In 1986 the laboratory centre for disease control established an interdisciplinary advisory committee on sexually transmitted diseases in children and youth in particular. It has recently completed its mandate which included examining issues of sexually transmitted diseases and sexual abuse among children and youths, conducting comprehensive research at a national level, advising on sexually transmitted, disease education and treatment, and making recommendations with respect to the development of public education and health promotion programs, one of the major undertakings included the establishment of Canadian guidelines for the diagnosis and management of sexually transmitted diseases in children, adolescents and adults. These guidelines were published in 1989, were widely distributed and have been extremely well received and implemented in the health field.

The Bureau of Communicable Disease Control has dedicated $450,000 for five years to fund research in the area of sexually transmitted diseases. Recently two professional schools were funded for research that will study sexually transmitted disease education currently being provided within universities.

The outcome of this research will be published in academic journals and will be another step in the fight against sexually transmitted diseases. The Canada youth and AIDS study has implications for all areas of sexual health.

• (1750)

A secondary analysis of the Canada youth and AIDS study of college and university students was funded and the findings published in June 1990. Analysis of the data revealed that many students are engaging in high risk sexual behaviour, despite being quite knowledgeable about safe sexual practices. Of particular concern was the finding that among college women, as the numbers of partners increase, there is a parallel increase in the use of oral contraceptives, but condom use declines.

Another secondary analysis in process will compare street youth, school dropouts, and grade 11 students. All of these studies that the government has supported have direct application to the primary prevention of sexually transmitted diseases.

An expert working group sponsored by health and welfare is currently developing national guidelines for sexual health education. The impetus for this project arose from a recommendation of the expert interdisciplinary advisory committee on sexually transmitted diseases in children and youth and will fulfil one of the recommendations made by the federal, provincial and terr□Bitorial working group on adolescent reproductive health. These guidelines will be addressed to multi-sectoral groups implementing sexual and reproductive health programs. The guidelines will enhance the knowledge base of community workers and will assist with the development of sexual health educational programs in schools, in the work place, and in communities. These guidelines will also promote the comprehensive approach to sexual health as an important principle.

The recently published "Sexually transmitted diseases" pamphlet is an educational tool available for teenagers, parents and service providers. This pamphlet was a collaborative effort within National Health and Welfare and with the sexually transmitted disease directors from the provinces and territories. It describes the types of sexually transmitted diseases, as well as ways to prevent and treat them. The pamphlet will be distributed across Canada to school boards, public health agencies and organizations involved in sexual health education.

In another area the royal commission on new reproductive technologies is examining not only reproductive technologies but is placing a strong emphasis on the prevention of reproductive health problems, including sexually transmitted diseases. The final report is due in october 1992. The recommendations will have important Implications for sexual health education.

Research in the area of sexual and reproductive health is an essential component of program planning and of implementation for governments, voluntary agencies and community groups. In turn, improved services and better information will help to reduce the incidence of teenage pregnancies, unintended pregnancies, sexually transmitted diseases, and can lead to healthy sexual development.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to Motion No. 44 put forward by my hon. colleague. To put the debate in perspective, I would like to read the content of this motion, and I quote:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking action to reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies in our society by reinstating a Family Planning Division at Health and Welfare Canada; reinstating funding to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada at its previously adequate levels; establishing new programs to combat sexually transmitted diseases and unwanted pregancies; establishing a national clearing-house on family planning; and increasing funding for research on safe and effective methods of birth control.

The motion tabled by my colleague from British Columbia is extremely important considering the present situation in our society. Let me give a few examples of problems of sex and sexuality among young people today.

First of all, at least one out of five 14-year-olds and 50 per cent of young Canadians 16 years old and over are sexually active. This means it just is not true to say that young people are not interested in sex or sexuality. They are already sexually active. One out of five 14-year-olds and half of our young people 16 years of age and over are sexually active.

Among teenage girls, one out of five will become pregnant before the age of 20. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, before these girls are 20, one out of five will be pregnant. This is incredible. We always think this is something that happens to other people, to those who did not get a good education, to people who are stupid and do not understand. Not at all. It can happen to anyone. One out of five of these young girls will become pregnant before they are 20 years old.

We could also talk about sexually transmitted diseases. Here again, people tend to think it only happens to people who are stupid or sexually promiscuous. We always think it will not happen to us. But do you know how many people are affected by STD today? One out of 100? No. One out of 50? No. One out of 25? No. When I saw the statistics on people affected by what used to be called venereal diseases but are now referred to as sexually transmitted diseases, I was astonished.

In Canada, one person out of eight is affected by STD. One out of eight is a lot. It is not just people who are stupid or ignorant. It is not just the poor. Just talk to our hockey players today. They are pretty worried. This is something they cannot—

Ms. Black: Talk to Magic Johnson.

Mr. Edmonston: That is something they cannot skate around, because there are no two ways about a sexually transmitted disease: either you have it or you do not. Talk to Magic Johnson. Talk to the athletes, the guys who look big and brawny, and I am sure that with all the money Magic Johnson made and all the girls he met, today he is sorry. He is sorry now. He happens to have a sexually transmitted disease called HIV positive, which most people call the first stage of AIDS.

• (1800)

Mr. Johnson is not poor, and he is not stupid. Today maybe he thinks it was stupid to forget to wear a condom. Sure. This was one of our most respected and nicest athletes, someone we could call a role model. Some role model. This is exactly why we desperately need to educate people.

Instead of doing what the Liberal Party did and gradually cut grants to family planning organizations, we should increase those grants. It is not a matter of educating people about a subject they can choose to ignore. It is a matter of life and death. It is a matter of being sick or not. In the case of girls who become pregnant, it is a problem that concerns future generations. Do we want to people the earth with unwanted children? Come on. Do we want to people the earth with children who will be abused because they were never wanted by their mothers? I do not think we do. To some extent I respect people who say: "I am against abortion. Abortion is terrible, and I cannot condone it". I respect those people because we must respect the opinions of others.

A mature society should give information on family planning to people who want that information, and that is what we are trying to do with this motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. member.

The time set aside for Private Members' Business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, on October 1, 1991 I asked the Minister of Finance if he was going to abandon the high Canadian dollar policy that is hurting so many of our primary industries. I asked this because I had just learned that the Rio Algom tin mine, the only tin mine in North America, would have to close.

I had just received a letter from the president of Rio Algom who blamed the decision to close the mine on "the ongoing problems of the international tin market and the strong Canadian dollar".

This was just one more company in Canada that was closing because of a strong Canadian dollar compared to the American dollar. It is simple economics that every cent our dollar goes up in relation to the U.S. dollar makes it more difficult for our exporters to obtain a return for their product in the U.S. or international market.

In November 1985 our dollar stood at 72.7 cents U.S. This was at the height of an economic boom, the likes of which this country had not seen for a long time. Today, thanks to this government's policy, it is at 88 cents U.S.

Average Canadians know what this government's policy of a high Canadian dollar means. Just ask the 220 tin mine workers who will be out of work in January. Just ask 330 Dominion Textile workers in Yarmouth who lost their jobs last June. Just ask fishermen and processors in southwestern Nova Scotia who have to cope with decreased quotas, dockside monitoring and a high Canadian dollar to try to sell their product.

Look at lobster fishing where costs have gone up over the last year. The dollar has gone up over last year and the price has gone down over the last year. How can we expect our primary industry to compete in the American or international markets as our dollar goes up? Just ask anyone who works in the primary industries what a high dollar has meant. Ask the local businesses which are going out of business what it has meant.

The minister will answer tonight as he answered my question that day. He will talk about having lowered the interest rates. At this point lowering interest rates does very little to stimulate the economy through increased investments.

As reflected in the narrow spread between the bank rate and the prime rate, there is very little demand for new loans for two reasons. Businesses are not making any profits and individuals are too concerned about keeping their jobs even to think about making investments.

However, a fall in interest rates accompanied by a devaluation of the dollar will do a great deal to boost export performance. This is what the government should be looking at and trying to accomplish.

More people are unemployed today than a month ago. A substantial percentage of the unemployed have been without work for over a year. This is something that Canada and Canadians should not accept. This is not what Canadians expect from a government. It is certainly not what Canadians should have to put up with.

This is just one more lesson for the government on how its suicidal high dollar policy in the wake of the free trade agreement has decimated our Canadian industrial base.

We cannot have a high Canadian dollar and expect to compete with the U.S. but the minister goes on saying the high dollar is not a deliberate policy and he will not give Canadians a strategy to lower the Canadian dollar to help our exports, to help our primary products and to help our industries.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I would like to advise the member for South West Nova that the government does not have a high interest rate policy. It is quite the opposite. The policy is geared to achieving durable lower interest rates through reducing inflation, as she probably knows.

Our policy we believe is working. As inflation pressures have eased in recent months, interest rates have declined in step. Short-term interest rates are more than 625 basis points lower than at their peak last May. Interest rate declines will continue and they will be sustainable.

Let me turn now to the exchange rate which she speaks of. There is no target or target range for the dollar. The exchange rate is determined by market forces. I think the member knows that but is just causing a bit of mischief.

The relative value of our dollar is affected by many factors, not just interest rates, such as inflation performance and prospects, investor confidence in the economy, international and political and economic uncertainty and the borrowing practices of Canadian businesses and governments. These can all affect the dollar.

It is clear that the Canadian interest rates are no reason for the increase in the exchange rate over the last year or so. Provincial government borrowings and international uncertainty are contributing to the dollar. They played key roles in the value of the dollar. Provincial governments placed $10.9 billion in new debt issues in the foreign financial markets in the first half of this year. This is double the amount that was placed in all of 1990.

Political uncertainty also affects the dollar. The problems in the Soviet Union, the Middle East and elsewhere have meant increased demand for safe haven currencies. This has produced a shift by the European and Asian investors into the North American market.

While the exchange rate does affect our competitiveness, the root cause of the deterioration in our competitiveness, is the more rapid increase in wage costs and the slower increase in productivity in Canada than in our major trading partners.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): A zero per cent increase.

Mr. James: Lasting improvements in our competitiveness can only come through improving productivity and controlling domestic costs. Attempting to improve our competitiveness by lowering the dollar through inflationary monetary policy would provide at best temporary gains and would be ultimately self-defeating.

MEME BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, on September 26 I rose in the House and asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he would require manufacturers of breast implants to provide information to breast implant patients just as the American food and drug administration was doing in the United States.

The other thing I raised was that the deputy minister had stated publicly it was not necessary. The minister in responding said he was informed the day before by the deputy minister about the U.S. directive to the implant makers and he said he would ask the same thing of makers of implants sold in Canada.

In a supplementary question I asked the minister if he would also do something about the booklet that had been produced and which the minister referred to in his first answer about breast implants by the breast implant industry, the Canadian Quebec Association of Plastic Surgeons, the Canadian Society for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery and the government. It stressed two things.

First, the booklet was not totally clear. It was a whitewash of the whole question of implants. Second, in our view it was inappropriate that the industry should be involved in the production of this booklet.

The minister responded by saying that he looked forward to me agreeing with him that the information should be provided. I had already agreed with him on this. He went on to say that he felt it was important that information be provided to women regarding breast implants.

It is now December. I have had a letter from the minister saying that he intends to revise the booklet. I have asked that the booklet be revised in plain, understandable language for women who are considering breast implants, whether for cosmetic reasons or for post-mastectomy reasons.

It is very important to point out that the booklet the minister is planning on revising does not tell women about the life expectancy of implants. It does not tell women about the pain associated with the surgery for breast implants. Women are not advised of known side effects for implants. They are definitely not told in that booklet that there is a growing body of evidence that links silicone implants with possible auto-immune disease. There is definitely no information outlining to those women who have had cosmetic implants that discusses any of the concerns they might have regarding childbearing and nursing after the child is born.

The ministry has not written that booklet. I am urging that when the ministry does write a booklet it include these very important points. It must be written independent of the plastic surgery industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare has been in the forefront of providing patient information concerning breast implants for more than three years now. The department, in co-operation with plastic surgeons' associations, published a booklet on breast augmentation. This booklet is widely used by plastic surgeons and serves, in addition to the information provided verbally, to give women contemplating breast augmentation precise information on its risks and benefits.

Health and Welfare Canada also provides this booklet in response to requests for information about breast implants.

To complement the booklet, the health protection branch will require that manufacturers of breast implants sold in Canada provide information for patients. Canadian and American women will receive similar information. Manufacturers have been advised of this labelling requirement through an information letter. These information sheets will have to be available 60 days from the date of the information letter announcing this change.

The information to be contained in these information sheets is very similar to that contained in the Canadian breast augmentation booklet.

In addition, working with the plastic surgeons' associations, the department will revise the present booklet to ensure that the information which it contains is current.

The breast augmentation booklet refers to a high level of patient satisfaction. In May of this year, the vast majority of callers to Health and Welfare's information line on breast implants said that they were satisfied with the results of their surgery.

Breast augmentation has been chosen by thousands of women in Canada. As with any surgical procedure, some patients can be expected to have post-operative problems. Risks exist, as in any human activity. The Department of National Health and Welfare wants to ensure that these risks are well understood by women contemplating breast augmentation. The final decision always rests with women in consultation with their doctors.

The department will continue to provide women with all available information and to ensure that the breast implants on the market meet current standards for safety and effectiveness.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 44, if I feel, and I do feel, that the parliamentary secretary has misunderstood my words I can rise on a point of order.

It would be most helpful if in future the parliamentary secretary were to listen to what the person speaking said and then responded to that and not something that is totally—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have a difficulty right now because our rules say that I should not have accepted a point of order in the midst of the adjournment motion. This is the adjournment motion, which is what the late show is called. I should not accept points of order during this part of our debate.

I am sure the hon. member and the parliamentary secretary who replaced the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare could get together and ensure that the hon. member gets a satisfactory answer to her question.

IMPORTED CARPETING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to pursue the question I asked in this House on October 4 regarding the launching of an anti-dumping investigation on carpeting produced by tufting machines made in or exported from the United States of America.

Following representations made by Mr. Yvon Hébert, president of Tapis Venture Limitée of Drummondville in my riding, I was pleased to guide Mr. Hébert and his business partners, Barry Husk and Bertrand Desautels, in their efforts to launch that investigation.

The complaint lodged by the Canadian Carpet Institute, whose executive director is Mr. Michael Kronick, contends that in 1990 the total production in Canada for that kind of carpeting was almost 54 million square metres, which translates into sales of $506 million on the domestic market and $37 million on the export market.

The Canadian market for the years 1988-89-90 clearly demonstrates that the absolute size of the market and the relative share of Canadian producers have narrowed tremendously during that period. The ten carpeting producers concerned in Canada, of which six are members of the Canadian Carpet Institute, support that complaint. Since 1988 the volume and value of imports from the United States have increased, whereas the market share of imports from other countries such as Belgium, Mexico and West Germany has fluctuated around 1 per cent in terms of volume and value. Since 1988 the imports from the United States have increased by 12 million square metres, or $98 million. This is a 215 per cent increase over three years. In terms of value, the United States share has increased 190 per cent.

Following the complaint made last June 21, the study undertaken by the department has revealed margins of dumping from zero to 91 per cent. The goods imported into Canada at alleged dumping prices have had a direct impact on the sales and production of carpeting in Canada. Undervalued imports caused domestic sales to drop by 5 million square meters in 1989 and 10 million square meters in 1990. The Canadian market share of U.S. imports grew from 8 per cent to 28 per cent in 1990.

The strong price competition from carpets produced in the United States undermined the prices of Canadian carpets. In fact, the number of jobs in this manufacturing industry fell from 1952 to 985 between 1989 and 1990. We should certainly speed up the valuation process on this issue, in order to determine formally if there is dumping.

In order to prevent more job losses or plant closures, could the minister assure us that this inquiry will be done rapidly and that its results will be known shortly? As there is dumping and as sales, markets, production, prices, profits are dropping and jobs are lost, there are also plant closures. It is easy to blame the free trade agreement for all that, but commercial piracy will always exist. I believe that if the department really has the will, it can get more employees and work harder to complete this inquiry.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to provide the hon. member for Drummond with further details in response to his question in the House on October 4, 1991.

As the hon. member pointed out, on August 6, 1991 the deputy minister of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, ordered an investigation under the Special Import Measures Act of carpeting from the United States produced on tufting machines. The investigation followed a complaint filed by the Canadian Carpet Institute on behalf of Canadian carpet producers.

I can inform the hon. member that departmental officials are analysing information obtained from exporters and importers. This is a tremendous task, which includes calculating margins of dumping for thousands of types of carpeting exported to Canada by the various exporters.

The hon. member may be interested to hear that because of the large number of importers and exporters concerned by the investigation and the many different types of carpets for which the margin of dumping, if any, must be calculated, the duration of the investigation of the dumping of certain carpets producted by tufting machines has been extended from 90 days to 135 days, as provided by the legislation. The preliminary stage of the investigation may result in a preliminary determination of dumping or in termination of the investigation, if no evidence of dumping is found.

If the deputy minister makes a preliminary determination of dumping, departmental officials will start collecting preliminary anti-dumping duties on the imported goods and will refer the question of whether dumping causes material injury to Canadian carpet producers to the Canadian International Trade Tribunal. Departmental officials will pursue their investigaton for another 90 days and will them make a final determination. The CITT has 30 days more to reach its conclusions as to the material injury that might be caused Canadian producers by the undervalued goods. If the CITT concludes there is material injury, the preliminary duties in effect at the time of the preliminary determination of dumping will continue to apply as anti-dumping duties to all subsequent carpet shipments imported into Canada.

Finally, to ensure that the government does not take any inappropriate or arbitrary measures, the hon. member for Drummond may rest assured that the investigation will be completed as soon as possible and that the findings will be released at that time.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair is very well aware of the importance of questions raised by hon. members and that parliamentary secretaries are trying to give answers as complete as possible.

Adjournment Debate

I must remind members on both sides that the new rules call for four minutes, and two minutes and not seven and three. We will be going past the time. I will let people go four and two. Please help whoever is in the chair during the adjournment motion.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, on October 10 I rose in this House to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration a very important question regarding the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed.

I asked the minister when the government would face reality and take all necessary steps to halt the deindustrialization of this nation and put Canadians back to work.

The reality I was speaking about was the reality of the unemployed in the current recession. Unlike past recessions, jobs that are being lost will never reappear. Factories whose doors have been shut will never reopen.

Unless this government fulfils its responsibilities, Canadians will be stuck with a decimated economy and economic structure. Another side of the sad reality is a youth unemployment rate of 16 per cent. That is 400,000 young people out of work.

This is the generation that, after all, expects to pay for its standard of living in the future. I wonder how it will do it while it stands in the unemployment lines of this nation today.

These realities seem to matter little to the minister. When he answered my question, he made a number of statements which I believe deserve to be closely analysed.

First, the minister said: "I do not know why he and his party and its cohorts in the other place fought Bill C-21 for so long". We fought Bill C-21 for two very good reasons.

As Liberals, we believe that the government has a role to play in helping the unemployed. Bill C-21 took the government out of the UI fund, leaving the entire burden to employers and employees.

Bill C-21 also made it more difficult for unemployed Canadians to qualify for unemployment insurance. Again, in these difficult times, Liberals believe in helping Canadians and not in abandoning them.

The minister also said, referring to the unemployed: "This year these people will get $1.8 billion more in training". That is incorrect. Last year the training budget was $1.4 billion and this year it is $1.8 billion.

From that it seems like the unemployed will get an additional $400 million instead of $1.8 billion. Even more, the modest figure of $400 million is questionable.

As the Canadian Labour Force Development Board pointed out, half of that sum will go to making up the $200 million that was cut out of the budget of the Canadian Jobs Strategy over the last two years.

Finally, even a $200 million increase is an illusion. The money that will be spent on training programs comes from the extra moneys that the government squeezed out of Canadians by increasing UI premiums and by tightening eligibility requirements.

In the end, we see the minister's statement of $1.8 billion more in training is not at all as impressive as it sounded. This case is a good example of this government's indifference toward training.

Between 1987 and 1990 federal expenditures on training as a percentage of the GDP fell from .19 per cent to .17 per cent. In 1988 the average Japanese worker received 200 hours of training. In Sweden it was 170 hours and in Canada it was less than seven hours.

If Canada wants to compete globally, we have to start moving in the opposite direction. The German electronics giant Siemens Electric has said that it would like to create 9,000 high-tech jobs in Canada but worries that this country will not be able to supply a skilled work force.

We will need those high-tech jobs to maintain the social programs and standard of living we have all grown accustomed to. To compete globally we must help unemployed Canadians and young Canadians get ready for the 21st century with a modern day, up-to-date training system.

• (1830)

The government fails to see that. Between 1985 and 1990, it cut the SEED program in half taking nearly 40,000 jobs away from young Canadians. The government must draft a comprehensive training plan for Canada.

In conclusion, until it accepts that the future belongs to the country with the best trained and the most highly skilled work force and does something about that, Canada's future will be in peril.

I call on the government to do its job and provide us with a training master plan so that unemployed Canadians, young and old, can meet the challenges of tomorrow while addressing the reality of today.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I welcome the opportunity to provide additional information relating to the question raised by the member for York North on October 10 on the government's labour policies.

In 1989 the government introduced the Labour Force Development Strategy. Under that strategy the government has allocated $3.1 billion this year and $3.4 billion again in 1992 on training and adjustment programs for Canadian workers. That is more than $6 billion in the first two years.

These funds have helped workers and their employers improve skills and maintain and create stable and long employment rather than make-work projects.

In his recent report on Canada Professor Michael Porter, an authority on competitiveness, noted that the recent federal government initiatives to devote more resources to training the unemployed are moving in the right direction. Furthermore, the creation of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board earlier this year is a model of the partnership that needs to be developed in Canada if Canada wishes to remain prosperous in an increasingly competitive world.

As part of the government's prosperity initiative, on October 29, 1991 the minister of science and technology and the Minister of Employment and Immigration released two discussion papers, one on competitiveness and the other on learning, which are intended to stimulate a national discussion on the factors which affect our current and future prosperity.

This national discussion will be co-ordinated by a private sector steering group on prosperity and will involve all interested Canadians.

On the learning issues, the consultation will help identify gaps that may still exist in the area of human resource development and ways for all Canadians to address them co-operatively.

Past and current initiatives of this government demonstrate clearly the importance the government places on labour market policies to facilitate the adjustment process for Canadians and ensure a stronger and more competitive Canadian economy.

POVERTY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, on November 21 I stood in this House and raised a question with respect to child poverty.

There were two parts to that question. The first one dealt with the social assistance payments that certain families receive. I was particularly concerned about single parents, most of whom are women, and their children. The second part dealt with child care support payments.

Let us look at the situation. There are roughly five million poor in this country, over one million of whom are children, and that is a rate that has grown over time. This year there will be 1.8 million people fed in food banks in this country and roughly 40 per cent will be children. That is a deplorable statistic.

The National Council on Welfare said in its report, Welfare Incomes, that a Manitoba single parent, most often a mother with one child to raise, is earning 3 per cent less today than that parent was earning five years ago. That same parent with one child to raise is living $9,000 below the poverty line. Can you imagine that? That is almost a salary in itself.

The government will say, and I can see it coming, that it spent more. Of course it spends more. There are more people who are poor. There are more people who are collecting. It will say that it increased certain payments. That does not take into account inflation. What help is that to that mother and those children?

I want to address the question of child support payments because it is one that was not at all responded to in my question. I was terribly disappointed. We know that these payment are inadequate. We know that they are paid late and sometimes not paid at all. We know that there is a default rate between 50 per cent and 85 per cent in this country. Those are people who do not pay or who pay late.

We know that those child care payments do not reflect actual child care costs either. We know that parents who pay out can deduct those payments from their income and those who receive the payment must declare it as income and pay income tax on an already very small payment. If you look at them all, they are in fact very small.

We know that the awards do not reflect actual costs, that they are not indexed to inflation and so the poor get poorer. Those are the poor moms and the poor children.

Studies indicate very clearly that children who are brought up in single parent families have more difficulties. They have more difficulties at school, sometimes in learning and in cases of discipline and more difficulties in getting student loans later on because of the delicate situation in which they find themselves.

Child poverty is most likely in Canada and in eight industrial countries, with the exception of the United States. I have been told that in this country today at this moment and as we speak there may be $1 billion—not $1 million—owed to parents because child care support payments have not been made.

[Translation]

For the love of children and their mothers, let us do something. We must react.

[English]

I will terminate with this. For the sake of the children and most often their poor moms, let us do something and let us do something now.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to my colleague from St. Boniface. I know he has a very sincere interest in children and their rightful financial position in our country.

However, I would like to raise a couple of points about the use of the numbers in the report that he refers to which comes from the National Council on Welfare. It compares provincial assistance benefits and I bring this to his attention. First, he knows welfare falls under provincial jurisdiction, not federal, and the federal government therefore does not set the social assistance benefits. The province does that. The government, as he should know, contributes significantly to the provinces to help them meet these financial obligations.

These figures are pretty substantial. The federal contribution to the provinces in 1991–92 was estimated to be in the area of $6.4 billion. That is a lot of money under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Second, we think it is a bit misleading to compare welfare benefits with the statistics of Canada's low income cutoff points that were used because Statistics Canada itself denies that its low income cutoffs are poverty line. So we must be a little careful with that. These cutoffs are best used for making comparisons across time and across sections of the Canadian population, but not as a measurement of poverty.

Further, since 1984 the federal government has taken on a number of initiatives. The member opposite mentioned that we would talk about that. The maximum child tax credit payable in respect of a child has increased from $367 in 1984 to $585. He talks about inflation, but that is a 16 per cent increase after inflation is taken into account.

Further, a child tax credit supplement of $200 per child under the age of seven was introduced by this government in 1988 and low income families now receive about $1,000 of child benefits for every child.

A number of initiatives, new measures and federal–provincial shared programs have been introduced.

I would like to reiterate that this government has a commitment to children and families with children and that is why the Speech from the Throne announced that the government was reviewing its policies in relation to the family. To that end we will be making some new announcements, in which the hon. member will be interested, in the near future.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 6, 1991

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, December 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I have just been informed that there have been discussions and there is an agreement to instead proceed very quickly with Bill C-5. I just want to confirm that, but that certainly has been my understanding, that we would proceed first with Bill C-5 and then go back to Bill C-4.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, things are moving a bit fast. Having been party to those discussions, I was not aware that one of my colleagues who is scheduled to speak on the Financial Administration Act has a time problem. Perhaps I could ask both the government and the Official Opposition how much time they anticipate taking on Bill C-5—for myself, five minutes maximum—just so I can get a sense before we do agree to whether or not we have time to get into Bill C-20 before eleven o'clock so that my colleague can make his speech and then move back to his riding.

Mr. Gagliano: We have an objection to that. The minister is not in the House. Maybe we could start with the financial package. We also have one member who has to put some amendments who is not in the House. Maybe we can start as scheduled with the Order of the Day and agree that as soon as the minister is here and our member arrives, we can to go to Bill C-5 and finish with C-5 after lunch.

Mr. Cooper: Yes, Madam Speaker, I think that makes good sense and it shows the co-operation that all of us are trying to demonstrate in working with one another. Let us go back to Bill C-4.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate on Bill C-4. We do agree on Bill C-4.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the indulgence of the House in permitting me to proceed with my speech in order that I can attend to duties in my riding later on today.

This is one of the rare occasions in which I stand in this House as a member of the New Democratic Party opposition to compliment everybody involved with this bill, including government members and the government itself, on a job well done. It is a bill that is long overdue. The government, the finance committee and the civil servants involved in drafting the legislation took the time and had the understanding to incorporate in this bill what the people whom it most affects want to see in it. There were extensive consultations with the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society and other credit union organizations and these people were listened to. As a result, I think we have a bill that takes us a long way forward in the area of regulating credit unions and, in fact, giving credit unions new opportunities in this country.

This act applies to credit union centrals that are federally incorporated. Many of the major credit union centrals in this country fall into that kind of category. The B.C. Credit Union Central, Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario and Nova Scotia Centrals, are all federally incorporated and thus this Bill C-34 that I am speaking on this morning applies to them.

What it does is give credit unions a level playing field with other financial institutions. I know the concept of level playing fields, along with the concept of competition, and other words like that has been debased in some people's minds, perhaps by some misuse by the government, but nevertheless it is appropriate to note that what this in fact does do is give the credit unions a level playing field with other people who are in the financial services business. It has strengthened some governance provisions that will protect the members of credit unions, such as creating new procedures for handling conflicts of interest and self-dealings within credit unions to make sure that some of the unhappy experiences which have occurred in credit unions will not repeat themselves.

Also in legal terms, it vests credit union centrals with the rights and powers of natural persons which enable them to engage in activities which the previous legislation did not.

As well, it broadens their powers to diversify into other financial sectors through subsidiaries so that they can build the type of networks and services that are necessary to compete with other financial institutions that are operating in our country, both domestic and foreign.

Furthermore, it allows them to build up their equity base through the issue of preferred shares to non-members. Certainly the need to increase the equity that is available to many of the credit unions is absolutely essential if the credit unions are to play the role that is expected of them in the community and to realize their true potential.

I have been a credit union member since 1971. I have had very few dollars to put in the bank but those that I have had I have put in credit unions. I would hope as a credit union member that this particular provision would not cause a dilution in the control by credit union members of their credit unions and I know that is fully the intention of the credit union centrals that so badly wanted this provision in the legislation.

I want to compliment the government for listening to the credit union sector. As the co-operative critic for our party in the House of Commons this means a lot to me. I hope it creates a precedent because we still have the problem of the co-op retail sector trying to get the understanding of finance department officials with respect to the GST application and direct charge co-ops in the dealings between different levels of the co-op system. It really seems that the nature of the co-op system is not understood there. There is a longstanding problem with respect to the co-op housing sector which has never got the 5,000 houses per year which it was promised and which it was built up to handle.

There has been a problem with worker co-ops getting proper recognition under the new labour force development legislation. Worker co-ops are not given equal opportunity with other kinds of business organizations for which people might use those funds.

Then there is the problem of the prairie pools, which represent a vast number of farmers on the prairies, not being listened to when it comes to the formation of agricultural policy.

I hope this means that the careful attention and the really good understanding which were demonstrated with respect to Bill C-34 and the credit unions are indicative of a new government attitude toward co-operatives.

The co-operatives, and in this case the credit union sector, is a story of success. For example, a credit union like the VanCity Credit Union, which I believe the member to my left, the member for Mission—Port Moody might well belong to being from that area, is a hugely successful venture which is not only a great credit union with huge assets but also one which has branched out into other successful enterprises and has created a foundation using its own capital to stimulate community development and to give a financial boost to those who are at the low end of the economic totem pole in our country and really need this kind of vehicle to help bring themselves out of poverty.

I should also mention the Saskatchewan credit unions and the Saskatchewan Credit Union Central. It should be noted that while many of the banks, in fact I think all the banks, are contracting their services in Saskatchewan, especially in rural Saskatchewan, the credit union system is expanding to give a guarantee virtually that every community in Saskatchewan will have financial services through their credit union system.

There is my own credit union in Prince Albert, the caisse populaire in Albertville, and the new Buffalo Narrows Credit Union in northern Saskatchewan, where the need to find ways to accumulate capital and do business in a remote situation has been addressed by the local community by forming its own credit union.

There is also the Arctic co-operatives' venture into the credit union movement. We shall soon see a network of credit unions throughout the Northwest Territories which will be a model of how to accumulate capital and run financial services in remote areas.

I should also make note of the Desjardins Credit Union movement in the province of Quebec. It has shown that not only can the credit union movement have significant local impact but that it can become a major player in the economic development and the economic strategies of a whole province and region.

I will move on to speak a little more about credit unions and the role they have played in our society. People often envision credit unions as being church basement shoe box operations, perhaps somewhat quaint, antiquated and very friendly but somewhat limited. Although that is not true, it is the image that a lot of people have of credit unions.

Many credit unions did start that way and many of them carry on that way. It was an appropriate way for people with no money and no other resources to get started. It is also true that the credit unions have pioneered many of the innovations and advances in the financial services industry in this country which many people now take for granted.

For example, credit unions were the first financial institutions to introduce consumer loans. Consumer loans are now widespread and taken for granted but credit unions were the first to introduce them.

They were the first to introduce automated tellers in this country. They were the first to introduce daily interest savings accounts. Fifteen years ago, they were the first to introduce debit cards, which are just now starting to catch on in the general market.

They developed weekly and bi-weekly mortgage options more advantageous to wage earners and their other customers.

They have a strong tradition of direct assistance in helping their members to manage their money and of training them so they can get involved in the financial world. For example, the Rosetown Credit Union recently sold computers at a group rate to the local farmers in its community. The credit union's staff trained these people to use farm business management software packages to ensure they were able to manage every dollar properly during very tough times in the farming community.

Many credit unions have trained high school students in classrooms in the system of financial management.

The caisse populaire in Quebec has been quite innovative in offering a debit card system for prescription drug claims under the drug plan. That means that 2.5 million members only have to pay the deductible portion. Their insurance claims are handled by the debit card system through their credit union. This is a huge benefit to the members of credit unions in the province of Quebec.

Credit union centrals have taken on a new role. They are now undertaking social audits, as well as financial audits, to ensure that their policies fulfil societal obligations such as employment equity, service to visible minorities, and access for the physically disabled.

Again the credit unions are showing the direction in which the financial world and the corporate world as a whole need to go.

There is also a point to be made in looking at credit unions in the larger Canadian picture. Credit unions are a sleeping giant whose true capacity to influence the Canadian economic system has barely been realized.

When we look back at the last several years it is quite clear that this government has decided for better or for worse that it is not going to enhance or ensure Canadian control of the economy by negative or punitive measures.

We have seen things like the dismantling of the foreign investment review procedures and the review board. We have seen the dismantling of the national energy policy and other mechanisms that were in place in order to ensure Canadian control of the economy. That is a choice that this government made. As an opposition member neither I nor the Canadian public has not been able to do much about it.

However, there is also a positive role that can be played by this government. In recognizing the role of credit unions through this particular piece of legislation perhaps the government is starting to realize the positive role that it can play. There is this financial sector in this country that is 100 per cent controlled and owned by Canadians where you can be assured that prosperity in that sector will accrue only to the Canadians. The money that is made through the co-operative and credit union system will not leak out through dividends or R and D payments or whatever interest payments go to foreign parents in other countries. The credit union system and the co-operative system keep their money at home.

I think this represents a challenge to many of us and to many people in this country who claim to be economic nationalists but have not seen the link between economic nationalism and the co-operative sector. I would like to challenge those people to get involved with the co-operative system, find out about it and put their money where their mouth is. This is something positive that all Canadians can do to ensure that the control of our economy and the development of our economy remain in Canadian hands.

A second feature of co-operatives that I think needs to be noted is the training and the ability that they give to local people to get involved in financial management and financial planning in their community. The credit unions have approximately 15,000 volunteers on their boards, as do the caisses populaires. That is about 30,000 Canadians who are learning about the financial system and how operations work and who are making financial decisions on behalf of their communities. This gives us a huge wealth of talent in our communities on which to base further economic development.

Creating a strong credit union sector also permits other co-operative sectors like co-op housing, co-op health centres, retail co-ops and worker co-ops to expand and prosper in their communities. It is very true that in many communities, certainly in the hinterlands and in the inner cities where big capital is fleeing, there are no other alternatives but the co-operative alternative toward capital formation and the creation of new jobs and opportunities in those communities.

This does not have to be small scale stuff we are talking about here. We are talking about ventures as big the co-op Enerco upgrader in Regina that grew out of the co-op refinery and with the involvement of the pools, the credit unions and federal and provincial governments, created a co-op upgrader that now permits the upgrading of the vast pools of heavy oil in that province so that they no longer need to go to Minneapolis, Minnesota, to be refined but can be refined in our own country with the type of value added activity that creates prosperity for all of us.

Credit unions as well are different from the banking institutions in the role that they can play in their local communities beyond just the financial role. I know when you talk to service organizations and different volunteer organizations in the local communities, they do not usually even bother going to the banks in their communities for donations for hockey trophies or different charities. Normally the banking institution or the huge institutions run their charitable contributions through their central offices. There is very little money if any that is available to be used in the local community.

The credit unions are not like that and the co-operatives are not like that. Co-operatives are there for local community enterprises. The co-operatives are there when it is time to pitch in to finance a community project, a community festival and the local arts or whatever. The credit unions are a community development tool that is of significant potential in many of our local communities.

I would like to sum up. The credit union sector offers us an alternative in the post-free trade economic world that we live in. It offers an alternative to local communities to ensure that the capital and the wealth that they generate in their communities stay in their communities for their own benefit. It offers an alternative to Canadian society as a whole which feels that it is losing its grip on its economic destiny.

I would like to compliment the government on this legislation. I would also like to say in conclusion that, in contrast to what my friend and colleague, the member for Nickel Belt, fears will happen with other financial institutions, we are not creating a new sumo wrestler.

The credit union system is not a sumo wrestler. When we give new strength to the credit union system we are creating a stronger team that is growing all the time. This is a situation in which when the team wins, we all win. All Canadians win when the co-operative sector gets stronger.

I would like to compliment the government and all who are involved with this bill in having the foresight to bring it forward.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River is to be commended for his speech and for having spoken so eloquently about the credit union system. I noticed that he said a great deal in favour of credit unions and then casually mentioned his caisse populaire in Albertville, Saskatchewan, and the caisse populaire in the province of Quebec.

I wonder whether the hon. member realizes that in Ontario, for instance, there is a huge Fédération des caisses populaires. Did he know that in Ontario the legislation regulating the caisses populaires applies both to the credit unions of Ontario and the caisses populaires of Ontario? Did he know a Mr. Desjardins from Lévis started the Mouvement des caisses populaires and, at the turn of the century, travelled across Quebec and Canada, and in Ontario visited the unions in Niagara Falls and Hamilton, for instance?

Did the hon. member know that in the National Capital region, on the Ontario side of the river, in Ottawa, we have caisses that are extremely solid financially, such as the Caisse populaire Laurier and the Caisse populaire d'Orléans? Does he know that in my own riding we have at least half a dozen caisses, each of which has deposits worth several million dollars? Their total deposits would probably be worth several billion. Does the hon. member know that the caisses populaires are not peculiar to Quebec or Albertville, Saskatchewan, but are established across the country?

In concluding, I want to congratulate the hon. member for his comments on both the caisses and the credit union movements.

[English]

Mr. Funk: Madam Speaker, I certainly appreciate the opportunity to pay special recognition to the caisse populaire movement in this country. The history of it has been of interest to me for a long time. My grandfather, as a matter of fact, studied co-operatives in Germany in the early part of this century. Our family has been involved actively in the development of credit unions for many decades.

As the member points out, the caisse populaire sector operates not only in Quebec but in many provinces. I personally have communication with ones in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick. There are 1,400 caisses populaires in this country with 4.4 million members. They are huge. They have 34,000 employees and $44 billion in assets. In fact they are the largest non-government employer in the province of Quebec.

I do want to make special note of the caisses populaires outside Quebec—

An hon. member: And as in Essex County.

Mr. Funk: —and as in Essex County, as my colleague points out, and also in my own constituency. They are often the rallying point of the francophone communities outside Quebec which as we all know have often had to struggle to survive. Their caisses populaires have played a role not only as financial institutions but have been significant in cultural and community development.

I know from my own experience that while the credit unions were sometimes still grappling with their social role and their community development role, caisses populaires, at least in western Canada where I knew them, were going full speed ahead with community development staff as part of their staff complement. I think they were showing a real visionary approach and deserve real credit not only for the job that they do as financial institutions but for the way that they have underpinned the francophone communities outside the province of Quebec.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I appreciate very much my colleague's speech.

I come from Surrey which is one of the fastest growing areas in Canada. Of course we have one of the fastest growing credit unions, the Surrey Metro Savings, which has just recently changed its name from Surrey Credit Union. It is now the second largest credit union in Canada next to Van City. Its growth has been based on its community service such as the fact that it did extend mortgages to families in our community to allow them housing. It helped finance many small subdivisions by local builders so that local jobs were created under local companies.

It has certainly moved in the area of commercial loans so that people could buy new cars and extend renovations on their kitchens. These are all things that were locally going to assist.

The other point made by the member that I was particularly interested in was the involvement from the board. The board is made up of local residents and therefore it acts in what is the best interest of that community. That has been the strength of Surrey Metro Savings over the years that I have been a member. Regrettably, I may be one of the older members. I joined when I first moved to Surrey in 1967.

One of the real things that I would like the hon. member to comment on is the community control and how that varies so differently from the banks and trust companies and how that has benefited the community. They have focused on community businesses, community projects and on the needs of families within their membership.

Mr. Funk: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Surrey North for his very good question. I would also like to compliment him and the other people involved in the Surrey Metro Savings Credit Union for the excellent job they have done. As he says, they are the fastest growing credit union in the country. I had the opportunity to stop in at one of their branches this summer. Certainly you could tell by looking that it was an efficient and well-run organization.

I should also make amends for an omission that I made earlier in my speech when talking about the Van City Credit Union. I neglected to mention the ethical growth fund, which is one of the pioneering efforts in this country to channel investments through vehicles like RRSPs into areas where people care about these things. They care about ethical concerns like the environment, employment equity, labour laws and so on. They can be sure that their money is being invested the way they want it to be invested.

I would like to turn just briefly to the point that the member for Surrey North made. Certainly community control makes a huge difference and sometimes it makes all the difference. When he spoke about his own community he gave some excellent examples of where that was true. It permitted local people to control development in their area rather than to be inundated and flooded by big developers from outside the area. That means that almost in perpetuity that community will have been built by its own residents for the needs of its own residents rather than by outsiders.

When it comes to things like small business lending, which is important in my constituency and many others, credit unions make a huge difference. What happens unfortunately is that when there are some articles in The Globe and Mail that there are tough times and slow growth predicted in Saskatchewan, the head office of the Royal Bank or the Toronto-Dominion or whoever in Toronto says: "Whoops, we have got to pull in our credit and tighten our belts in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, because there are tough times".

That means that perfectly viable companies suddenly have their lines of credit cut off. That means that the only people who can borrow money are those who do not need it, as the old saying goes.

On the basis of a few little articles in the paper, the whole financial structure of a community like Prince Albert, with 35,000 people, can suddenly go into decline as a result of a few head office decisions.

That does not happen with a credit union. The credit union knows the tough times and it can respond to the tough times. It can build up those it knows can pay and it can provide help and counselling to those in trouble.

In a province like Saskatchewan it is the credit unions and co-ops that are surviving in those communities in tough times, and there is a good reason for that. It is because they know how those communities operate and they have a commitment to those communities.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to begin by congratulating the New Democratic Party member for Prince Albert—Churchill River because I share most of his views toward co-operatives.

I am a member from an urban area where we do not have the real thrust and support of co-operatives in the manner with which rural members, and I think mostly members from western Canada, are familiar. I know that caisses populaires are very strong in the province of Quebec, and of course in Ottawa. However, in Toronto we seem to be surrounded by the five major banks. The basic reality, and I do not think my colleague the member for Mississauga South shares my view on this, that I tend to see, and I listen to my constituents, is that small and medium-sized businesses are constantly telling me that if they are turned down at the Royal Bank, chances are that is all for them. That is the end of the line. I do not just mean to say the Royal. If they are turned down at one of the five big banks, that is the end of the road.

Talking about the co-operatives today will hopefully provide some new competition and some new exposure to the co-operatives in the urban areas.

It is interesting that the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River talked about the sensitivity and the participation of the co-operatives in the community. I tend to share his view. This has happened to me directly. When you go into a local bank, a branch of one of the big five, and ask it to sponsor or participate in a particular event, and I am not talking about a political contribution here but anything from a child's baseball team to a single parents' event, the branch has to go to head office.

There tends to be an impersonal approach in the branches of the five major banks. Possibly, with the advent of this new thrust for co-operatives in the urban areas, we can get some competition going and those local branches will be given more entrepreneurial power.

It is not that the individual branch manager has the desire to be restrictive in his attitude. It is so often the central bank policy that limits his ability to move and react with the regional or local sensitivities.

Again, I congratulate my colleague from Prince Albert—Churchill River for his comments on the co-operative credit and associations act.

I want to briefly discuss the amendments to the trust and loan companies act. The government is doing a good thing by expanding the mandate and allowing them to have more opportunity to participate fully in the financial institutions' instruments arrangements that go on in our community.

As I said earlier, any legislation that we amend here which will promote a more vibrant competitive spirit among our financial institutions without jeopardizing the financial stability of our over-all financial system at large has to be applauded. Therefore, I commend the government for making these changes.

When I look at the Bank Act portion of this series of bills I get a little nervous because I do not really see anything substantive in this legislation that is really going to rattle the conscience or force a review of the procedures, systems and attitudes of the major banks in this country.

Again, I am going to report to this House the reactions I am getting from my constituents, and they are not just small businessmen. There are some large businesses. They feel that when times are tough and strained as they have been in this country in the last 16 months, our major financial institutions seem to be drawing in on credit lines and seem to be restrictive in their tone, attitude and actions. This is precisely the time when our corporate strength in this country, which is ultimately responsible for our job creation, needs that added support.

I realize the member for Mississauga South has added an amendment for consumer complaints. I think that is a good thing. I wish there was some way we could let the people of Canada know that this new consumer complaints amendment is part of the new Bank Act. It means that if a customer of a bank, whether an individual or a business, believes that he is not receiving proper and fair professional service from a financial institution, he can report this experience to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions who upon verifying this complaint is responsible for listing it in the Superintendent of Financial Institutions' report.

I believe that is a good measure. It is a warning light to the major banks. I am concerned about how many of the 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country would know about that amendment. I urge the government and the member for Mississauga South to consider ways to make that particular amendment to the Bank Act more widely known. It would add a lot of credibility to the over-all thrust and basic intent without jeopardizing the financial stability of our financial institutions. At the same time, it would bring them into some form of public accountability.

We as members of Parliament cannot check up on every complaint that comes to us from an individual or a business that does not feel it is getting a fair shake from its local, regional or central banker. However, I think that these banks might be a little more reflective in dealing with their clients if they knew full well that their name could be listed in the financial report of the superintendent of banks.

I want to say to the banking community of this country that we are going through a particularly difficult time right now. A lot of people in the community do not understand the reason we have the lowest interest rates we have had in 18 years. The headline in one of the newspapers today was: "Bank rate lowest in 18 years". That sounds good and inspires a little bit of hope. However, I realize that the only reason it is so low is that our economy is dragging so much. The member for Mississauga South has so rightly indicated the two-edged sword that it symbolizes.

However, I want to advise the people operating financial institutions to be careful not to mislead the public, because other than mortgages it seems that the 8 per cent bank rate is almost like false advertising. I am hearing from many businessmen that the bank rate is at 8 per cent but lines of credit or new loans for emerging businesses are very tough to get.

The member for Mississauga South shakes his head in disagreement with me and I know he will speak a little later. If he can provide some new and different hope that will suggest otherwise, the 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country will welcome it.

If there is one thing I would say to the lobbyists who tend to orchestrate this banking legislation and to the agents of the bankers, and the bankers themselves, it would be that this country is going through a very difficult and trying time. We realize that because of some rather large leveraged buyouts that have failed, some large real estate loans that have gone into default—some of them in the billions of dollars—and some massive refinancing packages out there, their capital has to be reviewed and examined very closely these days. As a result they tend to be a little less progressive with some of their smaller individual loans. Somehow the banking institutions have to cushion this period that we are going through. Otherwise, I am afraid that this so-called recovery, which I cannot quite see or feel yet, is going to be a lot longer than any of us in this House really want.

The attitude of all our financial institutions can go a long way in creating a kind of hope that will send confidence to the community and get consumers spending again. That will ultimately put our retailers in a more active state.

I am a little nervous that if over the next two to three weeks, which is a natural spending period, we do not somehow get more aggressive spending occurring then the first two months of the year are going to be lonely and tough for a lot of retailers in this country. Even in good times it is natural that there is a curtailment of spending in January and February. As a result of this apprehension with the general state of our economy, the natural Christmas spending patterns are off dramatically. By the way, banks are partially responsible for that.

There are a lot of businesses that continue to hold back on their own spending. Whether it is equipment or hiring practices, they are saying they will wait until spring, and that in turn causes a chain reaction which affects the entire marketplace.

The banking institutions of this country, the financial institutions of this country, can go a long way in the next two to three weeks in making sure that the first quarter of next year, which will be tough and is usually tough in the best of times, is cushioned by letting the economy heat up for the next three to four weeks.

I want to finish off by saying that like the New Democratic Party I support these amendments for the co-operatives. I support the amendments for the trust and loan companies. I applaud the member for Mississauga South for putting the amendment on the consumer complaint section.

I want to finish off by saying to the major banks of this country to go easy, deal in hope for the next three to four months until we get ourselves back on track in terms of a better economic strategy.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, as always the hon. member makes very meaningful representations in this House.

Right now many of my constituents and I am sure many of his are doing a lot of Christmas shopping and pulling out their credit cards. He talks to a lot of bankers and so on. I wonder if he could explain to this House why there is such a spread between the going interest rate and such a high interest rate on the credit cards. Credit cards in a way are a loan also and you are buying on credit.

Why is there that fantastic spread which is hurting so many Canadians?

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague, the member for Parkdale—High Park, for his question. Being a member from Toronto, he feels right now the nervousness of the consumer and the difficulties that many of his small businesses are having. I know that along Bloor Street, which is right in the heart of his riding, there are many stores feeling very nervous about the up and coming season.

One of the reasons the consumers are not really being aggressive is because they feel these credit cards are becoming a real gouge. We had a private member's bill in this House earlier this week. I believe it was on Monday or Tuesday. It was put forward by the member for Mississauga South, the chairman of the finance committee on the government side. He put forward a private member's bill asking his government to amend the action that we have going with the credit card system in this country right now.

He and other members put forward logical arguments why those credit card rates could be reduced substantially with absolutely no danger to the financial institutions. We went through a litany of companies and their profit performances even in the midst of this deep, deep recession. I say to the member that there was no danger of these credit card companies' balance sheets being weakened.

There is absolutely no reason at all. There is another argument and I checked with American Express on this particular issue about three weeks ago because I am hearing this argument from all my constituents too. American Express said: "We need to have these high rates because in bad times we have a lot of credit card loans in default, so we need to have the high rates to cover those defaulting cards, the cards that collapse".

I checked with my colleague, the hon. member from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. He did some extensive research on this, being our critic for consumer and corporate affairs and he said that was bunk.

There is absolutely no reason why the government could not have accepted the private member's bill of the hon. member for Mississauga South that was put on the floor of this House this past Monday. The government will have to answer for that sort of haphazard, lack of caring approach in the next election.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, what we are dealing with here is a number of bills. We are looking at the government getting its financial house in order. The hon. member for Nickel Belt spoke extensively about the ramifications of these financial reorganization bills. My fellow colleague from the NDP who spoke earlier this morning talked about the co-operative aspect, the caisses populaires, how parts of this bill are very good.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Nickel Belt spoke on how this was actually a bill that was in some respects working against Canadian interests. As a matter of fact, the member for Nickel Belt likened it to a cauldron with a wizard who was stirring it up and would not allow us to put anything into the brew in that cauldron that would be of great benefit to consumers. By saying there could be nothing added, what we have is a bill that makes some very minor improvements as far as consumers are concerned but just opens up a tremendous advantage in many areas for the corporate sector.

It is interesting to note that the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and I agree, said that up until the introduction of these bills we were looking at financial institutions being regulated in a sort of symphonic harmony where we had the government as the leader of the orchestra. I will get into that further as we go along.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will have to interrupt the hon. member who may, of course, continue later on. It being eleven o'clock, we shall now proceed to Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

RECYCLING

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, with the demand for municipal land fill sites reaching the crisis stage in many urban areas and dumping costs at an all-time high, it is time to take a serious look at our household waste and sewage residue and see if it can be recycled for agricultural use.

Blue box programs have succeeded in separating glass, metal and plastics from municipal garbage, and what is left is largely biodegradable. Lab tests allow us to determine which sewage sludge is safe for putting on the land. This could be composted with leaves collected in our cities each autumn, and all of this could provide an excellent source of organic matter and nutrients for farming.

This offers us a win, win, win situation for saving money, significantly improving our environment, and for developing a self-sustaining food production system.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Madam Speaker, today marks the second anniversary of the Montreal massacre. Two years ago, 14 young women were murdered by a young man who blamed his personal failure on ambitious, confident women. His viciously single-minded attack on those 14 women at Ecole Polytechnique is unparalleled in modern times.

Today is also the last day of the white ribbon campaign. For the first time ever, men everywhere are accepting that the only way to stop the war against women is if every man gets involved.

Finally, today we have a new gun law in this country. After a great deal of debate, we have a piece of legislation that will make it more difficult for people to kill other people. Now we must take the next step. We must begin to educate the next generation of men so that it is a unanimously accepted fact that women deserve the same kind of respect as men; at home, at work, on the street, and in every field of human activity.

HONG KONG VETERANS

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Madam Speaker, 50 years ago today, 1,975 Canadians were about to experience the horrors of war. They took part in the defence of Hong Kong, and as we know, there was no hope of being able to repulse this attack by the Japanese which came after Pearl Harbour.

Until Christmas Day, 1941, 290 Canadians died while trying to stand firm against the attackers. In addition to these casualties, many more Canadians died as a result of the brutal treatment they received as prisoners of war.

Canada has done what it could to compensate these valiant soldiers for what they had to endure. In fact, largely as a result of this experience, Canada became the first country to develop a major compensation program for former prisoners of war.

This government introduced legislation to ensure that they receive all the benefits to which they are entitled, both as a result of their war disability and for the time they spent as prisoners of war.

Programs and benefits will never really compensate the Hong Kong veterans for the horrors they experienced.

Next Sunday, members of the association of Hong Kong veterans will—

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, today is the second anniversary of the massacre at the Montreal Ecole Polytechnique, a terrible tragedy, and it is a reminder of the long way society still has to go toward solving the problem of violence against women.

One of the themes after the massacre was: First, we must mourn, and then we must make sure this will never happen again. Although we are still mourning this tragic event, Canadians must start taking the necessary steps to fight violence against women. Men must understand that no is a clear answer. Men should object to sexist behaviour. Men should reject pornography. Finally, men should listen to women.

I hope the federal government—

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, many of my constituents are fed up with the process of constitutional renewal because it does not seem to be addressing what concerns most of them, and that is the economy.

This perception is not entirely warranted because among the government's 28 proposals are suggestions to strengthen the economic union in Canada and also to remove costly interprovincial trade barriers.

Maybe we ought to go further. Perhaps the Canadian Constitution should include a clause which would make it against the law for the federal government to run a budgetary deficit.

Deficits are nothing but deferred taxes and Canadians are taxed to the max right now, so I rise to urge the parliamentary committee now studying the government's proposal to give serious consideration to a no deficit clause. This could be our greatest gift to generations of Canadian taxpayers yet to come.

VIOLENCE

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, before that senseless massacre in Montreal two years ago, I had seen incidents of violence against women as lamentable but I had felt helpless to play any meaningful part in the solution to the problem.

That terrible event and the public debate that followed made me focus on a brutal reality. It is society, our society, my society, which creates the Marc Lepines of this country and this world. We must change society.

What better place to start than with children. The Montreal based organization Coalition Against Violence in Children's Programming said in its recent publication:

> If, through television, film, and toys, we glorify violence, we can expect that, every day, he will play war, a real or imaginary war that will carry over to the home, the classroom and the neighbourhood.

Today we reflect on those 14 young women and their deaths. We reflect on 130 Canadian females—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Your time has expired. The hon. member for Don Valley East.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, for many weeks during this past summer the government debated its constitutional proposals behind closed doors. According to the media, there were some disagreements.

• (1110)

The final package deals with many, but not all of the concerns that were identified by the Spicer commission. Now all Canadians are discussing and debating these issues openly.

Hopefully the government is prepared to consider and accept not only constructive amendments to its proposals, but other constructive proposals as well, perhaps the proposals already debated and rejected without public input behind closed cabinet doors. After all, the Constitution must express the goals and the values of all Canadians, not just those of the government.

The bottom line is a constitutional consensus a majority of Canadians can live with.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, today is the national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

The white ribbon, which many members of Parliament have been wearing this week, has very quickly become the symbol of this day. Just as we wear the poppy to commemorate the many who died in war, the white ribbon symbolizes our continued effort to remember and act against violence against women.

The New Democrats very much regret that television networks, including the CBC, CTV and Global, are forbidding on-air personnel from wearing the white ribbon. It is important that everyone, especially men who must bear the responsibility for violence against women, have the opportunity to participate in this act of remembrance.

I ask the networks to review their decision and give their own on-air employees the right to wear the white ribbon which speaks out clearly against violence against women.

CROATIA

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I rise first in recognition of Joe Maric, Peter Matuzich, Tom Vlasic, Goran Ivanic and Drago Bigec.

Canadian Croatians from my constituency of Sarnia—Lambton came to Parliament Hill this week to express their concerns for Croatia. They came to Ottawa to demonstrate their desire for a stop to be put to the violence and bloodshed in Croatia.

I believe that Canada should note the European Community's condemnation of the Yugoslavian army's indiscriminate targeting of Croatian civilians and institutions.

We should be ensuring that our federal government is not supportive of any army's aggression that seems to be doing so to perpetuate itself.

All Canadians should heartily approve of the Government of Canada's backing of a UN peacekeeping force to go to Yugoslavia. Our troops are ready.

Canada should also do everything we can to ensure there is full compliance by all parties to a future agreement so a UN peacekeeping mission can be sent to Yugoslavia.

Also, we should all hope that the conditions which will allow Canada's recognition of the independence of Croatia, as noted by our Secretary of State for External Affairs, are met as soon as possible.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, today I would like to draw the attention of the House to the tragic events that occurred exactly two years ago at the Montreal Polytechnique. It is a dramatic reminder of the daily violence against women in our society.

Psychological, verbal and sexual abuse are harder to detect. However, domestic violence has several faces, and it could not continue to exist without a form of social violence. Social violence is structural and institutional. Prejudice against women and the transmission of stereotypes which see women as subject to male power, tend to keep women in a state of dependence. Domestic violence is found at all levels of our society, in all age groups and all income brackets.

Forty per cent of battered women are attacked for the first time during pregnancy. We cannot remain silent. Together we must fight violence in our society.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately the hon. member's time has expired.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, today represents a significant milestone on the long road to a violence-free society for women. On this national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, we should take this opportunity to pay tribute to the lives of 14 innocent victims. It is important for every Canadian to reflect on the deaths of those young women and ponder their own attitudes and actions in relation to violence against women.

We must now look to the future and I believe our government has by putting in place the following initiatives: The federal response to the committee report

"War Against Women"; the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women; gun control legislation; the 1991 federal family violence initiative; a network of research centres on family violence and violence against women; and the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare's announcement this morning of a joint initiative—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately the time has expired.

UKRAINE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to take this first opportunity since my return from Ukraine last night to rise in the House today and offer my sincerest congratulations to the citizens of Ukraine on their new-found independence.

It was certainly heart warming to hear the overwhelming gratitude of the Ukrainians for Canada's involvement in this peaceful and democratic process. Indeed, independence was gained, not through bloodshed but through a peaceful expression of the will of the Ukrainian people that serves to strengthen this achievement.

Over 90 per cent of the Ukrainian electorate freely voted for independence.

The history of Ukraine overflows with centuries of war, tyranny and persecution at the hands of its oppressors. Nevertheless, the flame of hope and freedom continues to burn brightly in the hearts of its people.

I am deeply honoured to have witnessed such an incredibly historic event. Indeed, there is much to celebrate both in Ukraine and here in Canada. Canadians must certainly be proud that our government was one of the first to decide to recognize Ukraine's independence. But our role is not yet complete. Diplomatic relations must be extended immediately. The Ukrainian government needs our assistance now to sustain its democracy.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the time has expired.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, violence against women in our society goes far beyond brutal beatings and vicious murders. As we pause today to remember the 14 women who died in an unbelievable massacre in Montreal, we must include in our thoughts what their deaths symbolize.

They symbolize for many women a lifetime of anxiety and fear, a lifetime of consciously and unconsciously being worried on the streets, in parking lots, in malls and in our own homes, a lifetime of making sure that we take the safe route, have the right locks on our doors, have someone accompany us to our cars.

Now added to our fear of being attacked by strangers, we are being told that most women who are victims of violence and death are victims of the men they love. Surely Canadian society has to pause today and reflect about how we come to find at least half of our population living in fear.

We must, as Canadians, ensure that among the freedoms we enjoy in a democracy must be the freedom from fear of violence.

MINORITY RIGHTS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, as our constitutional dialogue progresses I remind the Prime Minister that minority rights and minority language rights must be protected.

The need for watchfulness is real. Quebec still has Bill 178 which remains an offensive act to all of us seeking freedom of expression as a right. I say to Premier Bourassa as I have many times: removing Bill 178 will tell all Canadians they are at home anywhere in this great land, speaking and communicating, either inside or outside, in the language of their choice. A so-called softening of 178 will not do. Remember, most ordinary Quebecers across our province agree with this view and are not so mean spirited.

With reports that Mr. Bourassa's party will review the shameful French only sign language this weekend, I ask the Prime Minister to send this signal to Quebec City:

Now is the time to withdraw Bill 178. You advance neither society nor its majority by diminishing the rights of the minority, whether this means protecting the right to speak English in Quebec or fighting the perception around the world that we are a racist or bigoted society.

Wipe Bill 178 off the map of Quebec. Long live free speech.

BATTLE OF HONG KONG

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, 50 years ago, December 8, 1941, two battalions of Canadian soldiers began the fight for their lives as Japanese forces swept into Hong Kong.

Men of the Royal Rifles of Canada and the Winnipeg Grenadiers never had a realistic hope of repulsing such an invitation. They had no air support. They were out-gunned. Much of their transport had yet to arrive. They had no escape route and they were in fact doomed from day one.

Yet these men, trained only for garrison duty, managed to hold until Christmas Day. Some 290 Canadians were killed trying to achieve the impossible.

For the survivors, the ordeal had barely begun. For the remainder of the war they had to combat brutality, forced labour, starvation rations and illness.

The wonder is that so many managed to stick it out and live to rejoice in VJ Day and liberation. Their strength of character and will to live were unconquerable.

Statistics tell us that 1,975 Canadians sailed from Vancouver for Hong Kong in October 1941 and more than 550 never returned.

On this 50th anniversary of the Battle of Hong Kong let us salute those Canadian troops who were the first group to see action and the last to see freedom. They have earned our everlasting respect.

ORAL QUESTIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will know that 1,424,000 Canadians, including 600,000 Canadian women are without work as we approach the end of 1991. These Canadians, we can only conclude, in the mind of this government are an acceptable human loss in the so-called war against inflation.

I want to ask the acting Prime Minister: What hope, what promise of better performance is this government going to offer the 1.4 million Canadians who will spend Christmas this year as unemployment statistics, as stark evidence of this government's economic failure?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, no one takes delight in the unemployment figures that came out today. However, we might point out that employment has increased in the last six of nine months. The decline that we had in employment in the month of November was primarily in part time. In October and November we have had some 98,000 new full-time jobs created.

The economy is coming out of a very, very difficult period of time. It is coming out slowly but it is coming out. The signals are very, very positive. I can tell the hon. member that we are expecting a good recovery in 1992. With the participation in the labour force, we expect the conditions to be much better in the very near future.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, that is an incredible answer from the minister who apparently knows what is going on in the Canadian economy. The minister talked about labour force participation. The minister has not told Canadians or members of this House that 45,000 Canadians left the labour force last month, that if those 45,000 Canadians had not given up looking for work or gone on welfare, the unemployment rate today would not be 10.3 per cent. It would be 10.6 per cent.

I want to ask the minister whether he agrees with the words of Doug Peters, the chief economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, who said today: "It is time to review the mess we are in and the policies that got us here". When will this government recognize that Canadians are hurting out there in Main Street, Canada, and change the policies that created the mess we are now in?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The best thing that we can do, without yelling and shouting and ranting and raving like the hon. member will do from time to time, is to assure that the economy is on a sound footing. That is the most important thing.

Yesterday, we saw interest rates drop to an 18 year low. We also saw mortgage rates drop yesterday to a level that we have not seen in 23 years.

The situation is that the inflationary pressures are coming down, and that is a very positive sign. Housing starts in October are up over 200,000 annualized. There are some good signals there. The best thing that we can do for the people of Canada is to ensure a strong economy, a good strong recovery, to get people back to meaningful work. That is what we are trying to do.

By the way, Mr. Peters has his opinion. The Liberals like to quote Mr. Peters from time to time. I met with him in Montreal a couple of weeks ago and listened to him as well. But other economists have other opinions. As a matter of fact, in the pre-budget consultations the majority of the people are saying we are on the right track, stick to it, because they can see light at the end of the tunnel.

[Translation]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St.-Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, last month, 13,000 jobs were lost in Quebec, and 92 per cent of those jobs were filled by women. When will the minister table specific programs to help these women get back to work and take their rightful place in our society?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I thank the hon. member. This government has been working very diligently to help especially that group with the Canadian Labour Force Development Strategy. Under that strategy we have allocated $3.1 billion this year and $3.4 billion next year for training and adjustment programs for Canadian workers and more than $6 billion in two years time. That is working.

As a matter of fact I was in Montreal last night, and I had an individual come up and he said he took that training course and he now has a good full-time job in Montreal. He thanked the government for providing that training program. Those are the results that are happening. The hon. member pooh-poohs that but I am going to tell him something: Those who are taking the training and finding jobs thank the government for it, and the hon. member should as well.

PROJECT HAVEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

The time frame for Project Haven is nearly at an end. Workers with abused women across Canada are still wondering just where the money went. Will the minister tell us how much of Project Haven's dollars have already been spent, and will she also tell us how many transition house units have been built with this money?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, yes indeed I would be pleased to respond to my hon. colleague.

As I understand it, and this program does come under CMHC, basically the full allocation under the old Project Haven has been used up or has been committed and 499 new units have been established for women and their children under that project.

As the member knows, there is now a new project which commences this year and which will be focusing specifically on second stage housing, although there will be some components still related to emergency housing as well.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, we are happy for the 499 individuals who will be helped. We hope that the government will see its way clear to see the million or more women who are still in great difficulty.

Madam Speaker, the Micmac Family and Children's Services of Nova Scotia is still waiting for a final decision on Project Haven funding. This has been approved by the department, but to date no Project Haven dollars have been spent at all in Atlantic Canada.

Will the minister commit today to funding which has already full departmental support for the Micmac Family and Children's Services of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I have personally looked at this application. As members will recall, the application came in after the expiry of the existing program funding period. I met the proponents of the project and indicated that I would take every possible measure to find means to funding the additional requested units.

I might point out that the funds requested per unit are twice as high on average as we would fund under the Project Haven component program for aboriginal peoples, but we are looking for a way to fund this project in the next fiscal year.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Today, the entire country remembers the massacre in Montreal, but this day of remembrance can also be a day of action.

Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance says that he is preparing his budget. I would like to tell the minister that women are sick and tired of begging for shelters for battered women. We are sick and tired of organizing garage sales and bake sales so that our children can have a safe place to sleep. In Quebec alone, 12 shelters are threatening to close down. Will the minister tell women that in his next budget there will enough money for these shelters?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I know that the Minister of Finance already has been consulting with representatives of women's groups in preparation for the budget next year, and I think in quite an important and quite a new approach to consultation. I am sure that he will hear some of those same concerns that will be brought forward in the preparation of the next budget and I look forward to many of these being addressed.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, women's groups across this country have told this government time and time again about the need for core funding for women's programs and shelters for battered women. This is the time to end the consultation and to take some action.

The Minister responsible for the Status of Women and Associate Minister of National Defence, I suppose, could ask the army to have a bake sale and give core funding to women's programs. That might change something for the women in this country.

I would also like to ask the Acting Prime Minister this: We had 45,000 more Canadians last month who have gone from unemployment insurance on to the welfare rolls. This is families. One of the causes of violence against women is the breakdown in families caused by unemployment—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member put her question, please?

• (1130)

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister or the Acting Minister of Finance what this government is prepared to do to give women real options. What is this government prepared to do to get Canadians back to work?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, our programs to get the economy going again are beginning to show some very positive results. Interest rates are down and inflation is down.

The hon. member and members from her party have for many months told us to get interest rates down and that is what we have done. We have also brought inflation down to a level that is permitting us to lower interest rates in this country. We are going to see results from that. There is no question about that.

As far as helping women to obtain gainful employment, the programs that have been put in place are starting to bear fruit. There is no doubt about that. The results indicate people are joining the labour force, or entering the labour force for the first time, or being retrained where their jobs have become obsolete. We are spending $6 billion this year and next year on training alone, and that is very important. A large component of that goes to women.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Madam Speaker. The government continues to talk about maybe a recovery in 1992, maybe in the middle of 1992. It used to be the church that asked us to wait for the afterlife and now it is this government.

Every day there are women and families in this country just struggling to get through the day. On this day of action and remembrance, what is the government prepared to do to make economic options available for women, both young women trapped in abusive relationships and older women who have fewer and fewer options because of the economic policies of this government?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could respond to the leader of the NDP because I think a lot is happening.

As my hon. colleague has already mentioned, we look at the focus within the Labour Force Development Program to ensure that women have opportunities for training and retraining. We are focusing, of course, on a wide variety of initiatives on education and information, on issues relating to violence to assist women.

The family violence program itself, of $136 million, is focusing on a wide range of activities and supporting women throughout the country. Indeed, this very morning, the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced a program in co-operation with the YWCAs across the country, as a community-based model of education and public awareness to assist women dealing with issues relating to violence against women.

We do not have all the answers but I think in this sort of co-operative spirit which has developed on this issue in this House, we jointly are truly trying to search for them.

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Justice.

Bill C-17, the bill on gun control, was passed by the Senate and given royal assent yesterday. However, as you know, it will not be operative until the regulations are tabled and the law is proclaimed by Order in Council.

Canadians, especially women, want quick action on this matter. When will the regulations on the gun control bill be tabled and when will the law be proclaimed? What is the government's timetable?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Justice, I can assure all members that she is committed to moving this process ahead just as quickly as possible.

In fact, I understand her officials will be working through the Christmas period in order to get those regulations developed and bring them back to the House just as quickly as the House resumes. As you know, there is provision for them to go back to committee. However, it is our hope that those regulations can be in effect as early in the new year as possible.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, that is not enough. We want a very specific timetable.

Last year in Canada, 234 women were killed—74 by their husbands. In Quebec, there has been an 8.3 per cent increase in violent crimes against women. Although Bill C-17, the gun control bill, was adopted yesterday, there are still some serious gaps in our legislation.

Does the government intend to keep monitoring the situation to find out whether the legislation is truly effective against these violent crimes? What are the government's plans in this respect?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as my colleague pointed out a few minutes ago, in the other language, the bill was passed by the Senate yesterday, and I think all members of this House should be very pleased that the bill has finally been adopted.

The regulations will be tabled as soon as possible in the new year, and there will undoubtedly be room for improvement as there is in the case of any piece of legislation, especially this one. The government, and especially my colleague, the Minister of Justice, will be monitoring this very closely. Furthermore, appropriate amendments will be introduced, as required.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. According to Statistics Canada, the unemployment rate in Quebec is nearly 12 per cent, and 13,000 more people were without work in November than in October. Twelve thousand of the 13,000 who lost their jobs were women. How does the government intend to reverse this trend, which is disastrous for Quebec and for Canada?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, in looking at the figures, the hon. member is right, but most of those were part-time jobs, not full-time jobs that were lost.

What we are doing not only in Quebec, but across this country is concentrating a great deal of money into the training and retraining of individuals who are on unemployment insurance, who have lost their jobs, whose jobs have become obsolete, to train them with the types of skills they will need to face the next number of years in this highly competitive country that we live in.

We are concentrating on that. We are spending some $6 billion, which is a tremendous amount of money for training, and women will be the large beneficiary of those funds being expended.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, Montreal has the highest unemployment rate of all major Canadian cities—nearly 12 per cent. Why does the government not realize that its policies are not helping the Montreal area? When will it do something to get Montreal out of this economic slump?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard surely knows, or at least he should know, about the efforts this government has made in recent years to create jobs of the future in the Montreal area, jobs in high technology, aviation and pharmaceuticals. They are the result of laws passed and action taken by this government.

As for the situation of the unemployed in Montreal in general and the east end in particular, I think that the programs we created by changing the Unemployment Insurance Act to be able to spend much more on job training, in co-operation with the Government of Quebec, are concrete measures taken to correct the situation.

WHITE RIBBON CAMPAIGN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, yesterday I wrote a letter to the minister responsible for the status of women urging her to use her powers in her other capacity as the Associate Minister of National Defence to allow members of the military to wear white ribbons this week, just as they are allowed to wear a thistle for St. Andrew's Day, a shamrock for St. Patrick's Day, a leek for St. David's Day and poppies on Remembrance Day.

I want to ask the minister if she acted on this issue and, if not, why not?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I received my hon. colleague's letter this morning when I returned to Ottawa. Perhaps if she could have spoken to me about it a bit earlier it would have given us a bit more time.

I can advise my hon. colleague that there are, of course, regulations and rules which govern uniforms and appropriately so. If any changes are required there is a process of decision making with the Armed Forces Council that we go through.

I have suggested to the organizers of the white ribbon campaign, and I assume that they will be continuing this campaign in the future, that certainly I would be very supportive of a submission to the council. I hope this matter will then be resolved before the campaign commences next year.

One more thing, Madam Speaker. Because today is a Friday the members of the armed forces in Ottawa do not wear their uniforms and many of them are wearing white ribbons.

• (1140)

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that the Associate Minister and the Minister of National Defence have the authority to issue a declaration indicating that it would be permissible to wear a white ribbon honouring violence against women and the women who have been killed, on this national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

We also learn that reporters on TV are barred from wearing the symbol, a white ribbon. The reason given is that: "We don't use any overt signal to detract from our neutral position". What neutral position? There is no neutral position on this issue. This is not a political campaign. What is the other side of this?

Will the minister act to encourage greater freedom and participation in this white ribbon campaign? Will she write to the national media and give them at least her opinion on this and encourage them to allow the reporters the opportunity to show their solidarity with women?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as I understand the origins of the white ribbon campaign, it was a group of very distinguished men from all walks of life who indicated they wanted to show their commitment to the issue of violence against women. I commend them for that. I think it is a very important part of creating the kind of understanding that is required to address these issues.

If we really want to make this grass roots, I think they are the ones that should provide for that interaction. Certainly I offer my support. However, I would also suggest that those men who are involved in this movement, in this campaign, will also want to ensure that they make their concerns and their views known to national institutions, to broadcasters and to all in society.

BLUE WATER BRIDGE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, I want the Minister of National Revenue to know through you that the International Blue Water Bridge is receiving ever increasing vehicular traffic. He should also know that this traffic make-up is a mix of ever-increasing truck and business traffic, tourism traffic and so on. In fact the volume is quickly reaching the point where a second span will have to be built.

We are having traffic back-ups caused in part by primary customs inspection. The Blue Water Bridge Authority is ready to build new primary booths and stations.

I would like to ask the minister if he will commit his department to immediately put in place training and availability of customs personnel to facilitate the clearance at the Blue Water Bridge. He has been helpful in the past and I ask for his help in the future.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this very important matter.

As a result of his previous representations to me, many improvements at Blue Water Bridge have already been made, including the employment of additional personnel.

However, if the Blue Water Bridge is indeed proposing to expand the number of booths or lanes, we will have a look at that. If additional people will be required to man those booths, we would take that into consideration in a positive manner.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

While the official unemployment rate in metropolitan Toronto remains virtually unchanged at an alarming 10 per cent, the real figure is actually much higher since 14,000 Torontonians have left the labour force in November. These 14,000 people are either not looking for work or are now on welfare or have left Toronto all together.

Given that the Toronto economy is crucial to any national economic recovery and given that it is now both sputtering and shrinking, when will this government introduce measures to stimulate and kick-start an indispensable component of Canada's economic machinery?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, all the advice that the government has received from groups across this country has been that the best way to get the economy going is to get our basics in place and that is low inflation rate and low interest rates.

I recently had discussions with a number of individuals in the real estate industry in Toronto and the metropolitan area. The type of house selling that is going on now is first time home buyers that are getting into the market. That is a good sign. That is a good sign that the economy is picking up, that people are purchasing their homes in the Toronto area.

As a matter of fact, in my area of Brampton in the last very short period of time there have been hundreds of new homes sold primarily to first time home buyers. He looks surprised but I can take him out to the new Springdale development and show him where they have sold 500 homes in one week.

Things are beginning to happen in the metropolitan Toronto area. Of course the training programs that we provide through the community colleges are helping to train and retrain. We see some great signs of the economy recovering in early 1992.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The chronic unemployment crisis of metro Toronto not only paints a dismal economic picture but it also paints a very troubling social picture. Over 50,000 people are homeless in metro Toronto; 250,000 on welfare and 160,000 collecting unemployment insurance. There are 150,000 relying on food banks and the story goes on and on and on.

I ask the hon. minister when the government will recognize that metropolitan Toronto is really suffering from a tale of two cities and that it is in need of a serious economic blueprint in order to revitalize what is essentially a stagnating economy when it was once a very dynamic and bursting economy for Toronto and for the nation.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I come from that area and am very proud of that community and its role in the Canadian economy.

The hon. member stands up here with a doom and gloom scenario which does nothing to further the economic benefits of the metropolitan Toronto area. It is a vibrant city. The economy is starting to come back. We are seeing some very good signs and Toronto will be the beneficiary of the growth that is estimated by those outside groups—not by the government—of some 3.5 per cent to 4 per cent growth in 1992.

Toronto naturally will benefit. It is a very vibrant city. I am extremely proud of it and I am sure that these people will find meaningful jobs in the not too distant future and the city will be back operating again as a city that we all know and love.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or the acting minister, and it is about the other interest rates, credit card interest rates.

At a time when consumers are being gouged by credit card rates the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has no help for Canadians except telling them to shop around. Here is the shopping list, Madam Speaker: Bank of Montreal MasterCard, 19.25 per cent; Toronto-Dominion Visa, 19.75 per cent; National Bank, 19.75 per cent; Scotia Visa, 19.25 per cent.

I want to ask the government if this is Tory fairness.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, what is Tory fairness is our efforts to bring interest rates down. All Canadians, whether they are borrowers on credit cards or mortgage loans, should be delighted with the fact that the prime rate yesterday dropped to 8 per cent, the lowest level it has been in 18 years.

This, Madam Speaker, is good for everybody. As a result, interest rates on credit cards are going down and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has very rightly said that now is the time to start shopping for better rates as they become available to both consumers and businesses.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I just read the shopping list. The rates are 12 per cent above prime. Only a Conservative would think that is proper.

Why does the government allow the chartered banks to bleed Canadian taxpayers with usurious credit card interest rates?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the hon. member obviously cannot get it into his mind that people can, whether businesses or consumer, borrow money from their financial institutions at the lowest rates they have been for 18 years.

This is good news for consumers. This is good news for businesses. This is good news for Canadians and the Canadian economy. The hon. member should be applauding this government instead of standing up and posturing on statements he keeps making.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

He will recall that in 1982 male parliamentarians laughed when I stated that one in 10 men battered their wives. Although men in this House wear ribbons today, violence has escalated and we now learn that one in eight women are battered by their partners. This violence must end. The government must act now.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government will lift the ceiling on the Canada Assistance Plan so that one in every two women will not be turned away from shelters and that they and their children will have the help they need.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I think my hon colleague is as aware as other colleagues are that we are all working together to try to put an end to violence against women. It is not just one level of government that can decree it. It is going to require some fundamental changes in the attitudes so that women have equal respect in our society.

Just commenting on the final part of the hon. member's question, I am sure she is aware that it has been estimated that perhaps 25 per cent of $1.5 billion of the transfer payments to provinces do, in effect, go to support a whole variety of services for women and their children who have been victims of violence. This is a very significant contribution.

As my colleague is also aware, the Canada Assistance Plan contributions continue to increase to all provinces and the limit of 5 per cent to the three most prosperous provinces is well above the expected inflation rate this year of only 2.6 per cent. Progress is being made and I am working with my provincial colleagues so that we can be sure that we get our priorities right, act in a concerted manner and that our moneys can be used as effectively as possible to end violence against women.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, this kind of complacency is pretty hard to take. The minister must know that violence against women is highest in the provinces where CAP has been capped and shelters are being closed. Not very many are being opened.

My supplementary is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration or the acting minister, as the case may be.

Visible minority women, immigrant women and domestic workers often suffer violence in silence because they are afraid of being deported, loss of employment and rejection by their family and community.

What steps will the Minister of Employment and Immigration take to ensure that women immigrants have full protection from violent situations, that they are fully informed of this so that their silence will end?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, our colleague knows very well that we already have programs within the department to help integrate immigrant women into society.

I might also mention the Employment Equity Act that we implemented in 1986. We all know that a legislative committee has already started to review it. We can improve the law that we have had for five years. Progress is slow, but we are making progress. I concur with my colleague responsible for the status of women, who said that if we all work together, visible minorities, women, native people and the disabled will have their place in a well-balanced society.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS COLLEGE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

Following the passage of the Emergency Preparedness Canada legislation in 1988, the then Associate Minister of National Defence announced during the election campaign that a new building would be constructed at the Emergency Preparedness College in Arnprior, Ontario.

The building was to be occupied by students from municipalities and other levels of government and organizations from all over Canada by December 1990. To date a shovel has not even been put in the ground. Why has the government not kept its commitment to this very important process of training people for crisis management?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, my colleague the Minister of National Defence has responsibility for emergency preparedness and I will be glad to bring this to his attention.

My understanding is that in a climate of fiscal restraint all priorities need to be addressed. We have not been able to proceed with all the things we would like to be able to do. The activities we undertake at Arnprior are very important activities. The training that is provided for municipalities and people across the country will continue and I am sure will ensure that we have effective emergency measures preparedness throughout the country.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, the Emergency Preparedness Canada Act was introduced in this House with great fanfare by the Minister of Communications when he was Minister of National Defence. The concept was reasonably well received at the time.

In view of this support and in light of the government's announcement, will the concept that the government is planning be the same and will it come forward for the college at Arnprior where thousands of Canadians are trained in crisis management? It is very important when problems arise: fires, storms, and even civil disobedience. I think this is very important for Canadian safety.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I can assure my hon. colleague, yes, the government is committed to the maintenance of the high level of preparedness and training for people with respect to emergency measures.

I know, coming from British Columbia, the whole issue of earthquakes is a very important aspect of emergency measures preparedness. We passed that legislation, we have the commitment and we are following up in ensuring that it occurs.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister answering for Treasury Board.

Through Public Service 2000 the government proposes giving managers more power to contract out services. In his report, the Auditor General criticizes the sloppy management of operations and human resources in the contracting out that is already going on.

After a devastating Public Service strike brought about, by the way, by this government's policies, why is the government giving managers more powers to contract out without giving them clear, precise guidelines? Why this policy leading to conflict rather than one leading to harmony?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, project 2000 is designed to streamline the Public Service to bring them into the 21st century, to ensure that the services that are being provided to the Canadian public who are, after all, paying for them, are responsive to their needs and requests.

The suggestions made by the Auditor General in his report will help in designing those plans for the future for the bureaucrats. We look at the Auditor General as someone who helps us with the management of government. As a matter of fact, if the hon. member was fair, he would also point out that the Auditor General said that this government has made great progress in the administration of government over the past number of years.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, to give only one example, 64 per cent of those who left the Translation Bureau in the last five years resigned. I would ask the minister if the government is prepared today to meet with the unions and discuss seriously an acute problem that is affecting the workers' morale and the stress they are under, namely job security. Is he prepared to meet the unions and hold discussions with them to solve this very serious problem?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, in the last round of negotiations, as I understand it, the unions agreed to contracting out and privatization in the settlement that they came to with the federal government. In fact, Daryl Bean has talked widely about how an employee is protected if contracting out or privatization goes on.

Those negotiations and discussions have gone on. I believe now, because of those negotiations, that PSAC recognizes there is contracting out and privatization that can and should go on.

Sometimes the private sector can do jobs and provide services much more economically and better than the civil service. That has been proven in the past and I am sure will happen in the future.

SHIPBUILDING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Some three months ago a Canadian designed ice-breaker reached the North Pole. It was recently built at a cost that was less than one-half of the money currently being spent by the government to overhaul and refit an old and less powerful ice-breaker.

Why did the minister choose to spend all this money overhauling a 21-year-old ice-breaker when it could have built a new and a more powerful one and saved some $85 million at the same time?

• (1200)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that despite claims from competitors in the shipbuilding industry, a replacement vessel for the Louis St. Laurent, with the same capability had been estimated at approximately $250 million, assuming that the vessel would be built to Canadian standards, Arctic pollution prevention regulations and by a Canadian shipyard.

Any prices and costs mentioned by designer-builders at this stage for a replacement vessel for the Louis St. Laurent are totally speculative.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence on the issue of gays and lesbians in the Canadian Armed Forces.

In October the minister told a committee of this House that the current discriminatory policy was wrong, that the Chief of Defence Staff said it was wrong, that the Department of Justice said it was contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and was thus illegal, and that the policy would be changed well before the new year.

Why has the policy not yet been changed? Will it be changed before the new year? Has the government, according to reports, caved in to the neanderthals in the Conservative caucus?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I would not want to share the sentiments of the latter part of my colleague's questions.

A decision has not yet been finalized on this issue. As soon as it has been, obviously we will make the appropriate announcements. I can assure my colleague that a great deal of work has gone into this. I recently met with my new committee on social change and asked it, not to examine whether we should change the policy, there has been some misinterpretation about that, but if a decision is made to change the policy how we can make sure that it is implemented most effectively.

I think that is the kind of thing that my hon. colleagues and others would applaud. It is the kind of leadership we will need to take to ensure that any change is implemented effectively.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the minister clearly avoided the opportunity to make the commitment to this House today that the policy was going to be changed before the new year which she made before the committee.

This House can take it therefore that the minister has backed away from the word she gave to that committee. I ask the minister and her colleague the Minister of Justice how they can continue to sit in a government that practises systemic discrimination against gays and lesbians in one of the major public institutions of Canada.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as I advised my colleague and as I have indicated in the committee, there are many different aspects of this question that have to be addressed. I indicated that I hoped we would have a decision before the end of the year. That decision has not yet been finalized. As soon as it is my hon. colleagues will be advised as will other members of the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will finish with one question from the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and one question from the hon. member for Halton—Peel.

SLOVENIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As she knows, on December 2 Canada recognized Ukraine as an independent state after 80 per cent of the Ukrainian people voted in support of the independence. Slovenia declared its independence on June 25 after 93 per cent of Slovenian people voted in support of independence in a free and democratic referendum. On October 8 Slovenia began issuing its own currency and passports, and on October 26 the last Yugoslav federal army soldiers left Slovenia's soil and Slovenia is now in full control of its borders and defence.

I would like to ask the minister, in view of Slovenia's de facto control of its own country, is she prepared to recognize Slovenia as an independent state?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as I told the Slovenian foreign minister while he was here, and we had a very illuminating meeting which was very helpful to me, recognition will come to those Yugoslavian republics wishing it. The question is how to receive it and when.

The difficulty is that with the nation in a state of war at the moment it is important that all parties negotiate the solution together in terms of the republics and their relationship with each other.

We want an end to the bloodshed. That is our first and most important priority. We also are very active in promoting a UN peacekeeping force in Yugoslavia in which we have said we would take an active part. Our efforts are directed toward that end and will continue to be. However, to recognize independence at this time in our view would fundamentally alter the nature of the negotiation process or the potential for a negotiation process and would suggest that the negotiation process may not take place.

TRADE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, the future of the North American free trade deal looks somewhat cloudy after the American decision to pull back on talks. It is my understanding that Canadian officials are continuing to work with their American and Mexican counterparts.

My question is for the Minister of International Trade. If the Americans do shelve their participation, will Canada continue to be part of the negotiations? I want to ask him if he could give us in general an update about where these talks stand at the moment.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has used the phrase that the U.S. has pulled back. To the contrary, the U.S. has not pulled back. There has been—if I can call it this—some conventional wisdom in the media to the effect that the Americans are slowing down, but that certainly is not our experience at the negotiating table.

We are in the course of exchanging draft texts to help us move the process along. The Americans have been fully engaged in that. In conversations which I had quite recently with Mr. Mossbacker, who was here earlier this week, and Mrs. Hills, whom I have talked with on this matter two or three times in the last month or so, the administration is fully committed to moving the NAFTA process ahead.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, may I ask that the Speaker review the "blues" of the question placed by the hon. member for Victoria. I believe within his question were assertions that were out of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. I will certainly do that and if there was something said which was not correct I will come back to the House.

I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for bringing this matter to my attention.

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBRANCE AND ACTION ON VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on this first National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence against Women.

I would like to mention the presence in the gallery today of representatives of women's groups who, with many others, worked on the front line in the community to solve the problem of violence against women.

On December 6, 1989, fourteen young women were murdered at the University of Montreal. It was a tragic moment in our history. We will never forget the shock, horror and anger; our sympathy went to the victims' grieving families and friends. Neither will we ever forget the sorrow we felt for society in general.

[English]

The commemoration of this day ensures that the murders at Ecole Polytechnique can never be discounted merely as an act of a solitary madman. It serves as a reminder of the violence that many women experience daily in their homes, in their work places and on the streets.

December 6 marks not only a day of remembrance but also a day of action on violence against women. The memory of the countless women who have been victims of violence demands no less than a commitment from all of us to eradicate that violence from our society. The Prime Minister has said one Canadian woman suffering violence at home or elsewhere is too many.

Our government has made the ending of violence against women one of our major priorities and our goal, pure and simple is zero tolerance. To achieve this objective of zero tolerance we must recognize the plight and the difficulties experienced by the victims of violence and their families.

We announced last February the federal family violence initiative to which we are committing $136 million over the next four years for programs in the area of health and social services, criminal justice, community action, housing and support for services in aboriginal communities.

Through this initiative as well the government is working closely with its partners in society to promote community-based projects, to create new emergency shelters for women and to help train police and the judiciary in understanding the depth and the breadth of violence against women.

I would like to mention in particular the initiative announced this morning by the YWCA's national awareness program on violence against women. My colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced in Toronto this morning that the YWCA will receive funding in the amount of $1 million over the next four years to undertake a community based-awareness campaign that will involve local YWCAs and community partners right across the country.

To achieve zero tolerance we must also seek to more fully understand the underlying attitudes and values in our society that allow violence against women to flourish. To that end we have instituted a $1.5 million program to establish three research centres. These three centres of excellence will encourage the promotion, the co-ordination and the communication of Canadian research efforts in the areas of family violence and violence against women.

To achieve zero tolerance we must also encourage women to speak up and share their experiences and their solutions. Therefore we have established the Canadian panel on violence against women. As part of their work they will be meeting and visiting with men and women from all walks of life in all parts of the country to hear from them their experiences and their solutions for violence against women.

Throughout this comprehensive national grass roots dialogue we hope the panel will raise awareness and document the incidents, the causes and the effects of violence. For the first time we will develop a national plan of action which will be the the first in the world. It will help make Canadian society safer and more equitable for women.

To achieve zero tolerance, the judicial system must recognize that crimes committed against women and children are as serious as those against property or against men.

That is why we are considering ways to make the legal system more effective in protecting women's right to live without fear of violence. To this end, we have passed a new firearms control law and we will replace the Criminal Code provisions dealing with protection for victims of sexual assault.

[English]

Finally to achieve zero tolerance we must also make the public more aware of the stereotypes and attitudes that encourage violence against women. As part of our response to the subcommittee report War Against Women we have announced our intention to co-ordinate new prevention oriented public education programs to involve the business community, labour movement, professionals, women's groups and other non-governmental organizations to build on the collaborative efforts currently under way with provincial and territorial governments.

I would also like to applaud the initiative taken by men's groups across this country in launching the white ribbon campaign to confront male violence against women. It commits men to the full equality of women and actively encourages men to be part of the solution to violence against women.

May I say that I am heartened by the expressions of support for this initiative that have been shown by members on both sides of this House this week and right across the country as I have travelled throughout the country.

There are no easy answers or simple solutions or magic ways of dealing with it. It is going to take the concerted effort of all Canadians to change the ways that we women and men alike regard and relate to each other. It is going to take the concerted efforts of all of us to change the attitudes that have perpetuated violence and stopped women from achieving full equality in our society.

I ask members on all sides of the House to join with women and men across the country to say today that we reaffirm our goal of zero tolerance of violence against women.

Today we make a pledge to those 14 young women whom we mourn and to their families and friends. We make a pledge to build a society in which women have the right to live without fear in their homes, workplaces and communities. We make a pledge to build together a society in which women and men are truly equals.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for her comments. I wish that I could share more in her feeling of being heartened by what we have done. I do and will appreciate many of the steps that have been taken. But December 6 for me and I think for all of us is a day in which a feeling of depression and a feeling of sorrow overwhelm almost any other.

Two years ago today 14 young women were killed by a man shouting his hatred of women. They were 14 young women who just wanted normal lives but because those normal lives entailed education in a non-traditional area those normal lives were denied to them.

[Translation]

These women did not want to become symbols; they wanted to be engineers. The tragedy that we do not grasp is that all women are in danger, whether they are "traditional" or "modern".

[English]

Some people still think it was an act of an ordinary psychopath, whatever that may be.

Publicity, public awareness and the actions that have been taken have still not made changes in the attitudes of the general public and, with the greatest of respect, changed the attitudes of many men, which is necessary.

We have for example the response by some to the report of the subcommittee on the status of women entitled War Against Women. It was not a response that really reflected the views that were expressed in the paper that came from the hearts of women on the front line across this country.

The response to the white ribbon campaign both in the armed forces and in the CBC is not a response that any of us is particularly happy about nor is the continuing refusal of the government to institute mandatory gender sensitivity training for federally appointed judges. These are the things we still need desperately.

I received this clipping just before I came into the House. The bodies of two women, one beaten to death and the other stabbed, were discovered by Montreal police today which is the second anniversary of the killing of 14 women at the University of Montreal.

One of the victims was discovered in a lane way behind a series of stores in the city's north end at about 7 a.m. She had been beaten to death. Four hours earlier a woman was found dead in an apartment in the city's east end. She was stabbed several times.

No arrests have been made and no motives for the slayings have been established yet.

There are no motives, just a general motive that says women are not safe in this country and that we cannot seem to do anything of significance that can make them safe.

Consider women in poverty, women in job ghettos, women frustrated by glass ceilings, women mocked, women marginalized and women maltreated. Emotional, psychological, and physical abuse are all violence. All of this is abhorrent and all of it must stop.

[Translation]

This violence must stop. It must stop now!

[English]

We have to act. There are more things we can do. We want to do it. For God's sake let us do it.

• (1220)

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, today is the second anniversary of the horror that is indelibly stamped in the minds and in the hearts of Canadians. Today is the second anniversary of the massacre of 14 young women in Montreal. They were young women who dreamed their dreams, shared their hopes and aspirations, set their goals and worked toward achieving those goals.

They were young women who loved and were loved. They were killed simply because they were women.

Parliament has declared December 6 to be a national day of remembrance and action on violence against women. It is one small step taken to acknowledge that violence against women is real, longstanding and epidemic in proportion.

Let us consider these facts. Between 1984 and 1988 over 100,00 sexual assaults were reported to the police in Canada. Many police officers estimate that this number represents only 10 per cent of the actual sexual assaults. Forty per cent of wife assaults begin during the woman's first pregnancy.

In 1988 over one-third of homicides in Canada were domestically related. Sixty-four per cent of women murdered were killed in their own homes. Thirty-six per cent of men who beat their wives also abused their children in their homes.

A report was released in October by the U.S. Surgeon-General who said that wife battering in the United States injures more women than automobile accidents, muggings and rapes combined. Over 100 women are killed in Canada each year. They are killed by the men with whom they live or have lived. They are killed by the men they trusted.

Small steps are being taken by Canadians. Caring men have demonstrated their solidarity with women by launching the white ribbon campaign which commits men to working toward social and economic equality for women and toward ending violence against women. These men want to be a part of the solution.

The media has also focused on the issue of violence against women all week. This will help to educate the public and to heighten awareness of the depth of this very real social problem.

Women continue to struggle to raise funds for shelters for battered women and for rape crisis centres. They continue to staff these shelters and crisis centres. They are underpaid and they are overworked. Women continue to lobby all levels of government for adequate funding for services to women.

Some of these women are here with us in the gallery today. I would like to pay tribute to their dedication, hard work and commitment to our battered sisters.

The minister spoke of her government's family violence initiative which is $136 million for eight different ministries over the next four years. In fact the government plans to spend only $49 million before the next election. At the same time her government has slashed transfer payments to the provinces freezing both the Canada Assistance Plan for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia and Established Programs Financing for all provinces.

The cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, which provides among other things funds for shelters for battered women and spaces for child care and welfare services, will cost Ontario alone in one year four times more than the initiative's entire $136 million in one year alone.

The minister spoke of a multimedia awareness campaign announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare today. The previous minister said that his government hopes to educate Canadians about the importance of recognizing oneself as a victim and then seeking help.

What if the public does do exactly that? We have heard nothing about new services nor recognition of what front line workers have been demanding for years, which is a better delivery of services. Right now thousands of battered women and their children are turned away from overburdened shelters because of a lack of space. Research on this issue and a media campaign are an important part of the long-term solution. However, we need action now, action today that will help the women who are being beaten right now, the women who are battered, the women who are bruised, the women who are being turned away from shelters every day in this country.

It is simply not good enough to say we are working toward changing our society and that is the situation for our daughters. We must ensure that those women who are suffering now receive the support and services they so desperately need. We know that there is a crying need for more shelter spaces, for second stage housing and for counselling services.

We cannot wait for the report from the panel on violence against women, which I know and the minister knows will make recommendations for increased shelter spaces. The time that it takes for the panel to consult, report and recommend must never be viewed as a grace period for this government. The grace period is over. No grace period should ever have been expected or given.

In every region of Canada women and men are gathering to remember all of the victims of violence against women, to share their grief, to gain strength from one another. They are taking action. They are resolving to change our society, to ensure that women walk safely in our streets, that we may live securely in our homes, and that we may participate fully in our society as equal partners with our brothers. Women and men working together will bring positive change to our society.

I want to close with a quote from Judy Chicago in which she expressed her vision of a future without violence, a world in which both women and men are valued and respected. She said:

> And then all that has divided us will merge
> And then compassion will be wedded to power
> And then softness will come to a world that is harsh and unkind
> And then both women and men will be gentle
> And then both women and men will be strong
> And then no person will be subject to another's will.

We remember. Who could forget?

WHITE RIBBON CAMPAIGN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think this is the appropriate time for me to put forward this motion for unanimous consent, which I move on behalf of the hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis:

> That the House of Commons endorse the White Ribbon Campaign by encouraging all men to wear a white ribbon to signal their support in the campaign against violence against women.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal Party I am pleased to endorse this important motion condemning violence against women. Serious cases of violence against women are continually reported from all parts of Canada: cases of murder, rape, battering, harassment, forced prostitution, incest, pornography and repression.

Yesterday Parliament passed a stricter law on gun control, but stricter gun laws are not enough. There is a need for more shelters for threatened women, more effective family crisis intervention and more counselling for men prone to violence. In addition, we must do more to combat the easy distribution of violent pornography and the trivialization of violence against women in films, television and magazines.

The purpose of this white ribbon campaign is to show the solidarity of men with women in combating this growing wave of violence. However, members of Parliament and ministers wearing white ribbons in this House are not enough. If we are really serious we have to put more money into the shelter program and we have to provide more resources to combat violence.

Violence against women, no matter what form it takes, can never be tolerated.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus and the party itself I want to indicate our support for this motion.

I think that what we have seen this week from coast to coast to coast are men who, for the first time, are really standing up and saying they are concerned. However, they are saying more than that. They, along with the women of this country who have been voices in the wilderness for many, many years, are coming together to say that we all must act.

It is not just a day of remembrance. It is not just a campaign for one year. It is a commitment by all Canadians that their governments—federal, provincial and municipal—take action to look after those who are victims, and more important, to make the changes necessary to ensure that we can eradicate the need for future campaigns so that women or children are not violated by those who love them, by males. We must take this as a signal—I would hope the government does—that the people of Canada support a change in attitudes, support a commitment to funding to ensure that the protection is in place, and also to work to eliminate the problem itself.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BILL S-6

MOTION TO DISPOSE OF BILL AT ALL STAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I rise to ask for unanimous consent to present the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order and usual practices of the House, Bill S-6, an act to amend the Act of incorporation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the province of Quebec, be referred after second reading, to a Committee of the Whole instead of to Legislative Committee H; and

That, unless otherwise disposed of, at the end of the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business this day, any proceedings then before the House shall be interrupted and every question necessary to dispose of the said bill at all stages shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

That Bill S-6, an act to amend the act of incorporation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the province of Quebec, be selected as a votable item.

PETITIONS

UKRAINE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, it is with great honour that I present a petition on behalf of a number of Ukrainian Canadians in my riding calling for the recognition of Ukraine. More important, because this has not been done as yet, the petitioners call for the establishment of full and complete diplomatic relations between the governments of the people of Ukraine and Canada. I would also hope that air traffic between Canada and Kiev could be established as soon as possible.

UKRAINE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I stand today and put on record pursuant to Standing Order 36 the petitions of over 250 constituents of Winnipeg North led by the metropolitan Maxim Hermaniuk which were received in my office the day I left for Ukraine as a member of the official Canadian delegation to observe the referendum vote for independence in that country.

The petitions pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence and establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and people of Ukraine immediately following a positive confirmation vote in Ukraine's referendum on December 1, 1991.

I am proud to realize that Canada has now decided to recognize Ukraine and I hope that the Government of Canada would extend full diplomatic relations on behalf of my constituents and these petitioners as here humbly submitted.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if Question No. 107 could be made an Order for Return, this Return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 107 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

AERONAUTICS ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are three notices of motions in amendment to Bill C-5. Motions Nos. 1 and 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River will be debated together. A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motion No. 2. Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for York West will be debated and voted upon separately.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-5 be amended in clause 12 by striking out lines 12 to 20 at page 7.

That Bill C-5 be amended in clause 13 by striking out lines 24 to 32 at page 8.

He said: Madam Speaker, I rise today to address an issue that I believe is of great significance to our legal and justice system. We note that the bill here involves the Aeronautics Act. I have no quarrel with the broad principles of this bill. Most of us are anxious to see it passed subject to the amendment that my friend and colleague wishes to present later.

In any event, the legal framework in which we enforce our statutes and laws in Canada is not all that complex. We start off with a statute in which we can prohibit certain things or require certain things to be done, and quite often under the terms of the statute we permit the making of regulations, orders or other statutory instruments by the cabinet, the Governor in Council. These secondary regulations and orders are then published in the Canada Gazette and become a part of our law.

In the Aeronautics Act we have fines stated for breaching regulations and terms and provisions in the requirements of the Aeronautics Act.

The proposed section 6.2 in this case permits the minister to restrict the use of any airspace or airport. I do not quarrel with that. Sometimes for security and many other reasons it is necessary to restrict access to airspace around airports and to portions of the airport property itself.

Under this section the minister would do that by passing a regulation through the Governor in Council. Ordinarily in our law that regulation or order would be published in the Canada Gazette and made public for all the world to know.

In this particular case, and it happens in some other statutes, it is not intended that this regulation under 6.2 be published. We will not tell all of the world that there is a prohibition, for example. As a result it is quite likely that order or regulation will not come to the attention of a lot of Canadians.

Under our Canadian law I submit that it is repugnant that an individual might be convicted of contravening a law that he did not know existed and the existence of which he had no means of ascertaining. I think all Canadians agree with that. In fact, the current section 6.2 inserts a subsection which basically codifies and states that repugnance. It states that you cannot convict a person of contravening a regulation which has not been published unless all reasonable steps have been taken to bring the purport of that regulation or order to the notice of the persons likely to be affected by it.

We have accepted that in our law and that position is codified in it. You cannot convict a person unless the government has taken all reasonable steps to bring the order to the attention of the person affected.

I have seen that in several statutes. Just last week the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development confirmed that in another statute involving the Indian Act in which the orders or instruments made by band councils were not published in The Canada Gazette.

However, in this particular amendment the government has gone much further. It changes the balance. Subsection (3) of this new section says:

> A certificate purporting to be signed by the Minister or the Secretary of the Department of Transport stating that a notice containing the regulation or order was issued is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that reasonable steps were taken to bring the purport of the regulation or order to the notice of those persons likely to be affected by it.

This is a situation in which to prosecute for a breach of the order all that is required is that the secretary or the Minister of Transport file a certificate with the court. Rather than proving that the government took reasonable steps to bring it to the attention of the person it simply has to say that "we issued the order".

That provision clearly places administrative convenience before the interests of justice and fairness to an accused. Here is a hypothetical situation. The minister decides that access to the stairwell in a particular airport or the stairwells on the north side of the airport in any particular city shall be restricted to authorized persons. Some unfortunate individual who was not aware of this decides to take a short-cut through the airport and uses the stairwell and is caught. He or she is charged and the person goes to court.

Keep in mind that the individual involved never knew that this stairwell was restricted. There does not have to be any sign posted. There is simply an order issued by the minister saying that you cannot use this stairwell. This person goes to court, though he or she did not know it was an offence, and is faced with a situation in which the government files a certificate saying it took all reasonable steps. It issued the order and the subsection says that it shall be deemed that the mere statement or certificate that it issued the order is proof, not evidence, but proof that the government took all reasonable steps to bring the order to the attention of the person who has been charged.

What does the accused person have to do? I submit that person is in a situation in which he or she must prove a negative. That person has to prove that the government did not take the steps. How could that person ever know what the government does in bringing such things to the attention of the public when the order was never published in the first place? It was issued, but never published. That is patently unfair and it places the burden on the accused.

Sections 6.2 and 6.41 remove the judge from deciding whether the accused is properly charged, based on the facts. There are no facts. The minister has simply filed a certificate and said that the individual used the stairway. It is a bureaucrat who has made the decision that the stairway should not be used. This shifts the onus on to the accused, contrary to our common law principles under which you are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty and the burden is on the Crown to prove guilt. The burden is now shifted on to the accused.

The accused, who does not necessarily know anything about transport policy or how government works, must prove a negative in order to be found not guilty. That is very unfair.

The proposed sections 6.2(3) and 6.41(6) both enact this very unfortunate principle. It purports to alter a fundamental principle in our justice system, which I have already explained. It crosses the line. I think that citizens in this country have to say: "You may not cross the line. Our justice principles cannot be altered for administrative convenience. We will hold on to the principles of justice and fairness as they exist in our criminal law and our quasi-criminal law".

As well, because this will be carried in the parliamentary record for a long time, I submit that there are charter implications with regard to the putting in place of a mechanism which will convict a Canadian of an offence he or she never knew about, never was able to find out about by reading the government Gazette or other publications, and places a burden in court that most Canadians could never discharge.

That is unfair. That is why I oppose this provision. I do hope the minister has an explanation, at least for the record.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, while I appreciate the intent of my colleague I think we have to recognize that in the industry we are talking about there will be situations in which the government, having decided to impose an interim order on a carrier, is actually unable to serve that carrier because of the nature of the business. He is flying from one point to another.

In this case the government does need that ability. If the interim order is to shut down business and it has to done by radio communication it can be verified with a tape recording that the government has sent that instruction by voice to the plane to order it to land at the nearest airport and cease and desist. I think we have to allow that flexibility.

This is not an onerous clause. Whoever the government of the day is would not use it frivolously. Therefore, I would still feel more comfortable if it had that power in the legislation.

Perhaps the minister in her remarks might want to give a very clear indication as to the kind of circumstances where this would be used by today's government.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, this particular issue is one that has been discussed quite thoroughly in committee and by officials with the hon. member who brought it forward.

• (1250)

We feel that it is in the best interest of the public as well to enable us to do the work that is necessary in this area if we leave those two clauses within the bill and not delete them.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the Question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 1 and the vote on Motion No. 1 will be applied to Motion No. 2.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 negatived.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West) moved:

That Bill C–5 be amended in clause 15 by adding immediately after line 29 at page 9 the following:

"(1.1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or any regulation made thereunder, the Minister shall cancel a Canadian aviation document on the grounds that the holder of the document or the owner or operator of any aircraft, airport or other facility in respect of which the document was issued has contravened three times any provision of this Part or any regulation or order made under this Part dealing with noise."

[English]

He said: Madam Speaker, the reason that I moved this motion on behalf of my colleague for Scarborough—Rouge River and members of the Liberal caucus is that the whole question of noise abatement and noise pollution with regard to communities that abut major international airports like the one at Pearson International Airport in metropolitan Toronto is a very serious one.

It is also a very responsible one. You do not hear these communities suggesting that somehow Pearson International Airport is going to shut down or that we are going to go back to the horse drawn cart rather than have the noise of modern aircraft.

Whether you live by an airport or very far from an airport you obviously understand that air travel is not only here to stay but is on the increase because life is increasingly in the fast lane despite the fact that the numbers of travellers are down because of the economic recession and the problems that the airlines face as a result.

Therefore, the purpose of Bill C–5 is to try to come to grips with controlling and managing this because there needs to be a recognition of the vitality of any airport, the multiplier effect that an airport clearly brings to metropolitan Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver, and the needs of a Canadian domestic and international travelling public. We need to balance all those factors with the need for communities to be communities, to allow those neighbourhoods to continue rather than forcing people to pick up and move because of the airport situation.

We have tried to put an amendment through today that speaks to the fact that airlines would be pleased to pay or chance the penalty for violating a noise regulation as part of doing business. It might be profitable for them to simply absorb the penalty or try to appeal the situation because there are many more fines levied than there are actual fines paid.

It was brought to our attention by officials of the Department of Transport that some of the more flagrant abusers are foreign air carriers coming to and going from Pearson International Airport and other airports across the country.

My amendment would suggest that we try to stop and disallow any pattern of behaviour by any airline that wishes to pay the penalty costs regularly as part of doing business at Canadian international airports and therefore run roughshod over the regulations we have to protect the surrounding communities. Specifically my amendment would suggest that on the third noise violation by that one airline, it become mandatory for the minister and the department and indeed the government to simply remove that aviation document from that airline. This would effectively preclude that airline from doing business at that airport in Canada.

We feel that this would be in fact some tough medicine and would send out a very direct and clear message to particularly the foreign aircraft carriers whose regulations may differ with those they may find in Canada. The message is that we want to respect the balance between the vitality of an airport and the vitality of the communities which surround that airport. The minister has the option now to withdraw that document. It is not a mandatory one. It is an optional one.

What we would like to do is simply crystallize that, make it mandatory and begin to discourage any airline from thinking that rather than complying with our noise regulations and our time curfews, it should go ahead, pay the penalty and take a chance because it has a full load and some money in the bank anyway.

What my amendment does is to go beyond simply the minister or the government having the option to exercise some toughness. Obviously there are some special powers that all ministers have over their departments in very special or emergency cases. But we would like to make it part of the new stricter noise regulations that will be flowing from Bill C-5 if it becomes legislation. We would like to take it one step further and remove the potential systematic abuse of noise regulations by airlines which is to the detriment of surrounding communities. According to the evidence of the department this particularly concerns foreign aircraft.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise in support of my colleague's amendment. Very briefly, I just want to point out that as he has already said the monetary fines tend to be more like a licence fee.

We have given the judiciary the power to impose fees of up to $25,000 because of an amendment that was accepted by all parties in committee. I think looking at the record we will find that there were 2,599 complaints received between April 1, 1988 to March 31, 1989. Of these, 1,783 were handled administratively, 78 by judicial action and 738 were concluded with no investigation conducted.

Administrative monetary penalties were assessed in 347 counts with the average penalty being $215. Fines were imposed in 157 counts heard in court. The average fine per count amounted to $314.

In the initial case, $215 is considerably less than the price of almost any ticket flying into Toronto, Mirabel or Dorval. Three hundred and fourteen dollars maybe will be around the cost of a one way ticket flying into or out of any of those three airports. Even where we see a number of $500 fines imposed—this seems to be the more popular number—it costs me more than that to fly from Thunder Bay to Toronto to Ottawa and return.

Clearly the monetary fines that have been applied, even though the ceiling is nowhere near the amount of the fines, have not been sufficiently strong enough to convince the airlines to change their ways.

I think my colleague's amendment is a good move. It would make it mandatory to pull the ticket of an offending airline after it has offended the noise violations on three separate occasions.

The amendment does not say pull the ticket for life. It is not shutting down the airline. The government has the authority to do this now should it wish but it has not. If a ticket is pulled for a day or two I do not think there would be any problem whatsoever down the road.

I believe the airlines would think twice. Whether they are domestic carriers, those that survive, or whether they are international carriers coming into Canada, I believe they would think twice. This would be much the same way I might suggest that the zero tolerance laws regarding drugs allows governments to seize aircraft that have been found carrying drugs or illegal immigrants or what have you into various countries. That quickly puts a stop to that kind of illegal activity.

I would therefore encourage the government to give careful consideration to this power that parliamentarians want to give them so that they can show that they are prepared to get tough with noise polluters at Pearson International Airport, at Mirabel, at Vancouver, at Thunder Bay or at any of the airports where it has been a problem.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): With respect to this particular amendment, my hon. colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan was just mentioning the fines that had been paid and how low they were. Of course this was done because the current threshold is only $1,000 as a maximum.

Under the new legislation, as was pointed out, the fines are going to go up to $25,000. The ability will be there to make them much more of a penalty than what they are today.

The minister now does have the authority to pull the ticket if that is the action that needs to be taken. We feel that leaving it as it is and not putting a three-flight or three-occasion clause in there gives us the ability to do it on the first offence if we find it so necessary. We would prefer to leave it that way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Moore): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Moore): The question is on motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 3 negatived.

Mrs. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Moore): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to address the provisions of Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

At the outset I would like to extend my sincere thanks to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and all the committee members for their diligence shown throughout the sittings and for their proposals to amend this bill in response to the representations that were made to them.

Some of the proposed amendments can be summarized as follows. The maximum penalty for the breach of a designated provision such as noise abatement procedures will be increased both for corporations and for individuals. A new section will be added to authorize the Minister of Transport to make interim orders that will immediately implement urgent safety recommendations received from bodies such as the Transportation Safety Board of Canada. In addition, the Minister of Transport will be given the power to withhold, suspend or cancel a Canadian aviation document when of the opinion that the document holder's past record justifies that action. This closes a loophole that existed in the previous legislation.

Another amendment to the original bill was unanimously agreed to by the members of the committee after representations from several concerned groups. This was ably proposed by my hon. friend opposite, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. This amendment will add a new regulatory authority to the Aeronautics Act to set out the hours of work of crew members, including flight attendants. This move goes some way toward recognizing the important safety functions performed by flight attendants on commercial flights.

Other amendments will correct and update existing provisions in the Aeronautics Act.

The passage of this legislation has been eagerly awaited by the residents living near Canada's major airports, particularly the neighbours of Lester B. Pearson International Airport. In fact, the section of the legislation pertaining to increased fines for noise abatement or flight track infractions stems from extensive consultations with Pearson's neighbours. Municipal leaders and community groups told our officials that a maximum fine of $1,000 was not enough by way of deterrent and we have listened to them.

This bill, as amended, now calls for a maximum fine of $25,000 for corporations and $5,000 for individuals. The corporate ceiling recommended by the standing committee as moved by my colleague the member for St. Catharines is higher than the initial one proposed in Bill C–5. My officials at Pearson advise me that the subject of increased fines is a topic frequently raised at the public meetings that they hold regularly. But increased fines are only part of the solution. At Pearson the most advanced noise–monitoring and flight–tracking system in the world has been installed and is already providing important information. The system will be fully operational when the new air traffic control system is completed.

Pearson's noise management office will have an automatic link between 14 new noise monitors installed in neighbourhoods around the airport and the radar system that tracks aircraft flight paths. In the past we relied primarily on complaints of nearby residents. With the new system, any deviation from approved flight paths or failure to follow the noise abatement procedures will be readily apparent.

I trust that we have also allayed the concerns of those representing the interests of the general aviation field with respect to the transfer of certain zoning authority from federal jurisdiction to provincial jurisdiction.

Another issue that we are pleased with is the support of Canadian air carriers and the Airline Pilots Association for the proposed amendment respecting the making of interim orders to give immediate effect to any recommendation necessary for aviation safety or the safety of the public following an accident or an incident investigation.

One of the concerns raised at the standing committee was the wording and intent of certain amendments proposed in clauses 12 and 13. This is also the subject of the further amendments that were presented to us today and put on the Order Paper as we heard by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

It should first be understood that these particular subclauses in Bill C–5 are consequential amendments of what has been in the original Aeronautics Act since its passage in 1985. In these particular clauses the last subclause provided for a shift in the evidentiary burden to the accused where the regulation allegedly violated has not been published in the Canada Gazette. These subclauses address the situation where the department has taken other steps to bring the regulations to the attention of the accused. My friend from Scarborough—Rouge River gave notice to the amendments to C–5 to delete these two subclauses.

The department has well established practices for communication with the aviation community on regulatory provisions that are legally exempted from the publication requirements of the Statutory Instruments Act. It is the aviation community, as a very specialized and identifiable public, to which these provisions apply and not to the general public.

The primary vehicle for these communications is the notice to airmen, or NOTAM, which is distributed regularly to all licensed pilots and operators and is also made available through air traffic services facilities. The law requires that pilots familiarize themselves with all information appropriate to their intended flights. This includes familiarising themselves with all relevant NOTAMs.

If an accused has a special and unique reason to believe that longstanding government and industry practices which have support in law were not appropriate in the particular case, it is only reasonable that the accused explain what these are.

It is for these reasons that the subsections in question shift the evidentiary burden to the accused. This is in our view entirely appropriate. If evidence exists to demonstrate that reasonable steps were not taken in respect to the accused, he or she would be in the best position to show this and would accordingly be found not guilty of a regulatory violation.

In conclusion, I would once again like to thank the committee members and the associations that appeared before the committee for their very valuable contributions to Bill C–5. I am hopeful that all members of the House will offer their support for this bill as we continue our endeavours to enhance the already commendable level of aviation safety in Canada.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of of the member for Hamilton West and all of my caucus, I am pleased to respond to third reading of Bill C–5.

Essentially it is a bill that has obtained a fair amount of support from all sides. The main feature as the minister noted is the question of increased fines for airlines that abuse our noise regulations. The fines have been increased substantially. That needs to be said. Previous to Bill C–5 the fines stood for both individuals and the major corporations at $1,000.

Through the work of the committee, in conjunction with consultations within the constituency, including community groups, fines for individual small operators were raised to $5,000 and fines for corporations were raised to $25,000.

It is hoped this will discourage airlines which continue and seek to abuse our regulations. It is important to major airports of this country, as it is to airports around the world, for us to strike a balance. We cannot simply close our eyes or plug our ears in the name of advancing the question of air travel in our country or the question of expanding airports or the question of the jobs that come from airports. The fact is airports are here to stay.

Air travel is increasingly becoming popular with more Canadians from coast to coast to coast. That is well understood by communities around the airports and communities not close to the airports. There needs to be a balance to the other aspirations that are also equally important: the families, businesses and residential communities that are located and operate adjacent to international airports.

It is simply unfair for us to respond to those individuals by saying: "If you do not like it and if it is too noisy, just move". That is a glib answer which solves nothing for anyone.

We have to ensure when we plan for our transportation infrastructures, including airports, that those communities have every right to be viable communities like the rest across the country and that those families have every right to enjoy their local parts without being drowned by the constant flights in metro Toronto every 30 seconds. These people have every right to enjoy the aesthetics that are part of our neighbourhoods.

Let us face it, at the end of the working day as the pace of life quickens and as the pace of life becomes more hectic, going home is a moment that people relish. Our homes are our castles. Our homes, on average, are the biggest investments that Canadians will ever make during their working lives. It is more than simply a place to stay; it becomes an escape. It becomes an opportunity for one to go home with one's family, with one's children and relax and enjoy and be prepared and get ready to face the world the next morning. Therefore, we need to be cognizant of and sensitive to those very real and needed aspirations.

When we talk about communities in metropolitan Toronto, we are not only talking about a few small neighbourhoods. The member for Broadview—Greenwood will be seeking the floor in a few moments and is going to tell of his riding which is far east of the airport, but from which complaints are coming that the aircraft are coming in regularly along the Don Valley and causing problems there.

There are problems in the south end of my riding in North York. There are problems in Mississauga. There are problems in Etobicoke. There are problems in Brampton. Pearson International Airport is the flagship airport of our country and is a major player internationally and therefore, quite properly, attracts major clientele from around the globe.

We are not talking about an isolated pocket. We are not talking about being parochial. We are talking about a real live phenomenon which has frustrated many individuals in and around Pearson International Airport.

I believe that when we talk about expansion, when we talk about privatization and when we talk about runways, we also need to talk about and be cognizant of the situation that those neighbourhoods will have to put up with. That is the cost of increasing air travel in and out of Pearson airport.

The airport noise situation and the whole question of the increased fines toward airlines that break those regulations are the centrepieces of Bill C–5.

The minister mentioned that there are a number of applications, for instance, better clarifying the zoning procedures in and around airports for the purpose of the aeronautics bill. It is going to be interesting to see what we do with the new hotel at terminal 3 at Pearson, which is four–stories too tall for the safety of airport travel.

It was also suggested giving the minister, in terms of reacting to calamities that unfortunately befall us from time to time, a quicker response. Rather than waiting for the regulatory process to kick in, a minister on a two-year basis can issue an intermediate response. This is good because I think in times of emergencies and in times of tragedies it is reassuring for a public, a government or a minister to be able to have the tools and the wherewithal to react quickly and succinctly to not only rid ourselves of that problem in the future, but to re-establish confidence and safety among the travelling public.

The question of increased fines is but one factor in a multiplicity of factors that contribute to a complex equation in terms of noise abatement. I appreciate that the minister is here in the House. I put a number of different measures forward at report stage and during committee, amendments that were thought to be outside of the purview of the bill, but I wish to put them back on the agenda as we speak today.

I do not think we should simply forget about these ideas because I do not think we have licked the noise problems with just this one piece of legislation, notwithstanding the fact that it is an improvement in terms of the fines.

One amendment I put forward is a noise insulation program that has worked very well and very effectively in the Denver community. The problem there was becoming quite acute. The situation there was very similar to that of the residents in Mississauga and in my riding where the houses, doors and windows would rattle when aircraft were flying low.

The Denver airport, in conjunction with government officials, basically applied state of the art technology in terms of insulation against the rattling and also abating the noise penetrating these homes and buildings. It has established an insulation program which is an incentive for the local communities to take advantage of.

I read an article in terms of the success the Denver—Stapleton International Airport had. It allows for funding from the government of upward of $7,500. There is a meeting half way between government and community in terms of increasing and adapting technological insulation programs in keeping with the challenges.

In this country in the past we have had incentives in insulation programs. I would suggest that it would not be too far fetched, particularly for communities abutting the major international airports, to take a look at the experiment in Denver and see if we can adapt it. If we could, it would be a win situation. It would be a win for the government which is bombarded constantly with noise problems from communities that have nowhere else to turn.

It would be a win situation for the resident who would be assisted in purchasing that new insulation because the government would come in with some financial assistance. It would also be a win situation for employment and some activity, particularly in the trade sector in and around airports like metropolitan Toronto. We could get some of these contractors working again.

It is a situation which we simply should not just read about in a magazine and forget about. If it works in Denver, and it has had some success and there is going to be some financial commitment, I think there would be rewards for the government in terms of the work related activity and noise reduction. I think the government should seek to take advantage of the situation.

It is a program I recommend to the government to at least consider and study to see if it is something we might be able to adapt to our situation. If the Americans can make it work in Denver then I think Canadians can make it work in Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal.

I also had an amendment at report stage. I thought it would be good to have in our books on a mandatory basis the situation that would preclude an airline from thinking that it can simply run roughshod over our noise regulations and simply charge it as a price of doing business. For some major airlines or individuals perhaps $25,000 or $10,000 is a huge sum, and I do not want to belittle that.

For major international corporations, American or others, travelling around the clock to every corner of the world, perhaps it is not as big a bottom line as it is for individuals. Therefore there have been occasions, according to answers provided to us in committee by officials of the Department of Transport, in which airlines have taken the attitude of simply ignoring the fees or charges that would be levied against them for that violation and would simply charge it up as part of doing business, assuming they have a full load and are making a good profit which means they will simply take it off the top.

I was suggesting that if an airline committed three violations against our noise standards and regulations, it would trigger a loss of its travelling document, its right to operate in and around our Canadian airports.

I think that would provide some teeth and a signal to send to aircraft carriers, particularly to foreign carriers which are the bulk of them, as we were told at committee. It would show that we are not taking things lightly when talking about the important balance between airports and communities around those airports. Some of these carriers operate in countries where there are no environmental or noise standards, and we ought to have them respect the decisions that we have taken for our own citizenry and respect them in a way that we will not be having a flagrant systematic abuse of our laws.

The minister right now, without Bill C–5, can obviously remove one's document after the first violation. The minister made mention of that. There is a great difference between an option and a mandatory reaction to an action. I was hoping that the minister and the government might see fit, in order to strengthen the teeth that we have in order to get these foreign air carriers to comply with our standards, to make it mandatory. I am hoping that the minister and government are serious that if there are airlines that make it a practice to break our laws, we will be tough with them. The reality is that very few of the airlines that been fined have paid for those fines. The people who pay for that in the end are Canadians who live around those airports and have to put up with a lot of noise and air pollution which they feel is absolutely unfair.

Another issue that I put forward comes from consulting with communities in Brampton, Etobicoke, Mississauga and North York, for which I give them credit, and that is to use the moneys or part of the moneys that we will be getting from these fines and channel them back into the local communities in order to come up with better noise abatement procedures or to basically reinvest them in the fight against airport noise.

It was very similar to the efforts of our colleagues on this side of the House in terms of the many petitions that we are gathering, myself included, and in terms of the confiscation of drugs. Not all those moneys go back to general revenues in Ottawa where you never see them again, but they somehow find themselves rechannelled back to the local police and the local organizations responsible for the real fight against drugs.

Taking a page from that book, we are advocating that if we are going to increase the fines levied against the airlines, and if we are serious about having those airlines pay those fines, it would be a novel idea to somehow, with proper accountability, use some of those moneys that have come from noise violators to advance the cause for a better system at the airport to monitor and to fight those noise violations.

I thought it was a novel idea. I thought it showed good faith on behalf of the communities, and I thought it would have showed good faith on the part of the government to say: "Those moneys are not going to go in some black hole, but because of the fact that they have been raised through noise violations, we will be pumping those moneys, or part of those moneys, back to the problem so that hopefully with the passage of time the situation will be ameliorated rather than aggravated".

A further point that we advanced in terms of an amendment was one that we also had recommended as part of a metropolitan Toronto Liberal caucus task force several years back, two years to be precise. The Liberal members of Parliament from metropolitan Toronto and area came up with what I thought was a very articulate and creative set of recommendations for the government in terms of combating and managing the problem of not only airport expansion but airport noise. One of the central recommendations that we put forward was the creation of an airport ombudsman, for lack of a better title.

The frustration we have right now is that when there is a noise violation and when a constituent or an individual homeowner wishes to complain, they usually pick up the telephone and one of two things happens. Either the line on the other end is busy or they get to talk to a tape recorder or an answering machine. That obviously causes a great deal of frustration because once again the complaint goes nowhere, the frustration and anxiety of a community increase, the confrontation therefore between that community and the airport or the airport manager is heightened and you have a situation that obviously spells some doom and gloom.

What we are talking about is the management of the problem, managing the reality of the noise complaints that invariably will come with the likes of an operation with the capacity of Pearson International Airport.

What we are talking about is being realistic. We did not wish to create titles for the sake of creating titles or spend money for the sake of spending money. What we wanted to do was improve the system. We wanted to improve the response. We wanted to let people know that somehow there was someone on the other end of the system cognizant of that frustration who could react to it. We wanted to systematically put something in place that would respond to it generically, rather than a tape recorder taking the distraught message at two o'clock in the morning that the windows were shattering because some airplane from Jamaica was coming in once again at Pearson International Airport.

If you are talking into a machine what is going to preclude another airliner, the next morning at two o'clock, from doing the same thing?

You have a situation in which there is a sense of helplessness out there. It is not only in this problem. It is basically rampant across the country in terms of that one citizen saying "What can we do in face of the system? Why should I vote? Does it make any difference?"

This ombudsman position would be symbolizing that the complaints are important because they will be monitored and become part of something or a pattern that we need to analyse and dissect in order to make life a little easier for those surrounding communities.

We talked about that in a task force report two years ago and I reintroduced the amendment at committee stage. It was ruled out of order in terms of being outside the purview of the bill, but once again I appeal to the minister and to the government benches not to lose sight of that role. It would not only help the people living around the airport but it would improve the administration and the headaches that the airport manager at Pearson International Airport has to deal with each and every day.

The other fact of life is the whole question of curfews. In a letter to me dated October 25 the Minister of State for Transport responded to my letter which I had raised on behalf of constituents in York West in terms of the noise problem. She said: "I must stress that there are no curfew hours at Pearson airport. However, large air carrier jet operations are restricted between midnight and seven in the morning".

There is a debate on whether curfews should be mandatory at an airport like Pearson. I fall on the side that they should. The line is that certain kinds of aircraft generation, the more modern ones, are more silent or quieter than the large DC–8 stretches. They are.

An average homeowner living around an airport has not seen an airplane yet that does not make a lot of noise. That is a fact of life. Because of the different generations of planes some are permitted to land between midnight and seven o'clock in the morning. Therefore it causes problems on a practical basis.

Individuals are awakened in the middle of the night on a regular basis by aircraft for one reason or another coming in at all the wee hours of the night. If we put ourselves in the shoes of those homeowners who need to get up at six in the morning to go and make an honest living, it would not be too much of a pleasure to get up at two, three, or four o'clock in the morning because of a number of aircraft coming in.

I ask the minister once again to take a hard look at the whole question of night curfews.

Canadians living around the airport understand situations such as an emergency landing, an extraordinary situation in which a plane is unable to take off from point a or needs to land in point b, or a situation involving the Red Cross. What they do not understand are situations which sometimes become more than the exception. To some of them aircraft travelling at all hours of the morning looks like the rule more than the exception.

I stress that we need to re–examine the whole question of curfews and whether they ought to be more strictly applied. I believe that the evidence points toward a much stricter enforcement of a curfew at the major international airports.

Another method of trying to manage the noise is the fair alternation, particularly at Pearson International Airport, of planes landing and taking off at the various runways. If I could take a moment to simply localize the problem, it is one that is particularly felt in the south end of my riding.

Whenever planes use runway 24L–06R as opposed to 24R–06L it means that the aircraft only fly over the Humberlea community, which is the whole south end of my riding. Those residents have not been asking for the elimination of 24L, the elimination of planes landing there when wind conditions are such that they have no other alternative, or the elimination of emergency landings on 24L. They are asking for a more or less equal alternation between 24L and 24R so that we are sharing the burden of the noise, rather than simply localizing it over one area.

There is no secret why a lot of aircraft use 24L. It happens to be the runway that is closest to the terminal. I know that aircraft wish to reduce their fuel consumption by taxiing for two minutes rather than 15 minutes. I understand that aircraft want to provide maximum convenience to their passengers by getting them into the terminal in under five minutes rather than taxiing for 15 minutes.

What the airport, the department and the airlines also have to understand is that if we are always going to land predominantly over one runway it means that one section of the entire affected area has the problem. That is unfair.

It is like taxes. Why is there a tax revolt? It is in part because taxes are a bit too high, they are up to here and we are living to pay government. However, there is also a feeling that some people are not pulling their weight and that some are pulling more than others. We are all prepared to pay our fair share, but when someone or some group does not that is when you get a revolt. Some of the shoulders of the working middle class are feeling inordinately heavier at this time.

It is the same in this situation. Why should the community of Humberlea in North York be saddled with most of the problem when we can to try share the problem of airport noise?

I have written the minister a number of times. I am pleased that she has responded, but the problem still exists. We need the minister and the department to strictly enforce the requirement with air traffic controllers and airline captains that there be an alternation between our runways and that planes not necessarily get to the terminal by the quickest and cheapest way. That is only one side of the equation. The other side happens to be the people who are burdened with the by–product of that noise problem.

I wish to thank the community groups that have come forward and testified. I would particularly like to thank Mr. John Doherty of the Council of Concerned Citizens, the Etobicoke Federation of Residents and Ratepayers Association, and acknowledge the concern that also has been expressed by groups in Mississauga and Humberlea, Mr. Gilbert Parrotta from the Humberlea Community Association, as well as Jack Sweet and Ted Wray from the Oakdale Residents Association. They have been vigilant in the face of a parliamentary secretary who dishonoured himself with a constant barrage of questions to these community groups, questioning their legitimacy or credibility, as did some officials of the department.

There was an article in The Mississauga News on October 16 in which the Director of Communications for Pearson International Airport, Mr. David Austin, basically inferred that it is: "Only a small clique of people who have problems with respect to noise", inferring that the majority around the airport are happy.

I can say that both the parliamentary secretary, with his cavalier attitude, and Mr. Austin, with this kind of allegation, are dead wrong. These community organizations have no vested interest other than that of representing the views, on a voluntary basis, of their neighbours and their communities. They have come forward in good faith to represent those individuals and get a fair shake. That is all they ask; no special treatment, just a fair shake.

On the Liberal side we not only accepted their testimony but asked them to testify. For a parliamentary secretary to question the credibility of community organizations at every turn does not do justice to a government that says that it wishes to consult the public about all issues and decisions it has to take.

In summing up, I would like to say that Bill C-5, concerning the fines levied against airlines for noise violations, is good. However, that is only one aspect of a much wider battle we must wage in the war against airport noise for the benefit of Canadians who happen to have their castles in the communities that make up the hinterland of an airport.

We also need to take time when discussing airport expansion, management and transportation to be cognizant of those taxpayers. They are being fair and are being responsible. They are not asking for the demise of air travel. They are not asking for Pearson to close. They are simply asking us where we can, in whatever way we can, to balance the needs of a very complex society between the users of the airports and the residents who happen to live them.

I do not think that it is not an unfair request nor does it mean that it is impossible to come up with a solution. I think we are talking about the elements of a solution. It behoves Parliament and the government to look at them.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on third reading of Bill C-5, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

I do so as a member of the Standing Committee on Transport which had the responsibility to review this legislation. At the outset I would like to echo the comments of the Minister of State for Transport and compliment my colleagues from all parties on that committee. I think we proved once again that Parliament and the parliamentary system can work.

The government brought forward a piece of legislation that was good to begin with. It had some flaws. We were able to correct one of those flaws by agreement of members of the committee. A clause that would have reduced the amount of notice for objections was returned to the original time period of 60 days to deal with the realities of northern Canada for the benefit of aviation operators up there who needed the extra time to find out what changes the government was making.

As has been pointed out, we also increased the level of fines for corporations that violate, among other things, noise pollution guidelines. We attempted to reduce the fine to the individual because so often the individual is really just following company policy. If it is a pilot who is being told to ensure on-time delivery or being told by the company: "We do not care what the rules are, you have to land after a certain time or land more quickly" we did not feel that the level of punishment was appropriate. However, the government rejected that change. It did agree to increase the fine to $25,000.

The one change that really proves that this place can work is the one in which we, by unanimous consent, agreed to consider an amendment that was beyond the scope of the bill but was wanted by all parties, the government, and certainly by airline employees. That is a decision to give the government the right to regulate the hours of work of flight attendants. Currently the government has the right to regulate the hours of work of the front-end crew—the pilots, the engineers, the people who drive the plane—and it does that. It has prescribed a maximum work day of 15 hours.

Unfortunately flight attendants are not currently regulated. As we have found out, the flight attendants' prime responsibility is not the serving of food and drinks but ensuring our safety during take off and landing, both in terms of the in-cabin requirements of baggage stowage so that we have proper egress in the event of an emergency and making sure that we are wearing our seat belts, but also during an emergency landing and evacuation when it is their job to get us out of that plane safely.

I want to put on the record two examples that show why regulation is needed and why we cannot leave it to the collective agreement process to decide on these matters.

The first is the case of Nationair 10. On December 3, 1990 Nationair flight 680 left Mirabel at 0900 hours. It arrived at Fort Lauderdale at 1230. This aircraft and its crew were scheduled to begin the return flight to Mirabel at 1430 and finally arrived at Mirabel at approximately 1730 on the same day. This would have meant a total duty day of about 9.5 hours.

The return flight was boarded in Fort Lauderdale at 1400 hours. The captain then announced a 45-minute delay because extra meals had to be brought aboard as there were more passengers than expected. It was not long before passengers noticed mechanics working on one of the engines. This began a series of events that led to the flight attendants determining that they were too fatigued to handle safety situations properly. This was partially due to the extreme agitation and stress symptoms being exhibited by the passengers as well as by their own physical state and exhaustion. It was aggravated by the pilot's own lack of understanding of the situation and his state of mind, probably brought on by his extremely long duty day.

The crew had spent the entire day on duty dealing with concerned and agitated passengers. The passengers were boarded and deplaned three times in total and they were kept for most of the time on board an aircraft that had no air conditioning. They were also not informed of the real reasons for the delay.

As a result, the passengers were extremely agitated on a number of occasions. Some became so overwrought that they were literally screaming to be let off. Some, in their eagerness to get off, left without their luggage. Others waited on the jet way, smoking. By the time the captain ordered the crew to shut the doors and leave behind any passengers not aboard the aircraft this particular pilot had already been on duty for at least 16.5 hours. He had a further three to four hours ahead of him. He was in a very stressed condition. Some flight attendants were so concerned about his ability to make decisions that this became a major reason for their refusal to operate the flight.

It subsequently was revealed that the flight was not mechanically fit to leave in any event. The mechanical problem was serious enough that specialized help was needed and the engine could not be fixed until the next day. The departure would have also violated security regulations specifying that luggage had to match the passengers on board. A number of passengers had already left the airport and the pilot wanted to leave others standing on the jet way while their luggage was still on board.

After exercising their right to refuse when they were ordered by their pilot to work a total of 18.5 hours, and possibly more, in a single continuous duty period, the 10 flight attendants were fired. Nationair is now suing each of them for the amount of money it claimed to have lost because of their refusal to work, over $120,000 each.

That is one example of the realities of the industry that demonstrates why it cannot be left to the collective agreement process to provide protection, not just for the workers but for all who travel, whether it is on Nationair, Air Canada, Canadian or what have you.

The second example I want to read into the record is dated January 1990. It is a letter addressed to the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the Ministry of Transport, as well as to another individual.

• (1350)

To Whom It May Concern:

I am writing to you with safety concerns of a flight I operated earlier this month.

On January 8, I was scheduled to work Vancouver to Honolulu, check in was 8.15 a.m. At approximately 2030 on January 7, I received a call from Crew Scheduling informing me that I would now be deadheading to Winnipeg, working Winnipeg to Vancouver, then Vancouver to Honolulu, and that the flight was departing at 3.15 a.m. January 8. Briefing at 2.15, less than six hours notice. By the time I packed and made two phone calls it was 2130. I fell asleep sometime after 2230, and had to wake at 1 a.m. The Winnipeg flight was two hours and twenty minutes of which I dozed for, at the most one and a half hours.

When landing in Vancouver, and finding out that the company had no intention of replacing us, my thought was that I would not make it. We took off from Vancouver at 11 a.m. I almost fell asleep in my jumpseat. Three hours into the flight, I felt like I was in a dream, everything was in slow motion. If there had been a fire, or a medical emergency, I really don't know how fast I could have reacted. By the time we landed in Honolulu, I had at the most 4 hours sleep in 32 hours. I thought to myself: "Please get us down safely". It was all I could do to stay awake.

It is frightening to experience feeling totally useless when you know that a lot of lives could depend on you. What is even more frightening is knowing that the front end crew were also in the same situation. After the flight I asked them how much sleep they had, the flight engineer said 2 hours.

I feel we were lucky this time, but when will our luck run out? At what cost are we placing our passengers' lives? I'm sure you will recognize this situation as a potential safety hazard and do everything you can to prevent it from happening again.

The transport committee and this House has acted. I say thanks on behalf of all of those men and women who look after our safety in the skies and on the ground for the work that they do in protecting us. I say thanks to the House of Commons, the minister, her staff, the department and the Official Opposition for accepting my motion to give the government the power to regulate hours of work of flight attendants. It is in our own best interests.

I have one final comment. The next step in this after the other place considers this bill is the drafting of regulations. I know that will be a matter of negotiations between the Air Transport Association, Canadian Union of Public Employees and the Government of Canada.

I would urge the other place to give speedy passage to Bill C-5. I would urge the minister and her staff to give speedy consideration to the negotiation of the hours of work of the flight attendants because it is in all of our interests that that law be put in place as quickly as possible and the regulations that implement it be drafted and gazetted. We know that will take some time but the sooner we get at it the better it will be because we do not want this question at the bargaining table. I have already been told that Air Canada is planning on trying to negotiate a longer length of day at the next round in September.

The clock is ticking. I urge the government to act very quickly.

Once again I say thanks. It has really been a good day for Parliament and an even better day for airline employees.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House leaders that I will be very brief. I will try and make this less than two minutes because I respect the fact that we are trying to get this bill through the House of Commons by 1 p.m.

I do want to support everything that the Minister of Transport has said today as well as my colleague for York South—Weston and the member from the New Democratic Party. But I must put on the record that the problems with noise abatement are not just with our major airports in this country.

In my particular riding the problem that we are having now is that planes are coming to the Island Airport and they are using the Don Valley Parkway which is a body of land almost right through the centre of our city. Many residents are complaining that there is a lot of attention given to the noise problems at Lester B. Pearson while the problems in terms of noise and hours of work at some of the smaller airports are being forgotten. I would appeal to the minister who has put this bill through the House so efficiently to not forget the smaller airports such as the Toronto Island Airport where we are getting an overabundance of planes early in the morning and late at night. As you know, that artery goes right through the centre of a heavily populated urban area. So I am going to be happy to report to my citizens' group this weekend that thanks to the efficiency of this House the bill went through in one day, a couple of hours. That should make a lot of people very happy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Moore): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Moore): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-34, an act to revise and amend the law governing co-operative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the third time and passed.

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): It is with great pleasure once again that I return to the four bills which are before us. The bills of course are C–4, C–19, C–28 and C–34. They are bills which relate to the regulations and rules which will redefine the powers and ownership structures of Canadian financial institutions.

We are looking at some major legislation here which had a beginning back in 1985 through the report of the McDougall green paper, in 1986 with the Hockin blue paper, the draft trust bill which was in December of 1987 and furthermore the Canadian Senate report of 1992 which was titled Towards a National Market and Finance Services.

Previously I had said that this is a bill where we put our best minds together, supposedly where we worked on the studying of 2,428 clauses relating to these four bills and where we had a great deal of potential to actually create a major improvement in the way we regulate financial institutions.

An hon. member: We did.

Mr. Edmonston: I hear already from the other side from the hon. member for Mississauga East, I believe, that we did. I disagree. I think we did not. I think we had a great chance to show average Canadians that we were on their side. Unfortunately we came up with mediocre legislation. As a matter of fact I was referring to how my colleague, the member for Nickel Belt, had referred to the member for Mississauga. The member for Mississauga had been the chairman of the committee. He was dressed—I am speaking rhetorically—in his wizard's costume with his wizard's hat. He churned the cauldron in order to make this brew for financial regulations. He said that we could not put anything more into it and that these changes would not be allowed. "We do not want to have pro–Canadian consumer type legislation".

• (1400)

I am sure my hon. colleague will say: "Now wait a minute, Phil, it is a question of who you consider to be consumers. Trust companies and banks and such institutions are consumers and we have to look out for their interests as well." To a certain extent I would say that is true but I believe that the interests we are looking out for mainly are not the consumers' interests but in a very large sense—larger than necessary—they are the interests of the large corporations.

It seems that the elephant has given birth to a mouse and the mouse is a very mediocre one at that. I do want to say some positive things though about the bill because there are some things that are good in it.

We welcome Bill C–34 which is an act to revise and amend the law governing co–operative credit associations. Coming from Quebec it would be unthinkable to be against a bill which would improve the situation of our caisses populaires for example.

[Translation]

I was quite surprised and pleased that a few of my colleagues pointed out that the caisses populaires are not limited to Quebec. The caisses populaires movement and Mr. Rouleau's group also exist in all the other provinces.

An hon. member: There are also the Caisses Populaires Desjardins.

Mr. Edmonston: Yes, I know. But for the caisses populaires in general, I understand that 1,400 branches hold assets of nearly $44 billion. Moreover, the caisses populaires are the largest employer in Quebec.

It is for that reason I congratulate the government on its efforts to regulate the caisses populaires so as to better harmonize their activities, and make them more deeply rooted in the community.

We support the clauses of the bill that deal with consumer protection and the way that the review committee or the protection committee, which is called the audit committee, was set up. It is good that some regulations stipulate that the majority of the members of these committees must not be affiliated with the company's directors.

We are especially pleased to see that the members of this review committee or shareholders interest protection committee are independent individuals, because that is extremely important. Madam Speaker, I do not know if you ever attended a board of directors meeting as a shareholder and were not overly pleased with the information that you got from so–called independent individuals, from people who could have informed you on the financial condition of your organization—maybe it is a caisse populaire, I do not know—because the people who provided you with the information and the organization itself were not independent or open enough.

I believe that we have really taken a step forward with this bill in that the people who will inform us of the true condition of these financial institutions must have a certain independence.

There are some good things in these four bills that deal with financial institutions, but there are also certain flaws. My political party and I, as a member of Parliament, are not at all pleased that this reform plan contained in the four bills fails to deal with the harmonization of our domestic markets and our regulatory authorities, which are fragmented.

I think that because of deregulation, we are seeing a kind of wheeling and dealing between jurisdictions. Madam Speaker, I know you are aware of the differences between the way federal and provincial jurisdictions approach financial institutions. Sometimes the companies end up totally confused. Federal regulations are so strict that these companies do not know what to do, and sometimes they practically have to seek the protection of various provincial jurisdictions. For instance, in Quebec the regulations for insurance companies are not the same as the federal regulations.

This is not to say that one is better than the other, but there are differences. There is no harmonization, and it is because of this lack of harmonization that insurance companies or other companies may face a lot of problems. I find that intolerable, especially considering the increased emphasis on sensible consultation. It is quite simple, really. We just put our heads together and say: Well, how can we accommodate the companies? Can we accommodate the wishes and the needs of the general public and at the same time protect the public?

I think we can, but in this bill—actually we are talking about four different bills—we have failed to harmonize what should have been harmonized. I think we could have done better. For instance, in addition to the bills that have already been introduced, this government could have introduced a bill that would allow banks to sell insurance. This is no big deal! In Quebec, they have been doing it for ages at the Caisses Populaires Desjardins. They sell insurance.

As a former president of the Automobile Protection Association, I supported the Mouvement Desjardins in this respect because I thought it would make the industry more competitive in Quebec and, as a result, reduce the cost of insurance—yes, competitive—and also make all parties in the insurance industry more responsive to their customers.

That is exactly what happened. It didn't happen overnight, but for almost ten years, the Caisses Populaires Desjardins have been competing in the insurance industry because in Quebec, they are allowed to sell insurance contracts, including automobile insurance, to their customers. A number of my constituents in Chambly wrote to tell me they felt prices were very competitive at the Caisses Populaires Desjardins, and they were also very satisfied with the service they received. Even when they compared the Caisses Populaires with insurance companies elsewhere, they felt it was very healthy to have the caisses populaires compete in the insurance sales field.

Interestingly the predecessor of these four bills was Bill C-93, which ended up being split into the bills now before the House: C-4, C-19, C-28 and C-34.

I may have given the wrong number for the bill, and the hon. member for Mississauga may be able to help me shortly. Originally there was a clause to allow banks to sell insurance, and I hope that my colleague will agree with me, because I read it. They had the right to sell insurance. But today, I do not know, maybe because of our sorcerer's apprentice with his sort of soup made in a cauldron, we do not have this clause to allow banks to sell insurance. I am disappointed, because people often say that is plain common sense. Even we in the NDP would like to see competition and we found it was an excellent suggestion from the federal government, from this government, to have a clause in this bill allowing banks to sell insurance, because the Caisses Populaires Desjardins have not abused their right to sell it. Service has improved as a result of this competition. But unfortunately somewhere, for some reason, I do not know, this government which advocates and wants to promote competition and to protect consumers has refused to allow banks to sell insurance to their customers.

An hon. member: Fortunately.

Mr. Edmonston: One of my Liberal colleagues says "fortunately". I think that it is unfortunate. If it works well in Quebec, it can also work well in other places. It is plain common sense, no more and no less.

We could have done better, as one of my colleagues already pointed out. We could have required credit card issuers to calculate interest differently, in the way that the hon. member for Mississauga suggested to us in his Bill C-236, I believe. This bill would have credit card issuers calculate interest only on the unpaid balance rather than on the whole amount borrowed. This means that if you owed $500 on a credit card and paid $250, the issuer could charge interest only on the unpaid $250.

An hon. member: They wanted to do that!

Mr. Edmonston: No, they did not want to do that. It is too pro-consumer, too revolutionary, if I may say so. It may have been too NDP for this government, I do not know. I would say that their approach does not make much sense, since most of our constituents are in favour of our proposal. I am sure that most hon. members agree that when the government proposed these four bills to protect us, to help us, to regulate financial institutions, it forgot to protect the people at the bottom. Is it an oversight? I prefer to say that it is. I am not talking about the banks and other financial institutions; I am talking about people like us who use credit cards.

Even if we pay $250 on a total of $500, we still have to pay interest on that $500 today. That is disgusting, unacceptable, anti-consumer, illogical and unfortunately, it is really sad to see a government omit or overlook such a thing.

[English]

I am disappointed by these four proposed bills. I compared rhetorically my hon. colleague, to the grand wizard putting into his cauldron, his soup, all these different resolutions, all these 2,400 and some clauses, supposedly harmonizing the system, which it does not. I believe it creates a more favourable atmosphere for the large corporations to merge. Rather than making the system work better, I think it is going to work less so.

The government could have done better. It could have done much more to protect both institutions as well as everyday Canadians. I am sad because I think the bill had great potential. We could have done so many things and we did not.

The government is always asking: "NDP, Edmonston, Audrey McLaughlin, give us some examples. What would you do?"

Initially I said I would lower interest rates. I would lower interest rates on credit cards. Take a look at the credit cards. The minister said he had. He did no such thing. Take a look at the prime. The prime has hit an 18 year low. It is low. What are credit cards at?

When the minister of consumer affairs is asked what he is going to do about the difference in credit card interest rates and the prime rate, which is over 10 percentage points, the minister says—now follow me because this is logic which I am not quite sure I understand; it is very short, I am just giving a resume here—"The costs associated with their use are varied and complex and consumers should consider other more favourable forms of credit".

An hon. member: Like what?

Mr. Edmonston: Is that not throwing in the towel? Is that not saying: "I am sorry, I am the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but really I am the minister of corporate affairs". That is what he is saying. "I cannot help you. Go someplace else".

Finally what I am saying, Madam Speaker, is that the government could have done much more. It could have been much more evolutionary. I am not even asking it to be revolutionary. When we look at Bill C-4, Bill C-19, Bill C-28, and Bill C-34, unfortunately the government elephant laboured long and hard but it gave birth to a mouse and a mediocre one at that.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from the riding of Malpeque on her hard work, along with other members of the committee from all sides of the House, as well as her work with the government side in order to make sure that this bill will become a reality.

For the record I would like to give her credit for her work, especially in the area of consumer protection, to ensure that there is a complaint mechanism put in as part of this bill. I would like to congratulate the government on adopting this proposal in their bill.

As a result, we have a fairly good bill that, hopefully, the House will approve and send to the Senate as quickly as possible.

Having said that, Madam Speaker, I discussed with the hon. member her views on this proposal and asked her about some of the amendments she tried to introduce. She brought to my attention a fairly impressive amendment. I would like to say that I was somewhat surprised that the government would decide not to proceed with her proposal.

• (1420)

The amendment deals with the use of plain language when it comes to trust companies or banking industries putting out information to the consumers or to their customers. I understand that the government is resisting because it feels it might be a little late to adopt such a proposal.

I would like to suggest that perhaps while the bill is on its way to the Senate the government side could consult with the Senate and make sure that it adopts such a good, interesting and very well balanced proposal.

I would suggest that my colleague from Malpeque, Prince Edward Island does her research very well. Obviously she has looked at other places here in Canada as well as in North America before she made her proposal. She informed me that Alberta already has legislation on the books although there is still a bit of work to be done before it will become an effective law. Also she has informed me that in New York there has been legislation which allows the use of plain language and it seems to be working extremely well.

I am quite surprised that the government decided not to adopt such a proposal in light of the fact that more and more the Canadian public is aware of the need for plain language, whether we are talking about politicians communicating with their constituents or whether we are talking about regulations being put into place.

The reason why that use of plain language is extremely important is because, as you know, Madam Speaker, with an illiteracy rate of approximately 38 to 40 per cent, one could not help but say: "The least we can do, when we are trying to communicate with the people and make their life a little simpler, is provide them with information that is useful and that can be read easily".

Having said that, I would like to move on now to speak about banking and its relationship with consumers and the financial situation that we are faced with here in Canada. I cannot help but address the question of the over-all picture rather than focusing on the narrow end of what we have before us in terms of legislation.

The legislation is good. The proposal is excellent. We would like to see amendments made to it but if that is not feasible perhaps over the next few years we will be able to deal with those amendments in a little more effective way. However, we have to look at what we have before us in terms of the industry and its relation to consumers.

First I would like to say that we should be all very happy and optimistic about the fact that our banking industry is one of the best banking industries in North America, perhaps anywhere around the world. All of the credit should go both to regulators as well as to the industry itself. The industry has played a leadership role in weeding out any kind of potential difficulties. The regulators have been working in conjunction with the industry over the years trying to co-operatively come up with proposals that are not only satisfactory to the banking industry but also protect the interests of consumers.

What we have seen with the government proposal is another good example of the co-operative work that has taken place between both the private sector and the government sector in this field.

Looking at the banking situation or the financial situation I cannot help but look at the people who are using our banking industry over the past few months and indicate that there is a reason for us to stop and take note of the kind of difficulties that exist out in the community.

Going back just a little to November 20, I would like to bring to your attention a statement made by Canada's chief financial services regulator who appeared to be a little pessimistic about the weak economy. In his speech Mr. Mackenzie, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, told his audience that due to the situation in housing, real estate and retailing, "there is a deep pessimism going through the banking community that I work with".

I thought at the time it was a rather strange coincidence that if we have to paint a realistic picture of what is going on, if we have to build public confidence, if we have to move aggressively in controlling inflation and reducing interest rates and injecting more life into the economy, that a statement like this would be made.

I put my hand on a piece of information that was published by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It deals with bankruptcies for the month of October 1991. During that month, you will be unhappy to learn, we had a total of 974 bankruptcies. That includes areas such as the manufacturing industry, construction, transportation, storage, communications and other utility industries, the wholesale trade industry, industries that deal with retail sales as well as business service industries, among others. In fact, there is in excess of about 20 different groups.

The annual bankruptcies to date are about 8,000, of which approximately 1,800 have taken place in the retail industries. There is in excess of 1,200 in the construction industry, about 700 in the manufacturing industry, 474 in the business service industry and so on.

I took those figures and I thought well, these seem to be the major areas where we have large numbers of companies going bankrupt. In particular, the bankruptcies are in the construction and manufacturing industries. I compared it to the statement which was made by Michael Mackenzie, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, that there seemed to be a deep pessimism going through the banking community. I think he was referring to the fact that there are a large number of bankruptcies taking place in those industries that really deal with banking. As you know, Madam Speaker, when an industry manufactures wood or steel or whatever component that is to be used in the construction industry, the construction industry will build homes and the consumer will go out and buy those homes. As a result of that, he or she might go to a bank in order to borrow money.

So the wheel of the Canadian economy in a lot of ways is as good as the wheel of the construction industry as well as industry as a whole. So whenever there is a deficiency in the construction industry, you will know that is a bad indication and is a cause for alarm.

As I mentioned, I looked at those figures and I went to a fairly recent report published by the Economic Council of Canada to look at the exports and export-dependent employment dynamic services here in Canada. I looked at the export share of total output in terms of the percentage.

To give an indication, when we look at areas such as rail, truck and other transportation and storage industries and combine the total in those areas in terms of employment, in excess of 60 per cent of all jobs are export related jobs.

If we look at bankruptcies in Canada, in the transportation industry as well as related industries, we find that out of about 8,000 industries about 600 have gone bankrupt.

Moving on to wholesale and trade, there is about 11.8 per cent export share of total output in terms of jobs in the export trade. The total number of industries in the retail sector that went under is about 1,800, that is out of about 8,000 bankruptcies so far in the industry.

By looking at those two components by themselves, one can see immediately that many of those companies which trade internationally are creating jobs locally. When those corporations are having difficulties and are going under, automatically the jobs that are provided by those companies are going to disappear.

All I wanted to do was give an idea of the fact that while there are a large number of jobs here in Canada that depend to a large extent on the amount of trade our industries are doing abroad, the better we equip those industries to do well abroad, the more protection we will have for the jobs here in Canada.

The bankruptcy figures show that a large number of corporations are going under and the other book which was published by the Economic Council of Canada, 1990, indicated the vast majority of those jobs actually deal with exports. We will automatically come to the conclusion that in order for us to deal with the socio-economic problem we presently have here in Canada, we have to improve the situation for those very same companies that are trading abroad.

That brings me to the nasty subject of the high dollar value. I would suggest that we could spin our wheels for as long as we want, but unless we come up with a proper policy that deals with or balances the value of the Canadian dollar as well as the inflation in Canada, we are not going to be able in the short term to turn the wheel of the economy in such a way that we can move forward and address the question of high unemployment and the question of slow economic growth.

To that extent there is a direct correlation between economic renewal here in Canada and the reduction of the value of the dollar so we can allow those companies to compete internationally and protect those jobs.

In the city of Ottawa, for example, if we look at the figures from January to October 1990, we had approximately 1,230 bankruptcies.

An hon. member: That is a shame.

Mr. Harb: My colleague from Toronto says it is a shame. It is a shame. The picture gets even more bleak when it is compared to 1991. Here in our region we had in excess of 1,748 bankruptcies. That is an excess of 500 more bankruptcies than we had last year.

In the province of Ontario in the past 12 months, from November 1990 to October 1991, there were a total of 25,414 bankruptcies.

The picture in Ontario is no different from the picture all across Canada. For example, for the same period you will be disappointed to learn that over the past 12 months, from November of 1990 to October 1991, we had in Canada in excess of 64,052 bankruptcies. That is not a good picture.

I do not like to bring bad news always to the attention of the Canadian public or to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Commons, but I want to take this opportunity to say that while the federal government has a responsibility to address the value of the Canadian dollar and balance it with a controlled inflation rate, I want to turn a little bit to the province of Ontario. The government has done a disastrous job when it comes to dealing with a proper strategy for proper economic growth in the province of Ontario.

Last month, for example, Ontario business bankruptcies soared to a dismal 315 after a slight decline in September, and personal bankruptcies jumped to 2,782 from a 2,369 figure a month before. The total bankruptcies have increased by up to 17.4 per cent.

If you ask me why that is, I would say that there is only one simple reason: the NDP government of Ontario has deceived the people of Ontario on two fronts. Going into the election, it promised the world to the people of Ontario, with the hope that the people of Ontario believed it and saw in it an alternative at the time. Were they ever deceived. The government had a majority and as a result of that the business community had a lot of issues, a lot of bones to pick with the government.

The government as soon as it was elected had a look at the situation and said "We cannot deliver". That is fine if it came to the public and told the public that it cannot deliver on promises it made. As a result, the business community could move on with the realization that the NDP government of Ontario, which misled the electorate in the past election, cannot deliver on its promises. The business community could start investing in Ontario.

As it is now, it is a catch–22 for the business community. On the one hand, it is not too sure about what to expect from the province of Ontario and so it is not investing. On the other hand, on a daily basis we are seeing bankruptcy after bankruptcy taking place all across this province.

It is time for the government of Ontario to stand up and tell the people of Ontario that it is not going to be able to deliver on the promises made in the past election: "We fooled you".

The end result is that we could perhaps, as one of the largest provinces in this country and as one of the provinces that used to be one of the richest in this country, get on with our lives, both as the public and as the business community, and start investing in the economy.

I am saying all of this to demonstrate that by no means can we just blame the federal government for the lack of initiative when it comes to the high dollar policy.

I think a big part of the blame has to go to the largest province in Canada and that is the province of Ontario. I say the province of Ontario because historically the province of Ontario has been the engine of economic renewal in the country.

Madam Speaker, I notice you are giving me a signal that my time has ended. I would have loved to move on to cover other aspects of the discussion we are having today but I will give in and say thank you very much.

• (1440)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I just have a brief comment as somebody who from a disinterested point of view watched the last election in Ontario.

I have just heard some absolutely amazing statements made in this House with respect to that election. If there was any deception in that past Ontario election, it was the deception of a provincial Liberal government which came into that election claiming that there was a surplus in the financial accounts of the province of over $20 million. When the books were opened after the election, even the Liberal minister of finance, the Liberal treasurer of the time, had to admit that there was a massive deficit, not a surplus.

An hon. member: Shame. Shame.

Mr. Langdon The total for the Liberal mismanagement of that period was $2.7 billion as of that year. As a result of the spending programs which had been put in place by that Liberal government, the deficit was going to come in at over $8 billion this year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langdon: What happened instead was that the New Democratic Party government of the province did two things. First, it decided that it was important to put some spending controls into effect. There had not been a treasury board under the years of Conservative or Liberal rule in the province of Ontario.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Langdon: There had not even been a board to control expenditures in the province. There had been no cap on expenditures of health care outside Canada. Hospitals in the United States from coast to coast used to rip off Ontario residents. The Ontario government put a cap on those expenses.

Second, the Ontario government said: "We will not be able to do as much as we would like to do because of this massive mismanagement which the Liberal government had hidden. Instead we have established a program to help the economy back on its feet".

It is striking that as the unemployment rates have continued to go up in every other province they have decreased in the province of Ontario thanks to the excellent budget that was put into effect in that province.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I did allow the hon. member for Ottawa Centre to go slightly beyond what was being studied this afternoon. When the hon. member for Essex—Windsor rose and answered part of his speech, in all fairness I let him comment as well. It would useful to the Chair and to the House if the hon. member for Ottawa Centre would find a way to come back to Bill C-4.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I was doing but I ran out of time.

I want to look at the bad situation in Ontario as a result of the provincial government and bring it into the main stream to show how it was part and parcel of the difficult economic situation we are facing in Canada.

Since the hon. member asked me the question, if it was so good in the province of Ontario why would it need someone in Ottawa to apologize for what it has done over the past year? You only have to look at the variety of promises made over the past two and a half years and examine their delivery of them.

I just have one more comment because he made a reference to the deficit. If you look at the—

Mr. Boudria: And tax on tombstones.

Mr. Harb: My colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is mentioning the fact that the province of Ontario is imposing a tax on tombstones. That is another revenue generating mechanism.

My colleagues talk about the deficit of Ontario. When the government changed from a Liberal government to an NDP one there was a deficit of $750 million. Now there is a deficit in excess of—what is it now?

An hon. member: Over $10 billion.

Mr. Harb: There is over a $10 billion deficit in Ontario. If you compare it to the national deficit it is perhaps higher than the national deficit per capita. However, to say the least, for my colleague from Windsor to be an apologist for the mistakes and errors of the provincial government—we will leave that for another day.

Mr. Whittaker: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, if the member is finished his tirade, I am just going to point out that this has nothing to do with the financial bills and I would like to get on with the debate.

Mr. Blenkarn: Get after Langdon the next time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may have heard the Speaker asking the same thing because at one point I really thought we had moved the House of Commons to Queen's Park.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I can understand why the hon. member from Windsor felt it was necessary to come to the defence of his leader in the province of Ontario. He did not do a very good job but he did the best that he could with the subject.

The bill before us is probably one of the most complicated bills with which this Parliament has ever had to deal. It is a long awaited overhaul of Canada's major financial institutions.

I know of no subject which is more complex in terms of the details involved. This is because of the evolving nature of our financial industries.

In the good old days, perhaps a decade ago, there were the so-called four pillars: banks, trust and loan companies, insurance companies and security dealers. Everybody knew what those institutions did more or less. They worked in discrete, isolated areas and they were not competitors. Each sector had a partial or sometimes a complete monopoly in its own field.

Over the last decade or so, the barriers between our four major types of financial institutions have been broken down. They have merged into each other's businesses. The law we see today is a recognition of the breakdown of those four pillars. The point is not whether we want to go back a decade to the way things were when it was more simple because we cannot go back, the barriers have been broken.

The bill we see before us does not eradicate all of the walls. Some of the four pillars are still maintained. Not all of the financial institutions can go into the business of all of the other financial institutions. That is why there is so much complexity in this law and why it is so difficult for us, as members of Parliament, to say: "My goodness, we have done the perfect job".

We have to be humble in what we have been able to achieve because when these barriers are breaking down there are always going to be some institutions claiming that we were not fair to them, that they were not able to get into certain areas that others can, that they do not have the competitive advantages that other institutions have.

Having approached this bill with a certain degree of humility, because of the difficulty of bringing the law up to date with the economic realities of the 1990s, let us also congratulate the members of the committee who worked so hard to make these bills possible. I want to go on record to congratulate our member for Malpeque who has taken a very hard working and constructive role in this entire debate.

There are three main aims of this new legislation. One is to provide better services to the borrowers and depositors in these institutions, to owners. Second is to ensure the safety and soundness of these financial institutions. The third objective is to ensure that in the global view our institutions can be competitive both domestically and internationally.

Let us look at the first of these objectives, better service. In the time available I cannot go into all aspects of this objective, but I want to touch on a couple of them. Does this bill deal with the interest rates that can be charged to users of credit cards? Today in Canada the prime rate is 8 per cent, the lowest it has been in 18 years. Thank goodness it has come down. Thank goodness the government has brought it down, because it was this government that put the rate up so high in the first place.

Have the interest rates on credit cards come down? They are now in the range of 19 per cent and higher. This is an enormous spread and I have not heard enough evidence in this House to justify why these high rates must be paid by credit card users.

This bill does not deal with it and that is an obvious deficiency in this bill.

Another area in terms of better service to the public is addressed by a bill that was introduced by the member for Malpeque. She was able, with the co-operation of government and opposition members, to have it passed. If customers have a complaint they now have a statutory right to go to their financial institution and make that complaint, and if the financial institution does not respond they can then go to the superintendent. This is now written into the law. It is an empowerment of consumers to help ensure that they are treated fairly by these regulated institutions.

As for safety and soundness, I again want to commend the member for Malpeque who brought in Motion No. 47. This again was agreed to by all members of this House. It is an amendment to the bill at a very late stage which encourages employees to come forward and report on accounting procedures. It says they will not be penalized in any way if they go to the auditors and explain things which possibly management or the institution itself do not want the auditors to know.

This is important in ensuring the soundness of our financial institutions because we had testimony before us that, had the proper accounting procedures been used, we might not have had the Standard Trust disaster. We might have been able to avoid the problems that occurred in our two western banks.

The more that individuals can be encouraged to come forward and be forthright with the auditors, to put the auditors on notice, the more it will contribute to the soundness of our financial institutions, which exist not only to serve their owners but the public as a whole.

We cannot claim total success in terms of updating this legislation because there is still a certain anomaly which exists, and maybe this was inevitable. There are trust and loan companies in this country which are bigger than banks which in effect take deposits and make loans.

However, unlike banks they do not have to be widely held. Parliament in its wisdom said that banks must be widely held in order to avoid some of the conflicts of interest that may arise from time to time.

This was one of the very difficult issues for us to deal with because there are some very large trust and loan companies and they are being very well and soundly managed. However, they have sprung up under single ownership.

I am sure that the question we are going to have to come back to within a couple of years is whether, because banks must be widely held, with no one owning more than 10 per cent of the shares, the same requirement should be imposed on trust and loan companies. The bill did not deal with this particular aspect.

Another area which is probably beyond us as the Parliament of Canada, but which is highly regrettable, is the whole issue of regulation of our financial institutions. There are federal loan and trust companies, federal banks, and provincial loan and trust companies. There can be a federal loan and trust company doing business in the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario seeks to regulate under its own laws those trust and loan companies, and the Ontario laws may be totally or somewhat different from the federal laws in certain areas.

In addition to that, Ontario will regulate the federal loan or trust company's business, not only in the province of Ontario but right across Canada.

If we are going to have safety we also need efficiency of regulation. That means harmonization of our federal and provincial laws as they relate to our financial institutions. We are a country of 26 million people. If we want to be competitive does it make sense that we should have 11 different laws regulating these financial institutions? Surely, in the interest of efficiency and competitiveness, as Canadians we could find a way to regulate our major financial institutions at only one level. This is a goal that we as a Parliament and we as Canadians from coast to coast should be seeking to achieve.

The third goal of which I spoke is that of international competitiveness. Here we get into the issue of what foreign financial institutions should be able to do in Canada. What can they do? I have never been completely convinced that by opening up Canada to total competition from abroad for our financial institutions that we were helping strengthen our own financial institutions or that we were better equipping our financial institutions to compete here in Canada or in foreign jurisdictions.

When we changed the Bank Act in the early 1980s to increase the number of Schedule B, Schedule II or foreign banks coming into Canada from a very small number to something like 60 I remember wondering at that time what we were doing. Were we allowing these foreign banks to come into Canada to cream off some of the top accounts, the multinationals, the ones with connections outside this country that had lots of security outside Canada, and leaving the homeowners, the farmers, and the small businesses for the Canadian banks? I was quite worried about that.

When Parliament in its wisdom passed the law to allow the foreign banks to come in here we on the finance committee said at that time: "Let us be sure we monitor these foreign banks to make sure they are not just cherry picking, to make sure they are increasing the competitiveness and to make sure they are doing their fair share in terms of small business, farmers and homeowners".

I regret to say that type of monitoring has not been carried out. Therefore, I think one of the expectations, which was greater competitiveness with the benefits filtering down to the smaller borrowers, was denied to us.

Did this opening up of Canada to more competition from foreign banks give us greater access to other countries in the world? The main country we are concerned with is the United States. Did we, by opening up Canada to American banks get a greater right for Canadian banks to compete in the United States? As a result of the free trade deal which took down additional barriers, did we get the same type of rights in the United States that we gave Americans in Canada? No, the member for Burlington is absolutely wrong. We did not get reciprocal treatment for our banks in the United States to American banks in Canada. What we received was national treatment. National treatment is very different from reciprocity. Let me explain this.

By allowing American banks to come into Canada, they get access to nation-wide branch banking. They can set up their branch banks right across this country. Did Canada get that right in the United States? No.

Just recently a bill passed Congress that we had hoped would grant Canadian banks branch banking across the United States. We did not get it. So as for reciprocity American banks in Canada can have branch banks nation-wide while Canadian banks in the United States cannot. That is lack of reciprocity number one.

Lack of reciprocity number two is that U.S. banks own securities dealers, a company like American Express. We can say it is not a bank but they own large securities dealers. Can Canadian banks go down to the United States and own a securities dealer? No. We have real problems with that.

The third area is that under this new legislation that we brought in we have American banks in Canada that own insurance and trust companies. Can Canadian banks going to the United States own savings and loan or insurance companies or trust companies down there? In other words with this bill the reciprocity gap that existed previous to this bill for Canadian financial institutions vis-à-vis American banks has been widened. How does this lead to enhanced competitiveness?

I am also disappointed that this bill did not deal with what I think is probably the greatest travesty in terms of the administration of our financial institutions and which I think is a blight on our reputation for being an even-handed and fair rule of law nation. With the granting to American Express of the AMEX Bank of Canada licence and breaching five out of the nine guidelines set by this government, Canada showed the world community that friends are granted rights and privileges not available to anyone else.

We have spoken a number of times about what went on and how the pressure came from American Express. Through its massive support of the government in the last election on free trade, American Express lobbied to open up the border for financial services. American Express did not want to qualify as a bank in the United States for U.S. purposes because had it qualified as a bank it would have had to get rid of its major securities company. It was not regulated as a bank in the United States.

It was probably because of the tremendous support given to the government by American Express that this government was prepared to breach five of its own nine guidelines to allow that bank licence to be issued. This is even after our diligent public servants in Canada had held the application up for about 27 months.

Does this bill do anything to deal with this type of issue? No. If American Express were to apply today they would still be in breach of five of the nine guidelines.

All I can say is thank goodness that this bill does not retroactively legitimize what was a terrible breach of trust toward the Canadian people by this government. It was a granting of benefits to friends. It was a benefit which it would not have given to anyone else. Thank goodness this bill does not legitimize retroactively that type of operation. Neither does it go far enough to deal with a government that may choose again in the future to be arbitrary and to favour its friends at the expense of all other people who apply in honesty and good faith and in the expectation that Canada is a country in which the rule of law applies and it will be applied equally and fairly to all applicants.

This bill cannot be considered to be the be all and the end all. There are many issues which have not been resolved. It has been a good human attempt to deal with what I think is one of the most intellectually complex areas in the world. This is because of the breakdown of the old four pillars and the melding of them and our attempt to achieve equity and balance among those four within Canada. We have attempted to deal with the new realities, at the same time ensuring that the needs of customers, borrowers and depositors will be met. At the same time, we have attempted to ensure the soundness and the safety of these institutions because more than anything else Canada's banking reputation must rest on a sound basis and sense of security. That is why we cannot have any more of the AMEX bank licences because that makes us look like a banana republic.

This bill does attempt to deal with the competitiveness issue both within Canada, among these four institutions competing against foreigners and outside Canada with the ability of these institutions to compete abroad.

My feeling is that where we have not made the best of this bill is in this competitiveness area. There are people in Canada who still feel—and I am one of them—that foreign financial institutions have greater privileges in Canada than we are getting in their countries. I will end immediately. We have seen only a decade ago that our banks were among the top in terms of assets on a global basis. We now are lucky to have one in the top fifty. We have a long way to go. Let us as a country take steps to ensure that our banks and financial institutions serve the purposes of which we have spoken.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I am going to resist the temptation to respond to the previous member about the sins and inequities of his brother in power. It probably is not worth pursuing that subject further.

What I would like to do seriously is to congratulate the committee which worked on this legislation. I want to particularly congratulate the member for Nickel Belt who has been our representative through what has been an extremely difficult marathon slog of four pieces of complex legislation. Each piece had many different interested parties which wanted to have their say. It has been a difficult process for all members of that committee. I congratulate them.

Since he is in the House I want to say that the chairman who is the member for Mississauga South did an excellent job in this particular case. He was previously on the finance committee and now he is chair of the subcommittee or legislative committee, I forget which, that took on this bill in this session. He was better known as the terminator from GST days. We have however a set of bills in front of us which put into effect three important philosophies. We have first and perhaps most important a new philosophy which says that we will permit financial institutions in this country to be much more interconnected than has been the case previously. It will be possible for banks to own insurance companies and for insurance companies to own trust companies. There is an attempt to erect supposed walls in the actual operation of these institutions but, frankly, I am sceptical about whether those walls will be as soundproof and as hermetically sealed as the people who brought this legislation forward suggest. I think not. I think we are going to see much more in the way of conglomeration of our financial institutions.

The second piece of philosophy which marks these three bills is much more emphasis on self-policing in the regulation of these institutions. That too is something which the government has defended strongly but something which in my view carries with it considerable risks. There is a risk that the self-policing will not be done. We have seen in this country recently a series of unfortunate events with respect to both banks and trust companies. We have seen the collapse of two of our western banks.

We have seen the takeover and shut-down of the Bank of Credit and Commerce which was a foreign-owned bank which was implicated in a whole series of scandals and fraudulent activities in other parts of the world. We have seen the collapse of Standard Trust. We have seen the teetering on the brink which is taking place with Central Guaranty Trust which just announced this week that it is selling 25 of its branches because of financial pressures.

In the cases that we have been able to probe into in places like the finance committee we have discovered that there have been serious problems. We found in the case of the Bank of Credit and Commerce here in Canada for instance that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation's rules were not followed in all cases in that foreign bank's operations here in Canada. We found in the case of a number of the trust companies which have been affected by financial pressures in recent years that loans had in fact been made which put into effect investments that could not be justified by the extent of the loan or the riskiness of the venture which was being supported.

In some cases we have been dealing with the collapse of the real estate market. That has been the case especially in Alberta and a major piece of the explanation of the bankruptcy of those two banks in that part of our country.

That has not been the only problem. There has been a failure to recognize the need for strict financial security. Despite this experience and despite the experience of our cousins to the south, the United States, where the collapse of dozens and dozens of savings and loan enterprises has cost the American treasury and the American people close to $320 billion U.S., we still have a philosophy that says that we can let these financial institutions police themselves. I am sceptical and my party is sceptical.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langdon: There are actually people here listening.

An hon. member: Very intently.

Mr. Langdon: It is shocking for a Friday afternoon. The third point which has to be stressed—

An hon. member: We just wanted to wake you up.

Mr. Langdon: I put these points forward in all seriousness, despite some of the interplay which has taken place from side to side here.

There is also a commitment on the part of the government, in this case, to have ownership rules that will become progressively stricter as the institutions involved become larger.

I think in practice this is going to become extremely difficult to put into effect. We will find that as an institution grows it is not going to find it easy to suddenly reduce its ownership level from say 30 per cent down to 10 per cent and so the regulators will be asked to give exceptions and those exceptions will be extremely difficult to accept.

The likely results of this set of bills in front of us are first, a much more concentrated set of financial institutions in this country, much more concentration at the top of the financial system.

Second, we have failed to deal with the question of appropriate control of foreign banks like the Bank of Credit and Commerce which did not follow some of Canada's rules.

Third, we are going to see ourselves with institutions much more vulnerable, I believe, to collapse, as we have experienced in the case of banks and trust companies and as I believe we will experience more in the future.

Finally, I think we are going to see that with the emphasis on self-policing there will be too little supervision of these financial institutions. The financial institutions of any country are crucial, not just in the general economic progress of the country, but in the development, in taking us effectively into new areas of growth and new areas of change. That is why we need good financial institution legislation.

I am pleased with some of the advances in this legislation, but certainly my party and I are unhappy that there are areas such as those I have been mentioning that have not been tackled. This was the chance to meet the challenge of tackling those problems. What we have is compromised legislation in front of us which responds to the larger voices of those who represent our financial institutions instead of responding to the logic of economic development in our country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ACT OF INCORPORATION OF METROPOLITAN GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved that Bill S-6, an act to amend the act of incorporation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the province of Quebec, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Madam Speaker, Metropolitan General Insurance Company was incorporated under chapter 51 of the Statutes of Canada of 1956, and it is governed by the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

In April 1987, Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, a major mutual life insurance company whose Canadian head office is located right here in Ottawa, acquired Metropolitan General Insurance Company.

Metropolitan General Insurance Company is a direct underwriter of automobile and home insurance whose agents deal directly with customers without going through independent brokers. The premiums collected by that company all come from Quebec.

In 1990, the total value of the premiums collected by Metropolitan General Insurance Company was $12.2 million, and the company had 26,281 policies in effect.

Following net losses of over $5 million in 1989 and 1990, the parent company of Metropolitan General Insurance Company announced in January 1991 that this subsidiary would cease operations at the end of March 1991, unless it found a taker.

On June 4, 1991, the Commerce Group Insurance Company of Saint-Hyacinthe, in your riding, Madam Speaker, which is an insurance company incorporated under federal statutes and one of the two corporations in Commasur Inc., the leader in the field of fire and casualty insurance in Quebec, acquired Metropolitan General Insurance Company. After the takeover, and in order to strengthen the financial situation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company, the Commerce Group Insurance Company bought $9 million of capital stock in Metropolitan General Insurance Company, whose capital and surplus thereby more than tripled.

The Commerce Group Insurance Company does business exclusively through insurance brokers, while Belair Insurance Company, another member of the Commassur Inc. group, like Metropolitan General Insurance Company, deals directly with customers without the intervention of insurance brokers. Belair Insurance Company is incorporated under the Quebec Insurance Act.

Metropolitan General Insurance Company, a direct writer of insurance, wants to continue under the laws of Quebec in order to merge with Belair Insurance Company, also a direct writer of insurance.

The management of Metropolitan General Insurance Company believes that it can offer more competitive products and improve services to policyholders by merging with Belair Insurance Company, a company well-known and well respected among the insurance-buying public in Quebec. With its computer system and its distribution network of 35 sales offices, Belair Insurance Company will absorb an increase of its premium volume at low marginal cost. The synergistic effect of the merger should bring a positive contribution to the Commassur Inc. group's profitability over the next few years. As well, the acquisition of Metropolitan General Insurance Company by Commerce Group Insurance Company Inc. and its merger with Belair Insurance Company will ensure that more than 40 jobs, which would have been lost had the company discontinued operations, will be saved.

In order to be continued under the laws of Quebec, Metropolitan General Insurance Company must be authorized to do so under its basic legislation, and this can only be done through a private bill before the Parliament of Canada. At a special general meeting of shareholders held on November 5, 1991, the continuation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company under the laws of Quebec was unanimously approved.

The proposed transfer of jurisdiction of Metropolitan General Insurance Company is clearly beneficial to its shareholders, customers, and the general public.

In concluding, perhaps I may say that the Commerce Group Insurance Company is located in Saint-Hyacinthe, in the riding of Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, and that I sponsored this bill at your request. I want to thank hon. members for their co-operation, because they agreed to a number of exceptional measures that would allow this bill to be adopted today.

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, it is really with great pleasure that we are able to support this bill mainly because earlier today I had talked in this House on the subject of financial institutions and how there is a problem of harmonizing between the federal and provincial regulations. When you have a company trying to meet the requirements of the federal statutes and regulations and trying to meet the requirements of provincial statutes and regulations, you get a kind of jungle where there is really no clear way to go. I look at the 40 jobs that this bill will save that would otherwise be lost.

• (1530)

I also look at what we call in Quebec gros bon sens. This is a bill of what I consider to be gros bon sens. As a Quebecer and as a consumer advocate and a member of Parliament for Chambly, Quebec I am proud to speak on it today. I think we speak with one mind on the necessity of this bill and also the urgency with which we need to get this bill adopted and passed through this House. Therefore I just wish to tell you, Madam Speaker, and perhaps the people who are watching us today as they do many days that many times this House can do something extraordinary. They can speak with one voice on legislation which it considers urgent and necessary.

I would like to conclude with that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is not often that the Speaker can also assume the role of member of Parliament, but I would be sorry if I did not thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on behalf of my constituents of Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, for accepting to steer this bill through the House.

I can assure you that there are a lot of people in Saint-Hyacinthe and in the area who are very happy tonight, and I am grateful to you for that.

NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner (p. 4875).

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise and speak on this motion brought forward by my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley. I would like to compliment him on bringing it forth at this point in time in Canadian history. It is important that he has seen the wisdom of reminding Canadians that we have much to be proud of. We must at this point in our discussion of the Constitution and our constitutional problems take time out to be proud that we are Canadians and that we have a heritage that is rich and quite frankly worth bragging about.

Next year will be Canada's 125th anniversary. I think it is very appropriate that this motion is before the House so that it can be passed and that the first Canadian heritage day can be celebrated during our 125th anniversary.

One of the things I think makes Canada unique is the fact that most Canadians have roots in many parts of Canada. Although there are times when we have regional differences and different points of view, most Canadians when they look back at their family backgrounds have roots in all regions in Canada.

In my own family my grandfather, grandmother and my mother were born in Quebec. They came from the southern townships of Quebec. I have roots in Alberta where my father settled in Edmonton. I now have roots in British Columbia where I have lived for 40 years.

Because Canadians have roots in all parts of Canada we should have a national heritage day. It should not be a day that celebrates simply British Columbia or Quebec or Nova Scotia, but a day which emphasizes that we are all Canadians and that we have a heritage that is important to remember.

There is no area in Canada that does not have a rich heritage. My own municipality of Surrey, which was named after Surrey, England, is tremendously rich in the heritage of that area. People forget that it was one of the original logging areas. When we look at some of the pioneer pictures we find that particularly the north part of it was covered with massive Douglas fir. They are huge trees. The old pictures show the logging. It was nothing to have a six-foot diameter stump. The oxen and early steam engines dragged the timber out of the bush.

Fortunately for us in Surrey we have one of the best medium sized museums anywhere in western Canada if not in all of Canada. It is called the Surrey Museum. It has been able to capture and preserve a great deal of the history and heritage of Surrey. This is the heritage of the farm community which settled on the Delta between the Serpentine and the Nicomekl Rivers in South Surrey. It comes right up into the north part of Surrey, into what is now part of my riding in Port Kells. These were the original farming areas in the lower Fraser Valley. This is very good rich farming land. There are whole historical areas like the Tynhead area which has now been turned into a provincial park. This is where pioneers settled early on.

We have the Fraser River with its tremendous heritage. The Fraser River as everyone knows was the initial navigation river into the interior. It was the highway on which people went further into the interior in the exploration of British Columbia. It was a busy waterway in its earlier days and it still is for logging. Massive log booms were moved up and down that river. The lumber industry of British Columbia which has become known world-wide and is so much a part of our make-up actually started predominantly in and around the Fraser River.

We have historical trails like the Semiamo Trail that link New Westminster right down into the United States. It was really our first north–south link with our neighbours to the south.

These are the things that even a small community like Surrey has that is part of its heritage. Surrey has a rich multicultural heritage going back many years with Indo–Canadian families, with Japanese settling in the area and more recently with large ethnic communities such as Portuguese, Italians and Vietnamese. This again enhanced the heritage of our community.

It would be appropriate and fitting as we move toward our 125th anniversary if Canada adopted a national heritage day. That could act as a focal point of unity right across this country. It could say to all Canadians that we are proud. We have a tremendous potential in this country. We have a rich history and diversity, but we have some common goals and we have some common things to celebrate.

Therefore I would urge members on all sides of this House to support whole–heartedly this motion put forward by the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley so that we can pass it and that it can become law within the federal jurisdiction. Then next year, as we celebrate our 125th anniversary of Canada, we could have the first national heritage day.

Mr. Jean–Pierre Hogue (Outremont): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you for recognizing me.

It is a privilege to take part in the debate on second reading of Bill C–236, an act respecting national heritage day, especially since the potential impact of this legislation is quite considerable.

As citizens of this country, we have a right to be proud of our historical and cultural heritage and of the vital contribution made by the men and women who over the years have helped make Canada what it is today, one of the most enviable countries in the world.

We also have a right to be proud of our ancestry, our language and our family and religious traditions, which are so richly diverse. Together, these values reflect not only our attachment to the past but also our admiration for those who shaped that past.

Considering the profound changes taking place in today's society, especially at a time when we are trying to redefine our common future, it is imperative that governments—and each and every one of us—make a more conscious investment in preserving our history and our cultural identity.

Canada, as we all know, represents a unique mixture of traditions and symbols based on our history, our diverse heritage and our historic experience. These traditions and symbols strengthen our sense of community and maintain a continuity between our past and our future.

We have reached a turning point in our history, both nationally and internationally. The constitutional choices we are about to make will not only affect our identity as a nation but also our position in the world.

As a nation we are a confederation, and we want to remain so. This does not mean that the framework for our confederation must remain identical to what it has been so far. We must be creative and show initiative. We must start these discussions with the conviction that we are going to win, that we will create a Canada where everyone will be able to benefit from what this country has to offer.

But how do we do that? Obviously we need a good dose of tolerance and openmindedness, and both tend to increase with our knowledge of the past. Learning about our past does not mean memorizing historic facts and dates but understanding the men and women who made that past. That knowledge will put us in a better position to build our future.

Internationally we want to remain what we are: a prosperous and competitive nation. To do so, we must keep up with the rapid changes taking place in the world. Canada's future prosperity will depend on our ability to take advantage of opportunities and successfully meet the challenges of rapid change in areas such as informatics, biotechnology and telecommunications.

It may seem unusual that I should mention those three areas, considering the subject before the House today. In other words, what connection is there between technological expansion and our heritage? A very close one, because unless we have a profound sense of our heritage and the community to which we belong, unless we understand and assimilate our past, we cannot move ahead.

If we look at other countries, those that have learned from their past experience and past mistakes happen to be the same countries that are looking ahead to the future. If we want to build Canada, and if we want to build Canada's future together, we must know our roots. If Canadians are to contribute to the development and unity of this country, they must know what constitutes its foundation.

As I see it, the question is not whether Canadians should celebrate the riches of their heritage but how. Creating a national heritage day could become part of the government's efforts to emphasize the importance of preserving Canadian unity.

It is also true that adding a holiday that celebrates Canada, its people and its accomplishments would complement Canada Day, celebrated every year on July 1. We are one of those countries that tend to understate their heritage. Nevertheless, we have every reason to be proud of our background. Making Canadians more aware of our rich history and of heritage values in general would undoubtedly help to enhance our sense of community as Canadians. Canada Day expresses our pride as citizens of the confederation to which we belong, and National Heritage Day would emphasize our diverse roots and help us gain a better understanding of what was accomplished by the men and women who built the society in which we live today.

It was suggested that we should celebrate National Heritage Day on the third Monday in February, during the longest period in the year without a holiday. We have no objection. It is an excellent idea. I am sure that Canadians would be delighted to have a day's respite in the middle of winter. It would be a good opportunity to spend a few moments to reflect on what our ancestors accomplished. A chance to get back to our roots. It would also be an excellent antidote for the winter blues a real morale booster for workers and for all Canadians.

Furthermore, Canada Day is celebrated during the summer holidays but National Heritage Day would be celebrated during the school year. Our young people would have an opportunity to reflect on their country's past. With their innate curiosity and questing minds, they would make us explore areas that are too often neglected.

Parents, seniors and various cultural groups could be involved in a series of activities organized in our schools to prepare for this day.

If we want future generations to be proud of their identity, proud of belonging to this country, let us give them a chance to learn about the past, to gain a better understanding of the changes that occurred over the centuries and shaped the country we live in today.

However, there are other considerations, and I am referring to this country's economic interests. A holiday would be very costly. In fact, Canada would lose about $2.5 billion as a result. I realize that pride and patriotism cannot be expressed in dollars and cents, but we must be realistic.

We believe that increasing our productivity is the key to increasing the real incomes of Canadians. Considering the present state of our economy, and at a time when we are trying to make our economy more competitive, these figures should make us stop and think. Although we agree with the principle of National Heritage Day, our concern must also be for the economic prosperity of our country.

Creating National Heritage Day might also have a very substantial social impact, since this day would concern only a minority of Canadians. About 8 per cent of the Canadian population would be part of this magnificent day. Finally—I am running out of time; I noticed your signal, Mr. Speaker—to achieve a consensus in this respect we must try and develop in this country a real sense of heritage values and work together to create the kind of economic, social and political climate that such a message requires.

A national heritage day requires broader consultation, and consequently I believe that until we have found a way to let all Canadians share this pride in our heritage, it would be best to proceed as requested.

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to congratulate my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley for presenting this piece of legislation today. I was sorry to hear from the member who spoke on behalf of the Conservative Party that he is now calling for some delay in considering such a piece of legislation.

Canada's heritage is something we cannot celebrate enough. We should be paying more attention and creating holidays such as this where we can draw Canadians to the values in this country that they should be respecting and celebrating.

At this point the fundamental basis of this country is under attack from many quarters. Many people are concerned that institutions which initially brought this country together such as Canada Post, the national railway system, VIA Rail are now being dismantled. As a result the very sinews that hold the country together are weakening and people are concerned all across this country.

The same is true of the debate around our Constitution and the separation of the province of Quebec. Many Canadians are concerned about what is going to happen to our country in the future. They want to have their concerns focused on the value of keeping this country together and on the heritage of this country that we all treasure.

People are concerned that the promises made many years ago about economic integration of the United States with Canada and other countries in the hemisphere is now being realized. As a result we are losing our national identity. At this time Canadians need something to focus on in order to recognize and pay tribute to the heritage that brought this country together in the first place.

For example, Canada is described as a country that was put together against all odds, even geography. In this hemisphere we have a north-south alignment of the geographical features, the mountains ranges and the Mississippi River valley, et cetera. All these things tend to draw our attention north and south. Yet the Canadians of many years ago built a nation across this country from sea to sea that was able to defeat the dictates of geography. It is that kind of nation we are attempting to keep together 125 years after its founding in 1867. I am hopeful that we are going to it. We must constantly focus Canadians on the value of their country and heritage. At a time when there are tensions in this country that threaten to pull it apart I am concerned that people will be looking outward and will lose concern for their country.

A tremendous number of people over many years made great sacrifices to build this country and keep it together. I think those sacrifices ought to be honoured and recognized by Canadians. A holiday such as the one proposed by my colleague, a national heritage day, is exactly what we need. Dominion Day or Canada Day is recognized on July 1, but we are one of the countries in the world with the fewest days recognizing our natural heritage. I think the more we have the better off we are going to be. We need to focus people on the value of that heritage.

Many communities across the country are already attempting to do that. For example, I live in a community that grew up around the logging and forest industry. It was a pioneering community in terms of the development of pulp and paper on the west coast of Canada and the development of markets in Asia. The community where I live was a pioneering community in terms of those things. It was a community which really did not pay attention to its heritage until it saw that there was a threat to that industry and heritage. Members in the community have now revived an old logging road system based on a logging Shay engine, what they called the two-spot. They have revived an old railway station that was about to be torn down. It has been rebuilt on the waterfront and focuses the community on an industry which was very important in building that community.

There is an old pioneer mill, McLean's Mill, in the valley that they are now putting together and rebuilding. They hope to have an old operating sawmill in that community to show people exactly how the forest industry was structured many years ago. It will show what kinds of tribulations workers used to go through to keep the machines operating and the raw materials supplied to that mill.

Many communities across this country are looking back into their history and taking things of value from it. They are reviving and emphasizing them and using them to teach children their heritage and show them what kind of values this country and its communities had in the past.

Too often over the past 20 or 30 years we have ignored our past. As a result many of the children and young people in our country have lost those values. I think this proposal for a national holiday to celebrate our heritage is a perfect idea to focus our young people on the values that we as Canadians hold and the value of our history.

It would be unfortunate if we took the view that another holiday is simply an additional cost added to doing business. The previous speaker mentioned that a statutory holiday in Canada would cost something like $2.5 billion, but that is only one side of the ledger. We all know that holidays also have an economic value to the country. Canada has fewer holidays for its work force than almost any other country on the globe. I was looking at an article recently in an American magazine where they listed all the holidays people are entitled to in various countries.

In Austria, for example, workers are allowed a minimum of 30 days of holidays per year; Denmark, 30; Sweden, 30; Italy, 28; France, 25; Netherlands, 24; Spain, 22; United Kingdom, 22; Australia, 20; Belgium, 20; Finland, 20; Switzerland, 20; West Germany, 18; and down at the very bottom with 10 minimum holidays a year is Canada.

Many of those countries at the top of the list are countries that are very successful competitors when it comes to competition with Canada. Holidays are not a cost of doing business. They provide value to business. People get time off from work and are able to relax and reduce the kind of stress that builds up in the work place. People get time off work and they acknowledge important holidays.

In addition, when people get time off from work, other people who are currently not employed are able to take their place and as a result we are able to reduce the unemployment level in this country. By reducing unemployment, as many of these countries with more holidays than Canada have done, we may be able to bring people back so they can feel they are playing a larger role in the country, contributing more, and that they are not a net drag on the country's resources and will be much better Canadians as a result.

I would ask all members to support this bill to create a heritage day in the third week in February. Again I congratulate the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley who made this proposal.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to say how delighted I am to be able to participate in this debate. I support this bill and I congratulate the member for this motion.

Establishing a heritage day in Canada is not a new idea but it is a very worth-while idea. As a Canadian who loves this country I have always found it a mystery and a conundrum why we have so much difficulty with our identity, why we lack the unity of what is really a very successful country. This is one of the best countries in the world. Millions if not billions of people who inhabit this planet would give their eye teeth to be Canadians, to be citizens of this country.

Here we are, one of the most privileged people in the world living in one of the greatest countries in the world and we have unity problems. We seem to stress the negative. We seem to focus on the things that tend to disunite us as opposed to those things we hold in common, the things that unite us.

The fact of the matter is that unlike our friends south of the border, the Americans, we do not celebrate enough. We do not flaunt our successes enough. We do not show our pride enough. The Americans perhaps go too far because they show their pride and wear their pride on their lapels or on their sleeves. We tend to be shy and diffident. While I would not suggest that we should be just like the Americans, I think we do have to tell the Canadian story because it is a wonderful story.

Unlike America, this country was not born in revolution. We have a peaceful history. We have had peaceful evolution. We should have great pride in that. We should be very proud. We tend, however, to sit back and be quite defensive about this country. We do not have to be defensive at all. Let us go on the offensive and tell the world how great we are.

I can think of so many things to celebrate. We are coming up to our 125th birthday of Confederation and what a good time it would be to establish a national heritage day. Think of the private sector—public sector partnership we have had in this country. We have had a tremendous partnership. It is one of the reasons for the success of this country. We have not done it just on private moneys or private initiative. We have had a wonderful and very productive partnership involving government and the private sector.

We could think of the CPR, going back to the late 19th century when we established a railroad to the west coast. We could think of the seaway we built with the help of the Americans back in the 1950s. I can think of some of the great public initiatives like the CBC established in the 1930s.

Medicare, established in the 1960s, is still one of the great public health models and is envied, I would think, in most parts of the world. It has some financial problems today but it is a tremendous model, a successful model, a model to be emulated all around the world. We have a lot of things to celebrate.

We should think of our diversity. We should think of the fact that we have been the homeland of peoples from all around the world. People have come from the four corners of the earth to be here, to live here, to establish their families here, to pursue their careers and to contribute to this country.

That is another reason why we are successful. I think we have been able to have the cream of the crop of people from all around the world. We have had the very best come here and establish their lives. We have been the beneficiaries of this immigration.

When I think of a heritage day, I think not only of our diversity but of our multiculturalism which has given us some problem. I think it gives us problems because I do not think we understand multiculturalism very well. We compare it to what is called the melting pot in the United States.

The melting pot of the United States is largely a myth. For example, have the blacks been melted? Have the Hispanics been melted? They have not. There is a tremendous amount of diversity in the United States. There is a tremendous amount of multiculturalism in the United States. The myth persists about the great American melting pot. There is a melting pot at the level of the national anthem, at the level of the Stars and Stripes. It is there with respect to the flag and to good old fashioned American pie. When we get beneath that the United States is just as diverse and just as multicultural as we are.

I think that on heritage day we could explain multiculturalism. It would give us that opportunity. It would give new Canadians and groups of Canadians born elsewhere the opportunity to show how great they are as Canadians.

I believe to the very bottom of my heart that it does not matter whether your skin is brown, whether your religion is Islamic, Catholic, or what mother tongue you have: French, English, German, or Swahili. None of those differences stands in the way of being a good Canadians.

When someone asks me what a Canadian is, other than the fact that we all share a common citizenship it is very difficult for me to explain it. I do not identify Canadian according to race, according to colour, according to skin or according to religion. A Canadian is one who lives here, believes in this country, loves this country, has pride in Canadian citizenship and is proud of being a resident of this country.

A heritage day something we need. I think it would give us the opportunity to tell the wonderful Canadian story.

It could explain where we have been, where we are at right now—and we have some difficult times right now—and where we might be going. We have Canada Day on July 1, but we could do with a lot more. It is not unusual for other countries to have a number of days, several days in honour of national heritage.

A member earlier was mentioning Austria with perhaps as many as 30 days set aside to celebrate one way or the another its heritage. In the United States, just next door, there are apparently five national heritage days. Finland has 12.

It would seem to me that this great country could afford at least to have one more day. What better time than the cold month of February? This is a cold country and it would be good right in the middle of the winter, after Christmas and New Year's Day, to set aside a day to celebrate this country. We have a lot to celebrate.

I am happy to support this private member's motion. I congratulate once again the mover. I would hope we have a successful vote so that this motion could be examined further in committee.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to speak in favour of this motion instituting a national heritage day and I would like to congratulate the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley for putting forth this motion.

I would like to start my remarks in context of a quote from a government publication called Proud To Be a Canadian: A Rich Cultural Tradition. This government publication at page 21 stated:

> A Heritage Day celebrated nationally would enhance two vital aspects of Canadian identity. We would focus on those parts of our heritage which are truly the expression of what we have achieved together, from our liveable cities to our artistic genius. And we would reach out across our many cultures to learn about and savour the differences our heritage stands for. A Heritage Day, in other words, would be a uniquely Canadian occasion to celebrate both unity and diversity.

I think that paragraph captures what the idea of a national heritage day is all about. It brings together all of those things which make us Canadians and make Canada the country that we believe in.

We have been made up over the past 125 years and before of groups of people from all over the world. We are a mosaic of people who bring to Canada our rich backgrounds, our rich heritage from other places. We bring different languages, different cultures, different ways of looking at things. Over the years we have moulded together in a country I believe we can all be very proud of.

We have our difficulties and we have our problems. We are in the middle of a national unity debate as to whether we should remain as a whole from sea to sea to sea. I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of most of us that the heritage we have has a richness unsurpassed in very short time by any other country.

I remember when I was in high school looking at what they taught us then and thinking at that time in my early teens that Canada was not or did not have a very rich background, a very rich history.

Yet as time went on, through high school I began more and more to realize and to understand how rich our history was and how enriched Canada was. The richness of Canada is something I learned about over many years of reading political history books, political biographies, excellent Canadian publications such as Canadian Forum, Options, Maclean's magazine, to name three, that set out what we, as Canadians see; why we as Canadians stand out in the world.

I wonder throughout this unity debate why it is not important to have a national heritage day to reflect on how lucky we really are, and how we are viewed, not only internally in Canada, but how we are viewed by other nations around the world.

In talking to people from various other countries, they have a hard time believing that we as Canadians would even consider splitting this wonderful country apart. We have so much going for us, not only nationally but internationally. Looking at our heritage, I am a firm believer that we must take that step further. We must look not only at where we have come from and what we are today, but use this to show us where we should go in the future.

If I could be parochial for a minute, I will look back at Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and some of the things within that riding and within the area of the Kootenays where I was born and raised, that I think are so important to our history and so important to our upcoming generations. It is imperative that we protect that heritage and remember the richness of our history, our culture, our art—both visual and performing arts—that make us what we are.

If we look at Christina Lake, there is a group right now trying to preserve and save the Christina Lake or Cascade Powerhouse. It is an important building and an important point in the history of that region. Grand Forks, whose history goes back almost as far as any other community within British Columbia, has a rich heritage in mining. They are at present in the process of trying to preserve the railway station in that area, along with the abandoned rail tracks, to ensure that our heritage is protected.

Up in Penticton we have the ongoing restoration of the S.S. Sicammous, one of the few stern-wheelers remaining. The other stern-wheeler in our region in the riding of Kootenay West, in Kaslo, originally the home of both my father and my wife, is also preserving the S.S. Moyie and have a museum within that structure.

These are important parts of our past. It is important that we look at those parts of our past to ensure that our children understand what we went through and what our parents went through, little bits of the past that help us chart the course for the future.

I also would like to briefly mention how important to our culture and our heritage is art. On the west coast, for instance, there is the art of Emily Carr, an important part of the past, linking the heritage of Emily's background with the heritage of the community that was built up around her.

All across Canada in the visual arts we have the opportunity and have seen people take the opportunity to ensure that we understand and realize not only what is occurring at that time, what has occurred before and, what I am sure will come and be happening in the future.

• (1200)

Our performing arts such as the National Ballet in Ottawa, the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, the symphony orchestras having such a hard time across Canada whether they be in Vancouver or in any other city, these are important parts of heritage. Focusing on a day where we as Canadians can recall I think is important.

A minor part of that is the need for a day off for all working people of Canada to reflect. It would not simply be to have a day off to enjoy themselves, but for a focus as we have on Canada Day, July 1. It is a focus of the richness of our past, the richness of what we have in the present and the hope that I have of the richness that we will carry on into the future.

It is important. I believe that this House should go to the next stage on National Heritage Day, iron out the bugs that are within this bill and bring it back for third reading, passage and institution. Yes, Canadians want and need a day to recall the past, to remember the present and to ensure that it is reflected in what we do in the future.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I see that there is really only a minute or so left so I will just begin my remarks. If the matter comes back for debate, I would like to complete them at that stage.

I support this bill to establish a national heritage day. It is a very important bill, and I would like to congratulate the member for introducing it. I am disappointed that at least some government members have not said they are going to support the bill. In fact, the parliamentary secretary indicated in what is frankly a rather spurious reason that because the bill only applies to employees within the federal jurisdiction, it does not apply to enough people in Canada for the government to support it.

It seems to me that the government should recognize this bill as a first step. It does deal with those with whom it is the jurisdiction of Parliament to deal. We can only deal with employees within the federal jurisdiction, and therefore, we ought to exercise that jurisdiction to its full if the idea is a good one. I know that many government members believe it to be fundamentally a good one.

With that, I notice that it is 12 p.m. Perhaps I can continue on the next occasion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 19(93), the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I stand to be corrected but I think if you check with the Table, if I am not mistaken, we have just concluded the second of three hours of debate. There is actually yet another hour of debate to be had and a vote to be put on this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member is right.

I want only to remind the House, as I said earlier, that pursuant to Standing Order 93 the order is dropped to the bottom of the list on the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to consider Bill C–32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Essex–Windsor, will be debated and voted on separately. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

That Bill C–32 be amended by deleting Clause 1.

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, let us make it very clear what is involved here for people who are concerned about this debate.

The government is attempting to extend its discriminatory freeze on Canada Assistance Plan payments to other provinces of which three have been singled out: British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

The Canada Assistance Plan payments to those provinces will not be permitted to increase by more than 5 per cent per year. If this piece of legislation passes, this will hold until 1995. It is a very simple bill and has, in fact, simply one clause in it. To demonstrate our complete opposition to this piece of legislation, to demonstrate how completely unfair we feel this legislation is to the three provinces which are affected, and to the hundreds of thousands of unemployed people across the country who have had to go on to welfare because of the recession which this government created, we intend to move that that entire clause be stricken from the legislation, which of course would leave the legislation null and void.

We think that is in fact the best response to this irresponsible, uncaring and totally unacceptable piece of attempted legislation on the part of a government which does not seem to realize how badly it has hurt men and women and children across this country with the approach it has taken to try to save money, an approach which I have to say in my relatively short period here, about seven and a half years now, is the most heartless approach that I have seen this government or any government take. A more heartless approach I have not seen. It first created a recession. Remember, this has been called the "made in Canada" recession. It has not been called that by those of us in the opposition, it has been called that by the government's friends. The Conference Board of Canada, which is supported by the large-scale business community in this country, said this is a made in Canada recession, brought into effect by this government and this government's failures in economic policy.

Then, having created the recession, this government decided that they would put the following into effect. They would put into effect changes in unemployment insurance which would make it more difficult for workers in those parts of Canada that are being hardest hit by this recession—British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario—to receive the unemployment insurance to which they were due given their years of contribution.

Let me refer to what those workers found instead of receiving a fair amount of unemployment insurance in the midst of what, in Ontario at least, has been the worst recession since the depression of the 1930s. The figures demonstrate it clearly, I say to the minister on the other side. Like so many ministers on the other side he takes the position that there is nothing but optimism to be seen, nothing but sunshine to see, despite the fact that even Statistics Canada is unwilling to announce this recession is over because it is so clear that this recession is not over and that it is damaging people from coast to coast.

They passed these unemployment insurance changes which forced people who were out of work to turn to welfare and then, to add insult to this further injury, they put into effect this 5 per cent limit on federal government assistance to welfare payments: the so-called cap on CAP, the cap on Canada Assistance Plan aid to the provinces. The consequence to the provinces has been that they have been faced with either letting people starve on welfare or paying themselves for the welfare costs of their people.

Because we are Canadians and because we believe in this country, we do not let people starve. We do not let people face the complete destruction of their lives because of the mismanagement of the federal government. Most provinces have said: "We do not like it. We think it is so unfair that we are going to try to take the federal government to court, but we will still pay these extra costs".

In the case of British Columbia the extra cost of this piece of legislation up to 1995 will be $900 million. In the case of Ontario the estimates for the first two years of this program are $1.7 billion. It is going to cost $1.7 billion in the first two years of this freeze. Alberta has the same kinds of devastating figures. Then the government turns around and blames the provinces for running deficits when what has happened is that this government has systematically forced the provinces either to let their people go hungry, to let them live homeless on the streets or to have a larger deficit which they do not like, a deficit which they would prefer not to run but a deficit which is intended to safeguard the people of their provinces.

It seems to me that the heartlessness of this government combined with just tragic changes in unemployment insurance so far as people are concerned has led both to a financial crisis for our provinces and to devastating results for people across this country who have had to go on welfare, who have had to see their sense of dignity destroyed in many cases. These are people who have worked—I have talked to them—for 27 or 28 years for a single company and were thrown out of work by the free trade deal that the government has brought into effect. In front of us today the government wants to add insult to injury to further injury by passing this piece of legislation.

I urge this House to accept this amendment, to return this country to sanity and to make the federal government do the job that it is elected to do to safeguard the people of Canada.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that during the private members' hour between eleven and twelve o'clock this morning we were debating a bill about implementing a national heritage day.

I think one of our strong heritages in this country is a program such as CAP, the Canada Assistance Plan. I think it might be wise just to remind viewers what the Canada Assistance Plan is and why it was implemented.

As the mover of the amendment has already said, the CAP was enacted in 1966 to encourage the development and extension of assistance and welfare services programs throughout Canada. Under the plan the federal government has entered into agreements with the provinces and territories to share the costs incurred by provinces, territories and municipalities. This is crucial because the federal government seems to pass on: "That is a municipal affair, that is a provincial affair".

The plan specifically states: "and municipalities in providing social assistance and welfare services to needy Canadians. The primary objectives of CAP are: (1) to support the provision by provinces of adequate assistance and institutional care for persons in need". I underline "support", not cut as Bill C-32 wants to do. It continues: "(2) to support the provision by provinces of welfare services designed to lessen, remove or prevent the causes and effects of poverty, child neglect or dependence on public assistance". Again, I underline "to support", not to cut as Bill C-32 attempts to do.

Under CAP the federal government contributes 50 per cent of the costs incurred by the provinces and municipalities in providing assistance to persons who are in need regardless of the cause of their need. I want to underline that: "regardless of the cause of their need". The plan goes on to say that it enables the federal government to contribute 50 per cent of certain provincial and municipal costs of providing welfare services to persons who are in need or who are likely to become in need if such services are not provided.

The plan goes on to underline who should get help from the CAP. Persons who benefit from assistance and welfare services include children who are in care or in need of protection due to abuse or neglect, mentally and physically disabled persons. I have many mentally disabled persons in my riding. The provincial government under then Premier Davis decided to deinstitutionalize the programs for the mentally handicapped. That was a good program but it did not come with any support services. It turfed them out on to the streets, and these persons are out there with no supervision as to when they should take medication, no help with housing and so on. The provincial Conservative government abandoned them and now the federal Conservative government is abandoning these people who are in need. Then there are one-parent families, the aged, the unemployed. Let me share what is happening with the unemployed in the Toronto area, specifically in Parkdale—High Park. People with university education are losing their jobs. They are going on to the unemployment insurance rolls. When their UI finishes they have no choice and are forced on to the welfare rolls.

Every time I meet with the chairman of metropolitan Toronto, Alan Tonks, and the newly elected mayor, June Rowlands, they are saying that the federal government is abandoning its responsibilities to the provinces and to the municipalities.

The CAP is to help the families or individuals in crisis. This is left up to the Salvation Army because the federal government has abandoned these people. Then we have low income workers and battered women. Most of the men in this House wore white ribbons last week, and what happens this week? The government is going to implement Bill C-32 to cut programs for battered women. One week they wear white ribbons; the next week they cut the programs. That is the sincerity of this government. It is no wonder the public is losing faith in such management and in such ruling.

Every day we see headlines of how the cap on CAP is affecting people. Turning to medicare, every day we see headlines such as: "Budget Crunch Puts Care Jobs at Risk" and "Hospitals Face Crisis".

An hon. member: The Toronto Star.

Mr. Flis: No, it is not The Toronto Star. That was The Ottawa Sun, for the minister's information. They continue: "Bed Closings in Hospitals to Increase, Langdon says". Here is an item from a Tory paper, The Globe and Mail: "Ontario says hospitals may have to merge", "Minister warns of tough times ahead", "More lay-offs are inevitable, hospitals told", "Hospital squeeze", "Cash strapped province insists on belt-tightening".

Mr. McDermid: This has nothing to do with transfer payments.

Mr. Flis: The minister says: "This has nothing to do with transfer payments". It has everything to do with transfer payments.

Now the effect of transfer payments hits education. My daughter just began university this year. The professors at the university are warning the students already that their tuition fees next year may go up by 20 per cent to 30 per cent.

An hon. member: May.

Mr. Flis: May. Let us not pass this bill and then they will not. The minister says: "May". There are other students who went to the same high school as my daughter and are not in university because they could not afford it. What a shame. Students with talent and potential cannot go on to university because of this federal government saying nyet to education. Yet the same government puts out a $20 million package called Prosperity Through Competitiveness.

My daughter tells me the first programs that will be cut at the post-secondary education level will be languages. How can we stand up in this House and say we are going to promote competitiveness? We want to be more competitive, but we cut off the languages. We are not going to speak the languages of the countries we are going to trade in. What an investment. What mismanagement.

My God, get your act together, you people on the other side. If you are going to put millions of dollars into talking about competing and being more competitive then do not cut language programs in the universities.

My daughter, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member should be accurate. Education is a provincial responsibility. Those decisions are made by the universities and by the provincial governments, not by the federal government.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, that was not a point of order and I believe that should be pointed out.

Mr. Flis: I want to go back to dealing with our universities. My daughter is studying French.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, how they teach French in universities? They put 100 to 200 students in a class. They give them a French textbook and they tell them to translate it into English. That is the way we teach French in our country. Instead of having small groups of 20 to 30 students so that they can learn, they are given a textbook and are told to translate. Why are they using those methods? It is not the fault of the professors and the universities. It is because the federal government has been cutting these payments and they have to stick 100, 200 or 300 students in a language class.

An hon. member: Good Lord.

Mr. Flis: That is what our education has been debased to. This same government wants to teach and spend millions of dollars so that our students will be competitive in the future. It dismantles post-secondary education and then it supports its advertising and consultant friends in order to give them jobs. Will my daughter get a job when she finishes university? She will not be able to speak the other official language the way it is being taught in the universities right now.

When I read the headlines I see another shocker. Another effect of Bill C-32 is how the transfer payments are going to affect the police. The Ontario Provincial Police is very worried. There are headlines such as "Provincial Police Face Lay-offs as a $16 million Deficit Looms", "Cutbacks Hamper Police Work, OPP tells the Solicitor General", "Budget Cuts Threaten"—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The member's allotted time is over.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this amendment put forward by the NDP. I am happy the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization is in the House today. I do not think he is focusing on something happening in the marketplace today which is as much a part of the economic equation of managing a country as looking after things such as fighting inflation and making sure we have a lower interest rate.

It has to do with the spirit that exists in this country today. I want to say to the minister that I recognize the interest rate is the lowest it has been in 18 years. I recognize that the inflation targets for the government are probably three or four months ahead of schedule.

Inflation in this country is practically zero. Reducing inflation is a noble objective. No one in this House would argue that point. However, the aggressive, lean, mean approach that the government has as its agenda has caused a fear factor in the marketplace today. This has caused an incredible drag in terms of the consumer confidence and spending habits.

The people out there without jobs, and even the people with jobs, are fearful they are next to go. When we hear of corporations like IBM and Dialects Diversified, institutions that are foundations within our community, going through a restructuring it is natural that it sends a shiver into the marketplace.

I talked with one of the local fruit merchants on the weekend. He runs Sunland Fruit on the Danforth. He was telling me that people are buying more and more damaged goods. In other words, a sale one or two years ago might have been $20 or $30 but now people are buying $5 or $6 worth of fruit because the fear factor is so high. They are only buying $10 worth of fruit at a time. The fear factor has really taken hold of the economy.

One of the instruments the government has to stabilize the marketplace and minimize some of that fear is the CAP. The Canada Assistance Plan was always meant to be a secure safety net. The 5 per cent cap on it is a symbol. Most Canadians do not understand. In other words, it exacerbates the fear factor.

What do we hear from the provinces and municipalities? We hear about all these programs, whether they are for one-parent families, the aged, the unemployed or people on welfare. Because the unemployment insurance fund has been cut back we now have many more people on welfare and we have a problem in terms of the welfare system being properly funded in terms of battered women and low income earners.

When we hear that the government is putting a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan it exacerbates the fear. In other words, are things that bad in our country that the national government is sending out such a signal to the most disadvantaged people in our society?

Earlier today we talked about the motion the hon. member put forward dealing with a national heritage day. One thing this country in terms of its heritage has had great pride in, in the last few years, is our strong social safety net.

One instrument is the Canada Assistance Plan. Even if times are bad it is one of those instruments that we do not tamper with because it sends the wrong signal into the marketplace. It exacerbates the fear factor and puts a drag on consumer spending, which is ultimately going to affect all our retailers and to cause a never-ending vicious circle in terms of our unemployment and other social services. For so long we have had absolute pride in these services and have had a sense of security that we would never tamper with them.

My point to the government is that it is sitting over there way ahead of the inflation targets. It is sitting over there with an interest rate that is the lowest it has been in 18 years, but it must also realize that one of the reasons the interest rate is so low is that the consumer spending is almost at a standstill.

I would suggest to the government that it is time to park this lean, mean machine type approach and put a little of caring back into its economic plan. I do not think anyone in this country would argue with this government's ability to be a lean, mean machine. Part of governance is also having as part of its value system an attention to caring. I think that on this bill it should go back to its caring factor and drop this cap on CAP.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood said that no one would argue with the characterization of this government as a lean, mean machine. The minister was quick to point out that perhaps the Reform Party might argue with that characterization. I think it is instructive that as lean and as mean as this government has been, the Reform Party would promise to be even more Tory than the Tories, which is something people who might be considering voting for the Reform Party should keep in mind. If they do not like what they have received from this government, it makes absolutely no sense to vote for the Reform Party which would give them an even heavier dose of what is afflicting them now.

This cap on the Canada Assistance Plan which is the way in which the federal government has traditionally cost shared social assistance programs with the various programs, is a despicable moral as well as economic choice of action. What we see here in the cap on CAP is really the government's ethical framework being revealed for all and sundry. At the same time as it refuses to consider eliminating the business and entertainment tax deduction which goes toward the financing of lunches for the rich and famous and special hockey seats for friends of corporations, et cetera, it is keen to put a lid on the assistance that goes to people, many of whom must now use food banks.

At the same time as the government is still willing to finance through the tax system very expensive lunches at very expensive restaurants, it is limiting the ability of those Canadians who must now use food banks for their lunches to further their own economic interests and perhaps at some point get themselves off social assistance.

The government also refuses to consider eliminating a number of other tax loopholes, such as the interest deductibility rule which is used by foreign corporations to borrow money here interest-free so that they can expand their operations elsewhere; the manufacturing and processing tax credit which was variously justified over the years in ways that no longer hold water but still continue to exist; the special tax treatment of capital gains; the special tax treatment for real estate developers for writing off depreciation on properties that technically are supposed to be depreciating but are actually rising in value.

There are others such as the 21-year deemed realization rule for the trust accounts that were set up in 1972 which the government has indicated it will change so that those wealthy families that 21 years ago put this money aside will be able to continue receiving that tax break.

All these things stand out in contrast to the cap on CAP whereby this government has said that when it comes to touching the rich, its policy is to make things better for them. The Minister of Finance said clearly in one of his speeches in this House that Canada does not have enough rich people. This government has certainly gone out of its way to ensure that the rich in Canada feel better than they did previously. It has changed the income tax system, which used to be more progressive than it is now, so that the top few per cent of Canadian income earners pay even less tax than they did before.

These are indisputable facts. The Minister of State for Finance can argue the contrary if he likes, but the fact is that his government did so amend the progressive income tax system that the people in the very top bracket now pay less tax than they used to. That is a fact that even the government is not willing to dispute because it was part of an intentional policy on its part.

What we have here is the contrast between what this government is willing to do for the very wealthy in Canada and what it is doing to the very poor in Canada by extending this cap on the money it is willing to make available to cost shared programs with Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. The reason initially given for this was that these were the three wealthiest provinces and they should be able to carry this burden by themselves.

There are two things wrong with that. First, we do not unilaterally break a federal-provincial agreement that has existed for decades. The Canada Assistance Plan is a program which after many studies has been found to be, although not perfect, one of the best federal-provincial programs in the country.

The government is unilaterally withdrawing from this as it is from other federal-provincial programs. It is no wonder we have a constitutional crisis and a lack of confidence in the federal government. The government has taken upon itself to do all these things unilaterally, to pull out of agreements that it made years ago.

Unfortunately for the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood and others who may have spoken to this amendment, this had its origins in Liberal governments. It was a Liberal government in 1982 that first unilaterally changed the federal-provincial fiscal arrangement when the Minister of Finance, now the hon. Senator MacEachen in the other place, unilaterally changed the federal-provincial fiscal agreements that were to be negotiated in 1982.

I do not say that to excuse the other side because it has certainly accelerated that trend. It criticized it when the Liberals started it, but it no sooner got into office than it was guilty of its own unilateral action. There was action after action after action of this type, whether it was with regard to Established Programs Financing or Canada Assistance Plan or, for that matter, other programs.

The fact is that what we have here is a trend line of federal governments getting out of agreements in a unilateral way. Unfortunately, as I say, that was started by the Liberals but it did not need to be accelerated and made much worse by the Conservatives.

Ontario and other wealthy provinces are in a very difficult position, Ontario especially right now because it has that many more people going on social assistance thanks to the free trade agreement. It is radically restructuring the economy of Ontario in such a way that there are not the kinds of jobs there used to be.

I was just reading an article the other day about how some 36 or 40 per cent of people are on social assistance in Ontario now. These people had very good jobs not so long ago, only months ago. It is a real problem for Ontario. It is very bad timing for the government to say, at a time when Ontario is going through such difficult times thanks to the free trade agreement: "Sorry, you are going to have to go this on your own even though it is a federal government policy, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, which has created the situation in Ontario".

All in all, this is a truly despicable act by this government. Putting a cap on CAP and now extending it is a sure sign of the ethical depravity of the government on the other side which chooses, as I said before, to put limits on traditional commitments to helping the poor in Canada while at the same time refusing to close these many tax loopholes which continue to benefit the very rich.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, listening to the last speaker provoked me to rise and say something because he spent the bulk of his speech, as the members of the New Democratic Party are often wont to do, attacking the Liberal Party's record in terms of its dealing with recessions in this country and talking about the fact that the Liberals are ones who started to cut some of the transfers to the provinces.

If he would listen to what I have to say, he might learn something. Clearly his attempts at blaming past Liberal governments for this are misguided. First of all, he forgets that Liberal governments established the programs in the first place. They are the ones that set them up, not the Conservatives and not the New Democrats. The New Democrats have never had office in this country and they have not set up a thing. It is the Liberal Party, when it was in government, that set these programs in place in the first instance. For the member to sit here and dump all over the Liberal Party in the course of his speech is frankly ridiculous.

The second thing is that he should remember how NDP governments behave once they take office. We are seeing it every day in Ontario. We realize what a disastrous situation people in our province face. It is a serious crisis in Ontario, and it is more serious because of the fact that it has an NDP government which seems incapable of dealing with the situation.

One only needs to look at the vast increase in the provincial debt which is not being used to create new jobs. It is being used to pay people to do nothing. That is what the Ontario government is doing. It should be spending its money on capital projects as Liberal governments have done in the past.

My hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood knows extremely well that in the last recession the federal Liberal government spent billions of dollars creating jobs in Canada by funding capital projects across the country.

An hon. member: They spent money they did not have.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "They spent money they did not have". I agree that they did that, but the proper course is to borrow money and spend during the course of a recession and that is exactly what they did.

This government has continued to borrow through six years that it says are the best Canada ever had. The hon. member for homelessness says that is not so. The six years they have been boasting about as being years of unbounded prosperity in Canada and which the Prime Minister keeps talking about are the years in which they have continued to run up Canada's debt $30 billion a year.

An hon. member: Take credit for it.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "Take credit for it". I am reluctant to take credit for his government's incompetence. He knows perfectly well that his government has bungled this thing so badly it does not know which way to look. He is embarrassed now. He is starting to blush. I can understand that. He should be blushing furiously at the way his government carries on.

This is the way the Liberal Party in the past has carried on: it created and paid for capital projects to create jobs in Canada and to put Canadians back to work. Sure they increased the deficit to do it but any economist knows that is the normal practice. You spend in the tough times so that you save in the good times. The difference is that this government failed to save in the good times. It kept increasing the deficit and now it is in a position where it says: "We do not want to run up the deficit further in order to create jobs".

Then we have the NDP government in Ontario which runs up the deficit fivefold and does not create any new jobs. You know perfectly well it has not created any new jobs.

An hon. member: That is hypocrisy.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says this is hypocrisy. He knows what is going on in this country. He knows how his government has failed to get the deficit under control through six years. Here we are almost into year eight of Tory mismanagement and the national debt has doubled, thanks to his government he has supported throughout. That is why the government is unable to deal with the crisis it has created in Canada through its economic mismanagement.

The New Democratic Party government in Ontario is now offering peanuts to people who are on welfare. It is not able to keep up with inflation rates. After standing in this House complaining constantly about how fair the NDP is and how unfair any increase of less than inflation is, it seems once it takes office it starts acting like Tories. We have always suspected that the NDP and the Tories were in bed together. I see members opposite are laughing. They should be ashamed, not laughing. Even the minister is starting to blush again. It is a shame.

In any event what I want to deal with is the unfairness of this bill. I suggest that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is a reasoned and sensible amendment. This bill is a bad bill. It should not be approved by this House in this form or in any form.

The cutbacks the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park mentioned in his speech are real. They are keenly felt in my constituency of Kingston and the Islands. The cuts in education have been a disaster. This federal government, by making these cuts, has made it more and more difficult for the provincial governments to maintain their share of educational expenditure that is so vital in our country.

This competitiveness paper that the government is spending $25 million on is a great waste of the taxpayers' money, yet the government is so keen on indulging in it. It recognizes the need for education as a high priority to make Canadians competitive in the global environment it says is so important and is so much a part of the situation Canada is facing. Instead of assisting in education expenditures it cuts them. It cuts them in what it calls the most prosperous provinces, the have provinces of Canada, where the money is needed as much as any place else in this particular rubric of public expenditure.

If we cut funding for training and education in Canada, how are Canadians going to compete in the global environment the government says is so much a part of our system? Surely to goodness we have to continue those expenditures. We have to augment those expenditures, not cut them. This is particularly so at a time of recession when the provincial governments, including the NDP government in Ontario, seem so keen on cutting expenditures to post-secondary institutions.

I was just reading in the paper the other day how the minister of education in Ontario is warning the universities and hospitals to expect a zero increase or a very low increase this next year. How can we cut funding to our educational institutions which are the backbone of our future competitiveness if we are going to put ourselves in a position where we are competitive? It defies all logic and it defies all reason.

That is the policy that is being pursued both by the New Democratic Party in Ontario and by the federal Conservative Party in government in Ottawa. It spells a disastrous potential consequence for the people of Ontario and the people of all Canada if we pursue this kind of blind and wrong-headed policy that is inappropriate for the circumstances which are based on all the government's other reports.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I also smile at the harangue from my colleague who just sat down. It is very clear that the Liberal Party shifted dramatically to the right after its Aylmer conference. Now of course it is trying to put up a big smoke screen. Its members are the ones who initiated the national debt because of their mismanagement of the economy. Many of the things that we are now seeing in the cutbacks to social programs were in fact initiated and promoted by the Liberals when they were in government.

It is quite interesting to talk about Bob Rae. He is now 4 per cent or nearly 5 per cent more popular than he was the day he got elected.

An hon. member: No, he is not. Check the polls.

Mr. Karpoff: The polls show he is well over 40 per cent elected as of last week. He is very popular and it is time the Liberals started taking a look at that.

Mr. McDermid: What hypocrisy.

Mr. Karpoff: It has been very clear that his government has the support of the people because they understand many of the things it is doing. Let us take a look at the Canada Assistance Plan and what it was designed to do.

It was designed to deal with poverty in Canada and its causes and its effects on people. It was designed to deal with a whole range of welfare services from day care to child abuse to services for battered women. These are the programs that are now being attacked by this bill and by this government.

The Canada Assistance Plan was based on a federal-provincial partnership. It was a concept that called for the federal government to be involved with the provinces in these kinds of programs. I think it is very important to remember at a time when there is anguish in this country as to whether there is any reason to keep the country together that the government has been attacking these unity programs that are based on a partnership between the provinces and the federal government.

We have to start to make the conclusion that many Canadians are now questioning the validity of Canada because of the tax on these programs.

I want to focus a bit on the whole issue of income assistance. The income assistance case loads in most provinces are up dramatically for two reasons. The first is the change to the unemployment insurance scheme which makes it more difficult for people to qualify. They are entitled to income assistance for a shorter period of time. The second is the recession in this country. It has been deliberately precipitated by the federal government through its free trade deal which has devastated the industrial heartland of the country.

An hon. member: I guess that is what caused the recession in the States too, is it?

Mr. Karpoff: The high Canadian dollar and the artificially high interest rates have certainly wiped out many of our export industries including the lumber industry in British Columbia. They are still too high compared with those of the United States.

The federal government creates these things by changing unemployment insurance and by the recession. Then what does it say? "Of course we do not want to have to meet the financial responsibility for these kinds of changes. What we are going to do is pass legislation, offloading the responsibility on to the provinces, particularly the three big provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario".

It simply limits its liability to 5 per cent at the same time as it is dumping down on to the provinces not millions but billions of dollars of expenditure. Of course it has impact. It has an impact even on large provinces like Ontario. It cripples the province's ability to provide for the poor.

It is also starting to do a couple of other things. It is undermining some of the fundamental concepts within Canada. One of the things that happened when the Canada Assistance Plan came in is that residential requirements were waived. One could move from one province to another province and be entitled to receive financial assistance or income assistance.

I remember when I first started working in public welfare in British Columbia. A whole bureaucracy was designed to track down not only the province but the municipality in which that person lived for one full year without receiving any public assistance. Then that person had to bill back the municipality and the province for the income assistance that was granted. A whole bureaucracy developed.

All of a sudden now the wealthy provinces are hearing: "If people come from Nova Scotia, from Manitoba or from Quebec, we are not going to cost share". People are now starting to say: "Maybe we should get back to the old idea of residential responsibility. A person's financial assistance is the responsibility of the province in which they last resided a year".

Without financial help from the federal government, provinces are being forced to say: "Maybe that is what we are going to have to do". All the things that this Tory government does destroys standards of national programs. In income assistance it said that one could not use residential requirements in order to restrict income assistance.

I think it is very dangerous for the government to single out individual provinces for differential treatment particularly when it comes to social programs. Then it is simply saying: "We are going to treat you differently from other areas".

Another whole area of the Canada Assistance Plan relates to family violence and child welfare. This is the most hypocritical area in which this government has functioned. It champions the whole UN year of the child and the rights of the child and then refuses to live up to it. The government makes a big announcement about the program on family violence spending $137 million spread over five years. Actually it will spend some $40 million before 1993 when it is going to be long out of government office.

Then what does it do? It takes back from those provinces three and four times the amount of money they could have used for child abuse prevention and investigations of child abuse, for battered women's shelters, for transition houses and for counselling programs for women who have been abused. These are all of the very basic programs that are necessary to stop family violence. The government guts with its limit on the Canada Assistance Plan but then does a great PR splash saying: "We are going to solve it with this money that we are going to spread out over a number of years".

The Canada Assistance Plan is one of the mechanisms that has a unifying effect on Canada. This government has chosen to attack it, as it has attacked other types of unifying and social programs.

The government must no longer be surprised that this consistent attack results in the questioning of the unity of Canada.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have decided to partake in this debate this morning because of the number of comments that I have heard from the other side of the House. I would like to try to put a few things on the record.

I found it interesting when the NDP member for Essex—Windsor was up talking this morning about Ontario and how difficult it was. I am confused because I am not sure where he is coming from. On Friday, he was up defending the budget of the Ontario NDP. As a matter of fact, he was quoted in Hansard on page 5947 as saying: "It is striking that the unemployment rates have continued to go up in every other province but have decreased in the province of Ontario thanks to the excellent budget that was put into effect in that province".

On one hand, when he was here on Friday, he talked out of this side of his mouth, but when the debate goes the other way, he is talking from the other side. The member knows that.

The other thing that I think is important on these programs, and one of the difficulties, is that the federal government in a cost sharing program is responsible for paying 50 per cent of the costs. Yet we do not have exact firm controls as to how the money is spent. As a result, sometimes provinces will spend money and then send the bill to us afterward.

I would just like to quote something that was in the Ontario NDP budget of this year. It said: "Total payments from the federal government were $406 million higher than the forecast in the 1990 Ontario budget. Part of the increase was for prior year claims while most of the increase reflects significantly higher levels of provincial spending on cost shared social assistance programs".

We are asking to put controls on it, but that is how it works. It was reflected in the Ontario budget. I am standing here quoting this morning from NDP pearls of wisdom that have been stated both in Queen's Park and here.

The member for Kingston and the Islands came forward and talked about the fiscal policies of the Liberals in the early 1980s. I happen to have here a quote from Donald Macdonald, a long time Liberal cabinet minister. He was quoted as saying: "I have had really limited dealings with Prime Minister Mulroney during the last three years, but on the whole, I like the Prime Minister. He has been prepared to undertake a couple of policy initiatives that politicians, including guys like me, did not have enough guts to do".

There is a comment from a Liberal cabinet minister as he looks back and reflects on his term here in the House of Commons and what has happened during the last eight years. I guess he is showing some admiration indeed for the Prime Minister.

I guess the final point I would like to make just to get this on the record is that we are talking about CAP, Canada Assistance Plan payments. In 1984–85, the amount paid was just over $4 billion. By 1990–91, it had gone up to over $6 billion. In 1991–92, it increases to $6.350 billion and in 1992, it goes up to $6.642 billion. Indeed, the numbers continue to rise. I guess the final point—

Mr. Mills: After you fix the recession.

Mr. Sobeski: I hear the member for Broadview—Greenwood. He mentioned in his speech that indeed inflation is basically down to zero. If we have inflation down to zero with a 5 per cent cap rate, that seems to be 5 per cent of pure growth.

I just wanted to put those comments on record.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I found the hon. member's intervention very interesting. He seems totally oblivious to the fact that there has been a vast increase in unemployment. Of all the unemployment created in this recession, caused by his government, 75 per cent is in Ontario. There have been huge increases in welfare costs, occasioned by the recession that this government caused, not to speak of changes in UI and other transfer payments which have precipitated an even greater need for expenditures in the social welfare field. Those are the facts.

This member said he is going to have his last words. I hope he talks a great deal over the next few months because in all probability, very few Conservatives are going to have a chance to comment on anything in this House after the next election.

Earlier we were debating the bill to create a national heritage day. I see the hon. minister has come in to carp, and I will fish because I know he will bite. There he goes already. But I want to emphasize to you and the hon. minister that we are talking seriously about what is going on in this country.

Before he came in, letting loose with his usual interventions that are so unworthy in most contexts, I was saying that we were talking about the heritage bill this morning which would have celebrated the characteristics of this country that have made us so proud to be Canadians.

It could not have been missed. One of the things we have celebrated in Canada which sets us apart from our neighbour to the south is the extent to which Canadians believe that in fact we have a collective responsibility for one another. We believe there should not be extremes of poverty and that when people are in need, the taxpayers—that is you and I—will pool our money to help the least fortunate in a system that is based on generosity and concern.

Sometimes that is exaggerated, because when this government looks at the question of the deficit, it seems bound and determined to communicate a message that the deficit is because Canadians have been profligate in their expenditures on social programs.

Part of the reasoning behind the cap on CAP is that the deficit is in some way attributable to that Canadian sense of generosity, and we have spent ourselves into a hole by helping the people in this country who are least able to help themselves.

The fact is that of our budget deficit, of our debt, 6 per cent is occasioned by social programs. Forty-four per cent of our debt is attributable to payments or tax breaks for corporations and the very wealthy. The rest, about 50 per cent of the entire debt, is for payment of interest. The ballooning level of interest based debt is partly attributable to those very high interest rates we had in the early part of this decade, when the Liberals were in government and pumped it up in a futile attempt to try and get things straightened out again. This government must recognize that a large portion of our debt goes in payments to exactly those people who are benefiting from the so-called tax reform. If you are very rich you are going to make a lot of money on that deficit.

What are the Conservatives going to do to attack it? They are going to attack ordinary people. They have imposed a 5 per cent cap on British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario. I suppose the presumption under all of this is that Ontario is doing terrifically well. There was a time when Ontario did not do too badly, but that was before this government came into office. That was before the free trade agreement. That was before the destructive failure of government industrial policy put Ontario in the terrible state of affairs it is in right now.

If we look at southwestern Ontario and Windsor, we find that there has been a 24 per cent increase in the welfare case load. Measure that against the 5 per cent cap on the CAP that this government is perpetrating now. It is a cap that has already cost the province of Ontario $1.7 billion. Therefore, we have a province that up until this government came into office was the richest and most productive industrial province in the country. It has damned near wrecked it, and now it would impose limitations on payments to those who have been hurt by the very actions of this government. What will they do? They attempt to blame the NDP Government of Ontario, which is trying now to pick up the scraps that this government has created. It is an outrage.

An hon. member: It sure is.

Mr. McCurdy: We were talking this morning about the heritage day proposition and the celebration of all that is good about Canadian heritage. There is going to be a period of our history on which we are going to reflect. It is going to be known as the dark days of Canada when a niggardly, mean Conservative government tried to follow the script of the Business Council on National Issues and Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher and tried to change this country for the worst.

There is hope because on that future heritage day, Canadians are going to celebrate the day that they drummed these people out of office and saved Canada so they could follow the civilized path it followed in the past.

I understand the utterances, name-calling and silliness going on across from me between the minister and the minister of state. They are concerned, but they should not be too concerned. They will collect their pensions as they will collect the blame for what they have perpetrated over the last seven years.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to present to the House a special case study that we could use as an example to indicate to this government that indeed poverty and needs are not relegated merely to the poorer provinces or the poorest towns and cities of this nation.

I represent an area that by national standards is considered one of the most affluent. I had the occasion, along with community leaders, organizations and associations concerned with individual Canadian's needs in my area, to participate in a report called Addressing the Crisis of Human Services in York Region.

Today I stand in the House of Commons, look to the government side and analyse what it has done with the present state of the economy. I soon realize this government has obviously lost touch with the reality of what is going on in this country. It has lost touch particularly in the area of caring and compassion.

In my area, the report that I cited earlier clearly indicated that of all the times to be cutting transfer payments to the provinces, this is the worst.

We are faced with a situation where we have single mothers and people who are suffering and calling out for help. In this government's philosophical disposition toward a market driven economy, there is no room for human compassion and caring. We have seen cuts and caps. Call it what you may, the reality is that people are not being reached by this government.

Addressing the Crisis in Human Services in the York Region in one of its recommendations calls for the federal government to work to increase the level of federal assistance to cost share human services programs. The research that we did in our area, the York region, and the analysis that we were able to compile is based on an area that by national standards is considered affluent. Let me tell you, there are people hurting and in poverty, and need sees no boundaries in this nation. What people want from the federal government is the type of leadership that will bring effective change and reach out to those people who are desperately in need.

We have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed who need help. We have single mothers who are compelled to stand with their children in front of their local food bank for their daily meal. In an area as rich and affluent as the York region, the Fire-Fighters Association, the Salvation Army and I were forced this year to have a food and toy drive.

The Conservative agenda does not work anywhere in this country. It does not work because it fails to realize that one of the most fundamental purposes of governing and government is to reach out to people when they are in need.

I want to go back to the report in the York region because we have been seriously hit by the regressive economic strategy of this government. We have seen a widening gap between the rich and the poor. We have seen an unfair tax system. We have seen during the boom years a government that accepted all the extra revenue. Now Canadians are asking why it has not been able to get the deficit and the debt under control, while at the same time Canadians have been whacked over their heads with unprecedented tax grabs.

There is an accountability problem with the federal government and people in my riding of York North and elsewhere are asking themselves how this government is dealing with communities like mine that have a high population of young families. There is an increased demand for schools, child care, family counselling and health care. They want to know from this government what it is going to do with York region, which is the fastest growing municipality in the greater Toronto area. It has the lowest per capita community mental health funding in the province. York region's Children's Aid Society has the lowest per child funding in the province. The education system is the fastest growing in the province of Ontario and schools are over-enrolled on opening date. York region has one women's shelter, one men's hostel, eight group home beds for homeless youth and it is the third lowest funded public health unit in the province.

This is all happening in the perceived land of the rich. There are people in my community who are hurting. I think the response we are getting from the federal government is not the one that I, as a member of Parliament, can accept. I do not accept it because I think the federal government has a moral obligation and a duty to reach out and not merely accept things as a fact of life. Because 1.5 million unemployed Canadians should not be a fact of life in an industrialized country like Canada.

We should not merely accept human tragedy and family breakups as something that occur in every day Canada. I remember when this nation offered Canadians opportunity. I remember when this country gave young people the type of hope that was required to build a prosperous nation. Today we are devastated by bad news. Today we are demoralized by a government that only cares about taking care of the few, the friends of the government, while it is punishing millions and millions of Canadians with inaction. It is watching them as they cry out for help.

That is not the way we have governed in the past. That is not the way Liberals governed. While this government uses a tunnel vision approach toward the deficit, it is doing it on the backs of the unemployed. It is doing it on the backs of single mothers. It is doing it on the backs of those individuals who need help the most.

I will tell you that Canadians will not forgive this type of attitude. They know best when their children go starving, when single mothers and single parents are lining up in front of food banks every day of the week. Canadians are sick and tired of this type of arrogant attitude that is bringing about the demoralization of Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

I ask the minister, who is attentively listening to what I am saying, to force cabinet to start looking at the human side of governing instead of looking at a bottom line that is creating despair, and not caring about those individuals who are truly in need.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to speak against Bill C-32, or more particularly to speak in favour of our amendment. It would cut out clause 1 of Bill C-32 and have the same effect as defeating it.

Bill C-32 is not only a cruel bill that will affect millions of people who are in deep trouble through no fault of their own. It is also a very foolish bill and furthers what this government has already done to destroy the economy of Canada.

In round figures, this bill will probably cost the governments of British Columbia and Alberta $389 million in their 1991-92 budgets. In Ontario, it has cost $415 million in the 1990-91 budget and $1.2 billion is expected to be the cost in the 1991-92 budget.

Figures like that are so large that the average person listening has a hard time telling the difference between a million and a billion. If they get a few thousand in income in a year, that is the size they are familiar with. I want to talk a little bit about the effects.

The former finance minister brags that he will be taking more than $2 billion per year now out of the people of Canada through this cap, this lid he has put on the Canada Assistance Program. This is the only program through which Ottawa aids the neediest people in the provinces of Canada.

I want to talk first about one type of program locally in Trinity—Spadina that is being savagely cut. We have several community centres, mostly built by municipal funds and to some extent provincial funds.

Their programs for the young people, the children, the youth and the young adults are being chopped because the grants on which they have relied are being cut back or wiped out. They are asking to combat drugs among the young people by providing alternative educational programs. They are being starved for money for those anti-drug programs. They are asking for money to help young people become better job hunters. That is exactly what this government claims to be supporting, and it can usually get the money to do that.

But places like the University Settlement House, Scadding Court Community Centre, St. Stephen's Community House, St. Christopher House are trying with less and less money to serve more and more poor, destitute people in the area. They are trying to give the children, the kids in high school or dropping out of high school or even a few who get through high school, a sense of something to look forward to.

We are not getting it. We have the highest level of unemployment in Toronto since the dirty thirties. In Canada, at least 435,000 industrial jobs have disappeared in the last couple of years and half of those are gone forever.

The iron workers union in Ontario tells me that the main employment for iron workers is dismantling plants. They are not building plants, they are dismantling. It is this government that caused it with its program of inviting the buy-out of Canada.

The government brags about investment, but 97 per cent of the outside investment coming into Canada is simply to buy out Canadian enterprises. In may cases they are shut down, all the jobs are wiped out, and they take the whole enterprise except for the name. For example, they still sell Inglis washers in Canada but they are not made in Canada.

This government has caused this unemployment. In Toronto it means there has been a 30 per cent increase in food given for the Christmas season, but a 60 per cent increase in what is needed. One hundred and forty thousand people are relying on food banks for groceries, compared to 90,000 at this time last year and 60,000 of those people are children.

The question is why? The government says in effect that the workers are lazy. That is a lie. The fact is that the government refuses to tax the rich and instead asks the poor to pay the taxes that the rich are not paying. Its argument has been that if the rich get the tax breaks, they will invest the money and make jobs. In fact, between 1979 and 1990 Canadian investors sent their money out of the country. It was a little over 5 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product then and is now closer to 15 per cent. It is going out of this country in the form of investments by Canadians who got much of that money from tax breaks given by this government and the preceding Liberal government.

These are the same. Many of them, their pals and the Business Council on National Issues, bailed out the Tories in the last election campaign by a monstrous third party advertising campaign through their subsidiary financial groups. Their reward is further tax giveaways. They are cutting job creation in Canada and asking poor people to pay the tax bill.

According to The Financial Post of August 29, 1990, Revenue Canada estimated that the so-called tax gap, the amount owed but not paid by Canadians, hit $10 billion in 1987, the last year for which an estimate was available.

I can well understand why the government is not providing up to date figures. That was almost four times the 1977 level. What it does is not only give tax breaks, but when the largest companies do not pay their taxes they can argue about it for five years in court and by the time they do pay it, they have had a five-year free loan.

The government is telling industrial workers, transport workers, clerical workers, unemployed people if they are still drawing unemployment insurance and welfare families to pay the taxes that the rich people and the rich corporations refuse to pay and are excused from paying by this government.

The government has even cut back the Revenue Canada program which would catch some of the tax cheaters. It was a huge success, earning $17 for every dollar spent in the taxes it recovered. The government has cut it back to less than a quarter of what it used to be. It does not want to catch the big tax cheaters, because those are the people who finance its election campaigns.

Shame on this government for forcing poor people to pay the taxes of the rich.

An hon. member: You are right, Dan, you are absolutely right.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, this bill to limit the growth in federal payments to the richest provinces to 5 per cent and the amendment moved by the finance critic of the New Democratic Party to simply maintain the status quo reflect the lack of debate and a minimum consensus in the country.

Canada Assistance Plan spending grew much faster in the richest provinces in the last 10 years and federal transfers to the richest provinces grew much more than those to the poorest ones. This has intensified since the Progressive Conservative government took power in 1984.

In fact, federal transfers for the Canada Assistance Plan and even all federal transfers to the provinces increased more rapidly for the richest provinces than for the poorest ones, even if equalization is included.

Since 1984 federal transfers to the poorest provinces rose at a 5.7 per cent rate, while those to the richest provinces went up 7.7 per cent. Taking out equalization, which offsets this somewhat, the growth rate for federal transfers to the richest provinces would be almost double.

Today we have a proposal from the federal government to limit transfers to the three richest provinces to a 5 per cent growth rate, and the New Democratic Party, which claims to defend the poor, is opposed and brings in an amendment that would simply cancel this bill. That party, which should defend the poorest provinces, on the contrary clearly seeks to maintain the status quo of federal transfers favouring the richest provinces.

That same party very recently raised a hue and cry because of the regional development agreement whereby the federal government would give Quebec $160 million over five years, or a little more than $30 million a year. In equalization payments alone Quebec has lost $2.2 billion since 1987. For the current year, the cuts will amount to some $440 million. Did you see a single New Democratic member rise to denounce the situation? They all get up this morning to denounce a bill that would restrict the growth in spending in the richest provinces.

That is the real face of the NDP, and I hope Quebecers will take a good look, because this morning, they had a chance to restore a modicum of fairness to transfer payments. I agree this is a unilateral decision by the federal government, whose power to change unilaterally the rules of the game in fiscal arrangements has just been confirmed by the Supreme Court. It is also a situation that is intolerable for any responsible provincial government. Fiscal arrangements should include a mutual commitment by the federal government and the provinces that any changes in these arrangements will be negotiated. We would have a good chance to get a more balanced system, now that fiscal arrangements between the provinces and the federal government must be renegotiated for 1992–1997, and in fact, negotiations are under way. However, there has never been any serious debate about the type of fiscal arrangements, the type of agreements we want to see between the federal government and the provinces. We are now seeing a transfer of the federal deficit to the provinces, and unlike what is being said today about the New Democratic Party, these cuts, these transfers have, in recent years, tended to concentrate on the poorer, not on the richer provinces.

The freeze on transfer payments for health care and education applied to all provinces. The capping of equalization payments has been in effect since 1987. Yet we had to wait until 1991 for a cap on spending by the richer provinces which are still getting more funding from the federal government, funding that should be used to establish some kind of balance, to restore a measure of fairness and maintain the fiscal ability of governments to provide services to the entire population. This situation is so obvious that the finance ministers will meet this week, when the Government of Quebec will again clearly express its views on cuts in equalization and EPF transfer payments but also on the money the federal government wants to raise. I did not hear anyone from the NDP mention this. The new taxes that the federal government will raise through its decision to no longer allow deduction of payroll and capital taxes for federal income tax purposes will cost Quebec $46 per capita a year and Ontario $15 a year. Alberta and British Columbia will gain $39 and $16 per person respectively.

Not only are transfer payments cut but the tax base is being reorganized in such a way as to collect $325 million more. In that context, the bill presented by the government this morning is a small measure of fairness towards the provinces with less fiscal capacity, while the system as a whole is still very beneficial to the richest provinces.

[English]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on what the preceeding member said.

I listened very carefully to what he said and I cannot, frankly, understand why he would make the proposition that the PQ makes, that it wants to be a separate province.

I am puzzled because one of the most thoughtful statements, part of what the member said, was the concern about the less wealthy areas of this country. It was a very profound, emotional statement by that member pointing out what Canada is all about. There is no gap in terms of the sentiment about ordinary Canadians which that member spoke about so eloquently between his party and other members of this House.

Frankly, as I sat in this Chamber, I had a sense of pride hearing what that member had to say about fighting for other unfortunate people in Canada.

That is what we could have in common; not breaking this country up but keeping this country together on a sense of fairness and decency and openness to each other across the country.

He made the point eloquently.

I want to take the theme that my colleague from Quebec has raised in this House and expand it. We can argue about the differences in terms of capping the transfer payments and equalization payments. It was traditionally true in this country up until the advent of a very lax Liberal administration in the late 1970s and early 1980s and a disastrous Tory administration for the past six years in this government. We have now been reduced to fighting each other region by region because of the fiscal policies of this government.

I remind my friend there is no gap regardless of whether you speak English or French about the concern for the poor regions in this country.

While we are reduced to this in this debate, another story unfolds daily in this country which shows how bankrupt morally this government is. While we are reduced to moving a motion to kill the bill rather than have the kind of intelligent debate that we all want as my colleague points out, it is true that we missed the point in reducing ourselves in this debate as my member from Quebec so eloquently spelled out.

What is the point of this debate? We are talking about cuts when the people who should be paying their fair share in this country are getting away with murder. The wealthy in Quebec, the wealthy in Ontario, the wealthy in British Columbia, those corporations that abuse the work force of this country to build incredible profits over the years, have actually had their taxes reduced by this government.

It has us squabbling and quibbling region to region in this country at each other's throat over language issues, provincial rights issues and is diverting us in the constitutional debates when the very foundation for this kind of rancour and hostility in this country is the fact that from coast to coast there has been unfairness in taxation in this country and the poor people have suffered.

I say in common cause with my colleague with whom I was very impressed the thing that should unite us in this country is the word fairness.

Just this past week we discovered that the banks have made a usurious profit of over $3 billion while the country is going down the tube, while the government is cutting off services to people in Quebec, in the maritimes, in British Columbia. While it is cutting back and capping, the banks took an extra $3 billion out of the pockets of working people in this country.

It is usurious. Furthermore, when there is some pleading in this House for a simple, remedial matter in terms of just the credit cards alone, what does this government do? It wrings its hands and says it cannot do anything. It is so embarrassed that even the members of its own party have announced that the banks are going to be grilled on the obscene profits. Its own party.

The members want to save their skins in their ridings and I say if they are that motivated and concerned They should raise holy blazes here in the House and say no to the capping and collect the taxes due from the banks and the corporations in this country.

They say they are at the banks. They had the timidity not even to give the banks a slap on the wrist about their charges on interest on credit cards. You are a paper tiger. You are a paper kitten. You are a paper pussy. This is a gutless government that has abandoned everything to the private sector and caused the divisions that my friend from Quebec so eloquently spoke about today.

It was a great Canadian speech and I was proud to hear it. Now I want to tell you this. It does not matter what language you speak in this country, English or French. The real roots of the problems are the inequity in the economy and taxation in this country and a sense of fairness from coast to coast. What it does is drive people to protect their separate regions rather than build a great Canadian nation we all dreamt we should have and at some point did have.

I want to tell you that even our great neighbour to the south of us which skinned us on the free trade agreement came out of this economic downturn better than we did. Ronald Reagan was their great soulmate. They believed that he was the greatest sports broadcaster who ever lived, let alone their president.

I want to tell you that even the United States of America has a 20 per cent minimum corporate income tax. Do you know how much money would be raised for the province of Quebec, for the maritimes and for every other province in need in this country if there was a minimum corporate tax in this country? Over $6 billion would be made available, my dear friend. None of us would be quibbling about $200 million here or $200 million there.

It is embarrassing to have to fight for the unemployed in Montreal who are the same as the unemployed in Toronto and who are the same as the unemployed in Vancouver. This is one great nation that can be held together by fairness, but not by regionalism and divisiveness as created by this bill.

Putting a cap on the rich provinces when times are tough means that they in turn will not want to share when times are good.

In the past Quebec, British Columbia and Ontario have willingly shared when times were good. By putting a cap on them now when times are bad you are saying to them: "Be greedy and hang on until times are good". That is no way to build a nation. That is not how the ordinary people of Quebec feel. That is not how the ordinary people of Ontario or any province feel.

My colleague made a profound statement today on a pan-Canadian basis. I did not think it would come from the Bloc Quebecois but it did and I think it should be respected. I say to him in return that the alternative is a fair taxation system that collects money on an equality of basis to pay and the banks are the worst users of the tax system of anybody.

I say to you there is a united voice in this House on a bill like this that I have not heard before. It has nothing to do with regionalism or with separating and fighting for your own constituency, which is a paramount virtue for every politician who wants to get elected. It is, however, a statement about Canada and a fair tax system. The only party out of step in this House is the Conservative Party and it is not the Conservative Party of John Diefenbaker. This is a sell-out government that has capitulated to a free trade agreement and a low tax base in the United States to serve those corporate interests rather than the needs of the ordinary people of Canada.

An hon. member: What about the Liberals?

Mr. Barrett: The Liberals do not know which side they are on. They have to go back to Aylmer again and start all over.

But I will tell you that one of the most moving statements made in a pan-Canadian sense was made by a member from the Bloc Quebecois. That is very interesting. People are people right across this nation. They are all Canadians. We are all Canadians. If you want to keep this country together, then stop playing favourites when it comes to taxation. Make the rich pay their fair share. That is the way to start rebuilding this country again.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. He puts the argument about the impact of this bill and the successive policies of this government on national unity exactly where they should be put.

This bill that puts a cap on Canada Assistance Plan contributions to three provinces in Canada is a divisive bill. It penalizes those who can afford it least. It further destroys the social service network in this country and represents in my submission a very serious blow to national unity exactly at the wrong time in this country's history.

Bill C-32 which we are now dealing with at report stage extends from 1992 to 1995 a specific limit on federal contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan to three provinces: Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. Its predecessor Bill C-69 put a limit on caps to 1992. In the last budget the government announced its intention to proceed with this legislation to extend the cap to 1995.

The financial impact of this bill is very significant. The government has said it expects to save the federal treasury $2 billion a year and it seeks to justify this bill on the basis of financial constraints on the federal government.

This bill is flawed for three broad reasons. First, it is attacking the deficit by going after social programs which will inevitably have a negative impact on those who can least afford it at a time in our country's history when we are facing recession right across Canada.

We hear for example that in metro Toronto there will be over 200,000 children this Christmas who will have to get Christmas dinner at food banks. Child poverty is one of the disgraces of this wealthy nation. This bill will perpetrate and extend the scandal in the way in which our society has treated our children. This comes after the words of the Prime Minister at the UN not so very long ago who spoke at a summit on the rights of children.

We have rhetoric and no positive action. The only action we get is a bill of this kind which will have a direct impact on children and those who can least afford it.

The second problem with this bill is that it fails to attack the deficit where it should be attacked. The deficit that has built up in this country over the last 20 years by successive Liberal and Conservative governments has been almost entirely as a result of two policies by both Liberals and Conservatives. The first policy has been to give increasing numbers of tax breaks to the corporate sector and to wealthy individuals. A recent study demonstrated that 44 per cent of the current deficit is a result of those policies started by the present member for Vancouver Quadra when he was Minister of Finance. This continued under successive Liberal governments and has been given an accelerated drive by the Conservatives.

The second policy which both Liberals and Conservatives followed whenever the economy got into any kind of trouble was to increase interest rates. We saw it in the early 1980s when interest rates went up to over 20 per cent and we have seen it recently under the Conservative government. This of course had an impact on the deficit because as the federal government was beginning to run into deficits each year, the accumulated debt required higher and higher interest payments. This was one of the most significant costs to the Canadian taxpayer.

Social services have only added 6 per cent to the total national debt over the last number of years.

An hon. member: What nonsense.

Mr. Brewin: My friend from the Liberals from Kingston keeps shouting: "What nonsense". You can always tell when you get to the Liberals because they start heckling at that point.

The Conservatives and those on this side of the House from the New Democratic Party are fully aware that there is virtually nothing to choose between the policies of the Conservatives and the policies of the predecessor Liberal governments.

We find it interesting that for a period in opposition the Liberal Party began to shift to the left. We see now in Aylmer it has have gone back in a shift to the right. It is now going to try to compete with the Conservatives for the business vote in this country. It is welcome to it.

An hon. member: Tell us about Bob Rae.

Mr. Brewin: The third problem is with the impact of this bill on national unity. Let me speak to that in particular. First of all, this bill breaks a specific agreement with the provinces. This was a unilateral breaking of an agreement with the provinces.

The courts have found that this Parliament is within its jurisdiction and the government is within its legal right to bring forward this bill. But we submit that it has no moral right to introduce a bill of this kind which breaks a solemn undertaking that had been given to the provinces across Canada.

Second, the bill discriminates against three of the ten provinces. It has picked the so-called have provinces. These are the ones which also have large bills for social assistance because of the recession which the government has imposed on this country. It develops an argument whereby it says: "This does not affect us. We cannot therefore have any problem with adding to the tax bill of the people of Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia". It is a bill which gives a reverse kind of special status to B.C., Alberta and Ontario. At this time in our country's history it is a bad bill.

Finally, it very specifically attacks our social security and social service system. This is part of a larger Conservative agenda and is at a time when that very social service system is one of the distinctive natures of our country and is a key foundation of building a sense of nationhood.

The Canada Assistance Plan is a plan which is effectively a federal-provincial partnership. It has been in existence for many years. The federal government undertook to pay 50 per cent of the cost of designated social services at the provincial level. This gave the federal government a large and significant role in the social security net in this country. This represents a significant step by the federal government to back away from a federal role in social services in Canada. It is part of a larger agenda of which this is a key part.

First, this government has changed the tax system in order to reduce the burden on the corporate sector and those of wealth.

Second, this government through the free trade agreement has reduced protections for Canadian industry and opened this country up to even greater attack from multinationals from outside the country.

Third, this government has made it easier for foreign companies to attack and invest in Canadian companies and to buy Canadian companies even with our own money.

Fourth, the government has set about a process of privatization which has undermined public institutions.

Fifth, it has been an attack on public servants in this country and Public Service employees in particular. We saw the recent attack on the Public Service employees in the PSAC strike. We have seen a set of policies, including contracting out and including the use of exclusions and designations to undermine collective bargaining at the Public Service level.

When even that failed, the government came in and passed legislation to impose its own agenda as an employer on Public Service employees in Canada.

Most critically, it has attacked social services in this country. It has attacked family allowances and pensions. It has gone after medicare and accessibility of university and higher education in this country. It has reduced the effectiveness of unemployment insurance which has again imposed a special strain on social assistance programs right across the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time has expired.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak out against Bill C-32, the Canada Assistance Plan and the 5 per cent limit to the provinces of B.C., Alberta and Ontario.

I would like to start out by making a few comments with regard to the speech made by the Bloc Quebecois member. I think he made a very interesting speech about his concerns, but I want to say to the member from Quebec that if you are poor in Quebec and you are poor in the Atlantic provinces and you are poor in British Columbia, then that is what this plan is all about.

We should not be starting to bring in legislation that is going to start to bring about caps in some provinces because they happen to be rich. The poor in the provinces across this country are crying out for help. We have a national program that is supposed to be the Canada Assistance Plan.

I say to all of you what a time to be discussing the Canada Assistance Plan. It is three weeks before Christmas and this government is bringing in a policy that is going to cap social assistance programs in the province of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

I say it is shameful. I say to the people in the food banks across this country as the people line up there that some of these government members better go down to those food banks and listen to what is going on across this country. I want to say to you that you would not be bringing in a cap at this time for these people across Canada.

At the same time, as my colleague for Juan de Fuca has said, the banks are making profits with their credit cards and various things. We have raised this in this House and the government turned a deaf ear to it. It does not want to hear that. It does not want to hear that the banks are making a profit. Why can we not bring in a taxation system that when a worker makes his wages, he is taxed immediately on his wages and on what he does. Why can we not tax the banks and the large corporations at the source of their profits at 20 per cent minimum tax as the hon. member for Juan de Fuca has said. "We should bring in a minimum tax across this country". The Liberals would not do it. The Conservatives sure are not going to do it. The New Democrats will soon show the people of Canada a fair taxation system. The NDP will bring about a fair taxation system that will recognize the needs of the people of Canada.

We will not do it by dividing the country. We will not do it by cutting back on social programs. The Prime Minister of Canada in the last election said that our social programs are sacred to the people of Canada and to this government.

Mr. Speaker, I see my time is running short so I will continue after Question Period.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

LOBSTER FISHERY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday a letter from the minister of fisheries was printed in the Charlottetown Guardian. In this letter the minister said that because the lobster fishery is the biggest fishery in Prince Edward Island, Island ground fishermen did not deserve government assistance.

For the last 18 months fishermen have been calling for their fair share of government assistance.

In the recent $40 million aid package, Prince Edward Island did not get one cent. In the $584 million package in May 1990, P.E.I. received a miserly $150,000 from the government, some of which went to study the GST centre in Summerside.

I challenge the minister of fisheries to listen to the inshore ground fishermen who will not be able to make their boat payments. I challenge the minister to explain to fishermen why the ground fishery in P.E.I. does not get help.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today because I am concerned about the future of my country, also because I am concerned about the recent comments on this nation's future made by the leader of the Parti Quebecois.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, on many occasions the concept of our country has been described as a marriage. The people of my constituency believe that this country like a marriage is an association created out of mutual love, trust and respect. Any other concept is nothing more than a common law relationship.

The people I represent are not interested in a common law relationship for Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, we continually hear the Prime Minister saying how proud we are to be Canadian citizens. However, this undoubted privilege is being denied to some 50,000 legal immigrants who are now trapped in an Order in Council backlog.

For these tens of thousands of immigrants, who by and large have completed their security and health checks and are in Canada, this backlog is the only thing that stands in their way to becoming landed. They must receive their landing papers before they can apply for citizenship.

There is no reasonable explanation for this delay. The reality is that the government is holding them back so that the immigration levels announced by the immigration department can appear as though they are being met.

I ask the government to stop playing with figures. These people are here in Canada and have been processed in accordance with our laws. There is no reason to delay their landings any further. It should stop playing with the numbers because by doing so it is playing with people's lives.

ABORIGINAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the Yukon Territorial Government, the Council for Yukon Indians and the federal government on reaching an historical aboriginal self-government agreement.

The agreement ratified by four Yukon First Nations this past week signals the end of one era and the beginning of a new relationship, a relationship based not on dependency but on equality. The agreement puts into practice the principle that Yukon's First Nations people have the inherent right to govern their land and their people.

It shows all of us that when the political will is there, when governments of all levels can come together and there is a genuine commitment to creating a more equitable society, self-government can be achieved.

I strongly encourage the government now to ratify this historic self-government agreement and put principle into action.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, December 18, there will be a forum in the town of Springhill, Nova Scotia to address a proposal by Dr. Bruce Filiter for English speaking Canadians to indicate their desire to keep Quebec within the country.

Dr. Filiter believes the politicians have not been successful in delivering messages back and forth between Quebec and the rest of Canada, and I agree with him. He also believes that unless ordinary Canadians begin to show each other that they care about the future of the country we have a distinct possibility of losing it, and I agree with him.

Dr. Filiter's idea is that English Canada could send a very clear message by flying the Quebec flag at every opportunity, and this will be his proposal put forth at the seminar on December 18.

In a letter to the premier of Nova Scotia he has said that flying a Quebec flag may be a small gesture but it is gestures like this that can smother the flames of separation fanned by the misunderstandings and petty jealousies and the media's preoccupation with divisive forces.

I agree with Dr. Filiter that it must be up to Canadians from all walks of life to stand up and be counted in this debate. The politicians and the media have done a very poor job in sending messages back and forth and have certainly exaggerated any differences there may be.

I applaud Dr. Filiter for his efforts and determination and wish him every success in his approach to this all important question.

BATTLE OF HONG KONG

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, December 8, was the fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of the Japanese attack on Hong Kong which ended on Christmas Day of that year, 1941. Of 1,975 Canadians, 557 were killed or died in prison camps. Those who returned after years of brutal treatment would never be the same.

Their will to live and their will to be good Canadians, in spite of doubts about the wisdom of the policy and the government that sent them there, should be an example to all Canadians who are tempted to cynicism about Canada by much less personally devastating events.

The Canadians at Hong Kong were Winnipeg Grenadiers from Manitoba and Royal Rifles from Quebec. Let what they did together in defending the indefensible and in suffering the insufferable put our current tribulations into perspective and remind us of what Canadians can do as Canadians when the best in them is called to the fore.

VAL-D'OR AIRPORT ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the federal Minister of Transport, officially announced the creation of the Val-d'Or airport economic development board.

The new agency, made up of community representatives, is meant to promote and develop the interests of this northern Quebec regional airport. Transport Canada's regional airport in Val-d'Or boasts a runway that is 10,000 feet long and 200 feet wide. It has already accommodated a Concorde, Boeing 747s and the USAF Galaxy C-5, the world's largest plane.

Today, the airport can handle 400 to 500 flights a day and up to 30 flights an hour. Last summer, international airlines started making technical stops in Val-d'Or. A feasibility study showed that a market for technical stops exists on east-west routes to Toronto and Chicago.

POVERTY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, this evening in St. John's two events are taking place at the Radisson Hotel. In one the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans from Newfoundland and the Prime Minister are engaged in a function inside the hotel at $500 a head. At the same time another function goes on, a soup kitchen. That one is at the hotel, though outside. It is a soup kitchen to serve some of the poor who have been hurt by the policies of this particular government.

The two events are together a graphic summation of what is happening to this country: while some people hobnob at high prices and dine luxuriously, the other half who have been decimated, whose jobs have been lost by the policies of that same elite, sit outside in the cold and eat soup at 50 cents a bowl.

My one disappointment is not that the minister of fisheries is celebrating 25 years. I congratulate him. He has done some good service to the province and to the country during those 25 years. What disappoints me, though, is that tonight he will find himself inside the room with the elite instead of outside with the people who sent him here in the first place, a place where he is often much more comfortable. I appeal to him at this late hour to stay outside instead of going in with his buddies, the elite.

UKRAINE

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, in a free and fair referendum on December 1, the citizens of Ukraine voted for freedom, democracy and independence.

Yesterday in Winnipeg hundreds of people gathered at city hall to celebrate by raising the Ukrainian flag. One of the speakers of the ceremony was Mr. Ihor Derkatch, member of Parliament from Ukraine. Other guests included representatives of the Ukrainian Orthodox and Ukrainian Catholic churches and speakers from all levels of governments representing all political parties.

Canada was the first western country to recognize the independence of Ukraine. It is quite clear from declarations made by the Ukraine Parliament and from statements made by the new president, Mr. Leonid Kravchuk, that Ukraine will be a strong advocate of international arms control and human rights.

It is therefore imperative that Canada further recognize a free Ukraine by establishing diplomatic relations immediately.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the government announced in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal a major green plan initiative to combat smog. This initiative should result in significant reductions in emissions of nitrogen oxides and volatile organic compounds, the main smog creating pollutants, and will lead to a major improvement in air quality over the next 10 years.

• (1410)

Specifically new regulations, protocols and codes of practice will be developed for rail transportation, vehicle diesel engines, power and chemical plants, and dry cleaning facilities. A research program will be implemented as well as a public education campaign, and bilateral agreements will be negotiated with the provinces.

This green plan initiative is a major step forward in our fight against smog in this country.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, there are disturbing reports in today's papers that the government is backing off its commitment to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

In 1986 the government accepted the subcommittee on equality's recommendation that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to include just such a prohibition.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission has also repeatedly recommended that the government amend the act. Human rights codes in Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Yukon all include such protection.

The government has the responsibility to protect Canadians who face discrimination. Further, the government has a responsibility to live up to its promises. There are many Canadians who suffer from discrimination on account of their sexual orientation and require protection. It is unacceptable for this situation to continue any longer.

I urge the government to act without further delay and introduce the long delayed legislation.

WOODSTOCK SANCTUARY HOUSE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I took part in a ceremony commemorating the first anniversary and completion of renovations to Woodstock Sanctuary House. This project was made possible on funding obtained from the federal government through CMHC's Project Haven initiative.

Woodstock Sanctuary House provides temporary accommodation to victims of family violence. The transition home operates on a 24–hour per day basis to provide shelter, food, emotional support and access to other services. It also provides a safe and secure refuge to abused women and their children.

Woodstock Sanctuary House recognizes the specific and distinct needs of children from abusive environments. Congratulations and a thank you are in order to the citizens of Woodstock, New Brunswick and surrounding communities for working to make Woodstock Sanctuary House a reality.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, almost eight years later this government still has not managed to lay the foundation for a prospering economy. The current recession shows no sign of turning around for the better. So far this recession has a casualty toll of 71,000 lay-offs in Ontario, and last year alone 350,000 jobs disappeared permanently in Canada.

With businesses continuing to fail, thousands of Canadian workers are becoming the permanently unemployed. Welfare rolls are skyrocketing and families are relying on food banks to make ends meet.

Ask any retailer: the Christmas boom has turned into a Christmas bust. Canadians are displaying their lack of confidence in the Canadian economy and their lack of confidence in the current government.

When will this government stop pretending there is a recovery and start doing something about this dragged out recession? The Prime Minister even makes Scrooge look good, if that is possible.

BILL 178

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are suffering from chronic constitutional fatigue. They are tired of debate, sick of threats, weary of consultation, and fed up with rhetoric. Constitutional dialogue cannot be a one-way street. It is time traffic moved in both directions.

The Meech Lake process did not fail in June 1990. The spirit of Meech was destroyed in much of English Canada in December 1988 with the passage of Bill 178 in Quebec.

I want to congratulate Premier Bourassa and the Quebec Liberal Party for their resolution yesterday calling for alternatives to Bill 178.

Quebec and its people are an important and valued part of Canada. It is time for its leadership to come to the table and get involved. Yesterday's motion concerning Bill 178 is a most welcome step in this direction and indeed should be applauded by all Canadians.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The Minister of State for Finance bragged on Friday that his government was expecting a good recovery and that it was already under way. However the figures show quite a different picture. Last month alone the Canadian economy lost 49,000 jobs. Statistics Canada noted that 305,000 manufacturing jobs have disappeared forever since June 1989.

The only benefit of this economy seems to be the U.S. retailers who pocketed more than $3 billion from Canadian shoppers. People have given up hope. They are disappearing into the black hole of jobless despair.

Does the government intend to base its so-called recovery on simply sweeping Canadians under the carpet?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that in the second and third quarters real growth averaged 3.3 per cent, an increase of 3.3 per cent. It is a modest increase in growth but it is growth and we do feel that we are coming out of the recession.

For the hon. member to describe whether I was bragging or not, I certainly did not mean it in a bragging sense at all. We are still in tough economic times, but we are coming out of them.

The hon. member should do a little promoting about Canada rather than talking about people travelling to the United States to shop. It would do us a lot more good.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, what we on this side of the House would like to do is promote food for hungry children.

The number of people depending on food banks in this year of so-called recovery has increased by 20 per cent. Some 284,000 kids will depend on food banks this Christmas. To put it in perspective, we could fill the SkyDome, B.C. Place, and the Olympic Stadium with hungry children and we would still have 100,000 kids waiting outside trying to get a meal.

These kids are not sitting on Santa's knee asking for presents. They want food and they want a government that will care about them.

How can they call it a recovery when the line-up at food banks has increased by 20 per cent this year?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, nobody takes comfort in seeing families in need at any time of the year, but especially at this time of the year.

To be fair, the hon. member knows full well that a number of people, low income families, have come off the poverty roll over the last period of time. We know that we have increased the child tax credit. There are a number of projects that this government has undertaken to help those who need the help at this period of time. Of course the low income rebates from the goods and services tax which pays cheques quarterly to low income families is also a source of aid at this time.

I wish we could do more. I think everyone in the House wishes we could do more, but in this period the best thing for these people and for all people in Canada is to ensure that our economy gets back on track, that jobs are created, and that people are able to get off unemployment insurance and welfare and back into the work force with a meaningful job. That is our goal and we are going to accomplish it.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in Montreal alone there are 50,000 needy children, almost enough to fill the Olympic Stadium. We also know that Robert Normand said on Saturday that he expected unemployment to rise to 11 per cent. How can the government claim that the recession is over when it knows that the number of needy children has risen 20 per cent this year alone?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, that was the same question in French as it was in her English supplementary.

I can tell the hon. member that the economy is picking up. It is starting to improve. It is a vested interest for opposition members to see poor conditions because they think that will vault them into power the next time around.

Let me say to the hon. member that the economy is getting better. If we talked a little more positively about the good things in this country the economy would pick up faster, instead of the whining we hear time after time from the opposition in this House.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

A confidential report of the Department of External Affairs says that for competitive reasons Canada must never lead the world in the development of environmental standards.

This is totally contrary to the Porter report, to the competitiveness strategies of Japan and Germany, countries which have already stated that being ahead environmentally is an integral part of their plans for economic dominance.

My question is: How could this government introduce an economic prosperity agenda a month ago and obscenely spend some $21 million, spreading it cross the country, when its true agenda is to deny Canadians the opportunity of becoming competitive in the fastest growing market of the next decade, that of the development of environmental technologies?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member wait until he can read the entire report.

I would like to mention first of all that my colleagues, the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of State for Environment and I just met with some Canadian leaders from the Stockholm conference who are helping guide us toward UNCED. One of the things we have been discussing is the important connection between trade and the environment and how we indeed can use environmental issues.

We are into a different world now than we were before. The two go together. We are proud of our environmental record in Canada and we intend to continue to stay in the lead on environmental issues in the future.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, unless the minister is now in the process of busily rewriting the report, I have the complete copy, and it is very clear that it says that Canada must improve its step, must not lead our partners in the development of environmental standards.

The statement on the government's strategy is not only bad environmental policy; it is incredibly dumb and archaic economics.

However, be that as it may, my supplementary question is: How does the minister reconcile the statement in this strategy paper that in terms of environmental protection Canada must not move ahead of its trading partners, with the contrary position that has been taken by the same government that in the North American Free Trade Agreement it is perfectly acceptable that Canada enforce environmental standards that are much higher than that of Mexico?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the pertinent part of the document the member is referring to when it will be made public is the objective sections of the document. That is the one the hon. member and all members of this House should look to. I pray that he will wait until that document is out and then he will have the benefit of looking at the objectives part to make any judgment or statement about this document.

Furthermore, the hon. member made an allusion to the fact that environmental technologies are important. This government, through the green plan, announced a $100 million initiative.

Mr. Martin: That is nothing.

Mr. Charest: Only a Liberal would say that $100 million is nothing. Over six years $100 million for environmental technologies is what is dedicated through the green plan to develop technologies and bring them to the marketplace. That is the commitment this government has made.

In the context of the Canada—United States—Mexico trade agreement, the hon. member also knows that we are conducting parallel negotiations with the three parties on environment issues. That is something that in itself is unparalleled and has never been done before. We are making great progress in this area.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Today we heard that housing starts are dropping, that cars are not selling—20 per cent fewer cars were sold this month than last month—and that stores are expecting business to be slack over the holiday season. The economy is crumbling and during this time the Prime Minister is travelling across the country to raise funds for his party and his ministers responsible for the economy are busy with the Constitution. When will this government set its priorities straight and help Canadians find work?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, housing starts are at an annualized rate of some 174,000 which is about the average over the last number of years for Canada. They are up some 20 per cent over last year's starts. Those are hopeful signs.

As far as car sales are concerned, the hon. member said that sales are down 20 per cent. One of the interesting things is that foreign sales are down rather dramatically and North American made cars are up about 1.5 per cent. That is not a great increase but at least an increase. Those are workers for Canada not for the foreign makers.

Those are good signs we are seeing in the economy. We hope they will continue.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

We would all like to see good signs, but a 13 per cent decrease in housing starts and the sale of vehicles being down 20 per cent are not good signs either to the people who sell, to the people who manufacture or to the construction workers.

I want to say also that 35,000 manufacturing jobs were lost last month alone. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association said: "If job losses continue at this rate we have only got 30 months left before no one is left".

I want to ask the minister: When can we expect an announcement of a first ministers' conference on the economy and a clear indication that the government will take such a conference seriously and be open to changes in its economic policies?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been meeting with provincial premiers across Canada and the Minister of Finance will be meeting with the finance ministers this Thursday to discuss many of the issues that the hon. member raises and that the premiers have raised with the Prime Minister.

Once those meetings take place on Thursday and Friday, the Minister of Finance will be in a position to advise the Prime Minister on the advisability of having a first ministers' conference on the economy.

I would point out the comment of Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa when he said that he would consider going to a national summit on the economy if other premiers do not turn it into a concert of whiners. We want to make sure that that is the case.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary question.

While Canadians would like to see some action by this government on jobs, we still have a million and a half unemployed, the same number on social assistance or unemployment insurance, and hundreds of thousands of children who can expect to find their Christmas dinner, if they can find it at all, in a food bank. At the same time the banks in this country are still posting almost $4 billion in profit this year.

The minister knows there are loopholes that will allow banks to avoid paying taxes on much of this profit. The government says it needs money. The people of Canada know that money is needed. Is the government prepared to take action so that the banks will pay their full and fair share of taxes this year?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member raised that question, because indeed before this government came into power banks hardly paid any tax, if any at all. Last year they paid three-quarters of a billion dollars in tax and this year they will be paying more than double that amount. There are taxes coming from the profits that the banks are making today.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Finance.

He pointed out that on the weekend the premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, became the sixth premier to express a willingness to attend a first ministers' conference on the economy.

I ask the minister or the Deputy Prime Minister: Now that a majority of premiers are interested in having such a conference, why will the government not announce today an early first ministers' conference on the economy so that the federal government can work with the provinces to create new economic growth and more jobs for all Canadians? What is it waiting for?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member did not hear my answer to the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I will repeat it for him and I will go slowly so he can understand it.

The provincial premiers across the country have met with the Prime Minister and they have given a number of agenda items that they would like to talk about.

The ministers of finance are meeting on Thursday and Friday with the Minister of Finance of Canada to discuss agenda items on a number of the subjects that the provincial premiers wish to discuss.

Once those meetings are over the Minister of Finance will give the appropriate advice to the Prime Minister in co-operation with the provincial premiers. There is no sense announcing a meeting today until the ministers of finance have had an opportunity to discuss these issues, as well they should.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, while this minister is responding with callous arrogance to the concerns we express on behalf of the million and a half Canadians out of work, more and more of them are being added to the welfare rolls.

In its recent proposals on the Constitution, his government said it wanted to work with the provinces to strengthen the economy.

• (1430)

I ask the minister how his government and its proposals can have any credibility with Canadians when just two months later the federal government has not expressed a willingness and in fact so far is refusing to meet with the very provinces it said it wanted to work with to keep the economy moving? Why does this government not have any real commitment to economic growth and jobs for Canadians?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would just ask the rhetorical question: What do you think the finance ministers are meeting about this week? What a silly question.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

In April 1989 this government announced the creation of a Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies. Last March the commission mandate was extended by a year. Last week for perhaps the first time ever, appointed members of a royal commission announced that they were suing the same royal commission in the Federal Court.

How could this government let things get so out of control? Why the gross mismanagement of such a serious matter?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies is dealing with very complex issues regarding research into the reproductive system. You get into surrogate motherhood, sperm banks and organ transplants. They are very difficult. We look forward to the recommendations that the royal commission will bring forth at the end of 1992 and know that they are overcoming some very difficult issues.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the chairperson of the standing committee on health and welfare.

Twenty five million dollars has been spent by this commission and now this commission refuses the medical community for summaries of the commission's funded proposals. Will the chairperson of the standing committee on health and welfare convene a meeting of the standing committee so that members of Parliament of all political parties may question and probe the commissioners of this incredible fiasco.

Mr. Speaker: I just want to make it quite clear that provided that question is strictly directed to what the committee is about to do, the hon. member can answer it. The question was directed to the chairperson of the committee.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, we are having a business meeting of the committee tomorrow. I would certainly be interested in discussing the issue there. I am not certain that the subcommittee on the status of women is the most appropriate venue for such a hearing, but I certainly do think that there should be a hearing on this issue.

TAXATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, may Canadians believe that the elimination of the GST would be a great boon to the Canadian economy and bring us out of the economic doldrums that we are in.

The Minister of Finance said just last night on TV that the money raised by the GST would be difficult to replace.

I ask the Minister of State for Finance: If the government is truly interested in alternatives to the GST why the government refuses to consider eliminating the business entertainment tax deduction, the special tax treatment of capital gains, the special tax breaks for real estate developers, tax breaks for mergers, interest deductibility for foreign owned multinationals, the manufacturing and processing tax credit, the dividend tax credit, just to name several many billions of dollars that the government could look at if it was serious about the deficit, instead of its ideological agenda?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I find it passing strange that New Democratic Party members who stand up here, as their leader did today, and complain about jobs disappearing in the manufacturing industry would absolutely cripple that industry with additional taxes.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, what is crippling the manufacturing sector in this country is the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement brought in by this bunch over there and the fact that they refuse to admit it.

If the government is serious about deficit reduction, as it always says it is, why does it refuse to consider eliminating all these tax loopholes that are benefiting wealthy Canadians while poor people have to line up at food banks on the same day that the government is putting a cap on social assistance in this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, to make a blanket statement like that, one that it is just helping wealthy Canadians, is nonsense.

The various tax incentives that are there are designed to make our Canadian industries competitive with their competitors with the United States and other countries with which we compete.

Certainly we have got to compete with them. We export 35 per cent of what we produce. We have to be competitive. If we followed the NDP policy on taxation, we would be taxing our industries completely out of the competitive field and we would be wiped out by the people whom we have to compete with in other countries.

The tax measures that the hon. member refers to are not tax loopholes. They are tax incentives, and he knows that.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Transport.

At the end of last week, the Minister of Transport indicated in Winnipeg that the government is now seriously examining closing the port of Churchill in the new year, a decision that would have a disastrous impact on the prairie economy and certainly upon the town of Churchill itself.

I want to ask the minister why, when there have been a number of recent grain shipments to the various republics in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, a portion of that grain cannot be shipped through the port of Churchill. Why is this government engaging in a conspiracy with CN Rail to shut down the port of Churchill?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, there is no conspiracy with CN Rail to shut down the port of Churchill.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can only conclude that the government is doing it all by itself, which is no excuse.

I want to ask a supplementary. A private firm called Canada Space Technologies has announced that it has chosen Churchill as a site for a major development because of its rail and port infrastructure, a development that would bring hundreds of millions of dollars of development to the north plus many, many jobs.

Will the government now commit itself to keeping the port of Churchill open to allow this development to go ahead and for some new opportunity to be offered to the people of northern Manitoba?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that there is a commercial company doing market studies to see whether in fact it makes sense to reopen the Churchill Rocket Range. When those studies are complete, we will have the Canadian Space Agency review this whole matter.

CANADA—U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Considering the reaction of the United States to the way the Government of Quebec manages its hydroelectric resources, in particular Norsk Hydro, a decision having to do with Quebec government subsidies for these companies, and now that Quebec is beginning to realize that the free trade agreement is likely to ruin its economic and industrial infrastructure, what measures will the minister take to ensure that Quebec will not suffer even more from the free trade agreement that you signed with the United States?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that the minister is working very closely with the province of Quebec and we have objected very strenuously to the United States about this matter.

We believe that the action taken by the United States in this case is absolutely inconsistent with the GATT and we have made our position very clear.

[Translation]

M. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister if in the coming days he intends at least to consult the Quebec government on that, because it does not agree at all with the approach he has taken in the free trade agreement to protect energy resources, in particular from Quebec.

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that we are consulting with the province of Quebec on this important matter. There is no doubt in our mind that what the United States has done is inconsistent with the GATT and we are taking steps to ensure that we fight this case with everything we can.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The bank rate is down to 7.54 per cent, yet the interest rates on credit cards are two and a half times to almost four times higher on charge cards. Yet this government is looking to consumer spending to get the economy out of the doldrums.

Will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs instruct financial institutions to lower the card rates to the floating limit recommended by the consumer and corporate affairs committee two years ago?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague mentioned, interest rates have not yet been this low in years. This is a direct result of this government's economic policies and I think that we should be very pleased. Interests rates are so low that someone can negotiate a mortgage for a mere 8.25 or 8.5 per cent and personal loans at a slightly higher rate. We had not seen that in a long time.

That being said, by raising this important issue my colleague gives me an opportunity to reiterate in this House that if consumers are better informed, as I have done last week and as my colleague has done on occasions, they can be encouraged to make wiser choices between the various types of loans available and to take a personal loan instead of paying interest on their credit cards.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we know the answer.

Jesse James developed a notorious record for holding up banks. Today we have the spectacle of banks developing a notorious record for picking the pockets of consumers in Canada.

My question for the minister is this, and it is asked in a very positive way. Is the minister prepared to call in the heads of all the financial institutions for a summit meeting and to ask them to drop the rates immediately as part of a national program to build consumer confidence and to allow consumers to share in the windfall profits which the banks have enjoyed?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I know that Jesse James and Ninja turtles are the heroes of my friend. I saw a picture this morning with my friend looking at Ninja turtles.

To be more serious, I met last week and the week before with the head of the Canadian Bankers Association, all the other associations of trust companies and departmental stores. I told them what I said to the hon. member here in this House, that I am concerned about those rates. As members know, those rates went down over the last couple of weeks.

Maybe we are not yet at the bottom of it, but I think we should continue to put pressure on them and make sure that the consumers make the right decisions when they go to their banks.

PATENTED DRUGS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Bill C-22 on patented drugs, which was passed in 1987, ordered a government review of the situation after four years, which means this year. Could the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell this House if pharmaceutical companies have indeed increased their funding for research and development and whether as a result there has been an increase in the price of brand name drugs?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely important question that my hon. colleague is raising. Indeed, Bill C-22, passed in 1986, provided for a review of the effects of this legislation. In fact we have noticed that the price of patented drugs has increased by only 3.1 per cent compared to a 4.7 per cent increase in the consumer price index for the same period, which is excellent since we had set up a committee to monitor these increases.

Also, R and D in the pharmaceutical sector reached a level of almost $300 million in 1990. This year it should invest 10 per cent of sales, the goal set for 1996. Everything tends to demonstrate that this was a good decision and we will continue in the same vein.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Matta family in Edmonton are Christian Israelis. Fhimi Matta was a bus driver in Israel who was asked by some terrorists to place a bomb in an Israeli bus depot. He refused. A decision handed down recently by a credibility panel in Edmonton directed that the family must leave Canada.

Will the Acting Minister tell us today that she and her colleagues will exercise their undoubted discretion in allowing this family to stay in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I am not aware of that specific case. The hon. member knows full well that the Access to Information Act prevents us from providing details. However, I can check with the department and with my colleague responsible, for that matter, and within the parameters of the Immigration Act I can try to follow up his question.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): I understand the minister's colleague is reluctant to do this because Mr. Matta went back to Israel to get his family.

Does the minister know that Mr. Matta was trying to raise money to buy plane tickets to bring his family to Canada? Does she know that he also had to wait for seats to come back to Canada? Does she know that in Israel he was in hiding?

Mr. Speaker: Given the response of the minister, the question seems to be going on a bit.

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, as I said earlier, that I cannot comment on the specific case brought up here in the House.

THE MINT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My question is to the Minister of Labour. The Winnipeg and Ottawa Royal Mints, which are both on general strike, were informed that management is refusing to meet the employees, the workers.

The strike has already cost Canadians over $500,000. Will the minister intervene and appoint a mediator to bring an end to this dispute? It is not only costing Canadian taxpayers thousands of dollars, it threatens the very reputation, viability and future of the Mint. It prevents its men and women and their families from spending a peaceful and worry-free Christmas.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the services of the mediation and conciliation office of Labour Canada are always available in situations such as the one the hon. member raises. However, I am surprised at his question because he is the one who says we should appoint a mediator. I have not had a request from either management or the union to appoint a mediator.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. The minister knows that he has the legal right under section 105 of the Canada Labour Code to appoint a mediator and the obligation under the same law to promote good labour relations in this country.

The minister did it for the post office and the grain handlers, and he can do it for the Mint. Can I please tell my constituent, who has worked faithfully for the Mint for over 30 years and does not want to be on strike at Christmas time, and other striking workers, that the minister will appoint a mediator as he is able to do by law?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): The hon. member is correct when she mentions section 105 of the act. However, the hon. member will know that when a mediator is appointed, the person is appointed in the hope that a settlement is possible. In the previous cases the hon. member mentioned, the requests have come from the parties themselves. In this case, I can assure my hon. friend that if there is a request and we feel there is a little chance of success, I will appoint. But so far there has been no request from either side.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

When samples were taken of the barley waiting to be shipped from Seattle, inspectors found flour mill beetles, Mediterranean flour moths, flatgrain beetles, mustard grain beetles, lesser grain borers, granary weevils, rice weevils and confused flour beetles. These were all picked up from a filthy Cargill elevator and is now going to cost farmers thousands of dollars.

Will the minister do something positive to maintain the integrity of the Canadian grain system, and say there will be no more of these so-called experiments by the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member has a substantive list of beetles and bugs and some things that concern him, and something about confused beetles.

I can say to the hon. member that the Canadian Wheat Board is fully aware of the problem. It is taking steps. It has time to take the steps to fumigate the grain. That will not be done at a cost to the Canadian Wheat Board, as I understand it, or to the producers; it will be done at a cost to the operator whose facilities the Canadian Wheat Board is using to facilitate this experiment.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems clear and many would be suggesting that it is Cargill and the Canadian government that are plotting to undermine the entire grain industry in this country. Cargill ignored proper procedure by loading bins contrary to regulations before the inspections were made, tying up grain cars and shipping which is going to bear demurrage costs while they try to clear up this infestation.

I would like to ask the minister why he refuses to admit that this experiment has been a disaster for farmers, for the grain system and for the reputation of our high quality product?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware, I am sure, that the decision to follow through on this experiment was a decision that was made by the Canadian Wheat Board. The Canadian Wheat Board is charged with doing the best within its power to provide an ultimate return to the Canadian grain farmer.

I am sure the hon. member and his party are continuing to support the Canadian Wheat Board. Why does he now wish to change the direction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

TOURISM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of tourism.

The province of Nova Scotia and the federal government recently signed a $19.3 million tourism agreement but there were no details of how to access the agreement and to obtain funding.

Can the minister tell the House how much of this fund is pre-committed and how groups or individuals can access the money?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I would like to thank my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, for his very timely question. Last week it was announced by the minister for ACOA and the relevant provincial ministers that there is a new program of promotion of tourism, one of the most important industries in Nova Scotia.

Over $10.9 million will be contributed by the federal government and $8.3 million by the province. It will be used for developing products, it will be used for advertising what we have, it will be used for training, and this will go a very great distance to making Nova Scotia better known, not only within Canada but internationally as a tourism destination.

He can apply through ACOA and through our officials and he should know that none of the funds have been pre-committed.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for citizenship.

In light of the recent statements made by the prime minister in Montreal regarding Canadian citizenship in the context of a sovereign Quebec, I would like to know if the government is planning to introduce in the near future an amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act to withdraw the right every Canadian citizen has enjoyed since 1977 to acquire a new nationality while retaining his Canadian citizenship.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, we will soon be tabling a new Citizenship Act. At this time we are just starting to consider the subjects to be addressed, but I cannot see the issue raised by the hon. member as having any chance of being included.

CANADIAN PASSENGER VESSEL ASSOCIATION

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

When the minister was in my riding in Brockville a couple of weeks ago, he assured the president of the Canadian Passenger Vessel Association that he would meet with them to discuss problems faced by that industry. That is very encouraging.

I want to ask the minister if a time, a place and a date for that meeting has yet been established.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport, I will certainly contact him and find out if a date has been set and if one has not been set when he is available I will be pleased to try and set one within my time schedule to meet with them.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister of state for that answer.

I wonder if the minister could give me some assurance that on the agenda of that meeting they will discuss the government regulations that are restricting the passenger tour boat industry to the extent that they can no longer compete with the Americans in this business keeping safety in mind, of course.

I wonder if I could establish with the minister that she will ask the Minister of Transport to make sure that item is on the agenda of that meeting. Could I get that assurance today?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, of course safety is always the first principle with which we look at regulations and I will be glad to take that to the minister and ensure that it is discussed with the owners.

AIRPORT SECURITY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is for the Minister of Transport.

In September 1987 the Ministry of Transport announced a new security plan for Canadian airports, called the Airport Restricted Area Access Clearance Program, or at least part of it was. Under the program airline flight attendants and their spouses had to submit to fingerprinting as well as credit checks and personal investigations conducted by CSIS.

How does someone who has an Interpol warrant against her find herself on her first flight on a struck airline to be picked up by Interpol in Brussels? What happened to the security program this government put into place?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the person in question did not have a personal access pass, only a pass by which they must be accompanied. That plan is in fact in place in airports and is being followed by Transport Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, when all of the airline flight attendants in Canada were required according to this program to go through this kind of scrutiny, if an airline has a labour dispute and is using replacement personnel, are the restrictions then waived to facilitate the quick hiring of scabs?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, nothing is waived in any type of hiring. The passes that are issued are on a temporary basis until a full security check is made and during that temporary period they are not allowed full access. They can only go through the airports when accompanied by other personnel.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Agriculture. This could be the eleventh hour for article XI of the GATT. Since the end of negotiations is just days away, what concrete guarantee can the minister give us today so that we can assure Canadian farmers that their quotas will be maintained?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Canadian government has done all it could in the last two years to defend the Canadian position, which is exactly what farmers in Quebec and Canada want. I can tell you that our colleague, the minister of state for grains, is now in Geneva. After a meeting with the Cairns Group, he had discussions with other officials from foreign countries that share our position on that issue. Also, I will meet shortly with representatives from Quebec and Canadian agricultural groups to discuss the situation and to see how we can maintain the marketing boards in Canada. I believe this is a commitment that the government has taken and has every intention of keeping.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear an assurance from the minister yet. Can he assure us here and now that the quantitative controls that are presently in place at the border will remain after the conclusion of the GATT negotiations? Can he give us that assurance now? Yes or no.

• (1500)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned, it is our intention to maintain the supply management system in Canada. It is our position. It is our policy. We stand by it and we are not going to change our mind.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110, these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

While I am on my feet, I would like to designate tomorrow an allotted day, the final allotted day of this supply period.

CONTRAVENTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-46, an act respecting contraventions of federal enactments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) moved that the bill be now read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 1,050 electors of the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. The people of this riding are concerned about the present GATT negotiations and are asking this House and this government to preserve article XI of the GATT which is so vital to Canadian supply managed agriculture.

I am pleased to give my personal support to this petition as well.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House a petition signed by many residents of Nepean, Ottawa, Hull, Gatineau, Vanier, Gloucester, and so on.

All these residents are calling on the government to take action in order to correct the injustice when it comes to the gasoline prices in the Ottawa-Carleton region.

JUSTICE

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with several hundred names.

I am told by the member for Hamilton Mountain that 100,000 people signed their names to the petition about the tragic murder of Nina De Villiers. These petitioners are mostly from Ontario. Some are from Alberta, I am happy to say, as well.

They are underlining their concern about the criminal justice system, the fact that sentencing of many violent criminals do not reflect the seriousness of the crime. They are asking that the crimes of violence against a person be treated with amendments to the Criminal Code, the Bail Reform Act and the Parole Act accordingly.

TAXATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present.

The first petition deals with discrimination in taxation. These petitioners, mostly from my constituency, point out that for receipted day care, for example, one can get up to $4,000 worth of deductions for children from birth to six years of age and $2,000 from seven to fourteen years of age.

The petitioners point out that there is discrimination as well between married couples and those who are not. They are not looking to have those levels lowered. They simply want to make sure that it is fair and consistent.

They also point out that these particular policies discriminate against the amount of time that parents can spend with their children if they choose. That choice is not really there. There are really very few options.

The petitioners ask that these regressive policies and many others be changed.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my next petition is with regard to the education cuts that have been suffered by all Canadians of almost half a billion dollars this year.

People are really angry about the 3 per cent administrative fee on student loans. They believe it makes a mockery out of terms of globalization, competitiveness and productivity.

The petitioners believe that we need better policy for a stronger, more united, more productive country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my final petition is with respect to the goods and services tax on magazines, books and newspapers.

These petitioners point out that we have never had a tax on these materials since Confederation. They point out that reading and associated materials are the cornerstone of a democratic society such as ours.

The petitioners ask that this regressive, malicious tax be removed immediately.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present 36 pages of petitions which have all been certified correct by the clerk.

These petitioners are calling upon Parliament to take a look at the proposed regulations respecting the closing of the airports in Banff and Jasper National Parks.

For reasons of public safety and mobility the petitioners are calling upon this Parliament to make sure that those two air strips remain open.

It is my pleasure to endorse and support their petition.

UKRAINE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present today a petition from many constituents in Saskatoon—Dundurn of Ukrainian descent.

The petitioners point out that on August 24, 1991 the Ukrainian Parliament declared independence for the democratic state of Ukraine. They also point out that the Governments of Canada and Ukraine have signed an agreement to strengthen contacts in the spheres of politics, the economy, science and technology, education, the arts and other areas as well.

The petitioners point out that Canadians of Ukrainian descent have supported the concept of a Ukrainian homeland for over the 100 years which they have lived in Canada.

They are calling upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence and establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and the people of Ukraine immediately following the positive confirmation of the vote in Ukraine's referendum on December 1.

It has been taken. It has been confirmed and I call upon the government to do as my petitioners so humbly pray.

• (1510)

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the duty to present to this House three petitions.

The first petition is signed by Canadians living from Vancouver to Whitehorse. The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to fulfil its duties and responsibilities to the citizens of the First Nations and aboriginal peoples in Canada by taking immediate steps to recognize the right to use, preserve and enhance aboriginal languages in the Constitution of Canada.

REFUGEES

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): The second petition is signed by literally hundreds of individuals.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House, and especially the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to speed up the processing of any outstanding refugee backlog and refugee claimants' applications.

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): The last petition I have today is signed by many people living in the Hamilton and Burlington areas.

These petitioners join over 100,000 other petitioners in our area of Hamilton—Burlington. The member for Hamilton Mountain initiated this petition. She got together with a family who suffered a tragedy, the parents of Nina De Villiers.

The petitioners draw to the attention of this House and request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and that we should amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of many residents of Brandon—Souris, I am tabling a petition today which asks the Government of Canada to classify women's sanitary products as essential commodities so that the purchases of such may be exempted from the GST.

REFUGEES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour of tabling close to 2,000 petitions which are in addition to the over 2,000 already tabled on the subject of allowing east European immigrants to remain legally in Canada without prejudice.

The petitioners state that east European refugee claimants are being refused landing at the pre-inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews. Many are being prejudiced by the delay in the processing of their claims.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to request the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to speed up the processing of any outstanding refugee backlog and refugee claimants' applications, to accept all persons registered in the refugee backlog who are established in Canada for landed immigrant status at the pre-inquiry humanitarian and compassionate reviews, and to allow any persons registered under Bill C-55 provisions to apply for landing under the self-exile program provided they were in Canada prior to August 31, 1990, the date that the program officially ceased to exist.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present four petitions on the issue of gun control today. The first one calls upon Parliament to enact immediately laws requiring that all firearms be registered and included in a national data base of owners and weapons.

The second one calls upon Parliament in French to do the same thing.

The third one asks Parliament to enact immediately laws forbidding the ownership of firearms in Canada for any person with a criminal record.

The fourth petition calls upon Parliament to enact immediately laws forbidding anyone in Canadian territory from having in their possession automatic or semi-automatic firearms.

UKRAINE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition from the people of Winnipeg, particularly Winnipeg North Centre, who are concerned about the slowness in the recognition of Ukraine by the Canadian government.

Winnipeg has one of the biggest concentrations of Ukrainian Canadians. They have shown their concern not only through petitions but by showing up at rallies such as yesterday's in downtown Winnipeg.

The petition humbly prays and calls upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence and establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and the people of Ukraine immediately following the positive confirmation vote which was held on December 1, 1991.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present several hundred petitions with probably several hundred thousand signatures to add to the over hundred thousand we already have.

These petitions are from Nova Scotia, Edmonton, Toronto, Oshawa, Cambridge, Woodstock and all over southern Ontario.

These petitioners are supporting the parents of Nina De Villiers who was murdered a few months ago. They feel there are serious deficiencies in the Criminal Code. They ask Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society and they ask Parliament to amend the Criminal Code and the Bail Reform Act, 1992, accordingly.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the Ottawa area who are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to correct the injustice to Ottawa area motorists because of high gasoline prices.

The government's hands-off approach to gas prices, as to interest rates on credit cards, indicates its willingness to tolerate this rather pernicious price gouging which frankly these petitioners are objecting to with good reason. I wish to indicate my support for their petition.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 125, 134, 154 and 170.

[Text]

Question No. 125—Mr. Manley:

What is the anticipated gross national revenue in 1991 from the goods and services tax with respect to (a) children's clothing (b) home heating oil and gas (c) air, train and bus passenger transportation (d) non-prescription drugs (e) funeral services (f) postage stamps?

Hon. Donald Frank Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): It is assumed that the hon. member is essentially interested in determining the GST paid by consumers on the expenditures listed in the question.

The data sources available to the government do not provide for an expenditure breakdown for all the categories listed in the question. The following is the closest approximation available to those categories:

Anticipated GST Revenues

($ Millions on an Accrual Basis for 1991)

(a)	Clothing – includes both children's and adult's clothing	1,240
(b)	Home Heating Oil and Gas	345
(c)	Purchased Transportation – includes air, train, bus (urban and intra-urban), boats, and taxis	475
(d)	Non-Prescription Drugs	140
(e)	Funeral Services	not available
(f)	Postage Stamps	not available

Question No. 134—Mrs. Maheu:

With respect to the matter of redress for the Chinese head tax (a) has the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship met with representatives of the Chinese community in Canada to discuss the matter (b) is the government committed to proceed with a redress package ship, and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): (a) On instructions from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship has met with representatives of the Chinese Canadian community on a number of occasions to discuss this issue.

During his most recent meeting with the Chinese Canadian National Council on October 28, 1991 the minister received detailed proposals which he will study carefully.

The minister has also been meeting with representatives of other aggrieved ethnocultural communities. As soon as he has heard from all interested parties, the minister will report his findings to the Prime minister and his cabinet colleagues for their consideration.

Question No. 154—Mr. Jordan:

Did the Solicitor General of Canada recently travel to Victoria, British Columbia, on government business and, if so, (a) how many days did the minister spend in Victoria (b) what was the total cost for accommodation and travel for the minister and the public servants who accompanied him on the trip?

Hon. Douglas Grinslade Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): On October 11, 1991, the Solicitor General of Canada travelled to Victoria, British Columbia to attend the Criminal Justice Association of Canada Conference.

a) One day.

b) The minister was accompanied by one exempt staff member and one contractor and the total cost for accomodation and travel was $1,228.32.

Question No. 170—Mr. Proud:

With respect to members of the Veterans' Appeal Board, (a) who are they (b) what are their salaries (c) what is the term appointment for each member (d) have there been any resignations during the last two years and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. Gerald Stairs Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 95.

I ask that Starred Question No. 95 be printed in Hansard as if read.

*Question No. 95—Mr. Riis:

Did the government assume costs in relation to the activities of the Board of Inquiry on Activities of the RCMP related allegations made in the Senate of Canada (Cogger inquiry) and, if so, what were (a) the costs of (i) counsel representing Senator Michel Cogger (ii) of all other counsel (b) all the other costs?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): In relation to the activities of the Board of Inquiry on Activities of the RCMP related allegations made in the Senate of Canada (Cogger inquiry), expenses which have been paid or will be assumed by the government are as follows:

(ii) All other counsel, $462,695.

(b) All other costs paid up to September 30, 1991, $455,190.

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

CROATIA

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have an application under Standing Order 52.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek leave to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 52 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the unfolding tragedy in Croatia.

The federal Yugoslavian army continues its unrelenting attack against Croatia and has resumed shelling of Dubrovnik. A recent report of the European Community monitors has documented widespread and unprovoked attacks against civilians, hospitals and schools.

Finally, on November 18 this House did have an important debate on this question. I hope that the House would agree once again to debate this issue to look at the very serious situation, including the possibility of the immediate sending of UN peacekeeping troops and the question of Canada's recognition of Croatia and Slovenia.

I hope the House would agree to an emergency debate tonight on this desperate situation which affects the people of Croatia and about which all Canadians are deeply concerned.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway raises a very important and troubling question, but under the present provisions of Standing Order 52, I cannot grant the request of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway for the time being.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and of Motion No. 1.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak out against Bill C-32. I am resuming my debate begun prior to breaking for Question Period when I was discussing what the Prime Minister had said during the last election and during the free trade agreement. He stated that the social programs were sacred and that he would see they were kept sacred in Canada.

Of course we have a bill here that brings about a 5 per cent cap for British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario. That is not bringing about a universal system.

I want to say that during the free trade agreement when these kinds of discussions were taking place and they were talking about the level playing field, these were the kinds of issues we tried to bring before the Canadian people, what this government would be doing.

I want to refer a bit to some of those programs and how it is affecting them. This government brought in the free trade agreement shortly after we came back to the House. After all the profits being made by the banks we have Bill C-21 which makes it harder to get UI and makes it run out more quickly.

Again we have the government bringing in Bill C-21 which will change the whole system. In the past the workers, the employers and the government shared equally in contributing toward that program. Now the government has brought about a change which eliminates its participation in that program. It is strictly an employee–employee relationship. This reverts directly to the free trade agreement, so that it can say to the Americans that it is not subsidizing this program any more.

Then we go to another act that came into the House dealing with the partial deindexing of family benefits. It means families that need money get less each year. This is another program to show its American friends that it is not going to be subsidizing these programs.

The clawback of family allowance and pensions, also partially deindexed, means that the threat of cut off of benefits gets higher each year. Again the government can say to its American friends that it is looking after this and bringing about an order that brings about a fairer playing field.

There have been further cuts to social assistance, to health and post–secondary education. Bill C–69 and Bill C–20 are threatening the future of medicare and accessible education. Again we come right back to the free trade agreement because that is what is happening. This government is systematically bringing about changes to the programs in Canada to try to meet the needs of its American friends.

There is still no sign of the long promised national child care strategy which is so desperately needed in Canada. There is no mention of that during these times.

We have the high Canadian dollar which the former President of the Treasury Board in the last government told the Canadian people was directly related to free trade. The high Canadian dollar was promised to the Americans to offset the kinds of markets we were going to be dealing with.

That high Canadian dollar in Kootenay East has affected our coal sales and our national sales, because it is all tied to the Canadian dollar and how we sell our mining materials. We have had those kinds of problems throughout and they directly affect our social programs.

The GST is directly related to the free trade agreement. What we have seen here is a system of programs brought about by this government to implement its free trade agreement.

The Prime Minister promised the Canadian public that the free trade agreement would not affect our social programs. The Prime Minister said it was a sacred trust. I say the Canadian people cannot trust this government or the Prime Minister to look after our universal social programs. They are under serious threat. We must stand up in this House and defend those programs at every opportunity we get.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the convention on the rights of the child was the main topic of the UN summit on children co–sponsored by Canada on September 29 and 30, 1990 in New York City. I understand that Canada will be adopting the convention for ratification some time this week.

The summit for children made a declaration which was very progressive, very compassionate and very far–reaching for the children of the world and for the children of Canada.

Unfortunately the rhetoric of the government does not necessarily come out in its legislation. We have before us action being taken by the government which indicates that its sincerity in the summit a year and half ago in September and the ratification which is coming this week are mere words. It is not taking the same kind of action for the children of Canada.

One of the government's actions relative to children is this Bill C–32 which puts a limit on the amount of increase the federal government can or will make to the Governments of B.C., Alberta and Ontario relative to the Canada Assistance Plan. The Canada Assistance Plan is basic legislation in the country which was set up to alleviate poverty and support things like the Canada Health Care Program.

If you are poor in Alberta it hurts just as much as if you are poor in Newfoundland. Poverty is always hardest on children. All this discussion about the summit and the convention of the rights of the child is so much rhetoric when you allow children in this country to live in poverty.

For example, one child in six in Canada is poor. There are over a million children under the age of 18 in Canada who live in poverty, making children the largest single group of people living in families on low incomes.

Does the government think that none of these children live in Quebec, Ontario or Alberta? Almost half the number of Canadians who rely on food banks for something to eat part of the time are children. Approximately 284,000 children go hungry and need to go to food banks to eat. An article in The Globe and Mail says:

> As many as 284,000 children in Canada won't have enough to eat this holiday season, a spokesman for the Canadian Association for Food Banks predicts. Gerald Kennedy, who is also the director of the Daily Bread Food Bank in Toronto, said that this estimate is based on the number of households receiving social assistance and relying on the food banks.

There are 50,000 children who go without food part of the time and need to use food banks in Montreal. We could do that kind of liturgy for every one of the large communities across the country.

The government keeps telling us that there are less poor in the world or in Canada lately. Although there has been a decline in the number of children living in poverty in Canada since 1984, there are still more poor children than there were 10 years ago, despite a 3.7 per cent decline in the total population of children in Canada. As if Bill C–32 is not damage enough, we have gone through another series of bills over the last few years which has contributed to the poverty that children live in or the difficulty their parents have taking care of them.

As my colleague has mentioned, Bill C–21 makes UI harder to get and it runs out more quickly. There was a partial deindexing of family allowances and of old age pensions. The clawback of family allowances and old age pensions which have already been partially deindexed means that the threshold for cutoffs of benefits gets lower each year.

There have been further cuts for social assistance and for health and post–secondary education in Bill C–69 and Bill C–20. These bills threaten the future of medicare and accessible education.

This kind of legislation contributes to the malaise that is felt all across the country. It also contributes to the poverty, the need for food banks and the need for more assistance. This bill suggests there is a need for more assistance to these kinds of situations but that need is not in Ontario, Quebec or Alberta.

We are dealing with the problem of disunity in Canada and we are contributing to this kind of disunity by treating some provinces differently. Bill C–23 is another attack by this government on the social programs the government claims it is doing in the name of fiscal restraint.

Fiscal restraint depends on how we spend the money or where we get the money. The government is getting its money from the poor who are the people who need it most. It is allowing the banks to increase their profits by over $137 billion this year. It is not taxing them anywhere near the level that they are taxing the poor. If those banks paid 7 per cent tax on that amount just like we do on every product we buy, we would get a lot more taxation from the banks.

My colleagues and I will not support Bill C–32.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise in opposition to Bill C–32.

Our party has been in the forefront of opposing this legislation when it came to the House earlier in September. I thank my many colleagues who rose at that time to keep the debate going. We opposed it during the budget. We lead the way in opposing it during the committee hearings. Many groups came to us and they had the same perspective as the Liberal Party in that not only do we oppose Bill C–32 but we also oppose Bill C–20.

Those who are interested in looking at the record will notice that last week one member after another rose on amendments and on a major motion to protest to the government about the declining support for health and social welfare.

This week I was struck by two more developments. The first was the articles in the newspaper about the increase in the number of people who use the food banks, particularly for children. As we head into winter I am struck by the number of times we see nothing but negative articles about this. I was fortunate to visit the Soviet Union. I saw the bread lines forming throughout the Soviet Union, particularly in Russia. You say to yourself: How can that country survive the lack of food? You come back home and you look not at the same scale but at the same phenomena. We can no longer feed our youth. We can no longer care for the people who have turned to us for years.

I was struck by the report coming out of Nova Scotia from the Nova Scotia working committee on the Constitution. In its report entitled Canada: A Country for All there is a discussion of social programs on page 28:

Nova Scotians are of the view that our social programs must be preserved, protected and promoted across the country. This includes universal hospital and health coverage, unemployment insurance and all the rest of the net of programs which guarantees a level of assistance to all Canadians.

Interest was also expressed in extending that net through changes like a guaranteed annual income. Other people are worried about the consequences of the changes that are taking place at the federal level.

Let me just say that that paragraph in a capsule expresses the concern about social programs and the implications of bills such as Bill C-32 are not those of the whimsical interests of the opposition parties. In fact they are at the heart of the concern being expressed across the country.

The damage has not only been done by the federal Conservative Party. One of the ironies is that the provincial government in Ontario last week was unable or unwilling—this is perhaps a better word—to contribute to those people on social assistance who so desperately need support. I am sure the member for Kingston and the Islands would have noticed this since it is his province.

According to testimony in front of the committee on finance last week, over 900,000 people in Ontario are now on social assistance. According to some reports, over 250,000 of those people live in metropolitan Toronto.

Here is the jewel of our country being destroyed federally by the Conservatives and provincially by the NDP. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands knows that. One of the saddest things is that in the narrow partisanship of the NDP in this debate, they refuse to address these national issues.

They refuse to understand that the question of tax reform permeates not only federal but provincial governments. They join the ranks of the provincial premier who for endless generations attacked the federal government looking for a scapegoat.

Here we have now the new Messiah in Canadian politics, the premier of Ontario. What does he do? He chooses to attack the federal government. It is an easy way out, but you must be committed to reform across the board and willing to chastise your colleagues when the time comes to chastise them.

The Liberal Party which is more experienced in governing knows full well how to chastise its colleagues when time comes.

Mr. Angus: Tell us about the provincial Liberal government which left us a deficit of $8 billion.

Mr. Walker: The member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan said the Liberal government in Ontario left "us" a deficit of $8 billion. He said: "us", the royal "we". Here we have a voting member of the Ontario legislature joining us. He has a dual appointment. What an anomaly. It is us or them. There was that whole speech by the last member. It is us or them. Tax the rich. Save the poor. It is a great new speech. I have not heard that for 200 years.

What is it with these guys in their analysis? They have not read anything for 200 years. They have no understanding of the changes going on in Canadian society. They have no understanding of how to fight for Canadians. Instead they stand up with these cliches in the House hoping to fool their householders with no understanding of the damage that they are doing.

Mr. Angus: A good example is standing there.

Mr. Walker: The member is throwing some support. That is very kind of him. A multipartisan approach in this thing would be greatly appreciated.

I stand up decrying the misuse of the House for partisan points and wishing that all members would understand that it is the responsibility of all levels of government to help the poor.

I oppose Bill C-32 because it shows the inability of this government and the unwillingness of this government to fight for the poor of this country. I decry those other governments when it takes a mandate on one premise, then turns around and governs on a different premise.

I know parties who have always criticized the Liberal Party: "You campaign from the left but you govern from the right". We are seeing across this country people manipulating and voters given the hope of a better future and it turns around and treats them more miserably than the last government.

It is a shame but one that should be spoken about in public so that all Canadians understand this debate that is taking place.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the bill before us in its timing as it winds its way through this House and on to the other place is a very lousy Christmas present for the poor people and the lower income people of this country.

During my short intervention I want to give an indication of what we are up against. I want to talk about my own community to let you know what the impact has been of the economy brought to us by the Government of Canada.

There is the high dollar, the higher interest rates although they are coming down, which is a plus, and the free trade agreement. We have seen mills close entirely. We have seen work forces at paper mills cut in half. We have seen the woodlands operations almost disappear. One company is planning on making them all but disappear because of the change in operations.

We have seen an increase in general welfare assistance. The number of beneficiaries has gone up by almost 19 per cent from September 1990 to September 1991.

We now have 3,767 beneficiaries in the community of Thunder Bay with a population of about 110,000. Our social services department estimates a 56.4 per cent increase in general welfare assistance expenditures for 1992 over 1991.

We have to recognize that the Canada Assistance Plan is a formula that at one time ensured that provincial governments and municipalities could afford to deal with the fluctuations as the numbers of welfare beneficiaries rose or dropped.

We now find that in Thunder Bay our gross costs in 1992 will be $28.5 million to look after the people in our community who have no jobs, who have no unemployment insurance, who have no disability payments and who have no pensions in order that they can get by in a very meagre way.

We are seeing signs in other areas. There are ramifications from this kind of playing with peoples' lives and peoples' futures. The Lutheran Care community in Thunder Bay provides for people who come in looking for help. In 1991 they gave out 755 hampers up to September or about 84 a month. It is interesting to look at the breakdown of the income source of these people: some 44 per cent are general welfare recipients, 20 per cent are on family benefits, 9 per cent are on disability income; 12 per cent are unemployed, 12 per cent are the working poor and 3 per cent are transients. This is some society we have where people on government income assistance still have to rely on churches and church organizations and community organizations to get by from month to month.

The Do Drop Inn is a soup kitchen operated by St. Andrew's Roman Catholic Church in Thunder Bay. It serves about 80 people a day. That is up 30 per cent from last year. Fifty per cent of their clients are psychiatric patients who have been deinstitutionalized. They were turfed out into the streets without any kind of support whatsoever.

At this time of year when we obviously tend to think of others less able or fortunate than us, we find that in Thunder Bay we are expecting that 2,600 hampers will have to be produced for the Christmas cheer fund to be delivered to 3,900 children and 2,100 adults. That is 6,000 people who need the assistance of charity in order to get by this Christmas. I do not think that is the kind of society we want. By capping CAP we are contributing to that situation in our society.

In our emergency shelter, there has been a 40 per cent increase in 1990 over 1989 and another 18 per cent increase this year. In 1991 they averaged 75 people per day at the soup kitchen.

When the Government of Canada through the first bill and now through Bill C–32 decided to put a cap on the province of Ontario, the province of British Columbia and the province of Alberta, they in effect decided that if you are poor in Ontario it is different than being poor in Atlantic Canada. If you are poor in Alberta, it is different than being poor in Saskatchewan. If you are poor in B.C., it is different than being poor in the territories.

Surely this government understands that you are poor no matter where you live; if you do not have enough money to put a decent roof over your head or to wear clothing appropriate for the climate that we have or to purchase the kind of food that an individual and family needs to get by in a healthy way. Poor is poor is poor. The government says to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia that it is going to slow down the money coming into their provinces because they are have provinces. I cannot speak for Alberta or B.C., although I know that times are tough there as well, but I can tell you that in Ontario we have been ravaged by the recession. We have been ravaged by the free trade agreement brought to us by this government. We have been ravaged by the high dollar that has seen thousands of jobs across the north disappear, not just temporarily but forever. We have been ravaged by the changes in unemployment insurance, so those people who do have a good severance package find their income eroded because of the UI regulations and legislation. We have been devastated by the softwood lumber fiasco that this government allowed to happen. Sawmill after sawmill is closing, woodlands operations are closing and people who have no other skills, who rely on the Canada Assistance Plan to get by, are thrown on a waste heap.

I am the first to admit that money made available to welfare recipients and to anyone on income support, by federal and provincial governments, is insufficient today to meet their needs. There is no question about it. The federal government is saying to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia that they have to do more on their own. It is not going to help them as much. By saying that, the government is telling the people of Ontario, Alberta and B.C. it does not value them in the same way it used to. It does not care if they are hurting. It does not care if they have massive increases in unemployment and welfare rolls. They have to find their own funds.

In previous governments, both Liberal and Conservative federally, when money slowed down from the federal level to the provinces, the provinces found themselves having to transfer the responsibility down to the local level. Provincially and federally, revenues primarily come from income tax, while at the local level it is user fees or property taxes.

Municipalities can no longer afford any increases. In some ways the federal government is transferring its deficits to the provincial level. The provincial levels find themselves shifting the deficits to the municipal levels. It is all the same taxpayers. They all have had enough of this game playing. They are crying out for some kind of fair tax system to ensure that services are provided to those who need them when they are needed in a quality way, without putting people on the streets and cutting back on programs for income assistance, child care, community services support and what have you.

That is why my party has always opposed this bill. That is why we will be voting against this bill. It is wrong, wrong, wrong, just like this government is wrong, wrong, wrong in almost everything it does.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is really quite unfortunate that we are dealing with this legislation, Bill C–32, legislation to put a cap on CAP, the Canada Assistance Plan.

At this date, the House moves toward its adjournment at the end of the week for the Christmas time period. Most Canadians are hoping that it will be a festive season, when in fact the government of the day is the grinch of the day. Canadians will find lumps of coal in their Christmas stockings from the Conservative government this year as in the past couple of years.

It is amazing as well how much damage a government can do with a bill that is two pages long. The legislation we have been debating lately is 300 to 400 pages long, is very complicated, amends a great number of bills and requires a great deal of concentration and scrutiny to see exactly what is being done.

Today it is different. In two quick pages, this government is doing more to try to destroy social programs in Canada than the 400 page bill that we dealt with just the other day. It is important to really put on the record some of the concerns and problems that we have on this side of the House, certainly in the New Democratic Party in any case, over this legislation.

Let us have a little bit of background. "The Canada Assistance Plan, which was enacted in 1966, had the objective then of encouraging the further development and extension of assistance and welfare services programs throughout Canada by sharing the costs of such programs with the provinces and territories". That is official. That is from the Minister of National Health and Welfare in a letter that he wrote to me when I expressed my concerns about Canada Assistance Plan funding and the various programs and how they might apply in my community, primarily the Prince George area.

The result of this government's more ideological view of the world is its concern for Canadians and its drive to really put that Conservative imprint on the social policy in Canada, a policy that is failing in Canada.

There is no question that when you talk to Canadians in each province, you will find that people are rejecting the Conservative view of the world and we are all hopeful that in the election which will come either next year or the following year, Canadians will ensure that they follow through with their vision of what Canada should be at the ballot box and send a strong message to the Conservative Party.

This legislation, which allows for the extension of the 5 per cent limit on the Canada Assistance Plan in B.C., Alberta and Ontario, as my colleague from Thunder Bay said, means you are different if you are poor in Ontario, British Columbia or Alberta. You are different there because this government has decided that those provinces are not deserving of the ongoing commitment to social assistance and social programs that the federal government should be providing.

The very provinces being affected by this legislation from the government are the provinces that likely are going to be in the greatest need of the Canada Assistance Plan. When the economy is failing as it is, because of the GST, because of free trade and the other economic measures of this government, it is these provinces that traditionally in our country have been seen as the provinces in which if you lose your job somewhere you can go to these provinces and try and find other employment and what have you. Unfortunately for many of the people in our country, they end up on assistance, be it in British Columbia, my province, or in Ontario in which the municipalities even have to share in some of the costs.

It must be an incredible burden for some of these local governments in Ontario, given the devastation that free trade and the tax policies of the government have wrought on that province.

The Canada Assistance Plan is an important and integral part of the kind of programming we have put together in this country, the shared vision of Canada between the federal and provincial governments. We have the Canada Assistance Plan, a 50/50 sharing program with the provinces. We have the Established Programs Financing focusing primarily on post-secondary education and health, which is suffering, as I have raised in this House many times. We have the block funding formula which was started by the Liberal Party and now allows some provinces to spend health and education money on highways. We have the equalization formula.

We also have a number of specific federal-provincial agreements which help develop the economic aspects of our country and provide for the different social programs such as forestry in British Columbia. Our agreement there fell far short of what was required. Nova Scotia, as another example, is still waiting for the minister of forestry to actually sign the agreement with that province, though he tells the forestry committee that he hopes that maybe before Christmas some of the ministers who want to get in on this can all get their date books together and find some time to actually sit down and sign on the dotted line, so to speak.

This Canada Assistance Plan plays an important role. It is a vehicle through which the federal government works with the provinces and in some cases with local governments to deliver social assistance programs.

I have done some research in my own area of Prince George.

I have a list of some 20 organizations that are registered by the government as societies that can benefit from this: Mums and Kids Drop-in, Native Friendship Centre, the YM-YWCA, the Home Support, Senior Citizens Activity Centre, Spruceland Parent Participation Nursery, Cerebral Palsy Association. All of these organizations are now likely in the next year or so to realize the impact of what we are debating here today, that two-page legislation. These organizations in Prince George are going to find out in the next year or two what it means to them.

When Ronald Reagan was in office, this government talked about the benefits trickling down. We know that does not happen. We know that under the Conservatives and under the Socreds and under the Liberals it is not the benefits trickling down, it is the benefits drying up. That usually is what happens under these governments.

The key aspect of all of this is that it is a way for this federal government and our provinces to work together to develop the kind of programming which means that for the most unfortunate among us we have some assurances that they are going to be taken care of. There cannot be anything more important for a government to do. Raising and spending tax dollars is not more important than ensuring that its citizens are protected, fed and housed.

It is these kinds of programs that help do that. It is this kind of legislation that is starting to destroy those measures. We hope that some of the members opposite will go back to their ridings and find out what the impact of this legislation is going to be and what changes it is going to impact on them. I hope that when we vote on this bill they will reconsider the government's position, they will reconsider what the government is trying to do and join with members on this side of the House to oppose Bill C-32. I hope they will do that in good spirit, in the spirit of friendship and in the spirit of the festive season.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, this is not the kind of bill that should get a very easy ride in this Chamber. What the bill and this government are doing, and the bill's predecessor Bill C-69 has done the same thing for the fiscal years 1990-91 and 1991-92, to those categories of people is so devastating and so unfair that this bill should get the roughest possible ride almost of any piece of legislation that comes before us here.

This is not something about which we can sit on hands and plead party loyalty, or whatever the glue is that keeps that crowd together over there. It is certainly not common sense. Common sense must have deserted that crowd long ago or it would have many months before coming unstuck as a team over the goods and services tax, just as an example. Eighty-five per cent of the people out there are against it and this crowd is refusing to turn up its hearing aid or is refusing to hear.

Nobody is so deaf as he who will not hear. Has the government not learned any lesson at all as a result of that shemozzle called the goods and services tax? Has it learned nothing as a result of the misery it has inflicted on people with its free trade agreement? How many times do you want to be hit over the head with baseball bats before you get simple messages? Are they all kamikazes over there, all suicide oriented in political terms? What is wrong with this crowd?

They look like normal people. They have nice shirts and ties, or dresses and so on as the case may be, but they behave most abnormally. They do not respond.

One time during my university days, I had the occasion to visit B. F. Skinner in his classroom at Harvard University. He showed me the famous Skinner box. He was the authority on the matter of the Pavlovian response, the stimulus and response connection.

This crowd, including my good friend from the riding of Red Deer, does not respond to the kind of stimulus that Dr. Skinner was talking about. As politicians or as human beings these people do not seem to be reached by things like human suffering. They seem to have awfully thick hides on matters that normal people respond to.

Go out there now to the shopping malls during Christmas and you see normal people who cannot walk past the Salvation Army or one of those Christmas kettles because it is an opportunity for them at this season to say in tangible terms that they feel for those who are down and out. They would like to do something tangible about it.

Compare that and trust that to these people over here. They do not seem to understand that the public, the poor, are going to be devastated one more time by this bill. The poor do not need another kick in the shin from this crowd. They need a bit of compassion. Times are rough out there. They are very rough. They are rough in my province of Newfoundland and Labrador, but they are rough in Ontario.

That is only half because of the NDP government. They would have been fairly rough anyway. They would have been rougher but that is another story. They are rough in Ontario.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Trying to spend the Liberal deficit.

Mr. Simmons: I knew that would get a rise from my friend from British Columbia.

Great British Columbia. There are poor in British Columbia, too. There are poor all over this country.

Mr. Heap: That is right and you can blame it all on the new government after a couple of weeks in office?

Mr. Simmons: My friend from Spadina should know a couple of things. One is that the government in Queen's Park has been there considerably longer than two weeks.

Mr. Heap: Trying to catch up on the Liberal deficit that the Liberals lied about.

Mr. Simmons: He is not only being unparliamentary, he is also being inaccurate.

Mr. Heap: They concealed it.

Mr. Simmons: He is also doing something else. He is giving one of the finest speeches he has given in this Chamber. I am going to make a deal with him.

If he will shut up for the next five minutes, I will sit down and listen to him for ten. As he knows, I only have ten. I love an opportunity to spar with him because he helps the case that I am making here.

The specific case I was making is that Tories seem to be so preoccupied with the political agenda that they have not got time for the people of this country. What the gentleman for Spadina has just done unwittingly is demonstrate to me that the NDP across is no different. All he wants to do is fly the NDP flag and sit here and tell us that the poor crowd led by the arm chair socialist named Bob Rae has only been at it a couple of weeks.

It has had a couple of devastating weeks, I will say to him. God help the people if it stays there very long.

I ask the member for Spadina and the other NDP members in this Chamber plus the Tories in this Chamber to listen to what I am really saying. Would they put aside their partisan agenda for a moment and spend less time defending the Bobby Raes of this world and more time defending the poor people out there who are going to be devastated by this bill?

They are going to be devastated by this bill.

You can call it Liberal deficits or Tory this or NDP that all you want, but when we get into the frame of mind that somehow you can define a person's goodness in this Chamber by what party label he wears alone, it is time to have a good long look at yourself in the mirror, whether you are from Spadina or wherever you are from.

Mr. Heap: You have forgotten. You started it.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, we are hitting a few nerves and that is fair ball.

Mr. Heap: Hitting yours too.

Mr. Simmons: One of the nerves the member for Spadina is hitting is my nerve and he is absolutely right. When I hear that tripe, that absolute nonsense, that somehow the crow of socialists in Queen's Park can do no wrong, I happen to have difficulty with that. As a matter of fact, what he responded to was just a throw away line.

What I was really trying to say, since he is not saying it very well on behalf of the people who sent him here, is that people in Spadina are hurting too. Maybe one of the reasons they are hurting is because of the kind of government in Queen's Park. That is only one of the reasons. There are many other reasons.

Whatever the reason, it does not help a poor person who cannot buy the groceries to know the reason he is hurting unless somebody is doing something about the reason, unless somebody is doing something to help him or her buy the groceries.

Bill C-32 is another nail in the coffin of that government in partisan terms. In compassionate terms and more to the point it is another kick in the guts for people all over this country who have had already far too many kicks in the guts from this uncaring government.

Despite our differences, for the gentleman from Spadina and I and others, I am sure there is one thing that we will be united on. It is our opposition to this particular bill.

I would appeal to my good friend from Red Deer to show the compassion that he has been known for on a one to one basis.

Mr. Heap: You will be voting for our amendment, will you?

Mr. Simmons: I appeal to him to show some compassion to his constituents back home.

As for the NDP amendment, we will have a look at any sensible amendment which does not give us much time to have to worry about some of the stuff that comes from the NDP. We will put doubts aside and have a quick look at its amendment.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I certainly wanted very much to speak on this bill, to strongly oppose Bill C-32 which will cap the federal financing for social services in three provinces, British Columbia, Ontario and Alberta. It contravenes in my view, and the view I think of most people in this House, the whole concept and principle of Confederation and unity in this country.

Many people have spoken and there are many facts that have been put on the record today and other days stating why we feel so strongly that this bill really is anti-Canadian. I want to speak particularly on behalf of my constituents in Vancouver East and people on the west coast along with people in Ontario and Alberta who are suffering very much from increased unemployment, from the regression in our economic circumstances and who are not getting the kind of support services that the Canada Assistance Plan should provide during such tough times because the federal government will not pick up its 50 per cent share of the cost.

I ask the government to recognize that unemployment and poverty have increased considerably in these three provinces as in other provinces. It is grossly unfair that the government should be cutting back on financing for essential services.

It means that the budgets of provincial governments and also local governments are very hard hit. They cannot possibly meet the needs without federal help. There is very little money at all for support services such as day care, training programs, community service jobs needed to also assist people to get out of the welfare cycle.

There is really nothing, no increase at all in funds despite the very definite increase in needs in that area.

Because of the desperate state of the economy, for which the federal government must bear responsibility, we have had a collapse in traditional manufacturing jobs and resource related industries. We have men and women who have worked all their adult lives now finding themselves on welfare and with no chance of getting off social assistance in the future.

I am thinking particularly about Vancouver East in British Columbia, and workers who have worked in the forest industry, members of the IWA who have been union members and have contributed so much to building the economy of British Columbia in the past. They now find themselves out of jobs and not only on unemployment insurance but worse still, now on welfare.

I am thinking of the highly skilled workers who have been involved in the past in ship building in my province and the lack of federal support for that industry which has resulted over the past two years in workers not only using up all their unemployment insurance and their savings, but having to go on welfare. These are highly skilled workers.

Free trade has shut down the garment industry and the market gardening industry in which many immigrant people have often found work, particularly until they could learn to speak English and get into the general economy. Also, free trade has caused suffering to businesses that employ immigrants.

We have increased homelessness, people on the streets, living under bridges in Vancouver. We have young people out on the streets getting into drugs and prostitution and who will never get out of that cycle. They would not be there if their families and communities were able to provide alternatives. In many cases the alternative means programs and support of social assistance during hard times.

It is absolutely essential that the federal share of the Canada Assistance Plan should be maintained in all provinces across Canada. We should have a 50/50 sharing of costs. Why should this government discriminate against three provinces, the so-called richest provinces which in reality have been the hardest hit by free trade and by the recession?

It is not only the impact on people and on services and on the cost of government which is so devastating, but it is really a promise and a responsibility of Confederation which is being broken by this government, particularly by this very regressive piece of legislation which erodes the Canada Assistance Plan, one of our most important social programs on the federal level.

I remember that when the Canada Assistance Plan was brought in, it was one of the better social programs established in Canada. When I was in social work and studying social policy, we always said how important it was. This was a progressive program which should be maintained along with our universal floor of social benefits as part of Canada's responsibility to its citizens.

We opposed very strongly moves in the 1970s and 1980s to try to change the 50/50 method of funding when some people, governments in particular, were trying to go for block funding or to open-ended funding such as we have for established program funding for health care and post-secondary education.

The Canada Assistance Plan was good because provinces and communities could rely on 50/50 funding. When they put out money for social services, including preventive and rehabilitative kinds of services as well as welfare services, they knew that the federal government was obligated to pay 50 per cent back. It meant that we were able, at least in the early part of the 1980s and in the 1970s, to develop preventive kinds of programs as well. Those have all gone by the boards because we have had such increases in the costs of welfare and such reductions by both provincial and federal governments which do not recognize how important this is.

Now we have this government trying to use the Canada Assistance Plan to reduce the capping of CAP, as we say, in three of the largest provinces, and to do so on the backs of the poor.

As I said, we should be maintaining the 50/50 shared costs.

One of my colleagues said that when you are poor and you do not have enough to eat and you do not know how you are going to afford the rent and you have no place to sleep at night, it does not matter which province you live in. It is hard enough on adults who are forced into poverty or who have grown up in poverty and have no chance of getting out of it, but it is a tragedy for children and for young people. It is a tragedy that in a country like Canada they will have no opportunities to hold up their heads and get out of the cycle of poverty.

This government is ignoring the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the sanctimonious remarks that the Prime Minister made when he chaired the summit on children a couple of years ago when he said: "We must give children a better future". His government is not giving children a better future by cutting the very moneys that are needed to feed them.

Bill C-32 certainly contravenes the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

CAP funding is urgently needed to help, particularly with inner city problems. I would like to mention, as an example, some of the needs and projects in my own riding of Vancouver East. We have caring teachers, parents and community workers who have banded together to document the needs for better health care, the needs of hungry children and the fact that they are dropping out of school and getting into other kinds of social problems because they simply do not have enough to eat and because of all of the effects of poverty.

We know that from infancy, even from prenatal situations, poverty affects children and the stress on families is very severe.

There is no surprise at all that when children become teenagers and when they have not been able to function in school they get into youth gangs. The assaults, suicides and runaway children are very common. In our communities, the inner city schools and their neighbours are trying to do something about this, but they must have Canada assistance moneys continued and both provincial and federal funding to help with school lunch programs, nutrition programs, to help with support for families.

I would conclude by imploring government members to vote against this bill. Join us in voting for the children of Canada and fulfil their obligations as Canadians.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favour of the amendment that is before us today, which essentially does away with the single section of this act.

Basically this act is an attempt to starve the Canada Assistance Plan out of existence, starting with the three provinces that in a previous time were the wealthiest provinces in Canada. As a result of the policies of the current government, virtually every province in this country is operating on the edge of bankruptcy. It does affect first and foremost the three provinces British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, which used to be considered under a more favourable political and economic system the have provinces of Canada. Under the current government they have been reduced like virtually every other province in the country to have not status.

My concern about this bill is that it does not even do what the government claims it is going to do. The government says this bill is necessary in order to cut the costs of government so that government can trim its expenses and reduce the deficit, which is largely a result of the interest and principle payments on the national debt. Statistics Canada has already pointed out that the major cause of the debt and therefore the major cause of the deficit in this country is not the social programs. It is not program spending, as the Conservative government would have us believe.

Statistics Canada pointed out, in a study initially suppressed by the government until it was forced to release it, that 44 per cent of our national debt is due to tax and other concessions granted to large corporations, the wealthy and the powerful in this country.

Fifty per cent of that debt is attributable to the high interest rate policies, not only of this government but also of the former Liberal government. High interest rate policies have resulted in the ballooning of the debt. We now see a debt that is approaching something in the neighbourhood of $400 billion as a result of those tax concessions granted to the rich by both the Liberal and Conservative governments, as a result of the high interest rate policies.

According to Statistics Canada, only 6 per cent of Canada's debt can be attributable to the costs of social programs. The government should be targeting the 44 per cent by reducing some of those tax concessions to corporations, especially the ones not serving any useful purpose, that do not result in what the Conservatives believe in terms of the trickle down theory, because it does not trickle down. Everybody knows the reason it makes tax concessions to the wealthy and to corporations is so they can keep their wealth. They can keep their assets and not pass them down to other people. If you want something to trickle down, why serve the middle man? Why not pay that money directly to the people who require it and stand to benefit from it, the poor and those in need of social programs in this country.

It simply does not trickle down. It is a policy that does not work. It has been demonstrated decade after decade after decade that it does not work. Because it is a part of the ingrained ideology of Conservatives, and Liberals when they are in office, this theory continues to dominate the legislation in this country.

If we want to cut the deficit, do not do it by cutting social programs that everybody knows are not responsible for the deficit. Do it by cutting useless tax concessions to the rich. It has been pointed out in previous debates in this Parliament that we allow a billion dollars in tax to go uncollected in order to finance business entertainment expenses for people involved in large corporations, wealthy people.

One billion dollars. We could reduce the deficit in a single year by one thirtieth if we cut business expense deductions. It does not do Canadians any good. There is no demonstrated value that comes from that business expense deduction. One billion dollars.

Eliminate the ability to deduct losses sustained in businesses overseas from profits earned in Canada. Again, that would save hundreds of millions of dollars from deductions which are allowed to Canadian businesses operating overseas, which serve no useful purpose for people in Canada. Billions, hundreds of millions. There are tax concessions that have been made to business by Liberal and Conservative governments over the years which serve no useful purpose and are responsible for 44 per cent of the national debt. Yet this government has done absolutely nothing to cut those. In fact over the last eight years, it has increased them. The rich are doing even better than they were in the past while the poor have been suffering more.

On October 14 I read an article in Maclean's which talks about one of the world's wealthiest men. The eighth wealthiest man in the world is Kenneth Thomson. According to Maclean's he makes over $27,800 an hour whether he is awake or asleep, living or dead; $27,800 an hour. There are many people in my constituency who would enjoy making in a year what that man makes in a single hour without lifting his hand or doing anything. He makes $4.4 million in a single week. This is the kind of person who benefits from the tax concessions that are granted by this government and by previous Liberal governments in order to assist him to make $27,800 an hour whether he is awake or asleep, no matter what he does. Nobody in Canada should be making that much without paying their fair share of the tax burden in this country.

We should not be cutting programs like the Canada Assistance Plan that basically benefits the poor, the sick and the people in need of government services until we start taking the fair share of taxes out of the $27,800 an hour that Ken Thomson is making by the sweat of other people's bodies.

I was reading in another magazine article that Canadian corporate executives are paid at least 100 times what production line workers are being paid. That is the spread between income of production line workers and Canadian corporate executives.

In Japan, a corporate executive makes only 16 times what a production line worker makes. Why are our corporate executives paid so much and why are they not paying their fair share of taxes? Instead, this government brings in legislation like this and who does it hit hardest? Abused and neglected children in need of protection, mentally and physically disabled persons, single parent families, seniors, the unemployed and the working poor, battered women, families and individuals in crisis.

What kind of a country are we living in when some people pay virtually no tax at all and are making $4.4 million a week, $27,800 an hour. The government does not touch them at all, except to augment their income with tax concessions, and yet legislation like this attacks the poorest of the poor, the people who need those services the most.

I would urge members, if they have any compassion at all, to read this legislation, understand what its impact is going to be and vote against it. Support this amendment by the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time in less than a week that I have come over to the House to speak on an issue that strikes at the very heart of what it is to be a Canadian.

Legislation that was put through this place last week at report stage, I believe it was Bill C-20, sought to transfer this government's economic mismanagement on to the backs of the poorest provinces. This bill today seeks to transfer this government's economic mismanagement, not just on to the backs of the poorest provinces, but on to the backs of some of the poorest people in our country.

There is something inherently wrong with a society, a government, a country as wealthy as Canada, perhaps the wealthiest country in the world, when the government has squandered the resources and has been misdirected in where those resources should go. In the middle of the recession we are in—a lot worse than anything we have seen I think since the dirty thirties–in the wealthiest country in the world, we have in every community in Canada line-ups at food banks. We have churches whose resources are stretched to their limits.

My riding of Dartmouth is a wealthy city. It is fairly well off with one of the lowest unemployment rates in Atlantic Canada and a large industrial base. It has a lot of people with two incomes, two cars and a condo. But many times they forget that right in their midst, in the city of Dartmouth, there are individuals who because they cannot find a job or can only get a job that pays $5 an hour, cannot even afford to feed their children. They cannot afford to put decent clothes on the backs of their children. They are living in accommodations that no Canadian would be proud to say was a result of this great nation Canada and our absolute failure to redistribute wealth in this country.

I mentioned the churches in my riding of Dartmouth. I was absolutely stunned, shocked. I talked to Rev. Chang, an individual who has done much to try to reach out and help people in our community who have been shut out of the greatness of our economy, even during good times. He tells me that the number of individuals who have had to cash in their pride and integrity and stand in line waiting for a Christian handout from the churches in my community is growing almost exponentially. The people who have tried their very hardest to contribute, keep their integrity and provide for their offspring, have seen this recession bang the hell out of them.

At the same time that the ranks of the poor are multiplying like rabbits, we saw the spectacle last week of the Canadian chartered banks posting record profits. The vice-president of the Royal Bank sent me a nasty letter today because they do not like what I have been saying about their profits. We see the Royal Bank post a one billion dollar profit in the middle of a recession. We see the Bank of Montreal post the highest profit since it received its charter. We see businesses going out of business hand over fist in this country.

There is something inherently wrong when the government comes and tells us, through this bill, this regressive piece of legislation, that it can no longer afford to pay its fair share, to spread the wealth around to the poorest of the poor. It does not have the resources and everybody has to bite the bullet a little more.

What about the big banks and financial institutions? I do not know that any of the shareholders of the Royal Bank would go out of business if their profits were $750 million instead of $1,000 million, $1 billion. Two hundred and fifty million bucks would go a long way to fill hungry stomachs just before Christmastime right across this country. It is the same for the Bank of Montreal or any of the institutions.

We have become preoccupied in this place with dealing with special interest groups and putting forward legislation to make sure that the tax system is fair for Canada's largest corporations. We make sure that individuals who have a trust do not have to pay tax on income from the trust. Then the government comes forward and says: "Our hands are tied, poor kids. That little grumbling in your belly is going to have to last a little longer because we do not have the bucks to do it". Perhaps the government does not have the wherewithal or stamina to do it.

I talked to a colleague of mine in the Senate today, an individual who held the seat before me, Senator Forrestall. We talked about how wealthy this country is and how unfortunate it is that there are so many Canadians who cannot take advantage of the wealth and the resources that we have. That is the role of government and has been the role defined for government since this country came together. We have enshrined, right in our Constitution, the principle of equalization. That makes sure the wealth we have in this country belongs collectively to all of us. It is the role of government, through the instruments of government, this place and through legislation, to spread that wealth around. We have tried to do that since 1867. We have taken regions like the Atlantic, and at times the prairies, and have helped one another. We have used the tools of government and the uneven distribution of growth and wealth, but nevertheless wealth, to ensure that there is nobody in this country who should have to do without.

The government comes in the middle of a recession, and says: "Well certain provinces are better off than others so we are going to go after British Columbia and we are going to go after Alberta and we are going to go after Ontario and we are going to put a cap on CAP", knowing full well what that means. It means that you have lessened the provincial government's ability to provide minimal service to the poorest of the poor. That is what you are doing here. The province of Ontario is in the middle of a recession. You have seen the manufacturing industry which was the heart of Ontario's economy absolutely devastated because of free trade and because of this government's crazy economic policies. Ontario is where the wealth is created in this country. That is where the tax base is that allows governments to redistribute wealth.

Not only does it drive the Ontario economy into a recession but then a little further on it says to Ontario: "Now that we have driven you into a recession, we are not going to help you as much as we should help you look after the poorest of the poor, the hungry, the homeless, the downtrodden, the elderly and those who need our assistance the most. We are not going to ensure that you are able to provide that level of assistance".

There is something drastically wrong with a government that brings in such a mean-spirited act as this one which caps CAP.

A lot of people think that the poor have no voices and in many cases they do not. They are faceless in too many of our communities. I have three children. I have a little girl Danielle who is seven and Matthew who is five and I have a six-month old baby at home. When I think of the concept of an individual having to worry in this society today about whether or not their children are going to have a warm meal in their belly, it makes me sick.

Everybody likes to talk about the welfare bums and the poor. I will tell anybody in this House or anybody out there on the far right wing of society that if they think that individuals in society choose to be poor, then they are crazy. It is demeaning, it destroys integrity, it destroys your ability to dream. Consider a child who is brought up in poverty. The biggest crime that we perpetrate on that child as a society is that we destroy their ability to dream. When you do that you desensitize them and you ensure that their chances of becoming a full participant in society are pretty damn minimal.

The New Democratic Party opposite has come in with a motion that basically says—and that is what we are debating here today—that the cap on CAP legislation or the enabling legislation would basically die because it is a one clause bill and they want to delete it with an amendment. I agree with them that the clause should be deleted. But I also agree with those tens or hundreds of thousands of Canadians who say that we have to re-establish what our priorities are. Our priorities are to feed our own, to redistribute wealth and to give the poor back the dignity that they so richly deserve but which is withheld from them so often.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favour of the motion that we have put forth with respect to capping the CAP. It is with a lot of regret and some emotion that I rise to speak to this bill because this is a bill that is indicative of what we are doing in this country to the poor and to those who are living below the poverty line and those who are struggling to keep above the poverty line.

We have in this country a major problem with the redistribution of wealth. Speaker after speaker in this party has been rising condemning that action and calling for some logic and some direction with respect to those Canadians who are deeply in need of an opportunity to get themselves out of the financial situation they are in.

The government has not been doing the job. There have been over the years a number of non-governmental organizations or NGOs that have been established. These groups are struggling as well. Although this particular motion and this particular bill only affects the three provinces Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia there are ripples right through the entire system. This is not the only bill that this government is putting forward. It is not the only action it has done. NGOs across this country are suffering and these are the ones who more and more are striving to fill the gap that is being left by governments.

In my own riding one of the most active groups is Transition House. Transition House is in Moose Jaw which is a small town compared to some of the cities in this country. It has a population of about 35,000. Transition House has one home. It is overcrowded. It is in need of expansion. They have no money for that. They used to be paid quarterly. They are now being paid monthly, making it very difficult for them to operate and to budget. Their funding has gone up far less than inflation has. In some years it has not gone up at all.

They are struggling. For example they were told by the former provincial government that they could manage on one eight-hour shift. Transition House is open 24 hours a day. It has to be open 24 hours a day because no one knows when tragedy is going to occur or when a situation arises where a mother, a wife, is going to need Transition House. They cannot have a sign on the door advising people to have their problems occur between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m.

What they have been doing is keeping Transition House open 24 hours a day on an eight-hour salary. The only reason Transition House is open is because of the commitment these people have made toward their fellow Canadians.

They would also like to have a child counsellor position because there are many children going through Transition House. These children are in need of counselling. Children suffer the most during such incidents and such tragedy. They are impressionable and their experiences at this tender age have an effect on them for the rest of their lives.

In the city of Regina they have managed to bring in a child counsellor position but not in Moose Jaw. Regina is suffering very much as well, but they have no money for that. This government has gone so far with respect to the GST that they are actually having to absorb some of the GST costs, which is devastating.

If it was not for the commitment of these people and the dedication of its director, Marilyn McCrea, and others then that facility would be unavailable to people. We also have Moose Jaw Family Life which is a counselling group. There is also Moose Jaw Christian Counselling.

We just had a lobby group that came to Ottawa recently to talk about its problems in the area of mental health and the need for governments to pay more attention to those areas. I just mentioned two facilities in Moose Jaw that are doing what they can to help counsel those Canadians who in many ways have many problems that stem from economic incidents or are made worse because of the economic situation. Many situations either go untreated or are accentuated because of the poverty that exists in many of these homes. It is not because people are lazy or not because people do not want to try. It is because they are being denied an opportunity.

We have in this country a situation where more and more it is a country of the haves and the have nots. It is very fine for us as MPs with our generous salaries and some other Canadians to live in comfort and go home to a nice home and a good meal knowing there is a pay cheque coming in. There are other people who know they have no opportunity for that.

These counselling facilities are desperately needed and they are struggling just as Transition House is struggling to survive and to provide a service. There are committed people that are determined to make sure those facilities survive. And yet they are getting less and less help and less and less guidance and less and less support from this government.

We have another facility called Thunder Creek Home Care which provides facilities for elderly people who are trying to stay in their own homes. Many of them are on fixed incomes. Certainly in my riding most of them are on fixed incomes. Their incomes have not been rising with inflation. They have increasing costs and Thunder Creek Home Care has been attempting to help those people. They are suffering as well.

In the rural area of the Moose Jaw riding there is a tremendous need and much of it is directly related to the economic situation in this country. There are farm families in rural communities that are literally dying. There are all kinds of family problems and all sorts of situations that can be directly related to the economic problems that exist in this country. Those people need help from this government. The Canada Assistance Plan instead of being cut should be increased to help these people through their situation and to get on their feet but it is not happening.

Along with the poverty of course is another institution, which is food banks. Today I was reading in The Globe and Mail that 284,000 children are using food banks in this country. That may come as a surprise to the minister for external trade who says that there are no people in this country who are suffering from poverty. In fact in a speech he recently gave in the U.S. he said that we are spending our money on things like culture and the arts and so on and that no Canadian goes hungry. That was an unfortunate statement to have been made but it was made and it is comments like that that really put a lie to the facade that this government has been putting up with respect to aid to Canadians.

There are 284,000 children requiring food banks in this country. That is something that is hard to believe. The fact is that many of these people live below the poverty line and we talk about cutting back on the Canada Assistance Plan. But at the same time why is it in this country that people living below the poverty line are forced to pay income tax? Does that make any sense? Why is the government not amending the Income Tax Act to say that people who live below the poverty line will pay no income tax? That would help. But that does not happen. We do not see tax reform on the basis of helping Canadians who are suffering economically to get back on their feet.

We have a government whose income tax programs are helping wealthy Canadians and it is doing very little to help redistribute wealth in this country. This bill that is in front of the House is a tragedy and a mistake and it is something that we as a Parliament should be ashamed to even have in front of this House.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, ever since I came into this House and even before that I have listened to some of the parliamentary debates. I keep hearing references, particularly from the government side, that this is the wealthiest nation in the world.

I guess if you were a member opposite circulating among the elite of society as you are wont to do, you probably would be saying that this is the wealthiest nation in the world. It would not really matter if it was not because you would be living well enough that if it was not the wealthiest one in the world, you would not be able to tell the difference anyway. There would be enough to buy the caviar, enough to buy the best wines, enough to take the best vacations, enough to hob-nob with the best people, enough money to have a private box in the SkyDome and enough money to be able to buy the prime shares on whatever stock exchange you felt like investing in: Toronto, Tokyo, Paris or London. I suspect you would invest in any and all of them because you would be putting your money where it did you the most good.

I suppose there are some people in this House of Commons who would say that we live in the wealthiest country in the world. I cannot say that. From my experience I know that we are not the wealthiest country in the world.

An hon. member: Wealthy is relative.

Mr. Fisher: Yes, wealthy is relative. If you are talking about the number of people who are going to the food banks—which I think is a pretty good measure—then by that measure alone it is impossible to say we live in one of the wealthiest countries in the world.

• (1650)

There are innumerable countries in the world where children are not living in the abject poverty that they are in this country.

It certainly is obvious since I came into this Parliament that the prime reason why Canadians are becoming poorer and poorer all the time, and there are some pretty good statistics to show that and I will get into that presently, are the policies of this government. Certainly we in this party and for the most part, the opposition, have been arguing against such things as free trade.

We have been arguing against those policies of the Conservatives, this Conservative ideology, this monitorous scheme that was so much of the philosophy of Ronald Reagan. These are the successors of Ronald Reagan and his contemporaries while he was in here. Fortunately that anomaly, that out to lunch president, has departed the scene.

When they brought in the changes to the unemployment insurance, we told them over and over and over again that if you require people to work longer in order to qualify for unemployment insurance and then pay them less once they do become unemployed, having become unemployed as we also told them to a good measure because of the free trade agreement, not only were the citizens of the country going to be suffering from it but also the provinces, which is obvious, and municipalities, also becoming more obvious every day. That was going to be the logical outcome of what these people were up to.

I guess the Prime Minister was telling the truth when he said: "Give us 20 years and you will not recognize this country". It has not taken them 20 years. It has taken them not a mere eight years yet. They have accomplished I am sure what is far beyond the dreams of Milton Friedman, far beyond the dreams of the monitors, far beyond the political philosophy of this Conservative government to enhance the pocketbooks of the rich in this country at the expense of the rest of the people.

I would suggest that the upper 20 per cent of this country are enormously well off. The upper 10 per cent are living in a wealthy situation that is impossible for the other 90 per cent of Canadians to even imagine.

In that instance, the Prime Minister was telling the truth. I must say that this country is unrecognizable. I must choose my words a little more judiciously. Since this government was elected in 1984, inflation has gone up by 29 per cent. Corporate taxes have gone up by 17 per cent albeit from 1986 to 1989 they actually declined in relation to the figure I am about to give you.

Corporate taxes since 1984 have gone up by 17 per cent. This is far less than inflation. I am not going to keep anyone in suspense because the individual taxes have gone up by 103 per cent. Is it any wonder that Canadians are becoming more and more impoverished every day? It is no mystery to me or to the people I talk to on the doorsteps of my constituency why they are so much worse off.

One of the main themes which I hear constantly on the doorstep of Saskatoon—Dundurn is: "Ron, we have never been worse off. We have never been worse off". The figures show this.

In the 1960s, disposable income grew by 34 per cent. In the 1970s, disposable income grew by 22 per cent. This was still not too bad. Any of us who lived through the 1960s and the 1970s would realize that we did not do too badly. Things did improve. We were able to get a new car every three years or whatever it was. We were able to supply, without too much effort, the food, shelter and the education of our children.

In the 1980s disposable income grew by .5 per cent, one forty-fourth per cent of what it was in the seventies.

There is no mystery to the people I have talked to on the door steps. It is no mystery to me why some young people who started work in 1980 have not been able to make any progress at all in so far as being able to better themselves within our society.

Whatever happened to the concept of upward mobility? With figures like that, this who concept, this whole basis on which our society is economically established, upward mobility has come to a grinding halt. The predictions for 1992 and beyond are not that disposable income will grow, but that disposable income will decline.

We come to a bill like Bill C-32, a cap on CAP. The government says: "We have to do this. We have to cut back on these transfers to the provinces". It has got nothing to do with the debt. What it has to do with is the mean spirit of this government which takes a look at this block of people, mostly children, the elderly, the handicapped, single parent mothers, women who absolutely need the kind of help that this gives insofar as transition houses are concerned, houses for battered women. The government looks at this block of people in our society and says: "Those lazy, no good bums. People on welfare are lazy. If they are not going to work, we have to do something to try to force them to work".

It is completely beyond my comprehension how the government can give so many tax breaks. Someone else has pointed out that tax breaks to corporations account for 44 per cent of the federal debt. Fifty per cent of the federal debt is accountable for the high interest rates we have had to pay on the money that we had to borrow because getting it from the corporations was forgone.

The only reason these people are making these kinds of changes to the legislation, the only reason that they are holding this back, is because they believe that if they do this they will be able to somehow or another save the national debt. It escapes me how they can give the gigantic tax breaks to corporations and say that is an incentive. If they want to give an incentive to people who are poor, why can we not treat them the same as we do the corporations?

What is wrong with putting a decent amount of money into the pockets of the people who are receiving social assistance? It seems to me that an incentive for one ought to be an incentive for the other and this government in its mean spirit says: "No way".

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am not necessarily happy to be taking part in this debate. It is not the kind of debate that Parliament should be having, given the circumstances the country is in.

I want to start by saying that the test of how civilized any society is is how well it treats its old, its sick, its poor and its children; how well it protects and preserves its environment, its wilderness and wildlife; how well it treats our aboriginal peoples; how well we help those unfortunate human beings in the poor countries of the world.

Governments and societies that do not learn from history are condemned to repeat it and we are doing that now. The situation Canada is in now is equivalent to, and in some cases worse than, conditions we had in the dirty thirties. From 1930 to 1935 Tory governments under R. B. Bennett reigned.

I remember as a child of 10 hearing the grown-ups say: "Tory times are tough times". From 1935 to 1940 under the Liberals of Mackenzie King the tough times continued and in some respects got worse.

Both governments pleaded: "Where are you going to get the money?" The government is talking the same way now. It has not learned anything from recent history.

By 1940 every municipality, school board, provincial and federal government in this country were in debt and some were broke. My own province of Saskatchewan was bankrupt. You could not give its bonds away. There was no credit rating and the people were in the depths of despair and poverty.

"Where will we get the money", the government asks. There are several ways it can get the money. It can pick up another $1 billion or $2 billion by closing dozens of tax loopholes that still exist and benefit corporations and the wealthy. It could get the money by enforcing and going after the collection of what is politely called a tax gap, the collection of over $10 billion worth of unpaid taxes in this country. It was $10 billion in 1987. You can bet that it is a lot higher than that in 1991. In 1987 are the last figures that The Financial Post, and not some socialist periodical, came up with out of a report of Revenue Canada itself.

It talked about the tax evaders and the tax avoiders, the tax delinquents, all of those who can afford chartered accountants and lawyers to take advantage in every possible way of the tax law. Even when the tax avoider or tax evader loses to a successful challenge by Revenue Canada, there are a few types of taxpayers likely to change from non-compliers to compliers, to quote The Financial Post.

There is much to be done in this country and we have no excuse for not doing it. I have mentioned two areas in which billions are there to be obtained over the next year or so. I cannot say that I am speaking on behalf of my party in this instance. I am one of those who has been a close follower of John Maynard Keynes. In tough times you borrow and you spend and in good times you tax and repay.

If I had my way, over the next two years we would run the deficit up by another $2 billion, $3 billion or $4 billion, whatever is required. There would be short-term funding for food banks. My God, when I was a youngster in the dirty thirties they were called soup kitchens. It is refined now to food banks.

The fact is that it is a blot on our country and a disgrace for any government in any society to keep on putting up with that. The only way to get rid of deficits and debts is following policies of full employment. Why not establish a municipal fund from which municipalities can borrow? If the government can get the money at 7 per cent, then let the municipalities have it at 5 per cent and subsidize the interest rates or let them have it at 4 per cent, or in the first year pay all the interest charges.

The federal government is the one that has the complete control and authority on monetary and fiscal policy of this country, not any one province, not any municipality or school board and my hon. friend opposite cannot run away from it.

This country has scores of municipalities whose infrastructures need rebuilding and enlarging.

My God, we are still running raw sewage from Montreal into the St. Lawrence River. When are we going to see to it and do our part in helping to correct that?

Scores of municipalities across Canada have to fix and rebuild and modernize sewer and water systems, streets and sidewalks, power lines. That means jobs. It puts hundreds of thousands of people to work and they pay taxes. There is not a city or a large town in this country that does not have a list as long as your arm of people waiting for a house, waiting for a chronic care bed. Why are we not investing? A gain in construction means more and more jobs in low income and co-operative housing, federally, provincially and municipally.

We could put, over the next several years, a quarter of million people to work just cleaning up our air and our water. This will take some courage. It will take flying in the face of conventional wisdom and the typical Tory and Liberal line: "Where are you going to get the money?"

When we had a declaration of war all of a sudden there was a lot of money, lots and lots of money. I submit that we should now have a declaration of peace and make the same kinds of effort in fighting a war on poverty, illness, poor housing and our environment, to a greater extent than we ever did during the Second World War.

It is going to take that kind of effort, with the whole nation behind it. It has to be led by a federal government and it has to be led by this Parliament. The more we sit and wring our hands, the more we sit and rely on old ideological, worn out, wasted excuses and reasons. Where are we going to get the money? The money is there. What we need to do is challenge Canadians to roll up their sleeves and do all these things that need to be done. A policy of full employment will do more to wipe out deficits and substantially reduce if not eliminate the national debt.

That is what is required. We did it following the Second World War. If we translate our debt in 1945 into 1991 dollars, our debt then was as great or greater than it is now. It took us 10 or 12 years to pay it off. We financed the entire Second World War without a nickel of foreign investment, without a nickel.

We continue to sell out our economy for the sake of attracting foreign investors so that they can come in, make a profit and take the money out. They usually borrow the money from us. They financed the takeover of our economy and our country with our own money.

There are all those things to be done by this Parliament.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, actually it is not a pleasure to speak on this particular piece of legislation, but certainly we have to speak out against this and hope to bring the government to its senses on what it is doing to medicare.

I have just returned from Kamloops after having spent the last three days visiting people in their homes and talking to people in the shopping malls and going door to door throughout the small business community. When I asked people if they are aware that the Mulroney government is in the process of eliminating medicare in Canada, they said: "No".

I reminded them of Bill C-69. They do remember that because it put a cap on the contribution the federal government provided for medical care and hospital care across Canada. They said they remembered that and they remembered people saying that this was the beginning of the end of medicare in Canada. I reminded them of this Bill C-32 which extends that process.

It is interesting to look at the pages and pages of testimony before the committee. I have the testimony of a number of expert witnesses in the health care field, the professional people who operate our health care system and people who have professionally studied the health care system of Canada. Virtually every one of these people who appeared before the committee pleaded, begged and said to stop this bill because it was the end of medicare in Canada, one of the hallmarks of Canadian citizenship.

We all know that each year there are hundreds of thousands of people, nay millions of people who would love to come to Canada, become landed immigrants and eventually citizens of this great country. They know there are a number of benefits that accrue to Canadian citizenship and one of them is medicare. It does not matter where you live in this country, whether it is in Newfoundland, the territories, British Columbia or the prairies. You have universal health care. Today we find that the United States of America is holding up the old Canadian model and saying: "This is the model that we want to have in the United States".

This government, these cabinet ministers and these back-bench Tories are in the process of dismantling the medicare system that is the hallmark of Canadian citizenship. We say that is wrong.

The people of Canada recognize what the government is doing to the country and our health care system. The people of Canada, through our efforts as members of the opposition, will find out that every single one of these experts in health care has said this legislation is the death-knell of medicare in Canada. The Conservatives should be chastised for initiating this legislation. They should be tossed out of office. Canadians will put the New Democrats into office and we will once again put medicare back on the sound, financial footing that it should be on so that no matter where you are in Canada you will have access to this great system.

I cannot believe that my friends across the way are doing this. What do they have against sick people?

Mr. McDermid: We are not and you know it.

Mr. Riis: What do they have against people who are ailing?

An hon. member: They are not your friends.

Mr. McDermid: What nonsense. What poppycock.

Mr. Riis: There is my friend, the minister who says all these experts are wrong; oh, yes, he is right or his colleagues are right, but all the experts are wrong. I say I will throw my lot in with people who professionally know what health care is all about. I will say to my hon. friend—

Mr. McDermid: Where are you going to get the money?

Mr. Riis: He yells out where am I going to get the money. I will tell the minister where we are going to get the money. There are 69,000 profitable corporations in this country that do not pay any income tax at all. That is where some of the money should be coming from.

In any other country of the world when you inherit vast amounts of money and invest vast amounts of money you have to pay some taxes, but not in Canada. If you are a wealthy family and you are receiving millions and millions of dollars bequeathed upon you by your family, do you have to pay income tax in Canada? No. That is because those wealthy families have their friends across the way. They are called Conservative cabinet ministers who give privileges to the wealthy in this country and they pay for it by dismantling medicare.

Mr. McDermid: What nonsense.

Mr. Riis: We say it is absolutely wrong. It is unCanadian. Why should we be surprised by an unCanadian act by this government. Show me an area, whether it is in broadcasting, the economy or social policy, where this government has done a single thing to benefit the people of Canada other than a handful of wealthy people. We cannot find it. We can look under every report and initiative that has come out of this cabinet and we will not find it.

People around the world are perplexed because they know in their own countries they do not have this type of service. You think of what is going on, for example, in what used to be Yugoslavia today. The Croatian people are suffering by the tens and hundreds of thousands at the hands of a Serbian led army. People are defending themselves, their homes, their properties and their families with hunting rifles against tanks, artillery, air force and navy bombardment. The Serbian led Yugoslavian army, as we speak, is destroying historic monuments designated by the United Nations as historic treasures of the earth. They include old hospitals, churches, historic towns, cities and areas being bombarded presumably to break the Croatian people psychologically. They look at us and wonder why on earth we would be dismantling something as wonderful as medicare when they are struggling simply to maintain their own homeland against these barbaric forces.

When you think about it, 500,000 Croatian refugees are trying to leave the country wherever possible or seek refuge with family, friends or neighbours. An incredible hardship is being placed upon innocent people in that part of the world, and yet our government refuses to recognize the country of Croatia.

A number of Conservative backbenchers have asked the Prime Minister, as have others, to recognize Croatia but the government has not done it. Has it asked the UN Security Council to send in peacekeepers? No, it has not.

When I listen to the backbenchers of the Conservatives calling upon their government to take action, and they are being ignored, why would I be surprised at the government ignoring all of the experts when it comes to health care? When it does not even listen to its own backbenchers on something as life and death as the situation in Croatia, why would it listen to any of the people who understand health care recommending against the passage of this particular bill?

It is simply part of the old process. It is the father knows best approach to government. The Prime Minister says: "I am big brother. I know what is best for you Canadians. I know you do not agree, you do not support us, you do not support me, but I know what is best".

That is what a dictator says. That is what a leader of a totalitarian government says. At this sad time this is what our Prime Minister says. He knows best, the people of Canada do not know what is best, the experts do not know what is best, but our Prime Minister does.

It is a sad day when we think that. For years and years we have developed one of the world's finest health care systems. This government, starting a few years ago with Bill C-69, decided to end medicare in Canada. It decided to have maybe some health care for profit in some parts of Canada. Some of the wealthier provinces will be able to sustain the absolute destruction of medicare, but the poorer parts of Canada will not be able to maintain the level of health care.

In terms of national standards they will be gone because the federal government has given up its leverage when it fails to participate at reasonable levels in the funding of health care. It is a very sad day. It is a sad day for Canada, a sad day for Canadians, and a sad day particularly for all of those men and women who dedicated their lives to establish a decent health care system in this country. Regardless of whether you were wealthy or poor, an eastern or western Canadian, no matter who you were, you had access to universal health care. In the future that will not be the case and it will be the Prime Minister of Canada and his government that will have used the wrecking ball on what we have known as medicare in Canada.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, we know where the headaches are. They are right over there on the other side of the Chamber, right across from the opposition.

The government has brought in a bill to extend the cap on CAP for another three years. When the cap on CAP was first brought in, the godfather of the first cap on CAP was none other than the former Deputy Prime Minister, Erik Nielsen, old velcro lips. He was appointed chief honcho to take a look at all the government programs and see where he could cut fat and save money for the taxpayers.

• (1720)

He looked at the Canada Assistance Plan. He said: "It is a very good plan, a very good plan. It does a lot of good things". He then said: "You cannot have these open-ended agreements". The godfather of the cap on CAP is old velcro lips Erik Nielsen himself. When it comes to poor people, when it is time to transfer money to the less fortunate people, he is a tightwad, a scrooge. He is not the scrooge when it comes to his own spending.

An hon. member: Tell us about it.

Mr. Rodriguez: The members says: "Tell us about it". Here is this guy who wants to spend like Santa and save like Scrooge. He spends like Santa on himself. This same Erik Nielsen recently put himself up in a Vancouver hotel for two nights at a cost of $1,000. He took a motor trip from Ottawa to Whitehorse, Yukon for $5,865. He took a slow car from Ottawa to Whitehorse, Yukon.

Mr. Heap: Did he buy the car?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is a good question. Actually you could buy a new car with that money. He could buy one of the airlines in this country right now for that kind of money. Between November 1 and November 3 he was in Edmonton where he stayed at the Fantasyland Hotel for two nights at a cost of $403.20.

Mr. Heap: He has been in Fantasyland for years.

Mr. Rodriguez: The entire trip from November 1 to November 3 cost taxpayers $1,888. Then he was off to Vancouver again from November 10 to November 12. The air fare was $1,805 and the hotel accommodation for two nights was $973.44. That is over $2,700 for a two-day visit.

This is the godfather of the cap on CAP. This is the person who sat and examined government accounts. It was this gentleman, Erik Nielsen, who said: "We have to tighten the belt and trim the fat".

We must remember he was in Fantasyland. This person is spending taxpayers' money. Why did he not think of cutting his own fat and saving taxpayers some money? I see government members on the other side. It is all right to applaud after the horse has left the barn, after the money has been spent.

It took an exhaustive search and fight through the freedom of information office to get information on this kind of spending. It seems it is an old adage: if you look after the pennies, the dollars will take care of themselves. Members on the other side represent only one interest: the fat cat interest. They are not interested in the people who are suffering as a result of some of the things they have done.

That is part of the Tory culture. They have never been sensitive to the needs of people who work hard for a living. They have only been interested in and only benefited those who invest. They said: "Oh, no, you are not being fair". Government members say to me: "You are not being fair". Let me try to be fair for the record.

I am looking at The Financial Post and at an article that appeared on August 29, 1990. It says: "Big corporations leading tax evaders". We are talking about tax evasion here, not tax avoidance. There is a big difference.

Here is what the article says: "Revenue Canada estimates that the so-called tax gap, the amount owed but not paid by Canadians, hit $10 billion in 1987, the last year for which an estimate was available". That is almost four times the 1977 level.

We are talking about tax not collected. When a widow in my riding owes a few hundred dollars to Revenue Canada, we can see how tough it is on her. It sends out the knee breakers, the letters. It threatens. It is tough. It is tough in collecting.

Then the member of Parliament gets involved and says to the Revenue Canada people: "How come you are so tough on poor people? Inco owes you all kinds of taxes. Why do you not get as tough with them? Why do you not go over there and tell them that you are going to break their knees, that you are going to send some boys over?" Why does the government not do that? Why does it not put a lien on the mine or garnishee its receipts?

It will not do that. It will not do that at all. I want to suggest very seriously that it deliberately complicates the tax laws of this country so that its corporate friends avoid paying the tax.

They should read the tax act. They all get up and piously say: "We have to simplify the language of the tax act". There is piety over on the other side about the simplicity of the tax laws. The government has been in office now for seven years and we have not seen any simplification of the tax laws of this country. The government has made them more complex, more complicated. Corporate tax law is extremely complicated.

What does a corporation do? It simply goes out, hires fancy tax consultants, tax lawyers and tax accountants and it avoids paying the taxes. Even when it gets nailed, it does not pay it. It appeals it and it goes through a whole procedural rigmarole and it never, for years, pays any taxes. It does not for years.

I suppose some of them are skiddled off to the sunshine states where they can set up shop and avoid paying. The tax structure has been so jiggered that now the government collects about 45 per cent of its revenues from ordinary taxpayers. From its corporate friends, it collects about 9 per cent of the total revenues.

This is a new switch. This is a new concept of a medieval view of Robin Hood. Robin Hood used to take from the wealthy to give to the poor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. For the last couple of hours we have not had the pleasure of hearing any of the Liberals respond to this bill. We are wondering whether the Speaker is no longer able to see any Liberals or whether the Liberals are no longer fighting to protect the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member that was not a point of order.

• (1730)

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, had the hon. member been here he would have heard the number of Liberal speakers who spoke all morning and all day, but because he was absent he did not hear them.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is wonderful to be complimented by someone who gives bald men a bad name in the House of Commons.

The amendment before the House of Commons today is an amendment which deals with Bill C-32. Bill C-32 is the bill that will extend the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan up until 1995. It is an extension of Bill C-69 which became known in infamy throughout Canada over the last year when people realized that through this bill there was an attack, as my friend from Kamloops has said, on the medical care system and the health system in Canada and on the post-secondary system. We spoke to that part of the extension last week.

Bill C-32 deals directly with the Canada Assistance Plan which deals with the transfer payments of the federal government through to the provinces for matters of social assistance and all those matters interprovincially and within the provinces that deal with, for the most part, those who are less able to care for themselves through usually no fault of their own.

The amendment from my friend and colleague from Essex—Windsor is an amendment that would simply delete that extension. By taking away clause 1 of Bill C-32 it effectively does away with the bill and we go back to the system as it was set up and as it should be.

I speak in favour of that but in opposition to the idea behind Bill C-32.

In the Montreal Gazette on December 7, 1991 a letter from Southam News' Eric Beauchesne points out in a headline: "Abandoning the job hunt". In that article he says:

> Thousands of unemployed, frustrated by a lack of job opportunities, quit looking for work last month and that's all that kept unemployment from rising above an already dismal 10.3 per cent, analysts said yesterday.
> Employment fell by 49,000 in November but the unemployment rate remained at October's level because 45,000 workers also dropped out of the labour force, Statistics Canada said.

Statistics Canada further reported the week of December 7 that job prospects are their bleakest in seven years.

What does the unemployment rate and those that dropped out of the job market have to do with the Canada Assistance Plan? Where do these people go? They can no longer get unemployment insurance because this government changed the rules. It made it harder for people to get unemployment insurance and for those who can get on the unemployment insurance rolls. It shortened the period they can continue getting benefits.

In today's job market, as has been shown in this article and many others, it is clear that these people want jobs. They want to work. They need money to keep food on the table for their families. The average family has over two children each. It is these children who unfortunately suffer as a result of the poverty of their parents.

When they can no longer get unemployment insurance, they run through any savings that they have been fortunate enough to carry over the years. Where do they turn?

They turn to social assistance. The welfare programs are carried on by provinces or in some provinces by the larger cities themselves. They have to turn to these people.

Those 45,000 who dropped out of the market are some of those same people who are now looking at alternative methods of financing themselves, often and probably through social assistance. The money that comes from that social assistance has to be gained somewhere. By robbing Peter to pay Paul, the federal government is shirking responsibility to those people who have been hurt by the fiscal and monetary policies that this government has been following since 1984.

In the evidence given before the finance committee looking into Bill C-32, Lise Corbeil of the National Anti Poverty Organization, stated: "Bill C-32 will have an incredible negative impact on poor people. They are asked to tighten their belts in the name of deficit reduction, to trim the fat from their expenses while the National Council on Welfare study proved that there is absolutely no fat to trim when you live on welfare. To the federal government, CAP is one among many budget items on an expense sheet. It is just a line. To people living on social assistance, CAP is a lifeline. Welfare is their means of livelihood. It is not an intellectual exercise to try to balance a budget".

That brings out very graphically what the problem is with this government capping the Canada Assistance Plan.

As the unemployment roles increase and more people go on welfare and social assistance and as more people transfer into provinces such as Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, the three provinces hurt by the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, the provinces are forced into either cutting back services or increasing taxes within those provinces that most need the assistance of the federal government because of that immigration from other areas of the country and other areas of the world. Those people come into these most desirable areas such as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia and it is these three provinces that have had their assistance capped by the Canadian government.

Who is hurt by this policy? The poor, the poverty stricken, those who have nowhere to go, those who depend on this as a lifeline. It is a lifeline of the children who are hurt through the lack of assistance from this government.

It is interesting to note that one child in six in Canada is classified as poor. More than 1 million children under the age of 18 live in poverty. It is an interesting and sad commentary on today's life in Canada that almost half of the Canadians who rely on food banks are children, an estimated 225,000 children.

An hon. member: Shameful.

Mr. Whittaker: It is shameful. It is unfortunate. It is something this government must take into consideration. It must look at its policies. Many poor children live in families struggling on 50 to 60 per cent of poverty line income.

At a time such as this, leading into Christmas, it has become more and more apparent: the long line-ups at food banks; the number of people living in poverty; those who will not be able to sit down to turkey and stuffing or have gifts under the tree; those who will not be able to enjoy Christmas as Christmas should be enjoyed, by children and by all of us. It is hard to remember the joy of the season when you do not have food on the plate to feed your children and as a child your stomach is empty.

We have to do something about this bill and I suggest to this House that the way to do it is by supporting the amendment. I would ask this House to consider that amendment strongly and pass it.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that the very parliamentary day following December 6, the National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women, that we should be standing in this House debating a bill that extends the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

On Friday members of the government were standing in this place decrying violence against women and saying that we must end the situation that creates violence against women. They were saying that we in this House of Commons must take effective action to end violence against women. They were saying that we must provide the services that battered women so desperately need in this country to escape from violent situations.

It is ironic and it is sad. It is sad because this Bill C-32 will have a chilling effect on the building of shelters for battered women. The Canada Assistance Plan is the only funding mechanism in place right now for providing shelters for battered women. Now the government is extending this limit on funding until 1995. It is such hypocrisy. All the people in the House heard it say on Friday: "We must take action to end violence". Yet it is cutting from the very services that these women so desperately need to get out of violence and to break the cycle of violence.

It is beyond me. It is beyond me how this government can brag over and over again as it did again on Friday about its family violence initiative fund and then cut and then continue to cut from the services that women need.

It cut the social programs. It cut shelters for battered women with this bill. It is cutting child care spaces as well with this bill and we all know what a desperate need there is for child care in this country.

CAP is the only funding mechanism in place for child care spaces. The government knows how badly they are needed. The situation in Canada for child care is desperate. In fact today when a woman becomes pregnant in Canada, probably the first thing she does after getting that confirmation from her doctor, if she is a woman who works outside the home, is go and put her name on a list at a child care centre. She is hoping that by the time her child is two years old she may have child care. But they still wait years and years and years to find suitable child care in this country.

This government has refused to honour the promises it made in 1984, the promises it made in 1988 and the promises that it has made in throne speeches over and over again to provide Canadians with a national child care program. Now it is extending the funding cuts again from the only vehicle in this country that funds child care spaces.

It does this with the rationale of saying: "We are only capping the funds to five per cent". It calls it capping. In reality we know with the rate of inflation and everything else it is an actual cut in services. It says it is doing this in the name of fiscal restraint and it says it is only doing it to the rich provinces that can afford to take this capping. This government also knows that over 50 per cent of the poor in this country live in these three provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

In my province of British Columbia we have a food bank in Vancouver that is there simply and only for women and children. What has it come to in this country when volunteer organizations and church organizations are organizing food banks for women and children? The fact is that 50 per cent of the poor live in those three provinces. They are just as poor as the poor in other parts of Canada.

Those women who are beaten in those provinces are just as black and blue, just as degraded as the women in any other part of Canada.

This bill is just another example of how this government has decided to place the burden of paying off the debt on the shoulders of those who can least afford it, those who are not responsible for the debt.

Statistics Canada has shown that the spending on social programs is only responsible for 6 per cent of the national debt. In reality it is the tax breaks to wealthy people and to corporations that are responsible for 44 per cent of the debt.

The government has not targeted the cause of the debt to resolve it. Corporate taxes from 1986 to 1989 declined by approximately 20 per cent even though those profits increased by 34 per cent during the same time.

In fact the Statistics Canada figures in April show that taxes increased the most from 1988 to 1989 for those on the second lowest rung of the income ladder, with an increase of 1.1 per cent. But those in the highest income levels saw taxes rise by .9 per cent and those in the second highest by only .3 per cent.

Is this what the government means by tax fairness? Is this its idea of what it calls tax reform? It seems more like tax deform than tax reform.

These figures only confirm that those who should be paying for the deficit are not. Tax loopholes for the wealthy and for big corporations amount to more than $6 billion a year. For $6 billion we could have a heck of a good child care program in this country, one that meets the needs of all of Canada's children.

The Tories have not made a single move to get rid of the loopholes that were caused by the previous Liberal government. It had its commissions when it was in government and ignored the recommendations it received for tax fairness, just like this government does.

The largest group of people affected by this bill, of course, are children; the children and the poor of this country. Contrast the government's action with its commitment to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. I want to ask the government how removing money from social assistance will help children to escape from poverty. It is ironic that Canada plans to ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, since Bill C-32 will have a devastating effect on the health and the well-being of the children in this country who rely on social assistance, over a million children in Canada.

We are one of the wealthiest nations in the world and we still have a million children living in poverty. We are second only to the U.S. in the level of child poverty in the industrialized world.

These children, these battered women and the poor of this country are the ones who are being asked to pay the price for the tax loopholes that are offered to the wealthy and to the big corporations. I want to ask, is that just? Is that fair? Is that tax reform? I do not think so.

As if Bill C-32 is not causing enough damage, when you put it together with all the other regressive actions of this government the future for Canada looks very bleak indeed. Bill C-21 will make UI harder to get. The de-indexation of family allowance benefits means that families get less and less and children get less and less each year. There is the clawback on family allowances and old age pensions.

Further cuts to social assistance, cuts to health and post-secondary education, Bill C-69 and Bill C-20 are threatening the future of medicare and accessible post-secondary education for all of Canada's people.

There is still no sign of a child care policy. Promise, promise, promise, nothing but broken promises from this government. This is just another Tory attack on social programs which the government claims it is doing in the name of financial restraint. But it is clear this is a move about politics. This is politics, not money, not fiscal restraint, and these politics amount to more breaks for the friends of the government and a life of poverty and hunger for millions of Canadians who are burdened under the weight of high taxes and a tattered and weakened social safety net beneath them.

This really is a government of grinches at this time of the year.

• (1750)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): The present economic situation is disastrous, Mr. Speaker, and it is definitely a bad time to be capping the Canada Assistance Plan.

The poverty rate in the greater Montreal area is at an all-time high. More that 15 per cent of the people living on the island of Montreal is made up of poor families, that is to say 200,000 more than in the four Atlantic provinces combined. At least 60 per cent of welfare recipients in Montreal have been on the welfare rolls for two years. The unemployment rate in the Montreal area—the statistics were released on Friday—is still 12 per cent. What can be done to get out of this slump? During these difficult economic times, the government wants to cap the Canada Assistance Plan.

According to Statistics Canada, 45,000 workers have been dropped from the list of people looking for work not because they found jobs, but for the majority because their unemployment insurance benefits ran out and they are now on welfare.

My office is in the same building as the welfare office and I can assure you that every time I take the elevator I see unhappy people. There are a great many of them and in my riding as elsewhere the welfare office cannot keep up.

Our unemployment insurance offices cannot keep up with the demand. What about our welfare offices? There are over 10,000 homeless people in Montreal alone who spend the winter in subway stations. With the freezing temperatures we have in this country, what do you think they are going to live on this winter? Food banks—I just happened to be reading in the newspapers last weekend that Sun Youth, an organization which does a great job, cannot keep up with the demand the Holiday Season being just around the corner. The shelves are empty. There is not enough food to go around.

It surely is not a good time to make cuts, to cap public assistance. Last Friday we heard from both sides of this House statements on violence against women as well as on violence in general. Every morning I look at the newspaper when I get up and every day I read that someone somewhere was shot or killed. Why? Because they have nowhere to stay, nothing to eat, no job, nothing. We can see the result: increasing violence. The number of violent crimes is increasing every day.

The government has the responsibility to do something, to help in this very difficult period. There will be, I hope, as you do, Mr. Speaker, better times in this country, but for the moment the situation is so bad that we have to help people in need so they too can have some hope.

In Montreal—and this is not the first time this is mentioned in the House—exams had to be scheduled so as to coincide with the receipt of welfare cheques, because after a couple of weeks there is no money left and children come to school hungry, a fact which is not exactly conducive to good performance during exams. This is so serious it is almost unbelievable.

In Montreal East—I am giving figures for the whole of the island of Montreal, but there is the west, the centre and the east—it is totally unacceptable. We have never seen such a situation before.

I urge the government to revise its plan, to drop its decision to cap welfare payments, and to give to those who are in real need. During the Christmas season it is important to give. It is important for people to believe there is light at the end of the tunnel, that there is hope for a better tomorrow. What if we abandon them? Of course the government will argue it is strapped for money, but is it the right time to make those cuts? Is it the right time to deal with those financial problems?

The government had a number of good years. There were years when the economy was in good shape, and that is when it should have dealt with those problems. Unfortunately they were incapable of dealing with those economic problems and that is why we are in this recession today. The government keeps cutting. If you keep squeezing a lemon when there is no juice left, the result is the kind of violence we see every day not just in Montreal—I am from Montreal so I am very aware of this—but across Canada.

I hope the government will be able to listen to members on both sides of the House, because I am sure there are government members like yourself, Mr. Speaker, who share this view. Perhaps, in the spirit of Christmas, we should set aside political partisanship, withdraw this bill and increase welfare payments so that Canadians living in poverty can hope to have a Merry Christmas.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this motion doing radical surgery on Bill C-32. It is an amendment but it is radical surgery.

This is a bill that imposes a significant amount of belt tightening on our public finances in this country. It is belt tightening but we must look and ask who we are asking to tighten their belts. Who is going to do the belt tightening here? It is the poor and the hungry. It is not those who have the decent pay cheque coming in every week and who still have a job in this recession. It is the poor and the hungry.

The government says this is just a marginal impact on transfer payments, the Canada Assistance Plan payments that are paid to the provinces. It is marginal and puts a limit on the increases but every single dollar of that margin is being borne on the backs of the poor and the hungry. It is not marginal for that class of people in this country.

What was a two-year plan is now a five-year plan. It is extended out another three years and involves another $2 billion. I want to ask the House to contrast the fight that was waged by the Public Service in this town and across the country on the matter of the zero, three and three wage control and the imposed arbitration. That was a big fight. That was a strike. There was dislocation of government services right across this country and yet this bill is going to impact just as much and maybe more on the poor and hungry of this country.

Where are they? I would venture to suggest that many of them do not even know what is happening here. Who is here to speak for the poor and the hungry right here now as we approach the Christmas season? The timing is terrible.

The reason why the belt tightening has been made necessary is the failure of this government to address its fiscal management in the mid-1980s. It ran up a deficit that began in 1982 and 1983. It escalated and it kept on coming year after year right through the good years when we had an opportunity to put our finances in order.

I am very critical of the government for permitting this situation to occur.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your time has expired.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION ACT, 1991

The House resumed from Wednesday, December 4, consideration of motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991, be read the third time; and of the amendment of Mr. Walker (p. 5662).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to order made Tuesday, December 3, 1991, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the amendment of Mr. Walker at the third reading stage of Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment lost.

The question is on the main motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent to apply to the main motion the results of the vote just taken on the amendment, but in reverse.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We do not have unanimous consent. The next question is on the main motion.

All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion negatived.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

BANK ACT

The House resumed from Friday, December 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion for third reading of Bill C–19, an act respecting banks and banking.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I will try a second time and I hope to have more luck than with my first attempt. If you again asked for the unanimous consent of the House, we maybe could apply the result of the vote that was just taken to the next motion.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois was not consulted on that procedure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Is there agreement to apply the result of the vote that was just taken to the next motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there is no unanimous consent, I must proceed with the vote.

The vote is on the main motion relating to Bill C–19.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity that I am being given today to focus attention on International Human Rights Day. This event is of particular importance at a time when, more than ever, the peoples of the five continents have legitimate aspirations to freedom, social justice and the rule of law.

Today we commemorate the 43rd anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on December 10, 1948. The world has changed radically since then. Considerable progress has been made in many areas, especially on the world political scene.

In the past two years alone, we have seen the tearing down of the Berlin Wall, which symbolized the cold war, and revolutionary changes throughout eastern Europe. The improvement in east-west relations has had a ripple effect: the reunification of the two Germanies and the holding of free elections in eastern bloc countries are impressive testimony to this.

The Communist regimes of eastern Europe have collapsed under the pressure of the democratic aspirations of peoples too long deprived of their individual and political freedoms. In Africa, several countries including Benin, Ivory Coast, Zambia and Namibia have chosen the path of democracy.

[English]

In South Africa the apartheid system is being dismantled. In Asia elections have been held in countries such as Mongolia and the Philippines and at last the end of the rivalry between the two major blocs has enabled the United Nations to revive the co-operative spirit of the charter. The UN has regained its decisive role in maintaining international order and in seeking to resolve conflicts.

This new climate of co-operation and this emerging new world order along with disarmament talks have allowed a redefinition of the concept of security based on socio-economics far more than on military foundations.

Our concept of security must now be adapted to suit a new environment that includes all threats to global peace and stability.

Chronic poverty, debt, socio-economic disparities, destruction of the environment, unresolved regional conflicts, governments with repressive regime, all these socio-economic pressures represent threats to world peace and call for international joint action and ongoing political dialogue among all countries. A better understanding of the human factor and recognition of the universality of such fundamental values as individual and political freedom are essential to the advancement of all the world's societies.

Respect for human rights and the maintenance of peace and security are closely related, as are freedom and human development.

• (1010)

Our own country's security is also closely tied to our openness to the world and our desire to build a united Canada with democratic, economic and cultural freedom, a Canada that is proud to promote its values and convictions beyond its borders, a Canada that will play a leading role on the international scene in the 21st century.

The promotion of human rights has been one of the cornerstones of Canada's foreign policy for several years and is manifested in various types of activities. These include: our support for international institutions such as the United Nations Commission on Human Rights; our policies in favour of human rights and democratic development in our bilateral relations; our material and technical assistance to countries and institutions to support the promotion of human rights; the creation of an International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development; Elections Canada's support to the electoral process; and our development assistance program.

Canada's membership in international institutions such as the Commonwealth and La Francophonie consitutes a decisive factor in the quality and credibility of our political dialogue with other countries.

Canada's influence on the international scene is increasingly effective in efforts to achieve greater respect for human rights. The growing credibility that we have acquired beyond our borders stems from the quality of our activities and the vision that we seek to share with all human societies. Under the remarkable leadership of the Prime Minister, Canada has distinguished itself by its firm positions and innovative initiatives.

At the closing of the Dakar Summit in 1989, the participants issued a joint statement calling for respect for human rights and for the right to development. This statement, proposed by Canada, clearly defined the link between individual rights and the rights of peoples.

At the World Summit for Children, held in New York in September 1990 under the co-chairmanship of the Prime Minister of Canada, not only did Canada play a very active role, but we have also honoured our commitments through concrete initiatives, including our important financial support to the universel immunization program.

At the Commonwealth Summit in Harare last October, the issue of human rights was raised at Canada's urging. Canada played a leading role, as well, in the decision not to hold the fourth Francophone summit in Kinshasa, in the presence of Colonel Mobutu. The summit was moved to Paris.

I think that I must also mention Canada's support to Haiti's only legitimate leader, President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, who is in our country right now and whom I will have the pleasure of welcoming to Ottawa in a few minutes.

And yesterday, Canada suspended approval of new aid projects to Indonesia as a sign of indignation following the recent killings in East Timor and to reflect our concern about the human rights situation in this country.

Finally, the Prime Minsiter of Canada's firm position on human rights and democratic development set the tone for discussion and for the final declaration of Chaillot. Let me quote the key passage:

> Gathered to reaffirm our solidarity and our firm desire to work together actively to shape a better future for our peoples and for the international community— we, the heads of state, government and delegations gathered at Chaillot thus intend to live up to our historic responsibilities and to respond to the legitimate aspirations of our peoples in a new international context.

This new international context is sending us clear messages that call for a shared concept of the rights and freedoms associated with human development.

The whole world is moving irreversibly toward greater respect for human rights and freedoms.

This movement is based on growing awareness of our interdependence and our common destiny and on a broadly shared desire for global development that is both democratic and sustainable.

Mr. Speaker, 43 years ago in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights the peoples of the United Nations proclaimed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women, and determined to promote social progress, better standards of life and greater freedom. This is the fundamental commitment that the international community has made: These are the values that Canada defends and will continue to defend with conviction.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in this House today to draw attention to International Human Rights Day. Today we celebrate the 43rd anniversary of the world's adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

I agree with the minister. The world has changed radically since December 10, 1948. Some progress has been made in the world political scene. The Soviet Union, as an example, no longer exists as we knew it. This former superpower is now more than willing to work with its former adversary, the United States, to seek common ground on global issues rather than pursue the previous path of a balance of terror.

The Berlin Wall has come down, highlighting the end of the cold war and revolutionary changes throughout eastern Europe. Several African, Asian and American countries are choosing democracy. There is a world-wide movement toward democracy and no longer will people quietly be subject to authoritarian rule.

1991 has become the year in which we have become evermore aware of the tragic victims of violence around the world. Since we last proclaimed International Human Rights Day, the world has been at war with Iraq.

Yugoslavia continues to tear itself apart amidst ongoing violent struggle. In the Middle East, though human rights violations continue there is a beacon of hope with the peace talks.

A new internationalism is waiting to be born, based on the common goals of the elimination of poverty, a recognition of the fragility of the environment, and the slow recognition of the basic rights and dignity of every person and people.

Everywhere, including former Soviet socialist republics, the struggle for self-determination is the order of the day. The key word here is the word "struggle". With the freedom we enjoy as Canadians comes a responsibility to help reshape and redefine a new world order.

Canada has had a tradition of pursuing an international foreign policy, particularly under Prime Ministers St. Laurent, Pearson and Trudeau. As we face new challenges we can again be a voice in this birth of international co-operation, openness and compassion which will seek to free all people.

My leader, the leader of the Liberal Party, said in a foreign policy speech over a year ago:

> I am realistic about our ability to influence the course of events in a world where others often have larger stakes, or larger means, than ours. But Canada does have a respected voice and shares legitimate interests with many countries. We lead when we contribute a well-rounded vision of the world, or when we speak up for international law and mediation, or when we show that we care for those who suffer elsewhere in the world.

The minister speaks of Canada's support for international institutions such as the United Nations or the government's stated policies in favour of human rights and democratic development in our bilateral relations. Of late, however, there have been many examples in which the actions have not lived up to the rhetoric.

I think particularly of East Timor. It was not until yesterday that the government suspended approval of new aid projects to Indonesia as a sign of indignation following the recent massacre by Indonesian troops of an estimated 200 unarmed East Timorese.

This tiny nation was struggling toward independence and self-determination only to be invaded by Indonesia in 1975. The people of East Timor have suffered one of the most ruthless attacks in modern history. On a per capita basis the atrocities committed against the small population of less than a million people are higher than those committed by, as an example, the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia. As many as one-third of the people of this small south Pacific island have perished due to the initial war and subsequent acts of violence, starvation and disease perpetrated by the Indonesian army.

This week December 7, 1991 was the 16th anniversary of this invasion and the action of this government. While we recognize it, I am afraid it could be too little too late.

Indonesia, by its invasion and occupation of East Timor, has embarked on gross violations of the United Nations two most basic principles of integrity of territory and the right to self-determination. The United Nations Security Council has passed resolutions calling for the withdrawal of Indonesia, yet Canada is one of only two hold-out nations. The government has recognized Indonesia's de facto rule over East Timor. Canada has at the UN voted against resolutions calling for Indonesia's withdrawal. We should all be ashamed of that.

In order for Canada to be legitimate in its condemnation of Indonesia's abhorrent actions against East Timor, it must immediately and unequivocally offer support for all UN resolutions regarding Indonesia's illegal occupation of East Timor.

We must press for implementation of the UN Security Council's resolutions 389 and 384, which call for the immediate withdrawal of Indonesian troops and for international assistance to the people of East Timor.

A quotation of Mr. Andrei Sakharov, Oxford, 1986, comes to mind: "Human rights will not be helped by silence". In silence we are as guilty as the perpetrator of the human rights violations. This government has been selectively silent. The Prime Minister has made lofty pronouncements of a policy that would see the linkage of Canadian aid to a country's human rights record. We have yet to learn how the policy will work. There appears to be a double standard in its implementation. For example, why has the policy of this government been to treat the invasion of Kuwait differently than the invasion of East Timor?

I recommend developing and defining the criteria for implementing this stated policy with the following in mind: transparency, consistency, coherency and compassion.

In closing I would like to honour this year's recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize, Aung San Suu Kyi, for her non-violent struggle to restore democratic freedom to her country of Myanmar, formerly Burma. She has paid a dear price for exemplifying the values that we are commemorating on this day of international human rights.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to join in commemorating today the 43rd anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is an opportunity for us to review the progress that has been made toward equality and fundamental respect for human rights but also to underline the many challenges that face us still today in the world on this front and at home in Canada.

Internationally I would remind the House that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights encompasses civil and political rights as well as the economic, social and cultural rights. These aspects of human rights are profoundly important. Frank Scott, the distinguished Canadian poet, author, lawyer and constitutional human rights expert, said: "The trappings of democracy hang loosely on an emaciated body politic".

We know this only too well in a world in which 40,000 children die each day from preventable disease and from hunger. We know this from reading the annual reports of UNICEF on the state of the world's children. We know there are over one million poor children in Canada. It is a national disgrace. At the same time globally the world spends over $900 billion on weapons of destruction.

Surely it is time to recognize that the real threats to security globally are poverty, hunger, homelessness, sickness, AIDS and the global destruction of our environment.

The Prime Minister has spoken of the importance of the linkage between human rights and Canada's aid policies and hopefully our trade policies as well. We in this House support that, but there remains a huge gap between the rhetoric and the reality.

For example, we heard just last night in the external affairs committee from representatives of NGOs who are working courageously and diligently on the issue of self-determination for the people of East Timor.

We also heard from government representatives who suggested that they are not prepared to impose an arms embargo on Indonesia and are not prepared to support self-determination resolutions at the United Nations. This suggests that they are not prepared to encourage actively an international independent inquiry into the murders at Dili on November 12.

When we talk about basic rights, we must not forget that economic, social, civil and political rights as recognized internationally are linked, especially when we are talking about developing countries.

Canada must not pressure countries receiving assistance into adopting economic policies designed by international financial institutions which ignore the economic and social rights of the poor. Canada must maintain the same standards for international financial institutions.

[English]

Amnesty International has documented many other areas in which there are profound abuses of human rights: Burma, today we pay tribute to the recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize Aung San Suu Kyi; China, including Tibet; Central America where over 70,000 people have died in the tragic war in El Salvador; Sri Lanka; India, particularly in the Kashmir and in the Punjab; Mexico; South Africa where apartheid is not dead; Togo where the fragile new democracy has been overturned by a military invasion; and the Middle East where human rights continue to be violated whether it is the rights of 4,500 Syrian Jews who continue to be denied the most fundamental rights or whether it is the rights of the Palestinians who yesterday commemorated the fourth anniversary of the intifada. Certainly the time for justice for the Palestinians, for self-determination, for recognition of their right to nationhood and for an end to human rights violations has come. Indeed it should have come long ago.

We have seen violations in Croatia, in Vojvodina and in Kosovo. There has been a tragic loss of life and the destruction of the cultural heritage of a people.

We extend a warm welcome to Jean-Bertrand Aristide who is here in Ottawa, and we wish him a speedy return to Haiti as the president of that country.

[English]

In closing, I would remind the House that Canada must also practise at home what we preach abroad with respect to human rights. In that light the inter-church committee for refugees has reminded us of the importance that Canada not remain silent to abuses of refugees and asylum seekers in developed countries. Canada should do far more to respond to documented human rights problems with our own refugee programs in Canada.

Finally I would remind the House that the Canadian Human Rights Act must be amended. We have waited far too long for equality, equality for lesbians and gay men who were promised that equality five and a half years ago. They are still denied equality. We need equality for people with disabilities, for people of colour who still feel the sting of racism, for women who are still second-class citizens in Canada and for aboriginal peoples. The treatment of them at home remains a national shame and a national tragedy.

Both internationally and here at home much work remains to be done. Many challenges remain. We celebrate the accomplishments that have been made today on International Human Rights Day. We pay tribute to individuals who are working in NGOs both in Canada and internationally. We must remember much work remains to be done to realize the principle that was set out so eloquently.

Jean-Bertrand Aristide last night in Montreal told us: "Human rights are the torch that lights modern democracy".

That is true, so let us make sure it is true in Canada and throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker: I believe it would be appropriate to remind the House of the order of business at this point. We are now on Presenting Reports from Interparliamentary Delegations, under Routine Proceedings.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

CONGRATULATIONS TO AUNG SAN SUU KYI

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have consulted with my colleagues on all sides of the House and I believe that there would be agreement to the following motion:

> That this House express its congratulations to Aung San Suu Kyi, recipient of 1991 Nobel Peace Prize being presented in Oslo today, for her courage, integrity and commitment to the Burmese people's struggle for human rights and democracy.

It calls upon the state law and order restoration council of Burma to honour the results of the 1990 national election, to free Aung San Suu Kyi and the 62 jailed members of Parliament, and to allow her to give her speech of acceptance at this highest of awards from her home in Rangoon.

I believe this would meet with the agreement of the House.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I second the motion moved by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway. Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi has shown extraordinary courage in the face of repression by the State Law and Order Restoration Council.

Her efforts to promote human rights and democracy in Burma is certainly worthy of mention in this House. The Government of Canada has repeatedly demanded the release of Aung San Suu Kyi and of all political prisoners held in Burma, while asking the Burmese authorities to respect the results of the May 1990 election.

Today's motion is one more in a long list of representations.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate our caucus with this resolution, especially on a day when humankind's highest award is given to the Leader of the Opposition in Burma.

It is tragic that at this time she is denied her fundamental right not only to speak out on behalf of her own people but to be with her family, her husband and friends at this season.

I think this Parliament must go on record as supporting this resolution in particular in the hope that we can urge our own government to add its voice continually for the freedom of Aung San Suu Kyi. It is absolutely essential that her voice be added to the peaceful voices in this world.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: We are now on Petitions.

[English]

PETITIONS

JUSTICE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to present a number of petitions signed by people from Windsor, Ontario and various centres in Ontario.

The petitions bear close to 8,000 names. They call upon Parliament to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes which would apply uniformly to all regions of Canada.

HATZIC ROCK SITE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to present a petition signed predominantly by people from the riding of Mission—Coquitlam.

They are petitioning the government to recognize the Hatzic rock site near Mission, B.C. to be of great historical and spiritual value to the Sto:Lo people and to the people of Mission—Coquitlam.

We therefore ask the government to proceed with the necessary steps to see that the site is preserved and protected as a national heritage site.

UKRAINE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway, as well as residents of other parts of British Columbia and Quebec.

They point out that on August 24, 1991 the Ukrainian Parliament declared Ukrainian independence and the creation of an independent and democratic state of Ukraine. One million Canadians of Ukrainian descent have for a century sustained their ideals of freedom and democracy for an independent ancestral homeland.

They go on to point out some of the other history leading to the historic referendum just recently in Ukraine. Finally they call upon the Parliament of Canada to urge the government to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence and establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and people of Ukraine immediately following the positive referendum on December 1 of this year.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 145 will be answered today.

Question No. 145—Mr. Duhamel:

1. Since 1984, with respect to applications for (a) War Veterans Widows Allowance, (b) GIS, (c) Survivor Disability Pension, (i) how many late claims have been received (ii) how many late claims have been accepted?

2. What has been the estimated savings to the government in non-payment of these benefits to eligible persons?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Governement in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Veterans Affairs and National Health and Welfare as follows:

1. (a) With respect to retroactivity for war veterans allowance, there is no provision in the War Veterans Allowance Act to authorize payments for any period prior to the first day of the month in which the application was made. This is a matter of legislation and there is no discretionary power to alter it. With respect to the hon. member's question, then, there are no "late claims" for war veterans allowance purposes.

(c) There is no deadline for applying for survivor benefits under the Pension Act. When benefits are awarded to a survivor of a disability pensioner, the effective date of the award is the later of either the day following the death of the disability pensioner or three years prior to the date of the decision to award survivor benefits.

2. Because there is no provision within the WVA Act to authorize payments for any period prior to the first day of the month of application the question with regard to estimated savings is not relevant.

It is not possible to determine, or to estimate with any degree of accuracy, the number of applications for survivor benefits which may have been affected by the retroactivity limits of the Pension Act.

1. (b) and 2. At the present time, the Old Age Security benefit system does not maintain payment history on each beneficiary. Therefore, extensive research involving administrative costs and person-year utilization would be required to capture the requested information.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 87 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 87 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 87—Mr. Whittaker:

For each month since November 21, 1988, have any payments been made pursuant to the parliamentary secretaries expenses regulations and, if so, to which parliamentary secretaries and in what amount?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(a) and because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 23 minutes beginning at one o'clock p.m.

Also, since today is the final allotted day for the supply period ended December 10, 1991, the House will go through the usual procedures to consider and dispose of the supply bill. In view of recent practices, do hon. members agree that the bill be distributed now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—CANADIAN ECONOMIC SITUATION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition) moved

That this House condemn the government for economic mismanagement that has led to an intolerable and tragic level of unemployment, business failure and poverty in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House today, December 10, especially since exactly one year ago the constituents of Beauséjour did me the honour of electing me as their member. I wish to thank them for doing so.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I had the honour and the privilege to be elected in a riding that truly represents what is best in this country, where the two-thirds of the population that is French speaking lives on friendly terms with the other one-third that is English speaking, in southeastern New Brunswick. This people are hard workers and as Canadians they are very proud of their linguistic and cultural diversity. The two-thirds who are French speaking are descendants of those people who were deported and then came back, and they truly believe in the French language and culture and are very proud to be Canadians and to be part of Canadian society.

[English]

In every day of their lives we see examples of what is possible in Canada. The francophone Acadians who make up two-thirds of Beauséjour are working side by side with anglophones who make up one-third and have strong roots in Canada. Many of them were Loyalists who came from the United States to live under the Canadian regime. They have shown to this country that it is possible to live and work together in harmony. It has been a great experience and a great honour for me to be the member for Beauséjour for the last 12 months.

• (1040)

I would like to congratulate my colleague from York North who is celebrating his comeback to the House. He is one of the few in this House who has had the occasion to sit twice in one Parliament. All of us are very proud to have him as a colleague and we want to extend our congratulations for his second election in one term.

I am moving this motion as a condemnation of this government's economic policies. Of course, at the end of the year, in the festive season, we would like to be able to get up with a smile on our lips and say that we face the new year with great optimism.

[English]

We have to recognize that the government's mishandling of the economy has caused the worst and longest economic crisis since the 1930s. Every family, every community, every region of the country and every sector of the economy are being hurt.

For the last three years we have been saying to this government that the mix of economic policies it was developing was the wrong one. Yet it is still on it.

For the last three years the one obsession of this government has been to fight inflation at any cost. What has been the result of this policy that led to a high dollar and high interest rates? What is the situation today in Canada?

Somebody said this terrible economic strategy of the government is more or less a political version of the neutron bomb. The buildings are left standing but inside all the people have been destroyed.

We have 1.5 million Canadians today who are not working. In less than a year in Canada we have had 60,000 bankruptcies, either personal or business. We can talk about anything we want in this economy today and it is a disaster. Look at what happened in our cities. In the city of Toronto and the city of Montreal what do we see? It is a complete disaster. In fact in any big city in Canada we find that the fastest growing sector of the economy is food banks and soup kitchens.

In Toronto there are more than 100,000 people on welfare. Some 120,000 people have to go to food banks and one-third of these people are children.

Today the fair city of Montreal, which a few years ago said that it had pride, has unemployment. Thirty per cent of the citizens of greater Montreal receive unemployment insurance or welfare or some form of government assistance, and that is a disaster.

If you go to Montreal or other parts of Quebec, as I have, you see that people are completely demoralized. The same thing goes throughout the country. People are leaving the rural areas of Quebec to go to live in Montreal, but of course they do not find work. Nothing is more depressing today than walking down Ste. Catherine Street in Montreal. You see one closed store after another. That is the result of this government's economic policies.

We could talk about many other sectors like agriculture, for example. If any industry was stable even in Ontario it was agriculture, because in the past 10 years, marketing boards had stabilized it and balanced production with demand so that consumers had fixed, predictable prices and farmers had stable incomes.

But what is happening today? Because of this government's poor strategy, we are wondering what will happen with GATT. No one knows. If article XI were abolished, what would happen to marketing boards? What did the government do in the Free Trade Agreement? It completely gave up the possibility of setting up bilateral tariff barriers with the American market in case the GATT decision was unfavorable to farmers. Over the past 10 or 12 years, we had managed to stabilize that sector with some effort. It is now very uncertain and thousands of jobs are at stake.

[English]

I could talk about western farmers, not only those who need supply management in Canada. Wheat is at its lowest price since the depression. Farmers are leaving their farms every day, to go where? There is no place to go. If they go to the city there are no jobs. There are families who are losing their life assets day after day after day, and they really do not know what will happen to them. It is almost unbelievable.

In Beauséjour, Manitoba they have established a food bank for farmers. These are the very people whose job is to create food for our table and who do not have enough for themselves. We have never seen such a disaster in Canada. When does the government give some help? It just does that under a lot of pressure in the middle of an election, cynically to show that it can buy votes. Wait until the next election. It will not be able to buy one vote. I can guarantee that.

What about the fisheries and overfishing? There is no control over foreign ships that come and take over Canadian resources. We protect the fish on the Grand Banks, for example, off the coast of Newfoundland with conservation measures. We restrain our own fishermen from taking too much fish.

What happens? At the other end of the banks the foreign companies come and pick up the fish. There is no passport for fish. They do not know if they are in Canadian or international waters. Neither the international community nor this government is putting pressure on these countries that are abusing the situation. They are depleting resources that have been there for centuries.

[Translation]

I was in my riding of Beauséjour on the weekend and I met fishermen and people who work in the processing plants in Cap-Pelé. Cap-Pelé has perhaps the largest concentration of this kind of smokehouse in America, if not the world. These people worked very hard all year. Companies have built up considerable inventories. And what happens? Suddenly, but quite properly, the government embargoes products sent to Haiti, the main customer. But who pays? The fishermen and entrepreneurs, who are all small business people, and the government does nothing. We have called CIDA but have not heard back. We should not destroy this industry. I am not saying that there should not be economic sanctions against Haiti, but on the other hand this kind of food keeps and the government should do something. This was directly caused by a government policy, although well intentioned and one that looks good around the world. But the government does not pay the cost of it. Who pays? The fishermen and smokehouse operators in Cap-Pelé, New Brunswick, in the riding of Beauséjour. I hope that someone at CIDA is listening to us and will realize that they are working against a traditional industry that has been profitable for many years, that they are ruining it, perhaps even destroying it forever.

That is the kind of policy this government implements all the time. I could talk about plant closures.

• (1050)

Industries are closing down all over Canada. When we had the recession 10 years ago in 1982 they were closing down for a period of time. Now they are closing down forever. They are moving to the United States because of the free trade agreement. This government does not want to do anything.

I could talk about the trade deficit. For the first time in 15 years we have a merchandise trade deficit in Canada. We used to have a balance of payments problem but not a merchandise trade deficit. It is like that all over Canada, and this government is doing nothing at all. Why? It is because the government stubbornly has a fix on inflation and this is destroying everything.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance was in Montreal. He had discussions with business people and they said they wanted a lower Canadian dollar and they wanted to be competitive.

I remember what was said by the manufacturing sector in Canada at the time of the free trade agreement. They said: "Okay, we can sign that, but we need a dollar that will remain competitive". But this government has refused to recognize that reality because some government advisers have the gall to say that we will endure 30 per cent unemployment if we can have zero inflation. They should know that 30 per cent unemployment is a revolution. When you administer the economic and monetary policies of this country, you cannot have a fix only on inflation. You have to have a fix on employment and competition too. That it is exactly what we said to this government.

During the fall I travelled this country and talked about the five principles that we need to restore Canada. We said one of the first things we need is to restore Canada's industrial strength. The only instrument available to them in the very difficult world we are living in today is a competitive dollar. It is always a high dollar. Why? We do not know why. Is it because there are those who say we should have zero inflation that they are afraid to attain anyway?

Mr. James Baker, when he was the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, said: "We have no trade problem with Canada. The only problem we are having with Canada is the level of the Canadian dollar". Since the government signed the free trade agreement the dollar has been kept high. You have to look at all the reasons. The minister will get up and say that the interest rates are going down. They are going down, but today the government rate is still three points above that of the United States. Of course the prime rate has been reduced, but the government rate is 3.04 per cent above. Yes, sir. I checked this morning. You can say whatever you want, but it is—

Some hon. members: You are right.

Mr. Chrétien: It is 3.04. Why is this? Because this government has a deliberate policy to make sure that the Canadian dollar remains high. It is why the investor is looking to buy Canadian dollars. The prime rate has gone down, but the main rate has not gone down. There is still a spread of three points. So let us get the dollar lower.

The minister will tell us that he cannot lower the dollar. I have been Minister of Finance. I know that the government intervenes strongly or less strongly. I was there. At that time it was at 93 cents, but because we wanted to make sure that the industry in the riding of the minister in British Columbia could sell wood in the United States, we let the Canadian dollar go from 93 cents to 85 cents. We have to do that to the dollar, to make sure that we train our labour force, that we have research and development and that we have market support.

I could go on and on but apparently time is running short.

Some hon. members: More, more.

Mr. Chrétien: We have to reduce the tax burden of the middle class. This government has increased the taxes 32 times in the last few years. The gap between Canada and the United States in terms of the GDP and taxes is higher than ever before.

We have to make sure that we face competition today and with globalization that we have comprehensive and creative adjustment policies to make sure that those affected are not left in the cold like it is with this government. Nobody will do anything.

We have to make sure, as a fourth point, to balance regional economic growth because we cannot let only the market forces decide. There is nothing Canadian left on the shelves any more. This government has destroyed everything in terms of transportation and anything that was keeping this country together. What happens if we do not have any transportation? The people in Atlantic Canada are trapped there and remain poor.

We need a government that can intervene. It is why Japan and Germany are successful. The government intervenes there when it is needed. It is not a laissez-faire government like this one.

The fifth point of course is that they were elected to reduce the debt. Do you remember that, Mr. Speaker? When they started they said: "The $175 billion that these Liberals have left us is terrible". They worked on a program to reduce the debt. They worked very hard on it, and now the debt has been reduced to $400 billion. What a success, what a success.

I would like to say to everyone at the end of my remarks that people feel terrible in Canada but there is hope at the end of the tunnel. If this government has any decency within 12 months there will be an election. There was an election three years and one month ago so we should have an election in 1992.

I say to Canadians when I am travelling that we need a new government, but this new government will need a mission. This mission is to bring hope and pride to this nation as this government has failed to do. On every score this country is desperate today.

They have created a constitutional mess that we will try on a non-partisan basis to cure. If they had known better they would have shut up in 1987 when they were preoccupied in Quebec about having a new class of business people doing well in the world. They opened a wound that they will have a hell of a problem closing. We will help them.

I hope they will stop that nonsense of having a Spicer II show and doing what they are doing today. The NDP and ourselves put our feet on the ground and said: "We do not want that kind of show any more. We want the members to look at the 28 propositions". We went far to achieve that, but we have succeeded. I hope that we will be able to find a solution and bring hope. It is a problem that need not have existed, but it was created by this government. The economic mess is there, as we all know, but we say to Canadians that there will be an election. There will be a government that will understand that we have no ambition in life to be the lap dog of the American presidency and that we can speak as proud Canadians. We will tell the people that we will have a government that cares for people.

We had the Aylmer conference where we had experts coming from all over the world who told us: "Yes, it is possible to take the challenge of globalization but maintain at the same time the social safety net that is the pride of Canada. If you have proud and independent people, you will not have people in misery. They will be able to compete in the world".

The government that we will be forming, if the election comes next year, if this government has the courage to consult the people, will be a government that will maintain the dignity of Canadians while at the same time preparing Canadians, training them, educating them and challenging them to be the most competent, the best educated people in North America.

We can be on top of the world if we have a government that cares for people, that restores pride in Canadians. We will go into the 21st century, as we should do, as a proud, independent Canada which will not be afraid of the globalization in the world, but will remain, as I like to say, a united country in its diversity that will be the envy of the world.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in its opposition day motion the Liberal Party talks about the tragic levels of unemployment, the business failures and the poverty in Canada. I can certainly agree with many of the remarks that the hon. Leader of the Opposition made, but I think there are two very major areas that the opposition leader did not touch on and I would like to ask him about.

There are two economic policies that this government has implemented that have destroyed the economy of Canada, that have led to this poverty, that have created the business failures and that have created the unemployment, and those are in the Canada-U.S. trade deal and the GST.

With the trade deal we have seen the loss of manufacturing jobs. Just last week Norsk Enterprises in Quebec said that the trade deal had caused it to lose its business and that it had to lay off more workers. That is the story right across Canada.

We gave away our access to oil and gas. We created a situation where social programs are being undermined through the trade deal. We have ensured that programs like medicare could never be set up again in Canada because of the trade deal. Surely it is the Canada–U.S. trade deal that has created much of the problem that the hon. Leader of the Opposition has referred to. The second one is certainly the GST that has helped to create those bankruptcies, that is destroying small business.

I want to ask the Leader of the Opposition a question. The New Democratic Party has been very clear. The trade deal must be abrogated with Canada and the U.S. and must not be extended to Mexico. What is the position of the Leader of the Opposition on this very profound issue that has created these problems in the economy?

Also the position of the New Democratic Party on the GST is to get rid of the GST. What does the Leader of the Opposition think?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on the question of free trade our position is clear and has been copied by the Leader of the NDP in an interview with The Financial Post three weeks ago. She said very clearly: "We will renegotiate and, if they do not want to renegotiate, we will abrogate". Thank you very much. That is exactly our position.

I agree that this is a badly cooked deal. Only half of it has been concluded. We have seen the case of the electric problems Quebec faces. Now everything is a subsidy according to the Americans and a big failure of this government was not having clarified what is a subsidy.

I am happy to see on the free trade agreement that the Leader of the NDP is in agreement with us. It is a big move. It is a shift in policy in the right direction.

On the GST we have a very clear position. We say that we want to kill the GST, but we will come forth with an alternative. Not like NDPers who say that they will kill it. What about the $25 billion? They say they do not know where the money will come from. We will have an alternative. If the GST has put $20 billion into the coffers, we will find $20 billion to replace it. That is the only responsible way to do it. We will get rid of the GST but we will have to find a clear alternative because we will be responsible. We will not be like the NDP.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the member for Beauséjour.

Trust is the central issue in public life today. Canadians are saying from coast to coast to coast that they do not trust their politicians. What assurances can he give the people of Canada that the Liberal Party of Canada will have a value system that people can trust?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think that it is a very good question. It is a very important problem in Canada today.

Ms. Copps: The NDP thinks it is funny.

Mr. Chrétien: The NDP laughs at it. It promised that it would get rid of the GST and it put nothing in the window instead.

Trust will come when we say we will get rid of the GST and we have an alternative. This is responsible government. This is what we will offer to the people. We will not try to buy votes because people do not want to sell their votes. They want an honest government. They do not want the repetition of what this government has done to this nation, making promises and breaking them all the time.

We say to the people that we will not buy their votes. We will be truthful to them. We will have an honest government. It will not be a government riddled with scandal like the one we have now. It will be an honest government that will call a spade a spade, and the people will have confidence in us. We will restore faith in the institution.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to congratulate my leader on his first anniversary back from his electoral victory in Beauséjour. I would also like to congratulate him on what I consider to be an excellent and passionate speech. I believe it clearly outlined the concerns felt by millions and millions of Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

What is also important about the speech of the Leader of the Opposition is that it clearly accentuated and punctuated the differences that exist between the political parties in Canada and the clear and the precise economic agenda that the Liberal Party has proposed to Canadians.

My question to the Leader of the Opposition concerns the high unemployment rate among young people. In this country 400,000 young people in total are unemployed. I would like to ask the Leader of the Opposition to comment on this extremely important national issue.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this is the future of tomorrow that the hon. member for York North has raised, what we have to do. It will be the challenge of Canadians. We have to become the best educated and the best trained people in America. We can do that. In order to do that we will have to invest in the youth of Canada. We will have to invest in education and in training. We will have to work with the provinces to have a collective goal.

Yesterday I noted progress. Almost all provincial governments agree to have a kind of national standard for education among themselves. Unfortunately only the NDP Government of Saskatchewan disagrees with that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not know why only one government does not want to give an okay. The Quebec government recognizes the need to make all Canadians very competitive. We have to be educated in order to be as good as the Germans and the Japanese, but one government has refused to do that. It is the NDP Government of Saskatchewan.

It was not a Liberal government because we all believe in the youth of Canada. The youth of Canada is the future. We will invest in them because they will make this country the best in the world.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition seems to think because he says something it is true. If he were consistent and said the same thing maybe Canadians would think it was true too. He needs to be consistent about it.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned that he had been elected a year ago. I congratulate him on that. If he had been here, he would have heard the alternatives that the New Democratic Party has put forward consistently on the GST. We are the party that has come forward with the alternatives on the GST. The hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that very well. We are the party that has consistently said that we will abrogate the trade deal. It cannot be renegotiated.

I say to the hon. Leader of the Opposition: Why does he not have the guts to stand up to the Canadian people, be honest with them and say the same thing, that this deal must be abrogated?

• (1110)

Mr. Chrétien: Perhaps I was not nice to the NDP. She is quite upset. Probably the best thing I can do at this moment is to offer her a happy Christmas and New Year, but the reality is that what I said is all true.

Indications yesterday were that it was only the NDP Government of Saskatchewan which opposed. Look at what the NDP Government in Ontario has done to the electorate there, breaking every promise.

We are responsible. We want to get rid of the GST and will have an alternative which will not be like them. On the free trade agreement I have to repeat that it gave me a lot of pleasure when she met with The Financial Post. She said: "We will just adopt the Liberal policies". Thank you very much, madam, et Joyeux Noel.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am enjoying very much the family feud that is going on. It is very enlightening. We have all garnered a certain amount of information about the formulation of policy and how it actually is formulated, sort of on the run and in the House of Commons.

The hon. member and the member for Broadview—Greenwood talk about trust. The Leader of the Opposition says: "We will scrap the GST and, trust me, I will bring in an alternative".

Well, he is going to have to get a little more specific than that. Oh, I am sure he will. Him and Preston Manning will certainly be able to give us a lot of enlightenment on that one.

Yes, it is the Christmas spirit. Yes, it is. I thought for starters that one would want to look at the record of a government of which the hon. Leader of the Opposition was a member. I just took a quick survey and 10 years ago today interest rates for an ordinary businessmen were running at about 18 to 20 per cent. He talks about spreads. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, the spread between the Canadian prime rate and the United States prime rate is about half of 1 per cent. The Canadian prime rate, the lowest in 18 years, is at 8 per cent. The American prime rate is at 7.5 per cent and if you want to go to three-month commercial paper, that spread is about 2.6 per cent. It hovers between 2.4 per cent and 2.6 per cent.

I think that factually the hon. Leader of the Opposition was wrong.

Let us look at the unemployment rate. It was running at about 11.2 per cent. The inflation rate was at 12.6 per cent, and what happened in the third quarter of 1981? The GDP fell by 3.5 percentage points. There you have a situation where this member is condemning the federal government for its economic mismanagement and all we saw during the time that he was a member of that government of which I spoke. We had our fill of fiscal irresponsibility and structural suffocation. That fiscal irresponsibility is placing a heavy burden, an undue burden, on all Canadians in terms of our ability to cope with a burden of debt and the cost of servicing that debt which is costing Canadians 35 cents for every taxpayer's dollar that they provide to the Government of Canada.

Let us review a little more of the record of the Leader of the Opposition while I have his attention. He condemns this government for fiscal mismanagement. When he served as President of the Treasury Board between 1974 and 1976, in two short years he spent—

An hon. member: You're shameless, absolutely shameless.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if you want to give the hon. member a chance to speak I am sure that we can organize that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may very well seek time to speak but the hon. Minister of Finance has the floor and I know members would want to extend the courtesy of hearing him.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, in two short years, between 1974 and 1976, he presided over a spending increase of 33 per cent and then he said at 16 per cent, when he increased the spending for one year, that that reflected great restraint.

In Mr. Macdonell's Auditor General's report in 1974–75, he said this, and I quote:

> The present state of financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standard of quality and effectiveness.

In September 1976 he wrote, and I quote:

> I am deeply concerned that Parliament and indeed the government has lost or is close to losing effective control of the public purse.

That is the background around which we have to restore the fiscal integrity of this country and restore management. Again, giving an example of his managerial prowess, in a strike where public servants shut down the grain transportation sector for 31 days, he settled for a 29.25 per cent increase and he called that leadership.

Let us talk about the deficit when he was Minister of Finance. In 1977, the deficit the previous year had been $6.3 billion. The spring budget he brought in was to be a $7.2 billion deficit for 1977–78 and it ended up being a $10 billion deficit, a 70 per cent increase.

His next budget was a 30 per cent increase above the earlier one. That is where we got into this treadmill of spending. You know, spend today and borrow for tomorrow and place the burden on future generations.

He talks about the control he had over the Bank of Canada and how he manipulated the exchange rate. Well, here are some quotes out of Hansard that clearly demonstrate the opposite of his allegation that he had just presented to the House of Commons. He said on February 27, 1978, in a speech to The Canadian Club in Montreal, and I quote:

> Market forces should continue to determine the appropriate exchange value for our currency.

Another quote in Hansard at page 1222, November 17, 1978. He said, and I quote:

> We do not intend to fix the rate of the Canadian dollar. The rate will be fixed by the market.

And then another quote, in which he said the following:

> Our monetary policy is set by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and I do not intend to ask him to change his policy.

That quotation is from Hansard page 1635, December 7, 1977.

What the hon. member is saying here today is all hogwash. He talks a good line. He said something when he was sitting over here on the treasury benches. He had one position. Now that he is over there on the opposition benches he clearly has another position. That has to be taken into consideration as we focus on this particular debate.

There is no question, and no one can argue with the fact that the economy is emerging from a very difficult period. It has been a painful period for many Canadians. Coming out of a recession and through a period of transition where we see the need for a structural adjustment and change has placed very severe difficulties upon all segments of the Canadian economy.

I indicated in my appearance before the House committee last month that the recession had been a little deeper than expected and that the pace of recovery had been somewhat slower than we had anticipated. However, one has to view this in the changing circumstances that have occurred throughout the world. The world economy, for example, as I have indicated on many occasions, grew by some 2 per cent in 1990. It will grow by a meagre 1 per cent in 1991 and it is expected to grow something around 3 per cent or less in 1992. As a matter of fact, I have before me a headline from The Ottawa Citizen which says that the world economy is at its worst since 1945.

The growth rate of 1 per cent in 1991 has been the worst since 1981 or 1982. One has to look at the Canadian situation in that context and I have to remind hon. members that all industrialized nations have been revising their growth projections downward. I also have to advise hon. members that the only two countries that will experience an improvement in the unemployment situation in 1992, according to the Conference Board of Canada, are the United States and Canada. All other industrialized countries, particularly those in the G–7, will experience an increase in unemployment during 1992. I say that because we are going through difficult times and Canada is affected by it because we are a global trader, a world player. We cannot deny that.

There are some positive things that are occurring. I think they have to be recorded and that hon. members have to be reminded. Inflation has dropped significantly to just 1.6 per cent on annualized basis over the last six months. That is the lowest in 20 years.

I talked about interest rates. The prime rate at 8 per cent is the lowest rate of interest in 18 years. That is a remarkable achievement. There are other positive indicators on the horizon that came out in the third quarter annual accounts.

The corporate profits are strengthening. You need corporate profits if you are going to have investment in plant and equipment. They increased by 15 per cent on an annualized basis. The latest data indicate that personal income rose by 4.4 per cent over last year and personal disposable income by 4.6 per cent.

What is also interesting is that the savings rate of Canadians has increased from an average of 9 to 9.5 per cent to about 11 per cent. I have to remind hon. members that every one percentage point increase in the national savings, personal savings, reduces consumption by about $4.5 billion. Put another way, if that saving rate had not increased from 9 per cent to 11 per cent there would be an additional $9 billion out there for goods and services consumption.

It is quite obvious that Canadians are saving more because there is uncertainty and because there is lack of confidence in the economy. That is true, but some day soon that money will be spent.

The goods producing sector is another very important indicator in the third quarter statistics. The goods producing sector increased by 5.2 per cent. The other thing that should be noted is that in a survey by the 300 large corporations that are operating in Canada they had indicated that they would increase their capital spending by some 5.2 per cent in 1992. That too is good news.

Mortgage rates have come down dramatically and a person renewing a $75,000 mortgage will see a saving of something between $275 and $300 per month on his monthly mortgage payments. That is a major decline. That puts additional income in the pockets of Canadians for spending on consumer goods and services.

Housing starts are another important indicator which should bring us some comfort. The increase in the residential investment sector was some 17.2 per cent in the third quarter. Housing starts have been increasing to the level of roughly 200,000 on an annualized basis. The data coming out are not uniform. The data are erratic, and that is not unusual coming out of a recession.

We said in the budget of 1991 that growth would re-emerge in the second half of 1991. Colleagues certainly did not condemn the government for being overly conservative in that projection, but the fact of the matter is that growth re-emerged in the second quarter. It was originally quoted at 4.9 per cent real and in the third quarter accounts that was adjusted upward to 5.7 per cent. That is a remarkable turnaround when you consider that there was a decline of 4.9 per cent in the fourth quarter of 1990 and a decline of 4.7 per cent in the first quarter of 1991. To have a turnaround of 5.7 per cent positive in the second quarter was a dramatic turnaround.

Obviously no one expected that kind of recovery to be sustainable. We did have a lower rate of growth in the third quarter, .9 per cent, but when you average the two you end up with an average rate of growth over a six-month period of 3.3 per cent. I think that is not bad considering the depth of this recession, much deeper than we expected. We expected a peak decline of about 2.5 per cent. It declined closer to 2.8 per cent. The fact of the matter is that the recession accompanied by the need to readjust and to restructure is making this issue much more complicated and much more critical.

I should remind the House that in the early stages of the recovery, going back to 1981 and 1982, we had the similar kind of data coming out that were quite variable. As a matter of fact, in the ninth and the twelfth months of recovery in 1983-84 period we actually had negative growth.

I am just going through some of the quotes of expert analysts and journalists. In the 1982-83 newspapers there are articles on months one to three of the recovery. In a The Globe and Mail article by columnist Peter Cook there is a headline "Deteriorating Conditions Suggest a Renewal of Slump". On December 7 there was a headline "Economic News Bad to Worse".

On December 30, two months into the recovery, one read "Few Signs that Relief is Imminent". Again bad economic news predominates. You then get into four to six months of recovery. One headline is "Progress Uncertain in Real Economy. Upturn Begun but Still Weak". On April 6 one headline read "The Rate of Recovery in Manufacturing Begins to Falter." On July 22, 1983 another read "Don't Depend on Consumers Alone".

On August 2, 1983, 10 to 12 months into recovery, the headline is posing the question "Is Economic Recovery Faltering?" We go again to August 31, 1983. The Globe and Mail headline was "Experts see Signs of Recovery Slowing". We go on to October 1. The Star Phoenix says that the economic news was glum.

We are going through that kind of a situation. The fact of the matter is that we are going to have these kinds of volatile data that will be coming out and that will require explanation.

The fact of the matter is that we still remain confident that growth in 1992 will be something in the range of 3 per cent to 3.5 per cent. The latest survey conducted by the finance department and the private sector forecasts the growth rate to be something in the order of 3.5 per cent.

The IMF's most recent forecast suggests a growth rate of 3.8 per cent. The OECD suggests a growth rate of 3.5 per cent. The Conference Board of Canada suggests a growth rate of something in excess of 4 per cent. By historical standards, this is a moderate to modest recovery.

The fact of the matter is that we must continue to maintain our policy stance of declining inflation and the maintenance of low interest because that will produce the growth and that will produce the long-term jobs.

Inflationary policies which are being advocated by members across will not produce the goods, will not produce the services, will not produce the jobs and will not produce the long-term prosperity for Canada, and history really proves that.

By historical standards we know that this recovery is slow because of our inability, and we do not have the luxury of injecting fiscal stimulus. The hon. member should understand that. We must deal with the issues that are really confronting us. The issues are not only coming out of the recession, but how we can be more competitive and how we can be more productive. In that connection, it requires the co-operation, co-ordination and leadership of all segments of society.

In The Globe and Mail, I believe on Saturday, I noticed what the chairman of Ford Motor Company had to say about Ontario's policies. I am not here to pick on Ontario. I only use this to demonstrate the necessity for co-ordinating economic policy in this country. The headline says that our entrepreneurs are afraid to invest in Ontario. Mr. Harrigan said:

> Ontario's economic policies are placing roadblocks in the way of the recovery and scaring away investment.

Frankly entrepreneurs are afraid to invest in Ontario. The auto industry is apprehensive about labour changes that will make it easier to unionize, particularly auto parts companies. A strike at one of these companies would close down operations of the Canadian and U.S. car makers which rely on just in time parts delivery schedules. Eighty per cent of our production is exported to the United States.

I say that we must co-ordinate our policies in such a way that we can meet the challenges we face. Canada is a trading nation. We are the seventh largest trading nation in the world. We must trade to survive.

We must meet the challenge of globalization. We must meet the challenges of improving our productivity. The foundation of prosperity had been rotting away when we came into office. It required some major structural changes such as getting the deficit under control, making those structural changes such as deregulation, bringing about a free trade agreement and trade liberalization, scrapping FIRA, scrapping the National Energy Program and creating an investment climate in which Canadians would invest, in which the skill and the spirit of enterprises could flourish.

This is the kind of framework that we put in place. We have made the structural changes. We are getting the fiscal and monetary fundamentals correct. We have provided the foundation for strong sustainable growth with price stability. That will produce the growth. That will produce the jobs and that will produce security for all Canadians.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, before I address my comments and question to the minister, may I say that this is what Canadians expect from Parliament. This is the best of Parliament today and I am pleased to take my place in this debate in that regard.

I was disappointed in the minister responding to what is really turning people off in this country. We are in trouble in Canada and we expect something better than the exchange of the old clichés between the two ruling parties that represent the same interests which have governed this country for the last 100 years.

We expected some alternatives and specifics from both the opposition and the government because people out there are hurting. It is a cliché to refer to the experts and their interpretations. There are one and a half million experts in Canada on the economic crisis. They are all unemployed. They are experts about what has happened to them and to their families.

One of the major problems, if I may point it out to our friend who wants to quote economists, with the poor is that they do not have enough money. If you cannot figure that out, all the experts in the world are not going to be able to help you or the Official Opposition.

What is the action now? What will this government do today in the face of the fact it promised in the 1988 election that 250,000 new jobs would be created because of the free trade agreement? What is the government prepared to do today to help those people who are waiting for that promise to be fulfilled? What is the government prepared to do today to mobilize the indigenous savings of Canadians rather than lamenting that consumers have dried up?

What is the government prepared to show to initiate the use of RRSPs in an imaginative thoughtful way, to re-establish the infrastructures of our municipalities, cities and towns through municipal bonds? Is this government prepared to do as governments did during wartime crises such as give leadership, succour and comfort to those who are afflicted out there rather than rhetoric and comments about what economists are saying or what editorials are saying?

Finally my question to the minister, the most important question of all is: When is this government prepared to recognize that the polls consistently say it is at 16 per cent? Call an election and, by God, be gone from office.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I thought after the preamble that he would certainly not have engaged in political rhetoric. I agree it is a serious matter. Stick around. There will be an election and I hope he is ready at the time.

He talks about me using clichés. When we are addressing some of the fundamental problems, fiscal and monetary problems that Canada faces, and laying out a clear plan of how we are going to achieve the fiscal targets and the deficit targets, I do not think that is rhetoric and I do not think that is using clichés. I did not quote economists. I did refer to study groups, respectable study groups, like the IMF, OECD, and the Conference Board of Canada.

He made the suggestion of using RRSPs and municipal bonds. I would be very interested if he wanted to impart that information to me. I would even invite him over to my office and we could have a chat about it. I am open to all reasonable suggestions that can contribute to the process. At least I garnered one bit of a constructive element in the hon. member's question. What are we going to do about jobs?

I indicated that we expect growth to re-emerge in the vicinity of 3.2 to 3.5 per cent. Our estimate is that there will be at least 300,000 new jobs.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister stated that interest rates in Canada were the same as in the United States or so close that there was almost no difference.

With respect, what he was comparing was the prime rates in the two countries, which I suggest is not what the Leader of the Opposition was talking about. He was talking about the U.S. federal funds rate which is 4.5 per cent, at least it was as of yesterday. I understand it fell further yesterday afternoon so the spread is now more than 3 per cent.

The Bank of Canada's prime rate is 7.54 per cent which is an interest rate spread of 3.04 per cent. That was before yesterday's fall in the U.S. rate. The spread has increased and is more than 3 per cent. The traditional spread between these two rates is two percentage points.

The reason for the lack of prosperity is the size of this spread. It is overly large. I agree that interest rates have come down, but they have not come down far enough and I think the minister knows that. I would like him to comment on that and acknowledge that these figures given by the Leader of the Opposition are correct.

I would say to him that I agree with the other part of his comment. There are two reasons primarily why Ontario's economy is lagging. One is the present government in Ontario, which is a disincentive for investment in this province. It is costing us dearly in terms of the anticipated investment that should get us out of this recession, and it is not happening because of the incompetence of the government there. Also it is because of this interest rate spread which he knows is keeping the Canadian dollar artificially high and which is a disincentive to foreign investors, particularly in new plants because it costs more to do business in this country than it should. It is helping drive businesses south of the border and costing us dearly.

I wonder if he would comment on both those and acknowledge that the Leader of the Opposition's figures were correct.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I will comment on it. First and foremost Americans do not borrow money from the Fed; they borrow it from the banking system. Canadians do not borrow money from the Bank of Canada; they borrow from the banking system. The differential between the prime rate, which is the differential between the prime commercial bank rate in Canada and the commercial bank rate in the United States, is one half of one per cent. In the United States it is 7.5 and here it is 8 per cent.

The figure normally used for defining spreads is the three-month commercial paper which as of two o'clock yesterday was at 2.6 per cent. It has been hovering between 2.3 and 2.5, considerably down from the 5.65 per cent spread that was in existence a little over a year ago.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, let me ask the Minister of Finance a question.

He has gone through his usual performance today of giving us a great many optimistic statistics. How he can possibly justify, not after seven months but after seven and a half years of Conservative government, that all of the great plans and all of the changes of direction he said had to take place have led to a situation in which 1.5 million people are out of work? We have lost more jobs in the last year than the government promised we would gain from the free trade deal.

Does he not realize that his policies are bankrupt and that he must change those policies so as to put people back to work and make this country start to work together again?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if I could influence world economic policy I suppose I would be able to fulfil the suggestion the hon. member has made.

• (1140)

We certainly never denied the fact that Canada was part of the global trading community. We are the seventh largest trader in the world. We are the seventh or eighth largest economy in the world because we trade. We trade very aggressively. Our fortunes are very closely tied to our ability to trade.

We are coming out of a recession, but we are also going through a period of transition in our economy. We are trying to improve our productivity to compete internationally in a global economy. There is a shift from the emphasis on the resource base and manufacturing sector to a more service and more intensive value added sector. All these things are part and parcel of the process we have to go through.

What we have been trying to do is put in place the kinds of structural changes that will allow that adjustment to take place more effectively. Perhaps that adjustment should have started earlier. Perhaps it should have started in the early eighties. We are paying a bit of the price today.

The fact that we had a low dollar in the period from 1976 to 1986 masked many of our competitive inefficiencies. We are going through that structural change today and we must get the fundamentals right.

If you go to the period 1970–73 we had low inflation and an average inflationary rate of 2.8 per cent. You had an average unemployment rate of 4.8 per cent and you had an average growth rate of just under 5 per cent.

Historically the only way that you can have long–term sustainable growth and low unemployment is to pursue the kind of policy we are pursuing. Why does the hon. member not reflect on a little history? Perhaps he will join us and agree with the fact that we are on the right course to provide a framework for sustainable recovery and sustainable growth with price stability.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca complimented the House on the calibre of the debate this morning on the economy. He said that is what we should be doing, and I agree with him.

I am wondering if I could have the unanimous consent of the House to extend the question period another five minutes because we do not have an opportunity such as we have to question and debate with the Minister of Finance. Five minutes would allow some of the other members to pose a few questions.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park has asked for consent to extend the usual period of comments and questions for another five minutes. Is there agreement?

An hon. member: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park would not use up all the five minutes.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the leader of our party, the deputy leader and I have asked many times in Question Period what the government is prepared to do to eliminate food banks from our society.

One year ago I told the government it had two years left in its mandate and asked if it could give us some plan, some program, that it would eliminate food banks and child poverty from our society. The normal answer the minister always gave was to tell us how many more people are above the poverty line.

That is not an answer. The food banks are growing. The number of children who have to be given breakfast at school is increasing. Now the minister has one year left in his mandate. Could he share with us his government's plans to eliminate food banks from our society? It is a sore point and a shame to all of us in this House if the present government does not eliminate them.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it is a very important question and it is a tragedy. The minister of health is developing a program with respect to child poverty. He has so indicated in the House.

It will be going through the normal process. I cannot give the hon. member an undertaking as to when it might be announced, but I can assure him that it is actively being worked on. After it goes through the normal cabinet committee process, I am sure something will be announced.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in my former life as director of United Way of the lower mainland, I co-ordinated 32 unemployment action centres that were funded by the government for unemployed workers throughout British Columbia.

It was run by the B.C. Federation of Labour to help workers make the transition from unemployment insurance to welfare at a time when unemployment was lower than it is today. This government withdrew the funding through Canada Employment and Immigration for those action centres. There are still a couple that have managed to survive.

The government has not been able to reduce unemployment to even the levels that we faced when we had those action centres in the early 1980s and has withdrawn the funding. Could the hon. minister please tell us what this government's plans are to help the unemployed make the transition from unemployment insurance to welfare in their communities? Right now there is nothing.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to look into the specific matter that the hon. member raised. I remind her that about three weeks ago the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced additional funding for the training and development portion under the Unemployment Insurance Program. He increased that funding from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion. I am not sure whether this might be covered, but perhaps that is a way in which that might be explored.

I will undertake to look into the hon. member's question. If she will give us further details, perhaps I can have one of my staff members call her office today.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Minister of Finance.

The tax designs, both personal and corporate in this country, are disincentives to productivity and consumer spending. I believe this government's phase one tax reform did not meet the objectives.

I would like to ask the minister if he will consider another shot at corporate and personal income tax reforms for the next budget.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the difficulty with tax reform is that it creates uncertainty. We have had so much of it that we have been trying to fine tune and stabilize the system.

The hon. member has a unique proposal that he has been championing. I have taken a look at it. The biggest problem I have with his proposal is that if it were to be implemented roughly 50 per cent of the taxpaying Canadians would end up paying more tax under his proposal than they are today.

If that is wrong then perhaps he might be able to enlighten me. We have gone through it and that is what we have ascertained.

If he is asking me whether we are contemplating major and substantial tax reform, the answer is no. We are looking at ways in which we can make the tax system work better. We will hopefully simplify and streamline it and make it more effective in terms of discharging the kinds of approaches that are necessary to create investment, jobs and economic activity.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate today.

It is important that we in this House are debating the economy and putting forth the kind of alternatives that we as parties propose. We did not hear many alternatives from the government or from the opposition, but what we can see in terms of what is happening to Canada today is that this government's economic policies have failed.

Indeed the neo-Conservative economic policies of both this government and former Liberal governments have led us to where we are today.

I do not believe I need to go on in any great length about the record of this government. Virtually every day in Question Period we raise questions with the government asking whether it will be open to changing the economic policies which are destroying this country. Every day we get the same answers. It is closed to listening to what Canadians have to say and it is certainly closed to the alternatives that this party has put forward. What this government cannot ignore is the 1.5 million unemployed in this country. This government cannot ignore the other 1.5 million who are on social assistance or unemployment insurance.

The record small business bankruptcies, the record number of farm bankruptcies and the industrial sector in this country that is rapidly disappearing are all characteristics of our economy and are directly related to the policies of this government. Millions of Canadians are living in poverty. One in six children is living in poverty. An increase in food banks and an increase in the number of homeless necessitate action now. The homeless, the poor, the unemployed and those on assistance cannot wait until the middle of 1992 or 1993. They need help now.

When this government was first elected in 1984 no one, not even its strongest opponents, could have imagined the depth to which it would take the Canadian economy. No one could imagine the extent to which this government, which called social programs a sacred trust, would diminish social programs in this country. No one could have imagined a country that had so much to look forward to now has so much to regret.

This government was elected, I might say with some enthusiasm, in 1984. It was returned with reluctance in 1988 and in the next election this government will be turfed out where it belongs for the destruction it has done to Canada.

What Canadians have learned in the last decade is that neo-Conservative policies do not work. They do not work with a Liberal government and they do not work with a Conservative government. I am talking about high interest rates, an overvalued Canadian dollar, the trade agreement between Canada and the United States, the GST, privatization and deregulation.

Let us be concise and to the point. Each one of these policies has been a total disaster. All together, they have meant economic ruin for Canadian families. The GST is perhaps the best example of these destructive economic policies. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has explained how this sales tax is destroying our country's small businesses. It has reduced the purchasing power of consumers, undermined consumer confidence and encouraged Canadians to shop in the U.S.

The GST is the iceberg that is sinking the business sector of our economy. Canadian families may go under as well. If our economy makes it to port, it will be necessary to abolish the GST. Under an NDP government, the GST will be abolished.

[English]

The opposition, on the other hand, has been what we could call I suppose unequivocally equivocal when it comes to the goods and services tax. One day it is a tax that is regressive and discriminatory according to its leader. Another day it is a tax that would be scrapped but replaced with something like it. This is a bit confusing to Canadians.

One thing Canadians do know is that the Canadian economy cannot withstand the Conservative GST nor a Liberal GST. We have to scrap the GST, and that is the policy of the New Democratic Party.

Canadians are looking for a fair tax system. The Minister of Finance has just said that in this period of instability it would be difficult to consider major changes in our tax structure. I suggest to the minister that he go to any community in this country and ask the middle income person, ask the families that are struggling day to day to get by, whether this tax system needs to be reformed to create a fairer tax system. The minister will hear Canadians speak out and speak for a tax system that is fair, just and reformed.

The government and the opposition are quick to point out that if we get rid of the GST there must be alternatives. I certainly agree, as does my party. That is why we have put forward a number of alternatives aimed at closing tax loopholes and ensuring that the wealthy and large corporations pay their fair share of taxes.

I heard a member of the Liberal caucus during a debate yesterday suggesting that the idea of taxing the rich is an old idea. I would suggest that member ask someone who is unemployed, someone who is in a food bank line if that old idea is not the best idea and whether is time to do it now.

Just to put forward a couple of suggestions about replacing the GST and funds that could be raised, wealth and inheritance taxes for example which are common in Europe should be implemented. A corporate minimum tax such as is in place in the United States must be implemented.

Canada should put in place similar taxes to tax those who have the ability to pay rather than regressive taxes like the GST. Why do the Liberals and the Conservatives refuse to do this? Why were the corporate loopholes put in place in the 1970s by Liberal governments? They led to the rich not paying their fair share. Why do we have banks making $4 billion in profits and not paying their fair share of taxes?

The answer is quite simple and Canadians know it. Those same banks are those that fund the Liberal and Conservative parties and support those same political parties. It is time for a government that stands on the side of Canadian families, that stands for tax fairness and is not afraid to stand up and say so.

In these difficult times we have banks with $4 billion profits, and we have the highest number of billionaires per capita in any country in the world. This is a nation that is going through difficult times. We have millions living in poverty and, as I have said, many hundreds of thousands dependent on food banks and homelessness is increasing.

Is there anyone in this House who would disagree that those who have must pay their fair share for those who have not been as fortunate.

This is what an enlightened society is about. It is not a phrase we often hear any more, but surely all of us want Canada to be an enlightened society. Surely that must be what Canada is all about.

[Translation]

Let us talk about trade policy. Let us talk about the trade agreement between Canada and the United States, and about the hundreds of thousands of jobs that have been lost. These job losses are real. These jobs are now in plants in the United States or Mexico. Have any ministers bothered to go down and take a look recently at southern or southwestern Ontario or Quebec to see what this trade agreement has done to the auto parts industry and the manufacturing sector? I did, and my colleagues went as well. We are not talking about unemployment as an abstract concept. We are talking about people's lives, about families without jobs, about families who are looking for jobs. We are talking about families whose future is bleak. The plants that are closed will, in many cases, stay closed. These job losses are permanent. That is what this government has done, to its everlasting shame.

[English]

The solution according to the government is to expand the trade deal to include Mexico, to take a bad deal and make it worse. Again the Liberal position on the trade deal with the United States is confusing at best. The Leader of the Opposition, I believe, changed the party's position from ending the trade deal with the United States to renegotiating certain aspects.

My caucus, my party and I remain firm. This deal has cost hundreds of thousands of Canadians their jobs. It has undermined social programs in this country. It has meant that we cannot even use our own oil and gas resources in a way that is favourable to our economy. The deal must go and must be abrogated.

• (1200)

I understand that this is not the position of the Official Opposition. On a continental deal with Mexico the Liberal Party appears to see negotiations toward an agreement with Mexico as an opportunity for Canada.

In a letter to a member of the public, the international affairs critic for the party who is the member from Winnipeg wrote: "The current North American free trade talks have given us a new window of opportunity where the government can insist on provisions which would safeguard the Canadian people and economy".

"Insist on provisions". They sold Canada out in the first place. Are we going to give them a second chance? The New Democratic Party says there are no second chances to sell out Canada.

A North American trade deal of the kind proposed by this government would be a disaster for Canadian workers, for many American workers and for Mexican workers.

A few weeks ago there was a policy conference by the Official Opposition which suggested a significant shift to the right to these same neo-Conservative policies that have led us to the poverty, to the declining business and to the bankruptcies that we see today.

Globalization is a fact of life. We all agree with that but that does not mean that we have to accept neo-Conservative prescriptions on how to deal with globalization.

It does not mean that we have to embrace free market policies without any rules at all by governments in power.

There are two ways to approach globalization. One is to let it happen and accept all of its negative effects. The other is to work to ensure that greater international competition does not come at the expense of the workers of the world, of the families of the world and of the natural environment of this world.

The Canadian government's attitude seems to be that because many of the world's trading nations have a six-day week, 60-hour work week and $1 an hour wages we must diminish our own standards and wages in order to compete.

The Minister of Finance said again today that he does not like Ontario's proposal that there would be greater unionization of workers, greater powers for the workers. These are the very same workers who build this country and who are productive but who are suffering from a federal government's economic policies that have made it impossible for Canada to compete in many sectors.

Because of those nations that have weak environmental standards this government says that we have to reduce our environmental regulations in order to compete. That is obviously destructive and futile. It is also unnecessary.

What we can do in the face of globalization is establish international ground rules that ensure that workers are not exploited, that social programs are not destroyed and that the environment is not devastated.

The social charter that just this week the European community is discussing is an example of such ground rules. It is interesting that both the Liberal and Conservative parties have shown absolutely no interest in either national or international social charters. The government persists in saying that trade agreements are commercial agreements: they do not involve or affect people, they do not affect the workers and they do not affect the government. That is rubbish. At least the people of Europe recognize that.

There is one opponent of course in the EEC to a social charter and that is the Prime Minister of Britain. Mr. Major is opposed to the European charter because it would enforce a 48-hour week, break periods during work, a 14-week maternity leave, and consultation between employers and employees.

Colonialism in a geographic sense has been dead for a long time. I regret that the Prime Minister of Britain thinks that he can continue to entrench Thatcherite and Reaganite policies on the rest of the workers of Europe. Canada should be taking the lead to say we will not do that in our trade agreements and we will support a social charter.

We all agree that Canada must indeed be more competitive, but we can meet the challenge of globalization in my view in a positive way. Let us not look at it as an opportunity to reduce our rights and our freedoms but to enhance those of the exploited people of the world. No one should have to work a 60-hour or 70-hour week. No child of 12 should have to work. No family should have to live next to a toxic dump.

Let us make Canada more competitive. Rather than reducing standards and cutting money to education, health and social programs, and rather than perpetuating double digit unemployment, let us look at investing in people and putting people back to work.

Investment in education, job training and research in new technologies is just that. It is an investment. It creates opportunities. It creates jobs. It creates growth and in doing that it will mean debt reduction. Jobs must be a priority. Economic decision making must include social groups, labour, business and government.

This is what the world's most successful economies do and this is what Canada must do. Rather than imitating the world's weakest economies Canada should follow the course of the world's strongest. Instead of competing against the world's worst, let us aim to be the world's best. Let us be the world's best.

Finally I would like to put forward an amendment to the motion. The amendment reads:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following words:
> "unparalleled since 1982".

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member for Yukon. On questions and comments, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I would like to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that there are many things she said in her address today that I agreed with. We in the Liberal Party support a priority on full employment. We also are addressing the issue of fairness in the tax designs of this country. She brought forward in her proposal, if I understood her correctly, that she basically wanted to get the needed revenues from wealthy and major corporations.

I have stood in this House many times and have acknowledged the fact that close to three years ago there were 6,200 people in this country who made in excess of $500,000 a year and did not pay any personal income tax. That is wrong. There were 2,200 corporations three years ago with retained earnings in excess of $25 million that did not pay any tax. I think that is unfair as well.

But if we were to put the emphasis on taxing those rich people, those people with wealth and those few large corporations that are left, it would not generate enough revenue for the Treasury to meet all of the social programs that are required to meet the lifestyle we want in this country.

Here is my question to the Leader of the New Democratic Party: What specific tax designs does she have in mind to raise or generate the funds required to operate this country beyond just taxing the few rich who are left in this country and the few large corporations that are left?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I presume the member is not suggesting that the wealthy should not pay their share of tax. He did say that there are number of people who are not paying their taxes. We are agreed on that.

In terms of alternatives let me mention several. I mentioned a minimum corporate tax in my comments where about 60,000 profitable corporations are not paying any tax. It is clearly not just. Most Canadians recognize that very clearly. Corporations should be paying their full share of taxes.

Second, there are a number of tax loopholes for those in upper income brackets. As the member mentioned there are many with incomes over $500,000 who do not pay any tax. Clearly that is not just and we must close those loopholes.

There are other taxes. There is a tax on wealth similar to that in Europe which has certainly proved to be efficient in raising revenues and certainly is not oppressive to those in the middle income range because it is only dealing with those in very high capital and income brackets.

We talked about getting rid of the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. Clearly this benefits those who have money. It takes away tax revenues from those who need the funds and detracts from redistributing income in our society. This is one of the very important tasks of any government.

Consider the entertainment tax which costs Canadian taxpayers a billion dollars in tax revenue. Any government has to choose priorities. Surely the priority cannot be that someone gets a tax write-off for a box in the SkyDome or for business lunches rather than kids getting lunches and having the opportunity to eat. That is the trade off we are talking about.

The hon. member also spoke about tax options. Those are three I have mentioned. As the hon. member knows there are many billions in taxes that are uncollected. He will remember that just a couple of weeks ago the government, not to the surprise of any of us in the New Democratic Party, discovered billions of dollars in uncollected corporate taxes. We suggest that even under the existing rules the quantity of taxes that could be collected are not being done. This has been reinforced time and time again by the Auditor General of Canada.

Finally I would like to comment on the hon. member's point about full employment. I think he is quite right that in this society we need full employment as a goal. What that means, having adopted that as a goal, is that we structure our training programs and research and development toward that goal.

The unemployment rate for young people in this country is a tragedy. A country that cannot offer a future to its young people certainly is not going to have the confidence of Canadians who are young or old.

The New Democratic Party has long advocated a policy of full employment. We continue to advocate that. We believe it can be done, but it requires a different set of attitudes as well as concrete programs in training and education and income support.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to ask a question of the hon. member for Yukon who is the Leader of the NDP.

I did listen to her presentation. I certainly must congratulate her in one sense because she did present a very clear alternative to the system we presently have with the government I am a member of.

I would like to come to the point. In the riding of Ontario that I represent members of the business community are very demoralized. They are afraid to invest their money in new plants and new equipment. They are not afraid to invest in other parts of Canada. They are afraid to invest in my riding and in the province of Ontario. Part of the reason they are afraid to invest in Ontario is because of the dramatic increases they are seeing in social programs.

The member opposite in her presentation said that the Government of Canada or the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party was funded by the banks and the large corporations. There is no doubt about the fact that the unions in this country fund the NDP. In Ontario we have an NDP government that has brought forward union legislation. That has been tremendously discouraging to the investors in the province of Ontario and has clearly given advantage to the unions. The end result is that it has been a direct attack by the NDP government on the investors who would improve the economy of Ontario. Yet I have listened to the member say in public statements that she supports the policies of the Government of Ontario and would implement similar policies.

Now my question gets down to the final point. I met last week with a manufacturer who is in the process of announcing and will announce in the next two weeks a $100 million expansion of manufacturing capacity in Canada. This is in another province, even though he and his company are headquartered in my riding in the province of Ontario. He blames it squarely on the NDP policies of the Government of Ontario.

I have a question for the member. She stated that she supports the policies of Ontario. Heaven forbid if she ever forms a government in this country, but would she carry on the same policies that her party has in the province of Ontario?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member that he look at the polls. The fact is that over 40 per cent of Ontario people support the Ontario government. He might want to look at how many support the Conservative Party in Ontario. The reason they do not is because the Conservative Party federally and provincially, but particularly federally at this point, has caused unprecedented unemployment in Ontario. I think almost one in ten people in metro Toronto is living on some form of social assistance. This happened long before the New Democratic government.

This federal government insists: "If you just wait long enough we are going to help you out". The churches used to ask us to wait for the afterlife. Now it is the Conservative Party. There are poor people out there. There are hungry people out there and thank God they have a government like the Ontario government that cares about them and that has put in some policies to care about them.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I was impressed by the serious proposals given by the Leader of the New Democratic Party with specific alternatives. Even the government's spokespersons and others recognized that.

In the country right now there is disillusionment with politics and politicians. The Leader of the New Democratic Party says she will bring in a minimum corporate tax in this country, there will be succession duties and there will be the elimination of the GST. Can she tell us a timeframe? What record can she point to besides socialized medicine and other efforts by the New Democratic Party to lead this country rather than follow blindly behind?

Ms. McLaughlin: Those are very excellent questions from my hon. colleague. Certainly if I were to start listing the excellent contributions that New Democratic governments have made to this country it would be a very long list.

I should mention the record of my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca when he was the premier of British Columbia. He too established programs that were in the interests of the people of British Columbia. He took hold of that economy and said: "We are going to put in measures that benefit the people of British Columbia and in turn benefit this country".

My colleague asks about timetables. Clearly it is the policy of this party to bring in a fair tax system. In the 1960s the Carter commission had many good suggestions that Liberal governments refused to look at and Conservative governments have failed to look at. We have the alternatives. Tax reform is a priority. A fair tax system is the priority for a New Democratic Party. I can assure my colleague and I can assure Canadians that will be one of our first priorities as government.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to indicate that the speakers henceforth from the Liberal Party will have 10-minute speeches. Our times will be split into two 10-minute speeches, each with five-minute question and comment periods.

• (1220)

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Milliken: I will ignore the comment by the hon. member. He is trying to suggest our policy is split, but it is not as badly split as the party on my left.

I think you will find unanimous consent in the House to sit through the lunch hour. In other words our scheduled adjournment hour of 1.23 will be moved to two o'clock. I think if you ask you will find unanimous consent for that, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to extend the length of speeches during the lunch break?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa West for 10 minutes.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the comments I have to make in the next while are very much comments on paradise lost and a bit of despair that we are ever going to see paradise regained.

I want to talk about the code words of the years since 1984. I want to talk about the code words that have become empty words, hollow words, unkept promises and failed dreams for Canadians. I want to start with the most famous of the empty words that we have heard from this government and this Prime Minister about jobs, jobs, jobs.

Unemployment in this country right now is affecting 1.5 million people. That means there is virtually nobody in this country whose family, friends, neighbours are not touched by the devastation of being without a job and adequate income to provide for one's family, survival and comfort.

Unemployment has been accompanied by a dramatic increase in the number of bankruptcies and is partially the result of a dramatically increased number of bankruptcies. This government that came into office promising that Canada was open for business does not understand small business. It does not understand that 80 per cent of the new jobs in this country come from small independent Canadian owned businesses. Its policies have been devastating to those very businesses that are essential if we are to get Canadians working again.

On a larger scale, we have now lost .5 million manufacturing jobs. The number is bad enough but nearly one-quarter of the nation's manufacturing capacity is gone. It has gone in a very short period of time as a result of the policies of this government.

Getting Canada working means getting Canadians working again. Canadians working means people have income, are paying taxes and are able to buy goods and services that create jobs for other Canadians. It means a drop in the number of people who have to turn to government to help them through these difficult times with unemployment insurance and social services programs.

Jobs, jobs, jobs are empty words, hollow words for millions of Canadians today, and for more that 1.5 million over the course of this year. It is especially devastating when we know the extent to which it is affecting young children. This should be a happy time of year, but families are worried about their very survival and are unable to celebrate and join in sharing the joy of the season.

I want to talk about the other code words: globalization, competitiveness and free trade. Canadians know nothing is free and they are only discovering now how much free trade is costing us.

I remind the government that when it did its predictions on free trade and the benefits, not too many Canadians believed them. But the government believed, even it knew that any benefits to come from the free trade agreement were based on a dollar that was at maximum 85 cents.

For every one-hundredth of a penny the dollar went over 85 cents would in fact be negative effects of free trade. Yet it has consistently allowed the dollar to go and stay close to 90 cents.

The high interest rate policy of this government has devastated Canadian businesses and manufacturers. There have been 33 new taxes since this government has come into office. We now have a trade deficit for the first time in 15 years. There is a trade deficit in manufactured goods. No wonder we have lost so much of our manufacturing base.

Even more importantly we have this attitude that somehow straight raw market forces are what builds a country and what will let us get out there and compete and prosper in the global community.

That has been the philosophy of this government since 1984, and we are not prospering. We are not growing. We are not competing. Instead we see an attitude of freeing capital to move anywhere it wants in the world. The government is seeking out the cheapest labour and resources and is more concerned about helping those global dollars than helping their people.

We see that as the attitude of this government. We are seeing a new economic colonialism that is prepared to say that those who have least in any country in the world will have even less than they have now.

The third code word I keep hearing from this government which has no substance behind it is that people are our most valuable resource. If that were true then why have we seen a cut in unemployment and a cut in services to help people when they are going through difficult times created by this government's made-in-Canada recession?

Why have we seen hundreds of millions cut from training? Why have we seen no worker adjustment programs? Why have we seen no move on a good national apprenticeship programs? Why have we seen the devastation of science and research in this country so that our bright young scientists have to go south of the border or elsewhere in the world to use the talents that we as Canadians have paid to develop in them? Why can a bright young man with a Ph.D. and years of aeronautical experience in Canada not find a job and contribute to the growth of Canada and to our future?

Why do we now see in Ontario, the richest province in this country, an increase in welfare payments of only 2 per cent when inflation is 4 per cent and more? It is bare subsistence living for tens of thousands of Ontario families.

We are told: "Do without social programs. Do without education. Do without medicare. Do without training. Do without many of our social programs so that we can build an economy and have those things in the future". We see the doing without, but we do not see much of the future.

I want to speak briefly about the fourth code word, sustainable development. We know that our economic prosperity depends on the preservation of our resources. There is no area of economic growth or prosperity that does not depend on natural resources.

Yet we have a government that produces a well developed proposal for an economic union, but totally ignores the fact that sustainable development means integrating our environmental planning with our economic planning.

We have a government that is negotiating a new free trade deal, an economic instrument if ever there was one. It is refusing to integrate environmental considerations with that economic agreement.

I want to close briefly by talking about an experience I had a couple of weeks ago when I spoke to a small group of immigrants. A gentleman from El Salvador who has been here for about five years said to me: "What we cannot understand is why you have a government that keeps destroying things instead of building things".

• (1230)

I said: "You know, you just turned on a light in my head because all of you in this room have been in Canada less than seven years. You have never known another government besides the Conservative government. Let me tell you about when we had governments in this country that created medicare, that created the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, that created pensions and indexation so that people could live decently, that created unemployment insurance, that created legislation that protected workers". We had that kind of government in Canada and we will have it again when a Liberal government is returned to office. There is no hope for any improvement with this government.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to ask this member a question because she talked about the group she met with which had only been in Canada seven years and had not known previous governments. She went on to explain some of the things that previous governments had done.

I wonder if she proceeded to identify that the previous government forced an inflation rate in this country substantially higher than that of the United States and that the previous government put in place a National Energy Program which desperately attacked the wishes and needs of western Canada. Did she talk about a government that caused interest rates to climb to 22 per cent, that caused mortgage rates to climb so high that thousands upon thousands of people lost their houses because of the economic policies of a Liberal government that she was talking about? Did she talk to those people about the $200-odd billion debt that was created by that previous government in financing all of those many things that she took credit for in her presentation?

I am really curious. Was the member honest with the people when she talked about previous governments and the mess they left this country in? If they had not been stopped on the track they were on then, I hazard that many of us today would not be in this Parliament debating in such an open and free fashion the economic prospects of this country. We would be presently run by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank because under the policies of the government that she says was so great in the past we would have lost all control over all economic decisions. I wonder if she explained that to the people she was meeting with the other night.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the member could tell me which of the programs and policies he is disagreeing with. Which does he not think were worth Liberal governments doing? Was it medicare? Was it the Charter of Rights and Freedoms? Was it pensions with indexing so people are not poor in their old age? Was it unemployment insurance? These all seem to be programs that his government seems determined to get rid of.

I suspect also that we should go out and ask Canadians whether they preferred the kinds of programs that Liberal governments had over the years or the kinds of programs that his government is now doing and whether they felt more optimism in the 1970s and early 1980s than the despair they feel now with this government. I suspect the answers to those questions are in the polls which tell us the government is at a popularity level of less than 15 per cent.

I really did not get into a lot with the group of immigrants I spoke to. I did not get as far as telling them how this government has managed to go through a period of relative prosperity, high employment, positive trade deficit and still more than doubled the debt of this country and more than doubled the amount of taxes these people pay simply to service the debt.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to debate a very important motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition.

This government was first elected seven years ago on a promise that it would put the economy back on a solid footing and get the national debt under control. I think, if it were not so serious for the future of Canada, those promises would be laughable.

Seven years ago the Conservatives were full of ideas. They were going to give Canadians an unheard level of prosperity. They were going to make Canada competitive with new research and development commitments. They were going to cut the tax burden and create a climate favourable to business and business activity and hence economic growth. So much potential, so much disappointment.

As we survey the economic landscape seven years after, we see the wreckage created by the Conservative economic agenda. We see the industrial heartland of Canada slowly shutting down as plant after plant closes up and heads elsewhere.

We see Montreal, formerly a vibrant manufacturing centre, being turned into a desert where 11.8 per cent are unemployed. We see the farmers in the west and the fishermen in the east being told by the federal government that the cupboard is bare.

There is definitely anger in the land. The farmers, the fishermen and the unemployed are getting tired of this government's indifference and excuses. The government tries to pin the blame on past administrations but after seven years that excuse is wearing thin. After all, its blunders stand alone.

We can look at the national debt. In only seven years the Conservatives took the debt that had accumulated from 1867 to 1984 and nearly tripled it to over $400 billion. That is, I believe, an incontestable example of bad management.

The Conservatives also promised to get the deficit under control. Yet, even though they governed during the record boom years, they never managed to bring the deficit under $28 billion. The Tories can come up with all kinds of excuses, but the fact remains that these people who were elected because they were perceived as competent money managers could not get the deficit under control even in the boom years of the mid-1980s.

They could not get the deficit under control despite massive spending cuts and tax increases which have resulted in an additional income tax burden of $1,500 per Canadian family. Even the GST, which has done so much damage to business and consumer confidence, has not brought down this deficit.

There are many other examples of their economic mismanagement. In September Canada suffered its first trade deficit in 15 years. For a country like ours which is so dependent on trade, that is cause for alarm. Last month the Canadian economy lost another 49,000 jobs. This was added to 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed, but it was not reflected in the unemployment rate because 45,000 Canadians left the labour force. In other words, things got so bad for them for so long that the people's UI is running out and they are giving up and joining the welfare rolls of this country.

Speaking of people giving up, what of the 250,000 manufacturing jobs which have vanished since 1988? In the 1988 election the Prime Minister told Canadians not to worry about free trade because there were going to be adjustment programs for displaced workers. Three years later those programs are only on paper.

Conservative mismanagement is easy to explain. They have no coherent plans. They have no master plan, no innovative plan to deal with the emerging global marketplace. The old ways of doing economics, raising taxes and cutting spending are no longer enough to deal with the new creative approaches used internationally.

I do not think that their strategy will make Canada globally competitive. It is no wonder that as a nation we are faring so badly. On the other hand, I must say that there is an answer and the Liberal Party of the 1990s has a clear, precise and well planned agenda for rebuilding Canada's economy, an economy that since 1984 has been mismanaged to the point of causing unnecessary and irresponsible pain for Canadian small business, individuals, families and entire towns and cities.

We have a set of five Liberal principles on the economy. In restoring Canada's industrial strength, interest rates and the value of the Canadian dollar must be allowed to fall gradually, helping Canadians and their products to compete better internationally. New initiatives are required to promote labour force training, research and development and marketing support.

We must ensure a fair tax system. The Leader of the Opposition knows that the problems of unfair taxation cannot be solved overnight. While it would be responsible to offer tax cuts for everyone, Liberals have called for a fair tax system, especially to the middle class.

We have a comprehensive and creative adjustment policy. A Liberal government would introduce comprehensive adjustment programs to help both firms and workers adjust to the economic changes now in play.

Canada must help its workers to get the training they will need to have high skilled, high paying jobs in industries of the future. We must have balanced regional economic growth. All regions of Canada must be allowed to achieve their economic potential. Future industries should be based on the foundation of our existing resource industries and Canada should be seizing the opportunity in fast growing markets in Europe, Asia and the Pacific Rim.

We must have a fiscally responsible government. Canada's yearly deficits and accumulated debt are becoming an increasing drag on economic growth. The Leader of the Opposition has said that a Liberal government will scrutinize every line item of spending and only use government to do things it can and should do.

In conclusion, I would like to express the disappointment that all Canadians feel with this government's failed economic policies. Canadians, I truly believe, are not asking for too much. They want to feel that their government in Ottawa is fair, that their government is just, and that their government cares about their present state. Canadians want to feel that they live in a nation in which dreams and aspirations are still part of the national fibre. They want to know that their children and their children's children live with the hope of a brighter tomorrow.

At a time when people need to be taken care of, the Conservative government is abdicating its responsibility to the citizens of this country. I hope the Leader of the Opposition's motion in this House today has rekindled some of the necessary human feelings, necessary human passions, that all governments must possess in order to bring back faith, confidence and trust in a nation that is presently searching for a sense of identity.

It is one year since I was re-elected to the House of Commons. I was really hoping that I could get up in this Chamber and bring good news to the residents of York North. Unfortunately today I have to rise once again and say that the conditions for the residents of York North and Canadians from coast to coast to coast are worse. There is a lack of confidence. There is a crisis in confidence in this country. I think the government must seriously look within itself and find the inner strength necessary to bring about the type of positive changes that will take care of Canadians, particularly those people who are being hit by this unfair and unjust economic recession that has created so much heartache in many families and in many communities.

I trust that the government is listening to the message because it is a message that comes from the people of Canada.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from York North on his re-election.

I want to deal specifically with a question related to the economy. In all of our ridings we spend time when we are home going to the local restaurants. I have a couple of favourite spots. I have a place in the south end of my riding on Yonge Street called the Albion restaurant where I go on a Saturday morning to try to get a pulse on what is going on in the community. I know that the member for York North does the same thing in his community. We are constantly hearing that the tax designs are a real disincentive to growth and achievement in this country. The member lives in probably the wealthiest region in all of Canada. We heard NDPers take some rather cheap shots, I thought, when they said: "Let's just tax the wealthy and that will probably fix all our problems". I do not agree. I think people who pay absolutely no taxes should obviously pay their fair share.

But I would like the member who knows his constituents well to comment on the fact that people are not really against paying their fair share. At least that is my sense of this. Having said all that, they want some kind of a tax design that is going to sort of stimulate productivity rather than a tax design that is going to be a disincentive. I wonder if he would comment for those of us who are in regions of the country that may not be as well off as his. I wonder if he could share with us some of their comments as well.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood for his question, the sincerity of his question. He has been a member of Parliament who has worked extremely hard at devising a proposal that is obviously his own. I know that he has spent a great deal of time thinking about ways and means to have a tax structure that best reflects the aspirations of Canadians. I think he makes a very important point.

The people of the riding of York North like all Canadians do not mind paying their fair share of taxes. They do however resent it if the taxation system is imposed and if it indeed impedes economic activity and growth in this country.

I say to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood that the Liberal Party, as it did in the goods and services tax debate, clearly outlined principles that we will adhere to in our tax reform package. These are principles such as simplicity, visibility, fairness, the ability to pay and revenue neutrality. These are principles we are going to stick to.

We are not going to throw them away like the Conservatives did with the goods and services tax. We are going to have a tax system that is going to make Canadians want to get out there and produce and bring about economic growth.

On the point of taxation, I think at some time we are quite parochial in this House to think that the deficit is going to be reduced through an increase of taxation. I think that is unbelievable.

The only way we are going to reduce that deficit is going to be through economic productivity and growth and through having an economy that is going to expand. We have to make the pie bigger.

I am often puzzled by debates in this House concerning taxation, that we are still using this old-fashioned way of dealing with the deficit. What we need are innovative measures that will bring about economic growth and facilitate the process for those people who want to invest in people and indeed in the economic structure of this country. Government should be the key facilitator.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate today on the government's record in managing our economic affairs.

Unlike some of the other speakers who have spoken previously and who undoubtedly will follow me, I will speak about the record as it is and not as they imagine it to be.

• (1250)

I would like to remind this House that the government of which I am a member came to power some seven years ago. It inherited a backlog of deficit spending and accumulated debt unprecedented in Canada's history. I suspect if you truly check around the world, on a per capita basis there are not too many countries that saw a growth in their debt and deficit to levels that Canada did. Nothing can wish this record of fiscal irresponsibility away.

It is to the credit of this government that instead of trying to wish the problem away, it has taken some firm action to correct it and I might say particularly in the last three years. It is false and irresponsible to insist that one can spend one's way to prosperity. Instead, the government is taking the responsible course of putting our fiscal house in order as the only sure foundation on which to build the strength of Canada, growth and prosperity.

The facts are quite plain. Canada has a $400 billion deficit. It has a federal debt problem today because during the seventies and eighties governments spent more on programs, public services and interest than they received in revenues. While the deficit grew, rather than cut back, governments spent even more money.

By 1984–85 the government had a $16.5 billion operating deficit just on programs and operations. Add to that another $22 billion in interest costs on the national debt and we had a deficit of $38.5 billion. The government was spending $1.33 for every $1 in taxes that it took in.

The result of that "spend today, pay tomorrow" policy was to boost the national debt by nearly eightfold in just 10 years. It went from $27 billion in 1974–75 to $206 billion in 1984–85. Unfortunately the spending track that the Government of Canada was on was almost impossible for us to get off. In the last six years the debt has almost doubled to a level of about $400 billion.

Since the Conservative government came to office, it has been following a very consistent plan to increase Canada's economic potential. In fact the previous member who just spoke said that the solution is not increased taxation but an increase in the over-all pie. I can tell you that the government that I am a member of is in fact trying to do exactly that.

We have had to attack the debt challenge on two fronts. First we had to introduce fundamental structural reforms to revitalize the private sector and encourage the growth that makes possible new government revenues. These initiatives include deregulation of key economic sectors, tax reform, privatization of more than 20 Crown corporations, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and scrapping of the Foreign Investment Review Agency and the National Energy Program. It has provided a more positive investment climate.

The result of these reforms has provided real fiscal benefits. For example no longer are taxpayers footing the bill for de Havilland and Canadair. The spending on those by the end of 1984 had cost the government at least $2.5 billion. Privatization has helped reduce the public payroll by 80,000 in Crown corporation employees. In the post office, government payments this year will be $500 million less than in 1984–85.

In fact I heard members of the NDP, including the Leader of the NDP, speaking a little earlier about minimum corporate tax. I guess what I would ask her is why, when the government introduced the minimum corporate tax in this House, did her party vote against it? In fact that tax is now in place.

We also put in place a thing called a tax on capital. Why is it then that the NDP party and in fact the Liberal Party voted against those two proposals? They talk about fairness in the tax system yet on those two very specific points both opposition parties clearly voted against them.

We also recognize that Canada's debt burden was itself a barrier to economic growth putting pressures on taxes, inflation and ultimately interest rates. That meant further direct action was needed at the source of the debt problem itself, which was federal spending. We took action.

Under the leadership of the Prime Minister, we established a broad program to control spending. We have made absolute cuts in programs wherever possible and applied severe restraint on growth in other areas. The government has completely eliminated programs on home insulation, oil substitution and heavy water plants. As a result, federal energy subsidies today are $2.4 billion less than they were seven years ago.

We have closed military bases. We have cut back payments to VIA Rail. The size of the civil service has been reduced. It has been difficult but we have made those decisions. That discipline has delivered major results. From 1984–85 to 1990–91 growth in federal program spending—that is all spending except interest payments and debt—has been held to just 3.7 per cent a year. That compares with an average annual growth rate of 13.8 per cent in the previous 15 years.

We have gone even further because we have introduced into this House a proposal in the last budget which is now being finalized by the Minister of Finance, which is a spending control act. This will in fact restrict our arms and our ends and the way government spends money for the next five years.

It is important to recognize that two-thirds of the improvement in the operating balance has in fact been accomplished by expenditure control. Revenues account for only one-third of the improvement. As a matter of fact, government revenues as a share of Gross Domestic Product are no higher than they were in the early 1970s.

Because the government has achieved this operating surplus, the entire increase in the national debt since 1984–85 is due only to compound interest or interest charges on the debt we inherited. The fact is we have to make those interest payments and that means further deficits and still growing debt and the interest charges that debt imposes.

That is why in the February budget there were further measures introduced: first, to hold the deficit to $30.5 billion this year despite the impact of the recession, the agricultural subsidy war and the possible Persian Gulf war expenditures. That was a major accomplishment, in my mind. Second, we plan on getting the deficit down to $25 billion next year for the first time in a decade. We will be setting it on a path where it will continue to fall even further. Third, we plan on eliminating the need for new government borrowings on financial markets by 1994–95. This will be the first time in 25 years that no such borrowings will be necessary by the Government of Canada.

It has been tough and we have got to take some actions. I mentioned we introduced the spending control act which establishes very specific limits on program expenditure growth for the next five years. In fact the finance committee has reviewed that particular spending control act and has made its report.

Nearly all of the increases in program spending over the next two years are concentrated where they are in fact most needed: old age security, unemployment insurance benefits, increases in transfers to lower income provinces and social assistance transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Complimenting the spending control act, we have the debt servicing and reduction account which will ensure that all net revenues of the GST will only be used to service and reduce the debt itself ultimately. That is what Canadians demanded during the GST hearings. That is what they demanded when the GST was put in place. They wanted a guarantee that the government was not going to spend the revenue of the GST on new programs. They have that commitment in the form of legislation from our government.

Finally we established specific inflation targets to get inflation down to less than 2 per cent by the end of 1995. We have seen already that lower inflation is the key to interest rate reduction. The banks prime lending rate is at the lowest level since the early 1970s. Some mortgage rates are lower than they have been since the 1960s. I can vouch for that personally. We purchased our first house in 1970 and in that entire period from 1970 through until today I have never had a mortgage rate as low as I have today. There are results.

In my constituency, which has substantial housing development going on, even in the recession environment, I can tell you that mortgage rates are very important to my constituents. Lower rates have reduced in fact the cost of servicing the debt.

Good economic management means focusing and facing up to the fiscal reality. It does not mean promising silver bullet solutions, lower interest rates at whim, increased government spending that ignores our destructive debt burden or a dollar lower than the market determines that the opposition is trying to sell the Canadians. Those are just snake oil potions. They are all recipes for enduring competitive weakness and national decline.

We have to keep things in perspective as we look ahead to the challenges that we face as Canadians. We have one of the most prosperous countries in the world with an enviable record of wealth, income and job creation. We have the seventh largest economy in the world. We have the second highest standard of living. In other words, we should recognize and build on those strengths. By holding the course of putting our fiscal house in order, our government has chosen the responsible course. This is one that means we can and will be able to build on strength and not weaknesses. Finally I would like to turn to another vital area where the government has proposed ways to strengthen our economic potential. These are the proposals we have made to improve the working of our national economic union. These proposals would strengthen our economy in two important ways.

Before I list those ways, I should point out that in my riding we have discussions going on about the constitutional proposals that are before the country. Many Canadians seem to come out with the standard line: "Would you forget about the Constitution? Would you deal with our economic problems?" Well, those Canadians obviously have not read the proposals to their fullest, because if they truly look at them they will see that of the 28 proposals out there before Canadians right now, 14 of them deal with the economic issues of this country. That is where we need to make progress, and clearly that is where the government is acting.

I would like to return to my comments about two very specific issues. First we are trying to remove barriers to the free flow of persons, goods, services and capital.

Second, we are facilitating a process of joint decision making by federal and provincial governments on issues where greater co-ordination and harmonization can improve the operation of our economic union. The internal barriers in our domestic market represent a great burden to all Canadians.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association estimates that the cost to the average family of four in Canada is $1,000 a year because of those barriers that exist. Those are internal barriers, provincial trade barriers operating against Canadians.

To deal with that, we have proposed an amendment of the so-called common market clause in the Constitution. It would empower Canadians, both businesses and individuals, to challenge through the courts government practices that create barriers or restrictions to the free flow of people, goods, services and capital within Canada on the basis of provincial or territorial boundaries.

The effect of such constitutional amendment would be clear and simple. It would provide all Canadians with the right to pursue the livelihood of their choice and economic opportunities wherever they choose to do so across our great country. However, a strengthened, competitive economic union will require more than this. It will also require greater co-ordination and harmonization of policies between all levels of government, but particularly between the federal government and the provincial governments.

In the past, federal and provincial governments have had no mechanisms through which they could work together as partners to implement beneficial economic policies. In the absence of such a mechanism, federal-provincial meetings have often seemed to many Canadians as little more than a tug of war because there was no way to take decisions and no need for anyone to stand up and be counted.

We have to do better. What is needed is a joint decision-making mechanism that will allow governments of all levels, working together, to take actions to improve the efficient functioning of our national economy. To this end we have proposed a second amendment to the Constitution.

We are proposing that Parliament be empowered to make laws for the efficient functioning of the economic union with, and I stress only with, the agreement of at least seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population. Because of that provision such a power would not and indeed could not be used as a vehicle for a power grab by the federal government.

Unlike other federal-provincial powers in the Constitution, this power could not be used unless there was an agreement between both levels of government. Its application would be restrictive to co-operative measures that improve the functioning of the Canadian national economic union.

It is important to note that many of our international competitors have strengthened their economic unions by transferring powers to central authorities. Ours is a different approach, with proposals that apply to both levels of government. It is a model that calls for co-operation, not domination.

There is another important point I should add. Not only are our proposals designed to improve the way governments work together, but they also reflect the goal of making the whole economic policy process more open and transparent to the public at large.

Canadian taxpayers and business decision makers have a right to be better informed about policy issues, objectives and constraints. More open and better informed exchanges of views between government and the public is an important foundation to improve our economic performance and our ability to work together. Our government is committed to a course of fiscal progress toward the ultimate goal of debt freedom. Surely everyone in this House would support that goal. It is also important that we keep current economic circumstances in proper perspective. We must not allow an unjustified mood of pessimism about our economic prospects to become a self-fulfilling prophecy. We should also recognize that we have made real progress in getting our financial house in order.

Only by sticking to this responsible course can we ensure and fulfil our future prosperity. That is what good economic management really means.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the member who just spoke talked about his responsible policies and how well they have worked for the country.

If they have worked so well, can he explain why 1.5 million to 2 million people are out of work today and 1 million children live in poverty? If his government's interest rate policy is working so well, why have we seen a drop in new housing starts over the last little while across the country rather than an increase? Surely the member has to take off his glasses and start looking at the world as it really is.

His government's policies have failed and he should admit they have failed as R. B. Bennett did at the end of the last depression, and start changing those policies so that they can address the reality of the fact that we are deeply in a recession and need some action on the part of government to bring us out.

His government's policies have clearly failed. How does the hon. member explain high levels of unemployment, high levels of poverty, low levels of housing starts and economic activities? Clearly he must recognize that his government's policies have failed.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, no one can be happy with 1.5 million people out of work. In fact the number may even be slightly higher than that. We cannot be pleased with that. What the member is saying is that you ignore the concepts of debt, inflation and interest rates.

If he would truly look at it, the very people he is speaking about and those at the poverty levels are hurt more by inflation than anyone else in this country. They are hurt more by high interest rates than anyone else in this country.

It is very clear that you need to address the fundamentals to encourage investment. I would like to give him the best quote of all, because we look at some of our neighbours and some of our competitors around the world as doing really well. I would just like to quote him one line which appeared in the December 16 edition of Fortune Magazine: "What the economy needs now is not fiscal stimulus. It would send interest rates soaring. A better idea for the long term is to cut taxes on investment and pay the bills".

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member for Ontario. I tend to agree with some of the views he presented in his speech.

He did say in his address that the government's inflation target was approximately 2 per cent by 1995. We are sitting here in 1991 with an inflation rate that for the last two months on an individualized basis has been almost zero. Probably by the first quarter of 1992 there will be no inflation in this country. I believe the Minister of State for Finance in this House just yesterday or the day before said that.

This is a very heavy ratchet on inflation. The member knows this causes a lot of pain in the economy. In order to bring inflation to that level this quickly, it is obvious that the results are high unemployment and a nervousness in the constituency in the country, even though there is a low bank rate. It is the lowest in 18 years, I acknowledge that, and people are not spending. There are a lot of retailers out there right now in the busiest month of the year who wonder, because of the drag on consumer spending, whether or not they are going to make it past February 1 or whatever.

My question for the member who sits on the finance committee is: At what point do you let up on that ratchet on inflation, especially when it is zero, to try to let people revive again and get that economy going? At what point?

• (1310)

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for his question.

Presumably his comments about the current inflation rates are correct. The fact of the matter is that in the three years I have been on the finance committee we have done a number of studies on inflation rates and interest rates. There is no doubt there is a direct link between the two.

There are some other things, of course, that impact on interest rates, but inflation is certainly one of them.

Although we have two or three months of inflation numbers that are extremely low, I think what we on the government side are saying in our objective of a 2 per cent inflation rate is a sustained 2 per cent.

I would concur with the member that zero per cent is not sustainable. It is not healthy for the economy to have a zero inflation rate very long. I guess at some point we have to allow the economy some growth. We have acknowledged that in the context of reduction in interest rates that have already taken place.

I personally believe we will see more of that. I hope that will carry on. If you can get that rate down to 7 per cent or 6 per cent, I think consumers across this country will realize first of all that putting money in the bank is not all that lucrative, as was indicated this morning.

There are people saving money right now. The minute they have confidence in the economy, which we think they will have, they will have the resources to spend. They will also be able to borrow money at a very competitive rate which will also boost consumer spending. I think at that point, at a low inflation rate, we will see the economy functioning extremely well. I believe we will see that within a very short term, in the next quarter if not the one after that.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate my colleague from Ontario on his excellent speech. I think that he gave a good overview of Canada's past and present situation.

That being said, I would like my colleague to tell me how come the national debt, which was about $200 billion in 1984 when this government was elected, is around $400 billion. I want to ask the hon. member whether it is true that 90 to 95 per cent of the government's annual deficit since 1984 is interest it had to pay on the debt that the former Liberal government left us.

Doing this calculation, I must say that in 1984 I had a $200 billion debt with x billion in interest to pay and so on every year since then. All the interest payments made since then amount to the increase in the national debt that we have today.

[English]

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for Trois-Rivières for the question.

Certainly prior to 1984 the growth in government debt was tied twofold. First, they were spending more on programs than they were generating in revenue. On top of that there was the interest cost.

Since 1984, if you look at the six-year budgets—I am not sure of this year's number—of the Conservative government, of the over-all growth in debt of the Government of Canada about $15 billion was because the government spent more on programs in total over that six years than it generated in revenue.

The other $185 billion in growth on the debt of this country was in fact directly related to the interest payments we had to make on the $200 billion debt that was there when the government was elected in 1984.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, to the member, I note the figures on small business and personal bankruptcies over the past year have skyrocketed.

The last figures for October show there have been 6,896 businesses and consumers declaring bankruptcy. Of those 1,156 businesses went bankrupt in October, which is 22 per cent higher than last month and 1 per cent higher than one year ago.

How can the member assert that the Progressive Conservative government's policies in monetary and fiscal matters are working when the unemployment rate is so high, poverty is at an unheard of level in this country, and more small businesses are failing than ever before in the history of Canada? How can he stand there and tell the people of Canada that the government's fiscal and monetary policies are working when so many people are hurting so badly?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, no one can be happy when you recite numbers of 6,896 people or businesses going into bankruptcy. Yes, 1,156 businesses filed bankruptcy in this country and I presume they were small businesses. That is a terrible number. But what the hon member refuses to acknowledge is that in the last six or seven years there were some 1.5 million new businesses created in this country.

It is unfortunate there were 1,156 bankruptcies last month but we cannot ignore the 1,500,000 that were created in the last six years.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this extremely important debate, the motion that was introduced by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

This opposition day motion we are currently debating should be of concern to all Canadians no matter where they live, no matter what their jobs are if they have a job, no matter what their financial circumstances are.

The motion deals with the economy. It deals with the sorry state of affairs this great and wealthy nation currently finds itself in. A little earlier I said this was perhaps the wealthiest and greatest nation in the world. We have been blessed with more resources than any other part of the globe. We count ourselves lucky under God to inhabit this land.

There is a problem and it is not a lack of resources or a lack of ingenuity. The problem is not a lack of caring or wanting by the Canadian public to be productive to have our economy grow and flourish to become more competitive nationally and internationally. The problem comes down to managing that great resource which collectively we all own. That is where the problem is.

This sorry bunch opposite has been in since 1984. I remember 1984. The Prime Minister at that time went around the country with that smirk on his face saying: "Jobs, jobs, jobs". All you had to do was elect Brian Mulroney and his band of Tories and jobs would be everywhere.

In Atlantic Canada he threatened to inflict prosperity upon us. It was a pretty interesting challenge to be taken up.

In 1984 they elected him, figuring maybe he is the best individual to put forward continued liberal type policies of inclusion in the economy, of equalization, of growth of social programs, of growth and increase in our competitiveness and our productivity as a nation.

By the end of 1988 the gig was up. Canadians who had waited with bated breath in every part of this country for prosperity to be inflicted upon them found out there was something being inflicted upon them but it did not start by the letter p. It was not prosperity. It was depression. It was regression. It was recession.

In places like the Atlantic which are the first to slip into recession and the very last to climb out of recession, the same as some parts of western Canada, we waited. By the time the dinner tray got to us there were no crumbs left. In 1988 he knew that his promises of jobs, jobs, jobs was pretty hollow. He and his miracle makers, the mandarins in the back room, and his high priced help from down at the advertising agencies on Bay Street, some even from New York and other places, pulled together a campaign on free trade. Again we were told that the key to the competitiveness and future of the Canadian economy lay with the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. He said: "If you come with us, you will be set free because the borders are going to be opened and there is going to be prosperity. The sun is going to shine and in every garden patch there will be a job again". My colleague says big business bought full-page ads. The Canadian electorate were a little confused. It was not sure, and with friends like big business and full-page ads he managed to squeak in again.

The results are pretty sorry. We are three years down the road now and where is the prosperity? Where is the feeling of Canadians that somehow the greatness of this country has not been spent or misspent by this government? There is a mood in this nation which is foul. We do not even know if we want to stay together any more. Can you imagine? We are blessed. We have been put on this planet, on this soil, in a country that is the richest in the world. Now we are even talking about whether or not we want to stay together, if the French can live with the English, if we all can live with the immigrants and aboriginal Canadians. This did not just crop up. It was not some latent racism and bigotry and urge to self-destruct that we as Canadians always carried. It was planted there by this government.

You start to wonder whether or not you can put bread and butter on the table for your children. It is bread and margarine these days. Nobody can afford butter. You wonder whether or not your kids are going to be able to get a university education. You wonder how you are going to be able to manage if you do qualify for unemployment insurance. Then maybe you start to wonder if that great dream of Canada has lost its sparkle and magic.

Let us look at what government members have done to us. They are so smug on the other side here and when we get up to ask them questions they try to slap us down. They do not want to hear what we have to say, but we are speaking for Canadians.

Look at the unemployment rate. There are a million and a half Canadians unemployed right now. There is upwards of another half million, maybe a million relying on food banks. This is Canada, not a Third World nation. But those people have to rely on food banks to put bread on their tables and clothes on their children's backs.

The business community in Canada is a great business community. Small and medium sized businessmen and women of this country have made this country great. It was their ingenuity, hard work, commitment and investment in this country that allowed us to grow and flourish. But government members were not content to let well enough alone in that case either. They crippled them with taxes. They came in with the goods and service tax, and they told every businessman and woman in the country: "Don't worry about it. It is going to be better than the PST, that dastardly dirty old provincial sales tax, that killer of jobs. Trust us once again".

They trusted them, some of them did, but most of them said: "No, we have been misled by this bunch for too long. We were misled on the jobs, jobs, jobs in 1984. We were misled on the free trade in 1988".

Look at the manufacturing sector. There are nearly 400,000 jobs that have been lost because of free trade, most of them in southern and southwestern Ontario. They come with the GST and say: "Trust us. This is a fair way to do a tax". It was pretty damned fair to the 51,000 businesses that have had to declare bankruptcy in the first 10 months of this year. Go talk fairness to them and talk about economic prosperity. They have seen their businesses, their family lives and their dignity crushed. It is not because they did not have the wherewithal or the ingenuity but simply because they could not take another beating by this government through its insane economic policies.

Go talk to the 15,000 Canadians who have had to declare personal bankruptcy in this country in the last 10 months. Talk to them about how great this government has been doing with that fabulous resource called Canada that was entrusted to it. Talk to the retailers who probably do not have any fingernails left.

They have worked their fingers to the bone. They have bitten their fingernails off in every mall and on every main street in Canada. We have not forgotten them on our side. We have been doing our best for them. This government by its own economic policies has driven the country into recession. The GST has compounded the situation. The GST has done more to cripple the consumers' faith in the economy than anything any government has ever done before. Consumers do not spend. Do you know why? It is not just the GST. They just do not know the next trick this government has up its sleeve to beat them up with. They do not believe this government is dealing in good faith and that it has not abused the trust that was placed in it.

An hon. member: Obsessed by inflation.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. Bankruptcies are up. The GST has crippled consumer confidence. There are two million people unemployed. It is even higher than that. What about all those people who are underemployed? How do they feel? Maybe they are watching us live now because they do not have jobs and maybe their cable television has not yet been cut off. That would be the Grinch after Christmas. They sit there. They look at us and they want us to do something. They say: "Stop beating on me".

The hon. member opposite said a few minutes ago said: "We have done the hard stuff". It is easy for us to say that. We make about 100,000 bucks a year in this place. It is easy for us to talk about hard times, isn't it, when the results of our actions is that the poorest of the poor get nailed?

I wish I could speak for days on this. However, all I wish to say in conclusion is that this government has the message. It is at 14 per cent in the polls. Does it have no shame? It has crippled the small business sector and the economy. What we need at this point is either for this government to do a complete turn on its economic policies or to do the right thing and show some sense and decency. It should call an election so that the people of Canada can once again experience hope for the future.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my colleague from Dartmouth that I believe he is right on focus.

So often the people in the country wonder if the opposition only knows how to criticize. They wonder if the opposition has ideas to put forward. Even though the opposition is constantly putting forward ideas sometimes those ideas are not promoted.

I would like to refer to an idea my colleague talked about earlier last week. It dealt with credit card rates in this country.

We all know that when we do have fairness in our system this generates a will to succeed and to be productive. It generates a sense of confidence. When the government stands up day after day in this House of Commons in Question Period it talks about the 8 per cent bank rate. It is the lowest bank rate in 18 years, it says. However we have in our economy close to 50 million credit cards at 18.5 per cent to 19.5 per cent. These 50 million cards are the instruments of purchasing in this country today.

Does he not think, if this government were sincere in trying to give this economy a bit of a kick, that this might be a good time for an Order in Council from this government to do something concrete about reducing credit card rates to where they are more reasonable? This is especially valid when we now know that the major financial institutions in this country just finished recording close to $4 billion in profits.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I want to thank my hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for an appropriate question, particularly at this time of the year. This is the time of the year when individuals have been inundated with the promotion of the new type of transaction in Canada which is called credit cards. He is quite correct. Just for Visa and MasterCard alone in Canada there are nearly 27 million cards. Of those 27 million cards fully 50 per cent of them carry an unpaid balance of approximately $1,000 a month. That is a lot of money. Figure it out. There are billions of dollars here. The government has the ability to come in and regulate but it has not.

We have seen interest rates go down. We have seen the spread between the prime rate and credit card rates charged to about 18 million consumers in Canada stay almost 12 points above prime.

What does 12 points above prime mean? It means that for every single one per cent the interest rate is above what it should be per month Canadian consumers are being gouged to the tune of $15 million a month.

What has happened here is again a matter of confidence. The government has the tools at its disposal. The chairman of the committee has done an extremely good job in stripping the partisanship out of the committee that had studied this. The chairman is Mr. Holtmann. I know I am not supposed to say his name but I think Canadians should know.

We have come up with solid recommendations to the government. We said that one of the things the government can do easily is not going to cost it any money. It will put more money into the pockets of consumers. More important, it will put some confidence back into the pockets of consumers. They will feel that they are not going to be gouged and that the government is listening. It is taking the appropriate steps to ensure that they can become more productive and that their interests are being looked after. It could be done easily.

The banks at this point have made $3.7 billion profit at a time when we are in the worst recession since the dirty thirties. It is a time when there are one and a half million people unemployed and nearly half a million to a million people relying on food banks. The unemployment rate is over 10 per cent. Canadians are suffering. At this very time that Canadians are suffering the hardest the government says: "My hands are tied behind my back. I cannot do anything". If we can drop interest rates by 2 points that is $30 million a month or $360 million a year.

I am glad that he raised that because it shows Canadians that there are certain things the government can do. It can do them easily and quickly to effect an upsurge in consumer confidence which will in turn fuel the recovery we so badly and desperately need.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to stand in this House today to address this very important topic of the economy in Canada.

There are basically four points that I want to make. First, I want to draw a large picture to try to situate Canadians to give them a sense of what is happening within the country. They are not without knowing that the deficit is extremely high. It is in excess of $30 billion. They know that the debt has surpassed $400 billion. These are astronomical figures and extremely difficult for most individuals to understand because they do not deal with them on a regular basis.

They know that they have suffered tax increase after tax increase. In fact the number is well over 30. I believe the count is 34 if we include the goods and services tax. In fact it may be 35 if we include the increased premiums of unemployment insurance.

They see these particular increases and they see the deficit as still very high. The deficit is almost double and they say to themselves: "What is happening? Why are these problems not being resolved?" They recognize as well that when this government came to power the total revenue that it was collecting in taxes was in the neighbourhood of $70 billion.

It is now almost double. It is in excess of $130 billion according to what we project this year. They say: "All of these tax increases, an almost doubling of revenues, and there has been no significant gain with respect to the reduction of the deficit or the debt". They know that there have been until recently extremely high interest rates.

They recognize that if those interest rates had been lower it would have cost us less money to support that debt and to pay the interest. They are not totally sympathetic and that is the kindest way that I can say what has been happening.

They recognize that since June 1989 there have been over 300,000 jobs lost in the manufacturing sector and they worry. They worry about today, tomorrow, themselves, their future and their children's future.

They also know that this country of ours is one of the finest in the world and one where most people from outside our border would like to live. They know it is not only in a serious financial situation but the institutions that we have come to rely upon are really crumbling.

For example in Canada today as we speak—about five million people are poor. Many of them—I believe over a million—are young people, children, and a large majority are women.

Right now we realize that over two million Canadians are on welfare and nearly one and a half million are unemployed. We know very well that the actual number is much higher because many unemployed people have given up looking.

We know that this year 1.8 million Canadians, almost two million, will have to go to food banks. How can this be in our country? That is what is going on today and it is not at all pleasant. It is shocking. We realize that these 1.8 million Canadians who rely on food banks to eat include about 300,000 children, some very young. It is unimaginable, unacceptable and it frightens people. It makes them lose all confidence.

[English]

These same people, as they look at this deteriorating situation which I indicated, are frightened. They are losing confidence in the country, in its institutions and in government. Of course this makes the whole challenge of governing that much more difficult today.

It is not unusual that we should be having serious conflicts throughout the nation. There are conflicts in terms of national unity and conflict in terms of people being unwilling to make accommodations or compromises. Because they are frightened they feel that if they were to do that they would lose even more than they have lost.

They look at the country and they see bankruptcies. I want to quote because I do not want to mislead anyone. There have been more bankruptcies in the first 10 months of this year than in all of last year, which was a record breaking year for both consumer and corporate insolvencies. That was in the province of Manitoba. Between January 1 and November 1 of this year 2,455 bankruptcies were recorded in Manitoba. This includes 331 business failures.

As I travel about my constituency I see vacancy after vacancy. Many of the areas which were once flourishing with small, active, lively, competitive businesses look like disaster areas. That frightens people as well because as they travel back and forth to work and go out and do whatever shopping they can, they see that the situation is not getting better. It is getting worse. It is really getting very bad.

Let me share some personal statistics with which I am dealing in my own constituency. I will use fictitious names to protect the identity of the individual. The first person is Allan who is almost 50 years old. He was removed from his position because it was redundant. He was in a position of middle management. He has been looking for a job for over a year and has been unable to find anything. He has an excellent work record with superb references.

What about Brian? Brian has a master's degree in public administration. He has not been able to find a full-time job. There are little short jobs and very often he is very poorly remunerated.

What about Charles? Charles has a degree as well, in the area of economics. He has not been able to land a long-term job. If my memory serves me correctly, six months has been the longest job.

What about Donalda who has two degrees? She is a single mother who has not been able to find anything significant. In fact if things continue as they are she will probably have to take a basic entry job which pays a bare minimum wage or slightly over minimum wages.

What about Ernest? Ernest also has a master's degree. He is a new Canadian and full of enthusiasm. What has happened to him? He has been looking for a job for the last several years.

Every one of those individuals, and I can mention some other as well, is a responsible and well educated person. They have excellent skills but they simply cannot get jobs. I have not mentioned the Pauls and the Janices. These are the people who have journeyman papers and a number of trades who have lost their jobs and would have to take roughly half of what they earned if they can get a job. There are many of those people out there as well.

There were 2,000 jobs lost during the last 10 years in the CNR as I mentioned in this House this week. I think it was 1,000 during the last three years. They say: "What is happening to my province? What is happening to my country? What is happening to my city?"

They look at VIA Rail which was decimated with almost 3,000 lost jobs that were never to return. They look at Route Canada which was a trucking firm that went bankrupt a number of years ago and over 1,900 people were just left hanging. Nothing has been done for them. They look at TIEM, the company that was supposed to help small businesses. We do not have the full story there, but we know that it is less than totally pleasant. It did not work out at all. It left people hanging, people who had invested a lot of their time and a lot of their money.

They look at news stories such as the one yesterday about the port of Churchill possibly closing. They saw the headline of just a couple of days ago about the loss of additional jobs at CNR. They look at the cuts in Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International Limited. They wonder when this is going to stop.

What has the government done? It could have invested more in education, but it will have cut $10 billion in education between 1986 and 1995.

In training and retraining there are fewer dollars. We need more training and retraining. In research and development it was going to invest twice as much. What has happened? It slid. It is much less than what it was. I could go on and on.

We need an election. We really need to have the Canadian people say: "This is what we want with this particular program". We need to look at policies such as a lower dollar. We need to look at whatever it is we can do to get Canadians back to work.

I would like to say that if we could make one decision right now, it would be to permit those people with credit cards to have lower rates at this time. I am sure it would help the small business people who are struggling to make it over the Christmas holiday. If it does not work out during the next couple of weeks, they are going to be a lot more bankruptcies.

I am pleased I was able to address this particular motion.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, you caught me off guard. I thought for sure we would have some questions and answers from the other side.

The motion before us today is certainly a serious one. I think it is very important that Canadians have a chance to hear us debate it today in the House of Commons. There is no question that the Canadian economy is hurting, that we are in the midst of a recession, and that we do have a million plus unemployed in this country.

I think what we have to do is not only talk about Canada, but focus on where we are in relation to the rest of the world. Canada is not alone in this thing. None of us in this House enjoys listening to or looking at some of the stats that have been thrown around here this morning. Some were quite accurate and some were misleading.

Most of us would agree that we have a million plus unemployed and it is not a nice thing to see when we go back into our ridings. All of us are affected. This unemployment knows no political boundaries. Whether you are NDP, Liberal or Conservative, we are all affected in our individual ridings, neighbourhoods and our individual families. It is not an easy thing to see at this time of year.

As I mentioned at the outset we are not alone in this thing. That is what we have to focus on in this debate today. Canada is moving out of the recession. There are some very strong indicators that we are effectively moving out of the recession. There is a long way to go. We admit that but we are moving out of it.

Much of the emphasis today has been on Canada versus the U.S. and the free trade agreement in relation to the U.S. Let us examine the U.S. economy for a minute. Let us take a look at what is going right or what is going wrong with that economy. The United States has monumental problems. When we talk about job losses in Canada, we can talk about a million plus jobs lost and we will accept those figures.

As I mentioned earlier, they are not easy figures to accept, but we will accept them.

South of us in the United States there is unemployment at this very moment ranging, depending on whose figure you want to believe, from 10 million to 12 million. The U.S. has its problems too.

It is interesting to note that we are doing some things in this country about our position. We know we have to get some of the fundamentals right to move beyond where we are this very day.

Some of those fundamentals that we believe are very necessary to move out of recession to a period of recovery and growth I think we have the right concept of and we are doing the things that we have to do versus the United States which refuses to look at the real structural problems within its economy.

We have taken some of those hard decisions in the last couple of years, many hard decisions. Those are not easy ones to go back home and defend, but we have nonetheless taken those.

One of the serious problems that we faced in 1984 when we took office was a mounting debt, a crippling debt load, and one that was bound to get us into the kinds of difficulties we are in now.

Take a look at 1984. The percentage of debt in relation to Gross Domestic Product was running at a rate of 8.7 per cent. Take a look at it today. Today that number has almost been cut in half. It is in the area of 4.6 per cent in relation to Gross Domestic Product. That is the real measure of what we have done about the debt because the Canadian economy has grown but our ability to fight that debt in relation to the growth in the economy has been very successful. No one argues that, particularly international investors when they look at this country and can measure what we have done.

Politically it has not been easy. If you want to poke fun at our standings in the polls, they are higher than the interest rates today. A couple of years ago maybe we could have argued that they were not, but they are now.

I think the real truth of what is happening to the Canadian economy can be measured in the international investment world, the investment markets. We are doing the right things, although they are tough politically.

The figure of 4.6 per cent, the figure of debt in relation to Gross Domestic Product, is going to drop to less than 1 per cent by 1995. If our projections are right, it will come down in the order of about .7 per cent, less than 1 per cent. That will be the year that we will also start to pay down the debt. If it is not that year, it will be close to it. We will be in what we call a zero borrowing position. We can start really paying down that debt.

Another difficulty we inherited on this side of the House in 1984 was that our operating balance was out of whack. The cost of programs before paying interest was something in the order of $16 billion more than revenue. We changed that around. Now we have a $12 billion surplus on that operating balance and that operating account.

That was the thing which restricted us from paying down the debt. All political arguments aside, if you look at the debt we inherited, which was $200 billion plus in 1984, what we have today when we look at the accumulated debt of approximately $390 billion is accumulated interest on that debt because the structural deficit we inherited restricted us from paying down the dollar amount of that debt. We are simply paying interest on it.

We know how much that interest is gobbling up in terms of government revenues today.

Canadians are probably paying too much in taxes and 35 cents out of every dollar simply pays interest on the debt.

• (1350)

It is crazy. It is a crazy position for a government to get into. How did we allow ourselves to get into that position? Again, it is the old trick that I usually pull back in the riding. I pull the pen out of the pocket. It is interesting that I have a red pen here because those red numbers were simply created in those years leading up to 1984 when politicians went back home to their ridings and simply wrote the cheque knowing full well the money was not here to pay for it.

We did not have the money to pay the bills. We had to borrow it. We went on that destructive course and we had been on it for many years.

This is the first government in the last 30 years that has decided we cannot go on that destructive course. That 35 cents you are sending to Ottawa to pay the debt is money that is wasted.

Just imagine the types of programs we could have today if 35 cents of our dollar were not simply going to pay interest on the debt. It is wasted money. It is money that cannot be used for health care programs. It cannot be used for housing programs. It is simply money that is wasted. It is going to the bond holders who are reaping the rewards of this.

Talk about irony. The people who need the money the least are the ones who gain in a system laden with debt. Canada has done what very few western countries have done in the last 10, 20, 30 years. Canada has faced reality and is going back to square one.

An editorial in The Globe and Mail dated November 7, 1991 says it all. Talking about the U.S., the headline is "A wake-up call for George Bush". What it is saying is simply that the United States of America has refused to come to grips with its overspending as we have in Canada. When I mentioned those Gross Domestic Product figures in relation to debt, our position is much more favourable now than it was seven years ago, eight years ago, ten years ago.

Our position is on a projectile and you can see light at the end of the tunnel. The American position is straight up. Politically it does not want to deal with it. Politically when you deal with debts and deficits there is a price to be paid on the other end. When you go back into your respective neighbourhoods without those programs and the cheques in your pockets to do the types of things that make you popular in your ridings, they are not there.

The U.S. has not come to grips with that. It has its eye on the 1992 election, but it does not want to deal with the truth. It wants to continue to spend by borrowing from future generations.

We are not going to do that any more in this country. That is one of the reasons why we are bringing in, as a government, a proposed spending control act. At this point it is proposed because it has not been laid before the House, so to speak.

What it is saying is simply that we are going to put restrictions on the Government of Canada to spend the taxpayers' money. We know the future of this country can only be secured when we erase that burden of debt under which we are operating today. We are going to do it.

Some of the arguments that we have heard in this House this morning were in relation to the free trade agreement. I want to dismiss some of those. They are not painting an accurate picture at all.

The trade agreement with the United States is working. It is not perfect but it is working. I want to give some statistics that I will back up any day of the week, any place.

Our exports to the United States in the first two years since the free trade agreement have increased by $8 billion. Since the free trade agreement, our trade surplus with the United States has gone up by about $3 billion. Between 1988 and 1990 Canada went from a net direct investment outflow of $2.5 billion to a net direct investment inflow of $5.1 billion for a net turn around of $7.6 billion.

Those are good figures, believable figures. It is working. In August of this year Statistics Canada announced that our exports to the U.S. were at an all-time high. The FTA has been good for Canada. It has been very positive for Canada.

In this House the opposition is quite famous for coming in with names of companies, fictitious or otherwise, that have abandoned Canada as a place to invest. I want to go through some of the companies that have left the United States and have come to Canada with their money, with their investments. Let us go through some of these.

Canadian Thermos Products has closed plants in the United States and come to Canada as a good place to invest. Gandalf Technologies in Nepean is a U.S. company that moved to Canada. Heron Cable of Waterloo, Ontario left the U.S. and came to Canada. Hughes Aircraft Company located in Midland, Ontario left the U.S. and came to Canada.

There are others such as Inter-City Products Corporation, Brantford, Ontario; Kodak Canada Limited; Keep-Rite Incorporated of Brantford, Ontario; Sault Star Seamless Cylinder Co. of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario; J. L. DeBall Ltd. of Montreal; Polymer International, now in Nova Scotia; a litany of companies because Canada is a good place to invest.

International investors are recognizing that simply because of what we are doing. We are erasing that burden of debt and attracting international investors to this country.

One of the arguments they make on the other side is that the Canadian dollar is too high. Maybe it is too high. We do not argue that but world markets determine the value of the Canadian dollar. The world markets and investors are telling Canadians that we have a good country and it is a good place to invest. The level of the Canadian dollar is merely a reflection of what we are doing; building a strong country with a strong economy. More important, we are getting the fundamentals right. We are getting them down into the area in which investors can live with them, especially regarding inflation.

What we want to achieve is an economy in which inflation is as low as it can possibly get. We are achieving that. We also want to have an economy in which we have what we call price stability. We are achieving that. Those are the types of things that attract investment into a country. Those are the types of things that have attracted those companies that I just mentioned into Canada. We are doing those types of things.

We are also talking about job stability. Let us talk about the GST. The opposition loves to talk about that. We brought in a change to the old manufacturers' sales tax in this country to help manufacturing. That is what it is doing. It is helping manufacturing. It is bringing foreign investment into this country and doing what we said it would do.

If the opposition wants to argue on the political merits of the GST and the negative impact it has on our standings in the polls, I will support that 100 per cent. It is doing the tough things but doing them for the right reasons, and the right reasons are simply to gear up the Canadian economy so we can compete in the 1990s and into the turn of the century, doing the types of things that we were elected to do. We were not elected to simply stay in office and do the easy things. We were elected to make the tough decisions for the benefit of all Canadians.

Our economic policies are working. When the Canadian people go to the polls in 1993 they will have a chance to reflect and they will say we have done the right things, the tough things, and they will be willing to re-elect us.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, each year governments in Europe and North America subsidize consumers through programs to assist farmers that produce food at a loss.

Canada has developed a system of supply management which makes a great deal of sense to producers, processors and consumers with minimal support from the Canadian Treasury.

There has been a great deal of encouragement and support throughout Canada for the position that the federal government has taken at the GATT negotiations to see article XI:2(c)(i) strengthened and clarified.

Better access to world-wide markets, clear and fair rules on countervailing duties and rules to prevent the abuse of health and sanitary reasons as disguised trade barriers are important.

It is imperative if agriculture is to survive in Canada that we have a more stable environment for our domestic and export producers.

I urge all members of Parliament to support the government in order to ensure success in Canada's position during these last minute negotiations.

AIR CANADA

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, Air Canada has failed to ensure that the federal policy relating to employment contracts of airport screening personnel was respected at the Halifax International Airport.

The federal policy was that the turnover of these workers would be reduced through improvement and protection of wages and benefits. Transport Canada was supposed to ensure job security and wage benefits for the workers during turnover. It did not.

Those workers have lost their wages and they have lost their jobs. As of last week, workers with as much as nine years of experience had not been offered seniority by the new screening firm.

There were 30 employees at Walker Security. I therefore call upon the government to instruct Air Canada to review the contract with the new security firm. If it finds that the firm has abrogated the commitment that it made to both Air Canada and the workers, it should declare the contract void and sit down to ensure that we have fairness to those employees.

These people have been abandoned by Transport Canada, and they have been abandoned by this government.

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise to remind all hon. members that today is a very significant occasion in Canada and throughout the world. It is International Human Rights Day, and the 43rd anniversary of the United Nations adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The world has made gigantic steps. However, violations of human rights are still reported every day. That is why we must continue in partnership with other nations our efforts to ensure progress toward a world free of injustice, discrimination and prejudice.

Today, the Nobel Peace Prize will be awarded to Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, a founder of Myanmar's National League for Democracy, a courageous woman, currently under house arrest for her beliefs. All members of the Subcommittee on Development and Human Rights of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade congratulate her and call for her immediate release.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, today the NDP government in British Columbia is responding to the recommendations of the First Nations task force report on land claims.

Since my first days in the B.C. legislature almost 18 years ago, I have been urging that land claims be settled in my province on the basis of aboriginal rights and title.

Now that we finally have a government in British Columbia willing to do so, the federal minister of Indian Affairs is throwing up another road-block.

By threatening to stall negotiations with First Nations until the province accepts his preconditions on cost-sharing, the minister appears not to want to sit down with aboriginal people at all.

I commend Mike Harcourt's, aboriginal affairs minister Andrew Petter, and the NDP government for their historic, precedent setting commitment to settling the outstanding claims of First Nations in B.C.

I call on the minister of Indian Affairs to dismantle his road-block, drop the preconditions he has placed on negotiations with the First Nations, and get on to negotiating an honourable land claim settlement in British Columbia.

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from St. Albert just said in English, I would like to remind this House that December 10 has been declared International Human Rights Day and today is the 43rd anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the United Nations.

Exactly 43 years ago, the UN General Assembly adopted this universal declaration, this document which was to give all people everywhere the same basic rights and freedoms. This does not mean that injustice and intolerance have completely disappeared from the face of the earth. Unfortunately in some countries these rights and freedoms are not respected. Canada has adopted its own Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but much remains to be done. We want to give all Canadians, without exception, a chance to participate fully in our society.

International Human Rights Day is an opportunity to reflect but also to act. We should take this opportunity to ask ourselves how we as Canadians can build a fairer, more tolerant country, a country where everyone can contribute to the best of their ability.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, once again Canadians recalled the Montreal massacre, an event that focuses attention every December 6 on the issue of violence against women. Today and every day, women and children see their lives and families shattered by violence, violence that governments have done little to prevent or punish.

I call upon members of this House and all other legislatures in this country to look to their statutes and public programs for ways to control the menace that lurks in so many Canadian homes. Our laws must be made more effective, not just in words but in practice. Shelters only deal with the consequences of violence. Society must start to deal with the causes.

Children and mothers across the land are looking to their legislators for protection. Parliament must not fail them again.

EDUCATION

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to endorse the objective of national standards testing in education as proposed by the provincial governments at their meeting in Toronto yesterday.

As we all know, the future of our country will depend upon the ability to compete. However, this ability to compete is not attainable without a properly educated society.

In Canada today the inability to move east to west or west to east to provide for one's self and create a stronger economy is restricted by the lack of national education standards. I hope now that the business community and the political community are working together to set national standards that the educational community will be a very important part of this new strategy.

I congratulate all of the provincial governments for their efforts in reaching this agreement.

FISHERIES

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to commend approximately 200 Prince Edward Island fishermen who participated in the 11th annual convention and seminar at the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association this past weekend.

It was unfortunate that the federal minister of fisheries was unable to attend the event because he missed a great opportunity to listen to the concerns, views and possible solutions put forward by Prince Edward Island fishermen.

The fishing industry employs approximately 10 per cent of our work force in Prince Edward Island. In 1989 it contributed $226 million to our provincial economy.

Among the many issues discussed, perhaps the most serious issue remains the government's reluctance to return to a standard minimum lobster carapace size of 2.5 inches for all three designated areas on the Island.

I look forward to receiving copies of the resolutions passed which I hope to share with this House at the earliest opportunity.

SERBS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the unfair treatment Serbian people are receiving from the highest levels of our parliamentary system. There are more than 100,000 Serbs in Canada, and Serbia has always been Canada's ally: Furthermore, the Serbs were one of the groups that suffered most during the two last wars in which they lost almost a third of their population.

Today these people have a right to be treated fairly in the House of Commons. In fact, its most basic rights as a society have not been recognized, although today, it remains the first victim of the surge in fascism in Europe. It seems that people in certain Canadian political circles are playing a most unfortunate role in the present crisis in Yugoslavia. One would hope that in this country all parties concerned would at least have the decency to look at both sides of the story.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in celebration with six northwestern Ontario aboriginal communities which finally, after decades of neglect, will now receive a secure land base and the funds necessary to develop water and sewage services, decent housing, community facilities, not to mention the chance for economic improvements.

As my colleague Bud Wildman, Ontario minister of native affairs, said yesterday: "We are taking the first step toward ensuring that six communities in the Nishnawbe-Aski Nation will have a brighter and healthier future".

It is an historic first step to the people of the First Nations of Kee-Way-Win, McDowell Lake, New Slate Falls, Saugeen, Aroland and Wawakapewin. My congratulations and best wishes.

To the Government of Ontario: Thanks for providing the leadership to solve this dispute so long in occurring.

To the federal government: What took you so long?

Let us use this decision to move forward toward resolving all of the outstanding aboriginal issues. It is our responsibility.

ENTRANCE TO NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, for decades the main highway entrance to Nova Scotia has provided the most unique welcome of any province.

With a huge flower garden and information kiosks describing the provincial attractions, all tourists have been made at home right away.

Now, with the new highway about to bypass this entrance, it is important that tourism groups unite with the province to rearrange and rebuild this unique welcoming facility. The Amherst and area Development Commission has spearheaded the drive to create an even more impressive display than ever before.

The proposal includes replacing the Bluenose II at the site where it will be the first impression that tourists have as they enter the province and their last impression as they leave the province.

The Bluenose II will soon be retired and the border site provides the best possible location where virtually all visitors will have the opportunity to see the symbol of our Nova Scotia heritage and know that they have arrived at a unique province.

I call on the tourism ministry, the province, the federal government and all interested parties to work closely to achieve this goal of re-establishing this entrance to Nova Scotia.

CANADA EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, established in 1977, was mandated to provide the government with independent advice on policy issues.

In recent years the council has recommended, among other things, a full employment policy, a regional employment strategy, adjustment programs for older workers and opposed cutbacks in unemployment insurance. In most cases the government has totally ignored this advice.

Now there is serious concern that the government will close the council down. Currently there are five vacancies on the council which have not been filled, including the chairperson and one vice-chairperson.

What are the government's plans with respect to this independent, broadly based, private sector advisory council? Can the government not take advice which says it is wrong on several matters? Is this another example of the government suppressing legitimate dissent?

What is the future of the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council?

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is committed to a safer environment.

As part of the green plan, our government will improve the ability of Canadians to predict and warn about weather emergencies. Each year some 150 Canadians die from the direct effects of severe weather. Many others are affected by floods and automobile accidents caused by poor weather.

Under this $40 million program, weather emergencies and emergency surveillance systems will be upgraded and the public will be made more aware of natural disasters and how we can respond to them.

Doppler radars already in place in Edmonton and Toronto will also be installed in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec to give more advance notice of tornadoes. A more accurate computer model will be developed to improve Canada's ability to track clouds of nuclear fall-out, volcanic eruptions and major toxic gas releases.

The weather radio network, which already includes more than 100 transmitters, will be expanded further and upgraded, and special emergency television messages will warn of impending floods and of iceberg movements.

Let us all work together for a safer environment for all Canadians.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, this government's high tax, high dollar, free trade induced recession is continuing to cost Canadian workers their jobs.

In my riding of Kootenay West—Revelstoke the following plant closures last year contributed to an unemployment rate of 13.9 per cent.

Lost are 95 high-tech jobs moved to the U.S. due to closure of Johnson-Matthey in Trail; 167 woods product jobs permanently lost due to closures: YMIR Forest Products, Koala Timber, L & W Sawmills, Poplar Cedar, Shelly Cedar, and Eaglewood Firewood.

Many more have been laid off: 240 from Westar Timber in Castelgar; 50 more from Treminco Resources Mine shutdown at Sandon; 130 more at Kalesnikoff Lumber, Kootenay Valley Sawmills and Slocan Forest Products; 100 more from shutdowns at Columbia River Shake and Shingle; and at least 200 loggers are out of work as a result of all this carnage. I and my constituents urge the Prime Minister and his finance minister to open their eyes and see the damage they are causing.

There are none so blind as those who will not see.

My message is this: Stop, look and listen to unemployed Canadians. Shape up or ship out.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is most important that we cling to the symbols which unite us and pay tribute to those who have served their country. Like all other Canadians, I commended and applauded the Minister of Veterans Affairs last spring when he announced that a medal was finally being struck and awarded to those members of our Armed Forces who so valiantly served in the Korean war some 40 years ago.

It was nice to see a few of the medals presented in early November in a ceremony with the Governor General, but does the minister realize the time it is taking to process the applications for the medals and does he also realize that these medals are slated to be mailed out rather than be presented in any formal fashion to the recipients?

Mr. Speaker, the hypocrisy of it all. How can this government mail out medals of honour?

I call on the government to provide the persons who earned these medals with a more dignified presentation than is being planned at the present time.

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, Canadians can be proud of the substantial progress which has been made on the green plan as 80 per cent of first year program targets will be met by the end of the fiscal year.

Canadians in all regions will benefit from important initiatives which range from the Canada-U.S. air quality accord to the $275 million Indian health and water initiative.

Through the $100 million Arctic environmental strategy, northern communities and non-governmental organizations will be assisted to take local action on important environmental issues.

We are also expending some $100 million to help clean up the Fraser River and to return salmon populations to historical levels.

The $10 million Atlantic coast action program to restore harbours and coastal areas will fund programs run by a cross-section of community residents along with government, industry and business representatives.

In summation, we are making good progress in our stated goal to integrate environmental protection and economic development. We are improving the manner in which decisions are made and that is the best news of all.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance and some of his fellow ministers from the province of Quebec met with businessmen and union leaders in Montreal and according to the press reports the meeting was not a success.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance why he will not admit that Montreal businessmen and Montreal union leaders were right when they said it was useless for our bank rate to be 3 per cent higher than the bank rate in the U.S. Why did the government not take the necessary action to set the Canadian dollar at a level that would allow plants that are now closed in the Montreal area to start up again?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hate to disappoint the hon. Leader of the Opposition, but my colleagues and I had a very productive and constructive meeting with the Quebec business community. They acknowledge the fact that interest rates are the lowest they have been in 18 years. We have the third lowest interest rates in the world, next to the United States and Japan. The spread the hon. member speaks of is the spread between the Bank of Canada rate and the Fed in the United States.

As I said in the House this morning, people do not borrow from the Fed and they do not borrow from the Bank of Canada. They borrow from the commercial banks and the differential is about one-half of one per cent. Our prime rate in Canada is 8 per cent. The prime rate in the United States is 7.5 per cent. That is a tremendous record.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as he has done for the last few weeks, this morning the minister told Canadians that he thinks the recession is over.

He should know that, for example, last month housing starts were down 13 per cent. That was one sector we were led to believe was doing better and it was 13 per cent below what it was a year ago.

I want to ask the minister why he is not recognizing the fact that we are not out of the recession and why he keeps trying to defend the indefensible, the budget of his predecessor, and why he is not coming out with his own budget so we have a chance to create some hope for Canadians at this time.

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is true that housing starts declined somewhat in November over October, but I remind the hon. member that housing starts in the month of October reached 204,000, the highest in 17 months.

It would be very unusual to maintain that kind of growth. I can tell the hon. member that housing starts have strengthened. They come in at 178,000 units but obviously housing being an interest sensitive sector, and given the fact that in the third quarter it was recorded that investment in residential housing had increased by 17.2 per cent, I think those are positive indicators for the housing industry and I agree with the hon. member.

As the housing industry is stimulated that has a very major impact upon the total economy of Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful if the minister were more realistic and looked at what is happening.

Last week, for example, we learned that the Town and Country clothing chain will close 162 stores across Canada. Today the Ayres chain declared that it will close 60 stores across Canada. It is not waiting for Christmas; it is moving right away.

They all have the same reasons: high dollar, high interest rate, cross-border shopping, GST, and a terrible economic situation.

I ask the minister again: Why does he try to defend a budget that has been a complete failure and why does he not introduce a new budget on his own that might make more sense than the one presented by his colleague to his left?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would much rather follow the advice of the former Minister of Finance than the track record of the Leader of the Opposition, which is pretty dismal.

I put a few things on the record this morning. For example, his first budget was over the target by 70 per cent. The second budget was over its target by 30 per cent in terms of the deficit. In those days when he was President of the Treasury Board he talked about a 16 per cent increase in program expenditures as restraint. Some restraint.

That is not to take away from the seriousness of the question that the hon. member raised. Obviously, and I want to point out to the hon. member, this government does not have a high interest rate policy. With the interest being the lowest in 18 years, that is far from being a high interest rate policy.

Clearly our aim and objective is to get the basics right, the fundamentals right, and bring about a decline in the inflationary pressures. That will bring down interest rates, as it has, and that will provide the climate for sustainable growth and price stability.

POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said that poverty was decreasing in Newfoundland. Well, he was wrong.

In Newfoundland alone the welfare roll is increasing at the rate of 2,000 people a month and is at record highs. When the Prime Minister said poverty was decreasing he must have been in Disneyland, not Newfoundland. The ostrich approach may make the government feel good, but it does not put food on the table.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister what he can tell a four-year old Newfoundland child lined up at the food bank that can give him some hope this Christmas.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the frivolous conclusion of my hon. friend's question, but with regard to the information raised yesterday I simply indicated, and I think the statistics will bear it out, and I am speaking from memory, that unemployment in Newfoundland is down in the neighbourhood of 6 per cent from where we inherited it in 1984. It is still too high. It was 23.5 per cent when the Liberals left office. It is down to 18.1 per cent, I believe, today.

We are working. Some 25,000 new jobs have been created in Newfoundland in the last six years as opposed to 1,000 jobs that were lost in the period from 1980 to 1984.

Hibernia is creating some 35,000 new jobs and some 3,500 permanent jobs. Premier Wells I think agreed yesterday—you may want to check with him—that the general fiscal and financial approach of the Government of Canada is one that he generally supports. He is very pleased with what we have done with Hibernia and other economic initiatives and he believes that the co-operation between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador will bring prosperity to that province.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question about the four-year old boy who will end up eating at a food bank this Christmas is not a joke. It is the truth. In Montreal alone 50,000 children will eat at food banks this Christmas. That being the case, why does the government and why do the Prime Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, keep claiming that poverty has not increased, while they know perfectly well the unemployment rate and the welfare rate are going up, not down?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong again. No one can ignore the social problems we have in this country today. In Quebec we have some serious problems, for instance in East Montreal and a number of areas in eastern Quebec, and there are also problems in the Atlantic region and other parts of this country. There will always be too many cases of poverty and too many cases where the children of this country are involved. But the government has done a great deal. And I believe that very soon the Minister of National Health and Welfare will announce a number of major initiatives to provide greater security for children who are affected by poverty and other social problems.

That being said, I think we should realize that the real wealth of a nation is created by the private sector, not by governments with deficits. And the private sector will create wealth if interest rates go down. Today, however, interest rates are at their lowest levels in 18 years and the inflation rate is at its lowest level in 21 years. Those are signs that should encourage, not discourage the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Many Canadians were astonished when they heard on September 30 this year that the democratically elected president of Haiti, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, had been toppled by a coup d'état. Canada has now frozen $20 million in aid, of which $10 million was earmarked for non-governmental organizations.

We are in favour of economic sanctions against the military dictatorship, but the situation of the poor who have no shelter and no food is appalling. Will the government reinstate the assistance channelled through NGOs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government supports President Aristide and all efforts to help the president resume his democratic duties in Port-au-Prince. We also support the embargo ordered by the Organization of American States. Although it is unfortunate that the embargo is causing serious problems for a broad segment of the population, I believe that President Aristide's position is that the people of Haiti prefer this kind of temporary problem to the loss of democracy. He believes that these initiatives on the part of the Canadian government are helping to restore democracy in Haiti. That is why we intend to persevere in our efforts in this respect.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I gather that means that the government will not be assisting the Red Cross and other organizations which have asked for additional aid in order to assist those people in Haiti who are suffering.

My question for the Prime Minister on another subject however is that he was very careful on another international matter regarding the break-up of the Soviet Union and careful in Canada's response to this extremely complex and volatile matter. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, however, was not quite so cautious in her comments about the Slavic commonwealth. She said: "The Soviet Union is evolving into a new format and the changes we see are positive".

I would ask the Prime Minister if he would tell us today if he agrees that recent developments are positive, and will he let the House know if this is the message that he has conveyed to Mikhail Gorbachev?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was away yesterday, but I looked at the transcript and I am told that the minister indicated that it was a positive sign that the three republics wish to work together. That of course is by any standards a positive sign.

Our concerns—and I think they are probably shared by my hon. friend— in respect of the Soviet Union are political stability in the former U.S.S.R., because there is general agreement that it is in an evolving state, on terms that would be agreed to. We have deep concerns, as I expressed in the House the other day, about the deployment, use and control of nuclear weapons on the soils of many of the republics. We have concerns about food shortages, shortages of medicines this winter and the devastation that may inflict upon the Soviet people. We have concerns that we have expressed about minorities and borders so as to ensure that the situation in the Soviet Union does not disintegrate into the catastrophe that has now engulfed Yugoslavia.

We are proceeding with caution. We are proceeding with great care because we would like to have a constructive influence, if we can, on the development of matters in the Soviet Union. To that end we will consult with parties in the House and we will try to take the most constructive attitude possible.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has outlined a number of concerns that I think many Canadians and many people throughout the world have, while certainly supporting co-operation among newly independent states.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister a specific question about one of the issues he himself raised. In the three new Soviet states there are 8,911 nuclear warheads pointed toward North America and Europe. Yesterday there were conflicting statements from leaders in the three new Soviet republics regarding control of that arsenal.

The Prime Minister said that he is concerned, but I would like to ask him what action he has taken to convey that concern to the leaders of these new republics, and will he ask them to provide a specific plan for the control, non-proliferation and eventual elimination of this nuclear arsenal?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the position that we have adopted and conveyed to President Gorbachev personally and to the various ministers representing appropriate republics can be summarized in the communication that we conveyed to the President of Ukraine when we recognized the independence of Ukraine.

We recognized independence for Ukraine, but we began a process of negotiating diplomatic recognition pursuant to four or five important criteria, including some that have just been raised by my hon. friend. We have senior officials in Kiev doing that with a republic whose independence we have recognized. We will no doubt proceed in a similar fashion under analogous circumstances because the problems in large measure remain the same in the various republics.

I think that the precedent that the Government of Canada has established and laid down in regard to Ukraine can be looked upon for guidance in regard to the evolution of the other Soviet republics.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I am going to break with our recent practice and I think the House will agree with the reason for doing so at this moment.

HOUSING

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance in his answer to the Leader of the Official Opposition acknowledged the figures that were released by CMHC, indicating that housing starts had plunged by 13 per cent.

The Minister of Finance has several proposals made by the housing industry, such as the Canadian Real Estate Association proposal dealing with RRSPs and the 5 per cent down payment for home buyers.

When will the government take action on these proposals and introduce pro-active policies to kick-start the housing industry?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just to reiterate, the housing starts have been strong: 204,000 housing starts in the month of October. That was the highest in 17 months. I acknowledge as I indicated in an earlier answer that anything that would stimulate the housing industry further still certainly has a very major spinoff effect upon the total economy.

The two proposals to which the hon. member has referred are proposals that I am looking at very carefully with my colleague, the Minister of Public Works and minister in charge of CMHC. Hopefully we will be able to come up with some positive actions on those fronts. I hope to be in a position to announce the results of that review in the not too distant future.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this government should start walking down Main Street, Canada, and see the real world out there. According to CMHC, federal housing programs are not reaching over 1.25 million households that are in need of assistance, and yet this government keeps slashing dollars and programs. This is unacceptable, uncaring and irresponsible.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance when this government will honour its commitments and its responsibilities and restore the funding to build affordable housing units and co-operative units in this country.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think it is most important to put this matter in its proper perspective for the people of Canada. There are over 640,000 housing units for people who are now getting assistance from the federal government. That is 40,000 more this year than there were last year. There has been $116 million put into an increase in housing assistance.

I think the hon. member should realize that people in Canada are asking: Do you want to raise taxes to do that? Should this government act responsibly? We say yes, we should, and we will continue to do so.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister who, after meeting with Premier Wells yesterday, undertook to his great credit to reassess the fishery reforms announced last week by his Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, a hare-brained scheme if ever I saw one and whose only motive must have been to put Atlantic fishermen at each other's throats.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will now instruct the minister to get down there and talk to the Newfoundland government so that any changes in fisheries management reflect this new spirit of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not undertake to reassess the minister's programs. I undertook to look at a plan submitted by the provincial government.

Mr. Simmons: That is not what the press said.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, if it is not what the press says you can blame them, not me. I apologize, Roger. They are always right. I am sorry.

• (1440)

As a Newfoundlander, I think my hon. friend would want me to raise the fact that last night a thousand Newfoundlanders gathered to pay tribute to one of the greatest sons of Newfoundland, the hon. John Crosbie.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

On October 21 of this year, that son of Newfoundland—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: —said that every fisherman or plant worker who qualifies for assistance under the Fisheries Assistance Program will get that assistance or "My name is not John Carnell Crosbie".

I want to ask the minister of fisheries, that son of Newfoundland, why some 150 fishermen and plant workers on the great northern peninsula and hundreds more around the province have been disqualified for assistance under this program, assistance that they are fully qualified for.

Will he keep his word of October 21? Will he see that they get assistance? Will he see that he can continue to call himself not only a son of Newfoundland but John Carnell Crosbie?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to report to the House that a son of P.E.I., Premier Ghiz, attended our magnificent PC fund raising function last night in my honour.

He spoke very eloquently on the question of national unity. He is a Liberal who has some clarity of thought and who knows where is the best place to be. He is certainly to be admired.

To the hon. gentleman's question: I believe that everyone who has met the rules of reasonable attachment to the fishery has been looked after in this program. If they have not been looked after, then they are to be considered and reviewed.

The problem in Newfoundland is this. There are a great many people who are unable to get work or who are coming off unemployment insurance and who do not have the necessary attachment to the fishery. They cannot get work, and that is an argument for a job creation program.

Unfortunately they do not meet the terms and conditions laid down for this particular program which was to deal with catch failure and which is dealing with it. I am going to continue to call myself John Carnell Crosbie and to attend such functions with the Prime Minister as last night's function.

You did very well, Prime Minister.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for J. C. as well.

It is about the flagship of freshwater research in Canada. The Experimental Lakes Area Program was identified in last week's Auditor General's report as nationally and internationally significant.

Since this program is critical to our understanding of acid rain, Great Lakes water quality, sustainable fisheries, mercury and methane production related to hydroelectric projects and to the accurate measurement of global warming, I wonder if J. C. would explain why funding for this crucial scientific study has been cut by more than 70 per cent since 1976. Will he fully restore it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, obviously acid rain has not affected the hon. gentleman's moustache.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: There has been some brain damage.

With respect to the Experimental Lakes Program, that program is not terminated. We have contracted with the Rawson Academy, which I think is a well respected environmental organization, to develop a business plan for the experimental lakes area.

That business plan is due to be completed in March 1992 and the work will continue. It is true there has been some reduction in spending due to spending pressures that affect the government as a whole, but certainly the work is going to continue.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is not for the same minister. It is to the minister responsible for the green plan. Since he has just released his anniversary check list which has been almost universally described as off target, without timetables and a slush fund for other ministers and their pet projects, will the Minister of the Environment take this opportunity to avoid the flim-flam and tell the people of Canada that this project in terms of the experimental lakes area will in fact be returned to full funding.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take this opportunity to respond to the member for Skeena on how far we are and all the work we have done with the green plan. In fact we are on target. We have met about 80 per cent of our commitment up until now on green plan expenditures. That is in excess of $1 billion in expenditures that will be put forward over a six-year period.

In fact this green plan he has just referred to is probably the world's most comprehensive environmental strategy.

SOVIET UNION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Prime Minister concerning the historic and serious developments taking place in the former republics of the Soviet Union.

The secretary of state said yesterday that she welcomed these as a positive development. The Prime Minister today is saying that we are now proceeding with caution.

I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us what it is that Canada is going to do and how are we going to proceed. Are we in fact withdrawing recognition from the present apparatus of the Soviet government, headed by President Gorbachev? Will we be extending recognition to the so-called new commonwealth? Will we be starting discussions to establish diplomatic relations with all the other republics of the former Soviet Union?

Perhaps the Prime Minister could tell us exactly what we are going to do.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that in response to another question. I understand that the minister yesterday said that it was a positive sign that the three republics wished to work together. Obviously anything that brings greater stability to the region is very much a positive sign.

When I was in St. John's yesterday and before the minister spoke, I believe, I indicated that the policy of the Government of Canada was that we would wait for President Gorbachev's speech which he delivered later that day and that we would look at this with a great deal of caution because of the four or five concerns that I mentioned to the leader of the NDP, particularly the deployment and control of nuclear weapons on the soil of a number of these republics.

As we speak, events are taking place. We are being briefed on a very regular basis by our ambassador, our representatives in Kiev and elsewhere. We are monitoring it very, very closely so that the policy of the Government of Canada will become one that is helpful and constructive in pursuance of the four or five criteria I laid out both in the question of Ukraine and in response to the Leader of the NDP today.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. One concern the Prime Minister did not raise in his early remarks was the arrangements made with the former Soviet government with wheat sales and over $2 billion worth of credit.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister specifically: Are we continuing to send food aid to the various republics of the Soviet Union? If so, under what kind of credit arrangements and what kind of repayment arrangements will we be making? Will those simply be held in abeyance? Will we continue that kind of important humanitarian aid during these very critical winter months?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wrote to President Gorbachev a few days ago when we decided our course in regard to Ukraine. I conveyed to him the view of the Government of Canada, that we would be helpful to him as he grappled with these various problems my hon. friend has just raised in regard to foodstuffs, medicines and so on, particularly with the encroaching winter.

With regard to grain sales, I would have to check. But my recollection is that in the last major grain sale that was concluded by the Government of Canada through the Canadian Wheat Board, we received a counter-signature from the Republic of Russia. The Minister of Agriculture signals that is correct. We had the negotiations that took place in the normal course, but we asked for a further guarantee, and we obtained it.

INDONESIA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, reacting to recent killings in East Timor, the government supposedly suspended $30 million of bilateral development projects in Indonesia. Yet, despite inquiries we do not know what projects are suspended. What is more, resumption of Canadian aid will depend incredibly upon the report of Indonesia's own commission of inquiry into the East Timorese killings.

Will the Prime Minister today demand an independent objective UN commission of inquiry into the East Timorese killings?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, Canada has suspended some development projects, as my hon. friend has suggested. About $30 million in projects will be affected.

As far as the role of Canada in calling for an independent UN inquiry into this, my understanding is that the UN Secretary-General has announced that he is sending an envoy to Jakarta. We want to see what the outcome of that visit is, consult with the United Nations as to what those findings are. Once we have that information then we will be able to make a decision as to which way we should be going.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): My question is for the same minister.

A $30 million suspension of aid to Indonesia is significant, but it is still only a fraction of what Canada should be doing.

Will the minister today assure the House that Canada will finally withdraw its total support of this despotic regime and immediately support United Nations Security Council resolutions 384 and 389 which call for the withdrawal of Indonesian troops from East Timor?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague answered the hon. opposition member, we indeed suspended three aid projects totaling $30 million.

I would like to ask the opposition where it stands on aid to Third World countries. The projects being maintained in Indonesia—and I would be very happy to list them in this House if I had enough time—directly help the people.

I have the list of projects—and I could name them—which directly support the people through Canadian non-governmental organizations. What does the opposition want? Does it really want to help the people? That is what we are doing by maintaining some aid projects that really help people at the grass roots.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): My question is for the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, Mr. Speaker.

As the country knows, the Prime Minister has been meeting the premiers from one part of this country to the other and the minister himself said that in the new year he wants to meet the premiers regarding the Constitution.

I wonder if the minister can tell us two things: First, as a result of discussions that have already taken place, have there been any changes to the proposals that the government has tabled on the Constitution; and, second, can he assure the House that if discussions go on in the new year with the premiers and with the officials from the provinces that any changes agreed to between himself and the federal government and the premiers will be told to the committee right away so that the work of the committee could be as meaningful as possible?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised by the question. Any changes that will come to the proposals will be changes made by the special joint committee. That has always been the understanding of the House and the government. I have made that clear on a number of occasions.

I think the hon. member and other members in the House would want me and would want others in the country to do everything we can to encourage people who have concrete improvements to suggest to bring them forward so that we are dealing with very specific suggestions for improvement of the proposals we brought forward in September.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I thank the minister for his reassurance that the committee will of course be told right away, and the committee itself will recommend the changes.

But yesterday in Montreal the minister met the group on the economy and the Constitution, including the president of Bombardier. This group suggested abandoning the economic union proposal. I agree but for different reasons. However, I have the following question: To make it easier to reach a national consensus, is the minister prepared to act on a suggestion made by this important group from Quebec and drop the proposal on economic union?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the second question is the exact opposite of the first one. We are now asking Canadians to suggest improvements to our proposals.

Yesterday, here in Ottawa, I was delighted to have a conversation with a group of business people from Quebec who were interested in efficient federalism and suggested a number of changes. I think they will have an opportunity, either today or tomorrow, to present the same proposals before the special joint committee, and I hope the committee will consider those proposals. As far as we are concerned, we made some proposals and we will continue to urge Canadians to suggest improvements, but it is up to the special joint committee to make the next changes, to take the next step toward developing a Canadian constitutional position.

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Canadian automobile industry is having difficulty competing with used U.S. cars and trucks entering Canada because some of the standards outlined in the Motor Vehicle Safety Act are not being enforced on U.S. vehicles.

The Department of Transport is currently drafting new rules to address this situation, but in the meantime will the minister assure the Canadian industry that the present rules will be equally enforced on both Canadian and U.S. products and that new rules will require U.S. vehicles to compete and meet exactly the same standards as Canadian vehicles?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the hon. member on his tenacity in this matter. I can assure the hon. member and the industry that no vehicle will be allowed entry to Canada that does not provide the same level of safety as any vehicle made in Canada.

His concerns and those of the industry have been taken into consideration. We will be circulating a consultation paper on the different options, for instance auto maker regulations, before Christmas and we will make sure that the safety of vehicles made outside Canada meet the standards of the vehicles made in Canada.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

For the sake of supply management Canadian agriculture needs a strengthening and clarification of article XI of the GATT. Some of the vibes we are getting from overseas are not positive. The free trade agreement has already left many Canadian farmers vulnerable to unfair competition from the United States and if we lose at the GATT, Canadian farmers will have nothing left with which to defend themselves.

I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he can assure the House today that his government will accept absolutely nothing less than clarification and strengthening of article XI.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I guess I would reply to the hon. member by asking him a question. Is he suggesting that out of 108 countries Canada should not sign a GATT agreement which would benefit this country, would benefit agriculture? We believe we have developed a policy with the producers and with the provinces in both the elimination of export subsidies which are distorting the market and strengthening and clarifying article XI that will allow supply management to continue in Canada, that will allow the export part of agriculture to grow. In that we are firm. We have the support of the industry, and I hope I have the support of the hon. member and his party opposite in attempting to put in place something that will allow supply management to continue in this country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister just told us that he has caved in.

I have a very specific supplementary on a subject I raised yesterday: Could the minister give the House the assurance that the quantitative controls that exist today under article IX of GATT will be maintained after the current negotiations? Yes or no?

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has been following the debate he will know that is exactly why we are putting forward the position that we want article IX strengthened and clarified, so we can meet the end that he has just asked me about.

AEROBATIC FLIGHTS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

As the minister is aware, his permit to allow irregular and unsafe flying above the community of St. Andrews is due to expire. The permit in question allows irregular aerobatic flight within metres of a large housing development at St. Andrews, when a special flight area designated for aerobatic flight already exists only seven kilometres away.

Is the minister going to deny his permission for this irregular flight by directing the aerobatic flights to the nearby special flight area already designated for such activity, or is the minister casting some doubt on the safety of his department's special use areas all across the country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must inform my hon. colleague that we do not have a final decision on this matter yet.

My colleague, the minister of state, has undertaken to look into all the concerns raised and we will be getting back to him very soon.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth, a single question. This will be the last question.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The minister knows that the drug patent protection legislation has been offered as a negotiable item of GATT, a move that will threaten thousands of jobs in the Canadian pharmaceutical industry.

I ask the minister to please clarify. Is he for or against increasing patent protection from 10 to 20 years and is compulsory drug licensing now on the table at the GATT?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to receive that question. I think my hon. colleague will agree with me that the bill we put in place in 1986-87, C-22, was a great success because we got the increase in prices lower than inflation. We also got a large investment.

I can give a few of them if you want: Bristol Myers, $151 million; Burroughs Wellcome, $20 million; Ciba-Geigy, $225 million; Eli Lilly Canada Inc., $70 million; Boehringer Ingelhien Canada Ltd., $135 million; and Glaxo, $275 million. All those investments were just because we put in place a legislation that allowed research and development in Canada.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Ms. Joan Sawicki, Speaker Designate of the Legislative Assembly of the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to remind the Chair that today in Question Period while there were more than two dozen questions from opposition members, the Chair allowed only two questions from this side of the Chamber. Both of those questions were in the last five minutes of Question Period.

I would like to remind the Chair that some other members of the government side came to Question Period today with questions to ask of the government. A number of our constituents—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would simply remind the hon. member that this point has already been raised several times in the past and that the Speaker can only give the same answer. If the hon. member has certain matters to raise, he knows very well that there is a parliamentary committee on House management and he can make suggestions to improve the Standing Orders if he sees fit.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien (p. 6042), and the amendment thereto of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 6057).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte has one minute left.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what I can say in one minute, but I think I can at least invite—

Some hon. members: Take your time.

Mr. Thompson: I guess by the sound of it they are going to give me more than one minute.

I do have 10 minutes that have been allotted to questions and comments. I may extend that courtesy to opposition members at this point and respond to some of the comments. If they do have a question or critique I would be more than willing to take them.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to my hon. colleague's address just prior to Question Period. I know that he would not want to mislead this House and the Canadian people. He referred to a debt of $200 billion. I have a signed letter from the former Minister of Finance pointing out that when they took over government the debt was in the neighbourhood of $168 billion. I can table that signed letter if he wishes. I would appreciate the acknowledgement and the correction.

My colleague indicated that if he added the interest rate only to that particular debt at the time the government inherited it, it would add up to the current debt. Not so. He knows it, and if he does not he should because I have done the mathematics. I have had it checked out. It is an incorrect statement. I wish that he would acknowledge that as well. I am sure that he would like to do that and I will give him the opportunity.

The other question that he has not addressed is the whole question of revenues. When the government came into power it had revenues in the neighbourhood of $70 billion. This year the revenues will exceed $130 billion. It is roughly a $60 billion increase, almost twice as much. What has it done with the Canadian taxpayers' money? That is what I would like to know.

In a final point, the government boasts about controlling the debt. It is very easy to control the debt if you give it to someone else. That is exactly what they have done. They have given it to the provinces who have given it to the universities, the colleges, the hospitals, the Canadian taxpayers, the students. Do not brag about controlling the debt. It is no different than if I were to walk around and parcel out my own debts to all of you and then walk out and say that I am debt-free or I have less debt than you have.

The debt in 1984 when they came into power was not $200 billion, as he and a number of people say. It is not correct to say that if you add the interest rate only it would generate the debt we have today. That is not an accurate statement. Of course it does not even address the question of high interest rates that existed and in fact created additional debt. That is another issue. The revenue has increased. It is almost double. I would like a comment on that.

Finally with regard to the control of the debt by offloading it on to the provinces, I think a number of statements were verging on being somewhat irresponsible and certainly exaggerated.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I am more than willing to respond to that. If the member has the figures he tells us he has, he should table them in the House. I stand by my statement and the figures I have used and virtually every member in this House uses including the opposition. The figure is a very real figure. We have inherited a $200 billion debt.

The fact still remains that if we take interest into account in calculating the figure we have today, the accumulated debt in this country today of $390 billion is simply interest on that debt. He can shake his head and argue all he wants. The facts are there.

If the hon. member has further facts or evidence that he wants to promote, he better present them to this House. Up to this point he has not.

The party arithmetic it uses is simply not the kind of arithmetic Canadian people will put up with because it is not factual. It speaks volumes about the hon. member. He is lost in his own rhetoric.

There is no question about it. The interest we are paying today on the debt in terms of Gross Domestic Product is much less than when we took office. I used those figures earlier this morning to indicate we have made progress. As the Canadian economy has continued to grow under this government, the percentage of Gross Domestic Product that has to service the debt is less now by half of what it was when we took office in 1984. Those facts cannot be disputed.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to question the member for Carleton—Charlotte.

When this government ran for office it talked about accountability. It did not mention the deficit at that time. It told the Canadian people how much better it could manage the economy and how much better it could govern.

The fact remains we have all these people unemployed across Canada. We have a situation where the government promised jobs, jobs, jobs. It found money to fight a war in the gulf, but it cannot find the money to put people back to work. We have people all across Canada who are unemployed. It is cutting Canadian assistance programs across Canada. It is cutting medicare and equalization to the provinces. It is cutting the very network of our Canadian economy. It is saying to us that we are responsible. I want to say it has an accountability problem. It promised the Canadian people it was going to answer their problems. It has not answered them.

What is the government going to do with the unemployed especially at Christmastime when people are lined up at the food banks? What is it going to do to assist these people and get them back to work so they can be part of the Canadian society we all want?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, this question of what the government intends to do specifically was answered in Question Period by the Prime Minister.

What the government is attempting to do in this country can be better addressed in the over-all picture. It is attempting to get the fundamentals right. One of those is simply to pay down the debt and get out from beneath the crushing debt load that we have as Canadians.

The truth is that 35 cents out of every tax dollar going to Ottawa today services interest on the debt. Just imagine what we could do for the poor and unfortunate in this country, for the Canadians that really do need help. Just imagine what we could do if we did not have to send 35 cents of every tax dollar to pay interest on the debt. That is the real answer to the problem.

We know that the problem is there. We are doing our best to address it on a day to day basis. The real answer lies in coming to grips with debt and deficits in this country. That way we are going to utilize Canadian taxpayers' dollars the way they should be utilized to help the less fortunate than ourselves.

It is interesting to note that last year the United Nations did a study of 162 countries in the world in terms of how they deal with their people and the level of support they give to their citizens. Everything was measured in regard to help to the poor and elderly, housing standards and social benefits of all sorts. The only country in the world that beat Canada was Japan. Canada came in number two and Japan was number one. Canada came ahead of 160 other countries. We are doing a good job, but there is more to be done. That more means working together to rid ourselves of the debt that restricts us from doing the very things he mentions.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Very briefly, the hon. member for Longueuil. Very briefly, please.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about free trade. I want to tell him that I was also in favour of free trade during those talks. Unfortunately a year later people in Quebec and Canada were told that from now on they would have a huge open market to sell their products. They started spending money to open offices and promote products to the United States. At the same time they were told they would also have to train their employees and improve their equipment in order to produce more efficiently and be more productive.

Unfortunately a year later the government raised interest rates and kept them high for a long time. It also raised the value of the Canadian dollar so that Canadian companies started going bankrupt. Instead of helping, free trade was hurting the economy because the government was inconsistent in its policies.

When the hon. member tells me Canada is a prosperous country, I say that Canada would be a prosperous country if the government could be consistent. To be consistent, we should not have 11 political powers in this country.

What can he tell me? I do not have much time, Mr. Speaker, so I will get back to that.

[English]

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I want to address a couple of points raised by the hon. member. Certainly the member is well informed enough on the economic side to realize that the value of the Canadian dollar is simply a reflection of the confidence that is placed in Canada as a country in which to invest. Internationally we are held in very high regard. That is really the reason for the high Canadian dollar. No economy in the history of the world has ever gained anything by artificially reducing the value of its currency. I hope the member is not suggesting we do that.

Interest rates right now in Canada are the lowest they have been in 20 years. That is something that will pay dividends to all of Canada for the next number of months.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that the 20-minute and 10-minute question and answer periods will be split with the House's permission with the member for Comox—Alberni.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no problem. You do not require unanimous consent for that. You have the floor for 10 minutes.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be helpful at the outset to set out the opposition day motion that is before the House to put my remarks in context. The motion reads:

> That this House condemn the government for economic mismanagement that has led to an intolerable and tragic level of unemployment, business failure and poverty in Canada.

I think the motion comes at a very appropriate time when one considers what is occurring in Canada today as a result of monetary and fiscal policies that this government has pursued consistently since 1984, and more particularly since I have been in this House from the fall of 1988.

If we look back at the record of this government, in the three years that I have been here we have seen a free trade agreement, high interest rates, the dollar rate go to unprecedented highs and the GST come in with devastating effects. We have looked at more and more taxation on the business community through things such as unemployment insurance and, if the government has its way, through a further tax on businesses through its Bankruptcy Act.

I put my remarks in context with some of the most recent figures that have come out with respect to both business and personal bankruptcies. They show an all-time high in October with a total of 6,896 businesses and consumers declaring bankruptcy. Of those 5,740 were consumers declaring bankruptcy in October. This figure is 20 per cent higher than last October and 10 per cent higher than last month. Over 60,000 consumers have had to declare bankruptcy over the past 12 months. Of the total of over almost 7,000 businesses and consumers 1,156 of those are businesses that went bankrupt. Most of those were in the small business sector. This figure is 22 per cent higher than last month and 1 per cent higher than a year ago. Over the past year there have been 12,952 businesses that have been forced into bankruptcy.

We look at the causes. Why are these people and these businesses being forced into failures and bankruptcies at this particular stage? It is easy to say that we are in a recession and those types of things happen in a recession. It is very clear if we look at the history of this recession that Canada entered this recession long before others did because of the policies of this government. Those policies exacerbated a problem world-wide and brought it on much more rapidly in Canada than anywhere else.

When I was on the finance committee looking into the technical paper on the GST, we were warned time and time again that we would be in recessionary times by fall of 1990 and early winter of 1991 and if the GST came in at that time it would make the problem much worse. It would accent the problem to such an extent that it was predicted by the treasurer of the province of Alberta, a Conservative also, that we would fall far behind. We would fall so far into the depths of recession business-wise and consumer-wise that we would never be able to crawl out of the pit that had been dug for us by this government with its monetary and fiscal policies and particularly the GST.

Recently we looked at a number of studies on the goods and services tax as one of those examples of what is happening. We look at the advent of massive cross-border shopping and what the reasons are. Being from a community and a riding that borders the United States in south central British Columbia, it is very clear that the problem was increased substantially by the GST. It was added on to the back of the high rate of the dollar. People know that in Canada they are being taxed out of existence by this government and they are willing to close their eyes to all the benefits we have and go across the border.

For the small business community that is devastating enough. But look at what it costs them for the implementation of this devastating goods and services tax. In British Columbia alone, my home province, a recent survey by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business shows that the average cost for each firm to implement the goods and services tax was $4,190 per firm. The ongoing costs of administering the GST were shown at $430 per month. The total cost for business in British Columbia appears to be close to $1.3 billion. That is money coming out of the very pockets of the business community that we have to look to, to climb out of the recession. This is the very community that creates 85 per cent of all new jobs within Canada and keeps within Canada almost all profits from small business community and reinvests it in its own country.

This is what this government is doing with the goods and services tax to our small business community. The ongoing costs of complying with the goods and services tax has been shown in that recent survey to be $9.6 billion for Canadian business. Small business bears 82 per cent of the implementation costs in the paperwork and administration of the goods and services tax.

Is that fair taxation? Is that being fair to the community that we look to for assistance within Canada? The answer is a resounding no, no, no, it is not fair. We have to look at this. The New Democratic Party has. It has agreed with small business within Canada that the goods and services tax must go.

There is no doubt that this puts small businesses and small firms at a serious competitive disadvantage in relation to the larger firms. It is a regressive tax that has been shown to cost small firms with less money coming in much more in GST administration than it does for large firms.

It is apparent why larger firms are in agreement with the goods and services tax and why small business is hurting so drastically.

Let us look again at some of the devastating effects of the Conservative agenda in banking. It takes so much from the banks at election time that I guess it is their turn to pay something back.

The cost to small business when it comes to the service charges for use of credit cards is hundreds of millions of dollars a year alone.

If we look at some of the anticipated revenue of the GST we can see that once again this tax hurts small people as well as small business.

Look at the anticipated GST revenues from the sale of clothing. Children's clothing that has been hitherto untaxed by this government will now be included with adult clothing. This will bring into the coffers approximately $1.24 billion from the goods and services tax. Those are dollars out of the small person's pocket and out of small business.

Home heating oil tax will bring in $345 million out of the pockets of small business and the community. Transportation purchases will bring in $475 million. Non-prescription drugs will bring in $140 million.

It is very apparent that the monetary and fiscal policies and the direction that this government has taken this country have been nothing but devastating to the people of Canada and particularly for small business.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for offering his views and opinions to the House today.

I am somewhat puzzled by his speech. His speech is full of criticism and I think that there are reasons why you should be criticizing the government policy.

However what I noted is the absence of any plan or master plan by the member for the New Democratic Party in relation to how they would deal with the emerging global economy given the new dynamics that are at play today internationally.

In my speech this morning I not only criticized the government but clearly laid out the five economic principles that we Liberals have.

I think there is an obligation also on the opposition side of this House not to merely criticize the government. We should also offer concrete alternatives. I would like to hear from the member what his concrete alternatives are and what is the new master plan of the New Democratic Party of Canada toward addressing the very serious concerns that Canadians have.

• (1530)

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I think it is very apparent. I thank the member for his question. But had he been following over the past few years the New Democratic Party, which obviously he has not, he would have seen that there have been very positive responses to global economy. Unlike the Liberal Party we were willing to present to the people of Canada alternatives to the GST for their scrutiny.

I wondered at that time where the Liberals were. Where were the Liberals? When I sat with them on the finance committee I found that their main critic from New Brunswick in fact kind of liked the goods and services tax. The Liberal Party was widely split on whether they should agree with the goods and services tax or not. We watched the flip and the flop and the flop and the flip and the belly flop of the Liberals as they flopped back and forth deciding whether in fact they were going to go along with the goods and services tax, whether they liked it or whether they did not. But did they put forward any alternatives? No, they were bankrupt of ideas as so many small businesses are now bankrupt. They had no ideas. They had to decide: "Do we like it or do we not like it? What are we going to do about it?"

What happened was that they decided they would come out in opposition to it without ever looking at what they should do in place of it. We were very solid in looking at it with economists, with people from around the country and others who had worked with goods and services tax and value added tax areas in other countries. We were trying to come up with reasoned and reasonable alternatives to the goods and services tax.

In our minority report in the finance committee we put forth those alternatives.

Similarly I think if the member looks at places like British Columbia, where people have just recently had the good sense to elect a New Democratic Party government with new Premier Mike Harcourt, he will see that the realization has to be that we cannot continue to simply run across the border to the United States. The future of Canada is with the rising sun and not with the setting sun to the south. We have to look at our Pacific Rim countries. That is what Mr. Harcourt, the premier of British Columbia, has done. He has gone across in his first overseas trip to ensure that at least the west coast of Canada is recognized where future markets will be. We are looking in the future to the birth of new trade partners and not at the death of old trade partners.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I very seldom intervene in the process of questions after a speech, but I cannot let the hon. member off the hook when he comes up with statements that are either misinformed and/or incorrect.

For example, he blames the GST on the increase of cross-border shopping when he knows full well that the recent report by Statistics Canada concluded that in fact one-day trips to the United States since January 1 of this year decreased. That is incidentally when the GST took over from the old federal manufacturers' sales tax. The increase in cross-border shopping has decreased.

Second, he talks about the CFIB report about GST and cost to business. It has been made very clear, not only in this House but by analysts from coast to coast, that the report was flawed in its methodology. In fact I have here a letter to Mr. John Bulloch from Didatech Software Limited in Burnaby, B.C.—the hon. member's province—which says that Mr. Bulloch's report was flawed. It concludes in saying:

> I run a small company employing 12 people and have sales of around $1 million per year. The GST has improved our ability to compete and export to the U.S. market. We spend a trivial amount of time administering the GST. In fact the only problem with the tax is that it does not apply to everything.

It is signed by Paul Melhus, president of Didatech Software Limited.

I would like the hon. member perhaps to respond to that constituent from British Columbia who supports the GST over the flawed manufacturers' sales tax which has harmed Canadian businesses.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to answer that question very briefly, but I will try.

First of all, regarding cross-border shopping, it is very interesting that the minister uses statistics that are now newly adjusted, but if he looks at Statistics Canada's own figures he will see that the dollar value of the amount that is coming across the border has gone up by those same figures.

Regarding CFIB cost to business, he points out that its methodology is flawed. Over the past few years we have seen this same government when it suited its purposes using CFIB figures saying: "Here is the situation".

He gives us one example of somebody who agrees with the GST. This summer I went around and talked to the forest industry and larger industries that have been hurt by the GST because of the administrative costs. I have talked to other small industries that are telling me they are being put out of business by this government and its tax policies.

I think the minister had better open up his eyes, talk to the people of Canada and recognize that this GST is hurting Canada and has to be done away with.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I want to express appreciation to my colleague for sharing this time that we have to debate this Liberal motion. I want the House to know that I fully support this motion about the mismanagement of the government which has plunged this country into the kind of recession it is currently experiencing.

I suspect that the majority of Canadians living today have probably never gone through a period like the great depression of the 1930s. Most of us in this House were either too young to get the full impact of the experience or, like myself, were born during the war when the economic situation had changed or were part of the post-war baby boom that took over after the war.

I suppose the last two recessions, 1981–82 when the Liberals were in office and the current recession created by the Conservative government, are the only things that really come close to helping us experience what people went through during that period of recession back from 1929 through 1939.

At that time commodity prices on the farm and elsewhere plunged to record lows. Farmers, fishermen, people working in the forest industry, people working in industries across Canada, their commodities plunged to such a value that they could not even recoup their operating costs much less earn a profit.

Unemployment skyrocketed at that time. Unemployed young men ended up travelling back and forth across the country seeking employment. They were not lazy by any means. They were seeking work. As a result of government policies work simply was not available no matter where they looked in this country and they were certainly attempting to look.

Many of us who grew up during the depression or were born during or just after the war really do not have any kind of understanding about the impacts of that depression. We were brought up in an era when governments were taking steps to learn from what caused the depression, taking steps to implement policies which they felt would result in no new depressions of the type they had gone through between 1929 and 1939.

I recall books about the depression, for example Pierre Berton's book. Even R. B. Bennett at the end of the depression just before the election of 1935 was getting on the radio and saying: "Maybe Roosevelt's deal was the right thing, maybe we were doing the wrong thing here in Canada".

Even R. B. Bennett was proposing measures which would have brought people back into the work force, which would have stimulated the economy, which would have assisted areas of the country that had suffered more from the depression than other areas, which would have brought people back to work rather than sticking them in military style relief camps or concentration camps along the lines that were proposed by Mayor Charlotte Whitton, a former mayor of Ottawa.

I was brought up in a period when governments took great steps to implement measures which would prevent the onset of another depression like the one they had experienced between 1929 and 1939.

What they decided was the cause of the recession was unlimited laissez-faire market systems. Even R. B. Bennett in his radio programs back in 1935 was suggesting that the time for the laissez-faire market system was over. It had failed. It caused the depression and what they had to look at was more government involvement.

This was coming from the mouth of one of arch Conservatives of his day. He was saying that the laissez-faire market system had failed Canadians, had failed the people of the world and what was needed was more government involvement in the development of the economy, more regulation of the marketplace and of private industry in order to protect people from the onset of another recession or another depression like the great depression of the 1930s.

I am a person who grew up in that kind of an economy. My experience of that economy, although my family was relatively poor, is that it was a benign economy. It was not the kind of economy that we are experiencing right now. Government was involved in the economy. Government brought in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Trans-Canada Airlines. It was involved in transfer programs that assisted the less developed parts of the country. It was involved in transfer programs between the federal government and what were known as the poorer provinces in order to help upgrade the standard of services available in those provinces.

All of these measures were brought in by governments after the last depression in order to avoid the onset of another one. Things like the progressive income tax system and the distribution of wealth and income in the country were seen as necessary in order to prevent another depression.

Things like the Canada Assistance Plan, Established Programs Financing and national medicare were brought in I suppose at the end of this period in the 1960s to make sure that services were provided at a decent standard across the country.

Unfortunately in the 1970s and the 1980s that old phenomenon of Conservative ideology and the free market ideology resurfaced again. The pendulum swung back to the right. That is the kind of problem that we are wrestling here with now.

All of the regulations that were brought in after the depression and after the war in order to prevent the onset of another depression, all of those things which were brought in by both Liberal and Conservative governments of the day, are now in the process of being dismantled.

Regarding provincial transfer payments, we just passed legislation within the last couple of days to do away with some of those programs by capping them and by starving them to death.

We now as a result of the actions of this Conservative government have begun to dismantle the unemployment insurance system.

It is great to read the statements of R. B. Bennett and Mackenzie King during the last depression because they are so similar. They all were fiscal tinkerers and they all were concerned about balancing the budgets. The only thing they were not concerned about, the only thing they did not want to hear about, and I noticed it in the speeches being made by the Conservatives on the opposite side of the House, was the debt solution program which has not solved the debt crisis.

They talk about their inflation programs which have not solved the depression crisis. They talk about all of their fiscal tinkering and their financial programs, none of which has resulted in a single new job within the last little while.

The problem here is that the neo-conservatives of today—and there is no such thing because it is a contradiction in terms—are just like the old Conservatives at the time of Herbert Hoover and Calvin Coolidge. These are the kinds of people who took us into the depression last time. These are the kinds of policies that created the depression last time.

It is amazing how the statements made by people on that side reverberate all the way back to the 1920s and the 1930s. You can see exactly the same statements almost word for word. The problem here is that Conservatives create depressions. Tory times are hard times. When it comes to management of the economy, the Tories put ideology before practicality and that is the problem that Canada is experiencing right now.

If it were not the case then maybe the minister could get up on his hind legs for a change and tell me why we have two million people unemployed in this country. Why do we have a million kids living in poverty? Why do we have hundreds of thousands of people going to food banks under a Conservative government while the Minister of Finance here gets up and says that prosperity is just around the corner or that he can see the light at the end of the tunnel? He wonders why all his programs are not working.

In order to get these programs working, you have to focus them on the people who really need them and they are the poor, the unemployed, those people who do require food banks. Those are the people who need the focus of this government's attention and those are the people who are not getting it.

We need employment programs to put those people back to work. We need training programs in order for those people to be trained to deal in the economies of the future and to be able to survive in the economies of the future.

We have a government that is cutting back on those programs and cutting back on funding to the provinces. The problem here is that we have a Conservative government. It is going to be replaced by a Conservative government that now goes under the title of Liberal and that is going to be the problem.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think the member was right that there is a pretty good chance we will probably replace this government, but you can be darn sure that our policies would show a lot more caring than some of the policies of this government. We will talk about that later.

I have a question for the member because I need a bit of clarification. I have a New Democratic Party government in the province of Ontario right now and the way it is behaving, to quote my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, it seems from time to time that it is rather hopeless.

I would like to ask a question of the member for Comox—Alberni. Would he rather pay people from the public purse who are on unemployment not to work or have the people who are unemployed work on capital projects, environmental projects, something like the Company of Young Canadians working in the Third World or whatever? I am just trying to seek a clarification here from the member in terms of work ethic. In other words, we talk about people wanting to work and putting people back to work. Would he go so far as to say that it would be a much better thing for the productivity and the spirit of this country if those people who are unfortunately out of work because of a depressed economy or whatever had some kind of a constructive, productive thing to do rather than sitting at home collecting unemployment cheques or welfare cheques?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question.

I just want to go back to the first part of his question and the concern that he has about the government in Ontario. I am sure that the Government of Ontario would have had a much better idea of how it was going to run the province had it been given an honest answer as to how much money had been left in the treasury.

I recall seeing a cartoon in The Toronto Sun in which the Liberal treasurer of Ontario was taking Bob Rae on a transitional tour to the treasury vaults in the Parliament Buildings down there in Queen's Park and there was a mirror in the back of the vault. Somebody had smashed the mirror so it did not look like there was twice as much money as there was. He said: "Oh, one of the workmen must have shoved a broom through the mirror". There is only half the money available in the treasury. In fact the Liberals knew before they went into the election that they were going to be running a substantial deficit in the following year. They did not tell the people of the province the truth about that, and as a result it changed the whole perspective of the election. When people get into government and find out they only have half the money the previous government said they had, then we have a serious problem. That is the problem Bob Rae is dealing with right now.

The member asked me a question about how to get people in this economy back to work. I think it is possible to take a look at models that are available to us in other economies that have a relatively low level of unemployment and have a whole range of labour market strategies to deal with the problem of unemployment.

In most countries in Europe people retire voluntarily at the age of 55. Young people are able to move into the work force and take their place. In many cases they have better training. Many countries in Europe have paid educational leave. People can leave the work force and take a year or so of training to upgrade and become more skilled either in their own line of work or some other one. They become much more valuable to their employers and the economy as a result of that process of paid educational leave.

In most cases financing for those kinds of programs are paid in part out of collective agreements by employers and employees and are subsidized by the unemployment programs of the government. There are many ways that employment can be created and more people moved into the work force through expenditure on the part of all participants.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I understood that the member for Calgary was going ahead of me but that is no problem. I will be pleased either to yield to her or continue, whichever she prefers.

Mrs. Sparrow: Après vous.

Mr. Simmons: Après moi. I thank her. I was reflecting on the two Canadas when I was getting ready for this debate.

I see my friend, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, is in good humour as is usually the case. It is good to see him.

I was reflecting on the events of yesterday. I touched on it briefly yesterday here in the House but I ran out of time all too soon, at least from my perspective. I was reflecting on the two events at the Radisson Hotel in St. John's, Newfoundland yesterday evening.

One of the two events took place inside the hotel and had a fairly elite group of people. The Prime Minister was quick to point out that they were Newfoundlanders all, and I do not doubt his word on that. We happen to have per capita more millionaires than anywhere else in Canada, I am told. I am not surprised they could find some people out there to sell—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: That is a remark I will not repeat because it could get the minister in an awful lot of trouble and I like him too well to do that. It is a terrible remark.

I say to him that one of the companies that was mentioned today, Ayre's Limited, which is obliged for various reasons to shut down 62 stores across this country, has its headquarters in St. John's, Newfoundland. It had its beginnings there a couple hundred of years ago. It is a company that has provided a lot of leadership in the retail area to the entire country.

I know his quip was in fun, but I say to him that Newfoundlanders have a way of making an honest day's pay too and providing jobs for many thousands of fellow Newfoundlanders and people all across this country. That is the case with Ayre's that until now had employed over 700 people across this country from coast to coast in 62 stores and would continue to do so but for the policies of this government. The Ayre family has a tradition of not being particularly of the Liberal persuasion and that should come as no surprise, having just given its pedigree. The Ayre family in its release today has identified the polices of this government.

These are not my words. They mention the free trade agreement. They mention cross-border shopping. The member from Calgary looks like she is interested in what I am saying, but she obviously did not hear what I just said. I just pointed out that they have 62 stores across the country from coast to coast, in Toronto, in Montreal, all across the country.

We from Newfoundland have been in Confederation for such a short period that sometimes you will catch us in an unguarded moment saying "country" when we mean Newfoundland. We still say that a lot back home. However, in this particular case when I said "country" I meant Canada. I meant from coast to coast. I talked about the Ayre's stores in Vancouver, Montreal, Toronto and points in between. There are 62 of them going under and being shut down because, in the words of the management of that chain of stores, of the policies of this government, a government that family had supported over many years.

That was kind of off the track, but the minister has helped me make a point. I want to make a second point, which was to have been my first point. In the Radisson Hotel last evening there were two events. First of all, there was one inside the hotel. This great hotel was funded by a Liberal government that said everybody else had a convention centre except Newfoundland. Why does Newfoundland not have one? The government of the day pre-1984 made the funds available and of course they actually flowed in early 1985 when my good friend, the minister of fisheries as he is now, allowed the money to flow. So the convention centre and the Radisson Hotel were built in St. John's.

There are those that will tell you one of the hotels, which I will not mention, is the Liberal hotel and the Radisson is the Tory hotel. I do not subscribe to that kind of nonsense. I stay at both of them, depending on the occasion.

There were two events last evening, one inside the hotel with the elite. Some of the Newfie millionaires and others who could fork over the 500 bucks to see the Prime Minister were there. Let us face it, he has not exactly been seen down there recently. He has not been down there since May of last year, although it is an important part of the country as I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, coming as you do from another important part of the country, Quebec.

I suppose there are people down there who were anxious enough to see him that they would pay 500 bucks. But to pay 500 bucks you have to have it. But Newfoundlanders are always fairly ingenious and those of us who could not pay the 500 bucks found another way. We set up a little soup kitchen. This is the other event I come to. It was not quite in the hotel. It was on the premises if you like, just outside the door. The fee there was a little different. It was not quite $500. It was

50 cents for a bowl of soup. The bowl of soup was kind of secondary. The 50 cents was the same as the $500. It was to get a chance to look at the Prime Minister who had been missing of late.

It was also to help my good friend from St. John's West celebrate his 25 years in politics during which he has made a marvellous contribution to our province and to this country as a whole.

What else is different about the $500 and the 50 cents? They differ a lot if you subtract one from the other. You will get a fairly large sum. What else is different other than that one is a great massive amount of money that only some people have and the other is a small amount that most people would have.

What else is different? In those two events and in those two amounts you have the two Canadas. You have the two Canadas that are anticipated by this bill. You have the two Canadas that are already in the making by the policies of the gentleman from Baie Comeau. You have the Canada of the elite, the Canada of the well-heeled, the Canada of the people whose incomes are $100,000 or more and who in consequence had their taxes lowered since the Tories came to power by $1,200. That is right. They are paying $1,200 more now than they were in 1984 if they earn $100,000 or more. The other Canada is the 50-cent Canada, the soup kitchen Canada that has also been created by this honourable crowd, the Canadians who have had their taxes increased by $1,600 a year. They are paying $1,600 more in federal taxes this year than they were seven years ago when the Tories took office. Who is that group? It is the group whose salaries, whose income is $30,000 or less. Those are the two Canadas we are talking about. Those are the two Canadas this bill would perpetrate and carve in stone.

That is not the kind of Canada I envision. That is not the kind of Canada we need where one sits at the luxurious table and the other hopes to get near enough to the table to catch a few of the crumbs.

That is what this bill is all about and its predecessor bill from a year or so ago. It perpetuates an injustice that should never have been launched in the first place. Read The Quick and the Dead, the book by Linda McQuaig. I do not think she has ever been accused of being a Liberal, but she says some things we have been saying for a long time.

She says some things the whole country is saying these days. She says in effect this whole system, whether you are talking free trade, the GST or changes in tax law, is a sock for the rich. The Prime Minister and his friends are looking after their collective friends while doing a song and dance about how they really care about poverty and the unemployed.

They get up and cite figures. They play games with figures. The people out there are lining up in the soup kitchens. People who seven years ago were employed and would still be employed but for the devastation that this government has reaped on the country are lining up at the food banks.

I wish there was a bit more time, but I see my time is up.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to put a question to the Liberal member who I think was a minister in the Trudeau government and also to make a few comments.

From 1975 to 1984 the Trudeau government tried so hard to centralize powers in Ottawa that it created a mighty confrontation with the provinces, especially Quebec.

In 1984 when the Conservative Party took power—I was then with the Conservative Party—it said three things. Decentralization was necessary to run the country better and to make it more profitable and prosperous. We had to decentralize. That was what the government said in 1984. It also talked about national reconciliation and about reducing the deficit because this nonsensical centralization of the Liberal Party had put the country some $200 billion in debt.

Seven years later we have exactly the same problem. The federal government wants to centralize more. National reconciliation has not happened. Instead of being reduced, the deficit has increased. It seems that we have an accumulated debt of around $420 or $430 billion.

Given these facts, I would like to say this to the Liberal member who had these problems in the Trudeau government, which have continued under the Conservative Mulroney government: Basically it little matters which of the two parties, Liberal or Conservative, runs the country better. We realize that the present federal system does not work. The proof is that the present federal system is not working. Unless and until the government is highly decentralized this country will go broke. I would ask him who is more to blame. Is it the Liberal Party, which ran up a $200 billion debt for Canada or the Conservative Party which added another $200 billion? He talked about taxes under the Conservatives and I want to tell him that with a deficit as high as we have now taxes will continue to go up. What does he think are the solutions?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Longueuil for his question. As he knows, and I imagine has guessed, I have constituents who are francophones and I trust I can make myself understood in French. Today I ask him to bear with me because I must speak English to be sure I make myself clear.

[English]

I do thank the member for Longueuil and I give him the undertaking that at the earliest possible opportunity I will do my best to respond to him in his mother tongue because I think it is important to have that courtesy extended to you, particularly when I represent several thousand francophone electors in the péninsule Port-au-Port in my riding.

The member asked a question to which I would like to respond. He asks: "Who is the most guilty?" When the Liberals vacated office in 1984 the debt was of the order of $170 billion to $180 billion. But if people who want to be fair critics of the situation would go back, they would find that the debt mushroomed in the last five or six years of that regime.

It was not without some explanation. Do not forget that the early 1980s were a very rough period on the world scene. We had come through a recession the likes of which we had not seen during the depression.

Anybody who cites the so-called massive debt of the Liberals in 1984 ought to in fairness cite the circumstances which brought it about.

"Who is the more guilty?" he asks. The people who took over in 1984, the Conservatives, did so first with their eyes open and second with the undertaking that it was going to be different with them. They knew what they were getting themselves into. He knew because he was part of the team at the time. They knew they were getting into a situation that included a massive debt.

They keep telling us since that the interest on the accumulated debt is what the real problem is. I have a question for him who was part of that team: "Did they not realize in 1984 that there was going to be such a thing as interest? Did they not know when they made their commitments to wipe out the debt? Did they not know that maybe interest would be applied to the unpaid debt from year to year?"

In direct answer to his question I say to him that the Conservatives, including himself who was there until a year or so ago, are far more guilty because they did some massive misleading at a time when they knew the difference. They knew they could not deliver on wiping out the debt in the short time frame they had undertaken.

I say to my good friend from Calgary Southwest that I am looking forward to hearing her speech. I know she and I differ on some matters. That is why she sits there. We agree on skiing, she says. This is true but here I say to her we are going downhill on another matter altogether and on this one we disagree.

I will say to the member in direct answer to his question that I think a fair amount of the guilt has to lie with the Conservatives who have misled the people on the debt. Having said that, pointing the finger does not help. The important thing is for us to indicate how we would do it differently and I think we have been doing that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. One moment. I want to be sure because the Liberals suggested to me that they split their time. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's spoke for 10 minutes and there are still 10 minutes left for the Liberals.

The hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak today on a subject of primary concern for all Canadians, which is poverty. I would like to remind members that regardless of their political affiliations, really we cannot rest comfortably while we have people living in poverty in this country.

We do share the concerns. It is the policies and directions that tend to be a bit different.

• (1610)

Canadians generally really do enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world. It is second only to the United States. One of this government's priorities is to maintain and improve the standard of living for Canadians and especially for the children in the future. Assuring a better future for Canadians and protecting our social safety net is a sound basis for a healthy and prosperous economy. For Canada to be truly a caring society, our wealth and our prosperity must be shared with those who are less fortunate and those who are in greatest need.

Let us first address the issue of growth and prosperity. There is no question that the policies of this government have contributed to economic growth in Canada since 1984. In 1984 the government embarked on a program of revitalizing the economy. As a result of our economic new policies, there have been new jobs created.

Canadians in need have been able to benefit from this growth. Since 1984 close to one million persons have escaped low income circumstances. This government has taken necessary steps to help those people most in need and to ensure that economic growth can continue.

Despite these important achievements, most Canadians are aware that we are facing a very serious large debt problem. We have been debating this today in the House. Last year more money was spent on interest payments to service our national debt than on all programs administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Considering all the programs in health and welfare put together, our national debt was a greater expense to Canadians.

That means that if you look through the department, we spend more than the cost of national programs servicing the debt. I know many people here in the Chamber have realized the amount of money which goes to health and welfare and assistance to Canadians. It is almost 60 per cent of our budget.

There are national health care programs, welfare programs, Old Age Security, family allowance and assistance through the transfers to the provinces and through to individuals. We can see that if servicing our debt has cost us more than assisting Canadian through health and welfare, we have a lot of pressure on the revenues that we collect.

The survival of the programs that we have in place really depends upon the prosperity of this country. We have to take measures today to ensure for the next generation, which is our children. We must take these drastic steps, absolutely mandatory steps today to maintain a standard of living that Canadians expect tomorrow.

That has not prevented us from putting into place forward looking programs to ensure the future prosperity of all Canadians. Through tax reform we improved the simplicity, the fairness and equity of the income tax system by converting exemptions to credits and by lowering and reducing the number of income tax rates. Eight hundred and fifty thousand low income Canadians were taken off the tax rolls as a result of this policy change.

The government also remains firmly committed to maintaining social programs while recognizing the need to direct benefits to those most in need. One only has to look at the important improvements made in the recent years in respect of benefits available to families to see that the government is strongly in favour and believes in assisting the disadvantaged people and the disadvantaged families.

From the federal government's perspective, the concept of a family benefit related to the child goes back to 1918 when an amendment to the Income Tax War Act was first introduced. It was called the child tax exemption.

The family allowance program then came into effect in 1945, demonstrating that Canada accepted its obligation to assist in the upbringing of children. It was established as a vehicle whereby the federal government could supplement family income in order to alleviate some of the costs of caring for and raising children.

Several changes have been made to the family allowance since its inception to make the system of family benefits better targeted to families who are most in need. Currently the federal government delivers almost $2.7 billion in family allowance benefits to over 3.5 million families on behalf of 6.5 million children.

Benefits are usually paid to the mother on a monthly basis. In 1991 the monthly benefit was set at an average of $34 per child. The total amount does not differ, but the age group differs from province to province.

Current federal income support for families does not stop with the family allowances. In this regard family allowances are complemented by a system of child related benefits, mainly delivered through the personal income tax system.

The child tax credit program which provides benefits to lower income families is another key source of income support for families. Since taking office in 1984, this government has significantly enhanced the maximum value of the credit by over 50 per cent. The benefit has increased from $367 per child in 1984 to $585 per child in 1991.

As part of the national child care strategy, the federal government also introduced in 1988 a supplement to the child tax credit with respect to children six years of age and under. The supplement is valued at $207 per child in the year 1991.

The federal government has undertaken other income support measures to assist families with children. For example, we have implemented a goods and service tax credit package which, when all elements are taken together, means that families with incomes of less than $30,000 per year are better off than before the GST was implemented. Families benefit from an enhanced tax credit which is paid quarterly. In 1991 the maximum value of this credit is $190 per adult and $100 per child.

The issue of family violence is also a concern for this government for many reasons. It has a long lasting effect on individuals and on families as well as on our society as a whole.

We all have a role to play. The federal government announced in February 1991 a four-year, $136 million program to continue the effort of reducing the level of family violence in Canada. The new initiative addresses violence against women, children, seniors and the disabled and also within the Indian and Inuit communities.

The federal government has also eased the problem of marriage breakdown and divorce by introducing new divorce legislation which amended the grounds for divorce and humanized its consequences. To assist with the enforcement of support orders the federal government also introduced services which provide for the release of information from designated federal banks to help locate persons who do not meet their support order obligations and provide for the garnishment of designated federal moneys from defaulting spouses.

Given the increasing labour force participation rates of women and the changing structure of our family unit, there is no doubt that child care is an important matter. We the federal government do provide substantial support and it runs in the order of $1 billion per year. Included in this, of course, is more than $250 million in federal contribution to provincial and territorial governments in respect of their expenditures for day care services. Also included are the tax revenues forgone in respect of the child care expense deduction. Effective for the 1988 tax year this deduction was increased in order to better reflect the actual cost of care faced by parents using receipted child care.

For parents with pre-school aged children, the maximum deduction now is $4,000 per child, up from $2,000 per child per year.

There is also the child care initiatives fund which supports innovative approaches to child care. To date, for example, the fund has supported a wide range of projects including a national child care survey by the National Day Care Research Network, national conferences that have been sponsored by the Canadian Child Care Federation and a national survey of wages and working conditions for child care workers.

Families with newborn babies receive additional support as a result of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The amendments introduced a multi-tiered system of maternity, parental and sickness benefits, including 15 weeks of maternity benefits available during the period surrounding the birth of the child; 10 weeks of parental benefits available to natural or adoptive parents, either the mother or the father; and 15 weeks of sickness benefits.

This year parents will receive over $1 billion in benefits in order to look after their newborn or indeed their adoptive children.

The federal government also has a role in social services. While social assistance and social services are matters of provincial jurisdiction, and provinces determine policies with respect to the services, the federal government cost shares eligible provincial expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Current federal expenditures under this plan, called CAP, are about $6.3 billion in the fiscal year 1991-92. Moreover the federal government in co-operation with provincial governments is working to address housing needs of disadvantaged Canadians.

In 1990, the construction or renovation of over 42,000 new households was funded through federal social housing programs. Most of these programs were cost shared with the provinces and/or the territories. We have to address their sheltered needs. Besides that, over 640,000 households are now being assisted on an annual basis. There is a lot more that can be done and there is probably a lot more that should be done, but we are addressing the needs with the funds that are available.

The government is also committed to improving Canada's health care system to make one of the world's finest and best even better.

As the delivery of health services is a constitutional responsibility of the provinces, it is their responsibility to determine the needs, make the services available, and manage health costs.

The primary role of the Government of Canada is to make a financial contribution in support of provincial health programs. Under Established Programs Financing, transfers to provinces for hospital and medical services and extended health care came to an estimated $14.3 billion in the fiscal year which just ended.

That amount represented a significant increase over the value of health transfers during the previous year. EPF transfers will continue to grow. The federal government is committed to enhancing the health of Canadians through medical and health services research.

The Medical Research Council supports more than $200 million worth of grants and scholarships in aid of research every year. The National Health, Research and Development Program also supports research in the operation of health care delivery, the system of health care delivery in Canada as well as the causes and treatment of AIDS and Alzheimer's.

The government's commitment to addressing major threats to the health and well-being of Canadians is reflected in our funding of special programs to reduce substance and drug abuse such as the national drug strategy.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has signed several federal-provincial agreements which will provide funding for alcohol and drug abuse programs throughout Canada.

These agreements which will provide $20 million this year and each subsequent year will help those caught up in a vicious circle of drug and chemical abuse. Of course, we cannot forget the system of benefits for our elderly, central in its Old Age Security Program, which provides a basic floor for elderly Canadians that meet minimum residence requirements.

This basic benefit valued at more than $4,400 per pensioner is received by over three million citizens. In addition, the Guaranteed Income Supplement assists low income senior citizens by providing non-taxable benefits to those Old Age Security benefit recipients with little or no other income.

The Guaranteed Income Supplement recognizes the reality faced by many of today's senior citizens and targets benefits accordingly by providing an income tested benefit which directs most of the help to most of those in need.

I cannot overstate this government's concerns about poverty and its effect on children and families. For me, there is no other single issue which stands out that needs more time, more effort and more attention from all Canadians.

In fact, one of the major objectives of this government is to invest in our children and see them better educated, better protected and better nurtured so they can make their own contributions to our future.

In 1990 we watched children take on a new importance in world politics. At the World Summit for Children which was co-chaired by our Prime Minister, leaders of 70 nations adopted the world's declaration on the survival, protection and development of children and the action plan.

By signing this declaration Canada was urged to develop a plan of action of its own. We are doing this and I believe it will be early in the new year that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will be able to come forth with recommendations and with a policy.

On behalf of the government I have outlined certain areas we have addressed. We also realize the deficit and debt must be addressed.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member on the government side for what I felt was a sincere speech.

It was one that expressed deep concerns, particularly to the whole issue as it relates to the institution of the family and children. However, there is a reality that we are facing here in Canada today and part and parcel of this reality is the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed. Among them are 400,000 young people. We have lost approximately 250,000 manufacturing jobs. We have seen a middle class that, since this government took office, is now paying $1,500 more in taxes. There has been a widening of the gap between the rich and the poor in this country.

The government must somewhere have a master plan to deal with this issue and this reality that I am presently addressing. I am sure that the Conservative government does not want to have 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. I am sure they take no pride in having 400,000 young people unemployed. However at times I question my own statements. Why have we seen in this country cuts in areas like post-secondary education? Yesterday we debated a cap on CAP and the detrimental impact it has on many communities and people throughout Canada. I am just wondering, if indeed there is a master plan, what went wrong, because obviously something must have gone wrong. I do not think a country like Canada can afford nor should it have 1.5 million people unemployed. We should not have to be concerned that throughout Canada from coast to coast we have young children who cannot learn properly because they go to bed hungry. They get up in the morning and do not have breakfast. In a country as industrialized as we are, it is a national disgrace that we have these problems.

I want an answer in practical terms, in very specific terms. What are we going to do to address the issue of poverty in practical terms? I do not want to hear numbers. I want to hear actual facts and figures. I want to hear what we are actually going to do about these kids going to school with an empty stomach.

We must realize in this House that children and young people are going to be the future of this country. The government should realize that very quickly before we have yet another burnt-out generation.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the questions.

With regard to the 1.5 million unemployed and the 400,000 young people, it is very difficult and I certainly did try to speak from the heart. I feel very strongly that the situation of poverty and unemployment is one for all of us to be concerned about.

I would like to speak briefly first of all about the number of drop-outs in the education process. We certainly have seen the statistics that 30 per cent of youngsters drop out of high school. One in four people in the labour force are illiterate. By that I mean they cannot read or understand the manuals or the programs to run machinery or indeed carry on with their business. This is unacceptable.

We are addressing some of the issues with regard to forming partnerships with the labour union, academia, the educational institutions and private sector and discussing how we can better train people and increase literacy.

I can also say that through science and technology and globalization, the world is changing extremely quickly.

I think we all realize now that we have to change our attitudes.

We do have a problem. We are hopefully coming out of this recession which has hurt a lot of Canadians in all provinces. I just reflected back to the early eighties and what his party chose on how to attack the problem of that particular recession. It was by printing money. It was printing money and pouring money into the system which increased inflation and which increased the interest rates.

Some hon. members: What about inflation?

Mrs. Sparrow: Inflation was 13.5 per cent and interest rates were 22 to 23 per cent, which is totally unacceptable.

An hon. member: You forget the famous six and five program.

Mrs. Sparrow: Wonderful, wonderful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Other members may want to make comments or raise questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member for Calgary Southwest. In fact I had the pleasure of working with her on the industry, science and technology committee for a number of years. However, I wondered why she did not address the subject before the House. She talked about what she was doing for the poor. I agree that is important, especially in a recession. At the time we prepared a study on sustainable development and listened to the greatest experts in this country tell us what should be done to boost the Canadian economy. These people said there should be more co-operation between universities, research centres, governments, employers and unions. I would have liked to hear the hon. member talk about how we can improve our business.

We can say that since that time more Canadian businesses, especially in Quebec, have had a tendency to go bankrupt instead of being successful. There have been few successes and few solutions. I would now like to hear the hon. member's suggestions on how to improve the economy so that we can have successful businesses, create jobs, reduce unemployment and reduce welfare. I would appreciate an answer in this respect.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. I will go on in English, for which I apologize.

[English]

I want to thank my colleague. We did share an experience sitting on the Standing Committee of Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development, Tourism and Small Business. There were many things that we learned from the witnesses. In areas where this government has acted, the centres of excellence, I believe there were either 14 or 15 centres that were announced a year and a half or two years ago and some $240 million was put into them.

It was interesting because through the Minister of Science we joined partners with the academic institutions, the post-secondary institutions and private enterprise, as well as through some of our provincial counterparts. It started bringing partners together.

The other area was with regard to Canadian scholarships for students in the science area. This started three years ago. Some 2,500 scholarships are announced every year. Half of these scholarships go to women. We are trying to encourage more women to go into the science and engineering areas.

Obviously there is no quick fix, but we certainly feel that by encouraging youngsters at school and through engineering and sciences we will be able to tackle these problems more beneficially.

My colleague was remarking some time ago with regard to decentralization. It was interesting in a poll I did in the province of Alberta that 90 per cent of the returns were in favour of a strong, unified Canada with a strong federal government.

I think what was interesting was that a lot of the people did not want to see 10 separate governments. I have to say that we need a strong united Canada with a strong federal government.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up where the member for Calgary Southwest left off in answering the member for Longueuil who asked about what we could do to promote a more healthy business climate in the province of Quebec. Was that part of the question? Did I understand him correctly?

I would like to suggest a couple of ideas to the member before I get into my basic remarks. For starters, as a member of Parliament in this nation's board room, they should start by getting behind the minister responsible for national unity. I believe one of the problems we have in this country is the fact that there is fear among foreign and local investors because of all this talk about separation.

If the member would spend a little less time on separation issues and spend more time on galvanizing the will of the nation, I say with respect, that would go a long way to help the business climate in Quebec. Further than Quebec, I think it would go a long way toward helping the economy of this entire country.

I support the remarks of the member for Calgary Southwest who, unlike her Reform Party opponent who always deals in vague generalities, always speaks in specific terms about the issues she addresses. I do not always agree but that is fair. I do respect the member for Calgary Southwest for always dealing with issues in specific terms.

I want to start by saying that I felt good about my leader's motion today on the economy. Many people in this country have been waiting for our leader to be more specific about some of his thoughts on the economy. Today I felt he provided a lot of specifics.

He started off by referring to a value system that the Liberal Party would have as its cornerstone, as we are working a developing policy, hopefully in preparation for the opportunity to govern this country. He talked about a value system that talked about caring and approachability and a lot of compassion. He talked about a government that must really deal in terms of integrity.

I know that people from coast to coast are pleading for a value system like that to become a focal point again in terms of the policy we develop in this country.

Getting off the value system and on to a more specific area, I want to talk about the national debt of this country. There is one thing I hear over and over again from the government members that is almost like a part of a strategy, and that is that they cannot give a speech without referring to the national debt, the deficit and the debt. It is almost like a brainwash experience that they are putting the people of Canada through. I have noticed this as I have sat in the far corner of this House and listened to people over the last few months.

First of all, this government has exaggerated the debt of this country. It is terribly exaggerated. The exaggeration is close to $40 billion. It does not count the reserve of the Bank of Canada which is close to $23 billion.

Who controls the Governor of the Bank of Canada? The Government of Canada. That is a fact that it does not recognize in its calculations. There are also other reserves that it has which is another $23 billion that it has not calculated. I am not saying the debt is unimportant but I do not like this government's approach of trying to sort of scare the Canadian people into a state where nothing else matters but the national debt of this country.

We must address the problem. I am not saying that we should ignore it, but I think that one of the best ways to handle the debt of this nation is to make sure that we have a productive labour force.

The Gross National Product of this country is approximately $625 billion to some $630 billion. Can we imagine if the productivity of this country went up by some 10 per cent? We are talking about an intake of gross revenues into the system, if we kept expenses and inflation in line, of close to $60 billion.

I grant that all of that does not come back into the national Treasury. But my point is that the best way to handle the debt of this nation is with a galvanized work force where we have a galvanized will, a will that wants to succeed.

What instruments does the Government of Canada have at its disposal to work at galvanizing the will of this nation? It is from a galvanized will that productivity will increase. It may be low at 10 per cent. We should not just be thinking in terms of productivity being the number of widgets we make in an hour, because someone will be more productive.

We should also think of the creative juices that come from a work force that is galvanized and motivated. As I was about to say earlier, what instruments does the Government of Canada have? The one instrument that this government has that can touch everyone in this country is the tax designs.

This government has failed miserably in its tax designs. When it came to power in 1984 it promised comprehensive tax reform. I rest my case to the people of Canada. I think that the corporate income tax and the personal income tax reforms of this country have failed. The government should not look to the opposition to hear criticism. It should just listen to its own constituents. It could see the attitude reflected in their work habits. The tax designs of this country right now are a disincentive to productivity. The very thing that we need in order to address the problem which the member for Calgary Southwest mentioned earlier is the national debt.

It has exacerbated the problem, of course, with the goods and services tax. Now we are heading into a new season, a new budget is out there around the corner and there is still time for this. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that you have given me one minute. I plead with this government to use that one instrument that it has at its disposal to galvanize the will of this nation to make sure that the productivity levels are there to create additional employment. It will also attack the debt which can be handled easily once the will of this country is working together and everyone wants to succeed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe you will find consent for the following motions:

That, notwithstanding the order made on November 22, 1991, the membership of the Senate on the special joint committee to review the subject matter of Bill C-43, an act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, to establish a conflict of interest commission and to make consequential amendments to other acts, be changed from 5 to 7 members; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours thereof.

• (1650)

Mr. Speaker, the next motion is:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Orders and usual practices of the House:

That Private Members' Business hour for Wednesday, December 11, Thursday, December 12 be cancelled and the items retain their place in the order of precedence;

That Government Order No. 38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada, be called for debate on Wednesday, December 11, 1991 after Routine Proceedings at report stage, and that all questions to dispose of the said bill at all remaining stages be put forthwith and successively by the Speaker no later than at 5 p.m. on that day; and

That if a registered vote is requested it shall not be deferred and the bells shall not ring longer than 15 minutes.

That the House adjourn after completion at report stage of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, on Thursday, December 12 until 11 a.m. Monday, February 3, 1992;

That at any time during the adjournment, the Speaker may, after consultation with the government, fix a time at which the House shall meet for the sole purpose of receiving Royal Assent to a bill or bills;

That following such Royal Assent the House shall stand further adjourned as per Standing Order 28; and

That this order do not supersede the provisions of Standing Order 28(3).

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on the clause that refers to the House adjourning after completion of report stage of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, is that the only piece of legislation the government is calling on that day?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the House that yes, that is the intention of the government. There was one caveat discussed at the House leaders' meeting. It was that if there was an agreement on another bill—and I say "agreement" meaning all three parties—we would then perhaps proceed with it but it would have to be by agreement. Otherwise it will only be Bill C-32 that we will be calling.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. It does not directly relate to our permission to allow this motion to go through, but it does affect an item that will be happening when the House is not sitting. As he knows, I wrote to the government House leader earlier today reminding him that the royal commission on the Election Act will be reporting in mid-January and that in that commission's report there will be draft legislation.

I would ask that the government make a response to my request that a committee be set up to do pre-study of that draft legislation. It is important that the government respond. I would recommend that it would be in the best interests of all members of Parliament and all parties that we be in a position to act on that legislation. I would certainly be supportive of pre-study of the legislation.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I was not aware of the hon. member's letter. The issue was raised at House leaders' meeting earlier this afternoon. I can indicate to the member that the House leaders agreed that they would look at that and come to a decision hopefully prior to us rising. But I do not want to commit anything on behalf of my House leader or any of the other House leaders that were at the meeting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to present the motions?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motions?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motions (Mr. Cooper) agreed to.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien (p. 6042), and the amendment thereto of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 6057).

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few comments and then maybe ask the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood to answer a question that I have and give some of his comments.

I listened to the Leader of the Official Opposition this morning speak about his motion and the economy. I must say I agree whole-heartedly with what he had to say.

I want to come back though to what the member for Broadview—Greenwood asked the Leader of the Official Opposition this morning. He noted there was a problem out there in the country that our Canadian citizens do not have any trust or confidence in the system any more. I am going to reiterate that question to the hon. member because I feel that it is a very important one. I know in my travels throughout my riding that my constituents are telling me the same thing. They have lost trust and they have lost confidence in the system itself, not necessarily in individual politicians but in the system which does not seem to want to work any more. They are very frustrated.

One of the questions I have is: Will the member explain to me and to the Chamber how he expects to build trust and confidence back into the system?

The other point I want to ask him and make note of is the idea of income tax reform. The government quite often throws out the point that we do not have any ideas. I know the hon. member is noted for his ideas. I know he has a very good one with regard to the single tax. I have talked somewhat about that single tax in my riding. I was wondering if the hon. member could explain to those members who are here today a possible solution for getting rid of the GST and replacing it with a simpler type of tax. At the same time it could probably lower the income tax and put more money in Canadian pockets.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur for his two questions.

The first question is the issue of trust. I believe, and I know most of us believe, that the central issue in the next election campaign is going to be trust. The days of blind faith in politicians are over. I believe that people are going to say to us when we are campaigning in the next election: "Don't tell me what you are against. Tell me what you have as an alternative equal or better to what is in existence".

One of the things that I am so pleased about is the fact that we in the Liberal Party, as we are developing policy and as we are preparing for the next election, are not just listening to people from our own party. We are going to people who are from all parties and from all parts of the world, as we did in Aylmer two weeks ago. That is the kind of thinking that the people of Canada, I believe, want to see in the political process.

My last point is on the single tax. We got a major breakthrough today from the Minister of Finance because he said to me in this House today: "If you can prove to me that under your system 50 per cent of this population will not not pay more than they are paying under the current system I am willing to listen". I am in the process of presenting him that documentation.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question to the hon. member is simply this. The hon. member is an individual who has some experience with entrepreneurs and is somewhat of an entrepreneur himself. Since the government has been an unmitigated disaster in terms of facilitating the private sector to create the necessary jobs, I am wondering if the hon. member could comment on the appropriateness of the monetary policy which is being pursued by the Government of Canada as it relates to entrepreneurs in this country and in their desire to facilitate increasing employment opportunities.

I would like to hear the hon. member's views.

• (1700)

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Cape Breton. As he knows and as he has articulated so often in this House, the 900,000 entrepreneurs across this country are the best hope for putting people back to work. For some unknown reason, this government does not want to address that fact head on. I believe instead of ratcheting inflation to a point where we now have deflation, the government should let up a little bit on the inflation. That would ultimately cause a little bit of a drop in the dollar and would put out the kind of confidence that would generate a lot more jobs in this country which we so badly need at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. To avoid any misunderstanding, I gave the floor to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood to implement the Liberal round with the hon. member for Burin—St. George's. I now recognize, because there are no speakers on the other side, another two Liberals for 10 minutes each. The hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Dingwall: On a point of order, if the hon. member has joined our party and wants to be known as a Liberal member of Parliament, we would be prepared to give him the floor if he is going to support the policies we have just enunciated.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I would not join a group that would have me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Christmas spirit is here.

The hon. member for Willowdale for 10 minutes.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in confronting the tremendously serious economic challenges we face in Canada today, I believe we need a double-barrelled approach. For the past three years we have been talking to the government about one barrel of that approach and that is the long-term type of industrial policy that we as Canadians need and deserve.

This is a policy which is necessary, not only to allow us to compete, but more importantly to make us competitive. We have talked at length about monetary policies, fiscal policies, training, development, science, research technology, innovation, development, all of those things which are the hallmarks of an internationally competitive society and areas in which we are in decline.

The other barrel of our approach must be aimed squarely today at what has been a very disappointing economic performance in Canada, disappointing to members on this side of the House and to the other side as well.

We are not out of this recession. We are on the brink perhaps of a double dip. We are seeing unemployment figures stalled. Last month unemployment did not go down and 45,000 more Canadians dropped out of the work force. This requires immediate redress.

I want to put before you today some ideas where we can act immediately in Canada to deal with this depressing problem.

Let me start with a bit of background. Today we are spending in Canada on direct unemployment insurance payments, combined with welfare payments, the grand total of $31 billion. If we could wipe out all welfare and unemployment insurance payments for a year, we would wipe out our entire federal deficit.

When you look at how this affects individuals, it means that we are paying regular unemployment insurance of $13,000 per year for every unemployed person. In addition to that, we are spending $12,800 per year for every case of welfare.

We have money available, if we could get them off the UI cycle and off the welfare cycle, to invest in more productive aspects of our economy including job creation, a full $31 billion. Let us look briefly at some of the ways that we might constructively do this.

Number one, upgrading our municipal infrastructure. In 1988, the Liberals introduced a plan whereby the federal, provincial and municipal governments would share equally the cost over five years of a total of $15 billion expenditure to upgrade necessary municipal infrastructure such as roads, sewers, bridges and everything else.

That would have meant that the federal cost of the program was $1 billion a year for five years. We must look at the real cost, what we would have paid out of pocket. Informetrica did a study for the Canadian Federation of Municipalities which showed that the cost would not have been $1 billion but only $80 million.

What would we have received for that sum of $80 million a year for five years? We would have created 62,800 jobs a year. That would have been a net cost per job created of $1,274. That cost of $1,274 per year per job did not take into consideration the $13,000 a year that we pay for unemployment insurance.

If we had a municipal infrastructure program in place, we would be saving federal expenditures of close to $11,700 a year. That makes economic sense. We are investing a little and getting a lot through savings, stimulus and everything else.

Another area where we could be very creative is home building. Home building starts are down dramatically and this year we will be lucky if they are up over the depressing level of last year.

The industry is working at only 50 per cent capacity and there are 180,000 unemployed construction workers across Canada. Let us look at some constructive ways we could get this industry going with savings to the taxpayers of Canada. Reduce the down payment on new homes to 5 per cent.

This government is telling us it is out of the recession and things are rosy. Then there should be no problem in this government guaranteeing the remainder of that 95 per cent financing for a house.

We talked about another possibility that would cost the taxpayers nothing. We could allow potential home owners to invest their down payment from their RRSP savings. That would free up funds and savings that are already there at no cost to the taxpayer.

Another area where this government has been penny wise and pound foolish is in skills training and illiteracy. The Southam survey showed there are 5 million Canadians that are functionally illiterate.

The cost to business of this illiteracy alone is $4 billion a year. The annual social cost is some $10 billion. When you have costs like this to Canadians, does it not make sense to invest a little bit of money to correct it?

What has this government done? It announced a program in 1988. It said it would spend a total of $22 million over five years to deal with the problem of Canadian illiteracy. Do you know what this amounts to? It amounts to $4.40 per year for every functionally illiterate Canadian. It amounts to 1.21 cents per day for literacy training for illiterate Canadians. It is peanuts when you think we could save the social cost of $10 billion and the cost to the private sector of $4 billion.

• (1710)

Last, we should be looking at the optional right of every unemployed Canadian to have skills assessment and get immediately into a program of remedial and skills training.

I would suggest that when we have such payments as $31 billion of public money directly for unemployment insurance and welfare, $13,000 per year for every unemployed Canadian, $12,800 for every person on welfare, we have a tremendous fund available to create jobs through the private sector.

If we could create jobs by investing all or a portion of those funds in job creation, we would have the dignity of work. We would have taxpayers rather than welfare and insurance recipients.

There are a lot of programs where small businesses in particular could benefit but not by giving the full amount of that money. For example, we could take $5,000 to pay for the cost of a new full-time job for one year created by business in Canada. Financially and economically we would be far ahead in terms of what it would do to our deficit. Even more important, we would be restoring dignity to those people who want jobs but cannot find them.

There is so much we have to do in terms of our long term ability to compete. In the short term this government has neglected the most fundamental aspects of sound fiscal management. In economic management, in not investing in these programs which could help us immediately to get out of this unemployment and welfare cycle, this government has demonstrated once again its incompetence by being pound wise and penny foolish.

It is absolutely necessary that the government act immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate if in the beginning of his speech the hon. member could say if there is an agreement with the Liberal opposition.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I thought I got an agreement from Dingwall.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate some explanation from the hon. member.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The details of this new organic union should be spelled out to the House so that the rest of us will understand precisely what is happening.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we are going to have a royal commission and we are going to study it very thoroughly. I want to tell the Chair that the hon. member is a senior member of this Chamber and we thought out of the generosity of Christmas time, since he did not wish to join our party nevertheless we would give him an opportunity to take the floor and speak for 10 to 12 minutes or thereabouts. Then we would continue on with the debate.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to reconsider. Generally I am not in receipt of such generosity from the two governing parties which have been tandem in creating the mess that we are talking about in this country for the last 50 years. I welcome their understanding of my role in this debate.

I particularly appreciate the amendment to this debate that says since 1982, because they are wrapped up in it too. I am not here to blame the Liberals. I am not here to blame the Tories because they have been faithful to their political supporters. This is a direct result of their faith in their political supporters because both parties are the representatives of the corporate agenda in Canada.

As a consequence of being true to their corporate supporters, they have brought this country to its knees except for one major distinction. No previous Liberal or Conservative government ever gave up on Canada until this government was elected. This government, unlike previous Liberal governments and Conservative governments, gave up on Canada the day it started to negotiate the free trade agreement.

Who was it who made the strongest speech and the most clear position prior to the election of 1984 against the free trade agreement? It was none other than the Leader of the Conservative Party, the present Prime Minister, who said: "Do not talk to me about free trade. I will never lead Canada down this road". Do you remember that my friends?

Some hon. members: Yes, yes.

Mr. Barrett: Yes, they all remember that. Do you remember that over there on that side, my friends? They do not remember that, Mr. Speaker. I am shocked. They do not remember the wise words of their own leader that had misled some of them to think that when they supported the present Prime Minister he would keep his word and never get involved in free trade. How shocked they were.

They were so shocked they lost their ability to think and they have blindly followed him ever since he changed his mind. It was the now Prime Minister of this country who said he would never allow free trade to take place. He said not to talk to him about free trade.

An hon. member: Unfair.

Mr. Barrett: Ah, my dear friend. Mr. Speaker, I am under attack. Why am I under attack? They are attacking me for repeating the words of the Prime Minister. I want to tell you I am shocked. I know that all Canadians attack me for repeating the words of the Prime Minister. I know the Liberals attack me for repeating the words of the Prime Minister. But when the government criticizes the words of the Prime Minister, I am shocked.

He said "Don't talk to me about free trade". Now it wants to amend it and add words to it. Don't give me that stuff. The reality was that was its agenda and that is what caused the problem.

Now the consequence of that is anger, frustration, and general disappointment in this country. It has even spawned a new party called the Reform Party. The Reform Party is a right wing reaction to what it feels is a betrayal by the Conservative Party. The right wing has left the Conservative Party and threatens to throw into the ashcan those moderate Tories who have more sense and more reason from a tradition known as the red Tories.

One of them is the minister in charge of the Constitution. Here he is spending his time trying to put this country back together when he may not even win his own seat again.

Why is that happening in this country? I will tell you why it is happening. Canadians from coast to coast have lost faith in this government because it cannot solve the problems it created by its policies.

This motion deals with the fact that the economy of this country is in a shambles. There are 1.5 million people unemployed and the same excuses are being given after seven and a half years in office. It still stands up and blames the Liberals. After seven and a half years there are only 33 more years for it to go in the wilderness like Moses before it comes to its senses, but at least it is a beginning to separate its record from this record. To stand up in the face of this debate from the Official Opposition and blame the Liberals is even too much for me to stomach, and I am prepared to take any kind of criticism given to the Liberals.

This is too much. Seven and a half years and the Reform Party is spawned. The BQ is spawned and it has this country on its knees economically. All it can do is stand up in the House and attack the Liberals for the mess that they left it. That is what it got elected for. It claimed it was going to be different. It claimed it was going to create a new economy. The Prime Minister said he would not talk about free trade and he is the one who led this country into it.

Do not blame the Liberals with fictional nonsense. The truth condemns the Liberals more than fiction.

I think it is unfair of this government to blame the Liberals for the mess it created. It created its own mess and it lives with it. But has it said one thing today that offers hope, succor or comfort? Even my good friend over here, the member of the Liberal Party for Willowdale, came up with some thoughtful analyses of problems and approaches to resolve them. One of the things my friend spoke about was the simple work where we have lagged behind in this country since the last Liberal administration. I give it credit for its winter works programs. It started fumbling and bumbling in its own way toward the step of resolving the problems with municipal infrastructure. It is a serious problem in this country that my colleague talked about. There is very little political romance in talking about roads, sewers and sidewalks. Although it is alleged that the government is familiar with sewers, it is roads and sidewalks we are talking about. We are talking about the need to rebuild an infrastructure in this country. I want to tell you that the member for Willowdale is being modest when he suggests $5 billion. We should be spending $15 billion a year right now.

Now, of course, comes the cry: "Where will you get the money from?" There comes the cry. As a matter of fact, it was the Minister of Finance himself who said to this humble backbencher: "I liked what you said about the RRSPs. Come up to my office and we will talk about it". He did say that today. He did, today. Did he not say that? Yes, he did, thank you very much. Well, why should I go up to his office? I am right here in the House of Commons where the people of Canada should know about the alternatives. If he wants to come to an office, I have an office. If he makes an appointment I will see him. But, is it not ironic that in defence of a lack of a single action the minister gets up and says: "Well, that is a nice idea. Come up to my office and tell me about it".

What in the heck are they doing? They are the government. They have all the bureaucrats. They have all the genius experts. They have all the economists and all they could say today was to blame the Liberals and ask me to come up and give him some advice. He has to be really hard up to ask me to come up to his office and give him some advice.

Now that he has shown how hard up he is, I will give him some advice. First, if he really wants to take my advice, he should quit. That would save us all a lot of trouble. Just quit. Just get the heck out of here. You have outlived your usefulness. There, he is gone. No, no, to be fair, he does not have to quit. The Reform Party is going to take care of him.

There is $90 billion in this country in RRSPs, half of which is in undirected general deposits. The United States has a municipal bond system that pays 5 per cent of purchased municipal bonds and the interest earned from those bonds over a 10-year period is not taxable. This is not radical socialism. This is not dangerous liberalism. It is right here with Conservative fiscal management.

Now, listen quietly because I only have another minute and a half. Mr. Speaker can only hold up a finger, but I know it is a minute and a half.

These five per cent municipal bonds out of RRSPs lent to the federal government with a 10-year minimum earn $30,000 interest. At the end of that 10 years we have used their money at 5 per cent. We allow people to take out the $30,000 tax-free from their RRSP to be used any way they want. It is tax-free my friend and I will tell you why. If we tap into that half of the undirected RRSPs it makes a pool of funds of approximately $40 billion available to us. The first year up front we make the money available to municipalities at 5.5 per cent and the local taxpayers have the right to decide democratically on how the money is to be spent.

My time is up but if someone were to dare ask me a question on the rest of this program, I will make this my commitment to you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk for five minutes.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I listened quite intently to the hon. member's statements in talking about the free trade deal and how it has adversely affected Canadians. But he must have known when he was speaking that regarding supply management and regarding article XI of GATT we really lost a lot of the power we had with marketing boards because of the free trade deal.

If he takes the position that supply management then should be supported, why is it that he is quoted in the paper a few weeks ago as saying that consumers would benefit greatly if supply management was done away with? That really concerns me because there are members of the New Democratic Party who stand up in this House and say that indeed they do support supply management. When I read something like that in the newspaper, it concerns me that maybe members within the New Democratic Party do not understand the importance of supply management to all of rural Canada, not only to our dairy and poultry farmers.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact it was a Liberal researcher who pointed that article out to me. Frankly it is something that happens on occasions to politicians. It is a misquote. I have always, in all my 30 years of public life, supported marketing boards. My father was in the business. My father's dear soul would not rest at peace if he thought that I had changed my mind. That is incorrect in the newspaper. Thank you for the opportunity to correct it.

Your second question was about the RRSPs.

An hon. member: Where are you going to get the RRSP money?

Mr. Barrett: Where are we going to get the RRSP money? I already demonstrated that to you, my dear friend. As a cabinet minister half the money in the RRSP is not directed.

An hon. member: It is used somewhere.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, it is used somewhere. I am glad the bells are ringing in the Tory's head. Where is that money used now? It is used by the private banks that are making usurious profits off that money. That is where the money is being used now.

He does not understand that. I am saying give the depositor the freedom of choice to make a decision about how they can best use their money. Give them an option of a municipal bond that pays that 5 per cent and let the government in turn make it available to the municipalities. We can thereby use indigenous funds, as my friend from Willowdale clearly spelled out, because social purpose and municipal rebuilding does not cost megabucks like stupid megabuck projects. It is a social investment with indigenous funds that actually makes more in terms of tax revenue generated back to the government than any subsidy the individual lender gets at the end of 10 years.

As a matter of fact, the kind of revenue generated by having a $15 billion a year municipal works project means that we diminish unemployment significantly. We add to the local tax coffers. We add to the provincial tax coffers and we add to the federal tax coffers. There is an option. If that is not clear then you do not understand anything.

May I say in conclusion, if that minister with his question represents what this government knows about how banks use our money then God help us all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I give the floor to the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur for 10 minutes to implement the last opposition round.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to take part in this debate on the economy.

The motion before the House asks:

> That this House condemn the government for economic mismanagement that has led to an intolerable and tragic level of unemployment, business failure and poverty in Canada.

It is clear that the Mulroney government is responsible for the first made-in-Canada recession, with its high dollar and high interest rate policies. The results of these short-sighted measures are even more disastrous for the unemployed and for all Canadians who must depend on food banks to survive.

With an unemployment rate in this country of up to 10.3 per cent, in other words 1.4 million Canadians, and with the number of bankruptcies totalling 62,969, which is 45 per cent more than last year, the government has a clear indication of the seriousness of the problem and how urgent it is to take steps to deal with it.

However, that would be too much to ask of a government that has done everything in its power to cause this disastrous situation. In fact, if we go back to September 1990, when it was becoming increasingly clear that we were in for a made-in-Canada recession, the government denied any responsibility, saying that this phenomenon was part of the usual economic cycle and that there was no cause for alarm.

To top it all, the government made the situation even worse in January 1991 when it introduced the infamous goods and services tax. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the GST is like an albatross around the neck of the Canadian economy. This tax has had the effect of discouraging consumer spending, the cornestone of any vigorous economic recovery.

The GST is also an incentive for Canadians to shop across the border in the United States, which has had a great impact on our tourism industry. The latest figures released by the Minister of Finance show that introducing the GST cost Canadian taxpayers $900 million.

On top of all that, the government completely ignored the major issues of the day in the budget tabled on February 26, namely national unity and the recession. Right in the middle of the recession, this budget provided for no assistance whatsoever for the 1.3 million unemployed and the half million people who have to rely on food banks.

This budget did nothing either to make Canada more competitive in the context of a global economy. No wonder that in its analysis the Toronto-Dominion Bank found that in economic terms the 1991 budget was the most absurd and destructive since the 1930s.

In their last budget the Conservatives did not pay any attention to the plight of the unemployed, acknowledging that the rate of unemployment would remain above 10 per cent for at least two more years. It contained no new job creation policy. Instead, the Minister of Finance cut the Canadian Jobs Strategy funding by $100 million while at the same time hiking employee UI contributions by 24 per cent and cutting regional development funding.

[English]

Today I have heard many speakers talk about the economy, which is a very important issue. I want to relate that to the local level. We have talked a lot about the national economy. I want to give you a perception of what is going on in Restigouche—Chaleur and then get away from that and give you maybe some possible solutions.

The Restigouche—Chaleur area is a natural resource based section of Canada. We have a major problem with the forestry industry, as you well know. We have a mill in Atholville, New Brunswick, that has closed its doors indefinitely. We have a committee in place now that is working furiously at trying to get it reopened. Maybe there will be a new investor or a new buyer. Maybe they can diversify the product and end up with an added value product.

The Dalhousie mill has been in operation for many years. It has gone through some renovation, but it again has had some lay-offs over the years. If we go back 10 years ago there were 1,500 employees in the woodlands and mill operations. Now it is down to less than 1,000. We see our sawmills in Kedgwick and in other parts of the riding suffering from down time and having some economic problems.

The mining industry in the riding is in a downturn position. In fact the Belledune fertilizer plant has been shut down, I am told, for a two-month period. There have been lay-offs at Brunswick mining. Over the years, if we look at the operations of the federal government through CN in the riding, at one point in time not too long ago we had well over 1,200 employees. We are down to less than 200 right there now. That all has an effect on the area.

The unemployment rate that we have heard so much about today and the figure that has been quoted has been the national figure. The figure in my riding is 18.5 per cent. That is unacceptable in this day and age. With that, I just want to mention some of the possible solutions that we could have and some of the things that are going on in the riding that are very positive. I want to mention a group of individuals who have got together and developed what they call an economic conference. The Nepisiguit economic conference was just held over a week ago after a two-year planning stage. They have developed through self-analysis a strategy to be implemented for that region to help put the region back on track.

[Translation]

I would like to use this opportunity to congratulate Ian Oliver and Gérald Mallais, co-chairmen of that conference on the economy in Nepisiguit. I would also like to congratulate the co-ordinator, Georges Marcoux, and his team for having organized this conference.

[English]

I should also say there is another group busy at work in another part of the riding with another economic conference. They also have co-presidents, Madam Luminas Senecal of Campbellton and the mayor of Dalhousie, Sandy MacLean, who are going to co-chair that economic conference. I wish them well.

There is a group of individuals that realizes there is a problem in the region and is ready to try to find a solution through self-analysis.

I want to mention specifically that I honestly believe there has to be a federal presence, not only in my riding but in every riding across Canada. I honestly believe that federal expenditure should be used as a tool for regional development. I also think we have to start developing programs and an attitude in government circles that will allow new positions to be developed in departments where there are new programs set up and where it requires new people to be hired. Those positions should be placed in areas of high unemployment, a decentralization of sort so to speak.

I would suspect that in Restigouche—Chaleur we should be looking at 200 new federal positions to help stimulate the economy and give some confidence back to the area. It would send a message to the entrepreneurs that want to invest in that area that the federal government is there and is ready to help out.

I would also like to mention in closing that we have heard a lot of solutions today. Some of them have been very good ones. I want to echo the comments of the hon. member for Willowdale who talked about municipal infrastructure. I believe quite strongly that it is a very useful and reasonable tool. The other area is new homes, reducing the down payment to 5 per cent and allowing people to use RRSP money to invest in those new homes.

In conclusion, when we look at the economy and the motion today we should just ask ourselves if we are actually better off now than we were in 1984. I guess the answer for my constituents is a plain no. I rest my case.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will just ask a very short question of my colleague for Restigouche—Chaleur.

I remember visiting New Brunswick about a year and a half ago. One of the things that I noticed when I was there was the tremendous tourism potential in the province of New Brunswick. We all know that tourism is probably one of the largest job creators in this country. I wonder if the hon. member could maybe take a minute or two and speak to the people of Canada—this is a national forum we are debating in today—about some of the tourism ideas and the potential that I know exist in his province.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Broadview—Greenwood for his question. I would like to say from the outset that in New Brunswick, like everywhere across Canada, Canadians are very proud people. They are not looking for handouts. There is a misconception out there that when we talk about hard times and unemployment the people just want to stick their hands out and say: "Give us some money and we will go away. We will be quiet about it".

What I am hearing out there and what I see with individuals coming into the office to talk to me is that they are all looking for work. They want to work. They want to be put to work.

It is the responsibility of the federal government to put people back to work, to develop programs. If they cannot develop programs, they should not be the government. It is as simple as that. It was this government that promised jobs, jobs, jobs. We do not have jobs, jobs, jobs. We have no jobs, no jobs and no jobs. That is the problem we are having right now.

As far as tourism is concerned, I believe like the hon. member that small business is the motor of the economy. It is up to the government again to stimulate that motor and make sure that there are oil and fuel for that motor. Right now it is working in reverse.

The government is not stimulating. There is no gas in the tank. One of the small businesses that can be developed is the tourism industry. I spoke about economic conferences a while ago in the riding. Those are two priorities of the economic conference that I spoke about. They are going to continue to be priorities.

It is a priority in the province of New Brunswick but we need a partnership. There has to be a partnership of the people, the municipal governments, the provincial governments and the federal government. People cannot do it alone. We have to take a full share, a full partnership in that job.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the motion of the Leader of the Opposition that condemns the government for economic mismanagement that has supposedly led to an intolerable and tragic level of unemployment and bankruptcy in Canada. I must tell you that when the Leader of the Opposition was Minister of Finance in 1981 the Bank of Canada rate stood at 22 per cent, whereas it is now 7.54 per cent. In August 1981 the prime rate was 22.75 per cent under his governance, whereas it now stands at 8 per cent.

At that time the mortgage rate for five years was 21.75 per cent and it is now 9.9 per cent. The rate for one year was 21.25 per cent then compared to 8.75 per cent now. All this to tell you that in spite of unfavourable conditions, we took the necessary steps to try to alleviate the recession and revitalize the economy.

Mr. Speaker, it requires a lot of courage on the part of my leader to take measures which will bring back prosperity to Canadians. As you know, we reached rock bottom with 12 per cent in the polls, but if we stopped talking about the Constitution and solved this problem, maybe interest rates would go down even more in a next week, perhaps even by 2 per cent.

We made important achievements since we took power, but nobody talks about those today. As far as the free trade agreement with the United States is concerned, some members opposite have said a moment ago that it was not beneficial to Canadians. I understand that there can be losers in this agreement or trade, but there are winners as well. I can tell you that my community, Drummondville, was chosen industrial city of the year in Quebec in 1991, and it is precisely because industry people and firms of my community did business with the United States and increased their trade with them.

There was also, as you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the tax reform and there was the much acclaimed removal of the 13.5 per cent tax that eroded our exports. Now you will see the positive side of the implementation of the new tax. There was also the deregulation and the privatization of several Crown corporations, and you will soon realize all the changes and the well-being it implies.

You saw the critics recently, the reduction of federal government expenditures, and the freeze in the public service. We were courageous enough to introduce similar systems which also—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member.

[English]

It being 5.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(15), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

Therefore the question in on the amendment of Ms. McLaughlin.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

[Translation]

CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992, laid upon the table Friday, November 22, 1991, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Loiselle moved that Bill C-47, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1991, be read the first time and printed.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Mr. Loiselle moved that the bill be read the second time and deemed referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be a predisposition of the House to apply the vote on the previous motion to the vote on this without taking the time of the House to stand.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, there was no consultation with the Bloc Quebecois on that vote.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I think it is clear to the House that no one was consulted. The chief government Whip got up on his own and offered the House an option to apply the votes and I think that should be considered.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order again. While there have been no consultations, I wonder if we would not find, considering the hour, that we could apply the vote we have just taken against the various clauses of the bill, including the reporting of the bill and including third reading.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. There seems to be general agreement.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

Bill deemed considered in committee.

Bill deemed reported without amendment.

Mr. Loiselle moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Arseneault that Bill C-211, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (temporary community service), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee A.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, again. There have been no consultations but the next aspect of our proceedings today would be to deal with private members' hour.

I wonder if the member whose motion is up for debate might agree to postponing until tomorrow at three o'clock any recorded division that might arise. That will leave members free this evening to pursue the schedules they had in mind.

Otherwise there will be a bell in 45 minutes and members would have to come back. It would depend on the wishes of the private member because it is private members' hour.

I wonder if the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur might agree to that kind of a deferral of votes if a recorded division is required.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would even withdraw the motion and refer the whole subject matter to committee. If I had the whole approval of the House, I would be willing to do that.

Mr. Hawkes: Certainly from a government point of view we would be happy to have the subject-matter referred to committee.

It is an important subject matter, and we would agree with that.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposition. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: And so ordered. Accordingly the order is discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject-matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: It being 6.43 o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.43 p.m.

SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the federal budget for social housing is inadequate, if we are to meet the needs of 1.25 million Canadian households, one-third of which are in Quebec.

According to the Front d'action populaire de réaménagement urbain du Québec, when Ottawa brings down its next budget it should drop the 15 per cent cut in funding for construction of low cost housing introduced in 1990. In the housing sector about 60 per cent of Quebec's budget for housing comes from the federal government.

Ottawa should undertake to build 20,000 units annually in this country, with 5,000 units for Quebec.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY CENTRE

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, Treasury Board's leaked decision to shut down our world renowned Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety on April 1, 1992, on April Fool's Day, is no joke.

It is not even black comedy. It is a tragedy which will cost lives, health and productivity. In addition to saving the health and lives of working Canadians, the centre is one clear way to establish working conditions that begin to deal with the dollar side of the cost equation represented by industrial accidents and sickness stemming from poorly understood hazards, et cetera. It pioneers in the development of safe, cost lowering working conditions.

What will closing accomplish? It will cost this government more to close the centre than to maintain previously promised financial co-operation until 1995 when the centre would be able to stand independently.

There would be $3 million in severance packages and close to $2 million in leases, just for starters. Additionally the loss in memberships and contracts undertaken in good faith with international bodies like the World Health Organization and the ILO is incalculable.

With work place productivity losses presently running at 17 per cent or 3 per cent of the GNP, this decision is so stunning that one must seriously question—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

HIGH SPEED TRAIN

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Québec-Est, a riding that happens to be at one end of the high speed train corridor, I wish to announce that I am delighted with my government's decision to proceed with a feasibility study that will consider the advantages of going ahead with the first high speed train project in this country.

My colleague, the Minister of Transport, and his counterparts at Transport Ontario and Transport Quebec, have taken the necessary steps to move ahead with a project that happens to be one of the most exciting projects being considered in Canada today, as well as a first for North America.

This decision follows a recommendation by the Carmann-Bujold report to conduct a more thorough study before a decision is made either to go ahead or scrap the project.

We should also realize that the Quebec–Windsor corridor is one of 23 potential corridors in North America.

Because of the very short speaking time I am allowed at this point in our proceedings, I cannot expand on this very important issue. However, not long ago I made a speech on the same subject, and copies are available at my office to anyone who is interested.

SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has spoken glowingly, eloquently and frequently about sustainable development. Yet one year after tabling the green plan the government has failed to take one concrete step toward integrating environmental and economic decision making.

If the Prime Minister understands and means what he says about sustainable development, a proposal for an economic union would never have been tabled without a parallel environmental union being fully integrated. The government would not be negotiating a trilateral trade deal, a clearly economic agreement, without making it also an environmental agreement.

I ask the Prime Minister, therefore, either to make a clear statement to the House on what he means and what he intends to do about sustainable development or to stop pretending.

CANADA COUNCIL

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, there are many dimensions to the unity of Canada. In fact the very diversity of the Canadian identity is an important source of our nation's strength.

The Canada Council expresses that precept extremely well in its quest to spawn excellence in our cultural communities. In its peer jury process to inspire and recognize national and artistic standards of the highest order, the council applies the total Canadian perspective. It is not enough to merely excel in your own region or province or even in your own artistic sector. You must stand the competitive test among all Canadians to merit the critical and discriminatory support for which the Canada Council is noted.

It believes that it is in the celebration of all cultural identities throughout this entire country that we shall realize the richness of the Canadian potential.

If our diverse cultural expressions constitute the soul of our nationhood, as so many Canadians believe, then the Canada Council is surely one of the most important institutions in the pursuit of our national destiny.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on November 24, 1989 a resolution was passed in this Chamber committing this government to eliminate child poverty in Canada by the year 2000.

Just a year ago the Prime Minister signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child which among other things bound all signatories to reduce poverty by the end of 1990.

In the Hamilton Spectator today it was reported that more than 1,550 children would be looking to the Good Shepherd Centre this Christmas for food and clothing. This is a 105 per cent increase over last year.

A number of constituents have written to me asking why the Conservative government has not acted on any of these resolutions. Why has the Prime Minister forgotten about Canada's children?

I urge this government to make one final resolution this year, a New Year's resolution that will stop making promises it cannot keep, and that it will enact the Canada 2000 proposal and ratify the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Canada's children deserve at least that much.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, with the apparent dismantlement of the Soviet Union last weekend a startling fact is starting to dawn on Canadians. Canada looks like it will emerge as one of the biggest countries in the world with the failure of the U.S.S.R. and its breakup into smaller units.

I think this should give all of us reason to pause and reflect on Canada. Here we are a huge nation with a small and favoured population and with the second highest standard of living in the world. We are resource rich. We speak two world-class languages. We have social programs that our U.S. neighbours would kill for.

Given all this, how can reasonable Canadians contemplate throwing it away? But that is exactly what separatists in Quebec are doing and that is what regionalists in the rest of the country are willing to contemplate when they say, as Preston Manning did, that we should deal with Quebec with "benign indifference".

Well, this is one Canadian who wants to be neither benign nor indifferent and my country, one of the largest on earth, is worth fighting for.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, as this sitting of Parliament draws to a close I urge the Prime Minister to agree to a meeting on the economy with the provincial premiers.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that he would only have such a meeting if the premiers agreed not to complain about the economy. "No whining allowed", said the Prime Minister. He wants the premiers to say that he and his government have been doing just a great job and that the economy has no problems.

I can only hope that the Prime Minister was joking. If the economy is in such great shape, why does he think the premiers want such a meeting in the first place?

• (1410)

Cape Breton has an unemployment rate of over 30 per cent and during this past year we have had a record number of business bankruptcies. Cape Bretoners are very concerned that the new year may bring more of the same.

I urge the Prime Minister to meet with the premier of Nova Scotia and others to work at fixing the economic disaster that has been created under his government.

GREEN PLAN

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the green plan is well under way. We have started the changes that are needed to make sustainable development a fact of life in this country. We must now keep up the good work. The federal government will maintain the partnership it initiated with Canadians. In order to build on the successes we have achieved so far, $400 million have been earmarked for 1992-93.

We must also continue the implementation of current projects. The government will introduce new initiatives very shortly, and it will concentrate on changing decision-making processes at all levels of our society. Furthermore, the government will continue to actively promote sustainable development in various international organizations.

We are firmly resolved to implement Canada's green plan from a to z. It is an action plan that looks to the future and at the same time focuses on protecting our Canadian heritage.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY CENTRE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, according to an internal memo the Minister of Labour has been directed by Treasury Board to close down the highly respected Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, unless of course labour and business can come up with over $1.5 million by the middle of next month, a highly doubtful prospect given the made-in-Canada recession caused by this government.

Among other things the minister has been told to present, and I quote:

> The names of the chairman and committee members in charge of closing down the CCOHS—plan to terminate contracts with employees and clients, and, a statement of total costs and draft the official announcement on the closure.

One year ago this House supported my private member's bill to reinstate funding to the centre. It has failed to act on that recommendation.

Has the Minister of Labour become a willing hatchet man for Treasury Board, or will it support a national centre whose programs save the lives of working men and women in this country?

STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Student Loans Program is in trouble. It needs change. The amounts available are stuck at 1984 levels, while tuition and other costs have increased dramatically, largely due to this government's policies.

Some universities have even started food banks for students. The provincial education ministers want change. They want the federal government to act now, as it must act, to permit consultation and finalization of a new program by the end of January. If not, changes will be delayed for yet another year. Meanwhile the government seeks in consultations across the country to convince Canadians that education is crucial to our future prosperity.

What better way to convince them to act. Even now, even after seven years of inaction, a new student loans program would at least be a start.

VOLUNTEER SERVICE MEDAL

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Volunteer Service Medal for Korea is not a medal of honour but is a service medal. It is being sent by mail to those veterans who apply for it and are qualified by their Korean service in the traditional way.

That is the way the service medals for the First World War and Second World War were sent. That is still the way the Department of Veterans Affairs sent replacement medals which fall within its jurisdiction, and that is the way the Office of the Governor General of Canada is sending the Canadian Volunteer Service Medal for Korea. That is also the method agreed to by the president of the Korean Veterans Association of Canada, as indicated in a recently released newsletter I hold here.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has sent a letter to all, outlining procedures for arranging more formal ceremonies. I suggest the member for Hillsborough refer to that letter. As well, the hon. member for Hillsborough has certainly been the critic for veterans affairs long enough to know medal application procedures.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of the Environment admitted that budgets and policies are not assessed for their environmental impact.

Government policy statements do contain the right buzzwords but they lack in substance. For instance, the Department of External Affairs just produced a paper on foreign policy. It reads well until the conclusion that Canada cannot afford to be a leader in the environment.

And why? Because of the false assumption by this government that the environment and the economy are separate. Because of this outdated thinking, Canada has steadily fallen behind in the development of efficient and competitive industrial and environmental technologies. Unfortunately this government still fails to understand and practise sustainable development.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I am impressed by the ingenuity of retail merchants in border towns who are finding inventive ways to keep local shoppers at home.

I have with me the first issue of a publication from the National Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping called Cross-Border Bulletin. This publication acknowledges that while cross-border shopping persists as a menacing threat to business, Canadians have already proven they can compete with and outperform their stiffest competition.

I want to share my pride in the merchants of Erie who are no strangers to American competition. In Port Colborne the Community Futures Program and the Community Business Network joined with the Chamber of Commerce and the Downtown Development Board to present a seminar entitled "Service Excellence" to 17 businesses as well as students from the business courses of the two local high schools.

I congratulate all border communities that are meeting the challenge head on, and I have every confidence that Canadian business will emerge stronger for the effort.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister once again refused to call a first ministers' conference on the economy. He said that his government intended to stick with its policies and that the premiers had no choice but to follow suit and shut up. My question to the Prime Minister is this: If his policies are so good, why did we lose 49,000 jobs last month in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition is completely false. I said nothing of the sort, nothing.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister made a statement somewhere and I would like to quote what he said on confidence in the economy.

The Prime Minister said outside the House, on the stairs: "We have got a plan of action. That is the way the government is going to go. The premiers are either in or they are out. If they have some better ideas they can bloody well tell us what they are".

I would like to say to the Prime Minister that there are 1.4 million people out of jobs in Canada who want to have an answer from this government. They do not like this "my way or no way" that the Prime Minister always uses. The Canadian people know very well that the Prime Minister cannot lecture anybody on the economic life of this country.

I want to ask the Prime Minister why he does not do the right thing and call a conference right away.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, whether he says it in English or French, his statement was false. The Leader of the Opposition began by saying that I had refused to call a first ministers' conference on the economy. That statement is false.

Mr. Tobin: Are you announcing one?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend asks if I am announcing one. If the Leader of the Opposition had kept reading the transcript he would have found out that I will announce a decision after the Minister of Finance has met with his fellow ministers of finance, as I have said from the very beginning.

I have been meeting with all of the first ministers. I have had very good meetings with the first ministers on the economy.

They asked a question, and I am trying to answer it. Most of the first ministers have expressed an interest in a meeting, provided that meeting was not a session of whining and complaining. They do not want to participate in that kind of nonsense. I do not want to hold that kind of session because I do not believe it would be helpful.

• (1420)

As I have indicated from the very beginning, the Minister of Finance will meet with his colleagues over two days and will make a recommendation to me pursuant to those meetings as to the advisability of holding a conference. If his view is positive, I would be happy to convene a meeting of the first ministers in Ottawa and get the benefit of their views on how we can improve the economic situation in their provinces and across Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am happier with the answer today because yesterday his own friend, the premier of Nova Scotia, the member from Pictou County, Mr. Cameron, said that he was peeved by the attitude of the Prime Minister. I know that in the legion halls of Nova Scotia they have used another word.

I just want to ask the Prime Minister why he does not change his attitude and think about these unemployed people who want everybody to work together in Canada today.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one thing I try to avoid is a peeved person from Pictou. I have a great relationship, as we all have, with Premier Cameron who is doing a tremendous job down there.

An hon. member: Get serious.

Mr. Mulroney: The Liberal member from Cape Breton says: "Get serious". He is contradicting his leader who has just implied that Premier Cameron is doing a tremendous job down there, and I agree with that. I look forward to meeting with Premier Cameron and his colleagues across the country to improve the economic situation in Canada. I look forward to hearing their ideas.

I think there would be general recognition in Canada that where we should not expect any ideas—I expect some from the premiers and I look forward to it—is from the Liberal Party in Ottawa.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Public Accounts of Canada for 1991 were tabled in this House yesterday, but the Auditor General of Canada is holding back on full approval because he says: "The government has used improper accounting methods, methods that artificially deflate the 1991 deficit by some $2 billion".

I ask the minister: Why is the government using phoney accounting practices? Why is the government not coming clean with Canadians? Why is the government cooking the books?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I was somehow kind of hoping that the hon. member would give this House the opportunity to hear the statement for the first time, but I read it in the paper this morning so I expected this question.

The hon. member will know that for 14 of the last 15 years the Auditor General of Canada has always had some sort of reservations. This year, if the hon. member goes to the trouble of reading his report attentively, he accuses us in some instances not of using the wrong numbers but the accounting method, he says. In some cases we overstate certain amounts and in other instances we understate them.

I think on balance we disagree of course with certain aspects of the accounting, but I believe we are prepared to stand by our number.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance because I would like to have a serious answer this time.

In 1988 the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants recommended that the government modify its accounting conventions and practices in order to measure and present the deficits and debt accurately and in the same way from one fiscal year to the next. So far the government has done nothing.

Does the Minister of Finance intend to accept the accounting methods proposed by the professionals? In his budget next February, will he finally adopt modern efficient accounting methods?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I can say that the government uses such methods.

Of course, one can disagree about the actuarial evaluation of some projections. That happens, by the way. Even two auditing firms will not agree with each other sometimes. But we are very careful about using the most modern state of the art actuarial methods and I must say that our evaluation is quite consistent with the one we had in the budget.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I have here just a partial list of all the lay-offs that have taken place in 1991. There are hundreds and hundreds of companies. There are thousands and thousands of employees. Today we learn about a possible major lay-off in a GM plant of 3,700. Retail stores are closing. More and more people are out of work. Every day families are suffering.

I want to say to the Minister of Finance—surely he does not need to wait any longer—please tell the Prime Minister to hold a first ministers' conference on the economy and get people back to work.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the first thing the hon. Leader of the NDP might do is appeal to her leader in Ontario to stop putting road-blocks in front of a recovery out of recession, as the president of the Ford Motor Company said the other day.

I recognize the difficulty and the hurt that is going out there, but I think it is important to maintain a balanced perspective. She talks about the free trade agreement and the GST, but I have to tell her that in the last year or so these are the firms that have closed their operations in the United States and have transferred their operations to Canada: Canadian Thermos Products, Scarborough, Ontario; Gandalf Technologies, Nepean, Ontario; Huron Cable, Waterloo, Ontario; Hughes Aircraft, Midland, Ontario; InterCity Products, Brantford, Ontario; Kodak Canada, Toronto, Ontario; Keeprite Incorporation, Brantford, Ontario.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly congratulate the Minister of Finance on naming all those wonderful companies that are moving to Ontario, and we know why.

I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Economists everywhere are questioning the economic policies of this government and are crying out for change. I want to say to the Prime Minister that the anger and fury we have seen across the country are very quickly turning to despair, fear and hopelessness.

In fact I can quote from letters that I receive every day. I received one just yesterday from a man who was laid off at his work. He states: "I have worked in the construction trade for 10 years. It is hopeless. I cannot get a job. I cannot hold my head up high".

I want to say to the Prime Minister: rather than simply talking about people who are whining, these people who are laid off are not whining. They are feeling a sense of hopelessness. I call on the Prime Minister himself. Will he call a first ministers' conference on the economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we are going through some very difficult times, but I have not found any knowledgeable person who has suggested we should change course.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that even the treasurer of the province of Ontario would recommend such an alteration of course.

What is in fact occurring, and the OECD reported today, is that there is genuine sluggishness in the world economy. The OECD has reduced its growth projections by three-quarters of 1 per cent to an average growth rate in the industrialized world of some 2.2 per cent. They have adjusted the Japanese growth rate from 3.5 per cent to 2.5 per cent and the United States down to 2.2 per cent. Canada is part of the globalized economy. Canada is part of the global trading area and we cannot isolate ourselves. Therefore, we have put in place a program, a plan that will alleviate the inflationary pressures, that will keep interest rates down and that is the best approach to sustainable growth with price stability.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister is unwilling or unable to bring the nations's first ministers together to discuss constructively a situation that is so tragic for so many families in Canada, he should seriously consider retiring. I would ask the Prime Minister to use the time he has left to show leadership and compassion and to call a first ministers' conference to implement policies that will give new hope to families across the country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already said many times that I just completed a series of meetings with the premiers across the country.

The Minister of Finance will meet his finance colleagues for two days starting on the 12th of this month. After that, he will advise me on the usefulness of holding a first ministers' conference on the economy.

Several premiers have already said publicly that they would not want to attend such a meeting if the purpose was simply to blame Ottawa, because they approve of the Canadian government's over-all policies. But we will decide to hold such a meeting, and I will be pleased to call one, if we can have interesting ideas from the premiers. I will ask for specific ideas. To date, our policies have produced the lowest inflation rate in 20 years, the lowest interest rates in 18 years, and the highest growth rate in the industrialized world today. In a difficult environment, I think we must admit that is not so bad. Indeed it is very good for Canada.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today the subcommittee on poverty intended to release its long awaited report on child poverty. Instead, the Prime Minister has pre-empted the report so that he can have a photo opportunity, surrounded by children during the signing of the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister when he intends to stop the rhetoric, stop manipulating children and start acting on the real problems of child poverty.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is sad on the day that the Prime Minister will sign the convention on the rights of children to have that kind of question.

I would appreciate if the member would recognize the role the Prime Minister played last year at the summit and will play this afternoon signing the convention. I would hope that the member from Manitoba would recognize that the Prime Minister committed himself last year to signing the convention and he will do that this afternoon.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, in October of last year the then minister of health and welfare was declared minister responsible for children. He took the occasion to make firm commitments to a national child care program that he said would enable families to work their way out of poverty.

That minister was set aside, his promises were forgotten and poor children in Canada were once again forsaken by this government.

I ask the new Minister of National Health and Welfare to offer Canadians a reason why his soon to be announced strategy on children should be viewed as anything but yet another heartless political ploy by this government.

Is there any more room on the Tory shelf of broken promises?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is always impressive to see the opposition playing politics with children.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, as long as we have poverty for children in this country, I will do my best to correct the situation.

This member and her colleagues have asked me many times when the government will finally sign the convention on the rights of children. It will be done this afternoon, and I hope that all members of the House, without any partisanship, will recognize that what is important today for all the children of Canada is that we will sign the convention.

The convention recognizes that all Canadian children have rights. This is a great step forward for the future of this country. I would hope that members will applaud all those children who are in the House today.

There are 36 children representing all the children of Canada. I would hope that the member would admit that something today is good and positive for the children of Canada.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister or the minister of health.

This Christmas 284,000 children will go hungry. In Montreal alone, it will be 50,000; in Toronto, it will be 60,000; and in my own small city of Winnipeg, it will be 10,000.

Today the Prime Minister will ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. What measures will the Prime Minister take to also ensure the right of Canada's poor children not to go hungry this Christmas is guaranteed?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of this House will agree that as long as there are children in Canada who are living in poverty, we must do everything we can so that the government and society in general can take care of these children.

We all deplore the existence of food banks. However, I think we must be realistic, and I imagine everyone will agree that it takes time to turn the situation around. In fact, it has existed for some time, and I think there were food banks when the hon. member's party was in power.

However, as I said before in English all Canadians should be glad to see the results of the work done by the Prime Minister of Canada at last year's summit in New York. This afternoon he will make good on his commitment to sign the convention on children's rights, and I hope that all members of this House will appreciate that fact.

POVERTY

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The current struggle to have the basic necessities of food and shelter is reaping its devastating effect on Canadians in the north.

Northerners for the first time are now forced to establish dependencies on food banks, and there are school children who share their lunch with those who are coming to school hungry.

What is the minister prepared to do with the conditions of poverty in this country so grim that people are walking homeless and hungry at minus 47?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that question is the same as the one I answered before.

Once again, I said that we are very sensitive to the problem of poverty, particularly for children and people who the hon. member represents. I know very well that where we have one poor child in the country, in native communities we have two.

I know and I recognize that very well. In the strategy that I will put forward, I want to put particular emphasis on the aboriginal people and the problem of poverty for children.

SOCIAL CHARTER

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the European Community adopted a social charter. The Prime Minister often cites the European Community as an example for the direction in which the world is going.

Will he now acknowledge that the time has come for Canada to adopt a social charter to define the principles and the values we share and to protect the institutions and programs that reflect those principles and values?

• (1440)

Will he undertake today to raise the issue of a social charter with the premiers in future constitutional discussions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the issue has been raised in very general terms by the premier of the province of Ontario. I can arrange for the hon. member to speak to the premier of Ontario if that would be helpful.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Well, I will not do that if it is not desired.

What I think is needed now is some detail from those provinces and others that are interested in a social charter. I think it would be helpful to have that come before the special joint committee so there will be a specific proposal that can be looked at by the special joint committee and upon which recommendations can be made to this House and to the country.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In signing the UN Declaration on the Rights of the Child today, the Prime Minister will accept the principle that "the essential needs of children should be given high priority in the allocation of resources in bad times as well as in good times".

"In bad times as well as in good times", the principle of first call.

I want to ask the Prime Minister why he is being so inconsistent. If he is so committed to the over one million poor children in Canada, why is his government so consistently attacking the social programs upon which they rely for their very survival?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada spends, I think, in excess of $15 billion a year at the moment in looking after children in various ways.

Reforms to the tax system that we have brought about have favoured the working poor. My hon. friend is shaking his head. The fact of the matter is that all of the tax changes have been designed to help working families and the working poor. I think that is pretty obvious and is recognized by experts. There is nothing inconsistent at all with anything that is taking place except this. My hon. friend says food banks. No, that is wrong.

The minister of health just said it properly, when one child in a country like Canada is in poverty, that is one child too many. What we are working toward by trying to restructure the economy to build new wealth is to have more genuine resources so that we can distribute them to people in need, beginning with children. The declaration this afternoon is pursuant to an international convention on behalf of children, which benefits children. I will be damned if I can figure out why the NDP and the Liberals are making partisan shots at something so important as the welfare of children.

CHILD POVERTY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons why Liberals are raising this question is because UNICEF itself has said that Canada's proportion of children living below the poverty line has increased over the past couple of years. That is from the United Nations itself.

That's false? If the Prime Minister is still learning how to read, he should start reading that report.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The Chair has been fairly patient on this subject. I would like the attention of the House, please. The Chair has been fairly patient on this exchange. However, I am now asking members to put questions and I am asking ministers to do the very best they can to answer. I do not think we are advancing the cause everybody seems to be so excited about by some of the conduct in the Chamber.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister signed the declaration last year, every world government committed to putting forward a clear plan of action by the end of 1991. We do not yet have a plan of action.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. In the next 24 hours, before this House closes, will the government table its plan of action to deal with the problem of children?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the plan of action will be tabled in the House around February or March.

The reason is very simple. We live in a federation where we are trying to be in line with all the provinces. In the case of children, I think the positions of the provinces have to be put all together, which has not been easy even for the convention because the convictions are not the same all across the country.

I can assure the member that within the next two or three months we will put in front of the House of Commons a plan of action dealing with children and I believe we will do what is necessary to help all children of Canada.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on my supplementary let me go back to the Prime Minister.

When he signed that declaration Canada committed additional resources, close to $350 million, to a world action plan. In the meantime we have cut back our ODA budgets.

I ask the Prime Minister this: Would he endorse the idea of using those funds withheld from countries with unacceptable human rights records, such as the $30 million we withheld from Indonesia, and direct that money to programs to address children's poverty around the world?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are going to make and will continue to make very substantial contributions to children both in Canada and around the world.

Our immunization programs for the Commonwealth and the Francophonie are regarded as a model for the world. Our contribution to children's programs at the United Nations is, I believe, second to none. In fact I think with a population that is 31st in the world, Canada ranks fourth or fifth in the entire world in the size of its contributions to the United Nations and its agencies, and that is a record without parallel.

That has improved over the last number of years so we will be happy to.

My hon. friend says there has been a reduction in ODA. That is wrong. There has been an increase in ODA and there has been an increase in the programs to children, both in Canada and throughout the world.

We have not done enough. We acknowledge that. There are children at risk here in Canada for reasons of poverty, for sexual abuse, and this is an important societal problem that requires the efforts and the enlightened leadership of members of all parties. This is the one question that surely ought to be free from partisanship.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last week the Auditor General reported that the federal government advanced $13 million to Cape Breton Wall Coverings, a company whose activities were such that the provincial government refused to grant it the necessary environmental certificates required to operate.

[Translation]

On this first anniversary of the green plan, how can the government justify grants to companies that violate the environmental laws of this country?

[English]

Why in a country that desperately wants to embrace sustainable development and is looking for leadership is the federal government going the other way by funding companies that break the law of the land?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as far as the specific case is concerned, the hon. member will not be surprised at all if I say to him that I will have to look into that matter. I do not have the information here at hand; neither am I expected to have the information about a company that received a grant in Cape Breton.

I will be happy to look into that matter.

First of all, the compliance to environmental regulations on a local level is something of provincial jurisdiction, but that being the case I would be happy to look into the matter.

He refers to the green plan. I would be curious to know whether this is a matter that was dealt with before or after the green plan.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, there can be no better example of the lack of accountability or of the unconsciousness of this government that this item was raised in the Auditor General's report over a week ago.

Surely to God the little hacks that the minister has around him could pick that up.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the question gets much worse. The Auditor General said that the government knew about the problem. The company has now gone into receivership. The depression is very clear. Can the minister think of a better example of why bad environmentalism is also bad economics? Does the government not have enough problem with hazardous waste sites—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1450)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): It is difficult to try to draw a question from the statement made by the member. It seemed incoherent to me, Mr. Speaker.

Let me point one thing out about a comment that was made by the member. He alludes to the Auditor General's report and some complications around the Auditor General's report. If he goes back to the same report on the chapter on the environment, he will also find that the Auditor General notes that his remarks were made before the green plan was implemented.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in a precedent setting announcement the B.C. government said it is ready to negotiate and settle land claims in that province. Last week the minister of Indian affairs appeared to place a roadblock in the way of negotiations by demanding a cost sharing agreement to be in place with the province as a precondition to those land claim negotiations.

In view of the B.C. minister's very positive response yesterday to the B.C. First Nations task force, is the minister willing to drop his precondition so that negotiations of the B.C. land claim can proceed as quickly as possible?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I want to, together with all members of this House, commend the Government of the province of British Columbia for its recognition that this historic injustice of some 120 years of denying the existence of aboriginal rights and title in British Columbia has now been addressed by the government of that province and that it has joined with us in agreeing to establish a treaty commission, together with the leadership of British Columbia First Nations, to get on with negotiating honourable settlements to these matters.

I think it is also obvious that the people of British Columbia will benefit more than all other Canadians from the settlement of these matters and that British Columbia must share in the roles and responsibilities that both governments must bring to the table in this process.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his response, but I think he is aware that negotiating a cost sharing agreement with the province of B.C. could be a time consuming process, complicated by references to the courts. It could take a long time. As the minister has already indicated, it has taken 123 years to date.

Would the minister be willing to begin land claims negotiations immediately if the province were to agree to a framework agreement for discussing sharing of the costs prior to negotiations?

Mr. Speaker: I point out that the question may be out of order, but the hon. minister may want to deal with it.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): If I may, Mr. Speaker, now that the British Columbia government has stated its position and the minister has expressed his willingness to sit down and discuss this matter, I am certainly looking forward to discussions next week. I look forward to the co–operation of the British Columbia government in recognizing its responsibilities in this matter.

TAXATION

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last June the minister indicated in the House his willingness to consider ways of making the tax system fair and equitable, particularly as it relates to Canadian families. Since then the Schachtschneider family has lost its case in the courts and many other families are looking in dismay at a tax system which discriminates against them.

Can the minister tell us when he will do something to ensure that the tax system treats all families equally?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the very good work that the hon. member and other members of Parliament, and particularly members of the Conservative Party, are engaged in on this very important subject.

I want to assure him that the recommendations that have been advanced are being taken seriously. We are looking at them right now. I am sure that we can derive some positive conclusions from the recommendations that are forthcoming.

All I say is congratulations and we hope that together we will be able to improve this situation.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

A year ago critics were warning that the introduction of the GST would fuel the underground economy as businesses scrambled to avoid paying the tax. That perception is certainly being fuelled now by those same critics.

I ask the minister to tell the House, now that we have had almost a year of GST, if the underground economy is expanding. If so, is the GST responsible for it and, if so, what is he going to do about it?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, it was this government that had the courage to scrap the old outdated federal manufacturers' sales tax because of the impediment that it had on Canadian competitiveness.

We predicted, based on the tax roll, registration of between 1.4 million and 1.6 million registrants for the new value added tax known as the GST.

I am sure that all hon. members will be pleased to know that as of last month there were 1,727,975 registrants, confirming the New Zealand experience that much of the underground economy, not all of it but much of it, has come up from underground, taken advantage of the write-offs and the input tax credit for the benefit of Canada's competitiveness and Canada's economy.

POVERTY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

It is hard to believe that metropolitan Toronto has been reduced to a city where one in five Torontonians live below the poverty line and over half of the city's homeless happen to be children.

I ask the minister: Why has this government been so indifferent to this colossal economic tragedy and when can Toronto expect federal initiatives to stimulate an area of the country that is indispensable for our national economic prosperity and reverse a social face that is becoming uglier by the day?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have several housing initiatives that are in place. One of the best ways to stimulate housing is to bring interest rates down and keep them down. That is clearly the most important way.

Mr. Marchi: But people aren't working, Don.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if he wants to ask me that question, I will answer that question as well.

The fact of the matter is that one of the bright spots in the Canadian economy is the investment in the housing sector which has increased by 17.2 per cent in the third quarter and that has brought housing starts in the month of October to 204,000, a 17-month high. That should be encouragement for everyone.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I must submit to the Minister of Finance that if he is doing his very best then I think his very best is no longer good enough for Canadians.

This month, Toronto will reach a very depressing milestone: 100,000 welfare cases. The commissioner of Toronto's community services department says: "We are probably about where we were in the winter of 1938-39".

My question for the Minister of Finance: When will this government act on this serious crisis and bring back much needed hope to the people of Toronto?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are going through some difficult times. The recovery is certainly not as buoyant as we had expected, nor as buoyant as we would like. That is reflected as well in the global conditions.

As we just learned a few minutes ago, the OECD has revised downward its growth projections from 2.9 per cent to 2.2 per cent on average. The U.S. economy has been adjusted downward from 2.9 per cent to 2.2 per cent. Canada's outlook is still very promising according to the OECD and others because we have a plan. We are staying the course. We will continue to stay that course because that will provide the long-term basis for prosperity.

TAXATION

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

In 1980 the PQ governement introduced a payroll tax in Quebec. In its last budget the federal government made it clear that it would no longer allow companies to deduct provincial capital and payroll taxes from their federal income tax.

My question is this: Today, in view of the state of the economy in this country, is the Minister of Finance prepared to reverse this decision for the benefit of companies in Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, we took advantage of a meeting with the Conseil du patronat on Monday this week to discuss the matter.

We understand the concerns of Quebecers, Ontarians, and other Canadians in this respect. I can inform the hon. member that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, is reviewing this question and that he may have some news for us when he meets with his provincial counterparts.

TRADE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade.

Recently the Eddy Match Company of Canada had two truckloads of commercial matches stopped by American customs at Buffalo because the made-in-Canada logo was not located underneath each commercial name on each package of matches and in the same size lettering as the commercial message itself.

What a lot of balderdash. Why did the government not insist on having this silly regulation changed instead of walking away from it before signing a free trade agreement at any price and thereby putting many Canadian industries and jobs in jeopardy?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about the particular case, but I will certainly take it up with our department and get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this non-tariff barrier is a blatant act of bad faith in the U.S. in light of the free trade agreement. For several Canadian industries this has become an irritant which was not a problem before.

What is the government going to do now to correct this horrendous non-tariff U.S. customs regulation which this government willingly, if not irresponsibly, adopted when it signed the free trade agreement?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure that this has to do with the free trade agreement. If it is particularly a problem with respect to printing, we will take it up with the department concerned and I will get back to the hon. member.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On the weekend we heard in connection with Air Canada that the Minister of Transport, who has special responsibility for the Montreal area, had no intention of stopping the wholesale transfer of skilled jobs from Montreal to Toronto. Will the minister stop washing his hands of the matter and start saving the few jobs left at Air Canada in Montreal?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the hon. member for Longueuil is that he should not start false rumours. There are absolutely no plans for Air Canada to move any part of its headquarters out of Montreal.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: That concludes Question Period.

I have a ruling that I must give at this time and I have two points of order which I will deal with in a moment.

An hon. member: Questions of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: An hon. member thinks they are questions of privilege. I will speak to the hon. member in a moment, but in the meantime I have a draft ruling which ought to be given.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR TIMISKAMING—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: After having co-operated with the Chair and twice postponing his question of privilege, the hon. member for Timiskaming rose on Tuesday, December 3, 1991, to protest certain comments made in the House by the hon. member for Sudbury in an exchange which took place during Question Period on Thursday, November 28, 1991.

On that date, the hon. member for Sudbury asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works a question concerning the termination of a contract for the construction of a veterans affairs building in Kirkland Lake.

The parliamentary secretary responded, and then in a supplementary the hon. member for Sudbury put the question:

> I want to know the real reason behind this nonsense. Is it because the owner of the second site and the member for Timiskaming just happen to be brothers-in-law?

That was denied by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works.

The Debates show that someone then shouted out: "It sure helped the brother-in-law" and another hon. member said: "All in the family".

[Translation]

As I explained to the House on Tuesday last, I am concerned not only with the question raised by the hon. member for Sudbury but also with the mood that was created by that question. The Chair has to decide whether that question and those comments are merely out of order or whether they constitute a question of privilege.

[English]

The hon. member for Timiskaming was given quite a full opportunity on Tuesday last to respond to what he termed "allegations which have caused damage to myself, my family and the riding of Timiskaming".

The hon. member for Sudbury, for her part, has stated in response to the member for Timiskaming, and this is important, and I quote: "I do not for one minute infer any wrongdoing on the part of the hon. member, absolutely none".

Our jurisprudence is fairly clear in this regard. There has been no direct charge against the hon. member for Timiskaming raised by the hon. member for Sudbury and any inference to this effect has been categorically denied by the hon. member for Sudbury.

On the narrow issue then of whether a question of privilege can be found on this basis, the Chair cannot decide in the affirmative.

[Translation]

There is, however, a more troubling aspect to this whole matter. It lingers and has a suffocating effect on fair exchange in this place. That is that once certain words are uttered, it is very difficult to retract them. The hon. member for Timiskaming referred in his comments the other day to the hurt that the remarks made in the Chamber had caused him, his family and his constituents and he pleaded that in fairness: "We should once and for all be able to clear such allegations and not allow them to happen".

[English]

In coming to a decision on this question of privilege, the Chair is somewhat consoled by the fact that an opportunity to clear the issue has taken place. Prevention is more difficult to address. When certain words are uttered in this place, they receive wide and instant dissemination. Quite frankly, they leave an impression. The words may later be retracted, the inferences or offence the occasion caused may be withdrawn, denied, explained away, or apologized for. However, the impression is not always as easily erased.

The Chair has on numerous occasions in the past urged hon. members to respect the conventions and traditions of this place and to conduct themselves with the civility becoming representatives of their constituents. That type of civilized conduct should encompass not only interventions in debate but also questioning, statements and even those types of comments usually attributed in the official Debates to: "some hon. members".

[Translation]

The Chair wishes to emphasize that a major element of this civilized conduct consist in refraining from personal attacks. There is good reason for this. First of all, in a general sense, respect for the person is the building block upon which our society is structured. Second, few things can more embitter the mood of the House than a series of personal attacks, for in their wake they leave a residue of animosity and unease.

[English]

Accordingly the prohibition against personal attacks in our Chamber is fundamental to maintaining order in this House. That is why my predecessors and I have so frequently in the past interrupted when personal attack seemed imminent.

However, while the Chair is granted many powers, it is not omniscient and cannot predict what course debate or questioning or interventions will take. Accordingly, in the final analysis the Chair must depend on the responsible attitude of each hon. member.

[Translation]

Statements are made here to attract attention: the attention of the House, the attention of one's constituents, the attention of the media and the public at large. It is simply disingenuous to pretend that members do not realize the potential impact of their words on the audience they reach.

[English]

The Chair can devise no strategy, however aggressive or interventionist, and can imagine no codification, however comprehensive or strict, that will as successfully protect the Canadian parliamentary traditions that we cherish as will each member's sense of justice and fair play. Especially at this time of crisis of confidence in our parliamentary institutions, our constituents deserve and will tolerate no less.

• (1510)

I should tell the hon. member I already have two points of order. I will get to the hon. member as soon as I can.

I think I will hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and will decide whether it is privilege or order. I will hear the hon. member.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on an incident that occurred during Question Period, which I took to be very serious.

During the course of my asking a question on child poverty, the Prime Minister responded with very unparliamentary language. It was language that I would refuse to repeat to the House.

The Prime Minister was given notice during Question Period that this point of order was going to be raised. It is unfortunate that the Prime Minister could not have stayed and listened to your remarks on the last point of order.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am asking for the assistance of all hon. members.

Hon. members have constantly breached the rules of this House this afternoon. It is impossible for the Chair to hear it all. I have asked the House to steady down. I am asking each hon. member to do so.

The hon. member will continue, and there is no need for editorializing today.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask that the Prime Minister withdraw his unparliamentary remarks as heard by this side during Question Period.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of what remarks the hon. member is talking about.

When we see the "blues", I am aware of—

An hon. member: It has nothing to do with the "blues".

Mr. Andre: Hon. members opposite are not allowing me to make my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You heard it too.

Mr. Speaker: An hon. member just said that this point has nothing to do with the "blues".

I probably will have to look at the "blues" before I can respond to the point the hon. member is making. In the meantime, the hon. member has put forward his question of privilege. It is not at all difficult to find what the exchange was.

The hon. government House leader is answering in response in the absence of the Prime Minister. I ask hon. members to hear the government House leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I think your comments earlier in respect to another question of privilege were well taken. Perhaps we could all learn from them.

Indeed, there was a reaction to what was a very pejorative preamble to the hon. member's question. It was inaccurate and pejorative. That produced the kind of reaction that kind of pejorative accusation invites. That is why Beauchesne's suggests that they are out of order.

As I have indicated, I heard no such unparliamentary remarks on this side. I heard lots on that side.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised, as a question of privilege—it may be a point of order; I have to look at it—his complaint about some comments that the Prime Minister made to him.

The hon. government House leader, in the absence of the Prime Minister, is responding. Other members may want to respond, and I hope it will not go on too long.

We could probably conclude the matter—I hope eventually satisfactorily—if all hon. members would just remember that the fundamental rule is that when a member is on his or her feet they are not to be interrupted unduly.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as I was endeavouring to try to say, we will examine the "blues". I heard reaction to what I indicated earlier was a pejorative preamble to the question of the hon. member. That is the kind of thing that happens. I wish it would happen less in both the reaction and in the pejorative preambles.

We should all wish that it would happen less. Nevertheless, we will examine the "blues". I am sure that the Prime Minister, who has demonstrated many, many times in the past that he respects the rules of this House and the rulings of the Chair, will respond appropriately depending on what the "blues" say.

Mr. Speaker: I also have a point of privilege from the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon I gave notice to the Chair and the Prime Minister that I wished to raise this point.

I cannot repeat the words that were said but they were directed at either the member for Winnipeg North Centre or myself, or both, in which—

An hon. member: Twice.

Mr. Boudria: Twice. We were, and I will paraphrase, described as illegitimate sons. I will not use the words nor the prefix that was attached to it except to say that it starts with an f and it was not complimentary.

Both of those words were said. It is true. Members on this side of the House—

An hon. member: Fuddle-duddle.

Mr. Boudria: —certainly heard and saw it.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that, at least partially, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is up on the same point as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

At this point I have the complaint. The hon. government House leader.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make the point that we now have had two opportunities for the members on the opposite side to malign the Prime Minister, to suggest that he said things which I did not hear.

I would ask in fairness that the hon. members permit us to examine the "blues" before using code words and languages. It is a little bit objectionable that founding members of the rat pack would talk about behaviour.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Merry Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: I do not need to hear anybody further on this point. I will examine it very carefully. The House has heard the undertaking of the government House leader.

The hon. member is rising.

I am afraid that I do not need much assistance now.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I appreciate that you are not interested in further interventions. I know there will be many further interventions if you permit them.

However, Mr. Speaker, do you plan to come back to the House tomorrow with your observations, having read the "blues"? My concern is that, because of all these hon. members who heard or saw the sounds uttered by the Prime Minister, we continue this discussion tomorrow if they do not appear in the "blues".

Mr. Speaker: Given the calendar I will certainly try to come back to the House tomorrow.

The hon. member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Speaker to entertain the point of order from the member for Northumberland since notice was given. As the House leader for the government side has launched a number of accusations against members on this side who have raised this particular issue, I think it would be very pertinent to the record if the member for Northumberland could pursue her separate point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I just asked the hon. member for Northumberland if it was the same point and I think she indicated that it was. Is it the comment complained about?

Mrs. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to exercise my discretion to close it off here.

I do so because if a number of people are going to get up and say exactly the same thing there is no end to it. We have the point, and I certainly have the point.

I think it is appropriate now to move on.

The hon. member for Calgary Northeast has been rising.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I am appealing on a point of order to your wisdom.

As you know today is the 60th anniversary of the date when Canada ceased to be a colony and became fully independent. I wonder whether it is proper for this House to be sitting and debating things like who is insulting whom. Rather, we should recess and reconvene tomorrow.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member had put that suggestion about an hour ago we all would probably be a lot better off.

[Translation]

COMMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST AS TO WHETHER A RULING WILL BE MADE

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, the Right Hon. Prime Minister, in referring to the parliamentary House Leader of the Bloc Quebecois, said that he was a hypocrite and insignifiant. I asked you twice whether those terms were parliamentary.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could just save the House and the hon. member some time. I have that matter before me. I am going to try to deliver a ruling on it at the very first opportunity. I am seized with it, I know about it; and I have just about finished my deliberations. I will do the very best I can to respond. I do not need it argued twice.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You are a hypocrite and insignifiant.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[English]

PRINTING

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and I seek guidance from the Chair.

In October I had an article which I wanted to send to my constituents sent down to printing. Unfortunately I did not see what I was signing and I apparently signed that it was political. Therefore they could print it.

I wrote to you in October, Mr. Speaker, and this week I got an answer back. I asked for the bill for that printing, but I am even more annoyed because then I sent Hansard down to be printed and somebody in printing said: "No, it is political".

I would like to know from you, Mr. Speaker, what goes into Hansard that is so political that we cannot have it offset. What I wanted to offset that day was the Prime Minister's speech and my party leader's speech on the Constitution, and yet someone in printing said it was political.

I want the Chair to show me that somewhere in Hansard there is something not political and that is not why we are here.

The second point I want to make is that I would like to have the bill I asked for on October 3 so I can pay it, because I do not want to be seen by people as sending something considered political even if it is in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: I shall do the very best I can to respond to the hon. member for South West Nova.

[Translation]

COMMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST AS TO WHETHER RULING WILL BE MADE

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know when you intend to respond to this point of order. You have been postponing a ruling on the kind of language used in the House for at least six weeks. Are the words "hypocrite" and "insignifiant" parliamentary, yes or no?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I will give a ruling, but the hon. member will withdraw what he said about the Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: I do not know whether what I said was parliamentary because you have not yet given your decision. But as soon as the Prime Minister withdraws, I will.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I regret very much, but that is not good enough. The hon. member clearly hurled an insult straight at the Speaker. The hon. member's duty is to withdraw that. I will come back with the ruling. I am seized of it.

I am asking the hon. member to do his duty to this Chamber which, after all, is something that is an obligation to all of us.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Which terms does the Speaker want me to retract?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member suggested that the Chair was a hypocrite.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: I said that the Prime Minister—I was repeating what the Prime Minister said to the parliamentary House leader of the Bloc. I asked you whether, if I were to call you—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I am seized with having to decide whether what the Prime Minister said in the context he said it was unparliamentary, and I will do that. I am telling the hon. member that what he just said to the Chair—forget that it is John Fraser; it is the Chair of this place—was unparliamentary. It is appropriate that the hon. member get up and courteously say: Mr. Speaker, if it was unparliamentary, I was excited or I was angry but I withdraw.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: In the same context in which the Prime Minister said those words, I withdraw the terms I believe are unparliamentary, namely the words hypocrite and insignifiant. I used them in referring to you in order to get the Chair to apply the same decision to the Prime Minister. I therefore withdraw the terms hypocrite and insignifiant which I used in referring to you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough. That is not good enough for the Chair, nor for the occupant of the present chair, Mr. Fraser. The hon. member should withdraw his remarks unequivocally.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make it clear that I share the views of the House leader of the Official Opposition. I think we are having some difficult times here. We are having some difficult times in terms of this institution and the respect the public has for it and has for us.

The hon. member made an allegation, used unparliamentary remarks toward the Chair, and if he has any modest remnant of concern for this institution I would ask that he withdraw unequivocally.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could avoid having a debate today and leave it until after Christmas, some time in February, until the first week we get back on February 3. We have waited almost a month and a half, and I think we can at least wait until after Christmas in order to avoid a parliamentary crisis on these issues. We are sovereigntists and we have a right to be sovereigntists here.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I point out to the House that it would be very hard to dispute, if one looks at the statistics, that the hon. member and his colleagues have been treated by the Chair other than with almost antiseptic care to give them the benefit of every right that an hon. member has in this Chamber.

That does not mean that every member sitting where they are is always going to agree with the Chair any more than it means that members elsewhere are going to agree with the Chair. There is a fundamental to this place, and that is that as long as one is in it one has to respect the institution.

The hon. members have every right to free speech in this place. I am doing the very best I can to maintain that but what the hon. member just did was an attack on the Chair, an attack on the integrity of the Chair. I am asking the hon. member, because the hon. member knows the sense and the mood of the House, to make it quite clear that he regrets that and unequivocally withdraws it. Then we can get on with the other matter which the hon. member has a very proper and correct interest in.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I made it clear at the end of my comments that I withdrew what I said about you, Mr. Speaker, and that I merely used those terms to provoke a decision by the Chair to make the Prime Minister withdraw as well. I do not think this is parliamentary language, and I most emphatically withdraw what I said. I hope the Prime Minister will do the same with what he said about the parliamentary House leader of the Bloc Quebecois.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. That is I think clear enough for the House. I will do the very best I can to return on the other matter.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I listened to you and you say that you respect us. I must tell you that I do not feel very respected in this House. We do not have a research budget. We are not recognized as a party and then we are asked—

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member has a complaint, but the Speaker does not have to make a decision. After all, we had a debate on this subject a few months ago.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

CERTIFICATE OF NOMINATION

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a nomination which was recently made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(2), it is deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources.

EMPLOYEE SHARE PURCHASE PLAN ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to implement changes to the Income Tax Act to assist employees that wish to purchase the corporation that employs them by allowing these employees certain tax advantages specifically for this purpose. It will encourage co–operation among workers and allow them direct operation and control of their work environment.

I would strongly encourage all members to support this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Butland moves that the bill be now read a first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROMISES

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, I have a very important motion that has the support of more than I think two–thirds of members of this House on the implementation of a world summit for children and the promises thereto.

The motion reads as follows:

That this House take note that the first meeting of Heads of State and Government to address the problems afflicting children around the world, the World Summit for Children, was held at the United Nations on 29 and 30 September, 1990;

That this House take note that Canada was one of the instigators of the Summit;

That this House take note that the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, was the co–chairperson of the Summit;

That this House take note that the promises made at the Summit have the potential of saving 50 million lives in this decade;

That this House take note that the 71 Heads of State and Government in attendance committed to develop programs of action by the end of 1991 and to make available the resources to implement the promises made at the Summit;

That this House take note that Canada must keep its leadership role in the fight for child survival if the promises are to be kept on a global scale;

That this House take note that UNICEF now estimates that, of the $20 billion per year in additional resources less developed countries will require to implement these promises, $7 billion will have to come as assistance from donor nations;

That this House take note that a majority of Members have publicly stated their support for the full implementation of the Summit promises.

That this House take note that on the anniversary of the Summit, in over one hundred cities in Canada, Canadians have urged their leaders to take the necessary action to see to it that the promises of the Summit are kept.

That this House support the Declaration and Plan of Action of the Summit and that both be declared an integral part of Canadian international co-operation policy; and

That this House support the full and speedy implementation of the major global commitments agreed to in the Declaration and Plan of Action issued by the world leaders, including domestic international co-operation strategies for child survival and development; and

That this House support adequate financial resources being made available for these purposes, including a contribution to the additional resources required from donor countries based on Canada's historical 5 per cent share of global foreign aid; and

That this House request that the government encourage multilateral institutions to focus their efforts on the implementation of the Summit promises; and

That this House request that the Minister responsible for the Summit follow up be invited to report to Parliament once a year on the implementation of the World Summit Plan of Action and the Convention on the Rights of the Child to the extent that the application of the Plan and the Convention, at the national, regional and international levels, requires action or a contribution on the part of Canada; and

As we know this was ratified just a few minutes ago here in the rotunda of the Parliament Buildings by the Prime Minister. It continues:

That this House encourage Parliamentarians around the world to ensure that each country provides its fair share of the additional resources required to see that the promises of the World Summit for Children become reality.

I apologize for the length of the motion. I would also like to say that the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing who assisted the member for Winnipeg South Centre and myself in getting wide-scale support for this is not available today. I do know that the other two members would like to speak very briefly in support and in seconding this motion.

Mr. Speaker: We have a prior situation here.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Rosedale asks the House for leave to move a motion. Under the circumstances, unanimous consent is required. Do we have the agreement of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of members of my own caucus who participated in endorsing this resolution to join with the hon. member for Rosedale and the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing. We speak for all members of Parliament and we hope through all members we speak for all Canadians who dearly hope that the resolution we are putting forward today represents a major step forward in dealing with the problem of children.

When I was walking to the Hill this morning I saw a sign in a store window which said: "We did not inherit the earth from our ancestors; we are borrowing it from our children". I thought that was an appropriate way to put the meaning and spirit of this resolution. I must say with some regret that while we may be borrowing from our children we have not been very good in repaying our debts. We have not been particularly good stewards of that very important trust we have held.

I would like to say that there was a certain amount of tragic coincidence that at the same time the summit for children was being debated at the United Nations, the whole decision to go into the war in the gulf was also being debated just down the hall. Those were two parallel statements.

I only want to draw the attention of the House to the figures that were released today that the war itself cost something over $80 billion. Canada contributed $690 million of that. Yet at the same time when it comes to finding additional money to deal with the problem of glue sniffing on Indian reserves, to deal with the problem of inoculations for diphtheria around the world, we are not able to find those extra funds.

It simply shows one important fact, that while children are important they are also powerless. They do not have the means to make the kind of pressure on governments to take decisions on their behalf. It is, therefore, a challenge for all of us to try to put some power into their hands. That is why the ratification of the covenant is so important, because it does set a brand new standard by which all governments will now be answerable for their commitments. It will set a new standard by which we will all be responsible for making that kind of requirement.

It would be my hope that perhaps as we go through the next few months in discussion on constitutional change, it might be worth considering whether the word children and our responsibilities to them should also be incorporated as part of our constitutional commitments.

I would just like to close with something which I think may be the most appropriate word. It comes not from me but from a child, a young woman who is in grade seven in St. Mary's Academy in my riding. Last year when I sponsored an essay contest she sent in this essay which I think summarizes what the meaning of all this is. She says:

Dear World Leaders:

As I watch television and read the newspapers there is one thing that is always shown, children—not happy children being hugged but dead children, starving children, sick children or frightened children. Another subject that is always seen is some story about world leaders preparing for war, world leaders discussing pollution in the environment, blaming each other and coming up with very few solutions.

The leaders also seem to use the future of children as an excuse to do what they are doing. Well, listen to me, please. I am a child and I want you to really listen to me. I don't want you to talk to me about my rights. I want you to recognize that children did not choose to be born. They did not choose their country of origin or their circumstances. They did not choose to be victims. I would like the world leaders to use their power, their resources and their intelligence to provide a caring and loving world for children. If everyone stopped being so busy worrying about who has the most money, the most natural resources and the biggest guns they would help everyone.

Let's all try to see who can have the least homeless, the least child abuse, the least illiteracy, the least pollution and the most compassion.

If you really believe that we are the future, if you really believe that we deserve basic human rights, then show us. Next time you stand before the cameras of the world and talk about how important we are as part of the future, show us. We want to believe you but please show us.

I think the words of this 11-year-old summarize most adequately and most eloquently what we all have to do in this House as we sign this covenant on human rights.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add some brief comments on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

I would like first to thank the member for Rosedale for bringing forward this motion. I know he is passionately committed to the issue of children in both the Third World and in Canada who are suffering from deprivation, from hunger, from the effects of war and being left out of the processes that make the decisions which affect their lives. I would like also to thank the member for Winnipeg South Centre for his participation and my own colleague, the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, who I know was involved in the process of bringing this issue to the House.

I would also like to take the opportunity of commending the Prime Minister for his involvement in the UN convention where he played an instrumental role, and I think it is clear from his comments that he also passionately feels for the needs of children who are suffering in Canada.

We can all look to different ways of resolving that problem, the problems both of children in Canada and in the developing countries. But I think it is worth noting and it is important to note that the Prime Minister also is committed passionately to that issue.

I think now what we do is wait for the government's actions. As soon as the government brings forward measures which will indeed implement the terms of the UN declaration, increase Canada's contribution to the solution of the problems in developing countries and provide extra resources to deal with the chronic and terrible problem of child hunger in Canada, then we on this side of the House will be fully supportive and assist in the passage of those initiatives.

We look forward to those initiatives. I do not feel particularly confident that those initiatives will be forthcoming, but I hope so. I can assure the House of the full support of the New Democratic Party should they come forward.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to speak. The Bloc Quebecois also gives its consent, out of generosity and for the children of the world, not because of the way we are treated in this House.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

75TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, with unanimous consent on behalf of all parties in this House, I move:

That this House take note that the 1991-92 season marks the 75th anniversary of the National Hockey League; and

That this House take note of the longstanding role of hockey in Canada's culture, heritage and pride; and

That this House, in the 125th year of our country's existence, recognize January 1992 as National Hockey League month in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Again it is a matter of consent of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not have consent to proceed.

GREECE

2,500TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I trust that you will find unanimous consent for this motion. I move:

That the House of Commons of Canada convey its congratulations to the parliament, government and people of Greece, and the municipal government and people of Athens on the occasion of the 2,500th anniversary of the establishment of democracy in the city of Athens; and

That the hon. Speaker convey the text of this motion to the President of the Hellenic National Assembly.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Once again, do we have the agreement of the House?

Mr. Gérin: I would like you to advise me on procedure, Mr. Speaker. By giving our consent to have this or any other motion presented, do we have the right to speak on that motion later?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The parliamentary secretary has been asking for consent. He is asking only to waive notice of the motion.

[Translation]

If that is waived, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is fully entitled to participate in the debate on the substance of the motion.

The first question is: Do we have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances with the games that the Bloc wants to continue to play to disrupt this House, I want to withdraw my motion and not in any way embarrass the people of Athens or Greece.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the comments made by the deputy leader of the opposition. It is not a question of blocking. My colleague from Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead asked the Speaker for some information and you gave it to us. We are not out to block that motion. It is simply a matter of finding out whether we can comment on a motion.

• (1550)

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the rules is certainly not perfect but is a single member able to withdraw a motion once it has been put? Does it not require unanimous consent?

Mr. Speaker: The motion itself has not been proposed yet. All that is happening now is whether there is consent for the hon. parliamentary secretary to propose the motion.

Other hon. members have asked the question. The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead and the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer have raised the point of what the procedure is.

[Translation]

What is the procedure in the circumstances? I gave my response, and I assume hon. members are satisfied.

Furthermore, we now have a situation where the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer made a statement in which he, together with several other members, supported the motion.

[English]

Under the circumstances perhaps the hon. parliamentary secretary would want to put the motion again but I am questioning the hon. parliamentary secretary's handling.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear that I do not want to have this situation brought before the House in such a way as it may cause a debate that I think may call a number of the concerns of members into some sort of game playing situation.

I think it is pretty clear to the House what the Bloc Quebecois is trying to do and I do not want to play its game.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not want to proceed and as a consequence that is the end of the issue, at least for today.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a delight to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia, who are asking the government to ensure that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police receives adequate funding at a time when its mandate needs to be fulfilled more than ever before and there may be some question of reduction in federal support.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I cannot refer to the actual size of this petition but from the area of greater Kamloops there are literally thousands of names on this petition opposing the goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that the tax is actually destroying the local economy and is one of the major factors in the increase in bankruptcies over the last little while. They are simply asking the government to please come to its senses and withdraw this nasty tax.

Mr. McDermid: Did you ask them what they wanted it replaced with?

Mr. Riis: They want it replaced with a minimum corporate tax and they also wanted an inheritance tax for people who inherit millions of dollars, a wealth tax. They would have to pay some taxes on that.

There are others such as closing some of the major corporate loopholes.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of people from central British Columbia opposing the announced decision of a Vancouver firm in a joint venture with a California firm.

They plan to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount, British Columbia in an effort to divert some of the water into the San Diego, California area. The petitioners are simply asking the Canadian government to state that it will not allow this to proceed.

NARCOTICS CONTROL ACT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in this petition people in my riding of Davenport and several neighbouring ridings are calling upon Parliament to urge the government to revise the Narcotics Control Act so that assets and cash seized as a result of a conviction are shared fairly and equitably with local police forces and community organizations in their continuous efforts to reduce drug abuse.

This petition is submitted by the deeply felt desire to come to grips with the question of drug abuse and the way it is ruining the lives of our youth.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present a petition today on behalf of residents of southeastern Ontario, perhaps more than just from my own riding.

It is petitioning the government to dig in on the issue of article XI of GATT, not only keep it but to strengthen it.

The fascinating thing about this petition is that it is signed by hardware merchants, insurance salesmen, farm implement dealers and grain distributor dealers who are all affected if we do not have stability in the agricultural industry. We do not have it out west right now. We would like to keep some stability in the agricultural industry.

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. members that under the new rules we only have so many minutes to present petitions. In any event, speeches are not supposed to be made. I know that hon. members would want to co–operate with their colleagues and not take up too much time in the presentation of petitions.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present this petition to the House, that the undersigned residents of Canada, in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers, request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of hundreds of residents of Winnipeg, Manitoba. In their petition the undersigned residents of Canada avail themselves of their ancient undoubted right to present a grievance common to the petitioners and ask that the House provide a remedy for that.

In their petition they point out that the community around Empire Drugs consists of many seniors and lower income families relying heavily on the near–by services, including the complete range of services provided by the local pharmacy. Therefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to do all it can within its mandate to gain reconsideration of the decision of Canada Post Corporation to discontinue postal services at this location.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from constituents and residents of the riding of Ottawa—Vanier dealing with the gasoline prices that are significantly higher in the Ottawa area than those in southern Ontario.

The petitioners say that such price disparity discriminates against the Ottawa area consumers, and to that effect they would like to call upon Parliament to urge the federal government to correct this injustice to Ottawa area motorists.

ADOPTIVE PARENTS

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions. The first petition is primarily taken up by one individual in my community of Sault Ste. Marie, Jennifer Smart. The petition addresses the discriminatory practice as put into effect by this government against adoptive parents.

The operative clause is: "The government has failed to treat equally adoptive families who are a minority group in Canadian society and who are often unable to voice their concerns and fight for their rights due to concerns regarding confidentiality and discrimination toward their families". This is signed by 150 interested adoptive parents in my community.

CROATIA

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the second petition was passed to me by the member for Victoria and it gives me great honour and privilege to present it.

This petition addresses the frustration and helplessness that all Canadians feel with the events in Croatia and especially the actions of the Yugoslavian army which must be condemned.

The least we must do, and thousands of Ontarians are suggesting this, is recognize Croatia as an independent and sovereign democratic nation as 94 per cent of the people in Croatia have stated.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present another petition from residents in my riding and others across the Toronto region requesting that the minister of immigration issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of persons who have been determined to be convention refugees and allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

If this policy were in effect, families like that of Lilliana Petrescu, a Romanian refugee who claimed refugee status in October of 1987 and who has a three and a half year old son who has never seen his father and a daughter who is 15 years old now in Romania and a husband, could have been reunited in July 1991 when she finally got refugee status. It could be another two years.

During this holiday season let us remember these families that are suffering—

Mr. Speaker: I am awfully sorry. The matter is terribly important but members cannot make speeches or the rest of the House is not going to be heard.

• (1600)

UKRAINE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions. One contains the names of numerous petitioners from various parts of my riding who call upon the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence and establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and people of Ukraine immediately, following a positive confirmation vote in the referendum on December 1.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): The second petition is from petitioners from across Canada but mainly in southern Ontario, calling on the government to support the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture which passed a motion asking that the third line of defence payment be provided to give cash assistance on an emergency basis so as to provide the same net level of support on an acreage basis that would have been provided under the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account had they been in effect for the last crop year.

CROATIA

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I wish to present a petition signed by approximately 2,200 residents of my riding of Okanagan Centre.

The petition reads that whereas Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election conducted in April 1990; whereas 94 per cent of the population of Croatia voted for independence; whereas communism fuelled the Yugoslav army backed Serbian terrorists as it continues its brutal attack on thousands of unarmed Croatian civilians, women and children; whereas Croatians like all other people are entitled to freedom democracy and the right to self-determination; and whereas Canada has an international reputation as a moral authority and as such can initiate the democratic process without compromising world peace, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the initiative of officially recognizing Croatia as an independent and sovereign democratic nation.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 245 petitioners who ask the Canadian government to condemn the actions of the Yugoslav army in Croatia and to recognize Croatia as an independent nation.

I hope it is going to happen soon, as I support them.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by residents from Nepean, Ottawa and Kanata. These people are calling on the government to take action in order to end the disparity when it comes to gasoline prices in the Ottawa region.

They believe they are unfairly treated in this region.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a similar petition signed by numerous residents of the Ottawa Valley, particularly Petawawa, Mackey and Pembroke. These petitioners complain about high prices in the Ottawa region, and I can say that the same would apply for the Kingston region, or it did until very recently when prices took a plunge in my own riding. I am delighted since it shows the injustice of the prices in this area. The petition urges the government to bring an end to this injustice by introducing some legislation that will stop pernicious price gouging.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P–7 in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface.

P–7—Mr. Duhamel—September 16, 1991

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documents relating to the RCMP investigation of the TIEM Canada franchise firm.

Mr. Cooper: The information that is being requested was obtained and prepared by the RCMP in the course of a lawful investigation pertaining to the detection, prevention or suppression of crime. The release of this information would have the effect of disclosing investigative techniques and of revealing the identity of a confidential source of information or revealing information that was prepared in the course of an investigation.

Therefore, in accordance with section 16(1)(a)(i) of the Access to Information Act, the RCMP is not in a position to disclose any of the records of TIEM Canada in its possession. Therefore, I ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Some hon. members: Transfer it for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Riis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, directed to my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

Standing Order 39(5) states:

A Member may request that the Ministry respond to a specific question within forty–five days by so indicating when filing his or her question.

Mr. Speaker, I seek some direction from you or perhaps my hon. friend. Some of the questions on the list, including some of my own and many others, date back to May and June of this year. In other words, far beyond the 45 days the Standing Order requires for responding. These are not tricky questions.

For example, one asks: "For each fiscal year since 1984 what has been the total hospital expenses incurred by each deputy minister?" That is just a matter of punching a key on a computer and receiving that answer.

I have a solution. If my hon. friend finds that he cannot answer all of these questions tomorrow, which probably will be difficult and I respect that, would he consider that the responses could be tabled with the Clerk as they become available during the adjournment as opposed to simply sitting idle until the early part of February?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member that I agree with him that a number of these questions are long overdue. I want to tell him and other members of this House that I am pushing as hard as I can. My desire was that I would be able to answer all of the questions prior to the House rising tomorrow.

Should I fail to do so, I would like to take the hon. member's representation in hand, because it sounds like a very reasonable solution to me. I would certainly want to ponder on it and get back to him tomorrow, if that is all right with the hon. member.

Mr. Riis: I appreciate my hon. friend's comments. It is worth the study. Perhaps we could make further clarification tomorrow if he can proceed along these lines.

Mr. Speaker: Before we get to Orders of the Day I want to advise the House that in view of the fact that we are adjourning tomorrow there will be the usual hospitality by the Speaker for all hon. members. This is traditionally held across the hall. After today, I was wondering whether we should have three or four different rooms for it.

I insist on maintaining tradition and I would invite all hon. members to join with me from four o'clock on, if we are adjourned by then.

TELESAT CANADA REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from Legislative Committee E.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am now giving the ruling on certain motions in amendment. There are seven motions in amendment in report stage to Bill C-38, an act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, will not be selected because it is identical to Motion No. 2.

[English]

Motion No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, will not be selected pursuant to Standing Order 76(5), in that it was moved, debated and negatived in committee.

Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, and Motion No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, are out of order. These two motions go beyond the scope of the bill in that they introduce a new element which was not envisaged at second reading.

• (1610)

I refer hon. members to citation 698(1) of Beauchesne's sixth edition on page 207.

[Translation]

Motion No. 5A, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

For the convenience of the House I will recapitulate. Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6 will not be selected. Motion No. 1 will be debated and voted on separately. Motion No. 2 will be debated and voted on separately. Motion No. 5A will be debated and voted on separately.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, we expected a lot more debating time on this than we have this afternoon. I have not conferred with any of the parties on this idea, because I just thought of it now, to be quite honest. We are debating three amendment in total.

I wonder if we could get unanimous consent of the House to debate them all together rather than separately. We will vote on them separately, of course. If we could get unanimous consent it would make it much easier for everyone concerned.

We may find that debate on one amendment takes too long and we will not get to the other two.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think the proposal makes sense. Some of us indeed would like to participate in this debate and no one should be allowed to speak more than once on the combined debates of the three motions before the House.

If that is acceptable, I think on this side, having spoken to some of my colleagues—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Unfortunately we have no researcher to do the research we need on this bill, and since we lack the necessary information we cannot give our consent.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-38 be amended in Clause 5

(a) by striking out lines 5 to 7 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"5.(1) Subject to subsections (1.1) and (1.2), the Minister, on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, may";

(b) by adding immediately after line 13 at page 3 the following:

"(1.1) The Minister shall not sell or otherwise dispose of shares transferred to the Minister by section 4 unless the buyer of such shares undertakes in writing

(a) to buy, at the same price as the price paid by the buyer for shares sold by the Minister, that proportion of
(i) such number of shares of Telesat as are offered for sale by minority shareholders of Telesat one year after the day the shares of Telesat are offered for sale by the Minister that
(ii) the number of shares bought by the buyer is of
(iii) the total number of shares offered for sale by the Minister, and

(b) to pay the purchase price of shares of minority shareholders of Telesat referred to in paragraph (a) not later than six months after the day such shares are offered for sale.

(1.2) For the purposes of subsection (1.1), "minority shareholder of Telesat" means any shareholder of Telesat, except the Minister and members of Telecom Canada, who holds less than three per cent of the shares of Telesat."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to finally get the debate rolling here. I am very disappointed in the attitude of the hon. member for Richelieu who has declined to facilitate debate among other members.

In any event, now that we have to deal with this one proposed amendment, I want to be very practical about this and indicate that there are two other amendments the House will want to debate in the next 45 minutes or so.

This particular amendment, Motion No. 1, addresses the situation of the minority shareholders of Telesat. During the committee hearings and the discussions that went on outside committee concerning this bill it was brought to the attention of members, and discussed publicly, that there are a number of minority shareholders in Telesat who are being locked in as a result of the way this bill has been constructed by the government.

There are quite a few minority shareholders. This particular amendment addresses the circumstances of those minority shareholders who have less than 3 per cent of the outstanding shares.

The reason I feel their situation should be addressed is because since the inception of Telesat the government has been the honest broker shareholder and has been the dominant shareholder. These minority shareholders have continued along relatively quietly with the government basically controlling the shareholder interest and the over-all direction of the board of directors and of Telesat.

While the government is now divesting itself and disposing of its shares it is basically saying: "I am all right, Jack, you minority shareholders, we are going to continue the freeze on your ability to dispose of your shares at this time while we fish around for the best price. You guys have got to all wait until we have sold our public shareholdings".

That has been seen by some of these minority shareholders to be unfair.

This particular amendment addresses that issue and insists that the ultimate purchaser in the open bidding process acquire the shares of the minority shareholders who wish to sell out at the same time.

It is the best we can do. We are not going to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. I am hopeful the government will accept this amendment. I do not think there are a lot of minority shareholders within the shareholder agreement of Telecom, which is an umbrella group within the shareholder group.

Since the hon. member for Richelieu and his colleagues have, in a manner which is quite discourteous and disrespectful of what the House is trying to accomplish this afternoon, refused to go along with the suggestion of my colleague across the floor, the minister, I want to make a brief mention of two other related elements. They involve the other amendments, Motion No. 3 and Motion No. 5A. Motion No. 3 deals with the issue of what the government will do with the proceeds of this sale. In the press release that informed the public of what it would do the government said: "The net proceeds from the sale of the government's shares will go to the debt servicing and reduction account".

Fair enough. That is what the government has told us in a couple of budgets. In this bill the government has finessed that position and now says that it will only transfer to the debt reduction fund the proceeds of this sale in excess of the book value. The book value is approximately $40 million. We estimate the value of the government's equity at about $140 million. Just speaking in round numbers, I see that the minister is saying that price is a little high and will disappoint us with the sale price.

Speaking purely hypothetically, if the value of the government's shares were $40 million and if the value of the equity were $140 million, the government is saying that it will only transfer to the debt reduction fund the $100 million. It will keep the $40 million in its pocket.

This has been discussed. I have heard accounting explanations. I have given up trying to figure out what the accountants are saying. I believe it is just so much mumbo-jumbo. It is a shell game. When all is said and done if we follow the procedures set out in this bill, the government is still going to have $40 million in its pocket. I want to see, my colleagues want to see, and members of the House want to see the government follow through on its commitment to take all of the sale proceeds, the whole net sale proceeds from the sale of this corporation and apply them to the debt reduction fund.

I will close and give an opportunity to other members to discuss this motion and the other related motions.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on these particular amendments. I want to reflect my concern as my colleague for Scarborough—Rouge River already has. I had mentioned earlier that certain members of this House wanted to forestall, frustrate and confound the proceedings. They have essentially attempted to throw a monkey wrench in the works. I think it is unfortunate in light of the importance of this bill that they have attempted to do so.

The first amendment moved by my Liberal colleague has some good points, although it would generally precipitate a lowering of the price of the shares that may be offered for the purchase of Telesat.

• (1620)

The bidder will essentially have to look at the possibility of actually buying more shares than the 53 per cent share block that has been offered. I think his case makes eminent sense when you look at it in terms of fair play.

The fact is that the minority shareholders do not have the opportunity to disperse their share ownership: they are essentially locked into it. I think that this particular provision would provide that opportunity for them should they wish to exercise that right.

Really, the government should not be playing by any special rules in the liquidation of the shares. I think out of a sense of fair play to the other shareholders in this particular venture that this particular amendment should be supported.

The second amendment seems to have been duplicated by my Liberal colleague and myself. I was of the understanding that he was not proceeding with this but seeing both of them in there essentially reinforces the importance of this particular amendment.

Essentially the money that will be recovered from the sale of the shares of Telesat will not all be used under the current legislation to reduce the outstanding federal debt that is owed by the Crown.

We have placed this amendment in hopes that we can convince the government to utilize completely the moneys that will be returned through the sale of these assets and to place these moneys into the debt servicing reduction fund in order to help buy down the heavy federal deficit that we face.

Canadians contributed some $30 million to Telesat initially. That $30 million, if you looked at it in today's terms, would be about $120 million. As well, the taxpayers of Canada, through the government, have lent Telesat some $40 million in the early 1970s to get the company up and running.

After all of this support to Telesat the time has come, according to this government, to sell off these assets. We are saying that is fine if that is the decision that is taken. f this bill in fact does pass, then let us utilize those assets rather than maintain the original assets and place those assets into consolidated revenues.

Let us use that money to buy down the federal debt which I think the public in Canada would favour. It wants to see the deficit reduced. Liquidation of these assets as we have suggested through this amendment would better be accommodated by using all of the revenues that are returned to the Crown to help buy down the federal debt.

I just want to move briefly on to the third amendment. We have to recognize the foresight of my colleague for Mount Royal in placing this amendment before us. She has picked up on a real flaw in the legislation.

Any future sale of Telesat is to be approved by the CRTC, but the government's sale of Telesat which this particular legislation pertains to, is not going to be under the scrutiny of the CRTC, at least in the initial phases.

This amendment, I think, will correct that weakness in the legislation. It would ensure that the CRTC would in fact examine the sale of Telesat and the government's liquidation of its interest in Telesat to ensure that it really was in the interest of the public.

While this amendment might slow down the sale of Telesat, I think the public interest would indeed be served by having a full examination of the ramifications of this particular sale through the oversight of the CRTC to ensure that the interests of Canada and the interests of Canada's telecommunications industry are in fact fully recognized.

In that regard, may I just summarize by saying that the three amendments before the House at this time are good amendments. They are amendments that will move a considerable way in strengthening this piece of legislation before us today.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on yet another privatization initiative of this government. Telesat Canada happens to be in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier. I want to speak on the amendment put by my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. This is an amendment which I feel would be appropriate at this time since the purpose of the bill, as I read it and as we understand it, would not protect the minority shareholders who would be locked in till the majority shareholder has been satisfied. I find that difficult because we all know that there is an important minority in that company who are employees. One per cent of the shares of Telesat are held by 877 employees. Of these 672 are located at the head office and the remainder in regional offices.

The purpose of this amendment is to protect the minority shareholders and indeed to protect the employees who have shares in this company. Five hundred of those 877 employees are some of the best mathematicians in the world.

Mr. Baker: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Some of them are the best physicists in the world. These are people who are hardworking and who have proven to the world their ability to compete with anybody in the world. I am pretty proud that in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier Telesat Canada is something of which we can boast because indeed it was the first to put a commercial communications satellite up there. It was an example for all the world. It was a respected and I would dare say exceptional endeavour on the part of these people.

They also put the second one up. We all know they had some problems opening the antenna but they have corrected that and it is now operative. We are indeed very much behind this group of scientists who are presently making the telecommunications and communications network of the world something of great importance to Canada.

I will not have time to get to that amendment but I want to address the question of the location of Telesat. The bill that we have before us does not give protection to the employees in terms of giving them an ironclad guarantee that Telesat will remain in the national capital region. It only addresses the question as one of possibly negotiating or maybe making it a condition of sale to the eventual buyer. I want to quote from the government's own press release. I hear the minister making noises over there. The government's press release states:

> Bidders for the government's Telesat shares will need to state their intentions concerning the maintenance of Telesat headquarters and operations in the National Capital Region.

Why will this government not provide an ironclad guarantee to the 672 employees at Telesat's head office here in Ottawa that their jobs will remain in Ottawa? Why will it not incorporate this simple requirement into the legislation? It did not do it.

Perhaps we should not be surprised because it does not care for Public Service employees very much over there. It slashed them when it could and cut their salaries whenever possible. It even provoked them to go out on strike not very long ago, one of the hardest strikes we have had. This government has no employee-employer relations of any kind. We are just asking it to be sensitive to two things: first, that the families of these employees will have some kind of stability and, second, that their investment as minority shareholders will be protected. One per cent of all the shares held by Telesat are owned by their own employees.

I do not want to take any more time but I just ask the government to be understanding of the difficulties that people have in their careers and to be understanding of the fact that we have to make it a requirement that at least the head office of Telesat remains in the national capital region. I am very proud of the fact that they are in my riding. It happens to be something which we care for. I say to the government that it should take seriously this amendment before us, Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River that says minority shareholders should be protected also.

• (1630)

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the member for Ottawa—Vanier. Over the years the member for Ottawa—Vanier and some other members on this side of the House have taken great pride in the fact, as the hon. member said, that we have some 500 scientists, mostly mathematicians, who work at mission control in Gloucester close to Ottawa. They put up, as the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier said, the first commercial communications satellite in the world. It was not the United States. It was not France. It was not Germany. It was not Britain. It was Canada in 1970.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and I have conversed on many occasions as Telesat Canada put up its second one, its third one, its fourth one. To make reference to the minority shareholders, as he did, is the least the Government of Canada can do.

As the hon. member noted when the Anik-E II satellite was put into outer space and did not work, there was a $300 million debt created of which $260 million was insured.

Mission control for that satellite is close by here in the riding of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. In the middle of the night they met at mission control. They had received permission from the insurance company to take that satellite and put it into a spin in outer space to try to open that one antenna to try to save $300 million.

In the meantime the federal cabinet had met in session on a request from the company which said it was in dire straits. It owed $300 million. It was about to lose. The federal cabinet met and passed a very interesting Order in Council.

It was an order for the CRTC to take into account the risky business of putting up satellites, the incredible cost involved, the fact that the company was about to lose $60 million. It was a $300 million venture and only $240 million was insured. The federal cabinet made an order to the CRTC to re-examine the cost structure of Telesat and to put it on a firm financial footing because of these debts and the ups and downs in the satellite business.

As the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier just pointed out, at two o'clock in the morning some of the world's most respected physicists and mathematicians here in Canada met and spun that satellite. It was a risky operation, as the hon. member and I have discussed on many occasions, because it could have meant the destruction of the entire process. They were successful in opening that extra antenna. It became a success story.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier might agree with me that the employees should get together and take other measures, perhaps in the only manner that the Government of Canada can understand. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, how or why the cabinet gave the order to the CRTC?

Do you know who helped in that proposal? There were four lobbyists hired. This is registered with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. No one should ever say: "No, there is no hope of getting the cabinet to overrule a decision of the CRTC". It is there and it is on the record.

One of the lobbyists is a former employee of the present minister of external affairs. Another lobbyist is a former employee of a person who is now a senator who used to be the minister of trade. Then, if that were not enough to clinch it, it then hired the former president of the Tory Party of Canada, a very respected and capable man by the name William Jarvis. If that were not enough to overturn the CRTC, if that were not enough to clinch it for it, it hired another person by the name Bill Fox.

If you want to get something in Canada then you certainly must hire the right people. The directors of the company claimed that these people were hired just to prepare a response to the Government of Canada and to prepare the case. The member for Ottawa—Vanier and myself spoke about the fact that the submission to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was to arrange meetings with elected officials.

In closing, let us say that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is absolutely correct. The most important shareholders, the one per cent shareholders, are the employees of the company. They are the ones who made the $180 million profit for that company two years ago and another $180 million this year. They are the ones who showed $22 million clean net profit this past year on behalf of the company. These were the people who put the first commercial communications satellite into outer space. They were the ones who have put the most powerful commercial communications satellite in the world in outer space. These are the people who should be congratulated and these are the people who should be protected under this legislation.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, that was most enjoyable. I must admit I enjoy my friend from Gander—Twillingate when he gets up and talks so authoritatively about a number of subjects here in the House of Commons.

I want first of all to start by thanking my colleagues from Scarborough—Rouge River and Okanagan—Shuswap for the work that they have put in on this bill because they have done a tremendous job and have facilitated the passage of the bill to date. We do thank them very much for that.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier alluded to public employees. First of all, the employees of Telesat are not public employees. Telesat is not a Crown corporation. Telesat is a private corporation with some government ownership in it. Let us understand that he misunderstands the situation. They are not public employees. They are employees of Telesat which is a private company. That makes it a little different.

Second, the amendment proposed is there to protect the minority shareholders. Let me remind the House, if I might, that the only two groups this affects are the employees of Telesat, 1.5 per cent, and Ontario Northland Transportation Communications which holds two-tenths of 1 per cent. Those are the only two groups that it protects.

When we talk about the employee share ownership, they already have now in place—it does not change with this bill or anything else—buy-back rights under the employee share ownership plan. They do not need the protection. They have the protection now.

This amendment is redundant and we are going to oppose it for those reasons. Those shareholders are protected.

We brought in the share ownership program for employees in January 1990. It has been well accepted. I forget the percentage, but it is a fairly large percentage. Well over 60 per cent of the employees hold shares in Telesat. The hon. member from Vanier and the member from Gander are absolutely right about the employees. They have pride in their company. I think that is shown by their participation in the share ownership program.

The second motion that was brought forward about taking the entire proceeds and putting them into the deficit reduction fund causes some problems for the government and for the accounting procedures. There is $30 million on our books. Other countries with Crown corporations do not have them on their books for any amount of money whatsoever. In Canada, the account procedure does. When money is expended on behalf of a corporation or a Crown corporation it goes on our books. On our books for Telesat is $30 million which was originally invested by the government to acquire the Telesat shares. According to the accounting rules all costs of earning revenues including the original cost of the investment must be subtracted from the net proceeds of the sale.

In other words, the taxpayers of Canada have forwarded $30 million to this company. They are getting the $30 million back. It goes into the consolidated revenue fund. By the way, all the money goes into the consolidated revenue fund and then is accounted to this account. The $30 million comes off the books. It is no longer on the books as a debt of the Government of Canada. Therefore we are saving a considerable amount of money for the people.

That money has to go to write off the $30 million debt that is on our books at the present time. The balance will go into the debt servicing and reduction account and will be available for deficit reduction.

I might also point out that the moment this particular bill comes into play, the Canada Business Corporations Act kicks in and all the protections contained in there pertain to the shareholders of the company.

The final amendment which is proposed by the hon. member for Mount Royal would have the effect of making the sale of the government's Telesat shares subject to prior approval of the CRTC.

Under Bill C-38 which we are debating the prior approval of the CRTC will be required before any person can acquire control of Telesat. The only exception is when this minister takes the shares of the Minister of Finance and CN and the subsequent sale is to a third party.

I might point out, however, that sale must be approved under the Competition Act of this country. We are advising all those who are interested in making bids to go to the competition bureau and get pre-clearance before they put in their bids. We think that will save them a tremendous amount of time and will save us a tremendous amount of time also.

We are going to oppose the three motions for very legitimate reasons. They were presented for very legitimate reasons, but we think the concerns of hon. members have been answered and are covered in the legislation as proposed and also in the Canada Business Corporations Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-38 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 29 to 34 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"amount of the net proceeds of the sale of any shares pursuant to subsection (1), other than net proceeds paid pursuant to subsection (2), shall be credited".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will just call for the question at this point.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in the debate on this bill. I would point out that the reason we are in such a hurry to pass all these bills is the Liberal party here, with 600 guests. It must cost a fortune. I am not sure where it all comes from, I do not know who is paying for it, since the party was supposed to have a very large debt.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are debating an amendment which is proposed by my colleague from Okanagan—Shuswap.

The hon. member complained earlier that they have no research department and therefore could not debate the bill properly. I might tell the House that we offered them a complete briefing at the department, all the briefing material, and to answer any of their questions at that time. Not one of them took up the offer.

All they are doing today is deliberately delaying the proper procedures in this House. That is all they are doing today. I would ask the hon. member in all fairness—and none of us are impugning motives on any other political party—to bring some common sense to the House of Commons, not to be so foolish, and to carry on with the work of this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would simply remind my colleague from Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead that there is a rule of relevance in the House and if he wants to comment on Motion No. 2 before us I would be interested in hearing him. However, if he wants to talk about the celebrations on the Hill tonight, let him tell us right away.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I must admit that my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier is quite right. He is a very sensible man. But I cannot pass up the opportunity to tell you that what the minister just said is totally false. I never, ever received an offer for any briefing from his department. On the contrary, they think that they know the sacred truth and that they do not have to talk with pro-sovereignty Quebecers who represent a large majority of the population. They never contacted us.

He referred to a research budget. I will tell you that the House of Commons has always refused, through the government, to recognize the Bloc Quebecois as a party, so we have to be treated as independent members.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is such a thing as the rule of relevance. I would hope that the hon. member would speak to Motion No. 2. If he does not, I will recognize another member.

I will give him one more chance either to speak on the motion or I will recognize another member.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I thought that we were discussing the point of order that had been raised and I was waiting for your decision.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Derek Lee (for Mrs. Finestone) moved:

Motion No. 5A.

That Bill C-38 be amended in Clause 11 by striking out lines 26 and 27 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"and (2)."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at report stage of the bill now before the House.

The first vote is on Motion No. 2. Call in the members.

The House divided on the Motion No. 2, which was negatived on the following division:

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe that you will find consent to place the following motion without debate or amendment. I move:

> That eight members and the necessary staff of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs be authorized to travel to eastern and western Europe within the context of its current study on the role of the Canadian Forces in a changing world at any time between January 26, 1992 and February 16, 1992 for a period not exceeding a total of 15 days inclusive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to express my concern. This afternoon I was at the meeting of the multicultural committee with five or six witnesses who had come some distance. We stopped the committee and I rushed over here to vote. As I got in the door everything was over.

I really must object that my rights have been infringed because of two-minute bells. I certainly hope the House will look into this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member should know that under the new Standing Orders the Whips can come in at any time. I would hope that she would check with her House leader.

It being 5.10 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 5.10 p.m.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a number of my colleagues raised a very serious point of order with regard to comments made by the Prime Minister.

I know that you have now had an opportunity to be seized with the particular issue, but due to the fact that the Prime Minister is not in the House I am wondering if we could have some indication from the Chair that perhaps your ruling could be made later this day when the Prime Minister is in the House so that we may have the matter resolved and resolved forthwith.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, since then I have had an opportunity to check with the Deputy Prime Minister who sits next to the Prime Minister. I have checked with the minister of youth and amateur sport who sits behind the Prime Minister and with the Whip, and I remember what I heard. We deny categorically and absolutely that the words attributed to the Prime Minister were stated by the Prime Minister.

• (1010)

Mr. Speaker: Before we go further let me say that members were heard yesterday. I am seized with the matter, as the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has pointed out. I do not want further debate on it. I will indicate in response to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that I have looked at Hansard and I have checked the tape, watched it, and it does not assist us at all in this matter.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has suggested that the Prime Minister might return to the House at some later moment and I think that probably would be appropriate. Until I hear from the Prime Minister the matter is not completely settled.

I am indicating to the House that certainly at the moment I cannot advance the argument one way or the other as a consequence of having checked with the Hansard and checked with the tapes.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, just to seek clarification, you are awaiting the appearance of the Prime Minister before this is pursued any further. Is that correct?

Mr. Speaker: There is obviously an attempt being made by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond to have this matter resolved in a civilized way and according to the rules.

If the hon. government House leader disagrees, I will give him the floor. I will hear him.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, we have a situation in which an accusation is made by members opposite which is absolutely denied by everybody within earshot of the Prime Minister. The record was checked concerning any verification of this accusation by Hansard or by the tapes. There is absolutely none.

I dispute the fact that the allegation remains outstanding. An allegation is made without foundation or proof and it is categorically denied. That should be the end of it.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask all hon. members for just a moment, including ministers and front-bench members on the other side and anybody else, to just quiet down.

One of the reasons we are in difficulty is that there is too much shouting back and forth. Sometimes what is shouted back and forth creates a situation that may not be excusable and it may not be right but it creates disorder because somebody responds. It is not an easy task in a situation like this to find a way through it according to procedure and according to the best sense of civility that we can muster in the House. The hon. House leader feels that it is not necessary for the Prime Minister to come into the House.

If the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond feels that the denial the Prime Minister made outside the House is sufficient, I will accept it.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the matter has been raised through several interventions yesterday.

The hon. government House leader has made a proposition. He has indicated that members of his caucus did not hear the remarks. They deny the remarks as part of a tradition of this House. I will accept the word of the hon. member who says that.

When the Prime Minister returns to the House and says that on the floor of the House of Commons, we will then respect the words of that hon. member. Until such time we think it only appropriate and fair to all concerned since there are hon. members on this side who believe something different.

We will wait for the Prime Minister to return and to make a brief denial, if you will, or statement or apology.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to simply raise one point. Yesterday, after Question Period, the Speaker was asked to review the "blues" with regard to the statement of the Prime Minister.

I heard the Speaker say this morning that he reviewed the "blues" and they were not helpful. I would like to ask the Speaker to examine those words, because I think they are very helpful in that there are no such words on the "blues" or on any records of this House.

I want to be very careful to ask that the Speaker examine those words because I think the right words are that it was helpful.

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to get into an argument of semantics.

What I am saying to all members of the House and to the public is that neither the "blues", the Hansard, the tape, the television nor the soundtrack give any indication whatsoever that the Prime Minister said the words alleged.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we talk about tradition in this House. I am certainly one who respects the traditions and tries—

Mr. Simmons: You would never know it sometimes.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, please.

Does any hon. member really believe that by shouting at the minister when he is on his feet is helping us to settle this matter?

Mr. Simmons: I do not believe it but he is allowed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burin—St. George's will take his seat and be quiet.

Mr. Simmons: Play fair. He disrupted the House for five minutes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burin—St. George's will retract that accusation against the Chair.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the record will show that the right hon. gentleman from Yellowhead disrupted the House for five minutes with his shouting.

I retract any inference against the Chair, but I appeal to the Chair to continue its known fairness.

Mr. Speaker: That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to draw the attention of all of us to what I think would be quite a new practice established here.

Were it possible for an accusation or an attribution of words to be made to another member, however outrageous or however unfair that might be, and then to somehow transfer to the accused the onus of denying words that person never said, would be in my judgment a departure from the traditions of this House and not a helpful departure from the traditions of this House.

If one seeks to remove the rules of this House from the immunity from partisanship which they have by and large known, then that process can destroy order here surely and absolutely.

I as one member of this House—

Mr. Simmons: Keep him in order too. What a hypocrite.

• (1020)

Mr. Speaker: There is no pleasure in being Speaker and having to give lectures. There probably is a limit to how useful it is but I have to ask for the support of all members. At the moment I am asking members to comply very carefully with the best traditions of this place and let the hon. minister give his remarks. If the hon. member for Burin—St. Georges wishes to respond, he can seek the floor.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I think that my earlier intervention which was driven by quite an uncharacteristic loss of my temper was unhelpful to the House. I regret that. I certainly believe that we are moving dangerously close to a practice that could be disruptive to the long-standing order of the House. I would hope that both in the Chair's deliberations and in the decisions members on all sides of the House have to take about this matter that we will not give standing to a practice which might allow me to attribute to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, for example, some words he did not say and then impose upon him an obligation of denial. This has not been the practice of the House and certainly it is not one we should begin.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we can proceed with business of the day forthwith. I do not suggest in any way that members on one side are more correct than members on the other. I say to the minister for constitutional affairs, as I said to the Chair: let us proceed with the business of today. When the Prime Minister is here at three o'clock the matter can be resolved forthwith.

It is not the way to stand in the House very subtly and suggest that 20 members of a caucus are all liars. That is the inference that one could make. That is the interpretation one could take from the hon. member.

I made an offer to proceed forthwith sincerely with the business of the House. At three o'clock the right hon. Prime Minister will then take the floor and make a statement and then the matter will be resolved.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, first of all I apologize for any disruptive tactic. I had difficulty restraining myself because I was doing what I do so often in this House and that is take my example from a man whom at normal times I respect very greatly, the hon. member for Yellowhead. It so happens I was following a terrible example of his this morning. I found a certain hypocrisy in that he could shout for 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: We are on a specific matter. The right hon. minister has indicated that perhaps he was over enthusiastic. Why can we not just leave it at that? If the hon. member for Burin—St. George's has some advise for the Chair on the point we are discussing, I will hear him.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, just to reinforce the point that my colleague made a moment ago, it is not a question of conspiracy in which a bunch of us contrived some words that were never said.

We sincerely believe that we heard and saw mouthed certain expressions. Our analysis of what happened is not confined to members on this side of the Chamber. It has been confirmed by other people who were in the gallery at the time.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. We are getting into an area I felt we ought not to get into.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, speaking of insulting language, and especially on the part of the Prime Minister, it has been six weeks since the Prime Minister used insulting and degrading language in referring to me, and for six weeks, no one has done anything about it.

Mr. Speaker: One moment, please. Yesterday we discussed the position taken by the hon. member for Richelieu.

[English]

I am seized with the matter. I will do the best I can on it. This is not the time to get into it.

I think we are going to proceed with Routine Proceedings.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

PRESENTATION OF TWO REPORTS ON ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN CHAPTER

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present in the House, in both official languages, reports on two activities of the Canadian chapter of the International Assembly of French-speaking Parliamentarians.

My first reference is to the proceedings of the Eighteenth General Assembly, held in Ottawa and Calgary from September 1 to September 8, 1991. I would like to take this opportunity to thank all members who attended, with diligence and enthusiasm, both plenary sessions and commission meetings. I would also like to thank the clerks and all employees of the House who helped us host this meeting of the international Francophonie with graciousness and warmth and, if I may say so, with superb organizational skill.

My second reference, is to the participation of the Canadian chapter of the International Assembly of French-speaking Parliamentarians in the fourteenth Biennale de la langue française held in Lafayette, Louisiana, from October 30 to November 6, 1991. I had the honour to represent the association at the Biennale. We discussed how French is taught, the quality of the French spoken in various countries and continents, and the efforts being made throughout the world to preserve and promote that superb instrument of communication of our civilization: the French language.

INDIGENOUS PARLIAMENT OF THE AMERICAS

REPORT ON FIFTH MEETING

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Orders I am pleased to present a report, in both official languages, on the fifth meeting of the Indigenous Parliament of the Americas held in Ottawa between November 10 and November 13 of this year.

This is a gathering of some 50 members of Parliament from Central, South and North America who were here to discuss matters of international concern like the environment, the role they will play in Brazil in the conference there in 1992, human rights violations, the fifth centenary of the arrival of Christopher Columbus to the Americas, the International Labour Organization resolution 169, and the meeting in Greenland which was held by the United Nations, a meeting of experts.

We were very honoured to host this conference.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

20TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 20th report of the Standing Committee on House Management as per Standing Orders 104 and 114 and, if the House gives it consent, I intend to move concurrence in the report later this day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See today Votes and Proceedings.]

CONCURRENCE IN 20TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I move that the 20th report of the Standing Committee on House Management, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND THE STATUS OF WOMEN

SECOND REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women entitled Canada's Children: Investing in our Future. This report is the result of two years of study by the subcommittee on poverty of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare Social Affairs, Senior Citizens and Status of Women which examined the unanimous motion of the House of Commons:

> That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

• (1030)

The report makes recommendations which would ensure that every child in Canada is born as healthy as possible and that all parents have the necessary income to provide for the basic needs of their children and an adequate discretionary income to meet the educational, recreational and cultural needs of their children.

It proposes the design of a program which would provide financial incentives for people to work and ensure income security through an improvement in the federal minimum wage, a guaranteed earned income supplement and a refundable child care tax credit with maximum benefits given to low income earners.

The implementation of these recommendations would not only help poor children, but it would also help Canada compete internationally by maximizing the potential of our most valuable resource, our children.

Your committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response to this report in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 109.

TABLING OF MINORITY REPORTS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we just heard the report of the subcommittee on poverty.

On behalf of the Liberal caucus, I would like to present our minority report.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

I regret that since April, minority reports are now to be heard.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a minority report because the report presented by the subcommittee in our estimation is replete with recommendations that say they should be done as soon as possible with no definite timetable. Some of them have too many exhortations telling provinces what to do without financial and regulatory incentives. In fact, some of the recommendations are futile, downright ridiculous, behind the times in terms of the definition of poverty, redundant and really a further stab at our social programs and not a cure at all for poverty, but instead will perpetuate the malignant problem of poverty in Canada.

Therefore, I table our report.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might get unanimous consent from the House to introduce, in both official languages, the New Democrats minority response to the report?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You do not need unanimous consent. Go ahead.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): The response of the New Democratic Party to the majority report of the subcommittee on poverty is somewhat similar to that just mentioned by my colleague from Winnipeg.

This House has unanimously voted to resolve to end child poverty by the year 2000. This report will not ensure that child poverty is ended by the year 2000.

The Prime Minister made a commitment in signing the UN Declaration on the Rights of the Child to make children the first goal in national resources in good times and bad times.

This report will not support fully that call. It appears to me that the majority response from the subcommittee will hold back both the Prime Minister's commitment and the commitment of this House on the motion of November 1989 to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

What we have available is the New Democrats response which will ensure that the appropriate measures are taken to prevent poverty, rather than just to respond to it once it arises.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have a hunch that we are not going to get to Questions on the Order Paper today because of other items planned for Routine Proceedings.

I have a question for my friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. As was suggested yesterday, I wonder if during the adjournment as the various questions are answered they could simply be tabled with the Clerk so that we would not have to wait until the House reconvenes before the answers are forthcoming.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure my friend that I am looking at that option at this point and will be back to him with an answer before the day is out.

• (1040)

I also want to indicate to him that I expect we will get to questions, perhaps after we have done some of the motions and can allow the ministers to return to cabinet meetings. Then we could answer them at that time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe that you will find unanimous consent for me to move the following motion without debate or amendment:

> That eight members and the necessary staff of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs be authorized to travel to eastern and western Europe within the context of its current study on the role of the Canadian Forces in a changing world at any time between January 26, 1992 and February 16, 1992 for a period not exceeding a total of 15 days inclusive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no consent.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 56.1(1)(a), I move:

That eight members and the necessary staff of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs be authorized to travel to eastern and western Europe within the context of its current study on the role of the Canadian Forces in a changing world at any time between January 26, 1992 and February 16, 1992 for a period not exceeding a total of 15 days inclusive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion.

Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places?

And less than 25 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion is carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I first of all want to make it clear that we did not stand in opposition to this motion because we had supported the motion in principle. But I do want to register strong opposition to the use of this Standing Order for this purpose.

Obviously when Standing Order 56.1 was drafted, the intention was that it would be used only when proper notice was impossible to give and action had to be taken. Obviously there was ample time for notice to be given, and I regret the use of this very Draconian Standing Order in this rather casual way.

I simply want to go on record to say that in future our co-operation certainly will not be forthcoming, and I want to say that this is inappropriate.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: Shut up, Joe. Mr. Speaker, I listened when the hon. member for Yellowhead had something to say earlier.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): 'Tis the season to be jolly. Let's not get into that now.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I am also very worried about the use of Standing Order 56.1(1)(a) in this case, to allow eight members to enjoy the perks of a trip around the world for two weeks.

The fact is that a very Draconian measure is being taken for the sake of a trip that will let members travel all over the globe. My point is, that this year the government is making the same mistake it made last year by offering—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret but that is the Standing Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. We know how many members will be on this trip and how many weeks they will be away. However, I would like to know right away how much this is going to cost.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find that there is consent for me to move the following motion without debate or amendment:

That nine members and the necessary staff of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., from February 9 to February 12, 1992 to study the American auditing and accountability system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) I move:

That nine members and the necessary staff of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., from February 9 to February 12, 1992, to study the American auditing and accountability system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Andre, pursuant to Standing Order 56.1(1)(a), moves that nine members and the necessary staff of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C., from February 9 to February 12, 1992, to study the American auditing and accountability system.

Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places?

And less than 25 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion is carried.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I think it is indecent for the government to go on free trips around the world, when Canadian citizens are being asked to tighten their belts.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If hon. members disagree with the Standing Orders then they should do something about that. Otherwise there is no sense debating it in the House.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I might have concerns about the Standing Order, but at least we should follow it. Before this Standing Order is to be used there has to be an attempt to seek unanimous consent prior to the moving of this motion.

It seems to me that procedure was not followed so what we have just done is actually out out of order.

If I am allowed to complete my remarks, I first of all want to say that the procedure was not followed here as per the Standing Order. Second, I want to register once again my strong opposition to the inappropriate use of Standing Order 56.1, to it being used for a particular initiative for which it was never intended.

I simply say in closing that had adequate notice been given on Tuesday this would not have been necessary. But again I want to say that this motion has been proceeded with inappropriately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): As far as I am concerned, the motion was proceeded according to Standing Orders. There is no doubt in my mind.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find that there would be unanimous consent in the House to revert from motions to petitions, thereafter completing petitions and then referring back to motions.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we may do petitions and then allow me to answer the questions as well before returning to the concurrence motions.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, before the points of order on the motion by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, I rose on the motion for the trip to Washington.

I am a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and I refuse to go on this trip.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the member wishes to get any information he should check with his Whip.

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by approximately 2,200 people who wish to petition Parliament with regard to the Young Offenders Act.

They have asked me to present this petition to Parliament in memory of 16-year old Anne Marie Bloskie who was brutally murdered in Barry's Bay last summer.

They make some very cogent points in here. They say that section 16 of the Young Offenders Act fails to provide to the public protection from dangerous young criminals, that the community interest should be protected by allowing the participation of the community through the utilization of trial by judge and jury where young offenders are involved in offences of extreme violence and murder, and that they disagree with the light sentence that is involved with Bill C-12.

• (1050)

They are very concerned that once young offenders are sentenced to prison they have proper medical facilities available to treat them the moment they are incarcerated and that they be properly assessed before they are allowed back out on the streets. Therefore the petitioners recommend that psychological treatment for young offenders should be mandatory and immediate upon sentencing.

I present the petition on behalf of 2,200 very serious petitioners from across Ontario.

JASPER AND BANFF NATIONAL PARKS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions.

The first was signed by some 350 residents of Jasper, Alberta. They are opposed to proposed regulations which would close the airstrip in Jasper National Park.

The second petition was signed by 33 residents of the city of Calgary who also support the retention of airstrips in both Jasper and Banff National Parks.

HERRING FISHERY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise also pursuant to Standing Order 36. I have a petition signed by 152 fish plant workers from the Meteghan, Saulnierville, Weymouth and Church Point areas of southwestern Nova Scotia. They work in the herring fishery and are opposed to the practice of over-the-side sales when fish plants have no work.

The petitioners humbly pray and call on the House of Commons to urge the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to take measures to stop the over-the-side sale of herring and help Canadians process the fish for sale to the foreigners.

HOUSING

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I also have another one signed by 1,313 people from the Yarmouth area of southwestern Nova Scotia.

The petitioners are concerned about the government's constitutional proposal to transfer the jurisdiction of housing to the provinces without compensation. They are worried that the provinces will not be able to afford to maintain the current level of housing assistance on their own.

The petitioners call upon the minister responsible for Constitutional affairs to look again at this transfer.

RAIL LINE PRIVATIZATION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to table with you today.

The first petition has in excess of 2,000 names of individuals from the island of Cape Breton who are opposed to the privatization of the rail line between Sydney and Truro, Nova Scotia.

These petitioners come from such communities as Glace Bay, Sydney, New Waterford, Dominion, Sydney River and Port Morien. They call upon the government to intervene with CN in order to preclude this particular privatization of a rail line which has served the industrial heartland of Cape Breton for a good number of years.

My second petition again has in excess of 2,000 names. It comes from many parts of Cape Breton, particularly rural Cape Breton. Individuals from all over the island are opposed to the government's privatization of the rail line between Sydney and Truro, Nova Scotia.

The petitioners call upon the Government of Canada, under the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, to give a directive to CN in order to preclude the privatization of this rail line. It is very important not only to the industrial heartland of Cape Breton, but it has a profound economic impact in rural Cape Breton, namely on Stora Forest Industries as well as the coal industry, the steel industry and all other major sectors of our economy.

They call upon the government to act on behalf of those citizens who are opposed to the privatization of this railway line.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present more than 100 petitions which contain thousands of signatures of citizens in Burlington, Hamilton, Stoney Creek, Dundas, Mississauga, Oakville, Scarborough, Guelph, Kitchener, and all over southwestern Ontario.

The petitioners urge the government to stiffen the penalties for violent crime and point in particular to the death of Miss Nina de Villiers who was brutally murdered on August 9, 1991.

The petitioners ask that the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General continue to review all legislation that deals with public safety and negotiate where necessary with provincial authorities to ensure the laws are amended to reflect the concern expressed by the petitioners on public safety.

[Translation]

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by several Canadians from the national capital region, that is by people on both sides of the river, in both provinces. The petition asks the federal government to do something about oil prices in the area, which are excessively high compared with prices in other areas such as southern Ontario.

[English]

UKRAINE

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition signed by approximately 50 residents of my riding of Okanagan Centre.

They call upon the Government of Canada to give genuine support to the people of Ukraine by officially recognizing Ukraine's independence in establishing full diplomatic relations with the government and the people of Ukraine.

ATLANTIC CATCH FAILURE PROGRAM

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 regarding a petition related to the Atlantic Catch Failure Program.

It is signed by residents, mostly fisherpersons and those involved in the fish plants from Bonavista Bay, Trinity Bay and Conception Bay, all affected by the catch failure program. I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that their living depends very much on the fishery and 1991 was the biggest failure in the memories of those who are involved.

The Atlantic Catch Failure Program which was introduced in October was supposed to be a response, but unfortunately the response was inadequate to the crisis which threatens the continued viability of the industry, the existence of communities and the livelihood of the fishermen, plant workers and their families. It is going to be a cold winter for many families.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to review the Atlantic Catch Failure Program to ensure a timely and a very adequate response and a redress for all those whose livelihoods have been so adversely affected by the failure of the fishery this year.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a series of petitions I would like to table today.

The first one is from over 100 participants in Snow Show in Thunder Bay who are all calling on the government and Parliament to restore VIA Rail to its levels of a couple of years ago.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, a number of petitioners from Prince Edward Island are very concerned about the plans for building a bridge or causeway to connect it to the mainland.

They are asking for a halt to all business until such time as a direct vote of the public is held in the form of a plebiscite.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a third group of petitions from hundreds of people from Thunder Bay and northwestern Ontario who are totally against the GST, the free trade agreement, the high interest rates and the high dollar and ask Parliament to do something about it.

UKRAINE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the patrons of the Ukrainian Cultural Centre in Thunder Bay and the Holy Cross Ukrainian Church in Thunder Bay, I am pleased to table a petition that asks Parliament to advise the federal government to declare September 7, Ukrainian Day in recognition of the rich heritage and enormous contribution of Canadians of Ukrainian descent.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you would agree with that.

[Translation]

GATT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions signed by 700 constituents in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. These constituents are very worried about the GATT negotiations. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the government to protect our supply management systems during these negotiations.

I would also like to inform the House that during the past three weeks, I tabled petitions with about 1,200 signatures, in addition to the 700 I tabled today, which means that a total of 1,900 people have demonstrated their interest in this very important matter.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to present two petitions signed by people from my riding.

The first says that dairy and poultry farmers of Canada are concerned that the marketing systems may be in jeopardy due to the implementation of the free trade agreement and the current round of GATT negotiations.

Canadian dairy and poultry farmers have developed the most sophisticated marketing system in the world and provide high quality products to our consumers.

These petitioners are from such places in my riding as Lower Bedeque, Fernwood, Albany, Crapaud and other places. They instruct the government to hold our Canadian system up as an example to the rest of the world and to protect it in the current round of GATT negotiations.

• (1100)

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the other petition I have concerns transportation links to Prince Edward Island.

The Government of Canada has constitutional responsibility for the development of these lines. The Government of Canada's long-term solution for the province's transportation needs, the contract for the bridge, has yet to be approved. Following the award of the contract it may take seven to ten years to complete construction. The Government of Canada's ferry service between the province and the mainland is now being stretched beyond capacity.

These petitioners from places in my riding such as Cornwall, North River, Long Creek, Harrington and other communities. They say to the government that Prince Edward Islanders deserve and require a vastly improved ferry service.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present two petitions today. The first one has to do with the cutbacks in VIA Rail service, signed by a great many of my constituents who have been directly affected by the cuts in VIA Rail and some who have had meaningful access to their cottages cut back severely.

They call upon the government to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

TARTAN DAY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): I have another petition here, Mr. Speaker. I note that the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan presented a petition having to do with Ukrainian heritage.

Mr. Speaker, as you might know, the Ukrainians and the Scots share a patron saint in St. Andrew. I have the honour to present a petition calling on the federal government to declare April 6, Tartan Day, in recognition of the rich heritage and enormous contribution of Canadians of Scottish descent.

I hope this petition might find favour with the Chair.

GATT

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 as well with two petitions.

The first one is on behalf of numerous agricultural producers in the province of Alberta. Many of them are from the riding of Macleod which I serve.

These producers are very concerned with the current multilateral negotiations at the Uruguay round on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, more specifically the rules regarding international agricultural trade.

The many poultry and egg producers and concerned citizens of Alberta who have signed this petition support the efforts of this Government of Canada at the GATT negotiations. They support the federal government's position on the issue of agricultural trade. They want an agreement which restores sanity to international agricultural trade.

They urge the Canadian government to maintain its position on article XI of the GATT, to maintain a position that should be clarified and strengthened to protect Canada's system of supply management.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is a very substantive one. It is on behalf of 600 citizens of the province of Alberta. Most of the signatures come from the riding of Macleod.

The petition is in support of the proposed spending control act, an important piece of legislation and one widely supported by the people of Macleod.

By signing this petition they have indicated their support for the federal government's initiative to legislate limits on government spending. They have simple message for all hon. members of the House, that enough is enough.

They want us to get the government's fiscal house in order and ask that members of the House unanimously support this legislation.

These are from many communities.

JUSTICE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have a petition to present to this House. It is my honour and duty to do so and it has been certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It contains the signatures of many Canadians living in my riding of Hamilton West, right through down to Tillsonburg, Binbrook and other areas of Hamilton and Burlington.

They join the over 100,000 petitioners who have all called on this House to support the parents of Nina de Villiers and request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

CROATIA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of people from central British Columbia, calling upon the Government of Canada to recognize an independent and sovereign Croatia. They are calling upon the government to provide adequate humanitarian aid for those gallant Croatians defending their families, their homes and their homeland. They raised a number of other items, but I will present those at subsequent times.

I want to say that I consider it a privilege and indeed an honour to have this opportunity to make this presentation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter I have a petition from a large number of constituents, literally many hundreds of people. I have not counted all of the names.

They point out their concern that the government's 9 per cent goods and services tax is causing a great deal of economic pain for increasing numbers of Canadians and are asking the government to reconsider continuing with this tax.

RCMP

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, petitioners from Kamloops are calling upon the Government of Canada to ensure that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has adequate funding to enable it to fulfil its mandate and its role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On the last matter, the petitioners are pointing out their concern for the plan of a Vancouver based company, in co-operation with a California based company, and their intention to dam the North Thompson River at Vavenby, British Columbia, in an effort to divert some of the water into the San Diego, California area.

They are simply calling upon the government to indicate that Canadian rivers are not for sale.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by some 1,500 people from Montreal and more specifically Hochelaga—Maisonneuve and certified by the clerk of petitions.

The petitioners are concerned and want Parliament to pass legislation now to limit government spending.

[English]

UKRAINE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition dated November 22 which I just received very recently. The petition is signed by a number of members from the Ukrainian community in my riding of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

They call upon the government to recognize Ukraine, to recognize its independence and to move to establish full diplomatic relations.

On behalf of the Ukrainian community in Moose Jaw and on behalf of all constituents in Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, I want to congratulate the government on its swift recognition of Ukraine and would urge the government to press forward with its establishment of full diplomatic relations with the government and the people of Ukraine.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 52 and 138.

[Text]

Question No. 52—Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River):

With respect to security of the mail (a) have many letter carriers have been robbed in (i) 1990 (ii) 1991 (b) are letter carriers permitted to leave government cheques in relay boxes and, if not, for what reason (c) does Canada Post insist that government cheques be carried at all times by letter carriers (d) are keys to relay boxes given to contractors and, if so, what effect does that have on security (e) what measures has Canada Post taken to inform the public to be more careful with valuables shipped in the mail?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): A) Nationally, our incidents are as follows:

(i) In December 1990 there was one attempted robbery and one which resulted in the loss of approximately 120 pieces of mail.

(ii) In March 1991 there were two armed robberies of letter carriers, one resulting in the loss of official keys and the satchel and the other in the loss of keys.

No injuries were sustained in any of the above events.

B) As a result of a number of incidents relative to relay boxes, including theft and break-ins of these boxes, we implemented an interim protective measure to have letter carriers carry government cheques rather then sending them to their respective relay boxes. This measure was implemented March 1, 1991 and remains in place.

C) As indicated above, an interim procedure was implemented to have letter carriers carry government cheques rather then sending to relay boxes. This procedure is still in place.

D) Relay box keys are issued to contracted personnel for the purpose of delivering letter carrier relay bags at locations where employees are not used and for maintenance purposes. All such contractors are security screened by Canada Post and the keys are signed for and returned daily.

E) Canada Post corporation encourage its customers to purchase insurance when mailing items of intrinsic value within the guidelines of the corporation's policy.

Question No. 138—Mr. Nunziata:

Since 1988 have any members of the parliamentary press gallery entered into any contract with the government and, if so, (a) what are the names of the individuals (b) what was the nature of the contract or services provided (c) what was the individual paid?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed as follows:

(a)	(b)	(c)
Debra Brown	Communications Services	$ 3,883. 4,219.	E & I
Richard Inwood	Participation on the Basic Public Affairs Officers Course	$ 500. 500.	DND
Murray Maltais	Research services	$ 200.	PMO/PCO
Kenneth Pole	Speech writing	$ 535. 749. 1,050.	ECC
Jeffrey Simpson	Preparation and presentation of a summary session given at a seminar on the role of supply management by the National Farm Products Marketing Council.	$ 3,000.	NFPMC
	Researching, writing, preparing and presenting of a speech, on the role citizenship plays in the current constitutional debate from a non-governmental, non-partisan perspective.	$ 3,938.26 (Incl. travel expenses)	MULCIT
	Guest Speaker—Department of Finance management seminar.	$ 1,500.	PRIV. & REG. AFFAIRS
Michel Vastel	Acting as an animator from outside the federal government to provide the context for a discussion of national unity issues at a departmental senior management meeting.	$ 500.	CCA

Other departments have no information on this subject.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 137 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 137 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 137—Mr. Breaugh:

Did the government host a reception held on the fourth floor terrace of the United Nations Building in New York, during the opening of the General Assembly of the United Nations in the fall 1991, and, if so, (a) what was the cost of food served (b) what was on the menu (c) what beverages were served and what were (i) their country of origin (ii) total cost (d) what other costs were associated with this event, such as transportation, room rentals, service and communications?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Riis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just want to seek clarification from my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader in terms of the questions that are yet unanswered and are in contravention of the Standing Orders as a result because they are long past the 45 days required.

Could I ask my friend if he would indicate whether or not he has had a chance to consider the suggestion that as the questions are answered the answers be tabled during adjournment?

Mr. Cooper: No, Mr. Speaker. Since the hon. member last raised this issue I have been in my seat and have not had a chance to do those consultations, but I assure him I will.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motions.

Mr. Hawkes: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, just before we come to motions.

Earlier I was tempted to rise when some Independents raised some questions about the costing of motions for parliamentary committees to travel.

I just want the House to know that in my riding my constituents are worried about paying salaries to those same members because they show up here so very seldom.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I move that the second report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, presented to the House on Friday, November 1, be concurred in.

• (1110)

We could adopt the motion now, but I believe it would be appropriate for me to say a few remarks.

[Translation]

All members of the House will admit that if we want to make the best use of resources we must be able to measure the performance of programs. Such evaluations enable members of Parliament, public servants and Canadians at large to check whether the rationale, objectives and design of programs are satisfactory and to compare the desired and observed results.

Thanks to the program evaluation done at the Department of Finance, Parliament and Canadians have been better informed of how efficiently bureaucrats or civil servants, if you prefer, handle their tax dollars.

These performance evaluations are particularly important when budgets are tight. Canadians have never been asked to do so much to reduce the budget deficit. Because of these many constraints, future governments, of whatever party, will have difficulty fulfilling their mandate, for lack of resources.

Therefore it has never been so important for Canadians to know that the various government policies are justified and cost effective. Canadians want to be sure that they are getting their money's worth. That is clear and I think it is justified.

Taxpayers are increasingly reluctant to loosen the purse strings. They are wary of the excessive demands made by all governments. Never have the objectives of various tax measures been called into question so much. I am thinking of the Income Tax Act, remission orders, tax incentives for investment and the goods and services tax, to name only these.

The public accounts committee, which I chair, was therefore very surprised to learn that the Department of Finance was reorganizing the way it evaluates tax measures. The committee expressed great concern about the cavalier way that the department dismantled the tax evaluation division. Just an internal memo announced the reorganization of the important evaluation unit. A reminder of the events that led to the creation of the tax evaluation division in the Department of Finance is in order. As we know, this division was created in 1987 following many recommendations made by the Auditor General, the public accounts committee of the House of Commons and the Senate finance committee.

In 1983 the Auditor General already pointed out that finance was the only major department that had no program evaluation function. The Auditor General noted that the Department of Finance was the only department that apparently felt no obligation to give someone responsibility for program evaluation or to set up an evaluation unit. At the time, however, there were very clear Treasury Board guidelines which applied to all departments and agencies.

Perhaps I could give a few examples to illustrate the need for program evaluation. In 1984, the Department of Finance suggested introducing a research and development tax credit. Without an evaluation unit, this piece of fiscal foolhardiness ended up costing Canadians several billion dollars. Unfortunately the tax measure had not been evaluated by a special evaluation unit before it was introduced.

In his 1985 report the Auditor General of Canada highlighted the problems associated with the remission order given to the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited. It was after these events that the Senate Committee on National Finance and the House of Commons Committee on Public Accounts suggested the regular publication of a tax expenditure account.

[English]

In 1987 the finance department finally gave in and announced the establishment of a tax evaluation division. This new unit was to evaluate the effectiveness of fiscal policies in accordance with the guidelines issued by the Comptroller General of Canada.

[Translation]

The program evaluation policy, as revised in August 1991, provides that the deputy minister is responsible for reviewing all programs in his department.

He must report on program productivity and entrust a independent senior manager with the management of the evaluation process. He is also responsible for setting evaluation criteria and ensuring that all programs are evaluated periodically.

[English]

I should emphasize that given the prodding needed to get the finance department to establish a tax evaluation division, its getting out of the program three and a half years later is rather strange. It was the last in but the first out.

Numerous reports from the Auditor General, the public accounts committee of this House and the Senate finance committee were published on the inefficiency of some tax measures.

Furthermore, commitments made by the department in the past were given to the public accounts committee. The decision to put a discreet stop to the division's activities three and a half years later without informing the Office of the Comptroller General, the committee or the Auditor General is surprising, to say the least.

The committee had commitments made in March 1988 and signed by the previous Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre. I quote from the second paragraph of that letter: "I am entirely in accord with the committee's conclusion that Parliament needs information of higher quality on tax incentives, accountability and the tax system". The minister went even further and also assured the public accounts committee that the mandate of the division would: "provide evaluation of tax measures independent from line management".

The reorganization proposed by the Department of Finance three years later will not respect these commitments given by the former Minister of Finance, especially the requirements that the program evaluation be made independent from line management.

[Translation]

What the finance department proposed as an alternative to the evaluation unit does not meet Treasury Board guidelines. The guidelines issued by the Comptroller General's office require that these programs be evaluated independently, as I said earlier.

We think it is clear the department will no longer observe this guideline and these commitments. Furthermore, the Comptroller General requires that all programs be evaluated, every single one. Now that the division has been disbanded, the department no longer has an independent evaluation function. For instance, the government must finance, by means of various financial instruments, $400 billion in cumulative debt. The government's most expensive program, debt servicing, which in 1991 will cost us $41 million, is not evaluated. No one, including parliamentarians who are regularly called upon to vote on this matter, knows whether the program is managed efficiently.

This new way of doing or, should I say, not doing things, is a matter of serious concern to members of the public accounts committee. Others are concerned as well. Although the Comptroller General argued that the finance department's decision did not necessarily endanger the program evaluation function and that we should wait to see the results before judging the department's decision, the same Comptroller General acknowledged that the new method of evaluating tax measures was not what he would prefer. This decision must be a matter of serious concern to all parliamentarians. The department reneged on the commitment it gave the public accounts committee in 1987.

What parliamentarians should understand is that the decision to reorganize the evaluation of tax measures puts at risk the independence of evaluations of those measures and the objectivity of the reporting. By giving responsibility for evaluating the effectiveness and efficiency of tax measures to the same managers who developed them, the department inevitably runs the risk of creating conflict situations. Human nature being what it is, officials will always have a tendency to protect the tax measures they propose after several months or years of hard work, even if they prove to be inefficient or too costly. From now on, with the new method of evaluating tax measures, officials will be asked to be both judge and jury.

The finance department told us that these managers would report to a director general who would be outside the authority hierarchy. However, it is likely that this director general will co-ordinate evaluations but have neither authority nor influence. The manager in charge of the evaluation group might not be informed if embarrassing results were discovered.

• (1120)

That is why tax measures must be evaluated independently. As I already said, that is exactly what the Comptroller General of Canada ordered in his directive. The public accounts committees ask for nothing more and nothing new. We ask the Department of Finance to apply Treasury Board's directives and standards.

Why make an exception today, when it was unacceptable four years ago? Besides the question of the objectivity and independence of evaluations, which involves the validity of the results and analyses, the department's decision will also have other major consequences. For example, the Department of Finance is losing employees who developed very valuable expertise in tax evaluation.

This will all be lost because the Department of Finance has dismantled that division. It will be hard to replace. The tax evaluation division was the only program evaluation unit in the Department of Finance.

The division had to examine tax revenues of over $100 billion a year and tax expenditures of tens of billions of dollars. The Comptroller General's office wants all programs, without exception, to be evaluated periodically. When he appeared before the committee, the Comptroller General admitted that the Department of Finance was unable to evaluate all its programs, including the one we consider the most important, debt service.

The committee is concerned and parliamentarians should also be concerned about this bureaucratic decision. In fact, the committee thinks that the Deputy Minister of Finance will no longer be fulfilling his responsibilities if he does not apply Treasury Board's directives on program evaluation to the letter. As we know, these directives are from the Comptroller General. Parliamentarians must correct this situation.

This division was also meant to foster public discussion. Making information and evaluations public stimulated debate among parliamentarians and all Canadians. With this information, we were able to know whether tax measures were effective or not, whether the objectives and the ways they were reached were right and what these measures cost. With these documents giving a positive or negative assessment of various policies, we could tell whether the same objectives could be achieved at less cost to the public treasury.

The reorganization carried out by the department is therefore regrettable and could have harmful consequences, since Canadians and parliamentarians may from now on be kept ignorant.

[English]

The division has published several reports on the Cape Breton tax credit, pension plans, exploration tax credits and remission orders. These reports concluded that the fiscal policies put into place were not, these particular measures anyway, always meeting their aims. Other reports were not publicly released by the Department of Finance.

Commitments were given to the public accounts committee by the Department of the Comptroller General. We have on the record these commitments to reduce the committee's apprehensions about the consequences of this bureaucratic decision, but they do not diminish the seriousness of the problem.

The Department of Finance has proposed to table a calendar for the next three years covering evaluations of future tax measures. This will not solve the lack of independence and the lack of objectivity in the evaluations made by employees reporting to a staff manager without real power.

This is why the public accounts committee asked Revenue Canada to join the work of the advisory committee put in place by the Department of Finance. This advisory committee is supposed to establish the work plan and discuss the evaluations.

The Comptroller General has also been invited by the Department of Finance to sit as a representative. The public accounts committee expects the Comptroller General to report to this committee regularly.

Parliamentarians must be informed. Bureaucrats must respect the guidelines established by the Treasury Board. Departments must comply. The Comptroller General should make sure that these guidelines are all respected.

If we allow the Department of Finance not to respect the guidelines the message sent to the other departments will be wrong. We fear that the example set by the Department of Finance could be something that would be repeated in other departments and I do believe would lead to a very serious situation in terms of the government's control over public funds.

The Department of Finance plays a major role and has a lot of influence in the working of the government.

A precedent could be created by this department. Other departments might be tempted, as I said, to disband their program evaluations unit.

[Translation]

In conclusion, if each department and agency acted like the Department of Finance, we would have confusion and chaos. There would be no more standards and therefore no more controls. Members should rise in the House and sound the alarm and tell bureaucrats and public servants that we want standards, we want controls, we want information, and we want it to be effective and efficient.

[English]

The repercussions for all Canadians could be very costly. Parliament could be kept in complete ignorance as to whether, for example, the finance department tax measures are efficient. By adopting this unanimous report by the public accounts committee a strong signal will be sent throughout the government.

I therefore want to thank the members of the committee for their co-operation in presenting the second report and I hope the House will approve of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me congratulate my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier who, as chairman of the committee, does an excellent job and who this morning explained in a correct detailed way the motion before us that deals with the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, which made recommendations concerning the Department of Finance.

On the issue discussed this morning, I think we must go back a bit and ask why the Department of Finance decided to close something down. You will remember that in 1984, when we were elected, the government was spending $16 billion more every year than it took in, setting aside interest on the debt for now. I repeat that as far as operations are concerned, the government that preceded us spent $16 billion more than it took in. This year our government will spend almost $13 billion less than it takes in, which means that there has been a turnaround of close to $30 billion in seven years. How was this change brought about? How is it that today the government is running an operating surplus when it ran a deficit before? There have been tax increases, and I believe that all Canadians will agree that those were reasonable increases that account for approximately 30 per cent of those $30 billion. There have also been cuts in the federal government and the public service, which account for 70 per cent of those $30 billion. It is in those cuts, in that 70 per cent, that we find the issue we are discussing this morning.

Right now, we have the same number of public servants as in 1973. We have eliminated 12,000 civil service positions since 1984. These are all factors to take into consideration in the matter raised by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. One of this government's major commitments is to cut spending and thus reduce our debt. As you would do in your own house, or my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier would do in his, reducing spending and thus reducing our debts means making cuts. In the case that now concerns us, the committee is worried about an internal committee of the Department of Finance for tax evaluation. That is the big subject of discussion this morning. I would point out to hon. members, that since his report was tabled in the House in October or November, the Department of Finance normally has 150 days to respond to my colleague's report. Up to now, as he mentioned, I know that the deputy minister has submitted his comments and the department has already put in place several of the proposals put forward by my hon. colleague in his report.

I think that the committee has done an excellent job, and its chairman too, of course. We ought to continue, in this vein, to deal with issues in this non-partisan way for the sake of all Canadian men and women.

Having said this, I disagree with my hon. colleague on one point and that is when he says that because the tax evaluation division no longer exists, all of sudden nobody will know what is going on. I think, that we should go back to the roots of the system and the people involved in it, namely the members of this House. They are the ones who ultimately, decide, tax, financial, social and cultural issues. Members of the House of Commons are responsible for tax decisions and it is also our duty to see to it that over time the tax measures in place that were passed by Parliament are good and worthwhile for the country and for the people of this country. In the end, this is our responsibility as elected members of Parliament.

Civil servants are there to assist the elected members to make decisions. They are there to serve the Canadian public as a whole. I think this is the basic system that we should keep in mind when we look at the matter which my hon. colleague raised this morning.

One of the committee's recommendations had to do with monitoring. As my colleague explained, the Comptroller General's Office will have a representative on the committee which will be set up precisely to look at tax policies. We must not forget that the quality of the work done by the department will be maintained because there are still people there, even though a division is gone, and a review will also be done by outside experts and reports will be published. I believe these are the two key factors that will help members of this House decide on tax matters and on the review of fiscal programs put in place by the Department of Finance.

In conclusion, I want to say that I appreciate the work done by the committee, its members and its chairman. However, it may be premature this morning to make a final decision on the committee's recommendations, because the Department of Finance is still looking into the matter, although it showed good faith by implementing several recommendations of the committee.

The House must give the Department of Finance time to to complete its review and to enable the public accounts committee to keep up its excellent work so that the Department of Finance can also work for the well-being of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure this morning to speak in favour of the concurrence motion of my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

The motion is with respect to concurrence in the recommendations and the second report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. This report deals with the disbanding of the tax evaluation division of the Ministry of Finance.

It is somewhat a concern, certainly to myself, the New Democratic Party and the members of the public accounts committee that the department had to be essentially badgered into seeing the wisdom of a tax evaluation system and finally proceeded with that system. A division within the department separate and apart from the rest has now only after three and a half short years been disbanded very quietly by way of interdepartmental memo.

In defence of the department it has set up another system but one which I would suggest lacks the independence which certainly most of the committee and I would like to see.

We looked at what an evaluation system is and why we are talking about it. It is set up within the Treasury Board guidelines in the program evaluation policy in which in setting out the policy of an evaluation system it says: "The objective is to ensure that federal departments have relevant, credible and objective information available on the performance of their programs and they use that information for the cost effective and accountable management of programs".

The policy statement that follows says: "It is the government's policy to periodically evaluate the continued relevance, success and cost effectiveness, i.e. program performance of federal programs, and use that information to reconfirm, improve or discontinue programs".

In light of that this program within the tax department was ultimately set up. I think if we look further within that document, in table 1 as to the program evaluation issues, we see a number of questions such as: Does the program continue to be consistent with departmental and government-wide priorities and address realistically an actual need? In the basic evaluation issues are the activities and outputs of the program consistent with its mandate and plausibly linked to the attainment of the objectives and intended impacts and effects? What impacts and effects, both intended and unintended, resulted from carrying out the program? In what manner and to what extent does the program complement, duplicate, overlap or work at cross-purposes with other programs?

The statement further says: "In what manner and to what extent were appropriate programs objectives achieved as a result of the program? Are there more cost effective alternative programs which might achieve the objectives and intended impacts and effects? Are there more cost effective ways of delivering the existent program?"

It is within that context that all departments have been asked by Treasury Board to set up and maintain an evaluation system. It is within that context I would suggest that over an approximate eight-year period the finance department was pushed, pulled and badgered into finally in 1987 setting up a tax evaluation system.

I think it might be helpful to look a bit at the history of this pushing, pulling and badgering in getting into the context of why we in the public accounts committee looked so seriously upon the disbanding of a tax evaluation division.

• (1140)

It was way back in 1983 that the Auditor General pointed out that the Department of Finance was the only major department without an evaluation unit. In 1984 he again noted that the finance department had displayed negligence in proposing a research and development tax credit that had cost the taxpayer almost $3 billion.

He was pointing to the fact that had there been a proper evaluation within the department perhaps this bleeding of taxpayers' money would have been cauterized. The wound would have been cauterized and the bleeding would have stopped before it got to such an extent of depleting taxpayers' money into a program that was found wanting.

In the Auditor General's 1985 report he highlighted the problems associated in the Department of Finance by highlighting the remission order given to the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company, once again showing that had there been a tax evaluation system set up within the department it would have been forewarned and not been in a problem that cost the Canadian government so many dollars.

It was in this context that the committee on public accounts suggested the regular publication of a tax expenditure account. It stressed the need to introduce an evaluation function into the Department of Finance that would be separate from the department's policy function. I think we should remember that when we think of what has since happened with the tax evaluation system and how it is proposed to now evaluate the tax measures within the Department of Finance.

Continuing historically, in 1986 the Auditor General recommended to the Department of Finance that it ensure that tax delivered systems were accurately evaluated. He asked that the framework reflect Treasury Board guidelines.

Finally in 1987 the Department of Finance acted on some of those recommendations. It set up a new unit to evaluate the effectiveness of fiscal policies in accordance with the guidelines issued by the Comptroller General.

It had been a long, hard struggle but finally there was a system set up, money was set aside and the tax measure evaluation system kicked in.

It appeared that this system was working well. The people within the department, using their expertise, were able to step back from the policy of the on-line managers and look at systems set in place within Canada in the various tax measures, choose strategic ones, point out errors and mistakes, and ensure that they were properly evaluated so that things such as the scientific tax credit bleeding were not repeated again.

We have concern certainly with the way this was dismantled. In a memo from Ian E. Bennett dated July 15, 1991 he states that the purpose of this memorandum he sent around to his department was to advise that the plans to reorganize the way in which the department performs its tax evaluation function were going to be disbanded. He puts it in the context of budgetary cutbacks. I say now that I have grave doubts as to whether that was the real reason for these cutbacks. The amount of the budget for this tax evaluation division was not that great in the context of the billions of dollars spent each year.

It was well under $1 million for the staffing which had been cut back over the years. In this memo he states: "In an effort to ensure the department's limited financial and personnel resources are deployed in a most efficient and effective manner, it has been decided that future evaluation work will be performed within operating divisions of the branch. The tax evaluation division will be disbanded and every effort will be made to assist those individuals affected in finding suitable jobs in the branch".

I am afraid that is not good enough. After so many years of pushing and trying to get a tax measures evaluation system set up and finally getting one that was just adequately getting started, I question whether the department was really looking at the cost of this matter or whether it was looking at trying to ensure that embarrassing matters that could be delved into and dug up by this committee were not kept under wraps. That is not a good reason for disbanding a system that can unearth or ensure the proper value for people's money, the people of Canada's money.

In fairness, this memo stated that there would be a system set up to evaluate work: "Each operating division will incorporate a program for tax evaluation studies as part of its annual work plan. Preparation of an annual tax evaluation plan will be co-ordinated by the general director, analysis, of the tax policy branch and the completed plan will be submitted to the department's evaluation advisory committee by the senior assistant deputy minister. The evaluation advisory committee chaired by an associate deputy minister will review and approve the annual evaluation plan as well as individual evaluation studies. Finally in keeping with current practices, completed studies will be published and released to the public".

We have grave doubts as to whether this complies with the Comptroller General and the Treasury Board's guidelines. From an arm's length review of the evaluation of the programs within a department it seems to me and certainly to the committee that the independence of a tax review is lost in a system when we use the on-line managers to look at the system and make an evaluation.

Is it not human nature to ensure that things that are embarrassing for you or your department are covered up? Is it not human nature to want to ensure that policies you have recommended as an on-line manager, policies you have set up, are not shown to be inadequate, are not shown to be wasteful or ineffective? It is a reflection, I would suggest, on you as the on-line manager.

It seems to me with this lack of independence you would also get a lack of objectivity of the reporting. Even though it is to go back and be looked at by the director general who is to oversee the evaluation, it seems to me, and this is reflected in the committee report, that the information fed to the director general will be coloured by the perceptions of the on-line managers, those very people who set out the policies originally.

A system that sets out the responsibility to evaluate the effectiveness and the efficiency of the fiscal policies of the department and the government, a system that looks to those same officials who developed the policies, runs the risk of getting us into a conflict situation, a conflict of interest as I have already set out. I think we have to be very cautious of that. That is why I believe the committee and I personally are so upset at this cavalier throwing off of a responsibility.

It has also been pointed out by the member from Vanier that it is first in and first out. First of all, it was unfortunate that they took so long in getting an evaluation program but it is worse than that now that they have taken it away. By doing that, they have shown that they can turn their back on Treasury Board and on the Comptroller General and simply say: "We do not want an evaluation program". Here is a major department with $400 million that goes through every year that has successfully been able to turn its back on the guidelines, to turn its back on the Comptroller General and say: "We do not want a system of evaluating from without. We will do it from within". What is to prevent other departments from doing the same thing?

The Comptroller General assured us that he would not let that happen and yet what power does the Comptroller General have not to? The power lies within the departments to set up their programs. The Comptroller General does not have the power to stop them from cutting out the evaluation system. That is my fear. With one of the majors getting away with it, others who decide to save a bit of money will say: "We really do not have to do that because finance has shown us we do not have to do it". They will turn their backs on evaluating their systems. I think that over all that could have a devastating affect upon government programs, upon what we get as the public, upon what we get as members of Parliament on the information of the programs set up within our various departments.

We in the public accounts committee take our job very seriously. All sides of the House have worked hard within that department. They have looked at the systems. They have looked at whether the program within the systems were valid. I have worked in concert, over the two years that I have been a member of the public accounts committee, with the Auditor General in trying to see whether the people of Canada are getting value for their money within the government and within the various programs.

When you have a department that makes it difficult for the public accounts committee to do its job, you have a department that will not work within the system and the guidelines set out. You have a department that tends to ignore some of the requests and the recommendations of not only the Auditor General, but a parliamentary Standing Committee on Public Accounts. It does not bode well, I believe, for the future of the programs.

I have set out some of the concerns and the Comptroller General has said in evidence before the public accounts committee that he does not sit in judgment yet on the system that they have set out and I have outlined briefly from the memo within the department. He is willing to give it a chance.

I have set out a couple of things that have concerned me and have concerned the committee. There have been some efforts to go part way in meeting some of the concerns of the committee by the finance department.

I think the thing that would make me happiest, and I am sure that the members of the committee would agree with this, is that the policy guidelines set out within Treasury Board were followed. In fact there was set up within the tax department an independent body unconnected with the policy makers who could look at the systems.

I implore the department and this government to look at that over the next while and reconsider where they are going. It is important when we have a department in charge and dealing with as much money as this department that we ensure as taxpayers in Canada that those systems work. They should work within the context of how they were set up to work and in the context of giving value to people for money. We should ensure that they do not cost the Treasury of this country, particularly during a time of restraint and recession, billions and billions of dollars because of some people within the system who are protecting their jobs and their backsides because the programs have been inappropriately set up.

I urge the House to pass this motion of concurrence to send a message to the Department of Finance that this House will stand by its public accounts committee and that all departments should pay attention to the recommendations of the public accounts committee.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take a whole lot of the House's time. Members may or may not know that this is the subject matter that I taught at university. I had the honour some time ago, in the first two or three years after my election, to be the keynote speaker at the founding conference of the Evaluation Research Society of Canada which brought together professionals in this field for the very first time. It is a group that has grown in terms of its influence. It is a group that has grown in terms of its knowledge. The methodology today is I believe a great deal more advanced than it was some 10 years ago.

If you want to go back far enough in my own professional career, I was engaged in evaluation research activities as a graduate student in a doctoral program in the late 1960s and subsequently in the early part of the 1970s. I did an awful lot of evaluations in this country and some of the first that were ever done for the Government of Canada, in particular for the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The Department of Employment and Immigration I guess was larger. The one I remember with particular joy was in health and welfare, but there were some for the Privy Council Office and other bodies of government.

I guess I felt compelled to speak this morning because of the subject matter and the reality of the nature of this place. I have not heard a word of praise for the current government being in office seven years and for putting an evaluation research program into the Department of Finance. He did say it happened in 1987, but he did not say it with praise as the chairman of the public accounts committee. The place would work a little better if praise was praise and blame was blame and each was articulated according to reality.

The previous government that the current chairman served did not do it. The trigger I guess was the scientific research tax credit which was mentioned. That was a loss of tax revenue of $3 billion or $4 billion because people did not evaluate the consequences of the tax before they put it in. It happened so fast and the leakage was so great that the world has never been quite the same since.

If I were a methodologist looking at the committee report, I would see a committee which has a great deal of difficulty believing the evidence it gets from the Comptroller General as well as the Department of Finance about what it has done and what it intends to do.

• (1200)

It acknowledges that the evidence coming from those sources is different from what the committee report is perhaps concluding. It clearly runs roughshod over those. But perhaps it is more important that the report concluded on November 1, some five weeks ago, and that it wants government to respond in a comprehensive manner.

That is what the parliamentary reform package that our government brought in, in 1985, was designed to do. It was designed to give committees the power to conduct the investigations of their choice, to report to this House and to compel government through the rules to respond within a period of 150 days.

All that is legitimate and all that is appropriate. What is not appropriate, I believe, is that members are forced to stand in this House in December, five or six weeks after the report was presented to the House, and debate for two hours the subject matter of the report.

The appropriate time to debate is after the comprehensive report. Then members would have the committee's point of view, the government's point of view, and we could engage in real dialogue. We are sort of blowing by that opportunity with a premature motion for concurrence.

We are asking the House to concur in something that it has not had an adequate response to. We are asking the House to vote for something that it does not know enough about. I think that is inappropriate. That is what is wrong with what is happening here this morning.

We do that from time to time. Every time we do it I think it is wrong. When we move too quickly for concurrence in a report, especially one that deals with difficult and technical subject matter, then we are cheating the Canadian taxpayers out of the kinds of concerns and considerations that we are obliged to provide them with.

This should be a Chamber of serious thought, of serious reflection and of serious debate. If we have no other point of view on a subject matter as important as this, we run the risk of reaching some bad conclusions. It is guaranteed. It is not a risk. It is guaranteed that the time we take in debate costs lots of money. Every hour this place operates is a very expensive hour. Do we spend it on this subject matter, that subject matter, or the next subject matter? It depends.

The chairman of the committee has decided that today we shall spend it on the second report. I simply say to the chairman in the future that he should reflect a little more. If he wants the House to debate the matter and if he wants to move concurrence, then he should not ask for a comprehensive government report unless he intends to not move the actual concurrence until that report is part of the House.

The report may indeed be perfectly satisfactory to all members, in which case two hours of House time could be saved and that is several hundred thousand dollars.

This morning we were talking about committee travel for the public accounts committee itself. We could not have had this two-hour debate today and there would have been enough funds saved to send the committee to Washington several times. We would still have saved the taxpayers of this country money. We make choices and some of them are better than others.

I want to mention just a few words out of the report itself because they have not had what I would consider to be the proper emphasis. Let us remember that the report is unanimous. This is the third paragraph of the report. The opening sentence reads:

> Program evaluation is all the more important in the current context of budgetary restraint since resource optimization is now obligatory.

I have sat through Question Period in this Parliament for over three years and this is the first documented case in which the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party of Canada signed a document saying that financial restraint is now obligatory. Is that not marvellous? I wonder if we will see that in Question Period today. Get up and ask about this obligatory restraint.

Mr. Gauthier: I know what the answer is going to be.

Mr. Hawkes: You know what the answer is going to be. For instance, is the chairman of the committee going to ask the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister what the deficit situation is today compared to what it was, and then give the Prime Minister a chance to say that when the Conservatives came into office after those bad guys, the Liberals, were in office for so long the Conservatives had to borrow $16.1 billion? That was $16.1 billion simply to assist in the provision of programs and services in this country and that was in 1984.

As a result of this obligatory spending restraint we are in the position today of having a surplus of $12.7 billion on programs and services that we can apply to the interest on the public debt.

We inherited a situation in which we were borrowing $16.1 billion for programs and services, plus every penny for interest on the public debt. We have turned it around in seven short years into a surplus position. There is no other turnaround of that magnitude in the western world.

How did we do that? It was because we were attuned. Members on this side of the House, chair after chair after chair, desk after desk after desk, committee after committee after committee, brought to this House a concern for practical common sense management. That is what program evaluation is all about. It is about looking at a situation and asking: "Are we wasting money or are we spending money wisely?" It is a belief that pennies add up to dollars, dollars add up to $10, $10 add up to $100, and $100 adds up to $1,000. Out of thousands of dollars come millions of dollars and out of millions come billions if you start to look at your world.

You do not waste two hours of House time on a premature motion, that costs hundreds of thousands of dollars. You do not ask for a report from government that costs hundreds of thousands of dollars unless you want it because you believe it is going to have information that is worth while getting. You spend the money on a report, then you request more spending, and then you want a debate before the report comes in that would tell you whether you needed the debate in the first place or the situation was under control.

That is the Liberal–NDP way. It is all sort of show and tell, with not much practicality to it. How on earth did they get the taxpayers of this country into the mess of borrowing $16 billion for programs and services, and every penny for the debt? That is bankruptcy. This country was bankrupt in 1984. We have worked hard for seven years to change the financial situation, and it is working. You have to stick with it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hawkes: They laugh. That is their attitude to borrowing $16 billion and putting the burden of debt on their children and their grandchildren and their grandchildren's grandchildren. They have no shame about that. They live in an invented reality. We saw this invented reality yesterday at the end of Question Period, and it seized this Chamber for 30 minutes at the beginning of today. They believe it because they repeat it to each other.

An hon. member: It was there.

• (1210)

Mr. Hawkes: You cannot hear something that was not there. What portion of the caucus are embarrassed by this whole thing? They know when they evaluate the situation, evaluate their own experience, that there are some very good people on all sides of this House, all corners of this House and they are embarrassed. They are embarrassed by a runaway mentality that goes beyond the facts. That is how you get bad public policy and that is why program evaluation is important.

That is what I taught. I taught graduate students for a number of years at university. The lesson is simply to apply a social science methodology, the scientific principles and the scientific method, to the information needs of decision makers and evaluate to provide better quality, reliable and valid data to decision makers.

The biggest problem we have in this country, I have said it before and I will say it again, is that the media has no such standard for reliable and valid information. The media feeds on rumour and innuendo.

I saw an article in this morning's Toronto Star that began by using the words: "Angry Prime Minister" in the first paragraph. I do not know, but I will bet dollars to donuts the author of that paragraph was not in the Chamber. There were only eight press people out of the 350 that draw paycheques in this town in the whole Chamber.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is with some temerity that I interrupt the hon. member in his comments. However, I was under the impression that we were on a concurrence motion on the public accounts committee's second report. It seems to me that the hon. member has strayed substantially from the report.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. government Whip is coming right back to the relevance of the motion. The hon. government Whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, a logical chain of evidence and illustrations of a point of view is a foreign concept to a lot of members of the NDP party. They do have trouble following scientific methods because they live in an ideological world where ideas pop out of the sky and do not necessarily have to be related. They can be disjointed. There is a kind of comfort over there.

I have been here some 12–odd years and I have watched it. I am comfortable with the notion that it happens even though it does not please me.

What I am saying is relevant. Let us go back to the portion of the paragraph I read which all members signed, including the members who spoke: "Program evaluation is all the more important in the current context of budgetary restraint since research optimization is now obligatory".

That says that we make good common sense decisions based on accurate information. That is how to get the best bang for the buck. When we listen to headline writers who are never in this Chamber we should be warned that it is bad quality information. Every single person who writes headlines in this country is not familiar with the context. They are trying to sell newspapers, not pass on information.

When people write paragraphs about who looks angry in the context of a front-page news story, and they were not even present, they are writing fiction or hearsay information. I will bet dollars to donuts.

I read the statement of the member for Winnipeg North very carefully. I listened to him when he spoke on decorum in this House. I listened very carefully because it was an excellent, first rate presentation by a relatively new member. He never said in Hansard that he heard anything. He has never said anywhere else, as far as I know, that he heard anything. He was told. He rose on a point of order because of something somebody else told him.

You can see it visually and you can see it in his own words. Then we can get to some sense of reality, some sense of accuracy. It was impossible to hear what is alleged to have been said because it was never said. However, people listen to each other, rumours get started, and rumours get perpetuated.

It is part of our problem in this Chamber. If we are going to criticize maybe I can ask the chairman of the public accounts committee when we are going to get a report from the public accounts committee recommending that the House of Commons have an evaluation research unit to look into some things, for example, how much money some Ottawa area members spend on travel in their own constituency which came out in public accounts documents yesterday. It looks obscene on the surface. There may be a good explanation. Maybe we should have program evaluation research in this unit, in this place, if we are going to say that we need it in lots of other places.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just want to put a couple of questions to my friend and colleague. His prior incarnation was as a psychologist. I think he still practises the trade on us sometimes.

As I listened to him today there was a mild criticism of the fact that the committee moved concurrence in that report today. The member for Calgary West says the government has not had a chance to study the report or to reply. We all know that it will reply within the required time, which I believe is 150 days.

I want to make the point to him that the government, in the person of the Comptroller General who is a public servant under the Treasury Board, came to the committee and told us that this action was taken by the Department of Finance very quietly and secretly in the summer without even telling the Comptroller General. We were quite quite taken aback by this practice.

The Comptroller General came into the committee and said: "It is not my preferred option". We thought he was speaking for the government. At least I believe he speaks for the government. I believe he acts and looks after the interests of all Canadians as a servant of Treasury Board and therefore as a servant of the government.

I do not think the criticism that this report was moved today rather than 100 days hence is a very valid criticism. I think the member should use some creative thinking here. We are trying to stop other departments from copying what the Department of Finance did. Copy-cats do exist. We do not want the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans, Revenue Canada, Environment Canada or any other important department—and there are is a whole slew of them—to avoid this controlled program, controlled by the Comptroller General and by Treasury Board, of evaluating their programs.

That is the first point. On the other, he challenged me to ask a question in the House today. He knows that I would love to ask a question in the House today because there is a very serious reservation made by the Auditor General in the Public Accounts of Canada—not by me, not by a House of Commons committee but by a servant of Parliament—to the effect that if we accepted his recommendations, those reservations that the Auditor General has in the Public Accounts of Canada, the budgetary deficit for this year would be $2 billion over and above what the government says it is.

I will quote directly from the Auditor General's opinion: "If the government adjusted the financial statements for the matters reported in these reservations, the reported deficit for 1991 would be increased by up to $2 billion". That is not peanuts, that is a lot of money.

As I said yesterday, the government is cooking the books. We believe it is. The Auditor General says the government is not keeping accounting procedures and methods that are used in the private sector.

Why is it possible for public persons in public life, with public funds, to do things with those funds that in the private sector, with private funds, they would not be allowed to do?

• (1220)

If the finance minister, in his former incarnation as a car dealer, had used the kind of bookkeeping that he is now using with public funds he would have probably been pursued by Revenue Canada and would probably have been sued and put into some kind of clink because you cannot do that in the private sector. Yet we are doing it in the public sector. That is what we are trying to bring out.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, what an opportunity. My heavens, that member stands in this place and complains about the way we keep the books after I was in this Chamber with him in the 1980s when any resemblance between what the finance minister said in this place and reality was purely an accident, coincidental and non-sense. This is the group of people who took the whole UIC deficit out of the Public Accounts of Canada and shoved it off in the corner so they did not have to report it to Parliament.

This is like the pot calling the kettle black. This goes so far beyond belief that it defies any sense of credibility. I almost cannot deal with it because it is so obscene and so over-exaggerated.

He forgot praise where praise is due. Last year the Auditor General said: "This is an accurate statement of the Public Accounts of Canada". That is the first time in anybody's living memory that he was able to do an audit without notes. This year he is saying you reported everything. That is the piece missing in what the member says. You reported everything to him and you just sort of shifted the years a little bit as to how you were going to account for it, but you gave us all the numbers. You did not take the numbers and shove them under the bed and throw them out the kitchen door. You gave us all the numbers and that is very important.

He then says: "We do not want the other departments of government to do what finance is doing". That is the Liberal way.

Do you know what finance is doing, Mr. Speaker, what got him so exercised as chairman of the committee? It is saving overhead money. It is reducing management and leaving the money for the evaluations. It is not paying so many people to push paper around and sit at desks.

We want every department of government to save money. We make no apology for it. We want them to save money and to reduce overhead. We hope they copy the finance department's move in that direction. We will even give them a little bonus from time to time if they save us $100 million or $200 million. We will give them an extra $3,000 or $5,000 on their salary cheque at the end of the year because we think that is good behaviour and we would like to reward it, and we make no apology for it.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments that were made about the way the present government has handled the finances in this country since 1984 and I had some difficulty with some of the things that had been stated. Those difficulties really come down to a basic premise of what the truth is in comparison to, I guess, what is being stated.

I can read back in the records and I can check with Mr. Wilson. I have a note from his office which stated: "We were in the area of a $180 billion debt when we took office. We are now at $400 billion". The Conservatives in fact have doubled the debt through their great management. They use a silly thing about talking about $3 billion interest. That is not true. On $160 billion or $170 billion which they inherited I agree there is no way that it was $3 billion in interest. It is $3 billion and $4 billion because of the spending they have done.

The other point that has been alluded to all the way is the fact that they have brought about at least a 40 per cent increase in taxes over their period. When we start looking at that huge tax increase they say how much better they are running this economy.

We look at tax increases which are just abominable, the debt which has been doubled, unemployment which is skyrocketing, and we are now putting caps on programs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member wants an answer for his question, he had better put it.

Mr. Pickard: How can he say with a straight face that he is a reasonable manager? How would he even admit to being a manager at all when he realizes the financial crisis it has put this country into?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, every time a newcomer to the Chamber opens their mouth, some of us who have been around a while are really tempted to give them a piece of history which the chairman of public accounts will know.

We were a government for nine months and we got defeated. The total accumulated debt in all of history, just for the member's interest, in the 1980 election was $68 billion. Four years later it was $220 billion.

An hon. member: Now figure the interest on it.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, do you want to just do the percentage increase that the Liberal Party managed in four years?

How did you get so quickly from the balanced budgets in 1971–72? You had the current leader of the Liberal Party who was the finance minister for a little while and, man, was that a disaster. That was an unmitigated disaster.

But $68 billion to $220 billion is an increase of 200 per cent in four years. That is a 50 per cent increase annually in the accumulated national debt of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to comment on the public accounts committee report on the disbandment of the Department of Finance's tax evaluation division.

I listened very carefully to the speeches made by government members this morning and found that they were ridiculing the parliamentary system as a whole and in particular the principle of evaluating the work done in this House of Commons and the decisions made here.

The Minister of Finance has waited until 1987 to set up a committee—

An hon. member: A division.

Mr. Bellemare: —or a division responsible for evaluating the department's programs. We know that the Auditor General had been recommending since 1983 that the department set up a program evaluation committee and, in fact, considered it absolutely essential. The following year, the Department of Finance introduced a tax credit system and estimated, not through an arm's length evaluation, that the loss in tax revenue would be roughly $100 million. We know that this loss in fact amounted to $2.3 billion.

I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, who says an evaluation function does exist within the department. If there is one, it is not independent. We are going back to the problems we had in 1983–84, the problems raised by the Auditor General, when individual evaluations were carried out, not at arm's length and without using accepted procedures. That is how you put the country in deep financial trouble.

The hon. member for Calgary West had fun trying to take to task opposition members, particularly the newer ones.

He tried to make fun of us. He tried to be funny. I think the hon. member is irresponsible when he tries to laugh off what is said by new members of this House. He mentioned our national debt of $400 billion. He says it was the Liberal Party's fault, and that in 1984, when this government came to power, it had a debt of about $150, $170 or $175 billion. The figures seem to change every time a minister or a government member rises in this House! The debt was certainly around $170 billion, according to the government's former Minister of Finance.

They always say it is the Liberals' fault. They say they inherited a debt of around $175 billion in 1984 and that it is now up to $400 billion because of the interest on the debt. I think the government's economists tend to forget their mathematical and historical facts.

We must not forget that if we had a debt of around $175 billion in 1984, that debt was not only a legacy of the Liberal Party but also of two previous Conservative governments. Mr. Clark's government added to the debt, as did Mr. Diefenbaker's. If you want to check, look at the government's financial reports since 1950. We can even go back to R. B. Bennett, who had an unsettling effect on Canada during difficult times, times when the Conservatives were in power.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance and member for Trois-Rivières said the government had to save money, which is ludicrous when we realize that when his minister introduces a program, whether it is the GST or another tax program—since 1984 they introduced 33 different taxes—we know that every time they go and see their friends.

[English]

That is in the public relations section. It establishes its public relations programs and spends on books that are sent out to the whole community which say how good it is to be taxed by the Conservative government. It spends $25 million or $30 million on publications advertising that people are going to be taxed. Is this budgetary restraint?

Is it budgetary restraint when all the newspapers in Canada, no matter what the size, explain very thoroughly what the taxation is all about and what the latest details are on the taxes and so on? All the media discuss it. The present government talks about budgetary restraints and yet it will waste millions and millions in publishing and advertising its tax. It is trying to candy coat the tax situation to the public.

[Translation]

I think that is absolutely incredible! The talk on the government side is about saving money and budget cutbacks, but the fact is that they are constantly wasting money.

Every time we discuss the national debt or the deficit—we were talking about this earlier—they overlook the fact that their average annual deficit since 1984 has been around $25 to $30 billion. Tory members who brag about their skills as financial administrators are on very shaky ground, considering the fact that they spend more than they collect in revenue every year. They rise in the House to talk about budget cutbacks and financial constraints, and meanwhile they are wasting money.

As a member of the public accounts committee, I have heard any number of horror stories from our Auditor General. Our two Tory members forgot to mention the $200 million that was supposed to be spent on oil exploration in Nova Scotia a few years ago, but was used instead to build two bridges. Then they realized there were no roads leading to the bridges or leading away from them. Two bridges were built. One wonders why. Next a road was built through a forest, right in the middle of nowhere. Again, why did they do that? Whose forest was it? Did this enhance the value of the forest or of the surrounding land? Good question. In any case, it was a waste of money.

The only gas exploration they could justify was when they gave research funds to the dental arts faculty at a community college. I imagine the teachers found some gas in the teeth of the good people of Nova Scotia. It is ridiculous to hear these people talking about saving money and blaming the Liberal Party and going back seven, eight or nine years, but no more. I would strongly advise the Tories, when they start looking for historic scapegoats, to stop being selective and go back a little further. Go back to Clark and Diefenbaker and maybe R. B. Bennett, and you will really be in for some horror stories.

Mr. Speaker, getting back to the report from the public accounts committee, I must tell you that most of its members are from the government side. We voted on the report because the government has a majority on the committee. The recommendations in the report were not just those of the New Democrats and Liberals. We were a minority on that committee and still are. We did not make up the stories found in the report. It was prepared as a result of the Auditor General's report. In referring to the Income Tax Act which was changed to introduce a research and development income tax credit, the Auditor General mentioned that the department had estimated a loss of $100 million. In reality, it was $2.5 billion, a much larger amount. I am sure that the two members of the party in power will agree that the difference between $100 million and $2.5 billion is not imaginary. It is a mighty big difference. A $100 million loss becomes a $2.5 billion loss. I asked the committee whether they had foreseen this $2.5 billion loss or a $100 million loss instead. This is what the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Gorbet, replied to me:

• (1240)

[English]

"I believe you are reading it correctly and the answer is that we certainly did not expect $2.5 million. I am not sure to what extent we want to relive the past. It was a very expensive past. The only thing I could say, Mr. Bellemare, if you want me to say it, is that I do not think there is any excuse for what happened in that instance and I think that has been acknowledged several times".

[Translation]

The Auditor General, again in the report, after the Comptroller General of Canada, who is in a way the government's senior manager of all civil servants regarding financial matters, reports directly to Treasury Board. He is a financial manager so to speak. He told the committee that the disbanding of the evaluation committee and its replacement by a self-review committee was not his preferred approach. It was a polite way of saying that it was wrong.

The general manager himself, the Comptroller General, admits that it was wrong and the Auditor General said that it was certainly wrong. I am still reading from the public accounts committee report. I told Mr. Gorbet, the Deputy Minister of Finance, this:

[English]

"Earlier you said that you were not abolishing the function evaluation. Would the Auditor General care to add some comments to that?"

[Translation]

And the Auditor General, Mr. Desautels, replied:

[English]

"As I said in my earlier remarks it is a department's prerogative to organize the function as it sees fit. There is no doubt about that. What they seem to be doing is to be moving toward what I would call a self-review approach as opposed to having a fully independent, autonomous group to do this evaluation. This is not my preferred approach".

[Translation]

And he echoed what the Comptroller General had said:

[English]

"I think a move toward self-review has some validity but there has to be an element of sufficient independence in the process to make sure it meets the initial intentions".

First, I think that is definite. I think this is quite clearly a definite reduction in the independence of the process.

[Translation]

And the key word here is independence of process, something the hon. member for Trois-Rivières failed to mention in his speech this morning. He said that an evaluation function currently exists, but he was wrong not to admit that it was not an independent one.

That is precisely what we are asking for.

[English]

"There are other possibilities as well. For instance there could be a somewhat reduced level of effort", said Mr. Desautels. If the independent evaluation process is discontinued, after a while, we will not want to evaluate our own programs any more. It was very interesting to hear government members this morning talk about the national debt and their expertise in management. But they never set up a debt management evaluation committee, and the debt keeps growing. They spend their time whining, moping and complaining that the debt is going up every day and it is always the fault of the Liberals in the 1970s and 1980s. As a new member, I ask them where their debt management evaluation committee is. If you are such good managers, where is the debt evaluation committee?

The two members said that money should not be wasted.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired, but there will be questions and comments.

Mr. Bellemare: I will not be long.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will let you finish, then.

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Thank you for your generosity, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate it, so that I can complete my remarks.

Trying to save $250,000 by cutting this committee will not really save money. We want to avoid wasting $2.5 billion again. Do not eliminate small expenses and then not apologize for the big debts you are creating.

[English]

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good debate we are having today. It perhaps would have been better if we could have done it under different circumstances.

I would like to address a matter that is in this report and which was also raised immediately after the Auditor General's report last week. It was the question of the billion dollars with regard to the public sector pension plan for public servants.

The problem is that in accounting, as in many other professions or occupations, there are sometimes different ways of doing things. We do things a little differently than in the United States. The public accounts committee, I understand, as of today is going to be visiting the United States to look at its accounting practices. It will find that the United States does not write down in its books any amount for pensions for its public service that it might have to pay in some future year. It only worries about the ones it has to pay that year. We would call that cash basis.

The Auditor General has said in previous years that his preference would be that we should add all these numbers in. We do not have to have the money this year, today, but we want it in the future. We may need it in the future and so we should add this in. As a result of that, we have deficit this year that we record as $30 billion. It is not really $30 billion in terms of what we have to borrow. It is only $20 billion. The other $10 billion are these things we write down for the future.

If we took the assumption of this year's Auditor General on the question of the tax treatment of retirement saving which is referred to in this report we are debating here today, he has said that if the money had been put in the stock exchange we would be about a billion dollars ahead. That may be true but what is also true is that the money would have had to come from somewhere, either presumably by raising taxes during that time or by borrowing it.

The question is: Would we have been better off doing that? I guess the point is that there can be a debate. In this case I think the Auditor General is wrong. I think the other approach is better. I acknowledge that there are two approaches.

The question arose earlier in the debate by a previous speaker about why we do things differently sometimes in government than we say the private sector must do. The reason for that is that this is the public sector. I do not believe the rules for the public sector should always be the same as the rules for the private sector.

If I could just give one more example and then have the member comment, we pay our employees just like the private sector does. Then we collect income tax from their paycheques, just like the private sector.

One could legitimately ask why we bother. It is kind of going out of one pocket and into the other. We pay them a salary and then we deduct income tax. Does the money really go anywhere? The answer is no. When we do the same thing in the private sector the government collects the money and it comes to the government.

In reality, what we are arguing about is whether one way of doing things is better than another way. There is room for legitimate differences of opinion.

• (1250)

If the committee goes on this trip to Washington, I would ask the hon. member if it would then examine the issue of the tax treatment of retirement saving and how accounting in the United States is done for that. Presumably that is one of the things it is going to do when it examines the U.S. accounting methods and comes back with a report as to whether it prefers the Canadian way or the U.S. way.

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, certainly if I am invited by the American government to see how they operate in the area of public accounts and government auditing, I will be pleased to go and find out. Perhaps the government should send a huge delegation. Many Conservative members should go for their professional development.

I noticed that the hon. member suggested to the House how the question of pension funds should be handled. I must tell him that we should use the method recommended by the Auditor General. I must say I find it interesting that every government member who has spoken has changed the subject. The subject today is public accounts and the report concerning the dismantling of the evaluation committee of the most important department in Canada, the department that handles billions, not millions, but billions of dollars. It is the same department that is often, if not always, driving our nation to bankruptcy. I would suggest that the hon. member stick to the subject, unless he has problems with that.

For the hon. member's information, I would like to read a summary of the committee's recommendations.

> —The Committee recommends that Senior officials from Revenue Canada be invited to participate on the Advisory Committee, in order to have some influence on it, and asks that it be kept informed of the work plan for future years.
> —The Committee proposes that the following tax measures be evaluated by the Department of Finance: The GST, the new tax treatment for retirement savings, the tax treatment of capital gains and flow-through shares, and the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program.
> —The Committee would like to see the publication of an annual accounting of tax expenditures as part of the budget process.
> —The Committee expects the Comptroller General to report to it regularly, in order to determine Department of Finance compliance with Treasury Board directives requiring periodic evaluation of all programs.
> —In order to avoid setting a precedent, the Committee recommends that, before any dismantlement, there be more consultations between the departments and the Comptroller General, and that the process be more transparent.

[English]

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to be able to participate in this debate on concurrence of the report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I listened with great interest to my hon. colleagues across the floor as we debate the concurrence motion for the report. However, I also listen with interest as we banter back and forth as to who is really accountable to the Canadian taxpayer. I think that if we asked ourselves the question, it is this House of Parliament which is directly accountable to the Canadian taxpayer.

I would like to use overhead as an example, very briefly, as I notice the time is passing quickly.

We talk about overhead, as has been mentioned by government members, for the tax evaluation function. Since I began my career in federal politics in 1984 I found and still do find it quite disturbing—and I would assume that I speak on behalf of most members on both sides of the House—that with 295 elected members across this great land of ours and with in excess of 300,000 bureaucrats I do not know who actually runs this country.

I listened with interest to the chairman of the public accounts committee. I congratulate him and his committee members for the fine work they have done. I think probably one of the main results of the McGrath commission was to give more individual members more say and power in the functioning of the government. I have some difficulty with what the report recommends—and other members have said it—that in terms of accountability and the tax evaluation function we should perhaps add more bureaucrats.

Do not get me wrong. I do not intend to say that bureaucrats are evil. Bureaucrats are not evil. They are people we need as elected members, people who must be there to carry out programs and the ordinary everyday functioning of the government.

The McGrath report recommended that we should be able as backbenchers, as ministers, as parliamentary secretaries, to speak and say what we feel and what we think and be heard. If this McGrath report is to be held in the esteem that I know all members hold it in, the public accounts committee is entitled, as it has done in the past and I would assume will continue to do in the future, to invite as its witnesses, the top management, the Auditor General and the Comptroller General. These people are and must be at the disposition of these committees, not only the public accounts committee but all committees and all departments so that the elected people can request and question information that is so vital to our proper functioning.

I listened also with some interest as we went back to R. B. Bennett. Unfortunately I have not attained the same age as my hon. colleague from Ottawa—Vanier who spoke previously. He talked about who the culprits in our national debt were. I received in my office last evening from the Government of Canada a very interesting little booklet Where Your Tax Dollars Go. I would recommend it very highly to the members opposite, as I would to all Canadians.

If we look on page 5 as we discuss the debt treadmill we see for 1984–1985 the national debt at $206 billion; interest from 1984–85 to the present day, $238 billion; and government operating surplus since 1984–85, $25 billion. Let us just look at these three figures. There was a $206 billion debt run up by previous governments. Historical records show that the bulk of $206 billion was in the hands of the Liberal government: $206 billion plus $238 billion is $444 billion. If we subtract $25 billion in government operations or operations surplus, if we read these figures correctly, it shows that in actual fact since the Conservative government came into power the $206 billion debt is not $206 billion: it is $181 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the case of Ms. Omatee Ramganesh, a woman who came here from Trinidad under the Department of Immigration's domestics program. Her sponsors refused to pay her, insisting she get another job to pay for the privilege of working for them.

[English]

Ms. Ramganesh is facing deportation because she technically violated the Immigration Act by finding employment outside the parameters of the program. This violation was not a result of her own initiative, but as a result of the demands of her employers.

I plead with the minister not to make this woman a victim yet again. I urge that he review this file immediately and take the necessary action to remedy the situation.

NEW BRUNSWICK FOREST INDUSTRY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it has long been a source of pride to New Brunswickers that our province represents a model for Canada in more important ways than just one.

This week, in a survey published by Maclean's magazine, New Brunswick has again been acclaimed a Canadian leader, this time in both the policy and the practice of forest management.

With sustainable forestry development offering its own potential to be a model for developing Canada's environmental integrity, the New Brunswick experience is a valuable reference for other jurisdictions, including the federal government.

As one who had the opportunity to participate in the early days of the New Brunswick forestry program, I want to extend sincere congratulations to the ministers and the staff of that province's Department of Natural Resources who, over recent years, have been responsible for creating its success.

It is one thing to merely have adequate legislation, but much more important and difficult to transmit forest policy into effective management on the ground. New Brunswick's forestry sector has done that well.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago I urged the Minister of Employment and Immigration to change the Unemployment Insurance Act to allow laid off workers to receive unemployment insurance and the training dollars that accompany it before exhausting severance pay and vacation pay and virtually declaring personal bankruptcy.

Steel workers in Labrador City and Wabush, and in similar hard hit communities all across Canada, are not permitted to draw unemployment insurance and therefore are prohibited from access to training programs because they receive a severance package. Yet it is these very training programs that may be the key to their future.

The minister acknowledged that there is a problem and promised to consult with the business community that now controls the unemployment insurance program, but to date no action has been taken.

The effect of Bill C-21 is to place Canadian workers in a strait-jacket and to deny them the very training programs that the government is currently pushing so hard. Both government and non-government reports underline the need to push training to the top of the national agenda and yet the government's own policy is denying laid off workers access to training funds.

I call on the government to immediately amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to right this inequity.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the best and most important natural resource we have is our children.

Two days ago, we commemorated the International Human Rights Day. For several years, the International Organization for Business Resource Development, the Grand Council of Crees, the Four Directions Council and other NGOs with consultative status at the UN have worked very hard on a convention on the rights of the child. They worked especially hard to ensure the inclusion of aboriginal children.

It was great news that the convention drafted in 1989 has now been endorsed by all 10 provinces and by this government.

Consequently, I ask all my colleagues of this Chamber to join me in congratulating the current and former ministers of health, as well as the NGOs involved, for their work in ensuring that all children now have the rights to be protected under international law.

In particular, I ask this House to commend and thank the Prime Minister for his outstanding personal interest and involvement in Canada's formal ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw to the attention of the House the findings of the Security Intelligence Review Committee with respect to the role of CSIS in the entry into Canada of a member of the terrorist organization RENAMO.

The review committee today issued its report to the Solicitor General recommending that CSIS streamline its security screening procedure to ensure that security liaison officers have access to all sources of information available. The report criticizes the role of CSIS in the 1987 entry into Canada of Francisco Nota Moises, at that time the information officer for RENAMO.

Had CSIS conducted merely a review of the information in the public domain, particularly an 1986 documentary on the CBC The Journal, the outcome of the security screening process in this case may have been materially altered.

The report states in particular:"CSIS should re-evalute the current interviewing process and ensure proper research and briefing before interviews take place".

People watching The Journal knew more about RENAMO than CSIS did.

I strongly urge the government to follow the recommendations of the committee.

DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, our government has adopted a strategy to help disabled persons become fully integrated in Canadian society. The purpose of this strategy is to remedy a serious injustice. For instance, disabled persons are among the poorest citizens of this country. The government will spend $158 million over five years to meet three objectives: equal access, economic integration and the full participation of disabled persons in our society.

Economic integration means increasing opportunities for employment and training, encouraging employers and unions to support increased participation in the labour force and providing equal opportunities for employment and advancement in the Public Service.

AIRLINE DISASTERS

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, today marks the sixth anniversary of the worst air disaster on Canadian soil. To this day, the cause of the crash is not known.

The similarities between the Arrow air disaster in Canada and the Pan Am disaster over Lockerbie, Scotland are striking. Both aircraft left from North Africa taking U.S. soldiers back home for Christmas. Both aircraft landed in West Germany. Both carried out unidentified baggage. In both instances, the eye witness accounts were identical, denoting that there was a pre-crash fire. The similarities end there.

The glaring difference is that for the past three years the FBI and Scotland Yard have been examining every minute piece of wreckage to find the cause in Lockerbie whereas in Canada no such thorough investigation took place.

I am calling on the Government of Canada and the government of the United States to end this shameless disregard for how 256 people were killed on Canadian soil six years ago today and open a new and thorough examination.

CONSTITUENCY CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, at 7:55 a.m. a faxed letter from Moosehorn was waiting for me. It read:

Dear Felix:

I do not know how you put up with it. Maw and I were certain the rat pack was dead. Does this Copps and Boudria even give up on their smear stuff?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could turn this into a Christmas message. It should not be a personal attack.

Mr. Holtmann:

Oh well, times are tough and this Reform Party remind me too much like Oral Roberts or Jimmy Swaggart. Scary. Felix, we're sticken with you and Brian. Have a good Christmas. 92 will be much better.

Bill.

P.S. I like the way you have taken on the big banks. Maw and I are paying the shots and the bankers are getting rich.

P.S.S. I am not letting maw come to Ottawa. She has taken such a shine to your Speaker I am missing most of my hockey games and all-star wrestling.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the current strike at the Royal Canadian Mint is a result of the actions of a government that has lost every sense of fairness. The international reputation of the Mint and the quality of its work are a source of pride for Canada, and this is entirely due to its employees. We must not forget that the Royal Canadian Mint makes a substantial profit every year. Despite that fact, the government managed to provoke the employees by offering them a wage increase well below what management was offered, although the average manager's salary is much higher than that of the employees now on strike.

Speaking on behalf of the employees who established the reputation of the Royal Canadian Mint throughout the world, we urge the government to appoint a mediator immediately.

OPERATION RED NOSE

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, now that the holiday season is near, I would like to pay tribute to the work of the volunteers of the Operation Red Nose, especially those in the Joliette area.

• (1410)

Operation Red Nose is a service to take people who have had too much to drink safely back to their home in their own car.

This essential service, sponsored locally by the Federation of Caisses Populaires Desjardins of Lanaudière, covers all of Quebec during the holiday period. It exists only because of the hard work of its organizers and 350 volunteers, as well as the support of its sponsors.

These volunteers make an invaluable contribution; thanks to them, our roads are safer in this holiday season and we should all be grateful to them for that.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, for months I have pushed the minister of health and welfare to review the whole issue of the safety of all breast implants. He said we will have to wait for the U.S. to lead.

The U.S. has led. On Monday a federal jury in San Francisco found that Dow Corning Corporation misrepresented safety tests on all breast implants and led women to believe its implants were safe when it did not have the data to prove it.

The decision found Dow Corning guilty of fraud.

This is the minister's opportunity to take action to review all of the data that has been submitted by all of the manufacturers of breast implants sold in Canada about the safety of all of those implants, to review the life expectancy of breast implants, the incidence of implant ruptures, the impact of silicone on the immune system of implant rupture victims, and the health care requirements of those who became victims of failed implants.

The minister has promised to act on U.S. evidence. Here is new evidence. We are asking will the minister act now.

TAMILS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, there is still an urgent need to halt the killing of Tamils in Sri Lanka. Over a year ago Amnesty International issued a stinging report condemning Columbo for carrying out indiscriminate campaigns against Tamil citizens.

The report stated: "Many people have been arbitrarily rounded up, and sometimes killed, on the basis of anonymous accusations of subversive involvement".

I call upon Canada and other concerned nations to persuade Columbo to repeal the constitutional amendment that deprives Tamils of free representation in their Parliament. We must organize a United Nations sponsored commission to investigate the killings and to bring an end to the violence and tragic abuse of human rights.

Also the Tamils in the northern province, especially the Jaffna district, are in dire need of food and medical supplies. People are starving to death. We must offer our assistance.

TAXATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, those deadbeats in the Ontario NDP government are at it again with their morbid policies.

Not content with killing jobs in Ontario and bludgeoning people cold with tax increases, the NDP is now considering taxing tombstones. What a monumental error. It was not enough that the GST ghouls in Ottawa are taxing funerals. Small wonder our economy is moribund.

No matter how you cut it, Mr. Speaker, this policy is a grave mistake. The NDP tax vampires who plan to tax tombstones should be entombed themselves.

Come to think of it, the NDP is doing a good job at burying itself. And there is another nail in the NDP coffin.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, 1991 has been an exciting and educational year. For your patience, your guidance, your tolerance, respect for our views, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you. I want to thank all those who assist you, the deputy speakers, the table officers, the Hansard reporters, and others who serve this humble place.

May 1992 be a year filled with happiness and prosperity for all Canadians.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, this morning's decision by the U.S. international trade commission on the softwood lumber tariff is the start of a new trade war over our forests.

The unanimous decision means that a roller-coaster trade war over our forests has started.

I am concerned that the federal government is not fully committed to fighting Americans on this issue and that it is coasting on it.

The Prime Minister should call a summit meeting of forestry and trade ministers early in the new year to ensure that the federal and provincial governments have a united stand and remain vigilant in defending the sovereignty of our forests.

The government should defend our forests and not sell them out.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON NEW REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party believes that a study of reproductive technologies is essential to the well-being of this country.

It is so important, in fact, that it should not be left to cronies of the Conservative government who may have received patronage appointments for no other reason than they may happen to be spouses of senior cabinet ministers.

The consequence of such patronage appointments has been absolute chaos on the part of the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies. Not only have Canadian taxpayers been kept in the dark as to how the commission's $24.7 million budget is being spent for these appointments, but now three of the commissioners have filed a lawsuit against the chairman of the commission.

It is no wonder this government cannot get its act together to unify the nation. It cannot even get its patronage appointees to agree among themselves.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CHILD POVERTY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the occasion of my first question to wish you a Merry Christmas and to tell you that in your task you have our confidence.

Merry Christmas and Happy New Year, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Despite all the lively exchanges we have in this House once in a while, I would like to extend to the government members, to the NDP members and their leaders, a Merry Christmas.

I hope that everybody will take a good rest and be in very good shape come February, when we will be back.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: While we are talking about Christmas, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister: Is it not a good occasion for us to decide collectively that when we are back together next year, we should work on a program in collaboration with the provinces to permit the children of Canada, many of whom are hungry in schools, to have a breakfast and lunch?

There is a problem with food. We know a lot of children do not eat completely and cannot do their homework because of food problems. We should have a national program, beginning 1992.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the Leader of the Opposition first that the Prime Minister will be in the House in about 15 minutes. He has been delayed in his office.

Second, with regard to the children's program, I believe a couple of times in the House I answered that question. I said that we are now working on a strategy for children that we hope we can unfold maybe some time in February when we will try to deal with the main problems facing children in Canada today.

Of course, it is a very complex issue which cannot be solved exclusively by programs coming from the federal level. The Leader of the Opposition knows very well that it is a provincial matter, or regionally first. We have to deal with the provinces, but I believe with the help of the provinces and with the resources that we will have at our disposal at the time, we will try to put forward a strategy which will deal the best we can with the problems of the children of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the minister's good intentions. However, I would remind him that the Montreal Catholic School Commission already has such a program and even in Montreal, children are given their exams early in the month, because at the end of the month, they no longer have the physical strength needed for their school work. I therefore ask the minister to consider these problems, and we will be ready to co-operate with them, so that the children of poor families in Canada can go to school, because these children are our country's future. We must help them train their minds in an appropriate setting so that they can take their rightful place as the next century begins, as the best prepared to face global competition.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Leader of the Opposition is right to be concerned about the problem of child poverty. I think that everyone deplores that problem, but we must realize that children have many other problems besides poverty.

• (1420)

I believe there are problems of sexual abuse, problems of family violence, problems with street kids. All these problems are or will be considered in the strategy.

I want to tell the Leader of the Opposition that the problem with children also goes beyond the issue of simply being able to deal with the problem of poverty. And I believe that the hon. member is also aware of that.

I would also like to tell the Leader of the Opposition that yesterday we talked about the rights of children and I do not think that today we can discuss the rights of children without also talking about the obligations of adults. The program or strategy unveiled by the government will also take into account some mechanisms to make Canadian society more aware of the problems of children, which go beyond the problems of poverty.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the acting Prime Minister and concerns today's report on Poverty.

The report released today on child poverty by government members stressed, and I quote: "The federal government has a role to play in providing an economic training and job creation environment that will provide families with sufficient income to enable them to feed their children".

Will the government now admit to the total failure of its fiscal and family policies? Will it finally turn a new leaf and give Canadian families a break?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I obviously disagree with the question of total failure of policies. Of course there are too many children in Canada who are under the poverty level. At the same time I believe that when we put $15 billion into all departments of government that we manage, I believe we are doing something. It is never enough. Everybody agrees with that. At the same time, we have to put in more money.

As I said in French before, we have to take into account the the problems of children in Canada. I want to congratulate the committee which did wonderful work in dealing with the question of children and poverty. At the same time, the committee refers to much more than just the question of putting more money into the system. I believe that the money does not speak to the problems children have in Canada.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Labour.

One question which the committee refused to deal with is the question of minimum wage, yet the quickest way to address the needs of some of the poorest families in this country is to increase the federal wage.

When this question was posed in the House over the last two years, the minister repeatedly said that he is studying it.

Will the minister please inform the House that he is willing to stop studying this and give an immediate increase to those Canadians covered by the minimum federal wage, which is now the lowest in the country?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague would know, there are very few people working at the minimum wage at the federal level. Most people who work at the federal level earn much more than the federal minimum wage.

In any case, I have made a recommendation to my colleagues to increase the minimum wage and I am convinced I will be in a position to do so in the new year.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago Consumers Gas temporarily shifted $275 million of its debt from commercial paper into bankers acceptance notes, which for some reason are not subject to the large corporations tax.

The company's treasurer told the Ontario Energy Board that this move would save the company $500,000 in the large corporations tax.

I want to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he knows that his officials are telling corporate tax lawyers to go ahead and use this loophole. Does he know that most large corporations have their financial year end at the end of December and that they are now lining up to do this tax accountant's two-step? If he does know something about it, when is he going to make it clear to these companies that they are not able to avoid paying their fair share of taxes in this way and do something about it.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as to the latter part of the hon. member's question, it is not a question of when I will let the companies know. I already have. In my speech to the Canadian Tax Foundation last week, I made it very clear that we have accelerated revenue collections and targeting particularly on large corporations. We are guaranteeing my colleague, the Minister of Finance, at least $400 million in additional revenue which is already geared for the farm assistance program.

I can tell the hon. member that we are going to go further than that. This government is committed to making sure that every corporation in this country pays its fair share of taxes.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the $400 million he is talking about in terms of stricter enforcement is different from this question of bankers acceptance notes and the way in which many corporations are now lining up to avoid this government's flagship as far as tax fairness is concerned.

I am asking the minister today: Will he issue a directive now to make sure that these corporations cannot avoid paying their fair share of that tax while other people are lining up at food banks, the very children that we are talking about going hungry while these corporations stand to not pay $500,000 worth of taxes, just one company?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to issue any directive because that is the policy of this government already.

I want to assure the hon. member in connection with his previous question that no official from Revenue Canada, that I am aware of, gives any instructions to any business to take advantage of any loopholes. In fact, this government has taken major steps over the last years to eliminate the loopholes that existed prior to the election of this government.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

Today the U.S. International Trade Commission voted three to zero to proceed with an investigation of Canadian softwood lumber. We have lost round one. The U.S. industry wants duties of up to 25 per cent.

What is the government going to do to make sure that we do not lose the second round?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is aware of the fact that this is the preliminary injury determination. It is the first of four stages. Normally in this first stage the commission rules in favour of the U.S. industry. That is almost invariable. In fact, in 1983, when we won the ultimate determination, we did lose the preliminary determination on injury as well.

We will be working closely with the industry, closely with the provinces, closely with supporters of our position in the United States to put forward the strongest possible case. We believe that case is strong and we believe we have the facts to support that.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, during the free trade debate the government said on many occasions and promised on many occasions also that tariffs would be abolished.

Does the minister not agree that the imposition of a 15 or 25 per cent import tax on softwood lumber to the U.S. would still be extremely unfair to us?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, one thing that we did not give up in the free trade agreement, nor did the United States, was our access to trade remedy laws if we feel that there are unwarranted subsidies on either side of the border. Let us be very clear on that.

In this case we do not believe there is a subsidy. As I indicated in my previous answer, we are going to fight that one hard right to the end.

What we did not have in 1983 or 1986 but what we did get through the free trade agreement is the right to go to an ultimate dispute settlement panel to ensure, as we did in the pork case, that our rights can be upheld and that any determination of subsidy is going to be strictly according to the law and supported by that panel. If that is necessary, we are prepared to take that course.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health.

The subcommittee on poverty of the standing committee on health in its report tabled today recommends that the federal government in conjunction with the provinces and territories develop a healthy babies strategy to help reduce by 6,000 the number of low birth weight infants born yearly in Canada. This preventive approach alone will save the health care system as much as $600 million a year, as estimated by the Canadian Council on Children and Youth.

• (1430)

Will the minister immediately announce today that he will implement this recommendation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the minister will not make any announcement today, of course, because first of all I want to read the report. I want to be aware. I know there has been a very quick reading of the report. The report is very interesting, particularly the kind of recommendations the member is referring to. We must first of all look at all the recommendations and put priorities on them. As I said before to his leader, I intend to present some strategies some time around the beginning of 1992. It is quite possible that that kind of recommendation would be within this strategy.

POVERTY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the same minister. The subcommittee report to which he refers, of course, is futile. It is for the most part ludicrous and it is really a snow job.

Does he not know that child poverty is a national crisis? Will he as the minister undertake to see to it that there is established a job creation program to undo some of the damage being done by the government's anti-employment policies which are aggravating the child poverty issue?

I ask him also whether he will he see to it that come next spring there is an adequate and accelerated program for student jobs during next summer, the summer of 1992?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, of course I disagree with what the member said in his introduction because I think he is wrong. The departments, particularly the department of my colleague in employment and immigration, put forward a lot of measures in terms of the way we deal with job creation. I think it works, but within the period of time where we are, the difficulty in terms of the economy, we have to face reality.

Of course, increasingly we will be able to deal with the problem of job creation, which will improve the problem of poverty among Canadians. He also knows very well that it is not the only reason why we face the problem. I just gave him the example that three years ago in Toronto the unemployment rate was about 3.5 per cent, which is basically no unemployment because it is negligible. We have, however, in Toronto a lot of people who face the problem. In other words, we have to cope with the question of poverty from different angles, what we are trying to do and what we will do.

I want to say to the member that it is not just a question of job creation, it is a global problem to which we have to find a global answer.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, as it is the last day of the session I, too, would like to offer season's greetings to yourself and to all members of this House on behalf of myself and my party, and to wish everyone a good family occasion and a very happy and healthy holiday season.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there are still a million and a half Canadians who are not going to have a very happy holiday season, namely those who are out of work, and the almost two million men, women and children who are also on welfare. Just this week we heard that 3,000 jobs in Oshawa are at risk, another 3,000 in rail in Montreal and in Winnipeg, and as a result of today's softwood lumber decision, we heard that more jobs could be at risk in that particular industry.

There is a way to turn this around. I want to say to the Prime Minister that I know that the budget consultations are going on, and I want to ask him if indeed we can see a new direction in economic policies in the next budget.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would join my friend, the Leader of the NDP, and the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in wishing you, Sir, and members of your staff and the pages and all members of the House of Commons a very happy holiday season.

In regard to the question about a new economic direction, I suppose that will have to wait for the budget pursuant to consultations that are ongoing with the Ministers of Finance.

The reason for my delay today was that I had a communication from the Minister of Finance, who is presently meeting with his colleagues in Ottawa for the first of a two-day series of meetings. He called to advise that over lunch earlier today, they had discussed with one another the feasibility and the advisability of convening a first ministers' meeting to discuss the economy.

I am advised that the consensus is that it might indeed be a good idea to meet. Some of the finance ministers had some ideas in regard to conditions, the agenda, the clear objectives, the absence of any finger-pointing exercises and so on.

I would hope, given what the Minister of Finance conveyed to me earlier today, that after Question Period we will be able to communicate with the first ministers about their availability and the possibility of holding this kind of a meeting, perhaps before Christmas if we can, if their schedules allow, failing which we will do it at the earliest possible moment. After that kind of meeting, I might be able to give my hon. friend more guidance with respect to any change of direction that may or may not occur.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister. I am pleased to hear that there will be a meeting of first ministers and my question deals with that issue.

Is the Prime Minister open to a new direction for economic policies? Is he open to new suggestion on the economy, because unemployment is too high and this is tragic for many families, for the poor, for the less fortunate and for children?

I would also like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is open to new suggestions for the economy and whether he is willing to change the government's course if there is a consensus at the first minister's meeting.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my New Democratic friend asks me if I am open to new suggestions for improving the economy. Of course I am. Which ones?

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that because I am sure the Prime Minister knows there are no workers in this country who are not scared to death they are going to lose their jobs.

There are many things that can be done. The Prime Minister will agree that there are millions of Canadians without jobs and, alas, too many without hope. Today, the decision by the International Joint Commission on softwood lumber came as a blow to that industry. The Ministry for International Trade did answer, of course, that this is one in a series of stages. However, I think it is very important that the Prime Minister himself give direction that Canada take strong action now, before it is too late. Will the Prime Minister use his resources, his power and his influence to fight this unfair softwood lumber decision that we had today.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will put the resources, the talents and the influence that the hon. member imputes to me in a very vigorous defence of softwood lumber. I know she only said that because it is Christmas.

I would hope that the results for Canada, given the mechanisms that we negotiated in the free trade agreement, will be as beneficial as those in the recent pork decision which brought so much benefit to Canadian farmers.

My hon. friend asked me whether I am open to new specific suggestions to improve the economy. Indeed, I am, and perhaps she might tell me specifically what she has in mind to improve the economy.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister willing, with the consent of the House, to propose today a motion to show Canadian farmers his commitment to maintain farm assistance programs as we know them today, and to advise all GATT members of our determination to keep our farm programs?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the determination of the Government of Canada, the producers and the provinces has been shown to the world.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKnight: I am not too sure who is muttering over there in the backbenches.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. McKnight: I would say to the hon. member that the Government of Canada, the producers and the provinces have shown their commitment to maintaining supply management in Canada. The hon. Minister of Agriculture for the province of Ontario led a delegation to Geneva along with farm leaders to express their point of view in support of the Government of Canada's negotiating position.

At the present time the Government of British Columbia is leading a delegation to Geneva, made up of farm leaders, to say that they support the Government of Canada's position. The Government of Quebec has been in Geneva supporting the Government of Canada's position.

I think the hon. member and all members of this House support the government's position in its negotiations.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question was clear and direct. The farmers are expecting an unconditional response. We are asking for a simple motion to show unconditional support for the farmers of this country, as other legislatures in this country did. Why can the minister not present a motion and give the response to the rest of the countries in the GATT that we are determined to support our farmers?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is very strange to hear that coming from the Liberal benches after the farmers throughout Canada, who from 1980 to 1984 had their income decimated, were paying 22 and 24 per cent interest rates, had inflation at 14 per cent, and not one dollar of assistance to agriculture by the former Liberal government during all those difficult times.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. On October 1, Canada and the United States announced a joint program to practically eliminate all toxic substances in Lake Superior, as they put it. Much of that pollution is caused by the bleach used by the pulp and paper mills.

How will the minister reach this goal, since he refused two weeks ago to regulate toxic substances produced by these plants, except in two cases?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, since then, we have announced regulations for paper manufacturers throughout Canada that will regulate, under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, dioxins and furans. That will help reduce the level of organo-chlorines getting into our waterways from 600,000 tonnes in 1988 to about 400,000 tonnes in 1993. That is a 60 per cent reduction in the level of organo-chlorines getting into our environment, less than 2 kilograms per tonne. Moreover, that initiative will cost the industry approximately $3 billion, since it will have to modernize to meet the new standards in effect throughout Canada.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. The Attorney General criticizes the environment department for not having specific goals and deadlines to stop pollution of the Great Lakes and for dragging its feet on regulating toxic substances. Since the minister refuses to regulate the entire pulp mill effluent, which he admits is a toxic substance, in its entirety, will he tell Canadians today what targets and deadlines he is prepared to set so we can meet our international obligations to stop poisoning the Great Lakes?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): For the sake of clarity, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was referring to the Auditor General, not the Attorney General. May I point out that in the Auditor General's report that referred to matters that pertained to government policy before the green plan and that pertained in respect to the Great Lakes, to a report if I remember correctly that was published in 1988 or 1989, and that has since been corrected in terms of its approach. At least there has been some améliorations in the way that we have done things.

We have brought forward regulations for the pulp and paper industry that will reduce substantially the amount of organo-chlorines that go into the environment. In fact, by regulating dioxins and furans to a cost of approximately $3 billion to the industry, we will create a situation in regard to dioxins and furans that will oblige the industries to produce non-measurable levels of dioxins and furans.

That meets the test of virtual eliminations.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for small business.

A great many Canadians are concerned about the reports of continuing erosion of Canadian business interests to the United States. If such a trend of erosion does exist and if it is growing among our small business interests, then indeed it is a matter for serious and time for action.

Will the minister tell us if we are losing a significant number of Canadian businesses to the United States and, if so, what are we doing about it?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the whole House will be interested in the answer to that particular question because it is a very important question as we return to our constituencies.

Statistics Canada has just released figures which indicate from October 1989 to September 1991 that 5,000 additional manufacturers have been established in Canada and 30,000 new jobs have resulted.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I ask myself why this has happened. We know why this has happened.

First of all, we have a $500,000 capital gains exemption. We have the lowest corporate rate for small business in the OECD. We have lower medical and health care costs, far lower than in the United States, plus we now have a prime rate competitive with the United States and access to credit, thanks to the financial institution reforms that have been passed, better than any other country in the OECD.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

In the more than seven weeks between now and the resumption of this session in February, hundreds of farm families and their creditors will be reviewing their financial future. Since commercial mortgage rates are now as much as three percentage points lower than the Farm Credit Corporation rate, can the Minister of Agriculture tell this House and those families what rate Farm Credit Corporation will be charging in 1992 so that these farm people will be given realistic choices in deciding whether to continue or to quit?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be able to do that for the hon. member. If he would have asked that question last year, I would have given him an answer that would have had Farm Credit Corporation charging five percentage points more than it is today. The hon. member knows that farm credit adjusts its interest rates on a weekly basis so that producers are able to take advantage of the lowest interest rates that the Farm Credit Corporation could obtain for farmers in the market.

That is the policy. It is adjusted every week so that farmers have the advantage of the marketplace and the downturn in interest charges that has taken place through the Government of Canada, this government, managing the economy in the manner it has.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, our farms, fisheries, and forests are threatened by this government, in particular our forests.

The ruling today of the U.S. International Trade Commission on the softwood lumber tariff is the start of a new trade war over our forests. My question is to the Minister for International Trade. Last week in the forestry committee the minister of forests said the government was surprised by U.S. retaliation this fall.

• (1450)

Is the government surprised by today's action and can the minister assure Canadians and this House that it will fight with vigour to protect the sovereignty of our forests? We do not want our forest policy dictated from Washington, D.C.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely why we took the decision to terminate the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber, so that Canadian provinces would establish their own forest management practices without having to clear any of these with Washington.

As I indicated in my previous answer, we are disappointed with this particular decision. I also indicated that this has happened on many occasions before at this stage of the proceedings. This is the first of four determinations. Following that we have access to the dispute settlements mechanism system under the free trade agreement. If necessary, we are prepared to go to that limit.

If my hon. friend listened to my first answer, he would know that I said we will be working very closely with the industry, with the provinces, with our friends in the United States who support our position because we believe that the actions taken by the United States are quite unjustified.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On May 31 of this year, I asked the Minister of Justice to address the urgent issue of hard core pornography. As I said at the time, many violent crimes, including wife and child battering and the sexual abuse of women and young children, can be traced to hard core pornography.

When is the government going to act on this reality by bringing in strong legislation that will end the widespread problem of hard core pornography?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there is a provision in the Criminal Code, section 163(8), which defines obscene and is intended to address that question of hard core pornography.

The constitutionality of that provision is now before the Supreme Court of Canada in the case called Butler. That case was argued in June of this year and the decision has been reserved. We are hoping to hear soon from the Supreme Court of Canada their views of that subject. That will enable us to move ahead in this area with some kind of assurance about charterability.

In the meantime, however, as the hon. member will know, in all of the discussions that have taken place within Parliament, the Rix Rogers report and others, there has been a strong consensus on the issue of child pornography. I am prepared to move ahead in that area pending any kind of resolution of the broader issues in hard core pornography that the Supreme Court of Canada may provide.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

According to an internal memo, the minister has been directed by Treasury Board to shut down the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, unless of course business and labour can come up with over $1.7 million in just five weeks.

My question is as follows. Is the minister prepared to stand up and protect the health and safety of Canadian workers or will he abandon his responsibility as the willing hatchet man for Treasury Board?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my colleague and all members of this House that the government is very committed to CCOHS. I know the centre is in the hon. member's riding. When the Liberal government was in office, from 1978 to 1984 it gave the CCOHS on average $3.1 million a year.

When we came into office in 1984, until now, we have given the CCOHS on average $9.8 million per year. We will continue to contribute to CCOHS. However, we feel it is fair that the other stakeholders do the same; that is the unions, that is companies and that is the other provincial governments that get services from CCOHS.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, only this minister can take a Liberal creation, the CCOHS—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: We created it.

An hon. member: When did Lincoln Alexander become a Liberal?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Keyes: The fact of the matter is that this government says it is very committed to the CCOHS, yet it has only released half the funding that it needs before mid-January. That is its commitment.

How is it that the government can find $26 million in taxpayers' money for so-called prosperity hearings on competitiveness and the CCOHS is already there. Forty-three per cent of all its sales go to foreign customers?

Given that the government says that Canada must become internationally competitive and given that this House has urged the government to reinstate funding for the centre, will the minister do the right thing and financially support the whole amount of money that is needed to support this national centre whose programs save the lives of working men and women in this country.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I believe the intervention of the hon. member would be a lot more productive if he did what one of my colleagues, and I seldom say that, from the NDP and colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party did when they saw the same article that the hon. member for Hamilton West saw. They came to me and said: "How can we help to make sure the centre continues?" They have undertaken to talk to the unions and the provincial governments to make sure that the centre survives.

I can tell the member that we will go the extra mile and we will put in the money as long as the other stakeholders do.

BRAZIL

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Two Canadians have been sentenced to 28 years in a Brazilian prison for a crime they might not have committed. Having met this morning with the Lamonts and Spencer and hearing their plea to bring their children back to Canada, will the minister now do the proper thing, pursuant to Brazilian law, and immediately request the Brazilian government to expel Ms. Lamont and Mr. Spencer?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did meet with the Lamonts this morning and with Mr. Spencer. The Prime Minister had a conversation with Mrs. Lamont as well in Vancouver.

As I explained to them, we are going to take a look at the situation with regard to the severity of the sentence that was brought about on appeal.

I certainly understand how the parents of these people feel, and I have stated that in this House before. I have asked our Canadian ambassador to Brazil today to meet with the Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs as soon as possible, preferably today, to express our concern about the severity of the sentences. I have asked our departmental legal advisers, who met with the lawyers for the Lamonts and Spencers yesterday, to examine the information that they brought. We are waiting for a transcript of the recent judgment which gave what we consider to be an excessively severe sentence.

When that is all in my hands, I will then make a judgment as to action that we will take.

JUSTICE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, a short supplementary.

Ten years ago, Sidney Jaffe was kidnapped in Toronto and abducted to Florida. As a result, his wife was awarded damages by the Ontario courts and she now seeks to enforce this damage award in the courts of Florida.

My question is this: Why does the justice department refuse to issue an executive letter to help the Jaffes recover the huge expenses they incurred as a result of crimes committed against them in Canada? Why does this government refuse to come to the aid of Canadian citizens and help them obtain foreign redress?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the department and I have neither refused nor accepted. This issue has been brought to my attention and I have asked for more information.

The principle that is raised by the Jaffe case is an important one where a Canadian was actually taken by a bounty hunter out of Canada as opposed to using the extradition process. That principle is now before the Supreme Court of the United States in the context of another case. I in fact have instructed my officials to enter an amicus curiae brief to argue in that case against that principle in the hope that in the future there will be some support from the American Supreme Court against those actions by the American government.

With respect to the Jaffe case, I am reviewing it and I have asked my department for more information about it.

PUBLIC SERVICE 2000

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in his report, the Auditor General expressed support for the over-all thrust of the Public Service 2000 renewal initiative, but noted some concerns about its eventual implementation.

• (1500)

I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board, given that PS 2000 was announced by the Prime Minister some two years ago and given that Bill C-26 was tabled almost six months ago, will this government continue to pursue this reform as one of its top priorities?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question.

It gives me the opportunity to indicate very clearly that the government supports PS 2000 and wants to proceed with debate and referral as soon as possible, which should be early when the session reconvenes.

Mr. Speaker: There will be two more questions.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who yesterday signed the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

I would like to commend the Prime Minister for doing that and for his leadership in organizing the convention.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): I would like to point out a couple of points in the convention and ask for the Prime Minister's comments.

The convention commits Canada to encourage the production and dissemination of children's books and yet we have the GST on books. The convention also commits Canada to make higher education accessible to all on the basis of capacity by every appropriate means and yet the government has cut funding for the provinces for higher education.

I wonder if the Prime Minister could indicate when the government intends to change its policies so that it can ensure that it will be in conformity with the UN convention.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his important question and I thank him for his comments about the importance of the event that took place yesterday on behalf of all of the children of Canada.

Of all the obligations we have, few are more important than those to our children. I appreciate very much the non-partisan support we have received from the NDP on this very important issue.

Funding has been increased to the provinces, not decreased. My hon. friend raises an interesting and good question with regard to the GST. We have indicated in the past that it is going to be looked at in the light of the experience of the first year.

Also, undertaking the obligations in the signature ceremony yesterday, the document indicates that every nation including Canada must present a report which displays the weaknesses of our situation vis-à-vis children, spell them out clearly at given times so that they can be corrected.

That is the priority that we seek to apply to the problems of children. I am delighted to know that I can count on the support of my hon. friend and I am sure of most if not all members of the House in this very noble endeavour.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday, André Bourbeau, the Quebec minister, announced a complete reform of manpower policies and structures. This implies Quebec repatriating all powers in that area. Such a proposal goes to show the consensus that can be found in Quebec on this issue. Both labour and management are in support of a reform. I ask the minister this: Does he intend to open negotiations with his provincial counterpart to meet the needs identified by the Quebec government in this area?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will no doubt be happy to hear that, as recently as November 21, 1991, I signed an interim agreement on manpower training programs with my provincial counterpart. In the meantime, constitutional talks are under way and I am sure that, in the end, the tools required to tackle the labour market successfully will be available to Quebec workers as well as to all other Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have several notices of points of order and some of privilege.

I am trying to follow them in the proper order. The first is the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. I think this is on a continued matter.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I do intend to raise a point of privilege. However, members on the government side are co-operating in attempting to deal with the issue I wish to raise with the House. That co-operation is continuing at the moment and we may be able to complete the matter this afternoon. I would ask that I be able to defer raising this point of privilege until we have a chance to see if the government has been able to complete its work.

Mr. Speaker: I will take that into account. The hon. member may want to raise it again with me.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I rise with respect to the question of the member for Winnipeg North Centre yesterday in which he impugned the motivation of the Prime Minister in signing the UN Convention on the Child, the member misled the House when he stated that the Prime Minister had pre-empted the report so that he could have a photo opportunity.

I want the House to know that I decided last Tuesday morning, in conjunction with the standing committee, to table the report this morning because I felt it would be the best time. There has been absolutely no contact with the PMO. At no time did I plan to table the report on Wednesday, with the proviso that if the House did not sit on Thursday I might have tabled it on Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: We probably got pretty close to debate.

POINTS OF ORDER

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order arising out of statements today. The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell provided information to the House that was not correct. Perhaps he can check the "blues" and find that wherever he said "NDP in Ontario" he really meant "Liberal" and where he said "Bob Rae" he really meant "David Peterson", the premier who passed that particular act.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker's generosity is related to the fact that it is Christmastime.

COMMENTS IN CHAMBER

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in an exchange with the Minister of the Environment I made a reference to the little hacks around the minister. That was a poor choice of words.

First, it is not true. I know a number of the people involved and they are highly qualified and very dedicated.

Second, as my own staff pointed out to me quite frostily on my return to my office, when mistakes are made they are not made by staff, they are made by ministers or, in this particular case, by the opposition critic for the environment.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the remark he made today and the generosity and the spirit in which he made it. He is quite correct in the sense that the people who work with all members around this House are usually very competent and very dedicated.

May I say on my own personal behalf that the big hack was not offended.

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my point arises because the good feelings being exhibited in the House right now might mean that we adjourn slightly earlier than the intended hour this evening.

As all members know, the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny Of Regulations has the responsibility to scrutinize delegated legislation on behalf of all parliamentarians.

I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that for only the second time an order for revocation of a regulation is before this House. According to the reference in the Order Paper, the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations will be deemed to be adopted at six o'clock p.m. this day. This report includes an order for the revocation of certain sections of the Indian health regulations which have been found to be ultra vires.

My point of order is to seek clarification and assurance from the House that this order will still be deemed accepted should the House adjourn earlier than the hour referred to in the Order Paper.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for giving notice. I can assure the hon. member that the answer is in the affirmative.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I was unable to attend the House this morning during Routine Proceedings at the time of tabling of petitions. I wonder if I could receive unanimous consent from the House to table a petition.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked for unanimous consent to table a petition.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

JUSTICE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, the petition concerns the one circulated by the de Villiers from Toronto on the tragic death of their daughter. The undersigned residents of Canada, in support of the parents of Nina de Villiers, request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly. It is signed by a number of my constituents.

I wish them well and hope that the government can take care of this matter soon.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, this being the last sitting day of the Christmas season, I would like to ask the traditional question of the government House leader. Could he perhaps inform the House as to what business we might expect upon returning to Parliament on February 3?

Second, I wonder if the government House leader would be in a position to indicate quite clearly the date of the federal budget, which we presume will be in February. No specific date has yet been set. Could he give us some information on that particular point?

Third, could he indicate to us whether he will be forthcoming with enabling legislation with regard to a possible referendum?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in terms of House business, we will continue to the completion of Bill C–32 at report stage, after which we will adjourn for a needed, if not deserved, respite from this place.

Upon return, there is a considerable list of bills that I would like to consider. I would ask the hon. House leader's indulgence, as well as that of other parties and members, to get back to them well in advance of February 3 to indicate the government's priorities. It will depend on what ministers will be available for participation in debate. As for the budget, the pattern established by this government of having annual budgets at approximately the third week of February is well received by everybody in the country and it is a pattern that we will continue.

As for the question of plebiscites and so on, as I have indicated earlier, these will be considered later for many reasons, not the least of which is the fact that I wish to receive and study the report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform, which is an important ingredient, before we can even consider such legislation.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House leader could indicate to the House whether there are any further statements that ministers or others might be making today.

Mr. Andre: I am sure that everybody would like to stand up and wish everybody else a Merry Christmas. Beyond that, I cannot think of any other reason why members would want to start other than to complete the debate and begin a happy holiday season for everybody concerned.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question refers to the matter of the royal commission on electoral reform.

As he knows, the commission will be tabling its document some time in January when the House is not sitting. In the document there will be draft legislation. I had asked him and the other House leaders earlier in the week to consider having pre-study of that legislation so that there would be more opportunity and more of a chance that the legislation would be in place for the next federal election. I am wondering if he has considered that item and had a chance to consult with the Prime Minister's Office, and whether the government would be willing to have pre-study of the draft legislation that will be included in the commission's report.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, legislation of this nature obviously needs the general support of all sides of the House and of all persons concerned.

In that regard the question of pre-study of the proposed legislation may be the appropriate way to go. I want to assure the member that we will have ample time to deal with it before it is necessary to introduce it prior to the next election.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, on two points of order, one following from the earlier question on the royal commission. As the hon. government House leader knows, I have written to him about the very discriminatory features of the Canada Elections Act as it applies to the raising of money by independents. We cannot receive the donations that registered parties can. This is a blight on the whole system and it is a real problem in the pocketbook. I really hope, knowing full well the time it takes to amend the Canada Elections Act, even with pre-study, that over the break the hon. government House leader will confer with other House leaders to try to remedy this with a simple amendment, as I suggested in my letter. Then it will not be necessary to start a court action and an injunction against all political donations until this matter is resolved. I say that seriously.

That is my first question. Frankly I thought the royal commission, and perhaps the government House leader has further information on this, was intending to file that report in November. Perhaps he could indicate if he knows when it will be filed.

Since I was not able to get the Speaker's eye during Question Period, in a nice gesture of Christmas I would like to extend Christmas greetings to you and your staff on behalf of the independents, who happen to be the largest group in Canada at the present time. I was going to say that when I caught your eye. However, since I did not get your eye I will say it now. Now my second point.

Mr. Speaker: I can say to the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants that the reason he did not get my eye is that I knew he had several points. Please continue.

Mr. Nowlan: I have only one point left and it is a serious one. I know the Prime Minister has some other things on his mind, but since we all agree that confidence is rather important for the economy and the Constitution, is the government going to clarify this confusion and the Gilbert and Sullivan act of a Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies over this break, since a cabinet order is involved? If it cannot get it in order, scrub the whole thing right now.

Mr. Speaker: I think this is extending into Question Period. The hon. government House leader.

Mr. Andre: I hear the hon. member's representation respecting the question of tax deductions. As he knows, undoubtedly one of the questions the royal commission has been seized with is how to reconcile the kind of limits we have and the description of political contributions in terms of raising and spending within the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, taking into consideration the fact that we now have experience that groups can apparently violate the Elections Act. All of those questions need to be considered, including the representation made by the hon. member.

However, I hope the hon. member is not saying that he represents all of those who say "none of the above" when people answer the question "what is your preference" in the polls.

Mr. Heap: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a petition since the order was out of order this morning.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Heap: I thank my hon. colleagues. This is a petition on behalf of families who have been separated—

Speaker's Ruling

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to remind hon. members, especially the ones who have been here for such a long time, and I too have petitions, that we can simply table them with the Clerk of the House and the petitions are tabled without seeking unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member has unanimous consent of the House anyway.

An hon. member: Yes, he has.

Mr. Speaker: Well, let me put the question again to the House.

The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina has asked the unanimous consent to present a petition. Does he have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, colleagues.

This is a petition on behalf of families who have been separated for years and may be separated for years more. I am asking that the minister of immigration issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada, including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation, and allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

This has been signed by 25 residents of the city of Toronto.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have a question for the Prime Minister, if I may.

• (1520)

I am wondering if the Prime Minister has had an opportunity to review the Hansard of yesterday and if he would wish to make a statement with respect to the exchanges which took place yesterday at three o'clock.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I thought that perhaps goodwill was going to take over and prevail in the end.

As I indicated earlier, I sat here and my colleague the Minister for International Trade was not here. The Deputy Prime Minister, the minister of youth who was sitting behind the Deputy Prime Minister, and the Whip who was sitting behind the Prime Minister absolutely and categorically deny that those comments were made.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: Let me finish my comments. As was quite accurately and properly pointed out this morning during debate, the supposition that an accusation can be made in this House and the accused must somehow stand up and explain or apologize is something I simply cannot accept as a precedent.

I heard what the Prime Minister said. He did not say what was attributed to him, and frankly that should be the end of it.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, my colleague from La-Salle—Émard stood today and he corrected an exchange that took place. There are members on this side of the House who believe an exchange took place.

I ask the right hon. Prime Minister, and this is my final question, if he does not see fit to stand in his place and make a statement with regard to the exchange that took place yesterday at three o'clock.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENT IN QUESTION PERIOD—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has raised the matter which engaged us yesterday and also this morning. The hon. the government House leader has made his position quite clear. I am going to try to deal with the situation we find ourselves in as succinctly as I can.

Yesterday the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Hamilton East urged the Chair to review Hansard and the electronic tape, alleging that the Right Hon. the Prime Minister had used unparliamentary language and consequently caused disorder.

There were other members who wished to be heard, but I took the position that I had the point that was raised and I undertook to the House that I would, as they say here, look at the "blues"; in other words review Hansard and also the electronic Hansard.

This morning when asked by the opposition House leader I reported that I had reviewed both Hansard and the broadcast tape and neither lend any support to the claim or the allegation that the right hon. the Prime Minister used unparliamentary language. This morning the hon. government House leader asserted the view that the right hon. Prime Minister did not utter the words that had been attributed to him.

I ask hon. members to listen carefully because I am rendering a procedural decision. There is a dispute as to what happened. There have been statements made outside the House of which I am aware, but as is our tradition the Speaker cannot and should not make any ruling based on comments outside the House or in media reports.

In a situation like this, which is not easy, the first condition is: Did the Speaker hear words or a phrase of an unparliamentary nature? I have to say to all hon. members that the first condition was not met yesterday as the Chair did not hear the alleged utterance.

Hon. members will say: "Well, why didn't the Chair hear it?" The Chair cannot hear all comments made in the Chamber. All hon. members, I am sure, can accept that and know that.

The second condition if the Chair has not heard the words complained of is to verify our records to establish if they are reported by Hansard or audible on the recording.

Having done so there is no supporting entry in Hansard, nor does the electronic Hansard demonstrate that an offending phrase was used by the right hon. Prime Minister.

An hon. member: How about if I heard it?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a helpful suggestion at this point. I really would ask hon. members to refrain from making comments like that.

I suggest to the House that is where we are now. I am asking hon. members to listen carefully. That is where we are now. I suggest to the House that the Chair can go no further. I have done what I was requested to do and I have reported on it. The Speaker has no power to compel any member's attendance nor can I force any member to make a statement.

I want it clearly understood that some weeks ago on an unhappy day when a member was brought to the bar of this place, it was not done so by the order of the Speaker. It was done so by the order of this House after debate. There is a distinction.

The Chair is faced with a dispute and is unable to resolve it. When the official records are not supportive of the allegations, I am convinced that it is not the duty of the Chair to try to resolve it.

As far as I am concerned from a procedural point of view and in keeping with our conventions the matter is closed.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the important parliamentary decision. You indicate that neither the Speaker nor the video nor the sound records nor the Hansard monitors sitting a few feet away from me support the allegations imputed. The reason for that is because what you have just indicated is entirely consistent with the facts of yesterday.

That is why it is as it is. That being said, I have always taken the position in this House that any offence, real or imagined, deliberate or inadvertent, that might cause the Chair any difficulty of any kind is something that I as Prime Minister ought to be the first to respond to. I always have sought to do that and I do so again today.

I would say to the Speaker and to all hon. members of the House that I concur fully with the judgment of the Speaker and the reasons that he has given. They will search in vain for the offending phrase because it does not exist. That having been said, I convey to the Speaker my regrets for any inconvenience and I convey to any hon. member of the House my regrets for any offence they may have taken at any comments made by me that may have inadvertently caused them any degree of difficulty.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the clarity of your decision.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, through you on behalf of my party, we accept your ruling and we accept the statement just made by the right hon. Prime Minister.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1530)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier today I inadvertently forgot to present a petition. I wonder if I could have the unanimous consent to allow me to present a short petition at this moment?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CROATIA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my generous colleagues in the House for this gesture.

It is a petition on behalf of a number residents throughout western Canada. They point out that 94 per cent of the population of Croatia voted for independence, that Croatia instituted a democratic government in a multi-party election conducted in April 1990, that like all other peoples Croatians are entitled to freedom, democracy and their right to self-determination, and that Canada has an international reputation as a moral authority and as such can initiate this democratic process without compromising world peace.

The petitioners call upon the government to take the initiative to recognize Croatia fully as an independent and sovereign democratic nation.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, December 9, consideration of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and the motion of Mr. Langdon (p. 5964).

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak too long. I just want to review a few comments with regard to this bill.

[Translation]

I can say without any hesitation that I am definitely opposed to Bill C-32, a measure that demonstrates this government's failure to defend the poor in this country.

Faced with a situation in which more and more Canadians will have to resort to welfare, the Tory government is putting a cap on our Canada Assistance Plan. This measure will put a 5 per cent cap on funding for welfare plans in Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta. Unfortunately the need for funding will probably be greater in these provinces as a result of the negative impact of Tory policies such as the GST and free trade on our economy.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Canada Assistance Plan is a major component of the kind of program vision that requires close co-operation between the federal government and provincial governments. The Canada Assistance Plan is a shared cost program. We also have Established Programs Financing, which focuses mainly on post-secondary education and health care which is in bad shape and the comprehensive financing formula, under which the federal government works together with the provinces in the areas of health care and education.

The purpose of all these programs is to ensure that Canadians, especially those in greatest need, receive government assistance. However, the Tory government's policies have clearly shown us that the government has chosen to ignore Canadians and the fact that many are living in poverty.

The number of homeless people, people who live on the street and who are barely surviving, is increasing. There are young people on our streets who are getting into drugs and prostitution and who will never be able to get out of that world. Obviously this would not be happening if the community could offer them alternatives, some kind of programs and social assistance to tide them over difficult periods.

The government is acting irresponsibly by capping the Canada Assistance Plan.

According to the federal government's figures, the three provinces affected will lose $2.135 billion in federal transfer payments over five years. However, these provinces see a worse scenario. Ontario estimates that it will lose $1 billion in the current year.

Furthermore, as you know, Mr. Speaker, the provinces affected by the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan are the only ones that do not receive any equalization payments. Since half of poor families and 54 per cent of welfare recipients live in these three provinces, it seems very strange to me that the government is imposing such a devastating measure.

[English]

I would like to just to mention a few points before I conclude. I would like to say that as a maritimer I suppose some people are wondering why I am debating this Bill C-32 since it has to do mostly with Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia. I think that if we look at the statistics it will show that the Canada Assistance Plan does help these provinces. To put a cap on CAP is to punish those provinces. It is punishing the people who live in those provinces who can least afford to be punished.

We talk about child poverty. I would like to point out to the House and to Canadians in general that today there was a report tabled. I would like to review some of the recommendations tabled in the Liberal minority report on child poverty. It has to do with this legislation as well.

The title of that document is A Child Investment Strategy. I would like to go right to the recommendations rather than highlight the whole report. In the recommendations the Liberal Party recommends that there should be some type of nutritionally balanced breakfast, lunch and snack programs in schools throughout Canada.

We would also recommend that due to the hardship that some families are enduring and suffering from that we should restore entrance requirements and duration of entitlements to pre-Bill C-21 levels.

We ask the government to withdraw Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget of last February. We also ask that this very bill we are debating today be withdrawn.

I should point out that there are a number of other recommendations that have been made. One is that there should be a winter job creation program to help in the short term. Obviously we need medium-term and long-range solutions as well, but I think it is very important that we develop a short-term job creation program.

We know that unemployment will be very high for students and youths next summer. The government should be ready to have an accelerated job creation program for students and youths in place for the summer of 1992.

With regard to child poverty as it concerns aboriginals, we would recommend that the aboriginal leaders from across Canada meet with the federal government and establish an immediate course of action to address this very serious crisis.

One of the recommendations tabled today in our minority report was that the federal minimum wage rate be raised to $5 per hour effective January 1, 1992. Effective January 1, 1993 the rate should be raised to $6 per hour.

While I am on the topic of youths, students and poverty, I urge the government to stop dragging its feet with regard to the Student Loans Program. A complete review of that program is long overdue. I would ask that the government not only look and consult across Canada but look at other models in other countries so that we may come up with a better student loan package.

[Translation]

In closing, I must again object to this regressive measure of the Mulroney government.

• (1540)

Since unemployment and poverty have risen sharply in the three provinces affected by this bill, as they have in all the other provinces of Canada, the Conservatives show a lack of conscience and are committing a flagrant injustice by cutting funding for essential services.

Something is rotten in the kingdom when the ranks of the poor are growing at an astonishing rate at the same time that Canada's chartered banks report unprecedented profits, as we saw last week.

This bill is just a sneaky way for the Conservative government to put the burden of repaying the national debt on the shoulders of those who can least afford it and who have nothing to do with creating the problem.

Finally, I ask the government to revise its policy of capping CAP so the destitute can have what they need to survive. In this holiday season, it is important to give a little hope to people who need it most, so that they can look forward to better days.

[English]

Mr. Littlechild: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am wondering if there would be unanimous consent, without debate and without amendment, to move the following motion:

That this House take note that the 1991–92 season marks the 75th anniversary of the National Hockey League; and

That this House take note that the long-standing role of hockey in Canada's culture, heritage, pride and national unity; and

That this House in the 125th of our country's existence recognize January 1992 as the National Hockey League month in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the motion?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words this afternoon about Bill C–32 because this bill, brought in by the government at this time, is causing extreme hardship in many communities in the province of Ontario certainly.

The bill itself caps assistance provided under the Canada Assistance Plan to 5 per cent per year. Of course the government has gone to the Supreme Court to force this on the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia at a time when these three provinces, which are the only ones that do not receive transfer payments themselves from the federal government, are facing extremely high welfare and government assistance demands.

In fact in the Algoma riding I do not think that we have ever faced as high a demand for welfare assistance since the 1930s. Several weeks ago I attended a meeting of the Algoma Municipal Association meeting in which the welfare officials pointed out that the cost of welfare is really going through the roof in those communities. This is mostly because there were massive lay–offs in the summer and fall of 1990 in the community of Elliot Lake due to the downsizing of the uranium mine operations. There were also lay–offs in the fall of 1990 in the city of Sault Ste. Marie because of the downturn in the steel industry, the strike that took place at Algoma Steel and the subsequent lay–offs that occurred.

What we have in this bill is a tremendous increase in the responsibilities of the provincial government. Take the province of Ontario which is the energy and the engine of the Canadian economy. It has been in a very prosperous situation for the past six or seven years. There was an unprecedented growth period in Canadian history from 1983 through to 1990. Suddenly the whole economy of the province of Ontario goes into one of the worst slumps in history. The federal government caps the Canada Assistance Plan funding at 5 per cent at a time when unemployment and welfare costs are simply going through the roof.

After attending this meeting of the Algoma Municipal Association I wrote to the premier to suggest that the province of Ontario should be doing the same as most provinces in this country. I believe all the provinces with the exception of Nova Scotia and British Columbia should be jointly sharing the costs of welfare and assistance to people. They should be sharing these costs with the two senior levels of government, federal and provincial, and not be loading the municipalities of Algoma and municipalities across this province of 9 million people with 20 per cent of those costs.

Clearly, when there is a district like Algoma going through high unemployment, high UI payments and many thousands of those people coming off UI benefits, it is not the time to be loading more welfare costs on to the municipal taxpayers.

I have suggested to the premier that it should be taking on this responsibility jointly with the federal government. I suspect that there will be more difficulty in persuading the New Democratic Party government in Toronto that it should assume this responsibility which has been assumed by seven of the ten provinces in Canada, because of this capping of the Canada Assistance Plan.

I am told that the losses to the three larger provinces with the greatest fiscal resources amount to some $2.135 billion over the next five years. Therefore, persuading the Ontario government to do what it should do at this time will be made more difficult by the decision of the federal government to cap the Canada Assistance Plan.

CAP was a program that was put in place by the former Liberal government. It was a way to bring some order out of the chaos which existed before then with the multiplicity of programs in which the federal government simply assumed half the costs for people receiving welfare assistance for dental care, essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe houses for abused women and subsidized child care for low income families. Those are some of the parameters the Canada Assistance Plan provides.

It certainly is not the time for the federal government to be capping that assistance when provincial government welfare costs are going right through the roof after a period of massive sustained growth. Now we see unemployment in the province of Ontario, the income to the the government dropping dramatically, and at the same time the federal government is cutting back its assistance.

The House leader for the government indicated that they would be bringing in a new budget in the third week of February. Clearly this Bill C–32 is an unctuous bill. It is unfair to the provinces which generate the wealth to provide deficiency and transfer payments to those provinces with fewer fiscal resources. Now their resources from the federal government are being capped by 5 per cent per year. To bring that in at any time I think is a most unfair move. It brings it in now when welfare costs for the province of Ontario are going through the roof and when there are many communities such as northern Ontario and the Algoma district which need a more generous arrangement.

These communities were probably not getting it from the provincial government because of the federal government's action in capping the Canada Assistance Plan which is so vital and so important to maintaining the integrity of our safety net system.

• (1550)

Last fall at this time we were debating Bill C–22, an act respecting unemployment insurance. At that time we said to the government that it was increasing the contributions massively. It has already increased them again. It is loading training on employees and on employers across the country. It is reducing the benefits. Communities in which the unemployment was at a certain level would be receiving previously perhaps 50 weeks of UIC benefits and suddenly would find they were receiving 35 or 41 weeks of UIC benefits.

What we have is a domino effect. Those communities consist of people who have been laid off for 40 or 50 weeks and suddenly are going on welfare. Then the local municipality or the province which does not have to make any contribution to UIC benefits suddenly is being loaded with these welfare costs.

In the case of Ontario it is having its Canada Assistance Plan funding capped at 5 per cent. Its welfare costs have gone up to a higher percentage, in some cases perhaps an increase of 10 per cent over and above previous levels. It is simply an intolerable situation and this bill is a reactionary piece of legislation which ought not to be passed.

I certainly hope that if the government does force it on the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, the new budget will rescind it because it is a Draconian measure and is being brought in at an improper time.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to enter into the debate. The government has introduced Bill C–32 which would cap federal contributions to the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario.

I have been one of those who have advocated that there should be environmental review assessments on major projects. I would also advocate that there should be a social environmental review process when the government undertakes major initiatives like this.

I would like to know what the social impact of this legislation is. I would like to know how much more crime would be committed because of the increased poverty that this bill would put into effect.

I would like to know how many more suicides we will see because of this bill. I would like to know how much more hunger and poverty there will be. I would like to know the effects on children that this bill will have. I would like to know the effect this will have on future generations as we see more and more people, particularly families and children in those families, being pushed to the poverty level.

One child in six in Canada is now poor. Almost one-half of Canadians who rely on food banks are children, almost one-quarter of a million children.

In the period now of a major recession, major hardship, this government is further tightening the screws on the very poor in this country by putting a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan through this proposed legislation.

This program affects the very poor of this country by turning the screws on them even more. I think the human hardship and the human fatalities that this will create are things that Parliament should really know about.

We hear, in some ways rightly so, that we do have to control our deficit. Our deficit now is an outrageous $400 and some billion. Well over a quarter of government revenues every year go just to pay the interest on the debt, close to $32 billion I understand. I could be corrected but it seems to me it is around $32 billion a year.

An hon. member: $43 billion.

Mr. de Jong: Some $43 billion a year goes just to pay the interest on our debt. I consider that to be a transfer of wealth to the wealthy.

Who are the people who benefit from this? You have your financial institutions, your lenders, the people who have money to save and to put into Canadian bonds. You have banks and foreign investors. These are the people who get the $43-some billion. Imagine what we could do with $43 billion in this country. To blame the poor, to blame those who are on welfare, I think is disgusting. It is obscene. They are not the cause of the deficit.

We have often heard members on the right and the Tories say we have been living beyond our means. By this I suspect they mean that our social programs are too rich. I knew a number of years ago, and I suspect the statistics are still the same, that what we spend as a percentage of our Gross Domestic Product on social programs such as health, education, family allowance, old age pensions, welfare, education and so forth is the second lowest of all the industrialized countries of the world. We spend less than Holland, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Italy and England. Only the United States spends less than we do on social programs.

Do not tell me that we are spending too much on social programs or that it is the poor who have caused the deficit. There are countries such as Germany and England that have Conservative governments, but those governments I suspect have more of a social conscience than this government.

What is the cause then of our deficit? The real cause of the deficit, and it was illustrated in the budget in 1979 which the then Conservative Minister of Finance introduced, is tax expenditures, the tax loopholes. Those were the loopholes put in by the Liberals under their former finance minister, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

These loopholes allowed, for example, a clerk in 1983 to pay actually more in taxes than the Royal Bank of Canada did. Even though the Royal Bank of Canada had over some $360 million worth of profits that year, it did not pay one cent of tax.

These tax loopholes are the cause of our deficit. We did not collect the revenues we should have been collecting. Another beautiful example is tax reform in 1971 with the notion of a dollar is a dollar is a dollar. Whether one earns a dollar in terms of work or a dollar in terms of profit or a dollar in terms of dividends or an increase in capital gains, a dollar should be taxed.

In 1971 when we did away with the inheritance tax the government of the day, the Liberals, in order to help the Compeaus and the Westons and its large wealthy friends allowed them to put their wealth in a trust. At that time it was estimated that they were allowed to put their wealth in trust and not pay taxes for 21 years; in other words a deferral for 21 years.

• (1600)

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I distinctly heard the member who was speaking refer to another member by that member's name.

I believe the member would more properly be referred to as the member for Vancouver Quadra. I am sure the member is aware of that rule and I am sure he would want to follow it as closely as he could.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, you have two minutes left.

Mr. de Jong: I apologize to the hon. member and commend him for his brilliant introduction and for his contribution to the House.

The fact is that in 1971 the Westons and the Bronfmans said they were given a tax deferral that was worth some $18 billion then. The deferral runs out in 1993. Twenty-one years are over.

Finally, the folks who have benefited the most from deficit financing, from the increase in wealth that occurred in the 1970s and the 1980s, whose properties in downtown Toronto rather than being worth $10 million for a high rise building are now maybe worth $30 million, $50 million or $60 million, the Tories are now going to allow them to defer paying any tax until the last member of the trust dies.

Are they making any contributions to fighting the deficit? Where are the contributions of the Westons and the Bronfmans?

There is dead silence. I do not expect the Liberals to change that because, after all, they created the situation in 1971, nor the Tories who are just going to perpetuate it.

A horse in Mr. Weston's stables gets more tax deductions and tax breaks than an old senior citizen, a widow or a child living in poverty. That is the obscenity occurring today as we finish this session before Christmas.

Do not blame the people on welfare for creating the deficit. My heart throbs when we hear the Liberals complain and take up the plight of the poor. They also have some responsibility in all this.

It also does not make very good economic sense at times when there is an economic downturn to put the screws on the very poor. This does not make economic sense. It is almost Keynesian in reverse and we see that with this government.

In good economic times it introduces tax reductions and in bad economic times it introduces the GST and more taxes. In good economic times it increases government expenditures and in bad economic times it cuts down on economic expenditures.

That is more than voodoo economics. That is stupid economics. With the bill that we are debating today—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time of the hon. member has now expired.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Prime Minister signed the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

We have before us a bill today that is linked more closely than any we have had in the time I have been in this House with extending the poverty of children in Canada.

There is absolutely no doubt that when the government reneges on its commitment to cost share in social programs and social services, the Canadians who are being hurt are our children.

A report was done very recently in Ontario called the transitions report. This was approximately three or four years ago under a Liberal government. It has seen little action under the NDP government in Ontario.

Its primary recommendations were geared to having a social services system that allows people to get out of poverty rather than keeping them imprisoned in it. The main focus of that report was on our children. We should provide the family income so that children could be cared for, housed, clothed and fed decently. That means they would also be able to be educated. It means they would also have some commitment to a future that would encourage them to stay in school. It would mean they would be healthier and cost less to the health care system in this country.

This bill before us today says the federal government is no longer prepared to pay its share to meet the needs of children. It will set an arbitrary limit and no matter how many needy children there are, or how desperate those needs are, it will not go above that.

That is not the kind of Canada that I have raised my children in. It is not the kind of Canada I want for their children. It is a Canada where the poorest in our society bear the burdens of all the economic mistakes of government and of those with money.

The government creates the economic climate and it has no right to insist that the poorest and the weakest carry the burden of its errors in doing so.

If there is any doubt about who carries the burden, let us examine what services funding will be affected: dental care for people on social assistance, essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women and their children, and subsidized child care for low income families so they can go out and work.

This surely is the exact opposite direction from that in which a country like Canada, one of the wealthiest in the world, wants to head. Surely we want to create opportunities so that every child can grow up with a hope of being healthy, well educated, and of contributing to the maximum of their ability to their society. Yet, that is not what happens.

This bill continues the climate of envy and greed that this government has so carefully sowed among Canadians. It fertilizes it well because what is said in this bill to provinces like Ontario, B.C., and Alberta is: "You three will be selected, out of all the Canadian provinces, to have your poor, your elderly, your children, and your needy made subject to an arbitrary limit on how much they need. Even though you three provinces contribute the funds and the wealth to allow us to equalize opportunities across this country, you will not be able to share the resources this country has for looking after its most vulnerable citizens".

We are talking a lot about concurrence now, about the abilities of different levels of government to share power and share the responsibilities in a number of fields: culture and communications, the environment, management of the economic union, and society. Yet, we have here a violation of the fundamental bargain of Confederation, which was that we will share and will treat each other equally. This bill violates that bargain.

Three years ago those of us who cautioned against the free trade deal and cautioned that it would affect our social programs were told that we were scaring the elderly and the poor with no cause whatsoever. I want to examine a pattern of changes in public policy in the area of social programs that this government has taken us through since that 1988 election.

There is the deindexing of child benefits. Who does that hurt? That hurts those in this country with the lowest income. There is a steady cut in funding for affordable housing, the lack of which has been identified as the single main cause of poverty among children and among Canadian women.

• (1610)

There is the elimination of the Rental Rehabilitation Assistance Program, which allows tenants to upgrade rental housing, but home ownership still gets assistance from this government.

There are caps on the contributions from the federal treasury to programs for young offenders. Yet a new Young Offenders Act has been introduced which is punitive to young offenders when there are no services available.

There are cuts to family allowances and the old age security clawbacks. There is unemployment insurance. Again the poorest are being asked to make up for the cuts in training dollars that this government has carried out since its election. I say the poorest because there is a limit on how much people can contribute to unemployment insurance. Those earning the least contribute the most.

We just dealt with Bill C–20 in which we are talking about caps on our contributions to funding our health care program. Here we are again capping the Canada Assistance Plan, which is a fundamental program of our social safety network.

I say to the government that the people who were talking three years ago about free trade, about harmonizing our social programs with the levels of poverty and human degradation of our trading partner to the south, were not the ones who were scaring Canadians. It was this government that was misleading Canadians about its commitment to our social safety net, to our social system and to the dignity and respect that we believe as Canadians every human being in our society should have.

In the three years since the free trade agreement was implemented, we have moved steadily and systematically under this government toward harmonization with a social system that is inferior to us and which creates inferior human beings out of poverty.

This bill is just the latest nail in that coffin.

Here we stand, less than two weeks before Christmas, processing the second in a series of bills, but the 20th or 25th in a series of actions by this government, to further entrench poverty and dependency in this country.

Here we stand, before Christmas, with more people facing more hardship in this, one of the wealthiest nations in the world. That is not the kind of Canada those who have sat in these seats before us tried to create. It is not the kind of Canada that I hope I am here to try to create for the next and for future generations.

I can only say, in the strongest possible words that I condemn this bill. I condemn the fundamental dismantling of the Canadian commitment to sharing and equality of opportunity it represents.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in this House today to address the question of Bill C–32, an act respecting the Canada Assistance Plan.

I do so because I feel that it needs to be discussed, debated and reconsidered.

Let us just consider what we are talking about. We are talking about putting a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. We are talking about telling those provinces in Canada that are richer on a relative basis, that is Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, that the federal government, which up to now used to share a number of social assistance programs with the provinces, will do so only up to 5 per cent.

At first glance, people would say: "Well, what is wrong with that. I mean that seems to make some real sense when we have a large deficit and a large debt". However, let us consider the ramifications of such a decision. Picking on those three provinces already contributing massive sums of money to be redistributed within Canada to those provinces that have less means that they will feel, and justifiably so, picked on again and some more.

The freeze that was put into place has now been extended. There were tensions created then because it was challenged in a court of law. It will continue to be challenged, if not in a court of law, certainly from a moral perspective, a political perspective and a practical perspective.

I abhor any kind of legislation, any kind of government action that will simply increase the tensions in this country at this particular point in time.

It is also extremely sad that these provinces that have more relatively speaking are being asked to contribute even more, even though they are already giving a whole lot as a result of a problem that has been for the most part created by the federal government itself. Much of the problem has been created by the federal government.

[Translation]

We know because we have been talking about it for a long time. When we discuss our country's economic policies, we know that an effort has been made by the government to slow down the economy. Because of the high dollar and high interest rates, we are in a recession which started a long time ago and which unfortunately persists. How did that happen? More people are unemployed; more people rely on social services in our country. Because of a recession that was caused by the federal government and has a direct impact on people who need that help, we ask the provinces to continue to meet the needs of their population, and then we say: "up to a certain point". So, you see the contradiction. I find this really unfortunate.

I find a second thing regrettable.

[English]

When talking about control of expenditures, I mention this and I am going to mention it again and again and again, the government brags about having capped its expenditure level at around 3 or so per cent. It flaunts this. It must simply admit to the Canadian people that it has done this on the backs of the provinces, on the backs of the taxpayers.

If I were to take my debt, walk around this afternoon and simply parcel it out I could walk out with very little debt, perhaps no debt at all. How fair would it be to dump this on the backs of others?

This is precisely what has happened. I do not want to be particularly unkind because we are in that season in which one has to be even more generous than usual. There is not only a contradiction but there is an element of hypocrisy. It is simply untrue that the debt is being controlled effectively because much of that debt is in fact going to be absorbed by the provinces and by the people in those provinces.

We have particularly seen that in the whole area of education. The student debt is going right out of sight. In fact, there are fewer students who are continuing their education. They fear to do so because there are no jobs at the end, once they have completed their courses.

This action on the part of government raises a number of other serious questions. Which other provinces will be capped? If you cap some why could you not cap the others? I know that those which are capped are the contributing provinces. They are the ones not receiving assistance from the other provinces but rather contributing to it. What would prevent the government from saying: "We're going to take the next two in line in terms of per capita wealth and we're going to cap them to this particular level?"

Once you have started to do that—

[Translation]

It is obvious, in my opinion, that we could continue to do so, that we could come up with a new formula. Given the great priority that the government seems to put on controlling the deficit and the debt, especially on the backs of the provinces and their population, that possibility should not be disregarded.

[English]

When you talk about other provinces possibly being capped, you should not forget that there might be some other programs that are also capped, reduced, or eliminated. Why? Because the government wants to try to pretend to the Canadian people that it has controlled the deficit and the debt. It will take on any measure in order to try to make that point, even though it is most misleading. As I indicated before, it is not a control of the debt, it is simply giving it to others to accept. It needs to respond to the concerns of its citizens.

• (1620)

Let us review very quickly some of the negative effects this particular bill will have on Canadians. Dental care for many Canadians will be affected, as will essential living services for disabled persons. Disabled Canadians are among the poorest of the poor and they will be affected. We know that.

There is the issue of foster homes for abused children. We have talked a great deal during the last day or two about the need to respond to children. Here we have a government program that runs counter to this. I find that terribly disconcerting, contradictory, and certainly misleading.

There is the issue of safe housing for abused women. You and I and all of us here have heard the rhetoric with respect to what the government intends to do in this area. Here is a decision that is being made that is going to affect women who are abused. It cannot simply continue to say things that sound right and on the other hand act differently or completely opposite to what is being said. It does not wash any more.

There is the issue of subsidized child care for low income families. I have spoken about poverty.

[Translation]

As for poverty in this country, one of the richest in the world, five million Canadians live at or below the poverty line.

An hon. member: It is unfortunate.

Mr. Duhamel: Yes, it is very unfortunate and there are over a million children in that group.

I mentioned the food banks that will feed almost two million Canadians this year, 40 per cent of whom will be children.

[English]

Here we have a bill that will remove the subsidization to child care for low income families. We all know that the Supreme Court decision has given the federal government the right to cut welfare transfers to the provinces, but it did not provide the government with the moral right to abandon its responsibilities to poor and disadvantaged Canadians.

While I recognize that it is extremely difficult for any government to look at what it has done and admit it has done something really frightening and fundamentally wrong, I would hope that in the spirit of Christmas and the spirit of the holiday season it might for once do the right thing.

[Translation]

Those are my comments. I hope that they will be given some serious thought.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I spoke before on this bill and here I am speaking on it again. Before I proceed with that, I would like to congratulate the House of Commons committee on the good report it has introduced trying to deal with this question of poverty and child poverty across Canada.

It is my hope that the government will look at those recommendations with an open mind and try to set up some sort of a strategy to deal with child poverty in a very effective and direct way early in the new year.

There has been a lot of discussion on this question of child poverty in Canada and there have been a number of reports. The Senate committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology just very recently released a report on this whole question of child poverty.

I am not going to read all the recommendations, but I am going to indicate three of them because I think these recommendations are very relevant to the subject matter at hand.

First, the committee recommended that the federal government fully support the objective of substantially reducing child poverty in Canada. Toward that objective, the committee recommended that the federal government show leadership by undertaking co-operative strategies with other levels of government and the public at large to address the needs of Canada's children living in poverty.

This is the first recommendation.

The second recommendation is for a national conference involving all levels of the federal government on the subject of shared solutions to the problem of child poverty in Canada to be held within the next 12 months. This is important and timely.

Another recommendation is that the federal government in collaboration with the provincial and territorial governments set out a policy, as quickly as possible, on national child care outlining a range of child care options.

There are in excess of 16 different recommendations that came out of this report on the question of child poverty.

Why did we pick child poverty? It is a timely subject especially in light of the fact that Canada endorsed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. This is an excellent step in the right direction toward solving the question of poverty once and for all in Canada.

At the same time, because this debate is taking place during Christmastime, I wanted to focus on the question of child poverty as it relates to the city I represent. While many of my colleagues think we live in a fat city, in fact, as in anywhere else in Canada, we also have child poverty here. One out of every four children in the city of Ottawa lives in poverty. Ottawa is one of the largest cities in Canada.

When you look at the poverty rate for families with children in our region, it is almost double the rate of families without children. In this region alone over 12 per cent of families with children are poor in comparison with 6 per cent of families without children. It is almost double. Translated into numbers, there are almost 13,165 poor families with children.

Poverty hits children the hardest. When you look at children in schools, you will find that one out of six in this region under the age of five are poor. Almost 55 per cent of families with children are poor when the household maintainers are under 25 years old. The younger those family maintainers are, the greater the chances of them being poor. This is especially so when it comes to single parent families.

We have approximately 10,500 children living in 6,000 poor two parent families in this region. This is a serious problem facing not only our city but also has a tremendous impact on the schools that are trying to provide them with the education they need.

According to the latest statistics, almost 50 per cent, or 5,930 poor families with children have a household maintainer who has not completed high school. About 50 per cent of the poor families in this region, whether they are men or women, have not completed high school. This is twice the national rate across Canada when we talk about a dropout rate of 30 per cent.

When you look at the number of households where there are those who have post-secondary education, we have only 11 per cent in our region. That is only 1,200 families. It gets even worse when you look at the poor families where one of the household maintainers or supporters has a university degree. It is a very small percentage of people. It is only about 3 per cent or 935 families.

• (1630)

That is the kind of situation we are dealing with when it comes to poverty, especially in our inner cities.

Many of my colleagues might suggest that the reason we have poor families is because poor families have too many children. You would be surprised to learn that the majority of poor families, or approximately 78 per cent in our region, have one or two children at the most.

Also some people think that just finding a job is the answer to poverty. In fact, according to the Social Planning Council and its report on child poverty in our region of Ottawa—Carleton, many of the people who even have jobs live below the poverty line. It is a fairly large percentage of those people.

A lot of people think that people on welfare are single men too lazy to work. Unfortunately and fortunately at the same time, if we look at the people who are actually dependent on welfare cheques, 41 per cent of them are children, 17 per cent of them are disabled and 16 per cent are single parents.

Because of time constraints I am not going to go over the recommendations in other reports such as the Canadian Teachers Federation, the Standing Committee on Social Welfare and the Social Planning Council of Ottawa—Carleton in its report The Other Side of Fat City.

I am going to make reference to two recommendations which were made by our caucus. One of them could deal very effectively now with child poverty as it relates to school boards. We recommend that the federal government immediately participate with provincial and territorial governments, school boards, and community volunteers to provide nutritionally balanced breakfasts, lunches, and snack programs in schools throughout Canada. The reason we suggest this is because empty stomachs have no ears.

We also recommend that the federal government start immediately to look into redesigning the tax system to make it more equitable, to help families cope with the added expenses of raising children and to simplify the federal child benefit system by the beginning or by the end of April 1992.

These are all recommendations which were made. It is my hope that the government will have a chance to look at all these reports and hopefully in the new year it will come up with a strategy whereby we can solve the question of child poverty once and for all.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in the debate at this stage of the discussion in the report stage of Bill C-32, but some recent events in my constituency have prompted me to rise at this time to draw to the attention of the government and of Parliament the increasing numbers of people who are having to turn to welfare or social assistance as a result of what seems to be a breakdown in much of the UI system.

The relevance of course to this bill is that the government is attempting to do through legislation what can only be described as an act of Scrooge in the days before Christmas. It is attempting to transfer it's debt load on to our provincial governments in areas having to do with social assistance and welfare and many other financial cost sharing programs that impact directly on single parent families, on the poor and disabled, on injured and sick workers, those who are lining up at the food banks and the working poor.

There is something happening right now. I would like to quote very briefly from a memo that I just received from my constituency staff. My assistant in Nelson, B.C. says:

"People are mad as hell. I hear of fears for staff safety at the Nelson UIC office. It is taking at least six or seven weeks for first cheques in the most simple circumstances. If anything goes wrong with your claim, you face welfare until it is resolved. It is bad and we see little sign of it getting any better despite reassurances from UIC management".

This is just one additional way that at the same time as the federal government is cutting back on what should be its legitimate contributions toward caring for the unfortunate, the laid-off, the sick and the disabled in our society, the policies and management policies of this government are driving more people off work, off wages, on to UIC, off of UIC and on to the welfare system.

A few months ago the government moved to do that as well when it changed the eligibility for unemployment insurance to make it more difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance on the one hand and, at the same time, shortening the term of the benefit period during which workers could collect unemployment insurance.

This federal government has been attacking it from both ends at the same time as it has been cutting back on its contributions. It has driven people off of unemployment insurance and on to welfare. Through mismanagement in the UI system it is causing tremendous delays for people to be able to get their UIC cheques, even when they are qualified to get them. The provincial governments across the country are being stuck with the bill, at least those provinces that are affected by the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

Apart from the human impact of this, what does it mean financially? The provinces, generally speaking, have to pay a higher interest cost for borrowing than does the federal government, and a much higher proportion of their borrowing has to take place outside of Canada than is the case for the federal government. Therefore, for a whole range of macro-economic reasons it is also suicidal for the financial and economic health of the country. It also wreaks havoc on the lives of ordinary Canadians who find themselves in unfortunate situations.

Why is the government so determined to pursue this kind of policy? We know there are debt problems here. There are debt problems all over the country for respective governments. Except for sheer partisan political reasons, why should it dump the costs on to those jurisdictions that have to pay a higher cost for money than would be the case if that money were to be borrowed by the federal authority? It just makes no sense from any vantage point, except for partisan politics.

Surely the matter of the welfare of hundreds of thousands of ordinary Canadians deserves a secondary consideration. While this government is doing this, it is also taking other actions that are going to make the same matters worse for a number of other reasons.

Just yesterday in the press we saw an announcement that the federal government was going to be cutting off funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. Some people on the other side may wonder what that has to do with Bill C-32. One of the areas of research that CCOHS has been very involved with in terms of industrial health and safety has to do with preventing the kind of sickness, preventing the kind of injuries that cause people to go on to income assistance by levels of government, by compensation boards and by social assistance. Many of them will not for one reason or another qualify for workers' compensation benefits.

Again, the government seems intent for whatever reason to take financial actions which will result in more and more people going on to the welfare rolls at the same time as it is cutting back on what in past years the government has claimed to be its legitimate share of the cost of social services.

• (1640)

It is irresponsible and it is wrong and economically and financially, it just does not make sense.

In closing, I would simply hope that over the Christmas season, regardless of what happens to the motion before us at report stage today, the government perhaps may be visited by three spirits and like Scrooge turn over a new leaf over the Christmas holidays and when we come back present all of the people of Canada with a gift, and that is not to proceed with Bill C-32.

That would be blessing us, every one, and in this pre-Christmas season that is what I would ask the government to consider.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to stand here and speak to report stage of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Although I had spoken to this bill earlier I would like to speak again because today I would like to address the issue of child poverty in particular.

Through this legislation the government will cap the Canada Assistance Plan transfers to three provinces, Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. Obviously the federal government must believe that there is no poverty in these three provinces. I think that we can all attest to the fact that poverty exists in just about every region of this country, and certainly my province of Ontario is not any different than the others.

The Canada Assistance Plan was enacted in 1966 to assist and encourage the development and expansion of social assistance and welfare services throughout Canada. Under the plan, the federal government agreed to share 50/50 the costs incurred by the provinces and municipalities in providing social assistance and welfare services to needy Canadians. The people who benefit most from this plan are those who are the most vulnerable in our society, those who suffer from poverty, neglect, disability, the homeless, the elderly, abused children, abused women, low income families. More often than not it is the children who suffer the most. Currently there are over one million poor children in this country.

This Christmas close to 300,000 children will go hungry. UNICEF has said that Canada's proportion of children living below the poverty line has increased over the past couple of years, and yesterday we saw that the Prime Minister finally ratified the UN Convention of the Rights of the Child after signing it well over a year ago.

What are the commitments which Canada must now live up to? The commitments that were made at that time were that the children of the world would get a first call on the resources of their respective nations and ultimately of our entire civilization; that mortality rates for children under five would be reduced by at least one third; that maternal mortality rates would be reduced by one half; that there would be access to safe drinking water and proper sewage treatment; that there would be primary education for at least 80 per cent of primary age children; that there would be a reduction of adult illiteracy by at least one half; and that children would be protected in situations of armed conflict.

The ones who immediately come to mind when I think of children who have not been protected in armed conflict are the children of Iraq. What is happening there today as a result of the armed conflict in the Middle East is absolutely tragic for those children.

Fulfilment of the commitments made at the summit would save the lives of some 50 million children worldwide. One hundred and fifty-nine nations signed this convention over a year ago and as of December 6 of this year one hundred and two were "states parties" to the convention either by ratification or accession. Canada's ratification yesterday boosted that up by one more.

Canada now joins countries such as Bangladesh, Ethiopia, Ghana, Honduras, Indonesia, Malawi, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Yugoslavia.

If time permitted, I probably could name all of the 102 but there are other things to talk about.

The reason I mention these countries is that most of the countries which have already signed the convention are impoverished or embroiled in violent struggle. Certainly they will face overwhelming odds to live up to the promises made in the convention. For some signatories, it will be almost impossible. Luckily for Canada living up to these commitments is not impossible.

However, it will take political will on the part of this government to ensure that appropriate and adequate resources are channelled into eliminating child poverty here at home and abroad.

It is clear that there must be an expression of substantial public interest that these promises be kept. The hope that they represent is paramount. There is a world-wide campaign under way to ensure that all countries that have signed and ratified the convention will indeed live up to its promises. It is called the "Keeping the Promise" campaign. I had the honour earlier this week to speak about our world's children and this convention to a group of people from the city of Nepean and from all of the national capital region involved in the "Keeping the Promise" campaign.

On December 9, 1991, the Ottawa Youth Orchestra and the Ottawa Youth Choir dedicated to the children of our community and the world a concert at the Centrepointe Theatre in Nepean. These young people presented me with a petition containing 150 signatures, their signatures, all young people from the ages of 13 up, saying: "Please Mr. Mulroney, keep the promises made at the World Summit for Children".

Canada must lead. The government must ensure that it put in place its fair share of the funds necessary to keep the promises internationally. As passed in an all-party motion yesterday, our commitment amounts to 5 per cent of the cost of keeping the promises internationally. For Canada 5 per cent comes to $350 million.

We must also set the example for the rest of the world by meeting the commitments here at home. This will be increasingly difficult if the legislation before us passes. It is the provinces and the municipalities that provide the programs to meet the needs of our children, and there are simply too many.

The children are the innocent victims of the dour economic conditions created largely by this government. Today my colleague here in the House of Commons, the member for Winnipeg North, presented to us a wonderful report called "A Child Investment Strategy". It is the Liberal minority report on child poverty. I would like to congratulate him for putting together such a very worthwhile document. This minority report calls for a child investment strategy that would have marked the beginning of a 10-year campaign against all child poverty in Canada.

As one colleague said in the House yesterday, the government has yet to put forth a clear plan of action on the elimination of child poverty in Canada. The young people who signed this petition were most concerned that they had not seen a clear plan of action on the part of the Government of Canada and the Prime Minister.

This Liberal minority report, among its many well constructed recommendations, suggests that the federal government withdraw Bill C-32 because it is a very dangerous bill.

There are three main reasons for submitting this report. First, the report by the subcommittee on poverty, as accepted by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women, fails to deal immediately with child poverty. Two, the report that I just mentioned fails to inform the House of Commons and Canadians of the extent to which federal government policies have directly and dramatically increased poverty in every region and city throughout Canada. Three, the government's report says there are measures that can be immediately taken to ensure that the attack on child poverty is not deferred for another decade.

Fifty per cent of the people who use food banks are children. Many of these children could be helped more directly in the school system. We believe that the federal government should participate with provincial governments, through the boards of education, in the provision of nutritionally balanced food within the school system.

Changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act introduced by this government have radically altered the nature of the unemployment insurance program and have affected many people across the country. This government should recognize the negative impact of the recent change to the Unemployment Insurance Act and immediately restore entrance requirements and duration of entitlements to pre-Bill C-21 levels.

I recognize that my time is up. There are many more things that I would have liked to have had the opportunity to say. However, I thank you for the privilege and the capability of standing in this House. I encourage the government to study the report by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and implement this recommendation and the others included within it.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak against Bill C-32 which will put a cap on the Canada Assistance Program.

Curiously enough, the year before Centennial year, in 1966, the government of the day made the social commitment to match the provinces' contribution to the Canada Assistance Program. Curiously enough, as I was saying, 25 years later, one year before the 125th anniversary, the present Conservative government has decided to cap the Canada Assistance Program. It makes you wonder. Is the Reform Party so popular that the Conservative government would want to bring its policies in line with theirs? Here is the Reform Party's policy on this problem:

[English]

"The Reform Party calls for a new social services order with government's role in social services reduced and non-governmental agencies, business, volunteers and families assuming a greater share of the responsibility to care for those who cannot care for themselves".

[Translation]

Does the Conservative government want to move in that direction by bringing its programs in line with those of the Reform Party of Canada? I ask government members whether they have any respect for the poor or for the young. Do they not have a social conscience? I am being rudely heckled by members on the other side. I know it's Christmas and that they want to go to the Speaker's party, but I would ask them to listen a bit.

[English]

"Eighty-five per cent of CAP spending falls under its provisions for social assistance which include social assistance for persons in need, including single parents, the aged, the disabled, the unemployed, the low income families and children in care, care in homes for special care such as homes for the aged, child care families and transition houses for battered women".

[Translation]

Once again I am heckled by members on the other side. They are shouting insults at me because I am reading part of my text. When we speak about women, I find it really odd that the member who shouts the loudest in the House is a woman, a Conservative.

[English]

"Certain uninsured health care costs, such as drugs and dental services and child welfare costs including maintenance costs in foster homes".

[Translation]

This is a most important and serious matter, and the less fortunate need a bit of love. It is not the time for government members to try to trip me up in my speech as I endeavour to explain why this proposal is wrong. We are shirking our social commitment to the poor and women. Well, that Conservative women member can go on shouting insults at me.

I must tell the hon. member, that I feel for children, elderly and women.

In Ontario several people move to the national capital region. I had the honour to sit on the committee on social services for five years, and I could see that different groups were asking help from the regional government. Some were even asking help for funeral services because they could not afford such a luxury.

When we look at the most recent reports on social services in the national capital region, that is the Regional Municipality of Ottawa—Carleton, we find out that spending is increasing twofold and fourfold right now and that the national capital people would like to give more to the people really in need in the community. I submit that the conservative government is saying now to the province of Ontario: "You are very rich, so you pay more". That might seem alright if there was less unemployment in Ontario, if the economy was healthier, if people were spending more, if there was less bankruptcies. Every day on the news we hear of corporate and personal bankruptcies. That shows how bad the state of the economy is. People are so hard pressed in Ontario. That province has the highest rate of cross-border shopping in Canada. We point the finger to free trade, to the economic policies of this government and this government says in turn: "Listen, we will put a cap on our assistance to provinces, Ontario for example". And they ignore the fact that statistics shows very clearly that in the case of battered wives and abused children—

Mr. Kindy: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that Ukraine has officially recognized Croatia. I hope Canada will do the same. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has been in the House long enough to know that, quite apart from the importance of the matter, this is not a point of order. The hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester has the floor again.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed by the behaviour of the hon. member who thinks that since we are on television he can interrupt the proceedings for a flash on something which happened outside Canada and has nothing to do with a point of order.

To conclude, I would say that our government has lost its social conscience. Up to a while ago it seemed it had a little, not very much, but a little social conscience. But now, it is moving ever closer to the policies of the Reform Party by saying: that the federal government will involve itself less and less in social programs presently shared with the provinces. We are going to ask Canadians to do more volunteer work. We are going to ask companies not to contribute and help people in need of social assistance.

• (1700)

Mr. Vincent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent of the House to table a document which should have been tabled earlier today, but was not, regrettably. I hope that in the holiday spirit, my colleagues will be kind enough to give their consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to table that document?

[English]

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, as reported (without amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance; and the motion of Mr. Langdon (p. 5964).

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, the debate on CAP has been going on for a fairly long time now. Many people have used their time discussing the issue and how it would affect Canadians in general, how it would affect children and how it would affect the poor across this country.

My concern comes back to two or three issues that have to do with the CAP. First of all I think a program put in place that will cause very great hardship to many people in my area is an unfair program. In this case I look at what is happening with employment rolls and the difficulties in southwestern Ontario, not only the farm community problems but also difficulties with dismantling of manufacturing throughout Ontario. I quickly realize our welfare rolls have swelled and who has to pay the bill. Very clearly there are policies in place and bills have to be paid.

It seems very unfair that this government through a quick act, through a stroke of the pen, would say it is no longer responsible for the policies that have occurred in the past short time. What I am referring to is the fact that many of the policies carried out in the name of management by this government have created very difficult times in southwestern Ontario.

When we look at the free trade agreement, at the great promises that were made in it and at the results of that free trade agreement, we see that there were thousands of jobs lost, thousands of people out of work. We see children having a very difficult time of it. I see that for people in every walk of life. Whether it is small business, the farm community, the factory worker or big business in my area, the dollars are not there to support the economy as there were in the past.

The wardens of both Kent and Essex counties tell me that their welfare rolls have doubled, tripled and greater than that in some cases. In speaking about the numbers of dollars they require for social agencies to operate, their budgets have just skyrocketed far beyond their ability to pay.

In my community in Blenheim we have had a tax revolt which is the voice of the people saying that the taxes being imposed on them are far too strenuous in these times.

At the same time the federal government has created many of the problems with the policies it brought forward and is now saying that it is opting out of the bottom end of this whole thing by taking away support moneys to the programs put in place to help those in dire need.

I feel that the government really has put itself in a corner. As I stop and think about that I really wonder what type of managers the Tories are. I have to say they are poor managers.

When I was speaking a little earlier I heard three members across the benches suggest that the national debt when they took over was far higher than I recall the statements being. One member from Calgary suggested the national debt was as high as $206 million. Another suggested $220 million.

I have an inquiry that was sent to the then Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre. The question directly asked him what the national debt was in 1984. The answer he sent back was that the national debt was $167.985 billion. The national debt in 1984 was $168 billion, approximately.

Our national debt today is skyrocketing over $400 billion which is well over 100 per cent increase. We hear week after week that it is because of the interest rates they had to pay back in 1984. Their spending was in excess of $30 billion beyond the revenues collected. They had to pay a national debt on interest of $22 billion which they attribute to past governments.

It is very clear in my mind that they not only spent $30 billion beyond the tax dollars they collected, but they did not point out at the same time that the government amounts received had increased to the point at which they have raised taxes since 1984 until today approximately one-third more than were available then.

If I were to take the government revenues in 1984 they were $64 billion. Today they are $128 billion. If I look at the government expenditures in 1984 they were $96 billion. Today they are $148 billion.

The government has spent a great deal of money on various programs and done many things it felt were directions it should carry out, but it did not consider where it was spending money or who it was supporting.

I have some real concerns that tax increases have been tremendous, that revenues have increased dramatically over the last six or seven years. At the same time the revenues increased it has built a $30 billion debt year after year on top of that. The end result is we are now sitting with an accumulated debt of well over $400 billion.

We do not have money to support programs that need to be supported and the government is saying it is fiscally responsible by cutting moneys that need to be spent on the poor in this country today, on welfare programs which are there to support most of our communities.

When I realize that it is just transferring that responsibility on to the provinces and on to the municipalities then I wonder what type of manager it really is. I believe that if it were responsible, the government would stop and look at the real basis for the programs it has.

• (1710)

I believe at this point that the government should start to examine how those overexpenditures are being created. We have to question whether building buildings or other projects under way are the things to do. Should we be dealing with the poor, the weaker people in the economy, ensuring that education goes well, that lunch programs and schools go well, that those people who are having a very difficult time have the basic devices of life so that they can learn and increase their ability to be citizens in this community and are able to give as much as they can?

The direction we are moving in with this bill is retarding the ability of a great of number of people in this society to do the best that they can do. The problem is that we are not looking to the future. Presently we are looking at saving a few dollars, which create tremendous costs in the future.

Uneducated people, poorly nourished people who cannot learn, are going to be the children of the future if we do not change some of the things that are going on.

It is clearly evident that government has been very poorly managing our society. This bill is creating a tremendous disaster for the weak and the people who need support in our communities.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to this bill on report stage, Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan and the Motion No. 1 to delete clause 1.

Bill C-32 was given first reading on September 18, 1991. The bill will effectively extend the limit on the 5 per cent increases in federal contributions to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario until 1994-95. These provinces are not receiving equalization payments.

This will prolong the agony even more by not understanding the call of the National Council on Welfare which says this must not happen. An advisory body of 21 members composed of present and past welfare recipients, social workers, lawyers, professors, people from all walks of life give a perspective and advice as a body to the minister of health. Yet, the minister of health of this government has turned deaf.

When the Supreme Court of Canada made its decision on August 16, 1991 saying that the federal government has a right to withhold its contribution it did not say that it should do it. The court only conferred the onus of that responsibility on the federal government. When that decision was announced the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, Mr. Patrick Johnston, said: "The decision of the Supreme Court paves the way for the federal government to further limit its financial support for essential social programs". This was said barely one month before this bill was introduced. The prediction and fear have happened already. First we allow the extending of the limit until the year 1994–95. It will only be a matter of time until it will be extended to the other provinces.

According to the estimate of this government, the three affected provinces were to lose $2.135 billion over the 5-year period anticipated in this proposed bill. Perhaps at this time of year this government may mellow. Perhaps in the spirit of Christmas it will see a miracle and change its heart.

I would like to review the background of the Canada Assistance Plan.

At the time of Confederation, assistance to those in need, such as the ill, the aged, the disabled and those who felt the consequences of family break-ups and were suffering, was given by charitable organizations and charities, at the time mainly in rural areas.

The Fathers of Confederation gave the social assistance jurisdiction to the provinces. However, it became clear in the 1920s and 1930s that the Fathers of Confederation were wrong. The obligation to help the poor and those in need is truly a national one. Hence, the Canada Assistance Plan was born in 1966.

A year before that, a great Liberal, Mr. Lester B. Pearson, gave his vision of how to help those in need in the throne speech. That is the Liberal vision which this Tory government is trying to erase from the map of Canada.

The Canada Assistance Plan has two basic objectives: to eliminate poverty and, at the same time and even more important, to prevent and remove the causes of poverty.

Who benefits from the Canada Assistance Plan? In 1988–89, 1.85 million Canadians benefited from the Canada Assistance Plan, of whom some 40 per cent, over 780,000, were children. Not only that, but the volunteers in volunteer organizations who help these poor children feel that there is recognition of their work if the Canada Assistance Plan is in place.

This government is trying to take that away. What message are we sending to our volunteers in the country? The Canada Assistance Plan has been described as a social bond, as the cohesive glue that binds our country together. What a better glue at this time when the forces of disunity are threatening to disrupt our country.

Through this amendment the government is violating the spirit of Canadian nationhood. It is violating the sacred trust of Canada's social programs. If this government pursues this amendment Canada would take a great leap indeed, but a great leap backward.

Also, the Canada Assistance Plan, in addition to the Guaranteed Income Supplement for low income pensioners, is the only remaining national program that explicitly fights poverty. It is a program for poor and modest income families to access child care services in the provinces.

As long as we still do not have the national child care program which this government promised in 1988, which until now has not been implemented, at least there is an escape in the Canada Assistance Plan and an escape valve for children in need of child care spaces.

This government is even trying to plug this escape valve. Where is the soul of this government? Therefore, at Christmastime I say: "Please, open your hearts. Rescind this amendment".

In conclusion, I would like to repeat that the intention of this government to amend the Canada Assistance Act is a great step backwards. Canada would make a great step forward if this amendment were rescinded. I support the amendment of the member for Essex—Windsor.

• (1720)

This morning the subcommittee on poverty tabled its report and the Liberal caucus decided to issue a minority report. Why is that? It is because the majority report of the government members completely ignored the sense of urgency to help our poor Canadian children. It completely ignored the witnesses that we heard over one and a half years who would like to have measures introduced for food, clothing and shelter.

We recommend a series of proposals, such as the establishment of a national nutrition-based program for breakfast, lunch and snacks and to immediately restore the entrance requirements and duration of entitlement to the unemployment insurance benefits as they existed before Bill C-21.

We have asked the government to withdraw Bill C-20 and this Bill C-32. We would like an immediate job creation program this winter not next winter. You cannot postpone the temperature.

Finally we have asked that the federal minimum wage be immediately increased to $5 per hour. In the spirit of Christmas let us rescind Bill C-32 and we can go back to our provinces with a clean conscience and a conscience that we can share with Canada's poor.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House is disposed to have me speak for a very short time and I will undertake to do that.

It is seldom that I get the nod from my colleagues from the government side, but I suppose it is Christmas time and one is expecting to get some dispensation on these special occasions.

In all seriousness I did want to make a few comments on this bill. Essentially this cap affects three provinces. While they are outside the jurisdiction of my responsibilities as a federal member of Parliament I will say two things about that. While the cap does not apply to my province of Newfoundland, it does apply to three other provinces that are very close to Newfoundland in many ways. I am going to pick Ontario because as the economy of Ontario goes so does the work prospects of many Newfoundlanders who in the past would leave their homes, their residences or their towns to go and seek work in places like Toronto and other towns and cities in Ontario.

We felt the pinch of about a half a billion dollars if we total it all up in Newfoundland. This is because of a reduction in transfer payments in our case which reduced secondary and post-secondary education and hospital care. I have spoken on this frequently in the House and I am not going to repeat myself this evening. But this cap, as it applies to the province of Ontario and the other two provinces, concerns me greatly.

I do want to compliment my colleague from Winnipeg North who enunciated very clearly some of his concerns. The budget of February 26 was not the most popular budget in the world. This is I suppose the last act of clearing up what is left.

If I could be permitted to finish in a civilized manner, I would very much appreciate it. I am not known as a heckler on this side of the House so I would ask the indulgence of my comrades across the way.

I think it would be worthwhile for us to remind ourselves who this is applying to and who it is going to affect the most. Who does this cap apply to? Well, I am going to just remind us, just before we close this session of Parliament, that they are the people that I come in contact with as a member of Parliament. I am sure all our colleagues come in contact with them.

[Translation]

Among those who benefit from public assistance and social welfare services are children in care or in need of protection because they are abused or neglected, the physically or mentally disabled, single-parent families, the elderly, the unemployed, families of persons in distress, low-income workers and battered women.

[English]

These are all types of people we have discussed in great detail in this House in the last session since we met here in early September.

I would have to be very strong in support of the amendment put forward by my hon. friend. I am not always known to support the other opposition other than the Official Opposition, but on this particular occasion I would find it very difficult in my heart to do otherwise.

On the basis of those who are affected by this I would be in support of the amendment. Before I do sit down I would like to also take the occasion to thank you indeed, Mr. Speaker, for your good guidance and judicious seating in the chair. I take this opportunity to wish that all my colleagues will put some of the things we have done in the past year behind us and hope that we can go forward with renewed vigour and with renewed purpose in the new year. Merry Christmas to all and to all a good night.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West) moved that Bill C-270, an act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (oath of allegiance), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege for me to rise in debate on my private member's bill, Bill C-270, an act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867.

This bill attempts to amend by way of the founding document of our Constitution, the oath of allegiance members of Parliament must swear before they take their seats in this time-honoured Chamber. All members of Parliament, from Gander—Grand Falls to Saint-Maurice to Saanich—Gulf Islands, who put forward their names on ballots for general elections to the Canadian House of Commons and who win the privilege of taking their seats must swear an oath of allegiance before the Clerk of the House.

What is the nature of an oath, Mr. Speaker, be it to Queen, to country, or a general notion of collective values? Members of legislative assemblies across the world swear some type of oath after being elected to or in some cases appointed to national legislative councils. In one sense an oath is a legal requirement, in another sworn for dutiful or moral reasons.

The English philosopher, John Stuart Mill, states in his writing on liberty that an oath is a manifestation and part of the social contract. As Mill states: "What are called duties to ourselves are not socially obligatory unless circumstances render them duties to others. The only purpose for which legislative power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a community against the person's will is to prevent harm to others. His own good is not sufficient warrant."

In other words, an oath is not to be taken lightly and bears on the conduct of each member of this House. The oath of allegiance reminds us of what our primary responsibilities as members of Parliament are; the creation and passage of legislation beneficial to the common good of our country. We are sent here with a mandate from our electors with their faith and confidence in us, and we are rightly expected to act in accordance with the oath we swear before taking our seats in this Chamber.

As we all know, Canadians hold their elected representatives in less and less esteem, with less and less confidence to act in accordance with their best interests. I believe that if we are to reform our institutions, we must build from the bottom up. We must begin this process before we assume our seats in this House or take office and before we put into motion any sort of new constitutional mechanisms.

At this time when many Canadians, elected and non-elected, are thinking about what their Constitution should prescribe, let us first begin by subscribing to values of what we, as members of Parliament, are entrusted with upholding.

Last summer I was listening to a discussion phone-in program on CHML radio in my riding of Hamilton West. The particular program is hosted by a very knowledgeable, colourful individual by the name of Roy Green, whose discussion centres around issues in the public eye, issues of importance to many people.

During one particular week, Roy was talking about the oath of allegiance in relation to public institutions in Ontario. The subject matter of this particular program dealt with the removal of the oath of allegiance from the police act. People were very upset that the oath was being done away with. More recently, the Law Society of Upper Canada did away with requiring the oath to be taken by new members joining the Canadian Bar Association. That one has still got me scratching my head, Mr. Speaker.

Anyway, Roy Green's show got me thinking about our oath. When I called the Clerk's office for a copy of the oath I had sworn to—I must confess, I could not remember all the words because of all the excitement of the moment—and when I checked back to the oath, there was only mention of the Queen, period. There were no guiding principles, there was no mention of Canada.

As we are revisiting our Constitution, I believe it is high time that members also swear an oath to Canada as well as the Queen. Many people were very upset with the way the oath was being cast aside and wanted the oath to remain as is. Other callers to the radio show said that there should also be an oath sworn to Canada. I took this notion from Roy Green's show and decided that, instead of doing away with the oath as it stands, I would build upon it to recognize our history, to recognize our traditions. I decided I would swear an oath to the sovereign, but recognizing our maturing nation I would similarly swear an oath to uphold our Constitution, our laws and the institution of Parliament.

Since 1774, there has been an oath of allegiance in our legislatures which has not borne any mention of Canada. Today members swear the same oath as that prescribed in the Constitution Act of 1867 and not a single word has been changed to reflect the idea of a sovereign nation called Canada. It is because of my respect for our institution and our traditions that I stress again my intention, through this bill, is not to do away with the oath as it stands but to build upon it.

Some members may wish to do away with the oath to the Crown entirely during these times of constitutional change. Others may wish to keep it, and it alone, as the oath they must swear before taking their seats. I propose an alternative which I believe not only recognizes and respects our past but brings home what we are and how far we have come as a country.

Contrary to what some people may think, the Quebec Act of 1774 provided for the protection and promotion of the French community. The act provided that despite attempts to religious conversion from Great Britain, Roman Catholics could hold public office. The Roman Catholic church was established by giving it the power to collect taxes. The civil code was recognized in law and the boundaries of the province were extended. The oath of allegiance did not have to be taken by any person professing the religion of the Church of Rome, recognizing that in order to ensure peace, order and good government, French members of the community would have to be treated as equal members of the community. In 1774 the oath was almost as long as that British members of the Privy Council swear to today.

It was not until the passage of the Canada Act of 1791 that legislatures were created in both Upper and Lower Canada. The oath members at that time swore to is, incidentally, the same oath that members of the British Parliament swear to today; however, even when our Constitution was patriated in 1982, when we broke all legal ties with Great Britain, our oath remained the same.

We often hear debate over what is actually Canadian identity, Canadian culture. Our identity and culture have grown since 1791 and 1867, indeed since the presence of French explorers as early as 1605. Again I say that keeping the reference to the monarchy is not because we are subjects of Her Majesty. In law we are not, although many people claim loyalty to the Crown. By keeping the oath to the Crown, in addition to an oath to our Constitution and our laws, it is to merely recognize and respect our history.

I say to those quasi-judicial bodies and government institutions which have discarded the oath to the Crown that they cannot ignore and refute our historic past. In recognition of our history and the future before us, we must build upon our traditions, not to judge them but to honour them. True, the sovereign plays less and less of a role in our society today than ever before but it is also a notion which preserves in part our identity and our history. The oath members and ministers of the Canadian cabinet must presently swear before taking their seats and offices is this: "I, Stan Kazmierczak Keyes, do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth the Second."

By contrast, members in the mother of Parliaments, Westminster in Great Britain, swear the following oath: "I do swear by Almighty God that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth the Second, her heirs and successors, according to law, so help me God."

The Queen is still referred to as the Queen of Canada. It is only by looking back into history and not washing our hands of what has transpired, by not washing our hands of our common history, that we see the role of the monarchy more clearly. It is not something threatening, not something divisive; it is a treasured part of our history.

Therefore we must begin to be more assertive in who we are and what we represent as a country. If members of Parliament and perhaps an elected Senate—heaven knows, I do not wish to scare my colleagues down the hall—do not swear an oath to what is Canadian, what can we swear to?

My proposal, if passed through this House, would have members swear this oath:

> I do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth the Second, her heirs and successors, and that I will faithfully observe the laws and the Constitution of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen and as a duly elected member of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor I would ask for the unanimous consent of this House to adopt the motion which I will table with you right now. In a nutshell, it asks that this bill be put to a legislative committee.

• (1120)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Deblois): Negatived.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill before the House today is to amend our Constitution. According to the proposed text, each member will be obliged to take the following oath: "I will faithfully observe the laws and Constitution of Canada".

This is a most relevant reminder of the importance of the Constitution in protecting and enhancing the lives of Canadians. The Constitution Act, 1982, the fundamental law of our country, includes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Of course, our freedoms did not originate with the Constitution. The Constitution merely recognizes the four freedoms enjoyed by all Canadians: freedom of conscience and religion; freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression; freedom of peaceful assembly; and freedom of association.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms has a very special place in the hearts and minds of all Canadians. Those among us who are aware of the lack of freedom that exists in various parts of the world understand the value of the charter as a guarantee of our freedoms.

The equality rights recognized in the charter are particularly appreciated by anyone who has ever been discriminated against either socially, politically or legally.

Mr. Speaker, I imagine most members of this House have at some time met disabled persons, native people, members of visible minorities or members of linguistic minorities among their constituents. Such meetings make us realize how important it is to guarantee equality rights in this country. The government has submitted to Canadians 28 proposals on the future of this country. Their purpose is to strengthen the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Seven proposals concern more specifically the recognition of our common citizenship and of this country's diversity. The government suggests amending the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to include property rights. It also proposes to restrict the legislative power of Parliament and the provincial legislatures to opt out of certain provisions of the charter.

The votes necessary to invoke the override clause would be changed from a simple majority to 60 per cent of the members of Parliament or the provincial legislature. However, the government realizes that all Canadians should have their say about any major changes being suggested. The government is taking steps to encourage the participation of the general public and, more specifically, contributions by Canadians to the work of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada. To broaden the scope of the committee's work, the federal government has initiated a series of national conferences on four major components of its proposals for shaping Canada's future.

Each of the first four conferences is sponsored by an independent institution and focuses on a specific group of federal constitutional proposals. Three conferences have now been held, the third one in Montreal, on the weekend. Canadians have told all of us what they think about the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments, the reform of institutions, especially the Senate, and last weekend, about the importance of economic union. Next weekend in Toronto, the Niagara Institute will sponsor a conference on Quebec as a distinct society and on the proposed Canada clause and the charter.

At the fifth conference, sponsored jointly by the institutes and the government and to be held in Vancouver, incidentally, the results obtained in the four previous conferences will be summarized and an effort will be made to arrive at a general consensus which will help the governments act. As I just said, this conference will be held in Vancouver.

By attending the conferences and taking part in the committee hearings, Canadians show what they mean by freedom of opinion, expression, assembly and association.

By encouraging the public to participate and citizens to contribute to the hearings of the joint committee, the government is showing its deep attachment to the spirit and intent of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that almost all the aspects dealt with in our national dialogue—those in the government's proposals, those that will be discussed by the joint committee and those that will no doubt be presented by the public—have an impact on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Recognizing Quebec's distinct character, recognizing native peoples, affirming the Canadian identity, making political institutions more receptive, streamlining government operations and preparing for a more prosperous future all directly or indirectly affect our Constitution, our rights and freedoms and our future as Canadians.

The government presented 28 proposals to foster open, animated, informed and productive dialogue with reasonable Canadians all across the country. It openly invited everyone to take part in this great enterprise of establishing a new common goal, defining the Canada of the 21st century. It proposed a partnership in peace and prosperity, a partnership in which all citizens, regardless of their age or social status, can achieve their potential and benefit from a society that today is the envy of much of the world. But for all Canadians to have their say in guiding the future of the country, hon. members should respect the spirit and intent of the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In our debate this morning, Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt that members of all parties in this House respect the spirit and intent of the proposal submitted to us by the hon. member for Hamilton West. Nevertheless, before the House considers the proposal to amend the oath of allegiance found in the Constitution, I would like to ask the hon. member the following questions: Would he agree that in the spirit of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, all Canadians should have an opportunity to participate in constitutional renewal? Before the solemn oath that members of Parliament and senators must take is put in the Constitution, would he allow us to discuss this proposed amendment as part of the public debate now under way on constitutional renewal?

In that way, Mr. Speaker, to conclude, we would know for sure what reform and what changes our fellow citizens consider most appropriate.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a very great pleasure for me to participate in the private member's motion of the hon. member for Hamilton West. It could not be more timely, especially when we are talking about reforming the rules of the House of Commons and are debating reforming our Canadian Constitution from coast to coast to coast. This topic could not have come at a better time than on the opening day after coming back from the winter break when politicians and Canadians had time to sit back and reflect on what Canada is all about.

Let me share my experience of 40 years ago when I was attending a rural school in Saskatchewan. You know what a rural school was like, Mr. Speaker, where you had grade one to grade ten in one room with 30 students and one teacher. Each morning we were asked to rise and salute the Canadian flag, the kind of flag next to you, Mr. Speaker, which stood in the corner of this rural school house. We had to take an oath of allegiance, a pledge. We had to recite: "I pledge allegiance to this flag and to the country for which it stands, one country indivisible for the benefit of all".

This rural school teacher borrowed a bit of that oath from the U.S. pledge, but she put it into her own words. That pledge stuck with me through my whole life. It instilled in me a love for Canada, a knowledge that this is my country. When I look at that flag, I know I have to fight for the country for which that flag stands if any harm is going to come to it. I will put my life on the line. I grew up with this kind of pledge. I think what is missing in our country are these kinds of oaths of allegiance for elected politicians and for every Canadian.

• (1130)

Just two weeks ago I wrote an open letter to the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada. I urged the committee to look into the possibilities of a pledge that all school children could memorize as they go through our school system. This would give every Canadian something in common, a pledge to be a Canadian, a pledge that states what it means to be a Canadian, and states the duties and responsibilities of being a Canadian.

In all of the constitutional debates taking place across Canada that I am watching very closely, everyone is asking: "What is there for this group? Will the Constitution guarantee this for our region? Will the Constitution guarantee my individual rights?" Nowhere in the Constitution and nowhere in the debates do I hear: "What are my responsibilities as a Canadian citizen?"

Perhaps we should set an example by taking an oath before we take our seat in this House. We have to do that by the parliamentary rules and forms that guide us. In 1979, when I was first elected, I looked at the oath I had to take before taking my seat here. It read: "I, Jesse Flis, do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II". I felt uncomfortable with that oath. I took it because I knew the Queen stood for all of Canada. She is the Queen of Canada, so I took it very proudly and obediently, but I felt uncomfortable. There was something missing. Therefore, I read the alternative I could have taken.

By the rules of the House, members who object to being sworn may make a solemn affirmation if the taking of an oath is contrary to their religious belief or if they have no religious belief. That oath or affirmation would say: "I, Jesse Flis, do solemnly, sincerely and truly affirm and declare the taking of an oath is according to my religious belief unlawful and do also solemnly, sincerely and truly affirm and declare that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II".

It is not against my Catholic religion to take an oath. I was uncomfortable with that form also. For 10 years this oath of allegiance has bothered me.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that I raised a question of privilege in this House when one member took the oath, took his seat in this House and then went across the river and washed his hands of the oath. That should never be allowed. Such a member should not be sitting in this House. The Speaker ruled, and I accepted the Speaker's ruling.

I was very shocked after the member for Hamilton West completed his debate, giving excellent arguments why he wants to preserve our allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, and then adding the very vital part which I feel we should all swear before taking our seat: "I will faithfully observe the laws and Constitution of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen". That is what has been bothering me for 10 years as a parliamentarian. That was the missing link and the member for Hamilton West gave it to us. "I will faithfully observe the laws and Constitution of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen", leaving in all the rest: "I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II".

Many Canadians of non-British descent will say: "I am not British. Why should I swear to that?" I am not of British or French descent. But our Parliament is based on the British parliamentary system and by leaving that in we are respecting our heritage. By putting the additions in we are respecting all the other heritages that go into making up this country: of the aboriginal peoples, of the francophones, of the anglophones, et cetera.

We could have made history in this House of Commons on the opening day, but we blew it. We blew it because the whip of the government party does not read the order papers. He did not know what was going to be on the Order Paper. His first question was to the member for Hamilton West: "Did you negotiate for an agreement?" After all we heard on the TV programs, how we were going to bring decorum back to the House, how we were going to co-operate, these were the whip's opening remarks.

The member for Hamilton West is not asking that this be made law today. He wants it referred to a legislative committee. The hon. member opposite asked if there could be participation and input from Canadians. Yes, the committee could recommend that.

What is wrong with referring this to committee for further debate, further study, and improving our whole parliamentary system? It is very sad for the Whip to stand and say: "Did you negotiate an agreement?" It is very sad to open on such a note.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward to making some comments on this particular motion by the member for Hamilton West.

I guess first off I will agree with the member for Parkdale—High Park. I also spent some time in the constituency over the Christmas break and found out that the people of my constituency were concerned about constitutional reform. As with all of the comments made so far in this debate, that discussion about this particular motion is specifically lined up toward an important part of constitutional reform.

I question the relevancy at this time of this particular motion. In all of the discussions that people in the area I represent and following the discussions in these various meetings that are happening right now with the joint House-Senate committee, never once did we hear this one particular issue.

The members of my riding wrote quite a significant report on the various proposals brought forward by the government and the discussions that are going on right now. Not once did I hear this particular issue come up.

I am not saying it is not important because I think it is. The member for Hamilton West has brought forward quite a significant issue. We are concerned about the economy. We are concerned about Senate reform and, as the member for Parkdale—High Park just commented about parliamentary reform, is this the time or the place to be discussing the change of the oath of allegiance?

I say not. We should get on to the issues that are really important to the people of our country. I am not saying that this issue is not important. Unfortunately the people in my constituency and the people throughout Canada have never raised this issue. Nobody has come forward to me and said: "Mr. Bjornson, as our representative would you change your oath?"

In terms of the relevancy of this particular motion today, although I think sometimes we should take a long hard look at it, what we should be doing is listening to our constituents right now and reacting to their concerns. They have some very legitimate concerns. We should be going out and doing the parliamentary reform so that we do not have the comments that were just made by the member for Parkdale—High Park.

It is important to re-evaluate this motion. It is unfortunate that we do not have questions in this type of debate, but I would put this question to the member for Hamilton West and I probably will after the debate is finished: Why has he not taken this to the joint House-Senate committee for discussion? Why has that arena not been used to forward his specific motion rather than the House? I think we would all feel a lot better if the discussions were brought forward in what I hope and suspect we will get from the joint House–Senate committee. Would there be unanimous consent on a group of motions to be brought back regarding constitutional reform?

It is very important that we all get involved in the constitutional reform debate. Quite possibly during that debate maybe the member for Hamilton West will stand in this House and restate his position, which he feels very strongly about. I hope he does take the time to do that.

I would like to close with a comment to all members of the House. The best way to resolve our constitutional problems is to listen to our constituents. Sometimes we have to go to our constituents and show them that there is a certain need for discussion. Maybe this debate today is doing just that, showing that there is a need, a need for this specific issue to be brought forward in the discussion. To deal with this today, when we have a Constitution that has to be revised, is not the time and not the place.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the matter that is really right at the heart of what we do and who we are as members of Parliament in this House of Commons.

After being elected but before each or any of us take our seats in this House, each one of us did take the oath of allegiance. For each of us, taking that oath stands out as a very proud moment, a moment when we realize the full weight of the tradition that stands behind us in this House.

In this bill the member for Hamilton West suggests that we expand the scope of the oath to include fidelity to the observation of the laws and Constitution of Canada and to the fulfilment of duty as a Canadian citizen and as a member of Parliament. Members may be aware that with this proposed addition, the oath for members of Parliament becomes quite similar to the oath taken by new citizens of Canada. The oath for the Canadian citizen is:

> I swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth the Second, Queen of Canada, her heirs and successors, according to law, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

A question which may be in the minds of members is this: Why does the member for Hamilton West suggest that members of Parliament swear a new oath, one that parallels or even may duplicate the oath for citizens?

This oath sums up some of the responsibilities of every Canadian citizen: To be loyal to the Queen of Canada and her representatives and to the Governor General and Lieutenant-Governors, to be loyal to Canada, to obey Canada's laws, to respect the rights of others, to respect private and public property, to care for Canada's heritage, to support Canada's ideals.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees all Canadians the right to vote in federal and provincial elections, the right to be a candidate in federal and provincial elections, the right to enter, remain in or leave Canada, the right to earn a living and reside in any province and minority language educational rights.

The principles of citizenship is a subject which may not receive the attention that it deserves. I think my colleague from across the way has raised this. Citizens by birth and by choice have equal status, enjoy identical rights and privileges and are subject to the same duties and responsibilities. Citizens are loyal to the country with allegiance to its institutions, the Canadian Constitution and the law of the land. Citizens have both knowledge and understanding of Canada's system of government, its political and cultural history and official symbols. Citizens also accept that Canada is a united federal structure and that its character is multicultural. They have a knowledge of at least one of the official languages of Canada, that being either English or French.

Citizens do promote pride in Canada, in its institutions and its various communities by striving to enhance the quality of Canadian life. They use their knowledge of the nation's structure and language to participate fully in public affairs. We have seen that quite clearly over the past few months.

Citizens honour, respect and value the contributions of individuals from various and different cultures from coast to coast. They enrich Canadian life. They contribute to the linguistic and cultural diversity that really is a hallmark of this nation.

Citizens acknowledge their responsibilities as members of the global community to support and to respect fundamental human rights everywhere and to honour all international covenants and obligations to which Canada is a signatory.

Citizens encourage the acquisition of citizenship by all who qualify and invite such persons to become equal members of the Canadian community, thereby enriching the nation and sharing in the advantages that it offers the citizens.

Citizenship is a bond of faith among all Canadians. We share values; we share commitments; we share a unity of purpose. And we do this while enjoying the diversity of so many cultures. We believe in freedom, dignity and respect, equality and fair treatment and the opportunity to participate. We care for the disadvantaged. We prefer peaceful solutions, not quarrelsome disputes.

The government has recognized that as we approach the 21st century, Canadians want to discuss, articulate and reaffirm the principles of our citizenship. This is the reason the government has proposed a Canada clause for our Constitution, a clause that acknowledges who we are as a people and who we aspire to be. The proposed statement outlines such characteristics as equality of women and men; fairness, openness and full participation by all people without regard to race, colour, creed, physical or mental disability or cultural background; tolerance for individuals, groups and communities. These are just a few points to be included in the proposed Canada clause.

Certainly over the past few weeks, indeed past few months, at the various hearings that have gone on in Canada—one in Halifax, one in Calgary and, indeed, just this past weekend in Montreal—we have heard so much about Canada being a caring nation and how people all across our country want to expand the Canada clause to make sure it represents all of us and our true feelings.

Since we are in the midst of a major comprehensive renewal of our Constitution, I suggest to hon. members that it would be prudent to incorporate the major aspects of the bill before us today into a general discussion, into a review and into the renewal of our Constitution.

• (1150)

Many questions regarding citizenship which are raised by this bill of the hon. member today are already encompassed by the spirit and the intent in the existing law concerning citizenship.

Before we proceed with this bill, I suggest that we consider the views of many Canadians who are not members of this House but who are truly interested parties.

The principles of citizenship which I outlined would prompt us to be responsive to the wishes and recommendations of all our fellow citizens. By introducing this bill, the member for Hamilton West has brought before us many, many important questions. I join with other people in this House today to participate in dialogue, not only with them but with constituents, my constituents in Calgary Southwest, and with many thoughtful people all across this country, all of whom greatly value the privilege of being a Canadian citizen and seeing what we do as we go into the next century.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. The bill before the House today raises a number of important questions about the roles, rights and obligations of the members of this House.

I would like to touch on certain aspects of this bill that are generally related to the renewal of our Constitution. I think there is ample evidence that many Canadians across the country are anxious to formulate our fundamental law, the Constitution, in such a way that each and everyone of us can be proud to be a Canadian.

Some of the media claim that Canadians are sick and tired of hearing about constitutional reform. Nothing could be further from the truth, Mr. Speaker. Actually, 1,550 private citizens sent letters to the Conference Secretariat to reserve seats at one of Canada's five conferences. The fact is that many Canadians have the impression that the present Constitution does not recognize the kind of rights and status they should enjoy as citizens of this country; in other words, they believe they do not have everything to which they are entitled as Canadians.

I think the hon. member for Hamilton West is to be commended for explaining his position on this subject. The bill presented in the House today reminds us of the responsibility each and every one of us has to look at the Constitution of this country, to prepare proposals and to present them in order to ensure the renewal of our Constitution. However, I have one major reservation.

We are now engaged in an attempt to bring about a thorough reform of our Constitution. This massive national effort concerns, first of all, the citizens of this country, especially where the reform of our institutions is concerned, and I am thinking more specifically of the House of Commons.

The hon. member proposes to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 with respect to the House of Commons. Since all citizens who wish to do so are taking part in the current debate on the federal constitutional proposals, I think Canadians should be asked for their opinion in this instance as well. We must not deprive the citizens of this country of their right to take part in parliamentary reform. The bill under consideration is not an ordinary amendment: it affects the Constitution, the basis of our parliamentary democracy. Although the proposed amendment is short, it is very significant. Therefore it should be considered carefully.

I believe that members of all parties are perfectly aware that reforming Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, is too important to be left to members of this House alone, Mr. Speaker. Some people claim that the reputation of Parliament has suffered and that reform is necessary. Whether this criticism is justified or not, I think it is extremely important to react appropriately to the general interest shown across the country for parliamentary reform. We should therefore co-operate fully with the people and institutions in seeking ways to improve Parliament. It is most important as well to show that we are prepared to co-operate.

At the very moment when the whole country is trying to find a consensus on the reform of our main institutions, we in the House of Commons have taken it upon ourselves to make changes without widely consulting Canadians.

Some will say that Canadians are not interested in the reform of their Constitution, their institutions and their Parliament. Some will also claim that Canadians have clearly shown that they are primarily concerned with the economy, unemployment and their own security.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is an accurate assessment of Canadians' state of mind. Of course our fellow citizens are interested in the economy and employment and their material security, as we all are. But Canadians, well informed as they are, realize full well that prosperity and unity are inseparable and that Parliament is in the best position to defend national unity. It is a forum where we can and must debate the issue and then agree to act so as to ensure a prosperous future for our country.

The amendment before us proposes to include in the oath of allegiance found in the Constitution the duties of citizens and members of Parliament. Obviously, the hon. member for Hamilton West considered his bill for a long time.

We must thoroughly amend our Constitution and in 1992, all Canadians must have a chance to take part in the process. And, despite what some of the media would have us believe, many citizens are ready to suggest quite specific parliamentary reforms that they think are not only applicable and relevant but also an important contribution to the process.

Many people proclaim that in its present form, the House of Commons is no longer the representative, democratic and equitable legislative body that 21st century Canadians need. Mr. Speaker, I think that we must avoid taking amendments out of context; instead, we should do so as part of the over-all process of constitutional renewal.

Mr. Speaker, we have already begun this process of renewal.

• (1200)

I would hope that the hon. member for Hamilton West will see that it is really in his interest to make his proposal part of the over-all constitutional reform process. That is how we must act and that is the procedure which I propose to follow.

[English]

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to rise and speak very briefly on Bill C-270.

I have to say that Bill C-270 goes right to the heart of a matter which concerns every member of this House. It is an amendment to the Constitution, one which proposes reform of one of our parliamentary traditions. I believe that every member who knows, loves, and respects this House is committed to reform, to revitalize and rededicate this, our own institution.

Every one of us here representing the people of Canada must simply be determined to win unquestioned status for Parliament as the pre-eminent form and recognized champion of democracy in this country.

We have before us a formidable task: to reform parliamentary procedures, to foster more free votes, to enhance the role of members in committees so they can be more effective in amending bills, to allocate more time and higher priority to private members' bills and to ensure that seats do not remain vacant, thus denying people their representation, and major sweeping reform of the Senate.

It is indeed a formidable agenda. It is an agenda which has been placed firmly before us by the people of Canada. They have decided these are changes they want. These are changes whose time has come and our constituents have demonstrated amply that they want us to take action now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to debate third reading of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

This bill has come back from committee without substantive change. The factors that made this legislation necessary at the time of the February budget have not changed.

I will take a few moments, if I might, to describe what the bill seeks to do and why it is necessary, given the fiscal realities of the federal and provincial governments.

As part of the government's restraint program, this bill will continue the ceiling on the growth in federal contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan to the provinces not receiving equalization payments. A 5 per cent ceiling on CAP transfers to these provinces covering the years 1990-91 and 1991-92 was introduced in the 1990 budget. This legislation will extend those ceilings through to 1994-95.

The bill has been carefully designed to balance our concern for needy Canadians and our desire to avoid placing unnecessary burdens on Canadians in future. The government is well aware of how important these dollars are in providing assistance to the neediest of Canadians.

CAP contributions help to provide the most basic requirements of life—food, shelter, and clothing—as well as social support in a variety of ways.

Broadly speaking, CAP allows the federal government to share the costs incurred by provinces and municipalities in providing key social services, social assistance to persons in need, welfare services, and certain work activity projects. While the federal government specifies the conditions under which a particular program is eligible for cost sharing, the provinces are responsible for designing and delivering the programs and ensuring their comprehensiveness. Programs supported by CAP help low-income Canadians by attacking the causes as well as the effects of their problems. In addition to support for many welfare support programs, CAP payments allow people to get back on their feet and working by helping to pay for tools and equipment needed to carry on a trade or other employment.

The success of CAP is not measured by how many people are dependent on it, and that is what we hear about today, but how many people it can help to regain personal independence. This independence would be worthless without a healthy economy and the jobs to go with it. It is to ensure the long-term health of the economy, threatened by the debt problem this government inherited when it came to office, that we must put certain limits on the funds we give the provinces for these purposes.

This bill reflects a balanced approach to spending restraint. It takes into consideration the needs of Canadians during this period of economic difficulty as we recover from the recession we have just weathered. At the same time, it allows us to keep our course of deficit control because we know it is the only way to build a stable, long lasting recovery. None of the steps we have taken will compromise the social programs that are a key characteristic of Canada's sharing society. Rather they ensure that we will have a strong economy that will be able to afford these programs in the future and provide opportunities for those in financial difficulty to find independence and self-respect.

I am sure that all rational observers will agree that Canada's deficit and debt represents a major threat to this country's social and economic well-being. They threaten our goal of sustainable economic growth and our ability and the ability of all governments across the country to provide the social services that we are so proud of as Canadians. Canada's more than $400 billion debt burden and the deficits that add to it is a national problem affecting all Canadians.

It results in higher taxes, inflationary pressure, increased interest rates and long-term uncertainty. Because interest costs are such a large share of the budget—about $43 billion, or 27 per cent of total expenditures—the debt consumes funds that might otherwise be used to assist Canadians in need and to support programs Canadians want.

To effectively deal with our debt we must get back on track to reducing the deficit. This is the threshold step to get the debt under control and on to a downward path. Deficit reduction requires spending restraint. That is why we brought forward this legislation. It is part of a broad program of spending control needed to establish a positive economic environment for this country.

National problems demand national solutions. For this government to live within its means, spending restraint must be shared with the provinces. Federal transfers to other levels of government are simply too large to ignore in the effort. The financial support provided by the federal government to the provinces represents a large and growing part of the budget. That support has grown significantly.

During the period 1984–85 to 1990–91 that support has grown by almost 6 per cent annually. That is a much higher rate of increase than the 3.7 per cent growth in over-all program spending over the same period. As a result of this growth, total federal expenditures or contributions to the provinces, both cash and tax transfers, will reach nearly $37 billion this fiscal year. The cash component of these transfers will represent about 20 cents of every federal revenue dollar. We simply cannot afford to let this spending grow without any limits.

Measures to control the growth in one major transfer, Established Programs Financing, have already been introduced with Bill C-20. That was passed by this House last year. Complementing this legislation, the bill before us today seeks to continue the ceiling on the growth in federal contributions under the Canada Assistance Plan to the three fiscally strongest provinces. Even with the measures we are proposing, growth in federal transfers is expected to run at 3.7 per cent annually between 1991–1992 and 1995–1996, in contrast to just 3 per cent for all federal programs over the same period.

The level of CAP spending and the rate of growth over the past few years have meant that we cannot ignore this program as we work to contain expenditures. Since 1984–1985, federal CAP contributions have grown at about 7 per cent annually from $4 billion to more than $6 billion last year. In contrast again, I remind the House that federal program spending has grown at only 3.7 per cent over that same period.

Simply put, the government would not be a responsible custodian of the taxpayers' money if we allowed these contributions to grow without any restraint. We cannot spend our way out of problems with money we do not have. Some would have the electorate believe that but it is just not true. We cannot borrow the funds. Let us face it. The more we borrow, interest rates rise. There is a very high price for us to pay today and of course for our children tomorrow.

I would like to assure members of this House and all Canadians that the limits on CAP growth do not put this nation's welfare system at risk.

The assistance provided under CAP by the federal government will continue to flow in every province. For seven provinces there is no gross ceiling on federal contributions. We will continue to match eligible spending on social assistance in these provinces, dollar for dollar.

For the three wealthier provinces, CAP contributions will also continue to grow but to a limit of 5 per cent annually. Even with the growth ceilings outlined in this bill, we estimate that during the five-year period in which the CAP ceiling will be in place, federal CAP contributions to all provinces are expected to grow from $6 billion in 1990–1991 to more than $7.3 billion in 1994–1995.

CAP contributions to these provinces will continue to grow at a rate that is even faster than the growth in total program spending by the government. As I am sure all members are aware, we have introduced legislation to restrain the growth in most areas of our program spending to 3 per cent annually after 1991–1992.

The three affected provinces are those best able to share in the restraint necessary to build a stable fiscal foundation for this country's economy. Each of these provinces face interest costs that are considerably less than those of the federal government. These costs represent a much lower percentage of provincial spending.

For example, the national debt I mentioned earlier in my remarks now stands at over $400 billion, equal to almost 60 per cent of the country's Gross Domestic Product. Interest payments will consume 33 cents of very dollar of federal revenue in 1991–1992.

In contrast, the combined debt of all the provinces is expected to total about $113 billion for 1991 or 16 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product and provincial debt payments will represent about 11 cents of every dollar of provincial revenue. In particular, these changes are estimated to be 11.6 per cent of every revenue dollar for Ontario, 8.3 cents of every dollar for Alberta and 4 cents of every dollar for British Columbia.

The actual financial impact of the 5 per cent ceiling on the affected provinces will vary with its level of spending. We estimate that social assistance spending in Alberta has grown less than the 5 per cent limit placed in 1990–1991. Consequently we expect that federal contributions will continue to match the growth in Alberta spending dollar for dollar for that year. The total federal contribution will be about $530 million. For 1991–1992, the federal contribution will reach some $565 million.

However for British Columbia and Ontario, the growth ceilings will come into play limiting CAP transfers. Federal contributions to British Columbia will still top $715 million for 1990–1991. For 1991–1992 they will grow to more than $750 million. Ontario will receive for the fiscal year 1990–1991 about $2 billion, roughly one-third of the federal CAP contribution. For 1991–1992, Ontario will receive $100 million more for a total of $2.1 billion.

By taking the measured step contained in this bill, we are seeking to live within our means and the means of the guy who pays the bill, the Canadian taxpayer, while still ensuring that those most in need are fully protected. The financial discipline that we are asking for is essential if we are to further reduce inflation and interest rates. It is only in this way that we can strengthen the economic upturn that has already begun.

The fiscally responsible approach we have taken is the only way that we can generate productive long-term jobs and ensure renewed, sustainable prosperity. It is the only way to bring down inflation and to create a positive environment in which all Canadians can confidently plan for their future. It is only by ensuring a prosperous Canada with a sound financial foundation that we can maintain a strong social safety net for Canadians in need.

I would also like to point out that there is a review of all major federal transfers to provinces currently under way with an eye to improving their effectiveness and tailoring them to the changing needs of the 1990s. On the fundamentals to this discussion, I am sure there is already full agreement. The permanence and success of Canada's social programs depend on wealth and prosperity of the country as a whole. I need not remind my fellow members that prosperity cannot be legislated.

I am sure that all members of the House agree that the best assistance for Canadians in need is meaningful, permanent jobs. Job creation through sound economic management has been a priority of this government from day one.

The government's restraint efforts are even now showing results. The economy began to turn upward in the second quarter of last year and continues to grow, albeit slowly. We are expecting a growth rate of about 2.7 per cent in 1992. The OECD expects Canada to lead the G-7 in economic growth.

The conditions are in place for growth, but we are well aware that many Canadians are still experiencing the effects of the past recession. Without a doubt, we have work to do to ensure that the recovery is sound and long-lasting. If we waiver, if we let the deficit rise, inflation and interest rates will follow, choking off growth. The balanced measures we have taken, combined with economic recovery and lower interest rates, will push the deficit down.

During the recession of 1981-82, the government of the day chose a different path, allowing the deficit to balloon by $23 billion from 1982-83 to 1984-85 to a total of $38.5 billion. It is this burden of debt that we have inherited, all Canadians have inherited, from the previous government which has made the legislation we have before us today so necessary.

There are no quick, painless remedies to our debt problem, only difficult responsibilities we owe to Canadians. The extension of growth ceilings on CAP transfers flows directly from these responsibilities. I urge all members of this House to support this motion and to join us in accepting our fiscal responsibility to all Canadians.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for his remarks. Of all the ministers in this government, he perhaps lays it on the line most clearly. The fact that he has not been able to change the line of the government, change its thinking on this piece of legislation and change its thinking about what is going on in this country, is a testimony both to his own honesty and to the stupidity of the government.

In taking a look at this particular piece of legislation, I am struck by the fact that no matter what group has appeared in front of the committee, no matter which speeches have been given in the House of Commons, no matter which commentator you follow, no matter what the courts have said and no matter what evidence has been presented to this government, this government has failed to change one part of this legislation or one iota of its strategy.

This piece of legislation, Bill C-32, was considered at length by the committee on finance in a special set of hearings that attracted not the usual business oriented groups to their finance committee, but a long line of groups interested in social policy.

This is not strictly a budgetary act, but is the implementation of a very Draconian social policy. One of the strategies followed by this government since 1985 has been the use of the budget to introduce pieces of legislation which have undermined the current social policy developed in this country since the 1930s.

The evidence is now overwhelming that Canadians are being hurt by the strategy of the federal government. It does not only apply to the reality of the recession. I cannot believe I heard it, but I think I heard the minister say the past recession. If it has passed for him I guess his cheque comes in every month, but it has not passed for the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are still looking for work or who are still facing personal and corporate bankruptcy and are wondering where to turn next.

The fact that members of this House, after being away for six weeks to talk with constituents and to visit with different groups in our areas, can come back and give the same line is a sad commentary on the quality of representation that many Canadians are now receiving.

I must point out that during the hearings some of the groups making presentations pointed out to the federal government that there is a legal opinion that the strategy it is pursuing in Bill C-20 and Bill C-32 is illegal. In an unusual move, the House of Commons committee agreed to attach this legal opinion to the document submitted to the House and it is there for all members to review. We brought in officials from Finance and officials from Justice who were struck by the logic of this particular position. I am surprised that the minister, after having two months to consider this, has not in any way changed the government's position vis-à-vis Bill C-32.

Bill C-32 should be withdrawn by this government and fought by the opposition because the situation in Ontario is so dramatically different. To have this historical image that Ontario is a place where there is such economic growth that you can cap expenditures and make people who live there pay a price totally misses the point. Anybody who represents southern Ontario should be aware that the needs of people living in and about metropolitan Toronto and in cities such as Brampton are greater than they were two years ago and that families do require the assistance of the provincial government to a greater extent than ever before. That means they need the support of the federal government to pay those budgets. This has not been recognized by the federal government. It continues to keep its head in the sand and refuses to acknowledge the importance of reforming the social policy system instead of burying people under budgetary items.

Subsequent to the introduction of this legislation, there has been a series of media accounts as to what it means to be poor in Canada. During a debate like this we should pause and think about some of the statistics and the people in this country. Do not forget that this is a process begun 50 years ago to shore up the economic reality that from time to time we go into a tailspin and from city to city, from different parts of the country, people cannot compete and cannot live in the economic system.

One of the failures of Conservative policy, not only in Canada but in the United States, has been to balance the economic and social objectives of our society. If you look at the constitutional front, we have this desire for an economic union which was trashed on the weekend in Montreal because people asked: "Where is the other side of the coin? Where is your social policy? What are you going to do to help people out?"

This marketplace that we talk about, and we on this side of the House support very strongly, also needs to protect people. It is there to serve us, to further our individual interest and to further our small business. It is not there simply to enslave us in such a way that we end up being bankrupt after a lifetime of work.

The fact that dozens of people at a meeting came to this conclusion and had to quite literally re-route the constitutional process in order to make their point is again an indication that this government does not understand the significant feeling to protect the social policy of this country.

As an aside, I would point out the constant reminder of this government about deficit.

It is very interesting that it should constantly stand up and remind the House of how poorly it has done on the only objective it set for this country. In order to respond to the recession in the early 1980s, the Liberal government ran up a deficit for two years, a serious deficit. Since then, this government has treated this as being the reason for the collapse in the federal treasury. In the meantime, it has created by conservative estimates about $210 billion debt of its own. If you look at a similar parallel conservative coalition in the United States, in which Ronald Reagan and now George Bush convinced Americans that they had to vote for the Republican party in order to save their treasury, what do we find out? We find out that the Republican party has increased the debt more substantially than generations of Democratic governments.

An hon. member: A trillion dollars.

Mr. Walker: A trillion dollars, I am told by my colleague. If you look at a parallel development in Canada, the debt created by this government, whose whole raison d'etre was to eliminate debt and to create economic growth, is astounding.

It is nice for the minister to remind us of the government's failure, but I think instead of reminding us of its failure it should at least have accomplished one of its objectives. Heaven knows that the people who need money on social policy, who need money on medicare, who need money on post-secondary education, are doing without. It is about time that this government understood just exactly the price being paid by a false objective which it has not even come anywhere close to fulfilling.

According to an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail on December 19 of last year, the average family income for Canadians has dipped for the first time since 1985. Canada had more than one million children living in poverty last year, an increase of 150,000 from 1989. The last time Canada had more than a million poor people was in 1985 when 1,047,000 were below the federal data-gathering agencies' low income cutoff line. These statistics all come from Statistics Canada.

This report also revealed in a very challenging fashion the difficulty that Canadian families were having, even during the surge in the economy of the late 1980s. When that so-called surge in the economy failed, family incomes dropped by 1.6 per cent. Young parents, families headed by a single mother, and two parent families trying to get by on one income were among those hurt the most. Those are the people who form the backbone of family life. When you are trying to deal with the support systems for children and trying to deal with child poverty, these are the families we should be trying to shore up and not destroy.

As a whole, the 1980s marked an end, at least temporarily, to huge decade-by-decade jumps in family standards of living. In other words, the government's own agency now reveals that the Liberal strategy from the 1930s, 1940s, 1950s, 1960s and the 1970s was a strategy that produced a support system for families and increased the wealth of Canadians. Even during the Depression and again during the Second World War we managed to better protect Canadians than during the tremendous economic growth of the 1980s.

Just think how miserable this government would have been if it had had a recession for the last seven years; it would not have known how to cope. It does not know how to create wealth. It does not know how to create jobs. As a result, all it can do is use its budget to come down with Draconian measures such as Bill C-20, Bill C-32 and previously Bill C-69.

Canadians from coast to coast are arguing and are presenting briefs to this government saying: "Back off, we have had enough, we can't withstand this any further". All this government can do is indicate through every signal, in the speech by the Minister of Finance and in the speech we just heard in the House of Commons a few minutes ago, that this path will be continued. It is as if the complaints on individual levels to individual members of Parliament and complaints made across the country though briefs to this government are just put aside and not heard at all.

In responding to this report on child poverty by Statistics Canada, the Toronto Star in its editorial castigated the Minister of Finance who had responded in the pat fashion he has that he cannot do anything about it. I quote: "What he is really saying is that Canada, one of the world's richest countries, cannot help its poor, sick and jobless". Stop and think about what that means for Canadians. We have always put ourselves in the G-7. We have always argued that we have one of the most productive economies, that we have been able to generate tremendous wealth. Yet, when it comes down to the basic question of maintaining a society that is liveable for all people, we are now saying that we cannot do it any more.

Canadians hear these speeches in which somehow or other the implication is that you should feel guilty that you have spent all your money and that you should not be asking us for any more. Canadians have not spent all this money. Since 1984, the federal government has spent all this money. It has blown the opportunity. It should step aside and let Canadians with a more responsible idea of society take over and show other people exactly how to rebuild Canada. The sooner this happens, the better. As I say, Mr. Speaker, that is about the only question I am asked when I am back home in Winnipeg.

Another article that appeared in the media during the period of time since we last met was headlined "What future for kids in poverty's grasp?" It also repeated the figure that the number of poor children increased 15 per cent from 1989 to 1990 and that they now number more than one million. Think of it, a 15 per cent increase in child poverty in one year.

In 1990, two-thirds of children in single mother families were poor, making up nearly 40 per cent of the total number of poor kids. Ontario's welfare bill is now $5.45 billion.

Here are some other stats. Girls whose families are on welfare have 3.9 times the rate of poor school performance than other girls. Boys on welfare are 1.4 times more likely to do worse than other boys. Almost one-third of children in subsidized housing have psychiatric disorders compared to one in seven children in other homes. More than 40 per cent of children 12 to 16 in subsidized housing do poorly in school. However, children on social assistance who do not live in subsidized housing do even worse.

Child poverty rates are directly tied to adult jobless rates. There is a broad consensus around the need for better job training programs, agreements on pay equity for women and higher minimum wages. The point is that it requires a strategy.

We on this side of the House have spent the last year thinking about these issues and working with Canadians to develop a strategy. We believe very strongly that this government's strategy is incorrect and that what we need to do is again unite the two principal purposes we have for the federal government in this country; that is economic policy and social policy. Unless they are working hand in hand, we are not going to be able to redevelop the country that we were once so proud of. It is very important that we all recognize the significance and the imperative of integrating the two objectives of social justice and economic development.

For us on this side of the House, social policy has always represented an essential component of what we try to do as government. If the message from 60 years of Liberal government is that we have best represented the whole nation, that we have best articulated national values, aspirations and purpose, then that is why social policy has been so fundamental to the way we have governed in the past. In order to make ourselves a society distinct from the United States, and without being negative in the nationalism but being proud of Canada, surely the social infrastructure that we set out, the best example being medicare, is the way that we have challenged people to see Canada a different and a better place to live.

That is why we have opposed this government's strategy of integrating the two economies in North America without having a social policy agenda. That is why in many respects the strategy of the Europeans in integrating their economies is more forward looking and more helpful to all people. That is to say, they recognize there is a social side to the coin and that what they should be doing is making sure that workers are looked after properly and that families are looked after. The fact that there is no social policy in the original FTA with the United States, and it does not sound like there will be one in the future with Mexico, is the reason why this party, a party traditionally of free trade, has been so upset with the ramifications of the 1988–89 free trade agreement with the United States.

The Conservatives by contrast have never known what to do. On the economic side, and it is very interesting to think about this, their regimes parallel three major collapses in the Canadian economy: 1930, 1960 and 1990. In the two major constitutional crises—in the early 1960s when the FLQ began to develop a base in Quebec; and in 1990, in this recent constitutional crisis, through 1992—the Conservatives were in charge.

On the other hand, if you look at the economic issues of the NDP and the experience we have had in the west, the collapse of the Manitoba economy from 1970 runs parallel to the NDP government taking power in 1969. The decline of the Saskatchewan economy is very much parallel to the NDP being the government there. All the headlines indicate the panic that is riveting throughout the Ontario economy with the NDP in charge. It has only been the Liberal Party which over the years has been able to maintain an economic growth rate which has allowed the federal government to support provinces directly and to build up a base of expenditures, not indebtedness, which have created the social consensus which has kept this country together. This is why the Liberals have fought this piece of legislation with such determination.

The reason we are having such great difficulty putting the Constitution together right now is the fact that people do not see that this consensus and this coalition to do things, both on the social and the economic side, is no longer there.

In many areas, instead of cutbacks, we could be reforming. We would advocate during this session in the House and through the budget that the government begin to look at ways of supporting Canadians instead of ways of undermining their support systems. We could be doing more in areas such as income support, child care, health care, settlement policies, English as a second language, French as a second language, immigration, fair taxation, skills training, housing, post-secondary education, regional economic development and greater support for small businesses and entrepreneurship.

With the emergence of such a program, we would begin to see Canadians being more confident in their government and therefore beginning to make investment decisions on their own, whether as consumers or investors on the business side.

Since 1984, by contrast, the Conservative government has ignored the undeniable link between social and economic policy and made deficit reduction the top priority of the government.

The cumulative effect of the policy direction taken by this myopic government has been devastating for many Canadians. The result has been high unemployment, drastic increases in poverty levels and skyrocketing welfare rolls, a near bankrupt economy, little reduction in the deficit and, most important, little hope for a turnaround in the future.

The Conservative agenda has failed to achieve its stated goal of deficit and debt reduction. Over the past seven years, in spite of successive tax increases for low and middle income Canadians—the same Canadians who are having their support system removed by Bills C-20, C-69 and C-32—and the Draconian cuts in transfer payments, annual deficits have been stalled at approximately $30 billion and now the national debt is expected to reach $450 billion by the next general election.

Federal social spending as a percentage of GDP has declined from 8.1 per cent in 1984-85 to 7.1 per cent in 1990-91. One lesson to be learned from this experiment by the Conservatives is that spending cuts without social investment simply do not work.

The way that we have proceeded for many generations and will continue to proceed in our social policy in contrast with the government is as follows: First is a recognition that medicare is the practical and symbolic cornerstone of Canada's achievement as a caring society. The Liberal Party began medicare. We funded it properly, we shored it up with the Canada Health Act and we will do whatever we have to do in the nineties to maintain it.

• (1240)

Second is a recognition that tax reform and social policy go hand in hand. Today an increasing number of working families cannot make ends meet. One purpose of federal tax policy should be to ensure that working Canadians have every available opportunity to get jobs, day care, education and housing.

Third, economic growth and social policy are two sides of the same coin. You cannot have one without the other.

Fourth, child poverty does not begin and end with children; it is intergenerational. Eradicating poverty among Canada's children requires us to deal with child care, nutrition, family violence, job preparation, housing, among several other programs.

Fifth, because social policy is an integral component of Canadian identity, the protection of a Canadian way will be included in all international trade agreements.

There are choices that Canadians can make. Through pieces of legislation which may appear minor and are short in their text, Canadians are being presented with an agenda which is very negative and very destructive to their well-being. Canadians are turning to other parties, not so much for support for their position, because I think Canadians all feel that way, but because they want us to present alternatives. They want to see that other parties are thinking about ways of improving their society.

The policy process within this party, within this caucus, has been a very active one for the last two years. Thirty position papers have been produced on a whole number of issues, including social policy and tax reform. There will be a national convention in February which will present many of these ideas to the nation for consideration. There will be preparation for the next general election. People will see that at least one group of men and women have spent their time productively in the last four years, that it has not only been in opposition to the government, but it has also been in support of doing things a different way.

Perhaps through this process of formulating new ideas Canadians will begin to appreciate the protest parties, whether it be the BQ in Quebec or the Reform Party in the west. For example, Preston Manning, the leader of the Reform Party, says he would abolish the Canada Health Act. That would mean abolishing universality and allowing the introduction of user fees.

Perhaps once these debates begin to take place seriously, Canadians will understand where they should turn to for support for programs as fundamental to the future of this country as medicare, as well as CAP and a number of other programs, one of which, believe it or not, is day care. At the very time that this government has been hinting with one announcement after another that there is going to be a broad initiative dealing with child poverty, it has also gone about capping CAP, which has had exactly the opposite effect. It cuts down the room that provinces have to manoeuvre within the fundamentals of our society.

For the last year and a half a subcommittee of the House of Commons has been reviewing issues of poverty. This committee heard from one group after another. Our caucus committee heard from many other groups. We began to formulate some ideas about what should be done to deal with this issue. We stood up against Bills C-20 and C-32 and will continue to fight Bill C-32. However, we have also seen that Canadians are anxious that something be done right away. If you are creating debt, let us be clear about it. This government does not create wealth; it creates debt. It creates about $30 billion worth of debt a year and does not know what to do with it all. Instead of creating debt, which then in turn has to be handled by every working Canadian, we should be trying to create wealth.

People form governments for a reason. The economy has a power of its own, whether it be within this country, Europe or the United States. The power of society generally rests in the economy. There has been a 200 year struggle in this country—against the family compact to begin with, against Britain, against the United States—to form a government as an expression of political power. You express political power for a reason: in opposition to the economic forces which are undermining your life, to balance off the marketplace. You have to aggressively support a government against those forces. People get very upset when they see that the government they have voted for, the institution that they spend millions and millions of dollars supporting, refuses to respond. Why do Canadians spend their time voting? Why do they spend time following the news if at the heart of the matter their institutional arrangement cannot respond to them? We are trying to reach out to Canadians and to say that there are ways we can respond. We understand as clearly as they do that this government does not understand. However, there are members of Parliament, not only from this caucus but from other caucuses, who appreciate the anxiety and would like to translate it into initiatives.

When the subcommittee's report on poverty was presented to the House in the last week of the session before Christmas, we applauded the efforts by members of all three parties who sat through many hearings and the efforts of the majority on the committee to bring these issues to the attention of the public. The fact is that they did get a lot of public attention and that should be honoured and respected.

On the other hand, we found the report lacking in a focus that could help Canadians see their way through the next few years. I think it is time that we as politicians set aside our differences and begin to provide Canadians with some support systems.

During our deliberations we presented a minority report. In that report we came out with eight recommendations which I think contribute to the debate on how we go about rebuilding confidence in the economy and confidence in social policy.

I would like to review the recommendations from our child investment strategy presented before Christmas. First, the Liberal Party recommends that the federal government immediately participate with provincial and territorial governments through boards of education and in conjunction with community volunteers in the provision of nutritionally balanced breakfasts, lunches and snack programs in schools throughout Canada. In other words, the major report said that we should urge others to do it, but that is not sufficient.

These programs already exist in major Canadian cities, not through any free choice but through people recognizing that if children do not have a properly balanced diet they cannot study. If they cannot study they fall behind. If they fall behind, their families fall behind and it perpetuates the weakness in our system. We want to make sure that weakness is not perpetuated and that Canadians understand there are people in Ottawa who realize how desperate they must be to go to food banks, how desperate they have to be to have their children given a meal at school and how much that is a denial of their dream as a Canadian to look after themselves and their family and to be put into a position where other people have to feed their children, starting at 7.30 in the morning.

Second, the Liberal Party recommends that the federal government recognize the negative impact of the recent changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act and immediately restore entrance requirements and duration of entitlements to pre-Bill C-21 levels.

In my own city of Winnipeg there is a great deal of difficulty dealing with youth, particularly aboriginal youth. They cannot get access to programs because they are not UI recipients and all the training moneys in the employment department have been moved over to look after UI recipients. If you cannot get started in the job market, how can you get training? If you cannot get training, how do you get started? You enter a vicious circle of denial.

In five years we are going to be looking at those young people who will then be 26-30 years of age and saying: "You have never been trained. You do not have a job. Where do you fit into this job market?" We have an underclass forming and none of us recognizes just how severe the crisis could be. The only way to stop it is to begin to act now, put aside legislation such as Bill C-20, put aside Bill C–32 and Bill C–21 and begin to talk among the parties in the House of Commons as to how to reconstruct the social support system in this country.

Third is the removal of these pieces of legislation and perhaps have an all-party committee begin to review ideas such as the one put forward by the premier of Ontario and others on the social charter. Perhaps we should review other initiatives and see where we are headed in order to protect people, particularly in terms of international competition.

Fourth, the Liberal Party recommends that the federal government redesign the tax system to make it more equitable, to help families cope with the added expense of raising children and simplify the child care benefit system by April 1, 1992.

In other words, in the measures being presented in this budget, let us deal with the fact that families are having a difficult time.

• (1250)

Let us not just talk about the people who are on social assistance. Some families make between $20,000 and $50,000 a year but cannot make ends meet because of the cost of housing or because they are temporarily on UI. The tax system is burdensome for them. We cannot turn around and say they should be able to do it themselves. The reality is they cannot do it by themselves.

Metropolitan Canada has changed in the last 10 years, and our tax system has not caught up with the cost of living for these people. I am sure every member sitting in the House today can present stories from his or her own constituency about these living conditions.

We turn away from families in that income range and tell them they should be okay and we have done enough for them in the tax system. They do not sympathize with other people who are getting assistance. Instead of having a coalition among the different groups, you in fact create divisions. Creating divisions only exasperates the social harmony we require in this country at this time.

Fifth, the Liberal Party recommends that the federal government immediately establish a winter job creation program to counteract some of the damage already done by anti-employment policies that have had a direct impact on child poverty. In other words, as the newspaper article said and as just about every expert says, when you talk about poverty, you have to talk about the fact that the head of the household does not have a job.

With the UI system being what it is, there is a real crisis developing in this country. As people move from unemployment benefits to social welfare, the burden is going to be transferred tremendously from the municipality to the provincial government. This government can perhaps take satisfaction that its deficit is going to hover around $30 billion instead of being higher, but in reality it is creating tremendous public debt for other governments.

The historical responsibility of the federal government is to ensure that Canadians have access to jobs. When the private sector collapses as dramatically as it has over the last two years, we have a responsibility to make sure that people who want to get back to work have a program in front of them.

Some people say that all we are talking about is make work programs and they do not work. Of course they do not work, but there is a real backlog of infrastructure decisions that have to be made in this country. There is probably several billion dollars worth of work that can be identified by municipal leaders almost overnight. It is the same on the provincial side, but they need access to funds. A dollar put forward by the federal government is going to create more dollars by others.

We should not take the attitude of Canadian Conservatives in the 1920s and early 1930s, that they will all get back together again, so do not worry about it. During Diefenbaker's government they refused to respond to the 1960 recession. We have to respond. We have to show Canadians that we are not self-satisfied and we understand that they need work. We understand that people want the chance to be off social assistance, even if it is for 10 or 20 weeks.

They want to build roads. They want to replace sewers. They want to create spaces in day care, perhaps. There are things we have to do, and we are obliged as a Parliament to find ways of doing them. If we are in debt for $30 billion and do not offer Canadians any hope, then why not take the initiative, deal with that in a Keynesian sense and use the federal government's borrowing powers to create wealth and get people back to work.

I do not apologize for one minute for mentioning this possibility. People are paying taxes and people are on UI already. We are doing nothing for them. How do we think we make them feel better by doing less? The answer is that you make them feel rotten. It is time we developed a passion for this. Some of us represent constituencies where 30, 40, 50 or 60 per cent of the people are looking for some sign of help. Absolutely nobody is responding and saying they are sorry. Tough.

All of us here have a real obligation. We may feel sorry but we get paid. Every Canadian knows who gets paid. We get good money from those Canadians yet we are not able to do anything for them. It is with great apology that I have to go back to my constituency and tell the people in Winnipeg I am sorry, but I cannot convince them to help you. It is a horrible feeling. It is a horrible feeling when the government has been able to help others, bail out economic projects it should never have been involved in, or in the case of Ontario, help out a major aircraft builder when it can give people on social assistance only 2 per cent.

What kind of society begins to set that up? The people who have decried that for generations, turn around and choose the corporations over the people on social assistance the first opportunity they get. That is what makes Canadians crazed. That is what drives them into other parties and other forums. They want some semblance that people here are listening.

The sixth recommendation coming from our report, and again we have tried to get this economy started immediately, is that the federal government announce its intention to have an accelerated job creation program for students and youth in place by the summer of 1992.

The cashless student is becoming a focal point of the younger generation. They are not able to find summer work and are facing tuition increases somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent compounded annually. Access to programs they want are severely limited. They are forced to extend their programming over four or five years, which took many of us in another generation three years to complete. This is slow impoverishment. This is a slow death for students. What they need is work.

In the 1970s the Liberal government responded with several innovative programs. Students enjoyed working and had an income. They went to school and participated in the work force to become ready for the economy. This government does not want students to get ready for the economy, yet it turns around and talks about training and the competitive society. How do you get trained if nobody has a job or income for you? The answer is that you do not. You get limited to a very small percentage of the Canadian population which can afford to play by these rules. You need a level playing field. You need the chance for students to have access to jobs and support so they can get on with their education. We have no room for them in this Conservative-driven economy. There is no job creation taking place. There is a responsibility to help people find work.

There is no use speaking about this in May. You have to start thinking about it now. You have to include money for students in the budget .There is no plan coming forward. There is no consultation with students. It is time we came forward with some ideas to get this economy going.

Briefly, there are two other recommendations. We want to see the House of Commons deal more directly with issues of aboriginal poverty. In cities across western Canada in particular, the issue of aboriginal poverty is tied to the decline of funds being made available through CAP. They must be able to get some money to these families. In the report of the Conservative majority, one-half page dealt with aboriginal poverty.

Finally we have recommended, as we have several times, that the federal minimum wage be raised to $5 effective last January 1 and raised another dollar effective January 1, 1993. Historically the federal government has set the standard, and in this case as in so many cases, it is the bottom of the barrel.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, as we stand again to debate the cap on CAP, it is with the same strange sense of déjà vu. Only a year ago we were debating legislation which we in the New Democratic Party felt was the beginning of the end of Canada's social programs. Then we were debating Bill C-69 which legislated drastic cuts to health and post-secondary education, and contained the original cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

At the time, those on the government side accused the critics of this legislation of fear-mongering or exaggerating. Our predictions have come true and the government continues to follow this erroneous path of cutting funds to those Canadians who are most vulnerable: those Canadians who are living on something around 50 per cent of the poverty line. As if that is not bad enough, the government's purpose here is to reduce the money available to the poorest of Canadians even further. The government says that British Columbia, Ontario, and Alberta are fiscally strong and can afford to take the cuts they are being given. I think we have seen over the last little while that even these richest of Canadian provinces are finding it difficult to make ends meet, and are not fiscally strong.

Regardless of that, the people receiving social assistance that will be directly affected by the cutbacks in Bill C-32 are not fiscally strong. They are the poorest of Canadians, as I have pointed out. Half of Canada's poor live in these three provinces affected by Bill C-32. Being poor in a rich province is the same as being poor in a poor province.

I suggest that when those government members from British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario visit their ridings, they meet those Canadians who are the brunt of this bill. Most of them are vulnerable children who have nobody to speak for them. They are the weakest of the weak. These children are the ones who will be most affected by Bill C-32 because children make up the largest group of recipients of social assistance. When we take money from social services, we take money from children and food from their mouths.

There are over 1 million children living in poverty in a wealthy society like Canada. It is not just statistics. These are real children, real people. Yet just before Christmas I was appalled to read a quote in The Globe and Mail from the spokesperson from the office of the Minister of Finance, who said that everyone is not as rich as they once were, but this is Canada. Everyone is still pretty affluent.

This exhibits an incredible lack of understanding of the problems faced by millions of Canadians who live in poverty in this country. Everyone is not still pretty affluent and, of course, there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who never were affluent. We are not talking about reduced corporate profits here. We are talking about families who do not have the means to provide the basic necessities of life.

Food banks are not popular because people like to go to food banks. People go to food banks because after the 19th or 20th day of the month there is simply no money left to buy food to put on the table. There is no money for children, and no money for the parents either. People go to food banks because they do not want to starve. It is not a question of luxuries. It is a question of survival.

When the finance committee heard witnesses on Bill C-32, as was the case when witnesses appeared on previous pieces of legislation imposing a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan contributions to Ontario, B.C., and Alberta, nearly every witness talked about how disastrous this bill would be for Canadians trying to subsist on welfare. All those who worked the front line trying to help poor Canadians pointed out how this bill would make life worse for those Canadians who are already suffering the most.

One witness said that to the federal government the Canada Assistance Plan is one of many budget items on an expense sheet. It is just a line. To people living on social assistance the Canada Assistance Plan is a lifeline. Welfare is their means of livelihood. It is not an intellectual exercise to try to balance a budget.

We have overwhelming evidence that social assistance benefits across this country are woefully inadequate. This inadequacy affects children disproportionately in a totally unacceptable way.

Yet this government is planning to continue the cap on CAP. It is taking millions and millions of dollars out of money available for social assistance in the middle of a recession when the need is greatest. It affects children the most. When the Prime Minister recently ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, he adopted many commitments to placing children ahead of other charges on the national revenues.

He committed himself, his government and Canada to putting children first as a charge on national resources. Yet Bill C-32 will attack those very children once again by reducing the money available in those three provinces for the basic necessities of those children.

Article 27 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child says that Canada, among other nations: "must recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development".

Quite clearly, with social assistance rates at around 50 per cent of the poverty line, this commitment on the part of Canada is far from being met, and Bill C-32 will make it even more difficult to meet. Rather than heading toward responding responsibly to our commitments to the international community and to Canada's children, we are making matters worse for them. Surely this is the rankest of hypocrisy.

The ratification of the convention is not a public relations exercise, it is a commitment that Canada made to putting its children first. I hope the government will finally see the light and agree that following the regressive policies being pursued is making children worse and making Canada's commitment hollow.

The recent changes in federal social and tax policies have not helped Canada's poor, they have made matters worse. There is a litany of government initiatives which have attacked Canada's poorest, making Canada's poor pay for the deficit, pay for the extravagances of former federal governments and this federal government. It was not the poor who generated this deficit; they are the least able to respond to it and yet they are being asked to pay to get this government out of its fiscal difficulties.

It is not just Bill C-32. Bill C-21 makes unemployment insurance harder to get and it makes it run out more quickly. We have seen hundreds of thousands of new unemployed workers across this country as a result of this government's economic policies, as a result of free trade and as a result of the global competitiveness that Canada is finding it so difficult to respond to. We have more unemployed workers who are moving into social assistance more quickly because of the adverse changes made to the unemployment insurance program.

The partial deindexation of family benefits means that families who need money get less each year. The clawback on family allowance and pensions, also not fully indexed, means that the threshold for the cutoff of benefits gets lower each year. Further cuts to social assistance and health and post-secondary education are threatening the future of medicare and accessible post-secondary education.

There is still no child care strategy, which is so necessary to ensure that many Canadian care givers can also take part in the workforce. We saw the GST and the tax credit, again not indexed, so more and more of Canada's poorest will be denied their GST tax credit as time goes on. In my province we have now seen the GST attached to water, a basic necessity, something this government said would not take place. The government committed itself to not taxing necessities when the bill was introduced, but we see it nonetheless expanding.

It is clear that this is more than just financial; this is about politics, it is about a philosophy, it is about a way of responding favourably to the government's friends and attacking those who live a life of poverty and hunger.

The minister talked about how necessary the Canada Assistance Plan was and how necessary it was to make these cuts; presumably, therefore, how necessary it is to worsen the situation of the poorest of Canadians. He pointed out what the Canada Assistance Plan does—it helps the poor. Why would this government want to cut a program that helps the poor? He talked about how the Canada Assistance Plan is useful because it provides an opportunity for people who are in need of assistance to receive that assistance, and then go on hopefully to form a part of the work force later.

By cutting the resources available to the Canada Assistance Plan, this government makes it more difficult to reform the system, makes it more difficult to assist Canadians to re-enter the job market. That is what the government says it wants to do.

There is no real commitment to employment by this government. Unemployment is getting worse. No government since the war has committed itself to a policy of full employment. That is the core of this issue and that is where I would like to end up.

It is critical if we are ever going to address the problems of the poor, which are placing demands on government resources which the government responds to by cutting the resources available to those poor, that this government commits itself to full employment as a central core, as a central goal of government. That means a commitment to putting the creation of jobs first and foremost of the aims of government. It is more important than controlling inflation or controlling the deficit.

It means that employment is not sacrificed in order to deal with problems with the deficit, problems with interest rates, problems with inflation. It means that unemployment is not created in order to deal with these other economic problems. They are admittedly important economic problems but they should not be dealt with on the backs of the unemployed and on the backs of the poor.

Unemployment should not be created in order to reduce inflation. It should not be created in order to control interest rates. It should not be created in order to deal with other economic problems. A commitment to full employment means that other economic indicators will be dealt with in other ways, but we will ensure that all Canadians have the opportunity to adequately paid, decent jobs.

The government has not been very successful in its job creation efforts, again as committee after committee of this House has heard. We have seen increases in part-time, temporary and low wage jobs in the service sector, but we have not seen any net gain in decent paying jobs in the manufacturing sector. In fact, we have seen net losses.

If the present federal government wants Canada to be competitive, which it says it does, then why has it cut funding to education more than any other government in the history of Canada? Why has it burdened provincial governments in such a way that it is unable to function effectively to respond to the needs of the competitive world market?

If we are serious about solving our social problems, if we are serious about solving our economic problems, we cannot continue to pursue the policies that this government has pursued. We have to put full employment at the top of our agenda with all the ramifications involved including education, technical training and the need to ensure that there is a child care policy which enables people to take advantage of job opportunities. We need adequate housing, again a commitment which this government has broken with regard to co-operatives and social housing. We need to ensure that we have a fair tax system so we have the resources needed in order to cover the costs of the programs that Canadians view as so important.

We do need a commitment to full employment. That commitment to full employment, where it is being pursued across this world by social democratic governments, has been successful in reducing the costs, the burdens of social assistance. In countries like Norway, for example, the child poverty rate is 5 per cent; in Canada it is 25 per cent. It is not an accident. There is a strategy which is available to this government if it wants to pursue it. No Liberal or Conservative government since the war has even begun to think in these terms.

It appears that we have to concentrate in dealing with this government on emphasizing the economic costs of dealing with the situations we have. It is not enough for children to be poor in this country to get this government to respond. It is not enough for people to be unemployed in this country to get this government to respond. It is not enough that students cannot attend university to get this government to respond.

It is important to recognize the economic pay-offs as well as the social and humanitarian benefits of dealing with these social problems. Fewer poor people will translate into increased tax revenues as they work and contribute to the government's efforts as well as government savings resulting from reduced demand for social security, health care, subsidized child care, subsidized housing and so on. A better educated and trained work force would not only be an important solution and response to poverty, but essential to Canada's economic survival and prosperity.

A more effective and lasting solution rather than to slash spending on social programs would be to cut the demand for social programs, to be preventive in our approach, to try to respond to the economic, social and health damage caused by unemployment and low wages, by pursuing economic policies directed toward full employment and decent paying jobs.

As we know, Canada spends billions of dollars on unemployment insurance for the jobless, on social assistance for the long-term unemployed and single parents who cannot find child care and a job, on income supplements for the elderly who work for low wages and on other social and health programs which attempt to deal with our labour market induced poverty.

Why do we not concentrate on stopping that poverty and developing economic policies which ensure that people do not become poor? In this country we have put up with unemployment rates well above those of other developed nations, our competitors, without addressing those real concerns. We need a different approach and a commitment to help those who are suffering in poverty. We need a commitment to social rights.

As we heard in Montreal on the weekend, Canadians believe that we should commit ourselves to the health care programs we all view as so important to the social safety net which we have seen eroded by this government over the last seven or eight years.

We saw that commitment in Montreal and we see it across the country as we go about our business as MPs. We see people who want Canada to recognize that our social programs and our health care programs are critical to our national survival. They are critical because they provide a safety net for people so that when we attempt to deal with the economic problems that we clearly face, those people can do so with some confidence in knowing that they will not be poor and that they will be able to feed their children in the event that they might lose their job.

This government is not listening and that is why it is at record lows in the polls. If it wanted to look at what happens when governments do not listen, it should just look at those provincial governments across this country that have not listened to the complaints and the concerns of those who are most badly treated. Those governments are being defeated and that is what will happen to this government, although not before it creates so much damage. That defeat cannot be soon enough.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the speech of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing. I agree with much of what he said.

I want to ask him to explain to the House why he is able to be so critical, and deservedly so, of this government's disgraceful performance in the field of education and health as evidenced in particular by this bill we are discussing today. Recently the New Democratic Party government in Ontario, of which I know he is a staunch supporter, reduced the transfers to hospitals and universities in the province to a 1 per cent increase during the current financial year. I think he would agree with me that is perhaps both ill timed and inappropriate, particularly in the case of the universities which, according to his political colleagues in Toronto, have been chronically underfunded for years.

I wonder if he could explain to the House the fact that it seems the government in Toronto behaves exactly as the government in Ottawa does. They are both Tories and there is really no difference in how you vote.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I was expecting a question in that vein from my colleagues. Clearly, it is the case that provincial governments across this country, even those in the richest provinces, are squeezed for revenues.

• (1320)

They have looked in the short term to what changes they might make both on the revenue side and on the expenditure side to deal with these concerns.

Part of the problem, of course, arises as a result of accumulated Liberal debt in Ontario while the government in that province voted Liberal. Where spending was profligate to say the least in good times, the Liberal government in that province borrowed, even when it should have been salting away money for the tough times after it was defeated.

Part of the problem revolves around the creation of the debt by the Liberal government of Premier Peterson. Part of the problem and a very important part of the problem is as a result of cutbacks in transfers to Ontario. Indeed, most of the deficit in the first budget of the New Democratic government in Ontario was as a result of federal cutbacks.

While cutbacks to universities and health care raise concern, at least if they go on in the long term, in the short term it is unfortunate that they needed to have taken place. It is clear that unlike the Liberal and Conservative governments across this country, the New Democratic Government of Ontario, as with the New Democrat governments in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and the Yukon, are committed to bolstering those institutions in the long term rather than continuing to attack them.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I too agree with a good deal of what the member was saying.

In Victoria last week the minister responsible for constitutional affairs indicated, if my ears were correct, that one of the reasons his government does not want equal representation for each province in the Senate is that the have not provinces would control the Senate.

I found that astonishing for somebody who believes in sharing, in compassion and that sort of thing, a new minister of an NDP government, to say. I compliment the member's own provincial premier for in effect endorsing a Triple-E Senate. I wonder if he has any comments on what appears to be the attitude of the new NDP government in British Columbia.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I saw that exchange between the member from Edmonton and the minister of justice in British Columbia. I believe the minister advised the member from Edmonton to stop while he was ahead after getting into so much trouble with his line of questioning.

An hon. member: While he was behind.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Yes. He could have stopped while he was behind. That would have been an even better piece of advice.

It is clear that we are not going to have an equal Senate across this country. I do not think we need to spend a great deal of time on it. We are not going to have the province of Prince Edward Island having the same number of senators as the provinces of Ontario or Quebec and I do not think it has anything to do with the discussions that we are having today with regard to cuts in social programs.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment first of all on the excellent comments by the member from Saskatoon.

I would be intrigued with observations that he might be able to make on the fact that CAP was a cost-shared program between the federal and provincial governments. It had strings attached. I would be interested in his observations and a comparison with some of the other programs we have in the country, in fact, federal spending on post-secondary education and health. It used to be tagged to ensure that that funding did get spent in those areas. Of course, it was changed under the Liberal's six and five program.

I would be interested in his observations on the benefits of that kind of system and some of the difficulties that there might be. He will know, just for background, the difficulty of the former government in British Columbia. It was alleged in any case that it spent a great deal of post-secondary education and health money on highways. I would be interested in his observations and how he might try to resolve that issue so that we can ensure that federal transfer payments are spent in the places they should be.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, so many of these are issues that do not affect one province alone. Canadians are relatively mobile, at least in provinces outside of Quebec. They move across this country. People from Newfoundland go to Ontario, people from Saskatchewan go to British Columbia, and so on.

When we are dealing with issues of education, health care or social assistance, we are dealing with matters of national importance which affect Canada in a national way. A university in British Columbia services not only British Columbians, but Canadians from all across the country. That is why it is important that the Government of Canada respond in a national way to this issue, respond to the question of funding of universities and colleges across this country in a national way, and recognize that there is a benefit to Canada as a whole from those universities and colleges all across the country. It is important for Canada to know on what it is spending its money. It is important that the provinces spend the money that comes to them for health, post-secondary education and social assistance on those very programs.

In the social assistance area, we have seen that the tied nature of the program means that the provinces do spend the money on social assistance recipients in their provinces. Not only in British Columbia, but in New Brunswick and in other provinces, we have seen Social Credit, Liberal and Conservative governments spending federal dollars for other purposes than were desired.

Then we saw the federal government less desirous of making sure those provinces spend health care dollars on health care and education dollars on education, allowing those provinces in effect to spend Canadian dollars, dollars from the federal government which were designed to recognize the national importance of health care and post-secondary education on provincial highways, about which there is not a national interest.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on this bill on the first day of resumption of debate here in the House of Commons. We all have had time to go to our ridings and listen to what people are saying in terms of priorities that are on their minds, the concerns that they have.

Without a doubt, the number one preoccupation of Canadians, not just in my riding, and we heard this when we had caucus meetings earlier this week, is unemployment. We must develop ways of putting people back to work. In the last month to six weeks, people with jobs are even more concerned about the unemployment problem than the people who are without jobs. They naturally feel that any day or any week could be the week where either they are going to be laid off or their company could be one of the companies that is being shut down or is forced to go into bankruptcy.

It is really important. I salute the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing who talked in his speech about the issue of unemployment being right up there. I only wish he could transmit that message to his premier, the NDP premier in the province of Ontario. Just last Friday, a few days after that premier gave a speech on how important it was to put people back to work, he and his minister of municipal affairs, without even hearing a formal presentation on a job creation project just north of Toronto that would have created 17,000 jobs—the Queensville Properties project—a project that included an environmental university, some light industry and 5,000 affordable homes, was canned. They cancelled it without having a formal briefing.

I am really concerned about some of the hypocrisy that takes place when we get into this debate. I go back to the remarks of the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization when he led off this debate today. He said that this bill, this cap on CAP, is important because of the fiscal realities that we are dealing with in this country. He said it was important because they must maintain their government's restraint program.

He talked about this bill helping put people back on their feet. This bill hurts those people who need it most, at a time in our history when we have probably never experienced such deep economic pain. How the government can rationalize this bill at this time, this cap on CAP, is beyond me. It is a further example of when this government sees a shortfall in revenue, instead of trying to figure out ways to create more wealth, it cuts. This is a government that for seven years has been retreating from its responsibility as a national government. Whenever it runs into a difficulty where there is a shortfall in funds, it cuts it, privatizes it, caps it.

We have now reached a point where this national government is so stripped and so decentralized that this institution can barely function as a national government. The people of Canada are aware of it. Quite frankly, if there is one thing that I learned in the last six weeks, it is that most Canadians think that this Parliament is irrelevant. Most Canadians believe we are not doing anything. In fact, most Canadians believe that if anything, we are making the situation worse.

I think to have this bill on the agenda the first day back, when people were looking for some leadership and some hope from this national government, is the height of cynicism. I really do. What we should be doing in this House of Commons today is debating morning, noon and night ways and means to put Canadians back to work.

If we were putting people back to work, this bill would not be necessary. The problem that we have, and the government is nervous about this, is that this year our unemployment insurance draw will reach close to $20 billion and the welfare draw across this country will reach close to $10 billion. Just in those two funds alone, it is equal to the entire deficit of this country for the whole year. In terms of logic and priority, if we could take that unemployment fund and move it to the productive side of the ledger, we would not be debating this bill. There would be no demand on special support for those most disadvantaged in our society. The extra demand for cash would not be required because people would be leading productive lives

The one thing that I heard over and over again during the last six weeks in my riding in downtown Toronto is that people who are on welfare and on unemployment insurance are feeling guilty about taking that assistance. A lot of people, for the first time in their lives, have had to go on unemployment insurance and welfare in the city of Toronto. Our welfare rolls have doubled in the last year and a half. We have got people saying: "Gosh, I'd much rather be doing something in the community. Give me something to do".

There has always been a slur or an aspersion cast upon people who in the past have taken unemployment insurance and welfare. It is as though most people who are on welfare want to be on welfare. That is not the case. We have to figure out ways to get the people who are on welfare and unemployment insurance back into that work force.

We cannot just stand here and criticize the government. There are ways. I would like to start off by saying that there are 900,000 entrepreneurs in this country. I remember in 1981 when the member for then Winnipeg—Fort Garry, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who was the minister of employment at that time when there was also a very deep recession in this country, came up with the NEED program in which for six months the Government of Canada guaranteed 50 per cent of a person's wages. For the next three months it guaranteed 25 per cent of it. When it analysed that program after its completion, it was ranked to be one of the most successful programs in terms of getting people back to work quickly.

That is the kind of initiative that we need in this Parliament of Canada today. Just because it happened to come from a Liberal minister of employment, the government should not feel shy in taking that idea, dusting it off and using it again.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I understand this is a piece of government legislation which normally requires a minister to be here in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fee): I have been advised that it is the custom and tradition of the House that we not mention the absence of any member. We will just resume debate, please.

Mr. Mills: I think my colleague, our critic responsible for social development for the Liberal Party, is naturally concerned that on a bill like this we have a bit more support from the government side. We are not just trying to be critical of its policy, we are trying to put some ideas forward that will allow us to put Canadians back to work.

I want to repeat that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had a program in 1981. It was called the NEED program. In about 90 days we put about 300,000 Canadians back to work. We used the 900,000 businesses in this country to become active and take a chance on the human capital not employed because of the deep world recession. Why can we not do the same today? Why can we not find ways to enhance our municipal infrastructure which needs rebuilding, which needs repair?

What are we waiting for? These are things that would not cost the treasury that much because they are jointly shared programs. The province puts in one-third, municipalities put in one-third, the national government puts in one-third. By the time we figure what we are already paying, that $30 billion on unemployment insurance, plus welfare, if we turn that into a productive labour force, that would get this economy kick started again.

These are the kinds of things that Canadians want to hear us talking about in this Parliament of Canada. They want to hear us debating ways in which we can get people back to work. When people are back to work, there is less stress on the health care system, less stress on family life, and less stress on all the other social services, which ultimately would mean that this cap on the Canada Assistance Plan for those most in need would not be required. We would not need to be debating this legislation in the Parliament of Canada today.

Once again the government is using this almost tunnel vision approach to facing the deficit and debt of the nation. It is an incredible thing. It has almost brainwashed Canadians into thinking that deficit and debt are the priority one issues in this country.

• (1340)

It has almost brainwashed Canadians into thinking that for the last seven years this government has lived within its means. This government has not lived within its means from the very first day it came into power. It came into power with a $180 billion deficit and half of that $180 billion was the social cushion that we as Liberals put forward during the worst recession of the early 1980s. It was not just on unemployment insurance. We never capped CAP. We also had the special recovery projects in which we had all kinds of municipal projects going coast to coast.

When this government talks about living within its means, from $180 billion it took it to $410 billion. This government seems to somehow think that Canadians are so stupid that they will not realize that this government is responsible for $210 billion of that debt. What has it got to show for that $210 billion? It has dismantled Crown corporations which serve public policy. It has sold off lands across this country which serve public policy instruments. It has made cutbacks in every initiative.

I was in the Middle East last week, in Aman, Jordan talking to a group of Canadian small and medium-size businessmen. This government talks much about global trading and there is billions of dollars worth of business opportunity for Canada in the Middle East. In that entire region there is a very warm hearted feeling toward Canada. I must say it is mostly because of the previous Prime Minister, Pierre Trudeau, not this government.

This government talks about globalization and trade and yet these businessmen had their PEMD grants cut. This government has not supported global trading in the last six months for the business people of this country who want to go over there and try and write up orders that could come back here and fill our factories and create jobs. There is a total inconsistency with what its stated objectives are in terms of this fiscal responsibility and what its actual actions are. This government has not done a thing in the last six months to take a chance on the human capital that exists in this country. It has not come up with one job creation program in the last six months. People are telling us day in and day out that we have to do something to stimulate this economy, to get people back to work.

I am not saying to throw more money at it. I am not saying we should ignore the deficit or the debt of this nation. The only way we are going to tackle the deficit and debt of this nation is through full employment. The only way we are going to get full employment is by some inspiration and support to the 900,000 entrepreneurs who are currently employing 85 per cent of this nation.

As we start this new season, this new Parliament, when Canadians are looking for some hope, looking for some initiative from this Parliament of Canada, we have to figure out a way to communicate to the government that it should take a chance on Canadians. It should stop listening to the officials in Finance who are so obsessed with the deficit that they are exacerbating it. They are stifling creativity. I know there are many good members on that side of the House who are in their own way solid, performing entrepreneurs with good ideas.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister must listen and give support so that we can get people back to work. Once we reduce the unemployment problem, which is the paramount issue in my mind and in the minds of any of the constituents I talked to in the last six weeks, the draw on the assistance plan is going to subside.

There will be no need to bring in this bill. Right in the middle of a period of cold winter when people need help most, the government, on its first day back, comes out with a bill that wants to restrict payments to those most in need in our society.

I think it is bad timing. I think it is in poor form, poor taste. Let us shift the direction of this House of Commons to the number one issue, job creation, even if we have to debate it around the clock until we figure out ways on which we can all agree to get people back to work immediately.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my hon. colleague.

I represent the riding of Sudbury. In the 1980s there was a major recession and our area was extremely hard hit. I have the voice of experience when it comes to what timely make-work projects can do to a community and the kind of boon it can be, and the kind of stimulus created. As a result of these stimulants injected into our economy in the Sudbury area in the early 1980s, today we perhaps are one of the regions hit the least, at least in northern Ontario. That should not prevent the government from preparing some kind of measures to help those other areas which are equally hard hit now. The regions may have changed. Some of them are the same.

One of the things that really strikes me with this bill which is a cap on CAP is that it will in essence curb the spending in certain areas that are considered the rich areas.

I do not know where this government has been living for the last year or so, but there are really no more well-off areas. All you have to do is look at the unemployment statistics in southern Ontario. You might as well not bother looking in any of the regions of northern Ontario because there are absolutely no jobs there, and the prospects are not looking very good. If you look at the resource sector, the mining sector, there are just not very many wealthy areas, including the west.

I am wondering why this government is pushing ahead with a piece of legislation which is behind the times.

What we have to do now is work together to redress the problems that have been created in this country and not try to shift them to people in certain areas. The people in Ontario, the people in Alberta, and the people in British Columbia are no better off than the people in other areas of the country. Why would you insist on pushing this bill further and not deal with the economic problems? Perhaps you have some statements to make to this.

Mr. Mills: In reacting to my colleague's comment, as I said earlier in my speech, this kind of action the first day back in the Parliament of Canada shows me that this government's level of creativity is really suspect.

There are literally hundreds of ways that we can put people back to work in this country. Look at the tourism opportunities in this country right now that we could be taking advantage of which would put people back to work right away. Instead of spending $30 million in promoting government programs and services, let us spend $30 million in promoting people to travel and come to Canada.

I think Canadians would like to see all of us in this Parliament locked in this room and not let out until we come up with a program that will put people back to work. In the private sector, if your business is going badly or you are having a tough time, you do not work nine to five Monday to Friday. You come in at six or seven in the morning and work until late at night. You work Saturdays and Sundays. That is what the government should be doing. It should be taking the lead and have emergency debates on employment. It should work Saturdays and Sundays until everybody is back to work. Then its problem with CAP would be eliminated.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you and my colleague that it is very tough for a young entrepreneur like myself to understand why the government is not doing this. There are hundreds of thousands out there right now who fear maybe not being able to meet a payroll, or that the bank manager will not extend their line of credit when times are tough. They are counting on this House of Commons to try to solve their problems. I hope we can this week.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood has made an excellent speech. I wonder if he is despairing of the opportunity to proceed with the debate along the lines he had suggested. The reason for my asking about his possible despair is the lack of enthusiasm on the part of the government to listen to the debate, evidenced by the fact that not a single minister is here to hear his excellent presentation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that it is not according to the rules to—

[Translation]

It is against the Standing Orders to mention the presence or absence of another member in this House.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, but it is also customary in this House for a minister to be present during debate on a government bill.

[English]

In any case I ask the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood if he could perhaps indicate whether there are problems getting an urgent debate on a subject like this in the House, trying to restore employment to acceptable levels in Canada, and if in fact he thinks the government is serious in its efforts to get Canadians back to work.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, most Canadians think we are irrelevant in this House of Commons. That is one thing we certainly felt listening to people when we were home during the last six weeks. I know most members on this side of the House must concur with the feeling that most Canadians have. Time and time again we put ideas forward from this side of the House and they seem to fall on deaf ears. The government says that it listens. I challenge the government to initiate an emergency debate on the number one issue in this country: the issue of full employment.

I can only ask the government, and I repeat myself, to please listen to Canadians. Let us make this House respectable once again and get a program for full employment on the floor of this House before the end of the week.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is not a pleasure to get up and speak on this bill today. I have spoken on it at two other stages of its passage through this House. I would have thought after being home for six weeks to witness firsthand the carnage the recession has left in every single constituency in this country that the government would have come back perhaps a little kinder, gentler and wiser. It must understand this is exactly the type of legislation which will not just drive Canadians further over the abyss, but will create untold millions of throw-away people—our children—in the future.

I want to speak specifically. I have very limited time before we go into Question Period. There is something very disturbing about what is going on in this country.

Bill C-32 puts a cap on CAP. I heard the minister say this morning that this bill and this government have made sure that those who need the help the most are not affected. I hate to tell the government and the minister this, but poverty does not know geographical barriers.

I am sure the poor in metro Toronto do not think they are any better off because they live in Toronto or Ontario than the poor in Manitoba or Nova Scotia. If you are poor, you are poor and that is it. The government has come in with this amount of flimflam and said that all it is doing is capping the growth of its contribution to the Canada Assistance Program in the wealthiest provinces.

It should check its head offices and have a look at what it has done in the Ontario economy. It has driven the Ontario economy from being one it considered overheated two years ago—it attempted to anaesthetise it by putting interest rates up outrageously—into recession. It drove hundreds of thousands of children across this country into poverty.

One of the members earlier was talking about children and poverty. I looked over to the minister and his buddies and they were having a good guffaw. I do not know what the heck they were talking about, but I will tell you if anybody here ever doubts whether or not we are doing our job, talk to a mother or a father who cannot feed their kids nutritious food.

Talk to parents who believe they are not the best thing in the world for their kid because they have to live in substandard housing. They are living in places with rats and termites and their kids go to school in worn out clothing, with no food in their bellies. It is not just happening in the slums, it is happening right across this country.

This government has some nerve to come in here today, as my hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood said, after witnessing firsthand the carnage that is out there, and proceed with this regressive bill. There are some pretty disturbing statistics out there. If we could strip our partisanship down just for a few seconds, we might figure out that as human beings we have a responsibility to do something here.

This is not Bangladesh, it is Canada. Yet in Canada we have over 1 million children living in poverty. Those kids do not vote. They did not vote for this government or the opposition. Damn it, they are children who did not choose to be born into poverty. They were born of parents who live in a country where you should expect better treatment. It is a country that is wealthy enough that no one who has the skills, ability and desire should have to see their dreams collapse or their pride or integrity go down the drain because they are living on $650 or $700 a month on municipal welfare. What a great life.

There were some statistics quoted this morning. They are one of the reasons I wanted to get into the debate before two o'clock. This is not just one of those bills to fix, extend, broaden, or plug some tax loophole or some nicety of fiscal manoeuvring between one government and the next.

I am going to quote my hon. colleague from Winnipeg who has led for us in debate and has done an incredible job. He quoted from a Globe and Mail story dated Saturday, December 28. You can read this and weep. It says that between 1989 and 1990 the fate of Canada's poor children got worse. Their numbers rose by 15 per cent in one year to over 1 million children living in poverty.

Another part of the article says that girls whose families are on welfare—listen to this one—have 3.9 times the rate of poor school performance compared to girls whose families are not on welfare. There are one of two things happening. Either those people who eventually find themselves out of a job and on welfare have kids who are not as smart, or because they are on welfare and perhaps not getting nutritious food, those children are not able to perform in the school system to their fullest potential.

You can go a little further. On the next page it said: "Child poverty rates are directly tied to adult jobless rates." It means that if a child is plunged into poverty because the government has not created the economic climate which will allow that parent to participate in the economy to the fullest of his potential then it is creating a cycle of throw away people.

I have three children of my own and I would do anything in the world to make sure that those children have every opportunity to develop to the fullest of their potential. I can imagine how I would feel or how any member of this House would feel if we knew our children could not find a job and that having to live below poverty in this rich nation would lead to their children not being able to dream about the successes that should be theirs. This government constantly denies the reality of the facts that are before us.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood indicated that what we need is a government which is concerned, not about keeping people on welfare below the poverty levels, but a government that is concerned about putting people back to work, making them productive, allowing them to dream, allowing them to plan for their children and for their children's children's future.

This government has done absolutely the opposite in the last two and a half years. It has come in with a series of regressive measures that has taken money away from training, job support and job creation. My goodness, look at what the Liberal government, that members opposite love to criticize all the time, did in the last recession. We came out with programs. We had a special capital recovery program to put people back to work, to give people their dignity back.

The Speaker is motioning to me. I think my time is up, but I will continue this a little later, Mr. Speaker.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions, my hon. colleagues from Hamilton East and Hamilton West and I have inquired about the government's plans for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

We have been assured that the government intends to keep this world class facility open. Yet late last year a Treasury Board document indicated that the Minister of Labour was asked to prepare a plan to close the centre. This was to be completed by mid-January of this year.

To close this unique information centre would be a tragedy for Hamilton and for working people across Canada. The centre has been living in limbo for long enough.

I call on the government to give some indication of its commitment to work place health and safety in this country.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate today the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister for the announcement that 5 per cent down payments are now available to first time home buyers.

This initiative will increase home ownership, encourage personal initiative and reinforce family values. Many Canadians can afford mortgage payments for a home, especially with the present lower interest rates, but they cannot afford the down payment. CMHC calculates that 5 per cent down payments will allow an additional 200,000 Canadian households to own their own homes.

Past National Housing Act experience shows that the risk of mortgage default is virtually no different with a 5 per cent rather than a 10 per cent down payment.

In addition, this initiative should create hundreds of jobs at a time when they are desperately needed.

This announcement sends a very clear message that the government understands the current economic difficulties faced by Canadians and intends to do something to help.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration recently announced changes to the foreign domestic workers program which instead of improving the program has actually eroded it further. The changes fail to recognize work experience and, by forcing domestics to live in, leaves them vulnerable to abuse by employers.

The six month full-time training program criteria will make it virtually impossible for people from the Caribbean and other developing countries to qualify for these programs because they do not exist.

This Tory government is reverting back to the good old days of the British Empire and European trained nannies while paying lip service to multiculturalism.

I call on the government to deal with the recommendations submitted long ago by the domestic worker support groups which it has not answered. The work provided by foreign domestics must be recognized as an occupation needed in Canada. Foreign domestics must have the right to live out and their relevant experience as care givers and housekeepers must be recognized above formal training.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, many a Canadian child has been cradled in the arms of a nanny from another country. These women come usually from the Philippines and other developing countries and provide services greatly in demand as housekeepers, child care givers or parents' helpers. Domestics work for very little money but often feel it is reward enough to have a job at all, coming from countries where their futures are defined by poverty and lack of opportunity.

Therefore it is hard to comprehend why the Department of Immigration is tampering with the foreign domestic program. It is setting unnecessarily high educational standards, asking for the equivalent of almost a college degree for new applicants and in effect killing the program for those who come from developing countries. It is telling them they are no longer welcome in Canada and if they come, they must live in. This is blatant discrimination aimed at those least able to defend themselves. Life has already dealt these women enough misfortune.

I urge the minister of immigration not to add to it. Restore and improve, not destroy, the program in the name of equality and human dignity.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to convey congratulations and appreciation to the Prime Minister on behalf of grain farmers of western Canada for providing another avenue by which we can market our wheat.

The help provided by our government will not only assist our farmers but will encourage new economic aid and investment for Russia. We are helping the Russian people become democratic while ensuring that the future of Canadian agriculture will be sustained and strengthened.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, since 1988 I have demanded that the minister of health act to safeguard the health of Canadian women and remove the Meme breast implant from the market. At the same time, women from across this country who have expressed their concerns that their health was being endangered by other silicone breast implants were dismissed as being hysterical, irresponsible and uninformed.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the Meme is off the market and the U.S. food and drug administration has called for a moratorium on the distribution and use of silicone implants. Belatedly, this government has followed the U.S. lead.

Scientists have known for 30 years that the presence of silicone in the body can be a contributing factor to a host of auto-immune diseases. Both the FDA in the U.S. and the Health Protection Branch here in Canada have been aware of these problems and yet have allowed women to be used to test implants. Dr. Pierre Blais raised the alarm and was fired. Pierre Blais has been vindicated and it is obvious from what we know now that we cannot rely on the manufacturers to prove the safety of implants.

This government has dithered, dodged and denied its responsibility—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

AEROVOX CANADA INC.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, at the end of December the American parent company of Aerovox Canada announced it was closing the Amherst, Nova Scotia branch plant of Aerovox and moving all production to the United States.

This came as a surprise to all involved as the plant had just announced an expansion a few months earlier, along with a plan to move all production to Canada. The Amherst plant is more competitive and generates over 15 per cent profit on sales while the U.S. plant generates only 6.5 per cent. While generating only 12 per cent of the total Aerovox sales they contribute 24 per cent of the profit in Canada.

Based on common sense and normal business practice, the Amherst plant should be the one to stay open. Meanwhile discussions have begun with Industry, Science and Technology in an effort to locate a new product or owner for this factory and a local community committee has been formed to search for solutions. As well, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology is committed to assist in any way possible.

I urge the minister to take a personal interest in this issue because what happened to the employees in this factory in Amherst just should not have happened.

TRADE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, despite almost daily assurances in the last session of Parliament, this government appears to have given up on its efforts to negotiate a strengthened and protected Article XI in the current GATT negotiations.

This government has not yet gone the last mile to protect our supply management system which has provided stable prices for our dairy, poultry and egg producers and secure supplies for Canadians for more than 20 years.

• (1410)

I call on the Prime Minister to enter into bilateral negotiations with his counterparts in the United States and the European Community, directed at gaining support for the clarification and strengthening of Article XI. Also I call on the Ministers of International Trade and Agriculture to do the same with their counterparts.

As well, every effort should be made to establish negotiating ties, bonds of support with other countries which may be inclined to support our position, including Japan and South Korea.

We have had enough idle talk. Let us now see some concrete action for the dairy, poultry and egg producers of our country.

TRADE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian supply management system has fostered stable, viable poultry, egg and dairy industries in Atlantic Canada. By contrast, the American system has led to a highly integrated, highly concentrated, centralized industry.

Expectations of Atlantic farmers are that if the draft agreement put forward by Arthur Dunkel at the GATT negotiations is implemented, it will lead to the wiping out of vast numbers of Atlantic farmers.

Our farmers are pleased with the position taken publicly by the Government of Canada and with the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has taken an unequivocal position on the need for the maintenance and clarification of Article XI.

However, farm organizations are being told by sources at the Geneva talks that Canada has been less than aggressive at the bargaining table.

When it comes to negotiations, the U.S. and Europe play hardball. We must be prepared to do the same. I urge the Prime Minister and the government to direct its negotiators at the table to be vigilant, tenacious and when necessary aggressive in continuing to press the position taken by the Government of Canada at the GATT.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in metro Toronto and other parts of Canada the plight of people out of work is desperate. Those who have run out of unemployment insurance benefits see themselves as being forced to seek welfare assistance. That is not fair. The government talks of recovery but is unwilling to stimulate the economy and thus generate jobs for Canadians. It is irresponsible to tell the unemployed to go on welfare. It is irresponsible to expect municipalities and municipal taxpayers to foot the bill for this government's mismanagement of the economy.

The federal government should extend the benefit period for the unemployed, take steps to stimulate the economy to create new jobs for those who are trying to re-enter the labour force and for those seeking their first job.

Unemployed Canadians are in a desperate situation. All they want is a chance to work.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, last week while the House of Commons was in recess and the lights of the TV cameras were absent, the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced changes to the foreign domestic workers program.

He said that the changes would help domestic workers. But the many workers out in front of Parliament today protesting do not agree. The government is again using the guise of competitiveness to implement unfair policies.

The requirement to have a grade 12 education, a six month training course in live-in care and the ability to speak French or English will slam the door on women from the developing world.

These new requirements are not requirements for Canadians. A full high school education in the Philippines does not meet the Canadian grade 12 equivalent. There are no courses available for domestic workers in most of the Caribbean or in the Philippines.

Instead of addressing the unfairness of the current program such as violence and abuse, the minister is creating these needless standards and shutting the doors to Canada.

COMMUNITY FUTURES PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to talk about the Community Futures Program. This program has been the subject of many positive evaluations and reviews.

The Community Futures Program helps to plan strategies and develop initiatives that enhance a community's long-term development and improve the quality of the labour market.

A total of 221 Community Future areas, covering most of small town, rural and remote Canada, are participating and improving their local development capacities through this program.

The North Hastings Community Futures Committee and the Land O'Lakes Community Futures Committee have both offered a unique approach to addressing the needs of my large rural eastern Ontario riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington.

A third area in my riding, Centre Hastings, has applied for funding under the Community Futures Program. I am hopeful this area will be able to benefit from this program which has received a positive reception from community leaders and has contributed to a great many success stories in my area of eastern Ontario.

THE FAMILY

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important elements in our Canadian society is the family. In recent years the Government of Canada has clearly demonstrated its commitment to the family unit in this country. This has been done through adjustments to the child tax credit and through various initiatives to address family violence. More work, however, must be done not only by governments but also by family organizations and by society at large.

One such family oriented group is called "Kids First". Kids First is a national organization of parents who raise their children at home. Formed in Calgary in 1986, its thousands of members right across Canada are working hard to ensure fairness in our tax laws. Kids First is fighting for a fair deal for parents who choose to care for their children at home. Let us all support Kids First.

Let us work together for a better future for our children. Let us all work together for a better Canada.

ROBERTA BONDAR

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1992 Dr. Roberta Bondar from Sault Ste. Marie became the first Canadian woman astronaut to travel into space. This flight culminates eight years of training and preparation by Dr. Bondar who is a medical doctor and a neurologist.

During the eight-day flight she carried out a series of difficult scientific experiments involving more than 200 ground based scientists from 16 countries including Canada.

Dr. Bondar said before she blasted off into space that soon she would be granted the privilege and honour of touching the earth with her eyes, her heart, her mind, and her soul. She carried out her task in space with admirable courage and ability.

It is not only the people of Sault Ste. Marie who are proud of Roberta Bondar. Every Canadian admires her tremendous efforts for Canada and the world. I am sure that every member of the House of Commons joins me today in congratulating her on her tremendous achievements for mankind by this mission.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE LATE GED BALDWIN

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my condolences to the family members and friends of Ged Baldwin, a former member of Parliament for Peace River who passed away on December 16.

Ged Baldwin first came to this place in 1958. Over all he won eight consecutive elections. He was a good constituency man, easily and capably relating to the diverse challenges that a large and remote riding presents.

He was also a great parliamentarian and will be remembered as the father of Canada's Freedom of Information Act. His expertise in parliamentary procedure made him an invaluable member of Mr. Diefenbaker's government.

An author, a lawyer, a farmer, a decorated World War II veteran, a civil libertarian, a pursuer of world peace, Ged Baldwin did it all. He was awarded the Order of Canada and numerous other honours and tributes befitting a statesman.

I wish to express my personal condolences to Beulah, Gerald, Bruce, Greg, Pat, Barbara, and Gwennyth, the grandchildren and the great-grandchildren. I say to them that a member of Parliament can have no finer example to emulate than Ged Baldwin.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to welcome you and all members of this House back to this session.

In the past six weeks we all went to our ridings and got a very clear message from Canadians. They want to make Canada work again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Last Friday my party proposed an emergency plan in a few points that are quite clear: a lower Canadian dollar, municipal infrastructure, training and retraining, more money for food banks, and a program to stimulate housing in two points.

Today the government has decided to implement one of them: to reduce from 10 per cent to 5 per cent the cash payment for a new house. I congratulate the government on accepting that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: The second half of our proposition involves the use of RRSP funds. That will stimulate very much the housing industry. Is the government prepared to proceed immediately with this proposal as well?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that I agree with his observation that Canadians want Canada to work. They want the country to be united and they want economic activity.

I welcome the five-point proposal that the hon. leader on behalf of his party presented on Friday. Just to go through them, the first one was the 5 per cent minimum down payment for first-time home buyers. That was under active consideration. It was announced today by my colleague, the minister responsible for housing.

The second point was to permit the use of $7,500 from RRSPs for first-time home purchasers. I can tell the hon. Leader of the Opposition that that is under active consideration.

He talked about intensifying basic skills and training initiatives. I want to remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that in 1991-92 we are spending $3.1 billion on training programs and $3.4 billion for 1993-94.

The other measure suggesting emergency federal funding for food banks and the larger one of the shared cost infrastructure improvements, those issues have been floated around for consideration. Those points were raised at the First Ministers' Conference.

The hon. leader may want to indicate how he would pay for this $3 billion initiative when Canadians pretty well made up their minds that they are not prepared to accept higher taxes or higher deficits.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a very nice way to pay for that is to stimulate the economy in Canada. That will bring more revenue.

On Friday the Canadian Home Builders' Association said that if our program was to be implemented, the two parts of it, it would create 100,000 new jobs immediately and create 60,000 more new homes in Canada right now. I understand that to implement the second part of our proposal on housing with the use of RRSP money to pay the down payment on a house calls for a piece of legislation.

I would like to inform the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that if they want to introduce a piece of legislation now that will in fact complete the program on housing, we will make sure that this piece of legislation is passed in this House of Commons and in the Senate before the end of the week.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that would be a change from the normal practice of the opposition and I welcome that very much.

Obviously the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that there are some concerns about this particular aspect. We are trying to weigh some of the technical difficulties that might be addressed in a manner that would still provide for the usefulness of the RRSP proposal.

I might remind the hon. member, while I am on my feet, that housing starts in the fourth quarter are running at an average of 185,300 units per year. Housing affordability is at the best level it has been since the early 1980s. So there are many positive indicators.

The fact is that interest rates have come down enormously. Housing is an interest sensitive industry. I think the most important thing we can do for the housing industry is to keep interest rates down over the long term. That will provide stability and security for future home owners.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the opposition offers to co-operate with the government, the government wants to make it into a partisan debate. I want to tell the Minister of Finance now that our plan can be implemented immediately. The home builders' association reported 152,000 housing starts in Canada last year and expects at most 156,000 this year. With the measure we are proposing today, there would be 210,000 housing starts in Canada this year. Why does the government not want to follow this plan, which would create 100,000 new jobs right away, in housing alone?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did indicate to the hon. gentleman earlier that this was a matter that was under active consideration, and that it is.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Even with the government's announcement today of lower down payments for homes, there will still be hundreds of thousands of construction workers without jobs. The Minister of Finance himself admitted last week that they had little or no prospects of going back to work this year. Does the government not realize that they can go back to work if it takes more action now, together with the provinces, municipalities and private sector?

Therefore I ask the Minister of Finance: Why won't the government immediately adopt the plan outlined last Friday by the Leader of the Official Opposition to create a national community public works program, an infrastructure program, to create needed improvements in our roads, our bridges, our pollution control and transportation systems, and to get more Canadians back to work not next year, not some time in the vague future, but now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know this may come as a surprise to the hon. member, but construction output has increased for the eighth consecutive month in the last month. We recognize the recovery is sluggish primarily due to the slowing down of the world economies, and particularly that of the United States. Obviously the hon. member suggests that we drive up the deficit further or we tax Canadians more. It is one thing for the hon. member to suggest the expenditure of $3 billion; it is another thing to find out where we will find the money.

Is the hon. member suggesting that we should add $3 billion to the deficit? Or, is he asking that we should tax Canadians more? If so, where?

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance says the economy is sluggish. Why does he not level with Canadians and say it is not only sluggish, the recovery is slowing down because this government is doing nothing?

I ask the minister this: Why won't he adopt the Liberal community works plan which will get Canadians back to work, cut government spending on unemployment insurance and welfare, create wages for workers, profits for business, and generate revenue that will get the deficit down and help Canadians? Why won't this government adopt a practical plan that will create much needed hope and confidence for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thought this program was a Federation of Municipalities of Canada program. I am rather surprised that the Liberals have adopted it.

I repeat the answer to the hon. member: If he could provide me with some insight as to how he would pay for the $3 billion works program—

An hon. member: A billion.

Mr. Mazankowski: All right, a billion dollars. Is he proposing that we increase the deficit by $1 billion, $2 billion or $3 billion? Or, is he proposing that we increase taxes? If so, who does he want to tax?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Over the course of the last six weeks I have spoken with hundreds of Canadians, Canadians who have one message for this government, and that is that things have to change. There is a phenomenal lack of hope and sense of despair out there that is crippling this country. Right now this government's policy creates unemployment. I want to point out to the Prime Minister that unemployment is not a no cost option. Taxpayers are paying over $30 billion for the unemployed and those receiving social assistance.

• (1430)

I want to say to the Prime Minister that the best way to bring down the deficit is to bring down unemployment. Will the Prime Minister assure Canadians that there will be some hope in the February budget and that he will bring in a budget with job creation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are very deeply concerned about the level of unemployment. Because of the industrial restructuring program that we are going through, the prospects are not as buoyant as we would like, but we are not alone in this. Other industrialized nations in the world are going through the same difficulties as we are. The recession and the restructuring are very much a part of the transition that economies around the world are going through.

I can assure the hon. member that we will be doing everything we possibly can within our limitations to provide a ray of hope and a signal of confidence to the Canadian economy. As I have gone through my pre-budget consultation process, I have heard many good ideas. I am still receiving them. If the hon. leader of the NDP has any constructive suggestions I can assure her that I will take them seriously.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. There is one thing the workers of this country understand: unemployment. For instance, on Friday, 700 employees at the railroad workshops in Montreal were paying taxes and had jobs. Today, Monday, they have lost their jobs and will have to apply for unemployment insurance. What we have here is 700 workers or more who are jobless.

Is this the way to create the prosperity the government is always talking about? To have a healthy economy, this country needs a sound transportation infrastructure. Why hasn't the government invested in the transportation industry? Why hasn't the government invested in infrastructures? Why hasn't the Canadian government invested in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we believe that the most important thing that governments can do is to create a climate of confidence and a climate wherein productive investment can in fact take place.

One of the issues, that of high interest rates, was certainly a mitigating factor against that kind of investment activity. We have been successful in bringing interest rates down. We have been successful in bringing inflation and inflationary pressures down.

What we have to do now is put in place the kind of economic environment that will encourage and foster investment because through investment we can create jobs. That is the government's main preoccupation and it will provide long-term, durable jobs.

I might remind the hon. member that Canada is still a good place to invest. Witness the investment of $170 million or $175 million that is coming into the province of Quebec that was announced yesterday by the Prime Minister of Quebec.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister is fond of saying that they do not have alternatives except to create more unemployment. We have to create some hope in this country and hope for young people.

I want to suggest to the minister that there are alternatives and Canadians are crying out for this government to listen. Withdraw the GST and bring in a fair tax system. That is one alternative. Abrogate the trade deal. That is another alternative. Lower the dollar. That is another alternative. Establish a Canadian investment fund where pension funds can be used to invest in Canada. That is another alternative. Bring in an infrastructure program for Canada. That is another alternative.

Will the Prime Minister, as the leader of this country, give Canadians hope, try some new ideas, listen to the alternatives that Canadians and this party are putting forward?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks if I will listen to new ideas. Indeed I will. She indicates that one element of her platform is to withdraw the GST. Perhaps she could tell us what she would replace it with.

An hon. member: Read your mail.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend from the NDP says: "Read your mail". I will tell you what I will do. I will read my hon. friend a comment from the premier of British Columbia. When speaking in New York, Mr. Harcourt promised his government would eliminate its growing deficit before its first term expired and he stressed the need for government spending cuts and wage restraints. "We are determined to lower our deficit. You cannot spend your way out of a recession", Premier Harcourt said.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

The principal justification for the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement was to secure access to the U.S. market, yet in a number of crucial sectors the United States government is impeding Canadian exports.

Both the chief Canadian negotiator and his deputy have now concluded that the United States, and I quote: "is getting dangerously close to systematic abuse of the letter and the spirit of the agreement".

What is the government doing to ensure that such protectionist abuse is eliminated?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that thanks to the new free trade agreement context we have a dispute settlement mechanism under article 19.

Under article 19 when there is a dispute between the two countries, instead of the United States which is ten times the size of Canada always having the upper hand, we have one Canadian, one American and a neutral chairman. We have equality with the United States which allows us to resolve these disputes and gives us equality when we have a dispute with the United States.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well that article 19, the dispute settlement mechanism, is not working. That is precisely what the deputy chief Canadian negotiator said this past weekend when he spoke of there being no question that the United States has bent the agreement and has broken it in places.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We told you so.

Mr. MacLaren: What is the government doing about this? After all, Canada faces a tough trade dispute year with a protectionist minded U.S. Congress. Moreover, the Canadian government has pursued the very policies that are least likely to enable Canadians to benefit from the free trade agreement.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We told you it would not work and it is not working.

Mr. MacLaren: Can the government state today how its proposed North American free trade agreement will prevent the abuses that it has been unable to prevent in the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. gentleman poses these questions with a lack of enthusiasm because he has always felt that liberalized trade was the way for Canada to go. As he poses these questions about the FTA I think he knows the answers.

I will put to him the record. I have the details here. We have had four panel decisions rendered during 1991 and three involved review of U.S. agency determination. There was also a decision issued by an extraordinary challenge committee which confirmed our position on pork exports to the United States. The United States as a result of this ceased collecting duties on Canadian pork exports and duties totalling approximately $20 million were refunded to Canadian exporters. That is how the free trade agreement is working for this country.

BOOK PUBLISHING

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, first the Americans dictated our film policy. Now we learn that representatives of the American book industry met with Canadian government officials last March to have Canadian ownership restriction rules on book publishing and distribution changed, while at the same time this government was telling Canadian publishers that it was staunchly committed to Canadian ownership while it was busy negotiating it away with American conglomerates. Can you tell us why the double-speak?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there has been no double-speak. The policy which I announced last week received acclaim from both the Canadian industry across the board and from affiliates operating in this country. The purpose of the policy is to ensure that we have Canadian ownership of book publishing in Canada and to ensure that Canadian book publishers are soundly financed.

I am delighted with the support my colleagues have given to supporting the Canadian book publishing industry in making this important contribution to the unity and the strength of Canadian culture.

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: In recognizing the hon. member, I know that she will want to put her next question through the Chair to the minister.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): I am terribly sorry, Mr. Speaker. Through you to the minister, I just thought the minister would like to know that the Canadian culture policy was supposed to be off the table, not under the table. People are not exactly happy, as the minister would like to have us think.

Our television and radio industries were built through decisions of successive governments to limit foreign ownership of broadcasting in Canada in the sixties. Now in the nineties, will the government have the political will to apply the same measures and recover and ensure a book publishing policy for Canada in the Canadian interest?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my hon friend says that people are not enthusiastic about it. All I know is what I read in the press and it is always accurate. The Edmonton Journal of January 29 states "Publishers give Beatty rave review"; the Winnipeg Free Press, January 29, "Publishers hail protection and money injection".

We have one goal and that is to strengthen the cultural fabric of Canada. The measures which we took in the course of the past week will do precisely that by creating conditions in which Canadians will be encouraged to take over the book publishing industry in this country. There will be support to ensure that Canadian authors can get published and that Canadians will find that there are Canadian books available to read.

I think when the hon. member publishes her first book, she will be grateful for that, even perhaps when she buys her first book, she will be grateful for it.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade I have a question for the Prime Minister.

All Canadians participated prior to the last election in an intense debate about the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Currently there are negotiations between Canada, U.S. and Mexico and no intense debate.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to present to this House a draft of the Mexican–Canada–U.S. agreement, if such a draft exists, so that this House has the privilege of debating what this government may be committing us to.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the government has made it clear to the House many times what our objectives are. Let me just repeat them: in the NAFTA negotiations, improved access to a very growing and important market, the Mexican market; improved access to the U.S. in areas such as government procurement and financial services; greater access to North American, including Mexican inputs, to permit Canadians to compete better in world markets and also strengthening ourselves as a preferred site for domestic and foreign investment; safeguard mechanisms to protect our industries under a new trading arrangement; finally, a fair, transparent and expeditious dispute settlement mechanism.

All of these are very worthy goals and we are very proud to pursue them.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister if he was prepared to place in front of this House a draft of the Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade agreement. Such a draft does exist and it is being kept secret from this House.

I would like to ask the minister to explain why in a phone call, Ms. Pat Norman, the press secretary to Carla Hills, acknowledged to my staff today that such a draft exists and has already been made available to Mexican senators to discuss in their caucus before it goes to the chamber. I have also spoken to the press secretary, Mr. Rosenzwaig, of the Canadian Embassy in Mexico. He confirms that a draft bracketed treaty has been made available. The brackets are the areas where disagreements exist in the treaty negotiations.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, why this government is keeping that draft secret from Canadians while it is available to Mexicans.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, just so the Press Gallery does not think there is any news in that question, all of the bracketed items that he has suggested have been in fact the points of negotiation that we have been discussing for months.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

There are 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work and 2.3 million Canadians who are on welfare. While the country is on its knees, this government has taken a do nothing, cross your fingers approach. I would like to ask the minister of employment specifically: What programs does he have to put Canadians back to work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is no magic solution to put people back to work. If there were the magic to do it, I guess we would pull it right away.

There is the hard, every day work of preparing the road for recovery through fiscal restraint, through sound monetary policies and through helping our workers improve their skills.

Our efforts are beginning to show. Inflation is dropping. The prime lending rate is at its lowest level since May 1973. Through my Department of Employment and Immigration we have provided some $3 billion in training and assistance for Canadian workers last year.

We intend to spend as much in the new year trying to put in place programs which are relevant to a work force that has to compete in a global competitive economy.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, a lot of consolation that answer is to the million and a half Canadians who are unemployed.

Surely the minister must be aware of how desperate the situation is. Surely he must be aware of the pain, the suffering and the anguish. Surely he must be aware that Canadians are losing their jobs and their homes. Their lives are being ruined.

I would like to ask the minister: What specifically is he proposing to put the country back to work? Is he the minister of employment or is he the minister of unemployment?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is incredible. It depends on the place you occupy in this House. I remember unemployment being at 11.8 per cent without a peep from the hon. member.

The issue is: Can we go out and make believe that we can buy our way out of the problem overnight? I know it is the recipe of the Liberal Party of Canada. The Liberals gave it to us in 1981–82, and I remember what happened then. Interest rates, 10 years ago this morning, were at 20.3 per cent and today they are at the lowest level since 1973. The recovery, that is the way it will occur. Those programs we have in place are intended to equip the work force with the tools and skills it needs to be competitive in a sustainable and growing economy.

DOMESTIC WORKERS' PROGRAM

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Last Friday the minister announced some major changes to the Domestic Workers' Program, which is an important part of the child care system in this country. He said: "These measures respond to concerns raised by various groups and individuals".

The fact is that this weekend across Canada thousands of domestic workers and their employers were on the streets saying that these measures were discriminatory, were regressive and were taken without any prior consultation.

In light of these very serious criticisms, will the minister repeal the measures he has announced so that he can undertake a proper meeting and consultation with domestic workers and that the program can be improved and not destroyed?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in a previous incarnation, if I recall, brought changes to this program. Everything we did in the decision announced last week follows a court decision of the Federal Court of Canada and a period of review which involved extensive consultations with both employers and employees in question.

We have taken the decision to reconfirm the thrust of this program because there is a labour market need in Canada.

• (1450)

My prime concern under the program was to provide these persons with the protection they need. With the counselling measures that are being introduced in the new program, it will allow for a more secure environment for these workers.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let the record show that I have in my hand letters from various organizations representing domestic workers and asking why the government has not consulted with them.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. According to a study by Employment and Immigration, the government is concerned that most domestics come from the Third World. It doesn't matter where they come from: these women do an excellent job. Why is the government slamming the door on women from the Third World? Why doesn't it withdraw these unfair measures and consult with foreign domestics to improve the program?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says this closes the door on part-time workers from the Third World, but I may remind the hon. member that these people who come to Canada as temporary workers may eventually become Canadian citizens. Considering how vital certain qualifications are in order to enter the labour market, it is in the best interests of the people concerned and of this country to have people with better qualifications and that was the purpose of asking these workers to have the equivalent of Grade 12.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I might say through you to the Minister of State for Small Businesses that if there is no news in what the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca said, perhaps the minister could table the document he is referring to under tabling of documents in 15 minutes time.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Surely the Prime Minister must realize that the GST is bleeding the country to death. Retail outlets are shutting down all over the place, people are cross-border shopping en masse, and the Prime Minister says that there are no alternatives to the GST.

I ask the Prime Minister: Doesn't he realize that if he was not bought and paid for by the Business Council on National Issues there would be lots of alternatives to the GST?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would put his question.

Mr. Blaikie: I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, if they are looking for alternatives to the GST—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Blaikie: Will the Minister of Finance consider as an alternative to the GST getting rid of the manufacturing tax credit, the dividend tax credit, the interest deductibility rule, the business and entertainment tax structure, and a variety of other loopholes and tax shelters that we have been suggesting for months as an alternative to the GST?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the New Democratic Party continually harping like an old broken record when it knows at least six royal commissions, all-party parliamentary studies and committees categorically concluded that the old manufacturers' sales tax had to be replaced. The question was whether to raise taxes, raise deficits, or replace it with a modern tax like the value-added tax used in 48 other countries.

Let me quote a constituent from the hon. member's province and riding. This is a small businessman who says: "I run a small company employing 12 people and sales of around $1 million per year. The GST has improved our ability to compete and export to the U.S. market. We spend a trivial amount of time administering the GST. In fact the only problem with the tax is that it does not apply to everything".

That is the feeling of many businesses across the country.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the minister on finding the one small business person in Manitoba who supports the GST.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Does he not realize that the country, in combination with the FTA and the GST, is bleeding to death? What is needed now is a tourniquet. Scrap the tax. Don't slash our throats by adding a North American free trade agreement on top of what is already devastating the country.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will give the hon. member another example. I have a letter here from the Consumers Distributing corporation, which is a fairly large organization in Canada. After taking off the manufacturers' sales tax and adding the GST to its pricing, in its catalogue this year prices were reduced across the board by 2 per cent. If we add inflation to that, that is a reduction of 5 per cent. That is why some people support the GST.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question through you is for the Minister of Agriculture.

As we all know, the GATT negotiations have entered a very crucial stage. Will the minister reconfirm to this House, as well as to the agriculture community in Canada, its balanced negotiating position? Do the Government of Canada and its negotiators continue to support a clarified and therefore strengthened article XI?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks an important question. We are in delicate stages of negotiations within GATT. A text has been put out by the director general of GATT, Mr. Dunkel, which ignored the position put forward by Canada and five other countries.

We have said that we were both dismayed and disappointed. Along with the supply management groups and with the provinces which have supported the position that Canada is putting forward—after all, the provinces and the supply management groups helped Canada develop the position—we will continue to put that position forward.

COMMUNITY FUTURES PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It refers to Community Futures.

Colchester county in Nova Scotia is completely surrounded by very successful Community Futures areas and finds it cannot compete without the futures infrastructure. Colchester applied for a futures program in November. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether Colchester will be successful in its bid.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As the hon. member may know, Mr. Speaker, we have decided to announce the second round of funding for that program. Second generation support will be available through a process of reselection of communities which can demonstrate continuing need. Local EIC officials will have the details of the reselection process. When the review is complete I will advise the hon. member of the outcome of the Colchester application.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Environment. In the Oldman ruling, the Supreme Court unequivocally confirmed federal jurisdiction over the environment.

[English]

Given that decision, will the government be seeking an injunction to stop further filling of the Oldman reservoir until such time as the Federal Assessment Review Panel has completed its review?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the Oldman decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada reflects the position that the government had stated. In fact I had stated on behalf of the government in front of the Standing Committee on the Environment how constitutional and environmental issues should be dealt with.

On the specific decision on the Oldman dam case, we are now examining the consequences of that decision and will make a determination of how we think we should proceed. As soon as we do that I will be happy to inform the hon. member.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. The fact is that the dam is now filling up and there is no time. The minister has had over 10 days in which to make a decision.

The problem in Oldman is that the federal government's jurisdiction was ignored by the provinces. In the future how can the federal government hope to gain the co-operation of the provinces if it fails in this particular instance to insist and to enforce its authority now that it has been confirmed unequivocally by the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am more than happy to offer an example of co-operation to the hon. member for LaSalle-Émard. The day after the decision had been rendered on the Oldman dam, the Government of Canada signed an agreement with the Cree, the Inuit and the Government of Quebec on an environmental assessment for the Great Whale Project, something that the hon. member and all members on this side of the House had wanted to ask. In fact I think we had repeatedly stressed to the hon. member, on that specific issue, how important it was for us, as a government, to seek the co-operation of all parties when faced with these delicate problems or dossiers of environmental assessment.

• (1500)

We intend to continue on that path with the same success.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance has said repeatedly in recent weeks that Canada's economy continues to grow at a very slow rate, primarily because of a lack of consumer confidence. The Minister of Finance knows that consumer confidence is lacking because this government has refused repeatedly to change the economic game plan that has put Canada in the economic mess we are in today.

Given that Canada was given a new Minister of Finance in 1991, given that Canadians are waiting for some indication of change on the part of this government, can the Minister of Finance tell Canadians, at least today, whether or not his new budget, when it comes, will represent a departure from the existing economic policy of this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I think the hon. member would agree, Mr. Speaker, that it is important to maintain consistent policies both from a domestic point of view and an international point of view.

One of those policies has been to bring down interest rates on an ongoing basis and to keep them down, as well as bringing down the pressures of inflation because in bringing them down you bring down prices and reduce the cost of living. That is important to all Canadians.

It is also important to get the fundamentals right so that we can have the kind of investment necessary to generate the kind of economic activity and to accelerate the restructuring and transition, the very painful transition that we are going through.

Canada is not alone in this. Canada is joined with many other countries which are experiencing the same thing. Collectively, as a member of the G-7, we are working in concert to bring about, in a co-operative way, improvements to stimulate growth and strengthen the economy, not only in Canada but indeed around the world.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance talks about accelerating the recovery but StatsCanada, as recently as Friday in its leading economic indicator, said that the recovery continues to "decelerate" in this country.

The government has made some small recognition that there is a problem in announcing the reduction in the down payment today on housing from 10 per cent to 5 per cent, but that is a small recognition. If you want to change consumer confidence, Canadians' confidence, the feeling of confidence in this economy there must be a change of economic plan.

I ask the Prime Minister: Prime Minister, we have a new Minister of Finance, is it not time to get rid of this used budget and bring in a new economic policy for jobs in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can only assume, by the tone of the hon. member's question, that he wants the deficit to go up, inflation to go up and interest rates to go up, because he cannot have it both ways. We have to deal with the fundamentals.

He talks about negativism. I have here the February 1 Financial Post: "Financial markets point to recovery". February 3: "GDP hits upswing by summer". Quoting Ruth Genner, senior economist of the Toronto Dominion Bank: "I think we stand in a much better position than most of us realize. I think the worst is behind us and we are coming out of this recession." That is the kind of optimism, that is the kind of hope and that is what will inspire confidence.

Mr. Speaker: We must proceed with a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have forwarded a copy of my draft remarks to members opposite and to you, Mr. Speaker. They run some 12 or 13 pages. This is a question of privilege in relation to the failure of the Minister of Finance to lay before Parliament an order made pursuant to section 59(2) of the Customs Tariff.

The facts on which my question of privilege is based are simple. On December 30, 1988 the Governor in Council passed an Order in Council enacting the order respecting the suspension of privileges granted under the free trade agreement pursuant to section 59(2) of the Customs Tariff. The order was registered as statutory order and regulation 89-54 and was published in the Canada Gazette on January 6, 1989. This order was made for the purpose of delaying the elimination of Canadian tariffs on certain plywood and related products in retaliation for a U.S. decision not to lower its own tariffs as required under the free trade agreement.

Subsection 59(5) of the Custom Tariff provides that—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River is presenting to the Chair and to the House a question of privilege. I should advise the House that I have had considerable notice of it. It is a complicated matter and I know that all hon. members would want to give to the member the courtesy of listening carefully to the points he is making in order of course for an appropriate response to be given if that is necessary.

I would ask hon. members to give the hon. member the attention that all hon. members deserve.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I know that our colleagues are delighted to be back and they have a lot of views to exchange among themselves here this afternoon.

In any event, this provision required that the order respecting the suspension of privileges granted under the free trade agreement be tabled in this House on April 21, 1989 at the latest. I repeat the date, April 21, 1989. In fact this order was laid before the House on December 12, 1991, some two years and eight months after the expiry of the tabling deadline fixed by Parliament in the Customs Tariff.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the failure to table this order for nearly three years after it was made amounts to contempt of this House. I want it to be clearly understood by the House, however, that while the principle of ministerial responsibility, in the words of section 59(5) of the Customs Tariff, requires that we hold the minister accountable for the failure to table the order at the time appointed by the statute, I fully recognize that the practical responsibility, if I can use that expression, lies with the minister's servants.

The failure of the minister's officials to advise him of his obligations is all the more inexcusable in this case in that the non-tabling of the order was drawn to the attention of an assistant deputy minister in the minister's department in a letter from the joint committee for the scrutiny of regulations dated May 8, 1989. Officials of the same department were reminded of this on two subsequent occasions prior to December 12, 1991.

I turn now to the claim that the minister's failure to obey section 59(5) of the Customs Tariff amounts to a contempt of this House. Mr. Speaker, as you said in an October 10, 1989 ruling:

> Broadly speaking, contempts are offences against the authority and dignity of the House of Commons. They include situations which cannot specifically be claimed as breaches of the privileges of this House.

Mr. Speaker, you then cited Erskine May's 20th edition in which it is said that contempt of the House includes "disobedience to its legitimate commands". You went on to mention that:

> In summary, all breaches of privilege are contempts of the House, but not all contempts are necessarily breaches of privilege. A contempt may be an act or an omission; it does not have to actually obstruct or impede the House or a member, it merely has to have the tendency to produce such results. Matters ranging from minor breaches of decorum to grave attacks against the authority of Parliament may be considered as contempts.

In this instance, Mr. Speaker, the facts establish that the Minister of Finance failed to comply with the tabling requirement set out in the Customs Tariff for a total of some 964 days. There remains to determine whether this omission had in your own words, Mr. Speaker, "the tendency to obstruct or impede the House" or its members in the exercise of their duties as legislators or the tendency to diminish the authority and dignity of the House of Commons.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of laying requirements is well known. Parliament will require documents to be laid before it in instances where it determines that the formal transmission of a document is necessary for members of Parliament to properly discharge their responsibility of holding the executive accountable for its actions.

In the present instance it was the decision of Parliament that Orders in Council suspending trade privileges granted to the United States by Parliament should be brought to the immediate attention of both Houses.

It is through the tabling of these orders that members of each House gain knowledge of them and can, if they think it necessary, question the government in relation to suspension of trade privileges.

We cannot fulfil this role unless we are informed of those decisions. In this case, the failure to table the text of the order of April 21, 1989 means that the House was not officially informed of an important government decision until nearly three years after it was made.

I note that pursuant to Standing Order 32(5), the order, when it was tabled on December 12, was referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade. This committee and its members were effectively deprived of their right to review the order as contemplated in our Standing Orders for almost three years as a result of the minister's failure to meet his legal obligation under the Custom Tariff. This is a serious matter in terms of effective and proper operation of the committee system of the House of Commons. So long as Standing Order 32 is in place, any failure to table a document amounts to a denial of the appropriate standing committee's jurisdiction to study and review that document and to report to the House if it thinks fit.

There is another element to this and it is the lack of respect for Parliament that is reflected in such carelessness and persistent disregard for the law made by Parliament. In this regard I remind the House that senior officials of the department for which the minister is responsible had been informed of the omission in May 1989.

Subsection 59(5) of the Customs Tariff is a statutory provision and statutes are the highest form of command that can be given by this House. In my view, the disregard of that legislative command, even if unintentional, is an affront to the authority and dignity of Parliament as a whole and of this House in particular.

The eventual tabling of the order on December 12, 1991 does not cure the situation I have described. The basis of my complaint is not that the order had not been tabled, it is that it was not tabled in a timely fashion as required by law.

I am aware that it has often been said that it is not the role of the Speaker to interpret or to enforce the law. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize that I am not asking you to interpret the Customs Tariff. There is no need for any interpretation here. The law is clear and the only matter you are called upon to decide is whether the facts confirm that the order respecting the suspension of privileges granted under the free trade agreement was not laid before Parliament by April 21, 1989 as required by law. This is a question of fact rather than a question of law.

I also emphasize that the duty imposed by subsection 59(5) of the Customs Tariff is a duty that is owed to this House in its collective capacity. Any legal duty gives rise to a corresponding right. In this case it is the right of this House to have a copy of the order tabled in the House for the information of members and for review by one of its committees.

The courts of this country are not the proper forum before which the Commons can enforce this right. In the first place, the House of Commons does not have the legal capacity to initiate court proceedings.

Second, even if this was not the case, I submit that it would not be in keeping with the position of the House of Commons and our system of government for the House to appear as a plaintiff before the courts of justice over which it enjoys pre-eminence in any event.

A right which cannot be enforced is no right at all. For the reasons I have mentioned, it is not possible for the House of Commons to ask the courts to enforce its right to have the order tabled, nor would this course of action be in keeping with the constitutional position of this House. I submit the remedy lies with the House itself. The Minister of Finance was under a legal obligation to furnish this House with a copy of the order made by the Governor in Council within the time prescribed by statute.

I submit that the House has the ability to sanction the non-observance of a legal obligation established for the collective benefit of its members. I believe that the appropriate sanction for any failure to obey a tabling requirement is found in the contempt powers of the House.

In deciding whether there is a prima facie justification for an eventual decision of the House on this question, the Chair is not asked to enforce the law. The Chair is asked to decide whether the failure to obey the law has consequences in terms of the collective privileges of the House and in terms of the members' ability to discharge their duties as legislators. In short, does the omission to table a document, legally required to be tabled, impede or obstruct the House and its members in the discharge of their functions or does it have the tendency to do so. As stated in the 20th edition of Erskine May, contempt of the House includes any case of disobedience, whether or not intentional, to a legitimate command of Parliament.

It is difficult to conceive of any command of this House that can have more legitimacy than one contained in a law passed by this House. I am confident that the minister's disobedience to that command was not intentional. This, however, does not change the situation.

Nowhere can I find authority for the proposition that this House can only deal with intentional contempt. In fact, in the recent incident involving the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, the Chair found that a prima facie case of contempt existed even though the hon. member had expressly stated to the House that he did not intend to show contempt for the House or for the Speaker. I submit that intention is not a consideration at this stage and that the House should be permitted to deal with any facts that amount to contempt regardless of whether there was an intention to show contempt for the House. The question of intent is for the House itself to consider at a later stage.

In closing, allow me to reiterate that if this matter cannot be raised on the floor of this House in the way I have, then it can be raised nowhere else. There is no other forum outside of this House which is competent to pronounce or to enforce a legal duty that is owed to the House of Commons in its collective capacity. Subsection 59(5) of the Customs Tariff creates such a duty and the House has the right and responsibility to sanction the non-observance of that duty.

Mr. Speaker, if you do rule that there is a prima facie case in this instance, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion. I have forwarded to the member opposite two drafts of such a motion. We have not had an opportunity at this stage to discuss the appropriateness of either.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that two sentences in the speech by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River stuck in my mind. The first one was:

[English]

In this case, the failure to table the text of the order by April 21, 1989 means that the House was not officially—

[Translation]

I emphasize the word officially, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

—informed of an important government decision until nearly three years after it was made.

[Translation]

That was one of the sentences I found rather interesting. The other one was:

• (1520)

[English]

I am confident that the minister's disobedience to that command was not intentional.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think that what the hon. member described was a rather unfortunate situation. I believe he agrees, and I am sure you will agree, it was not the intention of the government or the Minister of Finance to avoid tabling an order within the prescribed timeframe. I think everyone here understands that.

Unfortunately, when all the free trade documents were tabled, this particular order was not tabled with the rest of the FTA legislation which, as you know, was impressive because of its sheer volume.

What the hon. member did not point out, and what he should have mentioned in this connection, is that the order was published in the Canada Gazette—after consideration and approval by the special committee—on January 18, 1989. This means that as of January 18, 1989, the order was in the public domain. It was also available to members of this House, since to my knowledge, the Canada Gazette, a bilingual publication, is delivered to each member's office.

We should also recall that the free trade agreement, as tabled, contained a reference to the timeframe for eliminating the tariff on plywood and related products. This reference was contained in the documents tabled in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I think that any self-respecting Canadian citizen or member of this House who had a problem with the subject we are looking at today was in a position to know what was happening—on the basis of the facts available—whether we are talking about the free trade documents or the Canada Gazette. And as a result, there was no breach of privileges, either of the members here or of the general public, and I think that in the circumstances, the hon. member's conclusions are a bit exaggerated.

Mr. Speaker, on November 21, 1991, officials appearing before the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations promised the order would be tabled before the holidays, and that is what happened. On August 12, 1991, and October 21, 1991, the minister had promised the order would be tabled. He also indicated he had set up a procedure to prevent any recurrence.

I think the minister and the government acted in good faith. For the Chair to respond favourably to the hon. member's comments, I believe there would have to be evidence of bad faith or perhaps of someone having suffered a loss of some kind. The hon. member, however, argued that no one's interests had been harmed, and he also said he believed the minister had acted in good faith.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should consider the incident closed and revert to the normal business of the House.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize the point that my friend from Scarborough made with respect to this matter.

The point is that the contempt occurred as a result of the wording of the statute and the wording is very clear. I simply re-emphasize it to you: "The Minister of Finance shall cause a copy of any order pursuant to subsection 59(2) be laid before Parliament".

The parliamentary secretary has pointed out that there was plenty of warning given with copies, et cetera. That is not the point. The point is, and the statute is clear, that the minister shall table this before the House within the 15-day period as set out. In this particular case, even after a letter in May 1989 setting out the provisions and the fact that it had not been conformed with, it was not tabled until late last year.

As the member has pointed out, it was almost three years after the original legislation. What has to be totally understood by the public watching and by the parliamentary secretary is that Orders in Council and regulations are laws that affect all of us, that do not come for debate before the House of Parliament, and the provisions are set out for a reason.

In this particular case, as has been pointed out by my friend in the Liberal Party, the minister has turned his back on the matter unintentionally, through oversight or by lack of proper documentation or advice by his ministerial advisers. The point, I believe and I simply want to emphasize this before closing, is that this is mandatory. It is obligatory for the minister to do this within that specified period of time and intentionally or unintentionally he has breached his duty to the House, I would submit. That in itself is contempt of the House.

As the member has pointed out, this is the only forum in which that can properly be dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River——and the hon. parliamentary secretary. I especially thank the hon. member for his statement in which he clearly said that it was not the minister's intention, but I think that some consideration is necessary before I render a decision.

[Translation]

[English]

I thank also the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and I have listened carefully to his comments. I also thank the House for co-operating with the Chair and hon. members while this important and complex argument was put to the House. I shall try to respond as quickly as possible.

I do take into account the fact that there seems to be general agreement. There was not an intention on the part of the minister. I also must say that the law seems very clear, and I shall have to deal with it as I see it. I thank hon. members.

TRIBUTES

THE LATE JEAN-PAUL MATTE AND GERALD WILLIAM BALDWIN

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take just a few minutes in this House to pay tribute to two of our former colleagues who passed away over the holidays and whom I knew in a special way. In a sense, they were very similar because they were real gentlemen and were respected on both sides of the House. I refer to the former member for Champlain, Jean-Paul Matte, and the former member for Peace River, Ged Baldwin.

Jean-Paul Matte was a very good friend of mine. He was elected in 1962 and remained a member until 1968. Later, after he lost his election, he had the opportunity to work in my office. He was very unpretentious, a businessman who was quite involved in his community in Champlain and particularly in the town of St. Tite. He was really close to the people and extremely dedicated.

I would call him the salt of the House of Commons, the kind of member who did not seek publicity but was always watchful and attentive to solve his constituents' problems. He had quite a good sense of humour, outside this House, yet while here, he was very modest and pleasant. When he was sent on delegations abroad, members very often came back saying that Jean-Paul was the most popular member of the delegation. His pleasant manners, down-to-earth language, sense of humour and extreme kindness made him a first-class diplomat, although he was in fact, with great honour, an ordinary businessman from rural Quebec.

His death will be a great loss to me personally, to my wife and to my children. When I went down to the riding of St. Maurice, we very often shared the same car and we spent many hours together. Not only I but also my wife and children and especially the people of Champlain appreciated his kindness, sense of humour, generosity and graciousness. On behalf of my party, since he was a Liberal, and my family, and in my own name as well, I would therefore like to extend to his family and those who were close to him our most sincere sympathies. We must all keep in mind that he was a real gentleman.

[English]

I would like to say the same about Ged Baldwin. When I arrived in this House, there was this gentleman who had been in the House for many, many years. He came from a part of Canada for which I have a special attachment, northern Alberta. Many of his constituents were francophones from Farrow and from other places which I have had the pleasure of visiting.

Ged Baldwin was everyone's friend. He was a great person in the House of Commons. He knew the rules very well. He would use them effectively. He was a competitor with Stanley Knowles regarding rules. He and Allan MacEachen would play games among themselves and exchange their knowledge which was somewhat too thoughtful or too specialized for the ordinary member to understand.

He could be tough too. When he had a good case, Ged Baldwin would get up and he would cut pieces out of ministers once in a while. I must have been the victim of some of his attacks. These were always done with class. He was a reflective man. For me what is so good about this House of Commons is that people come from all over the country with different personalities, different backgrounds, and yet we all serve the same cause. Through the years, you realize that sometimes the people you are most comfortable with are on the other side of the aisle because they are not really competing with you. Ged Baldwin was probably consulted throughout all his career by a lot of Liberals, asking: "Why am I having problems?" Because he was a gentleman, you were sure he would tell you honestly what he thought.

He was a great member of Parliament and the people of Peace River had many reasons to be proud of him. His family must be very proud of this great gentleman, Ged Baldwin, who served his country so well.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to join the Liberal leader in his eloquent tribute to Jean-Paul Matte, the former member for Champlain, who was elected three times as the member for the electoral district of Champlain: in 1962, 1963, and 1965.

Mr. Matte died on January 6 at the age of 77. He spent his last years in Saint-Maurice, in the riding of Champlain, but spent most of his life in Saint-Tite, in Filles de Caleb country. He was the first member of Parliament from Saint-Tite, where my family comes from. I think it was Mr. Matte who first gave me a taste for public life. I remember when he was elected in 1962. I was only nine years old, and my father was one of his best friends. Mr. Matte often came to our house, where we listened to him talking politics. I must say I was very impressed.

Interestingly, he was beaten by the Créditistes in 1968, as a result of some tricky political manoeuvring. They found a candidate whose name was the same as his, which caused considerable confusion at the time. However, he continued to enjoy the respect of the voters who had elected him since 1962. In fact, a major electoral reform which amputated part of his riding and gave him part of the electoral district of Portneuf was the main reason why he was defeated.

Mr. Matte was not known as a partisan politician. He rarely made fiery speeches. In fact, he always had this ability, which has become increasingly rare nowadays, to avoid political partisanship, and he always subordinated his own interests to the interests of Saint-Tite, the riding of Champlain, Quebec and Canada.

I spoke to him several times during the past few years, and I must say I found his advice very useful on many occasions. To the very last, Mr. Matte was a faithful Quebecer and a faithful Canadian, and I think members on the government side will wish to join me in paying him this special tribute today.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my colleagues today in recognition of the contribution that Mr. Matte made to this House of Commons, to the people of Canada and to the people of his riding for a number of years.

I was not here when Mr. Matte served his constituency and his country, but we know him by reputation as an individual who struggled on behalf of his constituents for a number of years and would have continued had it not been for a serious redistribution of his constituency.

On behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party we want to say that our hearts, thoughts and prayers are with his family today.

I also want to join with my colleagues in recognizing the passing of Mr. Ged Baldwin who served for 20–some years that great district of Peace River in northwestern Alberta. He was a fine and distinguished gentleman.

As a House leader he distinguished himself in terms of the understanding and use of the rules in appropriate and yet creative ways to advance the cause of his colleagues and his party.

His reputation as a parliamentarian is demonstrated by the fact that he was elected time and time again with excellent majorities.

If we could all have a model in terms of parliamentary behaviour and how to conduct ourselves on behalf of our constituents and our country, it would be to follow in the footsteps of a gentleman like Ged Baldwin.

Again our hearts, our thoughts and our prayers go out to his wife and his family today.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to say too much about Ged Baldwin, having earlier today paid tribute to him.

I simply want to say that he was a fine man, a real gentleman and in many ways respected the best and represented the best of this institution, having made a positive contribution to it for many years.

It was my privilege to follow him. He is an example I often look to in terms of behaviour and attitude. He is a man who paved a lot of roads for me within my own constituency.

Personally, I am very thankful to him for all that he has done for my riding and for the country and for our party and also for this House.

At the same time I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his kind words. I know that Ged's family will appreciate that, and also the kind words of the New Democratic House leader. Ged's family will appreciate that as well.

POINT OF ORDER

MEMBER FOR RICHELIEU—PARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Last October, the hon. member for Richelieu raised a point of order following an exchange between between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Shefford. He asked the Chair whether the words "hypocrite" and "stupid" could be considered parliamentary. I answered him that in general, the word "hypocrite" is not parliamentary, but the context in which it was said must be considered. Nevertheless, I promised to look into the matter and make a ruling on it.

I very carefully examined Hansard for October 9, 1991 and I am now ready to render my decision. I concluded that the Prime Minister's words, at the time they were spoken, did not lead to disorder in the House. I therefore refer the hon. member to my decision of February 10, 1986 and I consider this matter closed.

[English]

Having said that I also remind hon. members that words that in one context may survive the patience of hon. members may in another context not survive it. I would ask all hon. members to exercise restraint and consideration for each other when either putting questions or responding or entering into debate.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table in both official languages a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 36(8) of the Standing Orders, I have the honour to table in both official languages the government responses to 148 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, to my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. Earlier today in Question Period the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism referred to documentation regarding the Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade deal. Is there any intention to table these documents in the House so that we may all have a look at them?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I missed that particular exchange and I will have to review the "blues" and the words of the minister. We would be once again more than happy to co-operate in any way that we can.

HOUSING

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, pursuant to the Standing Order on petitions, to present well over 760 names calling upon the House and Parliament to look again at the government proposals to transfer jurisdictional responsibility to the provinces. This relates to housing. The petitioners are asking this House to recognize that housing is a shared provincial–federal responsibility. They hope that the federal government will continue to support the non-profit co-operative housing program and to maintain the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place to present to the House of Commons a petition signed by my constituents in York West. It deals specifically with the proliferation of drug abuse in the city of metropolitan Toronto, which is ruining the lives of many youths and Canadian families. It requests that the Government of Canada amend the Narcotics Control Act so that when there are great seizures of drugs and money, the money is channelled not only into general revenues at the national level, but is shared with the local police forces and organizations in the community that are in the front line against the battle on drugs. We would consider that an investment in the battle to try to win our communities and our youth from the proliferation of drugs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to present four different petitions. One is a big thick one with lots of names on it of people who are still concerned and have renewed concern about the goods and services tax and what it is doing. They articulate a whole number of concerns that they have and are simply asking the government at this time to eliminate the tax. I think it is a very appropriate petition.

ECONOMIC STABILITY IN CROATIA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, these petitioners from the Kamloops constituency are concerned about the situation in Croatia. They are asking the Canadian government to simply do whatever is possible to bring peace, security and economic development to that part of the world.

FRESH WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): These petitioners are from British Columbia and refer to a plan to partly divert one of the major British Columbia rivers into the United States and northern Mexico. They are asking that the government simply announce that this will not be permitted, period.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Lastly, in light of the last petition given by another hon. member regarding increased drug concerns, the petitioners are asking for proper financial support to enable the RCMP to carry out its mandate in enforcing law and order in the country.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am honoured to present petitions from over 100 constituents. They would like to draw to the attention of the House the fact that more than 60,000 foreign domestic workers have come to Canada since 1981 to answer the needs of many Canadians for domestic workers not otherwise available here. Nearly all of these workers are women and most are visible minorities. More than 80 per cent of these workers have been accepted as landed immigrants, indicating their continued value and adaptability to Canada.

They believe this new directive of the minister of immigration is insensitive to the needs of Canadian employers, callously disregards the needs of the women of the world, and contradicts a fundamental principle of Canada's longstanding non-discriminatory immigration policy.

They therefore pray and call upon Parliament to rescind the new directive, acknowledge the contribution of past, present and future foreign domestic workers to Canada's social and economic well-being, restore our Canadian values of tolerance and humanitarianism, and preserve Canada's international esteem.

If I may add, Mr. Speaker, I join them in their petition and I ask the minister to rescind the new directive in the name of equality and human dignity.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to introduce in the House today a petition signed by residents of Ottawa, Nepean, Gloucester, Vanier, Kanata, Manotick, and elsewhere in the Ottawa—Carleton region. These constituents are outraged at the price of gasoline in the Ottawa—Carleton region when compared to prices elsewhere in the province of Ontario.

These constituents are calling on the government to take action in order to correct this injustice through an amendment to the Competition Act.

• (1550)

DOMESTIC WORKERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by residents of Canada, many of whom are domestic workers.

These petitioners call on the Parliament of Canada to urge the minister of immigration to give foreign domestic workers the option not to live in the homes of their employers outside of working hours since that often leads to sexual harassment and continued exploitation in the workplace.

They ask that work experience take precedence over any formal training, that domestic work be recognized as an occupation needed in Canada, and that the necessary points be awarded toward permanent resident status.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition on behalf of over 200 signatories who are adoptive parents.

This order is pursuant to Standing Order 36, and these adoptive parents, all from the area of Thunder Bay, are asking the government to reconsider its position with respect to the legislation as it affects adoptive parents throughout Canada, and to stop the discrimination between those who are biological parents and those who are adoptive parents. They are one and the same.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present a number of petitions with respect to the CRTC hearings and the Unitel bid.

The petitioners in this particular case are concerned that any widening of competition within the area of telecommunications will unduly affect the affordability of service, particularly to those people in rural areas.

They urge the Minister of Communications to consult with all effective parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's urban areas, who will be impacted severely by deregulation. They further urge the minister to hold local hearings in the communities before deciding the fate of Canada's telecommunications system.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): The other petition, Mr. Speaker, is with respect to the softwood lumber issue and the forests in the province of British Columbia.

The petition is signed by a number of people within my riding from places such as Westbridge, Greenwood, Princeton, Grand Forks and others. They are concerned that the management of their forests remains in Canadian hands.

The petitioners ask that Parliament terminate the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber tariffs and return the decision making process back into the hands of Canadians where it belongs.

HIGH COST OF GASOLINE IN OTTAWA AREA

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by many citizens of the Ottawa area.

[English]

As the hon. member for Ottawa Centre has so ably stated, these constituents are concerned with the high cost of gasoline in the Ottawa area. They call upon Parliament to correct this injustice to Ottawa area motorists. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the same complaint is a frequent one in my own area of Kingston and the Islands.

I am pleased to be able to table this petition on behalf of the Ottawa area residents.

Question No 121—Mr. Dionne:

Which leases for rented office space over 500 square meters in area, signed by the government between January 1985 and December 1987, were renewed before the previous lease had expired and, in each case, what are (a) the name of the owner(s) (b) the address of the rented building or office space (c) the area covered by the previous lease (d) the period covered by the previous lease (e) the rent paid under the previous lease?

Hon. Elmer MacKay (Minister of Public Works): For the period from January 1, 1985, to December 31, 1987, Public Works Canada, on behalf of the Government, in the provinces of New Brunswick, Quebec, and Ontario, entered into two registered leases with the private sector which involved early termination of the previous lease.

The appended report provides the detailed information on the previous and current leases.

Question No. 122—Mr. Harvard:

During the recent postal strike, was there an extra cost associated with providing the extra remittance forms for corporation returns and employee deduction remittance forms, and, if so, what was it?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): During the recent postal strike, Revenue Canada, Taxation provided 950,000 extra source deductions remittance forms to employers and, in addition, provided 150,000 extra instalment forms to corporations to ensure timely payments of source deductions and corporate taxes through financial institutions.

Costs incurred:

—Printing $65,839.58

—Postage (Third class) $220,782.30

—Total cost $286,621.88

Question No. 142—Mr. Caccia:

Was the proposal to entrench property rights in the Constitution (a) subjected to an assessment for its environmental impact, and (b) will a public statement be released as required by the environmental assessment reform policy announced by the Minister of the Environment in June 1990?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): The proposed protection of an individual's property rights is raised in the document Shaping Canada's Future Together, tabled in the House of Commons on September 24, 1991. This document was referred to a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons with a mandate to seek the viewpoints of Canadians on these matters, and to make recommendations to Parliament. The process of committee review will give an opportunity for Canadians to bring forward their concerns from a broad range of perspectives in this national dialogue. The committee's review of these matters will assist Parliament in its consideration of constitutional proposals, and contributes to the over all process for constitutional reform which involves the legislative assemblies of provinces as well as Parliament. Therefore, it is premature to consider the question of an assessment of environmental impact.

Question No. 155—Mr. Caccia:

What policies, initiatives or programs, with respective person-year and dollar allocations, have been launched in response to the recommendations from the Federal Water Policy: A Progress Report in (a) Part I, recommendations 1.1.2, 1.1.4, 2.1.2, 2.1.5, 2.1.6, 3.1.1, 3.1.3, 3.1.4, 4.1.1, 4.1.3, 4.1.5, 5.1.2; (b) Part II, recommendations 2.1, 2.2, 3.3, 4.1, 4.5, 5.1, 5.3, 5.6, 6.1, 6.2, 7.1, 8.2, 9.2, 10.2, 11.1, 11.3, 12.2, 14.5, 14.6, 14.7, 18.1, 18.2, 18.3, 22.4?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): This information will form part of the second biannual Federal Water Policy progress report, which will be released by the Minister of the Environment in March 1992.

Question No. 156—Mr. Caccia:

With regards to nuclear electricity generating facilities in Canada, has the government prepared any studies estimating (a) the total cost of decommissioning each of the CANDU nuclear generating plants operating in Canada today (b) the total cost of safely and permanently storing all the spent fuel rods and other radioactive waste and, if so, what are the figures for each of the studies?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Allowances to cover the projected cost for both decommissioning the Canadian nuclear power plants and disposal of the spent fuel are being collected by the provincial utilities through the rates being charged to the customers today. The funds are being accumulated to be available when the expenditures are incurred in the future.

(a) Decommissioning the twenty-two nuclear power generating units that are either operating or under construction in Canada, including the safe and permanent storage of all radioactive wastes other than the spent fuel rods, is estimated to cost approximately $3.7 billion if the work were to be done today. In fact, the work and expenditure would not begin until the first unit is taken out of service, assumed to be in 2012, and would be spread over many years until the last unit is returned to green pasture in 2072. This decommissioning cost would represent a small fraction of the projected capital of $34 billion (in 1990 dollars) to replace the 15,700 Mwe of generating capability of these stations, particularly when the effects of discounting are taken into account. Current international estimates for nuclear plant decommissioning fall generally between 10 per cent and 20 per cent of replacement cost.

(b) The reference to "safely and permanently storing all of the spent fuel rods" is interpreted to mean the disposal of nuclear fuel wastes. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has developed a concept for geological disposal of such wastes. A federal environmental assessment and review of the concept, along with a range of related issues, is currently under way, and an independent panel has been appointed to carry out this public review.

Disposal of spent fuel does present a great uncertainty in terms of nuclear power costs. However, as the panel that conducted the Ontario Nuclear Cost Inquiry noted in its report of January 1989: "The time frame extends well beyond the middle of the century—-and means that, although the expenditures will be very large ($9 billion in 1988) when they are incurred, because of the discounting, they comprise a small portion of the levelized unit energy cost. The funds are being accumulated over the life-time of generating stations and invested over many years so that the charges for this item make up a small portion of the total cost of generating the nuclear-based electricity.

Question No. 160—Mr. Harvard:

What happened to the $7 million which was allocated for the construction of a Transport Canada hangar at the Winnipeg Airport and which was noted in the Supplementary Estimates B of the fiscal year 1990-91 and in Part III of 1991-92 Main Estimates for Transport Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Although a design has been completed for the construction of a new hangar at Winnipeg, and this item is still included in the Transport Canada capital spending program for the 1991-92 fiscal year, funds have not been allocated for this construction project. The project has been delayed to enable other cost effective options to be evaluated, including the possibilities for sharing facilities with other departments.

Question No. 162—Mr. Stupich:

Was a regional conference held in Whistler, B.C., on June 10, 1991 for economists, sponsored by CEIC in the B.C./Yukon territory region and, if so (a) what was the cost (b) how often are these conferences held?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): A conference of Managers of Regional Economic Services from across Canada was held in the British Columbia/Yukon region in June 1991.

(a) Costs of the conference were:

Air travel $11,680

Hotel accommodation 5,517

Meals & incidentals 3,294

Other transportation 1,969

Total $ 22,460

(b) These conferences are held twice a year.

Question No. 163—Mr. Stupich:

With respect to the CEIC in the B.C./Yukon territory region, has an internal communications survey been contracted out to Tower, Perrin and Co., and, if so, (a) what was the cost of this contract (b) how long have these surveys been contracted out (c) is there a cost comparison available for surveys done internally as opposed to externally?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes. Employment and Immigration Canada contracted with Tower, Perrin and Co. some portions of an internal communication survey.

(a) The contract cost $35,000.

(b) In all, there were two surveys conducted. The first survey was conducted in 1988, the second in 1990.

(c) Most, if not all of our surveys are contracted out. In addition, due to the varying scope and parameters of different surveys, cost comparisons cannot be made.

Question No. 165—Mr. Gardiner:

How many American citizens have entered Canada to work as professionals under terms of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The following is a breakdown of the number of United States citizens who entered Canada under the Professionals category of Chapter 15 of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement since the Agreement was implemented on January 1, 1989.

January 1 to December 31, 1989—1807

January 1 to December 31, 1990—3284

January 1 to November 30, 1991—2961

Question No. 168—Mr. Proud:

With respect to the Canadian Pension Commission (a) what is the current backlog (b) how does this backlog compare with the backlog three years ago (c) what is the current turn-around time for (i) first decisions (ii) Entitlement Board hearings and decisions (iii) appeals before the Veterans Appeal Board?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): (a) For the 1991-92 fiscal year, 6,000 first level decisions were forecast to be completed by September 30—6,671 were actually completed.

(b) Three years ago, in the 1988/89 fiscal year, for the same period to September 30, 5,500 first level decisions were forecast—5,364 were completed.

(c) Turn-around time for:
(i) First decisions—30 days
(ii) Entitlement Board hearings and decisions—14 days
(iii) The average turn-around time from the date of the hearing to the promulgation of a decision for appeals before the Veterans Appeal Board was 66 days for the period from April 1, 1991 to November 30, 1991.

The average administrative time for the collection of documents from the department, case preparation, distribution of documents and scheduling, from the date of receipt of a notice of appeal to the date of hearing, was 206 days over the same period. This delay is shared between the board, the department and the Bureau of Pensions Advocates.

Question No. 169—Mr. Proud:

With respect to the Canadian Pension Commission, (a) how many commissioners are based in Charlottetown (b) are any commissioners based in other parts of the country, and if so (i) how many (ii) has there been a reduction in travel by the commissioners because of the relocations?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): (a) The Canadian Pension Commission has 16 commissioners based in Charlottetown.

(b) Yes (i) 8 (ii) Yes there has been a reduction in travel by the commissioners.

Question No. 171—Mr. MacAulay:

1. With respect to the rock crab fishery in Prince Edward Island, for each of the last 3 years, (a) how many people have received fishing permits (b) what was the total yearly catch (c) what was the value of the total catch?

2. Does the government have any plans for (a) making the rock crab fishery a permanent fishery (b) licensing fishermen in the rock crab fishery?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): 1(a) 50 permits were issued in each of 1988, 1989 and 1990. However, log books submitted to DFO indicate landings for only 32, 21 and 6 permit holders in 1988, 1989 and 1990 respectively.

(b) 1988—930,030 lbs
1990—282,912 lbs

(c) 1988—$186,006.00
1989—$128,427.20
1990—$56,582.40

2. Consultations with the industry will begin early 1992. The following considerations will have to be addressed before a permanent fishery and the issuance of permanent licenses are allowed: stock evaluation, marketing and harvesting limits.

Question No. 172—Mr. LeBlanc:

With respect to the purchase of the former IDD/ECBC farm in Black River, Inverness County, Nova Scotia from the Government of Canada, (a) what is name and address of the purchasers (b) what was the purchase price (c) was the purchaser's bid the highest one received, and if not, (i) who submitted the highest bid (ii) how much was it (iii) why was this not selected (d) what did the successful bidder undertake to do with the property?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): a) Herman Vanden Hoogen Bros., R.R. #2, Mabou;

(b) The highest purchase price was $180,500;

(c) Yes, it was the highest bid received; and

(d) All of the potential purchasers planned to use the Mabou farm for agriculture purposes although their individual business plans differed. The successful bidder focused his plans on livestock and dairy operations.

Question No. 174—Mr. Axworthy:

Has the government created a Children's Bureau within the Department of National Health and Welfare, and, if so, (a) on what day was it created (b) how much money has it been allocated and spent in each fiscal year since its formation (c) how many (i) full time (ii) part-time staff are employed in the bureau in each fiscal year since its formation (d) what mandate has it been given (e) what projects has it undertaken since its formation (f) has it been directed to evaluate the government's constitutional proposals as they affect children (g) has it been directed to evaluate the government's prosperity agenda as they affect children?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) The Children's Bureau was created following the World Summit for Children, on February 4, 1991, by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

(b) the Bureau has an annual operational budget of $1.2 million.

(c) 12 person-years.

(d) The bureau's mandate is to ensure co ordination and consistency in federal programs relating to children. The bureau's principal purpose is to ensure the effectiveness of federal policies and programs relating to the health, welfare and development of children. To this end, the bureau promotes co-ordination within the federal governement, consults with other levels of government and non-government, consults with other levels of government and non-government organizations and communicates federal initiatives relating to children.

(e) The bureau's first major task is to co-ordinate the development of an action plan to implement the commitments made at the World Summit, and reiterated in the May 1991 Speech from the Throne. The plan will serve as a framework for initiatives that the government has undertaken or will put in place to improve the well-being of children in Canada and in developing countries.

By way of improving co-ordination among federal departments on children's issues and obtaining input for the development of the action plan, the bureau has established an Interdepartmental Committee on Children, comprising of 21 departments. The committee has met twice to discuss the plan.

The bureau held numerous meetings with non-governmental organizations as well as other federal departments. While the bureau does not have the capacity to provide grants or contributions, it has acted in support of initiatives and events contributions, it has acted in support of initiatives and events such as the conference "Canada's Children: The Priority for the 90's" held in Ottawa at the end of October, the "Ceasefire" conference, and next February's "Child Health 2000" conference which will bring together world-renowned experts on child health issues in Vancouver. In keeping with its interest in promoting research on the status of children, the bureau was involved with last spring's conference "State of the Child in Ontario" and the bureau has worked with the Child, Youth and Family Policy Research Centre to organize a small colloquium on the state of the child research across Canada.

(f) and (g) The children's bureau has not been directed to do this.

Question No. 179—Mr. Blenkarn:

Do the provinces pay goods and service taxes to the government and, if so, (a) which provinces pay goods and services taxes (b) how many dollars are collected in goods and services taxes from these provinces?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Purchases made by provincial governments are outside the scope of the Goods and Services Tax (GST) legislation by virtue of the Constitution Act. Therefore, all departments and bodies within the provincial entities do not pay the GST.

Point-of-sale exemption for provincial entities is provided through certificates attesting to the use of and payment for the supply by the province. Purchases must also be billed to the provincial body. In no case will Revenue Canada allow an exemption for cash purchases or purchases made by third parties on behalf of a province.

Question No. 183—Mr. Harvey:

With respect to the United Nations Human Rights Committee views concerning Communicaton Number 167/1984 Bernard Ominayak, Chief of the Lubicon Lake Band v. Canada, has the government received since October 1, 1990 any request or requests for further information from the Special Rapporteur for Follow-up on Views of the Human Rights Committee, and, if so, (a) when did the government receive such request(s), (b) has the government responded to such request(s), and, if so (i) when did the government reply (ii) what did the government reply?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The UN Human Rights Centre, as part of its routine procedure, has requested further information from the Government of Canada with respect to Chief Ominayak's communication following the release of the Human Rights Committee, while finding that an obligation exists to the Lubicon which must be settled, found the Canadian government's offer to be an appropriate remedy. While we have responded to the committee's request for further information, we emphasize that the committee, as a matter of practice, considers the response confidential at this stage and that Canada respects this rule. We cannot, therefore, comment on the content of our response. With regard to more recent developments, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development took the initiative and met with Chief Ominayak on November 1, 1991. That meeting proved productive and a further meeting is planned involving the minister, the Alberta minister responsible for native affairs and Chief Ominayak in February.

Question No. 185—Ms. Callbeck:

With respect to the reported $5865 in paid expenses claimed by National Transportation Agency Chair, Erik Nielsen during his summer trip to the Yukon (a) what is the breakdown of each item claimed as an expense (b) what was the purpose of Mr. Nielsen's trip (c) what was his daily schedule during that time?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The National Transportation Agency advises as follows:

(a) The cost of travel by the chairman to the Ontario regional office at Thunder Bay, and to the western regional office at Saskatoon and to the northern regional office at Whitehorse was $5,865.28, including mileage allowance and other travel related expenses at rates and amounts established by the Treasury Board.

Ottawa to Thunder Bay to Saskatoon to Whitehorse to Saskatoon to Ottawa	$ 2.722.83
Car rental	334.91
Accommodation	632.32
Meals	1,713.94
Other expenses (incidentals etc.)	461.28
Total claim	$ 5,865.28

(b) The purpose of the trip was to visit regional offices of the National Transportation Agency; to inspect various transportation facilities and services in western and northern Canada and to consult with individuals, public and private sector organizations and officials concerned with the transportation industry.

(c) During this period the chairman discharged his normal responsibilities as chairman of the agency through headquarters offices in Ottawa and through the agency's regional offices in Thunder Bay, Saskatoon and Whitehorse. He also participated in the inspection of transportation facilities and in organized meetings with shippers, carriers, industry and government official and others concerned with transportation matters.

Question No. 189—Mr. Assad:

With respect to the agriculture infrastructure in the prairie provinces (a) what are the total revenues of the government received under that infrastructure (b) does the government have any intention of calling into question that infrastructure as we know it today?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): (a) Our data sources do not permit a breakdown of government revenues from agriculture seperately from industries such as mining, tourism and so on. Agriculture accounted directly for 5.3 per cent of the prairie gross domestic product (GDP) in 1986 and much more than that when one considers transportation, storage, processing and related activities. Of 34 census divisions in Canada with over 20 per cent of their total employment on farms, 33 are in the prairie provinces.

(b) The government does not call into question the existing agricultural infrastructure, but the infrastructure has changed considerably over time, and it will continue to evolve in response to economic and social developments. It is the ability to manage change from the status quo that is the hallmark of rural communities and rural families. In line with the demonstrated importance of the sector, the objective of maintaining the income levels of prairie farmers and the infrastructure necessary to support the sector has been pursued by the government through unprecedented assistance. During the 1985-1991 period, net federal program payments in the prairies totalled $9.2 billion.

Question No. 191—Mr. Mifflin:

With respect to the future of the Argentia Naval Base (a) when does the U.S. Navy plan to vacate the U.S. naval facility at Argentia (b) are there ongoing discussions and/or negotiations under way to study (i) the scope (ii) the feasibility and viability of Canada taking over this base for operational and/or training purposes (c) will this subject be considered by the advisory group on defence infrastructure (i) as part of the Canadian Forces presence in Newfoundland (ii) as a socioeconomic issue?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): (a) No firm date has yet been established by the United States Navy.

(b) Interdepartemental discussions are ongoing concerning the future of Argentia.

c) The subject will not be considered by the advisory group on defence infrastructure as Argentia does not belong to the Canadian Forces but rather to the United States Navy.

Question No. 197—Mr. Wood:

Will the government's contribution toward the recent joint initiative with the Ontario government, announced on November 4, 1991, and entitled the Northern Ontario Development Agreement, come out of FEDNOR funds or will it be moneys other than those allocated to the FEDNOR program?

Hon. Thomas Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): FedNor:

The Northern Ontario Development Agreement (NODA) was not funded out of FedNor funds but rather from the Ontario Regional Development Reserve. The agreement was signed on Novermber 4, 1991 and provides $95 million over a five-year period to encourage economic development and diversification in northern Ontario in the key sectors of forestry, mining and tourism. The agreement is cost shared 50:50 by the federal government and the province of Ontario.

Question No. 200—Mr. Peterson:

Does the government have any intention of repealing the Postal and Courier Remission Orders of 1986 and, if not, what steps is the government considering to assist the direct marketing industry?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Several groups and individuals have expressed their concerns to the government respecting the impact of the Postal and Courier Remission Orders on the Canadian mail order industry. In response to these concerns, the government has established an interdepartmental committee to fully investigate and make recommendations on the entire cross-border shopping issue, of which these two remission orders are only a facet. As this matter is still under review by the committee, the department cannot provide details of the government proposals designed to address the situation. The department will be providing the Canadian business communities with the details as soon as they are available.

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 99.

[Text]

*Question No. 99—Ms. Langan:

For each year since January 1, 1988, has the government assumed any costs related to the (a) furnishing (b) decorating of the Prime Minister's residences at (i) 24 Sussex Drive (ii) Harrington Lake and, if so, at what cost?

Hon. Elmer MacKay (Minister of Public Works): The National Capital Commission informs me as follows:

The Official Residences Council (ORC) was established in 1984 to provide independent and impartial advice to the Prime Minister and the government on the development, maintenance, refurbishing and operation of the buildings and grounds of Canada's seven official residences[1].

In 1986, the National Capital Commission (NCC) assumed responsibility for the six official residences located in the national capital region while Public Works Canada assumed responsibility for the Citadel in Quebec City. All major projects and acquisitions require the approval of the ORC before proceeding within the strict budgetary rules and allocations approved by Parliament. Minor projects are implemented directly by the NCC.

As the ORC indicated in its Third Report Summer 1990, the lion's share of public expenditures on official residences is directed to essential rehabilitation, repairs and routine maintenance of buildings, and the restoration and conservation of Crown-owned heritage furnishings and works of art. Since its establishment, the ORC has ensured that public funds are expended only to meet legitimate and verifiable needs.

It should also be noted that, in addition to being large residences, these are aging buildings: four of them incorporate structures that predate Confederation with the remaining buildings built early in this century. All of the official residences are included in the Federal Heritage Buildings Register, a status that requires their protection and preservation for future generations.

From January 1988 until August 1991, furnishing and decorating costs amounted to $39,524 for 24 Sussex Drive and $60,359 for Harrington Lake. For purposes of comparison, the ORC reported that the total operating expenses for the seven official residences for FY 1989/90 totalled $2.8 million of which $1.26 million was spent on Rideau Hall, $107,000 on Stornoway and $219,000 on 24 Sussex Drive.

[1]These are: the residences of the Governor General, Rideau Hall in Ottawa and the Citadel in Quebec City; the Prime Minister's residences at 24 Sussex Drive and Harrington Lake; the Leader of the Opposition's residence, Stornoway; the residence of the Speaker of the House of Commons, The Farm at Kingsmere; and the Government's guest house at 7 Rideau Gate.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask my hon. friend some hard questions, but in light of the fact that he has answered so many questions, I want to hold off.

I commend the government on doing some homework over the break and providing these answers. It is nice to be able to say something positive to my hon. friend for the work that he does.

POINT OF ORDER

INCOME TAX RETURN FORMS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I want to raise this again with my hon. colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader.

I did not want to raise this earlier today for obvious reasons, but as we all know, tax returns are being sent out to the post offices. They are now being picked up by people, particularly the non-personalized ones. I have received a notice, and I guess we all did, that in western Canada many post offices are announcing that the forms cannot be picked up until after February 13 because they have some forms in one of the official languages but not in the other.

Could I ask my friend if perhaps by tomorrow someone could make a statement, at a critical time when everybody is wanting to get their tax returns filled out, on when they would be available in both official languages, particularly in western Canadian post offices.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member giving me notice of his concerns. I will indeed attempt to find an answer to his concerns and get back to him as soon as possible.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate, the hon. member for Dartmouth had 11 minutes left.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, before the break for Question Period I was trying to impress upon the House the true state of the nation with regard to what is happening because of this government's economic policies, as well as the downturn in the world economy, particularly with Bill C-32 which is the cap on CAP bill. Most Canadians who hold an interest in what we do here have at least read about this and perhaps have seen some of the debate on television.

The focus of my comments prior to the break for Question Period was simply this. With all we do in this place, with all of the tinkering and all of the niceties we exchange in debate, one of the things we have to be very clear about is the fact that in this country, which ostensibly should be the wealthiest nation on earth, we now have according to Statistics Canada over one million children living in poverty. The consequences of a child who lives in poverty are real and are negative.

I have three children and as everyone who has children knows, parents want nothing but the best and the finest for them. Even with the great incomes we in this House and people in the business community make, it seems we can never give enough to our children because we desire for them more than what we can have for ourselves. I think that is a fair comment.

The point I was trying to make is that this government, through its economic policies, has made a decision that children born in poverty are not worth rescuing. It has made a decision that the parents of those children who live in poverty somehow are to blame for the situation they find themselves in, as if anybody in his or her right mind would want to live on $800 a month.

Statistics Canada has told us what it means to be in poverty. It has said that on average a family of four making less than $26,699 in 1990 were living in poverty. There are people out there with families of four who are making $8,000, $9,000 and $10,000 a year. My God, they would think they had won the lottery if they could make $24,000 or $25,000 a year.

This government has made a strategic decision, that those people do not matter any more. It has come in with Bill C-32 and basically said that the poorest of the poor, those who suffer disproportionately because of mismanagement of the economy by governments primarily, have to bear more of a burden of responsibility for the state we find ourselves in than anybody else in this country.

Can you imagine? We are about the wealthiest country in the world. We spend billions of dollars on various programs, yet we have one million children living in poverty. They go to bed with hungry stomachs, go to school with hungry stomachs, go to recess with hungry stomachs, and go home at the end of the day with hungry stomachs.

I talked to educators. I went to schools in my riding, and depending on the part of the town more or maybe less of this will be found. They told me that after three weeks of having a class they can tell which kids are coming to school without any breakfast in their bellies. Kids who are hungry do not learn to their full potential because their brains do not work when there is not enough food.

• (1600)

It seems that we are fully willing to accept the consequences of cyclical poverty. It seems that we are fully willing to say, and pardon me for saying this, to hell with those children who were born in poverty. That is what we say in this place when we come in with a piece of legislation like Bill C-32 which is a cap on the CAP. We say that the poor will have to do with less because we have mismanaged. While we amend the tax act to give more to those who have, we have with a backhanded slap said to those who have been forced into poverty: "Tough luck, Charlie".

I normally do not read in this place, but I want to read from this statistic because it has bothered me a lot: "Boys on welfare are 1.4 times likely to do worse than other boys of their age group in school". This is startling. "Almost one-third of children in subsidized housing", which usually means people who are on social assistance and welfare, "have psychiatric disorders compared to one in seven children in other homes. More than 40 per cent of children ages 12 to 16 in subsidized housing do more poorly in school than other children do". These are kids. This is our future we are talking about.

Think about it. What we are doing here is crippling. We are giving these children a handicap before they even understand what their role will be as young adults or as adults in society.

An hon. member: It is criminal.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): It is close to being criminal. My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood, who has expressed with a great deal of clarity time after time after time in this House the problems this government has in focusing, would agree with my comment.

Instead of penalizing those individuals and their children who are forced into poverty, we need a 100 per cent effort by the Parliament of Canada and by the people of Canada and a partnership with the businesses in Canada; not to put more welfare payments out there, not to kick those who are down, but to put people back to work. If we can make that effort, break that cycle of poverty and put integrity and self-respect back in the lingo of those who are pushed down so hard, then just maybe the government would not have to worry. Even with its mismanagement it might be able to handle its deficit.

If we put people back to work in this country, if we focus our efforts on re-instilling pride in the work people do and allowing them to dream about doing better, they will be able to look up and see a light at the end of the tunnel. Right now, every time they see a flicker of light, the government comes in with some damned piece of legislation like Bill C-32 which basically says, as has been said before: "If you are poor, tough luck. You people don't vote anyway. Don't you know that? Poor people don't vote". We have all heard that. I guess they are too busy trying to figure out how in the name of goodness they are going to pay their rent and put clothes on the backs of their children.

I thought perhaps the government could have come back from its Christmas holiday a little wiser and asked what Bill C-32 does. It caps the rate of increase on the government's contribution to social assistance programs in three provinces, the ones it considers to be the wealthiest provinces. Well, wake up and smell the coffee. Ontario is quickly becoming a have not province in this country.

As I said earlier, how in the name of God can we differentiate one poor family from another poor family? If you are poor in Newfoundland making $10,000 a year, if you are poor in Willowdale making $10,000 a year, or if you are poor in Vancouver, damn it, you are still poor. To differentiate and say for some reason that because you are in southern Ontario, British Columbia or Alberta, as these payments go up it is not going to participate like it did before. Leave it up to the provincial governments.

This is going to sound strange, coming from the mouth of an Atlantic Canadian, but I am going to tell you. In Atlantic Canada sometimes we are the butt of jokes and sometimes we make Ontario the butt of our jokes. But let's be serious here. The new NDP left-right coalition—the NDP government down in Queen's Park and the Tory government opposite—has done almost the impossible with the Ontario economy. It took an economy which was bubbling over two and a half years ago and not only put the brakes on it, but wrecked the vehicle. It has literally killed the Ontario economy.

The free enterprise spirit has been crushed in Ontario. The high interest rates of this federal government of two years ago, the GST which has completely destroyed consumer confidence, the free trade deal, and a government in Ontario that says "what is another $10 billion in deficit", destroyed the main economy in Canada that allows our federal government to work, that allows us to have equalization programs and transfer payments. By the grace of God, for the last number of years Ontario has been the bread basket and the powerhouse economically in this country, and it has been.

It upsets me that it is being driven over. I do not know but I think the Prime Minister is in the driver's seat. Boy, I do not know if Bob Rae is pulling it over or pushing it over, but the Ontario economy is in deep trouble. For this government not to recognize that to put an additional burden on the province and the taxpayers of Ontario right now, when there are record numbers of unemployed which continue to grow, bankruptcies skyrocketing and hundreds of thousands of jobs are lost to south of the border, just belies credibility.

In conclusion, I would hope that government members opposite have taken note of what they have heard over the Christmas holidays. The government determines which bill gets up here on any given day. I would hope that it would come to its senses and stop penalizing those whom it has put in positions of poverty and that it would take this bill and allow it to die on the Order Paper.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, recently I put out a householder in my riding in which I was talking about the thrill it was to be associated with members of Parliament in this House of Commons and the different sort of experiences we have listening to and debating with one another.

I want to say that it is always a constructive experience listening to my colleague from Dartmouth, because he delivers a message that is succinct and to the point. His passion is such that he gives hope to the Canadians out there who are really looking to this Chamber for hope.

I wanted to point out, being a member from Ontario, a couple of little points. First, he mentions that people are poor in Newfoundland and they are also poor in Toronto. That is the case, but I want to say that $10,000 a year in Newfoundland goes a lot further than $10,000 in Toronto.

In my riding a single mother was being evicted from a basement apartment the other day. It was costing her $1,100 a month just for a basement apartment. Sometimes when we talk about Ontario or Toronto we imagine that everybody is rich, we imagine that everybody somehow manages to get through. That is not true any more. If I sounded a little aggressive earlier today when I was saying that the issue was getting people back to work, it is only because unemployment insurance payments and welfare payments do not work in the city of Toronto.

They do not work because they do not even cover the rent in 90 per cent of the cases, never mind clothing and food. That is why those of us in Toronto maybe for the first time in our lives are experiencing what many other regions of the country have experienced on a cyclical basis, sometimes yearly during different seasons when there is high unemployment.

I would like to remind, with kindness, my colleagues that the suffering which is going on in Toronto right now is good in one sense because it is making us aware of what is going on in the maritimes which maybe in the past we had not quite realized. I just wanted to mention that.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am fully cognizant of the fact that poverty is a relative thing. For those who find themselves in poverty, being from the great peninsula of Newfoundland, that wonderful province, or from metropolitan Toronto, the sting is no less severe.

People are looking for hope. They want a reason to believe that things will get better. Social assistance is not the answer. Surely giving social assistance at a rate that is 50 per cent does differ. A family of four, the average in Canada, at $26,000 or $27,000 is still considered below the poverty line. Look at the actual percentage of welfare payments, social assistance, making up the poverty line. If $27,000 is the poverty line in Ontario even with full social assistance benefits, those people are still 52 per cent below the poverty line.

We spend a lot of money but we keep people poor. We do not give them hope and in many cases we give them just enough to survive in misery and squalor. That is all we do.

I wish to make a comment on the UI system. Certainly the UI system should not be a supplement for good job creation programs. Even the UI system, which is meant to be a net when people get in an economic decline, is meant to be there for a period of time, whether two weeks or six months and hopefully not much longer, so that people can get on with their lives if there is a particular economic downturn in their area. Go to Newfoundland and talk to my colleague from Labrador. He has been in this House a long time and he has never seen people go hungry before in his riding. He sees them hungry today because the government last year made a decision on Bill C-21 that it was going to alter the UI system and it was going to penalize those people who had to rely on UI for a period of time.

What it has meant is that people no longer qualify. If they do, their benefits run out more quickly. All of a sudden what happens? They have to rely on their municipality for welfare and when the federal government has cutbacks on the transfers to every single province in this country, it means that those provincial governments do not have the money to do anything. The municipalities almost go belly-up.

It is a much broader problem than it first appeared to be. Most of it can go back to the misguided policies of this Conservative government.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in third reading debate today of Bill C-32.

In doing so, I want to try and outline a couple of things, one of which is an example on how we approach things differently than the government of the day or the official opposition when it was government in terms of our role in society, the role of government, the role of Parliament and the role in the relation between the federal, provincial and municipal governments.

This bill deals with a restriction on the amount of tax dollars shared with different parts of this country. The three provinces being restricted in that cash flow are B.C., Alberta and Ontario, supposedly because they are the have provinces.

I come from a community that has seen over a thousand mill jobs lost in the last year; a community that has a shaky future as it relates to the grain handling and transportation industry; an infrastructure that is deteriorating.

It is an infrastructure that is totally incomplete because we are still flushing our sewage almost virtually untouched into Lake Superior. We have a government that says: "Ontario, you have to do more on your own. The taxpayers of Ontario have to do more on their own". Ultimately it comes down to that, whether it is through increases in provincial taxes or whether it is through increases in property taxes, which are even more regressive than taxes like the GST.

I have had the occasion over the last three to four weeks, as part of the break from the House, to talk to a large cross-section of my constituency. Some was formal. I held a series of eight working sessions on the economy throughout the riding over two weeks. I also held a constituent assembly which attracted people not just from my riding, but from the neighbouring parts of the Thunder Bay—Nipigon riding in the city of Thunder Bay. Out of those meetings came a real understanding for me of the thinking of the people who were there.

In part, it has been paralleled by the conferences that I think have gone extremely well, held in different parts of Canada, to deal with the Constitution. They all relate to this particular bill. They relate to government powers, they relate to government spending, they relate to the trust that is placed in all of us in this House by the people who voted for us and who elected us. It also speaks to the kinds of things that we are hearing across Canada about the need for some protection from the actions of governments.

We saw this past weekend, at a conference that was designed to deal with the question of the economic union, an explicit request that some of those things that we value as Canadians, some of those things that make us different from our neighbour to the south, receive some kind of protection in the Constitution. People call it a social charter.

My leader, the member for Yukon, made a proposal, not last month but last year and the year before about the need to place a social charter in the Constitution. The premier of Ontario, Bob Rae, a former member of this House, formally proposed it as the representative of the province of Ontario. We saw at the conference strong support for it. Based on the constituent assembly that I held in Thunder Bay a week and a half ago, there is strong support there as well.

We raised the question on collective rights and basically asked a group of men and women who represented a fairly good cross-section politically, economically and what have you, if our Constitution should include more guarantees of collective rights and, if so, what collective rights should be included. Eighty-two per cent of those casting ballots said yes and then when we gave them a list to choose from and places to add on, they voted as follows: 78 per cent for a minimum standard of living; 91 per cent for decent health care; 81 per cent for an education and a job; 91 per cent for clean air and clean water; 63 per cent for collective bargaining; 84 per cent for integration of people with disabilities; 78 per cent for participation in the formation of economic and social goals.

The relationship to the bill that we are debating is tied to that kind of response. People do not want us to fiddle with the programs and services that are valuable to them and the fair and equitable treatment of those people who, for all sorts of reasons, do not have the economic strength for full participation. Those people need protection from governments. When the federal government reduces transfer payments to any group, whether it is a province or what have you, that group has to find some replacement funds.

We are seeing it in increased taxes, we are seeing it in reductions in transfers to municipalities which means the only things the government can do is either cut services or raise property taxes or user fees. It has no choice if it wants to protect its citizens.

The other theme that came through at the constituent assembly that again relates to this bill is the desire for a strong, central, national government with the power to ensure that there is equitable availability of services from sea to sea to sea, so that no matter where you are you have access to the same quality of health care, the same quality of education. That is not to suggest that there might not be different approaches in each of the jurisdictions, but that the same quality will be there.

They were very strong on that, but they were also strong on not wanting the courts to be the adjudicators. They wanted Parliament to make the decisions, whether it was Parliament in terms of this House or the other Chamber which they wanted retained but reformed to provide more protection for them so that this House, through the government of the day, could not arbitrarily reduce the quality of those services.

In a broad way they were saying: "We want you to do it but we are not prepared to trust you entirely", the "you" being we in this Chamber, the "you" being the government of the day.

I think it was a cry for a different way and by proceeding with this particular bill, Bill C-32, I believe it is going against the mood of the people of this country. They do not want our programs weakened. They want them strengthened. They want the power of this institution strengthened so that it acts on their behalf, the citizens of this great country, not on behalf of a bottom line or a particular corporate mentality; on behalf of all citizens.

At the same time they, like I, recognize that each part of the country is different. We have different needs. We have different desires. We have different realities—geography, history, language, culture, our economic base. Some of those jurisdictions need greater assistance from the federal level in order to help make them more equitable from sea to sea to sea.

This particular bill, which is extending a previous bill which capped CAP until 1992 and extends it to 1995, is going in the wrong direction. As the previous speaker said, it should be allowed to die on the Order Paper. We cannot necessarily reverse what has happened to date, but we can prevent this kind of change from occurring in the future.

It is fair game if the Government of Canada sits down with the provincial and territorial governments and carves out a new deal. That is fair game because it needs change. Just because we adopted a program in 1960 or 1950 does not mean we should not revisit it to see if it still works in 1992.

As my leader said in one of the constitutional debates, we should not be talking about who has what power in this country but where is that power best placed to serve the people of this country. It may be that the best place is at the municipal level. It may be that the best place is at the provincial level. It may be that the best place is at the federal level, or maybe a mix. That is the kind of approach we should be taking, not an arbitrary decision to cut off three provinces because of a no longer valid assumption about being haves.

Look at the statements from the premier of Ontario in the televised address that he made two weeks ago or the plea to the Government of Canada for almost $1 billion to assist Ontario in dealing with the realities of today. It does not matter who we blame for those realities, they are real.

We have lost thousands of jobs in Ontario and we are losing more every day. Yes, it is because of the free trade agreement and yes, it is because of the recession. Perhaps the federal government was directly responsible or maybe it was the provincial government, but the bottom line is that there are tough times in Ontario today.

We all have to work smarter and look for innovations to get people back to work, to keep people working, to provide the training that is needed and to ensure that as people go through transition after transition they have the skills to move forward. We are told that in this day and age, anyone graduating from high school or university can assume that they will have at least three careers during the course of their working days, and they are not necessarily related careers.

At the outset of my remarks I made reference to the loss of jobs in Thunder Bay in the pulp and paper industry. One mill closed entirely and its total work force is out on the streets. Another mill chopped about 400 jobs. In working with the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Canadian Jobs Strategy, training packages were developed. We now have men who came out of high school, got a job at the mill and worked there for 20 years. They are back at community college and are taking a broad range of careers. For them they are atypical careers.

Imagine someone going from being a paper maker to a nurse, or someone who operated a fork-lift learning computerization. All those things are possible and all we need are the tools to do them. If you cut off the transfers that provide support to people when they are unable to work, then you are cutting at the very foundation of their psyche, of their ability to get back on their feet, find a new option and new ways of doing things.

I think the federal government would be much better off looking for new innovations in that way, and not reducing the transfer payments to B.C., Alberta and Ontario. It has to find a better way. It has chosen to cut instead of allocating resources in a much wiser and more effective fashion.

I want to give you one suggestion, Mr. Speaker. There is a section in the Income Tax Act that allows people to defer their incomes. Teachers use it at the elementary and high school levels, instructors at the community colleges in Ontario use it and the federal public servants use it. In some cases it is called "four over five".

You sign up for the program with your employer and defer one fifth of your annual gross income into a special account. In the fifth year, you leave your place of employment for a year. Some people take training to upgrade and are paid throughout. Some people travel. Some people get into new occupations or activities to develop their minds, and come back refreshed. All sorts of options are opened.

What it also does, assuming the employer is concerned about creating employment, is create one full-time replacement job over five years for every five people in an operation who participate. That is available to every sector in this country. It has been in the Income Tax Act I believe for at least 15 years, if not longer, but very few sectors have used it.

I want to go one step farther. If we want to deal with the unemployment problem, which in part is responsible for the kind of mushrooming welfare situation we have not just in Ontario but right across the country, we have got to find ways to get people back to work. One of the ways to do that is to provide either interest-free or low interest loans through companies that agree to participate, provided they replace the workers.

What I am suggesting is that this coming year a number of people could take their year off for retraining, to relax, to recharge the batteries, to volunteer at a local hospital or whatever. Then over the next four years, they would repay that income. We just reverse the process a bit. This would allow the creation of some new positions now when we need them, because we have a lot of people out there with a lot of valuable skills that are going to waste.

There obviously has to be some recognition that peoples' incomes will drop, but I am told the experience in the education sector is that when you take off the taxable component, the loss of net income is marginal. At the same time, in the treasury of Canada, Ontario or any of the provinces, by having one more person for every five working in the work force paying income tax, not collecting UI, not collecting welfare, you will have a net gain to the treasury without the kind of investment needed to create a plan; millions and millions of dollars, whether it is in the deferred taxes for large corporations which reinvest in capital equipment, or the megaprojects or what have you. That is the kind of smarter thinking we need.

I am not going to take credit for this idea. It came to me from one of my constituents who came to one of my working sessions on the economy. It is one of many remarkable ideas offered to me as a means of trying to deal with the economic situation. Let us all go back to our constituencies and ask the ordinary folks for those kinds of ideas and in the meantime, let us scrap this bill so that we can ensure that while we need it, the money is being transferred from the federal taxpayer to the provincial taxpayers in those three provinces, so that we can look after the people in need.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan that I think that was a very good idea he just came up with. There are many parts of his speech that I agree with, especially when he was talking about the thousands of jobs that were being lost in the province of Ontario.

I do have however a little problem with the New Democratic Party. I want to be very specific. One of the largest auto parts organizations in Canada is Magna International. Its co-founder, Mr. Antoine Capka, resigned about three years ago, and went off with a group of other private sector entrepreneurs to develop an idea to build a small town. Eighty per cent of it was to be composed of affordable shelter. What I mean by affordable is ranging anywhere from $120,000 to $140,000.

They hired the former minister of education, Bette Stephenson, to head a group to set up an environmental college. It was kind of a dream situation. They invested $25 million of their own money. They got land that was declared surplus passed by agricultural experts. The conservation authority said that it was not causing any problems in terms of the environment or the ecosystem, et cetera.

This was a project that would have created about 17,000 jobs over a period of four years.

Just this Friday past, the minister of municipal affairs for the province of Ontario wrote a letter to the principals saying they would never approve this project. They literally shut it down. They shut it down without hearing a full proposal. I can tell you from personal experience, I have tried to call the premier. I have faxed the premier. I have written to ministers in the province in a very high-road, constructive way saying this project is three times the size of de Havilland for four years, not to mention the social benefits of the college, et cetera.

I tried to communicate the importance of this to the premier and his ministers in the province of Ontario and I got nowhere. The member was making remarks earlier about the province of Ontario and their need for jobs. What do I have to do in order to bring a project like this to the province of Ontario so we can put Canadians back to work, get affordable shelter, not to mention the light industry that was planned for the project?

Regretfully, Mr. Capka, who had this dream and was really one of the brains behind Magna, died two weeks ago of a massive heart attack, God rest his soul. I believe one of the reasons he died was because of the pressure and the frustration of dealing with layers and layers of bureaucracy. When you believe you have a vision or a dream, somehow the bureaucratic process can really strangle you.

My question to the member is: How do we communicate good ideas that will create jobs to the NDP leadership in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about this specific project, so I am not going to comment either way. Obviously the member has already done part of that marketing by standing up in the House and asking me that question. That is really what you have to do. The reality is that there are a lot of ideas out there and they have to get through to the people who are in charge.

I have found that the current Government of Ontario is much different than the previous Liberal government in that ideas have to be proven. They have to go through a process, as opposed to what I am told happened in the past. Then if you convinced the premier, he would order it done without thinking it through. I know of a couple of incidences of that.

I can tell you though, regardless of the one matter that the hon. member raised, that I have at least two examples of where the government worked hand in hand with business and labour in two plants in the community of Atikokan. There was some inventive financing that did not require large amounts of money from the province or the federal government. In fact, the federal government basically ignored us. Those plants, Proboard and Atikokan Forest Products, are running again, putting a community that had an 80 per cent unemployment rate back in operation.

So there are successes. There are ones that we wonder about.

An hon. member: How do you get through?

Mr. Angus: How do you get through? You keep knocking on the door. You do not give up.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional conference just completed in Montreal came to the conclusion that economic union in Canada could be put in place only with guarantees of social equity among the provinces. Equalization payments were attempts by previous administrations in Canada to establish at least some level of social equity among the provinces.

I wonder if the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan would comment on the effect of this bill on social equity, and on the possibility of economic union in Canada if this bill comes into effect.

• (1640)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for the question.

What the people in that conference were saying is that they wanted mechanisms to protect them and provinces from arbitrary decisions by the federal government to erode the fabric of the programs that we hold dear, whether they are health care, transfers for education or any of the other programs.

They want a social charter as a means of doing that. There may be other solutions but that is the one they focused on and they felt, as I understand the reports, that you cannot have an economic union without a social union; there has to be a balance. Certainly in the European Community a social charter has been a large part of not only its negotiations but of its agreements to protect the people in each of the member states.

That is really all we want in Canada, some kind of protection so that the government of the day, no matter what its stripe, cannot arbitrarily remove or reduce some of their services.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member about Bob Rae's relationship with business in Ontario. It is clear that Bob Rae has totally turned off business. One of the reasons is that just a few moments ago he said that if a project had to be undertaken in the province of Ontario under the previous Liberal administration, all you had to do was get the premier's okay and consent.

Today if you want to get anything done, you have to get the consent of the union bosses in Ontario.

I would like to ask him whether he agrees with what is happening in the province of Ontario in which labour and Bob Rae have totally turned off business. Would he not agree that type of antagonism toward the business community in Ontario has had the effect of destroying opportunities to create employment in the province of Ontario? It has scared off investors and the people he purports to act for, the average workers in Ontario, are suffering because of that cosy relationship between Bob Rae and the union bosses in Ontario.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is taking the mythology promoted by the major media in Ontario. I have been at meetings with Bob Mackenzie, the minister of labour, as he sat across the table from the Chamber of Commerce folks and other ministers. It is a very frank but not confrontational relationship. People are investing in Ontario. People are staying in Ontario and if you look at the leaked report of the premier's council, you see that we are more than competitive. We are doing very well.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before continuing the debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa West—The Royal Canadian Mint; the hon. member for Cardigan—Ferry Service; the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants—The Constitution; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Foreign Trade; and the hon. member for Surrey North—Cigarettes.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take advantage of the opportunity to speak on Bill C-32, the limitation on the Canada Assistance Program being proposed by the national government. I come from a part of Canada that looks at this so-called restraint on the three wealthiest provinces of Canada, Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia, with not the slightest degree of understanding or sympathy.

The people of Newfoundland, and I suspect the people who come from the so-called poor parts of this country, now more than ever before want their elected representatives, be they in the national parliament, be they in the legislatures, or at any level, to stand and be heard to oppose this bill which will limit the amount of money that the federal government will contribute under what was heretofore a 50/50 cost-shared program for social service purposes or welfare purposes in the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

Who has been singled out for fiscal restraint in those provinces? Whether you are poor in P.E.I. or whether you are poor in Toronto, a poor Canadian, no matter where he or she lives, should expect from their national government exactly the same kind of proposed level of treatment. Somehow this government has got in its head the warped concept that it is better to be poor—or easier to be poor—in some provinces than in some others.

The people in the province where I come from, the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, know that is nonsense. Those who come home from Ontario or come home from Alberta, and many have come home because of the downturn in the economy, know it is easier—if you have got to be poor, God forbid—to be poor where you can still plant, in rural communities, a few vegetables; to be poor where you can still go out, hopefully, and share in a few fish, although there are not many left; to be poor, hopefully, where you can still go out and share in the moose that was taken down by a brother or cousin.

This warped concept that it is okay to limit, to pick on poor people in so-called rich provinces, is really the latest manifestation of the, may I suggest with great respect, warped mentality that emanates from those who offer this policy opposite. Who are we picking on if we stand as members and support this bill? I notice that many members choose not to speak, choose not to stand and support this bill. Many of them plan to vote for it. When the time comes to say aye or nay, they will be there to say "Aye, aye, I support the bill". They are Conservative members of Parliament, but they do not dare to stand in their place and speak for this bill, defend this bill, explain this bill, propose this bill. Why? Because who are we picking on? We are picking on single parent families, mentally and physically challenged people, the aged, children in care or in institutions who are in need of protection because of abuse or neglect, the unemployed, families and individuals who live in crisis and seek crisis assistance, low income workers, battered women.

We are not reducing a payment to provinces. We are not picking on—who is the provincial treasurer in Ontario?

An hon. member: Laughren.

Mr. Tobin: Laughren, Floyd Laughren. He has logged an awful lot of additional unemployment lately in Ontario under his stewardship. We are not picking on Floyd with this bill. We are not picking on the treasurer of Alberta or the new minister of finance in the province of British Columbia. This is not a case of a government putting the financial boots to another government or governments.

This is not simply a question of a paper transfer across governmental institutions. These are people of flesh and blood and they are the poorest people in our country. They are the people least able to make their voice heard. They are the people, because a lack of will and resolve on the part of governments and parliamentarians, whose voices in many instances result in the sound of silence. They are among the weakest, politically and economically, in our society and they are the last people we should ask to bear the burden of a recession. They are the first to be affected by a downturn in the economy, the last to recover from a downturn in the economy and they should be the last people we ask to bear the burden of government restraint measures.

What is going on is morally wrong.

• (1650)

This bill, Bill C-32, is morally wrong. I come from Newfoundland and I know that if I stay silent in Newfoundland as these punitive measures are imposed upon the weakest members of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta society, when the axe comes for those who live in Newfoundland there will be nobody left to stand and speak.

This is not an ideological issue. It should not be a question of right wing thinking versus left wing thinking. There is no purity here. Nobody has a monopoly on a moral issue. This is really about how Canadians define themselves. This is really about what kind of country Canada is going to be. This government has challenged many of the basic tenets of the social contract that we have negotiated between ourselves over 125 years. It is the contract in which no matter whether you come from Newfoundland, Quebec, British Columbia, Ontario or New Brunswick, there are some things we hold in common.

There are many ways in which we are different across the provinces. We have different languages, different culture backgrounds, different ethnic groups, different economies—some are seasonal, some are manufacturing and some are resource based—different weather, but there are some values that we hold in common. Those values have always been defined by our institutions and by the participation of our national government.

There is only one national government. There are 10 provincial governments and territorial governments, but only one national government capable of giving some national leadership and national programs, capable of providing national standards that Canadians no matter where they live will find in common. When the national government withdraws from those programs, we turn the country into a social and political tower of Babylon in which we hold nothing in common.

Bill C-32 is the latest manifestation of a program of national deinstitutionlization, national destruction, that has been undertaken by this party for the last seven or eight years. Take any small community in Newfoundland or any small community in any part of this country where once the federal flag, the flag of Canada, flew over a post office, the flag is no more and neither is the post office.

In many parts of this country where once VIA Rail pulled up, stopped and picked up people in rural and isolated communities and allowed them to move around this country, particularly the aged and students, there are no more trains. They are gone. Where once people could look forward to services sometimes in a small hospital or in a medical clinic, because of the medicare program and transfers, because of a different set of cuts—the transfer payments have been cut—and because of the millions that have been cut unilaterally by this government, many of those medical facilities or institutions are now gone. Urban centres are more crowded than they used to be.

At one time a bright young Canadian, no matter where he or she lived, if they had the brains, the will-power and the get-up-and-go to grab themselves by their bootstraps and to go out and seek their future in this country, they could do that. At one time they could feel that no matter what their circumstance, no matter what their background, no matter what their family income, if they had the get-up-and-go they could find access to good quality education.

Today, the worst position you could be in if you want to succeed from an education point of view is to be a middle-income Canadian. Your parents make too much to allow you to qualify for student assistance and they probably do not make enough to pay your way, so you are shafted. That equality of citizenship is now gone in this country.

Unemployment insurance, tack that under Bill C-21. It is another dismantling of another national social net, a safety valve. Bill C-32 is not an aberration. It is not an accident. This did not happen by accident. This was not a bill put forward that somebody had not thought through and suddenly said: "Oh my goodness, look what we are doing. It was not our intent to dismantle this country, to tear up the contract that has been negotiated across and among citizens and across provinces, to remove, to withdraw the national government from the fabric of our national life, to sever the threads that hold this patch quilt called Canada together". It was not by accident, it was by design. Bill C-32 is the latest example of that mad design.

Frankly I found it quite amusing in recent months to see the national government dedicate so much of its energy to resolving the constitutional crisis, the "unity crisis in this country", spending millions sponsoring conferences, hiring all kinds of commissions and experts, holding public forums, looking for that hard to find solution to our unity crisis.

Has the government not understood that one of the reasons the will to live together, one of the reasons the joy of being Canadian has disappeared from this country is that it has manoeuvred for many Canadians their government, their country, their sense of sharing in a dream, an opportunity as well as difficulty. They have withdrawn that from people's lives and Bill C-32 is the latest example of that.

I began by saying that I come from the province of Newfoundland. I hasten to say that I am first and foremost and always a Canadian. I am proud to be a Canadian. I am proud to share in this nation's prosperity. I am proud to share in its opportunity and I am prepared to carry my share of the burden of its difficulties when difficulty comes.

That is why I cannot accept this concept that somehow it is okay to say to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia that they are "wealthy provinces and we are going to limit the federal government's contribution to social programs, welfare programs to those wealthy provinces. But we are not going to touch you in Newfoundland, so do not worry. It is not your business. It is not your issue. It is not your fight".

I am a Canadian. Newfoundlanders regard themselves in the overwhelming majority, first and foremost, as Canadians. Anything that touches their fellow Canadians, that negatively penalizes their fellow Canadians and in particular those Canadians who are least able to help themselves, affects Newfoundland.

Therefore, I can say with authority, on behalf of the people of my province, that we reject this bill. We challenge members opposite to stand and defend it or to withdraw it.

Nobody knows better than Newfoundlanders this past winter how tough times are in Canada. Nobody knows better than Newfoundlanders this winter that governments are being forced to make hard choices. I have been in communities this winter where the fishery failed this past summer. I went to a meeting at a house and when I went into the house I discovered that the next door neighbours had closed their house down, drained their water lines and moved in to stay with their neighbour because it was cheaper for two families to live in one house than to live in two separate houses. That is the reality of life in some rural Newfoundland communities.

That is the reality in St. Julien's on the great northern peninsula. That was the reality for two families I visited a month ago in the community of Croque. Times are tough, but I did not hear one person say to me that the solution to the problems and the desperation and the human misery and suffering in St. Julien's or in Croque or in St. Anthony or in White Bay or in the Baie Verte Peninsula or in the Bay of Islands, all of them having had a devastating failure in the fishery, that their solution could be found in visiting additional misery upon the poorest of the poor in the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

The issue here is not dollars and cents. The issue here is not the making of budgets or fiscal integrity. The issue here is a moral issue; it has nothing to do with political ideology. This is not another issue for the ideological battleground between right and left; this is a moral issue.

I would call upon my colleagues, particularly those opposite who contemplate supporting this measure, to examine their hearts and souls and their consciences in this great Canadian winter of discontent, to think about some of the people they met during the last six weeks when we all went back to our constituencies. I hope members were out talking to people. It is not pleasant. I have been here 12 years—that is not long compared to some of my colleagues—but this is the most difficult winter I have seen. It has never been tougher. Misery has never been easier to find, never been harder to escape.

I hope that members will examine their conscience, and I know they will, will speak within their caucus and will convince the government in the current circumstances, in the current bitter recession that Canada is experiencing, the current unity crisis that this country is feeling, that this will not bring our country together. This does not represent justice for anybody. This is not a way to resolve our fiscal problems. This is not how we should balance the books, on the backs of those who can least afford it.

I hope members opposite will see this bill withdrawn. If the government insists on proposing it, putting it, I hope they will find the courage to stand and vote against it.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on Bill C-32 at second reading and I was hoping that by this stage the government would have come to its senses. I hope that government members had the opportunity to go around their ridings and contiguous ridings to theirs and speak to the people affected by the legislation about the direction that this government has carried this country over the past years since it was elected in 1984. Perhaps they also spoke to them about the tumble that we have taken since 1988, since the institution of the free trade agreement, the goods and services tax, the clawback, the unemployment insurance bills. The attack on ordinary Canadians goes on and on and on.

I was hoping that members opposite would have realized the folly of pursuing the course that they have plotted, the course that is shown so clearly as set out in Bill C-32 and the bill prior to that, Bill C-69. Bill C-69 was the coupling, the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan to the 5 per cent level and the cutbacks in the Established Programs Financing to post-secondary education and health care. These went hand in hand. Now they have been separated and Bill C-32 is the continuation of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan for a further two years.

It has been properly pointed out by the last speaker from Newfoundland that while it supposedly hits the so-called rich provinces of Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia, the point here is not whether it is a have or have-not province, it is the stark fact that what they are doing is once again hitting out at the poor, those who have been impoverished over a period of time, many of them over the last little while. When I talk about the free trade agreement and some of the legislation, there appears to be a constant eroding of our social programs, a constant eroding of the direction that this country has taken over the 125 years since the BNA Act was signed in 1987. I would suggest it is a direction that we in Canada have taken for granted, that we have been proud of as a country. We look at our neighbours to the south and say: "We have come a different direction. We are a different people. We have things within our country, legislation that very clearly makes us stand out, programs that you people look forward perhaps one day in being lucky enough to have".

I have watched rather disheartened by the erosion of all of what I have seen happening over the last while. Bill C-32 is not necessarily an attack on the wealthier provinces, or those provinces that pay more in equalization payments, it is an attack on the people within those provinces.

The fact that they have larger populations, that they have better incomes, does not take away from the fact that they are provinces to which people migrate from other provinces. If we look at the migration between provinces, we see that some of the poorer provinces, in spite of the people not wanting to leave, they are forced to leave. Where do they go? They go to the provinces where they might have the opportunity of finding jobs.

This summer I picked up a person hitchhiking along the road from Newfoundland. He was working in my constituency as a fruit picker. His message was clear: "I'm a Newfoundlander. I love my province but this federal government hasn't done anything to help me get a job and ensure that I can live in my home province, the province that I love. I have to leave the province and look for work. The only work that I can find at this time to keep any food on the table is to pick fruit", an occupation totally foreign to a person coming from Newfoundland. He liked it in British Columbia but he wanted to be home. He wanted to be near his family. He wanted to be in the province where he was brought up. Because of the policies of this government, he had to move from the east coast to the west coast and take a job that was at best seasonal.

Because of the new regulations set out in the Unemployment Insurance Act he would have to work a greater number of weeks for a smaller amount of benefit. He was not sure that he would be able to get an adequate amount of time in fruit picking and other odd jobs throughout the Okanagan to get unemployment insurance.

Where does he turn if he cannot get unemployment insurance or if his unemployment insurance runs out, which it is assured to do before he is able to get another job? He turns in our province of British Columbia to the Ministry of Social Services and Housing. He certainly was a man of some pride and did not like to have what he called a handout. He was used to making it on his own. Yet, this government has forced him to go hat in hand to the government and admit that he cannot make it on his own. It is not a nice prospect for anybody.

What is happening through Bill C-32? I have talked about the migration from other provinces and certainly to the province of British Columbia where the weather is known to be good. In the summertime we have fruit-picking jobs, transient jobs that one can pick up. It encourages those from other provinces who cannot get work to move into provinces where perhaps the winters are a little less severe than in some other areas, where they have the opportunity of picking up jobs and getting a little bit more money for themselves.

However, when they ultimately have to turn to the welfare rolls it substantially adds to the cost and the problems of the provincial governments. They have the choice of adding to the pot and thereby increasing their deficits. We are seeing that happen in many provinces as the welfare rolls go up because of the inability of people either to get unemployment insurance or stay on unemployment insurance for the longer period of time that is required between having a seasonal job or cutting back the benefits. It is not a nice position to be in.

I suggest that what the government is doing, through its policies under Bill C-32, is attacking the very fibre that we have come to know and love in Canada.

I wonder, if I go back to the start of the free trade agreement, how this ties in. I look with some scepticism when the government says: "We are streamlining. We have to cut back". I look at what happened during the election in 1988. At that stage, the government essentially turned its back on the fact that it was running deficits each year. It turned its back on the fact that it had a major national debt to deal with and said: "Our problem is that we have to be competitive on the open market, and the free trade agreement will open up these broad horizons and these markets".

After that the government brought in the legislation in conformity, I would suggest, with some of the things set out in the free trade agreement. It predicted, in some of the arguments made, the cutbacks in unemployment insurance, the lengthening of the time it took to qualify, and the shortening of the period of time it took to get unemployment insurance. Although it promised more money for training because of the jobs that it agreed would be lost as a result of this agreement, that money was never forthcoming. In spite of the promises it made as it made the changes, it turned its back on the retraining of some of the very people it is now affecting by Bill C-32.

The clawback on Old Age Security and Canada pension was an attack on universality. It was the first step in the erosion of these programs, the deindexation of these pensions, the requirement of those above a certain level to pay back what has been paid out to them under the guise that "no, we are not attacking universality. These programs are still universal. Everybody gets them, but we are going to take that money back at the end of the period of time. It is different. It is like a tax". Nonsense. It was the first step in the total erosion of Old Age Security. It was the first step in cutting out family allowances to all people, not just those who were better off. That will be accomplished by the deindexation of those particular programs.

When we looked at the goods and services tax, the arguments made were endless. Some 85 per cent of the people in the country were against the goods and services tax. Yet, would this government listen? No. Once again it turned its back on the people. It closed its ears to what the people were saying and said: "We know what is best for the people of this country. Regardless of what they want, we are going to institute this tax because it will make us more competitive".

Tell one million impoverished children that the goods and services tax and the policies of this government have helped them. Tell those millions of people on the unemployment rolls that the policies of this government have helped them. Tell those millions of people on social assistance that the policies of this government have helped them. Tell them that the free trade agreement has given them those manufacturing jobs they used to have. Tell them that those jobs which are fleeing south are going to come back when we get out of this recession which I suggest is much deeper than this government has or will admit.

The government was told, prior to the institution of the goods and services tax, that a major downturn in the economy was coming and would hit in the fall of 1990 and early 1991. It was not until well into 1991 that the minister finally admitted that we were in recessionary times. The Conference Board of Canada and the treasurer of the Alberta government warned the government that the ramifications of the goods and services tax would be far-reaching and the implications massive for the people of this country.

Unfortunately those words are ringing true now. We have and are in a major recession. We have millions of people out of work. In my area in the Okanagan alone we have never been below the 10 per cent mark. We are always well above the national average on unemployment.

My riding which lies on the border with the United States is affected in a major way, and particularly since the advent of the goods and services tax, with cross-border shopping. People have been chased out of their own country to look where they feel they can get goods and services more cheaply. And the exodus is massive.

I spoke to a young gentleman who had worked some 11 years for a dairy company. He advised me that as a result of people going across the border to purchase their dairy products eight major full-time jobs were being lost and that there were cutbacks of up to 50 people for that dairy across the province of British Columbia.

This cycle has continued. I look at this government's policies with respect to privatization and centralization of services and I wonder what the thinking is. Are we going to close down the rural areas of our country in the guise of competitiveness? In the city of Penticton a number of federal services are affected directly right now because of this government's policies. The Penticton post office, an historic institution, has just been closed down or will be closed down at the end of this week. We cannot get any assurance from Canada Post that the sorting will continue in Penticton and that its historic cancellation stamp will be retained. There are 12 jobs affected by this move, and Canada Post will not give us the assurance that those 12 jobs will not be affected. It will not give us the assurance that we will have a full service facility. In the guise of competitiveness it appears that it is going to take those positions and move them to a nearby city, probably Kelowna or Kamloops.

Those areas are building and building and building. Little areas like Penticton, Oliver, Osoyoos, Grand Forks, and Merritt need jobs. We are losing jobs across the border on a daily basis. Certainly now is not the time to institute these policies of centralizing government services, of shutting down services in small communities.

I look at the VLA office in Penticton, an area that covers the southern part of not only my riding but also of Kootenay West—Revelstoke and Kootenay East. Its central area office is located in the same building in which I have my office. It has over 20 employees who do a good job for the people of the area. Yet once again rumours abound: Will this be shifted out, will this be moved? Mr. Speaker, over my dead body. We will not put up with a constant erosion of the jobs that are available in our small communities, particularly now.

This bill, while looked at as a belt-tightening bill, is once again one that hurts the poor and the middle class. It is a bill that hits the one million poor I spoke of.

Mr. Speaker, look at the submissions that were made before the committee that studied this bill. It is very clear that the long-term effects on the poor and the poverty stricken are major. The National Council of Welfare has recently reported that social assistance rates are still far below the poverty line—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please, your time is over. On questions or comments, the hon. member for Surrey North.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague's comments. I know before he was elected as a member of Parliament he was a lawyer and did a lot of work in the courts, and I am sure both in juvenile and family court. He is aware that the loss of revenue from this bill in the province of British Columbia will amount to $1.2 billion over the next five years.

Some of the services it will affect are services for children, protection services aimed at the removal, the prevention, the cause and effect of poverty, child neglect, and dependence on public assistance. This would include services like case work, counselling, adoption, homemakers and community development, all of the things that go to protect children, to assist families in functioning better and to deal with family violence.

From the member's experience as a lawyer and working in court, what does he think the impact on services will be with the withdrawal of $1.2 billion over a five-year period? What impact will it have on children and families, from the hon. member's experience?

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I did work in the courts in and around the Okanagan in particular and the boundary country. The areas the member referred to would have touched me directly as I was employed on a contract basis with the province of British Columbia over approximately 11 years. I dealt with protection services, child neglect and family violence on an ongoing basis in the courts. Quite frankly, it frightens me when I think that some of the steps we were slowly getting toward for family protection services, protection of children and battered women, will either stop, slow down or be eroded.

Transfer payments of $1.2 billion over a five-year period of time goes a long way toward assuring the type of protection for many of the families that we saw over the 11 years that I worked with protection services in the province of British Columbia.

The poor and those who are less well off than others are the ones who are hurt directly by Bill C-32. My friend has pointed out a number of areas that I did not hit on that will be directly affected by the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. The argument has been that it is only a 5 per cent cap, but the fact is that there is the migration that I talked about coming in, and the inflationary rate itself eats up almost 5 per cent. Add to it the migration of those coming from other provinces who have to go on social assistance and turn to some of the benefits provided by the protection services that my friend spoke about, and you have a terrible prospect for these people. You must agree that we are going to end up having to give up some of those services that are so desperately needed in these tough times.

Mr. Karpoff: Last fall the government announced, with a great deal of ballyhoo, a program aimed at family violence in which it was going to spend $1.37 million over five years. At the same time it has taken $1.2 billion away from British Columbia and something like $5 billion away from Ontario. What is the reaction that you are getting in the community to a government that on the one hand says it is going to extend services to the tune of $1.3 million, but then takes several billion dollars away from that same program. The reaction I got was that it was hypocritical, deceitful and a sham. What was the reaction in your part of British Columbia at this kind of shim-shamming on programs?

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the member for Surrey North has hit on one of the problems that all politicians end up running into because of what this government has been doing over the last little while. On the one hand it says it believes in something and is going to do a set thing, while on the other hand it picks the pockets of the very people it said it would help originally. He spoke of hypocrisy. Canada signed the ratification of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. The convention itself states that "parties recognize the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development". At the same time, Canada's social assistance rates are being eroded by Bill C-32. We look at Canada, one of the wealthiest nations in the world, with over one million children living in poverty. We are only second to the United States in the level of child poverty in the industrialized world. It is no wonder people are looking at the government in disbelief.

Where is the reality? What is happening? On the one hand the government picks our pockets, and on the other hand it says it is going to put something back in our pockets. Well if it put anything in, it makes sure there is a hole in that pocket so it dribbles back out again.

People have become very sceptical of what this government has to say. The government members continue to say that as politicians they are trying to do the best thing. It is this government's policies, both monetary and fiscal, that have eroded the respect that politicians have had in the past. It is this government's inability to hear the shouts and the cries of the people of Canada that has eroded the respect that politicians have had in the past. It is this government's total attitude toward the people of Canada that has eroded that respect that politicians have traditionally had in the past.

Frankly, with what I have seen here since 1988, I have some difficulty respecting the group over there as a whole. Yet I still recognize that individually each and every one of them cares as dearly as I do for their constituents. They get together in this herd mentality and do things that can only hurt the people of Canada. I ask them to reconsider Bill C-32 and stop it now.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-32 is quite straightforward. It has only one clause, whose purpose is to amend the Canada Assistance Plan. This bill proposes extending, from two years to five, the 5 per cent cap on increases in transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the cap applies only to provinces that do not receive equalization payments, and I am referring to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta.

This is a very important bill, Mr. Speaker. Since it affects the very source of our social programs, it will raise a great national debate on the whole subject of social charters, social rights and social services. This worries me, Mr. Speaker, because in the past few years, we have seen a great economic debate on government proposals aimed at restoring the objectives of the political right, in other words, at making the economy less subject to government intervention and more dependent on the private sector.

I have no objection to a mixed economy, Mr. Speaker, because it is part of our system. We are used to that. However, we have a government obsessed by deregulation, free trade and taxation. Remember, we have had at least 32 tax increases from this government since it came to power in 1984. What I find truly appalling, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that so far in this debate on third reading, only one member rose on behalf of government, a minister who spoke for 17 minutes, and that was it. Not a single government member rose to justify the decision made by their government, their political leaders who today are supported by only 10 to 12 per cent of Canadians. And now, without a national debate, without a parliamentary debate, on third reading the Conservative members will rise and vote, that I am sure, to support the government's proposal. That is the kind of silence I do not understand. It is a shameful silence! I urge Conservative members to rise in the House and say why they support this legislation on third reading.

Mr. Speaker, this worries me because I feel, in fact I know, that after what happened in Montreal on the weekend, the debate on social programs will be led by the experts, and this is the government's first initiative. It will impose on Canadians a decision made by 10 to 12 per cent of the population, a decision that will have a dramatic and even terrifying impact on the quality of life of many Canadians.

[English]

Who does the Canada Assistance Plan help provinces provide assistance and services for? The needy, Mr. Speaker. The CAP makes it possible for those in foster homes to survive, for abused children to get some care, understanding and help.

The CAP helps women in my riding with children, in homes that are called shelters for abused women. I have several in my riding. It is not easy. The people in there are having a hard time, but the CAP program is there to assist. It assists those people who need training programs. It provides essential living services for disabled persons.

In other words, CAP, Canada Assistance Plan, helps those in need. It is a safety net of the last resort which aids close to two million low income Canadians, our poorest citizens. We all know we have close to 1,400,000 unemployed Canadians today in Canada. That is a shame, but we also have 2,200,000 Canadians on social assistance and that is a shame for this country.

What do we do because we care? We put together a safety net. The Canada Assistance Plan is part of that safety net. This government, by the decision of a very few, is cutting the required resources which the poor people of Canada need.

People will argue that the rich provinces of Ontario, B.C. and Alberta, where equalization payments are not paid, should not be getting as much.

I will tell you that in my riding, the poor are poor. If we say the poor people in Ontario, B.C. or Alberta are not entitled to our preoccupations in terms of helping them, we are indeed in a sad state. We are indeed, as my friend today said, in a society with a warped approach to obligations.

I represent the riding of Ottawa—Vanier, and for those of you who do not know, it is not the richest. It has the lowest family income in the national capital region, but we are not ashamed of the fact that we work hard.

• (1740)

We do not have the high income groups because we did not have the systems in place years ago. I could give a whole historical background as to why poverty in my riding was systemic, why people would continue to live in sometimes low-income and sometimes poor conditions. I was brought up in that milieu. I got out of it basically because there was an understanding in this country of helping people who wanted to help themselves.

In Ontario this year alone a cap on CAP, the Canada Assistance Plan, will cost us $1 billion. Half of Canada's poorest people live in my province of Ontario, in British Columbia and in Alberta—half of them. In effect through Bill C-32 the Tory government is abdicating its responsibility to provide assistance to the poorest Canadians. It is transferring that responsibility to provinces and municipalities that must struggle to find ways to make up for their budget short-falls without jeopardizing their programs.

They had nothing to do with creating this made-in-Canada recession which was created and planned by this government following the free trade deal it made with the Americans. It was a set pattern put in place by people who knew what they were doing. We started being in a recession way before the Americans and we will probably get out of it way after they do.

Some people have said it in the House today: Bill C-32 is a bad bill at a bad time. The evidence of Tory negligence is all around us. I have mentioned the 1.4 million unemployed, I mentioned the 2.2 million on welfare and the more than 1 million children in this country living under the poverty line at this time. We could go on and on bringing forth these very sad situations.

In my view and in the view of my colleagues on this side, the government should let this bill die, acknowledge its disastrous effect and forget about it. We will see. It does not want to debate it. We will see what it will do. Its members do not want to debate it, but maybe they will have the guts to sit down in their places and not vote for it. That will defeat the damn thing.

We recently were given a presentation by the premier of Ontario on TV announcing the terrible news in this province. He said that the recession had cost thousands of Ontarians their jobs, more job losses are likely still to come. This recession brought on and worsened by Tory policies has forced the Ontario government to cut the increase in grants this year to hospitals, municipalities, school boards and universities to 1 per cent. In real terms with inflation factored in, this means job losses and a drop in the quality of service that these institutions offer.

This week the Ottawa region, my region, has had reports of cuts in regional and municipal budgets which would affect programs that help the poorest in our communities. The cut in provincial transfers is estimated to cost Ottawa-Carleton people $50 million to $60 million this year alone just to maintain. It is not to improve, but just to maintain the services.

In September last when I spoke on Bill C-32, the economic situation in this region was terrible. Today, it is even worse. Optimists—there are still a few around—predict an economic turnaround will possibly begin half way through this year. This Tory government blindly pursues this legislation to put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan at a time when it is forcing more and more Canadians to turn to such assistance.

I will give some stats on that.

One in ten Ontario residents is out of work. The number of long-term unemployed, those who are unemployed for six months, is expected to exceed 121,000, higher than the 1981-82 recession.

The unemployment rate in Ontario now is 9.7 per cent and not expected to drop below 8 per cent until at least the end of 1995, according to the Ontario treasurer. The number of unemployed in Ontario has risen from 331,000 in 1990 to 506,000 in 1991. Ontario has 40 per cent of the 1,100 manufacturing bankruptcies in Canada during the last year. Ontario corporate pre-tax profits are expected to have a decline of almost 30 per cent in 1991 while retail sales are expected to drop by 7 per cent.

The January 1992 issue of the Canadian Economic Observer shows that business bankruptcies in Ontario increased from 181,128 in October to 362,138 in November, the most recent month for which statistics are available.

I could go on and on and show the economic distress we are in. The staggering statistics have been provided.

I want to end my comments because I know my friend from Thunder Bay—Nipigon wants to make some remarks tonight and I want to give him a chance to get on the debate. On this side, we have a lot of members who want to speak. We are going to have to share our time so that we can all get on. I understand our concerns, but I cannot understand or accept that silence over there. The members of that Tory government fail to want to debate this important bill.

Therefore, in closing, may I just say that to place a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan is to jeopardize its effectiveness, its ability to help the poorest Canadians, wherever they live.

As the National Council on Welfare remarked in its report earlier this year, the Tories are imposing a limit on a program that was designed to be flexible enough to protect those with no other recourse for assistance. The council is also worried that this cap could postpone long overdue reforms to the welfare system to make it work better.

Confidence in this government is low. I can understand that. Everywhere they turn, Canadians witness and experience the painful fallout of Tory government policies.

For this government, the passage of Bill C-32 may be an objective. It may represent another landmark or checkmark for it. For us it is nothing but right wing agenda for the destruction of Canada as we know it. For Canadians, passage of Bill C-32 will be a sad event.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to be able to speak to the House and bring the concerns of the citizens of Thunder Bay—Nipigon with respect to the bill before us, a bill that was called by the minister today a cap on the CAP, the transfer payment to the provinces, that transfer payment being extended to 1995 and into 1996.

As the last speaker of the day, I would like to compliment the debate on this side of the House today and to reflect, not only to the members of this House, since this is our first day back, but to the people of Canada the feelings we are experiencing about the effects this bill will have.

We had speakers from our side from Newfoundland, Broadview—Greenwood, London East, Leeds—Grenville, Parkdale—High Park, Winnipeg North Centre, Edmonton Southeast and just recently the member for Ottawa—Vanier. They truly reflected the condition of the economy of Canada today and the debate also reflects the distress that some people find themselves in because of this capping procedure.

I would also like to comment just for a moment on the speaker who went before me from my sister riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan, and not to leave any impression as to what I heard him say about what was happening in the area I come from, Thunder Bay—Nipigon and particularly northwestern Ontario. There is no question that like everyone else in Canada we in northwestern Ontario and Thunder Bay are suffering. Perhaps it is not as much as some of our brothers and sisters in some of the eastern provinces, and perhaps not as greatly as they are in Alberta and British Columbia. In any event, there is no one in Canada today escaping this harsh reality that we find ourselves in because of the economic process.

Let me correct some of the statements that were made in that speech. We do not allow raw sewage to be discharged into Lake Superior. What we do have in Thunder Bay is a primary sewer treatment plant which has been operating for some 20 or 25 years and the necessity is now upon the municipality of Thunder Bay to put in a secondary treatment facility so that the discharge will be free and clear of any effluents whatsoever. That is a $60 million to $70 million cost which will have to be paid for by the municipal taxpayers and hopefully by some co-operation between the provincial government and the federal government.

The infrastructure program that we heard our leader talk about today would go a long way toward helping the community of Thunder Bay and every other community in this country to take care of those vital services that are so sorely needed I am sure in every community in our country.

We do have one paper mill that has shut down. We do have lay-offs in some of the other paper mills. I am satisfied with the paper mills that we do have in Thunder Bay, one of which is the fine paper mill, Great Lakes Forest Products. It has just completed a $50 million expansion and is producing recycled fibre. It is one of the mills in Canada that is state of the art. I am satisfied that in Domtar Nipigon the union and the company are talking about how it can become more competitive so that it can produce paper and its products and its cartons so that it will be more competitive.

I am satisfied also that the mills in Fort Frances and Dryden that produce fine papers and Provincial Paper which produces fine paper and Thunder Bay Mill which produces newsprint are working toward becoming economically a combination between management and unions working together in order to enhance the community.

I am not at all pessimistic about the future of Thunder Bay. I am optimistic that we have this type of co-operation between the parties involved so that we know what the market is out there. I say with the industriousness and the co-operation of all of the people in Thunder Bay that we will be able to meet the challenges ahead of us.

I am glad the Minister of Agriculture is in the House today. I want to compliment him on behalf of the people of Thunder Bay and to congratulate him for just over the weekend completing a transaction with Mr. Yeltsin to supply 25 million tonnes of wheat to the Russian people over the next five years and for granting the $100 million loan that was necessary for the Russian people to buy this grain.

While the minister is still in the House, I want to remind him once more that the traditional ports where the grain is shipped to the Russian market are usually the port of Thunder Bay and the Don River ports. I would hope he would remember that as he completes all of the further transactions that are going to have to be involved with the shipment of that 25 million tonnes of grain through the port of Thunder Bay. I would be available to advise him if he would accept my help.

We find ourselves in an unfortunate dilemma with this legislation here in Ontario. Twelve months ago the Government of Ontario decided that the best fiscal policy was to buy itself out of the recession. As a result, it originally forecast almost a $10 billion deficit which has now been increased, as I understand it, to about $13 billion or $14 billion. It has changed course and just recently decided that it cannot buy itself out of this recession, so it has come to the federal government to ask for mammoth amounts of money in order to relieve the unemployment situation.

What we find ourselves in, particularly in the province of Ontario, is this unholy alliance between the NDP in Ontario and the Conservative Party, which is trying to put a cap on spending. It truly spells disaster not only for the economy of Ontario but for the country as a whole.

This bill is so contentious, it is so harmful, it is so hurtful, it is so odious that the province of British Columbia, in conjunction with Ontario and Alberta, brought this bill, to cap the allowances that they were allowed, to the Supreme Court of British Columbia. They received a favourable ruling. Eventually this bill went to the Supreme Court of Canada and it said that the decision made in British Columbia was non-operable and the decision was reversed.

Although there was some discussion about that—I am glad the Solicitor General is in the House today—if you read that decision, you will find that what the Supreme Court of Canada was saying to us was that it was not going to interfere in the legislative process of this country. The court listened to the argument but I think the obiter of the case, the reading, the tone of that decision was that legislation is the mandate of this House. If you want to have any spending or any other fiscal responsibility with respect to how that money is spent, it does not come under the guidance of the courts. The courts are there to interpret what is said and this House passes the legislation.

I am very glad that in reading that particular decision that a division between the interpretation of the legislation and the legislation itself that was passed is the proper course that we all must follow.

Through no fault of their own, all too many Canadians have been caught in the grip of a very serious recession. I am often prompted by what we have been hearing on television, recession to all of us who have jobs, but a depression to so many in Canada today who have no jobs. This legislation will, in effect, limit the Canada Assistance Plan and will hurt most of the people in Canada who need it.

Payments to the so-called have provinces will be subject to a ceiling not of two years but, as I said, of five years. This is completely unacceptable.

Canada used to be known as a caring society but no one can help noticing the slide toward a society that imposes an even greater burden on the disadvantaged who are among us.

The focus of the bill under discussion has three targets: the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. These provinces have historically been viewed as the have provinces. I was impressed by the comments of our friend from Newfoundland who said that we can no longer look at the provinces in isolation one to the other. We talk about Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario as the have provinces but we will never be a united country unless we look at all of the provinces, realize the needs of each and every one of them individually and pass legislation in this House that is equal and compatible to all. If anyone is hurting in British Columbia, we should have the same care and compassion for that person, that Canadian, as the person who may be hurting in Newfoundland.

I am satisfied with that kind of a philosophy. With the economic union of Canada we can help all Canadians. We should not be looking at provinces as have provinces and have not provinces.

Close to 50 per cent of Canada's poorest families and 54 per cent of all welfare recipients under the Canada Assistance Plan today live in Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia. The government has decided to cap the Canada Assistance Plan right through to the end of 1995 and assumes that payments will grow in proportion to the increase of the Gross National Product.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, from everything that we have heard in this House today that there is not going to be an increase in the Gross National Product in Canada in 1992, so that cap is not a fictitious cap, it is a real cap, and those figures are set. We on this side of the House will never support legislation that tries to fight the deficit by cutting not only the flesh off the bone but goes to the marrow of the bone itself. It affects every person in need in this country. It affects the essential services for the destitute and those who are truly in distress within our country.

This bill is simply a way for the government to cut a few corners, to shave off a few more dollars. It is unacceptable to the Liberals. Look at who would be affected by the cuts in this act. The list is extensive. First off, in every province, the homes for the aged, the annual contribution made not by the federal government but by the federal government to the province and the province, eventually, down to the municipality.

As we all know, we have a great habit in this country, both provincially and federally, of passing legislation that puts the onus of responsibility for paying for that legislation on to the municipalities, to the real property owners. I do not think there is a municipality around anywhere in this country that can afford any more of those obligations which higher levels of government are forcing them to pay for those services.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time has run out. The House is to adjourn. I understand I will get some time tomorrow morning.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE MINT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the strike at the Royal Canadian Mint in Ottawa and Winnipeg has gone on for far too long. The Minister of Labour took far too long to get involved and to carry out his obligations to support good labour relations in this country.

Employees were on strike over Christmas in some of the worst freezing weather that this city has seen in many years. It was even worse in Winnipeg. They are still on strike today. The demands of the workers are not unreasonable, they are simply asking for the same treatment that their managers at the Mint have already received.

The 1990 profits at the Mint were $10.4 million. That money helped reduce the deficit and produced revenues that benefited taxpayers. These revenues are in jeopardy because of the strike that has been going on for over four months in Winnipeg and two months in Ottawa. The Mint's every day treatment of its managers is costing taxpayers money, paying for free lunches, free parking and free vans to transport them into their place of work. It is costing money by paying for the storage of gold outside of Mint property. It is flying Ottawa managers to Winnipeg and back on a regular basis. This is costing taxpayers money because all of this comes off the profits of the Mint, which reduced borrowing requirements for the Government of Canada last year to the tune of over $10 million.

Every day the Mint strike continues is costing us money, jeopardizing foreign contracts and the quality of products for which Canadians have become known. It is unconscionable that those who are responsible for this situation have given themselves increases of up to 8.5 per cent but refuse more than a 3 per cent increase for the people who produce those revenues for the people of Canada. It is unconscionable that a government that approves full cost of living increases for judges making eight times as much as many of these Mint workers directs the Mint's management to get tough with employees.

Nobody can understand why people earning higher salaries, the managers in this case, can give themselves double increases over what they are prepared to give their employees, especially when the cost goes directly to the taxpayers. These employees are not a drain on the public purse. They are making money for Canada that helps reduce the tax burden and cuts the need for government borrowing, again by over $10 million a year.

All they are asking for is fair treatment. We hope that the strike will be over as of tonight. We plead with the government to please intervene and make sure the quality of production at the Mint is maintained and that people are back to work with a fair salary and fair treatment after the strike is over.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member for Ottawa West to know there have been several developments in this labour dispute since her December 9, 1991 intervention.

The hon. member will be aware that a mediator was appointed to assist the parties on December 13, 1991, following a formal request for mediation assistance from the employer, as the minister mentioned he would do.

The mediator met with the parties December 16 and 17 but there was no agreement forthcoming.

Mediation meetings resumed on January 16, 1991, this time at the request of the union. As the minister mentioned, the representative parties should ask for the mediator to intervene. After three days of intensive negotiations the Mint made an offer which the union agreed to put to a vote of the union membership on January 20. The offer was rejected by the union membership and the work stoppage is continuing.

The parties subsequently met directly on January 24 and 25 but unfortunately their discussions did not lead to an agreement.

As a result of further discussions the union membership is to vote this evening on a further management proposal. We understand the union bargaining committee will recommend acceptance of the proposal to the union membership and if ratified all bargaining unit members in Winnipeg and Ottawa would be recalled to return; in Winnipeg, within 48 hours and in Ottawa within the next two or three days.

We want to thank the member for her interest. Certainly we are interested in seeing an end to this work stoppage in the very near future.

FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to bring up the concerns of my constituents before the House. The issue today arose from a question I asked the Minister of State for Transport last October concerning the Wood Islands ferry service in my riding. This is a very important link to the mainland and I would like to give the House a little more information on the issue.

In May 1988 the then Minister of Transport flew to Prince Edward Island to announce that a new ferry would be built for the Wood Islands–Caribou crossing, and that the ferry would be in place for 1990. However, it seems that as soon as P.E.I. sent four Liberal MPs to Ottawa the government started dragging its feet.

After I sent numerous letters to three Ministers of Transport, the government finally awarded a contract for a new ferry to be delivered only three years behind schedule. In late September the Minister of Transport responded to a letter I wrote raising certain questions about the impact the fixed link would have on the Wood Islands ferry service. Specifically I asked that there be no reduction in the operating subsidy for the service and that the government give a permanent commitment for the continuation of the ferry service.

In his letter the minister said, and I quote: "I am unable to make a permanent commitment for the continuation of the Wood Islands—Caribou ferry service". He went on to say that no hasty decisions would be made. In that context I asked the Minister of State for Transport for an assurance for a permanent ferry service from Wood Islands, P.E.I. In her answer the minister said: "I would not make a permanent promise of this. I promise to look into it".

Simply put, promises to look into it are not good enough. The government should not be looking into it at all. The government should come clean and give the people of Prince Edward Island and the people of Cardigan the guarantees they need in order to plan the financial future for eastern Prince Edward Island. How can people plan businesses that require transportation services when the government will not say if the service will be there in 10 years' time?

We are at a crossroads in P.E.I. right now. The government has accepted three proposals for the construction of the fixed link. After Public Works does a cost analysis and accepts a bidder, construction on the fixed link will begin. The Government of P.E.I. has stated clearly that it has 10 conditions that must be met before the final approval of this project is given.

Before the federal government awards a contract I think there are at least three requirements that must be met. The Wood Islands—Caribou ferry services must be maintained and updated, which means there will be no decrease in the operating subsidy.

Fishermen must be duly compensated for any loss caused by the construction and the operation of the fixed link. The federal government must ensure that the over–all environmental impact will be kept to a minimum.

These are my concerns as the member of Parliament for Cardigan. When the minister answered my question in October the response was unsatisfactory. I hope the response from the government this time will go further to ease the concerns of my constituents and give us some assurance that we will have a connection with the mainland.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the ferry service between Wood Islands, P.E.I. and Caribou, Nova Scotia has been operated by Northumberland Ferries Limited during the ice-free season between May and December for about 50 years now.

The operation of the ferry service is subsidized by the federal government because it recognizes that the service is an important alternative to the service required under the Constitution that is operated by Marine Atlantic Inc. between Borden, Prince Edward Island and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick. The Government of Canada clearly recognizes the importance of the Wood Islands—Caribou ferry service to the economy of the eastern part of the Island.

The federal subsidy for 1991-1992 will be in the range of $7.5 million. In addition, as the member has just noted, the federal government has awarded a contract valued at close to $43 million to Pictou Industries Ltd. to construct a new 200-car ferry for the service.

Funding has also been provided and work has begun on the redevelopment and modification of the related terminal facilities. The need for this investment was justified on the basis of traffic congestion during the peak summer period and the age of the existing ships.

The level of service offered is a reflection of the demand. Northumberland Ferries Ltd. provides over 7,000 single crossings per year, 2,000 more each year than there were 10 years ago. A service in the future will continue to be reviewed and adjusted based on the traffic needs.

The federal government is not presently considering any modification to the Wood Islands—Caribou service because of a fixed link. It would not, however, be appropriate for a fiscally responsible government to make any unconditional government commitment to subsidize the service in perpetuity before the actual impact of a fixed link on the ferry's traffic can be seen.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, on December 3, 1991, last year, I asked the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs about the apparent flip-flop of the government on the question of a national referendum on the Constitution. The minister replied at that time and suggested that regardless of all the conversation and conflict in the newspapers about where the government stood on the national referendum, in time the government would be prepared to have a mechanism of consultation with Canadians.

That was in December. We have had the Christmas recess and there has not been a member home listening to constituents and taking the pulse of his people who has not come back to this House knowing that while the Constitution is very fundamental, the question of any constitution at the moment is sort of in a state of paralysis. The public at large is stunned with the smorgasbord of constitutional committees, constitutional consultations, constitutional reports, constitutional conferences, studies, et cetera. The public at large is more preoccupied with the economy and really is not all that happy about anything regarding the Constitution.

We as parliamentarians have to address that because there are certain constitutional clocks ticking. It is only because of this parliamentary procedure that we have where you get an answer to a question and then the member who asked the question has four minutes to elaborate, and then there is supposedly a two-minute response, that you can even have this procedure. In the six minutes allowed, you obviously cannot get into the debate on the detail of all the rights and wrongs of constitutions, let alone the problems with a referendum.

Even though this is the cosy winter of Canada coast to coast, and certainly where I come from we are still dug into a large snowdrift, the people have time to watch TV, and are very much aware that 1992 is the year that is a sort of "high noon" for constitutional decisions. This government is going to have to give effective national leadership—not leadership in regions, but national leadership—on all constitutional questions, including the question of the referendum.

Old Shakespeare said somewhere in one of his plays that the question was "to be or not to be". The time for Canadians to wonder what this government stands for on the fundamental question of a referendum is over, and it is "to be" or at least the mechanism. It has to be either a referendum or, I would suggest, even an election. I know there are a good many sincere people, many good colleagues of ours, who are studying this in a more exhaustive way before the parliamentary committee now. They will be coming in with their report toward the latter part of February, and that is really when "high noon" is going to start to take a focus.

In the few seconds left to me, I would suggest to the government that it get its act in order. It must give some attention and priority to the economy so that Canadians from coast to coast appreciate, as we have up until now, our social programs, especially the medicare program, which as a benefit is part of our heritage. I am not going to get into that because I do not have the time for social charters, and I have some real questions as a lawyer about constitutionalizing social charters. But certainly in a pragmatic way we can accentuate the positive in this country from coast to coast. One of the positives has been our social net and our social programs for Canadians who cannot help themselves, and even for all Canadians to have the benefit of a medicare program which came in while I was a member. There were even members in the House then who thought there should not be a medical program. The then premier of Ontario, Premier Robarts, said they would never go ahead with it, and they did because members decided medicare was something for Canada.

I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that in coming to the finality of a constitution—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time is over.

[Translation]

The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs has two minutes.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I realize that my colleague has many questions. I probably cannot answer all his questions, but I know his concern about the referendum.

Mr. Speaker, it is here in this House of Commons that we will have to work to find a solution. The minister is certainly not ruling out any consultation procedure, as was stated in the Speech from the Throne. We promised to ensure that Canadians could take a more active part in constitutional development. The minister answered at the time that one of the ways that the government was still considering to fulfil its commitment made in the Speech from the Throne was to hold a referendum, but the decision is far from being made.

My colleague mentioned the social charter and so on—the public consultations now going on open new horizons for us and suggest new approaches. A consultation was held in Montreal on the weekend as part of the five major constitutional conferences; another one will be held in Toronto next weekend and finally one in Vancouver. This was preceded by the Spicer commission which everyone has heard about. We did not hear only negative things during that commission—on the contrary. There was the Beaudoin-Edwards committee; now there is the Dobbie-Beaudoin committee. Mr. Speaker, all this will lead us to make a decision; it will not be decided in a referendum but here in the House of Commons.

Some Canadians have put us on notice. Bill Davis, Allan Blakeney and Maurice Sauvé have warned us against deciding on the method of consultation too quickly. I repeat what Maurice Sauvé said:

[English]

"Everywhere in this country people expect Parliament to come up with a solution. They want members of Parliament to assume their responsibility. It is yours. You are representing all of Canada, all of it. Nobody can replace you. You can have constituent assemblies. You can have all sorts of other forums. It is you who has the responsibility. Because of this you must come up with a package supported by everyone".

[Translation]

We must take action that will unify Canada and lead to reconciliation.

TRADE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am rising tonight to follow up on a question I put to the Deputy Prime Minister back on October 3 on a very important issue, the softwood lumber tariff issue that has an impact on virtually all of Canada and the many communities throughout the country dependent on the forest industry. This question relates to the ongoing trade dispute with the United States over our softwood lumber exports to the U.S. and the American allegation that we unfairly subsidize our lumber exports and that it is causing injury to the American lumber export market in the United States.

My question was really twofold back in October. The first question was: Given that the government, albeit late and at the cost of thousands of jobs, was slow to respond in getting Canada out of the softwood lumber tariff, we have done that and we are now in a long process of hearing back from the Americans on just what their decision is going to be on this issue.

We already had one ruling in December that was against Canada. The second ruling which has been delayed now until February 25 will be important as well. This process will go on until May.

The first part of my question is related to assurances from this government that it will be aggressive in protecting Canada's sovereignty in our forests.

The second part of the question is related to legislation that was actually brought in by this government to implement this tariff. It was a question about the Softwood Lumber Products Act and what the intention of the government was on this legislation, if it was needed and if it was going to be continued. I think the point is that Canadians, particularly those who live in communities and work in the forest industry, need to see a definitive and aggressive response from this government to protect our interests and to ensure that the Americans do not walk all over us.

We do not want a situation again like the one that happened in 1986 when this government and its friends in British Columbia, the then Social Credit government, basically sold out our forests. I hope to hear from the government tonight that it will be aggressive in defending our forests and to have some indication from the government as to what it intends to do with the Softwood Lumber Products Act.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade noted in the House on December 3, 1991, the government's priority has been and will continue to be to develop in close co-operation with the provinces and the industry the best possible defence against the U.S. subsidy allegations.

There is no subsidy for Canadian softwood lumber. A GATT panel has been established to confirm our view that stumpage does not constitute a countervailable subsidy to Canadian lumber producers. The panel has also been asked to confirm that the United States did not live up to its international obligations when it self-initiated the investigation and imposed a bonding requirement on Canadian lumber exports.

Finally, we have asked the panel to determine that log exports controls do not confer a countervailable benefit under international trade rules.

With respect to the repeal of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, the government intends to repeal the legislation as soon as possible. All provinces are being zero-rated retroactively to October 4, 1991. We expect that the act will be repealed in its entirety within weeks.

With respect to questions posed by the United States, a number of questions were raised in the course of consultations which took place following our decision to terminate the softwood lumber memorandum of understanding. Much of the information contained in the response to those questions was provided by various provincial governments. We would have to seek the permission of those provinces to release this information.

I conclude by restating the government's commitment to fighting and winning this case and to reiterate our confidence that Canada-U.S. lumber trade will be put back on a normal basis. We will continue to work closely with the provinces, including the province of British Columbia, and the industry toward winning this case.

I would also remind the members of the House that the results of this action will be subject to binding binational panel review under the free trade agreement. This option was not available to Canada in the 1986 countervailing duty investigation before the free trade agreement.

CIGARETTES

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I wish to follow up on a question I asked at the end of November concerning the export of Canadian cigarettes and the smuggling back of those cigarettes into Canada.

The RCMP has estimated that it is now a $500 million business. In the first nine months of last year the export of Canadian cigarettes has doubled. Most of these are being smuggled back into Canada, partially by organized crime.

The export price on cigarettes is about $14. The retail price in Canada for the same carton of cigarettes is in excess of $40.

Canada has been one of the most successful countries in the world at reducing tobacco consumption. This made tremendous savings to our health care system and saved the lives of a countless number of Canadians. In spite of that, every year 38,000 Canadians die of tobacco related diseases. There is a loophole and that is the low price of cigarettes being exported out of the country and then smuggled back in. The impact is a loss of $350 million in revenue to the government and our health promotion program of reducing tobacco consumption is being undermined.

Myself and other people and organizations including the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Centre for Substance Abuse, and the Canadian Medical Association are calling for an export tax of $10 a carton on tobacco products. This would mean that it would be uneconomical to smuggle those back into Canada to circumvent our health promotion programs and our taxation.

We cannot understand why the government did not plug this loophole immediately. We can only speculate it is because of the influence of its friends in the tobacco industry, including Bill Neville. They are putting tremendous pressure on this government to erode its anti-tobacco campaign. We are anxious that this government not capitulate to the multinational tobacco corporations by not putting on an export tax. I trust the hon. parliamentary secretary will get up and inform the House that there will be an export tax and there will be no reduction of taxes on Canadian cigarettes.

In addition to the export tax, we are asking that labelling be strictly enforced so that it is very obvious when exported cigarettes are brought back into Canada.

It is important for the health of Canadians, for the reduction of government expenditures on health care, that this loophole in its good anti-tobacco campaign be immediately plugged.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. The government is of course aware of representations by certain groups that an export tax be imposed on cigarettes as a means of discouraging smuggling of these products.

This is one of a range of possible approaches to address this problem. The government is addressing this issue through several mechanisms. For example, in 1989, it introduced a number of measures designed to deter the smuggling of tobacco products. These measures included improving the legislative provisions relating to the marking of tobacco packages to identify more clearly tobacco products for the domestic market which are subject to duty and tax and those for export which are not subject to duty and tax.

Mr. Speaker, the penalties imposed under the Excise Act for selling tobacco products on which excise duty and tax have not been paid were also increased substantially at that time. More recently, the Minister of National Revenue has been working with the police authorities concerned in an effort to develop better strategies to counter the problem of cigarette smuggling.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the government has initiated a review of the legislation which imposes excise duties and taxes on tobacco products. One of the key aspects of this review will be to examine whether further steps should be taken to reduce cigarette smuggling. The hon. member may be assured that his representations for imposition of an export tax on cigarettes will be considered in the course of this review.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 17 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply seek your guidance on whether or not the Minister of the Environment should be making a statement as Minister of the Environment in relation to the alarming announcements of the observations of atmospheric decline over the northern hemisphere that were made yesterday, with a 35 per cent decline in the ozone layer. This is extremely alarming, Mr. Speaker. As you know, each 1 per cent decline in the ozone can be accompanied by a 4 per cent increase in skin cancer. I believe there is a responsibility on the Minister of the Environment to indicate to this Chamber and to Canadians exactly what he and the government intends to do about it.

• (1010)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The issue raised by the hon. member is a very important one. However, I think it would be more appropriate to raise it during Oral Question Period this afternoon. When the hon. member wishes to question the Minister of the Environment, he will have an opportunity to do so. I suggest he take advantage of that opportunity.

ASIAN INTERPARLIAMENTARY ORGANIZATION

TABLING OF REPORT OF TWELFTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report on the Twelfth General Assembly of the AIPO, held in Bangkok, Thailand, from November 18 to 23, 1991.

PETITIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents, and I mean a large number of constituents, pages and pages. I have not counted them, but there must be at least a few thousand here.

There is an ongoing concern about what the goods and services tax is doing to them personally, their families, their businesses. They say it is literally the death knell in terms of the local economy in Kamloops. They are asking the government to, for goodness sake, at this last gasp as we begin the new year do the right thing, send some symbol of hope and withdraw this dastardly tax.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another issue, Mr. Speaker, a number of constituents from British Columbia have heard the announcement that a firm is requesting approval to divert the North Thompson River into a variety of channels and eventually down to the Los Angeles area. They are saying to the Canadian government: "Please stand up and say on behalf of Canadians that our rivers are not for sale".

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter unrelated to the previous petitions, a large number of petitioners from Kamloops are concerned about the rumours they hear that the government plans to freeze RCMP funding on an ongoing basis. They want to ensure that law and order is upheld. They are asking the federal government to ensure that the RCMP is adequately funded.

VIOLENT CRIME

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition from a number of people, primarily in the Windsor, Ontario, area. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes which would apply uniformly to all regions of Canada.

This petition has been duly certified by the Clerk of the House.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my petition is from a number of British Columbians living in rural areas who are urging the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service. They are urging the minister to consult with rural communities and those people who live there as to the effects of that kind of deregulation, and they are asking the minister to hold hearings in their communities regarding that matter.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from over a hundred residents of Thunder Bay who are asking the government to reduce the down payment on homes from 10 per cent to 5 per cent, which was done yesterday, and stating that they continue to support the policies of Canada Mortgage and Housing.

TAXATION

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present some petitions from my riding. The petitions are from constituents who continue to urge this government to reconsider its approach to tax reform in this country. Having gone through the Christmas season where the GST has just caused disaster after disaster for small and medium-size businessmen, we now have proof positive that it is not working. They are humbly asking this House to cancel the GST.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Text]

Question No. 127—Mr. Waddell:

> Since July 1, 1990, were there any (a) meetings (b) telephone conversations (c) other communications between the PMO, PCO and FPRO and the Business Council on National Issues on the subject of the Constitution and, if so, (i) what were the dates of these contacts (ii) who took part in the meetings (iii) was there an exchange of documents and, if so, what were they?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Insofar as the Prime Minister's Office, The Privy Council Office and the Federal-Provincial Office are concerned:

As part of its broad strategy of consultation on unity issues outlined in the May 13, 1991 Speech from the Throne, the government has developed a program of ongoing consultations with provincial government and non-governmental organizations. In this context, between July 1 and September 30, 1991, officials involved in the unity process consulted extensively with a wide range of non-governmental groups, such as volunteer organizations; academia; aboriginal groups such as the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada and the Assembly of First Nations; business organizations including the Business Council on National Issues, and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business; and labour organizations, such as the Canadian Labour Congress.

The objective of the consultations with non-governmental groups was to obtain their views on key constitutional issues. In this regard, governmental officials received a variety of speeches and position papers from organizations such as the BCNI and held general discussions with them.

In addition, as part of this ongoing process, a number of these groups, including the BCNI, were provided with copies of the government's Unity Proposals after their release on September 24, 1991.

Question No. 144—Ms. Callbeck:

Since November 1988, has there been any government expenditures to assist individuals, business and industries negatively affected by the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement to adjust to the agreement and, if so, (a) how much money was spent (b) under which programs was the money spent?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by Industry, Science and Technology Canada and Employment and Immigration Canada as follows:

The advice which the government received from the Advisory Council on Adjustment was that no free trade agreement-specific adjustment programs were necessary. The council, made up of labour and business representatives, was established to examine adjustement issues arising from the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement (FTA). It noted that close to 400 programs were already in place and concluded that FTS–specific programs would be "unworkable" since it would be impossible to determine which workers and businesses were affected by the FTA and "unfair" as it would create two classes of workers or firms.

In light of this evidence, the government has continued to use existing programs to facilitate adjustment and foster international competitiveness rather than to create FTA–specific adjustment programs.

Employment and Immigration has long had programs in place to assist individuals, businesses and industries negatively affected by structural adjustments in the Canadian economy.

a) Since 1988, Employment and Immigration has spent approximately $5.2 billion providing training and adjustment assistance to Canadians and their employers.

b) Since November 1988, Employment and Immigration Canada has delivered this training and adjustment assistance through the following programs: Job Development, Job Entry, Skill Shortages, Skill Investment, Community Futures and Industrial Adjustment Service. These costs also include the Developmental Uses of the Unemployment Insurance Program which include Work Sharing (Job Creation), Training (Income Supporty), Training (Course Costs/Supplementary Allowances) and Self–Employment.

Question No. 178—Mr. Blenkarn:

Does the government pay provincial sales taxes and, if so, how many dollars in sales taxes were paid to each province in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Prior to 1991, the federal government had reached agreements with all the provinces, except for Saskatchewan and Alberta, whereby each government agreed to pay the other's sales taxes, or an equivalent amount in lieu of taxes. Alberta had no sales tax, and the government did not pay the provincial sales tax in Saskatchewan. With the coming into force of the GST, new agreements were reached with all the provinces, except for Alberta which still does not have a sales tax, whereby neither order of government would pay the other's sales tax. Please refer to the attached annex for the specific amounts of provincial sales tax paid to each province pursuant to the former agreement from April 1, 1990 to December 31, 1990.

Question No. 180—Mr. Blenkarn:

Does the government pay automobile licence fees to the provinces for federally owned vehicles of all nature operated within a province and, if so, how many dollars in licence fees does the government pay to each of the provinces in the year ending March 31, 1991?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Prior to 1991, the federal government had reached agreements with all the provinces, except for Saskatchewan and Alberta, whereby the federal governments paid an amount in lieu of the automobile licence fees to participating provinces for the federally owned vehicles operated within these provinces. The government did not pay Alberta's and Saskatchewan's licence fees. With the coming into force of the GST, new agreements were reached with all the provinces, except for Alberta, whereby the federal government pays provincial licence fees in each participating province, exept Alberta, it does not pay automobile licence fees in this province. Please refer to the attached annex for the specific amounts of automobile licence fees paid to each province pursuant to these agreements, for the year ending March 31, 1991.

Question No. 181—Mr. Boudria:

With respect to Studio D of the National Film Board (a) since April 1, 1985, what is the total amount of funding for its operation (b) what is the amount of funding spent on production preparation and distribution of films in the "Women and Spirituality" category (c) what was the total amount spent on (i) production (ii) preparing (iii) other costs associated with the production of the film "The Burning Times"?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): This matter has been brought to the attention of the National Film Board (NFB). We are informed as follows:

a) total NFB allocations to Studio D from April 1, 1985 to fiscal year beginning April 1, 1991*: $14,927,807;

b) Total cost of production, preparation and distribution of films in the "Women and Spirituality" series (Goddess Remembered, the Burning Times, and Full Circle): $1,785,212;

c) The cost of production, preparation and distribution of the film, The Burning Times: $578,481

* Fiscal year 1991–92 is based on initial allocation.

Question No. 184—Mr. Harvard:

Why, in calculation of total non–refundable tax credits for the 1990 tax returns (line 314 in the Guide), does the $1000 credit exclude pension incomes paid under the Old Age Security Act or any similar provincial programs, the Canada Pension Plan, Quebec Pension Plan or Saskatchewan Pension Plan and what is the rationale for such a policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The $1,000 pension income credit was introduced as a means of protecting pensioners from the effects of inflation since few private pension plans provide more than partial inflation protection. This credit is one of several government measures designed to be of principal benefit to elderly Canadians.

All Canadian seniors are guaranteed a basic level of income through the Old Age Security (OAS) program, the Guaranteed Income Supplement (GIS), and the Spouse's Allowance (SPA). In 1991–92, the federal government will spend about $18.9 billion providing benefits to seniors through these programs.

A basic level of earnings replacement is provided for working Canadians by the Canada and Québec Pension Plans (C/Qpp).

In 1992, the basic personal credit will exempt from tax the first $6,456 of income for all taxfilers. For all Canadians over the age of 65, the age credit will exempt an additional $3,482. In 1992, the age credit will cost the federal government about $1.1 billion in foregone tax revenues.

The federal government also provides tax assistance for retirement saving through the deferral of tax on contributions to registered pension plans (RPPs) and registered retirement savings plans (RRSPs), as well as the investment earnings in these plans. These tax concessions are estimated to cost the federal government $6 billion per year in foregone tax revenue.

Benefits provided to Canadian seniors under the OAS and the C/QPP are fully indexed for changes in flation. In addition, the tax system already provides substantial benefits to Canadian seniors at a large revenue cost to the federal government. For these reasons, there is no need to provide further tax relief for OAS and C/QPP benefits under the pension income credit.

Question No. 186—Ms. Callbeck:

Is plant and animal health as it pertains to a quarantinable disease the responsibility of the federal government and, if so, (a) what precisely are the federal responsibilities, (b) under what regulations or legislation can they be found?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, the Plant Protection Act and the Health of Animals Act are both federal legislation.

a) Animal Health:

Depending on the disease and its science, these responsibilities involve investigation, inspection, testing, quarantine, ordering destruction, awarding compensation, cleaning and disinfecting, and sometimes treatment.

Plant Protection:

The reponsibilities are to enforce control and eradication regulations and inspect plants and plant products, by prohibiting movement, ordering treatment, destruction and removal from Canada of plants and plant products which have or are suspected to have quarantine pests. Agriculture Canada is not obliged to control or eradicate a pest. Any control or eradication action usually is carried out upon a balanced consideration of economic benefits and costs.

b) Animal Health:

These responsibilities and authorities are found in the Health of Animals Act and Regulations.

Plant Protection:

These responsibilities and authorities are found in the 1990 Plant Protection Act and Plant Quarantine Regulations.

Question No. 190—Mr. Milliken:

Does the Government financially contribute to the Canadian International School in Hong Kong and, if so, what has been the amount of the contributions during the current and three prior financial years?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Canadian International Development Agency, External Affairs and National Defence did not make any financial contributions to the Canadian International School in Hong Kong.

Question No. 201—Mr. Wappel:

What are the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's specific policies and guidelines with respect to the personal use of its assets and equipment by employees?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): This matter has been brought to the attention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC). We are informed as follows:

CBC's capital assets are sometimes relocated to sites off the corporation's premises, both temporarily and on a continuing basis, either in order to facilitate operational efficiency or on loan to employees or others. The policies which govern such relocations are:

a) The relocation of capital assets to sites off CBC premises must be authorized in writing and supported by appropriate written records.

b) Network/regional heads, or officers acting with their approval, must issue the authorization, ensure that the relocations are documented, and put into effect adequate arrangements for the ongoing safe custody of the equipment involved.

c) If the relocation is occasioned by loan to an employee, the authorizing officer must obtain from the borrower a signed receipt and a guarantee that any loss will be reimbursed and any damage repaired at no cost to the corporation.

d) To the extent possible, the continuing existence of capital assets located off CBC premises must be physically verified by periodic inventory checks, in the same manner as for assets located in-house.

e) The capital assets sub-ledger must indicate assets are off-premises.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 52 to present. It was deferred from yesterday.

I am moving the adjournment of the House for an emergency debate under Standing Order 52. The Government of Canada is considering proposals arising from negotiations on the GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. These 500 pages of proposals will affect virtually all segments of our society, including the role that the provincial governments play in our Confederation.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. It is my understanding that the hon. member filed notice that he would present a motion under Standing Order 52 yesterday, but he did not do so again for today's sitting. This means the Chair cannot rule on the matter. According to the Standing Orders, notice must be sent to the Chair for the sitting during which the motion is to be presented. Consequently, I cannot entertain the hon. member's request, since the Standing Orders are very clear in this respect.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate and accept what you have just said. I must say that there was an understanding yesterday. I think the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader and the House leader for the Official Opposition would concur that there was some understanding there would be some discussions. The impression left with us by the Speaker yesterday was that he would consider the notice given yesterday to be applied today in the hope that there would be a chance for some discussions.

Unfortunately, discussions have not been held to the extent that we had hoped for. The understanding, Mr. Speaker, to be clear, was that the notice given yesterday would apply for today as well. Of course, there is always the option of seeking unanimous consent to allow the member to put his request. In all fairness, on such a critical issue, I would seek unanimous consent of the House to allow my colleague to put the request for an emergency debate.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken is correct in most of what he has said. I was not part and parcel of any deliberations that took place with Mr. Speaker, nor with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. In view of the subject matter, which I have discussed with my hon. colleague, I would have no difficulties on behalf of my party in giving unanimous consent in order to waive the provision of notice in order that you may entertain this particular motion on emergency debate.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm that in fact there were some discussions yesterday. I, on this side of the House, wish to indicate that we did expect that the notice of the intention to do so would stand over for today.

• (1020)

We on this side have no problem with the hon. member proceeding with his presentation, but I do not want to in any way imply that it somehow signals to the Chair that we expect him to behave in a certain manner.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As there seems to be unanimous consent, I will recognize the hon. member for Mackenzie so that he can present his motion under Standing Order 52.

[English]

Mr. Althouse: The Government of Canada is considering proposals arising from the negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Some 500 pages of proposals will affect virtually all segments of our economy, including the role that provincial governments play in Confederation.

The proposals embrace new sectors under GATT. For instance, trade, agriculture, services and intellectual property rights would be fully included for the first time. Thus there are special implications for Canadians working in these fields of economic activity.

The concerns of those individuals, the potential impact on our economy and on the nature of our Confederation cannot be adequately discussed because of a lack of opportunities available in the House before the government is required to make a decision whether or not to sign the GATT proposals. It is of the utmost urgency that the broad implications of this question be debated in the House. It is the responsibility of the members of this House to inform the government of the positive and negative implications of the decision that lies before it and of the concerns of all Canadians.

REQUESTS FOR EMERGENCY DEBATES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to serve notice to the Chair and to the Table with regard to the whole concept of emergency debates. I will not pursue it today but give notice to the Chair I would like to have an opportunity on the floor of the House of Commons to intervene in the whole concept of emergency debates and the procedure which we follow in this House.

Certain acts have taken place over the last 12 months which I think would change, if you will, some of the restrictions which are tied in with the concept of emergency debates. On a future day this week I would like to give my views to the Chair in order that the Chair could have a full understanding as to where the Official Opposition is on this particular subject matter.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am intrigued by my hon. friend's intervention. I think it is a fascinating one and I assume what he is talking about are some of the reforms or changes to the rules.

I suggest to him we have a couple of options. First, we could pursue it through the management committee, whose mandate this falls under or second, he could indicate to me whether he intends to use an opposition day for such a discussion.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to lend my support to my hon. friend's suggestion. Certainly I think we are all interested in reforms of the Standing Orders to allow more flexibility.

We saw a good example—I see my friend nodding in approval—earlier today when the hon. member for Skeena rose on the matter of the astonishing news of the depletion of the ozone over Canada. Obviously it is something we should be dealing with as quickly as possible. I want to lend my support to these great ideas as well, Mr. Speaker. The sooner we get on with it, the better.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I put through you to the government side yesterday a proposal for an emergency debate led by the government to have unlimited hours in order to figure out ways by the end of the week that we could put Canadians back to work. I wonder if the government could respond to that request.

[Translation]

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Considering the nature of our Standing Orders as they relate to emergency debates, I must inform the hon. member for Mackenzie that his motion does not meet the requirements set forth in our present Standing Orders.

However, the Chair is the servant of the House, and if hon. members would prefer to see a little more flexibility, the Chair will of course be glad to accept any changes the House may decide to make.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the adjournment of the House yesterday the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon had four minutes remaining for debate.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will not comment on the four minutes. I thought it was longer but I will abide by the request to maintain my remarks to four minutes.

As the debate closed last night I was trying to illustrate those areas of the economies of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia that would be affected by the capping process in this legislation that is presently before the House. Homes for the aged would be affected, as would nursing homes, hostels for transients, child care institutions, homes for unmarried mothers, residences for physically and mentally disabled persons, residents for victims of domestic violence and sexual assault, and rehabilitation services for substance abusers.

There is no question that the health care system in our country would be reduced for those so much in need, especially those among our elderly who require medication and dental care services.

Child welfare payments would be curtailed. What will happen to these children when these cutbacks take effect? We have all heard in this House the overwhelming support from all sides about the need to protect the children in this country in every way, particularly economically.

Welfare services of all types will be hampered: adoption services, rehabilitation services such as life–skills training, services for the aged and physically and mentally disabled persons, homemakers, home support and similar services to individuals and families in emergency situations, or as an aid to independent living in our communities for seniors and the disabled.

I could go on and on to state in unequivocal terms what this type of legislation is doing to those people, not only in those three provinces but in all of Canada that will be seriously affected if this legislation is allowed to go through.

Let me state this in closing. If Canada is to stay unified, if Canada is to stay as one nation, if Canada is to stay together to differentiate between the provinces over economic issues that will certainly affect each and every citizen, not only in the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario, but throughout this whole beautiful, wonderful country of ours, I implore this government today, in the spirit of the unity that we are trying to create, to withdraw this legislation and not bring it back until this recession period is over.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleague from Thunder Bay for his remarks on how wrong it is to put this cap on the Canada Assistance Plan at this time.

As we mentioned yesterday, we are not just criticizing the government here, we are also trying to put forward some ideas that hopefully will put people back to work. As we put people back to work, there will be less need to even think of putting a cap on such a fundamental program as the Canada Assistance Plan which looks after the most disadvantaged.

My question is to my colleague who has spent the last three years in this House doing some fabulous work in the area of transportation. He has seen all kinds of opportunities through our transportation systems and infrastructure where possibly we could invest in the human capital and in our infrastructure to put people back to work.

I wonder if he would be kind enough to enumerate to this House and to the people of Canada some ideas in the area of transportation which could put Canadians back to work if the government had the political will to do so.

• (1030)

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his remarks with respect to how we can assist this country in putting forward a system for our infrastructure, particularly in transportation. I also thank him very much for his kind words about the work in transportation that I have done.

Let me answer my friend by saying that what Canada lacks is a national transportation policy that would extend all modes of transportation: rail, water, air and roads into an infrastructure that would cause this economy to come back to what it once was.

Let me talk for a moment about the roadway system. In my particular area, VIA Rail has been cancelled from Sudbury right through to Winnipeg. As a result, we do not have any passenger rail service, which is so vital to any area of this country, but particularly in northern Ontario. With the absence of passenger rail service on days like today when the planes are not flying, we only have one means of transportation, roads. It is with trucks and cars that people move back and forth in all of the communities in that particular area and I am sure it is synonymous with every other area in Canada.

What we find now, Mr. Speaker, is that the infrastructure of our roadway system is deteriorating to a point where we have more accidents on our roads than we have ever experienced before. This is due primarily to the fact that the roads are not maintained as well as they once were. Coupled with the fact that the roadways are taking the excess transportation that should have been going on railways, it means that we have huge trucks on the roads. We have an economy that is resource based and we have logging trucks and so on.

We do not have the will through either the provincial government, although it promised that all kinds of great things were going to happen in the north, or this government which does not have the resources to provide for all of those communities in northern Ontario and other areas of Canada to spend on the infrastructure that is so vitally needed.

I just heard from my friends on the side here, Mr. Speaker, that they spent a fortune on northern Ontario. Let me say unequivocally and without fear of contradiction that all we have heard in northern Ontario is words and the promises that are made. We get ministers there making all kinds of promises and it has not, like other governments before it, followed through. That is a dilemma that all people in northern Ontario are facing, the dilemma that governments promise things that they cannot deliver. That is what is happening in Ontario, and we see it happening on the other side of the House.

Getting back to the point of my colleague on transportation needs, we need rail transport, additional roads and more access to the air systems of Canada. Thank you very much for asking that question.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to speak on Bill C–32, although I am not too happy with the consequences of this particular bill.

It allows for the extension of a 5 per cent limit on CAP for the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, the province from which I come. It is a continuation of Bill C–69 which limited the 5 per cent cap until 1992. Bill C–32 extends this until 1995. May I suggest that this is the only mechanism by which the federal government assists in funding social assistance and social services in the provinces.

I want to quote someone here: "And then there is what I call the dimension of tenderness. It is the vital responsibility of government to demonstrate compassion for the needy and assistance for the disadvantaged". "It is the equalization of opportunity for all and an elevated sense of social responsibility that must continue to find favour with every thoughtful Canadian. Of all the challenges of government, no cause is more noble, no obligation more sacred. We shall be judged both as individuals and as a society by the manner in which we care for those unable to care for themselves".

Our Prime Minister said those words and, as is so often the case, we can agree with his words but we certainly cannot agree with his actions. In fact only 12 per cent of the population in this country would agree with the Prime Minister these days.

The historical perspective has to be pointed out. This dates back to 1867 and the Constitution Act wherein it was decided that there would be an agreement or a pact between the provinces and the federal government to share 50 per cent in social assistance for the provinces.

As the years have progressed, the development of these policies has caused problems between the provinces and the federal government as to constitutional powers. It is suggested: "It is not my responsibility; it is yours" and vice versa. As a result the disadvantaged people of this country, the people who require the assistance, get caught in the middle.

The federal government often says that the municipalities are creatures of the province, but surely it begs that the three levels of government co–operate. One cannot function without the other, and therein is part of the problem. The federal government is no longer participating or is not fulfilling its obligations to the pact which began in 1867.

There is a history of changes where the social assistance system in this country became better and better and improved as years went on.

The Canada Assistance Plan of 1966 broadened the basis of support to those in need of financial assistance, regardless of the cause of that need. It was one of five elements of a program designed to abolish poverty. Obviously it is not working.

Some of the benefits of this program, the transferring of funds from the federal government to the provinces, to the municipalities, goes on and on. Although I do not agree with some of the things the previous speaker indicated, I certainly acknowledge that services are going to be severely cut: the rehabilitation services, including services to the chronically unemployed and to meet the special needs of persons at risk of being socially isolated, particularly the aged and the physically and mentally disabled.

There are people who vocationally want to be rehabilitated. The waiting list in my community is over one year. These people desperately want to be retrained and rehabilitated to get back into the work force. Bill C–32 perhaps renders this possibility impossible.

Community development services are to encourage and assist members of deprived communities to improve their social and economic conditions. The major employer of the community of Sault Ste. Marie is certainly under siege. We are not sure of tomorrow, next week or next month. Our social assistance rolls grow and grow and grow each and every day.

What has happened? The federal government says no to the province. A year ago the Ontario government increased transfer payments to the municipalities and the federal government was screaming: "You can't spend that kind of money". We quickly found out without the assistance of the federal government that we cannot spend that kind of money.

Where does it come to? It comes down to the municipality that is forced to hire more staff to handle the caseloads, and at the same time the tax base is being eroded. Our major employer cannot pay. With the assistance of the provincial government $4 million of tax arrears was paid by the provincial government on behalf of the employer. How can the municipality take up the slack if it does not get assistance from the provincial government that in turn has not received assistance from the federal government?

Of course the indication is that it is only the have provinces that have a cap. It is fortuitous or very timely that in The Toronto Star today it is stated "Cap on welfare costing Ontario $900 million". That is the financial effect this year on the Ontario government—$900 million.

The Minister of State for Finance says: "Ontario, Alberta and B.C. are the best places to bear the extra burden". What a cynical comment to make when Ontario was a have province and we hope that it shall be once again. Presently our manufacturing base has been eroded dramatically. We read day after day the litany of plant closures and plant layoffs. How can the federal government suggest, even intimate, that Ontario can best bear the burden? We can no longer bear the burden; $900 million is definitely an impact.

If we just want to talk about caseload, in metro Toronto the caseload for social assistance has reached 102,000 in one month, up from $98,000 in December. Any suggestion that the recession is over is not true. The proof is in what is happening in communities across the country.

There is almost unanimous consent that the timing of Bill C–32 is totally inappropriate. When you are in the midst of a recession you do not hurt the people who can least afford to be hurt. It should be noted that 50 per cent of Canada's poor live in B.C., Alberta and Ontario.

The recession has forced people out of work and on to UI. Believe me, my experiences with the UI program of this country have not been pleasant. The government has abdicated its responsibility in UI. It has made it more difficult for workers to qualify for UI. It has shortened the time period for which they will qualify. Believe me, if there is any doubt in the regulations, the workers will never ever get the benefit of the doubt.

I have been to the board of referees on behalf of hundreds of steel workers in my community. It was an unfortunate experience. The regulations point out that it is very difficult to win appeals. We shall go on despite this, but when these people run out of UI they are forced to go to the social assistance program. They do not want to, but will the help be there? It is becoming more and more difficult to provide that help.

In Canada, one of the wealthiest nations in the world, and I think we all still accept that, there are close to one million children living in poverty. We are second only to the U.S. in the level of child poverty in the industrialized world. These children are being asked to pay for loopholes that are offered to big corporations.

I want to cite a particular example. I think examples have to be used to hit home the severity of the problems in our communities in this country. Sault Ste. Marie is only a microcosm of what is happening in so many other communities. We are not in it alone certainly, but I think we are a case study of what is going on in this country.

I received a call from a nurse in a hospital suggesting that the number of cases of malnourished babies in our hospitals is growing. It took time to find out why. What was the problem? It was found and proved that parents of babies of underprivileged families, through no fault of their own, are forced to cut corners. One way to cut corners is rather than buying very expensive formula for their children, they dilute Carnation Milk and say: "I hope that this will do the trick for our children". It does not.

What a condemnation of our system if we cannot provide the basic food for children in our country. That at this point in time is not addressed and I suspect it cannot be addressed. I was in China. What most impressed me about that country that has, I believe, 7 per cent arable land and 1.14 billion people was that, as far as I could see, everyone ate. I could not see people going hungry. We did see a lot of that country. Yet in Canada babies are going hungry. That is a condemnation certainly of the system. Bill C–32 will only exacerbate the problem.

We have talked about timing. This along with Bill C–21, the changes in UI, the clawback on family allowance and pensions, the attack on medicare that we are only too aware of, all of these factors are happening at the same time, which puts a tremendous load on the system. As I have said before, unless we co–operate, unless we get this country back to work, the problems will only continue and get worse.

May I talk about something that is difficult to talk about, which is mental illness in this country, something that is elusive, but we know it is out there and growing. When people are distressed economically, they are distressed mentally.

In my community, depression not only means economic depression. It means mental depression. The suicide rate has increased dramatically among young people. This will not be addressed by attacking the deficit. Attacking the deficit will not make people feel better. People have given up hope. There is no hope. They cannot see the government participating in the rehabilitation and reactivation of the economy.

Certainly there are ideas out there. If we can put people back to work, that despair will subside and hope will come forward. I think the best idea is this public works project. The FCM agrees with it. They initiated it. George Bush, that right winger, even says it is a great idea. Our Prime Minister says that it is a silly idea. Once again, when everyone thinks it is a great idea, the Prime Minister describes it as silly.

Obviously we are on a course that we cannot continue to follow. We can restructure an economy. We can restructure businesses, all with difficulty. We can restructure industry, as we will have to do in my community with Algoma Steel. We can restructure the responsibilities, although it begs co–operation. We can restructure the debt. We can do all of this with great difficulty, but we can do it.

But we cannot restructure people's lives. We cannot restructure families. We cannot restructure educational opportunities without a loss of opportunity for the people and the country. We cannot restructure medical services without mental and physical pain. Restructuring is the buzz word, and they say that we have to do it. We realize that, but you cannot restructure people. It is impossible, but it is happening. Families are being forced to restructure in ways that fly against what is human nature. We cannot restructure people's feelings when they are down. They will remain down unless there are changes in what the governments of the country are doing. They see no change. "We are staying the course", says the federal government, "We are staying the course, despite what is happening around us". It says, "We understand". Well if it understands then bring about change and Bill C–32 does not bring anything to us.

I have said it before, it cuts and it cuts and it cuts, and it cuts some more, and then it says "we are wrestling inflation to the ground". But if the country is wrestled to the ground, if it wrestles the manufacturing base to the ground, if it wrestles people's hopes to the ground, when it is finished with all of the things that have been done in the name of policy, what benefits it and what benefits the country if at the end of it there is nothing there?

It can say, "Well, we went through with our policy and it is the only policy that we know". But what are the benefits when there is nothing left at the end of the exercise? It benefits no one.

I beg the government to get off this course because the country is asking you, imploring you. It goes from begging and asking and imploring to one of great anger and cynicism. So it is time to stop staying the course and do something to address the problems, and we can only address the problems together.

I ask the federal government to co-operate with the so-called have provinces like Ontario—which no longer is a have province primarily because of this federal government.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the member that I agreed with most of what he said. I understand the great frustration that he must be going through because of the problems with Algoma Steel. But he is a member of the New Democratic Party and right now that party probably has more influence with the premier of Ontario than any one of us in this House of Commons.

When you talk about this government staying the course, its plan of wrestling inflation to the ground—by the way, I think there is no inflation in this country—it has more than wrestled it to the ground and you basically indicated that. But my point to you is that I get a sense that the premier of Ontario is basically following the same course that this Conservative government is following.

I want to stress a couple of things. First of all, there are close to 400,000 entrepreneurs in the province of Ontario. These are people who are highly creative and highly motivated. Right now they are saying that they need some inspiration, they need a push, they need a spark from the province of Ontario. Quite frankly, there is a sense that the premier of Ontario would rather pay people not to work than try to take chances on the human capital and the entrepreneurship that is there.

I do not want to give a big long list in this House of Commons today, because this is a national debate and my specific examples are basically from my own province. I would like to meet with you privately. There are literally dozens of examples where entrepreneurs want to do things to create jobs, but they are looking for a little bit of spark, not in terms of taxpayers' money but things going through the process.

An hon. member: Name one.

Mr. Mills: You ask me to name one. I will name one. Last Friday in the province of Ontario the minister of municipal affairs put the hammer and closed down an affordable housing project, 5,000 affordable homes, $110,000 to $140,000 homes, five minutes north of Newmarket. It would have created 17,000 jobs. It was not going to cost the taxpayers of Ontario a nickel—17,000 jobs over four years.

Let me be very accurate. I personally faxed the premier, tried to phone the premier, wrote to the premier, wrote to all those people and I could not get a response.

The premier of the province of Ontario went on national television— I was not here when he gave his pitch; I was in the Middle East—but I heard that he was asking for ideas and ways to create jobs. Then a week later he put the hammer on it. There is a bit of inconsistency here.

I am not trying to do anything other than to suggest that when you throw a shot across the floor at the Conservative government, how about re-examining the opportunities that we have within the province of Ontario for creating jobs.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I fail to see the relevance of the hon. member's comments. The bill before the House today concerns the Canada Assistance Plan, and I would appreciate it if the hon. member would get back to the subject and finish his remarks.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the relevance is this. If we had people working again there would not be a necessity for this cap on the Canada Assistance Plan because if there were full employment in this country we would not be needing to cap bills that are as fundamental to the fabric of this country as this is. My plea is that we get people back to work.

Legislation like this can be withdrawn from the floor of the House and so I plead with the hon. member for some help.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I think there were some cynical comments there and it is unfortunate that this kind of debate would get that partisan. I think it became a little partisan. I would say that at least this government is consistent.

I suspect the party that the member represents could espouse what it says, and as full employment really is our party's policy, I think he is espousing our policy which never surprises me about the Liberals, opportunistic perhaps.

Last year when the New Democrats and the premier of Ontario put out this anti-recession fund, the federal government would not get on side. I am sure that the Liberal opposition at that time did not say "Premier Bob, that's not the right idea". It probably criticized him. At that time when they were spending money you were criticizing and now when they are coming back you are saying they cannot do that either. Well you cannot have it both ways. It begged co-operation last year when the New Democratic government said that it was going to spend its way out, and the federal government said no way. The Liberal opposition in Ontario said, "No way. You can't do that".

I think that Premier Rae has reached out to the business community and many times, for whatever reason, has had his hand slapped. Absolutely. I do not think they want to co-operate. But he will continue to reach out to them. In the end, without cynicism from the other parties, this will work. I do not think that Bill C-32 has anything to do with what the member was talking about and I commend the speaker for bringing that to the attention of everyone.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the member first of all accused me of being cynical when I gave him a specific example that would create 17,000 jobs. He then went on to say that he did not see what Bill C-32 had to do with job creation. I cannot believe a member of Parliament would say that. If we had full employment in this country we would not have such a draw on the unemployment insurance fund and we would not have such a draw on the welfare fund. My goodness, his leader's first question in the House of Commons yesterday was: "What about the $30 billion on UI and welfare? Let's put it into productive labour and then we would not have to worry about Bill C-32." He is not even listening to his own leader.

I put forward a specific, sincere question to the member of the New Democratic Party. I asked him for help to get people back to work. It was not cynical. I gave him a specific example and he stood up and made a mockery of my question. That is why people think this House does not work and they are right.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, the previous discussion is very revealing. I think all of us on this side of the House are trying to do our best to turn this country around and to get this country back on track, but let us keep our eyes on the ball and let us not forget who is tearing this country apart. It is the Conservatives across the way and let us not forget that.

Let us turn to the matter at hand. The other day I was reading a story in Time magazine. It was a cover story titled: "The Fraying of America". It spoke of the unravelling of that country. The United States of America is literally coming apart at the seams. It is coming apart at the seams because it has had far too many years of conservative administration.

I think many of us even on this side of the House would argue that perhaps in a period of 100 years there may be a time for a conservative administration. But history will tell you that having any more than about four or five years of a conservative administration in a longer period of time is far too much.

If you look at the United States it goes back to the Reagan years starting in January 1981, and that country has come apart. It has come apart to the extent that George Bush, who was riding high in the polls and nearing a 90 per cent approval rating a year ago has now slipped below the 45 per cent level. Who would have thought a year ago that George Bush could be facing defeat? It is now a possibility. I do not predict it, but it is a possibility.

That magazine cover story was addressing the very serious issue of the fraying of America, the coming apart of America. The same thing is happening here. Reaganomics did not work in the United States and Thatcher economics did not work in the United Kingdom. I am going to say that Mulroney economics does not work in this country.

Canadians know very well—they say it every day in the coffee shops, it is reflected in the polls, and even the Tories cannot deny it and they certainly cannot ignore it—that there is something terribly wrong with this country. They are searching for answers. They know that the Conservative government, going back to September 1984, has done something irrevocable to this country, or perhaps irrevocable. We are hoping if we get to power that we can turn it around, but the damage inflicted on this country by this government continues unabated day after day, day after day.

The first thing this government did was to begin damaging and tearing apart the social contract. We have had a social contract in this country for decades and decades and decades, something that separated Canada from the United States of America. There was a partnership in this country, a partnership involving government, the business community and labour. It can be called a partnership or a social contract, but we had it in this country.

It made a difference in this country, certainly a difference between this country and the United States. It made us one of the best countries in the world, but we are losing it. We are losing it very quickly because we have a Conservative government that wants to turn this country into a country governed by the laws of the jungle.

It has its favourite buzz-words like competitiveness and globalization. If we would only become competitive, everything would be just fine and dandy. Just leave us to the vicious forces of the marketplace. If we are competitive, everything is going to be fine. Just let big business have its way and all the benefits of that hard work will trickle down to us, the masses. What a wonderful dream. But it does not work.

Let us talk about the cap on CAP. The Tories tell us that there has to be this cap on CAP, this ceiling on social assistance and transfer payments to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia because, after all, they are here to cut the deficit. They tell us we must have restraint on government spending and the government budget must be trimmed. They say with this particular measure they are going to save $340 million. We have heard that story many times. Almost everything this government does is in the name of cutting the deficit and yet, strange as it may seem, the deficit remains. It hardly moves. After almost seven years of this Tory administration, despite some of the best economic years, the deficit sits there. But the debt goes up. It never stops going up. What do we get out of these Draconian measures from the Tories? Not a lot.

It raises the question of fairness. Under this measure the Tories are saying to the poor in Ontario, to the poor in Alberta, to the poor in British Columbia: "You are going to have to live with less". Where is the fairness? In free trade, what did the Tories do? In the free trade agreement they gave big business, particularly the international companies, a blank cheque. "Go out and do your thing."

For a while small business thought there was a lot in free trade for them. If big business prospered from free trade, so would small business. It has not turned out that way. People in small businesses are some of the most disillusioned people in the country today. It is because they realize that the corporate agenda followed by the Tories is not for small business. It is for the big business people, most of whom reside in places like New York, Los Angeles, Chicago and London. It is not your small retail outlet or retail operator on Portage Avenue in Winnipeg, for example.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that fair? They ask the little guy to tighten his belt and to live with less, but when it comes to the big guy, they give him more. Is it fair? What about the GST? It certainly gave a break, and perhaps a rightful one, to our exporters when it removed the old manufacturers' sales tax and imposed the GST, but what about the ordinary Canadian? What does he get out of it? He is paying more taxes. He is being gouged. He is being asked to pay more. I ask the question: "Is it fair?"

Here we have a government cutting back, constantly retrenching, constantly asking Canadians to give a little bit more and to bleed a little bit more. In the process we have 600,000 Canadians dependent on food banks. One-third of those are children.

• (1110)

We have 1 million Canadian children living in poverty. Is that fair, especially when we measure it against some of the Draconian measures instituted by this federal government? Is it not interesting that at a time of economic difficulties when people are feeling the hurt and the pain of the recession and feeling the pain of the measures of this government that we do not hear anything from the government when it comes to the huge stipends and salaries earned by chief executive officers of some of the largest corporations in the country? We do not hear a word.

I read in the paper the other day that the salaries of CEOs in Canada were going to go up this year 7 per cent on average. I wonder how many workers are going to enjoy a 7 per cent increase in their salaries this year. Not very many. A lot of workers will lose their jobs.

Do we ever hear anything from these fat cat Tories when it comes to high salaries of chief executive officers of corporations? We never hear a word. Is that fair?

A few years ago the federal government used to be the leader when it came to the minimum wage. Provinces lagged behind. Who is taking up the rear these days? Who is last in the line of providing a minimum wage? Is it little P.E.I., Newfoundland or Manitoba? No. It is the federal government. These parsimonious Tories have not adjusted the minimum wage for almost six years. It has not been adjusted since 1986. I ask you the question, Mr. Speaker: "Is that fair?"

What about the monetary policy? What about the policy of this government to wrestle inflation to the ground? None of us likes inflation. I do not know anyone on the face of the earth who likes inflation. The Tories stand up very bravely and say they are going to wrestle inflation to the ground. They have not done a bad job. But who was the pawn in this process? Who was used in the process to fight inflation to the ground? It was the little guy, the worker. The anti-inflation policy was carried out on the backs of little people. I ask you, Mr. Speaker: "Is that fair?"

What about the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces, cuts which are going to have and already have had a serious impact on health care programs in the provinces? I ask the question, Mr. Speaker: "Is it fair?" Is it fair to pass on more and more of the federal government's responsibility with respect to health care to the provinces? Is it fair to take federal cash out of the medicare system which will leave the provinces with an absolutely unbelievable burden that they will not be able to bear?

Mark my words, Mr. Speaker. Consider when there is no more federal cash for medicare, when the federal government loses its lever to apply the Canada Health Act. That will happen. The provinces will soon be adopting or instituting user fees and other measures like extra billing, and that will be the end of medicare. That will be the beginning of a two-tiered system where the rich will have their system and the poor will have their system. Of course the system of the poor will be a poorer one because they will not be able to afford the kind of system that the rich can enjoy. I ask the question again, Mr. Speaker: "Is that fair?"

I can take you down this long line of issues and I can raise the question every time: "Is it fair to be preoccupied with cutting and tearing apart the social contract that has existed in this country for so long?" What about the clawback of pensions? What about the clawback of family allowances?

Of course the Conservatives get on their soap box and say: "After all, we are just going after people with the wherewithal. We are just going after people with means. We are not going after poor little people. We would never do that". That is not true. The clawback is not tied in any way to inflation.

Even though the Tories wrestle inflation to the ground, I can assure you that as time moves on and as inflation takes its toll, the clawback to family allowances and the clawback to pensions will hurt more and more and more all the time. As you well know, the threshold right now is $50,000. That does not sound too bad, does it? It does not sound too bad, but when it comes to pensions, in eight years from now, $50,000 will be $40,000 because there is no indexation. That is what the threshold will be in eight years, $40,000. In 30 years it will be down to $20,000.

Can you imagine after 30 years of inflation, 30 years down the road? Canadians are going to have an old age pension worth $20,000. Is that fair? Is that the direction they should be following? Canadians know. They know and they say it every day. That is why the polls show that the Tories will be turfed out at the first opportunity. Canadians know that their policies are the ruination of this country. They have never heard of the word "share".

You will grow old, Mr. Speaker, sitting on this side of the House and waiting for the word "share" to come out of their mouths. The Tories do not believe in sharing. They never heard of sharing. In fact, if you ask them what sharing means, it means thievery to them. It means having to share some of what they have with other Canadians. That is what sharing means to them. It means thievery.

This idea of building two tiers in our society is achieved by the clawback. The clawback does that. The cuts in transfer payments to provinces build two tiers. This divides our country and our people. This sets off rich people on one side and poorer people on the other.

I will tell you the price that is to be paid for that. When you take upper middle income people and rich people out of mainstream programs like family allowances and pensions, they do not feel that those programs belong to them any more. They do not feel that they have anything to do with those plans. They have their own plans. Consequently, what happens when you cut those people from the mainstream programs is that they do not support you any more. They do not support you with their cash any more, and they do not support you with their politics and their votes.

Is that what we want? No. I would like to have a social contract. I would like to have a social contract that calls on all Canadians working together and sharing together. I do not want Canadians rushing off in different directions. Yet that is what Tory policy dictates.

Is it fair, I ask again? No. The Tories privatized the unemployment insurance scheme. It is harder to get into UI now and you get less out of it if you are lucky enough to get in. Of course, with privatization the Tories according to the 1989 tables removed their $3 billion contribution from unemployment insurance. Again it is the unravelling and the fraying of the social contract. There was a time set up by the Liberals that there would be a role for the worker in UI, a role for the businessman, but there also would be a role for general taxpayers through the instrumentality of government. That has been destroyed by this government.

In closing, I say there has to be a turnaround. If there is no turnaround we will lose absolutely everything we have. We will lose our social contract. We will lose the partnership that existed for so many years in this country.

The cap on the CAP is a reflection of the fraying of Canada and I just hope to God that we can put a stop to it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House today to address this extremely important legislation which I believe will impact negatively on the whole of Canada, not only Canada's poor but Canadians generally.

All of you will know that Bill C–32 is an act respecting the Canada Assistance Plan. That is a rather cold description of it. Let us look at what it really does.

It deals with the Conservative government's cap on the CAP, a cap on the Canada Assistance Program. Specifically, it is a cap on the transfers to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. This particular measure is a flagrant and highly visible example of the failure of the government to be able to come to grips with the balance between economic policy development and social policy development. What it attempts to do is bring some order into the economic policies of this nation by attacking those provinces which on a per capita basis are richer than others by limiting assistance to those who need it. I would argue, and I shall, that this is not the way to proceed.

It also raises a number of other important questions. If the government can do this to this particular program, what is to prevent it from expanding and broadening it? What is to prevent it from reducing the amount of transfers or to approach other programs with a similar philosophy? We have no guarantee that it will not do so.

I want to raise a number of questions. The first one is, who will this bill affect? It will affect Canada's poorest citizens. They will be the ones who will suffer the most from the Conservative government's extension of this cap on the CAP.

Members will recall that originally there was a cap of 5 per cent put on transfer payments to assist social assistance program recipients. This is an extension of that Draconian measure and it is completely unacceptable, particularly in view of the more difficult economic situations through which we are now passing. It is the wrong thing to do. It is the unjust thing to do. It is the insensitive thing to do.

It will be recalled that this penalizes not only British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario because it reduces the assistance they get, but it penalizes the people who are the recipients of those particular programs in those particular provinces.

There is an article in today's Toronto Star entitled: "Cap on welfare costing Ontario $900 million". That is almost a billion dollars. This is the effect of that particular bill. This $900 million will be money that the poor will not be able to get. Those who need assistance will not get—$900 million—almost a billion dollars. It is unconscionable. It is totally and completely insensitive.

Under CAP, the federal and provincial governments share equally the costs of basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities and households. The federal government does not set up these particular transfers for social assistance programs but it helps provinces in setting them up by responding to the needs of those Canadians who require assistance most.

Many of the services which will be affected are essential to Canada's poor. Let me give an example of some of them: dental care, essential living services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, safe housing for abused women, and subsidized child care for low income families. These are basic essentials that will be denied. The federal government will prevent these provinces from doing as much as they would like because it will not be matching, as it ordinarily would, the expenditures that provinces would undertake in those particular areas and in a number of others.

What is worse about this—a point that has never been talked about much—is that this was originally initiated in the 1990–91 budget year but has now been extended. The government got its foot in the door and now that it has its foot in the door it is going on and on. This ceiling has now been extended and it will continue to reap the same kind of effects that I have just mentioned in this Toronto Star article—$900 million in this one province alone, fewer dollars for those particular individuals.

I want to mention as well, and I think it is an important point, that this particular plan is going to result in transferring the debt and some of the economic difficulties on to the backs of poor Canadians. I think this is something that we often forget. It is easy to talk about statistics, it is easy to talk about these kinds of programs in a sort of cold, analytical way, but it is sometimes difficult to understand that there is a control going on here, an attempt to control debt, an attempt to control deficit, on the backs of the poor.

Some of you will know—and some people feel rather good about this—that because this was challenged in a court of law and the government was found not to be outside of the law, that somehow there is a moral victory. I suggest that this is not a moral victory; quite to the contrary, it is the extreme opposite. Even though there was a legal win, it does not give the government the moral right to abandon its responsibilities to the poor and disadvantaged Canadians.

Another point we often forget is that this kind of program pits those who are richer, on a per capita basis—and we all know that those richer provinces have become poorer recently—against other provinces. It heightens the tensions in this country at a time when the situation is particularly tense. It really does pit one part of the country against other parts of the country. It simply makes people more angry at the system because they feel it is not being fair, that it is not working, that it is not sensitive, that it is not sharing in a fair kind of way.

Let us talk about our current situation today.

[Translation]

You surely know that right now in Canada, about 5 million people live at or below the poverty line. Unfortunately, most of them are women. These 5 million include 1 million young people, children and youths. I find this situation deplorable in a country like ours which is rich compared to other countries in the world.

Right now, 2 million Canadians are on welfare; here again, many of them are women and children. I find it absolutely deplorable that in our country, Canada, with 27 million inhabitants, 2 million, or almost 10 per cent, receive social assistance. I find that unfortunate.

• (1130)

Nearly 1.5 million people are said to be unemployed, but the actual figure may be higher because some have given up looking for work—they feel it is no use.

I will give some concrete examples from my constituency. In my riding, I could name at least seven young men who have worth-while university degrees, masters in public administration, in economics or in other very important fields, and who have been unable to find work. They get contracts for a month or two, something like that, but nothing long-term, nothing promising. Can you imagine these young people who have studied for years to ensure a promising future for themselves and have lost hope?

I met a young man who has a bachelor's degree in economics. He had to go to the United States because there was no work for him here in Canada. He is a very intelligent young man who had great success in university, and there is nothing for him here in Canada.

In my riding now, there is a man of about 50 who lost his job because of cuts in the place where he was working. It was not because of his ability—he was very competent, very loyal, very hard-working—but cuts were made. He has been looking for work for more than a year and he has not found anything yet. Can you imagine the despair he feels and the despair in his family because he cannot find work?

I know an electrician who has worked for a number of companies, is very competent, and has all kind of references indicating he is very good at his trade. He is still looking, but there are no jobs.

And what about small business people who have gone bankrupt? And what about all those people who during the past year tried to set up a business and invested a lot of money in the process, and because of the recession, because of our very high dollar in relation to the U.S. dollar and also because at the time, interest rates were very high, were unable to survive?

We have food banks operating at this very moment, where 1.8 million Canadians will go this year if they do not want to starve. As you know, 40 per cent are children and teenagers. In this country, food banks are running out of food, and I think that is appalling.

[English]

I want to talk about tax increases because that has been a burden for Canadians. We all know that there is less ability to purchase now what we could a few years ago, in spite of some increases in certain sectors, because the tax increases have taken away more than we have received in almost every single area. The losses by the middle class, the very motor of Canada, the people upon whom we count in order to finance a number of the programs that we have in place, are suffering. They are losing faith. They are being crushed by that taxation burden. I am talking about the 34, I think it is, tax increases and the goods and services tax which is not any more popular today, I can assure you, than it was when it was implemented. I predict that tax is gone.

What is worse, I am talking about the middle class and the crushing burden that they are suffering. If we look at the taxes that are being paid by the poor, proportionately they are paying a greater share. That is happening in spite of the fact that there are a number of Canadians who are earning extremely high remuneration and who are paying very little or no tax. In a number of cases there are companies that are doing very, very well but are paying very little or no tax.

Canadians are angry. They are tired. They feel that this system is not fair. When you see a cap on CAP, such as this program, you see the unfairness. It is simply exacerbated by tax measures such as those.

Some of you will recall the clawback on the seniors, the clawback on the family allowance programs and the fact that it will become increasingly serious over time. Initially a lot of people looked at it very quickly and said: "Well, what is the problem?" The problem is that over time more and more people will be clawed back at a much smaller salary. That will become increasingly serious. Those Canadians who took it lightly will realize in another 10 to 20 years that that was another Draconian measure.

The whole system is rife with unfair taxation measures. Let me give a couple of examples. Between people who are married and people who are living in a common law relationship, there is an advantage in being in a common law relationship from a taxation perspective. I do not want married people to suffer more and I certainly do not want the people who are living in common law to be penalized as are the married people. I think, however, if one has a legal relationship, and those are legal relationships, surely the taxation should not favour one or the other. Surely what is good for one ought to be good for the other.

Let me give another example. People who have receipted day care receive certain taxation benefits, while those who choose to stay at home, are able to stay at home or want to stay at home do not get the same kinds of benefits. People know that. People get angry when they see this kind of unfairness, this kind of injustice, and they want change.

[Translation]

Often, we hear that certain measures are taken or bills introduced in order to control the deficit and the debt. However, the deficit has been about $30 billion for a number of years and this year it seems it will probably be more than that. I have here a document signed by the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, in which he indicated that the debt was $170 billion—which is a lot of money—in 1984, when the Conservative Party formed the new government. I believe the debt is now well over $400 billion.

So Canadians are saying: Look at all those tax increases. If those tax increases had been instrumental in reducing the deficit and the debt, I am sure they would be far more willing to accept what is happening now. But there has been no improvement. Things have got worse, and they do not like that.

[English]

What really gets me and a number of Canadians angry is the boast of the Conservatives that they are controlling their expenditures. They argue the cap on CAP and fewer transfers of dollars for health and education is helping to control the deficit and the debt. We have talked about the billions of dollars over the period of time that those transfer payments have been changed for health and education. From 1986 to 1995 we are talking roughly 30 billion fewer dollars for health and education. I think it is $20 billion less for health and $10 billion less for education.

What is happening is that they are exercising a certain amount of control, but it is on the backs of the provinces, territories and the citizens in those particular localities. To boast that one is controlling the debt by transferring it to one's neighbour is a very empty boast indeed.

Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, to my colleagues and to those who are listening, we need to relook. We need to examine again. We need to study in a very serious kind of way the linkages that there are and ought to be between economic development and social development. We need to be sensitive to those who have less. We need to recognize that by denying them that which they need to contribute to a greater quality of life, one that is often lacking in many instances, we are denying ourselves. We are denying the whole country. We are not only penalizing them but penalizing Canadians generally because they cannot participate fully in the work force. It heightens the tensions that we already have in this country.

We need a balance. We need a balance between economic development and social development. I am delighted that my party has taken this question very seriously, as well as the question of fair taxation and that it has been working for months to try to advance something that will be more sensitive, fairer and more acceptable to Canadians. I look forward to those announcements very shortly.

I want to complete my address on two notes. I want us to realize that when we are not sensitive to those who have less, we are in fact cheating ourselves as Canadians and cheating our country. That is not the intent. That is what is happening. If you look at children who are poor, you recognize that it is a vicious cycle and that they do very poorly in school, generally speaking. What is the future for them?

I know that I have come to the end of my allotted time. I am saddened that this appears to be proceeding because I see no positive benefits whatsoever. I think it is particularly sad that this year, 1992, when Canada will be celebrating its 125th birthday and we ought to be celebrating that which we have accomplished for those who have less, unfortunately, ce n'est pas le cas.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for articulating so well the linkage between social and economic development in this policy-making process. That was precisely the point I was trying to make earlier with the NDP. If we have a strong focus on the economic development instruments in this country, it is much easier to meet the social objectives that I know all members of this House are trying to achieve.

One reason I am so disturbed about this particular debate is because I believe that we are going beyond the power curve in our cutbacks. In other words, it is like an airplane that is taking a deep dive and, as can be seen during air shows, if that pilot does not turn it around at a certain point and it goes beyond the power curve, it is impossible to pull it out. Indeed, it is a year and a half ahead of its inflation targets. It has gone beyond the power curve in terms of ratcheting down inflation and other things. In terms of unemployment, I think we are only 200,000 or 300,000 people away from a revolution in this country. People are starting to say quite openly that our institutions are not working. They are not functioning.

My question is to the member who articulated so well about the despair that many people in his community are feeling. It is the same despair that people in my community are feeling. Does he believe that our focus in this House of Commons this week should be figuring out ways to put people back to work immediately so that once the economic equation is working productively again, it would be much easier for us to meet all the social objectives and values that we have held so near and dear in this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

[English]

Yes, I believe that it is extremely important. I would even say it is essential to devote this week and whatever additional time we need in order to see how we can get people back to work for a number of reasons. Obviously, quite apart from the benefits that come from employment, there is a satisfaction that people would feel about being back to work. The impact it would have on the families and on the partner and the children can never, never be underestimated.

I talked to my constituents before Christmas and just recently. The single greatest concern they have is making sure that people who are unemployed are back to work, that they have meaningful jobs. Second, that they are able to keep their own jobs. There is a great fear out there as you see your neighbour lose his or her job that you are going to be next.

It would re-establish confidence in the future for themselves because they would feel "I have had a productive life. My neighbours have. We want to retire with some dignity". That is being attacked as well because there is such a lack of confidence in the country.

The people not only fear for their jobs today, their jobs tomorrow, but their future. As well, they fear for the future of their children. They wonder whether or not their children will be able to get jobs and, if they are able to get jobs, whether they will be meaningful jobs that will tap the potential and the talents they have and whether or not that will be able to continue into the future.

For all of those reasons, I would suggest that we have to spend this week and as much time as we need to develop creative ways to ensure that people get jobs, that people are put back to work and are off social assistance programs, that people no longer need to go to food banks, people can find a vitality, a new reason for living and a new hope that this country will in fact provide for all of those who want to work, who want to contribute significantly to this nation and to its future.

Yes, there can be no more important goal this week than have this whole House attempt to determine ways of getting Canadians back to work and to restore confidence in our nation as we celebrate our 125th birthday together.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to again speak on this bill which is an attempt by the government to pass on to the provinces and, therefore, to the more unfortunate people of Canada budgetary cuts. It is also an attack on one of the pieces of social legislation that has united Canada and brought Canadians together. It comes at a time when Canada is having to debate its very existence.

We had better go back and take a look at what the Canada Assistance Plan is and what its implementation meant to Canadians. There are two or three aspects of it that I have not heard anyone raise in this House. The Canada Assistance Plan sets out very clearly that the aim is the provision of adequate assistance to and respect of persons in need and the prevention and the removal of the causes of poverty.

The act goes on to say that it will provide services like food and shelter, special care homes and a range of welfare services. These welfare services are aimed at the removal and prevention of the cause and effect of poverty, child neglect and the dependence on public assistance. We are talking about services that are directed to the most disadvantaged Canadians.

One thing that is fundamentally flawed about this bill is that it is inequitable in its application. It singles out the poor children and the unemployed in three provinces only, Alberta, B.C. and Ontario, at a time when we are trying to build a concept of national unity. We are being asked to pass a piece of legislation in this House that fundamentally attacks and singles out people in three provinces. It applies a different standard to them.

The preamble to the legislation says that these are the concern of all Canadians. That is in the preamble of the Canada Assistance Plan, and yet this government presents a piece of legislation that says: "We are not concerned about all Canadians. We are going to single out Canadians in Ontario, Alberta, British Columbia, and handle them differently". This is particularly galling at a time when at least 50 per cent of the children living in poverty are living in those three provinces, at a time when deindustrialization that is taking place in Ontario because of the mismanagement of the economy by the government is causing untold personal tragedies as well as economic tragedies.

There are other elements of the Canada Assistance Plan that I think are equally as important that I have not heard people discuss. I have been involved in public welfare administration for most of my adult life. When I first started out working in public welfare, prior to the introduction of the Canada Assistance Plan, we had all sorts of resident requirements for people applying for assistance, for children coming into care.

In British Columbia you had to determine whether the person was the responsibility of the province of British Columbia. You had to determine their last place of residence for one full year without drawing public assistance. If that was in Ontario, you billed back the province of Ontario.

All sorts of bureaucracies grew up tracing who was legally responsible for providing assistance to that person, not only by province but often by municipality. The Canada Assistance Plan came in and as part of that package, it said you will receive assistance where you are, the costs will be picked up by the federal government, 50 per cent, and we will get rid of this terrible bureaucracy that tries to treat Canadians not as Canadians but as a residents of Ontario, Manitoba or Saskatchewan.

This government by this act is opening up the whole question: Should these provinces which are now limited to 5 per cent expansion sit there and determine that a person is really a resident of Saskatchewan. He has come to B.C. to look for work but we are now forced to pay 100 per cent of the assistance for this person. Maybe we had better repatriate him to Saskatchewan, which they used to do, or bill the government of Saskatchewan for its share of the income assistance, or Nova Scotia or Newfoundland.

I do not think this government understands the path it has started down with this type of legislation. It destroys the whole concept that a Canadian is a Canadian is a Canadian regardless of where they are and that they are entitled to services in every part of this country, regardless of where they lived in the past, and there will not be financial billing back and forth between the provinces based on individual cases.

It would be a shame if another one of our social safety nets was eroded such as the threat that is now going on to our health care system because of this government's unilateral cutbacks to transfer payments.

What is the effect of these transfer payments? In Ontario this year under the cap on CAP there is a loss of revenue of $415 million. In 1991–92, it is $1.2 billion. In British Columbia it was over $40 million the first year. This year it is about $160 million and over the five-year period of this bill it will be $1.2 billion.

This government talks about the deficits being run up by some of the provincial governments, but these deficits are in large part simply the deficit that this government has transferred on to them.

This year in the province of British Columbia, the deficit of $1.7 billion is made up 67 per cent by the loss of transfer payments for EPF and CAP to the provincial government or the loss of revenue of $1.1 billion out of a total deficit of $1.7 billion.

The government has not solved the budgetary crisis or the debt crisis. It has simply passed it on to the provinces. The provinces are having to try and provide the services in a particular context. What is that context? It is a context of a shattered economy, a context of dramatic growth in unemployment, a context where many people who are working are still entitled to public assistance because the wages have been driven down, where there are part-time jobs, minimum wage jobs on which you cannot support your family.

Ontario has suffered the worst because of this recession. Because of the free trade agreement, the GST and the high Canadian dollar, the industrial heartland of Ontario has been devastated. Don Richmond, the commissioner for the Metropolitan Toronto Commission, points out that we are about where we were in 1938–39 in the midst of the Depression.

The number of people on income assistance rose from a little over 750,000 to well over 1 billion by 1992. The case load in Toronto is over 100,000, 3,000 more people a month; total individuals just under 300,000.

Ottawa–Carleton, an area that has suffered equally, has had an increase of 42 per cent. The increase to property tax owners is going from $290 million to $350 million; $12 million of that will be on property taxes. This government has taken programs and transferred them not only to provincial costs, but down to the municipal costs.

We talk about affordable housing. Anything the government did yesterday to make housing more affordable, it has undone with this piece of legislation because the costs in some provinces go directly on to the cost of owning a house. In Ontario it is through increased taxation. It is as important to be able to maintain that home as it is to purchase the home.

In British Columbia there is also an increase in people seeking income assistance. It has now reached the same point that it was during the recession of the early 1980s. Up until this point, B.C. has not felt the same impact of the recession as the industrial heartland in Ontario. In spite of that, it is now experiencing income assistance case loads that were equal to the height of the recession in the early 1980s.

At the same time, there are all sorts of other services other than direct assistance to individuals in terms of income assistance that are provided on our Canada Assistance Plan. I want to talk a bit about the flimflam and the hypocrisy of the government's actions in this as it relates to one of its pet things, which is violence against women or within families.

With a great ballyhoo, five different cabinet ministers made parallel announcements across this country that they were going to spend $137 million over five years. The bulk of that money is going to be spent long after they are defeated and gone from power. Very little of that money, less than $20 million, is to be spent this year. About the same amount is for the next fiscal year and the rest is for some time off in Never Never Land.

At the same time it is taking $1.2 billion from Ontario and $1.2 billion over five years in British Columbia. In Ontario it is $1.2 billion in one year and somewhere in the neighbourhood of several billion dollars over the five-year period. Here it is making this to-do that it is going to put in $137 million for violence within families and against women while it is cutting back hundreds and hundreds of times more money which is used for those specific services. These are the services that provide transition houses for battered women. These are the services that provide counselling for families. These are the services that provide protection for children who have been battered, abused and neglected.

It has the gall and hypocrisy to stand up and with much fanfare make an announcement it is spending this money when in fact it is putting children at risk by ensuring that services are not available at the provincial level. It is cutting back the moneys by hundreds and hundreds of times. It is putting children at risk. It is putting abused women at risk. It is putting families at risk. I think the Canadian public is sick and tired of this approach.

The government says: "We have no alternative. We have got to get control of the deficit". Yes, the deficit is a serious problem. It is a problem that has been put upon Canadians by two successive governments over the last 10 years. Yes, the government should have had control over it but it was not expenditures on social programs that have driven up this deficit and this debt. Six percent of the increase is because of social programs. Forty-four per cent is because of tax breaks to the multinational corporations and to the wealthy that have been brought in by the last two governments. Fifty per cent is because of debt charges mainly due to the policy of the Tory government. High interest rates have been maintained and are still being maintained to this day by that government. We have to solve the problems. We have to get people back to work. I want to outline two or three things that we in the New Democratic Party are suggesting be done immediately.

Get the dollar down. Let us get our export industry working. Let us have the dollar drop down to a realistic value. Let us get rid of the GST. The GST is the single most destructive thing for this economy in the last 10 years. Canadians are going to the United States to shop. I have talked to people in my constituency. Surrey borders on the United States. These people tell me: "It may even be costing me money to go across the line to buy something, but by God I don't have to pay the GST. I'm going to show the government what I think of the GST by going across the border to shop". They are voting on the GST with their feet by crossing the border to shop. The government does not seem to get that through its head. The impact of that is tremendous on Canada because the bulk of the Canadian population lives within 50 miles of the American border.

Get rid of the free trade deal.

Those are three concrete things. I could go on with other alternatives. This government has simply got to ensure that Canadians in every province are back working.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, first of all, no matter what side of the House one is on or what side of the question one is on, I think everyone would agree that the member for Surrey North shows great tenacity and at the same time sincerity on this issue. He has brought this to caucus on more than one occasion, saying this is an issue that we should address and give higher priority.

My question is very simple. Consider Bill C-21, Bill C-28, Bill C-69, Bill C-32 and other bills which I do not have the appropriate numbers for. Basically they are saying and doing the same thing. How long do we have? How much time is there before the erosion becomes literally an avalanche and our social assistance programs are completely deteriorated to a point of no return?

Mr. Karpoff: It is very difficult to say exactly how long we have. My feeling is that we have maybe one or two more years, particularly if the economy remains the same as it is now. What the Tory government has done is create a recession. It has changed the UIC rules which meant that fewer people qualified for UIC for shorter periods of time. Therefore, they had to go on income assistance sooner and for longer periods of time. They have simply changed the UIC rules in a manner that put the load again on the provinces and the local governments.

I think the real reason why we are short of time deals with the concept of Canada. Canadians could feel proud of their social programs. That was one of the things that united us. They knew that they could go to British Columbia and be entitled to income assistance no matter where they were from. This government, however, has said: "No, we are going to make a differentiation among Canadians by province. We are going to penalize the poor in three provinces. We are going to penalize battered women in three provinces". It is this concept, the erosion of our social fabric, that is probably the single greatest threat to Canada.

People are saying: "We had a concept of Canada. We had an understanding of services such as health care, income assistance, job training programs and services to children who were in jeopardy. It was based on the federal government being involved and being concerned about all its citizens. It has destroyed all of that".

One hears the provinces saying: "If you are going to cut off our money and we are still expected to pick up the people who are coming from Newfoundland and Manitoba why don't we just pull out and run on our own? What is the point of belonging to Canada?"

That is what is undermining a great deal of Canadians' confidence in this government. They do not see this government understanding the fabric of the Canadian society and the commitment that Canadians have to social programs.

Canadians will express this in the next election by bringing the greatest defeat of any Canadian government in the history of Canada.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this very important debate. I have to say it is one of the most important debates that I have ever heard in this House. The government opposite will have a lot to explain to Canadians particularly as it relates to this bill.

Most Canadians who are listening know that this is Bill C-32, just a simple and innocuous bill. We have had 17 minutes in third reading from the Opposition. The Minister of State for Finance, oddly enough, is from Ontario where this bill is going to hurt so many, at least 1 million people, because of this minister's lack of ability to understand what this problem is all about.

I cannot believe on third reading that we have not heard from certain Conservative members of Parliament: 46 from Ontario, 12 from British Columbia and 22 from Alberta. This bill is directly affecting the people in those provinces.

I am not talking about new programs. I am not taking about day care which was promised by this government in two elections and should have been in the Canadian system by now. I am not talking about that. I am talking about social assistance.

Because I am talking about social assistance I wish to go back and explain for the benefit of the Canadian people what the Canada Assistance program is. The best place to take this definition from is from the government's own Canada Assistance Plan annual report. I will say something about this before I give the people an explanation of the Canada Assistance program.

The basis of the annual report is four pages. This is an annual report on one of the best programs and one of the best models of federal-provincial co-operation. It is the best program for a social safety net for Canadians. It is an example to the world of what our social programs are.

Oddly enough the annual report for this was combined. This is what the government loves to do. I have seen it for Fisheries and others. It combined three fiscal years in four pages. What fiscal years did it combine? The most prosperous years that Canada has had in probably 15 years were 1986-87, 1987-88, 1988-89. This government could not even take a report in one year and try to see how the Canada Assistance program in good times might be made more flexible for tough times. But no, it comes in February of 1990—and I spoke immediately after that in the House on it—with a cap on the Canada Assistance program for the have provinces.

Canadians should realize, and we have 10 provinces and two territories, that when the Canadian government collects all the taxes, it has agreed to provide under the Established Programs Financing a return and a transfer payment to the have not provinces under the equalization program. In February 1990, seven provinces received transfer payments under the Established Programs Financing. The three provinces that did not need it were Alberta, B.C. and Ontario.

Mr. Wilson, the then Minister of Finance representing downtown Toronto—where there is so much suffering today with the economic policy and programs of the Conservative government—capped the payments under Canada Assistance at 5 per cent for two fiscal years for those three provinces.

The federal government may have wanted to stop any growth in new payments to provinces that it would have to pay out, but I am sure it did not mean to cap the social assistance that is needed in tough times. That is exactly what it did. Then the next year in the budget the same minister capped it again, or was it the new minister. I cannot remember. That is the bill that we have before us. The government capped it until 1994-95.

We see here an unimaginative government which combines the reports for the Canada Assistance program into one report given at the end of 1989 without any imagination. It is the largest cabinet we could possibly have with the least amount of work coming from it. We see a report of the most important universal program that we have in Canada, combined into three reports, with no new ideas coming from it except a budget in 1990 that puts a cap on the have provinces.

Who would have expected what happened as a result of this? I will get to that.

However, because my area is perhaps quite aware of the Canada Assistance program, I want to tell Canadians that this was a model in Canada of the federal and provincial governments working together. In 1966, my party's former government of Mr. Pearson came up with the Canada Assistance program. I am reading from the report, and I wish the government members would read it: "The Canada Assistance Plan was enacted in 1966 to encourage the development and extension of assistance and welfare services throughout Canada. Under the plan, the federal government has entered into agreements with the provinces and territories to share the costs incurred by the provinces". There you have the first safeguard: The province must put up the dollars first. The province must put up the 50-cent dollars before the federal government has to enter into a national type program.

This applies not only to the provinces, but to municipalities too. As everyone in this House knows, the municipalities first see the people in need at that local level. They see the need for social assistance and welfare services for needy Canadians.

I do not think I can stand here in this House and believe that today we are seeing the worst of what we call needy Canadians. We do not see jobs. We do not see an application of money to job creation and we do not see any new ideas. The Minister of Finance says that interest rates have gone down. Why have interest rates gone down? There is no demand. Interest rates will have to go down a lot further before ordinary Canadians can take advantage of them. Maybe big business or the government's friends who like to spend their Canadian dollars in the United States are benefiting. Certainly the Canadian dollar has not gone down enough to enable it to be spent on our natural resources to keep the people working.

Let me just tell you what the CAP covers. It covers persons who benefit from assistance and welfare services, including children who are in care or are in need of protection due to abuse or neglect. There are more children in Canada being neglected, particularly in the have provinces because their CAP has expired. It expired in Ontario and we heard the premier say that he cannot go it alone. Lift the cap and give us our social assistance under CAP.

In B.C. it expired and in Alberta it expires in early March. Do the people have to suffer because of the inability of this government to be flexible? I cannot say that this is an example of good government. I can say that I only saw one person rise on the other side to justify this government's policy. I would like to hear them tell me that people are not going to bed without shelter or food. I would like to hear them say that the 1 million who are on social assistance in Ontario are not hungry tonight. I would like to know if they have gone to a welfare office in the last week and asked how many people came to that door or how many people came looking for assistance from their constituency offices. That is the hard crunch that members of Parliament, members of the legislature, municipal council and town councillors have to go through because of the cap.

In February 1990 they did another thing. Under the established programs they capped a limit. Perhaps in many respects that is needed. But I do not feel it is needed when it is truly social assistance.

In my own province the government of the day brought in PharmaCare for seniors. This year seniors were asked to contribute. I can perhaps see the rationale for asking seniors to contribute a $3 fee for their pharmaceutical needs. It is perhaps justified in tough economic times. I cannot see cutting back to welfare recipients.

I just want to go back to some of the other programs that were capped. I think Canadians should see this. It was interesting, if anyone saw or read about what happened in Montreal this weekend. People came out and talked about federal-provincial programs that worked. Why are we, without a big debate, talking about doing away with this universality here in this House?

What else does it provide? It provides assistance for one parent families, the aged, the unemployed, and families or individuals in crisis. It provides for low income workers, battered women and mentally and physically disabled people.

It goes back to its primary objective. It was to support the provision by provinces of welfare services designed to lessen, remove or prevent the causes and effects of poverty, child neglect or dependence on public assistance.

It is capped in a province like Ontario supposedly because we were told by the minister that we have to taper.

We had the high interest rate because Ontario was in an overheated economy. They cap CAP. A year later Ontario is in a depression because there are no jobs. Free trade has done away with most of the jobs. It was implemented in such a way that the government absolutely could care less about where the jobs were being lost. There was a high Canadian dollar when the free trade agreement was being implemented, and a high Canadian dollar for our natural resources was just not going to keep most of those jobs going.

Rio Algom just closed because of the high Canadian dollar and the international price of tin. You may not be able to control the international price of tin, but this government can control a high Canadian dollar. It does nothing to help or protect fisheries, the price of fish or the price of anything we export.

The only time the high Canadian dollar helps is when you want to go to the United States to spend our Canadian dollars. I say that if Canadians can afford to go to the United States, they can afford to take the breaks of the lower dollar.

Mr. Speaker, I know my time is running out, but I just want to go back and challenge those 46 members from Ontario. I challenge them. If you look at the press today, it reports on the court's victory, but this is the government's victory, and people misinterpret it. The government can do what it wants to do. The Supreme Court said it could cut its assistance under the Canada Assistance program unilaterally, but that is not what you call federal-provincial co-operation.

It cut it unilaterally to Ontario, B.C. and Alberta. Since the court victory, Ontario and B.C. have had to pay back because they took out of CAP. They were paid by the Canada Assistance program 50 cents to match their 50 cents. They had to pay back last month in Ontario. Ottawa made its last payment to Ontario for its 1991-92 fiscal year because it had already reached its cap. Social assistance demands in Ontario rose by more than 17 per cent.

When Ontario is not feeling good, Mr. Speaker, it affects my area. Because of the way our country is, if Ontario is not in a prosperous mode, then the Atlantic is not going to be. We have always benefited from Ontario being in a prosperous mode. As Ontario goes down, you can imagine what it is going to do to the general revenues that would go into the equalization program.

I can imagine what is going to happen in the budget. It does not take much, but at the same time, with some degree of imagination this government could have looked at CAP in the good years when it only did a four page report for three fiscal years. It could have looked at some way of putting flexibility within the Canada Assistance Plan. We have not had the devastation of those who are most in need today: the poor, the jobless, the single woman under 65 and those people right across Canada who are suffering from a lack of imagination.

Why can it not take the money it is going to put into the UI fund because it is being over-run? Why can it not put the money into the UI fund for job creation as my leader has said so well. Put it into infrastructure, sewers, the environment and water supplies. Let the infrastructure be there in all those communities across Canada because people want to work. Give people work and we will be able to go on when the good times come back because, from all reports, they are just around the corner. But it is getting to that corner that is so devastating to the people across Canada.

• (1230)

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to challenge anything my hon. colleague from Nova Scotia has said about social assistance and other social programs, but I want her and others to know that the reality of life in Canada is that the greatest threat to social programs is a bankrupt national treasury. If our financial statements show horrendous debts and our annual financial statements show horrendous deficits, we will not be able to fund the social programs that Canadians have enjoyed in the past and it is as simple as that. There is no money. There is no money available for new social programs. All members who advocate greater expenditures at this time on the social programs and increased payments for social programs are simply heading the country toward bankruptcy. Then there will be no social programs whatsoever. I hope the beneficiaries of the social programs realize that they will receive no benefit from those who advocate expenditures of funds that the public cannot produce through taxes and other means.

I want to ask the hon. member a question. Let me explain it this way. The New Democratic Party members constantly demand greater expenditures and when you ask where we will get the money, they invariably say two things. First they say to reduce expenditures on national defence. We have a world-wide situation which may mean that we do not have to spend as much on national defence. This is the so-called peace dividend.

I want the member to stand up in the House and answer this question. Does she believe we should dramatically reduce expenditures on national defence? She knows the havoc that can wreak at Cornwallis.

Second, I would like to ask her if she thinks we should increase taxation to pay for social programs. Never mind the sermon about infrastructure. We all know about that. That has nothing to do with the matter before the House.

What she has contended is that we can continue to fund and increase the funding for social programs. I want to know where she thinks we should get the money. Does she believe we should get it from national defence expenditures or should we tax the rich as the NDP say?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Let me just say to the hon. member that as far as cutting defence, this government came out with the statement in September that it wanted to do more cutting. It had a new white paper that would set up a new committee, but two years before it had a white paper that said it was going to do something else.

I do not want to get really tied up in that.

Cornwallis, in case the member does not realize it, is our only basic recruit training base. It serves all three forces very well and is not costly in terms of a $12.8 million budget.

I just think that a $12.8 million budget today may have to be looked at in light of the changing world. We are always going to need new recruit training, so let us leave Cornwallis with that. I am sure the hon. member would agree with me.

You could find other needs for Cornwallis. You could put in the UN peacekeeping, as the committee to save Cornwallis has said. I do not want to waste my time because he has challenged me on other things. I have a list and I will send it to him and any newspaper that wants it. I presented such a thing to the minister's committee.

There are areas of taxation that we could perhaps do away with. We would have to do away with all the business lunches and all the perks that businesses have and cut back there. Maybe that might give us a little more revenue somewhere else. Maybe we have to look at other things that the Economic Council of Canada has recommended and not been acted on by this government.

I want to say something on the other side, and I want to be positive about this. If we cut and reduce the Canadian dollar, we will allow our natural resources and businesses to get going again and create jobs. As jobs are created there will be more people who pay taxes which come back into the coffers. Use the UI fund for job creation instead of paying people UI out of general revenues. You can do so much training and then there is no job after their months or year of training. There have to be jobs. Get people working. Put in an infrastructure. Finally, do not believe that this government or any government can put its ills and its lack of imagination to find a way out of this, on the backs of the needy, the poor, the children, the old, the women under 65 with no income and the jobless. We have never seen so many permanent jobless with nothing coming to them from any level of government. You just have to go to Yarmouth and see what has happened to a town that was supposedly booming, according to Maclean's three or four years ago.

We do not have to put that burden on the poor. If you want to sit down, I will tell you some of the other areas that I would cut.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may point out that we have now had five hours of debate.

[English]

It is now time for 10 minute speeches without a question or comment period.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by complimenting my colleague, the hon. member for South West Nova, and say that I am proud to serve with her. I agree 100 per cent with every comment she has made and I salute her.

Mr. Crosby: Including cutting national defence.

Ms. Clancy: I do not think the hon. member for South West Nova, who happens to be the member for one of the largest training bases in this country, was saying that, but if the hon. member for Halifax West understands it that way, I suggest he check his comprehension.

I begin my remarks by saying that during the Christmas break I happened to read a new book called Conversations with Canadians by Knowlton Nash. One of the conversations was with Robin MacNeil of the U.S. Public Broadcasting System, MacNeil–Leher Report. He is a son of Nova Scotia, as many of you may be aware, a writer and broadcaster. They talked about George Bush's theory of a kinder, gentler America. Robin MacNeil responded that there is a kinder, gentler America and that place is Canada.

I agree with that up to a point. There is a kinder, gentler America that is Canada or, sadly, there was. Unfortunately what we are seeing and what we have seen over the past six years is an attempt to dismantle this kinder, gentler country. One of the things that will dismantle it very quickly is the end of the social safety net upon which Canadians depend and of which Canadians are so justly proud.

Putting a cap on CAP effectively is saying to the citizens of this country that we as a country and a nation are one of the most favoured on the face of the earth. We are one of the nations with the highest standard of living and the largest number of resources. Everyone of us in this Chamber knows what our benefits are. Yes, we have problems, largely of our making, and I am not apportioning blame on that side. We of all political stripes, from every region, province and territory of this country have to take a share in how we might be messing up the country. This is why we now have to work together to pull it together. But we are a favoured and blessed country, no question, on the world scene. We are favoured and blessed as opposed to our neighbour to the south.

A country will only maintain its greatness and its favoured status when it can be judged favourably in the way it treats its least fortunate and weakest members. There are Canadians who are never going to be able to function in the Thatcherite, Reaganite, Mulroneyite free market kind of economy that this country has been pushed toward.

My colleague from Halifax West said, in response to my colleague from South West Nova, that you cannot do anything with a huge deficit and a bankrupt government. I could not agree more. No one disagrees with that. The deficit is a terrible burden.

• (1240)

It has been six years, and the deficit grows. There have been six years of these policies and it is not getting smaller. It is not helping—

Mr. Gustafson: Who created the deficit?

Mr. Halliday: It is the interest rates.

Mrs. Clancy: I thought the interest rates went down, my hon. friend over there, the hon. doctor. But you will have your time, the hon. member from over there. If you know the answer, why can you not fix it? You have had six years and you have not done anything. It is getting worse. I must have struck a nerve. They were not talking at all for a while, now they are all talking. I think they should speak on this in their own time. However, they have not solved this.

The Minister of Finance told us the other day we are faced with a 60-day freeze, and what is cut? What is always cut? Social programs to help the less fortunate; programs that reflect on our national characteristic of compassion are cut. Why?

I do not believe that my colleagues on the other side of the House want to think about people who are forced out of their homes and living in piano boxes, if they are lucky. They are living under bridges, if they are lucky, and in the streets from one end of this country to the other. I know that none of the members over there approves of that or wants to see it, but it is happening. You cannot pretend it is not happening. It is there.

Let me tell you this. The other night in Halifax, when we had the biggest snowfall in the maritime region in 30 years, I was talking on the telephone to my friends because none of us could come out of our homes. We were lucky we had homes to be in. A number of people wondered what was happening that night to those homeless people that we see on the streets. Where were they? Three feet of snow fell on the city of Halifax. Thank God there were church shelters, temporary shelters, Salvation Army shelters and the like to take them in.

This is a temporary response. The churches and the charitable institutions cannot be expected, with their limited means and limited base, to take over what is the responsibility of every Canadian, and consequently has to be the responsibility of government. You cannot back off and abdicate your responsibility and say: "Let them starve. Let them eat cake. Let the charities take care of it". It will not work. We have seen more poverty and want in this country in the last six years than we have seen since the Great Depression.

I was born many years after the Great Depression, but my family lived through it, mostly in the coal mining towns of Cape Breton. I heard about what it was like. I heard about children starving to death. I heard about people freezing to death for want of heat and light. It is programs like the Canada Assistance Plan that provide a buffer against that kind of horror.

I stand here today proud of my country. I am passionately committed to my country and utterly determined that it is going to come through the crisis it is in, a better place than it was before. It will be a country that comprehends our regional, language and cultural differences. It will be one in which all Canadians can be strong together. But you know, it does not matter if we preserve our cultures and our two great languages. It does not matter what we do with any of these things, or whether we have asymmetrical federalism or an elected Senate. It does not matter to any of us as the duly elected representatives of the people, if there are people starving, going without, and living in want from Victoria to St. John's, from Windsor to Inuvik, because we are responsible. As responsible people we must continue to support the Canada Assistance Plan and not see it diminished nor allow our social safety net to be taken away. This is a Canadian heritage and a Canadian trust that is as important as our languages and our cultures and any of our other institutions, and we must preserve it. It is not a question of "should we", it is a question of "we must". Anything less is unacceptable.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, as we resume debate on this bill today, I just want to reiterate a little bit of history here. It was back in 1966 when this bill was introduced into the House. As a matter of fact, on April 4, 1966, the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, who was then Minister of National Health and Welfare, rose in his place in this House and stated that he was moving:

> That the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution which has been recommended to the House by His Excellency.

It went on to outline in that resolution the things that were going to be covered by the bill that would follow. The resolution stated:

> It is expedient to introduce a measure to be known as the Canada Assistance Plan to establish a program for sharing with the provinces in the cost of assistance, including health care and welfare services provided to or in respect of persons in need, including mothers and children, older persons, disabled persons and unemployed persons who are in need, and in the cost of developing and improving assistance in welfare services programs, including child and youth welfare programs throughout Canada.

At this stage I would just like to comment that these provisions were necessary because after coming out of the Depression of the 1930s, it was clearly visible in anybody's mind that the provinces could not afford all these social services that were required by the residents of their individual provinces. This was another way during the Pearson administration in 1966 that the government of the day provided for assistance to those provinces to help them out in the tremendous costs that they had to bear in these fields.

The bill also stated and I quote:

> —provided for the making of arrangements for extending provincial welfare programs with the approval of Indian bands to Indians with reserve status and for the making of payments to the provinces with respect to the cost of so extending those programs, to provide for the making of payments to the provinces with respect to the cost of specialized projects for assisting and rehabilitating persons in need or likely to become persons in need who have unusual difficulty in obtaining or holding employment, to provide for amendments to the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act, the Disabled Persons Act and the Unemployment Assistance Act, that are incidental to or consequential on the introduction of the Canada Assistance Plan, and to provide further for the extension of the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act to the Canada Assistance Plan.

The reason why I listed those was simply to put right up front the importance of this legislation that is before the House today. If the federal government is going to move away from that kind of support to the provinces of Canada then with the pressures that are on all levels of government today, which is unfortunately sifting right down to tremendous pressure on municipal governments across the country in terms of social programs, I think it is incumbent upon the federal government to keep faith with the provinces in this country.

My hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood today got into some economics of what people can afford. People who are employed will provide funds to help finance things such as the Canada Assistance Plan. In this legislation the three provinces that are affected very negatively financially are Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta.

I had a constituent, a businessman, tell me he had been to Toronto recently. He had not been there for some time. He took the usual route from Toronto to Oshawa and on down 401. He said that he could not get over the number of empty office buildings, the number of empty office spaces, the number of empty manufacturing plants in that 40–mile space from Toronto to Oshawa. This tells a story in itself and relates directly to what we are talking about here today.

Ontario has always been looked to in past years to finance at least 40 per cent of the cost of social programs right across the entire country. It is obvious that today Ontario has serious economic problems. Many noted in the press last week that 469,000 jobs have been lost in Ontario. That means those people are not paying income tax to the extent they would normally.

It means that the businesses for which they worked are not paying corporation taxes or business taxes of any kind. That is taking away from the financial structure. It is taking away from the tax base of Ontario. It means that the economic base, the tax base here in Ontario, is eroding terribly. It means that the very tax base of a large part of the Canadian financial structure is not there today.

This is no time for the federal government to be saying to the provinces, and particularly those three provinces that are negatively affected by this bill: "You are going to get less. You are going to be nailed down to a flat sum and at a time when your economic base has eroded, you are going to have to find a way on your own to provide those services for your people", all those services which I originally mentioned when I started my speech.

This is not what you call national leadership in the country. It is saying to individual segments in the country: "You must go it on your own". That is not the way that the constitutional framework of Canada works. Going right back to the deep Depression of the thirties, the Rowell—Sirois commission report of 1937 was put in place to rearrange the taxation methods of the country, to say what taxation areas the provinces should have, what taxation areas the federal government should have, to put the tax system in place because the Depression years totally destroyed the old framework of taxation in Canada.

In closing, I simply want to make this very valid point. History will prove I am correct. There is no way that the national government of this country can go on neglecting its leadership in the financial administration. I maintain that in very short order we will need another royal commission of highly qualified people of this country—judges, financiers—to bring in a new report and to fix the damage that has been done to the allocation of the tax structure of this country by this government.

I hope this report will be done as well as the Rowell-Sirois commission report. If this is not done, this country is in serious straits. The provinces will tend not to look to Ottawa as the leader and this will be bad for the national unity of the country.

The bottom line is that the government must be there to lead.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I had a number of comments I wanted to make on this bill. In order to be able to make my full remarks, and it being five minutes to one, I wonder if the House would be disposed to call it one o'clock, given that there are only six minutes left. If not, I will interrupt my remarks and make them in part this morning and in part this afternoon. Can I ask for the unanimous consent to call it one o'clock so that I may be able to make my remarks uninterrupted?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for suspending the sitting and resuming debate at 2 p.m? Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will therefore suspend the sitting until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 12.46 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

DRUG ABUSE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the proliferation of drugs in our communities, school yards and playgrounds has become the calamity of the 1990s. Our youth have become the prime target for the drug trade which not only saps their youth but all too often causes anguish for the families involved.

The increase in the illegal drug trade in metro Toronto, accompanied by the related violence, has worsened of late and has stretched the resources of our local police forces to their limits.

In an effort to help those on the front lines continue their battle against drugs, I urge the government to amend the Narcotics Control Act and share the seized assets as a result of a drug conviction with the local police forces and community organizations, instead of returning all moneys to general revenues.

Along with York West constituents who have helped collect thousands of signatures on petitions to support this campaign, I call upon the government to immediately act upon this community initiative and help end this plague.

This problem will be won or lost on the local battlefields and therefore those waging the fight locally must be given the tools with which to overcome and to ensure victory.

OLYMPICS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, as we are on the countdown to the Olympics which officially begin this weekend, I would like to commend and wish our athletes well.

Many of us, including golfers and/or tennis players, took heart with what our Davis Cup team almost did in Vancouver last weekend. Our athletes at Albertville in the Alps are looking and dreaming of their gold, their bronze and their silver. I think it is only correct that as we are spaced out in this country on constitutions that we know we have those athletes who are not spaced out on constitutions but are spaced out on their own physical achievements. We wish them well.

We in this House, Mr. Speaker, deserve special credit because the daughter of a colleague of mine, the hon. member for Calgary Northeast, is on the official Olympic team as a freestyle skier. We wish her and all her companions well. They have faith in themselves, they have faith in their country. We have faith in them, we have faith in this country. We put our hopes in them and we wish them well.

AEROVOX CANADA INC.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the town of Amherst was shocked to learn of the planned closing of Amherst Aerovox, a subsidiary of an American firm. After the initial shock, the town and area are gathering up its resources and fighting back.

Already the Amherst Aerovox Community Committee has raised $100,000 to be used to search for products, partners or new owners for this factory. The team is made up of local business and development people who have knowledge of the industry and contacts which hopefully will prove successful in finding a solution.

The provincial Department of Economic Development is assisting with funding, resource people and material. The federal Department of Industry, Science and Technology has also provided information and assistance. The Cumberland Development Authority is acting as central office for the group. The Amherst and Area Development Commission has provided funding and manpower. The company has added funding as well. Canada Employment and Immigration is providing an industrial adjustment program to help the employees adjust and ACOA has acted quickly and significantly to provide funding and resources.

The search for products, partners and matching businesses has begun and will continue until a solution is found. We will leave no stone unturned to solve this issue in the interests of the 62 employees affected.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT WEEK

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, this is International Development Week in Canada. Again, Development Week falls in the midst of a global recession but this is not the time for Canada to reduce her budget for ODA.

This recession is hurting Canadians deeply, however, as usual the hardest hit are the world's poorest. Rarely have developing countries needed our help more than now.

The United Nations Development Program continues to highlight dramatic disparities between North and South, and UNICEF tells us that one quarter of a million children died last year from starvation or disease.

Canada must not back away from her obligations to the developing world. We must ensure that our development assistance provides the greatest possible benefit to the recipients. The government must work more closely with Canada's development NGOs to ensure that our ODA goals are met.

As final preparations are made for the budget, the government must be reminded of the negative effects for Canada and for developing countries of any cuts or dilution of Canadian ODA. As Canadians, we can make a difference if our government will help us.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we are off to a bad start for Canada's 125th birthday.

When invitations for the festivities were sent out to Canadians, Quebec's anglophone Canadians received theirs in French only, and one million francophones outside Quebec received theirs in English only. Was this an oversight?

Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that this country has two official languages, and we should respect that fact. One would expect an agency receiving $50 million from the federal government through the responsible department, the Department of the Secretary of State, to do better than that.

The government argues that the organizing committee is independent and accountable only to itself, but the fact remains that it is spending public funds. I think the Official Languages Committee, which has not met since last October, should shed some light on this matter and prevent further unfortunate incidents of this kind. This is an invitation to celebrate Canada's birthday, which is celebrated in both official languages of this country.

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Aur Resources mine in Abitibi, which is part of the Aur-Louvem group, will be operational in 1994, as soon as the infrastructures have been built: two exploration shafts, one pithead and one concentrator with a capacity of 5,000 tons per day.

This represents an investment of $326 million that will stimulate the economy of Val d'Or, located about ten kilometres from the mine. It is expected that 500 well-paying jobs will be created immediately, and the spin-offs of the exploration costs are estimated at $950 million over 14 years.

Mr. James Gill, president of Aur, seems to have succeeded in financing the mine without losing control over the company or diluting its stock. This was a complex operation that required months of negotiation.

Mr. Speaker, the mine's proven reserves are expected to produce revenues totalling $2 billion in Canadian funds during the 14 years it is expected to be in operation.

It is the biggest deposit ever found in this country since the Hemlo deposit was found in northeastern Ontario in the early 80s.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the procedure of the environmental assessment hearings into the construction of three additional runways at Canada's most overcrowded airport, Pearson International in Toronto, is quickly drawing to a close. Presentations to the review panel note that Pearson is at its capacity and noise is intolerable.

• (1410)

Transport Canada says the new runways will solve all the problems, but it fails to understand that 3, 5, 10 or 15 new runways will not make a bit of difference. The runways will allow more planes to fly in and out but passengers will not be able to board or deplane because there are not enough gates for the planes.

There is an opportunity to be had here. Instead of wasting millions on new runways at Pearson, Hamilton airport can be developed to handle more air traffic. A GO link could shuttle passengers quickly between Hamilton and Pearson International as is done in other major centres around the world.

Transport Canada and this government must develop a multimodal strategy on transportation with a view to future need, not short-term political gain.

MACEDONIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday I had the honour of attending a luncheon in Toronto hosted by businessman John Bitove to meet Macedonian President Kiro Gligorov. President Gligorov was elected to head the newly independent Republic of Macedonia on January 27, 1991.

In 1944, Macedonia was taken over by the federal Yugoslav government. Finally, after a long, suffering struggle spanning almost five decades, Macedonia held a referendum on independence and declared itself independent on November 17, 1991. The overwhelming results freed Macedonia from the shackles of communism and the yoke of Yugoslavia.

It is time for Canada to recognize this proud, independent republic. Without the world's recognition, Macedonians cannot be properly represented on the world stage.

HOME OWNERSHIP

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and our government have just taken a timely initiative that will enable 200,000 Canadians to own a home, by allowing a down payment of 5 per cent instead of 10 per cent to buy a house. This will benefit over 200,000 Canadians, including thousands of Quebecers, who, especially in isolated regions, did not have the income that was previously required for home ownership.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this favorable measure will help get the economy out of our present recession. This finally shows our government's great ability in taking tough measures to fight inflation and to lower interest rates when they were called for. It was unthinkable to bring in such a measure any sooner. However, this government can present incentives for home ownership. I say bravo. There will be more in the budget.

CHINESE NEW YEAR

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, today is Chinese New Year. Chinese Canadians are celebrating the Year of the Monkey while Vietnamese Canadians celebrate Tête.

The past year has seen more Chinese families reunited through immigration, business investments have increased and young Chinese Canadians continue to excel in scholarship and in professions. Canadians of Chinese origin are making a rich contribution to our multicultural Canada.

Chinese New Year is a time of hope and renewal. Chinese Canadians have waited patiently and worked hard for recognition of past injustices that early settlers suffered as a result of the racist head tax and the Chinese exclusion act. Once again, I call on the government to acknowledge these injustices with appropriate redress.

I also urge all parties to support constitutional amendments that will protect minorities from future discrimination.

May the Year of the Monkey bring a renewed Canada with health, happiness and prosperity for all Canadians. Kong Hai Fatt Choy.

HOME OWNERSHIP

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the government approved a plan to allow first-time home buyers to get 95 per cent financing on their real estate purchase.

That is great news. What was not so great was the attempt of the Leader of the Opposition to claim credit for an idea the government has been working on for a very long time. Canadians do not care where the ideas come from. They just want good ones.

Five per cent down is good, as long as home buyers are careful not to over-mortgage themselves. The lowest mortgage rates in over two decades is also a good idea, making this an excellent time to buy.

Finally, being able to use RRSP funds for first-time home purchases is another good idea, supported by many MPs on both sides of the House. We all urge the finance minister to listen, to reflect and just do it in the next budget.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT WEEK

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, yes, this week has been proclaimed International Development Week, but it will only be meaningful if the government commits and restates its policy targets of directing Canadian aid to benefit the poorest populations in developing nations.

Linking human rights to aid is laudatory, but only if those already oppressed are not further victimized. It cannot be used as an excuse to cut back on Canada's total aid budget nor cynically to target those developing countries for linked cutbacks that do not bring immediate economic benefits through trade to Canada.

When determining aid policies particular regard must be given to recipient government budgets and policies, their military versus social expenditures, women and child support initiatives, and environment and population problems. The economics of globalization must not continue to dominate our development efforts. Aid must not be conditional to a debt ridden country accepting punitive structural adjustment measures. The emphasis must be put on more substantive debt relief to the world's poorest countries, particularly those in Africa, and on direct poverty alleviation through health and education programs.

Canada's and global security depend on our continuing commitment to the poor of the world. International Development Week can be an important opportunity to strengthen Canadian resolve to that end.

HOME OWNERSHIP

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, $5,000 is now enough to buy a $100,000 house.

The federal government, through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, is doing its part to help individuals own a home.

The Loan Insurance Program for new home owners will reduce the minimum down payment required for buyers of a first house, whether new or previously built, from 10 per cent to 5 per cent for mortgage loans insured by the Canadian government.

This initiative, which takes effect immediately, will boost the construction industry in Canada for the next two years and give about 200,000 Canadian households which now rent their accommodation the chance to own their home.

Together with lower interest rates and the present state of the real estate market, this program should stimulate the economy and increase the chances of home ownership for many Canadians.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, small business is under considerable strain today for a variety of reasons, one of which I strongly believe is the paper burden we place upon it. Small businesses in my constituency continue to press me to get our government to attack this problem.

I am well aware of the commendable efforts being undertaken by my colleague, the hon. Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. We must not only support his initiatives but assist his efforts by providing feedback to his department from all constituents.

I urge all members of this House to participate in this effort, not to only facilitate productivity and growth in our small business sector but to reduce our costs as well.

CANADA—UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, prior to the free trade agreement coming into effect in January 1989, Employment Canada had a unit that was responsible for collecting information. Regional offices would phone in daily any closures occurring. This unit was cut due to government cutbacks just prior to the free trade agreement.

Once the free trade agreement was in place, demand for information increased and the government produced a report every two weeks.

In trying to track down this list recently I found that there is only one being compiled. In fact Labour Canada uses this list for its purposes. For example, earlier this month Labour Canada requested a list of closures in Quebec and a handwritten list was supplied.

I think my question is one that we all must ponder. Is the government trying to hide how many permanent lay-offs and lost jobs there have been due to the free trade agreement? If it is not, it has a responsibility to make sure not just parliamentarians but all Canadians know what permanent lay-offs have taken place.

Oral Questions

BUY CANADIAN

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, if we are as concerned about plant closings and manufacturing job losses as we say we are, why don't we buy Canadian?

In 1980, 73 per cent of the manufactured goods purchased in Canada were made in Canada. Today it is down to only 56 per cent and falling.

The Hudson's Bay Company says it wants to import more U.S. goods to compete with cross-border shopping on price and selection. If Canadian distributors do not market Canadian products and if Canadian retailers do not carry Canadian goods, Canadian consumers do not even have the option to buy the fewer and fewer products that we do manufacture. Sure, price and selection are important, but if we do not have jobs we cannot afford to buy no matter what the price and selection may be.

Fortunately Eaton's has announced a buy Canadian promotion campaign. Will the government join it?

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in a new spirit of co-operation I would like to thank the minister responsible for housing for doing his part in implementing the Chrétien plan to get this country working again.

My question, however, is for the Minister of Finance because I would like to know whether other ministers are prepared to put partisan politics aside and do their part to put Canadians back to work. Will the Minister of Finance allow the use of RRSPs to finance first home purchases?

We know the minister is looking at the plan. We are even willing to let the minister take credit for this plan if he will just put Canadians back to work. Why is he stalling on adopting this idea? Why doesn't he make the announcement today to put thousands of Canadians back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House yesterday, that issue is under active consideration.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I don't know where the minister spent his time during the Christmas vacation, but I do know that there are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians, including some who just lost their jobs in Sarnia, and that 700,000 children depend on food banks. We need a program to rebuild this country. The Liberal program for public works will help rebuild roads, clean up the environment and give industry work to do. Is the Minister of Finance prepared to adopt the five-point Liberal plan and put Canada back to work?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks what I was doing over the Christmas recess.

I was working with my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, putting together a deal that helped bail out de Havilland and put it back on a viable sound financial basis. I was working with my colleague, the Minister of Communications, on a book publishing program. I was working on reform of the equalization program for the provinces which particularly helped the poorer provinces, and I was working on a number of other initiatives that we are announcing on an ongoing basis.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I asked whether the minister had a chance during his busy schedule to meet with a million and a half Canadians who are looking for work.

The government has found emergency money for massive polling programs and massive advertising programs. Doesn't the Minister of Finance think it would be a lot smarter to get manufacturing and construction back on track with a national public works program rather than sit there while unemployment increases and food banks multiply?

Since the government has created the recession, why doesn't this Minister of Finance break from past policy and for once adopt the Liberal Party's five-point plan?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House and on other occasions, I have had extensive consultations with various groups from all walks of life in the preparation of the budget. The seven meetings involved representatives from labour, social groups, poverty groups, the disabled, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Bankers' Association, trust companies and insurance companies. We heard from them all and they all came through with some very clear themes. One was a very clear theme that Canadians want governments to live within their means. They want us to pay as we go. They do not want new taxes and the do not want higher deficits.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Reports on the depletion of the ozone layer right over Canadians' heads and its impact on the number of cancers are alarming. Last October, in spite of our pressure here in the House, the government refused to act more quickly, which is quite incomprehensible.

Will the minister promise immediately here today to eliminate by 1995 all chemicals that threaten the ozone layer and to put pressure on the rest of the world to do the same?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to an environmental situation, or problem, that well illustrates the challenges awaiting us in years to come. We have a problem of ozone depletion, which according to scientific studies is very serious. Canada has always taken the problem very seriously. However, Canada accounts for about 2 per cent of the ozone-depleting gases. Mr. Speaker, that illustrates the kind of problem we will have in future years.

The hon. member seems to be saying that Canada or the government has not paid attention to this problem. Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you very clearly that that is absolutely not so. In fact, Canada is four years ahead of the timetable it set for reducing these substances. We reduced them by 45 per cent from their 1986 levels and we played a leading role, since the first environmental treaty, the Montreal protocol, was signed under this government's authority in 1987.

The Canadian government, Mr. Speaker, intends to maintain its leading role in fighting ozone depletion.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

Unfortunately we have lost that position of leadership. This is a problem which exists now about Canada. The Germans, the Swedes and the Norwegians are well ahead of us.

However, there is also another question which is of immediate urgency in dealing with the depletion of the ozone layer. The green plan states that Canadians will be provided with warnings of ultraviolet radiation, but only in 1993. That is not good enough.

Will the government undertake to provide Canadians with daily alert warnings as is done in Australia by this April, following what NASA predicts will be a 30 per cent to 40 per cent depletion in the ozone layer and a major rise in the incidence of cancer across the country?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me use this opportunity to update the hon. member on what Canada has been doing in this area. In fact we have been instrumental in putting together the Montreal protocol signed in 1987, the world's first environmental international treaty.

We have reduced by 45 per cent the amount of CFCs going into the atmosphere. As a result of that we are now four years ahead of schedule according to what the Montreal protocol has set as a deadline. We think that we can in fact go faster than that. At the meeting of the countries involved in the Montreal protocol next November we will be pressing other countries to accelerate the phase-out of CFCs. Canada intends to maintain that leadership position.

I recently announced, I think it was in August, a $25 million initiative to assist us in meeting our objectives. Among the initiatives announced in August was in fact an initiative that will enable the Government of Canada to put out warnings of ultraviolet rays. I will be more than happy to look at anything we can do to accelerate that process given that financial commitment and some resources.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

There is increasing concern on the part of Canadian farmers and food producers that this government is letting down our farmers and producers at the current GATT negotiations.

The industry estimates that 100,000 Canadians will lose their jobs if the government signs a GATT deal that does not protect the Canadian supply marketing board system. For those 100,000 Canadians who could lose their jobs, in financial terms alone it would mean $243,000 a week in unemployment insurance. That is $12.5 million next year.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to sign such a deal and, if he is prepared to sign it, where will the extra funding for unemployment insurance come from? From a higher deficit or higher taxes?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the position put forward by the Government of Canada in the GATT negotiations was a position derived from consultation with the stakeholders, those very producers she is talking about.

Our position is to have GATT clarify and strengthen article XI. That was the position the supply management industries gave to the Government of Canada. That is our position today.

The hon. member also knows, as do the supply management industries, that under the existing GATT agreement and article XI they are very vulnerable. We as a government have taken their suggestion and we are putting forward their position.

That is the position of the Government of Canada and we will continue to work for it.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I understand the Government of Canada is trying to get a clarification but it seems to me the message coming clearly the last few days and weeks is that the government is not strong in its position and is presenting other alternatives. I want to ask the minister—

[Translation]

Did the government study the impact of this proposal? If not, how can it think of signing such an agreement without knowing what its impact will be? If so, why not share this information with the farmers and the House of Commons?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity personally to meet farm leaders, particularly from Quebec, two or three times since December 20. The UPA in particular asked us to share with them figures on the impact of the Dunkel report.

Of course, our government did not change its position at GATT one iota, Mr. Speaker. We continue to advocate zealously that article XI be clarified and strengthened. Nevertheless, it is very important that, at the farmers' request, we do check on all the ramifications of the report so that we can defend them properly in Geneva.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that Quebec farmers are very concerned because if article XI of GATT goes through, 30,000 milk producers may be out of work.

[English]

At the end of the day, Mr. Speaker, the government will have to sign or not sign a deal. We need to have good negotiators there. There are people in Canada who believe if we lose the supply management system through a GATT deal, this deal will do the same to rural Canada as the trade deal has done to urban Canada and we do not want to see that happen.

I want to ask the Prime Minister what he is prepared to do for the 100,000 Canadians who could lose their jobs if we do not stand up for Canadian farmers and producers in this GATT negotiation.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, one of the important aspects of supply management is the quota. The quota those people have is derived from the revenue they received from a supply managed industry. What I have just seen and what I have just heard is certainly one of the most damaging statements ever made by a political leader and will bring down the quota value for those very producers that she is talking about supporting.

What I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member is that the Government of Canada developed a position with the stakeholders. The stakeholders understand that the present article XI leaves them very vulnerable. They have said: "This is one way of maintaining it.". We say: "That is the way we want to have it maintained". However, the hon. member understands something else.

The support we need is what we are continuing to request and seek of other countries but Canada alone, out of 108 countries, is not able to change the negotiations. Canada, joined with other countries, is able to be successful and that is what we will continue to do.

This government has no intention of changing the position. It was developed with the stakeholders. It will be consistent in the benefit of those stakeholders and if they support us, we will be stronger in presenting our position.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The minister should be aware that the head of Canada's supply management commodities said today that the government's acceptance of the GATT would destroy their $10 billion industry and put in jeopardy nearly 95,000 Canadian jobs.

They have also requested that the government not submit tariff schedules for supply managed products March 1 as requested by Dunkel. Will the government table or not table these tariffs by March 1? Canadian farmers have a right to know.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it might be of interest to the hon. member that while I was in Switzerland this past weekend, I had a number of meetings with my counterparts from other countries and presented the position as set out by my two colleagues on what we are seeking through the GATT negotiations in relation to the supply management system.

We have meetings of agriculture ministers this week, trade ministers next week. There will be meetings of the government with the supply management sectors and based on that series of meetings we will be able to develop in concert with all the interested parties the answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his response, but my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister should be aware that farm leaders of supply managed commodities have requested that he meet with them in February to discuss this very important issue. Will the Prime Minister meet with these leaders in February and will he reassure them that he rejects the present GATT proposals as they relate to supply management?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have met with the agricultural leaders on a number of occasions.

The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Agriculture are setting up precisely the meeting that my hon. friend is seeking. I think it is very important that the leaders of all of the farm groups, particularly these days in respect of marketing boards, have an opportunity to discuss with the government in a very full and open way the concerns that they have about international negotiations.

I point out to my hon. friend, the NDP and others from the Liberal Party who is raising it, that in questioning the conduct of negotiation policy by the Government of Canada at GATT, it might have been appropriate to mention that the premier of Quebec who was also actively involved with this farm problem indicated the day before yesterday that

[Translation]

Premier Bourassa has full confidence in the Minister for International Trade to negotiate the new GATT agreements and he thinks that Quebec is better protected by the plan on which we are now working than with the present formula.

[English]

I was very glad of that statement by the premier of Quebec because it represents confidence in the policies that we have been following. But we have to do more and we have to make sure that all of the farm groups are more actively associated with our initiatives so that we can better defend their very legitimate interests at the GATT.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the economic crisis that Canada is going through has been particularly damaging to our youth.

While this government speaks at length about global competitiveness and its prosperity agenda, over 350,000 young Canadians are unemployed and many others are on the welfare rolls of this nation.

My question to the Minister of Employment is this. When is he going to realize that his government's policies are creating a lost generation of young workers condemned to a life of chronic unemployment? When will he introduce a meaningful program that will put our young people back to work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the government and the Department of Employment and Immigration have a host of programs trying to be helpful to Canadians of whatever age who are facing the downturn of the economy.

If the hon. member thinks that the $3 billion we spend to help these people is not enough, he could tell us where to take it from. Should we increase taxes or do we increase the deficit? If he has ideas as to how we could better spend that $3 billion I would be ready to listen to him.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, everywhere I go, in every community, in every town and in every city throughout this country, I find young people who fear for their future and the future direction of this nation.

My supplementary question to the same minister is this. What does the future have in store for Canada when 350,000 young people are being denied their rightful opportunity to a job and training? Who does the minister think will guarantee our future prosperity?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, over 470,000 Canadians take advantage of the programs that we have at Employment and Immigration. The way for these kids to tackle the future is to embark with all social partners in society into making Canada a more competitive country. This will ensure prosperity. That will be done through learning. That will be done through acquiring new skills. This is exactly what the initiative of the government is all about.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The alarming discovery of 30 to 40 per cent ozone depletion over northern and eastern Canada cries out for both government action as well as for early warnings. Since most of the ozone destruction results from the release of man-made chemicals such as CFCs and since this level of measured ozone destruction increases cancer by 120 to 160 per cent, increases eye damage by 18 to 24 per cent, reduces crop yield by 30 to 40 per cent and simply kills some forms of life, will the minister show leadership on the seriousness of this issue and implement an immediate national full cycle mandatory CFC recovery program, a program that this caucus will pass through this House in one day?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for Skeena for his question and having had the courtesy of informing me of the thrust of his question before Question Period.

It is important to reiterate the fact that this is an illustration of the global environmental challenges that the planet faces in the years to come. On the one hand we are faced with a problem that may have very dramatic effects on all of our country because of its geography while on the other hand we contribute 2 per cent to the total problem.

As I pointed out before, Canada has really been in the forefront in dealing with this issue. We were instrumental in putting together the first environmental treaty at the 1987 Montreal protocol. We have reduced the amount of CFCs by 45 per cent since then and we think we can eliminate at least 85 per cent of CFCs by 1995, away ahead of schedule.

We are dealing with the provinces on the issue of mandatory recycling. I will be happy to keep my friend abreast of the developments in that area.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): The problem is that in some sectors, such as with scrap refrigerators, 100 per cent of the CFCs are being vented and are leaking into the atmosphere.

Part of the NDP plan I am talking about to protect the ozone layer would require the implementation of full cycle national recovery. You need laws to do that. This is a plan that would create thousands of jobs in the private sector. It would create a private sector industry of over $100 million in value. It would protect the ozone and it would not require one new dollar of federal taxes, not one new dollar of federal expenditure.

That sounds like a pretty good plan to help protect the planet. Will the minister implement it?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the member will know that in fact we are a bit ahead of the game. Not only a bit, but very much ahead of the game in this area.

Last August the federal government announced through the green plan a $25 million initiative which has as a specific objective the acceleration of regulatory programs in this area. We are working very closely with the provinces to determine whether or not a regulatory regime would be necessary, given the fact that we will be reducing by 85 per cent the amount of CFCs we put in the atmosphere by 1995. We are away ahead of schedule.

That being said and the seriousness of the problem, given the leadership role that this government has always played on this issue and the seriousness of the issue, I will undertake to communicate directly with my provincial colleagues on the suggestion made by my hon. colleague to see whether or not the Canadian Council of the Ministers of the Environment would want to undertake some specific action, given the new scientific information we have.

Furthermore, at the next meeting of the countries that signed the Montreal protocol in November 1992, Canada will ask that we accelerate the schedule for phasing out CFCs.

BANKRUPTCY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The 1991 bankruptcy statistics are in and they are truly devastating. Over 75,000 Canadian men, women and businesses have gone belly up, the true victims of this government's insane high interest, high dollar, high tax policy.

How much economic devastation will we have to endure before the government abandons the destructive economic policies which have directly resulted in the highest level of bankruptcies in the history of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that last conclusion is absolutely false because the incidence of bankruptcies was much higher in the 1981–82 recession.
