. This summary of the report is filed in both official languages.

CORRECTION OF COMMENTS

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): On a brief point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct some information provided to the House yesterday, December 4, as reported at page 5773 of Hansard.

The Minister of the Environment properly indicated to the House that there would be a net reduction of 600,000 tonnes of organo-chlorines by the end of year 1993, but he should have indicated that would be from 1988 levels rather than from 1980 levels.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the government House leader, perhaps I could direct my question to the acting House leader and see if he could provide to the House what the business will be for the remainder of today, Friday, Monday and all next week including Thursday and Friday and if need be on Saturday.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): It will be a pleasure, Madam Speaker, to try and respond to the hon. member's customary question. As far as today is concerned, this afternoon we will call the financial institution bills on third reading: C-4, C-19, C-28 and C-34.

Tomorrow, Madam Speaker, we hope to continue and complete the debate on third reading of these bills. We also wish to complete report stage and third reading of Bill C-5, which deals with the Aeronautics Act.

On Monday, December 9, we will call Bill C-32, the Canada Assistance Plan, for debate at the report stage, and possibly for debate on third reading, Madam Speaker.

Tuesday will be the last allotted day.

On Wednesday, we will call Bill C-38, the privatization of Telesat, for debate at the report stage, and we hope to finish both report stage and third reading the same day.

As for Thursday, Friday, Saturday and, if need be, Sunday, Madam Speaker, the usual discussions will proceed.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, I am wondering if the minister could perhaps check with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. It was my understanding that since Tuesday is an allotted day, on Monday we would be just commencing on Bill C-32. On Friday, it was my understanding that we would be proceeding with report and third reading of Bill C-5 and thereafter in the afternoon we had hoped to be able to proceed with a concurrence motion of my colleague for Ottawa—Vanier with regard to the second report.

I am wondering if perhaps the minister, who has now had an opportunity, could clarify that. I think it is just the renaming of certain bills from 32 to 38 and perhaps he could change that.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux: Madam Speaker, something may have been lost in the translation, but the numbers I gave were correct.

[English]

With respect to the concurrence motion, obviously if time remains on Friday we will deal with it.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, since that has been clarified or is clear as mud, I want to indicate to the deputy House leader that there were discussions, as I am sure he is aware, with regard to the financial package. We would be prepared on this side to extend the hours this evening to complete that legislation in order to proceed on Friday with both Bill C–5 and with the concurrence motion of my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, with regard to the second report of the public accounts.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux: Madam Speaker, I hope the hon. member was not referring to the translation when he said it was clear as mud, because it was quite the opposite.

As for extending the hours this evening, we have no objection in principle. Appropriately, there should some discussion about the evenings proceedings.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think it is an excellent idea to have the usual discussion and then have someone advise the House so we will know exactly how to proceed for the remainder of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C–4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the third time and passed.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking, be read the third time and passed.

INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C–28, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, be read the third time and passed.

CO–OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C–34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co–operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the third time and passed.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to rise today and speak on the financial institution legislation.

We are debating four bills: the Bank Act, trust and loan legislation, insurance, and the co–operative legislation.

Last week we spent three days debating the many amendments to these pieces of legislation and today I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in third reading. This has been a very long process. We have spent over a year studying the government proposals. Many of them have been complicated and technical in nature, but it is extremely important legislation.

• (1510)

In fact, experts have called this legislation the largest single reform to financial institutions in Canadian history.

During this entire process, and as I said, Madam Speaker, it certainly has been a long process, the Liberal members of the finance committee studying the bills have had several objectives.

First, we wanted to be sure that we were going to better serve consumers. We wanted to be sure that once this legislation was passed that the depositors, policyholders, all the users of financial institutions would be better served by this new legislation.

Our second objective was to ensure that we would have sound and safe financial institutions. Certainly we are all aware of what has been happening south of the border, and there is no way that we want to see this ever occur in Canada.

Our third objective was to ensure that financial institutions would become more competitive internationally, which is extremely important in this day and age.

As I indicated, the process certainly was very long and detailed. But that is to be expected when you are studying four bills that contain more than 2,400 clauses and over 1,300 pages. Since we began the trust and loan legislation study which started last October, we have heard over 100 witnesses.

Witnesses came from all sectors. We had consumers who were concerned about various aspects of the legislation. We had academics who had studied in great detail various parts of the legislation. We had regulators, bankers, insurance people, representatives from co-operatives, as well as trust representatives.

They pointed out to us the pros and cons of various issues that this legislation dealt with and over all they helped to make this legislation that we have before us today stronger legislation. I want to take the opportunity, Madam Speaker, to thank all the people who took the time to come before the committee and present their views, and also the people who sent letters, briefs, and other material which helped us in studying the four pieces of legislation that we have before us this afternoon.

Let me say at the outset that I believe that the members of the committee tried their best. I honestly believe that we all made a sincere effort to come up with the best legislation under the circumstances.

I know at times that the committee chairman, the hon. member from Mississauga, certainly tried to move faster than we would have liked and that is sort of ironic because the government has really been dragging its feet for many years in this whole area of financial institution reform.

Nevertheless, we Liberal members on the committee tried our best to co-operate with the government and to pass this much-needed legislation while at the same time meeting our objectives.

We had, as I mentioned earlier, basically three objectives.

We wanted this legislation to better serve consumers. We wanted to be sure we are providing for safe and sound financial institutions. Also, we wanted to be sure that our financial institutions are going to be able to compete better internationally.

We believe we struck a balance between these three objectives. That is why we are supporting the legislation today. These new bank, trust and loan, insurance and co-operative bills represent a major improvement over the old legislation.

In some cases we are talking about legislation that has not been updated for decades. The Trust and Loan Companies Act, for example, has really not been substantially revised since it was brought in by Mackenzie King approximately 60 years ago. A lot has happened in the field of financial legislation in that 60 years. What we have had really are outdated laws. This has imposed significant burdens on companies and on institutions trying to meet the modern marketplace.

To look at an example, the Trust Act that trust companies are operating under at the present time requires that 93 per cent of their lending activity must be in mortgages. By confining the trust companies to this whole mortgage area, the old act may have put their safety at risk because a value of a mortgage asset can change dramatically with the price swings in real estate.

That left only 7 per cent of the trust company's investment for consumer and commercial loans. Under the new legislation that we have before us today, that stipulation will be removed, giving the trust and insurance companies a wider range of options, enabling them to better meet the demands of the marketplace.

This afternoon I am going to confine my remarks to the Bank Act, the Trust and Loan Companies Act and the Insurance Act because my colleague from Moncton, who is the critic for co-operatives, will deal with Bill C-34, the co-operative legislation.

One of the major items contained in the three bills is the natural person powers. In other words, banks, insurance and trust companies will be able to do anything in their line of business that is not clearly prohibited by legislation.

That certainly is a switch from what we have under the present legislation. What this means is that they will be able to do anything in their line of business unless it is stipulated in legislation that they cannot do it.

For example, in the trust and loan legislation, there are 11 business powers that trust companies will not be able to have. One of those is the ability to retail all types of insurance.

Another important element in the new legislation is to protect in a better way the soundness of financial institutions in Canada. For example, these institutions will be required to have one-third of their directors who are unaffiliated with the company.

The question is what is affiliated and what is not affiliated. As far as the legislation is concerned, the act says that a director is affiliated if he or she is an officer, an employee or a major customer of the institution.

What that really means is that one-third of the directors of financial institutions from now on cannot be an officer, an employee or a major customer.

• (1520)

Also, to continue talking about making institutions safer and more sound, it will be necessary to have procedures dealing with conflict of interests. Two more committees will have to be established: an audit committee and a conduct review committee.

It will be the job of the audit committee to deal with any problems the Auditor General points out in his report. The conduct review committee will review possible self-dealing situations.

That is a situation in which a director of a company may use his influence on the institution in a way that would benefit him personally.

All these measures which I have mentioned will make financial institutions more sound and safer for the Canadian public.

There is another new aspect to this legislation. There is a whole new ownership regime. Under this legislation banks, insurance and trust companies will be able to own one another. As well, they will all be able to own corporations within the financial services family.

This legislation will also give trust companies and insurance companies full commercial and consumer lending powers. Trust companies will no longer be restricted as they were under under the old legislation, under which they could only put 7 per cent of their lending into consumer and commercial loans. As well, insurance companies will be able to lend money not only to policy holders but to the general public.

Those are some of the changes that will come about under this new legislation. There are some aspects of the old legislation that will not be changed. One is that banks and trust companies will not be able to sell all types of insurance.

There are many important elements in this legislation. As I said, some of it is new and some of it is simply carried over from the old legislation.

The most controversial issue which the committee had to deal with was the retailing of insurance by banks and trust companies. I do not think that any other issue produced more studies, more phone calls, more meetings or more debate in the committee room. We in the Liberal Party heard arguments from various groups and individuals on both sides of the issue. We heard arguments that banks should be able to sell insurance because it would be cheaper and more convenient for the customer. We were told there would be no risk of tied selling. That happens when a bank tries to pressure a customer into buying insurance from that bank by threatening to deny him the mortgage.

We were told that around the world, and even in parts of Canada, deposit taking institutions sell insurance with no consumer problems and at very competitive prices.

On the other side of the coin, we also heard many arguments that banks should not be able to sell insurance. First, we were told there is no evidence that banks could sell life insurance any cheaper than the insurance companies are doing now. I mean over the long term. It is argued that maybe in the short term banks may undercut the prices of insurance companies to gain market share. That would mean that the consumer could benefit in the short run.

However, in the long term, which is what we really must be concerned about, it is still far from certain that banks would offer life insurance at super competitive prices.

We heard a lot of contradictory evidence on this whole issue. For example, in 1989 the Public Interest Research Centre did a study claiming that if banks sold insurance consumers would save millions of dollars. However, in 1991, this year, there was a study completed by Eckler Partners discrediting that previous study.

That is what I mean by saying that there was a lot of contradictory evidence to sort through to make decisions.

We also heard a lot of arguments that the banks would provide very unfair competition. That is because of the size of the banks. With assets of $126 billion, one bank, the Royal Bank, would be larger than the total insurance industry in Canada. Together the six major banks account for almost 90 per cent of the $584 billion in Canadian banking assets.

Therefore, it has been argued that there is a possibility of very unequal competition between the banks and the insurance companies simply because of the size of the assets of the six chartered banks.

It is possible that if the banks and trust companies sold insurance we might have a short but very intense battle between the huge chartered banks and the smaller life insurance companies. We could have massive dislocations in the insurance industry, which is made up of 170 companies and 35,000 agents.

Possibly a lot of insurance people could lose their jobs and a very successful Canadian insurance industry, which serves both rural and urban Canadians, would be permanently damaged by such a battle between unequals.

There is also some evidence to suggest that there could be some tied selling, which I described earlier. A survey in the United States by the insurance industry indicated that regulators found significant evidence of tied selling there. Therefore, you might ask: "Well, does that mean that it would happen in Canada?" Not necessarily, but it is certainly one of the arguments or factors we had to consider very seriously.

As I indicated earlier we heard a lot of conflicting views on whether banks and trust companies should be able to sell all types of insurance. We have studied this in great detail and given the potential enormous cost to the insurance industry. We in the Liberal Party have decided that banks and trust companies should not be able to sell all types of insurance.

Another issue that took up a lot of time in committee and which we examined in detail concerned the kind of foreign institutions that should be able to own Canadian Schedule II banks. This new Bank Act before us today adds financial institutions to the list of those which can apply for a Canadian Schedule II bank. That is really the same as it is in Canada.

We think that it is fair that foreign financial institutions should be able to apply for a Schedule II bank as long as we have confidence in the quality of the applicants.

The first draft that the government presented to the committee said that anyone in the business of financial services should be able to apply for a Schedule II bank. We had concerns about that and there was a lot of concern expressed about the potential destabilizing effects of the entry of unregulated companies like General Electric Finance Corporation and others. That could create a serious problem in Canada.

The original draft of this section was also very vague. As I said, anyone in the business of financial services could apply in Canada to become a bank. We felt that this left the door open for a whole host of undesirable applicants and that it would possibly undermine the soundness and safety of financial institutions in Canada.

As I mentioned earlier, that was a main objective that we in the Liberal Party kept in mind when we were reviewing this legislation. Foreign non-banks like GE Finance do many things that Canadian banks do. They raise money by making short-term loans known as commercial paper. This sounds like banking even though these institutions are unregulated and they are commercially linked. If they came into Canada they would obviously be regulated.

However, the question of allowing such commercially linked companies into Canada raises concerns about the fairness to Canadian banks and about the soundness of the Canadian financial industry.

One can therefore legitimately ask whether the government was putting our banks at a disadvantage with its original draft of the Bank Act. The new draft and the new legislation before us today restrict the applicants to foreign banks and foreign financial institutions. That includes co-operatives, trust companies, insurance companies, and security dealers.

The act goes further. It also requires that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions must satisfy himself about the adequacy of the foreign applicant. In other words, the superintendent has many questions to pose to anyone who wants to come into Canada and set up a Schedule II bank. That superintendent must find that the applicant responded to those questions satisfactorily and that the applicant will enhance financial institutions in Canada.

This new foreign bank section is the result of a compromise hammered out in the finance committee. It is not a compromise that was satisfactory to everyone. However it does express the concerns that were expressed and is a typical example of the give and take required in making workable legislation.

I know there are those who still argue that only banks should be allowed to apply for a Schedule II bank licence. They talk about the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada and this year's scandal as a reason this whole area should be tightened up. It is a misleading example because the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada would fit the criteria of being a bank and being regulated. It is really not an example that makes any sense whatsoever in this argument.

The Superintendent of Financial Institutions feels that this legislation we have before us today as far as the foreign applicants applying for a licence for Schedule II banks does not present a danger to the soundness of the Canadian financial institutions.

As I mentioned before, that was one of the major objectives of the members of the Liberal Party when we were studying this legislation.

A third important area I want to mention briefly here today is consumer issues. That was a main objective. We wanted to be sure that this legislation would help consumers and improve services to consumers from financial institutions. Of course, our party was extremely pleased when an amendment was passed in committee and eventually included in the bank and insurance bills as well.

Our amendment was to give customers the legal right to place complaints to financial institutions if there were charge fees they felt were extremely too high. There is going to be a mechanism there. First, they can go to the institution where they borrowed the money or whatever the fee happened to be for. If they do not get satisfaction there, they can go right to the top to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

In the annual report, the superintendent has to have a section on these complaints. That will have the number and types of complaints and how they have been dealt with.

As I said, we were extremely pleased that our amendment was passed in committee. We feel this will be very beneficial for consumers.

I want to mention a couple of other amendments. Another amendment we proposed last week when we were discussing this legislation in this House was an amendment dealing with the flow of information to auditors. I am happy to say that all members of the House saw fit to support this amendment. This is one which will go a long way toward helping produce better statements and will probably keep our financial institutions on a more sound basis.

It really prevents lawsuits against anyone who gives information in good faith to an auditor of a financial institution. We feel that protection is important. That information may go a long way toward providing more correct or more accurate financial statements.

In the failures of the two western banks that we had in 1985 and this year's failure of Standard Trust, the questionable accounting practices were in part blamed for these failures. In fact, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions told the finance committee last November that approved accounting practices might have made a difference in Standard Trust.

Here is what this amendment which we put forward really means. Consider an employee, for example, of a trust company who has information that he knows the auditor really needs to perform an accurate audit. The employee knows there is no way the trust company is going to give the auditor that information.

• (1540)

Under the present circumstances he might be reluctant to come forward because he would be afraid of a lawsuit.

With this amendment, that employee can come forward and give the information without any fear of being sued. I think that this amendment will result in a better audit. It could mean better financial statements and a better chance also for the superintendent to catch small problems. If they are not caught at the beginning, these could mushroom into huge problems and might eventually in the end cause a bankruptcy in that institution.

Another amendment that we in the Liberal Party propose is what you call a plain language amendment. We are extremely disappointed that the government did not see fit to support us in this amendment. It would require trust companies and other financial institutions to put into plain language various documents signed by customers.

I think it is extremely important that customers understand what they are signing. I know that we have all seen documents whether they are from an insurance company or a trust company or a bank that generally are very difficult to read. They have small print and very long sentences and they also have a lot of legal jargon in them.

This amendment that I proposed and which the government defeated involved using shorter sentences and everyday words. It was to make the document as easy to follow as possible.

I want to acknowledge though that certainly there has been some progress in this whole area. The financial institution industry itself has looked at this. It realizes that a lot of its documents are difficult. It is practically impossible for the average person to understand some of them.

There has been a trend by the financial industry itself to put a lot of its documents into plain, everyday language and I certainly commend them for this.

When I brought this up last week the member for Mississauga said that it was too difficult to do. This has been done. In the United States there are 10 states that have passed this legislation. New York was the first in 1978 and the results have been very impressive.

We also have a province in Canada that has passed this legislation. Alberta put plain language into law in 1990. It was an amendment that was reasonable because it gave the insurance companies and the trust companies and the banks two years to get these documents into everyday language.

Also it was not for everybody. This plain language amendment did not apply to large customers who would be borrowing over $250,000. As I mentioned, the government did not see fit to support it. It said it was too difficult. That is not an answer. That is an answer, but it is not a proper answer because this has already been done. It has already been accomplished in 10 states and one province.

I think it would go a long way toward improving the services of financial institutions to consumers. I was very displeased that the government would not support this amendment. I think it is an amendment which would help immensely consumers of financial institutions.

In looking over all at this legislation the banks, the trusts and the insurance people tell us that generally they are pleased with the content of the new legislation. We certainly feel that the consumer is going to benefit in many ways. As I said, that was one of our main objectives. We wanted consumers to benefit and we are confident they will.

The industries have said they are generally happy. They want to end the wrangling over specific powers and they want to get on with it. That is exactly what we in the Liberal Party are prepared to do.

There will be a five-year review of these bills. At that time there will be a lot of issues that will have to be revisited. These are issues that we were unable to resolve to the satisfaction of people concerned during our year's study of this whole area of financial institutions.

That review is extremely important. The whole financial institution industry is moving so quickly. We proposed in committee that that review should take place in three years but the government turned it down. As I said it will be five years as is in the legislation that we are giving third reading today.

One issue that no doubt will take a lot of debate the next time around, as it did this time, is whether banks and trust companies should sell insurance. Certainly I want to note that the world is changing in this area. If we look at Europe in 1995 I understand that banks will control about 20 per cent of the life insurance market. In Spain banks are said to distribute 74 per cent of the life and pension types of insurance. That is a whole issue which I am sure the committee will spend a great deal of time on five years down the road.

Another important issue that I want to talk about for a couple of minutes today is one with which we have to deal. It is the harmonization of provincial and federal rules for trust and insurance companies. Unlike banks, which are federally regulated, trust and insurance companies are regulated both federally and provincially. In some cases that means 11 different sets of rules.

That is a lot of rules. It is very costly and time consuming and in the end who really pays the cost? It is the user of the financial institution, whether it is the insurance company or whether it is the trust company.

I know that you told me that I only have one more minute. I would just like to sum up my remarks that today we are in third reading of this bill and the final phase of the role of the House of Commons in what experts are calling the largest single reform of financial institutions ever to take place in Canadian history.

I am pleased to support the legislation because we feel it meets our objectives. It is going to be better as far as customers are concerned. It is going to ensure sound and safer financial institutions. It is going to make Canadian financial institutions more competitive internationally.

I want to remind the government of one thing. Our financial institutions cannot achieve their international potential until the government succeeds in harmonizing their regulations at home.

• (1550)

I encourage the government to take action and I have been encouraging the minister for the past year to do this. I encourage him now that this legislation is going to be passed to get on with the job because really he has no excuse now that these four bills have gone before committee, have been scrutinized, and the legislation has come to the House of Commons to be passed. Once this goes through the Senate and becomes law, I encourage the minister to get on with the job of harmonizing the rules in Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

My colleague from the Liberal Party from the riding of Moncton asked if he could, since he has to leave at 4.15, go ahead of me for 10 minutes and I have agreed to that in order to facilitate him.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. I had not been made aware of that arrangement. I am delighted to recognize the hon. member for Moncton.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, we were busy negotiating as the member for Malpeque was concluding her address, so that is why we did not have a chance to consult with you beforehand.

It is a pleasure to speak to this particular bill and to have been part of the process. I want to start first by complimenting the member for Malpeque, our official critic for financial institutions, for doing an absolutely fantastic job. As can be seen from her address this afternoon, she has dealt with this legislation with a great deal of interest. She got into the details and dealt with those critical things that a lot of parliamentarians, myself included, have a tendency to brush aside and not deal with.

She has taken the time and effort and worked extremely hard in order to represent our party in what is really, without exaggeration, the biggest pile of boring legislation that I have seen in a long time. That is no aspersion to any of the institutions or to the chairman of the committee or anyone. It is just boring, boring material, but very critical to our country and to our financial institutions, and, to use the new buzzword that is in play these days, to competitiveness.

I would have to say that there is the old view that it is a curse to live in interesting times and I believe we are. Changes are taking place in the world today. Political changes are occurring in the Soviet Union, in Eastern Europe and all around the world. The global marketplace is evolving and there are interesting things happening such as the European common market is now looking at a single currency, the Eurodollar. It is looking at perhaps a global, single unit of currency rather than the different yen, mark, Canadian dollar, American dollar and those things. There are some major fundamental changes taking place in our financial institutions and in our economic institutions.

The question then becomes whether we have done a proper job with the legislation that is before this House. I think it has been a process of exhaustion rather than actually dealing with a lot of the issues. The legislation has been around for a long time. The review has taken a long time. I think all of the financial institutions have finally said: "Enough. We will take what you give us and we will get on with our lives". I think all members of the committee were of the same opinion.

However, we have to try to prepare these financial institutions for the year 2000 and beyond. I and our party feel that at this particular stage we have prepared them for the 1990s, but not for the year 2000. There is still more work to be done. We must make our institutions far more competitive and far more aware and involved in what is going on in the global economy.

The impression that we are left with is that this is an in between measure and that we will be back and working on these institutions and trying to make them more competitive in the future.

I must say as well that when we look at the information age and the things that are happening, such as the fact that you can be in Tokyo today and put your bank card in a machine and have yen taken out of your account, banking institutions are soon going to be processing a lot of their material and work in the part of the world that is asleep while they are awake. In other words, the banks in Canada and the United States will probably have a lot of their data processed in Hong Kong, Taiwan or Japan because while we are asleep they are awake and vice versa.

There are going to be some major changes and we have to be concerned about what is going to happen to our institutions. We cannot allow ourselves to lose the competitive edge, nor can we allow ourselves to have our technology and our knowledge systems broken into and utilized by other organizations and other countries.

We have to maintain the safeguards and the integrity of our system and the privacy of our information as this is going to be dealt with in other countries.

I look as well at the challenges we face. The goals of the Liberal Party were fairly simple at this stage. They were to try to protect the Canadian consumer, to have sound financial institutions and at the same time to make our financial institutions more competitive.

I think we have achieved to a degree the idea of serving our Canadian consumers better. I am not sure whether we have yet the full safety nets around the financial institutions. I am not sure whether OSFI in its present make-up can actually do the job it is intended to do. It seems that as soon as OSFI is interested in a financial institution, there is a run on that institution. It is almost like a sledgehammer killing a fly in some cases.

We have seen in a couple of our financial institutions in the past that it is necessary that we have a strong OSFI organization. We have to give it some of the tools to better protect our financial institutions. We cannot let OSFI become the institution that puts our financial institutions out of work.

There is also the issue of competitiveness which we have talked about. Our financial institutions have lost their competitive edge over the last number of years. Our banks have slipped from being major players in the world economy to minor players in the world economy and we have to do what we can to strengthen our financial institutions.

I also want to talk about the co-op movement, the co-operatives and credit unions because they are going to become more critical in years ahead. As we embark on a global economy and our institutions start to compete world-wide and become larger, there will be a tendency to forget about the individual.

We need those organizations that are going to be people oriented, that are going to accommodate the individuals on the farms, in the fishing villages, in the towns and municipalities in our country, and not deal with those large impersonal organizations. The credit unions, the caisses populaires and those organizations will be able to give our Canadian consumers the type of financial service they need and deserve. At the same time, by utilizing those organizations I believe that ultimately we will see the co-op movement become a major player on the world stage as well.

We can see what the caisse populaire has done and the credit union movement in Quebec has done as far as fuelling economic development in that province. I believe that organization and the concepts it espouses can do a tremendous job as far as the economic well-being of our country is concerned.

I appreciate the opportunity to have a short, quick, rushed comment on this legislation, having worked in the committee. It was a pleasure to serve on the committee and work with the chairman and the member for Mississauga who taught me a lot about the railroad industry as the bills were going through. He managed to railroad a number of clauses through very well.

• (1600)

It was nice to see that VIA Rail and CN were back in business in the Standing Committee on Finance at least. It was a pleasure to work on and study the legislation and to watch a good chairman pilot the legislation through the committee. It will be a pleasure, I am sure, to hear the comments of my friend from Nickel Belt who will be talking about caging animals and all the rest of that as we move to discuss financial institutions.

The only admonition I would give is that when you start caging animals and keeping a financial zoo, somebody eventually has to feed those animals and it could become a very expensive proposition. I thank the member for Nickel Belt for the opportunity to precede him. I regret that I will not be able to hear all that he has to say, although I will stay for a portion of his address.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, a point of order. Before us today there are by agreement four bills being dealt with in one debate. Given that my friend from Nickel Belt would normally have 20, 40, 60, 80 minutes of debate, I am wondering in the spirit of Christmas if we can seek unanimous consent of the House to allow the member to speak a little longer than his 20 minutes, up to a maximum of 40 minutes. I know the House will not only be entertained, but my friend, having looked at some of his notes, has a lot to offer the House and the people of Canada in his speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to get the same amount of time as the first speaker for the government and for the Liberal Party?

Mrs. Marleau: I am certainly happy to agree to the 40 minutes for my neighbouring colleague, but I would want to specify that there will be no 10 minutes for questions and comments. Is that understood?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is the normal procedure when there is a 40-minute speech. It is not followed by a period of questions and comments.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues for that kind consideration.

These are not ordinary bills that we see here. These bills speak to the question of money, Canadians' money. That is what these bills speak to.

The lengthy process involving these bills seems to have begun with Bill C-83 in the previous Parliament. However, it began even before that. It began with the McDougall green paper in 1985, the Hockin blue paper in 1986, the draft trust bill in 1987, the Senate report in 1990. All these bills contain 2,428 clauses.

You have to imagine the way the structure was. Financial institutions were regulated by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, Michael Mackenzie. He could best be described as an orchestra conductor. He would make sure that all of the players in the orchestra were in concert, each complementing the other; the wind section, the string section, the brass section—all of them. Mr. Mackenzie was playing away as the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

I want to tell you that the whole future of financial institutions is being redesigned and it deals with the savings of the Canadian people.

In fact we now have a new vision of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. We have abandoned the concept of the orchestra pit. The imagery of an orchestra conductor conducting the symphony is gone, just gone. With the passage of these bills at the end of third reading the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is now a matchmaker or a shadchan, as the Jewish culture would call it. That is somebody who makes a match. You have a daughter and you have a son; I am the matchmaker. This new picture of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions as a matchmaker is very well described in today's business paper.

It is deal making, as described in an article by Brian Milner. The headline is: "Spurned suitor left perplexed". The article continues: "It seemed like the perfect marriage. A Quebec based trust company with deep pockets and big ambitions teams up with a slightly larger but struggling competitor that still owns a valuable set of family jewels". See the picture. There is somebody in trouble, but they have some family jewels, and there is somebody with deep pockets.

Who has the deep pockets? Montreal Trust Co., which is owned by Bell Canada Enterprises. Have you got that picture? The one it is vying for is Central Guaranty. What happens? They both go and see a matchmaker. Central Guaranty wants to be bailed out. Montreal Trust wants to bail them out. Therefore, they go to the matchmaker, Michael Mackenzie, no longer the orchestra conductor but the matchmaker. He tries to make a match but something happens and it falls through. Why?

These are the words of Central Guaranty officials: "Central Guaranty officials say that the no quarter given bargaining tactics of Montreal Trust Co. left their board with no alternative". They found somebody else. You will see in a minute who they found.

"They were incredibly greedy. They wanted to steal the company", a Central official said. They bet that they were the only guys bidding and they lost. The article says: "Mr. Mackenzie is believed to have played a large behind the scenes role in the dealing that led up to Central Guaranty's branch sale". Guess who sneaked into the bedroom in the dark, grabbed the family jewels and took off? The National Bank of Canada. It took off with $3.5 billion in healthy loans and deposits and left all of the junk behind. I wonder who will pick that up. The bad loans, the non-performing loans, all the other things you cannot get a return on are left behind. I wonder who will pick it up.

These bills now see the Superintendent of Financial Institutions in a new role, not as orchestra conductor but actually as a matchmaker, trying to merge the weak with the strong.

It even gets to the point where all of these activities are very secretive. One would think that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is really performing a job for the Canadian taxpayer. However, when the Superintendent of Financial Institutions claims the fifth amendment and refuses to testify before the OSC hearings you have to wonder what is going on. This is not a transparent system any more. These bills being passed into law will make it all the more ravenous.

• (1610)

What was the government's view of this reform? Why is it bringing it in? What were its goals with this? An information sheet on September 27, 1990 said that the purpose of this legislation was to benefit consumers by increasing competition and the spectrum of services offered by financial institutions.

Reading between the lines it says that you have to build bigger financial institutions, sumo wrestlers of financial institutions, that can compete abroad.

The second purpose of the legislation was to enhance protection for the depositors and policy holders. What does that mean? The translation is knock down the pillars, deregulate.

The third purpose was to strengthen the ability of Canadian financial institutions to compete at home and abroad by giving them new opportunities for growth.

We just saw that in the Royal Bank's latest statement on earnings. Take a look at it. Take a very good hard look at it. The Royal Bank has about $27 billion of assets internationally, and receives a return on assets of 1.52 per cent. It has $102 billion in domestic assets and receives a return of .55 per cent. Their return on equity on their foreign assets is 1.52 per cent and on their domestic assets is .55 per cent.

That is very important when you think about it. They want to become sumo wrestlers because there is more to be earned, and of course we do all the processing here at home. That is what we read between the lines.

The fourth purpose is to lay the groundwork for discussion with the provinces on harmonizing the regulations on supervision of financial institutions.

Read between the lines. That translates into relaxing business powers and ownership rules to the lowest common denominator. There is nothing to beef up the rules and say to the provinces: "Now you conform to the federal rules. Go up to the highest common factor". The government said: "No, we'll go down to the lowest common denominator". In these bills we have watered down our wine. We have not shown any leadership in Canada on the whole question of trying to get the provinces to harmonize with the tougher regulatory powers that should be at the federal level.

How do we New Democrats view reform of financial institutions? We have two aims and objectives in mind. First, the solvency of our financial firms and, second, the availability of credit at a reasonable price, in every region, every city and every town and to every citizen.

Oh boy, did we have experts come before the committee during the whole process. We were inundated with bankers, auditors, and experts of all types. We had the most exotic array of flora from the financial jungles of Canada.

Mr. de Jong: And fauna.

Mr. Rodriguez: I like to use the flora; it is not so cruel. They were there in full colours. They were there at all stages. Never before in history have members of Parliament been so inundated with lobbyists of all stripes. There we were in the committee. We were led by the grand wizard and he was churning away. He chanted incantations as he peered at us: "Return on equity, capital base, demutualization, leverage, corporate governance, technical amendments, poor loss linkages".

An hon. member: Who's the wizard?

Mr. Rodriguez: The wizard is the member for Mississauga South in full regalia. "Cross pillar synergies". He reminded me of the witches from Macbeth. How does it go: "Boil and toil, oil and troubles, witches brew, cauldron bubble". There he was. That is the image of what he was.

Then he put his hand in and he pulled out Bill C-34. Everybody agreed that it was pretty harmless. It dealt with the co-operatives and my friend who will speak later will deal with that. He put it over on his side. Then he went on and pulled out some other things: "Prudential corporate governments". I bet you do not know what that is, Madam Speaker. "Prudential corporate governments, conduct at audit committees, independence from executive management". We had no problem with these first emanations from the cauldron.

However, in the images cast by the smoke emanating from the cauldron we saw the dark side. It is characterized by its mediocrity because it relaxes the rules on ownership, the rules on relationship between commercial and financial. This is a victory of mediocrity over excellence. By relaxing the ownership rules and broadening the powers both in-house and out-house we have also dropped the traditional opposition we had to close commercial ownership of financial institutions.

We thought that the wizard wanted to ensure the wide ownership which he had often espoused before he put his wizard's hat on, that what he had foreseen in 1987 he was prepared to do now. However, when he had done churning and chanting he put a cowl over the cauldron and said: "This is a done deal". Nobody else could put anything in the cauldron.

I wanted to put some garlic in the cauldron. I wanted to keep the evil spirits out. He would not let me put anything in the cauldron, no garlic. I could not even make a cross by the cauldron because he chanted: "This is a done deal. This is a done deal".

There is nothing on this earth in Canada that you, Madam Speaker, or I could do that could change it one iota. One jot or tittle could not be changed because it was a done deal.

• (1620)

These bills, in our view, do not address our very serious concerns, the concerns of wide ownership of financial institutions. They do not deal with the whole question of keeping commercial and financial arrangements separate. You cannot mix the two up.

I am not the only one saying this. Henry Kaufman, one of America's best known economists, testified to Congress this month that countries in which banking and commerce are close, such as Japan and western Germany, tend to end up with an elitist corporate state.

Gerald Corrigan, the influential chairman of the New York Federal Reserve voiced the central bank's objections that the deposit insurance safety net could be stretched too far, and some industries are too alien to central bankers for the proper supervision of banking subsidiaries. For the same reason monetary policy will be hard to run.

Corrigan warned of the same thing. He has been warning the American government and American regulators that when you start mixing up the commercial with the financial, it is a recipe for disaster. We have that in this cauldron. It was cooked up and it was churned up by my colleague, the member for Mississauga South.

These bills fail to address the question of harmonization. We called on the government to show some leadership. We said: "Why do you not call a meeting of regulatory authorities and provinces to deal with the number one problem in financial Canada, harmonization of financial institutions?"

There are things that you are allowed to do provincially that you are not allowed to do federally. What the government does is simply incorporate provincially where it is a little bit more loosey goosey.

We pass rules here that contradict things that are happening at the provincial level and it does not make any sense. Each jurisdiction has its own rules which contravene or duplicate federal rules. These bills, to a large extent, it seems to me are pitching to the mythical average province.

It brings us down to the lowest common denominator and not the highest common factor.

Mr. Mills: No national standards.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is right. My colleague and friend from Broadview—Greenwood is absolutely correct.

Financial harmonization is not so much a question of technical complexity but rather one of political will. Does the government have the political will to do it? This government has never shown any national leadership, especially in the area of financial institutions harmonization.

What we end up with is the tail wagging the dog. That is what we have here. In the whole process, I am sorry to say that my Liberal colleagues showed absolutely no leadership in the committee. They showed no leadership whatsoever.

There were occasions when they actually watered it down even further by jumping and saying to the grand wizard: "You are putting too much of that in there. Take it out". We wanted to put two auditors in the cauldron. They said: "No, you only need one. Take one out". We ended up with only one auditor for financial institutions.

Read the papers. Read what is going on. There is a feeding frenzy out there. They are involved in all kinds of real estate things. The trust and loans companies are capital hungry.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

BANK ACT

INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, as I was saying, there is the whole question of overlaps between the federal rules governing financial institutions and provincial rules. There are overlaps that have not been dealt with. There are such things as conflict of interest, arm's length, self-dealing relationships and capital adequacy. They have not been dealt with in terms of the federal-provincial overlaps.

In terms of soundness and stability of our system, we have developed an extremely sound financial institutional system in this country. It is one of the best in the world when we compare it with what we see south of the border and when we compare it with the European problems and the Japanese problems. I am leaving aside the complaining that we often have from time to time about credit card interest rates and bank service charges and financial institutions serving single industry towns and rural communities. I just want to leave that aside for the moment. Based on soundness and stability, the financial institutional system of this country is one of the best in the world, if not the best in the world.

How did the system get that stability? It took the crash of 1929 to get that. It was not the two main parties that have governed Canada. It was not the two parties that brought this about. It is a direct result of the hard lessons we learned from the crash of 1929. Of course the hard working citizens of this country have contributed to these high marks.

We warned at every stage of the bill that benefits earned by deregulation are not free. There is a price. What is the price for our global warriors? Read the papers. Read what is happening. There is increased concentration of ownership, increased concentration of activity, increased vulnerability of our financial institutions as they move into foreign markets and gradually have a larger share of their earnings determined outside Canada. Consider the forays that were made in the last couple of years where some of our financial institutions went into the United States and started buying real estate and getting into commercial real estate lending, golf courses and apartment buildings. They are ending up as pretty big landowners and landlords in the United States.

I mentioned the fact about their foreign markets. When they get an increasing share of their earnings from their foreign investments, how do you control that? How do you control these activities?

We have pointed out the shortfalls of this reform which failed to address the decline in the transparency of the financial system as a whole. Imagine trying to track the financial transactions as they cross borders.

Have we forgotten the BCCI? We did not even know what transactions were going on across the borders between the BCCI in Canada and the United Kingdom. We received the report from the regulator in Great Britain about the BCCI. They could not read it because of all the heavily blacked out information. They had to bring in agent 007 to try and see through the black.

This is the first time I have ever heard of a financial institution going down because of the black ink. They usually go down because of the red ink.

All the information is not even available to our regulator for transactions that cross borders from Canada to others. We cannot track that, yet we are encouraging the development of these sumo wrestlers where you have to reinforce the stage at Albert Hall so they can wrestle each other.

At committee and report stages we proposed amendments and alternatives that would address some of the concerns that we expressed. When the bathtub was heaved out the window, we wanted only the water to go out the window. We wished for the baby to remain.

In view of what took place, we on this side of the House tried, but in vain. We heard the chairman for Mississauga South chanting: "It is a done deal. It is a done deal". There was nothing we could do about it.

The Financial Post of November 29, 1991 did a report on the story. It said that the chairman of the committee who is the member for Mississauga South:

> —along with the Minister of State for Finance—shepherded the legislation through long parliamentary hearings

Shepherd they did and that is what he was. He was the good shepherd. He would say: "Shall clauses 400 to 600 carry?" The Tories would say: "Baa". He would say: "Shall clauses 600 to 650 carry?" " Baa". He shepherded all right. He shepherded 2,468 clauses right through into the promised land.

If there was anything in the committee that somebody did not like, it went to the big sheep, the minister, who with nods and winks finally got it through.

There was one more "It is a done deal" and one more "Done deal". With a few more "Done deals" this government would have made a complete mockery of Parliament and its role in protecting the future of the country.

Financial institutions knew many months ahead that the walls between banks and insurance and trust companies were coming down. The walls of Jericho were coming down. They knew that and they went out there to become significant players. For the last 12 to 18 months they have been hiring the top guns in real estate and the top guns in insurance. When you have something to be fixed, you go to the top guns. Behind closed doors a deal was struck on these bills. Parliament did not legislate these. We are going through a pro forma exercise here. This was a done deal behind closed doors with the BCNI and the financial bigwigs of this country. They cooked up this deal. They handed it to the government. They said: "You shepherd it through your flock of sheep. You do it". That is what happened. That is what we have here.

That is why we could not move any substantial amendments or change anything substantive in these bills. It was a done deal as the member for Mississauga said. In blunt terms, this is a compromise among the corporate interests of this country. They get what they can and they keep what they have. That is the approach. "What I have got is mine and what is yours is negotiable". That is the approach. That is the Canadian tradition.

I want to say these Tories, this government has speeded up, accelerated and extrapolated what the Liberal governments before them began. If we read the bills, the language of the bills is written in a complex "loopholable" and double sort of language. It is a language which divides society into: "I know and it is up to you to find out", a language that protects the jobs and ever-rising incomes of the myriad lawyers, accountants and experts who thrive on legalism. It protects the private fortunes and the empires of the 40 to 60 families and corporations of this country which control two-thirds of the financial assets of Canada.

We had four pillars. We had a pillar arrangement following the crash of 1929. We had a pillar for banks, for investment brokers, for trust and loan companies, and for insurance companies. We had four pillars. The first thing they did was to collapse that pillar in 1987 to bail out the brokerage houses because they had gone too far out on a limb and they lacked the capital. Today where are those pillars? Where is that pillar? It is in the back pocket of every bank. They have all got their side-arms. These are the RBC, Dominion and ScotiaMcLeod. They even wear their fancy Scottish tartans. They are identified by their tartans and their little caps like my colleague from Thunder Bay, except theirs is a bright orange. I do not know where they got that from.

Financial deregulation was triggered by the Ronald Reagan administration of the early 1980s. It revolves around letting the market decide so that these systems will become even more efficient in a global market.

The first pillar went down. Bills C-4, C-19 and C-28 further collapsed the pillars. There is going to be no legal distinction or very little legal distinction between banks, trust and insurance companies. It encourages the further breakdown of the pillars. It will erode the pillar structure.

The emergence of a full service financial conglomerate will now come out of the cauldron. That is the ultimate aim of the wizard of Mississauga South. He is now going to draw out of that that there will only be one super financial institution, one financial conglomerate. It will either do it by broadening in-house powers or through the acquisition of subsidiaries including insurance and vice versa.

Canada's laws and regulations supported the pillar concept from a national perspective. They were set to create and regulate institutions which not only held a distinct and well-defined function but also obeyed different ownership rules.

• (1650)

The pillar constraints were designed to make supervision easier. It was designed to protect national markets from concentration and to reduce chain reactions in the case of a failure. Ownership rules were designed to discourage direct accumulation of powers. They were designed to prevent vertical concentration and conflict of interest and self-dealing.

These rules also safeguarded a predominant Canadian content. We all know about the 10 per cent rule for banks and we know about the 25 per cent rule stating that no group of non-residents may hold more than 25 per cent of the shares of a bank. Now they are all history. As a result, banks, insurance companies and trust companies will virtually be able to own any type of financial institution.

Look at what is to come. Look inside the cauldron, see what is in there, and see what is emerging from the depths of the cauldron that has been stirred up by my colleague from Mississauga South, the wizard of the committee. Look at what is happening. Insurance companies have recently been gobbling up trust companies. Sun Life Trust, the wholly owned subsidiary of Sun Life Assurance Company, bought Coronet Trust from Crown Inc. and Counsel Trust from Counsel Corp., making it the eighth largest trust company in the country with more than $3 billion in assets.

The Confederation Life Insurance Co. has been gobbled up. The sale of Standard Trust to Laurentian Bank; the sale of Cabot Capital Corporation and 50 per cent of Huronia Trust and First-Line Trust to Manulife Financial; the sale of Citizens Trust to Vancouver City Savings Credit Union; the sale of two units of La Financière coopérants Inc. to La Financière coopérants crédit-bail Inc. Inc.; and Financière coopérants prêt-épargne Inc. to Laurentian Bank.

Central Guaranty Trust Ltd. is waiting for the matchmaker so that marriage can be consummated. It is sitting there in the bedroom waiting.

National Trust and First City Trust are potential merge candidates; more work for the new matchmaker, not the orchestra conductor any more, but the new matchmaker. That is the new reality. That is the new Tory financial institution's outlook.

I have said consistently in committee that financial-commercial linkages will legalize the creation of major private governments and they have adverse effects on our CDIC.

Imagine one of these sumo wrestlers growing and growing with $700 billion in assets walking into any prime minister's office and saying: "Hey, Charlie, this is what you're going to do". Is the Prime Minister going to argue with anybody like that? Is he going to argue with that kind of sumo wrestling power? No. He is going to say: "What do you want, sir, and how much?" That is the danger: increased monopoly and the cost of failure.

Imagine what would have happened if we had an Algoma Bank or a Lavalin Bank or a Robert Campeau Bank? Where would we be today? We would be paying for a scream off for God's sake.

In 1989 the CDIC annual report pointed out that; we had since 1970 some 20 trust and loan companies that went down the tube. The value to CDIC was $1.048 billion. We paid that; we picked it up. The situation that I have described encourages more incentives for mergers. It encourages more links between the commercial and the financial. It is not going to be a more regulated system. They have watered it down. There is no harmonization with the provinces. This is part of the neo-conservative view that what is good for the market has to be good for Canada, and it ain't necessarily so.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to take a few minutes to participate in this debate.

This particular set of bills, the financial institution bills, has in many ways demonstrated Parliament at its best in terms of process. Through the committee stage, through second reading, report and third reading stages of this bill there has been a lot of good will on the part of members from all sides of the House.

As a result I think this legislation has had a very complete and thorough review. I think members on all sides of the House should be complimented for their work in this legislation.

Madam Speaker, I know that you are aware of the impact that has had on the House and on the general good will that has built up between members.

When the House leader for the Official Opposition asked the regular Thursday question, there was a strong indication that the opposition was prepared to extend hours this evening to allow us to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment to complete third reading of this bill. I know that there is a desire on the part of all members to see that debate is completed on this bill in time to proceed to the Senate, so that the Senate will have adequate time to review it next week and we can have the royal assent prior to us adjourning for Christmas.

I do not want to take a great deal of time of the House. Under Standing Order 26(1) I move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of third reading debate on Bill C-4, an act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I just wish to advise the House that because a number of our members who are scheduled to speak on this bill are unavailable this evening, we will be unable to support this motion. More important I should point out to the House and to those people watching that regardless of whether the bill is completed today or tomorrow, any vote on it will not happen until Monday next. Therefore there is no need for such speed to get it to the Senate because it will not go to the Senate until after Monday in any case.

Mr. Cooper: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I do not intend to delay your putting of the motion. There has been a great deal of co-operation in the House lately, and the Official Opposition has indicated that tomorrow afternoon it would like to move a concurrence motion which will dramatically affect the amount of time that we in this House have to complete both Bill C-5 and the financial institution bills before us right now.

I am just wondering if I can obtain from him an assurance that it should not be any problem completing those prior to Routine Proceedings tomorrow which would be at the normal time of approximately twelve o'clock.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, actually at this point, without having consulted with my colleague, the critic for these bills, I am not sure what time he requires for our speakers to complete it.

I can assure him though in terms of Bill C-5, for which I am responsible, that it is my intention not to give more than a five-minute speech and to allow both report stage and third reading to occur tomorrow, because we would rather get the bill passed and to the Senate.

In any case, as the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader pointed out in a media conference this afternoon, Thursday and Friday of next week have not been allocated in terms of the work of this House. He knows he has some flexibility to get the agenda of the government through by next Friday.

Mr. Cooper: I do not mean to prolong this, but I want to be very clear. What the hon. member is suggesting is that an agreement that has gone on between the various House leaders did allow for us to complete the stages of both Bill C-5 and the financial institution bills by at the latest tomorrow. He knows our concerns relating to the Senate.

I just want to make sure that no misunderstanding is developing.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Just one moment. I see the hon. member has left the House. The hon. member for Oshawa rose and seemed rather upset and asked for a point of order, as another member had been recognized on a point of order. He seemed to be rather upset with the Speaker.

• (1700)

I do hope that the hon. Whip will let the hon. member know that I cannot recognize two people at the same time. There has to be one person after the other and someone already had the floor.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I will pass on that information.

I would just like to say to the House that it is my understanding that at no time did we give a commitment to reduce the number of speakers in order that the bill be passed tomorrow. We did not know about the intention of the Official Opposition to move concurrence in that motion tomorrow which has disrupted the schedule that was planned out by the House leaders, I understand that notice was given at the House leaders meeting. That was not part of the mix. It is still our intention to endeavour to meet that agreement but we cannot do so if our members are not given adequate time to make their comments.

I know some members are staying in Ottawa in order to do that, although some of them are not available tonight.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And more than 15 members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Southwest Nova—The Economy; the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam—Meme Breast Implants; the hon. member for Drummond—Imported Carpeting; the hon. member for York North—Unemployment; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Poverty.

Mr. Mills: Excuse me, Madam Speaker, I have a point of order.

I just want to seek a clarification from the Chair. If I understand correctly, the member for Thunder Bay earlier today asked for unanimous consent of this House to take an extra 40 minutes so that he could put forward his point of view on this bill. We concurred in the spirit of co-operation in order to get this bill moving.

If I understood correctly, the NDP now is saying we cannot continue to debate this bill in order to get it going.

An hon. member: Precisely.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to reread Standing Order 26(1) which says, if I may paraphrase, that if a member from his seat asks that debate continue after the normal hour, if less than 15 members rise and say they disagree, we do go on. If 15 or more members rise and say they do not agree, the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn, which is what we have just seen in the last few minutes.

The Speaker explains the rules. This is all that I try and do.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

HEALTH

FAMILY PLANNING

The House resumed, from October 31, consideration of the motion of Ms. Black (p. 4331).

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I am most pleased to be able to rise and speak in favour of the motion that has been put forward by my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby.

One of the things that is quite striking in our society is that the same situation is one of the greatest causes of joy and one of the greatest causes of sorrow, that is the determination by a woman that she is pregnant.

If a woman is mature, financially well off, and wishes to have a child it is a time for great joy and celebration. If a woman is immature, poor, unemployed, and particularly if she does not wish to have a child it is a time for great anguish, trauma, and sorrow.

Since the government's failed attempt to recriminalize abortion, it has failed to come forward with any concrete positive measures to deal with the question of unwanted pregnancies. I think that this bill goes a long way toward beginning to put forward very concrete, positive steps to deal with this and other problems in Canada related to unwanted pregnancies and the spread of venereal disease.

Sexual ignorance is widespread. Before we look at programs, we have to look at some of the information about the situation in Canada. One in five 14-year-olds and one in two 16-year-olds are sexually active. One in five teenage girls will become pregnant before the age of 20. Sexually transmitted disease affects one in every eight Canadians. One in 10 couples is infertile, partly as a result of sexually transmitted disease.

Although 83 per cent of Canadians believe that sexual education should be taught in schools, only one-half of schools in Canada approve any such program. Forty-six per cent of Canadians feel that they have limited access to contraception and family planning. Nearly 70,000 women in Canada have abortions each year.

When one looks at these statistics in comparison with other countries, particularly other countries in which family planning and sexual education is the norm, it is quite striking. The rate of adolescent pregnancies in Canada is five times as high as in the Netherlands, five times. It is four times as high as in the Scandinavian countries.

We have had some experience with what can happen with even limited family planning programs aimed at adolescents and young women. In Ontario between 1976 and 1986 there was a 23 per cent reduction in the number of adolescent pregnancies. They declined from 21,000 to 14,000 a year. The rate of abortion in that period of time remained relatively the same. This was as a result of education programs undertaken within the province of Ontario.

• (1710)

In 1975 the Ontario government said that it would fund 100 per cent of education information and contraceptive services through health units. Eighty-one per cent of the units now offer these services. At the same time, it made the opportunity available for education within the school system. This has not been universally done.

The result is that there has been a dramatic drop in the rate of pregnancies and abortions in Ontario, particularly among young teens up to the age of 16. In this age group the rate of pregnancies has dropped 33 per cent, the rate of births has dropped 40 per cent, and the rate of abortions has dropped 28 per cent.

For older teens, those 17 to 19, the rate of pregnancies has dropped 20 per cent and the rate of births has dropped 38 per cent, but abortions have risen.

In the report that studied the question of whether extending access to prevention reduces abortions and births to the unmarried, the conclusions are: "It is a reasonable conclusion that declining pregnancies during the decade are largely as a result of programs reaching the most accessible adolescents: accessible geographically, living close to public and private prevention resources, accessible socially, meaning those with support within their personal network to reinforce prevention messages, and accessible personally, adolescents who did not have some special needs, disability or who were not living in deprived, crisis-ridden environments".

There are clear indications that family planning and education work.

We very much want to take a look at what is happening in Canada with regard to family planning. The federal government was supportive of family planning and the Planned Parenthood Association in Canada. Its funding peaked in 1977 at $627,000 but has taken a dramatic nosedive since then under two governments. The former Liberal government reduced the association's funding from $627,000 to $237,000 by the time it left office in 1984. It was tragic. Funding was cut not only in half but greater than half.

The Tory government then got in. It was going to show that it could do even better, that it could cut more and cut faster. By 1990 it had taken the $237,000 and reduced it to $146,000, where it has been frozen. There is now no comprehensive program in Canada without that.

The Speaker is indicating that my time is running out. I think it is tragic that there is no program, particularly because of the fact that the cost benefit ratio has been shown to be one to ten.

It is also a personal tragedy. I think this bill would go a long way toward restoring these programs and helping women and other young people deal with it on a very positive basis.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare Canada recognizes the need for programs in the area of sexuality education and family planning, especially for young people.

The Health Promotion Contribution Program under the health promotion fund provides funding to community based projects. Since 1983 the Health Promotion Contribution Program has dedicated over $2 million to projects related to reproductive health, including fertility and family planning. One project is the development of a national sexuality information resource centre and clearing-house by Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada.

To assist Planned Parenthood in its endeavour to reach this goal, the Department of National Health and Welfare Canada, through the Health Promotion Contribution Program, was able to direct $314,000 to Planned Parenthood, to conduct a structured needs assessment and to begin the development of the sexuality information resource centre and clearing-house. These funds have allowed Planned Parenthood not only to conduct a needs assessment but to begin the development of the centre.

The purpose of this project is to fill a gap in the information services available and to assist educators who work with individuals in family life education.

The need to co-ordinate quality information about human sexuality has been indicated by many organizations.

Planned Parenthood is now working hard to raise funds from individual, foundation and corporate sources to cover the high start-up costs of the resource centre and the clearing-house function. Many clearing-houses have shared this challenge of finding and maintaining funding sources.

The Department of National Health and Welfare supports the intent of the resource centre and clearing-house and encourages all sectors to show commitment to this worth-while project. In Canada we are fortunate to have the voluntary sector play such an important role in health care. This is in keeping with our philosophy of fostering public participation and strengthening community response to health needs.

There are many other projects related to reproductive health funded through the Health Promotion Contribution Program. For example, a child abuse prevention training kit for day care workers; a community resource kit on new reproductive technologies; a northern childbirth workshop for women and their families; a needs assessment and plan of action for women in menopause; and a maritime parent sexuality education project.

The health promotion fund manages the AIDS Community Program known as "ACAP". This program funds projects that strengthen community participation, intersectoral co-ordination and evaluation in addressing HIV-AIDS issues.

Within the education and awareness initiatives supported by this progBram, several focus on the enhancement of negotiating skills and behavior change.

Two such projects, "Sex without AIDS today", sponsored by the Faculty of Nursing of the University, of New Brunswick, and "Talking sex on campus", sponsored by the Faculty of Nursing Student Council of the University of Toronto, focus on skill building and the adoption of safer sex behaviour by students.

• (1720)

Another project, "How to talk to your kids about AIDS", sponsored by Planned Parenthood in Hamilton, Ontario, will assist parents to teach their children about sexuality.

These projects and others promote safer sex practices and focus on examining one's own sexual behaviour.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has been involved in an exciting project sponsored by Telefilm Canada, CBC, and Playing with Time Incorporated. The result of this year-long collaboration and consultation with Health and Welfare is Degrassi Talks, a series of six innovative documentaries examining the problems and concerns young people deal with every day. The series will be hosted by cast members of the Degrassi television series and will include talks with teens about tough issued like sexuality, teen sex, depression, abuse, drugs and alcohol.

The government is pleased to be part of this national educational program and is exploring other ways to be involved with the presentation of this CBC television production.

Teenagers and young adults who are school dropouts, unemployed or have no permanent homes are especially vulnerable not only teenage pregnancy, sexually transmitted diseases, and AIDS, but substance abuse as well. Many of the educational strategies used for substance abuse prevention can raise individual self-esteem and can improve decision-making skills. Many of the drug strategy programs have been designed within this comprehensive framework, so they too can have a positive effect on the individual's over-all health including their sexual health.

Canada's drug strategy aims to reduce the harm caused by alcohol and other drugs to individuals, families and communities. Many partners are co-operating in dealing with Canada's drug problem and the Department of National Health and Welfare plays a leading role in this partnership. Grants and contributions support community drug awareness initiatives such as Safe Grad, Students Against Impaired Driving, and other community alcohol abuse programs. Prevention programs, such as the "Really Me" awareness campaign, are designed to change teenagers' attitudes toward peer pressure and to help them feel better and trust their own decisions and choices. "Ready or Not" is an education program that enables parents to help their eight to twelve year old children make positive and informed choices about drug use and also enables mothers and fathers to build parenting and communication skills through group discussion and information sessions.

These programs', as well as others within the national drug stategy, promote life-skills that will enable the individual to make better decisions related to a variety of situations and will promote the self-worth of the person. These will, in turn, lead to better choices for lifestyle behaviour.

In conclusion, this government has considered and is trying to help fulfil the needs of many individuals, organizations and communities. We will continue our efforts to provide a co-ordinated and comprehensive approach to sexuality and reproductive health issues within the Department of National Health and Welfare.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-6, an act to amend the act of incorporation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the province of Quebec, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

HEALTH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Black (p. 4331).

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise on this private member's motion supporting the development of a number of programs related to the prevention of unwanted pregnancies.

It really is a shame that we even have to put those two words together, that any pregnancy, the potential for any child to be born, can be an unwanted event in anybody's life, but it can be. There have been a lot of statistics in the speeches I have read and heard on this subject about the number of pregnancies, the transmission of sexual diseases, the ages at which young men and women are becoming sexually active, the numbers of abortions that result, and so on.

I think it is sometimes more effective to talk about real people to whom this happens, rather than about statistics. Therefore, I am going to talk about two young women I know and their stories, which are somewhat different despite their similar backgrounds.

First, I am going to talk about a young woman named Jan who came to see me at my constituency office very recently. She phoned and said: "You said if I ever needed some encouragement to go back to school to give you a call, so I am calling you". We spent about an hour talking one Saturday afternoon.

Jan had grown up in a public housing community. That meant that about two-thirds of the families in that community were living on public assistance. The ones who were not on public assistance were in very low paying jobs. It meant that the vast majority were single parents and the vast majority of the children were living in single parent households. That meant that at least two-thirds of them were living in conditions of extreme poverty.

Jan said to me: "You have known our community for a long time. You have watched a lot of us grow up". She mentioned a few people I would remember. She said: "Of all of us there are only two out of that community of 132 homes who grew up, finished high school and did not get into drugs or did not get in trouble with the law or did not get pregnant". There were only two out of the hundreds of young children who grew up in that community.

Jan is all set to go back to community college now. She has been working two jobs so she can earn the money to do that. If she achieves her dream, she will have a college diploma in a couple of years and may even go on to university. She will have some hope for her life and she will have some prospects. We talked about all the young girls who became pregnant and why they did.

I want to talk about another young girl, Penny, whom I have also seen grow up from a little two-year-old. She grew up in another public housing community, also in poverty, with not enough social services, not enough support for the families in those communities. She had her dreams too.

Her dream was to be an aeronautical engineer. That may seem an unrealistic dream for a little girl growing up in poverty. In fact she was just about to finish her high school education at a technical school as an auto mechanic, which was a good entry into being an aeronautical mechanic. However, she got pregnant, lost the baby, and then got pregnant again.

We talked about the lack of self-esteem that one develops growing up in poverty and all the reasons that young girls get pregnant rather than dreaming the same dreams as others in society and trying to fulfil them.

I am not saying that only young women growing up in poverty get pregnant, but they do disproportionately. That is one major issue we have to deal with. Why do we have a society, one of the wealthiest countries in the world, in which one million children live in poverty? We know that means they are four times more likely to drop out of school.

• (1730)

They are much less likely to go on to university even if they finish high school. They are more likely to die. They are more likely to get sick. They are more likely to be injured. They are more likely to commit suicide.

If we start talking about programs to prevent unwanted pregnancies, we must start looking at the fundamental reasons that young girls get pregnant. Poverty is certainly one of them. The biggest one, and it arises out of poverty, is a lack of self-esteem.

Until we are able to deal with that problem I am going to continue to see in my community nine, ten and eleven year old girls being sexually approached by young boys and responding, because that is what their sense of self-worth and self-esteem comes from.

Look at the advertising on our airwaves. Look at how we use sexuality to sell products and how that convinces very young girls that only by being sexually active, sexually attractive and sexually aggressive can they have value.

There are a lot of things in our society that tell women they do not have value. There is a lot of money spent telling them that their only value is sexual.

If we are going to address unwanted pregnancies we need to deal with the sexual abuse of young children. What are the results if we do not deal with these things? The results, as we are seeing now, are 66,000 abortions a year. The cost is not only money but tremendous agony.

We are seeing again young women dropping out of school, living lives of poverty, and damaging their health.

It is a straight case of gender discrimination if we do not deal with preventing unwanted pregnancies because boys do not get pregnant. Boys can walk away from an unwanted pregnancy. It is the young women who bear the economic, social and health costs. The cost is their future.

We only repeat that cycle when we have children having children and trying to raise them. It is not surprising that we still have trouble dealing with this as a public policy issue. Believe it or not, it was barely 20 years ago that it became legal in this country to sell or even distribute information on contraception. If we had an AIDS epidemic 22 years ago you would not have been able to walk into a drugstore to buy a condom.

It is not surprising that we still have trouble dealing with what our public policy should be on pregnancy planning and on family planning. Health plans in a number of our provinces do not even cover the cost of contraceptives, yet we wonder why we have unwanted pregnancies.

We need to talk about prevention. Yet, there is a cutback in funding to provincial programs that deal with issues of poverty and issues affecting the young women I have talked about.

We have fiscal restraint in health and welfare resulting in cutbacks in the kinds of programs the hon. member just spoke about. In fact, we are cutting back on preventing drinking and driving. We are cutting back on preventing alcoholism. That is because of cutbacks in both funding and people in that department.

These preventive programs are being sacrificed. We are cutting back on employment programs in the summer, which is one of the reasons some of the young people I talk about are able to return to school in the fall. Without the summer employment programs, they never go back to school.

Finally I want to talk briefly about letters I have written to the several Ministers of National Health and Welfare asking: "Why is there not research on contraception?" We set up a Drug Prices Review Board that is supposed to monitor drug prices and how companies that have received new protection for their profits spend their research dollars.

Yet, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not interested in why that money is not being spent on research into contraception and pregnancy prevention.

We owe our children information. We owe them knowledge. We owe them programs. We owe these especially to our young women to make them feel like worth-while human beings independent of their sexuality. We need to make them independent of the need to become sexually active just to feel like a decent human being.

We need to address those kinds of issues as we talk about programs to prevent unwanted pregnancies.

I hope the House will endorse this motion. Hopefully it will start us on a program to allow more of our young people to lead their lives fully and completely without unwanted pregnancies.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak briefly on this very important matter.

In the area of teenage pregnancies, the government has taken a comprehensive approach to sexual and reproductive health. We address concerns of this nature through pro grams that promote responsible decision making and responsible sexual behaviour. The government agrees that there is a need for action to reduce the incidence of teenage pregnancies in Canada.

We know that some teenagers begin sexual activity at a young age. According to the Canadian Youth and AIDS study, one in five 14-year-olds and one in two 16-year-olds said they had sexual intercourse at least once.

In 1987, 36,000 Canadian teenagers became pregnant. This is too large a number of teens who have become pregnant before they are socially, economically, physically and emotionally prepared. The negative effects of early parenthood have been well documented and may have serious adverse consequences for the teenagers themselves, their babies, their families, their parents and society.

The provincial and territorial governments provide information and education about sexuality to teenagers through various means, including schools, health clinics, family physicians, public health nurses and social service centres. There are myriad other non-governmental organizations involved.

Nonetheless, the federal government must work with non-governmental organizations, other levels of government and individuals to identify barriers to service and to act to remove these barriers.

It is the government's belief that education and access to appropriate resources are critical steps in preventing these difficult problems of teenage pregnancy and sexually transmitted diseases.

I would like to describe some current federal government initiatives that address the prevention of teenage pregnancy. Recently a report on adolescent reproductive health was produced by a federal-provincial-territorial working group and was distributed across Canada. The report examines the problems associated with sexual and reproductive health with an emphasis on teenage pregnancy and sexually transmitted diseases. It also emphasizes the importance of sexual health information and education and makes recommendations. The government is committed to supporting the activities of the provinces, territories and organizations in meeting the recommendations outlined in this report. For example, through its special competition, the National Health Research and Development Program will fund research related to sexual health, education and services.

On a similar theme, many areas within the Department of National Health and Welfare are involved in the review of research related to contraceptive devices and contraceptive services.

The health protection branch has a bureau of radiation and medical devices that reviews the safety and efficacy data of new contraceptive devices and responds to reported problems with existing devices. The sale of contraceptive devices in Canada is controlled by the Food and Drugs Act and the medical devices regulations.

• (1740)

These regulations ensure that only safe and efficacious products are available to the Canadian public. A review of the research is done on all contraceptive devices which are left in the body for more than 30 days, such as the intrauterine device. These devices undergo a pre-market review considering safety and efficacy data prior to being sold in Canada.

Other contraceptive devices are monitored through post-market surveillance, through manufacturer statements of safety and efficacy.

As well, the bureau continues to contribute to the development of international standards for condom testing. This entails collecting data on condom standards, quality, distribution and use.

Under the Food and Drugs Act and regulations the bureau of human prescription drugs of the health protection branch monitors and evaluates all new drugs to be used as contraceptives. Their safety and efficacy is ensured during clinical trials and prior to marketing.

The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby during our first hour of debate called for the government to investigate the drug RU-486 which is used to terminate pregnancy. The government has no present intent to clinically investigate RU-486.

Before a drug like RU-486 may be sold in Canada, an acceptable new drug submission would have to be filed with the health protection branch. According to the food and drug regulations, such a submission must contain substantial evidence of the safety and efficacy of the product under the recommended conditions of use.

To date, no such submission and no clinical protocols for investigation of RU-486 have been received. It is important to note that under the Canadian Food and Drugs Act and regulations the decision to file a submission for any drug rests with the manufacturer.

The health protection branch also has a special advisory committee on reproductive physiology which advises it on issues related to contraception.

For example, the labelling of oral contraceptives is periodically reviewed by both this body and by the health protection branch and is updated based on new information.

The work of the bureau of medical devices and the bureau of human prescription drugs has a direct impact on effective contraceptive use by individuals and on the prevention of teenage pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases.

The federal government places special emphasis on supporting families in their parenting role, especially teenagers who are raising children. Thus the Department of National Health and Welfare has implemented a national post-partum parent support program. This program not only strengthens the family centred approach to maternity and newborn care in Canadian hospitals and community health settings, but provides parents with information and support through the post-partum period.

For those who experience unplanned pregnancy and who choose to have their babies, the post-partum parent support program will provide assistance by linking mother and babies with appropriate community resources.

The department's commitment to families is also exemplified in the nobody's perfect program. This co-operative effort with the provinces is aimed at young, single, low income parents who feel isolated, who lack support and confidence in their ability to raise their children. This program gives parents accurate information on their children's health, safety, development and behaviour.

Both of these programs include a component on sexuality and family planning to promote the importance of future planning and responsible sexual behaviour.

Because adoption is a necessary option for many parents, a study has been designed to explore means of increasing public understanding and to encourage adoption. The study began in April 1989 and will provide information on current trends and practices in adoption as well as what barriers and supports influence decision making by parents with unplanned pregnancies.

As just described, it is clear that there are many ongoing activities that concern teenage pregnancy. It is through concerted efforts such as these that we will influence change.

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, the current patterns of unplanned and unprotected sexual behaviour have resulted in a widespread problem of sexually transmitted diseases. A co-ordinated effort by governments, health promotion, scientific communities, and educators can help achieve primary prevention of these diseases.

In 1988 the Department of National Health and Welfare established a division of sexually transmitted disease control and a national laboratory for sexually transmitted diseases within the laboratory centre for disease control. I think there is a continuing need for programming to combat sexually transmitted diseases, especially in adolescents and young adults, the groups with the highest rates of reported disease. The division of sexually transmitted disease control is working closely with provincial and territorial governments to improve surveillance activities, especially in the area of chlamydia infection. Chlamydia is the most commonly reported sexually transmitted disease in young women and is important because of its potential long-term consequences, such as pelvic inflammatory disease, ectopic pregnancy and infertility.
